6. Conversion, repentance, belief.—Baptism (q.v.) is then the seal (σφράγις) of repentance and conversion, the sign of admission to the new society which is the Body of Christ. Yet this never takes place without a change of heart; so much so that in the NT baptism of children is apparently never referred to (the meaning of 'household,' 1 Co 1<sup>16</sup>, is dubious). Here again it must be remembered that the NT nowhere deals with a long-established church, or with the questions which would naturally arise in one. But where baptism has not been preceded by a real conversion, the writers speak in no uncertain tone (cf. the case of Simon Magus, Ac 8<sup>9</sup>). What then is the relation of conversion to repentance? They are twice mentioned together (Ac 3<sup>19</sup> and 26<sup>9</sup>); repentance comes first in both cases: repentance (μετάνοια, change of mental attitude), it has been suggested, expresses the ethical aspect of the process, conversion the spiritual; or they may be called the negative and positive aspects. But they cannot be separated. If there is a turning from (repentance), there must be a turning to (conversion). Sometimes the initial impulse will be dislike for the old (cf. Starbuck and Hadley, ut infra), or the goodness of God will be felt as leading to repentance (Ro 2<sup>4</sup>; cf. Ezk 36<sup>31</sup>). But the two are parts of one process. The same thing must be said of belief. For belief is nothing but a turning or giving oneself to a person whose support is expected with confidence and whose will is accepted as a command to be obeyed. And since these commands cannot be obeyed without ceasing to do what is inconsistent with them, belief really includes what we have called both the negative and the positive.

7. Individual instances.—Less can be learnt from these, as referred to in the NT, than might have been expected. Of the conversions of Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, and the rest of St. Paul's great co-adjutors, we know nothing. The Ethiopian eunuch has already been referred to. Cornelius (Ac 10<sup>1ff</sup>), as a proselyte, has already broken with his heathen manner of life, and his passing over to belief in Christ is secured by his vision; St. Peter's discourse simply completes the process: to adopt Seeberg's suggestive phrase, Belehrung is ended by Bekehrung. Lydia also, who is apparently a proselyte, believes while St. Paul is preaching (Ac 16<sup>14</sup>), and at once shows the change wrought in her by offering to entertain the Apostle. The Philippian jailer, blurring out in his terror a cry almost of despair (Ac 16<sup>30</sup>), receives an answer which must have seemed quite meaningless to him at first; and then, as the result of a discourse which is unfortunately not preserved for us, believes and is baptized. Whether any conversions took place at Malta as the result of St. Paul's stay there is unknown. The above instances are all of Gentiles. The appeal which led to the conversion of Jews would seem to be that which St. Paul used to Agrippa: 'the redeeming work of the Messiah is foretold or implied by the prophets; you believe the prophets; therefore you must believe in the Messiah, Jesus whom we preach' (Ac 18<sup>5</sup> 26<sup>22, 27</sup>; Lk 24<sup>27</sup>). In the case of St. Paul we have two accounts purporting to come from his own lips (Ac 22, 26), and for the third (Ac 9) he must have been the authority. Certainly, he did not turn from any outward works of darkness (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>); he may have been prepared previously, like Cornelius, though unconsciously; but when the change came, in a blinding flash of celestial light, it meant an instant and entire transference of his loyalty and a complete destruction of his old self-esteem. The culmination of his conversion, leading to baptism, was brought about, as in the case of Cornelius, through two mutually dependent visions, and actual instruction from a disciple. For St. Paul, it was a turning from darkness to light, a revealing of the Son of God in him (Gal 1<sup>16</sup>); but the only works of the flesh whose renunciation was involved were anger, pride and hatred, and these he, like his friends, would probably have considered, up to the crisis, as positive virtues. Was this perhaps the reason why anger, hatred, malice and strife find such a prominent place in his later catalogues of evil deeds?

8. To turn: transitive or intransitive?—We have left to the last the difficult question whether man turns to God or God turns man to Himself. The language of the NT gives little assistance (see § 1). Where the verb is not intransitive, the subject is a man (Ja 5<sup>18, 20</sup>, and perhaps Ac 26<sup>18</sup>), and elsewhere we have simply the passive voice (1 P 2<sup>-5</sup>), with no reference to the agent. But it is impossible to leave the share of God in the process (Eph 2<sup>5</sup>, Col 2<sup>15</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, He 10<sup>32</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>, Ro 11<sup>30</sup>) or the connexion between conversion and salvation (1 Co 12<sup>1</sup>, Ro 10<sup>13</sup>). But the question of the relative importance of the action of God and of man in conversion never occurred to the NT writers; and a closer examination of the whole subject will show that it is not a case of 'either . . . or.' According to our point of view, we may see the act as wholly God's or wholly man's. Exhorting the sinner, the preacher will say, 'Turn to God'; looking back on the act, the sinner will say, 'God turned me to Himself'; or else we may use language which admirably and daringly combines the two, employing the imperative of the passive voice, 'Be ye reconciled to God' (2 Co 5<sup>-0</sup>). Conversion itself rests on the Atonement; man must be made 'at one' with God, and yet this cannot be done unless, at that very moment, he makes himself 'at one.'

The question appears a difficult one just because the answer is involved in the simplest processes of action. All action between persons is interaction. It is the union of two elements to bring a third to the birth. We may for the moment overlook either the one or the other; but both are there. And the two are really one. William James's theory of the subliminal is suggestive: conversion results from the breaking up of the fountains of the great spiritual deep; there is a 'subliminal uprush' in me; and a flood of perceptions, feelings, loves and hates, of which I had hitherto been quite unconscious, gives me a new conception of myself and my life. The correctness of this account cannot here be discussed. It appears to cover much in the vast changes described so simply in the NT. It leaves room for, but it does not actually state, the main factor in every NT reference to conversion, and this is neither a new moral ideal nor a fresh conception of oneself, but the redeeming love of a God of mercy and righteousness, to whom the sinner turns in repentance and by whose goodness that turning is encompassed and made possible.

COPPERSMITH (χαλκεύς, 2 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>).—The Greek word properly denoted a worker in χαλκός (aes)—a term applied indifferently both to copper and its alloys—and more generally a worker in any metal. Copper was the first ore men learned to smelt and work: 'Prius aeris erat quam ferri cognitus usus' (Lucret. v. 1292). The handicraft of the copper-smith was therefore very ancient. Later, when iron came into use, χαλκεύς was extended to include workers in the new ore, σιδηρεὺς being a term rarely employed. In the LXX Tubal-cain is described as a χαλκεύς χαλκοῦ καὶ σιδήρου (Gn 4<sup>-2</sup>). Herodotus (i. 68) tells how Lichas, 'coming to a smithy, looked attentively at the iron being forged, and was struck with wonder when he saw what was done. The smith (χαλκεύς), perceiving his astonishment, desisted from his work.'

As the Romans drew their supply of aes chiefly from the island of Cyprus, it came to be termed aes cyprum, which was shortened to cyprum, and corrupted into cyprum, whence comes the Eng. word 'copper,' Fr. cuivre, Germ. Kupfer.

CORINTH (Κόρινθος).—Corinth was the commercial capital of Greece, and one of the first centres of Christian light in the continent of Europe. Occupying a commanding position at the southern extremity of the narrow isthmus which joined the Peloponnesus to the mainland of Greece, and under the steep northern side of the stupendous rock of Acrocorinthus (1800 ft. above sea-level) which formed one of nature's strongest fortresses, it enjoyed unique advantages alike for commerce and defence. 'Corinth of the two seas' ('bimaris Corinthus') [Hor. Car. i. vii. 2; Ovid, Met. v. 407] could not fail to become a great maritime power. Its western harbour, Lecheum, on the Corinthian Gulf, received the shipping of Italy, Sicily, and Spain; its eastern port, Cenchreæ (q.v.), on the Saronic Gulf, that of Asia Minor, Syria, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Instead of circumnavigating stormy Cape Malea, coasting ships regularly made for the Isthmus, where those of larger size transhipped their cargoes, whilst those of smaller tonnage were hauled from sea to sea on a tramway 5 miles long (διολκος). 'For goods exported from Peloponnesus, or imported by land, a toll was paid to those who had the keys of the country' (Strabo, VIII. vi. 20). As an emporium of the trade of the East and the West, Corinth grew into a splendid city, the home of merchant princes, adorned with Temples and filled with works of fine art.

Corinth was described as 'the bridge of the sea' (Pind. Nem. vi. 4), and 'the gate of the Peloponnesus' (Xen. Ages. 2). 'Prosperous (ευδαίμων) Corinth' is Herodotus' designation of old Corinth. 'The Corinthians,' says Thucydides, 'were very rich, as is shown by their poets, for they gave the title of αφνειός to the place' (Hist. i. 13). 'The city was rich and opulent at all times,' says Strabo (VII. vi. 23). At the zenith of its power it probably had a free population of 200,000, with half a million slaves employed in its fleet and in its numerous colonies.

Pillaged and razed to the ground by the Romans under Lucius Mummius in 146 B.C., Corinth lay desolate for a century, till Julius Cæsar refounded it in 46 B.C. as the Colonia Laus Julia Corinthus, peopling it with Roman veterans and freedmen. 'The copestone of the republican epoch was the atonement for the sack of Corinth made by the greatest of all Romans and of all Philhellenes, the dictator Cæsar, and the renewal of the star of Hellas in the form of an independent community of Roman citizens, the new "Julian Honour"' (Th. Mommsen, Provinces, Eng. tr.<sup>2</sup>, 1909, i. 260).

As the capital of the province of Achaia, and the seat of proconsular government, new Corinth became nearly as populous and prosperous as the old had been, again deriving a vast revenue from the sea, again developing its industries and cultivating its arts. Corinthian potters and especially workers in Corinthian brass—a mixture of gold, silver, and copper—were famous all over the world: 'nobilis aere Corinthus' (Ov. Met. vi. 416). The establishment of the Isthmian games in the sanctuary of Poseidon (Strabo, VIII. vi. 22) made the city a great centre of Hellenic life. But as it increased in wealth and refinement, it succumbed to the temptations of luxury. Theoretically, and not unnaturally, it was devoted to the cult of Poseidon, but practically it worshipped only Corinthian Aphrodite, who was doubtless no other than the Syrian Astarte of the original Phœnician settlers. Her temple had more than a thousand ιερόδουλοι—ministers of vice not found in other shrines of Greece, though common enough in those of Asia Minor—and 'the city was frequented and enriched by the multitudes who resorted thither on account of them' (Strabo, VIII. vi. 22). Corinth became proverbial for abysmal profligacy. 'To live like a Corinthian' (Κορινθιάζεσθαι) was a synonym for abandonment to immorality. When St. Paul wrote the appalling first page of his Epistle to the Romans, he had never seen Rome, but he had lived nearly two years in Corinth.

Into this centre of commerce, shrine of art, and vortex of iniquity St. Paul came probably in the autumn of A.D. 50. He came alone, depressed by the apparent failure of his preaching to the intellectuals of Athens, entering his new sphere of labour, as he confesses, with a sense of 'weakness and fear and much trembling' (1 Co 2<sup>3</sup>). But when his companions, Silas and Timothy, whom he had left in Philippi, rejoined him after some weeks, 'he was constrained by the word' (συνέχεται τῷ λόγῳ, Ac 18<sup>8</sup>). This probably means that to these companions it seemed as if all his energies were being 'compressed' into one channel, all his thoughts controlled by a master idea. Carlyle has shrewdly observed that 'the preaching man of our day has lost the point.' The greatest preacher of apostolic times had, perhaps after some humiliation, rediscovered the point. His profound philosophical disquisition in Athens—his noble attempt to find common ground with the speculative minds of Hellas—having apparently missed the mark, he determined not to repeat his error in Corinth; here he would preach nothing 'save Jesus Christ and him crucified' (1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>). He did not, of course, contemplate the preaching of a new gospel, for in the province of Galatia, and doubtless elsewhere, Christ had already been 'openly set forth crucified' (Gal 3<sup>1</sup>). But in Corinth he seemed to limit himself to one aspect of 'the word,' to preach the Cross with a new passion. His message, like his mind, was 'compressed.' The intensity of spirit with which Christ faced His own last task was indicated by the same word, πῶς συνέχουμαι, 'how am I straitened!' (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>).

The 'word of the cross,' preached with such fervour, wrought moral miracles in pleasure-loving Corinth. The spiritual attraction of Calvary was the counter charm to the sensual temptations of the corrupt city. Writing not long afterwards to his converts, St. Paul gives a black list of the various types of evil-doers in Corinth, and adds: 'such were some of you; but ye were washed, but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God' (1 Co 6<sup>9-11</sup>). And if he found that the inveterate habits of a light-hearted pagan society speedily re-asserted themselves even within the Church (1 Co 5<sup>1-13</sup>), it was still by the spiritual influence of the same sacrifice that the members of Christ's body were to make and to keep themselves pure (5<sup>6-8</sup>, 11-13, 6<sup>11-20</sup>).

St. Paul had not intended to remain long in Corinth, his heart being in Macedonia, to which he had been Divinely called (Ac 16<sup>9-10</sup>), and where his appointed task seemed scarcely begun. He would have quickly retraced his steps if certain difficulties, which seemed to him Satanic hindrances, could have been removed (1 Th 2<sup>17-18</sup>). But another night-vision (Ac 18<sup>9-10</sup>), attaching itself no doubt to waking thoughts which had begun to shape themselves in his mind, convinced him that it was now his duty to remain in Corinth, where many converts were to be won. As in other cities, he laboured there with his own hands, that his motives as a preacher might be above suspicion. Being of the same trade (οὐρέτης) with Aquila and Priscilla (q.v.), he accepted an invitation to live in their house (18<sup>3</sup>). In a commercial centre like Corinth the presence of Jews was a matter of course (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 36), and their numbers had lately been augmented by the edict of Claudius which banished all Jews from Rome (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>). A number of Greeks had gradually been attracted to the worship of the synagogue, in which St. Paul, adhering to his plan of going to the Jew first (Ro 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>9-10</sup>), 'reasoned every Sabbath' (Ac 18<sup>4</sup>), till the inevitable rupture took place (v. 6). He was then offered the use of the house of the 'God-fearing' Titus Justus, who was probably one of the Roman coloni, and who may have adopted the cognomen of Justus when he became a proselyte. The preaching of the gospel in such a house was calculated to win the ordinary Gentile population, who might have been slow to enter the synagogue.

The Corinthian converts were drawn from three classes of inhabitants—Roman colonists, Greek incole, and Jewish settlers. The number of those who bear Latin names—Lucius, Tertius, Quartus, Fortunatus, Achaicus (Ro 16<sup>1-3</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>17</sup>)—is striking. A few were men of some social standing, such as Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>), Gaius, who was hospitable to St. Paul and to 'the whole Church' (if this means that the Church met at his house, it is possible that he is to be identified with Titus Justus), and Erastus, the city treasurer (Ro 16<sup>23</sup>). Not many in philosophical, administrative, or aristocratic circles were called (1 Co 1<sup>6</sup>), and St. Paul glories in the apparent impotence of the means by which the gospel gains its victories: 'faex urbis lux orbis.' Yet Ramsay may be right, on the whole, in maintaining that in Corinth, as everywhere else, 'the work of the Christian Church was to create or to enlarge the educated, the thoughtful middle class' (Expositor, 6th ser., i. [1900] 98).

St. Paul's Corinthian experiences seem to have directed his attention to the central importance of the Church in Rome and to the attitude of the Imperial government to Christian missions. (1) His host and hostess, having lately come from Italy, were able to give him vivid first-hand intelligence regarding the world-city, which from this time certainly loomed large on his mental horizon: he 'must see Rome' (Ac 19<sup>21</sup>; cf. Ro 1<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>4</sup>). (2) His Corinthian trial, at the instance of jealous Jews, before the proconsul Gallio, the large-minded and tolerant brother of Seneca, on the charge of worshipping God 'contrary to the law,' a trial ending in his speedy and triumphant acquittal, not only made it clear to him that Christianity was a religio licita, which might be preached in any part of the Empire, but evidently confirmed his idea that the Imperial government might be regarded as a restraining power (1 Th 2<sup>7</sup>), which would give protection to law-abiding Christians, especially to Roman citizens, engaged in the peaceful work of evangelization.

In Corinth St. Paul initiated a form of missionary activity which proved immensely beneficial to all the churches—the writing of letters. From Corinth he dispatched 1 and 2 Thess., Rom., and possibly Gal.; and to Corinth he sent not only the two canonical Epistles which have come down to us, but apparently two others—referred to in 1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>8</sup>—one of which may be fragmentarily preserved in 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>-7<sup>1</sup>, while the other is perhaps to be found, in whole or in part, in 2 Co 10-13.

It was in the Church of Corinth, with its numerous types of converts and its astonishing variety of gifts (1 Co 1<sup>4</sup>-7 12<sup>4</sup>-10), that the first ecclesiastical divisions (σχίσματα, 1 Co 1<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>5</sup>) took place, with an accompanying hero-worship which detracted from the reverence due to Christ alone (1 Co 1<sup>10</sup>-13). For the party-strife, so characteristic of the democracy of Greek cities, in which persons were put before principles, the three leaders who, without being consulted, were set up as heads of rival factions, were in no way to blame. St. Peter probably never visited Corinth at all. Apollos laboured for a time in this city, and achieved much success among the Jews (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>), but nothing could have been finer than the mutual loyalty of St. Paul and Apollos (1 Co 3<sup>6</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 16<sup>12</sup>). Cf. also following article.

The Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians was written about A.D. 97. While commending their general tone and spirit, it contains an exhortation to concord among the members of the Church, which was still vexed by divisions. See art. CLEMENT OF ROME, EPISTLE OF.

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE.—1. Authenticity.—It is generally agreed that both these Epistles are rightly ascribed to St. Paul. As to 1 (or. the external evidence is remarkably strong. Clement of Rome directly appeals to it as the work of the 'Apostle Paul' (ad Cor. xlvii.: ἀναλάβετε τὴν ἐπιστολὴν τοῦ μακαρίου Παύλου τοῦ ἀποστόλου. τί πρῶτον ὑμῖν ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἔγραψεν; ἐπ' ἀληθείας πνευματικῶς ἐπέστειλεν ὑμῖν περὶ αὐτοῦ τε καὶ Κηφᾶ τε καὶ Ἀπολλῶ, διὰ τὸ καὶ τότε προσκλῆσαι ὑμᾶς πεποιθῆσθαι). The Epistle was certainly known also to Ignatius and Polycarp (cf. W. R. Inge, in The NT in the Apostolic Fathers, 1905, p. 67: 'Ignatius must have known this Epistle almost by heart. Although there are no quotations [in the strictest sense, with mention of the source], echoes of its language and thought pervade the whole of his writings in such a manner as to leave no doubt whatever that he was acquainted with the First Epistle to the Corinthians.' P. V. M. Bénécke [ib. p. 86] is equally sure about Polycarp: 'Polycarp's use of 1 Corinthians may be regarded as certain'). The internal evidence is equally strong. The Epistle gives an extremely graphic picture of a Christian Church of early date. Much of it is occasional in character. There is nothing to suggest forgery. The attack made on its authenticity by Bruno Bauer, and renewed later by Loman, Pierson, Naber, van Manen, Steck, and others, has met with very little acceptance. Attacks have also been made on its integrity by Hagge and Völter, at these also have little to be said for them.

2 Cor. appears in Marcion's Canon, and is afterwards widely quoted. But there are few traces of it in the Apostolic Fathers. Clement makes no allusion to it, though it would have suited his purpose to do so. It seems probable that it was not published until the churches began to look upon St. Paul's letters as Scripture. It is in the main personal, and contains but little moral or doctrinal instruction. It is, therefore, quite intelligible that it should not have been published as early as 1 Cor.,* which would be at once recognized as a document of universal interest and great importance; but there is no reason to doubt its Pauline authorship, in spite of the inferiority of the external evidence for it. Irenæus, Tertullian, Athenagoras, and Clement of Alexandria are all familiar with it and quote it freely. And the internal evidence is very strong. Its autobiographical touches carry their own assurance of genuineness, and, while not in the main doctrinal, 'it is saturated with the characteristic theological conceptions of St. Paul.'†

2. St. Paul's relations with Corinth before writing 1 Corinthians.—St. Paul's first visit to Corinth is described in Ac 18<sup>1-18</sup>, where we have an account of the foundation of the Corinthian Church. After leaving Corinth, he continued to be in communication with the Church there, and we can reconstruct some part of his relations with it from the evidence of his two extant Epistles to the Corinthians.

(a) St. Paul wrote a 'previous letter' (1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>), in which he told the Corinthians not to keep company with fornicators. This must have been due to information that immorality was creeping into the Church. It is possible that a portion of this letter is preserved in 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>-7<sup>1</sup> (see below).

* Cf. J. H. Kennedy, The Second and Third Epistles to the Corinthians, 1900, p. 141 ff.; K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, 1911, p. 163 f.

† UDB i. 492.

(b) The Corinthians had themselves written a letter to St. Paul, raising a number of points and requesting his decision upon them (1 Co 7<sup>1-25</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 11-12<sup>1</sup>). They raise the question of marriage—whether marriage is legitimate for a Christian, the relation between husband and wife, between a non-Christian husband and a Christian wife, and vice versa. They interrogate him regarding the status of virgins, and probably also ask advice on the question of ειδωλόθυσια, with all the problems of social life which it involves. The difficulties that arose over the Eucharist may have been mentioned in the letter (11<sup>17</sup>), also the question of spiritual gifts and of disorders in the assemblies, perhaps also the question of the resurrection of the dead. Attempts have been made to reconstruct the Corinthian letter,* but these must necessarily be too conjectural to be of any great value. It is probable, however, that a good many of the expressions used in 1 Cor. are direct quotations from their letter, e.g. παντα ἐξέστιν (cf. 10<sup>23</sup>), probably a sort of catchword, which the Apostle accepts from them, but qualifies. In 11 he probably quotes their letter.

(c) St. Paul had had other sources of information besides this letter. The existence of parties within the Corinthian Church had been made known to him by Chloe's people or household (1 Co 1<sup>11</sup>). He had also heard, possibly from the same source, of a case of incest (ch. 5), and of the habit which had arisen of going to law with fellow-Christians before heathen tribunals (6<sup>1-8</sup>). Apollos, too, had visited Corinth (3<sup>6</sup>), and was now with St. Paul at Ephesus (16<sup>12</sup>). Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus had also come to him from Corinth (16<sup>17</sup>).

3. Analysis of 1 Corinthians.—In view of the information received from these sources, St. Paul wrote the First Epistle. It will be convenient here to give a full analysis of it.

I. INTRODUCTION (11-9).

11-9 Salutation.

vv. 4-9 Thanksgiving for spiritual gifts of Corinthians.

II. REBUKE (110-620).

(a) Party-spirit, based on false intellectualism in religion (110-421).

110-17 Exhortation to unity.

vv. 18-25 The paradox of the Cross. What seems to men weak and foolish is Divine strength and wisdom. vv. 26-31 This is illustrated by the natural characteristics of Corinthian Christians—they are naturally weak and foolish, but their strength and wisdom is Christ.

21-5 Further illustrated by St. Paul's own behaviour at Corinth.

vv. 6-9 Yet there is a spiritual wisdom for mature Christians.

210-32 Only the spiritual man can understand this. The Corinthians, when St. Paul preached to them, were not yet spiritual.

33-4 Nor are they yet spiritual, as is evidenced by their factions.

vv. 5-9 Foolishness of party-spirit, seeing that the work of all is God's work.

vv. 10-15 St. Paul has laid the One Foundation, Jesus Christ. Others may build upon it, and are responsible for the character of their building.

vv. 16-17 The building is God's Temple. To destroy it is to cause one's own destruction.

vv. 18-23 Folly of subjection to human teachers. All belong to Christ.

41-5 Human teachers are responsible to Christ, and to Him only.

vv. 6-7 This rebuke is really only applicable to the followers, not to the teachers.

vv. 8-13 For the teachers are forced by their sufferings to realize their limitations. Only the followers are proud.

vv. 14-17 Appeal to them to follow St. Paul's example.

vv. 18-21 He hopes to come himself, and test the truth of their claims.

(b) Want of discipline in dealing with case of incest (ch. 5). 51-8 The case of incest. Necessity of excommunicating offender.

vv. 9-13 Explanation of instructions given in former letter about Christians' attitude to immoral persons.

(c) Litigiousness (61-11).

61-6 Lawsuits not to be taken before heathen tribunals.

67-11 Lawsuits altogether wrong. Christians ought rather to endure wrong; but no Christian ought to give occasion for a lawsuit.

(d) Fornication (612-20).

612-14 The law of liberty does not apply to impurity.

vv. 15-20 Relation between Christ and believer incompatible with fornication.

III. ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS (71-140).

(a) Marriage problems (ch. 7).

71-7 Celibacy is best, but marriage is sometimes expedient.

vv. 8-9 Unmarried persons and widows should, if possible, remain as they are.

vv. 10-11 Married couples should not separate. If they do, the wife must not re-marry.

vv. 12-16 Mixed marriages are not real marriages in the Christian sense, and therefore not indissoluble.

vv. 17-24 It is best for people, both in marriage questions and in other matters,* to remain externally in the condition in which they were when they became Christians.

vv. 25-35 Virgins may marry without sin, though they do better to remain unmarried.

vv. 36-38 Spiritual marriage is a good custom.†

vv. 39-40 Second marriage allowed, but not recommended.

(b) The eating of things sacrificed to idols (81-11).

81-3 One should be guided by the Law of Love.

vv. 4-6 Christians know that idols are nothing.

vv. 7-13 Yet to eat of a banquet in an idol's temple may offend the weaker brethren, and so is a sin against the Law of Love.

91-3 St. Paul claims spiritual liberty even more than they can.

vv. 411 He has the same rights as the other apostles.

vv. 12-18 Yet he does not use the right to maintenance, but surrenders it as a voluntary offering to God.

vv. 19-23 He has surrendered his liberty for the sake of his cause.

vv. 24-27 For the Christian life needs perpetual effort and self-denial.

101-5 This is illustrated by the example of the Israelites, most of whom perished in spite of their privileges.

vv. 6-11 Their history is an example to us, that we may avoid their sins.

vv. 12-13 No temptation is too strong to be resisted.

vv. 14-22 Idolatry is a real danger. The Eucharist and feasts upon things sacrificed to idols are incompatible.

vv. 23-24 In any case the Law of Love is supreme.

vv. 25-30 Christians may accept the invitations of non-Christians, and so run the risk of eating things offered to idols. But the Law of Love forbids that this should be done knowingly.

1031-111 One must do all to God's glory, and avoid giving offence.

(c) Women in the assemblies (112-16).

112-10 Women must have the head covered in the assemblies because they are inferior in spiritual status to men.

vv. 11-12 Yet men and women are complementary.

vv. 13-15 Appeal to natural instinct.

v. 16 Appeal to Christian custom.

(d) Disorders at the Lord's Supper (111-34).

vv. 23-25 Account of institution.

vv. 26-29 Responsibility of communicant.

vv. 30-32 Physical evil and death caused by unworthy reception.

vv. 33-34 Command to avoid gluttony and self-assertion.

(e) Spiritual gifts (121-140).

121-3 The test of a Spirit is his attitude to Jesus.

vv. 4-11 The gifts of the Spirit are diverse, but all for use.

vv. 12-13 Christ is One; yet we in our variety are members of His Body.

vv. 14-26 The members of the natural body are interdependent.

vv. 27-31 So is it with Christ's Body. Yet some gifts are greater than others.

131-3 But all gifts are useless without love.

vv. 4-7 Description of love.

vv. 8-12 Temporary character of spiritual gifts contrasted with permanence of love.

v. 13 Faith, hope, and love are permanent, and love is the greatest.

141-5 Superiority of prophecy to tongues.

vv. 6-19 Unintelligibility of tongues.

vv. 20-22 The only use of tongues is as a miraculous sign to unbelievers.

vv. 23-25 An outsider is impressed more by prophecy than by tongues.

vv. 26-33 Need of order in the assemblies.

vv. 34-36 Women forbidden to speak in the assemblies.

* v. 21 may contain an exception in the case of slaves; but the Greek is ambiguous.

IV. THE RESURRECTION.—An answer to those who doubted about the resurrection of Christians (ch. 15).

151-11 Summary of St. Paul's Gospel, of which the resurrection is an essential part.

vv. 12-19 The resurrection of Christians depends on the fact of Christ's Resurrection.

vv. 20-22 Parallel between Christ and Adam.

vv. 23-28 The final consummation, the reign of the Father, when Christ, having subdued all His enemies, delivers up to Him the Kingdom.

vv. 29-32 Christian practices, Christian endurance and self-denial unintelligible without the Resurrection.

vv. 33-34 Knowledge of Resurrection should be an incentive to energy in Christian life.

vv. 35-38 Nature of resurrection body. Analogy of seed.

vv. 39-41 Variety of natural kinds.

vv. 42-46 The natural body is the suitable framework of man's present self; his future body will be the suitable framework for him when he has become spiritual.

vv. 47-49 So man must be changed from the likeness of the First to that of the Second Adam.

vv. 50-53 At the Last Trump, the dead shall arise incorruptible, and those who are still on earth will be suddenly changed and glorified.

vv. 54-57 This is the conquest of death.

v. 58 This gospel of the Resurrection gives value to all moral effort.

V. PERSONAL MATTERS (ch. 16).

161-4 Arrangements about collection.

vv. 5-9 St. Paul's intention to come and make some stay at Corinth.

vv. 10-11 Commendation of Timothy.

v. 12 Apollos' unwillingness to come.

vv. 13-14 Final exhortation.

vv. 15-16 Commendation of the household of Stephanas.

vv. 17-18 Thankfulness for the coming of Stephanas and others.

vv. 19-24 Salutations and benediction.

4. St. Paul's relations with Corinth between 1 and 2 Corinthians.—It is necessary to go into some detail with regard to the relations between St. Paul and Corinth after the dispatch of 1 Cor., as many questions connected with 2 Cor. depend upon the view taken of the external history.

(a) Visit of Timothy.—In 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup> St. Paul speaks of sending Timothy to Corinth, apparently with a mission to deal with the party-spirit that was prevalent there. But in 16<sup>10</sup> he speaks as though it were uncertain whether Timothy would arrive. In Ac 19<sup>2</sup> we read that Timothy went into Macedonia. If that refers, as is probable, to the same journey, Timothy must have had a mission to discharge in Macedonia as well as in Corinth. We hear nothing of his arrival at Corinth. But it is quite certain that St. Paul did receive from some source very bad news from Corinth. It is on the whole probable that Timothy went to Corinth, and found the situation there very bad, that he made no impression, and that he returned with alarming news to St. Paul at Ephesus.

(b) St. Paul's second visit ἐν λόγῳ.—On the receipt of bad news from Corinth, whether from Timothy or from some other source, St. Paul sailed thither in person, but his visit was unsuccessful, and he soon went back again to Asia Minor. The evidence for this visit is to be found in three passages of 2 Cor., viz. 13<sup>1-2</sup> 12<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>. The most natural exegesis of 13<sup>1-2</sup> and 12<sup>14</sup> implies that he had been to Corinth twice already, though it is just possible to avoid this conclusion. When these two passages are combined with 2<sup>1</sup>, the case for a second visit to Corinth becomes overwhelming, for in 2<sup>1</sup> it is implied that St. Paul had paid a visit to Corinth ἐν λόγῳ. Now such a description would not apply to his first visit, which was a distinct success, in spite of certain disappointments and sorrows. The fact that this visit is not mentioned in Acts is unimportant. It was very brief, and in the main unsuccessful. The difficulties which occasioned it were afterwards settled, and it would not naturally enter into the plan followed by the author of Acts.

This visit must have been paid after 1 Cor. had been written, for in that Epistle St. Paul speaks throughout as though there had been only one visit. His knowledge of the state of affairs at Corinth is derived from information received, not from personal observation (cf. 1<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>), and in 4<sup>21</sup> he shows that he realized the possibility that he might have to pay a second visit, though he was not sure about it.

(c) The severe letter.—On his return to Ephesus, St. Paul wrote a severe letter 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart.' The letter so referred to in 2 Co 2<sup>4</sup> must have been written at this time, though efforts have been made to identify it either with 1 Cor. or with the 'previous letter' alluded to in that Epistle (1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>; see above, § 2). 1 Cor. was certainly not written 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart, with many tears.' It is calm and in the main unemotional. Moreover, the references to the 'severe letter' in 2 Co 7<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>3</sup> 1<sup>23</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> do not suit 1 Cor. particularly well. There is not a word in 1 Cor. to suggest that he was shrinking from a visit for fear of its being unpleasant. The 'previous letter' is also impossible. For St. Paul only heard that his 'severe letter' had brought the Corinthians to repentance when Titus returned and met him in Macedonia (see below). But, when writing 1 Cor., St. Paul had already had an answer to the 'previous letter' (1 Co 5<sup>9-11</sup>).

The theory has been put forward that part of the 'severe letter' is to be found in 2 Co 10-13. If this theory is correct, we should expect to find (1) a great difference in tone and spirit between the two parts of the Epistle, together with a sudden break of the sense at the end of ch. 9: the last four chapters should be severe and threatening, the first nine should be encouraging, cheerful, and forgiving; (2) a certain number of cross-references, passages in the first nine chapters which seem to look back to the last four; (3) a solution of the rather intricate question of the relations of Titus with Corinth.

(1) The first nine chapters are clearly written at a time when St. Paul has suddenly been relieved from very great anxiety by the arrival of Titus and the good news which he has brought from Corinth (7<sup>4-7</sup> 2<sup>12-13</sup>). The whole tone of these chapters is one of great relief, apparently caused by the impression produced by his 'severe letter.' But in chs. 10-13 we find great anxiety and great passion. The change cannot fail to be noticed by any reader of the Epistle. And there is a marked break in the sense at the end of ch. 9. After speaking of the collection, and ending with an ascription of praise to God, suddenly, without even an ἀλλὰ, he begins to threaten his readers. This has been accounted for by those who believe in the integrity of the Epistle in two ways—(i.) That the first nine chapters were addressed to the repentant majority, the last four to the rebellious minority. But there is no hint of this. Ch. 10 is apparently addressed to the Church as a whole. There seems no room for a repentant majority. And chs. 1-9 give no hint of a rebellious minority (cf. 7<sup>13-15</sup>). (ii.) That St. Paul received later news from Corinth while writing the Epistle, and wrote the last four chapters in the light of this later news. But surely there would have been some indication of this. He could hardly have allowed the earlier part to stand without alteration.

(2) We find certain apparent cross-references between the two parts of the Epistle, pointed out by Kennedy in his Second and Third Epistles to the Corinthians (pp. 79-94), and by Lake in The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul (pp. 157-162). Of these the most striking is the parallel between 2<sup>9</sup> and 13<sup>10</sup>. In 2<sup>9</sup> the Apostle states that he wrote a severe letter in order that when he came he might not have to be so severe. In 13<sup>10</sup> he says that he is at that moment writing a severe letter, that he may not have to be severe when he comes. Again in 1<sup>23</sup> we have a parallel with 13<sup>2</sup>.

(3) The visit of Titus to Corinth mentioned in 7<sup>6</sup> was with, or at the same time as, the 'severe letter.' 8<sup>17-18</sup> shows that St. Paul was sending Titus again to make arrangements for the collection. This surely he would not have ventured to do if he were under the necessity of writing in the tone of chs. 10-13. No man would send a letter full of rebuke, and of self-justification in the face of what seem to have been charges of dishonesty, and in the same letter ask his readers to subscribe money. In 12<sup>14</sup> he alludes to his custom of taking no money from them for himself personally. He assumes (v. 16) that they admit this, but then he says that they may accuse him of winning their confidence with a view to future efforts to get something out of them. How? he asks. Not by his representatives; e.g. Titus never 'made gain out of them.' Clearly he alludes to some early work of Titus at Corinth. Titus they know and trust. So he is a suitable person to send at this critical moment to Corinth. In ch. 7 we hear of the success of his mission. The fact that he was a persona grata at first and has recently been successful there makes him a very suitable person to send again (ch. 8) to arrange about the collection.

Finally, the last four chapters of 2 Cor. answer admirably to the descriptions we have of the 'severe letter.' They might well have been written 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart, with many tears' (2<sup>1</sup>). It is quite conceivable that after writing them St. Paul might have regretted sending them and wondered whether they were not too severe (7<sup>8-9</sup>). Self-commendation is a very prominent feature in them (3<sup>1</sup>). They show that the Apostle was contemplating, but shrinking from, a visit which he might have to pay (12<sup>30-1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>). This corresponds to 1<sup>23</sup> and 2<sup>1</sup>. Thus the internal evidence for the theory is very strong. No single point is in itself conclusive; but the conjunction of different lines of evidence, and the fact that the theory straightens out a tangled web and solves many problems, is very significant.

The theory is made easier of acceptance by the fact that 2 Cor. appears not to have been published at an early date (see above, § 1). The Corinthian Church would hardly have wanted to publish the 'severe letter,' and the later letter is in the main personal, and does not contain much instruction. It is quite possible that the MSS were not carefully preserved, and the two letters may have been confused.

(d) Visit of Titus.—The 'severe letter' and the mission of Titus already alluded to were apparently successful, and Titus met St. Paul in Macedonia, bringing him reassuring news (2 Co 7<sup>6-7</sup>), after which St. Paul wrote, according to the theory we have adopted, 2 Co 1-9, probably sending Titus with it, and instructing him to make arrangements for the collection.

5. Analysis of 2 Co 10-13.

I. STRONG REBUKE (10<sup>1-18</sup>).

10<sup>1-2</sup> Appeal, and threat of strong action against his detractors.

vv. 3-6 Claim to possession of spiritual power, and description of that power.

v. 7 The Christ-party's exclusive claim unjustified.

vv. 8-11 Threat of exertion of spiritual power on arrival at Corinth.

vv. 12-16 St. Paul's boasting, unlike that of his opponents, shall be confined to his own sphere of work.

vv. 17-18 But all self-commendation is to be deprecated.

II. ST. PAUL'S SELF-COMMENDATION AND ITS REASONS (11<sup>1-12</sup> 12<sup>18</sup>).

v. 4 Their tolerance of new preachers.

vv. 5-6 Comparison of himself with these preachers.

vv. 7-11 His refusal of maintenance.

vv. 12-15 Its reason—avoidance of unfavourable comparison with them.

(b) The self-commendation (11<sup>16-12</sup> 12<sup>18</sup>).

vv. 21-22 Comparison of himself with his rivals in respect of religious prerogatives.

vv. 23-23 In respect of sufferings on behalf of the gospel.

12<sup>1-5</sup> In respect of visions and revelations.

vv. 6-10 The thorn in the flesh and its significance.

vv. 11-13 Comparison resumed in respect of work done at Corinth.

vv. 14-18 Justification of his refusal of maintenance.

III. FORECAST OF A THIRD VISIT TO CORINTH (12<sup>19-13</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>).

vv. 3-5 This is likely to be made necessary by their accusation of weakness. Discussion of this.

vv. 6-10 His hope that after all it may not be necessary.

IV. EXHORTATION, SALUTATION, AND BENEDICTION (13<sup>11-14</sup>).

It is impossible to feel any certainty about the place of 13<sup>11-14</sup>. Some think that it is really the conclusion of chs. 1 to 9. But there seems no good reason to think that it is in its wrong place. St. Paul might quite well have concluded the 'severe letter' with ordinary exhortations and salutations. The decision is made difficult by the fact that in any case chs. 10-13 can be no more than a fragment of the 'severe letter,' and we have no means of judging what proportion of that letter has been lost.

6. Analysis of 2 Co 1-9.

I. ST. PAUL'S RELATIONS WITH CORINTH (1. 2).

vv. 3-5 Thanksgiving for consolation.

vv. 6-7 Parallelism of their experiences with his.

vv. 8-11 His sufferings and deliverance in Asia.

vv. 12-14 His clear conscience.

vv. 15-22 His failure to carry out his previous intention of visiting them was not due to fickleness.

12<sup>3-22</sup> It was due to his desire to spare them.

23-4 Reason for writing the 'severe letter.'

vv. 5-11 Exhortation to forgive the offender.

vv. 12-13 His anxiety previous to his meeting with Titus.

vv. 14-17 His thankfulness to God for His use of him.

II. VINDICATION OF ST. PAUL'S LIFE AND WORK AS AN APOSTLE (3-7).

3-13 His 'letter of commendation' is nothing but his relations with them.

vv. 4-6 His confidence, based on this, as a minister of the New Covenant.

vv. 7-9 The old and the new dispensations compared in respect of content.

vv. 10-11 In respect of permanence.

vv. 12-16 In respect of clearness and openness.

vv. 17-18 The new dispensation brings liberty and transformation into Christ's likeness.

41-2 Consequent openness of Christian preacher.

vv. 3-4 Any obscurity is due to the blindness of the hearers.

vv. 5-6 For the content of the preaching is Christ, the Illuminator.

v. 7 Weakness of human preacher makes manifest God's power.

vv. 8-12 His continual difficulties, which are not, however, insuperable, show that the life manifest in his converts comes from Christ.

vv. 13-15 All his efforts are based on faith, and directed to their conversion to the end of God's glory.

vv. 16-18 So he works on, while the body grows weaker, but the spirit stronger.

61-5 Gradual dissolution of weak earthly bodies succeeded by bestowal of new spiritual bodies.

vv. 6-8 So death shall mean presence with Christ.

vv. 9-10 Therefore, in view of the Judgment, he strives to do His will.

vv. 11-13 This must be his defence against charges alike of fanaticism and of excessive self-restraint.

vv. 14-15 The constraining motive in everything is Christ's Love.

vv. 16-19 This transforms everything, so that he has a new and spiritual knowledge of Christ and Christians.

vv. 20-21 As Christ's ambassador he preaches reconciliation to God, made possible through Christ's Sacrifice.

61-2 His instant appeal to them.

vv. 3-5 As a Christian minister he endures hardships.

vv. 6-7 He displays supernatural virtues.

vv. 8-10 His life is one of continual contrasts.

vv. 11-13 He exhorts them to respond to his affection.

61-4-71 Impossibility of Christians associating with immoral persons.

72-4 His affectionate and honourable relations with them.

vv. 5-7 The relief brought to him by the coming of Titus.

vv. 8-12 Satisfactory result of the 'severe letter.'

vv. 13-16 The joy of Titus.

III. THE COLLECTION FOR THE POOR CHRISTIANS AT JERUSALEM (8. 9).

81-5 The generosity of the churches of Macedonia.

vv. 6-7 His injunctions to Titus to stir up the Corinthians in like manner.

vv. 8-9 The example of Christ.

vv. 10-12 Appeal to them to carry out their good resolutions.

- 8<sup>13</sup> 15 Need of reciprocity among churches.
 vv. 16-24 Commendation of the deputation which he sends.
 9<sup>1-5</sup> Necessity of immediate action if his boasting is not to be falsified.
 vv. 6-7 Cheerful giving.
 vv. 8-11 Generosity brings a blessing.
 vv. 12-15 It also redounds to the glory and praise of God.

7. Integrity of 2 Co 1-9.—Attempts have been made to divide our 2 Co. still further, or to ascribe portions of it to a later editor or editors. Drastic reconstructions have been proposed, e.g., by A. Halmel,* D. Volter,† and H. Lisco.‡ But such elaborations have but little to recommend them. There are, however, reasons for thinking that 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>-7<sup>1</sup> is a passage which has got misplaced. It occurs in the middle of an affectionate appeal made by St. Paul to the Corinthians, and appears to have no connexion with what precedes and what follows it. The supposed connexion is that St. Paul urges them to show their affection for him by ceasing from their immorality. But a closer examination of the passage shows that the point is not that they should cease to be immoral, but that they should abstain from intercourse with unbelievers. Now we know from 1 Co 5<sup>9-13</sup> that in a letter written previously to the Corinthians he had spoken on this subject, and that they had asked for an explanation of his exact meaning, and in the passage referred to he explains that he did not mean, as they supposed, that they were not to have anything to do with non-Christians, but only that immoral Christians were to be avoided. In the absence of definite evidence it is impossible to be certain, but it is clear that 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>-7<sup>1</sup> would naturally be interpreted to mean what the Corinthians did as a matter of fact suppose St. Paul to mean. And for this reason, taken together with its irrelevance in its present position, it seems extremely likely that it is an extract from the 'previous letter,' which has by some means been misplaced. If it is omitted here, the sense runs on admirably from 2 Co 6<sup>13</sup> to 7<sup>2</sup>; and we avoid the necessity of having to suppose an extremely unnatural digression on the part of St. Paul.

Another view which seems to deserve special consideration is that which finds the situation implied in ch. 8 inconsistent with that in ch. 9. After the earnest exhortation to liberality contained in ch. 8, we hardly expect to find in 9 the words: 'About the ministration to the saints it is superfluous for me to write to you.' Moreover, these last words would certainly suggest that the 'ministration to the saints' was a new subject, with which he had not so far dealt. J. S. Semler,§ therefore, propounded the hypothesis that ch. 9 was a separate letter, addressed to the Christians of Achaia. Others have supposed that it is ch. 8 that ought to be separated from the rest of the Epistle (e.g. Hage, Michelson). It is no doubt true that, as the chapters stand, there is a certain amount of repetition, and, as has been noticed above, the beginning of ch. 9 would be more natural if ch. 8 did not precede it. Moreover, the subject of the 'collection' seems to be treated at disproportionate length. Yet these considerations are not really conclusive. There is no question that St. Paul attached very great importance to the 'collection' alike for religious and political reasons; and when he feels strongly about a subject he often deals with it in an emotional and rather disconnected manner. This would account also for the disproportionate length of his references to it. And the situation implied in ch. 9, taken as a whole, is not really inconsistent with that implied in ch. 8. With some hesitation, therefore, we conclude that it is unnecessary to separate chs. 8 and 9, and that it is probable that they are in their right places.

8. The troubles at Corinth.—We must now discuss the nature of the troubles at Corinth—a subject of great complexity. The evidence at our disposal is really not sufficient to enable us to arrive at a positive conclusion. The fact that we only possess a portion of the 'severe letter,' in which St. Paul deals with the troubles at their height, and that the portion which we possess does not include his treatment of the specific difficulties, but is only a discussion in general terms, ambiguous to us because of our ignorance of the context, adds greatly to the complexity of the problem. But there are certain passages in both Epistles which throw some light on the situation.

(a) In 2 Co 2<sup>5-11</sup> 7<sup>12</sup> St. Paul speaks of a particular offender. It appears that he has been sentenced to some punishment by a majority of the Corinthians (ὐπὸ τῶν πλείονων). St. Paul says that the sentence is adequate. The language of the passage suggests the existence of a dissident minority, and it would seem that St. Paul is addressing this minority when he gives his exhortation that the offender should now be forgiven and encouraged, lest he should be swallowed up by excessive grief. It seems most probable that the minority had objected to the sentence as inadequate; and this would imply that they were what we may call an ultra-Pauline party. This suits the passage better than the older view that they were hostile to St. Paul, and objected to the sentence as excessive. St. Paul's use of the word καρὸν makes it clear that the objection was rather that the sentence was inadequate. St. Paul says in effect that the sentence passed by the majority satisfies him, and urges them to forgive the man, implying that their forgiveness will make all the difference to the man's happiness. Who then was the offender, and what had he done? The view that he was the man guilty of incest, mentioned in 1 Co 5, cannot possibly be right. For in 2 Co 7<sup>12</sup> St. Paul says: 'I wrote not for his sake who did the wrong, nor for his sake who suffered the wrong, but that your zeal for us might be made manifest to you in the sight of God.' But (1) it is clear from 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup> that in that case St. Paul was writing 'for his sake who did the wrong'; (2) 'He who suffered the wrong' (ὁ ἀδικηθεὶς) would have to be the man's father. This would involve the supposition that the father was alive, and that a Corinthian Christian had actually taken to wife his father's wife during the lifetime of his father without protest from his fellow-Christians. The language of 1 Co 5 does imply that it was a gross case of immorality, but it is hardly conceivable that this could really have occurred. And, if it had occurred, St. Paul would surely not have treated it as lightly as he seems to treat it in 2 Co 2<sup>5-11</sup> and 7<sup>12</sup>. The language of these passages suggests rather that the offence was a personal one, that the offender had grossly insulted St. Paul when he came to Corinth, and that ὁ ἀδικηθεὶς was St. Paul himself. The suggestion has been made that ὁ ἀδικηθεὶς was Timothy, and that he had been insulted when he visited Corinth (cf. 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup> 16<sup>19</sup>). This is possible, but it is more probable that the reference is to an insult inflicted on St. Paul himself: the fragment of the 'severe letter' which we possess is full of defence of his authority, which had clearly been in some way attacked. No doubt there was a reference to the offender in the part of the 'severe letter' which is lost. St. Paul's authority had been attacked, but it is not clear from what quarter the attack had proceeded.

(b) In 1 Co 1<sup>12</sup> we read of the existence of factions or parties at Corinth. It is possible that * Der zweite Korintherbrief des Apostels Paulus, Halle, 1904.

† Paulus und seine Briefe, Strassburg, 1905.

‡ Die Entstehung des zweiten Korintherbriefes, Berlin, 1896.

§ Paraphrasis in Pauli ad Cor. Epistolas, Halle, 1770, 1776.

here we may have the key to the Corinthian troubles, for one of the parties at any rate may probably either have been from the first anti-Pauline or have afterwards turned hostile to St. Paul. It will therefore be convenient at this stage to consider these parties. First of all, St. Paul, with characteristic tact, mentions the party which took his name, and condemns them. He then mentions the party of Apollos. The latter clearly did not exist in opposition to St. Paul with the consent of Apollos (1 Co 16<sup>12</sup>). Apollos (q.v.) was a Jew of Alexandria, who, after instruction from Priscilla and Aquila, went into Achaia, where he was very helpful to those who had believed, being particularly skilful at confuting the Jews, and using for this purpose his great knowledge of Scripture (Ac 18-<sup>1-8</sup>). Until he met with Priscilla and Aquila, we are told that 'he spake and taught accurately the things concerning Jesus, knowing only the baptism of John.'

The meaning of this is uncertain, but it is probable (cf. art. by J. H. A. Hart on 'Apollos' in JThSt vii. [1905] 16 ff.) that it means that he was fully acquainted with Messianic prophecy, but did not know to whom it referred, 'the things concerning Jesus' being texts from the OT which from the Christian point of view referred to Jesus, though not, of course, from the point of view of Apollos himself at this time. This interpretation gives a more intelligible sense to the passage than that which is at first sight more natural, viz. that τὰ περὶ Ἰησοῦ means the history of Jesus' life. It would imply that he preached the same message as John the Baptist—a message of the imminence of the Kingdom, the marks of the Messiah, and the need for repentance. His instruction at the hands of Priscilla and Aquila taught him to whom the Messianic passages with which he was familiar referred. And at Corinth his knowledge of Scripture was turned to good account in showing that the Messiah had come and was none other than Jesus. The view that the intellectualist tendencies condemned in the early chapters of 1 Cor. were particularly characteristic of the party of Apollos is not susceptible of proof, but it is not inconsistent with what we know of Apollos. For Alexandria was the home of philosophy, and Apollos was an Alexandrian Jew. We do not, however, know that he was a disciple of Philo, and we do know that he was a disciple of John the Baptist. These discipleships might be combined in the same person, but it does not seem altogether probable. The fact is that there is no evidence, and we must be content to leave the matter doubtful.

The party of Cephas was in all probability a Judaizing party. To say this does not involve the view that St. Peter was himself a Judaizer. But it is extremely likely that those who used his name were so. Lake (The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, pp. 112-117) maintains that it is probable that St. Peter had himself been to Corinth, and that there is no likelihood of his party having been Judaizing. But this is perhaps the least convincing part of his admirable discussion of the Epistles to the Corinthians. The policy of St. Peter was one of friendliness to the work and mission of St. Paul, combined with a personal respect for and adhesion to the Law. The Acts certainly represents St. Peter as acquiescing in the freedom of the Gentiles from the Law, but does not forbid the supposition that he acquiesced with some reluctance. A modified and liberal Judaism would describe his position with sufficient accuracy. This may well represent the policy of his party at Corinth. Probably also they went behind the authority of St. Paul to that of the Twelve, of whom St. Peter was the recognized leader. It is most likely that the main point in dispute between them and the Pauline party was this question of St. Paul's independent authority. But we have no indication that they were an important body at Corinth.

The Christ-party is the real difficulty. Some have held that ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ is not the watchword of a party, but St. Paul's own cry. But the form of the sentence makes this most improbable. Moreover, there are indications in 2 Cor. of the existence of a Christ-party at Corinth (10<sup>4</sup>). This party apparently questioned St. Paul's authority. Their leaders commend themselves (10<sup>1-4</sup>), i.e. arrogate a lofty position to themselves. They are probably referred to (11<sup>5</sup>) as οἱ ὑπερβίαν ἀπόστολοι. It appears that they declined to take money from the Corinthians.* But he says that they are false apostles, deceitful workers. In justifying his own position against them he says that he too is a Hebrew, etc. (11<sup>22</sup>). He certainly excels them in the amount of his sufferings for Christ. In the matter of visions and revelations he is at least their equal. Therefore he is in no respect inferior to them (12<sup>11</sup>).

Broadly speaking, there are two views as to the character of this Christ-party. The first is that they were Judaizers, representatives of the party who sent emissaries to Antioch and preached the necessity of circumcision for all Christians (Ac 15<sup>1ff.</sup>), but were afterwards repudiated by St. James. It is clear from 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup> that they were Jews who prided themselves on their Jewish birth. But there is no kind of evidence that anyone had told the Corinthians to observe the whole Jewish Law. This is not one of the subjects with which St. Paul has to deal in his Epistles. The danger seems to be the other way. Therefore it is on the whole unlikely that this party were, as has been supposed, more extreme Judaizers than the Cephas party, representing themselves as being in an authoritative position to say what the mind of Christ really was, and what His own practice had been, because of their common descent with Him from an old Jewish stock and because they were in continual communication with His relatives.

A more probable view is that they were spiritualizers rather than Judaizers, and that they went further than St. Paul in the direction of freedom from the Law. The arguments about εἰσὼλόθῃτα in 1 Co 10 seem to be directed against men who made a boast of their freedom from Jewish restrictions—πάντα ἔξεστιν seems to have been their cry. St. Paul shows the danger of this, and the necessary subservience of any such principle to the law of charity, and consideration for weaker brethren. The whole of 2 Cor. becomes more intelligible if we suppose the opposition to St. Paul to have come from a party of people who regarded themselves as πνευματικοί, and therefore free from restrictions and regulations concerning carnal matters. 2 Co 10<sup>2</sup> implies that their charge against St. Paul was that he walked according to the flesh, i.e. that he was not πνευματικός. The grounds of their attack on his apostolicity were, it seems, such as would most probably be employed by those who regarded themselves as πνευματικοί. For he defends himself not only by asserting his Jewish birth, but, after giving a list of his sufferings for Christ's sake (which is the defence to which he himself attaches most importance), by making claims to visions and revelations (12<sup>1-10</sup>), and the working of miracles (12<sup>1-</sup>). Throughout the Epistle St. Paul claims to be πνευματικός in the only legitimate sense, quite as much as his opponents (cf. 5<sup>16</sup>). The fact that these opponents were Jews does not make it impossible that they were also πνευματικοί. We have evidence that there were Jews who did not attach importance to circumcision and the ceremonial Law, but treated the Law as symbolic (cf. Philo, de Migratione Abrahami, quoted by Lake, op. cit. pp. 24, 25). The attack on the apostolicity of St. Paul is also intelligible from this point of view. An 'apostle' was not much more than a missionary (cf. Didache). οἱ ὑπερβάντες ἀπόστολοι cannot in any case be the Twelve, for St. Paul was at this time on good terms with them. Their attack on his apostolicity was based on his lack of spiritual power and γνῶσις, and therefore cannot be regarded as inconsistent with this view of their character. The fact that they seem also to have prided themselves on their Jewish birth, though logically inconsistent, is not at all unnatural. For such pride of birth often remains in people whose view of life makes it wholly irrelevant.

* This would appear from 2 Co 11<sup>12</sup>, where St. Paul asserts that his object in refusing to accept maintenance was that in the very matter of which they boasted they might be found even as he. This seems to make it clear that they did not accept maintenance, and the phrase εἰ τις κατεσθίει (11<sup>20</sup>) must be interpreted in accordance with this fact.

It would seem, then, that the opponents of St. Paul at Corinth were men who boasted that they were above the Law as being in the Spirit. They attacked St. Paul because he was still held in the bonds of a legalism from which they had emancipated themselves, and attached an altogether undue importance to such carnal matters as morality. St. Paul's answer is a claim that he too is πνευματικός; but there underlies this answer an undertone of protest. He does not really accept their tests of apostolicity. While asserting that he can meet them on their own ground, he continually reminds them that spiritual power and knowledge must show themselves in zeal for morality and in actual suffering for Christ's sake. It is on these points that he lays the greatest stress.*

9. The doctrine of the Epistles.—(a) The Person and Work of Christ.—No one can read the first chapter of 1 Cor. without perceiving that the writer places Jesus Christ in a position which is more than human. There is, of course, no developed doctrine of God to be found either in this chapter or elsewhere in the Epistles, but where St. Paul places God and man over against one another, he consistently puts Jesus Christ on the side of God over against man. Grace and peace are to come to man from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>2</sup>). Jesus is never regarded as a man among men. He is the source, or at any rate the medium, of God's gifts to men. Christians call upon His Name, and the bond of union between Christians in every place is that they recognize the common Lordship of Christ. When St. Paul wants to reprove the Corinthians for the existence of factions among them, his crowning argument is that they are actually degrading Christ to the position of a party-leader, and so putting Him on a level with Apollos, Cephas, or himself. Always he disclaims any independence of Christ. 'We preach not ourselves but Christ Jesus as Lord' (2 Co 4<sup>5</sup>). When he is speaking of the exalted position of 'spiritual men' (1 Co 2<sup>10-16</sup>), he points out that the spiritual man is superior to all others, for whereas the 'natural man' can understand and form estimates only of 'natural things,' the spiritual man can form estimates of all things. He has all that the 'natural man' has, and he can move freely in a sphere where the 'natural man' is helpless. And he crowns his argument by a quotation from the OT: 'Who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he should instruct him?' That is to say, no one can understand the thoughts of Jahweh. 'But we,' he adds, 'have the mind of Christ.' The 'natural man' cannot understand the mind of God. But we who are spiritual actually have the mind of Christ.

* For this whole section see Lake, op. cit., where the case is lucidly and convincingly stated.

The argument of this passage shows that St. Paul, at any rate here, identified Christ with the Jahweh of the OT. This is perhaps the most striking example of the position which he gives to Christ, but it is what the language of the Epistle throughout would lead us to expect. He clearly regards Christ as having existed before He was born upon earth. 'Though he was rich, for our sake he became poor' (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>). Yet it would be dangerous to assert that he had a clear and consistent view of the relation of Christ to the Father. He regards Christ as sent by the Father, as in some sense belonging to the Father (1 Co 3<sup>23</sup>). And in 11<sup>3</sup> he seems to imply that the relation of God to Christ is parallel with the relation of Christ to man, and again with the relation of man to woman. It seems superfluous, however, to suppose that he had a very definite conception in his mind. He need not have meant more than that, as Christ does the will of God, so man is to be obedient to Christ, and woman to man. In 15<sup>78</sup> he looks forward to the time when the mediatorial Kingdom of Christ shall come to an end, and God shall be all in all. There is no reference here to any termination of the personal existence of Christ; he is only thinking of the end of His mediatorial Kingdom. But it seems clear from this and the other passages mentioned that he regards Christ as being definitely subordinate to the Father, though, as has been said above, always on the Godward side of things, over against man. He had not faced the question of the bearing of this view on monotheism.

As to the human life of Christ he has no doubt. 'He was crucified through weakness' (2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>). His Cross and Passion are the centre of the gospel message. There is probably no Epistle in which it is made so clear that St. Paul regards the Cross as the centre of the Christian Creed. 'We preach Christ crucified' (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>). 'The story of the Cross is to them that are perishing foolishness, but to us that are being saved it is the power of God' (1<sup>18</sup>). There is very little in the way of an explanation of the significance of the Cross. 'God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself.' 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin for us, that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5<sup>19-21</sup>). But here again it is a mistake to suppose that St. Paul had in mind any detailed theory of Atonement. There was a sense in which the death of Christ was a sacrifice (1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>); but there is no theory of the Atonement either stated or implied.

There is, however, a great deal of explicit teaching about the relation between Christ and Christians. Christians are in Christ, and Christ is in them. This relationship is brought about by the action of God (1 Co 1<sup>30</sup>). And on this mystical union of the Christian with Christ his spiritual status entirely depends. It is Christ with whom he is united that is his wisdom. He is justified, sanctified, and redeemed because of this union. The Christian calling can be described as a calling into fellowship with Jesus Christ (1<sup>9</sup>). And this union makes a complete change in a man's whole position. 'If anyone is in Christ, it is a new creation: old things have passed away; behold they have become new' (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>). It is impossible to exaggerate the stress which is laid by St. Paul on this experience of union with Christ.

(b) The Church and the Christian ministry.—The ruling thought of St. Paul about the Christian Church is expressed by the metaphor of the Body and the members (1 Co 12). The gifts of the Spirit are most diverse in kind; but it is One Spirit who is the giver of them all. Just as in the human body the members are diverse, and for all their diversity of function are closely inter-related, and all of them necessary, so it is with the Church, which is indeed the Body of Christ. Every individual member of the Church has a necessary part to play. Being a member of the Church, he is necessarily a member of Christ. He does not give a list of ecclesiastical officials. To suppose that he does so is to misunderstand his argument. He merely gives specimens of the diverse spiritual gifts which God has bestowed upon the Church, and the lesson which he desires to teach is the lesson of unity—the same lesson as he tries to inculcate when he rebukes the Corinthians for their factions (1 Co 10<sup>10f.</sup>)—diversity in unity, a unity which is secured by the fact that the whole body is the Body of Christ, and that the Spirit from whom the diverse gifts descend is One. The Church is also compared to the Temple of God (1 Co 3<sup>16</sup>) built upon the One Foundation, Jesus Christ (3<sup>11</sup>). Here the lesson is the same. The Christian teachers are indeed different from one another, but all of them build upon that One Foundation.

This brings us to the consideration of the position which he assigns to the Christian ministry, about which there is a good deal in the Epistles. While deprecating strongly any usurpation by Christian teachers of what should belong to Christ alone, and asserting that they exist only for the benefit of the Church, he claims for them an independence of the Church which they serve. They are responsible to Christ, and to Him alone (1 Co 4<sup>3-4</sup>). They are slaves of men, but they are ambassadors of Christ. And their authority can be put to the test. St. Paul always claims that if he exerts his authority he will be able to reduce his opponents to subjection (4<sup>18-21</sup>, 2 Co 10<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>). He seems to have been prepared to allow that the authority of the Christian minister should be tested by his spiritual power, which would on occasion manifest itself by producing physical or natural results. An instance of this is to be found in 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, where he speaks of delivering a man over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. He seems to mean that the carrying out of the sentence passed by himself, and confirmed by the Corinthian Church, would result in the death of the offender, and that this would ultimately be for the salvation of his soul. The passage may be paralleled by the story of Ananias and Sapphira (Ac 5<sup>1-11</sup>). As a rule, however, spiritual power produced results which were themselves spiritual; and the main proof of his own authority as a Christian minister was the existence of the Corinthian Church.

(c) The Eucharist.—The accidental circumstance that difficulties had arisen in the Church at Corinth owing to the bad behaviour of some Corinthians at the common meal with which the Eucharist was associated, is responsible for the fact that we have in 1 Co 11<sup>23ff.</sup> our earliest account of the institution of the Eucharist. But in the same Epistle it is alluded to in two other connexions. When St. Paul is using the example of the Israelites as a warning to the Corinthian Church against presuming upon their privileges, he gives as instances of the privileges of the Israelites the cloud which went with them and the sea which they miraculously crossed, and also the rock which, according to the Jewish legend, followed them, and from which they drank. These he clearly regards as types of Baptism and the Eucharist. Thus he puts into close association as the two great privileges of the Christian Church the two Sacraments of the Gospel (1 Co 10<sup>2-4</sup>). And immediately afterwards, in warning the Corinthians against idolatry, he treats the Eucharist as parallel with the heathen sacrificial feasts, thus clearly showing that he regards it as a sacrifice in the same sense in which these heathen feasts were sacrifices. He regards the communicant as entering into real communion with Christ through the act of eating the bread and drinking the cup; and similarly he seems to regard real communion as brought about between the worshipper at the heathen sacrifice and some δαίμωνιον whose power was behind the idolatrous worship (10<sup>14-21</sup>). His account of the institution he prefaces by the words, 'I received from the Lord' (11<sup>23</sup>), and this has been taken to mean that he claims to have received it from the Lord Himself, presumably in a vision. But this is not certain. Even if it is true, it by no means follows that he claims to receive all the details of his account in this way. It may be that he merely intends to convey the impression that he received directly from the Lord a revelation of the general doctrinal meaning of the Eucharist. It is important to remember that he claims to have had other visions and revelations of the Lord (2 Co 12<sup>1-9</sup>). His account of the institution is marked by the command to repeat the rite, which is given twice, after the institution of both bread and cup. He connects it with the death of Christ, which is thus proclaimed. He attaches great importance to due preparation for reception; and asserts that physical evils have resulted from unworthy reception and failure to discern the Body, which seems to mean failure to differentiate the bread from ordinary bread. It may be said here briefly that St. Paul's teaching about the Eucharist is that it is sacrificial, that it brings about a real communion between the communicant and Christ, that the bread and the wine are endowed with the character of the Body and Blood of Christ, and must not therefore be received as ordinary bread and wine. See further art. EUCHARIST.

(d) Eschatology.—St. Paul's treatment of the questions submitted to him is always coloured by his belief in the imminence of the παρουσία. Christians are 'waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Co 17). His language implies that he expects some at any rate of those to whom he is writing to be alive at the παρουσία, and he appears to expect to be alive himself (15<sup>51-52</sup>). The chief characteristic of the παρουσία will be judgment (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>). The work of the Christian minister will then be tested (1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>). The Parousia will be the signal for the beginning of the mediatorial reign of Christ. 'He must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet' (1 Co 15<sup>25</sup>). And then finally comes the end of His reign, when God's rule shall be unmediated (v. 28). It is important to notice that St. Paul does not discuss in these Epistles the future condition of those who are not Christians. It is with the resurrection of Christians that he is here concerned. For them he affirms the resurrection of the body. But it is to be noticed that he differentiates the body from its parts. 'Meats for the belly,' he says, 'and the belly for meats: but God shall bring to nought both it and them. Now the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body: and God both raised the Lord and will raise us also through his power' (6<sup>13-14</sup>). The new spiritual body will differ from the old as the fruit differs from the seed sown. This life is the time of sowing, and the nature of the spiritual body will depend upon the character of the seed. But it will not be of flesh and blood, and it will have no element of corruption (15<sup>50</sup>). It will be a full and complete means of self-expression for the 'spiritual' man, just as the 'natural' body is a suitable means of self-expression for the 'natural' man, but is already found inadequate for Christians, who are even now becoming 'spiritual.' Christians have received an earnest of the spiritual body in the gift of the Holy Spirit (2 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). The metaphor of which he is most fond is that of a garment. He is to be clothed with this new spiritual body (1 Co 15<sup>53</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>).

10. St. Paul's attitude to practical questions.—(a) εἰδωλόθυτα.—One of the problems which faced the Corinthian Christians was the question of their attitude to the eating of things sacrificed to idols. This affected their social life very nearly. For much of the meat sold in the market had been offered to idols, and their heathen friends would give banquets in idol-temples, using in the banquet food that had been offered to the idols on domestic and other anniversaries. Moreover, in the ordinary entertainments given by heathen there was a possibility that some of the food had been so offered. It might have been supposed that the question would be regarded as settled for St. Paul by the Apostolic Decree (Ac 15). But, whatever be the reason, no allusion at all is made to any decree of the kind. St. Paul deals with the matter on first principles. He enunciates the law of liberty, which must, he says, be tempered by the law of love. At first he makes a strong assertion of monotheism. Idols, he says, are nothing (1 Co 8<sup>4</sup>). But elsewhere he seems to admit that there is, or may be, the power of a δαίμωνιον behind the idolatrous worship (10<sup>10</sup>; see above, § 9 (c)). Whatever that power may be, there is no danger to the Christian in the mere act of eating. But there is a danger for a man who has only recently emancipated himself from idolatrous belief and practice, lest he may be acting against his own conscience if he eats. There is also a danger lest by eating he may offend the conscience of his weaker brethren. And so St. Paul's conclusion is that Christians may eat what is set before them without asking questions, may accept invitations to dine with their heathen neighbours, but may not go and dine in a heathen temple, which would be a mere act of bravado. This is a good illustration of St. Paul's method of dealing with practical problems, and settling them upon fundamental Christian principles. The whole discussion of this question in the Epistle is rendered much more intelligible if we suppose that the opponents with whom he had to deal regarded themselves as πνευματικοί. This supposition accounts for the protest which he makes against self-styled γνώσις, on which men relied, and thus felt themselves justified in ignoring the scruples of their brethren.

(b) Marriage and the position of women.—St. Paul's teaching upon this question is conditioned by the attitude to women common in the world in which he lived, and also by his expectation of the παρουσία. As the time is so short, it is best for people to remain in the external circumstances in which they were when they were converted (1 Co 7<sup>18-20</sup>). As to the desirability of marriage, he lays stress upon the necessity of the avoidance of anything that can distract the Christian from the service of God. In most cases he thinks marriage will constitute a distraction. Therefore for most people celibacy is desirable. But if celibacy constitutes a greater distraction than marriage, then Christians should marry. There is no hint of any view of conjugal relations as being in themselves evil. The only consideration present to his mind is as to whether marriage will help or hinder a Christian in the service of God. His view that celibacy from this point of view is the best state is put forward on his own authority.

But for the indissolubility of Christian marriage he claims the authority of Christ Himself (1 Co 7<sup>10, 11</sup>). As to this he is quite explicit. A wife must not separate from her husband; if she do so, she must not marry another; and a husband must not leave his wife. But where two non-Christians have been married, and one of them is afterwards converted, then, if the unbelieving partner is willing, St. Paul thinks it is best that the marriage should be regarded as binding; yet he allows divorce, apparently with liberty of re-marriage (7<sup>15</sup>). His principle is quite clear. A marriage entered upon by two non-Christians is not a Christian marriage at all, and was never intended to be a permanent bond. It is not fair to the non-Christian partner that it should be regarded as necessarily permanent. Yet, if he is willing, it had better be regarded as a Christian marriage. For that will be better for the children.

His attitude to women is, as has been said, affected by the current view of their position. Women are not to take part in the assemblies, and are not to be teachers. In one passage he speaks as though women occupied an inferior spiritual position to men (1 Co 11<sup>3</sup>). But his language elsewhere is inconsistent with this. The fact is that St. Paul had not in this matter worked out his own principles, and he is therefore inconsistent. In his discussion of marriage he gives to women a position which is distinctly high. The rights of the wife are safeguarded no less than those of the husband.

11. The character of St. Paul as revealed in the two Epistles.—There is no Epistle in which the personal character of St. Paul is so fully revealed as in 2 Corinthians. The 'severe letter' brings before us a man acutely sensitive, affectionate, and at the same time determined. He is in a high degree impulsive. He writes a 'severe letter,' and is sorry for having written it (7<sup>8</sup>). An immense load is lifted from his heart by the news of the repentance of the Corinthians (7<sup>6, 7</sup>). He is intensely affectionate, and yearns for the affection of his converts (6<sup>11-13</sup>). He never spares himself. There is no limit to the demands which are made upon him by his converts. It is no affectation on his part to crown the list of the sufferings which he has endured for Christ by the words 'anxiety for all the churches' (11<sup>4</sup>). We see him as a true pastor, combining great practical wisdom with remarkable emotional intensity. He is a mystic, and he gives us an account of one of his mystical experiences (12<sup>1-9</sup>; there is no reason to doubt that in this passage he is speaking of himself). But he is fully alive to the danger of mysticism. No one could lay more emphatic stress upon the duty of letting religion bear fruit in good works. Indeed he is sometimes self-assertive where self-assertion is needed. He does not hesitate to tell the Corinthians to imitate him (1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>). But every missionary must speak so on occasions. And he was in the presence of teachers who asserted their own authority against his. Above everything else he is possessed with an over-mastering devotion to Christ; for His sake he is willing to endure everything, even ridicule (2 Co 5<sup>13-14</sup>). Thus his correspondence with the Corinthians is of immense importance for the understanding of his character. For we see him dealing with difficult practical problems, and we see him when he is most deeply moved by personal slights, and again by personal reconciliation. It is absurd to look to such a man for a systematic doctrinal system. He speaks as he is moved. He makes experiments. He is often tentative. He provides the material on which doctrinal systems may be built. He is not himself their builder.

12. Importance of the evidence of the Epistles.

—The importance of the Epistles to the Corinthians consists largely in the fact that they give us examples of St. Paul's methods of dealing with practical difficulties which actually arose in an early Christian community. He does not set out to give instruction to the Corinthians, but rather to answer questions which they themselves have raised, or to reform abuses which have actually grown up. We thus get a picture, of quite unique value, of the life of such a community; and the doctrines and practices referred to in the Epistles are evidently not being advocated by St. Paul now for the first time, but are actually existing in the Corinthian Church, and apparently have so existed for some time.

(a) Doctrine.—It would seem that the doctrine held by this Church was of a comparatively advanced type. There is no hint of any difference of opinion at Corinth about fundamental beliefs. Differences do exist, but they are concerned with disciplinary or ethical rather than with theological questions. It is true that there are some at Corinth who deny the resurrection from the dead. But it would appear from St. Paul's argument that they all accepted the doctrine of the Resurrection of Jesus. For he argues from the Resurrection of Jesus to the resurrection of Christians generally; and his argument seems to involve the supposition that there was no difference of opinion about the Resurrection of Jesus. Similarly there is no hint of any difference about the position assigned to Jesus Himself, or about the expectation of His speedy return in judgment. No one in the Corinthian Church seems to have thought that Jesus was merely human. The danger was probably rather the other way. There may have been a tendency to regard Him as a Redeemer-God in the same sense as other redeemer-gods,* and to have paid inadequate attention to His human life, but for this there is no direct evidence. It is clear that to a Christian this life was in the main a preparation for entrance into the Kingdom of God when that Kingdom should come. This preparation consisted in the reception of Christian Sacraments, by which he was transformed into a 'spiritual man.' But the necessity of moral reformation was never forgotten, at any rate by St. Paul, though there may have been a tendency on the part of some of the Christians to forget it (1 Co 6<sup>9</sup>). All the evidence of these Epistles goes to show that there was no tendency to depreciate the importance and the supernatural character of the change wrought for Christians by the life and death of Christ. The danger probably lay in the other direction—lest they should think that Baptism and the Eucharist of themselves, without any effort on their own part, were sufficient to ensure membership of the Kingdom.

(b) Organization and discipline.—The chief piece of evidence about the organization of the early Christian Church is to be found in 1 Co 5. It would seem from this chapter that for the decision of a case of discipline there would be an assembly of the Church, presided over by St. Paul in virtue of his apostolic authority. St. Paul pronounces sentence of excommunication, and it is ratified by the assembly. It does not appear that the Apostle recognized any right on the part of the assembly to dispute his sentence. In the case specified St. Paul is himself absent from Corinth, but he acts as though he were present, being indeed present, as he says, in spirit. These Epistles tend to confirm the view that the Apostle held an absolutely predominant position. Apart from the Apostle there is not much evidence about organization, though the discussion of the Body and members includes the names of many Church offices. It is clear that on the principle of the specialization of function, different duties were assigned to different members of the Church, in accordance with the Divine choice expressed by diverse spiritual gifts (1 Co 12<sup>28ff</sup>); and there is a recognition of the fact that some members are ιδιώται, i.e. have no special ministerial position in the Church (14<sup>16</sup>). But there is really no evidence as to the different functions discharged by the different officers.

13. Christianity and Gnosticism: the Christian wisdom.—Christians have the mind of Christ (1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>). This differentiates them at once from other people, who are merely ψυχικοί. The ψυχικός άνθρωπος is the man whose spirit has not been touched by the Divine Spirit. At Baptism a man is made potentially πνευματικός; he becomes νηπιος ἐν Χριστῷ. His life in the Christian Church is a rendering actual of the potentiality of spirituality which is now within him, and which shows itself in moral effects. Thus the Corinthians, although they ought to be by this time full-grown Christians, are still babes. This is shown by the fact that they display party-spirit—a sure sign of carnality. As long as a man is merely ψυχικός, the Christian wisdom is not for him, for he will not be able to understand it. He has first to be converted by the mere preaching of the Gospel of the Cross. St. Paul seems to mean by 'Christian wisdom' something more than this, τα βάθη τοῦ θεοῦ, probably the secret counsels of God, God's purpose towards mankind. The purpose of the gift of the Spirit is that we may know the things freely given to us by God. Thus the greatness of the heritage of the Christian appears to be the main content of the 'Christian wisdom.' There is no indication of an esoteric doctrine, belonging to a privileged class in the Christian Church. The 'Christian wisdom' is, indeed, esoteric from the point of view of those outside the Christian Church. And even for those who are babes in Christ it is not suited, but only for the τέλειοι. But all Christians may become τέλειοι. It is their own fault if they do not.

CORNELIUS (Κορνήλιος).—Cornelius was a Roman centurion stationed at Caesarea in the early years of the history of the Church (Ac 10<sup>1</sup>). His name is of Roman origin, and he is described as belonging to the Italian band or cohort. An inscription recently discovered in Vienna proves that an Italian cohort was stationed in Syria about A.D. 69, but Schürer holds that this could not have been the case under Agrippa in A.D. 40–44, which is the date of Cornelius (cf. Schürer, GVV<sup>1</sup> i. [1901] 463, also Expositor, 5th ser., iv. [1896] 469–472; W. M. Ramsay, Expositor, 5th ser., iv. [1896] 194–201, v. [1897] 69). Leaving aside altogether the question as to the presence in Caesarea at this date of an Italian cohort recruited from Romans settled in the district, there is no reason why Cornelius even apart from his cohort may not have been there on duty in the years referred to. Native princes often received assistance from Roman officers in training their home troops (cf. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 250). Cornelius enters into the history of the Church through a series of mutual visions received by him and the Apostle Peter, who admitted him into the Church by baptism. According to the narrative in Acts, St. Peter, in the house of Simon the tanner of Joppa, saw in a vision a cloth let down from heaven on which were four-footed beasts, creeping things, and fowls of the air, many of which in the eyes of the Jews were regarded as unclean. When St. Peter refers to their ceremonial uncleanness, the message is given, 'What God hath cleansed make not thou common' (Ac 10<sup>15</sup>). After the vision had passed messengers arrived from Caesarea telling St. Peter of Cornelius, who in a trance had received a command to send to Joppa for him. The next day the Apostle, accompanied by some of the Christians of Joppa, went to Caesarea and preached Jesus to Cornelius and his household, who gladly accepted the message, received the Holy Ghost, and were baptized. An important question arises as to the exact significance of this act of St. Peter. Luke evidently, from the space devoted to this incident, regards it as of supreme importance and as marking a decided step in the forward progress of the Church. Cornelius is described as 'a devout man and one that feared God.' The phrase 'a devout man' might be used to denote goodness characteristic of a Gentile, but, in connexion with 'one that feared God,' it implies that Cornelius was a proselyte, although there is no reason to believe that he had been formally admitted to the Jewish Church by the rites of circumcision and baptism. He belonged to that large class who found greater truth and satisfaction in the teaching of Judaism than in their own heathen religions, and who observed the Jewish law of the Sabbath and the regulations of ceremonial cleanness (cf. Schurer, GJV iii. [1909] p. 177, where Bertholet's view is combated that φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν, 'fearers of God,' is not in Acts a terminus technicus). The distinction which was drawn by later Judaism between 'proselytes of righteousness' and 'proselytes of the gate' is not found till after NT times, but there is little doubt that the circumstances giving rise to this distinction did really exist, and that 'the fearers of God' of Acts are practically identical with those who at a later date came to be known as 'proselytes of the gate' (see art. PROSELYTE). The significance of the incident seems then to lie in the recognition that full membership in the Christian Church was open not only to Jews but also to the Gentiles who 'feared God.' St. Peter uses the incident as a true precedent in Ac 11<sup>27</sup>, and reasserts its determining importance at the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15). The admission of Cornelius was the first step towards the recognition of the universality of the gospel of Christ. A further step was taken when membership in the Christian Church was offered to the heathen who had no relation to the synagogue.

CORNER, CORNER-STONE.—Among Semitic peoples a special sacredness was supposed to belong to the corners of structures, and this probably lies at the root of the metaphor. The Heb. ḥanōp, pinnāh, 'corner-stone,' is the stone at the angle, which, uniting the walls, holds the two sides together. It was chosen for its solidity and beauty to occupy an important place either in the foundation or the battlement. In the OT pinnāh denotes the principal men in the community and the supports of the State (e.g. Jg 20<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 14<sup>38</sup>); cf. 'Meum praesidium et dulce decus meum' (Hos. i. 1), where strength and beauty are united in one. NT believers saw Christ everywhere in the OT, and hence the word which originally referred to the choice among the chosen people came to signify Christ. The figure of the corner-stone is thus taken over from the OT, and specially from Ps 118<sup>22</sup> and Is 28<sup>16</sup>, the passages which rule the apostolic use.

In the NT 'corner-stone' was applied by Jesus to Himself (Mt 21<sup>42</sup>), and reappears in St. Peter's address to the Sanhedrin: 'He is the stone which was set at nought of you the builders, which was made the head of the corner' (Ac 4<sup>11</sup> γενόμενος εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας). Quoting, evidently from memory, the Apostle uses ἐξουθενέω 'despise and regard as valueless,' a word expressing great contempt; but later (1 P 2<sup>7</sup>) he uses the milder word ἀποδοκιμάζω of the LXX, which means 'test and reject after actual trial.' Ramsay (Pauline Studies, London, 1906, p. 253) notes that 'at the Phrygian marble quarries there have been found many blocks, which had been cut, but not sent on to Rome . . . some of them bear the letters REPR, i.e. reprobatum, "rejected." These were considered as imperfect and unworthy pieces, and rejected by the inspector.' It might happen, however, that a stone passed over by one builder was seen and chosen by another and wiser architect; cf. Michel-Angelo carving his colossal statue of David out of a block of marble which had been spoiled and rejected by an inferior sculptor some years before. So St. Peter's argument in his Epistle (1 P 2<sup>7</sup>). In ignorance and self-will the leaders of the people had rejected the corner-stone, but others, with truer spiritual discernment, making it the ground of faith and belief in God, had found in the rejected stone 'preciousness' (RvM 'honour') and worth; ἐντιμος suggests both meanings.

In Eph 2<sup>20</sup> 'Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner-stone' (ὁ βῆλος ἀγκυρωμαῖον αὐτοῦ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ), the thought is of the unity of Jew and Gentile in the Church—the saints build up the fabric, and the corner-stone is Christ.' They are drawn and held together in Him, as the walls of a building cohere in and are united by the corner-stone, which determines the lines of 'each several building' and compacts it into one.

COS (Κῶς, now Stanchio = ἑς τὰν Κῶ).—Cos was an island of Caria, at the entrance to the Ceramic Gulf, between the two headlands on which stood the cities of Cnidus and Halicarnassus. Its chief city, lying at the sheltered eastern extremity of the island, was 'not large, but beautifully built, and a most pleasing sight to mariners sailing by the coast' (Strabo, XIV. ii. 19). Its position on the maritime highway between the Aegean and the Levant gave it great commercial importance and wealth. It had the rank of a free city till the time of Augustus.

Cos was 'the garden of the Aegean' (T. Lewin, St. Paul, 1875, ii. 97). It was renowned for its vines and looms, its literature and art, and above all for its temple of Aesculapius and school of medicine, which must have made it especially interesting to St. Luke. It had Theocritus the poet, Apelles the painter, and Hippocrates the physician among its citizens. It attracted Jewish settlers at least as early as the Maccabean period (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>). Some words which Josephus (Ant. XIV. vii. 2) quotes from a lost work of Strabo—'Mithridates sent to Cos and took . . . 800 talents belonging to the Jews'—prove that the city had become a Jewish banking centre. One of the benefactors of the island was Herod the Great (BJ i. xxi. 11). Another was the Emperor Claudius, who decreed that it 'should be for ever discharged from all tribute,' chiefly on account of its medical fame (Tac. Ann. xii. 61).

St. Paul and his companions, in their voyage through the Aegean, 'came with a straight course'—running before the wind (εὐθρομῶσαντες)—from Miletus to Cos, a distance of 40 miles. Off Cos, where there was good shelter, they anchored for the night, and next day, with a northerly wind still blowing, they enjoyed an equally good passage to Rhodes (Ac 21<sup>1</sup>).

COVENANT.—1. Context.—In the EVV of the NT 'covenant' is the translation of the Greek word διαθήκη, which occurs 33 times. In the RV the word is uniformly rendered 'covenant' except in He 9<sup>16, 17</sup>, where 'testament' is used, with 'covenant' in the margin. In the AV, 'testament' occurs 13 times (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>6, 14</sup>, He 7<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> bis. 16. 17. 20, Rev 11<sup>19</sup>) and 'covenant' 20 times (Lk 1<sup>72</sup>, Ac 3<sup>25</sup> 7<sup>8</sup>, Ro 9<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>27</sup>, Gal 3<sup>15, 17</sup> 4<sup>24</sup>, Eph 2<sup>12</sup>, He 8<sup>6, 8, 9</sup> bis. 10 9<sup>4</sup> bis. 10<sup>16, 29</sup> 12<sup>24</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>). (For further particulars see DCG i. 374.) Analyzing the instances more closely, we see that 18 refer directly to the OT, 7 occurring in quotations; 12 have reference to the new or better dispensation of Jesus, or to His blood; 3 only (Gal 3<sup>15</sup>, He 9<sup>16, 17</sup>) are concerned with ordinary human institutions.

2. Use of διαθήκη in LXX.—It is most natural, in view of this preponderance of references to the OT, to seek in the LXX use of διαθήκη the clue to its meaning in the NT. διαθήκη is the all but invariable translation of the Hebrew word ברית (berith), which in our EVV is always rendered 'covenant,' never 'testament.' In some instances—as, for example, 1 S 13<sup>23, 38</sup>, 1 K 20<sup>31</sup>—the word indisputably means 'covenant' in the full sense, i.e. a mutual relationship between two parties. In others, the idea of the mutual relationship is wanting, as in 1 S 11<sup>1</sup>; but the idea of setting up a relationship, which may be done by the free act or choice of one person, is always present. It is in this later sense that we understand the Divine berith. This is a Divine order or arrangement which takes its rise without any human co-operation, springing from the choice of God Himself, whose will and determination account for both its origin and its character. The one-sidedness of such an institution makes the word 'covenant' a rather unfortunate choice in our EVV. Kautzsch goes so far as to state that 'the usual rendering of berith, namely "covenant," ought to be avoided as incorrect and misleading' (HDB v. 630b). It seems that we do not possess a word in English which exactly conveys the meaning of the Divine berith. Neither 'arrangement' nor 'disposition' is at all adequate. We are compelled in the OT to continue the use of 'covenant,' merely making the mental qualification required.

We have next to inquire why the LXX chose and adhered to the word διαθήκη as the rendering of berith. It is an undoubted fact that throughout the later classical period, and certainly in the early Christian period, this word had, in common usage, the meaning of 'will' or 'testament.' It is sometimes stated that there is only one instance of its use in the sense of 'covenant' in the whole of Greek literature, namely in Aristophanes, Birds, 440. Building upon this instance, Wackernagel has recently suggested that this meaning was current in the Ionic dialect, and may have been derived by the LXX from that source. If this were proved, many questions would be answered at a stroke; but unless some further evidence can be adduced in its favour it seems very precarious. On the other hand, further investigation rather qualifies the absoluteness of the assertion that διαθήκη means 'will' and nothing else. Ramsay in his Historical Commentary on the Galatians, and Norton in his Study of ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ, both show that, before will-making in our modern sense had become part of Greek social life, the word διαθήκη might be used to express 'a disposition of relations between two parties, where one party lays down the conditions which the other accepts,' not an ordinary bargain or contract, but a more dignified and solemn compact or covenant (Norton, op. cit. p. 31). In particular Ramsay speaks of the διαθήκη as a solemn and binding covenant, guaranteed by the authority of the whole people and their gods, and being primarily an arrangement for the devolution of religious duties and rights (op. cit. p. 361 f.). Accordingly, it is urged that in the early part of the 3rd cent. B.C. no better word was available to express the OT idea of a solemn and irrevocable disposition, made by God Himself of His own gracious choice, and meant to secure a religious inheritance to His chosen people. Accepting this as the best explanation offered as yet, we may observe that the later Greek translators, Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, writing at a time when the meaning of διαθήκη had been narrowed down to mean 'will' exclusively, felt obliged to fall back on the usual Greek word for 'covenant,' συνθήκη. Similarly, as Riggenbach has pointed out (Theol. Stud. 294), Josephus instinctively replaces διαθήκη by συνθήκη or the cognate verb, where the reference is undoubtedly to a covenant agreement between man and man, his linguistic sense being offended by the use of διαθήκη in any sense but that of 'will.' We come, therefore, to the conclusion that in NT times the use of διαθήκη in the sense of a solemn promise or undertaking had become an archaism. Readers of the English Bible can easily recall analogies to such a process in the use of words like 'conversation' or 'peculiar' or 'walk disorderly.'

3. Use of διαθήκη in apostolic and sub-apostolic times.—(1) Ordinary usage.—When we come to the NT period, there is no possible doubt that in ordinary usage διαθήκη means 'will' (so G. Milligan and J. H. Moulton in Expositor, 7th ser., vi. [1908] 563). 'The agreement of papyri and inscriptions with regard to the use of διαθήκη is very remarkable. . . . Any number of citations may be made, and there is never a suggestion of any other meaning' (than 'will'). Deissmann, agreeing with this conclusion, emphatically declares that the usage was so fixed that St. Paul could not have employed the word in the sense of 'covenant.' 'There is ample material to back me in the statement that no one in the Mediterranean world in the first century A.D. would have thought of finding in the word διαθήκη the idea of "covenant." St. Paul would not, and in fact did not. To St. Paul the word meant what it meant in his Greek OT, "a unilateral enactment," in particular "a will or testament"' (Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, p. 341). In his St. Paul (p. 152) he goes further and says that St. Paul found in his Greek Bible the idea that God had executed a will in our favour. It does not, however, seem possible to grant that St. Paul, who read his Hebrew Bible as well as his Greek, always thought of a will when he read of the Divine berith. Yet the expression of berith by a word that meant 'will' may have enriched the OT idea with new associations. We may note in further illustration of the usage in Jewish authors that in the Greek apocryphal writings διαθήκη and συνθήκη are used, once at any rate, as synonymous terms (cf. Wis 12<sup>21</sup>; 'covenants of good promises' (συνθήκη), and 18<sup>22</sup>; 'covenants made with the fathers' (διαθήκη). Philo appears to use διαθήκη in the sense of 'will,' saying that it is written 'for the benefit of those who are worthy of a gift.'

Yet when he adds that it is 'a symbol of grace, which God has placed between Himself who offers it, and man who receives it,' he seems to go back to the somewhat wider use we found in the LXX (Philo, de Mut. Nom. vi. 52f.; cf. Riggenbach, op. cit. p. 311 f.).

(2) NT usage.—Passing now to the NT, we must ask whether its writers use διαθήκη in what is undoubtedly the Hebrew OT sense of the covenant between man and God, i.e. 'unilateral enactment,' or as 'will,' or in a sense derived from both meanings. (a) It is best to begin with He 9<sup>16-18</sup>. Here, in spite of some attempts to retain the meaning of 'covenant' throughout (Westcott, Hatch, Dods, et al.), the weight of evidence seems decisive that in v. 17, at any rate, the writer is speaking of a human will. As has been said, 'if the question were put to any person of common intelligence, "What document is that which is of no force at all during the lifetime of the person who executed it?" the answer can only be, "A man's will or testament."' The most usual exposition grants this, but then supposes that the writer slips from one meaning in v. 16 to another in v. 17, and then back again to the first one. But if Philo, with whose writings the author was familiar, could, as we have seen, read the notion of will into an OT passage, there is little ground for denying the same possibility here. And when once the translation 'will' is admitted throughout the passage, the argument, which is so difficult to follow from any other point of view, becomes luminous. Verse 16 affirms that the inheritance contemplated under the first testament of God could not be enjoyed until a death had taken place; v. 17 adds that this is illustrated by the ordinary human practice, where a will comes into force after death; v. 18 states further that this was foreshadowed, even at the time when the first testament was given, by the death of the victim, which, as the whole argument of the Epistle shows, looked onwards to the perfect sacrifice of Christ. It is indeed urged that the use of the word 'mediator' in v. 15 is fatal to the translation 'will,' since a will needs no mediator, whilst a covenant does. But, as has been shown by Cremer (Lexicon, p. 421), citing illustrations from Diodorus Siculus, iv. 54, and Jos. Ant. iv. vi. 7, the word μεσίτης (mediator) may be used in the sense of 'one who appears or stands security for anything,' 'one who pledges himself for promises,' a parallel conception to the 'surety' in He 7-2. This is admirably illustrated by the use of the cognate verb in He 6<sup>17</sup> 'God interposed with an oath.' God gave His promise to Abraham direct, and by the oath which He swore condescended to become the guarantor of His own word.

If we admit this translation of διαθήκη in these verses, it appears to follow also in 9<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>0</sup>, as also in 7<sup>22</sup> and 12<sup>24</sup>. The references in 8<sup>6a</sup>, in view of the direct citation from Jeremiah, seem less certain, though Riggenbach argues for the same meaning here. A διαθήκη written on the heart is less easy to think of as a 'testament.' Yet the connexion of the διαθήκη with the promise in v. 8 suggests that this thought was not far away. This is one of those cases where we cannot deny that the archaic sense may have been present, but we may at least claim that it has been enriched by the new meaning of the word. Such a use is easily illustrated. When Newman in his sermon on 'Unreal Words' says: 'Our professions, our creed, our prayers, our dealings, our conversation, our arguments, our teaching, must henceforth be sincere,' and goes on immediately to quote: 'In godly sincerity . . . we have had our conversation in this world,' he understands of course the archaic biblical use of the word he quotes. But can we doubt that it has been enriched to him in such a context and on such a subject by its later use to describe speech?

(b) Turning to St. Paul's Epistles, we may begin with the much-discussed passage in Gal 3<sup>15-17</sup>. Here St. Paul declares that he is about to speak 'after the manner of men.' By some he is supposed to mean that he intends to use the word διαθήκη in its ordinary human sense of 'will,' as opposed to its biblical sense of 'covenant.' But it appears more likely that he means that having taken his previous arguments from Scripture he will now make his point clearer by taking an illustration from common daily life. Obviously if he does this he must give to διαθήκη its current meaning, which is without doubt 'will.' But if so, we ask whether he reverts to another meaning for the same word in v. 17. The whole circle of ideas is against this. It is a διαθήκη of promise, i.e. a testament. It belongs to Abraham and to his seed, it comes by way of gift, it invests those taking part in it with the rights of inheritance. The testator designates his heir, and arranges that at a predetermined time he shall receive the specified boon (42). It is indeed argued (Lukyn Williams, et al.) that we must not translate 'will,' because this connotes death. But St. Paul seems to have guarded himself against the over-pressing of his argument, showing by his 'though it be but a man's will' that the analogy was not exact. The word διαθήκη suggested to him that there was a human document which no one could set aside, namely a will; how much more then when God makes a will must that remain unalterable.

In Eph 2<sup>12</sup> and Ro 9<sup>4</sup> the idea of 'will' seems most probable. The use of the plural of διαθήκη to express the singular meaning 'will' is very frequent in Greek, meaning either the different provisions or the will as a whole. It is possible, however, that the Apostle is thinking of the oft-renewed promises made to the fathers. In Gal 4<sup>24</sup> the word is twice used, and applied once to the διαθήκη of promise given to Abraham and fulfilled through Christ, and once to the διαθήκη made at Sinai. As we can hardly suppose that St. Paul speaks of the Abrahamic dispensation in another sense than in ch. 3, and as the thought of a will seems clearly present in 4<sup>2</sup>, we find the same conception here. The Law of Moses, which in 3<sup>19</sup> appeared only as a supplement to the testament of promise, delaying its operation but not cancelling it, is here spoken of as an inferior testament. There appears to be a very marked touch of irony here. 'If you will have it that it is a testament,' says the Apostle, 'and insist on choosing to come under its provisions, it is a testament which will bring you an inheritance of slavery.' Our view of 2 Co 3<sup>6</sup> will be determined by our explanation of 1 Co 11<sup>5</sup>. Here we note the comment of Zahn (Galater, p. 162) that the Greek word had actually in the time of our Lord passed over into the Aramaic as a loan-word in the sense of 'will.' Hence we may suppose that our Lord, speaking almost in the very presence of death, and promising to His disciples a share in His inheritance (Lk 22<sup>3</sup>), enriched the OT idea of covenant with the thoughts that cluster round the testament of a dying man planning out the future of those who are dear to him. This is the best illustration the NT affords of the new wealth of meaning put into the old conception of berith. If so, we may find this in St. Paul's use also. In the case of 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>, where διαθήκη seems to stand for the OT, the archaic use appears more likely.

(c) Lastly (omitting Ro 11<sup>27</sup> and Rev 11<sup>19</sup>, which, as cited directly from the OT, do not contribute anything to the understanding of the question), we may say that Ac 3<sup>5</sup>, referring to Abraham and to the inheritance, may have been at least coloured by the Greek conception of 'testament.' In Ac 7<sup>8</sup> διαθήκη stands for the seal which accompanied the establishment of the new relationship, and sheds no light upon its character.

(3) Sub-apostolic writers.—Passing to the sub-apostolic Christian writers, we find few instances that are decisive. In Clem. Rom. ad Cor. i. the word occurs twice (xv. 4, xxxv. 7), each time in citations from the OT. The Epistle of Barnabas quotes also from the OT, and refers specially to the two tables of the διαθήκη which were broken by Moses (iv. 6 f.). Yet his most frequent use is 'heirs of the διαθήκη' (vi. 19, xiii. 1, 6, xiv. 5). 'Moses as a servant received it; but the Lord himself, having suffered in our behalf, hath given it to us that we should be the people of inheritance.' 'He was manifested that we . . . being constituted heirs through him, might receive the διαθήκη of the Lord Jesus, who was prepared for this end, that . . . he might by his word enter into a διαθήκη with us.' In this last passage we seem to have a clear instance of a passing over from the idea of 'will' to that of 'covenant.'

4. Conclusion.—As an illustration of the new fullness of meaning which we have discovered above, reference may be made to one of the most interesting of all the Jewish non-canonical writings, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. There the fathers of the Hebrew tribes plan out the future of their descendants, and with warning and promise speak of what lies before them. In the NT all earlier thoughts of God are summed up in the grand conception of Fatherhood, whilst man's relationship to God is set forth as perfected in the realization of sonship. It was the knowledge that we have been brought into the family of God, and made children of His and therefore heirs, that called forth St. Paul's adoring gratitude (Ro 8<sup>14c</sup>). Looking back into the past, he delighted to think that this gracious 'will' which adopts us and makes us heirs of the great inheritance had been made long since in favour of Abraham, and of those who are partakers of his spirit of faith and trust. If he read into the OT b'rith something that was hidden from the sight of those who first wrote of it, it is but another illustration of Augustine's saying: 'Vetus Testamentum in Novo patet.'

COVETOUSNESS In both AV and RV 'covetous' or 'covetous person' translates πλεονεκτής (1 Co 5<sup>10. 11</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, Eph 5<sup>3</sup>), and 'covetousness' πλεονεξία (Ro 1<sup>29</sup>, Eph 5<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>). Closely related terms are φιλαργυρία (1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>)='love of money,' and αίσχροκερής (1 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, Tit 1<sup>7</sup>)='greedy of filthy lucre.' φιλαργυρία and πλεονεξία are sometimes distinguished as 'covetousness' and 'avarice,' the desire to get and the desire to keep; but this distinction, which scarcely exists in fact, is not borne out in NT usage. φιλαργυρία, which is a 'root of all evils,' is manifested alike in greed of gain and in parsimony. It emphasizes the object of the desire, while the primary idea in πλεονεξία is the injustice of the means used for its attainment. Etymologically the latter word signifies the desire or claim to have a larger share (πλέον ἔχειν) than others; in usage it is covetousness, rapacity, the disposition to seek, and the habit of seeking, one's own enrichment without regard to the rights and interests of others. This sense comes out clearly in the use of the verb πλεονεκτεῖν, which in the Pauline Epistles (2 Co 2<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>17. 18</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>) always means to 'take advantage of' another. Such unrighteous advantage may be taken in the transaction of business (τῷ πράγματι, 1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>), or by the employment of religious influence and ecclesiastical position as a means of gain. In the apostolic writings the latter abuse is strongly reprobated. To be without covetousness is a mark of the true apostle (1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>), of the worthy bishop (Tit 1<sup>7</sup>), deacon (1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>), and elder (1 P 5<sup>2</sup>). To be 'greedy of filthy lucre' is characteristic of the false prophet (2 P 2<sup>3</sup>); and against this charge St. Paul guards himself with sensitive scrupulosity (1 Co 9<sup>1-18</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>17. 18</sup>).

(1) The apostolic writings show that then, as now, covetousness, the grasping selfishness which manifests itself in disregard of the interests, and violation of the rights, of others, was one of the most prevalent and flagrant of the evils which it is the work of Christianity to eradicate.

(2) They take the gravest view of its heinous sinfulness (Col 3<sup>5</sup>), its wide-spread ramifications (1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>), its ultimate consequences (1 Co 6<sup>10</sup>). In the Epistles of St. Paul, particularly, a central place is always assigned to it in the organism of vice. It is constantly set side by side with unchastity (1 Co 5<sup>10. 11</sup>, Eph 4<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>3. 5</sup>, Col 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>) in a fashion which has suggested to some exegetes that in such passages πλεονεξία signifies transgression of the rights of others in sexual rather than in pecuniary relations (many thus understand τῷ πράγματι in 1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>). The preferable explanation is that 'impurity and covetousness may be said to divide between them nearly the whole domain of selfishness and vice' (Lightfoot, Col.<sup>3</sup>, 1879, p. 213). 'Homo extra Deum querit pabulum in creatura materiali vel per voluptatem vel per avaritiam' (Bengel).

(3) Covetousness is a sin against one's own soul—destructive of spiritual self-possession (He 13<sup>5</sup>), bringing men into bondage to things external and uncertain (1 Ti 6<sup>17</sup>); against one's neighbour (1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>); but ultimately and essentially against God. The most pregnant word on the subject is that of St. Paul (Col 3<sup>5</sup>), 'covetousness which is idolatry.'* The antidote is regard for the righteous judgment of God (1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>), love to one's neighbour (1 Co 10<sup>24</sup>), trust in God's unfailing providence (He 13<sup>5. 6</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>17</sup>), a soul-satisfying experience of life in Christ (Ph 4<sup>11-13</sup>).

CRAFT.—See ARTS.

CREATION.—The NT doctrine of creation in general is that of the later OT writings and the Apocrypha; e.g. 2 Mac 7<sup>28</sup>, Wis 11<sup>17</sup>. It is found over the whole range of apostolic writings, from the early speeches in the Acts (7<sup>50</sup> [quoted from Is 66-] 14<sup>15</sup> 17<sup>24</sup>) to 2 Pet. (3<sup>5</sup>). God made the heaven and the earth and all that therein is; He is the one supreme power in nature; and He is as benevolent as He is supreme (cf. Ac 14<sup>1</sup>). Human affairs are subject to His will (cf. Ac 18<sup>21</sup>, Ja 4<sup>15</sup>). Though * Cf. Euripides, Cyclops, 316-17:

ὁ πλούτος, ἀνθρώπισκε, τοὺς σοφοὺς θεός·
τὰ δ' ἄλλα κομποὶ καὶ λόγων εὐμορφία.

supreme, therefore, He is no capricious tyrant. The concept of laws of nature, of course, is unknown; but the world is none the less a world of order; when surprising events take place, they serve as reminders or signs of His government or as means for the working out of His providential purposes (cf. Ac 12<sup>7-10</sup>, 22<sup>7</sup>). The existing world order, however, will not last for ever; it will dissolve in a catastrophe or series of catastrophes (cf. Ac 2<sup>19a</sup>, quoting Jl 2<sup>28-32</sup>; also Jude, 2 P 2, and Rev. passim), when the power that created will unmake to make anew.

But throughout the OT writings is manifested the feeling that some intermediary is needed in the operations of God's government (cf. Jg 6<sup>11f</sup>, 13<sup>3</sup> [an angel; but note 6<sup>14</sup>] and Ezk 11<sup>1</sup> [the Spirit]). Later Jewish thought went further and developed a detailed angelology; but the NT reproduces the simpler thought of the OT (cf. Ac 27<sup>23</sup> [an angel; so in 12<sup>7</sup>] or 16<sup>6</sup> [the Holy Spirit]). And with regard to the original act or acts of creation, the simple 'And Jahweh formed' or 'breathed' of Gn 2, and the even simpler 'And God said' of Gn 1, are extended even in the OT by the well-known references to the brooding Spirit (Gn 1<sup>2</sup>; perhaps, like the rest of the chapter, containing a purified echo of pagan cosmologies) and to Wisdom (Pr 8<sup>30</sup> etc.); a hint of a primal man as an assessor at creation has been found by Ewald in Job 15<sup>7</sup>. On such foundations as these, later Jewish thought built its theology of the Memra or Divine Word, and of the Logos as it appears in Alexandrian Judaism.

In contrast, perhaps in opposition, to all this, the apostolic writings prefer the language of continual reference to God Himself. They are troubled by no Jewish (or Gnostic) fears as to God's contact with the world of matter (Ro 1<sup>20</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>, He 1<sup>10</sup> [quoting Ps 102<sup>25-27</sup>] 3<sup>4</sup>). Note also He 1<sup>13</sup>: 'the worlds—αἰῶνες—have been framed by the word of God' (cf. Ro 11<sup>36</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>6</sup>, Eph 1<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>). The practical deductions from this view, that all things made by God are good, and work together for good, are found in Ro 8<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>4</sup>.

This insistence on God's sole activity makes the more remarkable the relation of the Father to the Son in the work of creation—a concept which, like so many others, owes its most definite formulation to St. Paul, but is represented in every other stratum of apostolic teaching. Thus in 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> we read: 'to us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through (δια) whom are all things, and we through him.' It is perhaps worth notice that this great sentence occurs in the discussion of things offered to idols, as if St. Paul expected the Corinthians to recognize the truth as something quite familiar (cf. Ro 11<sup>36</sup>, where the expression is ἐκ, not ἀπὸ, θεοῦ). In Col 1<sup>16</sup> we read that all things have been created in Christ and through Him and unto Him (ἐν, διὰ, εἰς). In v. 15 He is called the πρωτόκοπος πάσης κτίσεως—a term which recalls Rev 3<sup>14</sup> but goes far beyond it; with this should be compared the μονογενὴς of Jn 1<sup>14</sup>; see also Ro 8<sup>28</sup> (εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν πρωτόκορον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς), Eph 1<sup>4</sup>, and 1 P 1<sup>20</sup>. The same thought appears in somewhat different language in He 1<sup>2</sup> (the Son 'through [διὰ] whom he made the worlds . . . upholding all things by the word of his power'). In the locus classicus of the Johannine writings (Jn 1<sup>3</sup>) the preposition is still 'through' (διὰ). In these passages we have what may be termed the distinctively Christian contribution to the theistic doctrine of creation. Instead of a word, or spirit, or angels, the great instrument of creation is a living Divine Person—the Son. And the difference is not simply what the Christian might express by saying that the instrument is not the word but the Word. The Son is not merely the instrument, He is the end; δι' αὐτοῦ, and also εἰς αὐτόν; cf. Eph 1<sup>10</sup> 'to sum up all things in Christ'; ἰ.ε. He is also the final cause, while at the same time, from another aspect, with regard to His manifestation (1 P 1<sup>20</sup> quoted above), the final cause of the appearance of Christ in the world is to be found in the Church. Christ is also Lord of the created world, in this present time (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>, Col 1<sup>17-19</sup>); all things consist, have their ordered being, in Him; He is the head of all principality and power (Col 2<sup>10</sup>), just as 'all the fulness of God' dwells in Him (2<sup>9</sup>). And of all this created order the Church is the crowning work; of the Church Christ is the Head (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>); i.e. the Church, as in some way distinct from the rest of creation, stands in a unique and timeless relation to Christ.

It is impossible to enter into these daring thoughts without asking, What then of evil? Was evil too created by God, and through Christ? To the childlike thought of the OT, evil was, or rather is, created by God, like good (Is 45<sup>7</sup>; cf. Am 3<sup>6</sup>). And the NT writers were too fully steeped in the thought of the OT to feel the problem as we feel it to-day. But it was felt none the less. In 1 P 4<sup>19</sup>, indeed, the sufferings of the good only suggest the thought of a 'faithful Creator.' Ps 8<sup>6</sup> is quoted three times in the Epistles: once in Eph 1<sup>2-2</sup>, with simple approval; in 1 Co 15<sup>27</sup> it is recognized that the subjection of all things to Christ is not yet complete; so in He 2<sup>8</sup>, where this recognition is joined to the author's characteristic teaching with regard to the sufferings of Christ. For the most part, St. Paul refers moral evil to the 'spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>; cf. 2<sup>2</sup>, also 2 Th 2<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>). But in one pregnant passage, illuminating yet obscure, Ro 8<sup>19a</sup>, he hears in the long wail of the misery of creation the cries of the birth-pangs which herald a new order, of which the leaders and inaugurators are the sons of God; and in the apparent vanity (fruitlessness) of nature (in which 'of fifty seeds she often brings but one to bear'), he sees the preparation for a new revelation of the creative order and purposefulness of God; while no created thing is able even now to separate us from the love of Christ (v. 39). It is therefore not surprising that, in contrast to the old order, St. Paul should speak of the appearance of a new, here and now. If the whole of creation is through Christ, much more is the new character or self a new creation (Gal 6<sup>15</sup>; cf. 2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup> with Eph 2<sup>15</sup> and Ps 51<sup>10</sup>). The 'new man in Christ' explains and satisfies the longing of the created and imperfect world.*

Hitherto, no reference has been made to the Epistles of St. John, and indeed in these Epistles no mention is made of the act of creation. But it may none the less be maintained that St. John adds an essential element to the whole apostolic doctrine. A consideration of this may be introduced by a summary of the foregoing. As we have seen, the majority of apostolic writers are not interested in the question, How did things originate? Their language can be used with equal sincerity by those who believe in separate acts of creation and in some form of evolution (though doubtless, if questioned, all of them would have upheld a literal interpretation of Gn 1). Their interest is in creation as a stage or epoch; an epoch destined, after its work is done, to give place to a better, whose beginnings can even now be discerned. Neither of these stages can be understood apart from Christ. The first, like the second, is good, because it is the work of God. It is based on Christ; it is held together in Christ. But its goodness (to employ the profound Aristotelian distinction) is a matter of δύναμις rather than of ἐντελέχεια. Moreover, it exists side by side with another order, κόσμος, which is ruled over by the powers of evil, and which is doomed not to be superseded but destroyed. The second stage or epoch, whose succession to the first is sometimes spoken of in terms of a sudden catastrophe, sometimes, as it would seem, as the result of a long process—'one far-off divine event'—is the complete manifestation of the will of God; it involves a kind of transfigured pantheism, in which God is all things, and in all things (1 Co 15<sup>8</sup>).

St. John does not, however, pay attention to these two epochs; his antithesis is throughout between the present evil order and God's final purposes (the phrase ὁ κόσμος ὁ μέλλων is never used). This order is the abode of evil (1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>) and of the great enemy of God (4<sup>1</sup>); it lies, indeed, in the evil one (5<sup>19</sup>); it is passing away (2<sup>17</sup>); it is not to be loved (2<sup>15</sup>; contrast Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), but to be conquered (5<sup>4</sup>). On the other hand, the Son of God has been sent into the world; and through believing in Him is enjoyed, here and now, the gift of eternal life—a gift so complete and final that only in one passage does 1 Jn. speak with any definiteness of a future order at all (3<sup>2</sup>). As the other apostolic writers imply, the order of creation which centres in Christ, properly understood, is not physical, but moral and spiritual; and therefore, to those who believe in Christ, it is present here and now.

References in the Apostolic Fathers are not numerous; the deeper aspects of NT teaching were hardly caught; attention may be called, however, to 1 Clement: 'the Creator and Father of the ages' (ch. xxxv.), 'the God of the ages' (lv.), and 'the King of the ages' (lxi.). In Hermas we have a further reminiscence of the NT (Vis. i. i. 6): 'God, who dwelleth in the heavens and created out of nothing the things that are, and increased and multiplied them for His church's sake.'

LITERATURE.—References to the literature on Creation as a part of theistic doctrine cannot be given here, but the reader may be referred to G. H. A. v. Ewald, *Old and New Test. CRESCENS (Κρήσκης).—Crescens, a companion of St. Paul during his last imprisonment, had at the date of the writing of 2 Timothy gone to Galatia (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>), which may mean either Galatia in Asia Minor or the western province of Gaul. We find two of the best MSS (N and C) reading Γαλλίαν (Gaul) for Γαλατίαν (Galatia), and Eusebius (HE iii. iv. 9), Epiphanius (Hær. li. 11), Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret understand Western Gaul to be meant in the passage. If the Apostle visited Spain, as we have every reason to suppose, it is probable that he passed through Southern Gaul and may have founded churches there to which Crescens may have been sent as a delegate. On the other hand, the fact that the other delegates mentioned in the verse were sent to the east of Rome has led some to think that Asiatic Galatia is meant. The reference in the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) is ambiguous, as Western Gaul might be referred to as Galatia. Lightfoot thinks it likely that Western Gaul is indicated, and that the Apostle would certainly have written 'Galatia' when referring to the province in the West. He also holds that Γαλλίαν (Gaul) is an early explanatory gloss which crept into the text of several MSS (Galatians<sup>5</sup>, 1876, p. 31). The churches of Vienne and Mayence both claimed Crescens as their founder. Of the man himself nothing further is known. His name is Latin, and he may have been a Roman freedman. He is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on June 27 and in the Greek Menologion on May 30, where he is treated as one of 'the Seventy' and bishop of Chalcedon (Acta Sanctorum, June 27; Menologion, May 30).

CRETE, CRETANS.—One of the largest islands in the Mediterranean, Crete (Κρήνη) lies 60 miles S. of Greece. It is about 150 miles in length from E. to W., and varies from 7 to 30 miles in width. The greater part of it is occupied by ranges of mountains, but the valleys are exceedingly fertile, and the climate is delightful. While the northern coast has good natural harbours, the southern is much less indented, the mountains in many parts rising almost like a wall from the sea. In ancient times Crete had very numerous cities; Horace (echoing Homer, Il. ii. 649) describes it as 'centum nobilem Cretam urbibus' (Epodes, ix. 29; cf. Virgil, Æn. iii. 106). The recent excavations of early sites have furnished astonishing evidence of a highly developed pre-historic civilization, with 'Minoan' palaces and shrines, a 'Minoan' art of which that of Mycenæ is only an offshoot, and a 'Minoan' script of which the Phœnician alphabet is but an altered copy (EBR<sup>11</sup> vii. 421).

Tacitus (Hist. v. 2) commits a curious error in suggesting that the Jews came originally from Crete, and that the name Judei was derived from Mt. Ida. The Jews who resided in Crete in the early Maccabean period (1 Mac 10<sup>67</sup> 15<sup>-3</sup>) were of course immigrants. In 67 B.C. the island was annexed by Rome, and combined with Cyrenaica to form a single province, which remained senatorial under the Empire.

The ship in which St. Paul sailed from Myra for Italy would under ordinary conditions have gone north of Crete, but she was driven by stress of weather to seek the shelter of the south coast. Rounding the promontory of Salmone in the east, she coasted as far as Fair Havens, where she remained for some time weather-bound. In an attempt to reach the better harbour of Phœnix (now probably Lutro), she hugged the shore till she rounded Cape Matala, when a violent E.N.E. wind suddenly beat down upon her from the central mountains of the island, and compelled her to scud till she was able to get under the lee of the small island of Cauda (Ac 27<sup>5-16</sup>). See FAIR HAVENS, PHOENIX, and CAUDA.

It is not known how Crete was first evangelized. Cretan Jews and proselytes were present at the first Christian Pentecost, and some of them may well have been among the 3000 converts (Ac 2<sup>11.41</sup>). It is hardly likely that St. Paul was idle while he was perforce spending 'much time' (ἱκανον χρόνον) near the city of Lasea (27<sup>8-9</sup>). The Epistle to Titus, though perhaps not Pauline, reflects a credible tradition which links the name of Titus with Cretan Christianity. The need of the churches of which he had the oversight was organization (Tit 1<sup>5</sup>). 'The natural inference is that up to this time the Christians of Crete had gone on without any kind of responsible government, and that this anarchic condition was one considerable cause of the evidently low moral condition to which they had sunk. Accordingly, the appointment of elders was a necessary first step towards raising the standard of Christian life generally' (F. J. A. Hort, Christian Ecclesia, 1897, p. 176).

The Cretans were a brave and turbulent race, hard to govern, with an evil reputation for avarice, mendacity, and drunkenness. The writer of Tit.

quotes a hexameter of Epimenides, a prophet of their own—called by Plato θεῖος ἀνὴρ (Laws, i. 642 D)—who brands them as ‘always liars, beasts, and idle gluttons’ (Tit 1<sup>12</sup>). For this indiscriminate condemnation, uttered with prophetic indignation and scorn, there was much excuse. The Greeks coined a special word (Κρητίζειν) for a kind of talk and conduct which was characteristic of Crete, and to out-Cretan a Cretan (πρὸς Κρητὰ Κρητίζειν) was to outwit a knave (Plut. Æmil. 23, Lysand. 20).

CRISPUS.—Crispus (Κρίσπος) was the ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>) who accompanied St. Paul when he abandoned the synagogue for an adjoining house, and who became a Christian. Crispus was one of the few persons whom St. Paul himself baptized in Corinth (1 Co 1<sup>14</sup>), the Apostle usually leaving the baptizing to others; but Crispus was one of the first converts, and one of uncommon importance, whose conversion cost him dear, whilst it was a notable encouragement to St. Paul. The example set by a man of such eminence had considerable influence. His own household became Christians with him; and their conversion seems to have inaugurated a large gathering.

J. E. ROBERTS.

CROSS, CRUCIFIXION.—The English word is derived from the Latin crux through the French croix (Old French and Middle English, crois). The Greek σταυρός is wider in its meaning than the English word, and includes the upright stake, crux simplex, to which the criminal was bound or upon which he was impaled, as well as the crux composita, of various shapes. In the NT, however, σταυρός is confined to the usual English signification, and is equivalent to crux. It was the instrument upon which criminals suffered death, and the references in the NT are chiefly to the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, the instrument becoming the symbol of the cardinal doctrine of the Christian faith, the atonement and the work of human redemption, and in general the gospel itself.

1. Archæological.—The crossing of two lines at right angles as a symbol not only antedates Christianity, but is of the remotest antiquity, being prehistoric in origin. The primitive form of the cross was probably the gammate cross (crux gammata) known by the Sanscrit name of svastika, as it is designated by students of archæology. The form of this cross , used as a token of benediction and good luck, has been found on the ruins of ancient Troy, on the Hittite monuments, in Cyprus, and in Greece. In pre-historic times it was used, according to de Mortillet, as a symbol of consecration and not as a merely ornamental device. The gammate cross has been found on ancient Buddhist remains, and it was largely employed by the Buddhists. It has also been seen upon jewels and weapons amongst the Gallic, the German, and the Scandinavian peoples, in China, and Ashanti, and amongst the South American Indians. Although it was used by the early Christians as a prophylactic symbol, it was often placed alongside the other forms of cross. In Egypt the cross is found in the paintings on the tombs in the form , as the key of life; and although its material origin is doubtful, the symbolism clearly indicates the vital germ.

From Egypt its use extended to the Phœnicians, and afterwards to all the Semitic tribes.

2. Historical.—The relation of the non-Christian symbolism of the cross to that of the Christian Church need not be discussed here, although the connexion is held by some writers to be very close. We are on sure ground, however, in tracing the Christian doctrine of the cross to the historic basis as found in the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. This mode of execution was exceedingly ancient in the Orient, and it was practised amongst the Phœnicians (Valer. ii. 7), the Egyptians (Thuc. i. 110), and the Persians (Herod. ix. 120). Amongst the Romans it was a punishment considered too degrading for the citizens of the Empire (Josephus, Ant. xx. vi. 2, BJ ii. xii. 6, xiv. 9, v. xi. 1). Cicero (in Verr. ii. v. 66) speaks of it as being the severest penalty, reserved only for slaves (servitutis extremum summumque supplicium). It was inflicted upon those convicted for highway robbery, piracy, and similar crimes (Petron. lxxii.; Flor. iii. xix.), also for the public accusation of a master by a slave, for sedition, tumult, or false witness. The arbor infelix spoken of by Cicero is suggestive of the penalty of crucifixion (pro Rabir. iii. ff.). The Jews did not crucify their criminals whilst they were alive, although dead bodies were hanged by them to the accursed tree; consequently the execution of Jesus Christ was carried out by the Romans. The Jewish mode of execution was by stoning to death (Lv 20<sup>2</sup> 24<sup>16</sup>, 23, Dt 13<sup>10</sup> 17<sup>5</sup>, etc.).

There were generally two forms of cross used in capital punishment: the crux simplex, which consisted of a single stake to which the victim was fastened or upon which he was impaled; also the crux compacta. The latter was made of cross pieces of wood and took the form of: (a) the crux andrcana or crux decussata, in shape like the Greek X; or (b) the crux commissa, in the shape of the letter T or Greek Tau; or (c) the crux immissa, in which the vertical trunk extended higher than the transverse beams. It was upon the last-named form of cross, according to the testimony of the Fathers, that Jesus was crucified. Matthew tells us (27<sup>37</sup>) that the titulus was placed over (ἐπάνω) the head of Jesus.

Crucifixion was preceded by scourging (virgis cædere), according to the custom of the Romans, after which the prisoner was compelled to carry his cross, or at least the transverse portion of it, to the place of execution. There the cross would be uplifted, and the victim bound to it by cords (tollere in crucem). Then he would be fastened to it by three (or perhaps four) nails (Lipsius, de Cruce, ii. vii.), and probably also supported by ropes (Pliny, xxviii, § 46), and the placard or titulus bearing the name of the criminal and his sentence would be fastened to the upper portion. The condemned man would in the ordinary way die of hunger and thirst in the course of time; but in order to shorten the duration of the agony, the legs of the sufferer might be broken, although this practice was not common amongst the Romans. Nor would the Romans permit the removal of the corpse without special authorization.

The historical account of the crucifixion of our Lord agrees with all the above details of the mode of execution. He was condemned (falsely) for sedition and tumult. He was scourged, and compelled, until He was relieved, to carry His cross. His legs were not broken, it is true, because it was found that He was dead already (Jn 19<sup>32</sup>, 33). The brigands who were crucified with Him were subjected to crucifragium, but one of the soldiers pierced His side with a spear to make sure that He was really dead, and there flowed out ‘blood and water.’

To the Romans the cross had no religious significance as it had in the East; they merely regarded it as the material instrument of a most degrading punishment. The Hebrew Scriptures, on the other hand, contain what may be regarded as suggestions of the crucifixion, as in the case of the uplifted brazen serpent in the wilderness (Nu 21<sup>8-9</sup>), the piercing of hands and feet in Ps 22<sup>16</sup>, also in the suppressed passage, referred to by Justin Martyr, formerly contained in Ps 96<sup>10</sup> (LXX version, some codices).

As the instrument of Christ's execution came to be regarded in the early Church as the means of human redemption, it became the symbol of the Passion, and later still it was used as a sign of protection and defence. Some of the earlier forms of the crucifix represented the Lord as reigning from the tree, the triumphant Saviour-King, with no signs of agony. There is, however, no monument of the cross or crucifix remaining which belongs to the 1st century.

The ceremony of making the sign of the cross is of great antiquity, and is referred to by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 11 [Patr. Græca, ix. 305]) and by Tertullian in the 3rd cent. (de Cor. Mil. iii.), who felt it necessary to defend the Christians against the charge of the heathen that they too were guilty of idolatry in the worship of the cross. The superstitious use of the symbol to ward off evil may be traced to the middle of the 2nd cent., whilst the adoration and the exaltation of the cross came in later.

3. The doctrine of the cross in the early Church.—The doctrine of the cross, or the death of Christ, and the doctrine of the resurrection formed the essential teaching in apostolic Christianity. At Pentecost, and in the earliest contact of Christianity with Judaism, the fact of the resurrection, or rather the Christ of the resurrection, came to the front. But it was always the Crucified One who had been raised from the dead. The crucifixion was an event which was familiar to all, but the distinctive message was that God had put His seal and approval on the sacrifice of Christ. On each occasion in the Acts on which St. Peter preached the doctrine of the resurrection, he charged the Jews with having crucified Jesus (Ac 2<sup>36</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>39</sup>). In his First Epistle he spoke of Jesus as having borne our sins in His own body on the tree (1 P 2-4).

St. Paul in his address in the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia proclaimed the fact of the resurrection and laid the responsibility of the crucifixion of our Lord upon the Jews (Ac 13-7-29). It was in his Epistles, however, that he laid down specifically the doctrine of the cross. In his First Epistle to the Corinthians he refers to the cross as the central feature of his ministry, and states that he had determined to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (2<sup>2</sup>). It is a double reconciliation which is thereby effected, between God and man, Jew and Greek. The enmity is slain through the cross, and access is gained in one Spirit unto the Father (Eph 2<sup>16-18</sup>). It was the sole means whereby reconciliation and peace between God and man were possible (Col 1-9). The cross was a stumbling-block to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks, but it was God's wisdom, not discernible by the natural man and only truly appreciated by those who are spiritual (1 Co 1). In Gal. the curse of the cross is brought forward (3<sup>13</sup>). This curse was borne by Jesus Christ on behalf of all men, both Jews and Greeks, for it rests upon those who have not kept the whole law, as well as upon those who have ignored it altogether. Neither Jews nor Gentiles can be justified by the works of the law; both alike are under the curse and are to be justified by faith alone. The curse is transferred to Christ as the sacrificial victim, and the 'bond written in ordinances' is nailed to His cross, and taken out of the way (Col 2<sup>14</sup>). This idea is very prominent in the symbolism of the scapegoat, the transfer of the curse being represented in the light of the victim bearing the iniquities of the people into the wilderness (Lv 16<sup>5ff.</sup>). The shame, ignominy, and disgrace which were associated with the cross formed the culmination in the humiliation of Him who 'was in the form of God and counted it not a prize to be equal with God,' and it was the ground of the glorious exaltation with which God invested Him, and for which He received the name which is above every name, and should receive the homage of all things in heaven and earth and under the earth (Ph 2<sup>8-11</sup>). 'He was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth through the power of God' (2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>).

The Epistle to the Hebrews (especially 9<sup>11-28</sup> 10) develops the conception of the High-Priesthood of Christ and demonstrates that He is the High Priest of good things to come, having through His blood obtained eternal redemption for us, and thus He becomes the Mediator of the new Covenant. By His redemptive work once for all we are sanctified and perfected for ever through the offering of His body.

The hope of the race for the future is based upon the atonement, and the consummation of the dispensation is associated with the sacrifice of Christ as the Lamb which hath been slain. The Lord of the Churches is to receive the adoration of the Church throughout all ages because He hath loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood and hath made us a kingdom and priests unto God the Father (Rev 1<sup>5-6</sup>). 'Because of the suffering of death' He is 'crowned with glory and honour' (He 2<sup>9</sup>). Throughout the eschatological references of the Apocalypse, the power and dignity of the Lamb upon the throne culminate in the ascription of all praise and glory to Him who is worthy because He has been slain.

From the references in the NT we gather that the cross and the crucifixion of Christ became the symbol of human redemption and of the doctrine of the atonement. The doctrine of the cross was the central truth in the early Church, confirmed and completed in the fact of the resurrection. Though a symbol of humiliation, disgrace, and shame, it came to stand for the most glorious truths of the salvation wrought for us by Jesus Christ and as synonymous with the gospel itself.

That this was the doctrine of the cross amongst the churches of the 1st cent. is evidenced by the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. Polycarp refers to the blood of Christ as demanding vengeance upon His persecutors (Phil. ii.); he also alludes to the cross, when he affirms that he who rejects the testimony is of the devil (vii.), and enjoins prayer for the enemies of the gospel (xii.). The doctrine of the cross is with Ignatius the central teaching of his faith, and he lays great stress upon the 'blood,' the 'passion,' and the 'cross' of Christ, so much so that he vividly recalls the words of St. Paul. The cross means to him salvation and is the pledge of eternal life, but it is a scandal to the unbeliever (Eph. xviii.). The words το πάθος are very frequently used by Ignatius, for in our Lord's passion all men must die; through Christ's sufferings the penitent is to return to God; Christ's passion the saint must strive to imitate; and it is the joy and peace of the Church. The main endeavour of Ignatius in combating the Docetic heresy was to prove that the sufferings of Christ were real experiences, especially in Trall. ix. (see also Trall. Inscr. xi., Smyrn. i. iii. vii., Philadel. Inscr. iv. viii.).

(1) The death of Christ upon the cross is the sacrifice for human guilt and sin.—The immediate cause of Christ's death was the animosity of the Jews with whom our Lord was brought into collision through His teachings, His ministry, and His claims. In the condemnation and death of Jesus all human sin was epitomized and focused. It was the rejection of the Messiah by God's chosen people who represented the race in its treatment of the Son of God. The death of Christ was, however, voluntarily borne by Him, who was willing to sacrifice Himself and become the victim of the sins and wrongs of humanity. It is plainly and repeatedly taught by Christ and His disciples that He gave Himself on our behalf and for our sakes. The Greek prepositions ἀντί, ὕπέρ, διὰ, πρό are used with respect to this transaction as well as such terms as propitiation, reconciliation, mediator, and ransom. The propitiatory rites of the Mosaic economy are freely employed by the NT writers, not merely by way of illustration but also as types of Christ, who has in His death fulfilled and consummated them all.

The whole scheme of human redemption must be viewed in the light of Divine and perfectly holy love. Love transfers to itself every aspect of suffering that its object has to bear. Even the sense of isolation and 'the dereliction' of our Lord, as it is termed, must be regarded as the transfer that love alone is capable of making. Perfect love is perfect sympathy and perfect interest, and the mystery of the cross is the mystery of love at its highest power and value. When love sacrifices itself for sin it must entail suffering. Although love is regarded as identifying itself with its object in the sense of shame, disgrace, and degradation, there is no confusion of moral issues. Christ knew no sin although He was made sin for us. He was pure, harmless, and undefiled, without spot or blemish. Nevertheless He experienced sin as God experiences it, whilst He experienced its effects as man does (Forsyth, The Cruciality of the Cross, p. 212). As there is in the identification of love the act of putting oneself in the place of another, an element of identification, which in some sense amounts to substitution, is always involved.

It is important, however, to observe that the death of Christ regarded as a penalty or an act of suffering is not per se stated to be the propitiation or the satisfaction offered to Divine Justice or the Moral Law. It was the perfection of the offering and the finished obedience culminating in the death of the cross which won the acceptance by God of the sacrifice. The moral value of the offering was the sacrifice of a complete and absolutely perfect life which met and satisfied the claims of the law. It was not the transfer of an exact equivalent in suffering which constituted the worth and efficacy of the atonement, but the offering of a complete personality in holy obedience and full surrender. Such was the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

(2) The redemption of mankind is wrought by means of Christ's death upon the cross.—The race is under condemnation and a curse through sin, but Christ has taken the curse upon Himself, and in doing so has made an offering for the whole of mankind—a cosmic sacrifice by the life of perfect obedience that the Law required. This righteousness is imputed to all who exercise true faith in Him. Whilst the holy love of God in Christ makes it possible that sin should be transferred to the Redeemer, it is faith on the part of the believer which makes possible the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the sinner's account. The man who believes in Christ appropriates the righteousness of Christ as his own, by accepting the sacrifice and the satisfaction rendered to the eternal law of right as being offered on his behalf. Thus there is on the part of the believer the identification of himself with Christ in His perfect sacrifice. He lays his hand as it were upon the head of the scapegoat, and he makes the offering of the Paschal Lamb his own act. Christ is to him the expression and the fulfilment of the perfect righteousness which he feels is expected of him and that is worthy of him. Ideally all that Christ did, accomplished in His life of perfect obedience to the will of God, culminating in the death of the cross, is appropriated by the believer as his own. Christ's righteousness is transferred to the believer in so far as he is united to his Saviour by living faith. He can say with St. Paul, 'I have been crucified with Christ, yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>), and 'That I may gain Christ, and be found in him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith' (Ph 3<sup>9</sup>). The true self is not the actual self, but the ideal self, which the believer finds in his Lord. In the life and character of the believer this ideal is being continuously and progressively realized, in such a manner that he dies to sin and rises with Christ in the power of His resurrection, and is enabled more and more to live the Christ-life in the world. By faith we are united to Christ in His death, dying to sin, and are raised into newness of life in His resurrection.

The death of Christ upon the cross secures the forgiveness of sin for those who accept the Christ and His sacrificial work on their behalf. In Him we have our redemption, the forgiveness of sins (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>, Col 1<sup>14</sup>). The demands of the Law are satisfied, God's requirements are met in the perfect life and personality of our Lord, the rightness of the moral obligation is acknowledged, and the God of Holiness can forgive. The need of forgiveness is seen in the psychological fact that every man requires, before he can make a fresh start in a life of holiness, the consciousness that he is entering upon a new, unstained, and unblemished chapter of his life, and that the guilty past is blotted out. The incubus of guilt must be removed, and he must take up his life as if the past had not been. He needs to know that he is in a right relation with God, and that his ideal is yet attainable. The assurance of forgiveness is absolutely necessary; for although the Lord is full of mercy, and there is always forgiveness with Him, yet the requirements of the Law must be acknowledged and satisfied. They have been fully met in the death of Christ, and the acceptance of that offering has been sealed in the resurrection of Christ from the dead.

The mystic union of the believer with his Lord, which is constituted by love and wrought through faith, results in the crucifixion of self to the world and of the world to self (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>). The spell of sin is broken, and the believer is dead to its power; the violated law has no hold upon the believer. He is one with his Lord in the love that sacrificed itself to the death, and is kindled within the heart of the man who accepts the sacrifice as made on his behalf. The love which brought Christ to the cross and the grace of God in Christ establish a spiritual unity with Christ in all His sufferings and His judgment upon sin, so that man's lower nature is crucified with Christ and His blood washes away sin and cleanses from all guilt. Thus the blood of the cross becomes the symbol of that redemptive grace which brings men back to God, and by which the triumph of the Redeemer over sin and death is achieved.

CROWN.—The word is used in the apostolic writings of the NT (AV) to translate two Greek words—στέφανος and διάδημα. The RV, however, distinguishes between them and always translates διάδημα by the word 'diadem.' The latter term is less frequently used, and signifies the official head-dress of a king or a priest. It was originally applied to the silken fillet of blue or purple mixed with white used by the Persians to confine the hair (Gr. διαδέω, 'to bind'). By and by the word came to be applied to the ornamental head-dress of the king, which was distinguished by its colour and the pendants of gold or jewels attached to it. The Persian diadem was adopted by Alexander the Great, and came to be regarded as the special and distinctive head-dress of royalty. Metaphorically the word was used to indicate royal power, dominion, or authority. Thus in Rev 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>12</sup> the RV gives the correct translation 'diadems' (AV 'crowns'). In Rev 12<sup>3</sup> the royal power of the dragon is referred to, in 13<sup>1</sup> the power of the beast, and in 19<sup>12</sup> the royal dignity of Christ.

The term στέφανος (Lat. corona, Eng. 'crown' [AV or RV]), on the other hand, is never used of a kingly crown (cf. Trench, NT Syn.<sup>8</sup>, London, 1876, § xxiii.). It refers to the chaplet or wreath given by the Greeks as a mark of victory, e.g. to the winner in the games, or as a reward of talent, of military or naval prowess, or of civil distinction, while it was also worn on festive occasions and at funerals. The Romans in the same way used the term corona, and distinguished a great many crowns (made of different materials to signify various achievements in war and peace. No fewer than eight crowns are mentioned as rewards for military prowess. Thus a crown or wreath made of grass, seeds, or wild flowers was given by the inhabitants of a besieged city to the general who raised the siege (corona obsidionalis). To the soldier who saved the life of a Roman citizen was given a wreath of oak leaves (corona civica). The sailor who first boarded an enemy's ship received a golden crown (corona navalis or classica). In the same way the soldier who first scaled the wall of a besieged city received the corona muralis, also of gold; while a similar crown, corona castrensis or vallis, was given to the soldier who first crossed the rampart (vallum) and forced an entrance into the enemy's camp. The Romans also distinguished three kinds of triumphal crowns (corona triumphalis), one made of bay leaves and worn round the head of the general who secured a triumph; another of gold held over the head of the victorious general during his triumph; and another, also made of gold, sent by the provinces to the victorious commander. In the same way the general who received only an ovation obtained a crown of myrtle (corona ovalis), while another crown of olive leaf (corona oleagina) was worn by the soldiers of the victorious army as well as by their commander.

The custom of wearing crowns or chaplets at festive entertainments originated in Greece and was transferred to Rome. These festal wreaths were made of various shrubs and flowers, such as roses, violets, myrtle, and ivy, while at marriages the bride and bridegroom were both adorned with wreaths, the bride plucking the flowers with her own hand. The practice of crowning the dead with garlands of flowers and leaves, which was also taken over from Greece to Rome, probably arose from the desire to honour the departed who had fallen in war.

Thus we see that the ideas underlying the word

στέφανος are neither dominion nor royalty but (a) victory, honour, reward; and (b) joy. (1) The conquering Christ in the Book of the Revelation is described as wearing a crown (6- 14<sup>14</sup>), as are also the devastating locusts (9<sup>7</sup>) and the 'woman clothed with the sun' (12<sup>1</sup>). Here the idea is that of victory. (2) In the same way the Christian who is victorious over the temptations of life obtains as his final reward a crown of victory (1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Rev 2<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>). This is particularly described as a 'crown of life' (Ja 1<sup>12</sup>, Rev 2<sup>10</sup>) and 'a crown of glory that fadeth not away' (1 P 5<sup>4</sup>). Probably the 'crown of righteousness' of 2 Ti 4<sup>8</sup> is to be understood as signifying not 'the reward which is righteousness,' but rather 'the reward of righteous acts.' The Apostle has fought the good fight, finished the course, kept the faith, and as the reward of these things expects to receive the victor's crown, the victor's reward (cf. EGT iv. [1910] 178). The crown of life and the crown of glory are undoubtedly to be understood in the sense of 'the reward or crown which is life,' 'which is glory.' Probably a saying of Jesus suggested the use of the word crown in this connexion (cf. EGT iv. 427). (3) The ideas of victory and of joy are both present in the use of the term by St. Paul to describe his converts. The Philippian Christians are his 'joy and crown' (4<sup>1</sup>), i.e. the marks of his victory, the cause of his rejoicing, his reward; so the Thessalonians (1 Th 2<sup>19</sup>) are his 'crown of rejoicing.'

The same word is used of the 'crown of thorns,' which probably was intended to mock the defeat and humiliation of the 'King of the Jews.' It marked the ironical contempt of the Roman soldiers for the Jews. In the later history of the Apostolic Church the question of the relation of Christian converts to these 'crowns' of the Roman army and Emperors became a burning one, which is discussed by Tertullian in his work de Corona.

CRYSTAL (κρύσταλλος, from κρύος, frost).—The glassy sea before the throne of God is like unto crystal (Rev 4<sup>6</sup>), the light of the New Jerusalem like a crystal-clear jasper (21<sup>11</sup>), and the river of the water of life bright (λαμπρόν) as crystal (22<sup>1</sup>). κρύσταλλος signifies either ice (glacies) or rock-crystal (crystallum). For the purpose of the similes it is immaterial which of these is meant, as both are colourless and transparent, and either may be used to convey an idea of 'the white radiance of eternity.' The same ambiguity attaches to the terrible crystal (or ice) in Ezk 1<sup>22</sup>, where the LXX renders קָרָן by κρύσταλλος. The ancients regarded rock-crystal as a kind of congealed water, whence its name in Hebrew and Greek. It is really the most refined kind of quartz. It crystallizes in hexagonal prisms with pyramidal apices. The Romans carved it into vases and goblets, sometimes elaborately engraved. It was supplied to them from the Alps and India. Its use is now largely superseded by that of glass.

CUBIT (Gr. πῆχυς, lit. 'forearm').—The most important Hebrew unit for measuring length was from the earliest times the cubit. This was approximately the length of the forearm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger, and we find very frequent use of this measure in the OT. Like our own 'foot' as a measure of length, this standard was averaged at an early date, and many varied attempts have been made by metrologists to fix the exact length of the Hebrew cubit in English inches.

The evidence of the OT generally, and particularly of Ezekiel, goes to show that both before and after the Exile a longer and a shorter cubit were recognized. We find 'the cubit of a man' (Dt 3<sup>11</sup>) distinguished from a longer cubit used in the measurement of Ezekiel's Temple (Ezk 40<sup>5</sup> 43<sup>13</sup>). The 'cubit of a man' is the measure in every-day use at the date of the writing of Deut. (probably in the time of Josiah). Ezekiel in describing the Temple of his vision uses a larger measure—one hand-breadth longer than the ordinary cubit. As the prophet's measurements correspond with the details of Solomon's Temple, he probably adopts the ancient cubit, generally used in the days of Solomon, in order that his new Temple may be an exact reproduction of the Solomonic edifice. The Chronicler (2 Ch 3<sup>3</sup>) speaks of the dimensions of this first Temple as being 'after the former measure.' Common tradition fixes the length of the cubit as six hand-breadths, and we have ground for concluding that the larger cubit used in building in the age of Solomon measured seven hand-breadths.

It is remarkable that in Egypt (see F. L. Griffith, 'Notes on Egyptian Weights and Measures,' in PSBA xiv. [1892] 403) two cubits were in use from early times, viz. the 'short' cubit of six and the 'royal' cubit of seven hand-breadths. The 'royal' cubit can be fixed with practical accuracy at 20.63 in. (Petrie, EB<sup>9</sup> xxiv. 483<sup>4</sup>). Using this as a basis, we can fix the 'short' Egyptian cubit at 17.68 in., being six hand-breadths of 2.95 in. or 24 finger-breadths of .74 inches. It is uncertain whether the Hebrew system of measurement was originally derived from Egypt or not, but the similarity of the two systems makes such a conclusion extremely probable.

Kennedy in HDB iv. 909 brings forward evidence which seems to show that the cubit of later Judaism and particularly at the date when Josephus wrote his histories, had been approximated to the Roman-Attic standard cubit, which was measured from the elbow to the knuckle of the middle finger and was equal to 17.5 in. (cf. Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant.<sup>3</sup>, 1875, p. 122<sup>7</sup>).

The cubit was subdivided into the span, equal to  $\frac{1}{2}$  cubit; the palm or hand-breadth, equal to  $\frac{1}{4}$ th of a cubit; and the finger-breadth or digit,  $\frac{1}{16}$ th of a cubit. Four cubits formed a fathom, and six cubits a reed.

In the apostolic writings of the NT the word 'cubit' is found only once, viz. Rev 21<sup>17</sup>, where the seer describes the angel going forth to measure the walls of the New Jerusalem: 'and he measured the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of an angel.' The measure used by the writer here is the ordinary Græco-Roman cubit, of which 400 went to the στάδιον or στάδιος of the preceding verse. The mention of 'an angel' does not imply any reference to the 'royal cubit,' but is, as Moffatt (EGT, 'Rev.', 1910, p. 484) remarks, 'another naive reminder (cf. 19<sup>9</sup>, 10<sup>22</sup>, 22<sup>9</sup>) that angels were not above men.' Swete says: 'The measurements taken by angelic hands are such as are in common use among men. . . . There is perhaps the further thought that men and angels are σύνδουλοι (19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>) and men shall one day be ἀσάγγελοι' (Swete, Com. in loc.). W. F. BOYD.

CUP (ποτήριον).—The Eucharistic cup is called by St. Paul 'the cup of blessing' (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>). Various shades of meaning have been found in the phrase: (1) the cup which Christ blessed, making it for ever a cup of blessing; (2) the cup which has been consecrated by a prayer of thanksgiving for use in the Lord's Supper; (3) the cup which brings blessing to the communicant. The sacramental cup is usually, and very naturally, supposed to have been connected in Jesus' mind with the third and most sacred of the cups which, in the ceremonial of later Judaism, were handed round at the Passover. That third cup was known as 'the cup of blessing' (כוס ברכה), and St. Paul, who had often received it, also appears to be tacitly comparing and contrasting with it 'the cup of blessing which we (Christians) bless.' The identification of the Lord's Supper with the Passover is, it is true, a much-disputed point, but even if the institution of the Eucharist took place at an ordinary meal, the cup used by our Lord may well have been signalized, both at the time and ever afterwards, as the new cup of blessing. Another name for it was 'the cup of the Lord' (1 Co 10<sup>-1</sup>), i.e. the cup received from His hand, signifying fellowship with Him and devotion to Him, to drink from which made it morally impossible for the communicant to share in the riot and debauch of heathen banquets—to drink 'the cup of demons.'

By a Semitic figure of speech, one's lot or experience, joyful or sorrowful, regarded as a Divine appointment, is compared with a cup which God presents to one to drink. Thus the writer of Rev., saturated with prophetic ideas and imagery, speaks of Divine retribution as 'the wine of the wrath of God, which is prepared unmixed in the cup of his anger' (14<sup>10</sup>; cf. 16<sup>19</sup>). JAMES STRAHAN.

CURSE.—Traces of the early belief that curses rightly pronounced had an inherent power can hardly be found in the NT. The principal force of the word is either as an expletive provoked by passion from an undisciplined mind, or as a serious and strong assertion of the connexion between evil-doing and woe. Sometimes the imprecation of Divine wrath is present, with sternness or mere rage in the appeal; sometimes religious sanctions are implicit, and part of the connotation of the Heb. herem or ban is preserved; and in one passage (Gal 3<sup>10-13</sup>) the word recurs in various forms four times in as many verses, and its suggestions relate to one of the deepest mysteries of the Cross.

In Ac 23<sup>-14</sup>, 21 and Rev 22<sup>3</sup> the Gr. word used is a form or compound of anathema (q.v.); and in each case the form is in the NT peculiar to the passage, though not unknown in later ecclesiastical usage. The curse or oath was the invocation upon themselves of the judgments of God if the conspirators failed to do as they had covenanted with one another. It was a religious bond such as fanatical hatred has always been disposed to resort to, and superstitious terrors were called in to ensure the common purpose. In the passage from Rev. the word is strengthened by a prefix, and made equivalent to our 'execration.' The phraseology is at least reminiscent of Zec 14<sup>11</sup>, and includes, but goes beyond, the reversal of the doom of Gn 3<sup>17</sup>. In the Holy City, as in the Jerusalem of the prophet, will be found no more any person or thing, execrated or execrable, and there will be no need for the incidence of any Divine judgment. It is an anticipation of a condition of moral purity without any breach of right relationship among the residents or between them and God; but the prophetic parallel suggests that the primary idea is that of security, the people dwelling safely in the absence of any influence that would involve moral peril.

Another root occurs in the rest of the passages, its usage passing from the general idea of prayer through that of the effect of prayer in securing ill to an enemy and ending with a partial personification in which Ara becomes a goddess of destruction and revenge. Almost without exception the thought is that of a Divine visitation upon an offender, involving grievous, though not necessarily permanent, suffering. The simplest form is found in Ro 3<sup>14</sup>, which is a free rendering from the LXX of Ps 10<sup>7</sup>. In Ro 12<sup>14</sup> also the meaning does not go much beyond ordinary blasphemy (cf. Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). James (3<sup>24</sup>) makes the curse of an individual a wrong done to mankind, and thus protests against the Pharisaic temper of Jn 7<sup>49</sup>, and traces the sin back to its actual source, a defect in love for man being an effect of the absence of love for God. 'Children of cursing' (2 P 2<sup>14</sup>) is a Hebraism (cf. Eph 2<sup>3</sup>, Lk 10<sup>6</sup>); it may denote nothing more than the extreme wickedness of the men referred to, though one is disposed to see an allusion to the wrath of God, as in Ps 95<sup>11</sup>. 'Nigh unto a curse' (He 6<sup>8</sup>) recalls Gn 3<sup>17</sup>; such land looks like that described in the original curse, and therefore rejection and 'to be burned' are its natural fate. The burning is apparently final, or at least like the destruction of a land by volcanic eruption (Dt 29<sup>3</sup>), for the thought of purification by the burning up of noxious growths is foreign to the context.

There remains only the critical reference in Gal 3<sup>10-12</sup>. The starting-point of the argument is the impossibility on the part of anybody of compliance with the requirements of a legal religion or specifically of the Jewish Law; for while the Mosaic Law is to the forefront, the Pauline use of the word for 'law' without the article is significant, and the pronouns look beyond the group of converts from Judaism. Hence every legal religion lays upon its adherents the unavoidable curse of Dt 27<sup>6</sup>, which again is cited freely from the LXX. The curse evidently means humiliating hopelessness of attainment; strive as he may, the aspiring man is bound in the shackles of his very nature, and cannot meet the claims which his religion is recognized as justly making upon him. 'He that doeth them shall live in them' (Lv 18<sup>5</sup>) is a law of life, which in experience becomes a doom. The only refuge left is a sure one, for Christ became a curse for us and thereby redeemed us from the curse of the Law. What that curse means is shown in two particulars. The one is His death by crucifixion, and the other the fact that this death was endured not for Himself but for others. Shame and penalty, rejection by God (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>), gathered upon Him; and thus faith became the permanent secret of righteousness. Crucifixion can hardly be said to have been practised among the Jews; though there are many instances of their exposing dead bodies on stakes or otherwise, and to that the citation from Dt 21<sup>23</sup> relates. To the Roman the shame of the punishment was intolerable because of its association with slaves and captives; to the Jew it was an outrage upon humanity. It meant the defilement of the land, and the concentration upon the sufferer of the wrath of God. It has been argued that Christ's death in this way, though He was personally sinless, was the formal inauguration of a better method of salvation than Mosaism (but see C. C. Everett, The Gospel of Paul, 1893). But neither Jew nor Gentile would be likely thus to understand it; nor do such spectacular expedients appear to enter into God's methods of salvation. The Pauline thought is rather that Christ was made sin for us (2 Co 5<sup>-1</sup>) and a curse for us, bearing the penalties of sin and thus effecting our redemption.

CUSTOM.—1. Custom in its primary significance is habitual practice, on the part of either the individual or the community. The Greek word έθος implying both usage and habit is employed in the NT to denote the routine of the priest's office (Lk 1<sup>9</sup>), the practice of attending the ceremonial feast (Lk 2<sup>4</sup>), and detailed observance of ancestral practice or the Mosaic ritual (Ac 6<sup>14</sup> 16<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>-1</sup> 26<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>14</sup>).

The formation of habit in individual conduct through frequent repetition is a process well known to the psychological student, but the origin and development of custom in the community are involved in some obscurity. The first step towards the establishment of a polity and organized society is the formation of a 'cake of custom,' as Bagehot terms it (Physics and Politics [ISS, 1872], p. 27); but it is a matter of dispute as to the way in which the 'cake' was made, since it goes back to the remotest antiquity. The parities of circumstance were in those far-distant days more prominent than in the historical period, but it is thought by some, as e.g. Henry Maine, that the specific commands and judgments of the ruler or sovereign preceded the establishment of custom (Ancient Law<sup>10</sup>, new impression, 1907, p. 4 ff.). Most probably it is a collective product or a common creation. It is generally held that custom was the precursor of law and one of the chief elements in its evolution. Whether amongst primitive peoples or in later times, custom has a tremendous influence over the actions of the individual and the community, rivalling even the law itself, with its appropriate sanctions. The law recognizes the force of custom and usage, but apart from the legalized forms; whilst the individual is largely under the domination of habit, so the community is under the sway of custom.

2. The word 'custom' in English, through the associations of law and obligation, is extended to cover what is connoted by the Greek τέλος in its signification of toll, tax, or duty. The State with its authority and sovereign power becomes the τέλος, but the term is used in a derivative sense to include what is due to the State, as custom in the sense of toll. The tax-gatherer, ὁ τελωνης, collected the custom on behalf of the State or the King (Mt 17<sup>-5</sup>). In Ro 13<sup>7</sup> the payment of custom together with tribute, no less than fear and honour, formed part of the obligation devolving upon the Christian with respect to the higher powers, which indeed are 'ordained of God.' J. G. JAMES.

CYMBAL (κύμβαλον, from κύμβος, 'a hollow').—The word signifies one of a pair of brass or bronze plates which make a ringing sound when brought sharply together. The word appears only in 1 Co 13<sup>1</sup>, where κύμβαλον αλαλάζον is used to describe the man whose lack of love despoils even his undoubted gifts of intellect and eloquence. The adjective is better translated as 'clanging'; cf. the cymbalum concrepans of Jerome on Gal 5<sup>26</sup>. Pliny (H.N. Præf. § 25) has an expression which is suggestive: 'hic quem Tiberius Cæsar cymbalum mundi vocabat'; and in modern days, Goethe is said to have thought of 1 Co 13<sup>1</sup> when he read Byron's poems.

Little is known for certain of Jewish music in the Apostolic Age, and we rely mostly on inference. As a race the Hebrews did not deserve Cicero's tribute to the ancient Egyptians, but they cultivated music and were probably influenced by the Egyptians and Assyrians (but cf. J. L. Saalschütz [Geschichte und Würdigung der Musik bei den Hebräern, 1829, p. 67], who believed that the Jews preserved their own national music). Harmony and counter-point were almost unknown, though C. Engel (The Music of the Most Ancient Nations, 1864, pp. 320, 356) holds that the Hebrews were acquainted with some form of harmony; and, consequently, much attention was devoted to form and volume of sound, and to combinations of instruments. This accounts for the prevalence of percussion instruments, especially those, like the cymbal, which had a shrill, clanging sound. Cymbals were in the hands of the chief musicians, and were used to mark time, as they were used in Egypt, Greece, and Rome, where they played their part in the festivals of Cybele and Bacchus. From 1 Ch 15<sup>19</sup> we learn that cymbals were made of brass, but, if we can trust Josephus (whose account of Jewish music is at times perplexing), they were also made of bronze. He describes them as large broad plates of bronze (Ant. vii. xii. 3). In Wellhausen's 'Psalms' (Haupt's PB, 1898), Appendix, there are two illustrations of Assyrian musicians which make it plain that cymbals were of two varieties: the one depicts bell-shaped cymbals with handles which permit the player to strike them together, the one on the top of the other; the second shows flat cymbals, similar to modern dinner-plates, with cord handles, and these were beat against each other sideways.

In the OT, to which one must turn for knowledge of cymbals, the two words used are כִּנְרָא and צִלְצִלָּה. In Ps 150<sup>5</sup> the latter word appears, and it has been supposed that 'loud cymbals' are castanets (cf. Engel, op. cit. p. 312), but Wellhausen thinks this very doubtful. Zec 14<sup>20</sup> presents difficulties to the exegete, but it is possible to compare the noise of tinkling trappings of horses with the clanging of miniature cymbals. Cymbals are still used in the East at religious and secular festivals (see W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, new ed., 1910, pt. iv. p. 698). ARCHIBALD MAIN.

CYPRUS (Κύπρος).—The name is given to a large island in the N.E. angle of the Mediterranean, 46 miles S. of Cilicia and 60 miles W. of Syria. In fine weather the Taurus and the Lebanon ranges are both distinctly visible from its higher ground. Its greatest length from W. to E. is 140 miles (including the eastern promontory, which is 45 miles long), and its greatest breadth 60 miles. It consists mainly of two mountain ranges, running E. and W., separated by a wide and low-lying plain, which is drained by the Pedæus. Strabo describes it as a land of wine, oil, and corn (xiv. vi. 4). The fragrance of its flowers won for it the epithet εὐώδης. For centuries it derived a great revenue from exports of copper and timber, the supply of which has long been exhausted. The word 'copper' itself comes from 'Cyprus.' The island owed much to Phœnician and Greek colonists, but it never developed the nobler aspects of Hellenic culture and art. Its Oriental character always predominated, and the Cyprian queen, whom the Greeks identified with Aphrodite, was really the Astarte of Syria.

The Cypriotes never had energy enough to establish themselves as an independent nation. After having been successively under Assyrian, Egyptian, Persian, and Greek influence, they became subject to Rome in 57 B.C. Cyprus was at first an Imperial province, but in 22 B.C. Augustus gave it to the Senate in exchange for S. Gaul (Dio Cass. liii. 12), so that St. Luke is strictly accurate in calling the governor at the time of St. Paul's visit 'the proconsul' (ἀνθυπαῖος, Ac 13<sup>7</sup>). An inscription of Soli on the north coast of the island is dated 'in the proconsulship of Paulus,' who was probably the Sergius Paulus of Acts (D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, London, 1889, p. 114). The names of several other proconsuls of the province are found on coins and inscriptions (op. cit. Appendix). The presence of Jews in Cyprus during the Maccabæan period is indicated by 1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>, and probably many others were attracted to the island when Augustus farmed the copper mines to Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvi. iv. 5).

The part which Cyprus played in the progress of apostolic Christianity was singularly honourable. She helped to liberalize the primitive Church. Her Jewish population had the gospel preached among them by Christians whom persecution drove from Jerusalem after the death of Stephen (Ac 11<sup>19</sup>), and some Christian Jews of Cyprus, along with others from Cyrene, initiated a new movement by preaching at Antioch 'to the Greeks also' (11<sup>20</sup>). This reading, rather than 'to the Hellenists,' is required to bring out the contrast to 'Jews only' in the previous verse; and where the MS authority is about equal the sense must decide. Barnabas, who discovered St. Paul (11<sup>25</sup>) and became his first comrade in missionary labour, was a native of Cyprus. It was probably at the instance of Barnabas that the island became the earliest scene of their united evangelism (13<sup>4</sup>).

After preaching in the synagogues of Salamis—the plural number indicates that the Jewish colony was large—they went through the whole island (13<sup>6</sup>), and Ramsay (Expositor, 5th ser. iii. [1896] p. 385 ff.) contends that διελθόντες signifies 'a missionary progress.' The verb, with the accusative of the region traversed, occurs other eight times in Acts (never in chs. 1–12), and also in 1 Co 16<sup>6</sup>, each time apparently with this meaning, and it seems to have been a terminus technicus in the missionary language of the Apostle and the historian. To travel across Cyprus by either of two roads—the one inland, the other along the south coast—would take only 3 or 4 days, but an evangelistic tour would occupy a much longer time. The Apostles had John Mark, Barnabas' cousin, himself perhaps a Cypriote, with them as their attendant (ὑπηρέτης, Ac 13<sup>5</sup>), but he deserted them at Parga, and his conduct ultimately led to the painful separation of the two leaders (15<sup>37–39</sup>). Barnabas and Mark thereafter returned to Cyprus (v. <sup>39</sup>), probably to resume a joint-ministry, of which no record has been preserved. Another Cypriote was the 'early disciple' Mnason, who may have been one of Barnabas' converts, and who became St. Paul's host in Jerusalem (Ac 21<sup>16</sup>).

The other references to Cyprus are geographical. The ship which brought St. Paul back to Syria at the end of his second missionary tour went straight across the high seas from Patara to Tyre, Cyprus being sighted—ἀναφανέντες is one of St. Luke's many nautical terms—on the left, i.e. to northward (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>). At the beginning of his voyage from Cæsarea to Italy, his ship sailed round the north side of the island, in order to get under its lee, and to have the benefit of the current which sets strongly westward along the coast of Cilicia and Pamphilia.

The connexion of the Jews with Cyprus ended in disaster. In A.D. 117 they rose and massacred 240,000 of their fellow-citizens. To avenge this appalling crime, Hadrian banished all the Jews from the island, forbidding them to return on pain of death. If at any time thereafter a Jew was wrecked on the shores of Cyprus, he pleaded for mercy in vain (Eusebius, HE iv. 6). The later history of the Cyprian Church lacks distinction. The legendary discovery of St. Matthew's Gospel in the tomb of Barnabas at Salamis gave the patriarch of the island the right to sign his name in red ink; and the Council of Cyprus was convened for the purpose of forbidding the reading of the books of Origen!

CYRENE, CYRENIANS.—Cyrene (Κυρήνη), the capital of Cyrenaica, was an important city in N. Africa, about equidistant from Alexandria and Carthage. It was founded by a colony of Dorians in 631 B.C., and its inhabitants retained their thoroughly Hellenic nature, though with some mixture of Libyan blood.

Standing on a plateau 10 miles from the coast, 1800 feet above the sea-level, with a background of mountains on the S., and in full view of the sea to the N., the city was famous for its beauty, its climate, and its fertility. It excelled in culture as well as in commerce. It was the birth-place of Aristippus, whose school of philosophy was called the Cyrenaic, of Callimachus the poet, of Eratosthenes the father of geography, and of Carneades the founder of the New Academy. The phrase used in Ac 2<sup>10</sup> to describe Cyrenaica, τα μέρη τῆς Λιβύης τῆς κατὰ Κυρήνην, corresponds with Λιβύη ἡ περὶ Κυρήνην of Dio Cassius (liii. 12) and ἡ πρὸς Κυρήνην Λιβύη of Josephus (Ant. xvi. vi. 1).

After the time of Alexander, Cyrene was subject to the Greek kings of Egypt. Jewish settlers were attracted to it at an early period. Ptolemy the son of Lagos (305-285 B.C.), 'being desirous to secure the government of Cyrene and of the other cities of Libya to himself, sent a party of Jews to inhabit them' (Jos. c. Ap. ii. 4), and in all such cities the Jews had equal rights with the Macedonians and Greeks. Strabo (quoted by Jos. Ant. xiv. vii. 2) says that the population of Cyrene consisted of citizens, husbandmen, strangers, and Jews. The second book of Maccabees is stated to have been written by Jason of Cyrene (2 Mac 2<sup>23</sup>). The territory of Cyrene was left to the Romans by Ptolemy Apion in 95 B.C. Cyrenaica and Crete, being separated by no great expanse of sea, were made into a dual province, Creta et Cyrenæ, which at the division of the provinces in 27 B.C. became senatorial. Under Roman government the Jews had their ancient privileges confirmed (Jos. Ant. xvi. vi. 5).

Cyrenians played an interesting and important part in the expansion of the primitive Church. Simon of Cyrene (ὁ Κυρηναῖος in each of the Synop- tists, Mt 27<sup>32</sup>, Mk 15<sup>21</sup>, Lk 23<sup>26</sup>) was the cross-bearer, and his sons Rufus and Alexander were Christians well known to St. Mark's first readers (Mk 15<sup>21</sup>). Rufus may be the 'choice Christian' (τὸν ἐκλεκτὸν ἐν Κυρίῳ) of Ro 16<sup>13</sup>, whose mother had at some time 'mothered' St. Paul. Jews and proselytes from Cyrenaica were present at the first Christian Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>10</sup>). Cyrenian Jews resident in Jerusalem, where they had a Hellenistic synagogue, were among the narrow-minded antagonists of Stephen (6<sup>9</sup>); but, on the other hand, Cyrenian Jewish Christians, progressive in thought and action, were among the original founders of Gentile Christianity in Antioch (11<sup>20</sup>), and Lucius of Cyrene was one of a number of prophets and teachers in that city who are credited with the organization of the first mission to the nations (13<sup>1</sup>). A tradition which cannot be called well-founded makes Lucius the first bishop of Cyrenaica.

An insurrection in the reign of Trajan, in which the Jews of Cyrene massacred many Greek and Roman citizens, led to great disasters. The beautiful city was destroyed by the Saracens in the 4th century. Extensive ruins still attest its former magnificence.

DALMATIA (Δαλματία).—Till about the middle of the 1st cent. this term denoted the southern part of the Roman province of Illyricum (q.v.). Thereafter it began to be extended to the whole province. Both Pliny and Suetonius reflect this change. For a time the two terms were convertible. From the Flavian period onward Dalmatia was the word regularly used. St. Paul, who consistently gave geographical names their Roman sense, first employed the old provincial term (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>), but in his last Epistle (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> occurs in what is generally regarded as a genuine Pauline fragment) he adopted the new designation. In his own missionary progress he went as far as the frontiers of Illyricum (μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ), but probably did not enter it. His lieutenant Titus took possession of Dalmatia for Christ. JAMES STRAHAN.

DAMARIS.—Damaris was converted by the preaching of St. Paul at Athens (Ac 17<sup>34</sup>). The name is probably a corruption of Damalis ('heifer'), a popular name among the Greeks. St. Chrysostom (de Sacerd. iv. 7) makes Damaris the wife of Dionysius the Areopagite, as does the Latin of Codex E ('cum uxore suo'), though the Greek has only 'a woman.' W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul, 1895, p. 252) suggests that she was one of the educated ἐραλπαί. She seems to have been a person of some importance, since her name is mentioned, and it is open to doubt whether a prominent Athenian woman would have been present. Codex Bezae omits all reference to her.

DAMASCUS, DAMASCENES.—Damascus (Δαμασκός) cannot now be regarded as the oldest city in the world, but it has a surer title to fame in its possession of the secret of eternal youth. While Tadmor and Palmyra, Baalbek and Jerash, have only a 'glory hovering round decay,' Damascus is still 'the head of Syria,' the queen of Oriental cities. The creations of architectural genius have their day and cease to be, but Damascus is the perennial gift of Nature. The green oasis between Mount Hermon and the desert must always be a theatre of human activity. Wheresoever the river comes, there is life. Damascus has no means of self-defence, has never done anything memorable in warfare, has been captured and plundered many times, and more than once almost annihilated, but it has always quickly recovered itself, and to-day the white smokeless city, embowered in its gardens and orchards and surrounded by its hundred villages, is to every Arab what it was to young Muhammad gazing down upon it from the brow of Salahiyyeh—the symbol of Paradise.

During the centuries of Greek and of Roman sway in Syria, Damascus had to yield precedence to Antioch. The Hellenic city in the Levant became the first metropolis of Gentile Christianity, and organized the earliest missions to the Western nations. Yet in a sense the religion of Europe came by the way of Damascus, which was the scene of the conversion of the greatest of all missionaries. It is in connexion with this event alone that the city is ever mentioned in the NT. The story is told three times in Acts (9<sup>1-23</sup> 22<sup>3-16</sup> 26<sup>1-20</sup>).

In the 1st cent. of our era the Jewish colony in Damascus was large and influential. During a tumult in the reign of Nero 10,000 Jews were massacred. Josephus indicates the extent of Jewish proselytism in the city when he states that the Damascenes 'distrusted their own wives, who were almost all addicted to the Jewish religion' (BJ II. xx. 2). It is not known when or how Christianity first came to Damascus. There were doubtless Syrian Jews in Jerusalem at every feast of Pentecost, though none are mentioned in Ac 2. Damascus was the first of the 'foreign cities' (Ac 26<sup>11</sup>) from which the Jewish authorities resolved to root out the Nazarene heresy. St. Paul came to it as a voluntary inquisitor, to call the Christian Jews to account for their apostasy. He was armed with 'the authority and commission of the chief priests' (Ac 26<sup>1</sup>).

<sup>1</sup> In a certain sense the Sanhedrin exercised jurisdiction over every Jewish community in the world. . . . Its orders were regarded as binding throughout the entire domain of orthodox Judaism. It had power, for example, to issue warrants to the congregations (synagogues) in Damascus for the apprehension of the Christians in that quarter' (Schürer, HJP II. i. [1885] 185).

St. Paul had instructions to deal summarily 'with any that were of the way' (Ac 9-), but the letters which he carried 'for the synagogues' (9-) were never delivered, and his 'commission' (26<sup>12</sup>) was never executed. One of the Christians whom he intended to 'bring bound to Jerusalem' (9<sup>2</sup>) baptized him (9<sup>18</sup>), and 'with the disciples who were at Damascus' (9<sup>19</sup>) he enjoyed his first Christian fellowship. None of them were among the confessors who afterwards haunted him 'with their remembered faces, dear men and women whom' he 'sought and slew.' In Damascus he 'preached Jesus' (9-<sup>20</sup>), the substance of his gospel being 'that he is the Son of God,' 'that this is the Christ' (9-<sup>22</sup>). The incident of St. Paul's escape from conspirators by his being let down over the city wall in a basket (9-<sup>25</sup>) is recorded by the writer of Acts (Ac 9-<sup>25</sup>), and confirmed in one of St. Paul's own letters (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>). While St. Luke ascribes the plot against him to the Jews, St. Paul relates that it was the ethnarch under Aretas the king who guarded the city of the Damascenes to take him. The two versions of the story can be reconciled by supposing that the governor turned out the garrison and set a watch at the instigation of influential Jews, who represented St. Paul as a disturber of the peace of the city. The alleged ascendancy of the Nabatæan king in Damascus at that time raises a difficult historical problem, which has an important bearing upon the chronology of the primitive Church. This point is discussed under ARABIA, ARETAS, ETHNARCH.

DATES.—The dates of the Apostolic Age are interlinked with those of the NT as a whole. No single date is fixed with the absolute precision which modern historical science demands in the case of recent or contemporaneous chronology. Although some individual dates are so nearly agreed upon that all practical ends aimed at in chronology are secured, yet, in the words of W. M. Ramsay,

'No man can as yet prove his own opinion about chronology and order in the New Testament to the satisfaction of other scholars' (Expositor, 8th ser., ii. [1911] 154). In re-stating the information accessible on these dates, it will be well to exhibit clearly the limits of the apostolic period, to reproduce some Roman Imperial dates, to fix some pivotal points which may serve as landmarks, and to determine the times of some of the important events in the life of the Christian community so far as they can be related to the above. What has been said of the difficulty of reaching indisputable results will be found to be especially true of the last part of this task.

I. GENERAL LIMIT DATES.—In its broadest acceptance (in ecclesiastical history) the Apostolic Age begins with the birth of Jesus Christ (usually reckoned as 4 B.C.), and ends with the passing of the last of the apostles from the scene of action, i.e. the death of John in the reign of Trajan, or, for the sake of convenience, A.D. 100. In a narrower sense, the first 33 years of this general period are not included in the Apostolic Age. They constitute an epoch by themselves. The problems raised in them are connected with the life and work of Jesus, and the story is told in the Canonical Gospels. In this definition of it, the Apostolic Age begins with the Day of Pentecost, or at the point where the author of Acts takes up the story; and it ends with the last of the apostles. In a still narrower sense, the period beginning with the Fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) is thrown off on the ground that 'NT history may fitly be said to close with the great catastrophe of A.D. 70' (Turner in HDB i. 415<sup>b</sup>). This limitation may be further justified by the fact that the destruction of the Temple established a new order of things not simply with reference to Judaism, but also to the whole apostolic activity, and that the only items of importance in Christian history that can be included in a chronology subsequent to that event are the dates of some apostolic (or other NT) writings.

The date of the Crucifixion.—Since the Apostolic Age begins with the Day of Pentecost, the question of the year in which the Crucifixion occurred falls to be briefly reviewed here. The line of departure for the chronology of the Crucifixion is given by the Gospel narratives. These name both the Roman and the Jewish rulers of the day. The Roman Emperor was Tiberius (A.D. 14-37), the procurator of Judæa was Pontius Pilate (A.D. 26-36), the high priest of the Jews was Caiaphas (A.D. 25[?]-34[?]). Since Pilate must have been procurator for two or three years before the case of Jesus came for trial (cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 1-3, BJ II. ix. 2-4), and since, according to St. Luke, the whole ministry of Jesus falls after the 15th year of Tiberius (A.D. 29, if sole reign is meant, and 27, if co-regency with Augustus), it follows that the earliest year for the Crucifixion is 28.* The latest limit is fixed by the fact that after 34 Caiaphas was no longer high priest. Between 28 and 34, however, the determination of the exact year is facilitated by the astronomical calculations as to the coincidence of Passover with the day of the week implied in the Gospel narrative. There is a margin of uncertainty on this point; but, whichever way the perplexing problem is solved, the year 29 or 30 still satisfies the conditions.† As between the two years to which the discussion narrows down the choice, the year 30 seems upon the whole, in view of traditional as well as internal grounds, to be the more satisfactory.

* The question is somewhat complicated by the uncertainty as to the length of the ministry of Jesus (cf. L. Fendt, Die Dauer der öffentlichen Wirksamkeit Jesu, 1906; W. Homann, Die Dauer der öffentlichen Wirksamkeit Jesu, 1908).

† For full discussion see Turner in IIDB i. 410; cf. also art. 'Dates' in DCG i. 413.

The net results arrived at for limiting dates, therefore, are :

- (1) The Apostolic Church = 4 B.C.—A.D. 100.
- (2) The Apostolic Age = A.D. 30–100.
- (3) The Apostolic Era = A.D. 30–70.

II. ROMAN IMPERIAL DATES.—Jesus Christ was crucified during the reign of Tiberius, and more precisely in the 15th year of that Emperor's sole rule, and the 17th, or 18th, of his co-regency with Augustus. Tiberius was followed by Caius Caligula in A.D. 37. Caligula was succeeded by Claudius in 41. Nero followed Claudius in 54, and was supplanted in 68 by Galba. Otho succeeded Galba in 69, and was followed by Vespasian in 70. Vespasian was followed by his son Titus in 79. Domitian came next in 81, reigning until 96. Then came Nerva, whose reign lasted till 98; and, so far as the Apostolic Age was concerned, Trajan closed the succession, ascending the throne in 98 and reigning till 117.

	A.D.		A.D.
Tiberius . . . .	14–37	Vespasian . . . .	70–79
Caligula . . . .	37–41	Titus . . . .	79–81
Claudius . . . .	41–54	Domitian . . . .	81–96
Nero . . . .	54–68	Nerva . . . .	96–98
Galba . . . .	68–69	Trajan . . . .	98–117
Otho . . . .	69–70

III. PIVOTAL DATES.—Close scrutiny brings into measurably clear detail the following fixed points in the apostolic chronology, which, therefore, may serve as general landmarks.

1. The rule of Aretas over Damascus.—In unravelling the complications of the problem raised by the mention of an 'ethnarch of Aretas' by St. Paul (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>), it must be borne in mind that Rome governed the subject territories of Asia either directly or through subject princes. Before 33–34 and after 62–63 Damascus was under direct Roman administration. This is made clear from the extant Syrian coins of these years, which bear the heads of the Roman Emperors Tiberius and Nero and do not allude to subject rulers. Since some allusion is always made where subject princes intervene, the case seems clearly made out that only after 34 and before 62 could a Nabataean king have secured ascendancy at Damascus. How this came about, however, is not definitely known. It could certainly not have been due to rebellion or any other form of violence. And if it was brought about peacefully, it is probable that it was done upon the initiative, or by consent, of Caligula, who is known to have encouraged the devolution of as much autonomy on the native dynasts as was consistent with Roman suzerainty. The Nabataean ascendancy in Damascus was thus near its beginning during the last years of Aretas (Harithath) IV. For the accession of this king is placed by Josephus (Ant. XVI. ix. 4) in connexion with certain events in the latter part of the reign of Herod the Great. His immediate successor Abia ruled under Claudius and was a contemporary of Izates, of Adiabene, against whom he waged war upon invitation of certain malcontents and traitors (Ant. XX. iv. 1). The probable limits of his reign thus appear to be 9 B.C. and A.D. 39 or 40 (cf. CJS, pt. ii. 197–217; also Schürer, HJP I. ii. 357, II. i. 66, 67). The 'governor (ethnarch) of Aretas' referred to by St. Paul must therefore have acted his part of guarding the gates of Damascus before the year 39. But how long before is not certain. And since from Gal 1<sup>7</sup> it is clear that Saul returned to Damascus as a Christian leader after a period of three years spent in Arabia, and the flight from Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>) cannot be identified with any later event than this visit, his conversion must have taken place not later than 36, and perhaps several years earlier. See also art. ARETAS.

2. The death of Herod Agrippa I.—According to Josephus (Ant. XIX. viii. 2, BJ II. xi. 6), Agrippa died at the age of 54, at the end of the seventh year of his reign, four of which had been passed under Caligula and three under Claudius; Josephus also makes it plain that the three years that fell under the reign of Claudius were the period of Agrippa's sole rule over the whole of Palestine, and that he had been made king over the whole of Palestine by Claudius immediately after his accession (Ant. XIX. v. 1, BJ II. xi. 5). Since Claudius succeeded Caligula on 24th Jan. 41, the death of Agrippa must be dated in 44. This conclusion harmonizes with the circumstance that the festivities at Caesarea during which he was stricken with his fatal illness were being held in honour of the safe return of the Emperor from Britain (συνηγας, Ant. XIX. viii. 2) in the year 44 (Dio Cass. ix. 23; Suet. Claud. 17). But if this was the occasion for the celebration, the time of the year for it was in all probability the late summer or early autumn, since news of the return of the Emperor must have taken some time to reach the East. The year 44 is thus fixed as the date of the events in Ac 12, and at the same time serves as a terminus ad quem for all that precedes.

3. The proconsulship of Gallio in Achaia.—L. Junius Gallio (Ac 18<sup>1</sup>), brother of the philosopher Seneca and mentioned by him in affectionate terms (Quest. Nat., Preface), but adopted by the rhetorician Gallio, served a proconsulship of one year in Achaia some time between 44 and 54. The fact of his residence in Achaia is certified by Seneca, who alludes (Ep. XVIII. i. 104) to his having been obliged to leave that province on account of a fever. It is further attested by the mention of his name in an inscription found near Platæa in which he is designated as a benefactor of the city: Ἡ πόλις Πλαταιῶν Λούκιον Ἰουνίου Γαλλίωνα Ἀνιανόν [ἀνθύ]πατον τὸν ἐαυτοῦς εὐεργ[έτην]. But, since neither of these references to Gallio's experience in Achaia is associated with any date, the exact year of his proconsulship was left to be determined in the earlier computations upon purely conjectural grounds; and these yielded no palpable gain in the direction of greater fixity.

Thus a great variety of results was reached: Anger (de Temporum . . . Ratione, 1833, p. 119), A.D. 52–54; Wieseler (Chronol. des apostol. Zeitalters, 1848, p. 119), Lewin (Fasti Sacri, 1865, p. 299), Blass (Acta Apost., 1895, p. 22), Harnack (Gesch. der altchristl. Lit., 1897, ii. 237), 48–50; Turner (HDB i. 417b), after 44, probably after 49 or 50; Hoennicke (Chron. des Lebens des Apostels Paulus, 1903, p. 30), at the latest 53–54; Clemens (Paulus, 1904), 52–53; O. Holtzmann (NTZG, 1906, p. 144), 53; and Zahn (Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., 1909, iii. 470), 53–54.

This uncertainty has been altogether removed by the discovery at Delphi of four fragments of an inscription naming Gallio and linking his proconsulship with the 26th acclamation of Claudius as Emperor. The fragments were fitted together and the inscription was given to the public by Émile Bourguet (de Rebus Delphicis Imperatoriae Aetatis Capita Duo, Montpellier, 1905). The discovery and its significance were discussed more or less fully by Deissmann (Paulus, 1911, pp. 159–176; Eng. tr., 1912, Appendix I. p. 235), Offord (PEFSt April 1908, p. 163), and Ramsay (Expositor, 7th ser., vii. [1909] 468). The text is not in a perfect state of preservation, but is sufficiently clear, with the restorations which have been proposed by Bourguet, to cover the chronological point under dispute. It was a letter sent by Claudius when he bore the title of Imperator XXVI. (ΚC Παινηπατριδος). It names Junius Gallio as the friend of the writer and proconsul of Achaia: [Ἰου]ΝΙΟΣ ΓΑΛΛΙΩΝ[ος] ΜΟΤ ΚΑΙ [ανθύ]ΠΑΤΟΣ. This meaning of the inscription was first pointed out by A. J. Reinach (REG, 1907, p. 49), and is independently reached or otherwise accepted by Offord (loc. cit.), Ramsay (loc. cit.), Clemens (ThLZ, 1910, col. 656), Loisy (with his usual hypercritical caution, Revue d'hist. et de lit. relig., March, April, 1911, pp. 139-144), and Deissmann (loc. cit.). The exact date of the acclamation of Claudius as Emperor XXVI. is not given anywhere. But, since from R. Cagnat's tables (Cours d'épigraphie latine<sup>3</sup>, 1898, p. 478) it appears that at the beginning of 52 Claudius was Emperor XXIV. and at the end Emperor XXVII., both the 25th and the 26th acclamations must have been issued some time in 52, and in all probability after victories secured during the summer season. But if Gallio was proconsul when the document was sent to Delphi, since the proconsular year was fixed by Claudius as beginning April 1 (Dio Cassius, lvi. 14. 5; lx. 11. 6, 17. 3), Gallio's term of office falls in the year beginning with the spring of 52. Cf. art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, VI. 3.

4. The recall of Felix and the accession of Festus.—The appointment of Felix was one of the later acts of the Emperor Claudius; and Nero on his accession confirmed it (BJ II. xii. 8, xiii. 2-7; Ant. XX. viii. 4, 5). The exact year of the event is given by Eusebius (Chron. [Armen. VS and some MSS of Jerome's tr.] as the 11th year of Claudius. Tacitus (Ann. xii. 54; cf. Jos. BJ II. xii. 7 f.), in his account of the troubles leading to the deposition of Cumanus, placed the event in connexion with the year 52. Although Harnack has drawn a different conclusion from the Eusebian Chronicle, it seems upon the whole that these three sources agree in pointing to the year 52 for the arrival of Felix in Palestine, or, at all events, for his assumption of the proconsulship. Much more complicated, however, is the question of the termination of Felix's tenure of office. There is no doubt that, like Cumanus, Felix had by his misrule made himself the object of hatred and the ground of complaint on the part of the Jews, and that, owing to representations made by the latter, he had fallen into disfavour, and had escaped condemnation only by the timely intercession of his brother Pallas (Josephus, Ant. XX. viii. 7-9). According to the apparent meaning of Josephus' words, this occurred after Festus had assumed control of Palestine in succession to Felix. But Tacitus informs us that Pallas had already fallen from his place as Nero's favourite in 55 (Ann. xiii. 14), i.e. when Britannicus was 13 years of age. With this Dio Cassius (lxi. 7. 4) agrees.

Assuming that Josephus is correct, and taking in addition the testimony of Eusebius (Chron.), who places the accession of Festus in the second year of Nero, Harnack (Gesch. der altchristl. Lit. i. 235) and Holtzmann (NTZG, p. 128 f.) place the vindication of Felix in 55 and the arrival of Festus in Palestine in 56. But, while this course seems the natural one upon the narrow range of evidence taken into account, it is precluded when the following considerations come into view.—(1) The sedition of 'the Egyptian' (Ac 21<sup>38</sup>) occurred during the procuratorship of Felix, and some time earlier than the arrest of St. Paul. But Josephus informs us that it took place during the reign of Nero, or after 54 (BJ II. xiii. 5; Ant. XX. viii. 6). If the downfall of Felix is to be dated before 56, the arrest of St. Paul must have been made in 53 or at the latest in 54, and the uprising of 'the Egyptian' still earlier, or from two to four years before the accession of Nero.—(2) The marriage of Felix and Drusilla is, according to Josephus, rendered impossible before 55. For she had been given by her brother Agrippa to Azizus of Emesa, being herself 15 years of age, in 53 (Ant. XX. vii. 1). But according to Ac 24<sup>24</sup> she was married to Felix at the time of St. Paul's appearance before the procurator. Either, therefore, the arrest of the Apostle and the end of the proconsulship of Felix must be dated several years later than 53, to allow time for the necessary development of the intrigues by which Felix lured her to unfaithfulness to her husband and persuaded her to marry him, or these events must be condensed within an incredibly short interval. Besides, between the appearance of St. Paul before Felix and Drusilla and the deposition of Felix two years must be allowed (Ac 24<sup>7</sup>).—(3) Felix had sent certain Jewish leaders to Rome, where they were imprisoned pending trial. Josephus says that in his own 27th year (63-64) he went to Rome to negotiate the liberation of these prisoners. But if Felix ceased ruling Judaea in 55, these men were kept confined for the unparalleled period of 8 or 10 years. If, on the other hand, Felix remained in office until 60, their imprisonment lasted only 4 years.—(4) The length of the procuratorship of Felix may be approximately computed from a comparison of Ac 24<sup>10</sup> and 24<sup>27</sup>. In the former passage Felix is said to have already ruled 'many years.' It would be impossible to construe this as meaning less than three years. In the latter his rule is reported as continuing for two years longer, thus giving a minimum of five years. This is, however, a bare minimum, and may well be doubled without violence to the situation. If, therefore, the computations which fix the date of the appointment of Felix be correct as given above, and the year 52 is approximately the correct time of that event, the year 59 or 60 would be a reasonable one to fix on as the time of the end of his rule.

The only consideration that offers any difficulty in the way of this conclusion is the fact that Josephus associates the recall of Felix with the influential period of Pallas at court; but (a) Josephus may have been in error in attributing Felix's escape from punishment to the intercession of Pallas. (b) He may have grouped together events belonging to two separate dates, i.e. certain charges made at the early date, when Pallas by his plea on behalf of Felix saved him from punishment, and the final complaints which ended in his removal. If this be the case, the effectiveness of the later accusations of the Jews could be all the more easily understood, since at that time Poppaea had acquired her influence over Nero and an appeal of the Jewish leaders would enlist her strong endorsement. (c) It may be, however, that Pallas, after being charged with high treason and found innocent, was re-instated into favour by Nero, and so continued until the year 60. This is not probable in view of the testimony of Tacitus, who tells us that Pallas was indeed acquitted along with Burrhus (Ann. xiii. 23); but that he was never again treated with special favour (ib. xiii. 2). He died of poison in the year 62. The conflict between the statements of Tacitus and Josephus is best harmonized if we take the former to have been well informed on the order and time of events in Rome, but misled as to similar matters in Judaea; Josephus, on the other hand, may be regarded as accurate in his statements regarding Palestinian events and less so on matters of an internal character in Rome. The result yielded by this view is that Felix was found guilty of maladministration in 54-55 and escaped punishment at this time through the intercession of his brother Pallas. Pallas was himself charged with high treason the following year and fell from Imperial favour. Felix continued until 60, and meantime added to the grievances of the Jews, and yet entrenched himself in favour with sundry leaders because of his bold measures against certain classes of criminals. In 60, however, he was finally brought to trial, and in the absence of the powerful intercession of his brother was at this time deposed and succeeded by Festus. Cf. also art. FELIX, FESTUS.

IV. CORROBORATIVE DATES.—These are such as do not of themselves permit of clear determination, but can be deduced from general considerations; and when so deduced confirm and elucidate the chronology as a whole.

1. The famine under Claudius.—Josephus, in connexion with his account of Agrippa's death (Ant. XX. ii. 1, 5, v. 2), tells how Helena, queen of Adiabene, and her son Izates were converted to Judaism and made a visit to Jerusalem during a famine which both she and her son helped to relieve by procuring provisions at great expense. According to Ac 11<sup>28-30</sup> a famine occurred 'throughout all the world,' but presumably it was especially severe in Judaea, for it was to this point that the brethren 'determined to send relief.' This relief came 'by the hand of Barnabas and Saul.' The death of Herod must have taken place during this visit of Paul and Barnabas (Ac 12<sup>25</sup>); else why should it appear after the account of the mission of the Apostles to Judæa and before their return from Jerusalem? This is a natural inference; but it meets with a difficulty in the omission of all mention of this visit in Gal 1<sup>17</sup>, where St. Paul presumably gives an exhaustive statement of all his visits to Jerusalem. The difficulty is primarily one of harmony between Gal. and Acts. Yet it indirectly affects the chronological problem. By way of explanation it may be said that the enumeration of the visits in Gal 1<sup>17</sup> was meant to be exhaustive, not absolutely but relatively to the possibility of St. Paul's meeting the 'pillar' apostles at Jerusalem. If it were known that during the famine they were absent from the city, St. Paul might very well fail to allude to a visit at that time.

But even with the visit fixed during the distress of the famine, which is in general associated with the time of Herod's death, it still remains doubtful whether this famine took place in 44. Since both Josephus and the author of Acts introduce the whole transaction (Ant. xx. ii. 1; Ac 12<sup>1</sup>) with the general formula 'about that time,' the famine may very well have occurred as late as 45 or 46.

2. The expulsion of the Jews from Rome (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>; also Suet. Claud. 25).—This cannot be the action alluded to by Dio Cassius (lx. 6), who expressly says that the Emperor, deeming it unwise to exclude the Jews from the city, commanded them not to hold meetings together, although he permitted them to retain their ancestral customs (πάτριος βίος). The decree, therefore, must be a later one unmentioned by the secular historians (except Suetonius, who assigns no date to it). It is possible, in spite of the generally favourable attitude of Claudius towards Agrippa II. in the years between 51 and 54, that he saw the necessity of checking the growing power of the Jewish community in the capital, and decreed their exclusion from the city.

3. Sergius Paulus (Ac 13<sup>7-12</sup>).—The data for the fixing of Sergius Paulus in a scheme of NT chronology are as follows: (1) The name occurs in inscriptions. Of these one was first published by L. Palma di Cesnola (Salamina, 1887, p. 256) and afterwards carefully edited by D. G. Hogarth in Devia Cypria, 1889, p. 114. It ends with the words τιμητέρας τὴν βουλὴν [δι]ὰ ξαστῶν ἐπὶ Παύλου [ἀνθ]υ- πάτου. Palæographically the inscription is judged to belong to the 1st century. The second inscription is one found in the city of Rome naming L. Sergius Paulus as one of the curatores riparum et alvei Tiberis during the reign of Claudius (CIL vi. 31545).—(2) The government of Cyprus was by proconsuls. The island came under Roman control before the establishment of the Empire, but was defined as a 'senatorial' province in 22 B.C. under Augustus (Dio Cass. liii. 12. 7; liv. 4. 1). Upon these data, however, while it is very clear that about A.D. 50 L. Sergius Paulus (who had already been a high officer in Rome) was holding the proconsulship of Cyprus, no nearer approach to the precise date either of the beginning or the end of his rule can be made. See also art. SERGIUS PAULUS.

4. Agrippa II. and Drusilla.—Agrippa II., the son of Agrippa I., was born in A.D. 28. According to Photius (Bibl. 33) he died in 100. At the time of his father's death he was considered too young for the responsibilities of the large kingdom, which was therefore again put under the care of procurators. But on the death of his uncle in the eighth year of Claudius (48) he was given the government ('kingdom') of Chalcis (Ant. xx. v. 2, BJ II. xii. 1). Within four years, however, Claudius, 'when he had already completed the twelfth year of his reign' (Ant. xx. vii. 1), transferred him from the kingdom of Chalcis to the rule of a greater realm consisting of the tetrarchy of his great-uncle Philip, of the tetrarchy of Lysanias, and of that portion of Abilene which had been governed by Varus (BJ II. xii. 8). When Nero succeeded Claudius, he enlarged this kingdom by the addition of considerable tracts of Galilee and Peræa, but the dates of these larger additions are not clearly given. More important than the growth of Agrippa's power is his giving of his sister in marriage to Azizus, whom not long after (μετ' οὐ πολὺν χρόνον) she left in order to marry the Roman procurator Felix. These events cannot be fixed earlier than 54 or 55. The incidents of Ac 20<sup>18</sup> 24<sup>1-20</sup> are therefore posterior to this time. Cf. art. DRUSILLA.

5. Death of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome.—The belief that the martyrdom of the two apostles took place in Rome in one of the last years of Nero's reign is based on tradition. Epiphanius places it in the 12th year of Nero, Euthalius in the 13th, Jerome in the 14th. Dionysius of Corinth associates the death of St. Peter and St. Paul in the phrase κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν ('about the same time'). No positive result for precise chronology is gained by these data. The general conclusion, however, that St. Paul's death took place after 64 is borne out by the necessity for finding a place in his life later than the Roman imprisonment for the composition of the Pastoral Epistles; and, although this necessity is not admitted on all sides, the predominance of view among critics seems to recognize it. The death of the two apostles may thus be approximately placed between the years 65 and 68. See artt. PAUL, PETER.

6. The Passover at Philippi (Ac 20<sup>4-7</sup>).—W. M. Ramsay, upon the basis of some very precarious data (see his St. Paul, p. 289 ff; also Turner's discussion, HDB i. 419 f.), claims the fixed date 57 for St. Paul's fifth and last recorded visit to Jerusalem, which was also the occasion of his arrest. The argument is briefly as follows. The Apostle celebrated the Lord's Supper at Troas on Sunday night (v. 7). If so, he must have left Philippi on Friday. Friday was the day after the Passover, which was therefore observed on Thursday that year. But the 14th Nisan (Passover Day) fell on Thursday in the year 57, not in 56 or 58. The uncertain factors in the computation are: (1) the exact day of the week for the Passover; concerning this there is always room for dispute, owing to the well-known but unscientific method of the Jews in determining the beginning of the month Nisan; (2) the interval between the Passover and St. Paul's departure from Philippi, which, on Ramsay's assumption, is a single night (but the text does not exclude a longer interval); (3) the time when the Lord's Supper was observed at Troas, which is stated to have been 'the first of the week' (τῇ μιᾷ τῶν σαββάτων) (but this may be construed as Saturday evening towards Sunday). Any one of these uncertainties vitiates the conclusion arrived at. Yet on the whole the conclusion corroborates the date 59, and is not necessarily inconsistent with 60 for the removal of St. Paul to Rome.

V. PALESTINIAN SECULAR DATES.—1. The procurators of Judæa.—(1) Pontius Pilate, it seems to be universally agreed, was appointed procurator of Judæa in 26, and held the office until 36, being then deposed and sent to Rome by Vitellius, after 'ten years in Judæa' (Ant. XVIII. iv. 2). He arrived in Rome just after the death of Tiberius.

(2) The year following the deposition of Pilate, the Imperial authority of Rome was represented in Judæa by Marcellus, a friend and deputy of Vitellius. He is nowhere given the title of 'procurator,' and Josephus is careful to call him a 'curator' (ἐπιμελητής, Ant. XVIII. iv. 2). Nor had he apparently come into sufficient prominence through any action to warrant his being mentioned in the succession.

(3) From 37-41 the procurator was a certain Marullus (Ant. XVIII. vi. 10) who, like Marcellus, does not seem to have done anything official worthy of note.

(4) From 41 to 44 Agrippa I., as king on approximately the level of independence enjoyed by his grandfather Herod the Great, superseded all procurators. At his death, according to Josephus, Cuspius Fadus was appointed, thus resuming the line broken for three years (Ant. XIX. ix. 2, XX. v. 1, BJ II. xi. 6; Tacit. Hist. v. 9). The term of office of Fadus was probably between two and three years.

(5) Tiberius Alexander, a renegade Jew, who was rewarded for his apostasy by appointment to various offices, culminating in the procuratorship, probably reached Palestine in 46 (Jos. Ant. XX. v. 2; BJ II. xi. 6, xv. 1, xviii. 7f., IV. x. 6, VI. iv. 3; Tacit. Ann. xv. 28, Hist. i. 11, ii. 74, 79; Suet. Vespas. 6).

(6) Ventidius Cumanus was sent to succeed Alexander in 48. According to Tacitus (Ann. xii. 54), he was placed over Galilee only, while Felix was assigned rule over Samaria. They were both involved in various cruelties practised on the natives, and both were accused before Quadratus, who was commissioned to examine into the affair. But the commissioner quietly exculpated Felix, and even gave him a place on the court of investigation and judgment. Cumanus was condemned and removed. Such a joint procuratorship, however, is excluded by Josephus' explicit statements (Ant. XX. vi. 2, vii. 1). According to these, Cumanus alone was the procurator and alone responsible. Felix was sent by Claudius from Rome to succeed him at the express request of Jonathan, the high priest. The contradiction is probably due to some confusion on the part of Tacitus. The date of the removal of Cumanus may be approximately fixed as 52.

(7) Antonius Felix immediately succeeded Cumanus. Soon after his arrival in Palestine, he saw and was enamoured of Drusilla, the sister of Herod Agrippa II., and enticed her to leave her husband, Azizus king of Emesa, and marry himself. This he succeeded in accomplishing through the aid of a magician from Cyprus, bearing the name of Simon. Drusilla was born in 38, being six years of age at the time of her father's death (44), and his youngest child. She was therefore at this time 14 or 15 years old. The procuratorship of Felix was characterized by arbitrariness and greed. Though he did much to punish lawlessness, he also provoked complaints on account of which he was recalled in 60. See above, III. 4 and art. FELIX.

(8) Porcius Festus.—The reasons which fix the beginning of the procuratorship of Festus in 60 have been given above. The time of the year when he arrived is determined as the summer season (Ac 25<sup>1</sup>). There are clearer data for fixing the end of his term. From BJ VI. v. 3 we learn that Albinus his successor was in Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles (?), four years before the outbreak of the great war and seven years and five months before the capture of Jerusalem—or, in other words, the Feast of Tabernacles of the year 62. Allowing for sufficient time for the next procurator to assume the reins of government at Caesarea, for a similar interval for his appointment, for the journey from Rome and arrival in Palestine, the death of Festus, which took place while he was still in office in Palestine, must be dated very early in the summer or late in the spring of 62.

(9) Albinus.—The date of the death of Porcius Festus determines also that of the accession of Albinus (BJ VI. v. 3). W. M. Ramsay (Expositor, 6th ser., ii. [1900] 81-105), in harmony with his theory that the death of Festus occurred in the autumn of 60, dates the arrival of Albinus in May or June 61. But the computation rests on a series of obscure and questionable considerations. Albinus was recalled in 64, after more than two years of maladministration.

(10) Gessius Florus was the last of the procurators. According to Josephus (Ant. XX. xi. 1), it was in his second year that the Jewish War broke out. Since this is fixed at 66 (BJ II. xiv. 4), he must have entered upon his office in 64. The end of his administration was also the end of the method of governing Judæa by procurators. For the events which follow the year 66 and culminate in the catastrophe of 70 he is held responsible.

We thus obtain the following list of procurators of Judæa, with dates of their administration:

	A.D.		A.D.
Pilate . . . . .	26-36	Ventidius Cumanus . . . . .	48-52
(Marcellus) . . . . .	36-37	Antonius Felix . . . . .	52-60
Marullus . . . . .	37-41	Porcius Festus . . . . .	60-62
Cuspius Fadus . . . . .	44-46	Albinus . . . . .	62-64
Tiberius Alexander . . . . .	46-48	Gessius Florus . . . . .	64-70

2. The Herodian kings.—When Jesus Christ was crucified, Herod Antipas and Herod Philip were reigning simultaneously in accordance with the testamentary provision of their father, Herod the Great. Antipas held Galilee and Peræa; Philip ruled over the region beyond Jordan. Both bore the title of tetrarch. Philip died in 34 without a successor. In 37 his place was filled by the appointment of his nephew, the son of Aristobulus and brother of Herodias, Herod Agrippa I., and this was done by Caligula, whom Agrippa had befriended. He did not, however, take active possession of his kingdom until 39. He lived for the most part in Rome, and engaged in intrigues with the politicians and secured the deposition and banishment of Antipas. When the tetrarchy of Antipas was added to his (BJ II. ix. 6), he took his place in Jewish national affairs, and by assisting Claudius to the Imperial throne after the assassination of Caligula, he so ingratiated himself into the favour of the new Emperor that the province of Judæa was added to his domains immediately on the accession of Claudius (A.D. 41). Thus he came to unite the different sections of the kingdom of his grandfather, Herod the Great (BJ II. xi. 5f.). He issued coins from which it appears that he must have reigned until 44 or 45. These dates, given for the most part by Josephus, are corroborated by the incidental coincidence of the order of events in Acts. The death of Herod is recited in Ac 12. All that precedes must be dated before 44; all that follows, after that year. The appearance of Cornelius as the representative Roman military authority in Caesarea is probably prior to the elevation of Agrippa to the standing of Herod the Great (41).

When Agrippa I. died, his son, Herod Agrippa II. was deemed too young to succeed him, but in 49 he was given a portion of his father's kingdom (Chalcis), held by his uncle Herod. In 53 he exchanged this kingdom for another, made up of portions of Galilee and Peræa, and thus reigned to his death in 100.

Antipas, A.D. 4-39—Galilee and Peræa.
Philip, A.D. 4-34—beyond Jordan.
Agrippa I., A.D. 37, as tetrarch; 39(41)-44, as king.

VI. PAULINE DATES.—The pre-eminence of St. Paul in the Apostolic Age and the leading part he took in the development of the earliest Church have furnished the ground for the preservation, in his own Epistles and in the Book of Acts, of a double series of data regarding his work. These determine not only the general order of the facts of his ministry, but also many of the minuter details of time and place. The accuracy of the author of Acts has been questioned, especially on matters of remoter interest; but his reports of the movements of St. Paul are coming to be more and more recognized as drawn from personal knowledge of, companionship with, and participation in, the Apostle's ministry.*

A fixed starting-point for Pauline chronology is given in the year of the accession of Festus. This took place, as shown above, in A.D. 60. But, according to Ac 24<sup>7</sup>, St. Paul was detained by Felix a prisoner at Caesarea for two years. His arrest must, therefore, have taken place in 58 (possibly as early as May). But he left Philippi 40 days earlier, late in March or about the beginning of April ('after the days of unleavened bread'). From Philippi his course is next traceable backward to Corinth. His presence at Philippi was only incidental, his purpose being to journey into Syria (Ac 20<sup>3</sup>). At Corinth he had spent three months, arriving there in January of the year 58. This visit to Corinth immediately followed the memorable and troublous residence at Ephesus. From a comparison of 1 Co 16<sup>5-9</sup> and 2 Co 2<sup>1-4</sup> with 2 Co 7<sup>5</sup> it may be gathered that the continuation of the whole journey from Ephesus to Corinth through Macedonia was prolonged by circumstances not included in the record. A fair allowance for these yields the approximate estimate of nine months earlier, or the spring of 57, for the end of the stay at Ephesus. This stay, however, lasted nearly three full years.† This leads to the year 54. The departure from Antioch in the spring or summer of 54 marks the beginning of the third missionary journey.

The interval between the second and third missionary journeys is not given definitely. It included some sort of a visit to the churches in Galatia and Phrygia, and a sojourn of some length in Antioch (Ac 18<sup>-3</sup> 'after he had spent some time there'). It is probable that this stay at Antioch was as long as one year; but, assuming that it was not, there is still the period of three years to be assigned to the second missionary journey. One year and six months were probably consumed in the earlier part of the journey. This would bring the beginning of the journey to the spring of 51; or, if the sojourn at Antioch had occupied a whole year, to 50.

The second missionary journey was immediately preceded by the Apostolic Conference at Jerusalem on the question of the admission of the Gentile converts without the rite of circumcision (Ac 15). The interval between the Conference, from which St. Paul proceeded immediately to Antioch, and the beginning of the journey, was very brief and spent at Antioch. The Conference itself would thus appear to have been held in 49-50.

The chronology of the years between the conversion of the Apostle and the Conference at Jerusalem may now be approached from another point of view. The item furnished by the allusion to the

* The researches of W. M. Ramsay and A. Harnack have contributed much toward this result (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, 1895, Luke the Physician, 1908; Harnack, Luke the Physician, 1907, The Acts of the Apostles, 1909, The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels, 1911).

† Although in Ac 18<sup>3</sup> the period of his active work in the synagogue is said to be three months and in Ac 19<sup>10</sup> his teaching in the school of Tyrannus two years, the further detail in Ac 19<sup>22</sup> ('for a season') would tend to confirm the conclusion reached here that the 'three years' of Ac 20<sup>3</sup>, though possibly reckoned in the Hebrew sense of 'parts of three,' were in reality more nearly three entire years than a whole year with mere fragments of the year preceding and the year following.

'ethnarch of Aretas' at Damascus (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>; cf. above) fixes as the latest limit for the conversion of St. Paul the year 36, but admits of several years' latitude for the earlier limit. In determining this earlier limit much depends on the identification of the journey to Jerusalem alluded to in Gal 2<sup>10</sup>. Two questions must be answered here: (1) When did the 14 years begin—at the conversion or after the three years mentioned in Gal 1<sup>18</sup>? (2) Are these full years in each case, or are they reckoned after the Hebrew plan, with parts of years at the beginning and end counted in the number as separate years? The answers to these questions yield respectively longer or shorter periods between the conversion and second visit of the Apostle to Jerusalem. The longest period admissible is 17 years; the shortest, 12. The smaller of these figures is excluded almost certainly by the datum found in connexion with the control of Damascus by Aretas, which does not admit of a later date for the conversion than 36. The longer period necessitates the very early date of 32 or 33 for the conversion. This is favoured by W. M. Ramsay, who fixes the conversion in 33. But there are intermediate possibilities. The interval may have been 13, 14, or 15 years; which would bring the conversion in any one of the years 34-36, with the probability in favour of the earlier dates.

The Conference at Jerusalem arose out of the conditions produced by St. Paul's preaching during the first missionary journey. This is shown by the place given it by St. Luke, and also by the fact that it was during this journey that the preaching of the gospel met with large success among the Gentiles, and that a definite movement to preach to the Gentiles independently of the Jews was inaugurated (Ac 13<sup>46</sup> 14<sup>-7</sup>). From these considerations it would be natural to draw the inference that no very long interval separates the end of the journey from the Conference. In spite, therefore, of 'the long time' alluded to in Ac 14<sup>28</sup>, it is safe to fix the limits of the first missionary journey at 47-48.

Between the date of the conversion of St. Paul and the beginning of the first missionary journey it is possible to identify the date of one more incident, viz. the visit to Jerusalem, with the aid in relief of the famine. Computations independent of the life of St. Paul lead to the placing of this date in the year 45-46 (cf. IV. 1). For reasons given in rehearsing these computations it is impossible to identify this visit with that made in Gal 2<sup>1</sup>. This must be regarded as the prolonged visit for purposes of conference and thorough interchange of views with the leaders of the Jerusalem church of which the author of Acts gives an account in ch. 15. The chronology of the life and work of St. Paul yielded by the above items may therefore be put as follows:

	A.D.		A.D.
Conversion . . . . .	34-35	Arrest at Jerusalem . . .	58
Visit to Jerusalem with aid for famine-stricken church . . . . .	45-46	Imprisonment at Caesarea . . . . .	58-60
First missionary journey . . . . .	47-48	Removal to Rome . . . .	60
Conference at Jerusalem . . . . .	49-50	Imprisonment at Rome 60-62
Second missionary journey . . . . .	51-54	Release . . . . .	62
Third missionary journey . . . . .	54-57	Last missionary journey . . . . .	63-64
		Arrest, imprisonment, and execution at Rome . . . . .	(65-67?)

VII. APOSTOLIC CHURCH DATES.—1. Pentecost.—It is manifestly the intention of the author of Acts to begin his narrative with the significant event of Pentecost. Just as he had closed his Gospel with the account of the Resurrection of the crucified Jesus, he opens his second treatise with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. For the Apostolic Age, Pentecost becomes the epoch-making day. But, as the very name of it indicates, Pentecost was a relative date in the year, being computed from a day of manifestly more importance than itself. Accordingly, in the determination of the year for the Pentecost of Ac 2 it is necessary to revert to the computation which fixed the date of the Crucifixion (see above, I.). Pentecost is thus dated in May A.D. 30.

2. The martyrdom of Stephen.—The date of this event is fixed with approximate certainty by its relation to the conversion of St. Paul. It was the persecution following the death of Stephen which enlisted Saul in the effort to exterminate the nascent Christian community and thus led him on the way to Damascus and his conversion. Stephen's martyrdom could not therefore have preceded the conversion by a very long interval, and must have taken place between 32 and 34.

3. The execution of James the son of Zebedee, together with the imprisonment and deliverance of St. Peter, is so closely associated with the death of Herod that both these events may be safely placed in the same year (44).*

4. The rise of Antioch into prominence as a centre of Christian aggressiveness must be placed at some time before the year 46, though, from the nature of the case, the exact time cannot be fixed. From Ac 2<sup>8</sup> (cf. Tacit. Ann. xv. 44) it is clear that some time before the year of the famine there was a large number of believers to attract attention and to be recognized as a type of religionists different from the Jews. Immediately after the year of the famine the church at Antioch became the fountain-head of missionary activity.

5. The Conference at Jerusalem is placed, through its relation to the missionary journeys of St. Paul, in the year 50.

6. The death of James the brother of Jesus.—From the time of the Conference at Jerusalem, St. James was recognized as one of the foremost men in the Christian community at Jerusalem (Ac 15<sup>13</sup>, Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). In consequence of his relation to the mother church, he bears the title of bishop of that church. According to Josephus, he was put to death during the interregnum between the procuratorships of Festus and Albinus (Ant. xx. ix. 1). This was in the year 62.

7. The death of St. Peter.—For the date of St. Peter's death we are obliged to appeal to extra-historical (purely traditional) information. The difficulties of estimating the value of such information are due (1) to the absence of sufficient data regarding the original witnesses on whose authority such information secured circulation, and (2) to the facility with which even good historians in antiquity accepted unverified statements where events of importance were concerned. The desire for some definite data often overcame whatever intuitive sense of accuracy may at other times have ruled the outlook of these historians. Thus tradition, i.e. the unverifiable belief of an age not capable of direct contact with the facts, may be credited frequently with a high degree of probability, more frequently with less probability; in most instances it is incapable of giving more than the mere possibility of what it attests. In the case of the death of St. Peter several considerations conspire to render the tradition highly probable. The Apostle was in Rome at a time of persecution. This appears from the contents of

1 Peter, irrespective of the genuineness of the writing. Even if it be assumed, as seems probable to many scholars, that it was composed about A.D. 80, it would issue from a period near enough the date of the reputed death of St. Peter to afford a reflexion of a living current belief regarding his experiences. The allusion to 'Babylon' in the Epistle has from the days of Papias (Euseb. HE ii. 15) to the present time (with slight exceptions) been taken to refer to Rome. From this city the Apostle, according to Papias, sent the letter to his fellow-Christians dispersed and scattered by the persecution of which he was made a victim. But, even granting that the martyrdom of the Apostle occurred in the Neronian persecution, the question of the exact year remains uncertain. Harnack believes that it took place in 64 (Gesch. der altchristl. Lit. bis Euseb., pt. i. 'Chron.', 249 ff.). Erbes (TU, new series, iv. [1900]) fixes it in 63. Of the older historians, William Cave (Lives of the Apostles, 1677, 'St. Peter,' xi. 7) also believed in the date 64. In the Chronicon of Eusebius, however, the 13th or 14th year of Nero (67-68) is given as the date, and the same conclusion is accepted by Jerome. The tradition of the Roman Catholic Church has uniformly adhered to the period 42-67 as 'the twenty-five year episcopate' of the Apostle in Rome. Upon the whole, this later date seems best supported. See IV. 5 and art. PETER.

8. The pre-eminence of Ephesus in Christian activity may be generally placed in connexion with the ministry of St. Paul in that city; but its rise to the first rank as the seat of apostolic influence under John (the Presbyter?) must have followed the Fall of Jerusalem, but cannot be fixed with precision.

9. The death of St. John, 'the beloved disciple,' is associated by tradition with his residence at Ephesus to an extreme old age, occurring in the reign of Trajan (98-117). See art. JAMES AND JOHN (sons of Zebedee).

VIII. LITERARY DATES.—Nothing in the Apostolic Age was fuller of significance for the future than the production of the NT writings. But, while the dates of production of a few of these are comparatively easy to determine, the majority do not afford sufficient data for the positive solution of the problem as it affects them.

1. The Epistle of James.—Discussions of the date of this writing are based for the most part on the neutral features of it. The character of the audience to which it is addressed does not betray an advanced development of Christian thought or practice. There is no allusion to Gentiles in the Church. Compact organization has not yet been achieved, and it is possible for teachers (διδάσκαλοι) to assume the function at will (3<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ac 13<sup>1</sup>, Ro 12<sup>7</sup>). The eschatological outlook still includes the vivid expectation of the Parousia (5<sup>7-9</sup>), which has not been disputed as in 2 P 3<sup>3-9</sup>. In general the author addresses Jews as if the new doctrine of Christianity were the legitimate and rightful outcome of historic Judaism. Such a point of view was natural in the early beginnings when the challenge to Christianity was still in its first forms, but scarcely after the rupture between Judaism and the Church had issued in open and wholesale hostilities on each side. On the other hand, certain characteristics of language and style, together with supposed allusions to the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith, have led others to assume an extremely late date for the Epistle. Upon the whole, it seems probable that the date 40 to 44 is the correct one. Cf. JAMES, EPISTLE OF.

2. The Thessalonian Epistles.—The First Epistle was written during the sojourn at Corinth (Ac 18<sup>11</sup>). The reference to Achaia (1<sup>4</sup>) is decisive

* In a recently published fragment of Papias (de Boor, TU v. 2, p. 170) it is said that 'John and James his brother were killed by the Jews.' This, together with the bracketing of the names of the two brothers in the Martyrology on the same day, has led some to infer that the death of John the son of Zebedee took place in 41. The question, however, is involved in the vexed problem of the identity of the author of the Fourth Gospel, and must be left open for further investigation and discussion. See art. JAMES AND JOHN (sons of Zebedee).

on this point. The view that Athens was the place of writing, held by Theodoret and many ancient Fathers, is deduced from 3<sup>1</sup>, which, however, evidently refers to a stay at Athens somewhat anterior to the composition of the Epistle. Since the Corinthian sojourn falls in 52-53, 1 Thess. must be dated accordingly. The Second Epistle could not have been written much later than its predecessor. It is evidently designed to explain what was misunderstood in 1 Thess. (2 Th 2-), and aims to do this as speedily as possible. Cf. THESSALONIANS, EPISTLES TO THE.

3. Galatians.—The date of Galatians has been made the subject of a new discussion as the consequence of the promulgation of the South Galatian theory of its destination. The traditional dating of the document based on the North Galatian destination fixed it in the sojourn of the Apostle at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>). The reasons for this view are that St. Paul proceeded from Galatia to Ephesus (Ac 18-3), and must have written either before he reached that city (which is improbable) or during his sojourn, or perhaps on the way from Ephesus to Corinth. The rise of the South Galatian theory, however, renders it possible to think of a much earlier date. Accordingly, many argue for its priority over all the Pauline writings (Emilie Briggs, New World, 1900, p. 115 ff.; C. W. Emmet, Expositor, 7th ser., ix. [1910] 242 ff.; Garvie, Studies of Paul and his Gospel, 1911, p. 23 ff.); some trace it even to a time anterior to the Conference at Jerusalem. Calvin, singularly, held this view (cf. Com. on Gal 2<sup>1</sup>), fixing the date at 48 or 49. Had St. Paul written it as early as this date, however, he must have named Barnabas, who was still with him in his labours. Upon the whole, the year 54 still appears the most probable for the writing of this Epistle. See, further, art. GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

4. The Corinthian Epistles.—The First Epistle was written in Ephesus some time before Pentecost (1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>), whether before or after the Passover does not appear (5<sup>6-8</sup>). The Apostle was expecting to leave very soon; and the writing must, therefore, be placed towards the close of the stay at Ephesus, hence about the time of the Passover in 56. On the assumption of the unity of 2 Cor., the interval between it and the First Epistle could not have been very long, and the writing must accordingly be placed somewhat later in the same year. But, if the Epistle is a composite one, as it seems reasonable to believe upon good critical grounds, the probabilities are that the earliest section of it (6<sup>14-7</sup>) constitutes a fragment of a letter earlier than 1 Corinthians. The second section in point of time is 2 Co 10-13 ('the painful letter') and represents the sequel to 1 Cor., growing out of the situation created by the last-named communication. This portion of 2 Cor. is accordingly to be located in 56 as above. The remainder of the composite document (2 Co 1-9, exc. 6<sup>14-7</sup>) must be dated later than chs. 10-13, but is not necessarily separated from this section by a long interval. If the phrases 'since last year' (ἀπὸ περὺν), 'a year ago' (2 Co 8<sup>10</sup>), 'for a year past' (9-) refer to 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>, approximately one year must have intervened between this portion of 2 Cor. and the First Epistle. This would bring the date to 57. Thus the dates of St. Paul's letters to Corinth would be: (1) 2 Co 6<sup>14-7</sup> in 55 or early 56; (2) 1 Cor. in 56 before Pentecost; (3) 2 Co 10-13 in summer of 56; (4) 2 Co 1-9, late 56 or 57. Cf. CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE.

5. Romans.—Since Ro 15 must be regarded as an original part of the whole Epistle (cf. Moffatt, LNT, p. 143), the allusion in v. 23 to St. Paul's intended journey to Jerusalem fixes the point of departure for the date of the Epistle. The statement in v. 19 that the Apostle had 'fulfilled' the gospel 'from Jerusalem and round about even unto Illyricum,' has led some to place the writing of Romans in Illyricum; but the greater probability lies with the view which identifies the place with Corinth, and fixes the date as the eve of St. Paul's departure thence for 'Syria' (Ac 20<sup>3</sup>). This was in the spring of 58 (during the Apostle's three months' sojourn at Corinth). See art. ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

6. The Imprisonment Epistles.—Under this title are usually included Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon. Ephesians is by many made an exception to this class. The period of St. Paul's imprisonment, however, is divided into two parts by his removal from Cæsarea to Rome. Assuming the Pauline authority of Ephesians, it has been, with Colossians and Philemon, located in the Cæsarean period of his imprisonment (56-60; so Meyer, Weiss, Sabatier [The Apostle Paul, 1891, pp. 225-249]). Others have included even Philippians in this list. But it is difficult to think of Philippians and Philemon as composed elsewhere than in Rome and during the Roman part of the imprisonment (cf. the reasons in a summary by Bleek, Einleitung in das NT<sup>4</sup>, 1885, § 161). It is possible, though not probable, however, that Col., which was written earlier than Eph., may have fallen within the latter portion of the Cæsarean imprisonment. In such a case the order and dates of these writings would be: (1) Colossians in 59 (Cæsarea); (2) Ephesians in 60 (Rome); (3) Philemon in 60 (Rome); (4) Philippians in 61 (Rome). See artt. on the various Epistles named.

7. The Pastoral Epistles.—The present condition of opinion on the problem of the Pastoral Epistles presents three distinct views as to their dates: (1) that they were composed by the Apostle after his release from the Roman imprisonment (62), towards the end of his fourth missionary journey (66 or 67); (2) that they represent a much more advanced stage of development in Christian thought and organization, and therefore fall between the date of St. Paul's death and the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 67-117), with the greater probability for 90-100 (cf. Moffatt, LNT, pp. 395-420); (3) that they represent short letters by St. Paul produced in his last year and expanded by interpolation. The merits of these views it is not possible to discuss in the compass of this article (cf. J. V. Bartlet, Acts [The Century Bible, 1901], Moffatt, loc. cit., and the artt. on TIMOTHY, EP. TO, and TITUS, EP. TO).

8. Acts.—All the discussion of the problem created by the abrupt close of the Book of Acts seems to lead to but one clear conclusion, viz. that the author knew nothing more to tell about St. Paul and the fortunes of the gospel, and that the date of the composition of the book coincides with the end of the second year of the Apostle's imprisonment at Rome (62). This in general is the simple process of reasoning that ruled opinion in ancient times from the days of Eusebius onwards (HE II. xxii. 6). In modern times its advocates have been some of the ablest critics (Alford, Godet, Salmon, Rendall, Bisping, Rackham, Blass, and Harnack). On the other side, it is argued that, as Acts is a sequel to the Third Gospel (τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον), which, it is assumed, was written after A.D. 70, the earliest date possible for Acts must be some years posterior to this date. The more precise determination of the period, however, becomes a question of extremely debatable considerations. Accordingly, a wide variety of dates of composition is proposed, as by Zahn, Headlam, Bartlet (72-74); by Bleek, Adeney, Gilbert (80); by Jülicher, Burkitt, Wrede (c. 100); by the Tübingen critics (110-120), or even later. Harnack, however, has shown reasons why the posteriority of St. Luke to the year 70 cannot stand (The Date of Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels), and the traditional dating at A.D. 62 may be said to have received a rehabilitation at his hands. See art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

9. The Synoptic Gospels.—That the Synoptic Gospels were composed upon the basis of pre-existing collections of ‘Sayings of Jesus,’ through a process of development, may be assumed as one of the fairly well-established results of modern critical study. How long this process continued is of secondary importance. The order in which the Gospels evidently appeared is—Mark, Luke, Matthew. The earliest notices of the time of the composition of Mark are not perfectly harmonious. Irenæus (Hær. iii. 1) testifies that Mark, ‘the disciple and interpreter of Peter,’ published ‘the things preached by Peter’ after the departure (ἐξόδου) of Paul and Peter; but Clement of Alexandria, a contemporary, represents the Gospel of Mark as written in the lifetime of Peter, and adds that the Apostle ‘neither forbade nor encouraged’ the work. This discrepancy is not of course a contradiction. The ‘departure,’ to which Irenæus makes the writing of Mark posterior, may be a mere departure from Rome (though this is not likely); or it may be that the statement of Clement merely means that Peter knew of Mark’s purpose to write, though that purpose was not actually carried out till after his death. The best view, however, of the discord is that neither of the representations is primarily based on chronological interest, and therefore neither can be used as a precise datum in a chronological computation. So far as the passage in Irenæus is concerned, Chapman has shown this to be true (JThSt, vi. [1905] p. 563 ff.), and Harnack contends that it is also true of the passage in Clement. Such an estimate of these ‘testimonies’ of the ancients leaves the time of the origin of the Gospels indefinite, but is in itself just. Upon the whole, therefore, it seems not improbable that Mark and Luke at least were composed before Acts and in the years of St. Paul’s imprisonment in Rome or even earlier. The case is slightly different with Matthew, where signs of a later time are more clearly visible (27<sup>8</sup> 28<sup>15</sup>: ἕως τῆς σήμερον, ‘until to-day,’ implying a considerable interval from the days of Jesus); a date as late as 70 or even later is quite admissible. See art. GOSPELS and artt. on separate Gospels in DCG.

10. Epistle to the Hebrews.—The evidence as to the date of this production is extremely faint and uncertain. The external data are partly some free citations from it in Clem. Rom. (xix. 2, xxi. 9 [cf. He 12<sup>1</sup>], xxxiv. 1 [cf. He 2<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>-5</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>]), and partly a certain dependence of thought on St. Paul and on 1 Peter. Internal data appealed to are such as that the Temple service was still operative (7<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>3-5</sup> 9<sup>6-9</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>), that, considering the purpose of the writing, if the Temple service had been rendered impossible by such an event as the catastrophe of 70, the writer must have mentioned the fact; the non-occurrence of any severe persecution of Christians in the Hebrew world leading to martyrdom (12<sup>4</sup>), the possibility of which is, however, kept in view. Other items are slighter and less conclusive. The most decisive indications of time seem to be the allusions in 10<sup>34</sup>, 12<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>4</sup>, which show that the writer was thinking of an attitude in his readers of shrinking from suffering publicly, whether this was imminent or actual, though not severe. In Palestine this attitude of mind was to be met in the years of the Jewish war. The latter portion of the period, therefore, or the years 68 and 69, may very well be taken as the most appropriate setting for the writing. See, further, HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE.

11. The Epistles of Peter and Jude.—The date of the death of St. Peter as already fixed necessitates a date for 1 and 2 Peter prior to 67. For 2 Peter (7.v.), in the present condition of the evidence, this proves impossible, on both internal and external grounds. The conclusion is inevitable that this writing (together with Jude [7.v.]) must be detached from the Apostolic Age. For 1 Peter, however, there is a very natural place in the Apostle’s sojourn in Rome. The mention of ‘Babylon’ (5<sup>13</sup>) has been from very early days (Euseb. HE ii. 15) referred to Rome, in harmony with the literary methods of the day. The conditions reflected in the writing also correspond with those that prevailed in the reign of Nero. Christians had been obliged to leave the capital in large numbers and create a new ‘Dispersion.’ It was a time of temptation to fall away because of hardships, threatened or actual, for bearing the name ‘Christian.’ Altogether, the year 66 or even 65 may, therefore, well have been the date of the writing of this Epistle. See, further, art. PETER, EPISTLES OF.

12. The Johannine writings.—Of the writings of this group the Apocalypse offers the clearest marks of its age. But even here, from the earliest times, differing views have prevailed. Signs of an earlier time than Domitian’s reign may easily be pointed out in the book. But they are quite as easily accounted for as reminiscences or traditions incorporated into the work. The undeniable allusion to the worship of the Emperor (17<sup>8-12</sup>), however, points to the reign of Domitian, under whom for the first time Emperor-worship assumed its serious aspect to the Christians. This, with some minor considerations, gives the predominance of weight to the Domitianic dating of the Apocalypse. See, further, art. APOCALYPSE.

The Fourth Gospel is related to the Apocalypse not merely by the external and superficial identity of the author’s name but by the substantial agreement of the two writings in view-point and doctrinal system. Stylistic and linguistic characteristics, however, separate them very widely, and the affiliation of the two is best explained on the ground of origin within a Johannine ‘school’ or group. But if the Apocalypse was written between 85 and 95, the Gospel cannot be dated much earlier than the latter year, since such a Johannine group must have taken some time to develop its characteristic point of view and conceptions. On the other hand, the likelihood that Ignatius, Justin, and Papias were familiar with the Gospel fixes the latest date for the latter as 110. It must be dated, then, some time between 95 and 110, with the probability strongly in favour of a year prior to 100.

Of the Johannine Epistles (see JOHN, EPISTLES OF) the First must be connected in time as well as authorship with the Fourth Gospel. Whether it preceded the larger writing or followed it is of small importance. Its general period remains the same. The two minor Epistles by the Presbyter issue from the same group, and probably belong to the same general period.

LITERATURE.—The primary sources of information outside the apostolic records and Epistles are the works of Josephus (Ant. and J.); the Annals of Tacitus; Suetonius, The Lives of the Twelve Cæsars; and the works of Eusebius (HE and Chronicon, together with Jerome’s VS). The modern study of the subject has issued in a vast number of discussions. Some of these are incorporated in works of larger scope, such as E. Schürer,

DAVID (Δαυίδ, but TR Δαβίδ).—David, the most popular of the heroes and the most illustrious of the kings of Israel, is often alluded to in the NT. He is 'David the son of Jesse' (Ac 13-), a name reminiscent of his lowly origin; and he is 'the patriarch David' (2-), 'our father David' (4<sup>25</sup>), one of that company of venerable progenitors who may be supposed to have bequeathed something of their spirit to all their descendants. He is habitually thought of as the ideal of manhood, the man (ἀνὴρ) after God's heart, doing all His will (13-); and as the devout worshipper who desired to find a habitation for the God of Jacob (7<sup>46</sup>). All Israelites loved to think of his 'days' (7<sup>45</sup>) as the golden age of Hebrew history, and of 'the holy and sure blessings' shown to him (13<sup>34</sup>), or Divine promises made to his family, as pledges of everlasting favour to his nation. He is of course included in the roll of the OT heroes of faith (He 11<sup>32</sup>).

These were matters of ancient history, but the relation of David to the Messiah seemed a point of vital importance to every Jew and Jewish Christian, as well as of deep interest to all educated Gentile Christians. The Davidic descent of the coming Deliverer—based on Is 11<sup>8</sup>, Jer 23<sup>5</sup>, Ps 132<sup>11</sup>—was an article of faith among the scribes, who connected with it the hope of regal power and a restored Kingdom. It would be too much to say that our Lord's own discussion of the point (Mt 22<sup>41</sup>, Mk 12<sup>35</sup>, Lk 20<sup>41</sup>) amounts to a denial on His part of Davidic descent, but it clearly implies that He did not attach to the traditional genealogy the same importance as the Rabbis. The Messiah's spiritual Lordship, acknowledged by the writer of Ps 110—who is presumed to be David—is for Him the essential fact (cf. W. Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu<sup>2</sup>, 1892, p. 82 f.). The Apostolic Church, however, appears to have taken for granted His Davidic extraction on the male side. This fact is genealogically set forth in Mt 1<sup>1-16</sup> and Lk 3<sup>23-38</sup>. Much earlier, St. Paul is said to have referred to it at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13<sup>23</sup>), and in Ro 1<sup>3</sup> he expresses the belief that Christ was 'born of the seed of David according to the flesh' (cf. 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). For the writer of the Revelation, too, it is an article of faith that Christ is 'the Root (meaning shoot or scion from the main stem) of David' (5<sup>5</sup>), 'the Root and Offspring of David' (22<sup>16</sup>).

Before the rise of historical and literary criticism, the Psalms were assumed to be Davidic in authorship and many of them directly Messianic in import. In Ac 1<sup>16</sup> the 69th Psalm, in 2-5 Ps 16, in 2<sup>34</sup> Ps 110, in 4<sup>25</sup> Ps 2, in Ro 4<sup>6</sup> Ps 32, in 11<sup>9</sup> Ps 69, and in He 4<sup>7</sup> Ps 95 are ascribed to David. Ps 16 is supposed to be the poetical embodiment of an astonishing vision granted to David, of the resurrection of his greater Son. In its original significance it was a cry for the deliverance of the writer from death and the expression of a serene hope that the prayer would be answered. St. Peter is struck by the parallel between the words of 'the patriarch David' and the experience of Christ, and instead of abstracting the eternal principle contained in the Psalm—that God cannot leave to destruction any holy one with whom He had made a covenant—and applying it to Christ, he assumes, as the exegetical methods of his time permitted him to do, that the Psalmist had the actual historical events directly in view a thousand years before their occurrence. In the same way Ps 110, which ascribes to an ideal King the highest participation in the sovereignty of God, is interpreted, on the ground that David himself 'ascended not into the heavens,' as a prevision on his part of the Ascension of Christ (Ac 2<sup>34</sup>). Historical criticism insists on the rigid separation of all the Psalms from their NT applications. Each of them had its own meaning in its own time and place. The words 'his office let another take' (Ac 1<sup>10</sup> || Ps 109<sup>8</sup>) were no doubt originally spoken regarding some traitor, but probably not by David, and certainly not concerning the betrayer of our Lord. Yet 'the idea lying behind the parallel perceived . . . is usually profound, admitting of suggestive restatement in terms of our own more rigorous literary methods' (J. V. Bartlet, Acts [Century Bible, 1901], p. 145).

In Rev 3<sup>7</sup> the Messiah is described as 'he that hath the key of David.' This is part of a message of comfort to the persecuted Church of Philadelphia. The whole verse is an adaptation of Is 22<sup>22</sup>. The idea is that the steward who has the key of the house possesses the symbol of unlimited authority over the household. As the Scion of the house of David, Christ has supreme power in the Divine realm, admitting and excluding whom He will. 'And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder' (Is 22<sup>22</sup>) is synonymous with 'And the government shall be upon his shoulder' (9<sup>9</sup>). Vested with that authority, possessing that key, the Messiah sets before the Jewish Christians of Philadelphia, who are shut out from the synagogue, the ever-open door of His eternal Kingdom.

DAY AND NIGHT (figurative).—Besides their literal meanings, 'day' has frequently, and 'night' on two or three occasions, a figurative signification.

1. By a species of synecdoche, 'day' is often employed generally as an equivalent for 'time'; cf. the similar use of ἡμέρα in the OT (Gn 47-6, Jg 18<sup>30</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>1</sup>, etc.). 'The day of salvation' (2 Co 6<sup>2</sup>) is the time when salvation is possible; 'the day of visitation' (1 P 2-), the time when God visits mankind with His grace, though some would make it equivalent to the day of judgment; 'the evil day' (Eph 6<sup>13</sup>), the time of Satan's assaults. In this use of the word the plural is much more common, and is illustrated by such phrases as 'for a few days' (He 12<sup>10</sup>), 'in the last days' (2 Ti 3<sup>1</sup>), 'good days' (1 P 3<sup>10</sup>). Sometimes 'days' is followed by the genitive either of a person or a thing. With the genitive of a person it denotes the period of his life or public activity. 'The days of David' (Ac 7<sup>45</sup>) are the years of his reign; 'the days of Noah' (1 P 3<sup>20</sup>), the time when he was a preacher of righteousness to the disobedient world. With the genitive of a thing, 'days' refers to the time of its occurrence, as 'in the days of the taxing' (Ac 5<sup>37</sup>), 'in the days of the voice' (Rev 10<sup>7</sup>).

2. In Rev. 'day' is used as a mystical symbol for a certain period of time. As to the length of that time the interpreters of apocalyptic have widely differed. Some have taken the author to be using words in their literal meaning when he writes in 11<sup>3</sup> 12<sup>6</sup> of the 1260 days (with which cf. the corresponding 42 months of 13<sup>5</sup> and the 'time and times and half a time,' i.e. 3½ years, of 12<sup>14</sup>). More commonly the 'year-day principle' (cf. Ezk 4<sup>6</sup>) has been applied, so that the 1260 days have stood for the same number of years. Similarly the 'ten days' of tribulation (2<sup>Th</sup>), instead of being regarded as a round-number expression for a short and limited period (cf. Job 19<sup>3</sup>, Dn 12<sup>7</sup>), has been taken to indicate a persecution of the Church at Smyrna lasting for 10 years.

3. In a specific sense 'the day' (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>, He 10<sup>25</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>19</sup>) and 'that day' (1 Th 5<sup>4</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>, 13<sup>4</sup>) are used metaphorically for the Parousia with all its glorious accompaniments, in contrast with which the present world of sin and sorrow appears as 'the night.' 'The night is far spent,' St. Paul exclaims, 'the day is at hand' (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>). Elsewhere he conceives of Christ's people as illumined already by the glorious light of that day's dawn, so that, although they still have the night around them just as others have, they do not belong to it, but are 'sons of light and sons of the day' (1 Th 5<sup>5</sup>), whose calling it is to 'cast off the works of darkness' and to 'put on the armour of light' (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>; cf. 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>). In keeping with this metaphorical description of the glory of the Parousia as a shining day is the conception of the heavenly city, illumined by the presence of the Lamb (Rev 21-3), as a city of unfading light: 'for there shall be no night there' (v. 5; cf. 22<sup>4, 5</sup>). In this distinctive sense 'the day' is more fully described as 'the day of the Lord' (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>, etc.), 'the day of our Lord Jesus' (2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>), 'the day of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1<sup>6</sup>), 'the day of Christ' (v. 10), 'the day of God' (2 P 3<sup>12</sup>), 'the great day' (Jude 6), 'the great day of God Almighty' (Rev 16<sup>14</sup>). It is further defined by a variety of epithets in which reference is made to its characteristic manifestations and events. Thus it is 'the day of judgment' (2 P 2<sup>9</sup>, 3<sup>7</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>17</sup>), 'of wrath' (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, Rev 6<sup>17</sup>), 'of slaughter' (Ja 5<sup>5</sup>), 'of revelation of the righteous judgment of God' (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>); but also 'the day of redemption' (Eph 4<sup>30</sup>), a day in which Christ's people shall not only have boldness (1 Jn 4<sup>17</sup>), but shall rejoice (Ph 2<sup>16</sup>), and whose coming they are to look for and earnestly desire (2 P 3<sup>12</sup>).

DAY OF THE LORD.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

DAY-STAR.—In the OT there are traces of the survival of a dawn myth of which we have reminiscences in Job 3<sup>9</sup>, where 'the eyelids of the dawn' (חַמְצָה; LXX εωσφόρον ἀνατέλλοντα) glance over the mountain-tops to behold the sleeping earth. The morning- or day-star is the son of the dawn, as in the great ode on the overthrow of the king of Babylon (חִלְלֵי בִרְיָה; LXX εωσφόρος ὁ πρωὶ ἀνατέλλων; AV 'Lucifer, son of the morning'; but RV 'day star' [Is 14<sup>1-2</sup>]). From this came the metaphor. But in the NT the physical associations of the figure are entirely lost, and the word 'day-star' has become the equivalent of harbinger or forerunner—some joyful event or appearance foretelling the end of the night of distress and sorrow, and the dawning of a new and better day. 'This species of symbolism was employed freely, as every reader knows, in the Gospels. . . . John the Baptist was the Forerunner, the Morning Star. Christ was the Sun, the Light of the World. . . . The usage persisted as it had been originated' (W. M. Ramsay, Luke the Physician, p. 230 f.).

The word 'day-star' occurs in the NT only in 2 P 1<sup>19</sup>—καὶ ὡσφόρος ἀνατείλῃ ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν—and the day-star arise in your hearts' (AV and RV). The thought, however, is fairly common (cf. such expressions as 'the dayspring [ἀνατολή] from on high,' Lk 1<sup>78</sup>; 'his marvellous light' [φῶς], 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>; and specially 'I will give him the morning star' [τὸν ἄστέρα τὸν πρωϊνόν], Rev 2<sup>28</sup>; 'the bright, the morning star' [ὁ ἄστηρ ὁ λαμπρὸς ὁ πρωϊνός], 22<sup>16</sup>).

In the Apocalypse, it should be noted, the usage (2<sup>28</sup> 22<sup>16</sup>) is different. While in the Gospels 'an earlier age and another style of thought' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 234) had called Christ not a Star but the Sun and the Light of the World, in Revelation Christ calls Himself the Morning-Star as 'the herald and introducer of a new era,' and the gift of the Morning-Star means 'the dawn of a brighter day and a new career.' In 2 P 1<sup>19</sup> the writer, discussing the effect produced by the Transfiguration of Jesus, says that by it 'we have the word of prophecy made more sure' (RV). The glorification of Christ on the Mount was not only a partial fulfilment of Messianic prediction, but was in itself the earnest of a complete glorification. In the squalid place of the world (RV in ἐν ἀσχημῶν τόπῳ—the adj. occurs only here in the NT), where the Christian's lot is cast, the prophecies, even with their partial fulfilment, are a lamp shining.

The new day heralded by the day-star may be the Second Advent (Bennett, Century Bible, in loc.); but there is more to be said for Plumptre's view (Cambridge Bible), that the rising of the day-star points to a direct manifestation of Christ in the soul of the believer (ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν). It is the revelation and confirmation in the heart of the Christian of what had been foreshadowed both by the prophetic word and the earthly manifestation of God's Son. Christ in the heart is the gleam, the light, the Day-star, which the believer follows, and to which he moves. He has therefore the testimony in himself that he follows, not wandering fires, but a star.

Witsius (Trench, Epp. to the Seven Churches<sup>3</sup>, London, 1867, p. 155) sums up the import of the morning-star as follows: (1) a closer communion with Christ, the fountain of light; (2) an increase of light and spiritual knowledge; (3) glorious and unspeakable joy, which is often compared with light. Such hopes 2 Peter holds before Christians in the squalidness of a world where God is not known. But they know, for the day-star shines in their hearts.

'Nor would I vex my heart with grief or strife
Though friend and lover Thou hast put afar,
If I could see, through my worn tent of life
The steadfast shining of Thy morning star'

(Louise Chandler Moulton).

For the same thought in the hymnology of the Church reference may be made to the Advent Hymns, 'Light of the lonely pilgrim's heart, Star of the coming day,' also 'Come, O come, Immanuel.'

DEACON, DEACONESS.—'Deacon' or 'deaconess' (διακονος, masc. or fem.) means one who serves or ministers. In classical Greek the word commonly implies menial service. In the NT it implies the noble service of doing work for God (2 Co 6<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>23</sup>, Eph 6<sup>21</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>2</sup>), or ministering to the needs of others (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>; cf. 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>); and the meaning of the term, with its cognates 'service' or 'ministry' and 'to serve' or 'to minister' (διακονία and διακονεῖν) is nearly everywhere quite general and does not indicate a special office. The only passage in which special officials are certainly mentioned is 1 Ti 3<sup>8-11</sup>, where v. 11 refers to women deacons (RV) rather than to wives of deacons (AV). But it is highly probable that 'with [the] bishops and deacons' (Ph 1<sup>1</sup>) also refers to special officials; although it is just possible that St. Paul is merely mentioning the two functions which must exist in every organized community, viz. government and service. A church consists of rulers and ruled. The case of Phœbe, 'διάκονος of the church which is in Cenchræ' (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>), is doubtful. She may be a female deacon; but this is very unlikely, for there is no trace of deacons or other officials in the church of Corinth at this time. Phœbe was probably a lady, living at the port of Corinth, who rendered much service to St. Paul and other Christians. Milligan (on 1 Th 3<sup>2</sup>) quotes inscriptions which show that διάκονος (masc. and fem.) was a religious title in pre-Christian times. The Seven (Ac 6) are probably not to be identified with the later deacons. The special function of deacons, whether men or women, was to distribute the alms of the congregation and to minister to the needs of the poor; they were the church's relieving officers. They also probably helped to order the men and the women in public worship. The qualities required in them (1 Ti 3<sup>8-12</sup>) agree with this: 'not greedy of sordid gain,' and 'faithful in all things,' point to the care of money. See artt. CHURCH GOVERNMENT and MINISTER, MINISTRY.

1. Literal use.—The word 'debt' signifying a business transaction is found in Philem<sup>18</sup> (ὀφείλει), where St. Paul delicately refers to money or valuables stolen from Philemon by Onesimus. St. Paul here uses the technical language of business—τοῦτο ἐμοὶ ἐλλόγα. We meet ἐλλογέω in pagan inscriptions and in an Imperial papyrus letter of the time of Hadrian (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 79f.). Dibelius ('Kol.' in Handbuch zum NT, 1912, p. 129) quotes various examples, as ὡς πρὸς ἀρραβῶνος (τῇ τιμῇ ἐλλογουμέν[ο]ν (Grenfell and Hunt, ii. 67, 16ff.). In the rest of St. Paul's half-humorous sally with Philemon (ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ) he probably has in mind τὸ χειρὶ γράφον (Col 2<sup>14</sup>). The debtor could have another to write for him if unable to write himself (cf. specimen of such a note by an ἀγράμματος from the Fayyûm papyri [Deissmann, op. cit. p. 335]). The common word for 'repay' is ἀποδίδωμι (cf. Ro 13<sup>7</sup>), but St. Paul here uses ἀποτίσω, 'which is much stronger than ἀποδώσω' (Deissmann, p. 335 n.; cf. also Moulton and Milligan, in Expositor, 7th ser., vi. [1908] 191 f.). St. Paul thus gives Philemon his note of hand to pay the debt of Onesimus. In Ph 4<sup>18</sup> St. Paul uses, perhaps in playful vein again, the technical word for a receipt, ἀπέχω, in expressing his appreciation of the liberal contribution sent to him by the Philippians (cf. ἀπέχω for a tax-receipt on an ostrakon from Thebes [Deissmann, p. 111]). The term εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν (Ph 4<sup>17</sup>) has the atmosphere of book-keeping (cf. also εἰς λόγον δόσεως καὶ λήψεως in v. 15). In Ro 4<sup>4</sup> we find the figure of credit for actual work as a debt—κατὰ ὀφείλημα. This is simply pay for work done (wages). The word ὁ μισθός, hire for pay, is the common expression (cf. the proverb in 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup> and μισθωμά (hired house) in Ac 28<sup>30</sup>).

In Ja 5<sup>4</sup> the curtain is raised upon the social wrong done to labour by grinding employers who kept back (ἀφωστέρει) the wages of the men who tilled the fields. James rather implies that there was little recourse to law in such cases, but consoles the wronged workers in that God has heard their cries. There was imprisonment for debt, as was the case in England and America till some 50 years ago, but it was only with difficulty that the workman could bring such a law to bear on his employer. In Ro 13<sup>6-8</sup> St. Paul expressly urges the Roman Christians to pay taxes, a form of debt paid with poor grace in all the ages. Christianity is on the side of law and order, and recognizes the debt of the citizens to government for the maintenance of order. 'For this cause ye pay tribute also' (v. 6), φόρους τελεῖτε. In v. 7 he urges the duty of paying (ἀποδοτε) back in full (perfective use of ἀπο as in ἀπέχω above) one's taxes. φόρος is the tribute paid by the subject nation (Lk 20<sup>2</sup>, 1 Mac 10<sup>33</sup>), while τέλος represents the customs and dues which would in any case be paid for the support of the civil government (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, 1 Mac 10<sup>31</sup>). So Sanday-Headlam, Romans, in loco.

In Ro 13<sup>8</sup> St. Paul covers the whole field by μηδενὶ μὴδὲν ὀφείλετε. We are not to imagine that he is opposed to debt as the basis of business. The early Jewish prohibitions against debt and interest (usury) contemplated a world where only the poor and unfortunate had to borrow. But already, long before St. Paul's time, borrowing and lending was a regular business custom at the basis of trade. Extortionate rates of interest were often charged (cf. Horace [Sat. i. ii. 14], who expressly states that interest at the rate of 5 per cent a month or 60 per cent a year was sometimes exacted). Jesus draws a picture of imprisonment, and even slavery, for debt in the Parable of the Two Creditors (Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>; cf. also 5<sup>25ff.</sup>). But the point of view of St. Paul here is the moral obligation of the debtor to pay his debt. In few things do Christians show greater moral laxity than in the matter of debt. Evidently St. Paul had already noticed this laxity. He makes this exhortation the occasion of a strong argument for love, but the context shows that literal financial obligations (ὀφείλη, common in the papyri in this sense) are in mind as well as the metaphorical applications of ὀφείλω.

2. Metaphorical uses.—The examples in the apostolic period chiefly come under this heading. The debt of love in Ro 13<sup>8</sup> is a case in point. It may be noted that ἀγάπη can no longer be claimed as a purely biblical word (cf. Deissmann, op. cit. p. 70). None the less Christianity glorifies the word. The debt of love is the only one that must not be paid in full, but the interest must be paid. For other instances of ὀφείλω see Ro 15<sup>1-7</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>10</sup>. In Ro 13<sup>7</sup> ὀφείλη covers all kinds of obligations, financial and moral (cf. also 1 Co 7<sup>3</sup> [conjugal duty]). The metaphorical use of ὀφείλετης appears in Ro 1<sup>14</sup>, Gal 5<sup>3</sup>, etc. The metaphor of debt is found in various other words. Thus, when St. Paul speaks of Christians being 'slaves of Christ,' he is thinking of the obligation due to the new Master who has set us free from the bondage of sin at the price of His own blood. The figure need not be overworked, but this is the heart of it (cf. Ro 6<sup>18-22</sup>, Gal 2<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>9-13</sup>, Ro 3<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>, Tit 2<sup>14</sup>; cf. also 1 P 1<sup>18</sup>, He 9<sup>12</sup>). (See Deissmann, op. cit. pp. 324-44 for a luminous discussion of the whole subject of manumission of slaves in the inscriptions and papyri, as illustrating the NT use of words like ἀπολυτρώσις, λυτρώω, λυτρον, ἀντίλυτρον, ἀγοράζω, τιμὴ, ἐλευθερώω, ἐλεύθερος, ἐλευθερία, δοῦλος, δουλεύω, καταδουλώω, etc.) The use of ἀποδίδωμι with the figure of paying off a debt is common (cf. Ro 2<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>17</sup>, etc.). ἀρραβων (Eph 1<sup>14</sup>) presents the idea of pledge (mortgage), earnest money to guarantee the full payment (Deissmann, op. cit. p. 340). In He 7<sup>2</sup> in the same way ἐγγυος is surety or guarantor. It seems clear that διαθήκη in He

9<sup>164</sup>. has the notion of a will (testament) which is paid at death. Deissmann (op. cit. p. 341) argues that 'no one in the Mediterranean world in the first century A.D. would have thought of finding in the word διαθήκη the idea of "covenant." St. Paul would not, and in fact did not.' That sweeping statement overlooks the LXX, however. Cf. art. COVENANT. The figurative use of ἐλλογῶ occurs in Ro 5<sup>13</sup>.

DECREE.—This word occurs only three times in the NT, once in the singular (Lk 2<sup>1</sup>), where it is the decree of Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed, and twice in the plural (Ac 16<sup>17</sup>), the reference in the one case being to the decisions of the Apostolic Church at Jerusalem, and in the other to the decrees of the Roman Emperors against treason.

The word in its technical or theological sense of the Divine decree of human salvation, or of the decrees of God comprehended in His eternal purpose whereby He foreordains whatsoever comes to pass, is therefore not found in the NT at all. The Greek word which it most nearly represents is πρόθεσις, which describes the purpose of God in eternity for the salvation of men. 'They that love God' are 'the called according to his purpose' (οἱ κατὰ πρόθεσιν κλητοί, Ro 8<sup>28</sup>). 'The purpose of God according to election' (ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις τοῦ θεοῦ, 9<sup>11</sup>) is to stand, not of works but of His own sovereign grace who calls them that believe. Christians are 'allotted their inheritance, having been foreordained according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (προορισθέντες κατὰ πρόθεσιν τοῦ τα πάντα ἐνεργούντος, Eph 1<sup>11</sup>). The Divine purpose is 'a purpose of the ages' which God fulfilled in Christ (Eph 3<sup>11</sup>) as He had purposed it in Him (προέθετο, Eph 1<sup>9</sup>). God's eternal decree depends upon the counsel of His own will, for it is 'not according to our works but according to his own purpose (κατὰ ἰδίαν πρόθεσιν) and grace given in Christ Jesus before times eternal' that 'he saved us and called us with a holy calling' (2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>). See artt. CALL, ELECTION, and PREDESTINATION.

The decree of God, however, is not to be conceived in the same way as that of Darius or Nebuchadnezzar, who could say, 'I have made a decree: let it be done with speed' (Ezr 6<sup>12</sup>). God's decree has no constraining effect on the things to which it is directed, because it is not promulgated to the world, but is really His secret plan for the regulation of His own procedure. It is not the proximate cause of events, yet the objects which it contemplates are absolutely certain, and are in due time brought to pass. Whilst the decrees of God are 'his eternal purpose whereby he foreordains whatsoever comes to pass,' yet He accomplishes His ends by the means proper thereto, and even when men are moved by Divine grace to embrace the gospel offer, they do so in the exercise of their liberty as free agents. As St. Paul says: 'God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth' (2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>).

DELIVERER.—In the Acts and Epistles the word 'deliverer' occurs only twice. Once (Ac 7<sup>35</sup>) the original word is ὁ λυτρωτής and once (Ro 11<sup>29</sup>) it is ὁ ρυόμενος. The reference in Acts is to Moses, and so does not specifically concern us here, except that the word is one of a group (λύτρον, ἀντὶ λύτρον, λυτρώω, ἀπολύτρωσις) used of the redemptive work of Christ. In the Koine the word λύτρον usually meant the purchase-money for the manumission of slaves (A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1911, p. 331 f.). In the LXX (Ps 19<sup>14</sup> 68<sup>35</sup>) the word λυτρωτής is used of God Himself, and the λυτρωσις wrought by Christ is illustrated by that wrought by Moses (Lk 1<sup>68</sup> 2<sup>38</sup>, He 9<sup>12</sup>, Tit 2<sup>14</sup>), and that notion may have influenced Luke's choice of the word in Ac 7<sup>35</sup> (R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 192). The passage in Ro 11<sup>26</sup> (ὁ ρυόμενος) is a quotation from Is 59<sup>20</sup> and is given the Messianic interpretation. 'There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer.' It is a free quotation, the LXX having ἐκ Σιών instead of ἐνεκεν Σιών, while the Hebrew has 'to Zion.' Some of the current Jewish writings (En. xc. 33; Sib. Orac. iii. 710 f.; Pss. Sol. xvii. 33-35) cherished the hope of the conversion of the Gentiles. St. Paul here seizes on that hope, and the OT prophecy of the Messiah as Deliverer, to hold out a second hope to the Jews who have already in large measure rejected the Messiah. Before He comes again, or at His coming, the Jews will turn in large numbers to the Deliverer once rejected (cf. Sanday-Headlam, Rom., 1902, in loc.). In 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> St. Paul had already used ὁ ρυόμενος of Jesus in connexion also with the expectation of the Second Coming of Christ. It is not here translated 'the Deliverer' because the participle is followed by ἡμᾶς, 'who delivereth us from the wrath to come.' The word ρύω means properly 'to draw,' and so the middle voice is 'to draw to one's self for shelter,' 'to rescue.' The word emphasizes the power of Christ as our Deliverer, ἐκ τῆς ὀργῆς τῆς ἐρχομένης. The deliverance is complete (ἐκ) (Milligan, Thess., 1908, in loc.). This word ρύομαι is the most frequent one for deliverance by God. St. Paul in 2 Co 1<sup>10</sup> uses it of his rescue from death in Ephesus (ἐρύσατο ἡμᾶς καὶ ῥύσεται—καὶ ἔτι ῥύσεται). It is the word for our rescue from the power of darkness in Col 1<sup>13</sup>. St. Paul has it also in 2 Ti 3<sup>11</sup> when he tells how the Lord delivered him out of his persecutions. In 4<sup>17</sup> he uses it of his rescue from the lion, and of his hope that the Lord will deliver him from every evil deed. In 2 P 2<sup>9</sup> St. Peter uses it also for God's help in temptation. In Gal 1<sup>4</sup> St. Paul has ὅπως ἐξέλθαι for Christ's purpose to deliver us from the present evil age. The word is ἐξαίρέομαι, 'to take out from,' while in He 2<sup>15</sup> the word for deliverance from the fear of death is ἀπαλλάσσω, 'to set free from.'

These words are simply those that in the RV happen to be translated by 'deliver' in English. But they by no means cover the whole subject. As a matter of fact all the atoning work of Christ is embraced in the notion of deliverance from sin and its effects. St. Paul himself epitomizes his conception of Christ as Deliverer in his paean of victory in 1 Co 15<sup>54 f.</sup>: 'Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting? The sting of death is sin; and the power of sin is the law; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.' This deliverance applies to the whole man (soul and body) and to the whole creation (Ro 8<sup>18-25</sup>). It means ultimately the overthrow of Satan and the complete triumph of Christ in a new heaven and a new earth (the Apocalypse).

DEMAS (Δημάς, perhaps a short form of Demetrius, as Silas was of Silvanus).—Demas was a Christian believer who was with St. Paul during his imprisonment in Rome, and sends greetings to the Colossians (4<sup>14</sup>) and to Philemon (v. 24). Probably he was a Thessalonian, and in both the references he is mentioned in connexion with St. Luke, while in 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> his conduct is contrasted with that of the beloved physician. In the last-named passage we are informed that Demas left the Apostle when he was awaiting his trial before Nero. The desertion seems to have been deeply resented by St. Paul, who describes his action as due to his 'having loved this present world.' Probably Demas realized that it was dangerous to be connected with one who was certain to be condemned by Nero, and he saved his life by returning to his home in Thessalonica. The phrase used, however, suggests that the prospect of worldly advantage was the motive which determined Demas. No doubt the busy commercial centre of Thessalonica offered many opportunities for success in business, and love of money may have been the besetting sin of this professing Christian. The name 'Demetrius' occurs twice in the list of politarchs of Thessalonica; and, while we cannot say with certainty that the Demas of 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> is identical with either of these, the possibility is not excluded. In this case the prospect of civic honours may have been the reason which led him to abandon the hardships and dangers of the Apostle's life and return to Thessalonica, where his family may have held positions of influence. Perhaps the bare mention of his name in Col 4<sup>14</sup> and the reference in Ph 2<sup>0-21</sup> may indicate that the Apostle even at this early date suspected the genuineness of Demas, who was with him at the time of his writing to Philippi (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 358). We have no certain assurance that the apostasy of Demas was final, but the darker view of his character has usually been taken, as e.g. by Bunyan in The Pilgrim's Progress. Epiphanius (Hæc li. 6) classes him among the apostates from the faith. It is impossible to identify Demas with any Demetrius mentioned in the NT.

DEMETRIUS.—There are two, if not three, persons of this name mentioned in the NT—a fact which is not surprising, considering how very common the name was in the Greek world.

1. Demetrius, the silversmith of Ephesus (Ac 19). A business man, profoundly interested in the success of his business, Demetrius was a manufacturer of various objects in silver, of which the most profitable were small silver models of the shrine of the Ephesian goddess Artemis (see DIANA). These models were purchased by the rich, dedicated to the goddess, and hung up within her temple. The preaching of St. Paul was so powerful that devotion to the goddess became less prevalent, the demand for such offerings was reduced, and Demetrius felt his livelihood in danger. He called a meeting of the guild of his handicraft to decide on a means for coping with the new situation. The meeting ended in a public disturbance. Nothing is known of the later life of Demetrius.

2. Demetrius, an important member of the church referred to in the Second and Third Epistles of St. John. It is impossible to identify the church with certainty, but there can be little doubt that it was in the province of Asia. The presbyter-overseer of the church is absent, and in his absence Gaius and Demetrius act in the truest interest of the members. Demetrius' good conduct (3 Jn 12) is attested by all.

3. The full name of Demas (Col 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>, Philem 24) may very well have been Demetrius (possibly Demodorus, Demodotus); see DEMAS.

LITERATURE.—See W. M. Ramsay's lifelike picture of the scene at Ephesus in his St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 277 ff. The best list of pet-names is found in A. N. Jannaris, An Historical Greek Grammar, do. 1897, § 287.

DEMON.—1. Nomenclature.—The word δαίμωνιον (or δαίμων, which, however, occurs only once in the NT in the best MSS, viz. in Mt 8<sup>31</sup>, though some MSS have it in Mk 5<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>, and some inferior ones in Rev 16<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>) is almost always rendered 'devil' in EV, though RVm usually gives 'demon.' In the RV of the OT 'demon' is found in Dt 32<sup>17</sup>, Ps 106<sup>37</sup>, Bar 4<sup>7</sup> (Heb. רַע, LXX δαίμωνιον). Originally δαίμων had a somewhat more personal connotation than δαίμωνιον, which is formed from the adjective (i.e. 'a Divine thing'); and both had a neutral sense: a spirit inferior to the supreme gods, superior to man, but not necessarily evil. Some trace of this neutral sense is found in the apostolic writings. Thus δαισιδαίμων, δαισιδαίμονια have probably not the bad sense of 'superstitious,' 'superstition' in Ac 17<sup>2</sup> 25<sup>19</sup>—which at any rate would hardly suit the former passage, where St. Paul is not likely to have gone out of his way to insult the Athenians—but the neutral sense of 'religious,' 'religion.' This view is borne out by the papyri, where, Deissmann says (Light from Ancient East, 1910, p. 283), the context of these words always implies commendation. And similarly St. Luke's phrase (Lk 4<sup>38</sup>) 'a spirit of an unclean demon' would imply the existence of a pure demon, just as 'unclean spirits' imply the existence of pure spirits. The neutral sense is also found in the saying attributed to our Lord by Ignatius (Smyrn. 3; see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers<sup>2</sup>, pt. ii. vol. ii. [1889] p. 296): 'Lay hold and handle me, and see that I am not a bodiless demon' (δαίμόνιον ἀσώματον), a saying clearly founded on or parallel to Lk 24<sup>39</sup>, perhaps due to an independent oral tradition. But ordinarily in the NT δαίμωνιον has a bad sense, and signifies 'an evil spirit.' The expression 'to have a demon' (or 'demons'), which occurs several times in the Gospels (ἔχειν δαιμόνια [δαίμονια], equivalent to δαίμονιζεσθαι, which is also frequent there), is the same as the paraphrases found elsewhere in the NT which avoid the word 'demon' (Ac 8<sup>7</sup> 'had unclean spirits,' 19<sup>12</sup> 'had evil spirits,' 10<sup>38</sup>, etc.). In Christian writings the word 'demon' always means an evil being, though it is curious that, in the NT and (as far as the present writer has observed) in the Fathers, Satan himself is never called δαίμων or δαίμωνιον ('demon'). Conversely his angels are never in the NT called 'devils' (οὐαβόλοι), though in Jn 6<sup>70</sup> Judas is called διάβολος. The Fathers emphatically assert that all demons are evil: see e.g. Tertull. Apol. 22, Orig. c. Cels. v. 5, viii. 39 (the Son of God not a demon), Cypr. Quod idola dii non sint, 6 f. By the time of Augustine even the heathen used the word 'demon' only in a bad sense (de Civ. Dei, ix. 19).

2. Conceptions about demons in apostolic writings.—Demons are regarded as the ministers of Satan—a host of evil angels over whom he has command. They are the 'angels which kept not their own principality' (ἀρχήν) but left their proper habitation' (Jude 6), who 'when they sinned' were 'cast down to Tartarus' (2 P 24). They are described as the Dragon's angels, forming his army (Rev 12<sup>7-9</sup>; cf. Mt 25<sup>41</sup>). That these angels are the same as the demon appears from the fact that Satan is the prince of the demons (Mk 3<sup>2</sup>), and that demoniacs are said to be 'oppressed of the devil' (τοῦ διαβόλου, i.e. Satan [see DEVIL], Ac 10<sup>38</sup>; cf. Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). Thus there are good spirits and evil spirits which must be distinguished and proved: the spirit of the Antichrist must be distinguished from the Spirit of God (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>).

St. Paul, in not dissimilar language, speaks of discernings of spirits (1 Co 12<sup>10</sup>; cf. 2 Co 11<sup>4</sup>) and of evil angels as being 'principalities' (ἀρχαί), 'powers,' 'world-rulers' (κοσμοκράτορες) of this darkness, 'spiritual beings' (πνευματικά) of wickedness in the heavenly [places]' (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>; the last phrase may be roughly rendered 'in the sphere of spiritual activities'; cf. Robinson's note on Eph 1<sup>3</sup> and see art. AIR); perhaps also as being 'the rulers of this age which are coming to nought . . . the spirit of the world' (1 Co 2<sup>6, 14</sup>); or collectively as 'all rule and all authority and power' which are to be abolished (1 Co 15<sup>4, 6</sup>, Eph 1<sup>21f.</sup>). That these are Satan's hosts appears from the context of the last passage (2-), which speaks of the Prince of the power of the air (see AIR).

It would seem that St. Paul regarded the heathen gods as demons, having a real existence, though they were not gods. On the one hand, 'no idol is anything in the world, and there is no God but one' (1 Co 8<sup>4</sup>); on the other hand, the sacrifices of the heathen are offered to demons, not to God, and therefore Christians must not attend heathen temples lest they have communion with demons (10<sup>20f.</sup>; note the idea that sacrifice involves communion between the worshipper and the worshipped). So in the LXX Ps 96<sup>5</sup> affirms that all the gods of the heathen are demons (Heb. עֲלִילִים, i.e. 'vanities'; Vulg. daemonia) and Dt 32<sup>17</sup> (see above) both in the Heb. text and in the LXX clearly identifies the heathen gods with demons. And similarly in Rev 9<sup>0</sup> the worship of demons is joined to that of idols.

The activity of demons towards man is great. Though, after a fashion, they believe—not with the Christian's faith, which is born of love, but with faith compelled by fear (Ja 2<sup>19</sup>: they 'shudder')—yet with the ingenuity which is peculiarly their own (Ja 3<sup>15</sup> σοφία . . . δαμονιώδης), they try to draw man away from his belief: they are 'seducing spirits,' whose teaching is called the 'doctrine of demons' (1 Ti 4<sup>1f.</sup>, so most commentators); their captain is called the 'spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience' (Eph 2-; where, however, 'spirit' is in apposition to 'power,' not to 'prince,' perhaps by grammatical assimilation; see Robinson's note ad loc.). The demons accordingly instigate evil men against the good; they are 'unclean spirits, as it were frogs' coming 'out of the mouth of the dragon . . . for they are spirits of demons,' instigating the 'kings of the whole world' to the 'war of the great day of God' (Rev 16<sup>13f.</sup>). If we identify them with the 'rulers of this age' of 1 Co 2<sup>6</sup> (see above), they instigated our Lord's crucifixion (v. 8). See also DEVIL.

Demons are able to work miracles or signs (σημεῖα, Rev 16<sup>14</sup>), as Antichrist can (2 Th 2<sup>9</sup>); they attract worship from men (Rev 9<sup>20</sup>; cf. Dt 32<sup>17</sup> above), and have their temples and tables (see above). Rome, the corrupt capital of the heathen world, designated 'Babylon,' is the habitation of demons, the prison of every unclean spirit, the prison of every unclean and hateful bird (Rev 18-).

Just as the fruits of the working of the Holy Ghost in man are called the spirit 'of power and love and discipline' (2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>) and 'of truth' (1 Jn 4<sup>6</sup>), so those of the demons are 'the spirit of bondage' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>), and 'stupor' (κατανύξεις, 11<sup>8</sup>), and 'fearfulness' (2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>), and 'error' (1 Jn 4<sup>6</sup>).

3. Demoniacal possession.—This subject is much less spoken of in the writings which are here dealt with than in the Gospels. The evangelistic records depict a much stronger activity of evil in Palestine during the earthly life of our Lord than that which, as the rest of NT would lead us to suppose, existed elsewhere and at a later time. Yet in four passages of Acts we read of possession by unclean or evil spirits: at Jerusalem (5<sup>16</sup>); in Samaria, where they were expelled at the preaching of Philip (8<sup>7</sup>); at Philippi, where the ventriloquist maiden is said to have a spirit, a Python (16<sup>16</sup>: πνεῦμα πύθωνα is the best reading); and at Ephesus, where by St. Paul's miracles the evil spirits were expelled (19<sup>12</sup>). In this last passage we read of the evil spirit speaking out of the possessed man's mouth, and of the man's actions being those of the evil spirit (v. 15); also of Jewish exorcists who endeavoured to expel him (the seven of v. 14 become in all the best MSS two at v. 16; probably there were seven brothers, but only two took part in this incident). The word 'exorcist' does not occur elsewhere in the NT. The passage about the Python (16<sup>16</sup>) is very remarkable. The name is derived from Pytho, a district near Delphi where the dragon (called Python) was slain by Apollo. The title was thus given to a diviner: both Apollo and the Delphic priestess were called 'the Pythian' (ὁ Πυθιος, ἡ Πυθία). Ventriloquists were regarded as being under the influence of demons, and as being able to divine; they were, as Plutarch tells us (Moralia, ed. Xylander, ii. 414 E, quoted by Wetstein on Ac 16<sup>16</sup>), called πυθῶνες, πυθῶνισσαι. Here, then, we have the conception of something other than ordinary madness being a possession by evil spirits; and this incident may be considered as a stepping-stone to the conception found in some NT writers of physical disease as being, at least in some cases, also a possession. This is the case especially in the writings of Luke the physician. Thus the woman who was 'bowed together' is said to have had 'a spirit of infirmity' (πνεῦμα ἀσθενείας, Lk 13<sup>11</sup>) and to have been bound by Satan (v. 16); our Lord 'rebuked' (ἐπετιμήσε) the fever of Simon's wife's mother (Lk 4<sup>39</sup>), as if it were an unclean spirit; a deaf-mute is said to have a 'dumb spirit' or 'a dumb and deaf spirit' (Mk 9<sup>17, 26</sup>).

There is nothing which leads us to suppose that the conception of demoniacal possession which we find well established in the four Gospels, especially in the Synoptics, was not shared by the other NT writers; but it is noteworthy that, as the subject is only glanced at in the Fourth Gospel (with reference to the charge against our Lord, Jn 7<sup>20</sup> 8<sup>48f.</sup> 10<sup>20f.</sup>), so it is not dealt with at all by St. Paul, though we could perhaps hardly expect that it should be spoken of in epistolary writings. We may, however, remark that the language of the famous passage Ro 7<sup>14-5</sup>, in which the Apostle speaks of the power of sin in the Christian—for we can hardly think that he is speaking of himself only before his conversion—bears a close likeness to that used to describe demoniacal possession.

DEPUTY.—This is the AV translation of ἀνθυπατος, the Gr. equivalent of pro consul, 'proconsul' (q.v.). In NT times 'proconsul' was the name given to the governor of a senatorial province—that is, a province under the supervision of the Roman Senate, which appointed the governors. In the NT the following senatorial provinces are referred to as under proconsuls: Asia, governed by an ex-consul, called proconsul, a province of the highest class, and Cyprus and Achaia, each governed by an ex-prætor, also called proconsul, provinces of the second class.

DERBE (Δέρβη).—Derbe was one of 'the cities of Lycaonia' into which Paul and Barnabas fled when driven from Iconium (Ac 14<sup>9</sup>). Strabo says it was 'on the flanks of the Isaurian region, adhering (ἐπιπεφυκός) to Cappadocia' (XII. vi. 3). It belonged to that part of Lycaonia which, in the 1st cent. B.C., the Romans added, as an 'eleventh Strategia,' to the territory of the kings of Cappadocia (XII. i. 4). From them it was seized, along with the more important town of Laranda, by Antipater the robber (called ὁ Δερβητης), who is otherwise known as a friend of Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 73). Antipater was attacked and slain by Amyntas of Galatia (c. 29 B.C.), who added Laranda and Derbe to the extensive territories which he ruled as a Roman subject-king. On the death of Amyntas in 25 B.C. his kingdom was formed into the Roman province of Galatia. But the 'eleventh Strategia' again received special treatment. After changing hands more than once, it was ultimately added—as the inscriptions on coins indicate—to the kingdom of Antiochus IV., and therefore called 'Strategia Antiochiane' (Ptolemy, v. 6), an arrangement which lasted from A.D. 41 to the death of Antiochus in 72. Derbe, however, being required as a fortress city on the Roman frontier, was detached from the Strategia and included in the province of Galatia, after which it received a new constitution, and was named Claudio-Derbe, which was equivalent to Imperial Derbe.

Ethnically and geographically Lycaonian, the city was now politically Galatian. As in Lystra, the educated natives were no doubt bilingual, speaking Lycaonian (Λυκαονιστί, Ac 14<sup>11</sup>) among themselves, but using Greek as the language of commerce and culture. Derbe lay on the great trade-route between Ephesus and Syrian Antioch. All the cities on that line had been hellenized by the Seleucids, whose task the Romans now continued. St. Paul's first visit to Derbe was very successful; he 'made many disciples' (Ac 14<sup>21</sup>), and the city is not mentioned as one of the places in which he was persecuted (2 Ti 3<sup>11</sup>). It is a striking fact that he made Derbe the last stage of his missionary progress, instead of going on to the neighbouring and greater city of Laranda. His action appears to be prompted by a motive which the historian does not formally state. Because Derbe was the limit of Roman territory, he made it the limit of his mission. He followed the lines of Empire. In his second journey he evidently crossed the Taurus by the Cilician Gates, passed through the kingdom of Antiochus, and so 'came to Derbe and Lystra' (Ac 15<sup>41-16<sup>1</sup></sup>). A third visit is probably implied by the statement that 'he went through the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, establishing all the disciples' (18<sup>23</sup>). On the Southern Galatian theory, the Christians of Derbe formed one of the 'churches of Galatia' (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>, Gal 1<sup>2</sup>), and they were among the ἀνοήτοι Γαλάται (Gal 3<sup>1</sup>) whom he exhorted to stand fast in their Christian liberty (5<sup>1</sup>). Imperial Derbe stood in closer relations with the Roman colonies of Antioch and Lystra than with the non-Roman Lycaones of the kingdom of Antiochus.

Sterrett (Wolfe Expedition, 1888, p. 23) placed Derbe between the villages of Zosta and Bossola on the road from Konia to Laranda. In both of these places there are numerous ancient cut stones and inscriptions, but it is doubtful if they are in situ, and W. M. Ramsay thinks that the position of the ancient city is indicated by a large deserted mound, called by the Turks Gudelissin, about 3 miles W.N.W. from Zosta. It still waits to be explored.

DESCENT INTO HADES.—1. By the Hebrews, Sheol or Hades was regarded as the under world, VOL. I.—19 a subterranean region of abysses and mysterious waters upon which the earth rested (Ps 24<sup>2</sup> 136<sup>6</sup>). It was the region to which all souls passed after death, there to live a shadow-like existence, incapable of the higher forms of spiritual activity, such as the praise of Jahweh (Ps 6<sup>5</sup>). In NT times, a distinction has been drawn between the departments of Sheol inhabited by the good and the bad: 'Paradise' is the resting-place of the righteous and penitent (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>), while the 'abyss' (q.v.) is spoken of as the abode of demons (Lk 8<sup>31</sup>; cf. Rev 9<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>).

2. Those who accepted the Jewish cosmogony believed that, at death, every soul passed to this hidden region. The death of Christ involved for Him, as for every son of man, the same journey. To the first disciples, that He 'descended into Hades' would not present itself as an article of faith, or as a matter of revelation; it was implied in the fact of His death. That He went into 'the abyss' does not need argument for St. Paul (Ro 10<sup>7</sup>; cf. Eph 4<sup>9</sup> κατέβη εἰς τὰ κατώτερα μέρη τῆς γῆς); that His soul was in Hades after the Crucifixion is assumed as a matter of course in Ac 2<sup>31</sup>. No one in the Apostolic or sub-Apostolic Age would have been impelled by dogmatic considerations to insert the article of the Descent into Hades in the baptismal creed, for it was only another way of saying that Christ died. In the NT, accordingly (with the exception of 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>), the references to Christ's Descent into the under world are incidental only, introduced to illustrate special points; e.g. Ac 2<sup>31</sup>, that Christ did not remain in Hades; Mt 12<sup>40</sup>, that the period of His sojourn 'in the heart of the earth' was 'three days and three nights'; Eph 4<sup>9</sup>, that the Crucified who descended is the Ascended Lord; and Lk 23<sup>43</sup>, that the penitent thief would be in security with Christ in the unseen life after death. (It is to be observed, however, that Lk 23<sup>43</sup> is not quoted by the Fathers as illustrating the Descensus, some of them—e.g. Tertullian—holding that Paradise was not a department of Hades, but distinct from it.)

3. But the question was inevitable: when Christ descended to the under world, what office did He perform there? And in attempting to find an answer to the question as to the consequences and the purpose of Christ's Descent into Sheol, the early Christians naturally betook themselves to the OT and to the forecasts of Messiah's mission which they found therein. Even before speculation began on these points, it had been natural to use OT language when the fact of the Descensus was mentioned: thus Ro 10<sup>7</sup> goes back to Dt 30<sup>13</sup>, and Ac 2<sup>31</sup> to Ps 16<sup>10</sup>. Now the OT suggested a deliverance of the righteous from Sheol, and this thought was destined to be prominent in the development of Christian eschatology.

Sheol, as we have seen, is the abode of the spirits of the departed (Ps 49<sup>14</sup>), and it is from Sheol, personified as the ruler of this gloomy region, that the righteous Hebrew looked for deliverance. 'God will redeem my soul from the power of Sheol' was his hope (Ps 49<sup>15</sup>; cf. Ps 30<sup>6</sup>). The Divine promise was, 'I will ransom them from the power of Sheol' (Hos 13<sup>14</sup>). 'Because of the blood of the covenant I have brought forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water' (Zec 9<sup>11</sup>) is a prophetic forecast.* To St. Paul's thought, the climax of Christ's victory was the conquest of death (1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>); and it was part of the purpose of His humiliation that in His triumph the powers of the under world should own His sway (Ph 2<sup>10</sup> ἵνα πᾶν γόνυ κάμψῃ . . . καταχθονίων). When it was asked how this subjugation was exhibited, the answer was ready to hand. It was in the deliverance from Satan's bondage of the dead whom he had in thrall in Sheol. Christ has the keys of death and of Hades (Rev 1<sup>18</sup>).

It is possible that some such conception of Messiah's mission to the departed was prevalent in pre-Christian days. Two passages from the Bereshith Rabba* are cited as testifying to Jewish belief: 'When they that are bound, they that are in Gehinnom, saw the light of the Messiah, they rejoiced to receive him'; and 'This is that which stands written, We shall rejoice and exult in thee. When? When the captives climb out of hell, and the Shechinah at their head.' But the date of this literature is uncertain, and it may be affected by Christian ideas. At any rate, this conception of the purpose of Christ's Descensus is prominent in the earliest Christian documents. Thus in a section of the Ascension of Isaiah (ix. 16f.) assigned by Charles to the close of the 1st cent. we have: 'when he hath plundered the angel of death, he will ascend [sc. from Hades] on the third day . . . and many of the righteous will ascend with him' (cf. also x. 8, 14 and xi. 19, 'They crucified him, and he descended to the angel of Sheol'). With this should be compared Mt 27<sup>52-53</sup>, perhaps the earliest suggestion of the thought that the saints were freed from the bondage of Hades by the Descent of Christ.† In a 2nd cent. section of the Sibylline Oracles (i. 377) we have: οσοι αν Αιδωνεος οikon | βησεται αγγελων επαναστασιν τεθνεωσιν; and again (viii. 310): ηξει δ' ελς Αιδον αγγελων επιδα πασιν. The date of the (Christian) interpolation in the Latin version of Sir 24<sup>45</sup> is not certain, but the words interpolated are significant: 'Penetrabo omnes inferiores partes terrae et inspiciam omnes dormientes, et illuminabo omnes sperantes in Domino.' We have an explicit statement in Origen, who, commenting on Ro 5<sup>4</sup>, says: 'Christum vero idcirco in infernum descendisse, non solum ut ipse non teneretur a morte, sed ut et eos, qui inibi non tam praevaricationis crimine, quam moriendi conditione habebantur, abstraheret.'‡ Origen elsewhere interprets the binding of the 'strong man' of Mt 12<sup>9</sup> as a binding of Satan in the under world, and Irenæus gives the same exegesis.§ This is the general view: the express purpose of Christ's Descent to Hades was to liberate the souls who were there in thrall. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus works out, in picturesque detail, the story of the 'Harrowing of Hell,' a legend which deeply impressed the consciousness of Christendom. So wide-spread was this belief in the early Christian period that a controversy arose as to whether the souls of Jews or of Gentiles or of both were included in the deliverance wrought by Christ in Hades. Marcion—if Irenæus|| is to be trusted—held that it was only for the redemption of the wicked heathen of olden time, but Justin¶ and Irenæus** restricted it to the righteous of Israel; while Clement of Alexandria†† and his school included both Jew and Gentile in its grace. We find, then, that, while the NT gives no explicit sanction to this idea of the conquest of the powers of the under world and the deliverance of imprisoned souls by Christ's Descent into Hades, it was firmly established in the 2nd and 3rd cent., and that it grew out of OT phrases about the redemption from Sheol.

5. The idea that Christ preached in Hades to the souls who were in bondage there has a somewhat different history. It is found in Ignatius‡‡: 'even the prophets, being His disciples in the spirit, were expecting Him as their teacher, and for this cause, He, whom they rightly awaited, when He came, raised them from the dead.' More explicit is an oracle quoted both by Justin* and by Irenæus† as from Isaiah or Jeremiah, although it is not in the OT, and its source has not been traced: 'The Lord God remembered His dead people of Israel who lay in the graves, and descended to preach to them His own salvation.'‡ In like manner, the apocryphal Gospel of Peter (2nd cent.) tells of a voice from heaven which said, 'Thou didst preach to them that sleep' (ἐκήρυξας τοῖς κοιμωμένοις). This, according to Clement of Alexandria, who does not countenance the legendary developments of the idea of liberation, was the sole purpose of Christ's Descent into Hades, viz. that He should preach the gospel there.§

Of Christ's preaching in Hades there is no foreshadowing in the OT, although Clement of Alexandria|| will have it that Job 28<sup>2</sup> predicts it. But it is plainly stated in 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>, and the efforts to explain these passages of a preaching of the pre-existent Christ to the patriarchs, or of His mission to the spiritually dead, can only be regarded as after-thoughts of Christology, although they have the authority of Augustine and Aquinas. The words are explicit: τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνευματος πορευθεῖς ἐκήρυξεν . . . νεκροῖς εὐηγγελισθη. It is noteworthy, however, that early Christian belief on this point was not founded on these texts. They are not cited in connexion with the Descensus by the earliest writers, such as Ignatius, Justin, or Irenæus. Cyprian¶¶ quotes 1 P 4<sup>6</sup>, but he offers no comment upon it; and Clement of Alexandria** is the first to use 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> to illustrate the proclamation of the gospel in Hades. Nothing is said in either passage as to the effect of the preaching; there is no suggestion of that triumphant deliverance of souls from Hades, on which the next age loved to dwell. Indeed, 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> does not speak of a preaching to all the spirits of the departed, but only to those of the antediluvian patriarchs; and this limitation, whatever be its precise significance, needs to be kept in mind. It was, perhaps, because of this limitation that the passage was not quoted by the early Christian writers when debating the meaning of the Descensus; the doctrine was developing itself in quite a different way.

6. A curious passage in the Shepherd of Hermas (Sim. ix. 16) throws some light on the primitive Christian conception of the under world. A parable is told of the building of a tower which represents the Church at rest. All the stones which are built into the tower are taken from 'a certain deep place' (ἐκ βυθοῦ τινός), i.e. the under world. The first tier represents the first generation of men, i.e. from Adam to Abraham; the second, those from Abraham to Moses; the third, the prophets and ministers (sc. of the Old Covenant); while the fourth tier represents the apostles and teachers of the New Covenant. All alike had 'to rise up through water' that they might be made alive, so that the seal of baptism is needed for all. Now the 'apostles and teachers' differed from the rest in that they had been baptized before they passed into the under world; but when there, 'after they had fallen asleep in the power and faith of the Son of God, they preached also to them that had fallen asleep before them, and themselves gave unto them the seal of the preaching,' sc. baptism. Thus Hermas does not speak of a Descent of Christ into Hades, but he finds a mission there for the apostles and teachers of the Christian dispensation, viz. that they might evangelize and baptize the pre-Christian saints, so that they too might become members of the Church. Clement of Alexandria* quotes this passage from Hermas, and adds† that the apostles preached in Hades, following the Lord. Probably neither writer had formulated a quite consistent scheme of Christ's mission to the under world. As Clement held that the apostles were followers of Christ in Hades, so Origen taught that Christ had forerunners there. He held that as the prophets, both those of the OT and John Baptist, were His heralds on earth, so they were His heralds in the under world:‡ 'Ἰησοῦς εἰς ἔδου γέγονε, καὶ οἱ προφῆται πρὸ αὐτοῦ, καὶ προκηρύσσουσι τοῦ Χριστοῦ τὴν ἐπιδημίαν.

7. The primitive view, so far as it can be collected from Hermas and Ignatius, seems to be correctly expounded by Loofs.§ Christians, since the Redemption wrought by their Master, were not subject to the bondage of Hades after death; from the power of death they had been freed once for all. And what Christ did for the patriarchs in Hades was to place them in a like position to those who had been favoured by His presence on earth. Those who welcomed Him there were delivered from thrall, as all His disciples had already been delivered. This was not held by Tertullian|| or by Irenæus,¶ but it is definitely stated by Origen**: ἐάν ἀπαλλαγώμεν γενόμενοι καλοὶ καὶ ἀγαθοὶ . . . οὐ κατελευσόμεθα εἰς τὴν χώραν ὅπου περιέμενον τὸν Χριστὸν οἱ πρὸ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ κοιμώμενοι.

This may have been the significance of the preaching in Hades, mentioned in 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>; but it remains obscure why it is limited (at least in the first passage) to the antediluvian sinners, for there is no hint that they are to be taken as typical of all men who lived before Christ's Advent.

8. The Descent into Hades is the topic in several of the recently discovered Odes of Solomon, which date from the 2nd century.

These remarkable hymns were first published from the Syriac by Rendel Harris in 1909, and several editions have appeared since in German, French, and English. Opinion is divided as to their date and doctrinal standpoint; but it is not doubtful that the passages here cited are Christian. They may be dated, provisionally, between A.D. 150 and 180.

In Ode xxxi. 1 ff. we have a Song of the Victory of Christ in the under world: 'The abysses were dissolved before the Lord: and darkness was destroyed by His appearance: error went astray and perished at His hand: and folly found no path to walk in . . . He opened His mouth and spake grace and joy . . . His face was justified, for thus His holy Father had given to Him. Come forth, ye that have been afflicted and receive joy, and possess your souls by His grace, and take to you immortal life.' And in xlii. 15 ff.: 'Sheol saw me, and was made miserable: Death cast me up and many along with me . . . I made a congregation of living men amongst his dead men, and I spake with them by living lips . . . and those who had died . . . said, Son of God, have pity on us . . . and bring us out from the bonds of darkness; and open to us the door by which we shall come out to thee.'

Here we have the redemption of souls in Hades, and also a preaching by Christ there after His Passion. In these Odes there is the earliest appearance of the detailed doctrine of the Descensus which is found in the Gospel of Nicodemus, and was afterwards universally prevalent in Christian circles. The Odes do not appeal directly to Scripture; and the manner in which they allude to the fact and the purpose of the Descensus shows that it must have been a familiar Christian idea at the date of their composition.

9. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus tells (ii. 10) that John Baptist announced to the patriarchs in Hades that he had baptized the Christ, who would soon come to bring them deliverance. We have already (§ 6) found in Origen the conception of John as the precursor of Christ in the under world; but we have now to notice the remarkable similarity between the language used about the Descensus and that used about baptism. Four points in particular may be noted:

(a) The Descent was a going down into 'the abyss' (Ro 10<sup>7</sup>). A text of the OT quoted by Cyril of Jerusalem* as pre-figuring this is Jon 2<sup>6</sup> 7, which is in the LXX:

ἄβυσσος ἐκύκλωσέν με ἐσχάτη, ἔδω ἡ κεφαλὴ μου εἰς σχισμὰς ὀρέων, κατέβην εἰς γῆν ἧς οἱ μοχλοὶ αὐτῆς κάτοχοι αἰώνιοι.

Now in baptism we are 'buried with him' and 'united with him by the likeness of his death' (Ro 6<sup>4</sup> 5). The Fathers, e.g. Basil,† speak explicitly of our baptism as a reflexion or imitation of Christ's Descensus; as a Western Council‡ has it, 'in aquis mersio, quasi in infernum descensio est.'

(b) When Christ descended, the keepers of the gates of Hades were scared (cf. Job 38<sup>17</sup> πυλωροὶ δὲ ἔδου ἰδόντες σε ἔπηξαν), and the Gospel of Nicodemus (ii. 8) speaks of the brazen gates and iron bars being broken (cf. Ps 107<sup>16</sup>, Is 45<sup>2</sup>). The powers of the under world were terrified. Now the Epistle of Barnabas (§ 11) quotes as predictive of baptism Is 45<sup>2</sup> 'I will crush gates of brass and break in pieces bolts of iron'; and the same text is alluded to in Odes of Solomon, xvii. 9, where again the reference is to baptism. Further, all the Eastern baptismal rites bring in the idea of the waters (the mysterious region where evil spirits dwell) being terrified at the coming of Christ for baptism, quoting Ps 77<sup>16</sup> 114<sup>3</sup> 29<sup>3</sup> as forecasting this. We have the same thing in Odes of Solomon, xxiv. 1 and xxxi. 1 f. In some pictorial representations of the Baptism of Christ, Jordan is depicted allegorically as starting away in astonished fear. That is, the terror of the powers of evil is described in the same language, whether the Descent to Hades or Christian baptism is the topic.§

(c) The main purpose, as we have seen (§ 3) of the Descensus was the release of captive souls. But that baptism is a release from bondage, the bondage of sin, is a commonplace in early Christian literature. Baptism, says Cyril of Jerusalem,|| is αἰχμαλωτὸς λύτρον (cf. Odes of Solomon, xvii. 11, xxi. 1, xxv. 1, and Ephraim Syrus, Hymns on the Nativity, xv. 9: 'Blessed be He who has annulled the bonds').

(d) The Gospel of Nicodemus describes the passage to Paradise of the saints redeemed from Hades by Christ. It was, again, a familiar thought in early Christian speculation that in baptism we are restored to Paradise, to the state from which Adam fell, the guilt of original sin being annulled (cf. Origen,¶ Cyril of Jerusalem,** Basil,†† and Ephraim,‡‡ who says of the baptized: 'the fruit which Adam tasted not in Paradise, this day in your mouths has been placed.' See also Odes of Solomon, xi. 14).

Other illustrations might be given, but these are sufficient to show that what may be called the folklore of the Descent into Hades is closely connected with the folklore of baptism. The juxtaposition of the two thoughts—the ministry of Christ in Hades and the efficacy of baptism—in 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> is remarkable, and deserves a closer examination than it has yet received from commentators.

10. The article 'He descended into Hell' does not appear in any Creed until the 4th cent., the Arian Symbol of Sirmium (359) being the first to include it; and it is not included in the baptismal Creed of the Eastern Church to this day. The motive with which it was inserted in the Creeds of the West is not clear; but, whatever the motive was originally, the clause now is useful as testifying to the perfect humanity of Christ, His spirit having passed into the unseen world after death, as the spirits of the departed do. Nor are we just to early Christian tradition, or mindful of the implications of 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>, if we do not recognize that this Descensus must have affected in some way the condition of souls in the unseen world.

LITERATURE.—This is very copious. The artt. 'Descent to Hades (Christ's)' by Loofs in ERE and 'Hell (Descent into)' by Burn in DCG with the literature there cited are most valuable. A large number of Patristic references will be found in F. Huidekoper, Christ's Mission to the Underworld<sup>2</sup>, New York, 1876. H. B. Swete, The Apostles' Creed, London, 1894; E. C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England, do. 1896-97; and J. Turmel, La Descente du Christ aux enfers, Paris, 1905, give useful summaries. C. Bigg, Epp. of St. Peter and St. Jude (ICC), 1901, is the fullest English Commentary on the Petrine texts. J. H. BERNARD.

DESERT, WILDERNESS.—The ideas suggested to our minds by the words 'desert' or 'wilderness' differ to a considerable extent from those conveyed to an Oriental by the biblical terms so translated. When we think of a desert we tend to imagine a bare sandy waste, without any vegetation or water, such as the Desert of the Sahara in N. Africa. The 'desert' of the Bible is rather a place without human habitations, devoid of cities or towns, but by no means devoid of vegetation, at least for a considerable portion of the year. Properly speaking, the desert was the place to which the cattle were driven (Heb. דָּרַךְ from דָּרַךְ 'to drive'), an uncultivated region where pasturage, however scanty, was to be found. Joel, for instance, speaks of the fire having devoured the pastures of the wilderness (1-<sup>9</sup>), and of the locusts leaving a desolate wilderness behind them (2<sup>3</sup>). It was in the wilderness that the shepherds tended their flocks, and other forms of life were also to be found there. Thus, e.g., pelicans (Ps 102<sup>6</sup>), wild asses (Jer 22<sup>4</sup>), ostriches (La 4<sup>3</sup>), jackals (Mal 1<sup>3</sup>) had their home in the desert. As the pasture to be found in the wilderness was scanty and insufficient to support a flock of sheep for any length of time, the shepherds had to move from place to place in order to obtain the necessary food for their flocks. The desert was thus the special home of nomadic or wandering tribes, although the name 'desert' or 'wilderness' was applied to the uncultivated tracts of land beyond the bounds of the cultivated area near the towns or villages. Some of the deserts mentioned in Scripture are small, and correspond to the English 'common' or uncultivated pasture ground near a village on which any of the inhabitants could graze their cattle. Thus we read of the Wilderness of Gibeon (2 S 22<sup>4</sup>), of Tekoa (2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>), of Damascus (1 K 19<sup>15</sup>). On the other hand, many of the wildernesses referred to in the Bible are simply parts of larger deserts. Some of these larger tracts of uncultivated pasture land are, e.g., the Wilderness of Judah (Jg 1<sup>16</sup>), of Moab (Dt 2<sup>8</sup>), of Edom (2 K 3<sup>8</sup>). The Wilderness of Judah included the Wilderness of Ziph, of Tekoa, of Engedi.

The best-known desert of the Bible is the Wilderness of Sinai, where the tribes of Israel wandered before settling in Canaan. God's care for the people in those days of wandering is repeatedly referred to by prophets and psalmists (e.g. Hos 13<sup>5</sup>, Jer 2<sup>6</sup>, Am 2<sup>10</sup>, Ps 78<sup>32</sup> 107<sup>4</sup> 136<sup>16</sup>). In the same way the sin and unbelief of the people in the wilderness are mentioned (e.g. Ps 78<sup>40</sup> 106<sup>44</sup>), while on the other hand several of the prophets seem to look on the time of the sojourn in the wilderness as the ideal period in the story of Israel's relation to God (e.g. Jer 2-; Am 5-<sup>5</sup>).

In the apostolic writings we have several references to 'wilderness' or 'desert.' The terms employed are ἐρημία and ἐρημος, the latter used either as a noun or adjective with τόπος or χώρα or some similar word understood. In the life of our Lord the desert holds an important place. It is the scene of the Temptation, of the feeding of the 5000, of midnight prayer and rest from labour. In the life of St. Paul we have a reference to his sojourn in Arabia (Gal 1<sup>17</sup>) after his conversion, and undoubtedly we are to understand that the Apostle had retired to the desert for meditation. The evangelist Philip is instructed by the Spirit to go to meet the Ethiopian eunuch on the road from Jerusalem to Gaza, and the statement follows, 'which is desert' (Ac 8<sup>36</sup>). If this refers to the road which passed through the desert, there is no difficulty; but the natural application of the words is to Gaza itself, which in the time of Philip was a prosperous town. G. A. Smith (HGHL<sup>4</sup>, 1897, p. 186 f.) supposes that the reference is to Old Gaza, past which the road ran; but the more likely explanation is that the sentence is a later marginal gloss inserted after Gaza had passed away, and that it at length crept into the text (cf. HDB iv. 918<sup>b</sup>). In the Epistle to the Hebrews reference is made to the persecuted followers of Christ 'who wandered in deserts and mountains' (11<sup>38</sup>). Probably this refers to the Jewish Christians of the Holy Land during the great war with Rome and after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. The apostolic writings also contain repeated allusions to the wilderness of Israel's wanderings. In the speeches of St. Stephen and St. Paul, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, we find the story of the desert sojourn, in the accounts of the history of God's revelation of Himself to mankind (Ac 7<sup>36-38</sup> 42. 44 13<sup>18</sup>). St. Paul in 1 Co 10<sup>5</sup> refers to the temptation, sin, and punishment of the people in the wilderness as a warning to Christian believers against giving way to temptation. A similar use of the temptation in the wilderness is made in He 3<sup>8-17</sup>.

In Rev 12<sup>1-14</sup> 'the woman clothed with the sun' has a place prepared for her in the wilderness, whither she flees from before the dragon, while in 17<sup>3</sup> the seer is carried to the wilderness to see the 'woman sitting upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy.' The thought behind the former reference, of the wilderness as a place of refuge for the woman, may be taken from the history of the Jews who fled from Pharaoh to the wilderness, but there may be no more than the general idea of the wilderness as a place of refuge and concealment, so amply illustrated in the life of David. The idea in the latter instance may be connected with the Jewish conception of the desert as the home of demons or evil spirits (cf. art. DEMON).

W. F. BOYD.

DESTRUCTION.—The material is scanty in St. Paul's writings for 'a detailed theory on this most awe-inspiring of all subjects,' and it is proper for us to note 'the "wise Agnosticism" (the phrase is Dr. Orr's in discussing the teaching of Scripture on eternal punishment) of St. Paul with the attempted theories of the Synagogue-theologians' (H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, 1904, pp. 313, 315; cf. also 4 Ezr. ix. 13, 'Enquire not further how the ungodly are to be tormented, but rather investigate the manner in which the righteous are to be saved'). But there can be little doubt that the term 'destruction' to St. Paul meant, not annihilation, but a continual existence of some sort in the outer darkness away from God. St. Paul has a group of words for this idea. ὁρμή (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, Ro 25<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>) is a more general term and applies to the Day of Judgment. θάνατος (Ro 6<sup>21</sup>, 23 8<sup>6</sup>) is not the death of the body, which is true of all, but rather the second death of Rev 20<sup>6</sup>, 14. The NT gives no scientific description of death, nor is one possible in the spiritual sphere. The analogy of Nature (see Butler's Analogy, ed. Gladstone, 1896, and Drummond's Natural Law in the Spiritual World, 1883) does not make annihilation necessary. The words φθείρω and φθορά (Gal 6<sup>8</sup>, 2 P 21-) have the notion of corruption. Note the contrast in 1 Co 15<sup>42</sup> between ἐν φθορά and ἐν ἀφθαρσία. St. Paul uses φθείρω in 1 Co 3<sup>17</sup> for the punishment of one who destroys (φθείρω) the Temple of God. In Ro 3<sup>16</sup> destruction (συμτριμμα) and misery (ταλαιπωρία) are coupled together for the ways of the sinful. But the chief words for the idea of destruction of the unbelieving are ἀπώλεια (ἀπολλύνω) and ὀλεθρος, both from ὀλλυμι, 'to destroy.' In Rev 9<sup>11</sup> ὁ Ἀπολλων, the destroyer, is the title of Satan. The use of ἀπο in ἀπολλύνω and ἀπωλεια is perfective, and in Greek literature generally the terms mean 'destruction.' This fact is used by the advocates of conditional immortality in favour of the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked, but it is by no means clear that the words connote extinction of consciousness. Least of all is this true of the LXX use of the words. In 2 P 3<sup>7</sup> ἀπωλεια is used for the Day of Judgment and punishment of the wicked, which implies life after death. In Ph 1<sup>23</sup> the word is in opposition to σωτηρία, in He 10<sup>39</sup> it is opposed to περιποίησις τῆς ψυχῆς (see also Ja 4<sup>1</sup>, Jude<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>19</sup> 10<sup>9</sup> 15<sup>18</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>15</sup>, 4<sup>3</sup>, Ro 2<sup>12</sup>, Ph 3<sup>19</sup>, Rev 17<sup>8</sup>, 11). There seems no good reason for reading into the context the notion of annihilation of the soul, for that was probably an idea wholly foreign to St. Paul. The term ὀλεθρος meets us in 1 Th 5<sup>3</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>9</sup> (εἰς ὀλεθρον καὶ ἀπώλειαν). In 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup> we have τίσουσιν ὀλεθρον αἰώνιον, which is the only passage that makes a statement about the duration of the destruction of the wicked. Aristotle (de Caelo, i. 9, 15) defines αἰών as the limit (τὸ τέλος) either of a man's epoch or the limit of all things (eternity). The word does not in itself denote eternity, but it lends itself readily to that idea. The context in 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup> makes the notion of finality or eternity necessary (Milligan, Thess., 1908, ad loc.). The word ὀλεθρος denotes hopeless ruin (cf. Beet, The Last Things, ed. 1905, p. 122 ff.). In 4 Mac 10<sup>15</sup> we have τὸν αἰώνιον τοῦ τυράννου ὀλεθρον in contrast with τὸν αἰώνιον τῶν εὐσεβῶν βίον (cf. Milligan, op. cit. p. 65). St. Paul's natural meaning is the ruin of the wicked, which goes on for ever. It is a dark subject from any point of view, but eternal sinning seems to call for eternal punishing. See also artt. on LIFE AND DEATH, PUNISHMENT, and PERDITION.

DEVIL (διάβολος).—In this article the conception of the Evil One in the apostolic writings and of the various names used to describe him will be considered; for the passages in EV where 'devil' represents δαίμονιον see DEMON.

1. The name διάβολος.—(a) It is used as a common noun or as an adjective to denote 'a slanderer' or 'slandering' (NT in Pastoral Epistles only), as in 1 Ti 3<sup>11</sup> (women not to be slanderers), 2 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>, Tit 2<sup>3</sup>; and so in LXX of Haman (Est 7<sup>4</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>; Heb. זָר, זָרָה, Vulg. hostis and adversarius). The corresponding verb is used of accusation, where the charge is not necessarily false, as in Lk 16<sup>1</sup> (διεβλήθη) of the unjust steward, though probably a secret enmity is inferred; and Papias (ap. Euseb. HE III. xxxix. 16) uses the verb (unless it is Eusebius' paraphrase) with reference to the 'woman accused of many sins before the Lord.' It is noteworthy in this connexion that the devil's accusations against man, though undoubtedly hostile, are not always untrue.

(b) As a proper name διάβολος is constantly used in the NT, usually with the article, but occasionally it is anarthrous (Ac 13<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>8</sup>, Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>). It is explicitly identified in Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20- with the Heb. name Satan, and, like that name, it is not used in the NT in the plur. (except in the primary sense of 'slanderer' as above), and is not applied to Satan's angels, as we apply the word 'devils' to them. It is curious that we never in English use 'Devil' as a proper name without the article, while we always use 'Satan' in this way. Hence the title does not convey to our ears quite the same idea as it conveyed to the Jews. Conversely we should do well if we did not always treat 'Christ' as a proper name, but sometimes used it as a title or attribute, 'the Christ,' as occasionally in RV (e.g. Lk 24<sup>46</sup>). In the OT 'Satan' (from שָׂטָן, 'to hate,' 'to be an enemy to,' the root idea being the enmity between the serpent and the seed of the woman, Gn 3<sup>15</sup>) is generally used with the article, שָׂטָן, as denoting the adversary: in 1 K 5<sup>4</sup> it is used without the article, as denoting any adversary (LXX ἐπίβουλος, Vulg. Satan). The name 'Satan,' however, had not been transliterated into Greek till shortly before the Christian era, for we never find it so rendered in the LXX, but always ὁ διάβολος. The latter is used as a proper name in the LXX of Job 1<sup>6</sup>, Zec 3<sup>1</sup> (Vulg. Satan), and Wis 2<sup>4</sup> (Vulg. Diabolus); and so often in the NT. There we have, as frequently, ὁ Σατανᾶς, almost always with an article, but in 2 Co 12<sup>7</sup> we have Σατάν or Σατανα without the article; some cursives in Rev 20- have Σατανᾶς anarthrous. The transliteration 'Satan' is found 34 times in the NT, of which 14 cases are in the Gospels.

(c) We find in the apostolic writings some paraphrases of the name 'Satan.' 'The Evil One' (ὁ πονηρός) is used in Eph 6<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>13</sup>, 3<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>18</sup>; this designation is also found 5 times in the Gospels, and, in addition, probably in the last clause of the Lord's Prayer. In the Apocalypse 'the dragon' is frequently used as a synonym for Satan, ὁ ὄρακων probably meaning 'the sharp-seeing one,' from δέρκομαι.* It is used in Rev 12<sup>3</sup>, 13<sup>4</sup>, 11 16<sup>13</sup> 20<sup>2</sup> as denoting a large serpent (as in classical Greek), explicitly identified with the 'old serpent' of Gn 3 in Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20-. This identification is perhaps implied in Ro 16<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup> (cf. Wis 2<sup>4</sup>). Satan is also called 'the Accuser' and 'the Destroyer' (see below, § 2). For other names see ADVERSARY, AIR, BELIAL.

2. Apostolic doctrine about the devil or Satan.

—The apostles, like their Jewish contemporaries, taught that Satan was a personal being, the prince of evil spirits or demons (Rev 12<sup>7</sup>, 9, Eph 2<sup>2</sup>; cf. Mt 25<sup>41</sup>, Mk 3-), but the name 'Beelzebub' is not found in the NT outside the Gospels, and therefore one of the 'angels which kept not their own principality' (Jude<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>4</sup>). In accordance with the conception of Wis 2<sup>24</sup>, that his malignity towards man is caused by envy (for Jewish ideas see Edersheim, LT<sup>4</sup>, 1887, i. 165), he is represented as pre-eminently the adversary of man (1 P 5<sup>8</sup>), and as accusing him to God (Rev 12<sup>10</sup> κατηγορος or κατήγωρ; the reference seems to be to Job and Joshua the high priest). He has power in this world, though only for a while (Rev 12<sup>12</sup>), and therefore is called the 'god of this world' or 'age'

(αἰὼν) who 'hath blinded the thoughts (νοήματα) of the unbelieving' (2 Co 4<sup>1</sup>; cf. Jn 14<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>11</sup> 'the prince of the [this] world'). This 'power of Satan' is contrasted with 'God' as 'darkness' with 'light' in the heavenly vision at St. Paul's conversion (Ac 26<sup>18</sup>). 'The devil' has 'the power of death' (He 2<sup>14</sup>), not that he can inflict death at will, but that death entered into the world through sin (Ro 5<sup>12</sup>) at his instigation (Wis 2<sup>4</sup>). As Westcott remarks (on He 2<sup>14</sup>), death as death is no part of the Divine order, but is the devil's realm; he makes it subservient to his end. He must, therefore, almost certainly be identified with 'the Destroyer' who appears as Apollyon (ἀπολλύων) or Abaddon (אַבְדּוֹן, lit. 'destruction'; see ABADDON) in Rev 9<sup>11</sup>, the king of the locusts who has power to injure men for five months—the name is akin to 'Asmodeus' of To 3<sup>8</sup> (אַסְמֹדֵאִי, from אָפָר, 'to destroy'), but not with the 'Destroyer' of 1 Co 10<sup>10</sup> (see ANGELS, 5 (δ)).

The devil uses his power to seduce man to sin; he tempts Ananias to lie to the Holy Ghost (Ac 5<sup>3</sup>); he deceives the whole world (Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>8,10</sup>); he is pre-eminently 'the tempter' (1 Th 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup>); he tempts with wiles and devices and snares (Eph 6<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>11</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>26</sup>); he uses evil men as his instruments or ministers, who 'fashion themselves as ministers of righteousness' even as he 'fashioned himself into an angel of light' (2 Co 11<sup>14</sup>). A passage in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>) suggests that the fundamental temptation with which Satan seduces men is pride. The Christian ἐπισκοπος must not be puffed up with pride lest he fall into the condemnation (κρίμα) into which the devil fell (i.e. when cast out of heaven; this seems to be the most probable interpretation, not 'the judgment wrought by the devil'; cf. Jn 16<sup>11</sup> 'the prince of this world hath been judged,' κέκριται). Satan is far from being omnipotent; man can resist him, and he will flee (Ja 4<sup>7</sup>); man must not 'give place to' him, i.e. not give him scope to work (Eph 4<sup>27</sup>). Not that man can resist by his own strength, but only by the indwelling power of the Holy Spirit, who helps his infirmity (Ro 8<sup>26</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>16</sup>, and in St. Paul's Epistles passim; cf. Mt 12<sup>28</sup>); the Holy Spirit is man's Helper or Paraclete against the Evil Spirit.

The devil is described as instigating opposition to Christian work* and persecution; whether by blinding the minds (lit. thoughts) of the unbelieving (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>), or directly by suggesting opposition, as when he 'hindered' St. Paul's return to Thessalonica (1 Th 2<sup>18</sup>), perhaps (as Ramsay thinks [St. Paul, 1895, p. 230 f.]) by putting into the minds of the politicians the idea of exacting security for the leading Christians of that city (Ac 17<sup>9</sup>). Similarly in Rev 2<sup>10</sup> the devil is said to be about to cast some of the Smyrnaean Christians into prison; and Pergamum, the centre of the Emperor-worship which led to the persecution described in the Apocalypse, is called Satan's throne (2<sup>13</sup>). No phrase marks more clearly than this the difference of attitude towards the Roman official world between the Seer on the one hand and St. Paul and St. Luke on the other, or (as it seems to the present writer) the interval between the dates of writing. The Seer looks on the Emperor and his officials as closely allied with Satan, while St. Paul and St. Luke look upon them as Christ's instruments (Ro 13<sup>4</sup>, etc.; and note the statements about Roman officials in Acts). In close connexion with the above passages, the persecuting Jews are called a 'synagogue of Satan' (Rev 2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>).

3. The conflict with Satan.—Michael and his good angels are represented as at war in heaven with the devil and his angels (Rev 12<sup>4</sup>) as a direct result of the spiritual travail of the Christian Church (vv. 2-6). Satan is cast down to the earth and persecutes the Church (v. 13). But he is bound by the angel for a thousand years, i.e. for a long period, and cast into the abyss that he may no longer deceive (20<sup>2,4</sup>). This period of binding synchronizes with Christ's reign of a thousand years (see v. 7), when the triumph is shared by the martyrs (vv. 4-6); this is the 'first resurrection,' and is best interpreted as taking place in the present life, and as referring to the cessation of the persecution, which was to last for a comparatively short time—3½ days (11<sup>9,11</sup>) as compared with 1000 years (20<sup>4</sup>), and to the establishment of a dominant Christianity. But the reign of Christ is not said to be 'on earth.' The reign of the martyrs was not to be an earthly one; they 'would live and reign with Christ as kings and priests in the hearts of all succeeding generations of Christians, while their work bore fruit in the subjection of the civilized world to the obedience of the faith. . . . The age of the martyrs, however long it might last, would be followed by a far longer period of Christian supremacy' (Swete, extending and adapting Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xx. 7 ff.). In other words, Satan's power for evil now is not to be compared with his power at the beginning of our era. This conception of an anticipatory victory over Satan may be compared with Ro 16<sup>30</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup> 5<sup>18</sup>.

* In this sense Peter is called 'Satan' in Mt 16<sup>23</sup>.

After the thousand years the devil will be released (Rev 20<sup>3</sup>); there will be a great activity of all the powers of evil before the Last Day; but he will be finally overthrown (v. 10), and Christ's triumph will be complete. This is the great message of the Apocalypse. The struggle between the Church and the World will end in Satan being vanquished for ever.

4. Satan dwelling in men.—This subject is considered in art. DEMON; but certain NT phrases may be noticed here.

(a) Wicked men are called 'children of the devil' (Ac 13<sup>10</sup>, Elymas; 1 Jn 3<sup>10</sup>); and in Rev 2<sup>24</sup> the 'mysteries' of the false teachers at Thyatira are called 'the deep things of Satan, as they say,' as opposed to the 'deep things of God' of which St. Paul speaks (1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>; cf. Ro 11<sup>33</sup>, Eph 3<sup>18</sup>); i.e. 'the deep things as they call them, but they are the deep things of Satan.' In these wicked men and teachers Satan is conceived as dwelling; but pre-eminently he dwells in the man who is his representative, and who is endowed with his attributes, 'the lawless one' (Antichrist) who works false miracles and has his Parousia even as Christ has (2 Th 2<sup>9</sup>, where see Milligan's note).

(b) Delivering unto Satan.—This phrase is found in 1 Co 5<sup>4</sup> and 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup>, and is perhaps based on Job 1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>6</sup>, where the patriarch is delivered to Satan to be tried by suffering. In St. Paul the phrase seems to denote excommunication, the excommunicate becoming a dwelling-place for the Evil One. It is, indeed, thought by some that the phrase 'destruction of the flesh' in 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup> means the infliction of death, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira (Alford, Goudge, etc.). But in 1 Tim. death cannot be intended, for the object of the discipline is that the offender may be taught not to blaspheme; and in 1 Cor. the balance of probability perhaps lies with the opinion that the offender is the same as the man who was received back into communion in 2 Co 2<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>12</sup> (for the contrary view see A. Menzies, Second Corinthians, London, 1912, p. xvii ff.). Ramsay thinks that the phrase was an adaptation of a pagan idea in which the punishment of an offender is left to the gods. Undoubtedly excommunication in the early Church was a severe penalty; bodily sufferings are not impossibly referred to, for these are attributed to Satan in the NT (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>, the woman whom Satan had bound), and St. Paul calls his 'stake in the flesh,' whatever form of suffering that might have been, 'a messenger of Satan to buffet me' (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>). Yet this discipline is intended to bring about repentance, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.'

DIADEM.—See CROWN.

DIANA.—The use of the name 'Diana' in Ac 19 (AV and RV) to indicate the Ephesian goddess is probably due to the influence of the Latin Vulgate. From a very early time the Romans used the Italian names of their own divinities to indicate also Greek divinities whose characteristics were analogous to those of their own. It was thus that the Greek maiden huntress-goddess Artemis was early equated with the Latin goddess Diana, maiden and huntress. (In the earliest Roman period Diana and Ianus [=Dianus] are male and female divinities corresponding to one another.) But the Artemis of Ephesus is a divinity entirely different in character from the ordinary Greek Artemis; and that such a goddess should come to be represented in English by the name Diana is almost ridiculous.

The goddess of Ephesus, called Artemis by the Greeks, was a divinity of a type wide-spread throughout Anatolia and the East generally (cf., for instance, ch. iii. in Ramsay's Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, Oxford, 1895). She represented the reproductive power of the human race. The Oriental mind was from early ages powerfully impressed by this, the greatest of all human faculties, and worshipped it, now under the male form, now under the female. There are still in India, for instance, survivals of phallic worship. The Artemis of Ephesus was represented in art as multimamma, covered with breasts. The worship of such divine reproductive power naturally lent itself in practice to disgusting excesses. Instead of being kept on a spiritual level, it was continually made the excuse for brutalizing and enervating practices—prostitution, incest, etc.

The origin of the name 'Artemis' is veiled in obscurity, and the attempts of both ancients and moderns to derive the word have been unsuccessful; the best suggestion is that of Ed. Meyer, that the word is cognate with ἀρταμειν, ἀρταμειν, and means 'the female butcher.' This would suit certain early aspects of the cult very well. But it is as a Nature-goddess that we find the most wide-spread worship of Artemis in the earliest days of which we have any knowledge. She was worshipped on mountains and in valleys, in woods and by streams. Her working and her power were recognized in all life, plant and animal, as beneficent in their birth and growth, as signs of wrath in their destruction and death. With her is sometimes united a male counterpart. She is in any case wife and mother; she nourishes the young, aids women in childbirth, and sets bounds to their life. Afterwards various developments in this original conception take place. The wife and mother element, with the growth of the Apollo legend, both Apollo and Artemis being children of Leto, retires into the background, and Artemis becomes a maiden goddess. She also becomes the goddess of seafaring men, and is patroness of all places and things connected with them. In Homer she appears mainly as the goddess of death of the old Nature religion. From the 5th cent. onwards we meet her as goddess of the moon, while Apollo is god of the sun. On the boundaries of the Greek world her cult is associated with the barbarous ceremonies of other divinities recognized as related.

The most important aspects of the Artemis cult for the NT are naturally those connected with the life of Nature, but the whole idea of Artemis must be sketched as briefly as possible. Various trees are sacred to her. Moisture as fertilizing them is sacred to her—lakes, marshes, and rivers. She is thus also a goddess of agriculture. Her beneficence causes the crops to grow, and she destroys opposing forces; whence offerings of crops are made to her. Of all seasons she loves spring best. She is mistress of the world of wild animals, such as bears, lions, wolves, and panthers, and also of birds and fish. Out of this conception the huntress idea would naturally develop. And it seems that it was in connexion with this that the idea of the goddess as a virgin arose. She was also the protectress of cattle. Further, she was revered as the guardian of young people, and to her maidens made offering of the toys, etc., of their childhood. Among her other attributes was that of goddess of childbirth, goddess of women in general, especially goddess of death (particularly for women), and as such she demanded human sacrifice. She was a goddess of war, of the sea, of roads, of markets and trade, of government, of healing, protectress from danger, guardian of oaths (by her women were accustomed to swear), goddess of maidenhood, of beauty, of dancing and music. Finally she was a moon-goddess.

The Ephesian cult was in its origin non-Greek. The application of the name Artemis to a goddess of the characteristics of the Ephesian divinity shows that this identification must have been made in very early times, before any idea of virginity attached to the goddess among the Greeks. The cult of the Ephesian goddess remained Oriental, and she was never regarded as virgin. Her temple was a vast institution, with countless priests, priestesses, and temple-servants. The priests were eunuchs, and were called μεγάβουζοι; there was one high priest. The goddess was also served by three grades of priestesses, called μελλίεραι, τεραι, and παρίεραι; at the head of these was a high priestess. Under the dominion of these priests and priestesses there was a large number of temple-slaves of both sexes. The cult was wild and orgiastic in its character. As a result of partial hellenization two developments took place. First, the worship of Apollo was sometimes associated with that of his Greek sister. Second, games were established on the Greek model, called Ἀρτεμισία or Οἰκουμένηκα, and were held annually in the month Artemision (=April).

The Ephesian cult of Artemis was by no means confined to Ephesus. The statement of Acts (19<sup>1</sup>), 'whom all Asia and the Roman world worship,' was no exaggeration. Evidence of this cult has been found in numerous cities of Asia Minor as well as in the following places further afield: Antun, Marseilles, Rhone Mouth (France), Emporiae, Hemeroscopeum, Rhode (Spain), Epidaurus, Megalopolis, Corinth, Scillus (Greece), Neapolis (Samaria), Panticapeum (Crimea), Rome, and Syria. The Ephesians were proud of the goddess not only because she was theirs, but because her worship brought countless visitors from every part of the Empire. This of course was also good for trade, so that religion and self-interest went hand in hand. The account in Acts (19<sup>23ff.</sup>) illustrates most vividly the enthusiasm which can be aroused when religious fanaticism and commercial greed are in tune. The manufacture of offerings to the goddess brought in extensive profit to the makers. St. Paul's preaching, which appealed to the better educated classes, drew many away from the coarse and barbarous cult of Artemis. The demand for offerings decreased; hence the meeting and the riot. The air rang with shouts of 'Great Ephesian Artemis!'

Ephesians prized very greatly the honorary title of νεωκωπος, temple-keeper (lit. 'temple-sweeper') of the great Artemis and of her image which fell down from the sky (Ac 19<sup>35</sup>). This image was doubtless a meteoric stone of crude shape like the Palladium preserved at Rome.

It was in Ephesus (q.v.) that the Artemis worship was at length Christianized in the middle of the 5th cent. by the substitution of the Mother of God (θεοτόκος). This was the beginning of Mariolatry.

DIDACHE.—1. Discovery.—That at one time a book called the Teaching or Teachings of the Apostles had an extensive circulation in Christian circles had long been evident before the actual discovery of any MS. The nature of this book, so highly esteemed in certain quarters, was a matter of conjecture. It was thought by some to be another name for the Apostolic Constitutions. Others, like Archbishop Ussher, were certain that it must be a much shorter document, omitting much of that later compilation. It came to be recognized that behind the whole development of works like the Apostolic Church Ordinance, and the Apostolic Constitutions and Canons there must be a common original. A brilliant attempt at reconstruction was made by Krawtutzsky (Theol. Quartalschrift, iii. [1882] pp. 359-445), who, from the matter common to these two works, framed a document which anticipated with wonderful accuracy the first part of the Didache, but which he called, after Rufinus, Dux Viæ vel Judicium Petri.

At the time when this was published, a MS of the Didache had already been discovered in the library of the Jerusalem monastery in the Phanar or Greek quarter of Constantinople, and was given to the world in the end of 1883 by its discoverer, Philotheus Bryennios, the Metropolitan of Nicomedia. The MS belongs to the 11th century. It contains, besides the Didache, six other early writings or groups of writings, beginning with Chrysostom's Synopsis of the Old and New Testaments, and including the Epistle of Barnabas and the Epistles of Clement of Rome. At its close the scribe has appended a note to the effect that it was finished 'by the hand of Leo, notary and sinner,' in A.M. 6364, i.e. A.D. 1056.

No other book of primitive Christianity outside the NT has found so many and such industrious editors. This MS is still the only one known of the whole Didache, but in Harnack's edition (TU ii. 1, 2 [1884]) von Gebhardt draws attention to a Latin fragment from a MS of the 10th cent., formerly in the convent library of Melk, which, even in its brevity, has one marked difference from our Didache, to be referred to later. Then in 1900, J. Schlecht published from a Munich MS of the 11th cent. an old Latin version (Doctrina XII. Apostolorum, Freiburg i. B., 1900), co-extensive with the first six chapters of the Didache, containing, among other variations, the same noteworthy omission. These are the texts on which all present investigation must rest.

The re-discovery of the Didache created a great sensation, and it was hailed as a most important find. It was seen to fill a gap between the Apostolic Church and the Church of the 2nd cent., in matters of worship, ministry, and doctrine.

'Until the discovery of the Didachê,' says Sanday (Expositor, 3rd ser. v. [1887] 106), 'there were certain phenomena of the Apostolic age which hung as it were in the air. They were like threads cut off abruptly of which we saw the beginning, but neither middle nor end. It is just these phenomena that the Didachê takes up, brings them again to our sight, and connects them with the course of subsequent history.'

It was seen to be the actual forerunner of a whole series of later works in the East. It differs from its successors in that it does not claim direct apostolic inspiration; it is simply the summary of what its author conceived to be the teaching of the apostles.

'It is anonymous, but not pseudonymous; post-Apostolic, but not pseudo-Apostolic' (Schaff, Oldest Church Manual<sup>3</sup>, New York, 1889, p. 14).

2. Contents.—The Didache is not a long document. It is about the same size as the Epistle to the Galatians. In the MS it is not divided; but there is now a standard division into chapters and verses, which is followed in this discussion. This division is quite satisfactory save at one point—xi. 1, 2 ought to belong to ch. x.

The Didache may be divided into two main parts, the latter containing three sections, thus:

- I. Chs. i.-vi. Pre-baptismal moral teaching.
- II. Chs. vii.-xvi. General instructions to the Christian community concerning:
  - (a) Rites (vii.-xi. 2).
  - (b) Office-bearers (xi. 3-xv.).
  - (c) The Last Things and the duty of watchfulness (xvi.).

At the head of the MS appears the title, 'The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles' (Διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων). The first part opens with a sub-title which runs continuously with the text (see facsimile in Schaff or Rendel Harris). The sub-title is 'The Teaching of the Lord by the Twelve Apostles to the Gentiles' (Διδαχὴ Κυρίου δια τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων τοῖς ἔθνεσιν).

This sub-title was either the original title of the whole work, the present title being an abbreviation (in which case the word ἔθνεσιν refers to Gentile Christians) or, as is just possible from its position in the MS, it was originally the title of a shorter work corresponding in length to the Latin Version, in which case ἔθνεσιν means 'those not yet received within the Christian fold,' and indicates that the work contains the moral teaching given to those who are still outside the Church—the candidates for baptism.

The first part consists of a delineation of the Two Ways—the Way of Life and the Way of Death. The Way of Life consists in obedience to three commandments: (a) Love to God, (b) Love to one's fellow-men, and (c) the Golden Rule in its negative form. The Way of Life is set forth not as a logical development of these three in turn, but first positively, and then negatively. The positive development (i. 3-6) consists mainly of extracts from the Sermon on the Mount. The negative begins with a prohibition of gross sins (ii.); it proceeds, after the manner of a Jewish 'fence to the Law,' to a warning against subtler forms which lead on to the grosser (iii.); it concludes with the inculcation of duties necessary for a true life in the Church and in the household (iv.). The Way of Death is delineated in a list of sins and sinners (v.). The moral instruction ends with a warning against going astray from 'this Way of the Teaching,' and the injunction to follow it as far as possible. This part, unlike the rest of the book, is addressed to an individual, the connecting link between it and the other part addressed to the community being the words: 'Having first taught all these things, baptize ye.'

The second part begins with (a) instructions as to the baptism which is to follow this moral instruction of the catechumen (vii.); fasting and its days; prayer, its times and its form, the Lord's Prayer (viii.); the Eucharist and the common meal associated with it, together with forms of prayer (ix. and x.). It is added, however, that the prophets are to be left free in prayer. The mention of the prophets leads on to the next section, but first of all there is a more direct connecting link in the injunction to receive all who come teaching 'all these things aforesaid.' (b) The section on the Christian ministry deals first with the apostles and their reception as they pass on their way to their fields of labour (xi. 3-6), then at greater length with the prophets (xi. 7, xii.), who were evidently more familiar visitants. Commonly they were itinerant, but they might be settled in one community. Simple tests of character are given, for there is the constant danger of being deceived by a pretended prophet. The itinerant prophet suggests the hospitality to be given to way-faring Christians (xii.). The settled prophet suggests the disposal of first-fruits (xiii.), as also regulations for the Lord's Day and the Eucharist (xiv.). The local ministry of bishops and deacons is dealt with in a short chapter (xv.) which closes this section on the office-bearers of the Church. (c) The last section (xvi.) counsels watchfulness and preparedness in view of the approaching end. Signs of the end are enumerated, and 'then shall the world see the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven.' With these words the Didache comes to a conclusion.

3. Sources.—To begin with express quotations, there are two from the OT (xiv. 3 = Mal 1<sup>11, 14</sup>, xvi. 7 = Zec 14<sup>5</sup>), two from the NT (viii. 2 = Mt 6<sup>54</sup>, ix. 5 = Mt 7<sup>6</sup>), and one probably from some unknown apocryphal book (i. 6). There are, besides, three separate references to what our Lord has commanded in the gospel (xi. 3, xv. 3, 4). Apart from express quotations, reminiscences of the OT are clear, especially in the first six chapters, and the same applies to the OT Apocrypha (Sirach and Tobit). Direct borrowings from the NT are even more numerous. Harnack (op. cit. pp. 70-76) has tabulated 23, and of these 17 are from Matthew. (For full list of actual parallels with the NT see Schaft, op. cit. pp. 82-95.) Certain features point to acquaintance with Luke—e.g. the form of the quotations from the Sermon on the Mount in i. 3-5, and the order of cup and bread in ix. 2. 3—but there is no conclusive proof that Luke was actually used. Mark seems to be unused. The case of John is doubtful. There are resemblances to Jn 6 and 17 in the Eucharistic prayers, the most remarkable being the use of the formula 'Holy Father' (πάτερ ἅγιος, x. 2 = Jn 17<sup>14</sup>). So many and so subtle are the parallels, that acquaintance with John must be admitted, or else it must be supposed that the Didache, or at least its liturgical forms, originated in a Johannine milieu. The canonical Gospel of Matthew seems the chief source for our author's knowledge of the teaching of the Lord, but alongside this written Gospel he was familiar with phrases from the oral tradition. On the question of the use of St. Paul's Epistles, almost every intermediate position has been occupied between that of Harnack (1884), who could find no single clear trace of their use, and that of Armitage Robinson (JThSt xiii. [1912] 350), who regards the writer as intimately acquainted with 1 Corinthians: 'he has imitated its sub-divisions, borrowed its words and phrases, and modified its thoughts to suit his own purposes.' There are certainly traces, but they are few in number. His debt to St. Paul is not great. Much more marked is his debt to Jewish writings. The work has been called 'a sort of Church Catechism intensely Jewish' (Westminster Review, Jan. 1885, p. 206). Apart from i. 3-5 there is little that is specifically Christian in the first part, and nearly all of it has its parallels in purely Jewish literature. For this section there has been posited as source a Jewish proselyte catechism of the 'Two Ways,' and parallels and borrowings are not wanting in the later portions of the Didache as well (cf. C. Taylor, The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, with Illustrations from the Talmud, Cambridge, 1886).

4. Integrity.—There is no doubt that the Didache as we have it in the Constantinople MS reads like a unity. Its parts are closely knit together and follow an orderly development. That the primal Didache was co-extensive with our text, with perhaps a few omissions and some textual variations, seems an almost certain inference. But the two facts, that the Latin of Schlecht (L) contains only the first part with no sign of being unfinished, but, on the contrary, with a conclusion of its own, and that certain apparently dependent writings seem to have known these chapters only, suggest that the Didache did once actually exist in such a shorter form. The two main questions which emerge whenever the integrity of the fuller Didache is discussed arise in this way. Ever since Taylor pointed out the numerous Jewish parallels, and even before that, the theory of its dependence on a Jewish proselyte catechism of the Two Ways has been advanced and defended. The discovery of L seems to confirm this. Was there ever, then, such a Jewish catechism? And was it purely a catechism of the Two Ways, or did it contain further material? The case for a Jewish original seems proved. It was natural that Christians reared in Judaism, familiar with Jewish missionary propaganda and methods of instructing converts, should take over and use the forms which they had seen observed in the reception of proselytes, and the Didache bears many a trace of being such a Jewish document worked over in the Christian interest. Was this written or oral catechesis of Judaism co-extensive with chs. i.-vi., or are we to look for a larger document having matter parallel with some parts of chs. vii.-xvi.? It was surely to be expected that any such instruction should contain, besides moral precepts, teaching in regard to the ceremonial and legal requirements of Judaism—circumcision, the Sabbath, foods, first-fruits, fasts, prayers, festivals, and so forth. And when we find phenomena such as these—the Christian fasts and prayers carefully differentiated from the fasts and prayers of the 'hypocrites' (viii. 1, 2); the weekly day of worship, called the Lord's Day of the Lord (κυριακή κυρίου, xiv. 1), corresponding to the 'Sabbath of the Lord' (Lv 23<sup>3</sup>), instructions for the disposal of first-fruits (xiii. 3-7) obviously dependent on, and contrasted with, Jewish customs—then it seems almost a certainty that the Jewish source did contain matter corresponding in some measure to the later chapters of our Didache. Further, in view of the eschatological interest of contemporary Jewish thought, it would be natural that such a manual should contain an eschatological section parallel with ch. xvi.

But if there was, as seems natural, and appears to be a justifiable inference from the phenomena of the text, a Jewish catechesis, oral or written, corresponding to the material in both parts of the Didache, it seems to follow that the first form of the Didache was not the truncated form of L, but the fuller form of the Constantinople MS; in a word, that chs. vii.-xvi. belong to the primal document. We have, then, to regard L as an abbreviation. But is this credible? How could any Christian writer abbreviate in the manner in which this has been done? It is easy to explain the omission of chs. vii.-xvi. If L belongs to the 4th cent., as Schlecht himself maintained, there would be at least two factors in the omission: (1) Church conditions did not at all correspond in his day with the situation in the Didache, and (2) the material of the Didache had already been worked up and modernized in other cognate documents to be considered in the next section. The one grave objection to this whole hypothesis—to the primary nature of the whole of the fuller Didache—is the omission in L of i. 3-ii. 1, and the omission in the Epistle of Barnabas of any trace of this passage. How can we explain the psychology of an abbreviator who could omit the one specifically Christian part, supposing it to be primary? Certain explanations suggest themselves. He may have reckoned these verses among the counsels of perfection, and considered it unwise to place them at the outset before catechumens. Did they not belong to a later stage and a higher plane of attainment? Or he may have regarded his version of the Two Ways as a kind of equivalent to the abrenuntiatio diaboli, and considered positive precepts out of place. In all probability there was a negative and positive baptismal vow from very early days (ἀποραγή and συμραγή). Explanation is not impossible, but neither is it necessary. The conclusion of the present writer is, that the fuller Didache, with the probable exception of i. 3-ii. 1, or parts thereof, and a few isolated expressions later, is the primary form; that it is not an expansion from a form corresponding to L, but that L is either an abbreviation of it, which is not inexplicable, or more probably an abbreviation of an earlier form of the complete version.

The stages in the history of the Didache were something like this: (1) Jewish document of the Two Ways plus instruction in the practices and customs of the Jewish faith; (2) a Christian adaptation ( $\Delta$ ) corresponding to our Didache with some few omissions, from which (3) the Latin version (L) is an excerpt, and of which (4) our Didache (D) is a slightly revised version, with probably a few more definitely Christian additions. The contents of  $\Delta$  were practically identical with our Didache. (For analyses of the history of the text which employ a greater number of recensions see Harnack, Gesch. der altchristl. Litteratur, i. [Leipzig, 1893] 87, and Hennecke in ZNTW ii. [1901] 58 ff.)

5. Cognate and dependent works.—(a) Barnabas.—That the Epistle of Barnabas is a cognate work is obvious. But the significance of the common material has been interpreted in very different ways. The diversity of opinion is perhaps most clearly seen in the first German and the first English editions. The very phenomena which prove for Harnack the priority of Barnabas, for Hitchcock and Brown prove its later and derivative character. The bulk of the common matter is to be found in three chapters (xviii.-xx.), which contain most of the matter in Didache i.-v., with the exception of i. 3-ii. 1. But there is also a very close parallel, too close to be a coincidence, with Did. xvi. 2 in Barnabas iv. 9, 10. It should be noted in passing that the priority of the Didache seems to be hinted at, if not implied, in the way in which this common matter is introduced in Barnabas: 'Let us pass over to another knowledge and teaching (διδασκαλία). For without pressing the word, the suggestion is here at least of transition to a new source of material. Without entering into details, the conclusion comes to is, that Barnabas used the Didache, but in the earlier Christian recension ( $\Delta$ ). If he had it before him in documentary form, he expanded it freely, but he may have quoted familiar material from memory and amplified it in the process.

(b) Hermas.—The connexion with Hermas is neither so extended nor so obvious. The relationship played a great part in earlier discussions from its bearing on the question of date, but it has now receded into the background. It is matter of general agreement now that Hermas used the Didache, but there is much to be said for the thesis of Hennecke, that both Barnabas and Hermas used the earlier Christian recension ( $\Delta$ ), while the final form (D) is indebted in some very minor points to both.

(c) The Apostolic Church Ordinance.—This is an adaptation of the Didache to suit the altered ecclesiastical condition of Egypt in the end of the 3rd or beginning of the 4th century. Here the bulk of the material of the first part of the Didache is distributed among the individual apostles, who in turn contribute their part in a kind of dramatic dialogue. Following on this, and corresponding to the rest of the Didache, are similarly delivered directions about bishops, presbyters, deacons, readers, widows, deaconesses, the conduct of the laity, and the participation of women in the liturgical service, showing in both the enumeration of office-bearers and the powers ascribed to them a much more developed stage of Church organization. As source the Apostolic Church Ordinance has a form of the Didache very like ours: it may have been the earlier Christian recension, though the mass of textual evidence points rather to its being ours plus Barnabas.

(d) Didascalia.—This work fulfilled for Syria towards the end of the 3rd cent. what the last-named did for Egypt a little later. It is not, however, like it, simply an adaptation of the Didache. Indeed, it was earlier regarded as completely independent, but its dependence may now be held as proved (cf. C. Holzhey, Die Abhängigkeit d. syr. Didascalia v. d. Didache, Freiburg, 1898). No certain conclusion can be drawn as to what form its author had before him.

(e) Apostolic Constitutions and Canons.—The first six chapters embody the Didascalia, and to that extent the Didache is used at second-hand. Direct relationship is confined to the first 32 chapters of the seventh book. Most of the Didache is here embodied, but with significant alterations and additions which betray a later age. The adaptation is clearly based on our text of the Didache. Here at last there is no serious question of dependence on an earlier recension.

(f) Other works.—For a full list the reader is referred to Harnack (Gesch. der altchristl. Litt. i. 87), Rendel Harris (Teaching of the Apostles, 1888), and Vernon Bartlet (HDB v. 442). Chief among these may be mentioned: Athanasius, Syntagma Doctrinæ, which is obviously dependent on Did. i.-vi., and less obviously on xii. xiii., the underlying text probably being the earlier recension ( $\Delta$ ); the pseudo-Athanasian Fides Nicæna and Didascalia cccviii. Patrum, where the basis is evidently the Syntagma; the Life of Schnudi, which includes most of the first part in an Arabic version, derived probably from the Apostolic Church Ordinance.

We have, therefore, continuing the numbers at the end of § 4, (5) Barnabas (B) and Hermas (H), dependent on the earlier Christian recension ( $\Delta$ ) and probably known to the maker of the final recension (D); (6) the Apostolic Church Ordinance (CO), possibly based on  $\Delta$ , but more probably on D + B; (7) the Apostolic Constitutions and Canons (A), clearly based on D; (8) the Syntagma (S) and dependent works based on the earlier recension ( $\Delta$ ).

The evidence, then, points with great probability, for it can never amount to demonstration, to (1) the circulation and use of two recensions of the Didache, an earlier and a later, which differ in the omission and inclusion respectively of i. 3-ii. 1 and in certain other ascertainable points of slight importance; (2) the gradual disappearance of the second part of the Didache in the two ways of (a) omission, as in B and L—in B, through lack of relevance, in L through lack of correspondence to actual conditions; (b) supersession by a complete recast of material to suit altered ecclesiastical conditions as in CO and A, and, it may be added, by omission and supersession jointly, as in S; (3) the fortunate preservation of a complete copy of the later of these recensions by a scribe whose full MS shows interest in what he conceived, generally rightly, to be genuine remains of Christian antiquity.

The general result may be tabulated thus:

6. Place of origin and date.—(1) Place.—Both place and date seem to assume importance when we begin to discuss the significance of the work in relation to the problems of the early Church. But this is true of the place only to a very limited extent. For, though it were proved to have originated in some more isolated community, yet its acceptance by so wide a circle would show that it was no mere reflexion of abnormal conditions which existed nowhere else. Most of the regions in which early Christianity had any hold have been suggested as the place of origin—Syria (in particular, Palestine), Egypt, Asia Minor, Thessalonica, Rome. But the great bulk of opinion is almost equally divided between Egypt and Syria. On behalf of Egypt it can be, and has been, urged that the earliest references and quotations belong to Egypt; that the work had there from an early date almost canonical authority, and was used freely from the time of Clement to that of Athanasius and later. On the other hand, the testimony of use from Syria, though less imposing, is also strong. Further, the form of the doxology in the Lord's Prayer has Egyptian affinities. It omits 'the kingdom' with the Sahidic version. But the doxology itself originated in Syria, and was thence adopted into Syrian texts of the NT (Westcott and Hort, NT, 1882, App. p. 9). Against the claim for Egypt there is what Schaff calls 'the insuperable objection'—the allusion to the broken bread having been scattered in grains 'upon the mountains.' But after all this only proves that this particular form of prayer here incorporated did not originate in Egypt, but in some hillier land. The objection is not 'insuperable,' but it has more weight than is commonly allowed, for later Egyptian works certainly felt the difficulty. ('Upon the mountains' is omitted in Apost. Const., and represented by 'upon this table' in the pseudo-Athanasian tract de Virginitate.) On behalf of Syria, in particular of Palestine, there can be urged the marked affinity of the Didache with the Epistle of James and other recognized products of Palestinian Christianity, and the fact that it must have arisen in a community where it was necessary to make decisive the distinction between themselves and non-Christian Jews, e.g. in the regulations about fasts (viii. 1). A multitude of lesser indications are urged on both sides, but it is quite unnecessary to make any decisive pronouncement in favour of either. The essential point is that, from an early date, it was accepted in both, in one or other recension, and therefore comes from the heart of a situation which could not be regarded as impossible, or even as irregular, in either.

(2) Date.—In regard to date, there has been the same wide divergence—dates having been suggested from A.D. 50 to 500—and the same substantial agreement. The great mass of opinion, however, is again divided, in somewhat unequal portions, between two periods—the larger number favouring a date between 80 and 100, and the smaller clinging firmly to a date between 120 and 160. Space forbids a detailed examination of the evidence. It may be said briefly, in regard to external evidence, that the earlier date is confirmed by such indications as the citation of the Didache as Scripture by Clement of Alexandria and the fact that it is an adaptation of a Jewish manual. Such an adaptation could only be made early. And one thing to be remembered is, that long before its actual discovery it had been assigned, necessarily on external evidence, by Grabe (1698) to the closing years of the 1st cent. or the very commencement of the 2nd. Internal evidence confirms this. The general correspondence of conditions with those of the Ascension of Isaiah (see HDB v. 448-9), the vivid contrast with Jewish customs, the simple nature of the liturgy, all point to this conclusion. Another point has been well made by Taylor (op. cit. p. 53), who says in regard to the rules for baptism contained in the Didache:

'That distinction should be made more rabbinico between the kinds of water to be used is one of the evidences of the Jewish origin and early date of the Teaching. Tertullian (de Bapt. 4) enumerates the various kinds, making no distinction (Nulla distinctio est, mari quis in stagno, flumine an fonte, lacu an alveo diluatur); whilst at a still later date we find merely the injunction to baptize in water (Apost. Const. vii. 22).'

But if Barnabas and Hermas had influence on the text of our Didache, we seem driven to some such conclusion as this—that the earlier Christian recension dates from the earlier period (80-100) and the later, which differs only in certain insignificant details, from the later (120-160).

7. Tendency.—Before we go on to discuss the evidence of the Didache, and the bearings of that evidence on the problems of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic Church, we have to face this question: Has the Didache any special purpose or tendency which would lead us to suspect or to discredit its evidence? In this connexion we encounter first the contention of Hilgenfeld that it is coloured by Montanism. But the general discussion to which the book gave a great impetus has made clear that it must be pre-Montanist. For if Montanism had arisen, and its problems had to be faced, then this book, if produced in the orthodox interest, would have said much less about the prophets, and if written from a Montanist point of view, it could not have resisted saying more. Krawtzwsky, who had so fully anticipated the first part of the Didache in his reconstruction, assigned it, on its appearance, to an Ebionite heretic at the close of the 2nd century. But searching criticism has failed to discern any clear trace of that heresy. It has been characterized, on obvious grounds, as pro-Judaistic and anti-Judaistic, which implies that it preserves the balance of normal Christianity. Research has failed to displace it from the main current of the Church's life. No writer with a predilection for any early heresy could have hidden it so well, nor would his book have commanded such universal recognition.

In this connexion mention must be made of the contention of Armitage Robinson that the book reflects no actual conditions which ever existed anywhere, but is a 'free creation' of the author working on the basis of 1 Cor. with close dependence on Matthew and John. But it is surely unthinkable that any Christian writer could have produced a manual which had hardly any correspondence with the conditions of the Church of which he was a member and just as little with the conditions of the Church of the NT, and with no suggestion of substituting a new ideal of Church life and government. The Didache certainly has its roots in the NT; it also has its dissimilarities from it; but that is because the Christianity familiar to its author had its roots in the NT, but had in the meantime grown to something different. The Didache represents an actual stage in the development through which the Church passed. The purpose of its author was evidently to represent, justify, and confirm actual conditions, and to guard against evident dangers.

8. Church conditions.—It is a simple community with which we are brought into contact in the Didache, without the developed organization and manifold official activity of the communities for which the later bodies of legislation were compiled (see art. APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS). The instructions, even in regard to baptism and the Eucharist, are addressed to the community, and not to any official personage or class of officials. The 'sovereignty of the community' is implied throughout. Attempts have been made to evade this. The latest has been already referred to (JThSt xiii. 339 ff.). The significance of the address is here discounted as a mere trick of style, borrowed from the practice of St. Paul. But this stands or falls with the whole theory that the Didache is a 'free creation' of the author with no relation to actual conditions, a theory which we have just shown good ground for rejecting. No work which passed over and slighted the recognized position of accredited officials could have found such general currency and acquired such wide repute. The community, therefore, is sovereign. It tests travellers and prophets; it makes provision for the Christian poor; it sets apart 'bishops and deacons'; it exercises discipline; the Sacraments of the Church are its concern. It is obviously a small community, but not isolated or out of touch with the general body of Christians. It is knit to them by the golden thread of hospitality, by the visits of itinerant apostles and prophets, by the unity of the one bread. It is situated in a locality where Christianity is past its first beginnings. The missionary propaganda of the Church is now further afield. Apostles are known only as exceptional visitants on the way to their proper spheres of labour elsewhere. Though past its first beginnings, it is not yet beyond the possibility of being taken by outsiders for a mere phase of Judaism. Open divergence of practice in outward ordinances is, therefore, strongly emphasized. The moral requirements of the community are of the highest order, but its doctrinal position, though strictly orthodox, is wanting in precision and fullness. The lack of emphasis on soteriology seems to have been felt by Barnabas, who, followed in this respect by the Apostolic Church Ordinance, added to the opening words of the Way of Life—'Thou shalt love God who made thee'—the words, 'Thou shalt glorify Him who redeemed thee from death.'

The members meet on the Lord's Day for worship. Here we have the first testimony outside the NT to the Lord's Day as a day of public worship. A little later Pliny reports to Trajan from Bithynia that the Christians there were accustomed on a fixed day (stato die) to assemble before daylight to sing hymns to Christ as a God, and to bind themselves by a sacramentum. On every detail of this report we have fresh light from the Didache. Worship is on the Lord's Day. It consists in the breaking of bread, giving of thanks, and confession of sins—the sacramentum (?). And the Eucharist (see below) has as one of its closing sentences, 'Hosanna to the God of David'—a hymn to Christ as a God.

Baptism is the rite of initiation. 'Living water,' i.e. water of spring or stream, is to be preferred to other kinds, but even warm water is allowed in exceptional circumstances. Immersion is normal, but, where the water is insufficient, affusion is permissible. The rite is administered after a definite course of instruction, and always in the Name of the Trinity. The candidate for baptism is to fast beforehand. Fasting, recommended to the baptizer and those associated with him, is enjoined on the baptized. No mention is made of any anointing, or the use of anything save water.

The Eucharist is the centre of Christian worship, but the evidence of the Didache has proved a bone of contention. Instructions in regard to it seem to be given twice over, in chs. ix. x, and in ch. xiv. It is with regard to the former instructions that difficulties emerge and controversies have arisen. The instructions are thus introduced: 'Now as regards the Eucharist (the Thank-offering) give thanks after this manner' (περί δὲ τῆς εὐχαριστίας, οὕτω εὐχαριστήσατε). Forms of prayer are given, simple and non-theological.

'We thank Thee, our Father, for the holy vine of David Thy servant, which Thou hast made known to us through Jesus, Thy servant [παῖς]: to Thee be the glory for ever.'

'We thank Thee, our Father, for the life and knowledge which Thou hast made known to us through Jesus, Thy servant. To Thee be the glory for ever. As this broken bread was scattered [in grains] upon the mountains and being gathered together became one, so let Thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth unto Thy Kingdom: for Thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever.'

The former is given for the cup (ποτήριον), the latter for the broken bread (κλάσμα), and there is another form, similar in thought and diction but longer, for the close, after being filled (μετὰ το ἐμπλησθῆναι).

The difficulties in regard to these two chapters arise in this way. There is no trace of the words of institution, and there seems no room for them. Were these simple prayers meant as consecration prayers? Were they meant for the use of the presiding brother at all, or were they written to be used by the recipient (so Box, JThSt iii. 367 f.)? Why does the thanksgiving for the cup come before the thanksgiving for the bread? Why are these words, which sound like an invitation to the Table, placed at the very end—'If any one is holy, let him come; if any one is not holy, let him repent'? And why does the previous chapter end with a similar 'fencing of the tables,' given in the very midst of the forms of prayer ('let no one eat or drink of your Eucharist except those who have been baptized into the name of the Lord')? What do the words μετὰ το ἐμπλησθῆναι imply? Are they to be interpreted in a literal or spiritual fashion? Finally, why was it necessary to give instructions about the Eucharist in ch. xiv., if these had already been given in detail in chs. ix. and x.?

Beginning with the last question, it has been suggested (V. Ermoni, L'Agape dans l'Eglise primitive, 1904, p. 17 ff.) that the first instructions refer to the Agape, and the Agape alone. But there is no other case in which any writer uses the word εὐχαριστία in the sense of the Agape alone. All the indications point to a combined Agape and Eucharist, and the word εὐχαριστία refers to this combination, i.e. it includes the Agape, just as in Ignatius (Smyrn. 8) the word Agape has the same meaning, i.e. it includes the Eucharist. The words were never interchangeable, but either, it seems, might be used of the combined celebration. The probability, then, being that these chapters refer to such a combination, can we disentangle the Agape from the Eucharist? Are they inextricably mingled, or can we see that one preceded the other? Certain of the questions asked above seem to point to the former alternative, but the balance of evidence is with the latter, and points to the Agape preceding the Eucharist. The words 'after being filled' seem to shut us in to that. The attempt to find true analogies to a spiritual or mystical interpretation has failed. In 6th, so often appealed to, makes for the opposite view. And the author of the Apostolic Constitutions, who was dealing with the Eucharist only, has to alter the words to 'after reception' (μετὰ δὲ τὴν μετάληψιν). The prayers already given for the cup and the bread refer, then, to the Agape: the 'fencing of the tables' at the end of ch. ix. is preparatory to the Eucharist proper; the prayer in ch. x. is the transition, the closing prayer of the Agape, or the opening prayer of the Eucharist, according to the point of view; the Eucharist follows immediately on the prayer. No formula is given for it. The words of institution may then have been recited. At both Agape and Eucharist the prophets are to have full liberty in prayer. The closing invitation is to catechumens present to come forward to the full privilege and duties of Church membership. One grave objection to this interpretation is that it presupposes a simple liturgy for the Agape and none at all, or practically none, for the Eucharist. A priori, we expect the exact opposite. But no other explanation seems to satisfy nearly so many of the conditions. Further, absence of fixed forms is characteristic of the Eucharist even later. Justin Martyr (First Apology, 65-67) tells us that the presiding official (ὁ προεστώς) offers prayers and thanksgivings according to his ability (ὅση δύναμις αὐτῷ).

The Agape, then, in this small community, is combined with the Eucharist. It is a common meal shared by the brethren, with a simple liturgy of its own, Jewish in origin, with marked affinity to Jewish blessings at meals. It is followed by the Eucharist so closely that it is all one service. None but the baptized participate. Forms are lacking, as a member of the charismatic ministry seems in general to preside, and he is to be left free to follow the promptings of the Spirit. Catechumens and members under discipline are not excluded from the place of celebration. On the contrary, they are expected to be present, and are urged publicly to acquire or recover the right of participation. The Eucharist is a sacrifice (θυσία), and the words of Malachi are taken as a prophecy of it, 'In every place and time offer me a pure sacrifice, for I am a great King, saith the Lord.' But this does not indicate, as Bickell thought, the germ of the doctrine of the Mass, nor what is technically known as the Eucharistic Sacrifice. The sacrifice, as all approximately contemporary use of the word confirms, consists in the prayers, the praises, the worship, and the gifts of believers (see ERE v. 546 f.).

There is no trace of a Christian year in the Didache, but there is a Christian week. The Lord's Day is the day of worship; Wednesday and Friday are fasts. The only evident reason for the choice of these days is the necessity of being distinct in all things from the 'hypocrites'—the unbelieving Jews—who fast on Mondays and Thursdays; but the real underlying reason may have been that which was put forward later for these days as semi-fasts, viz. that Wednesday was the day of the Betrayal and Friday that of the Crucifixion. There is also what may be called a Christian day. The beginnings of a certain formalism in devotional exercises appear in the injunction to pray, using the Lord's Prayer, three times a day. This, too, is founded on Jewish practice. No definite hours are named, and therefore no change of hour is suggested. Tertullian, later, prescribes definite hours. Christians are to pray at the third, sixth, and ninth hours, in addition to the ordinary morning and evening prayers of which no Christian needs to be reminded. These devotions are to include the Lord's Prayer (de Orat. xxv., x.). Clement of Alexandria, in the work in which he cites the Didache as Scripture, though he knows, and, to some extent, commends, the three hours of prayer, rather disparages the adherence to these definite hours. 'The γνωστικός prays throughout his whole life, endeavouring by prayer to have fellowship with God' (Strom. vii. 7).

It was in its account of the office-bearers of the Church and the nature of the ministry that the recovered Didache produced the most profound impression. Accounts of origins and development like Lightfoot's were greatly strengthened in most particulars, but others received from it a fatal stroke. The details and even the general trend of these controversies lie outside the scope of this article. Our attention is confined to the evidence of the Didache itself. Even in its first section it puts a very high value on the ministry. The catechumens is enjoined to 'remember night and day him that speaks to thee the word of God, for whosoever the Lordship is spoken of, there is the Lord.' Who are included among those that speak the word of God? The reference plainly is, in the first place, to the unlocalized or charismatic ministry, which occupies so large a place in the part dealing with office-bearers. This ministry is not appointed by the members of the Church, their office is transmitted through no human channel. They comprise only the first three of St. Paul's list in 1 Co 12<sup>8</sup>—apostles, prophets, and teachers.

The apostles are evidently, as already said, rare visitants. The missionary work of the Church is elsewhere. But every apostle who pays a visit is to be received as the Lord. He is not to remain longer than two days, for impostors are rife, and the desire to live for longer than two days on the generosity of the community and in the sunshine of its favour, is a sure sign of a false prophet. The genuine apostle will not ask for money, nor take with him more than the necessary food for the next stage of his journey. Prophets are more common, but are held in high esteem. The true prophet is not to be tried or proved; his word is to be accepted as that of one who speaks in the Spirit. He is to be free from the rules and forms that bind other men. But abuses have crept into the prophetic office, and counterfeit prophets are to be detected by their behaviour, especially by their asking for money for themselves, or ordering an Agape for their own benefit. A prophet may wish to connect himself with a particular community. Such a settled prophet is worthy of support. First-fruits are to be set aside for the use of these men, for, in this respect, they are like the high priests of the Jews. There were communities without any resident prophet. In such the first-fruits were to be given directly to the poor. An obscure sentence about the prophet 'making assemblies for a worldly mystery' or 'acting with a view to the worldly mystery of the Church' (even the translation is doubtful) has, as yet, received no satisfactory interpretation. Little is said about the third class of the general ministry, the teachers. They too are worthy of support. This implies that there were both peripatetic and settled teachers. The slightness of the reference cannot be due to their rarity. May it not be due to the following? It is commonly argued that the Shepherd of Hermas passed over the prophets because its author belonged to that order. May it not equally be that the Didache says little about the teachers for a similar reason? The very name of his work would indicate that its author was numbered among the teachers.

In addition to this ministry to the whole Church, there is a local ministry of bishops and deacons. They are appointed and set apart by the local church. Their authority is, thus, not directly derived from the Holy Spirit. They are in danger of being despised, but are to be honoured along with the prophets and teachers. Such is the character of the ministry as known to the author of the Didache. It shows us the local ministry strengthening its position in a small community and in need of having its position strengthened, while the general ministry is fading into the background through the prevalence of plausible counterfeits from mercenary motives. (For fuller discussion of the significance of all this see Harnack, TU ii. 1, 2, pp. 93-157; C. H. Turner, Studies in Early Church History, 1912, pp. 1-32; T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry, 1902, esp. p. 170 ff.)

With such a full-length picture of contemporary Church conditions, it is not remarkable that the Didache was hailed as a most important find. At times its importance may have been over-estimated, but it certainly fills a blank in our knowledge. It sets clearly before us facts which might have been, and indeed were, reached by gathering together the scattered and less definite indications of other works. It sketches the nature of the work, the worship, and the ministry in one community which, though small, was not isolated; though doubtless individual, was not peculiar. It gave the initial impulse to works of a similar character without which our knowledge of the early centuries in these matters would be much more meagre than it is.

DIOSCURI (Ac 28<sup>11</sup>, RVm; AV 'Castor and Pollux,' RV 'the Twin Brothers').—The Dioscuri were the sons of Leda and Zeus, Castor being mortal and Pollux immortal. They were famed for many exploits, and at length, in a battle against the sons of Aphareus, Castor was slain by Idas. Pollux besought Zeus that he too might die. According to one fable the Father of the Gods granted Castor life on condition that the brothers should alternately spend a day in Hades, but another states that their love was rewarded by Zeus, who placed them together among the stars as the Gemini. They were regarded as the patrons of athletic contests, Castor presiding over the equestrian events, Pollux being the god of boxing (Κάστορα δ' ἱππόμεμον καὶ πῶς ἀγαθὸν Πολυδεῦκα [Hom. Il. iii. 237]). Their worship was very strictly observed among the Dorian peoples, and they were also held in special reverence at Rome, as they were popularly supposed to have fought on the side of the Commonwealth at the battle of Lake Regillus and to have carried the news of victory to the city (Dion. Hal. Ant. Rom. vi. 13). It is worthy of note that they were specially held in honour in the district of Cyrenaica near Alexandria (schol. Pindar, Pyth. v. 6).

The ships of the ancients carried two figures as a rule, one being the figure-head (παράσημον, insigne), after which the ship was named (Virgil, Æn. v. 116, x. 166, 188, 209), and the other in the stern. The latter was the tutela or image of the divine being under whose guardianship the vessel was supposed to sail. The Dioscuri were regarded as the guardian deities of sailors, and Horace speaks of 'the brothers of Helen, the beaming stars,' as shining propitiously on those at sea (Odes, i. iii. 2, xii. 25; cf. Catullus, iv. 27; Euripides, Helena, 1662-5).

DIOTREPES.—An otherwise unknown man named in 3 Jn<sup>9</sup> as ambitious, masterful, and tyrannical. As the authorship of the Epistle, its destination, and date are all doubtful, any attempt to identify Diotrepes is futile. His main interest for the student of the Apostolic Church is that he is a witness to the opposite currents of thought which disturbed it. The writer of 3 John was apparently responsible for a band of travelling evangelists to whom Diotrepes refused a welcome. The ground of refusal appears, from the references to 'truth' in the Epistle, to have been a difference of doctrine. If the writer was a 'pneumatic' teacher, Diotrepes would probably be a Catholic officer of influence, but of lower standing than the writer. If the writer, on the other hand, was a Catholic teacher, Diotrepes was probably a man of Docetic views. The name occurs in profane Greek twice—once as son of Heraclitus in the 3rd cent. B.C., and once as the name of an Antiochene rhetorician (Pauly-Wissowa, s.v.).

DISCIPLE.—The use of the word 'disciple' (μαθητής) in the NT is remarkable and very instructive. It occurs 238 times in the Gospels. In the Epistles and the Apocalypse it does not occur at all, its place being taken by 'saints' (ἅγιοι) and 'brethren' (ἀδελφοί). Acts exhibits the transition, with 'disciple' (μαθητής) 28 times and the feminine form (μαθητρια) once, but with 'saints' 4 times (9<sup>13</sup>, 22, 41, 26<sup>10</sup>) and 'brethren' (not counting addresses, and mostly in the second half of the book) about 32 times. In Acts, 'believers' (πιστεύοντες, πιστεύσαντες, πεπιστευκότες) is another frequent equivalent. The explanation of the change from 'disciple' to the other terms is simple. During His life on earth, the followers of Jesus were called 'disciples' in reference to Him; afterwards they were called 'saints' in reference to their sacred calling, or 'brethren' in relation to one another (Sanday, Inspiration<sup>8</sup>, 1896, p. 289). In Acts, the first title is going out of use, and the others are coming in; in ch. 9 all three terms are found. Christ's charge, 'Make disciples of all the nations' (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>), may have helped to keep 'disciple' in use.

'Disciple' means more than one who listens to a teacher; it implies his acceptance of the teaching, and his effort to act in accordance with it; it implies being a 'believer' in the teacher and being ready to be an 'imitator' (μιμητής) of him (Xen. Mem. i. vi. 3). It is remarkable that St. Paul does not call his converts his 'disciples'—that might seem to be taking the place of Christ (1 Co 1<sup>13-15</sup>); but he speaks of them as his 'imitators.' In the Gospels, 'disciple' is often used in a special sense of the Twelve, and sometimes of the followers of human teachers—Moses, or John the Baptist, or the Pharisees. Neither use is found in Acts: in 19<sup>1</sup>, 'disciples' does not mean disciples of John, as is shown by 'when ye believed' (πιστευσαντες), that is, 'when ye became Christians,' which is the dominant meaning of this verb in Acts. These 'disciples' were imperfectly instructed Christians.

DISCIPLINE.—The root meaning of 'discipline' is 'instruction,' but in course of time it came to be used for 'moral training,' 'chastening,' 'punishment.' The subject naturally divides itself into two parts: (1) the spiritual discipline of the soul; (2) the ecclesiastical discipline of offenders.

1. The training necessary for the discipline of the soul.—This may be under the guidance of another or under one's own direction.—(a) In order to develop and perfect man's moral nature, God deals with him as a wise father with a child. The benefit of such treatment is pointed out in He 12<sup>1-13</sup> (cf. Mt 5<sup>10-12</sup>). Its final efficacy depends upon the spirit in which it is received. The motive for its endurance must be right, and the end in view must be clearly perceived. The Heavenly Father does more than simply teach His children; He disciplines them with more (cf. Pr 3<sup>11</sup>, Job 5<sup>17</sup>) or less severity (cf. Pr 12<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>). If the Author of Salvation was made perfect through sufferings (He 2<sup>10</sup>; cf. 5<sup>8f</sup> 7-8, Lk 13<sup>32</sup>), it is clear that the 'many sons' must pass through the same process and experience as the 'well-beloved Son.' In their case the need is the more urgent, for latent powers must be developed, lack of symmetry corrected, the stains of sin removed, evil tendencies eradicated. Errors in doctrine and action must be transformed into truth and righteousness (1 Co 11<sup>7ff</sup>, 2 Jn 10<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>16f</sup>; cf. Tit 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>9-13</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>6</sup>). Body and mind can move towards perfection only under the guiding hand of the Holy Father. Pain and sorrow, frustrated hopes, long delays, loneliness, changed circumstances, persecution, the death of loved ones, and other 'dispensations of Providence,' are designed to chasten and ennoble the soul. Character, not creed, is the final aim. Having begun a good work in His children, God will 'perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1<sup>8</sup>).

(b) The Christian must also discipline himself. Through the crucifixion of his lower nature he rises into newness of life. St. Paul describes (Tit 2<sup>12</sup>) the negative side as 'denying ungodliness and worldly lusts,' and the positive as to 'live soberly, and righteously, and godly in this present world' ('sobrie erga nos; iuste erga proximum; pie erga Deum' [St. Bernard, Sermon xi., Paris, 1667-90]); see Ro 12<sup>9</sup>, Tit 2<sup>12</sup>; cf. 2 Ti 2<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>;

also Lk 17<sup>5</sup>, Ac 17<sup>30</sup> 24<sup>25</sup>. The Christian must put away anger, bitterness, clamour, covetousness, envy, evil-speaking, falsehood, fornication, guile, hypocrisy, malice, railing, shameful speaking, uncleanness, wrath (Eph 4<sup>17-32</sup>, Col 3<sup>8-11</sup>; cf. Ja 1<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>1</sup>). Then he must acquire and mature positive virtues. This involves at every stage self-discipline (see Ro 6<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>25ff</sup>, Col 3<sup>5</sup>; cf. Mt 5<sup>29</sup> 18<sup>9</sup>, Mk 9<sup>47</sup>, Gal 5<sup>24</sup>).

Many elements enter into this discipline of self. Amongst others the following deserve special mention: prayer, 'the hallowing of desire, by carrying it up to the fountain of holiness' (J. Morison, Com. on St. Matthew<sup>9</sup>, 1885, p. 89); see Ro 12<sup>12</sup>; cf. Ac 1<sup>14</sup>, Eph 6<sup>18</sup>, Col 4<sup>2-4</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>7</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>41</sup>, Lk 18<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>36</sup>. Fasting is frequently associated with prayer: e.g. Ac 13<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>, Did. vii. 4, viii. 1, and many other passages. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 122) speaks of the solemn prayer and fast which accompanied the appointment of the elders, and says that 'this meeting and rite of fasting, which Paul celebrated in each city on his return journey, is to be taken as the form that was to be permanently observed.' Sobriety in thought and action is commended (Ro 12<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1 P 4<sup>7</sup> [Gr.], 1 Th 5<sup>6, 8</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>9, 15</sup>; cf. Sir 18<sup>30</sup> [Gr.]); watchfulness (Ac 24<sup>15</sup>, Ro 8<sup>19, 23</sup>, 1 Co 17<sup>16</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>18</sup>, Eph 6<sup>18</sup>, Col 4<sup>2</sup>, Tit 2<sup>13</sup>, He 13<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>7</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>12</sup>; cf. Mt 24<sup>42</sup> 26<sup>41</sup>, Mk 13<sup>33</sup>, Lk 21<sup>36</sup>); obedience (Ro 13<sup>1-7</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>6</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>1-3</sup>, Tit 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>13, 14</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup> 3-2); patience (Ro 5<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>25</sup> 15<sup>4</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>3-5</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, He 10<sup>36</sup>, Ja 1<sup>3</sup>; cf. Mt 10<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>13</sup>, Lk 21<sup>19</sup>); conflict against error and evil forces and on behalf of the truth (Eph 6<sup>11-18</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>18-20</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>3, 4</sup> 4<sup>7f</sup>, Philem<sup>2</sup>, Jude<sup>3</sup>); work (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>, Eph 4<sup>28</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>8-12</sup>); almsgiving (Ac 24<sup>17</sup>, Ro 12<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>25-26</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1-4</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>6</sup>, Gal 6<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>17-19</sup>, He 13<sup>16</sup>, Ja 2<sup>15, 16</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>17</sup>; cf. Mt 6<sup>19, 20</sup>, To 4<sup>7-11</sup>); temperance (Ac 24<sup>25</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Gal 5<sup>3</sup>; cf. Sir 18<sup>30</sup> [Gr.], Tit 1<sup>8</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>6</sup>); chastity (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Gal 5<sup>24</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>; cf. Sir 18<sup>30</sup>); meekness (Ro 12<sup>10</sup>, Eph 4<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>, Ph 2<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>11</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>5, 6</sup>).

In Ph 4<sup>8</sup> and 2 P 1<sup>4-8</sup> there are inspiring directions for this same self-discipline. 'If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise,' the brethren are to 'think on,' or 'take account of,' 'whatsoever things are true, honourable, just, pure, lovely, of good report.' If men are to become partakers of the Divine nature, and to escape the corruption that is in the world by lust, they must heed the injunction: 'For this very cause adding on your part all diligence, in your faith supply virtue; and in your virtue knowledge; and in your knowledge temperance; and in your temperance patience; and in your patience godliness; and in your godliness love of the brethren; and in your love of the brethren love' (see also 1 Co 13 and 1 Jn 4<sup>6</sup>). This will save from idleness and unfruitfulness. They will give the more diligence to make their calling and election sure.

No doubt the expectation in the Apostolic Age of the cataclysmic and immediate coming of Christ led to rigour and austerity of life, which were afterwards relaxed in many places. The moral necessity of discipline is always the same, even though the power of belief in the second coming of Christ in spectacular fashion wanes or departs. After the close of the 1st cent. the development of asceticism and penance became pronounced. The NT gives little or no countenance to the extreme forms that these disciplinary systems assumed.

2. Ecclesiastical discipline.—For self-protection and self-assertion the early Church had to exercise a strict discipline. Its well-being and very life depended upon the suppression of abuses and the expulsion of persistent and gross offenders. In some cases toleration would have meant unfaith-fulness to Christ and degradation to the community. The duty of maintaining an adequate discipline was one of the most difficult and most important tasks that confronted the primitive Ecclesia. Jesus Himself gave to the apostles (Mt 18<sup>18-19</sup>, Jn 20<sup>22-23</sup>) and to the Church (Mt 18<sup>15-18</sup>) a disciplinary charter. The Church followed the main lines of guidance therein contained. Only public sins were dealt with in the ecclesiastical courts. Private offences were to be confessed to each other (Ja 5<sup>16</sup>), that prayer might be offered for forgiveness (5<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup>), and also confessed to God (1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). Further, Christians were discouraged from carrying disputes to the civil courts (1 Co 6<sup>1</sup>; cf. 5<sup>1-6</sup>). 'Let not those who have disputes go to law before the civil powers, but let them by all means be reconciled by the leaders of the Church, and let them rightly yield to their decision' (see Clem. Ep. ad Jacob., 10). The object of ecclesiastical discipline was to prevent scandal and to restore the offender. When private rebuke and remonstrance failed (Mt 18<sup>15</sup>; cf. 1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>), the wrong-doer was censured by the whole community (cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>20</sup>, Gal 2<sup>11</sup>). This sentence might be pronounced by some person in authority, or by the community as community. If the accused person still remained obdurate, and in the case of heinous sin, the Church proceeded to expulsion and excommunication (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>2, 11, 13, 9</sup> Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). The offender was thrust out from religious gatherings and debarred from social intercourse. To such excommunication might be added the further penalty of physical punishment (Ac 5<sup>1-10</sup> 3<sup>24</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>20</sup>) or an anathema (ἀνάθεμα, 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>9</sup>). Knowing the great influence of the mind over the body, one can readily understand that disease, and even death, might follow such sentences. It was fully believed that the culprit was exposed, without defence, to the attacks of Satan (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>).

The whole Church exercised this power of discipline. St. Paul addresses the community in 1 Cor., which is our earliest guide on the subject. Laymen on occasion could teach, preach, and exercise disciplinary powers. In the case of excommunication it was not necessary that there should be unanimity. A majority vote was sufficient (2 Co 2<sup>5</sup>). It was believed that Christ was actually present (Mt 18<sup>20</sup>) to confirm the sentence, which was pronounced in His name (1 Co 5<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>10</sup>).

No doubt the procedure followed in the main that of the synagogue, where expulsion was of three types—simple putting forth, excommunication with a curse, and a final anathema sentence. Discipline was designed to be reformatory and not simply punitive or retaliatory. There must be, if possible, 'rectification' (see 2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, where ἐπιστροφὴς is significantly joined with παιδεία). Repentance is to be followed by forgiveness (2 Co 2<sup>5-10</sup>, Gal 6<sup>1</sup>, Jude<sup>24</sup>). The penitent was probably received into the Church again by the imposition of hands (cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>5</sup>).

Owing to persecution, the discipline of the Church became more and more simply moral influence. The demand for it was more urgent than ever; but, while some communities remained faithful to this duty, others grew more lax (e.g. the practice of obtaining libelli).

DISPERSION.—ἡ διασπορά (from διασπέρω 'to scatter,' as ἀγορά from ἀγείρω 'to gather') is used collectively in the LXX and the NT for the Jews settled abroad. The most important NT reference occurs in Jn 7<sup>35</sup>: 'Whither will this man go that we shall not find him? Will he go unto the Diaspora among the Gentiles, and teach the Gentiles?' This splenetic utterance was an unconscious prophecy of the course our Lord actually followed, when, having reached the goal of His public ministry, and having received 'all authority in heaven and on earth,' He went on 'to make disciples of all the nations.'* The first line of advance was already marked out by the Diaspora. It was the bridge between the Jew and the Greek, and soon the sound of many feet speeding over it with their message of good tidings was heard; or it was the viaduct by which the living waters that went forth from Jerusalem were led to the cities of the Roman Empire.

The Diaspora partly originated from causes over which the Jews had no control, and was partly the result of a spontaneous movement outwards. It was largely due to the policy adopted by the great conquerors of antiquity of deporting into exile a considerable number of the population of the countries which they subdued. The various transplantations suffered by the Jews need not be recounted here. But their dispersion was still more largely due, in Greek and Roman times, to voluntary emigration from Palestine. The conquests of Alexander the Great turned what had hitherto been barred avenues and dangerous tracks into safe and open roads, and the Jews were not slow to take advantage of the openings, both in the direction of secular culture and of commercial enterprise, that lay before them. In NT times, they were domiciled in all the countries along the shores of the Mediterranean. The accounts of Philo and Josephus, of which the substantial accuracy is attested by inscriptions (HDB v. 92<sup>a</sup>), enable us to see how much at home the Jews were in Syria, Egypt, Asia Minor, and the Greek cities and islands, and all the data now available afford grounds for believing that they numbered at this period from three to four and a half millions, and that they formed about seven per cent of the population of the Roman Empire (EBi i. 1112; Harnack, Mission and Expansion<sup>2</sup>, i. 10, 11).

Following Jeremiah's advice to the exiles in Babylon, they 'sought the peace' of the cities they settled in, without, however, amalgamating with the other inhabitants. The dislike created by their aloofness gave way a little before the involuntary respect commanded by their intelligence, their aptitude for work, and their exemplary family life, but was never completely overcome. Yet they had the art of conciliating the great, and of gaining powerful patrons. Several of the Syrian and Egyptian kings were their warm friends. Amongst their friends must also be included Julius Caesar, who with the prescience of genius saw in them the true connecting link between the East and West, and would not have relished their being made the butt of Roman wits. Their mourning for his death ('noctibus continuis bustum frequentarunt,' Suet. C. Julius Caesar, 84) reminds us of the mourning of the Jews in London for Edward VII.

The Jews could not carry on their sacrificial worship in foreign lands—we may let pass the schismatic attempt to do so at Leontopolis in Egypt—but they kept in full communion with Jerusalem by making pilgrimages to the great feasts, and by sending the yearly poll-tax of half a shekel for the upkeep of the Temple (cf. Mt 17<sup>24</sup>). 'The Law and the Prophets and the Psalms' went with them everywhere, but 'in the Greek Diaspora . . . strict canonicity was accorded only to the Torah' (ERE ii. 580<sup>b</sup>). The observance which attracted most notice from their Gentile neighbours was that of the Sabbath rest. On the day of rest all classes of the Diaspora were 'gathered into one,' and felt that they were indeed 'the people of the God of Abraham.'

That Julius Cæsar had regarded them as his friends was not forgotten by those who came after him. It was a precedent that proved of immense advantage to the Jews settled in Rome. The freedom he granted them in the exercise of their religious customs was endorsed by his grand-nephew Augustus (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10, xvi. 6), and, after weathering some dangerous storms, became the settled policy of the Empire. In Roman law, Jewish societies were collegia licita, privileged clubs or guilds. Meetings in their synagogues, or προσευχαι, or σάββατεια (op. cit. xvi. 6.2) were not hampered with any troublesome restrictions. They could settle matters pertaining to their law without going to the Roman tribunal (cf. Ac 18<sup>14-15</sup>), and were apparently permitted to inflict punishment for what they looked upon as schism or apostasy (Ac 26<sup>11</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>24</sup>). They had a coinage of their own for sacred purposes (HDB v. 57<sup>a</sup>). In the region beyond the Tiber, 'in the neighbourhood of the wharfs where the barges from Ostia were accustomed to unload' (F. W. Farrar, Life and Work of St. Paul, 1 vol., 1897, p. 585), many of them found employment, or drove a brisk trade. The only occasion on which they were seriously threatened with the loss of their privileges occurred under Claudius, who, in the words of the historian, 'Iudæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit' (Suet. Claud. 25). The meaning of these words is uncertain (HDB iv. 307<sup>a</sup>, v. 98<sup>a</sup>; EB i. 757; JE iv. 563; Gwatkin, Early Church Hist. i. 40; Zahn, Introd. to NT, i. 433), but if they refer to tumults in the Jewish quarter caused by the preaching of the gospel, we may conjecture that Aquila, a Jew of the Dispersion, had been one of its preachers (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>). The edict of Claudius was probably found unworkable (Ramsay, St. Paul, 254). This Emperor seems to have been as favourable to the Jews as his predecessors (Jos. Ant. xix. 5. 2, 3).

Long before they had acquired a political status in Rome, a great inward change had been working among the Jews of the Dispersion. As may be inferred from the fact already mentioned, that strict canonicity was accorded only to the Torah, they carried abroad with them an intensely legal conception of their religion. It was conceived as consisting simply in the observance of a definite code of laws as to worship and life, given by God on Mount Sinai. So long as this conception predominated, their relations with their non-Jewish neighbours were little more than ordinary business relations. But as soon as the stimulus exerted by the higher culture of the Greeks was felt, an inward change began to work. Habitual intercourse with a people so advanced in civilization could not fail to have its effect. They were captivated by the freedom and range of Greek thought. They recognized in their philosophical and ethical ideas a manifestation of the Divine Wisdom. There was thus evolved a tendency to tone down what was repellent in Judaism in order to bring their faith into harmony with the Greek mind. Illustrations of this tendency are found in the Prophetic and Wisdom literature, in the modification of OT anthropomorphism by the LXX, in the serious attempt of Philo to find the philosophy of Plato and the Stoics in the narratives of Genesis by the method of allegorical interpretation (HDB v. 199). The LXX itself was the outcome of the keen desire to make their religion understood, as well as to guard and preserve it from influences hostile to it. The favourable reception which it met with brought to the front an aspect of their religion yet scarcely apprehended, viz. that it was a religion of hope for mankind. The words of the prophets concerning the future of the human race began to be read with a more open mind. There it was found that Israel was called to be the missionary to the nations. Many in the Dispersion realized that they were in a specially favoured position for undertaking this missionary duty. In spreading the knowledge of their faith, they laid stress, not upon ritual details, but upon the great central principles of the unity of God, and the cleansing and saving power of His word. As they went on communicating those spiritual principles to others, they became more spiritual themselves, and also more expectant of 'the good things to come.' A large number of high-minded Greeks were convinced of the truth of their doctrine of God. Those whom they won over, the σεβόμενοι or φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν of the Apostolic Age, were already far on their way to the more complete satisfaction of their spiritual wants that was to be found in Christianity.

From the founding of Alexandria and Antioch, the Jews were πολῖται (cives), but in the older Greek cities, except those of which the constitutions were altered by Alexander or his successors (HDB v. 104 f.; Expositor, 7th ser., ii. 37 f.), they were simply μέτοικοι (incolæ, 'residents'). The Jews of Rome whom Cicero mentions as possessing the Roman civitas (pro Flacco, 28) probably belonged to the class of libertini or enfranchised slaves (cf. Ac 6<sup>9</sup>). Jews of Ephesus, Sardis, Delos, etc., had the Roman civitas, as appears from the edicts preserved by Josephus (Ant. xiv. 10). St. Paul's citizenship (q.v.) of the Hellenistic city of Tarsus (Ac 21<sup>39</sup>) is to be distinguished from his Roman citizenship (Ac 22<sup>3</sup>; cf. 16<sup>37</sup>). The latter right may have been conferred by some Roman potentate on certain important Tarsian families (Ramsay, Expositor, 7th ser., ii. 144, 152; cf. Schürer, HDB v. 105 f.). It was not the least important of St. Paul's providential equipments for the Apostleship, and was recognized as entitling him to respect from Roman officials. The laws of the Empire had a high moral value for the Apostle, and he repaid what he owed to them by fervent intercessions for those who administered them (Ro 13<sup>1-7</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>1-2</sup>).

In St. Paul himself—his training, his conversion, his missionary calling, his Christian achievement—we can study, as in a single picture, the service rendered by the Dispersion to the free course of the gospel. Himself a Jew of the Dispersion, educated in a strict Rabbinical school, he had the two-fold advantage of becoming proficient in Judaism, the religion of his fathers (Gal 1<sup>13</sup>), and of growing up in his Cilician home under the penetrating influence of Greek civilization. The question of Ro 3<sup>9</sup>, 'Is God the God of the Jews only? Is he not the God of the Gentiles also?' was one that he must have often asked himself in his Pharisaic days; and when the sight and the call of Jesus had given him the decisive answer, 'Yea, of the Gentiles also,' this became the moving force of his strenuous life (cf. Joh. Weiss, Paul and Jesus, p. 67). He had been a traveller from his youth, for the journey from Tarsus to Jerusalem was not a short one; but now he took a wider circuit (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>), and would fain have embraced the whole world in his travels (v. 23), so anxious was he to proclaim what he believed to be the religion of redemption for all mankind. The highest service that the Dispersion has up till now rendered to the world is its becoming the starting-point of the aggressive Christian movement of St. Paul and his fellow-apostles; what further service it may be designed to render, in the form in which it now exists, is yet hidden in the counsels of the Eternal.

It may cause some surprise that St. Paul never visited Alexandria, where the freest development of pre-Christian Judaism took place. This development, however, was in many respects alien to St. Paul's mind. Alexandrian Judaism was 'a cultured Unitarianism with strong ethical convictions. The old dream of a theocracy was forgotten, and Messianism aroused no interest' (Inge, ERE i. 309; cf. Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, i. 177). This brief account must be qualified, however, by the statement in Acts (18<sup>28</sup>), that it was a gifted Alexandrian Jew, Apollos, who, after 'the way of God had been expounded to him more carefully,' demonstrated the Messiahship of Jesus publicly, before the Jews in Corinth, with energy and success (cf. Harnack, Acts of the Apostles, p. 121). The illustrious Church of Alexandria must have been founded, like other churches, on 'the Rejected Stone.'

Many traits of the Diaspora mentioned above are illustrated by the Acts and the Epistles. The long list of foreign Jews present at Pentecost shows how widely scattered their settlements were. Was it by means of some of these (Ac 2<sup>10</sup>), returning to their native synagogue 'in the power of the Spirit,' that the faith of Christ first reached the city of Rome? At Antioch, some Cyprian and Cyrenæan Christians were the first to take the bold step of 'speaking unto the Gentiles also, preaching Jesus as the Lord' (Ac 11<sup>19</sup>), 'where the sense of the passage seems to require "Ελληνας" (Gwatkin, Early Church Hist. i. 56n.). The names of Barnabas of Cyprus, Philip of Cæsarea, Lucius of Cyrene, Timothy of Lystra, Jason of Thessalonica, Sopater of Berea, Crispus of Corinth, Aquila of Pontus, illustrate how largely the Church's assets consisted of Jews settled abroad. The tent-making of Aquila, in which St. Paul joined him, gives a glimpse into the industrial life of the Diaspora. Amongst his 'kinsmen' in Asia and Europe the Apostle found some of his most efficient coadjutors; from them too, and not only from the unbelieving portion of them, there came some of his most fanatical opponents.

In Ja 1<sup>1</sup> St. James may be addressing the Christian Jews of the Eastern Dispersion, and in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> St. Peter those of the Western (J. B. Mayor, Ep. of James<sup>3</sup>, 1910, p. 30); but in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> it is much more probable that the whole body of Christians living at the time are addressed as being now, spiritually, 'the Israel of God' (Gal 6<sup>16</sup>; cf. Hort, First Epistle of Peter, I. 1-II. 17, 1898, p. 7).

There are few data to satisfy our curiosity about what happened to the Jewish Diaspora from A.D. 70 to 100. The rebellion against the Roman authority seems to have met with no sympathy on the part of the Jews of Rome. They had no share in the insurrections under Vespasian, Trajan, or Hadrian, and were left unmolested (JE iv. 563).* We even hear that 'after A.D. 70 till perhaps 100, Judaism made many converts especially in Rome' (Parting of the Roads, pp. 286, 305). Those Jews who had had their home in Jerusalem were compelled after A.D. 70 to live after the manner of their brethren of the Diaspora (Ebi ii. 2286). The story of the re-organization of Judaism on a non-sacerdotal basis by Jochanan ben Zakkai, the founder of the School of Jamnia near Joppa, and his successors, has recently been re-told by E. Levine in a manner that commands attention and respect (Parting of the Roads, 299 f.). But to pursue this interesting line of study would take us far beyond the limits of the Apostolic Age.

DIVINATION.—1. Definition.—Primitive man, under the influence of animatism and animism, came to think of himself as surrounded by innumerable spirits. These in course of time became differentiated into gods, goddesses, demons, ghosts, etc. These beings could influence, enter into, and animate not only each other, but human beings, beasts, and things. Man gradually realized that it was his duty to discover and cultivate relations, friendly or defensive, with these—a duty intensified by his covetousness of good and his aversion to calamities or privations. Some of the methods he employed for doing this became regulated and systematized into forms of worship, i.e. approved methods of approaching and propitiating the spirits. As these forms became more and more universally recognized, they acquired a sacred character, which differentiated them from, and placed them on a higher level than, other ceremonies. Still the latter continued to be practised, because the forms of worship did not meet all men's necessities. Unusual circumstances occurred through which, or on account of which, the divinities communicated with men, or by reason of which men felt the need of communicating with those beings in whose hands lay the destinies of their lives. These survivals of the lower culture, from which the regular forms of worship had shaken themselves free, may be grouped under the name 'Divination.'

The Latin name for a divine being was deus. Divus indicates the quality possessed by a thing which makes it 'godlike'; divinus rather the qualities which make a being 'divine'; divinitas means 'the divine nature'; divinare, 'to see like a god'; and divinatio, 'the power of seeing like a god.' This came to be confined, in ordinary use, to the power of foreseeing. But the word has a much wider meaning. To Chrysippus and the Stoics, 'divination' was the means of communication between the gods and men. Cicero (de Div. i. 38) argues that, if there are gods, there must be men who have the power of communicating with them. In English 'divination' has the wider meaning akin to the original significance. Divination then rests on the idea that, apart from forms of worship, a divinity and a human being can, when necessary, come into living touch with each other, the divinity acting on or through the man, thus revealing his mind to him; or the man by approved methods so revealing his mind to the divinity that the latter acts on or through him.

2. Divination and magic.—Just as worship, by becoming systematized, left behind it the forms of communication called 'divination,' so divination, as it became more regulated and elaborated in the hands of professional diviners, left behind it cruder and lower forms of communication which may all be included under the term 'magic.'

The distinction between divination and magic may be briefly and not inaccurately stated thus: the diviner is in touch with the divinities because he is their servant; the magician, because, for the time being, he is their master. Thus, each of these forms of communication, though existing alongside of each other and accepted by the same people, has its own distinctive features.

3. Development.—If we think of the above three methods of communication between the divinities and men as existing, in embryo, in the earliest ages, we can realize how they were each developed by such great races as the Semites and the Aryans, and how the common inheritance of each of these was developed along distinctive lines by the different nations springing from them. Thus, to confine our attention to divination, we have that of the Semites,* developing into that of the Mesopotamians,† Persians,‡ Jews,§ and Arabians;|| and that of the Aryans,¶ developing into that of the Vedas,** Greeks,†† Romans,‡‡ Celts,§§ Teutons,||| and Lithuanians;¶¶ while that of the Egyptians strongly influenced and was influenced by many of these.***

The Pax Romana and the toleration of the Roman Government permitted the cults of innumerable divinities and all these forms of divination to spread throughout the Empire; and Jews, Christians, worshippers of all kinds of Eastern and Egyptian deities, diviners, 'magicians, astrologers, and wizards jostled each other in a theological confusion to which no parallel can be found' (K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, 1911, p. 47).

4. Divination in the Apostolic Age.—It is difficult, but necessary, to realize this amazing profusion of divinities as a distinct feature of the Apostolic Age. Besides mentioning Jahweh, the God of the Hebrews, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit, worshipped by the Christians, and some of the innumerable ethnic deities, the literature of the Apostolic Age contains references to angels, archangels, living creatures, Satan, the Devil, the Wicked One, the Antichrist, demons, unclean and evil powers, dominions, principalities, authorities, thrones, and glories.

It is not easy to decide how far belief in these affected the various classes. But practically this is true: each man had his favourite divinity to which all Gentiles added a select group of deities whom they revered. Rationalists like the Sadducees denied the existence of ἄγγελοι and πνεύματα (Ac 23<sup>8</sup>); many of the more educated viewed the existence of the minor supernatural beings with more or less scepticism; but the mass of people lived in the belief and the fear of these divine beings. In that age men felt themselves surrounded by a great cloud of witnesses (He 12<sup>1</sup>), living in a world where the gods appeared (Ac 14<sup>11</sup> 23<sup>8</sup>), where Jesus appeared to St. Paul (9<sup>17</sup>, 27 26<sup>16</sup>) and to Stephen (7<sup>55</sup>), and His Spirit prohibited action (16<sup>7</sup>), where an itinerant preacher was received as a messenger of God, or even as Christ Jesus re-incarnated (Gal 4<sup>14</sup>); where the Holy Spirit was a distinct living personality, where the assertion that a man was the Son of God made a Roman governor tremble (Jn 19<sup>8</sup>), and the patience of His death caused a Roman centurion to exclaim: 'This was a Son of God' (Mt 27<sup>54</sup>). In such a world the Satan fashioned himself into an ἄγγελος φωτός (2 Co 11<sup>14</sup>), σαίμονες entered into men, and were cast out by men (Lk 11<sup>19</sup>, Mk 9<sup>38</sup>), converts to the religion of Jesus who had believed and were baptized proposed to purchase the ability to confer the Holy Spirit (Ac 8<sup>19</sup>), the power of the evil eye was exercised (Mk 7--), and ἀρχαί and δυνάμεις, 'principalities' and 'powers' (Ro 8<sup>38</sup>), 'mustered their unseen array.' Nor must we think that the Christians stood far removed from the common beliefs of the age. This is clear from many things. Think of their belief in the Satan, the antagonist who stood over against God. He was conceived as a huge dragon, or old serpent (Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>11</sup> [as amended by Charles in his Studies in the Apocalypse, 1913, p. 100] 20<sup>2</sup>), and as such was identified with διάβολος. He was regarded as having his abode in the skies, in which he and his ἄγγελοι had been defeated by an ἀρχάγγελος Michael and his ἄγγελοι, and thrown down on the earth (12<sup>7-9</sup>) to be flung into the abyss for a thousand years (20<sup>3</sup>, 7). He had his subordinate spirits. Special mention is made of 'the Lawless One' [according to N B] (2 Th 2<sup>3</sup>), and the ἄγγελοι who fought for him (Rev 12<sup>7-9</sup>), and afflicted men's bodies (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>), and even destroyed them (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). He himself could masquerade as ἄγγελος φωτός (2 Co 11<sup>14</sup>), and could equip his servants with full powers, the miracles and portents of falsehood, and the full deceitfulness of evil (2 Th 2<sup>9</sup>, 10). The Satan was the adversary of men; his chief aim was to seduce to wrong (Rev 20<sup>3</sup>, 5, 10, Eph 2<sup>2</sup>) by tempting to such sins as lying, cheating (Ac 5<sup>3</sup>), incontinence (1 Co 7<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>15</sup>), gross sexual excess, 'his deep mysteries' (Rev 2<sup>2</sup>, Eph 2<sup>3</sup>). He gains advantages by clever manœuvres (2 Co 2<sup>11</sup>). He is the accuser of the members of the Christian brotherhood (Rev 12<sup>10</sup>). He hinders good endeavours (1 Th 2<sup>18</sup>), but the God of peace crushes him under His people's feet (Ro 16<sup>9</sup>). Jews hostile to the religion of Jesus are thought of by the Christians as his servants who form his synagogue (Rev 2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>), and in places noted for wickedness he dwells in power as a king on his throne (2<sup>13</sup>). By a deliberate act of judgment an offender could be consigned to the Satan's power for the destruction of his body (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>).

The natural and inevitable outcome of this multiplicity of divinities was the universal practice of divination. The testimony of history to this fact is fully confirmed by the discovery of contemporary texts, among which are 'innumerable . . . horoscopes, amulets, cursing tablets, and magical books. . . . The whole ancient world is full of miracles' (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, 1911, pp. 284, 393). Divination and magic were prevalent not merely among sects like the Essenes, but among the Jews generally (Schurer, HJP II. iii. [1886] p. 151 ff., II. ii. [1885] p. 204). The writings of the Apostolic Fathers show the relation of the Christians to these arts. In the Didache among other commandments are these, 'thou shalt not practise magic, thou shalt not use enchantments, οὐ μαγείσεις, οὐ φαρμακεύσεις (ii.), and this entreaty, 'become not an omenwatcher, nor one who uses charms, nor an astrologer, nor one who purifies,' i.e. one who averts disease or removes sin by sacrifices, μη γίνου οἰωνοσκοπος . . . μηδὲ ἐπαοιδός, μηδὲ μαθηματικός, μηδὲ περικαθαίρων (iii.). Hermas (Mand. xi. 4) cautions Christians not to consult soothsayers (μαντευόνται). The Didache describes the Way of Death as full, among other things, of 'magical arts and potions,' μαγείαι, φαρμακίαι (v.), while in the Way of Darkness, among other things that destroy the soul, are 'potions and magical arts,' φαρμακεία, μαγεία (Ep. Barn. xx.). Ignatius speaks of the birth of Jesus as destroying or making ridiculous every kind of magic, πᾶσα μαγεία (Eph. xix.), and exhorts his readers 'to flee evil arts,' τὰς κακοτεχνίας φεύγε, but all the more to discourse in public regarding them (Ep. to Polycarp, v.). In Ps.-Ignatius, Ep. to the Antiochians, xi., 'the practice of magic,' γοητείας, is a vice forbidden even to the Gentiles. Aristides (Apol. xi.) in indicating the things which Christians should not do, omits all reference to divination or magic, and a similar omission is noticeable in Ep. Barn. xix. and in 1 Clement, xxx. xxxv. Hero is warned (Ps.-Ignatius, Ep. to Hero, ii.) to distrust any one teaching beyond what is commanded, even 'though he work miracles,' κάν σημεῖα ποιῇ. In the description which Aristides declares the Greeks give of their gods, he writes that they say some of them were 'sorcerers,' φαρμακοὺς (Apol. viii.), 'practising sorcery,' φαρμακείας (xiii.), and he calls Hermes 'a magician,' μάγον (x.). But it is noticeable that in Ps.-Ignatius, Ep. to the Antiochians, xii., among the Church officials is 'the exorcist,' ἐπορκιστής, and in the Ep. to the Philippians, v., Christ is by way of honour called 'this magician,' μάγος οὗτος, while in Ephesians, xx., the sacramental bread is called 'the medicine of immortality,' φάρμακον ἀθανασίας. Pagan testimony is to the same effect. The Emperor Hadrian (A.D. 117-138), writing to the Consul Servianus on the state of Egypt, says: 'There is no ruler of a synagogue of Jews, no Samaritan, no Presbyter of the Christians who is not an astrologer, a soothsayer, a quack [mathematicus, haruspex, aliptes]' (Script. Hist. August., 1774, 'Vopisci Saturninus,' 8).

These supernatural beings communicated with men by means of ἄγγελοι ('angels' or 'messengers') or prophets, by possession, by means of the hand, tongues, dreams, visions, trances, voices, sounds.

The human beings in touch with these supernatural beings were variously named exorcists, soothsayers, sorcerers, enchanters; and, lower still, magicians, witches, and wizards. They had various methods of bringing the power of the divinities to act on men, all of which may be classed into two groups: (a) regular: blessing, cursing, pronouncing anathema, invoking the Name, embracing, laying on of hands, shadowing, signs and wonders, as e.g. healing, or smiting with disease such as blindness; (b) exceptional: the lot, the vow, the oath, and committing to Satan.

As religion has become spiritualized, divination has more and more lost its hold on the minds of men. The ultimate end will be reached when worship shall be the approach to the One Father by a man, who, because he is taught and led by the indwelling Spirit of Jesus, needs no divination, and who, because he can proffer his requests to the Father in prayer, scorns all magic. But the end is not yet.

LITERATURE.—There is no book dealing with Divination in the Apostolic Age. Reference to its various phases will be found in modern Commentaries and in works on Comparative Religion, and Anthropology, as those of E. B. Tylor, A. E. Crawley, J. G. Frazer, F. B. Jevons, J. H. Leuba, and R. R. Marett. In addition to these and the authorities cited throughout the art., reference may be made to F. W. H. Myers, on 'Greek Oracles,' in Essays, 1883, and to the series of articles in ERE vi. 775 ff.

DIVISIONS.—The work of the Apostle Paul was much hindered by divisions in the Church. There are many passages in his Epistles which refer to this, but the subject cannot be better studied than in 1 Co 1<sup>10ff</sup>. The Corinthian Church, though outwardly united, was divided in its allegiance to different teachers—'I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ.' Much ingenuity has been expended in sketching the characteristics of these four parties, but it is not easy to be certain of them. Apollos was a Jew of Alexandria (Ac 18-<sup>2-8</sup>), a disciple of the Baptist, who, being more fully instructed by Aquila and Priscilla, was baptized into the Christian Church. At Corinth his learning and eloquence made a great impression, and there might be many who would regard him as a leader in the faith; but there need not have been any serious division in the Church on this account. Far greater difficulty would be experienced between those who are generally known as the Judaizing party and those who accepted the teaching of the Apostle.

The question of Gentile converts being free from the yoke of the Law of Moses had been settled by the Council held at Jerusalem (Ac 15<sup>1-29</sup>), but the Judaizing party had not acquiesced ex animo in that decision. The Epistle to the Galatians gives us an insight into their tactics then, and it is highly probable that in the 'Christ' party of 1 Co 1<sup>10ff</sup> we meet with the same line of action. In the Second Epistle to the Corinthians the Apostle defends his authority and apostolicity in much the same way as he does in the Epistle to the Galatians (2 Co 10. 11. 12, Gal 1<sup>11 221</sup>).

This party would perhaps point to the obedience of Christ to the Law during His life, and would strongly advocate the position that Christianity was an outcome of Judaism, and that the Gentile in accepting Christ must bow his head to the yoke of the Law as well. In 1 Cor. we see this party in its infancy; but in 2 Cor. it has grown to much more dangerous proportions. From the internal evidence of the latter Epistle we may gather something of their claims. They were Hebrews; they claimed to be apostles; they preached another gospel and another Jesus (2 Co 11). Their insistence upon obedience to the ceremonial Law brought them into direct conflict with St. Paul's teaching on justification. They made many grievous and unjust charges against him, and sought in every way to discredit him and to belittle his authority. The Epistle makes it clear that they met with considerable success. The Corinthians were infatuated with their new teachers, and turned against the Apostle. In some way the news of the defection reached St. Paul, and led to his paying a visit to Corinth. This visit is not recorded in the Acts but is alluded to in this Epistle (2 Co 13). This was followed by a stern letter which some think is preserved in 2 Co 10-13; and finally, on receipt of the good news of their repentance, St. Paul wrote with thankfulness the Epistle which we have in 2 Co 1-9. DOCTOR.—'Doctor' (Lk 2<sup>46</sup> 5<sup>17</sup>, Ac 5<sup>34</sup>) = 'teacher.' The 'doctor' was a scribe. Till 40 years old he was talmid ('scholar'). Probably after examination he became talmid hākhām ('sage scholar'). On receiving a call from a particular community, he was solemnly ordained to office with laying on of hands, and became rabbi ('master'). Such was the process after A.D. 70. In the NT rabbi has not so specialized an application. The Law, especially the oral tradition, was the great subject of study; it was learned by indefatigable memorizing. Discussions were held at which listeners might put questions (cf. Lk 24<sup>6</sup>).

DOG (κυν, Ph 3<sup>2</sup>, 2 P 2-, Rev 22<sup>15</sup>).—In Palestine the dog plays a very insignificant and contemptible part, and is in consequence the symbol for all that is ignoble and mean. The ordinary pariah street-dogs are from two to three feet long, tawny in colour, have small eyes, short fur, and comparatively little hair on the tail. They act as scavengers, clearing away carcases and offal, which form the staple of their food, and which, but for them, might create pestilence (cf. H. B. Tristram, Natural History<sup>10</sup>, p. 78). They bark and howl all night (cf. Ps 59<sup>6, 14</sup>), but as a rule are afraid of men, though on occasions they attack travellers in lonely places. Sometimes they are trained to act as sheep-dogs (cf. Job 30<sup>1</sup>), not, however, for driving the sheep, as with us, but for guarding them against the attacks of wolves and jackals at night. Dogs were seldom regarded or treated as pets; this was perhaps due to the fact that the Jews were not a hunting people. Tristram, however, informs us that he had no difficulty in making a pet of a puppy taken from pariah dogs (op. cit. p. 80), while we have clear evidence in Mt 15<sup>27</sup> || Mk 7<sup>27</sup> that they sometimes became household pets; it is, however, noticeable that the term used in these two passages is the diminutive κυνάριον. The only other breed of dog known in Palestine is the Persian greyhound, which resembles our greyhound in general form and appearance, but is larger and stronger, though not so swift. This dog is used by shaikhs for hunting the gazelle.

When used as a personal epithet in OT and NT, 'dog' is a term of absolute contempt when applied to others, of extreme humility when applied to oneself. In Ph 3<sup>2</sup>, St. Paul applies the term to his Judaizing opponents—'Look to, be on your guard against, the dogs, the workers of mischief, the concision' (cf. Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 143)—a party, clearly, well-defined and well-known to the members of the Philippian Church. In 2 P 2<sup>22</sup> the 'dog' is mentioned along with the 'sow' as in Horace (Epp. I. ii. 26)—the dog turning to his own vomit again, and the sow that hath bathed itself (in mud), to wallowing in the mire. The reference is to apostates—those who, after being converted to the way of righteousness and having abandoned the filth in which they had once so zealously 'bathed,' return again to wallow in the mire of their former delights. In Rev 22<sup>15</sup>, the 'dogs' are those who are corrupted by the foul vices of the heathen world, many of whom were doubtless to be found within the pale of the Church (cf. 214, 201, 2 Co 12<sup>21</sup>).

κυριότης is found in four passages, viz. Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup> (plural), Jude<sup>8</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>10</sup>; RV in all cases gives 'dominion,' AV in the first three, and in the margin of 2 P 2<sup>10</sup> (text, 'government'). In Eph. and Col. a class of angels is meant (Milton's 'Dominations') with which compare 1 Co 8<sup>2</sup>, where angels are called κυριοι (Grimm-Thayer, Lexicon, s.v. κυριότης). The meaning of the word in Peter and Jude presents some difficulty. (a) Many suppose that here also angels are referred to, which 2 P 2<sup>11</sup> and the reference to the sin of the Sodomites seem to support. Cremer (Lexicon, s.v. κυριότης) says that in Peter evil angels are implied from the context, though not in Jude. But, as Bennett (Century Bible: 'The General Epistles,' 1901, p. 334) points out, 'it does not seem likely that blasphemy against angels would be so conspicuous a sin of licentious men as to call forth this emphatic condemnation.' (b) κυριότης may be understood of the power and majesty of God (Bigg, St. Peter and St. Jude [ICC, 1901], p. 279), or the Lordship of Christ, in support of which 2 P 2<sup>6</sup>, Jude 4<sup>15</sup> may be quoted. (c) It may refer to authorities in the Church whose legitimate power these men despised and spoke against. Bennett inclines to this interpretation in Jude and regards it as included also in 2 Peter, where he gives the general principle of the argument thus: when good angels withstand dignities, i.e. evil angels, although the good are the more powerful, they do not abuse their opponents; how absurd and wicked for evil men to abuse good angels, or perhaps even the legitimate Church authorities. J. R. Lumby (in Speaker's Commentary: 'Heb. to Rev.,' 1881, p. 395) combines (b) and (c) above: 'the railing at dignities, though its first exhibition might be made against the Apostles and those set in authority in the Church, yet went further and resulted in the denial of our only Master, God Himself, whose dominion these sinners were disregarding, and our Lord Jesus Christ, whose glory these men speak evil of or rail at.'

DOMITIAN Titus Flavius Domitianus, second son of Titus Flavius Vespasianus (Emperor A.D. 69-79; see VESPASIAN) and his kinswoman Flavia Domitilla, and brother of Titus Flavius Vespasianus (Emperor A.D. 79-81; see TITUS), was Roman Emperor from A.D. 81 to 96. He was born on 24 October A.D. 51 in Rome, during the principate of Claudius, almost twelve years after his brother Titus. He lost his mother and only sister in early life, and when his father and brother entered on the Jewish War in A.D. 66, Domitian was scarcely fifteen years old. When his father was called to the Imperial throne on 1 July 69, his sons received corresponding honours, each being named Cæsar and princeps iuventutis. Domitian had a narrow escape at the hands of the Vitellians, being compelled to leave the Capitol in the robes of a priest of Isis, which a freedman had procured for him. On his father's accession Domitian received the prætorship, which he held from 1 January 70, but exercised for the most part by deputy. Following the fashion set by Augustus, he robbed L. Lamia Æmilianus of his wife Domitia Longina, and, after living with her for some time unmarried, finally married her. It was unfortunate for his future career that his father and elder brother were absent for a lengthy period from Rome and Italy, being detained by the Jewish War. The sudden accession to power and influence of a youth of barely eighteen years of age ended, as might have been expected, in a disastrous perversion of character. The complaints against him served to hasten his father's return. Before 21 June 70, Domitian and Mucianus, the most prominent supporter of the Flavian house, left Rome for the Gallo-German war. A change in the situation caused Domitian to return. He lived for a period in his Alban villa in retirement from public life. On the return of his father he received much distinction, but so far as direct government of the Empire was concerned he was kept in the background. He was, however, six times consul before he became Emperor. On the death of Vespasian (79) Titus became Emperor; Domitian, though openly spoken of as consors imperii, was wisely kept in an inferior position.

On the death of Titus through fever, Domitian became Emperor (13 September 81). Henceforth his title was Imperator Cæsar Domitianus (Domitianus Cæsar) Augustus. The title Germanicus was conferred upon him in 84, and he became censor perpetuus (after 5 Sept.) in 85. Certain of the important events of his reign may be enumerated. It was probably very soon after the death of Titus that the decree for the construction of the arch in his honour, still standing at the Summa Sacra Via, was passed. On it are the famous representations of the Golden Candlestick, etc. (see art. ROME). His first year was also signalized by the victories of Cn. Iulius Agricola in Scotland and the establishment of fortified posts as far as the line of the Forth and Clyde. In 82 the rebuilding of the Temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline Hill, which had been destroyed by fire in 80, was completed. In the same year the roads in the Imperial provinces of Asia Minor were repaired, and Agricola carried out his fifth campaign, planning also an invasion of Ireland which never took place. In 83 an expedition to Germany took place as the result of which victories were gained over the Chatti. Territory was added to the Empire in the region of Taunus and Wetterau on the right bank of the Rhine, and secured by a fortified rampart (limes). This success brought the title Germanicus to Domitian on 3 September 84 (cf. Statius, Silvæ [passim] for the use of the name; passages in Klotz's index, p. 187). About this time Domitian also allowed himself to be appointed consul for ten years, and received the censoria potestas for life, and other honours. The pay of the soldiers was increased by a third. In 83, on his sixth campaign, Agricola had been able, with the co-operation of his fleet, to extend his hold over our island. He marched as far north as Inchtuthill near Dunkeld, and made a lasting camp there. In 84 occurred the battle of Mons Graupius (locality uncertain), by which the Caledonians received a crushing blow. Agricola left Britain in a pacified state, when Domitian's jealousy recalled him soon after this victory. In the period 85-87 Domitian led in person two expeditions against the Dacians, who had provoked war. They crossed the Danube and invaded the province of Mœsia. The governor of Mœsia, Oppius Sabinus, was defeated and killed. The Dacians thereupon ravaged the territory on the right bank of the Danube and destroyed towns and forts. About the end of January 86 Domitian himself took the field. Of the details of the war almost nothing is known. It appears that Domitian issued his commands for the most part from the Imperial camp in the province of Mœsia. The Decebalus was conquered, and Domitian took the credit of the victory to himself. He was back in Rome in the summer of 86, but the war was continued by Cornelius Fuscus, who appears to have suffered a heavy defeat.

About the same period the Romans were engaged in warfare against the Nasamones on the African coast, and against the Germans. It was in Domitian's reign that the custom of buying off the opposition of Rome's enemies began. During this period the Emperor became more and more a tyrant and less and less a constitutional prince. It is significant that he allowed himself to be called dominus ac deus (A.D. 85-86). Tyranny aroused the more republican of the senators, and many were condemned; a conspiracy against the Emperor was discovered and crushed. Probably about the end of 89 Domitian triumphed over the Dacians and the Germans, whose governor, L. Antonius Saturninus, sought to dethrone him. Domitian had taken part in both these wars himself. We learn also of an expedition against the Quadi, the Marcomani, and the Sarmatians, all of whom were allies of the Dacians. Domitian was recognized as victor, peace was made between the combatants, and large sums of money were sent by Domitian to the Decebalus. The year 89 was marked by further condemnations of distinguished persons and the confiscation of their property. Twenty years after Nero's death (9 June 68) a false Nero appeared, and caused an uprising among the Parthians which it was extremely difficult to quell. It is not impossible that some reference to this occurrence is latent in Rev 13<sup>3</sup>. In the year 91 a Vestal virgin, charged with having broken her vow of chastity, was by the orders of the 'censor' Domitian subjected to the ancient penalty of being buried alive. In this year also was unveiled the great equestrian statue of Domitian in the Forum (celebrated by Statius in his Silvæ, i. 1), the base of which is still in position. In 92 (or, strictly, in the period Oct. 91 to Sept. 92) there was a good vine crop but a bad cereal crop. Domitian in consequence ordered that no new vineyards should be laid out in Italy and that the vines of the provinces should be reduced to one half their former number. This measure, intended to improve agriculture, was not carried out strictly. The provinces complained, among them Asia Minor. M. Salomon Reinach pointed out in 1901 (in RA, reprinted in Cultes, Mythes et Religions, ii. [1906] 356-380) that there is a reference to this edict latent in the difficult passage Rev 6<sup>6</sup> (see Sanday in JThSt viii. [1906-07] 488 f.). In the same year Domitian conducted war against the Sarmatians with success. Next year (93) was marked by more condemnation of the nobility, and among others the great Agricola fell a victim. Now began the reign of terror which ended only with the death of Domitian. Among those who suffered were some of the noblest Romans, men and women, that ever lived.

It was in the year Oct. 93 to Sept. 94, according to the Chronicle of Eusebius, as translated by Jerome, that the Domitianic persecution of the Christians began, and that the Apostle John, being banished to the island 'Pathmus,' saw the Apocalypse (cf. other ancient references recorded in the introductions to the Commentaries by Swete, Bousset, and Hort, to which add pseudo-Augustine, Quæstiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti CXXVII, lxxvi. [lxxii.] 2: 'ista Reuelatio eo tempore facta est, quo apostolus Iohannes in insula erat Pathmos, relegatus a Domitiano imperatore fidei causa'). For the difficulty in dating the Apocalypse see art. APOCALYPSE. There must have been a fierce persecution of Christians in Domitian's time, and the Apocalypse would seem to be the mirror of it. The Church always believed Domitian to have been the second great persecutor. The wonder is that the outbreak did not come earlier, in view of Domitian's assumption of the titles 'Lord and God' referred to above. It has been usual to connect with this persecution the charge of 'atheism' (by which, of course, the Romans meant the worship of no god in visible form: they had long charged the Jews with the same [cf. Lucan, ii. 592-3: 'dedita sacris incerti Iudaea dei']) brought against two relations of the Emperor. These were Flavius Clemens, the consul of the year (95), first cousin of the Emperor, and his wife, Flavia Domitilla, niece of the Emperor. Clemens was beheaded, and Domitilla was banished to Pandateria. A grave in the catacombs near Rome belonged to the latter. Before the summer of this year 95 the Via Domitiana connecting Sinuessa and Puteoli was completed (celebrated by Statius, Silvae, iv. 3). This meant a saving of time for journeys from Rome to Naples and beyond (see art. ROADS AND TRAVEL). In the year 96, on 18 Sept., the much-hated Emperor met his death at the hands of his friends, his freedman, and his wife.

LITERATURE.—Among the ancient authorities, his beneficiaries Statius and Martial say all and more than all the good there is to be said of Domitian; the part of Tacitus' Hist. dealing with him has perished; there are occasional references in contemporary authors, and there are the biography by Suetonius and parts of Dio Cassius, Orosius, etc. The best modern work is S. Gsell, Essai sur le regne de l'empereur Domitien, Paris, 1894; there is an excellent résumé with references and literature in Weyland's art. in Pauly-Wissowa, vi. [1909] 2541-2596; A. v. Domaszewski, Gesch. d. rom. Kaiser, Leipzig, 1909, vol. ii.; general histories of the Empire. On Domitian and Christianity see W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, chs. xii. and xiii.

A. SOUTER.

DOOR.*—The examples of the concrete use of θύρα, 'door,' are all found in Acts, and may be treated under three heads: (1) house doors, (2) prison doors, (3) Temple doors. The first two occur in the narratives of miraculous events.

1. In Ac 5<sup>9</sup> the feet of them that buried Ananias are said to be ἐπὶ τῇ θύρᾳ, nigh at hand, if not actually heard by those within. More vivid still is the instance of 12<sup>3</sup>, where one required to knock at, or beat, the door, to make oneself heard within. (The presence of a knocker for the purpose is not to be inferred, for Jewish doors at least.) τὴν θύραν τοῦ πυλῶνος (cf. Ezk 40<sup>11</sup> [LXX]) is best understood as a door abutting on the street or lane, which gave the entry to a covered passage communicating with the court of the house, in which the living rooms were situated (see GATE). Rhoda stood in this passage, hearing, but seeing not (besides, it was night), the Apostle Peter, who was without, and being in command of the way so long as the door, not the gate, remained locked or barred. ἀνοίξαντες (v.<sup>16</sup>) implies door, which is rightly not expressed in RV. For modern usage see Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, 1898, p. 95.

2. With one exception (Ac 12<sup>6</sup>) the doors of prisons are found in the plural (Ac 5<sup>19</sup>.<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>36</sup>.<sup>27</sup>). The indications afforded by the narrative of Acts are too meagre to enable us to reconstruct the form of these places of detention, either in Jerusalem or at Philippi. Security seems to have been given by guards, chains, and stocks rather than by any peculiar strength of door. Of necessity the bolt or bar was attached to the outside, of cell doors at least. For the situation at Philippi, see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 220 f.

3. In Ac 3-4 the Beautiful Gate of the Temple (cf v.<sup>10</sup>) is described by the word for 'door,' which RV brings out. As in the private house, so here, the door forms part of the gate, the latter being in reality a portal. This particular gate of the Temple is now believed to be the Corinthian Gate, which is identical with the Nicanor Gate, on the east side of the Temple precincts. Its doors, and other parts, were of Corinthian brass (or bronze), probably solid, being shut with difficulty by twenty men (Josephus, BJ vi. v. 3; cf. Ant. xv. xi. 5, BJ ii. xvii. 3, v. v. 3, c. Ap. ii. 10). They seem to have been double doors (EBi, art. 'Temple'), standing at the entrance to the portal. Compare, for Babylonian Temples, PSBA, 1912, p. 90 ff. For the Beautiful Gate of the Temple see the full and illuminating account by A. R. S. Kennedy in ExpT xx. [1908-09] 270 f.; also art. TEMPLE.

We read (Ac 21<sup>31</sup>) that the people laid hold on St. Paul, and dragged him out of the Temple, and straightway the doors were shut. Farrar (Life and Work of St. Paul, 1897, p. 532) locates this turmoil at the Beautiful Gate, but, considering the number of doors that gave access to the Temple precincts, there are other possibilities.

In Rev 21<sup>25</sup> we can picture the gates as provided with doors, although these were not in use.

The metaphorical use of θύρα in Acts, Epistles, etc., may be briefly noted. In this sense the word appears without the definite article, Ac 14<sup>7</sup> being no exception: 'a door of faith' (RV). In St. Paul's Epistles mention is made of a great door and effectual (1 Co 16<sup>9</sup>), a door being opened (2 Co 2<sup>12</sup>), a door for the word (Col 4<sup>3</sup>), all with the notion of opportunity and facility. The idea of the nearness of judgment is brought out by Ja 5<sup>7</sup> (cf. Mt 24<sup>33</sup>): 'The judge standeth before the doors,' where RV replaces the singular of AV by the plural, following the Greek.

In Rev 3<sup>7-8</sup> a door is set or given, ἡνεωγμένην (note peculiar verbal form), i.e. a door already opened, which none can shut (see KEY), and in 4<sup>1</sup> a door is already opened in the heavens at the moment the vision commences. In contrast to this is the closed door of Rev 3<sup>30</sup>, a passage in which is concentrated great wealth of meaning.

DORCAS.—This name occurs in the narrative of St. Peter's sojourn in the plain of Western Palestine after the dispersion of the Jerusalem Church on the martyrdom of Stephen (Ac 9<sup>36-42</sup>). It is given as a translation of the Aramaic proper name Tabitha ('Tabitha which is by interpretation Dorcas,' Ac 9<sup>36</sup>). The word t'bittha (ܬܒܝܬܬܐ) is Aramaic corresponding to the Heb. šēbi (שִׁבִּי), and is either the term applied to an animal of the deer species, 'roebuck' or 'roe' in AV, 'gazelle' in RV, or a proper name borne by women. The word is translated in the LXX by the term δορκάς (οὐρκομαι, 'see'—a reference to the large eyes of the animal). Both the Aramaic and the Greek terms were used as proper names for women, and the writer of the Acts gives the translation for the benefit of his Greek readers, though the woman was probably known as Tabitha.

The bearer of the name was a dweller in Joppa, a female disciple who had devoted herself to 'good works' and to 'almsgiving.' One feature of her benevolent activity was the making of garments which she distributed among the poor, a circumstance which is regarded as indicating special goodness, as a woman with means adequate to provide such benefactions might have been content with merely giving her money. This circumstance has in later Christianity given the inspiration and the name to the so-called Dorcas societies devoted to providing garments for the poor. There is no ground for concluding that Tabitha was a deaconess, nor can we tell whether she was one of the widows or married.

This disciple fell ill and died when St. Peter was in the neighbouring town of Lydda, nine miles distant. The believers in Joppa at once sent for the Apostle. Their motive for so doing is not apparent, but it is unlikely that they expected him to work a miracle. More likely the sorrowing friends turned to St. Peter for comfort in their bereavement, and his proximity led them to send for him. On his arrival the mourners showed the Apostle the garments Dorcas had made and spoke of her alms. The narrative then tells how St. Peter put them all out of the room, knelt down and prayed, and turning to the woman said, 'Tabitha, arise!' when she opened her eyes, sat up, and was handed over to the widows. This raising of Tabitha is reported to have become widely known and to have led large numbers to attach themselves to the Church.

The account of the raising of Dorcas has obvious points of similarity to that of the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9<sup>25</sup>; Mk 5<sup>40-41</sup>; Lk 8<sup>54</sup>), but there is sufficient dissimilarity in details to cause us at once to dismiss the notion that the one is a mere imitation of the other. It is natural that St. Peter, who was present at the raising of Jairus' daughter, should follow the method of his Master, while we see how, with the humility of Elijah or Elisha (1 K 17-9, 2 K 4<sup>33</sup>), he does not at first speak the word of power but kneels down in prayer. Holtzmann and Pfleiderer regard the raising of Tabitha as parallel to the restoration of Eutychus by St. Paul (Ac 20<sup>9-12</sup>), but beyond the fact that these commentators suppose both Tabitha and Eutychus to have been only apparently dead, there is no similarity between the two cases.

DOXOLOGY (δοξολογία, only in eccl. Greek).—The name is given to brief forms of praise to God (or to Christ, or to the Trinity) used in early Christianity, the models of which were taken over from Judaism. They sometimes occur as a momentary interruption in the midst of a discourse, a sudden breaking forth of praise at the mention of the name of God, of which 2 Co 13<sup>1</sup> is an example. We shall consider the most important of these in chronological order. 1. Gal 1<sup>5</sup>.—The appropriate ascription of praise to the Father for His redemption of mankind according to His will, wherein is revealed His attributes of wisdom, holiness, love, in which for us His glory chiefly consists. 2. Ro 11<sup>36</sup>.—The 'all things' are the things which have to do only with the kingdom of grace to which He has invited Jew and Gentile, and the doxology is the natural climax of praise for such wisdom and love; the 'Him' refers to God, not to Christ; v. 34 is an echo of Is 40<sup>13</sup>, and v. 35 of Job 41<sup>11</sup>, and the first part of v. 36 cannot have Trinitarian reference, as the context does not suit. 'It is the relation of the Godhead as a whole to the universe and to created things. God (not necessarily the Father) is the source and inspirer and goal of all things.*' 3. Ro 16<sup>27</sup>.—While grammatically the 'to whom' (ᾧ, if it be retained) could refer to Christ, and while according to the spirit and even language of the NT there is no objection to such reference, it is quite certain that the pronoun refers to the 'only wise God,' as that is in accordance with the whole purpose of the writer. It is the most fitting close to the Epistle, as it embodies the faith from which its central chapters proceed.† The dislocation of the language is probably to be explained by the intense spiritual feeling of the writer, who, without waiting to clear the matter up, bursts out into the usual doxology to God. 4. Eph 3<sup>21</sup>.—It is the glory which is due to God and befits Him. It is rendered 'in the Church' as the special domain where God is interested, viz. in a social brotherhood having organic life in Christ—the praise not being a thing of secular or voluntary ritual, but having its life and reason only in Christ and in a society redeemed and possessed by Him. 5. Ph 4<sup>20</sup>.—Notice here also the emphasis: the glory, that glory which is His attribute and element. 6. 1 Ti 1<sup>17</sup>.—Here we find echoes of Jewish forms: To 13<sup>6, 10</sup>, Enoch ix. 4, Rev 15<sup>3</sup>. The thought and phraseology are Hebraic. Bengel thought the æous had indirect reference to Gnosticism, but this is not necessary. 7. 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>.—'The Lord' here refers to Christ (cf. 17), to whom this doxology is addressed.* 8. He 13<sup>21</sup>.—This doxology may be to the 'God of peace' of v. 20, but it is both more natural and more grammatical to refer it to Christ, immediately preceding. Throughout the whole Epistle the latter has been constantly before the mind of the writer. 9. 1 P 4<sup>11</sup>.—Hart well remarks that the insertion of 'is' (ἐστιν) changes the doxology to a statement of fact, and thus supports the interpretation of 'whose' (ᾧ) as referring to the immediate antecedent, Jesus Christ, which seems also otherwise required. The thought is: already He possesses the glory and victory; therefore (v. 12) Christians endure joyfully their present suffering.† 10. 1 P 5<sup>14</sup>.—This refers to God, and 'dominion' is emphasized as a consolation on account of the persecution. 11. 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>.—Here we have another doxology to Christ. 'For ever' signifies lit. 'unto the day of eternity,' and occurs only here. Cf. Sir 18<sup>10</sup>. Bigg makes the point that εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας ('unto the ages') became so immediately the ruling phrase that this doxology cannot have been written after liturgical expressions became in any degree stereotyped. 12. Jude 25. 'Majesty' (elsewhere He 1<sup>3</sup> only) and 'power' are unusual in doxologies. 13. Rev 15<sup>6</sup>.—'The adoration of Christ, which vibrates in this doxology, is one of the most impressive features of the book. The prophet feels that the one hope for the loyalists of God in this period of trial is to be conscious that they owe everything to the redeeming love of Jesus. Faithfulness depends on faith, and faith is rallied by the grasp not of itself but of its object. Mysterious explanations of history follow, but it is passionate devotion to Jesus, and not any skill in exploring prophecy, which proves the source of moral heroism in the churches. Jesus sacrificed himself for us; ἀντὶ ἧς δόξης. From this inward trust and wonder, which leap up at the sight of Jesus and His grace, the loyalty of Christians flows.*' 14. Rev 5<sup>13</sup>.—God and Christ ('the Lamb') are linked together in this doxology, as often in thought among the early Christians (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>, Rev 7<sup>10</sup>: 'salvation unto our God who sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb'). 15. Rev 7<sup>12</sup>.—It is a fine saying of Rabbi Pinchas and Rabbi Jochanan on Ps 100-: 'Though all offerings cease in the future, the offering of praise alone shall not cease; though all prayers cease, thanksgiving alone shall not cease.'

A famous passage often interpreted as a doxology either to Christ or to God the Father is Ro 9<sup>5</sup>. For referring all words after 'of whom' (or 'from whom,' ἐξ ᾧ) to Christ it may be argued that: (a) it supplies the antithesis which 'according to the flesh' supports, and (b) it is grammatically better, for ὁ ὢν ('he being') naturally applies to what precedes: the person who is over all is naturally the person first mentioned. If we punctuate so as to read 'God who is over all,' there are objections: (1) ὢν would in that case be abnormal, and (2) 'blessed' would be unparalleled in position, as it ought to stand first in the sentence as in Eph 1<sup>3</sup> and in the LXX. Besides, the doxology to God seems here without a motive, without either psychological or rhetorical reason, a solecism which jars on the harmonies of St. Paul's pen. Then almost all the ancient interpreters, whatever their views, referred the whole to Christ. From consideration of language Socinus consented. Against this Stromann argues* that (i.) 'God blessed for ever' occurs frequently in the OT (though that does not prevent the predicate from being also used for Christ in the NT); (ii.) 'blessed for ever' is used for God in Ro 12<sup>3</sup> (but similar expressions are also given to Christ in the NT [see above], and when once the possibility is granted, each case must be judged on its merits); (iii.) where 'blessed' is used in the NT it is always used of God (but exactly equivalent expressions are used also of Christ). It is true that the fact of St. Paul's not calling Christ 'God' outright, but even making a distinction (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>), strikes Meyer and Denney† so strongly that they cannot allow the interpretation here. But to this theological argument it may be replied that passages like 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>3</sup> 20, Ph 2<sup>5</sup> 11 ascribe no less dignity to Christ than if St. Paul had used 'God' of Him. While a Christian Jew would ordinarily use 'God' for the Father, and 'Lord' for Christ, he might also use 'Lord' for the Father (1 Co 3<sup>5</sup>) and 'Spirit' for Christ (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>). As soon as the religious idea that meant the Divinity of Christ reacted in the use of names, the word 'God' would be used of Him, as we see in John, Ignatius, Ac 20<sup>23</sup> (the two oldest MSS), and Ti 2<sup>13</sup>. There is no impossibility in such a use here, therefore, and we are again driven back to the natural, and grammatical, interpretation.

In the sub-Apostolic Age we have in Clement of Rome (A.D. 97) 'to whom (God) be the glory for ever and ever,' chs. 38, 43, 45, 50 perhaps of Christ. 58 'through whom (Christ) is the glory, etc.,' and 65 'through whom (Christ) be glory and honour, power and greatness and eternal dominion unto him (God) from the ages past and for ever and ever. Amen.' Ignatius uses none of the doxologies. The Didache (c. A.D. 100 to 125) adds to the Lord's Prayer: 'For thine is the power and glory for ever and ever' (ch. 8); gives in the Eucharistic prayers twice: 'Thine is the glory for ever and ever,' and once: 'For thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever and ever' (ch. 9). In the post-Eucharistic prayer it gives twice the same benediction again: 'Thine is the glory for ever and ever,' and once: 'Thine is the power and the glory for ever and ever.' The doxologies in the Martyrdom of Polycarp and in Justin Martyr are too late for this work.

DRAGON (δράκων).—The word is found in the NT only in Rev 12<sup>3-17</sup> 13<sup>-4</sup> 11 16<sup>13</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>. In each case, with the exception of 13<sup>11</sup> ('as a dragon'), the reference is to the symbolical 'great red dragon' with seven heads and ten horns (12<sup>3</sup>) who is expressly identified with 'the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan' (v. 9; cf. 20-). When inquiry is made into the origin and meaning of the symbolism, it becomes evident that what we find in Rev. is an adoption and application to Christian purposes of certain conceptions that played a large part in the literature of pre-Christian Judaism, and had originally been suggested to the Jewish mind by its contact with the Babylonian mythology. The Apocryphal book of Bel and the Dragon testifies to the existence in Babylon of a dragon-worship that must have been associated with belief in the ancient dragon-myth which forms so important a feature of the Babylonian cosmogony. In the Creation-epic Tiamat is the power of chaos and darkness, personified as a gigantic dragon or monster of the deep, who is eventually overcome by Marduk, the god of light. In the post-exilic Jewish apocalyptic literature a dragon of the depths becomes the representative of the forces of evil and opposition to goodness and God. But it was characteristic of Judaism, with its fervent Messianic expectations, that the idea of a conflict between God and the dragon should be transferred from the past to the future, from cosmogony to history and eschatology, so that the revolt of the dragon and his subjection by the Divine might became an episode not of pre-historic ages but of the last days (cf. Is 27<sup>1</sup>, Dn 7<sup>3</sup>). In Rev. the visions of non-canonical as well as canonical apocalyptists have been freely made use of; and the Jewish features of the story of the dragon are apparent (cf. 12<sup>7</sup> with Eth. Enoch, xx. 5, Assumption of Moses, x. 2). But what is characteristic is that the figure and functions of the dragon are turned to Christian uses, so that they have a bearing upon Christ's earthly birth and heavenly glory (12<sup>5</sup>), upon the present conflict of Christianity with the world's evil powers and its victory over them by 'the blood of the Lamb' and 'the testimony of Jesus Christ' (vv. 11, 13, 17), and above all upon the assurance of Christian faith that God will destroy the dragon's present power to accuse His people and persecute them even unto death (vv. 16, 11, 13, 17), and will at the appointed time send forth His angel to subdue him utterly (20<sup>1-3</sup>).

DREAM.—'Dream' may be defined as a series of thoughts, images, or other mental states, which are experienced during sleep. The words that are most frequently translated 'dream' in the Bible are חלום and ὄραφ. In the OT dreams are described somewhat in detail, especially those of Jacob (Gn 28<sup>10-22</sup>), of Joseph (Gn 37<sup>5-10</sup>), of Nebuchadrezzar (Dn 2 and 4), and of Daniel (Dn 7). In the NT, the only instances given are those of the appearance of the angel to Joseph (Mt 1<sup>20-23</sup> 2<sup>13</sup> 19. 20), the dream of the Magi (Mt 2<sup>12</sup>), and the notable dream of Pilate's wife (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>). In spite of the fact that certain dreams are set out with considerable fullness of detail, the instances recorded are not numerous, which seems to indicate that God's revelations by this medium are to be regarded as exceptional and providential rather than as the usual means of communication of the Divine will. The Fathers were in the habit of warning the Christians against the tendency to consider dreams as omens in a superstitious sense.

The only references to dreams or dreaming in the apostolic writings are Ac 2<sup>17</sup> 'your old men shall dream dreams' (quoted from Jl 2<sup>28</sup>), and Jude<sup>8</sup> 'these also (the false teachers of v. 4) in their dreamings defile the flesh': the reference is understood by Bigg (Second Pet. and Jude [ICC, 1901]), following von Soden and Spitta, to be to the attempt of the false teachers to support their doctrines by revelations.

The earliest theories present the dream-world as real but remote—a region where the second self wanders in company with other second selves. The next stage is that of symbolic pictures unfolded to the inner organs of perception by some supernatural being. The general depression of vital activities during sleep may produce complete unconsciousness, especially during the early part of the night, but portions of the brain may be in activity in dreaming, with the accompanying partial consciousness. It was asserted by the Cartesians and Leibniz, and as stoutly denied by Locke, that the soul is always thinking; but many modern writers consider that dreaming takes place only during the process of waking. It is generally admitted that, whilst for the most part the material of our dreams is drawn from our waking experiences, the stimuli, external or internal, acting upon the sense organs during sleep produce the exaggerated and fantastic impressions in the mind which are woven into the fabric of our dreams. On the other hand, F. W. H. Myers (Human Personality) regards dreams, with certain other mental states, as being 'uprushes' from the subliminal self, and sleep with all its phenomena as the refreshing of the soul by the influences of the world of spirit. This view, if correct, would afford scope for the revelation of God's will as narrated in the biblical accounts, if not in exceptional experiences of the present time. At any rate, there is nothing in modern psychology to preclude the possibility of Divine manifestations in dreams. Many recent writers enjoin the cultivation of restfulness and repose of the soul in order that sleep may be beneficial and may not be disturbed by unpleasant dreams. George Macdonald sings in his Evening Hymn:

'Nor let me wander all in vain
Through dreams that mock and flee;
But even in visions of the brain
Go wandering toward Thee.'

DRUNKENNESS.—It may be taken for granted that the wine of the Bible was fermented, and therefore, when taken in excess, intoxicating. Unfermented wine is a modern concept. The ancients had not that knowledge of antiseptic precautions which would have enabled them to preserve the juice of the grape in an unfermented state. It was the inebriating property of wine that constituted the sting of the calumny with which the sanctimonious tried to injure our Lord—'Ἰσοῦ ἀνθρώπου οἰνοπότης' (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>). There would have been no scandal in His habitually partaking of a beverage which was never harmful. Christ bade men take heed lest their hearts should be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness (κραυπάλη καὶ μέθη, Lk 21<sup>34</sup>), but He evidently regarded it as possible to draw the line between the use and the abuse of wine. He was not a Nazirite, Rechabite, or Essene. A Palestinian movement against wine and strong drink might conceivably have been begun by the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>15</sup>), but not by Christ. His religion was not in its essence a system of ascetic negations; it was much more than one of the 'creeds which deny and restrain.' In His time and country, drunkenness, however pernicious in individual cases, could not be regarded as one of the deadly national sins.

'Orientals are not inclined to intemperance. The warm climate very quickly makes it a cause of discomfort and disease' (Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, 1898, p. 46). Moreover, 'the wines of Palestine may be assumed on the whole not to have exceeded the strength of an ordinary claret' (A. R. S. Kennedy, EBi iv. 5319).

It was Gentile rather than Jewish wine-drinking habits that Apostolic Christianity had to combat, and Bacchus (Dionysus) was notoriously one of the most powerful of the gods of Greece and Rome. The apostles did not fight against the social customs of pagan nations with a new legalism. It was not the Christian but the Judaizer or the Gnostic who repeated the parrot-cry, 'Handle not, taste not, touch not.' Christianity goes to work in a wholly different manner. It relies on the power of great positive truths. It creates a passion for high things which deadens the taste for low things. Its distinction is that it makes every man a legislator to himself. The inordinate use of wine and strong drink becomes morally impossible for a Christian, not because there is an external law which forbids it, but because his own enlightened conscience condemns it. St. Paul does not say to the Roman Christians, 'Let us walk lawfully, not in revelling and drunkenness,' but 'Let us walk becomingly' (εὐσχημόνως, Ro 13<sup>13</sup>). This means that there is a beautiful new σχῆμα, or ideal of conduct, of which every man becomes enamoured when he accepts the Christ in whom it is embodied. Thereafter he feels, with a shuddering repulsion, how ill it would become him to walk in 'revelling and drunkenness, chambering and wantonness.' He abjures the thought of being at once spiritual and sensual. Having put on the Lord Jesus Christ, he cannot continue to make provision for the flesh, to fulfil its lusts.

It is true that the moral verdicts of the Christian are not always immediate and sure. 'Manifest are the works of the flesh,' wrote St. Paul, naming among them 'drunkenness' (μέθαι, Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup>), but they were far from being so manifest to all his converts. The Christian conscience needed to be educated, the spiritual taste to be cultivated. At Corinth the ἀγάπη, or love-feast, which ended in the Lord's Supper, all too readily degenerated into something not very unlike the banquets in the idol temples. 'One is hungry, and another is drunken' (μεθύει, 1 Co 11<sup>21</sup>). 'Paul paints the scene in strong colours; but who would be warranted in saying that the reality fell at all short of the description?' (Meyer, Com. in loc.). It has always been one of the enchantments of Bacchus and Comus to make their devotees glory in their shame, so that they 'Not once perceive their foul disfigurement,

But boast themselves more comely than before'
(Milton, Comus, 741.).

That this is true of the vulgar and of the educated alike, both in pagan and in Christian times, is attested not only by a thousand drinking-songs but by the orgies of the 'Symposium' and the 'Noctes Ambrosianæ.' Yet even Omar Khayyam, after all his praise of the Vine, is obliged to confess that he has 'drowned his glory in a shallow cup'; and, in the light of Christianity, drunkenness stands condemned as a sin against the body which is a 'member of Christ.'

Christianity is a religion of principles, not of rules, and in Ro 14<sup>1</sup> St. Paul states a principle which justifies any kind and thoughtful man, apart from considerations of personal safety and happiness, in becoming an abstainer. In doing this the Apostle is far from imposing a new yoke of bondage. He does not categorically say to the Christian, 'Thou shalt not drink wine,' but he reasons that it is good (καλόν)—it is a beautiful morale—in certain conditions and from certain motives, to abstain. There was evidently a tendency among Christian liberals, who rightly gloried in their free evangelical position, to say, 'If men will pervert and abuse our example, we cannot help it; the fault is their own, and they must bear the consequences.' St. Paul, the freest of all, sees a more excellent way, and chooses to walk in it, though he does not exercise his apostolic authority to command others to follow him. What is his own liberty to drink a little wine in comparison with the temporal safety and eternal salvation of thousands who are unable to use the same freedom without stumbling? He cannot—no man can—live merely unto himself, and he would sooner be so far a Nazirite or an Essene than do anything to hurt a brother.

It is noticeable that there was never any organized movement in the Apostolic or post-Apostolic Church against the use of strong drink. Many of the Fathers, following the example of Philo—who wrote a book περί μέθης on Gn 9<sup>1</sup>—dealt with the subject at length. Clement, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine all preached moderation to every one and abstinence to some. But neither the apostles nor the Fathers ever dreamed of seeking legislation for the prohibition or even the restriction of the sale and use of intoxicating liquors. Since their time two things—the discovery of distilled liquors in the 13th cent., and the trend of civilization northward—have greatly altered the conditions of the problem.

'Extremists now place all alcohol-containing drinks under the same ban, but fermented liquors are still generally held to be comparatively innocuous; nor can any one deny that there is a difference. It is safe to say that if spirits had never been discovered the history of the question would have been entirely different' (A. Shadwell, EBR 11 xxvi. 578). 'The evils which it is desired to check are much greater in some countries than in others. . . . The inhabitants of south Europe are much less given to alcoholic excess than those of central Europe, who again are more temperate than those of the north' (ib. xvi. 759).

Just where the temptations to drunkenness are greatest, the Apostle's principle of self-denial for the sake of others is evidently the highest ethic. No drunkard can 'inherit the Kingdom of God' (1 Co 6<sup>10</sup>), and the task of Christian churches and governments is 'to make it easy for men to do good and difficult for them to do evil.'

Since, however, it is notoriously impossible to make men sober merely by legislation, the main factors in the problem must always be moral and religious. The Apostolic Church found the true solution. The Christians who were filled with the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost were mockingly said to be filled with wine (γλευκος, Ac 2<sup>13</sup>, perhaps 'sweet wine'; not 'new wine,' as Pentecost took place eight months after the vintage). St. Peter tried to convince the multitude that it was not a sensual but a spiritual intoxication, and St. Paul gives to all Christians the remarkable counsel, 'Be not drunken with wine, wherein is dissoluteness (ἀσωτία; cf. ἀσώτως in Lk 15<sup>13</sup>), but be filled with the Spirit' (Eph 5<sup>18</sup>). It is presupposed that every man naturally craves some form of exhilaration, loving to have his feelings excited, his imagination fired, his spirit thrilled. And drunkenness is the perversion of a true instinct. It is the fool's way of drowning care and rising victorious over the ills of life. Intoxication is the tragic parody of inspiration. What every man needs is a spiritual enthusiasm which completely diverts his thoughts from the pursuit of sensuous excitement, on the psychological principle that two conflicting passions cannot dominate the mind at the same time. That enthusiasm is the gift of the Divine Spirit.

The injunction to Timothy to be no longer a water-drinker (μηκέτι ὑδροπότει) but to use a little wine (1 Ti 5<sup>23</sup>) is now generally regarded as post-Pauline. It is 'evidently, in the context in which it stands, not merely a sanitary but quite as much a moral precept, and thus implies that Timothy had himself begun to abjure wine on grounds of personal sanctity' (F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894, p. 144). The words were probably written about the time of the first appearance of the Encratites (ERE v. 301), who made abstinence from flesh, wine, and marriage the chief part of their religion, seeking salvation not by faith but by asceticism. Water-drinking thus for a time became associated with a deadly error. This was a situation in which Christians felt it to be their duty to assert their right to use what they regarded as the creature and gift of God (1 Ti 4<sup>4-6</sup>). See, further, art. ABSTINENCE.

DRUSILLA (Ac 24<sup>24</sup>).—The youngest of the three daughters of Herod Agrippa I. She was but six years old when her father died in A.D. 44 (Jos. Ant. XIX. ix. 1). He had betrothed her to Epiphanes, son of the king of Commagene. This marriage did not take place, as Epiphanes refused to undergo the rite of circumcision (Ant. XX. vii. 1). Drusilla was given by her brother Agrippa II. to Azizus, king of Emesa. The marriage took place seemingly in A.D. 53. Very shortly afterwards the procurator Felix, who had lately come to Judæa, met the young queen and was captivated by her charms ('She did indeed exceed all other women in beauty' [Ant. XX. vii. 2]). Employing as his emissary one Simon, a Cypriote, he persuaded her to leave her husband and to join him as his third wife—and third queen ('trium reginarum maritum,' writes Suetonius of Felix [Claud. xxviii.]). Of this union there was issue a son, who was given the name Agrippa, and of whom Josephus (Ant. XX. vii. 2) records incidentally that he and his wife perished in the eruption of Vesuvius in the reign of the Emperor Titus, i.e. in A.D. 79. Of Drusilla herself nothing is recorded later than the statement in Acts, which permits us to assume that she was present when St. Paul had audience of Felix, and used the opportunity to reason 'of righteousness, and temperance, and the judgment to come.'

DYSENTERY (AV 'bloody flux'; Gr. δυσεν-τέριον, Ac 28<sup>9</sup>).—When St. Paul and his companions, on their way to Rome, were shipwrecked on the island of Malta, the father of Publius who was governor of the island was suffering from this malady in an aggravated form. The symptoms of the disease are inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine, mucous, bloody, difficult, and painful evacuations, accompanied with more or less fever. Owing to Publius' kindness to the little group of delayed travellers, the Apostle visited his father, 'prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him.' This was evidently a case of mental healing, made effective by prayer and personal contact.

EAGLE (ἀετός, Rev 4<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>14</sup>).—There can be but little doubt that the 'eagle' of the EV ought in most cases rather to be rendered 'vulture.' Both the Hebrew word נָשׁוּף (in the OT) and the Greek word ἀετός (in the NT) are used to designate 'vulture' as well as 'eagle,' and it is a bird of this species rather than an eagle that is generally referred to both in the OT and the NT, though in the above-mentioned passages it is just possible that ἀετός may denote an eagle.

Four kinds of vultures are known in Palestine (cf. Tristram, SWP: 'The Fauna and Flora of Palestine,' 1884, p. 94), viz. (1) Gypætus barbatus; (2) Gyps fulvus, or 'griffon'; (3) Neophron percnopterus, the 'Egyptian vulture'; (4) Vultur monachus (cf. Post in HDB i. 632). The Gyps fulvus or

'griffon' is supposed to be referred to in most of the passages in the OT and the NT.

There are said to be eight different kinds of eagle in Palestine: (1) Aquila chrysaetos, or 'Golden Eagle.' This is seen in winter all over Palestine, but in summer it is only to be found in the mountain ranges of Lebanon and Hermon. (2) Aquila heliaca, or 'Imperial Eagle,' which is more common than the Golden Eagle, and does not leave its winter haunts in summer time. The Imperial Eagle prefers to make its nest in trees rather than cliffs, and in this respect differs from the Golden Eagle. (3) Aquila clanga, or 'Greater Spotted Eagle.' (4) Aquila rapax, or 'Tawny Eagle,' which is found fairly frequently in the wooded districts of Palestine. This bird breeds in the cliffs, and plunders other birds of their prey. (5) Aquila pennata, or 'Booted Eagle,' which is found chiefly in the wooded parts of Galilee, the Lebanon and Phœnicia. (6) Aquila nipalensis, or 'Steppe Eagle.' (7) Aquila bonelli, or 'Bonelli's Eagle,' which is not uncommon in the wadis and rocky districts of Central Palestine. This bird is more like a falcon than an eagle. (8) Circetus gallicus, or 'Short-toed Eagle.' This is by far the commonest of all Palestinian eagles. They remain from early spring to the beginning of winter, when most of them migrate, probably to Arabia. This fearless and dignified bird is easily recognized by its large flat head, huge yellow eyes, and brightly spotted breast. Its short toes and tarsi are covered with scales which afford it protection against the serpents on which it preys. The abundance of this species is doubtless accounted for by the large number of lizards and serpents found in Palestine. It is found throughout Central Europe, but only rarely; on the other hand, it is seen fairly often in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. It breeds in trees and not on rocks.

In Rev 4<sup>7</sup> the eagle plays a part in the vision of the throne in heaven: 'And the first creature was like a lion, and the second creature like a calf, and the third creature had a face as of a man, and the fourth creature was like a flying eagle.' These four forms, which suggest all that is strongest, noblest, wisest, and swiftest in animate nature, are the same as those in Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1<sup>10</sup>), but here the order is different, and each 'living creature' has six wings, while in Ezekiel each has only four wings. Nature, including man, is thus represented before the Throne as consciously or unconsciously taking its part in the fulfilment of the will of the Divine.

In Rev 8<sup>13</sup>: 'And I saw, and I heard an eagle, flying in mid heaven, saying with a great voice, Woe, woe, woe, for them that dwell on the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels who are yet to sound,' the eagle appears as the herald of calamity. The first series of four trumpet-blasts have gone forth, and the forces of Nature have done their work ruthlessly, but the worst is yet to come. The eagle—which, it will be noted, was heard as well as seen—is chosen on account of its swiftness as a fitting emblem of the judgment about to fall upon the pagan population of the world.

In Rev 12<sup>14</sup> the eagle is the means whereby the woman—i.e. the Christian Church—is conveyed away from the dragon and his fury to a place of safety in the wilderness. The actual event alluded to was no doubt the escape of the Church of Jerusalem to Pella (cf. Mk 13<sup>14</sup> 'then let them that are in Judæa flee unto the mountains'), though the life of the Church and her members must always to some extent be a solitary life—i.e. in the world but not of it—and her vocation will, from one point of view, always be that of a 'voice crying in the wilderness.' Again, in the early days of Christianity persecution made secrecy necessary for the very existence of the Church. The figure in Rev 12<sup>14</sup> is paralleled in the OT. Thus in Ex 19<sup>4</sup> Jahweh is represented as saying, 'Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself,' while in Dt 32<sup>11</sup> He is likened unto an eagle: 'As an eagle that stirreth up her nest, that fluttereth over her young, he spread abroad his wings, he took them, he bare them on his pinions.' Lastly, in Is 40<sup>31</sup> the promise to those who shall 'wait upon the Lord' is that 'they shall renew their strength,' and 'mount up with wings as eagles.' In all the passages in Revelation, it is probable that ἀερός denotes 'vulture' as elsewhere.

EAR.—The finer shades of biblical statement are discerned only as we succeed in placing ourselves at the contemporary point of view. This is particularly the case with references to personality and its elements or manifestations, since primitive or ancient psychology differs so greatly from the psychology of the present time. For example, primitive psychology, in its ignorance of the nervous system, distributes psychical and ethical attributes to the various physical organs. There are tribes that give the ears of a dead enemy to their youths to be eaten, because they regard the physical ear as the seat of intelligence, which thus becomes an attribute of the consumer (J. G. Frazer, The Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, 1900, ii. 357 f.). Though the Bible contains nothing so crude as this, yet the same idea of localized psychical function underlies its references to the ear. The high priest's ear is consecrated by the application of ram's blood, that he may the better hear God (Lv 8<sup>23</sup>); the slave's ear, on his renunciation of liberty, is pierced by his master, as a guarantee of his permanent obedience (Ex 21<sup>6</sup>, Dt 15<sup>17</sup>). Such practices help to give the true line of approach to many biblical references to the ear, the full force of which might otherwise be missed. The 'peripheral consciousness' of the ear (cf. 1 S 3<sup>11</sup>, Job 12<sup>11</sup>, Ec 1<sup>8</sup>, etc.) must be remembered in regard to phrases which have become to us simply conventional, such as the repeated refrain of the Apocalypse, 'He that hath an ear, let him hear' (Rev 2<sup>7</sup>, etc.; oûs). This greater intensity of local meaning gives new point to the Pauline analogy between the human body and the Church. Since 'the body is not one member, but many' (1 Co 12<sup>14</sup>), in a psychical and moral, as well as in a physical, sense, it is more readily conceivable that the ear might resent its inferiority to the eye (v. <sup>16</sup>). Its actual co-operation with the eye is therefore a more effective rebuke to the envy springing from Corinthian individualism.

Moral or spiritual qualities are assigned to the ear in several passages, according to the frequent OT usage (Pr 15<sup>31</sup>, Is 59<sup>1</sup>, etc.); one example is quoted from the OT and applied by St. Paul to the Jews of Rome: 'their ears are dull of hearing' (Ac 28<sup>27</sup>; cf. Ro 11<sup>8</sup>). The same charge is brought by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews against those to whom he writes (5<sup>11</sup>; ἀκοαί, not οὐς). This attribution of quality to the organ does not, of course, imply naturalistic determinism; the ear is part of the responsible personality. If men 'having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts,' it is because 'they will turn away their ears from the truth' (2 Ti 4<sup>31</sup>; ἀκοή). The OT reference to the 'uncircumcised' ear (Jer 6<sup>10</sup>) is several times repeated (Ac 7<sup>51</sup>; Ep. Barn. ix. 4, x. 12).

The only significant act named in this literature in reference to the ear is that of those who hear Stephen declare his vision of Jesus at the right hand of God: they stop their ears, that the blasphemy may not enter (Ac 7<sup>57</sup>). Ignatius writes to the Ephesians (ix. 1), with reference to false teachers, 'ye stopped your ears, so that ye might not receive the seed sown by them.' Irenæus (ap. Eus. HE v. 20) says of Polycarp that 'if that blessed and apostolic presbyter had heard any such thing [as the Gnosticism of Florinus], he would have cried out, and stopped his ears.' The baptismal practice of a later age protected the ear of the candidate by the Effeta (Ephphatha), a rite based on the miracle recorded in Mk 7<sup>33</sup>. The priest touched the ear with his finger moistened with saliva (Duchesne, Origines du Culte Chrétien, 1908, p. 311). The positive side of the baptismal anointing of the ear seems to be implied in the Odes of Solomon, ix. 1: 'Open your ears, and I will speak to you' (cf. J. H. Bernard, TS viii. 3 [1912] ad loc.). For the apostles, therefore, the ear forms the correlate to 'the word of faith which we preach' (Ro 10<sup>15</sup>), which is conceived with equal pregnancy of meaning as the vehicle of the Spirit (E. Sokolowski, Die Begriffe Geist und Leben bei Paulus, 1903, pp. 263-267). Through the response of the conscious ear to the spoken word, an experience is begun which eventually passes into the realm of those 'things which ear heard not' (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1 Clem. xxxiv. 8, 2 Clem. xi. 7), and of those 'unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter' (2 Co 12<sup>4</sup>). H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

EARNEST (ἀρραβών).—The word occurs three times in the NT, viz. 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup> 'the earnest of the Spirit,' and Eph 1<sup>14</sup> 'the earnest of our inheritance.' The word means 'pledge,' 'surety,' 'assurance,' and is taken from an old Hebrew term used in connexion with the transference of property. The Hebrew equivalent אַרְבֶּון is found in Gn 38<sup>17</sup>. 18. 20 referring to the pledge of a staff and a signet-ring given by Judah to Tamar as an assurance that she would receive her hire. Probably the word came into Greek through Phœnician traders, and we find it in Latin in three forms: arrhābo, arrābo (e.g. Plautus, Truc. III. ii. 20), and arrha (e.g. Aulus Gellius, XVII. ii. 21). It is found in the form arra or arrhes in the languages most directly derived from the Latin. The Scotch word 'arles'—the coin given by a master to a servant on engagement as a pledge that the fee will be duly paid—is derived from the same source, and corresponds to the obsolete English word 'earlespenny.' The word signifies, not merely a pledge, but also a part of the possession. In the conveyance of property in ancient times it was usual for the seller to give the buyer a handful of earth or part of the thatch of the house as a token that the bargain would be binding, and that the whole property, of which the buyer thus received a part, would be delivered over in due course.

In Scripture the idea underlying this conception is frequently referred to. Thus in Gn 24<sup>2</sup>. 5<sup>5</sup> the ear-rings and the bracelets given by Eliezer to Rebecca are tokens of the wealth of his master and evidence of a comfortable home in Canaan. In the NT passages the Holy Spirit which is given to believers is regarded by the Apostle as both the pledge and the first-fruits of the inheritance that awaits them. In 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup> 'the earnest of the Spirit' is the earnest which is the Spirit. The present possessions of Christian believers imparted by the Spirit are both pledge and foretaste of the future bliss that awaits them. They are the 'earnest' of the 'inheritance' (Eph 1<sup>14</sup>).

W. F. BOYD.

EARTH, EARTHEN, EARTHY, EARTHLY.—Earth (γῆ) is used in a variety of meanings, which may be distinguished as follows: (1) the dust or matter of which the first man was made (1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>); (2) the fertile soil which yields grass and herbs and fruit (He 6<sup>7</sup>, Ja 5<sup>7</sup>, Rev 9<sup>4</sup>); (3) the solid ground upon which men stand or fall (Ac 9<sup>4</sup>. 8); (4) the land in contrast with the sea (2 P 3<sup>5</sup>, Rev 10<sup>5</sup>); (5) the whole world as the abode of men (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>, etc.; equivalent here to the more frequent οἰκουμένη) or beasts (Ac 10<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>6</sup>); (6) the earth in space, in contrast with the visible heavens—skies and stars (Ac 2<sup>19</sup>, Rev 6<sup>13</sup>); (7) the earth in contrast with the invisible heavens—the dwelling-place of God and Christ, of angels and perfected saints (Ac 7<sup>49</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>, Eph 3<sup>15</sup>, He 8<sup>1</sup>; cf. v. 1); (8) the earth in contrast with the underworld (Ph 2<sup>10</sup>, Rev 5<sup>2</sup>. 13); (9) the earth with a moral connotation, as the sphere of a merely worldly life to which is opposed the heavenly life with Christ in God (Col 3<sup>2</sup>. 5).

Earthen (οστρακινος, fr. οστρακον = 'burnt clay,' or anything made therefrom).—The Gr. word occurs twice in the NT, but in EV is only once translated 'earthen.' In 2 Ti 2<sup>20</sup> the rendering is 'of earth,' and the reference is simply to the material of the earthen vessels in contrast with those of gold and silver and wood. In 2 Co 4<sup>7</sup>, where 'earthen' is used, there appears to be a suggestion not only of the meanness of the earthen vessels in contrast with the preciousness of the treasure they contain, but of their frailty in contrast with the exceeding greatness of the Divine power of God who uses them as His instruments.

Earthy (χοϊκος, 'made of earth,' fr. χοῦς = 'earth,' 'dust,' by which in the LXX ἔρα is rendered in Gn 2<sup>7</sup>, etc.; though in other passages γῆ is frequently employed for the same purpose, just as it is by St. Paul in 1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>).—The only occurrence of the word is in 1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>. 48. 49, where Adam is called 'earthy,' i.e. consisting of earth-material, in contrast with Christ, the 'heavenly,' i.e. of heavenly origin. The meaning of 'earthy' here is thus suggested by (7) above as well as by (1).

Earthly (ἐπιγῆιος, 'upon the earth,' 'terrestrial,' 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>, Ph 3<sup>19</sup>, Ja 3<sup>15</sup>).—Outside of the Fourth Gospel 'earthly' occurs only 3 times in the NT, but ἐπιγῆιος is found also in 1 Co 15<sup>40</sup>, where EV renders 'terrestrial,' and Ph 2<sup>10</sup>, where EV gives 'things on earth.' In all these passages there is a contrast of the earthly with the heavenly. In 1 Co 15<sup>40</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup> the contrast is that suggested under (7). In Ph 3<sup>19</sup>, Ja 3<sup>15</sup> it is that suggested under (9). In Ph 2<sup>10</sup>, while 'things on earth' are contrasted with 'things in heaven,' the meaning of ἐπιγῆιος itself is that suggested by (5), the 'things on earth' being the inhabitants of the whole world; and there is a further contrast with the 'things under the earth,' the inhabitants of the underworld (cf. (8)).

EARTHQUAKE (σεισμός, from σείω, 'to shake').—In the ancient East all abnormal phenomena were regarded as supernatural, and any attempt to explain them by secondary causes was discouraged as savouring of irreverent prying into hidden things. Being at once so mysterious and so terrible, earthquakes and volcanoes were traced to the direct activity of One 'who looketh upon the earth and it trembleth; he toucheth the mountains and they smoke' (Ps 104<sup>2</sup>). Minor tremors were not, indeed, always interpreted as signs of the Divine displeasure; sometimes quite the contrary. When a company of disciples were praising God and praying after the release of St. Peter and St. John from prison, the shaking of the room was regarded as a token that the Lord Himself was at hand to defend His cause. But more severe shocks were always apt to cause a panic fear, which was naturally greatest in the breasts of those who were conscious of guilt. When St. Paul and Silas were praying and singing in a Philippian gaol, the place was shaken by an earthquake violent enough to open the doors and loose every man's bands (Ramsay's explanations [St. Paul, 1895, p. 221] are interesting); but terror prevented the prisoners from seizing the opportunity of escaping, and the chance was past before they had recovered their wits.

Earthquakes play a great rôle in prophetic and apocalyptic literature. God's last self-manifestation, like the first at Sinai, is to be in an earthquake, and His voice will make not only the earth but also the heaven tremble. While the things that are shaken will be removed, those that are unshaken (τὰ μὴ σαλευόμενα) will remain, the temporal giving place to the eternal (He 12:<sup>28-29</sup>; cf. Hag 2:<sup>6</sup>). When the sixth seal of the Book of Destiny is opened, there is a great earthquake (Rev 6:<sup>12</sup>). When the censer filled with fire is cast upon the earth, there follow thunders and an earthquake (8<sup>9</sup>). In another earthquake the tenth part of a great city falls (probably Jerusalem is meant, though some think of Rome) and 7000 persons are killed (11:<sup>13</sup>). When the last bowl is poured upon the air, the greatest earthquake ever felt cleaves Jerusalem into three parts, and entirely destroys the pagan cities (16:<sup>16</sup>).

The writer of the Revelation may himself have experienced many earthquakes, and at any rate he could not but be familiar with reports of such visitations, for in Asia Minor they were frequent and disastrous. In A.D. 17 'twelve populous cities of Asia'—among them Sardis and Philadelphia—'fell in ruins from an earthquake which happened by night' (Tac. Ann. ii. 47). In A.D. 60 'Laodicea, one of the famous cities of Asia,' was 'prostrated by an earthquake' (ib. xiv. 27). Palestine and Syria were very liable to similar disturbances; regarding earthquakes in Jerusalem see G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, 1907-08, i. 61 ff.

The religious impression made by earthquakes in pre-scientific ages was profound (see e.g. Mt 27:<sup>54</sup>). They were regarded as judgments or warnings, it might be as signs of the approaching end of the world, 'the beginning of travail' (Lk 13:<sup>3</sup>=Mt 24:<sup>8</sup>). Even Pliny, the ardent student of Nature, asserts that they are invariably precursors of calamity (HN ii. 81-86). The just man of the Stoics was undismayed by them: 'si fractus illabatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae' (Hor. Car. III. iii. 7 f.). Jesus assured His disciples that amid all the 'Messianic woes' not a hair of their head should perish (Lk 21:<sup>18</sup>).

It was not till the middle of the 19th cent. that a careful investigation of the phenomena of earthquakes was begun. Seismology is now an exact science, in which remarkable progress has been made in Japan, a land of earthquakes. But while man rationalizes such calamities, and can no longer regard them as strictly supernatural, he is practically as helpless as ever in their presence. In the earthquake of 1908 which destroyed Messina and Reggio (the Rhegium of Ac 28:<sup>13</sup>) the loss of life was appalling.

EASTER.—See PASSOVER.

EBIONISM.—Ebionism is best understood as the generic name under which may be included a variety of movements, diverging more or less from Catholic Christianity, and primarily due to a conception of the permanent validity of the Jewish Law. Of these, some were merely tolerable and tolerant peculiarities; some were intolerable and intolerant perversions of Christianity.

As soon as Christianity became conscious of its world-wide mission, the problem arose as to its relation to the Judaism out of which it sprang. This produced what we might a priori expect—a difference within the primitive Christian community between a liberal and a conservative tendency. It was a liberalism which steadily advanced, a conservatism which as steadily hardened and became more intolerant, and drifted further out of likeness to normal Christianity. Jewish Christian conservatism in its different degrees and phases gives rise to the various species of Ebionism.

1. Characteristics.—All Ebionites are distinguished by two main and common characteristics: (1) an over-exaltation of the Jewish Law; (2) a defective Christology. We may take the first as fundamental. The second is deducible from it. To hold by the validity of the Law is obviously to find no adequate place for the work of a Redeemer (Gal 5<sup>4</sup>). Christ tends to be recognized merely as a new prophet enforcing the old truth. And defective views of the work of Christ logically issue in, if they are not based upon, defective views of His Person. It is clear also, that those who hold the Law to be permanent, cannot consistently accept the authority of St. Paul, so we find that (3) hostility to St. Paul, involving the rejection of his Epistles, was a characteristic common, not to all, but to many, Ebionites.

2. Main groups.—There are three distinct classes of Ebionites. Ancient authorities speak of two sects of Ebionites, the more nearly orthodox of which they call Nazarenes. It is necessary, however, to add as a third group those Ebionites whose system results from a union of other elements with the original mixture of Judaism and Christianity. Our classification, therefore, of the Ebionite sects is: (1) Nazarenes, (2) Ebionites proper, (3) Syncretistic Ebionites.

The clear division into two sects, named Nazarenes and Ebionites, appears in the 4th cent. in Epiphanius (Hær. xxx. 1) and Jerome (Ep. 112, ad August. 13). But in the preceding cent. Origen speaks of 'the two-fold sect of the Ebionites' (c. Cels. v. 61), though he has not the name Nazarene. In the 2nd cent. Justin Martyr divides Jewish Christians into two classes: those who, while they observed the Law themselves, did not require believing Gentiles to comply therewith, and who were willing to associate with them; and those who refused to recognize all who had not complied with the Law (Dial. c. Tryph. xlvii.). Justin has neither name. At the end of the same cent., we find the name Ebionite for the first time in Irenæus (adv. Hær. I. xxvi. 2, etc.). He has no distinction between Ebionites and Nazarenes, and in this Hippolytus and Tertullian follow him. It is not surprising that only writers who had special opportunity of familiarity with Palestinian Christianity should be aware of the distinction.

3. Name.—In all probability both names, Nazarenes and Ebionites, applied originally to all Jewish Christians. It was not unnatural that they should be called Nazarenes (Ac 24:<sup>6</sup>); it was not unnatural that they should call themselves Ebionites, a name signifying 'the poor' (Heb. עֲבִיּוֹן, 'ebyôn). We know that the Ebionites identified themselves with the Christians of Ac 4:<sup>34</sup>, and claimed the blessing of Lk 6:<sup>20</sup> (Epiphanius xxx. 17). (Gal 2:<sup>10</sup> is an interesting verse in this connexion. It seems clear that 'the poor,' if not a name for the whole Christian community of Jerusalem, is to be understood at least of Jewish Christian poor.) Or, on the other hand, the name may have been attached to Jewish Christians in contempt. At all events, we may take it as highly probable that the two names were originally designations of Jewish Christians generally, and the retention of those primitive names is in keeping with the essentially conservative character of Ebionism.

Some of the Fathers (the earliest of them Tertullian) derive the name Ebionite from a certain teacher, Ebion. In modern times Hilgenfeld is inclined to support this view (Ketzer-geschichte, 1884, p. 422 ff.), but it is highly probable that this is a mistake, and that Ebion had no more existence than Gnosticus, the supposed founder of Gnosticism. Origen has another explanation of the name Ebionite as descriptive of the poverty of the dogmatic conceptions of the sect. This is but an interesting coincidence.

4. Nazarenes.—We begin with the Nazarenes, who came nearest orthodoxy, and are to be considered not as heretics, but as a sect of Jewish Christians. Our information regarding them is scanty, and several details are obscure. Our main and almost sole authorities are Jerome (de Vir. illustr. iii., and some references scattered in his Commentaries) and Epiphanius (Hær. xxix.). The latter, who on almost every subject must be used with the greatest caution, is in this particular case specially confused, but has the candour to admit that his knowledge of the Nazarenes is limited. Jerome had opportunity of gaining accurate acquaintance with their views, and unless we admit his authority, we have practically no knowledge of the sect at all.

Mainly from Jerome, then, we learn that the views of the Nazarenes on the three important points (bindingness of the Law, Christology, authority of St. Paul) were as follows:

(a) As to the Law, they held that it was binding on themselves, and continued to observe it. They seem, however, to have distinguished the Mosaic Law from the ordinances of the Rabbis, and to have rejected the latter (so Kurtz, Hist. of Christian Church, Eng. tr., 1860, vol. i. § 48, 1). They did not regard the Law as binding on Gentile Christians, and did not decline fellowship with them. They honoured the Prophets highly.

(b) As to Christ, they acknowledged His Messiahship and Divinity. They termed Him the First-born of the Holy Spirit from His birth. At His baptism the whole fount of the Holy Spirit (omnis fons Spiritus Sancti) descended on Him. They accepted the Virgin-birth. They looked for His millennial reign on earth. They mourned the unbelief of their Jewish brethren, and prayed for their conversion.

(c) They bore no antipathy to St. Paul, and accepted his Epistles. They used a Gospel according to Matthew in Hebrew (see below). We shall comment on these views below, in connexion with those of the Ebionites proper.

5. Ebionites proper.—In strong contrast to the Nazarenes stand the Ebionites proper, regarding whom our information is fuller and clearer. Our main authorities are Irenæus (adv. Hær. i. xxvii., iii. xv., v. iii.), Hippolytus (Hær. vii. 22, x. 18), Epiphanius (Hær. xxx.), and Tertullian (de Præscr. Hær. xxxiii.). Eusebius (HE iii. 27) and Theodoret (Hær. Fab. ii. 2) may also be mentioned. In the main these give a consistent account, which may be summarized as follows:

(a) The Ebionites not only continued to observe the Law themselves, but held its observances as absolutely necessary for salvation and binding on all, and refused fellowship with all who did not comply with it.

(b) As to Christ, their views were Cerinthian (see art. CERINTHUS). Jesus is the Messiah, yet a mere man, born by natural generation to Joseph and Mary. On His baptism, a higher Spirit united itself with Him, and so He became the Messiah. He became Christ, they further taught, by perfectly fulfilling the Law; and by perfectly fulfilling it they too could become Christs (Hippol. Phil. vii. 22). They agreed with the Nazarenes in expecting a millennial reign on earth. In their view, this was to be Christ's compensation for His death, which was an offence to them.

(c) The Ebionites denounced St. Paul as a heretic, circulated foolish stories to his discredit, and rejected all his Epistles as unauthoritative. They agreed with the Nazarenes in accepting a Hebrew gospel, and in addition had certain spurious writings which bore the names of apostles—James, Matthew, and John (Epiphanius, Hær. xxx. 23). This Hebrew gospel used by Nazarenes and Ebionites was in all probability the Gospel according to the Hebrews, of which only fragments have survived. With this work we are not here concerned. It is in place to say that most likely it was a Nazarene production. In ancient writers it is sometimes attributed to the twelve apostles, more often to Matthew. The Ebionite version was accommodated to their peculiar views by both mutilation and interpolation; thus it omitted the first two chapters, and began the life of Jesus with the baptism. For full treatment of this subject see E. B. Nicholson, The Gospel according to the Hebrews, 1879.

From the information at our disposal we cannot say how rapidly Ebionism developed, nor estimate the position it had reached by the close of the 1st century. No doubt all the essential elements were active before then. In the NT itself we see the process well begun. Dating from the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15), we can see not only the possibility but the actuality of the rise of three distinct groups of Jewish Christians: (a) those who embraced Christianity in all its fullness, and developed with it; (b) those who accepted the indefinite compromise represented in the finding of the Council, and did not advance beyond it, which is essentially the position of the Nazarenes; (c) those who did not agree with the finding, and continued to protest against it, which is the starting-point of the Ebionites proper. We see them carrying on an active propaganda against the liberal school whose leader was St. Paul. The Epistle to the Galatians (g.v.) is St. Paul's polemic against them. In Corinth, too, they have been active (2 Co 10-13). After the Fall of Jerusalem, just as Judaism became more intolerant and more exclusive, so we may suppose this judaizing sect followed suit, and, retiring more and more from fellowship with the Church at large, and seeking to strengthen their own position, they by degrees formulated the system we have described.

In brief, then, while the Nazarenes are only Christians of a stunted growth, the Ebionites proper are heretics holding a system that is false to the real spirit of Christianity. While the Nazarenes are Judaistic, the Ebionites are Judaizers. Neither Nazarenes nor Ebionites seem to have been of great influence. The latter were the more wide-spread, and, we may suppose, the more numerous. While the Nazarenes were practically confined to Palestine and Syria, Ebionites seem to have been found in Asia Minor, Cyprus, and as far west as Rome.

6. Syncretistic Ebionites.—The most conservative movement could not escape the syncretistic tendencies of the age with which we are dealing. We have notices of several varieties which we class together as Syncretistic Ebionites.

(a) The first of these we may term the Ebionites of Epiphanius. Epiphanius agrees with Irenæus in describing the Ebionites as we have done above. But he adds several details of which there is no trace in Irenæus. Making all allowances for the generally unsatisfactory character of Epiphanius as an accurate historian, we cannot set aside what he reports so clearly. The easiest explanation is that the Ebionites of Irenaeus developed into the Ebionites of Epiphanius, i.e. Ebionism as a whole became syncretistic. The Ebionites of Epiphanius show traces of Samaritanism and an influence which we may with great probability term Essenic. The former is shown in their rejection of the Prophets later than Joshua, and of Kings David and Solomon (Hær. xxx. 18). The latter is manifest in their abstinence from flesh and wine, their rejection of sacrifices, their oft-repeated, even daily, baptism (xxx. 15, 16).

The siege and fall of Jerusalem were events of the greatest importance for Judaism (see art. PHARISEES) and Jewish Christianity alike. Jews and Christians, including Ebionites, settled east of the Jordan. There they came into close contact with a Judaism that was far from pure. The most important form of this was Essenism (see art. ESSENES). There were also the Nasaræans, who exhibited the very peculiarities described in the Ebionites by Epiphanius, except perhaps as regards the baptisms (Epiphanius, Hær. xviii.). If, as seems probable, the Order of Essenes was broken up after the Fall of Jerusalem, it is very likely that many of them would associate with the Ebionites, who held the Law in such esteem, and would be able to impress their own customs on their associates.

(b) A still more pronounced Essenic influence is patent when we consider the Elkesaites. The Book of Elkesai was in great repute among Essenes, Nasaræans, and other trans-Jordanic sects, and Ebionites accepted it also (Epiphanius, Hær. xxx. 3). The book appeared about A.D. 100. Hippolytus (Phil. ix. 8-12) gives details regarding it. Its main points are: bindingness of the Law; substitution of frequent baptisms for sacrifices; rejection of the Prophets and St. Paul; Christ's appearance in Adam and others; permissibility of formal idolatry in times of persecution; magic, astrology, prophecy. This is specially interesting because we trace here a germ of Gnostic doctrine.

Gnostic tendencies are still more pronounced in the Ebionism of the Clementine Literature, which, however, falls outside the period we are concerned with. Gnosticism has there advanced sufficiently to induce even a more favourable view of St. Paul. The union of Ebionism with Gnosticism is one of the strangest cases of extremes meeting. In most things the two movements are completely antithetical: one practically denied Christ's humanity, the other His Divinity; one made salvation depend on obedience to the Law, the other on speculative knowledge. Yet the two met in a strange amalgam. The explanation lies in the Essenism with which Ebionism entered into relation. It was already a Gnosticism of a sort. Ebionism ran its course till about the 5th cent., when in all its forms it was extinct. It was despised by Jews and Christians alike, and had no strength to maintain itself, as is shown by the unnatural union it entered into with its own antithesis.

EDIFICATION.—The term (οικοδομή) means literally 'building up.' The figurative sense of building up spiritually has two applications in apostolic usage. (1) It signifies the spiritual advancement, in a general way, of the Church. (2) It is the special process or didactic means whereby the faith, knowledge, and experience of individuals were established and enlarged.

In AV οικοδομή and the cognate verb οικοδομῶ, in the figurative sense, are translated 'edification' or 'edify' 19 times. The two meanings indicated above are more apparent in RV, where 'building up' is often employed to express the more general idea, especially where, as in Eph 4<sup>12</sup>, 'the picturesqueness of the metaphor must be preserved' (Armitage Robinson, Ephesians, 1903, p. 182), while 'edification' or 'edify' occurs 14 times. Half of these are found in 1 Co 14, where they bear the special meaning.

1. General.—The figurative use of the term οικοδομή for that which builds up generally the Church and the spiritual life of individuals within the Christian community is almost exclusively Pauline. The germ of the idea is probably to be found in the saying of Christ (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>) concerning the building of His Church (Lightfoot, Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, 1895, p. 191). But St. Paul frequently applies the metaphor of building to the structure and growth of the Christian life (1 Co 3<sup>9f</sup>, Eph 2<sup>20f</sup>, Col 2<sup>7</sup>; cf. 1 P 2<sup>5</sup>). Edification is the promotion of this building up process by speech (Eph 4-<sup>9</sup>) or conduct (Ro 15<sup>9</sup>). Three elements in the Church contribute to it—peace, both external (Ac 9<sup>31</sup>) and internal (Ro 14<sup>19</sup>); love (Eph 4<sup>15f</sup>), in contrast especially with boasted knowledge (1 Co 8<sup>1</sup>) or self-seeking (10<sup>3f</sup>); and service (διακονία) wherein each may share in the ministering of all (Eph 4<sup>11f</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>11</sup>).

2. Special.—In its specialized use, οικοδομή is a technical term for the exercise of 'spiritual gifts' (χαρίσματα) within the Christian congregation by its members, for the mutual 'edification' of individuals. St. Paul's description of the variety and exercise of these endowments in Corinth (1 Co 12 and 14) is probably true of most places in which the Church was established. There were evidently meetings held almost exclusively for 'edification,' to which unbelievers were admitted (1 Co 14<sup>34f</sup>). It was not a formal service for Divine worship, but rather a fellowship meeting with the practical aim of affording members with a 'gift' an opportunity of using their supernaturally bestowed powers for the spiritual welfare of all present (1 Co 12<sup>6</sup>; cf. 1 P 4<sup>10f</sup>). At such times the most notable contributions would be: (a) teaching (διδάχη), which included the 'word of wisdom' and the 'word of knowledge' (1 Co 12<sup>8</sup>); (b) prophecy (προφητεία), which dealt with future events (Ac 11<sup>3</sup>) or revealed an insight into the needs of those present (1 Co 14<sup>3, 24f</sup>); (c) glossolalia or tongues (γλῶσσοι), which were probably incomprehensible utterances expressive of prayer or praise (v. 13).

Closely connected with prophecy was 'discerning of spirits,' and with glossolalia 'the interpretation of tongues' (1 Co 12<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>27ff</sup>). In addition there would be prayer, the reciting or singing of hymns, the reading of Scripture, and the 'word of exhortation' (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>, Eph 5<sup>19</sup>, Col 3<sup>16</sup>, Ac 13<sup>15</sup>).

In order that genuine edification might result from such a variety of gifts, exercised often under stress of great excitement, two rules were laid down for the Corinthian Church: (1) the comparative value of χαρίσματα must be recognized—e.g. prophecy is superior to 'tongues' for purposes of edification (1 Co 14<sup>1-5</sup>); (2) there must be an observance of due order in the meetings (vv. 26-40).

EDUCATION.—1. Jewish.—The Jews from early times prized education in a measure beyond the nations around them. It was the key to the knowledge of their written Law, the observance of which was required by the whole people without respect of rank or class. They were the people of a Book, and wherever there is a written literature, and that religiously binding, elementary education, at least in the forms of reading and writing, is imperative and indispensable. The rise of the synagogue, and of the order of Scribes in connexion therewith, exercised a powerful influence upon the progress of education among the mass of the people. In the 4th cent. B.C. there was a synagogue in every town, and in the 2nd cent. in every considerable village as well. To the synagogues there were in all probability attached schools, both elementary and higher, and the hazzān ('the attendant,' Lk 4<sup>o</sup> RV) may well have been the teacher. The value of education was understood among the Jews before the Christian era. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs we read: 'Do ye also teach your children letters, that they may have understanding all their life, reading unceasingly the Law of God' ('Levi,' xiii. 2). In the Psalms of Solomon the frequent use of παιδεύειν, παιδεύτης, and παιδὲς (with the significant addition of πάβδος, vii. 8, and of μαστίξ, xviii. 8) points to the existence of schools and of a professional class of teachers. By the Apostolic Age there is abundant evidence of the general diffusion of education among the people. 'Our principal care of all,' says Josephus (c. Ap. i. 12), comparing the Jews with other nations, 'is to educate our children well, and to observe the laws, and we think it to be the most necessary business of our whole life to keep this religion which has been handed down to us.' Among the Jews every child had to learn to read; scarcely any Jewish children were to be found to whom reading of a written document was strange, and therefore were there so many poor Jewish parents ready to deny themselves the necessities of life in order to let their children have instruction (c. Ap. ii. 26; cf. B. Strassburger, Gesch. der Erziehung bei den Israeliten, 1885, p. 7). The result of instruction from the earliest years in the home, and of teaching received on the Sabbath, and on the frequent occasions of national festivals, is, according to the Jewish historian, 'that if anybody do but ask any one of our people about our laws, he could more easily tell them all than he could tell his own name. For because of our having learned them as soon as ever we became sensible of anything, we have them as it were engraven on our souls' (c. Ap. ii. 19).

Education began, as Josephus says, 'with the earliest infancy.' Philo speaks of Jewish youth 'being taught, so to speak, from their very swaddling clothes by parents and teachers and inspectors, even before they receive instruction in the holy laws and unwritten customs of their religion, to believe in God the one Father and Creator of the world' (Legat. ad Gaium, 16). 'From a babe thou hast known the sacred writings,' writes St. Paul to Timothy (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>), recalling his disciple's early acquaintance with the OT Scriptures. At the age of six the Jewish boy would go to the elementary school (Beth ha-Sepher), but before this he would have received lessons in Scripture from his parents and have learned the Sh'mā and the Hallel. From the sixth to the tenth year he would make a study of the Law, along with writing and arithmetic. At the age of ten he would be admitted to the higher school (Bēth ha-Midrāsh), where he would make the acquaintance of the oral Law, beginning with the Mishna, 'repetition,' the oral traditions of the Law. At the age of thirteen he would be acknowledged by a sort of rite of confirmation as a 'Son of the Commandment' (Bar-misvāh), and from this point his further studies would depend upon the career he was to follow in life. If he was to become a Rabbi, he would continue his studies in the Law, and, as Saul of Tarsus did, betake himself to some famous teacher and sit at his feet as a disciple.

Although schools were thus in existence in connexion with the synagogues, it was not till comparatively late that schools, in the modern sense, for the education of children by themselves, seem to have been instituted (see art. 'Education' in HDB). They are said to have been first established by Simon ben-Shetach in the 1st cent. B.C., but this is disputed. However this may be, schools were placed upon a satisfactory and permanent footing by Joshua ben-Gamaliel, who is said to have been high priest from A.D. 63 to 65, and who ordained that teachers of youth should be placed in every town and every village, and that children on arriving at school age should be sent to them for instruction. Of him it is said that if he had not lived, the Law would have perished from Israel. The love of sacred learning and the study of the Law in synagogue and school saved the Jewish people from extinction. When Jerusalem had been destroyed and the Jewish population had been scattered after the disastrous events of A.D. 70, the school accompanied the people into the lands of their dispersion. Jamnia, between Joppa and Ashdod, then became the headquarters of Jewish learning, and retained the position till the unhappy close of Bar Cochba's rebellion. The learned circle then moved northwards to Galilee, and Tiberias and Sepphoris became seats of Rabbinical training. Wherever the Jews were settled, the family gathering of the Passover, the household instruction as to its origin and history, and the training in the knowledge of the Law, served to knit them together and to intensify their national feeling even in the midst of heathen surroundings.

While the great subject of school instruction was the Law, the work of the elementary school embraced reading, writing, and arithmetic. To make the Jewish boy familiar with the Hebrew characters in every jot and tittle, and to make him able to produce them himself, was the business of the Bēth ha-Sēpher, 'the House of the Book.' Reading thus came to be a universal accomplishment among the Jewish people, and it was a necessary qualification where the sacred books were not the exclusive concern of a priestly caste, but were meant to be read and studied in the home as well as read aloud and expounded in the synagogue. The case of Timothy already referred to is evidence of this; and the Scriptures which the Jewish converts of Berea 'examined daily' were no doubt the OT in Greek which they were trained to study for themselves. Writing may not have been so general an accomplishment, but it must also have been in considerable demand. This can be inferred from the numerous copies of the Scripture books which had to be produced; and from the prevalence of ῥηφίλλιν ('phylacteries') and ῥηζόθη, little metal cases containing the Sh'mā, the name of God, and texts of Scripture, fastened to the 'doorposts' of Jewish houses, which were in use before the Apostolic Age. The simple rules of arithmetic would be wanted to calculate the weeks, months, and festivals of the Jewish year.

In the higher school, Bēth ha-Midrāsh, 'the House of Study,' the contents of the Law and the Books of Scripture as a whole were expounded by the authorities. It is said to have been a rule of the Jewish schools not to allow all and sundry, without regard to age, to read all the books of Holy Scripture, but to give to the young all those portions of Scripture whose literal sense commanded universal acceptance, and only after they had attained the age of twenty-five to allow them to read the whole. Origen tells of the scruples of the Jewish teachers in regard to the reading of the Song of Solomon by the young (Harnack, Bible Reading in the Early Church, 1912, p. 30 f.). But there was no lack of materials for reading and exposition. In course of time there grew up the great and varied literature now contained in the Talmud—the Mishna, the Gemara, and the Midrashic literature of all sorts—narrative, illustrative, proverbial, parabolic, and allegorical (see I. Abrahams, Short History of Jewish Literature, 1906, ch. iv.; Oesterley and Box, Religion and Worship of the Synagogue<sup>2</sup>, 1911, ch. v.).

In the school the children sat on the floor in a circle round the teacher, who occupied a chair or bench (Lk 24<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>, Ac 22<sup>3</sup>). The method of instruction was oral and catechetical. In the schools attached to the synagogues of Eastern Judaism to this day, committing to memory and learning by rote are the chief methods of instruction, and the clamour of infant and youthful voices is heard repeating verses and passages of Scripture the whole school day. This kind of oral repetition and committing to memory undoubtedly occupied a large place in the earliest Christian teaching, and had an important influence in the composition of the gospel narratives. The purpose of St. Luke in writing his Gospel was that Theophilus might know more fully the certainty of the things concerning Jesus wherein he had been instructed (κατηχηθης) (Lk 1<sup>4</sup>). Apollos having been thus instructed in the way of the Lord (Ac 18<sup>25</sup>) taught with accuracy the facts concerning Jesus. But whilst the method had great advantages, it had also great dangers, tending to crush out all originality and life, and to result in barren formalism.

In the education of the Jewish boy, punishment, we may be sure, was not withheld. The directions of the Book of Proverbs, which is itself a treasury of sound educational principles, were carried out not only in the home but in the school (Pr 12<sup>24</sup> 19<sup>18</sup> 23<sup>13</sup>). St. Paul, addressing a self-righteous Jew, exposes the inconsistency of the man who professes to be a guide of the blind (οδηγὸν τυφλῶν), a corrector of the foolish (παιδεύτην ἀφρόνων), and a teacher of infants (διδοσκαλὸν νηπίων), and yet does not know the inwardness of the Law (Ro 2<sup>18</sup>).

Games had some part in the life of Jewish schoolboys. One game consisted in imitating their elders at marriages and funerals (Mt 11<sup>16</sup>). Riddles and guesses seem to have been common, and story-telling, music, and song were not wanting. But when, under the influence of Antiochus Epiphanes, a gymnasium for the athletic performances of the Greeks was set up in Jerusalem and the youth of the city were required to strip themselves of their clothing, it became a grievous cause of offence to the pious among the people (1 Mac 1<sup>11</sup>). See art 'Games' in HDB.

Whilst the education of Jewish youth on the theoretical side centred in the Law and was calculated to instil piety towards God, no instruction was complete without the knowledge of some trade or handicraft. To circumcise him, to teach him the Law, to give him a trade, were the primary obligations of a father towards his son. 'He that teacheth not his son a trade doeth the same as if he taught him to be a thief,' is a Jewish saying. Jesus Himself was the carpenter (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>), and Saul of Tarsus, the scholar of Gamaliel, was a tent-maker (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>). We hear of Rabbis who were needle-makers, tanners, and followed other occupations, and who, like St. Paul, made it their boast that their own hands ministered to their necessities and to them that accompanied them (Ac 20<sup>34</sup>).

The education of the Jewish youth began at home, and the parents were the first instructors. Of a noted teacher of the 2nd cent. A.D. it was said that he never broke his fast until he had first given a lesson to his son. But in due course the children were sent to school, in Rabbinic times apparently under the protection of a pedagogue, better known, however, in Greek family life (Gal 3<sup>24</sup>). The teacher was required to be a man of unblemished character, of gentle and patient disposition, with aptness to teach. Only married men could be employed as teachers. Women and unmarried men were excluded from the office. The office itself was full of honour: 'A city which neglects to appoint teachers ought to be destroyed,' runs the saying. One teacher was to be employed where there were 25 scholars (with an assistant where the number exceeded 25), and two where they exceeded 40. In the 2nd and 3rd centuries of the Christian era teachers received salaries, but the remuneration was in respect of the more technical part of the instruction. Nothing was to be charged for the Midrash, the exposition of Scripture.

The girls in Jewish families were not by any means left without instruction. The women of the household, like Eunice, the mother, and Lois, the grandmother, of Timothy (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>), who at least influenced the boys, would have a more active part in the instruction of the girls. This means that they were not themselves left without education. The example of Priscilla, the wife of Aquila, shows that a Jewess (who did not owe all her training to Christianity) might be possessed of high gifts and attainments (Ac 18<sup>26</sup>). In the Talmud similar instances of gifted and accomplished women are to be found. One of the most notable features in what is known as the Reform movement in modern Judaism is the earnestness with which its adherents insist upon the more general and the higher education of women.

2. Greek.—Among the Greeks education was the affair of the State. Its purpose was to prepare the sons of free citizens for the duties awaiting them, first in the family and then in the State. Whilst among the Jews education was meant for all, without respect of rank or class, among the Greeks it was intended for the few—the wealthy and the well-born. Ptolemy in his treatise on the education of children says: 'Some one may object that I in undertaking to give prescriptions in the training of children of free citizens apparently neglect the training of the poor townsmen, and only think of instructing the rich—to which the obvious answer is that I should desire the training I prescribe to be attainable alike by all; but if any through want of private means cannot attain it, let them blame their fortune and not their adviser. Every effort, however, must be made even by the poor to train their children in the best possible way, and if this is beyond them to do it according to their means' (de Lib. Educ. ii.). Down to the Roman period at least, this educational exclusiveness was maintained, and only the sons of those who were full citizens were the subjects of education, although there were cases in which daughters rose to distinction in letters, and even examples of slaves, like the philosopher Epictetus, who burst the restraints of their position and showed themselves capable of rising to eminence in learning and virtue. We even read of bequests being made to provide free education to children of both sexes, but the rule was that women needed no more instruction than they were likely to receive at home. Being an affair of the State, education was under the control of officials appointed to superintend it. Gymnastic, for the training of the body, and music in the larger sense, including letters, for the training of the mind, were the subjects of instruction. These—athletics, literature, music—were regulated by a body of guardians of public instruction (παιδονόμοι). We hear of an Ephēbarch at the head of a college of ἐφηβοί, or youths who have entered the higher school, and of a Gymnasiarch who superintends the exercises of the παλαίστρα and pays the training-masters.

The stages of education were practically the same in all the different branches of the wide-spread Grecian people. First, there was the stage of home education, extending from birth to the end of the seventh year, when the children were under parental supervision; second, the stage of school education, beginning with the eighth year and lasting to the sixteenth or eighteenth year; thirdly, there was the stage from the sixteenth or eighteenth to the twenty-first year, when the youths were ἐφηβοί, and were subjected to strict discipline and training. Before a youth was enrolled among the ἐφηβοί he had to undergo an examination (δοκιμασία) to make sure that he was the son of an Athenian citizen and that he had the physique for the duties now devolving upon him. This was really the university stage of his career, for he then attended the class of the rhetors and sophists who lectured in such institutions as the Lyceum and the Academy, and devoted himself to the study of rhetoric and philosophy (cf. Ac 19<sup>9</sup>). On the completion of this course he was ready to enter upon the exercise of his duties towards the State.

When the boy, at the age of seven, went to school—the grammar school and the gymnastic school—he was accompanied by a servant called a παιδαγωγός who carried his books and writing materials, his lyre and other instruments, and saw him to school and back (see SCHOOLMASTER, TUTOR). The school-rooms of ancient Athens seem to have been simple enough, containing little or no furniture—they were often nothing but porches open to wind and sun, where the children sat on the ground, or on low benches, and the teacher on a high chair. At first the child would be exercised in 'the rudiments,' τα στοιχεῖα (cf. Col 2<sup>5</sup> and Xen. Mem. II. i. 1). Great stress was laid upon reading, recitation, and singing. In particular, the memory was exercised upon the best literature, and cultivated to an extraordinary degree of retentiveness. The works of Æsop and Theognis were much in use in the class-rooms. Homer was valued not merely as a poet but as an inspired moral teacher, and the Iliad and Odyssey were the Bible of the Greeks. Great pains were also taken with the art of writing. Tablets covered with wax formed the material to receive the writing, and the stylus was employed to trace the letters. By apostolic times papyrus or parchment was in use, written upon with pen (καλαμος) and ink (μέλαν) (2 Jn 12, 3 Jn 13; cf. 2 Co 3<sup>3</sup> and 2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>). Sherds (δοτράκα) were a common writing material—that used by the very poor in ancient Egypt. Exercises in writing and in grammar have been preserved to us in the soil of Egypt written on ostraca, on wooden tablets, on tablets smeared over with wax, and have now been recovered to let us see the performances of the school children of twenty centuries ago. Among them are school copies giving the letters of the alphabet, syllables, common words and proper names, conjugation of verbs, pithy or proverbial sayings as headlines, and there are even exercises having the appearance of being school punishments (E. Ziebarth, Aus der antiken Schule, 1910, in Lietzmann's Kleine Texte).

The mention of school punishments leads to the subject of school discipline. At home, at school, and in the palestra, the rod and the lash were freely used. It is from school life, both Jewish and Greek, that St. Paul, as noted already, derives the imagery of a well-known passage in his Epistles (Ro 2<sup>17-21</sup>). In the Psalms of Solomon, a Jewish book written under Greek influence, there is reference both to the rod (πάβδος, vii. 8) and to the lash (μάστιξ, xviii. 8) as instruments of punishment; and 'chastening,' 'correction' (παιδεία), occurs again and again in this sense (Eph 6<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, He 12<sup>11</sup>; cf. Didache, 4).

'We are given over to grammar,' says Sextus Empiricus (adv. Math. i. 41), 'from childhood, and almost from our baby-clothes.' Grammar was succeeded by rhetoric, which had accomplished its purpose when the student had acquired the power of speaking offhand on any subject under discussion. In addition to these subjects, philosophy was also taught, its technical terms being mastered and its various schools discriminated. Arithmetic, geometry, astronomy belonged to the programme of secondary education, and from Plato and Aristotle there have come down to us the seven liberal arts—the trivium and the quadrivium of the Middle Ages. All the while gymnastic training went hand in hand with the training of the intellect. The gymnasion, where the youths of Greece exercised themselves naked, was enclosed by walls and fitted up with dressing-rooms, bath-rooms, and requisites for running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and other athletic exercises, and there were seats round about the course for spectators, and porticoes where philosophers gathered.

By the Apostolic Age it had become the practice for promising students to supplement their school education by seeking out and attending the lectures of eminent teachers in what we should call the great universities. Roman Emperors like Clandius and Nero had done much to encourage Greek culture and to introduce it into Rome itself, where the Athenæum was a great centre of learning. At this epoch Athens and Rome had famous schools, but even they had to yield to Rhodes, Alexandria, and Tarsus; and Marseilles, which had been from the very early days of Greek history a centre of Greek influence, was in the time of Strabo more frequented than Athens. The idea that Barnabas of Cyprus and Saul of Tarsus had met in early life at the university of Tarsus is by no means fanciful, and it was to his education at Tarsus that St. Paul owed the power to 'move in Hellenic Society at his ease' (W. M. Ramsay, Pictures of the Apostolic Church, 1910, p. 346). That St. Luke had received a medical education and was familiar with the great medical writers of the Greek world is now almost universally admitted; his literary style and the frequent echoes of Greek authors, at least in the Acts of the Apostles, prove him to have been a well-educated and cultured Hellenist. Of the various philosophic schools then exercising an influence upon thought in the Greek world two are expressly mentioned in the Acts (17<sup>18</sup>)—the Stoics and the Epicureans. St. Paul must have received Stoic teaching at Tarsus, where the school flourished, and he knew and quoted at least one Stoic poet (Ac 17<sup>-8</sup>). A century later Marcus Aurelius endowed the four great philosophical schools of Athens—the Academic, the Peripatetic, the Epicurean, and the Stoic. Justin Martyr, a little earlier, in the account he gives of his conversion to Christianity (Dial. cum Tryph. 2 ff.), shows how the representatives of the Stoic, the Peripatetic, the Pythagorean, and the Academic (Platonic) Schools in turn failed to satisfy his yearning after truth, and satisfaction came to him when he found Christianity to be the only philosophy sure and suited to the needs of man. Christianity, brought into contact with the society in which this philosophical habit of mind had established itself, modified, stimulated, and elevated it, and in turn was modified by the habit of mind of those who accepted it. 'It was impossible for Greeks, educated as they were with an education which penetrated their whole nature, to receive or to retain Christianity in its primitive simplicity. Their own life had become complex and artificial: it had its fixed ideas and its permanent categories: it necessarily gave to Christianity something of its own form' (E. Hatch, Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church [Hibbert Lectures, 1888], 1890, ch. ii. p. 48 f.).

3. Christian.—The sentiment which caused education to be so prized among the Jews must in course of time have caused it to be greatly desired among the followers of Christ. To the first Christians, as to the Lord and His apostles, the OT Scriptures were the Bible, and, outside the Holy Land at least, the Bible in the LXX translation. No doubt it was a roll of this translation which the Ethiopian eunuch was carrying back with him to his home far up the Nile, when Philip the Evangelist joined him in his chariot on the Gaza road (Ac 8<sup>27</sup>). It was the same Scriptures wherein the youthful Timothy was instructed from infancy in the home of his Greek father, under the guidance of Eunice and Lois (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>). St. Paul, in the many quotations he makes from the OT, quotes from the LXX rather than from the Hebrew original. 'The LXX was to him as much "the Bible" as our English version is to us; and, as is the case with many Christian writers, he knew it so well that his sentences are constantly moulded by its rhythm, and his thoughts incessantly coloured by its expressions' (Farrar, St. Paul, 1879, i. 47). It was not till the second half of the 2nd cent. that most of the NT books were recognized in the Church as the Oracles of God, and on the same level of authority as the books of the OT. 'Among the Jewish Christians,' as Harnack points out, 'the private use of the Holy Scriptures simply continued; for the fact that they had become believers in the Messiahship of Jesus had absolutely no other effect than to increase this use, in so far as it was now necessary to study not only the Law but also the Prophets and the Kethubim, seeing that these afforded prophetic proofs of the Messiahship of Jesus, and in so far as the religious independence of the individual Christian was still greater than that of the ordinary Jew' (Bible Reading in the Early Church, p. 32).

That the private study which had been devoted to the OT came in due course to be given to the books of the NT may be seen from the use of them in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. The OT, the Gospels, and the Epistles of St. Paul had a wide circulation at an early period, in all the provinces of the early Church, and were perused and applied to their spiritual needs by multitudes of Christians, not clerical only, but lay; not men only, but women. 'Ye know the Holy Scriptures,' writes Clement of Rome to the Corinthian Christians (1 Clem. liii. 1), 'Yea, your knowledge is laudable, and ye have deep insight into the Oracles of God.' 'What are these articles in your hand-bag?' asks the proconsul Saturninus when examining Speratus, one of the band of Scillitan martyrs in N. Africa. 'The books and epistles of St. Paul,' was the reply (TS i. 2 [1891], p. 114). The feeling grew and spread that it was at once a privilege and a duty thus to make acquaintance with the meaning and teaching of Holy Scripture. In Asia Minor and in Gaul, in Syria and Egypt, this feeling prevailed. Men like Justin Martyr, Tatian, Theophilus of Antioch, became Christians—such is their own acknowledgment—by reading the Scriptures for themselves. By and by wealthy Christians had Bibles copied at their own expense to be given or lent to their poorer brethren. Pamphilus, the friend of Eusebius, whose library at Cæsarea was famous, had Bibles copied to keep in stock and to be given away as occasion demanded, 'not only to men but also to women whom he saw devoted to the reading of Scripture' (Jerome, Apol. c. Rufin. i. 9).

All this intellectual activity devoted to the study of the Scriptures implies throughout the early Church a considerable level of educational attainment. That many of the poorest and least educated found in Christ and His teaching the satisfaction of their deepest needs is manifest from the NT itself (1 Co 12<sup>26</sup>), and Celsus sought to discredit the Christian system by aspersing the intellectual as well as the moral character of its adherents. Origen in answer points to the passages of the OT, especially in the Psalms, which the Christians also use, which inculcate wisdom and understanding, and declares that education, so far from being despised among the Christians, is the pathway to virtue and knowledge, the one stable and permanent reality (c. Cels. iii. 49, 72). We must not suppose, however, that the Church of the first days took any steps to provide schools and an educational system of her own. Members of the Christian community had no alternative but to send their sons to the schools of their localities to receive instruction along with scholars who were heathen and accustomed to the usages and customs, the superstitions and fables, often corrupt and unclean, of paganism. Although the Fathers of the Church did not permit their youth to become instructors in pagan schools, they did not consider it wise to deny them the advantages of a liberal education, even though associated with falsehood and idolatry. If they had forbidden their attendance they would have justly incurred the charges made by Celsus of hostility to learning. Christian parents made a virtue of necessity, which Tertullian approves, only recommending Christian pupils to accept the good and reject the bad (de Idolatria, x.).

Scarcely less pressing and even more difficult was the question of the propriety of studying the productions of the great pagan writers. Among those who took the liberal view was Justin Martyr, who held that 'those who lived with Logos are Christians, even if they were accounted atheists: of whom among Greeks were Socrates and Heraclitus' (Apol. i. 46). Clement of Alexandria was conspicuously broad in his Christian sympathies, and his quotations from classical writers have preserved to us fragments of authors whose works have otherwise perished. Others, like Cyprian, drew a sharp dividing line between pagan philosophy and Christian doctrine.

But though the circumstances of the times rendered separate Christian elementary instruction impossible and inadvisable in the early Church, the Church was not indifferent to the Christian instruction of her members. Foremost among the members belonging to the Body of Christ are 'teachers,' mentioned along with 'apostles' and 'prophets' (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>). Elsewhere they are classed with 'pastors' (Eph 4<sup>11</sup>). Among the gifts that minister to the upbuilding of the social fabric of Christianity is 'teaching' (Ro 12<sup>7</sup>). Power to teach was a qualification which Timothy was charged to look for in the bishops whom he should appoint (1 Ti 3-), and he was told that the servant of the Lord in any office must have aptness to teach (2 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>). The teacher as a separate functionary seems early to have disappeared from the Church, his functions being absorbed by the more official presbyter or bishop (q.v.), who was always required to be able to teach (Charteris, The Church of Christ, p. 32). The need, however, for institutions for higher instruction in the things of Christ came to be felt early. Out of the training of the candidates for baptism grew the catechetical schools in great centres of pagan learning. The first and most notable of them was the catechetical school of Alexandria, of which Pantænus was the founder, and Clement and Origen were the most distinguished ornaments. This was the counterpart of the pagan university, offering to philosophic pagans an academic and articulated view of the Christian system, and to earnest Christians of intellectual gifts and tastes training for the offices of preachers and teachers. Gregory Thaumaturgus commends Origen as having taught him philosophy, logic, mathematics, general literature, and ethics as the ground-work of theological training, after which he proceeded to the exposition of the sacred Scriptures. Under Clement and Origen the school was great and prosperous, and schools at Cæsarea, Jerusalem, and elsewhere were founded upon its model.

The share which woman had in the work of Christian education apart from her influence and work in the home is not made clear in the records of Church history. In the Syriac Didascalia Apostolorum, however, translated by Mrs. M. D. Gibson (1903), we have an official document of the 3rd cent. directing the deaconesses to assist in the baptism of women, to teach and educate them afterwards, and to visit and nurse the sick.

EGYPT (Αἴγυπτος).—NT references to Egypt occur mostly in historical retrospects. As the land which was friendly and hospitable to the Hebrews in that of Joseph, but cruel and oppressive in that of Moses, it is mentioned twelve times in Stephen's address before the Sanhedrin (Ac 7), once in St. Paul's speech at Lystra (13<sup>17</sup>), and four times in Hebrews (3<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>-6</sup> 27). There is a single allusion to contemporary Egypt in the account of the first Christian Pentecost: among the Jews and proselytes who were 'sojourning in Jerusalem,' and who formed St. Peter's audience, were 'the dwellers (οἱ κατοικοῦντες) . . . in Egypt' (Ac 2<sup>9, 10</sup>).

Philo estimated that there were not fewer than a million Jews in Egypt in his time (in Flaccum, 6; see Schurer, HJP II. ii. [1885] 229). The movement from Palestine into Egypt, partly by voluntary emigration and partly by forcible deportation, had been going on for six centuries. Aristæas (Epist. 13) states that Psammetichus (probably the Second, 594-586 B.C.) had Jewish mercenaries in his army. A company of Jews fled to Egypt after the Fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer 42-43). Some Aramaic papyri found at Assuan and Elephantinê show that a colony of Jews was settled at this garrison and trading post (590 miles S. of Cairo) in the 6th and 5th centuries B.C., and that they had built a temple to Jahweh. Many Jews were attracted to Alexandria at the time of its foundation by the offer of citizenship (Jos. c. Ap. ii. 4, Ant. XIX. v. 2). Ptolemy Lagi carried a vast number of Jews captive to Egypt (Aristæas, Epist. 12-14). Philo mentions that two of the five quarters into which Alexandria was divided were called 'the Jewish' (in Flaccum, 8). In no country were the Jews so prosperous, so influential, so cultured as they were in Egypt, where some of them held important offices of State under the Ptolemys (Jos. c. Ap. ii. 5, Ant. XIII. x. 4, xiii. 1, 2), and where an attempt was made to fuse Hellenic with Hebrew ideals.

History gives no trustworthy account of the evangelization of Egypt. The statement found in Eusebius (HE ii. 16) that St. Mark was the first missionary who went thither, and that he preached there the Gospel which he had written, is confessedly legendary, and the idea that Apollos had some share in the enlightenment of his native city is no more than a natural conjecture. There are few materials to fill the gap between apostolic times and the beginning of the 3rd cent., when Alexandria (q.v.), the home of Clement and Origen, became the intellectual capital of Christendom. Even till the days of Constantine the progress of Christianity in Egypt was almost confined to this one Hellenistic city.

'The great city which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt' (Rev 11<sup>8</sup>) is probably Jerusalem, regarded as the latter-day enemy of righteousness and of God's people, such as Sodom and Egypt had been in ancient times. The alternative view is that Rome is the great city which is allegorically or mystically named. If the addition 'where also their Lord was crucified' were original, it would of course decide the point; but this may be a gloss.

ELAMITES.—Elamites are mentioned in Ac 2<sup>9</sup> among the sojourners in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost. Jews settled in Elam during the post-exilic period, whence they and their descendants came up to the Holy City for the annual religious festivals. Elam lay due east of Babylonia and the lower Tigris, and corresponds to the modern Khuzistan. Its ruling cities were Shushan (or Susa) and Ansan (or Anzan), and the earliest native rulers called themselves patesis, or 'viceroys,' in acknowledgment of dependence upon Babylonia. The native Elamites had been gradually encroached upon, from the west, by invading Semites, who brought their own system of writing with them. This system was adopted by the Elamite princes for many of their votive tablets and inscribed monuments. For a brief period after 2300 B.C. Elamite chieftains ruled in Babylonia, but their power was broken by Hammurabi, whose son Samsu-iluna finally restored Babylonian supremacy.

ELDER.—'Elder' preserves better than 'presbyter' the history of the title, which goes back to the fact that tribes were governed by the heads of their component families. 'Elder' is probably the earliest name, after 'apostle,' for a Christian official (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>). See BISHOP and CHURCH GOVERNMENT. A. PLUMMER.

ELECT LADY.—See JOHN, EPISTLES OF.

ELECTION.—1. Definition.—Election, in the teaching of the apostles, is the method by which God gives effect to His eternal purpose to redeem and save mankind; so that the elect are those who are marked out in God's purpose of grace from eternity as heirs of salvation.

2. Election in the OT.—The doctrine of a Divine election lies at the very heart of revelation and redemption. Abraham was chosen that in him all the families of the earth should be blessed (Gn 12<sup>3</sup>). It was through the chosen people, the seed of Abraham, that God was pleased to make the clearest and fullest revelation of Himself to man and to prepare the way in the fullness of the time for the world's redemption. Through their patriarchs and their Divinely guided history, through the laws and institutions of the Mosaic economy, through tabernacle and temple, through prophets and psalmists, through their sacred Scriptures, and at length through the Incarnate Word, born of the chosen people, the world has received the knowledge of the being and spirituality of God, of the love and mercy and grace of our Father in heaven. To Israel their great legislator said: 'Thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth. The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all peoples: but because the Lord loveth you' (Dt 7<sup>6f.</sup>). Israel was chosen to spread abroad the Divine glory, and God designates them by His prophet 'My chosen, the people which I formed for myself, that they might set forth my praise' (Is 43<sup>20-21</sup>). They were taught, also, to realize how great were their privileges: 'Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord; the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance' (Ps 33<sup>1</sup>; cf. 135<sup>1</sup>). Their very position on the face of the earth, placed in the midst of the nations, was chosen with a view to their discipline and sanctification, for thus the Maccabean annalist puts it: 'Howbeit the Lord did not choose the nation for the place's sake, but the place for the nation's sake' (2 Mac 5<sup>19</sup>). And the destiny of the elect people was to culminate in the Elect Servant of the Lord: 'Behold my servant whom I uphold; my chosen (עֲבֹדָה, ó eklektós mou) in whom my soul delighteth: I have put my spirit upon him; he shall bring forth judgement to the Gentiles' (Is 42<sup>1</sup> RV; 'the Elect one' appears as a Messianic designation in the Book of Enoch, xl. 5, xlv. 3, 4, 5, xlix. 2, 4, and is found applied to Christ in Lk 9<sup>35</sup> 23<sup>3</sup>). This conception of Israel as the people of God's election colours the whole of the teaching of the apostles and forms the subject of St. Paul's great discussion in the chapters where he deals with the problem of their rejection (Ro 9-11). That the Jewish people had come to attribute to it an exaggerated and erroneous value is clear not only from St. Paul's argument but also from the Rabbinical literature of the time (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, p. 248 ff.).

3. Biblical use of the word.—In biblical Greek the word éklektói (ἐκλεγένθαι, ἐκλογή) is of frequent occurrence. In the OT we find éklektos used in the sense of picked men (Jg 20<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 24<sup>2</sup>); of individuals chosen by God for special service (Moses, Ps 106<sup>23</sup> [LXX 105]; David, Ps 89<sup>20-21</sup> [LXX 88]); of the nation Israel (Ps 106<sup>5</sup> [LXX 105], Is 45<sup>4</sup> 65<sup>9-15</sup>); of the Servant of the Lord (Is 42<sup>1</sup>; cf. 52<sup>13</sup>). In the NT we find the verb used, always in the middle voice, of our Lord's choice of the Twelve from the company of the disciples (Lk 6<sup>13</sup>, Jn 6<sup>70</sup> 13<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>19</sup>, Ac 1<sup>2</sup>); of the choice of an apostle in the place of Judas (Ac 1<sup>24</sup>); of Stephen and his colleagues (Ac 6<sup>2</sup>); of God's choice of the patriarchs

In the Gospels éklektói and κλητοί are distinguished: κλητοί, as Lightfoot puts it (Colossians<sup>3</sup>, 1879, p. 220), 'being those summoned to the privileges of the Gospel, and éklektói those appointed to final salvation (Mt 24<sup>22-24</sup>, 31, Mk 13<sup>20-27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>7</sup>). But in St. Paul no such distinction can be traced. With him the two terms seem to be co-extensive, as two aspects of the same process, κλητοί having special reference to the goal, and éklektói to the starting-point. The same persons are "called" to Christ and "chosen out" from the world.' It is to be noticed in the Epistles that while ó καλῶν is used of God or Christ in the present tense (1 Th 2<sup>1-5</sup>, Gal 5<sup>8</sup>), ó ἐκλεγόμενος is never used, nor the present tense of any part, the aorist being employed to describe what depended upon God's eternal purpose (Eph 1<sup>14</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>). In St. Peter's Epistles κλητός is not found, nor ἐκλεγέσθαι, but the verbal adjective ἐκλεκτός is found four times, once of 'elect' people (1<sup>1</sup>), once of Christians as an 'elect race' (2<sup>9</sup>), and twice, following the OT, of Christ as the Living Stone, choice and 'chosen' to be the corner-stone (2<sup>4-6</sup>). ἐκλογή is found of the Divine act (Ac 9<sup>15</sup>, Ro 9<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>5-28</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>), and once as the abstract for the concrete éklektói (Ro 11<sup>7</sup>).

4. St. Paul's doctrine.—It is St. Paul who most fully develops the doctrine in its strictly theological aspects. His teaching, however, only expands that of our Lord on the same subject, as when He speaks of those whom the Father had given Him (Jn 6<sup>37-39</sup> 17<sup>1-4</sup>), to whom He should give life eternal, and whom He should keep so that they would never perish (Jn 10<sup>28</sup>). St. Paul from an early period of his missionary labours saw results which were recognized in his circle to be due to an influence higher than man's—to the predestinating counsel of God. For the historian tells how, on St. Paul's preaching for the first time to Gentiles at Antioch of Pisidia, 'as many as were ordained to eternal life believed' (Ac 13<sup>48</sup>). This was on his first missionary journey. On his second he preached to the Thessalonians among others, and in the two Epistles written to them on that extended journey there is the clear recognition of the same influence. Giving thanks to God for them, St. Paul in the opening words of the First Epistle discerns in their experience, and sets forth for their comfort, the proofs of their 'election' (1 Th 1<sup>2-10</sup>). From their response to the gospel call, their acceptance of the gospel message, their patient endurance of affliction, and the joy they had in their new spiritual life, a joy begotten in them of the Holy Spirit, St. Paul inferred and knew their election. And not long after, when he wrote the Second Epistle to correct misapprehensions produced by the First, he set before the Thessalonian Christians, in language still loftier and more explicit, this profound and encouraging truth of a Divine election (2 Th 2<sup>13-15</sup>). God is here represented as taking them for His own (the verb is ἐλάττω, not ἐξελέξατο), and it is 'from the beginning,' from eternity (there is a reading ἀπαρχήν, 'firstfruits,' instead of ἀπ' ἀρχῆς), that the transaction dates. It is not to religious privileges merely, nor even to a possible or contingent salvation, that they have been chosen, but to an actual and present experience of its blessings, felt in holiness of life and assurance of the truth. This was, indeed, what they were called to enjoy through the gospel preached by St. Paul and his colleagues, so as at length to obtain the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ. In his Epistle to the Romans, written not long after, St. Paul, in ch. 8, rising to the loftiest heights of Divine inspiration, and penetrating, as it might seem, to the secret place of the counsels of the Most High, apprehends for himself, and makes known for the encouragement of faith, the links of the great chain of the Divine election by which the Church of believers is bound about the feet of God—'foreknown,' 'foreordained,' 'called,' 'justified,' 'glorified' (Ro 8<sup>28-30</sup>). Here 'they that love God' are co-extensive and identical with 'them that are called according to his purpose.' They are 'foreordained,' so that they may attain the likeness of God's Son, and, further, that He may be glorified in them and see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied. God's elect (Ro 8<sup>33</sup>) may have the assaults of temptation and trial to face, and tribulation, anguish, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, and sword to endure; but nothing can separate them from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus.

These disclosures regarding God's eternal purpose of grace are continued and extended by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Ephesians, where the spiritual blessings enjoyed in such abundance by them are traced up to their election by God—'even as he chose us in him (Christ) before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blemish before him in love: having foreordained us unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace' (Eph 1<sup>4-6</sup>). It is a further development of this when St. Paul says again in the same Epistle: 'We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them' (Eph 2<sup>10</sup>). The unconditional character of the Divine choice, emphasized in these statements of the Apostle, is affirmed again when, writing to Timothy, he bids him suffer for the gospel 'according to the power of God, who saved us and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose of grace which was given in Christ Jesus before times eternal' (2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>).

In a separate passage of the Epistle to the Romans (chs. 9-11) St. Paul deals with the mystery of the call of the Gentiles to take the place of gainsaying and disobedient Israel. In so doing he first vindicates God from the reproach of having departed from His ancient covenant—a reproach which would be well-founded if the covenant people were rejected and the Gentiles put in their place. Such a rejection, he contends, would not be altogether out of keeping with God's treatment of His people in the course of their history.

'There was from the first an element of inscrutable selectiveness in God's dealings within the race of Abraham. Ishmael was rejected, Isaac chosen: Esau was rejected and Jacob chosen, antecedently to all moral conduct, though both were of the same father and mother. Such selectiveness ought at least to have prevented the Jews from resting their claims simply on having "Abraham to their father"' (Gore, 'Argument of Romans ix.-xi.' in Studia Biblica, iii. 40; cf. A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, p. 312 ff.).

'The election within the election' here, St. Paul argues, is the Christian Church—the Israel after the Spirit; and the reproach of the objector falls to the ground (Ro 9<sup>6-9</sup>). Besides, the Apostle further maintains, God, in His electing purpose, is sovereign, as is seen in the difference between the two sons of Rebecca; in the Divine word to Moses: 'I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy'; and in the hardening of the heart of Pharaoh (Ro 9<sup>10-24</sup>). And after all, if the election were cancelled, the blame would be Israel's own, because of unbelief and disobedience, such as Moses denounced, and Isaiah bewailed when he said: 'All the day long did I spread out my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people' (Ro 10<sup>-1</sup>).

But, despite appearances, Israel was not cast off. Their rejection was not final. There were believing Israelites, like St. Paul himself, in all the churches; and he could say: 'At this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace' (Ro 11<sup>5</sup>). Meanwhile the problem of Israel's unbelief and of the passing over of spiritual privilege to the Gentiles (Ro 11<sup>11</sup>) is to be solved by the Gentiles provoking Israel to jealousy—appreciating and embracing and profiting by the blessings of the Christian salvation to such an extent that Israel will be moved to desire and to possess those blessings for their own. When Jews in numbers come to seek as their own the righteousness and goodness which they see thus manifested in the lives of Christians, and are stirred up to envy and emulation by the contemplation of them, the time will be at hand when all Israel—Israel as a nation—shall be saved. Of that issue St. Paul has no doubt, for 'the gifts and calling of God are without repentance' (Ro 11<sup>29</sup>).

To sum up St. Paul's teaching, election (1) is the outcome of a gracious purpose of the heart of God as it contemplates fallen humanity from all eternity (Ro 8<sup>-3, 29</sup>; cf. Ro 5<sup>6-10</sup>); (2) is a display of Divine grace calculated to redound to the glory of God by setting forth His love and mercy towards sinful men (Eph 1<sup>3-14</sup>); (3) is not conditioned upon any good foreseen in the elect, nor in any faith or merit which they may exhibit in time (Ro 9<sup>11-18</sup>), but is 'according to the good pleasure of his will' (Eph 1<sup>5</sup>), 'according to his own purpose of grace' (2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>), of God's sovereign purpose and grace (Ro 9<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>5-7</sup>); (4) is carried out 'in Christ' (Eph 1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>10</sup>) through the elect being brought into union with Him by faith, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places (Eph 1<sup>3</sup> 5); (5) issues in sanctification by the Spirit and assurance of the truth (2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>) and heavenly glory (Ro 8<sup>30</sup>); and (6) is proved by acceptance of the gospel call and by the trust and peace and joy of believing and obedient hearts (1 Th 1<sup>4-6</sup>).

5. St. Peter's doctrine.—If St. Peter's allusions to the subject of election are few they fully support the teaching of St. Paul. In his addresses at Jerusalem after Pentecost, he speaks of 'the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God' (Ac 2<sup>-4</sup>) with reference to Jesus. It is fitting that the Apostle of the Circumcision should speak of Him as 'a living stone, rejected indeed of man, but with God elect, precious' (1 P 2<sup>4</sup>; cf. ἀποδεεργμένον, 'approved,' Ac 2<sup>22</sup>), and even quote concerning Him the prophetic Scripture: 'Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious' (2<sup>6</sup>; cf. Is 28<sup>16</sup>). Of Christ he speaks, too, as 'foreknown' (1<sup>20</sup>; Hort, ad loc., 'designated afore') before the foundation of the world.

St. Peter gives manifest prominence to the doctrine of election when, in the opening words of his First Epistle, he addresses the Jewish Christians of Pontus and other Asiatic provinces as 'the elect who are sojourners' there (ἐκλεκτοὶ παρεπιδήμοι διασποράς Πόντου, κτλ.). 'Elect' they are because their lot is cast in favoured lands where the messengers of the gospel have proclaimed the good tidings—still more because they have obeyed and believed the message, and have had experience of the blood of sprinkling and of the sanctifying power of the Holy Spirit—yea, because they have been 'designated afore,' not to service as Christ was from the foundation of the world (1<sup>20</sup>), but to blessing, even all the blessings of the Christian salvation by God the Father Himself (1<sup>1, 2</sup>). Conceived of as the Christian Israel, the Israel after the Spirit, these Jewish believers are, as St. Peter elsewhere calls them, 'an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession' (2<sup>9</sup>), where election is seen to be not simply to privilege, but to character and service, to holy living and the setting forth of the Divine glory). Although they are an 'elect race' they are also in the same context described as 'living stones' (2<sup>3</sup>), and Hort is right when he says 'the whole spirit of the Epistle excludes any swallowing up of the individual relation to God in the corporate relation to Him; and the individual relation to God implies the individual election' (First Epistle of St. Peter, I. 1-II. 17, 1898, p. 14).

Few as are St. Peter's utterances regarding the doctrine, they entirely support St. Paul, even when, emphasizing the urgency of the matter as a part of practical religion, he bids his readers give diligence to make their 'calling and election sure' (2 P 1<sup>10</sup>).

6. St. John's doctrine.—It is from St. John that we have the record of our Lord's most impressive teaching on the subject of those whom the Father had given Him (Jn 6<sup>37, 39</sup> 17<sup>2, 24</sup>). In his Gospel he uses ἐκλέγεσθαι, always, however, as employed in His discourses by the Lord Himself and with a definite reference to the Twelve, or to the company of the disciples. In his Second Epistle (vv. 1<sup>13</sup>) he has ἐκλεκτῇ. Whether the word describes an individual or a society it is not easy to say, but at least it has the same theological signification as in St. Paul and St. Peter. In the Apocalypse (17<sup>14</sup>) ἐκλεκτοί is used in a very significant connexion, where they that are with the Lamb in His warfare against the powers of evil, and in His victory over them, are 'called and chosen and faithful.' They are 'called' (κλητοί) in having heard and accepted the gospel message; 'chosen' (ἐκλεκτοί) as thus having given evidence of their Divine election; 'faithful' (πιστοί) as having yielded the loyal devotion of their lives to their Divine Leader, and persevered therein to the end. That 'the elect' are the same as 'the sealed' (Rev 7<sup>4</sup>) may be inferred from the manner in which the 144,000 pass unscathed through the conflicts and terrors let loose upon them (14<sup>1</sup>).

From this passage apparently comes the thought of the 'number' of the elect as in the Book of Common Prayer ('Order for the Burial of the Dead'): 'that it may please Thee to accomplish the number of Thine elect.' The thought appears early in the sub-Apostolic Church, for in Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians he urges them to 'pray with earnest supplication and intercession that the Creator of all would preserve unharmed the constituted number of His elect in all the world through His beloved Son, Jesus Christ, through whom He called us from darkness to light, from ignorance to knowledge of the glory of His name' (lix. 2; cf. ii. 4, lviii. 2; Apostol. Const. v. 15, viii. 22). No countenance is given in the Early Church to the idea that 'the elect' may live as they list and at last be saved. 'Let us cleave to the innocent and the righteous,' says Clement of Rome, 'for such are the elect of God' (op. cit. xlv. 4). 'It is through faith,' says Hermas (Vis. III. viii. 3), 'that the elect of God are saved.' 'In love all the elect of God were made perfect,' says Clement again (xlix. 5), 'for without love nothing is wellpleasing unto God.'

ELEMENTS (στοιχεῖα, elementa).—στοιχεῖον is properly a stake or peg in a row (στοῖχος); then, one of a series, a component part, an element. The special meanings of στοιχεῖα are: (a) the letters of the alphabet; (b) the physical elements or constituents of the universe; (c) the heavenly bodies; (d) the rudiments or principia of a subject; (e) the elementary spirits, angels, genii, or demons of the cosmos. Each of these meanings, with the exception of the first, has been found by exegetes in one or other of the NT passages in which στοιχεῖα occurs. In one case (He 5<sup>12</sup>) the interpretation (d) is beyond dispute; the others have given rise to much discussion.

From Plato downwards στοιχεῖα frequently denotes the elements of which the world is composed. Empedocles had already reckoned four ultimate elements—fire, water, earth, and air—but called them μῑώματα (ed. Sturz, 1805, p. 255 ff.). Plato preferred to speak of the στοιχεῖα τοῦ παντός (Tim. 48 B; cf. Theat. 201 E). In the Orphic Hymns (iv. 4) the air (αἰθήρ) is called κόσμον στοιχεῖον ἀριστον. Aristotle distinguished στοιχεῖα from ἀρχαί (though the terms were often interchanged) as the material cause from the formal or motive (Metaph. iv. i. 1, iii. 1). The Stoic definition of a στοιχεῖον is 'that out of which, as their first principle, things generated are made, and into which, as their last remains, they are resolved' (Diog. Laert., Zeno, 69). στοιχεῖα has this meaning in Wis 7<sup>17</sup>: 'For himself gave me an unerring knowledge of the things that are, to know the constitution of the world, and the operation of the elements' (καὶ ἐνέργειαν στοιχείων; cf. 19<sup>18</sup>). In 2 Mac 7<sup>22</sup> a mother says to her seven martyr sons: 'It was not I that brought into order the first elements (στοιχείωσιν) of each one of you.'

This is probably the meaning of the term in 2 P 3<sup>10</sup>: 'The day of the Lord shall come as a thief; in which . . . the elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat' (στοιχεῖα δὲ καυσούμενα λυθήσεται [or λυθίσονται]); and v. 12: 'the elements shall melt (τήκεται) with fervent heat.' Here R<sup>VM</sup> gives the alternative 'heavenly bodies,' which is a meaning the word came to have in early ecclesiastical writers. The stars were called στοιχεῖα either as the elements of the heavens, or—a less likely explanation—because in them the elements of man's life and destiny were supposed to reside. Justin speaks of τα οὐράνια στοιχεῖα (Apol. ii. 5). Theoph. of Antioch has στοιχεῖα θεοῦ (ad Autol. i. 4), and the word bears the same meaning in Ep. ad Diog. vii. 2. In 2 P 3<sup>10</sup> the situation of στοιχεῖα between οὐρανοί and γῆ favours this interpretation; the universe seems to consist of the vault of heaven, the heavenly bodies, and the earth. But as the writer of the Epistle is not methodical, and as, in painting a lurid picture of final destruction, he evidently uses the strongest language at his command, it is probable that the στοιχεῖα whose burning he contemplates are the elements of the whole universe.

The Gr. word frequently denoted the rudiments or principia of a science, art, or discipline. The στοιχεῖα of geometry, grammar, or logic are the first principles; στοιχεῖα τῆς λέξεως are the parts of speech (Aris. Poet. xx. 1); στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρετῆς, the elements of virtue (Plut. de Lib. Educ. xvi. 2). The word unquestionably has this meaning in He 5<sup>12</sup>, 'the rudiments of the first principles (τα στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς) of the oracles of God'—the ABC of Christian education, what is milk for babes but not solid food for men (v. 13).

The phrase in regard to which there is most division of opinion is τα στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου (Gal 4<sup>8</sup>, Col 2<sup>8, 20</sup>; τοῦ κόσμου is clearly implied in Gal 4<sup>8</sup>). (i.) Many take στοιχεῖα in the intellectual sense: 'the elementary things, the immature beginnings of religion, which occupy the minds of those who are still without the pale of Christianity' (Meyer on Gal 4<sup>3</sup>); 'the elements of religious training, or the ceremonial precepts common alike to the worship of Jews and of Gentiles' (Grimm-Thayer, s.v.). To this view there are strong objections. Those who are in bondage to the στοιχεῖα of the world are compared with heirs who are still under guardians and stewards (Gal 4<sup>2,3</sup>), where the parallel suggests the personality of the στοιχεῖα. To serve the στοιχεῖα is the same thing as serving them that by nature are no gods (4<sup>3</sup>)—a statement by no means evident if the στοιχεῖα are the rudiments of religious instruction. The relapse from God to the στοιχεῖα (4<sup>9</sup>) can scarcely be a return to a mere abstraction. The observance of times and seasons is according to the στοιχεῖα of the world, not according to Christ (Col 2<sup>8</sup>)—a contrast which suggests that the στοιχεῖα and Christ are personal rivals. When men died with Christ from the στοιχεῖα of the world (v.<sup>20</sup>), this was more than a death to rudimentary teaching. The στοιχεῖα are apparently identical with the principalities and powers of which Christ is Head and over which He triumphs (vv.<sup>10-15</sup>). Finally, a man's knowledge of the στοιχεῖα is not approved as his beginning of religious education, but condemned as his 'philosophy and vain deceit' (v.<sup>8</sup>).

(ii.) Those interpreters come nearer the facts of the case who suggest that the στοιχεῖα to which the Galatian and Colossian Christians were reverting were the heavenly bodies conceived as animated and therefore to be worshipped. Such worship was certainly common enough among the Gentiles. 'They say that the stars are all and every one real parts of Jove, and live, and have reasonable souls, and therefore are absolute gods' (Aug. de Civ. Dei, iv. 11). Nor was the belief in astral spirits confined to pagans. In the Predicatio Petri (ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 5) the Jews are represented as λατρεύοντες ἀγγέλοις καὶ ἀρχαγγέλοις, μὴτὶ καὶ σελήνῃ, and this worship is classed with that of the heathen. Clear evidence of this belief is found in Philo (de Mundi Op. i. 34) and in the Book of Enoch (xli. xliii.). The animated heavenly bodies, however, would rather be described as τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, and the στοιχεῖα of the 'cosmos' must include those of earth as well as those of heaven.

(iii.) Many recent expositors therefore maintain that the στοιχεῖα are the angels or personal elemental spirits which were supposed to animate all things. There is evidence that this view was wide-spread. The Book of Enoch (lxxxii. 10f.) speaks of the angels of the stars keeping watch, the leaders dividing the seasons, the taxiarchs the months, and the chiliarchs the days. Stars are punished if they fail to appear when due (xviii. 15). The Book of Jubilees (ch. ii.) refers to the creation of the angels of the face (or presence), and the angels who cry 'holy,' the angels of the spirit of wind and of hail, of thunder and of lightning, of heat and of cold, of each of the seasons, of dawn and of evening, etc. The same species of animism is found in the Ascension of Isaiah (iv. 18), 2 Es 8<sup>21f.</sup>, Sibyll. Orac. (vii. 33-35). In the Testament of Solomon (Migne, Patr. Gr. cxiii. 1315) the spirits who come before the king say: 'We are the στοιχεῖα, the rulers of this under world' (οἱ κοσμοκράτορες τοῦ σκότους τούτου). The belief survives in modern Greek folk-lore, in which the tutelary spirit who is supposed to reside in every rock, stream, bridge, and so forth, is called a στοιχεῖον.

Not a few passages in the NT indicate the prevalence of this conception. The four winds have their four angels (Rev 7<sup>1,2</sup>), and the fire has its angel (14<sup>18</sup>). Each of the Seven Churches has its angel (2. 3). Angels take the form of winds and fire (He 1<sup>7</sup> || Ps 104<sup>4</sup>). The inferiority of the law to the gospel is due to its administration by angels (Gal 3<sup>19</sup>). The belief in a world of intermediate spirits is the basal thought of Gnosticism, which St. Paul encounters in its incipient forms. 'Jewish worship of law and pagan worship of gods are for him fundamentally the same bondage under the lower world-powers which stand between God and men.' Grant that this language is paradoxical, 'it is still extremely significant that Paul dares to speak in this way of the law' (Bousset in Die Schriften des NT, ii. 62).

Even in 2 P 3<sup>10, 12</sup> it is possible that the στοιχεῖα which are to be 'dissolved,' or 'melted,' are elemental spirits. 'This may or may not seem strange to us, but we must ever learn anew that bygone times had a different conception of the world' (Hollmann in Die Schriften des NT, ii. 594). Schoettgen quotes the Rabbinical words: 'No choir of angels sings God's praises twice, for each day God creates new hosts which sing His praises and then vanish into the stream of fire from under the throne of His glory whence they came.' A closer parallel is found in Test. of the XII. Patr., 'Levi,' 4, where it is said that on the Judgment Day all creation will be troubled and the invisible spirits melt away (καὶ τῶν ἀοράτων πνευμάτων τηκομένων).

JAMES STRAHAN.

ELIJAH (Ἠλίας).—One incident in the life of Elijah is recalled by St. Paul (Ro 11<sup>2-4</sup>) and another by St. James (5<sup>17f.</sup>).

(1) Much is to be learned from a great man's mistakes; the memory of his lapses may save others from falling. In a mood of despair Elijah imagined that the worst had happened to Israel, and that the worst was likely to overtake himself. The prophets were slain, the altars were digged down, he was left alone, and his enemies were seeking his life. Ahab and Jezebel and the false prophets had triumphed; it was all over with the cause of righteousness and truth for which he had laboured. Seeing that all Israel had proved unfaithful to God, there was nothing for the lonely, outlawed prophet to live for, and he requested that he might die. But the answer—ὁ χρηματισμός, the Divine oracle—proved him to be the victim of a morbid fancy, and brought him back to facts. Among the faithless many others were as faithful as he. God had reserved for Himself seven thousand men who had not bowed the knee to Baal. All Israel had not forsaken Him, and—what was still more important—He had in no wise forsaken Israel. There is but one thing that could ever conceivably justify pessimism—the failure of Divine power or love; and the fear of that calamity is but a human weakness. Now St. Paul could not help seeing the close analogy between the conditions of Elijah's critical time and those of his own. Israel as a whole seemed once more to have forsaken God, in rejecting the Messiah. In certain moods St. Paul might be tempted to compare himself—lonely, hated, hunted—to the sad prophet. But did the 'great refusal' of the majority prove either that all Israel was unfaithful or that God had cast off His people? No, for (a) now as in Elijah's time there were splendid exceptions, forming a remnant (λείμμα=ῥῆψ) which was the true Israel; and (b) God's immutable faithfulness made the idea of a rejection incredible and almost unthinkable.

(2) St. James (5<sup>17f.</sup>) takes an illustration from the story of Elijah, and in doing so reminds his readers that, though so great in life and so remote from ordinary humanity in the manner of his exodus from the world, the prophet was yet a man of like passions (or 'nature,' RVm) with us—ἄνθρωπος ὁμοιοπαθὴς ἡμῖν—so that his experiences may serve as a help to weak, ordinary mortals. The success of his prayer for a time of drought, and again for rain in a time of famine, is cited as an evidence of the fact that 'the prayer of a righteous man availeth much in its working.' It has to be noted, however, that the OT narrative (1 K 17) contains no reference whatever to the former petition, while the latter is scarcely deducible from 1 K 18<sup>42</sup>, where it is only stated that the prophet bowed himself down upon the earth and put his face between his knees. Sirach (48<sup>2,3</sup>), however, affirms that he 'brought a famine,' and 'by the word of the Lord he shut up the heaven.' In 4 Ezra (vii. 109) Elijah is cited as an example of intercession pro his qui pluviam acceperunt.

ELYMAS.—See BAR-JESUS.

EMERALD (σμάραγδος).—The emerald is a mineral of the same species as the beryl. It owes its value as a gem to its extremely beautiful velvety green colour, which is ascribed to the chromium it contains. The primary form of its crystal is a hexagonal prism variously modified. It is electric by friction, and frequently transparent, but sometimes only translucent. Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 620) suggests that the σμάραγδος with which the rainbow (ἴρις) round about the throne is compared (Rev 4<sup>3</sup>) was rock-crystal, as only a colourless stone could throw prismatic colours. But the nimbus or halo may have been emerald in colour and only like a rainbow in form. The fourth foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem is emerald (Rev 21<sup>18</sup>).

EMPEROR.—See AUGUSTUS.

EMPEROR-WORSHIP.—One of the most interesting and important facts in the inner history of the Roman Empire prior to the adoption of Christianity as the State-religion was the rise of Emperor-worship. Only in recent years have the facts regarding it been adequately investigated, and their importance for the early history of Christianity recognized and appreciated.

1. Origin and development.—Emperor-worship, like many other strange phenomena, was first of all a product of the contact and fusion of Orientalism and Hellenism, which for all practical purposes may be dated from the conquests of Alexander the Great. In each of these modes of thought it had a root; and, before the advent of Roman power, the reigning monarch had been regarded as divine in those regions where Greek and Oriental thought had blended. In Oriental societies generally—e.g. Egypt, Babylon, Persia, China—it was the custom from early times to speak of the ruler as 'son of God,' and in other ways to pay him divine honour—a custom which may easily be derived from the general tendency there to cringing adulation and extravagant flattery on the part of the subject (in Ac 12<sup>23</sup> we have a good example), and from a natural desire on the part of the monarch to confirm so useful a sanction of his authority. In the Hellenic world an approach to this is found in the custom of raising to divine rank after death those who in their lifetime had been pre-eminent for bravery or other qualities of great service to the community. To such men sacred rites and festivals were decreed, and in one formula used in inscriptions they are spoken of as 'gods and heroes' (E. Rohde, Psyche<sup>2</sup>, Tübingen, 1903, ii. 353). As noted above, in the kingdoms formed out of the Empire of Alexander in which Orientalism was hellenized, the deification of the monarch was definitely carried out. An inscription of Halcarnassus, c. 306 B.C., describes Ptolemy I. as Σωτηρ καὶ Θεός, 'Saviour and God' (Dittenberger, Orient. Gr. Inscr. Selectae, 1903-05, xvi. 2, 3). The Syrian kings named Antiochus are termed Θεός (God), the infamous Antiochus IV. being designated on his own coins as Θεός Ἐπιφανής ('the God who has appeared among men').

It was in hellenized Asia that the deification of the Roman power began. In 195 B.C. Smyrna instituted the worship of the power of Rome, and from 95 B.C. onwards we find in Asia the worship of various beneficent Roman officials, e.g. Scævola, Q. Cicero (cf. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches, p. 117). Julius Cæsar was honoured in his lifetime in an Ephesian inscription as 'the God descended from Mars and Venus, who has appeared in human form, and the universal Saviour of the life of men' (Dittenberger, Sylloge Gr. Inscript.<sup>2</sup>, Leipzig, 1898, 347, l. 6 [vol. i. p. 552]). Upon his successor, the great Augustus, the East showered divine honours in profusion. A temple was dedicated at Pergamum to Rome and Augustus with a guild of choristers 'for the God Augustus and the Goddess Rome.' A similar temple rose at Ancyra in Galatia, and the recognition of the deity of Cæsar became widespread in the Orient.

It is to be noted that it was no mere flattery that was expressed in this deification. It was a sincere sentiment of gratitude that led the East to confer on Cæsar the highest honour conceivable. The pax Romana which he gave them and preserved for them was an inestimable boon. He did for them what their gods seemed unable to do: he put an end to their constant dread and frequent experience of warfare, tyranny, injustice. He gave them security of life and goods, kept safe the highways, fostered their commerce, and developed their resources. And all those benefits were safeguarded to them by a might which seemed invincible and irresistible. Viewed through a medium of Eastern poetic emotion, Cæsar easily appeared invested with essential qualities of godhead—limitless power wielded for the good of the subject. Many inscriptions might be quoted which show that the Eastern pagan world found its Messiah in Cæsar, the language in some cases bearing a resemblance to Jewish Messianic psalms and prophecies. The following will serve as illustration. It is an inscription of date 9-4 B.C. (Ramsay) in honour of the birthday of Augustus, and is a decree of the commune of Asia, instituting the Augustan era, and ordered to be put up in all the leading cities (Ramsay, op. cit. 436). We give only an extract:

'This day has given the earth an entirely new aspect. . . . Rightly does he judge who recognises in this birthday the beginning of life and of all the powers of life, now is the time ended when men pitied themselves for being born. . . . All-ruling Providence has filled this man with such gifts for the salvation of the world as designate him the Saviour for us and for the coming generations, of wars will he make an end, and establish all things worthily. By his appearing are the hopes of our forefathers fulfilled. . . . The birthday of God has brought to the world glad tidings. . . . From his birthday a new era begins.'

(For whole inscription see Mitteilungen Inst. Athen. xxiv. [1889] 275 ff.)

Nor was it only in the Orient that Cæsar appeared a being worthy of divine honour. The establishment of his power meant the restoration of tranquillity and security to Italy after a reign of terror. The last two centuries of the Republic were marked by a constant succession of revolutions, each of which drenched Rome with Roman blood, and none of which could produce a just or stable government. The patience with which the tyrannies and cruelties of the bad Emperors were endured is eloquent testimony to the lasting impression of horror which the nightmare of the expiring Republic had produced. And the early years of the Empire seemed full of promise. A new era seemed begun in Italy no less than in the East. Vergil wrote his well-known 'Messianic' fourth Eclogue predicting the birth of a son who should 'put an end to the age of iron, and cause the age of gold to arise for the whole world,' the reference being, according to the most probable view, to a son of Augustus whose birth was expected A.D. 40. The Senate decreed that the birth-place of Augustus was a holy place (Suet. Cæsar Octav. Aug. 5). Stories of portents and miracles at his birth grew with the years. The new name Augustus borne by Octavian and his successors connoted from the first something of superhuman dignity. Thus Rome was prepared for the deification of the reigning Cæsar; in fact, it was reluctance on the part of Augustus to accept it that somewhat retarded the process. He limited the worship of Romans to the dead Julius Cæsar who had received apotheosis in 42 B.C. under the title Divus. As early as A.D. 14, however, Augustus accepted deification from Beneventum.

Thus we see that deification was an honour spontaneously offered to Cæsar by grateful, enthusiastic, and devoted subjects. What was the attitude of the Roman Government towards it? Not too much weight is to be laid on the reluctance with which Augustus accepted the dignity. Reluctance in accepting offices and honours offered was his settled policy. On the other hand, it may be that the practical mind of a Roman did honestly feel that there was something embarrassing, ludicrous, or even impious in his own deification. But the same practical mind, with its genius for government, soon perceived that in Cæsar-worship the Empire would secure what it lacked—a bond of unity and a powerful safeguard of loyalty. In the East especially this was eminently desirable and conspicuously lacking. We must simply refer the reader to Ramsay's demonstration (op. cit. pp. 115, 127) of the place filled by Cæsar-worship as the great bond of Empire in that region. It was because of this special need of the Eastern provinces that Augustus accepted deification from them, while ostensibly refusing it from Italy. But the principle once adopted as part of Roman statecraft could not be limited spatially as matter of practice, still less as matter of theory. Cæsar could not be a god in one province if he were mere man in another. Hence Cæsar-worship rapidly became organized and highly developed as the State-religion of the Empire; the Cæsars so far conquered their reluctance to pose as gods that Domitian proudly designated himself as Dominus et Deus, 'Lord and God' (Suet., Domitian, 13). Cæsar-worship was enforced by the whole might of the State; refusal to worship the Emperor was high treason. The Jews alone were exempt. For details as to the organization of the new religion, its priesthood, the pomp of its ritual, etc., we must refer the reader to Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire; and Lightfoot, Apostol. Fathers, pt. ii.: 'Ignatius and Polycarp.'

2. Cæsarism and paganism.—It is necessary to make a few remarks on the relation of the new religion to the old paganism, because in sermons and other popular treatments of the subject the facts are often mis-stated. In no sense was the worship of Cæsar either enforced or adopted as a substitute for other religions. It did not displace or quarrel with any of them. The old gods did not leave the stage to make room for Cæsar. Contrary to what is often asserted, the old religions were very far from having lost their power. The satirical strictures of Juvenal and Martial on Roman city-society are no proof that the old Roman religion was powerless. The fact that several of the Emperors acted munificently towards the temples of the old gods shows two things—that the old religion was still in force and far from negligible, and that the new religion was not at all a rival to it (cf. S. Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, London, 1904, bk. iv. ch. 3).

Indeed, the very Augustus who was the first, and remained the ideal, Emperor-god, was also the restorer to the ancient Roman religion of the dignity it had lost in the troublous times of the dying Republic.

But a further stage was reached, and first of all in Asia, at which the new religion became conscious that it could maintain itself only by closely allying itself with other religions, by associating Cæsar with the local divinities. How Cæsarism came to need this buttress is intelligible enough. It was only one or two generations that could have adequate experience of the vast benefit that Cæsar's rule brought with it. The previous state of social misery became more and more a dim memory as time passed, and the fervour with which Cæsar was greeted as divine could not and did not last. Hence, while during the 1st cent. the State-religion was simply the worship of Rome and Cæsar, in the 2nd cent. a modification was necessary; and, as indicated, this consisted in associating Cæsar with a local god who could call forth a genuine religious feeling. On coins we find Rome and Augustus associated with Diana, Persephone, etc. (see Ramsay, op. cit., p. 123f.). Thus it is entirely erroneous to say that the new religion owed any of its strength to the decay of the old paganism; it was only in close alliance with the old that Cæsarism as a religion could continue in existence.

3. Cæsarism and Christianity.—It will be convenient to treat of this under three heads: (a) the antagonism; (b) the resemblances; (c) Cæsarism in the NT.

(a) The antagonism.—This is the most obvious and familiar point in the relation of Cæsarism to Christianity. It is known to all that Rome persecuted Christianity. What needs to be noted is that persecution was not a spasmodic thing due to the whim and caprice of specially 'bad' Emperors, as has sometimes been represented. Persecution of Christianity was the deliberate and settled policy, not of this or that tyrant, but of the Roman State. From the time that Christianity attained any great dimensions to the day of Constantine's Edict of Toleration, there existed between it and the Roman power a relation of antagonism; and a condition of persecution resulted for the Church. The persecution might be wide-spread or local, few or many Christians might be involved: that depended entirely on the diligence and zeal of Roman officials. From what has been said above, the reason for this state of matters is quite plain. Rome had no option but to persecute. Cæsar-worship was the bond of Empire, the test of loyalty, and Christians refused to worship Cæsar. They were, therefore, a danger to the State. Other charges were preferred against them, but this came to be the one capital charge—treason to the State manifest in refusing to worship Cæsar. The story of persecution, of course, is a varied one; we cannot trace its development here. But we have indicated its rationale—the principle which from the first underlay it, and gradually became explicit.

With Christianity as one religion among others Rome would not have concerned herself. Because Christianity threatened what had been adopted as a political safeguard of the first importance for the coherence of the Empire, Rome, without a reversal of her adopted policy, could do nothing else than attempt to extirpate this dangerous sect.

*The Christian who refused this sacrifice (to the image of Cæsar) fell automatically under the charge of majestas, i.e. of mortal insult or treason to the Emperor, who represented in his own person the majesty, wisdom, and beneficent power of Rome' (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, p. 101).

Thus the fact that the great and good Marcus Aurelius was a persecutor of Christians does not require the laboured explaining away it has often received, e.g. from Farrar in Seekers after God, 1891, p. 257 ff. The fact may be fully accepted and easily explained. Just because of his goodness as a ruler, he was a persecutor. His first duty was to suppress anarchy, and in the view of the Roman Government Christians were anarchists.

We do not need to expound here the inner, inherent antagonism of the two religions. It was that of the material and the spiritual, the seen and the unseen, the temporal and the eternal, the glorification of success and the exaltation of service even when it meant renunciation, loss, and self-sacrifice; the one boasted of a throne, the other of a Cross.

(b) Resemblances.—The opposition of Christianity and Caesarism becomes more marked when we consider their resemblances. (a) Both were universal religions; we do not need to dwell on that. (β) Each proclaimed and honoured a 'Messiah.' As noted above, Caesar's praise was celebrated in phrases closely parallel to the praises of Messiah in Isaiah or the Psalms. The prosperity and peace of Messiah's reign as pictured in Isaiah have been regarded by many as the basis of Vergil's Eclogue, though there is no probability in the view. Similar 'Messianic' passages are by no means rare in the Latin literature of the period. Throughout the world, indeed, there was an expectancy of some great deliverer. The Church proclaimed Jesus, the pagan world acclaimed Caesar. (γ) All the great designations by which Christians expressed the dignity of Christ had already been used of Caesar. This is the most striking, as it is the least familiar, thing to be noted. 'Lord,' 'our Lord,' 'Saviour,' 'Son of God,' 'Image of God,' 'God manifest'—precisely the greatest names applied to Christ in the NT—were all familiar, throughout the East at least, as usual terms in which to speak of the Emperor (for details see H. A. A. Kennedy, in Expositor, 7th ser., vii. [1909] 289 ff.). While some of the terms, e.g. 'Son of God,' certainly had a root quite independent of Caesarism, and all as applied to Christ and Christians had a different content from the same terms applied to Caesar by pagans, the parallelism is too complete to be pure coincidence. To seize as eminently suitable for their own purpose the whole vocabulary of Caesar-adoration was a bold and brilliant stroke of policy on the part of the preachers of Christianity. The humble missionaries, speaking of Jesus as the Emperor was spoken of, must have made a startling and very profound impression. On the one hand, keen hostility would be aroused, but on the other, in many cases an eager curiosity and interest would be awakened. Any religiously-minded pagan must have felt the difficulty of the real godhead of Caesar. Caesarism after all could not satisfy any religious instinct. To any deep reflexion it must appear in reality the negation of religion.

'It was only a sham religion, a matter of outward show and magnificent ceremonial. It was almost devoid of power over the heart and will of man, when the first strong sense of relief from misery had grown weak, because it was utterly unable to satisfy the religious needs and cravings of human nature' (Ramsay, op. cit., p. 123).

The proclamation of a spiritual Kingdom with a King to whom all the highest titles borne by Caesar really applied cannot but have made a strong appeal to the interest of many of the more serious in pagan cities (cf. Kennedy, loc. cit.). From another point of view this strange parallelism may be regarded as one among many aspects of a providential preparation of the pagan world for Christianity. Men were familiar with its greatest conceptions before it appeared; their conceptions required only to be spiritualized.

(c) NT references.—Outside the Apocalypse there is only one clear reference to Caesarism, and it is slight, viz. the mention in Ac 19<sup>31</sup> of the 'Asiarchs' who were friends of St. Paul. The provinces were united in communes for Caesar-worship, and the president or high priest of the commune of Asia was termed 'Asiarch.' So in Galatia there was the 'Galatarch,' in Bithynia the 'Bithyniarch,' etc. The Asiarch held office for a limited period, but retained the honorary title, hence there might be several Asiarchs in Ephesus (see EGT in loc.). Cf. art. ASIARCH.

It is scarcely too much to say that in Caesarism we have a key to the Apocalypse. With that key many obscurities disappear, and the value of part of the book as a sober historical document becomes plain. Knowledge of the history of Caesarism makes it clear why Pergamum is described as 'Satan's seat' (Rev 2<sup>13</sup>). At Pergamum, the administrative capital of the province, the first temple to Augustus was built. For 40 years it was the sole centre of Caesarism for the province; and, after other temples were established, it retained its primacy. 'Satan' is a symbolic expression for whatever was the great obstacle and hostile influence to Christianity; hence Pergamum was Satan's seat par excellence (see Ramsay, op. cit., p. 294). We cannot here deal with the whole subject of Caesarism in the Apocalypse. We must be content to refer briefly to ch. 13, which Caesarism explains, and which makes a contribution to our knowledge of Caesarism. The 'first Beast' is the Imperial power, the 'second Beast' is the government of the Province of Asia, with its 'two horns,' proconsul and commune. The chapter proceeds to record how the commune maintained the Imperial religion, the worship of 'the first Beast.' 'It maketh all to worship,' and orders images of Caesar to be made (vv. 1-14). Verses 13-15 add to our knowledge the fact that pseudo-miracles were practised by the priests of Caesarism. The miracles in question were the familiar accomplishments of the priests of many faiths—fire-producing and ventriloquism; and, as Ramsay shows (op. cit., p. 99 ff.), there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the account here given, though it is our sole authority on the point. Verses 16-17 indicate a policy of 'boycott' against Christians. This might quite possibly be not ordered by the proconsul, but recommended by the commune. Other points in this interesting chapter deserve notice; every phrase is significant; but the reader must be referred to Ramsay's exposition (op. cit. ch. ix.).

ENLIGHTENMENT (φωτισμός).—Enlightenment is the intellectual and moral effect produced in the spiritual experience of believers by the reception of the Christian revelation. Objectively, it is called 'the light (φωτισμός, RVm 'illumination') of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). The gospel is God calling us 'out of darkness into his marvellous light' (1 P 2<sup>9</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel Christ claims to be 'the light of the world,' τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου (Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>). Even before His Incarnation, as the Divine Logos, He is said to have been the informing principle of both life and truth within humanity, 'the true light which lighteth (φωτίζει) every man' (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). Subjectively, specific Christian enlightenment arises in the consciousness of those who actually embrace the truth revealed in the person, teaching, and work of the historic Christ. It is no mere intellectual illumination whereby abstract or doctrinal truth is understood. St. Paul regards it as a gift of spiritual insight into the Divine nature and redemptive purposes. It is God's bestowal of 'a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him'; it is 'having the eyes of your heart enlightened (πεφωτισμενους) that ye may know' (Eph 1<sup>17</sup>). This spiritual insight manifests itself in action. It has ethical as well as intellectual results. 'The fruit of the light (ὁ καρπὸς τοῦ φωτός) is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth'; hence the enlightened 'walk as children of light' (Eph 5<sup>8</sup>). St. Paul calls his early converts 'sons of light,' υἱοὶ φωτός, and concludes, 'Let us, since we are of the day, be sober' (1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>, 8).

Two passages in Hebrews (6<sup>1-5</sup> 10<sup>32</sup>), which presuppose this enlightenment, call for special attention because they have been thought to contain reference to baptism on the one hand, and to the pagan Mysteries on the other. That there is some allusion to baptism in 6<sup>1</sup> is quite probable, for the two expressions, 'once enlightened,' and 'made partakers of the Holy Ghost,' correspond respectively to the preceding expressions in v. 2, 'teaching of baptisms' and 'laying on of hands.' As instruction in Christian truth formed part of the preparation of catechumens for baptism, the rite itself attested the enlightenment resulting therefrom. It is a well-known fact that the terms 'baptism' and 'enlightenment' soon after apostolic times became synonymous. Syriac versions of the NT render the word 'enlightened' in both 6<sup>1</sup> and 10<sup>32</sup> by 'baptized.' As early as Justin Martyr (150) 'enlightenment' had become a recognized term for baptism. In his Apology (i. 61), after speaking of baptism as a 'new birth' (αναγέννησις), Justin says: 'And this washing is called enlightenment (καλεῖται δὲ τοῦτο τὸ λουτρὸν φωτισμός) because those who learn these things [i.e. the Christian teaching] have their understanding enlightened.' He also, in the same passage, calls the recently baptized 'the newly enlightened.' Later patristic writers, understanding 'enlightened' in He 6<sup>1</sup> to mean 'baptized,' inferred from the expression, 'those who were once (ἅπαξ, 'once for all') enlightened . . . it is impossible to renew,' that it was inadmissible to rebaptize, while the Montanists and Novatians went so far as to deny the possibility of absolution for those who sinned after baptism, holding that baptism in the blood of martyrdom alone would avail in the case of flagrant sin.

In reference to the Mysteries, it may be said to be probable that the term 'enlightened,' occurring in these two passages, is one of the many NT words which reproduce the phraseology made current by these pagan cults. In He 6<sup>1-5</sup> 'enlightened' occurs among quite a number of other terms or ideas which were current in connexion with the Mysteries. For instance, 'perfection' (τελειότης), or 'full growth' (RVm), was the technical term for the state of the fully initiated (οἱ τέλειοι) into one or other of these cults. The mention of 'baptisms' in this connexion reminds us that the Mysteries also had lustrations among their initiatory rites. The twice-mentioned 'tasting' suggests the symbolic tasting and eating in the pagan ceremonies. The expressions 'made partakers of the Holy Ghost' and 'tasting 'the powers of the age to come' recall the fact that the ideas of a possible participation in the Divine nature and a future life were central in the symbolism of all the Mysteries, however crudely or even repulsively set forth. A. S. Carman draws attention (Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. 1. [1893]) to the use made by the NT of terminology drawn from the Mysteries. G. Anrich contends (Das antike Mysterienwesen, 1893) that no direct dependence of Christianity upon the Mysteries could be established. A more complete knowledge of the nature and diffusion of mystery-cults in apostolic times, together with the recognition of additional terms in the NT vocabulary drawn from them, makes it easier to accept the recent opinion of Clemen (Primitive Christianity and its non-Jewish Sources, 1912, p. 345) concerning He 6<sup>1</sup> that 'the expression φωτίζειν, which also occurs in 10<sup>32</sup> and then in Eph 1<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>, is borrowed from the language of the Mysteries; and this is the more probable seeing that in the Mysteries there was also a sacred meal, and in He 6<sup>4</sup> "tasting" and "enlightened" are associated.'

In relation to the dependence which the NT shows in this subject, as in others, upon both the phraseology and religious ideas of earlier and lower cults, it must be borne in mind that a richer and fuller content has been poured by Christianity into those pagan forms of expression, and that here, as in the case of the Jewish Law, Christ came 'not to destroy, but to fulfil.'

M. SCOTT FLETCHER.

ENMITY (ἐχθρα).—Human life is disquieted and embittered by enmities, active and passive. (1) Men are enemies of God in their mind (τῇ διανοίᾳ) by their wicked works (Col 1<sup>21</sup>). This is not to be taken in a passive sense, which would imply that they are hateful to God (invisos Deo, says Meyer, ad loc.). Their enmity is active. The carnal mind (φρόνημα), caring only for the gratification of the senses, is hostility to (εἰς) God (Ro 8<sup>7</sup>). The friendship (φιλία, which implies 'loving' as well as 'being loved') of the world, which loves its own (Jn 15<sup>19</sup>), is enmity with God (Ja 4<sup>4</sup>, Vulg. inimica est dei). Some who profess Christianity are sadly called enemies of the Cross (Ph 3<sup>18</sup>); and a man may so habitually pursue low ends as to become an enemy of all righteousness (Ac 13<sup>10</sup>). It is the work of Christ to subdue this active inward enmity to God and goodness, and thus to undo the work of the Enemy who has sown the seeds of evil in the human heart (Mt 13<sup>28</sup>). While sinners are reconciled to God, it is nowhere said in the NT that God, as if He were hostile, needs to be reconciled to sinners. It is the mind of man, not the mind of God, which must undergo a change, that a reunion may be effected' (J. B. Lightfoot, Col.<sup>8</sup>, 1879, p. 159).

(2) The enmity of Jew and Gentile was notorious. After smouldering for centuries, it finally burst into the flames of the Bellum Judaicum. The contempt of Greek for barbarian was equally pronounced. Christ came to end these and all similar racial antipathies. By His Cross He 'abolished' and 'slew' the enmity (Eph 2<sup>15</sup>, 16), creating a new manhood which is neither Jewish, Greek, nor Roman, but comprehensive, cosmopolitan, catholic, fulfilling the highest classical ideal of human fellowship—'humani nihil a me alienum puto' (Terence, Heaut. I. i. 25)—all because it is Christian.

(3) The Christian, however, cannot help having enemies. Just because he is not of the world, the world hates him (Jn 15<sup>18a</sup>). But the spirit of Christ that is in him constrains him to feed his enemy when hungry, give him drink when thirsty (Ro 12<sup>20</sup>), and so endeavour to change him into a friend.

(4) Every preacher, because he is bound to be a moralist and reformer, runs a special risk of being mistaken for an enemy. Truth, though spoken in love, may arouse hatred: ὥστε ἐχθρὸς ὑμῶν γέγονα ἀληθεύων ὑμῖν; (Gal 4<sup>16</sup>). Yet a moment's thought would make it clear that the aim is not to hurt but to heal, and the surgeon who skilfully uses the knife is ever counted a benefactor.

(5) The courageous faith of the early Church assumed that Christ would put all His enemies under His feet (1 Co 15<sup>25</sup>; cf. He 1<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>13</sup>), i.e. that every form of evil, moral and physical alike, would finally be subdued. 'The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death' (1 Co 15<sup>26</sup>).

(6) A single passage seems, prima facie, to imply that men may sometimes be enemies of God sensu passivo. To the Romans St. Paul says of the Jews, 'They are enemies for your sake' (Ro 11<sup>28</sup>). They are treated as enemies in order that salvation may come to the Gentiles. But the enmity is far from being absolute; they are all the time 'beloved' (ἀγαπητοὶ διὰ τοὺς πατέρας, 11<sup>28</sup>).

JAMES STRAHAN.

ENOCH (Ἐνὼχ).—Enoch (along with Elijah) was regarded as having a unique destiny among the saints of the OT, in that when his earthly life was ended he was taken directly to heaven. Gn 5<sup>24</sup> is referred to (1) by the writer of Hebrews (11<sup>5</sup>), who gives Enoch the second place in his roll of the faithful. Instead of the Hebrew text ('and Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him'), the writer had before him the LXX version: καὶ εὐηρέστησεν Ἐνὼχ τῷ θεῷ καὶ οὐχ ἠύρισκετο, διότι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεός. The phrase 'he pleased God'—which is used in other places (Gn 17<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>40</sup> 48<sup>15</sup>, etc.) where the original has 'he walked with (or before) God'—is regarded by the author of Hebrews as a testimony to Enoch's faith. To the statement that 'God took (or translated) him' the writer adds the explanatory words 'that he should not (or did not) see death.' The idea of immortality has rather to be imported into the original words, which, as Calvin saw, might imply no more than 'mors quaedam extraordinaria.' But the thought that Enoch escaped death had already been suggested by Sirach (49<sup>14</sup>) in his eulogy of famous men: 'No man was created upon the earth such as was Enoch; for he was taken up (ἀνελήμφθη) from the earth.' In 4 Ezr. vi. 26, Enoch and Elijah are spoken of as men 'who have not tasted death from their birth.' Josephus preserves the ambiguity of the original in a characteristic phrase, 'he departed to the deity' (ἀνεχώρησεν πρὸς τὸ θεῖον), but instead of venturing to infer that this implies actual deathlessness, the historian merely adds: 'whence it is that his death is not recorded' (Ant. I. iii. 4). The 'two witnesses' in Rev 11<sup>3</sup> are generally regarded as Enoch and Elijah.

(2) In later Judaism the words 'and Enoch walked with God' were interpreted as meaning that he was made the recipient of special Divine revelations. In the recovered Hebrew text of Sir 44<sup>16</sup> he is described as 'an example of knowledge' (changed in the Greek into ὑπόδειγμα μεταβολῆς τῶν γενεῶν), and the Book of Jubilees says, 'He was the first among men . . . who learned writing and knowledge and wisdom. . . . And he was with the angels of God these six jubilees of years, and they showed him everything which is on earth and in the heavens' (ch. iv. [Charles, Apoc. and Pseud-epig., 1913, p. 18 f.]). Enoch the saint was thus transformed into the patron of esoteric knowledge, and became the author of apocalyptic books. In Jude<sup>14</sup> he is designated 'the seventh from Adam,' a phrase taken from the Book of Enoch (lx. 8, xciii. 3), and a passage is quoted in which he is represented as threatening judgment upon the false teachers of the early Christian Church.

The extraordinary developments of the Enoch-legend in later Judaism could never have grown out of this passage [Gn 5<sup>24</sup> 24] alone; everything goes to show that the record has a mythological basis, which must have continued to be a living tradition in Jewish circles in the time of the Apocalyptic writers. A clue to the mystery that invests the figure of Enoch has been discovered in Babylonian literature' (Skinner, Genesis [ICC, 1910], p. 132). He is there identified with Enmeduranki, who is described in a ritual tablet from the library of Asshurbanipal as a favourite of the gods, and is said to have been initiated into the mysteries of heaven and earth, and instructed in certain arts of divination which he handed down to his son.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ENOCH, BOOK OF.—Introductory.—The Ethiopic Book of Enoch (or 1 Enoch, as it is now more conveniently denominated) is the largest, and, after the canonical Book of Daniel, the most important of the Jewish apocalyptic works which have so recently come to be recognized as supplying most important data for the critical study of NT ideas and phraseology. The Book—or rather the Books—of Enoch the reader will find to be a work of curious complexity and unevenness. It is a wonderful mass of heterogeneous elements; in fact, it is quite a cycle of works in itself—geographical, astronomical, prophetic, moral, and historical. In this medley we find certain recurring notes. The temporary success and triumph of the wicked, idolaters, luxurious, rich, oppressors, rulers, kings, and mighty ones, and the present sufferings of the righteous, are continually contrasted with their future destiny—after death or after judgment, according to the views of the particular author as to the moment at which moral discrimination will begin. Another recurring note is the subservience of natural phenomena to spiritual and quasi-personal forces, which in turn are responsible and as a rule obedient to God. Repeatedly and with dramatic force the unfailing order of Nature is contrasted with the disobedience of man. Yet another recurring feature, and one common to this apocalyptic literature, is the reserving of the visions and the books of Enoch for the last days, for the elect to read and understand. On the other hand, there is ever and anon a baffling change in the presentation of ideas about the Kingdom, the Messiah, the form of the future judgment and life after death. The pictures of the Messianic Kingdom take on a shifting, ever-changing form, in accordance with the views of the author and the particular tribulations under which each individual writer was labouring. Judgment is mediated now by angels of punishment, now by the archangels, or the sword of the righteous or internecine strife, or by the Son of Man, or exercised immediately by God Himself. Darkness and chains and burning fire, valleys and the abyss, loom large in all descriptions of the place and mode of punishment. There is a highly developed angelology, in keeping with the general conception of God's transcendence, and an equally developed demonology, which is connected with the interest of the various authors in the problem of the seat and origin of evil. The power of prayer—whether that of the angels, the departed holy ones, or the righteous on earth—is recognized, especially in the bringing in of judgment. The space devoted to the calendar, however, and the movements of the heavenly bodies, and the secrets of natural forces, stands in sheer contrast to the NT silence on those subjects.

We cannot close without quoting Charles's words in his introduction (Book of Enoch, 1912, p. x):

'In the age to which the Enoch literature belongs there is movement everywhere, and nowhere dogmatic fixity and finality. And though at times the movement may be reactionary, yet the general trend is onward and upward.' This work is the most important historical memorial 'of the religious development of Judaism from 200 B.C. to 100 A.D., and particularly of the development of that side of Judaism, to which historically Christendom in large measure owes its existence.'

We have only to take the single example of the unique portrait of the 'Son of Man' in the Parables—eternally pre-existent with God, recognized now by the righteous, and hereafter to be owned and adored by all, even His foes—to be assured of the truth of this verdict.

1. Contents.—SECTION I.: chs. i.—xxxvi.

i.—v.—Enoch takes up his parable: God's coming to judgment to help and bless the righteous and destroy the ungodly (i. 1-9); Nature's un-failing order (ii. 1-v. 3) contrasted with sinners' disobedience; a curse on them, but forgiveness, peace, and joy for the elect (v. 4-9).

vi.—xi. (Noahic fragment).—Fall of certain angels, through union with women (vi. 1-vii. 1); birth of giants who devour mankind and drink blood (vii. 2-6). Knowledge of arts, magic, and astronomy imparted by fallen angels (viii. 1-4). Cry of souls of dead for vengeance (viii. 4, ix. 3, 10) heard by the four archangels, who bring their cause before God (ix. 1-11). God sends Uriel to Noah to warn him of approaching Deluge (x. 1-3). Raphael is to bind Azazel in desert in Dudael till judgment day, and heal the earth (x. 4-7); Gabriel to destroy giants by internecine strife (x. 9-10, 15), Michael to bind Semjaza and his associates for seventy generations in valleys of the earth (x. 11-14). All evil is to cease, and the plant of righteousness (i.e. Israel) to appear (x. 16). All the righteous are to escape and live till they beget thousands of children (x. 17), the earth is to yield a thousandfold, all men are to become righteous and adore God (x. 21). Sin and punishment will cease for ever (x. 22). Store-chambers of blessing in heaven will be opened (xi.).

xii.—xvi.—A Dream Vision of Enoch.—Enoch is hidden from men (xii. 1) and is sent to the fallen angels ('Watchers') with the message: 'no peace nor forgiveness' (xii. 4-6), which he delivers to Azazel (xiii. 1, 2) and the others (xiii. 3); they beseech Enoch to write a petition for them (xiii. 4-6); as he reads it he falls asleep and sees visions of chastisement, which he recounts to them (xiii. 7-10). The message of the vision is given in xiv. 1-7; the manner of it in xiv. 8-xvi. 4. He ascends in the vision to heaven, past crystal walls into a crystal house and a greater house beyond, to the blazing throne of the Great Glory (xiv. 20), whom no angel can behold. He entrusts Enoch with the message to the Watchers; they had sinned in taking wives (xv. 3-7); from the dead giants' bodies proceed evil spirits which, remaining on earth, do all harm with impunity till the Great Judgment (xv. 8-xvi. 1); the Watchers' doom is repeated (xvi. 2-4).

xvii.—xxxvi.—Enoch's two journeys: through the earth and to Sheol.—(a) xvii.—xix.—Enoch is brought to the ends of the earth and views treasures of stars, and the winds that uphold heaven (xvii. 1-xviii. 3), and seven mountains of precious stones (xviii. 6), and beyond, a deep abyss of fire (xviii. 11), and further, an utter waste (xviii. 12) with seven stars like burning mountains, bound for ten thousand years for not observing their appointed times (xviii. 13-16). Here stand the fallen angels, whose spirits seduce men to idolatry (xix. 1) and their wives, turned into sirens (xix. 2).—(b) xx.—xxxvi.—These seven archangels—Uriel, Raphael, Raguel, Michael, Saraqael, Gabriel, Remiel—and their functions (xx.). Enoch proceeds to chaos and the seven stars and the abyss of xviii. 12-16 (xxi. 1-7), which is the final prison of the fallen angels (xxi. 8-10). Elsewhere in the west he sees a great mountain with three ('four' in text) hollow places (=Sheol), to contain men's souls till the Great Judgment—one for martyrs like Abel and other righteous men, with a bright spring of water (xxii. 5-9), one for unpunished sinners (xxii. 10, 11), one for sinners (who suffered in life), who never rise (xxii. 12-13). Thereafter, still in the west, he sees the fire of the heavenly luminaries (xxiii.), and elsewhere again, beyond a mountain range of fire, seven mountains of precious stones, the central one to be God's throne on earth, with the tree of life (xxiv. 1-xxv. 3) to be transplanted after the judgment to the holy place, where the righteous shall eat of it and live a long life on earth (xxv. 4-6). In the middle of the earth Enoch sees a holy mountain (Zion) with its surrounding summits and ravines (xxvi.), and the accursed valley (of Hinnom) which is to be the scene of the Last Judgment (xxvii.). Thence he goes east (xxviii.—xxxiii.), past fragrant trees and mountains, over the Erythraean Sea and the angel Zotiel (xxxii. 2), to the garden of the righteous, and the Tree of Wisdom, which is fully described (xxxii. 3-6). Thence to the earth's ends whereon heaven rests, with three portals for the stars in east and west (xxxiii. 3, xxxvi. 2, 3) and three in north and south for the winds (xxxiv. 1-3, xxxvi. 1).

SECTION II.: chs. xxxvii.—lxxi.—The Parables.—xxxvii. 1 commences 'the second vision . . . of wisdom'; till the present day such wisdom has never been given as is embodied in these three Parables recounted to those that dwell on the earth (xxxvii. 4, 5).

xxxviii.—xliv.—The First Parable.—When the Righteous One appears, where will the sinners' dwelling be? Then shall the kings and mighty perish and be given into the hands of the righteous and holy (xxxviii.). [Descent of the Watchers—an interpolation (xxxix. 1, 2).] A whirlwind carries off Enoch to the end of the heavens; he views the dwelling-places of the holy who pray for mankind, and the Righteous One's abode under the wings of the Lord of Spirits (xxxix. 3-14); an innumerable multitude, and four presences (=archangels)—Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, and Phanuel—and their functions (xli.); heaven's secrets and weighing of men's actions (xli. 1, 2); secrets of natural phenomena and sun and moon; their chambers and weighing of the stars (xli. 3-9, xliii. 1, 2, xlv.). the stars stand for the holy who dwell on the earth (xliv. 4). A fragment.—Wisdom goes forth, and finds no dwelling-place among men, so returns to heaven; while unrighteousness is welcomed and remains with men (xlii.).

xlv.—lvii.—The Second Parable.—The lot of the apostates: the new heaven and earth. Those who deny the name of Lord of Spirits are preserved for judgment (xlv. 1, 2). 'Mine Elect One' on throne of glory shall try men's works; heaven and earth transformed (xlv. 3-6). The Head of Days and Son of Man (xlv. 1-4) shall put down the kings and the mighty; they have no hope of rising from their graves (xlv. 5-8). 'In those days' the prayer of the righteous united with angelic intercession was heard (xlv. 1, 2); the Head of Days on the throne of His glory, books of the living opened, vengeance of righteous at hand (xlv. 3, 4). Enoch sees the inexhaustible fountain of righteousness: 'at that hour' the Son of Man was 'named' in the presence of the Lord of Spirits; he is a staff to the righteous, the light of the Gentiles: in His name the righteous are saved; kings and mighty are to burn like straw (xlvii.); infinite wisdom and power of the Elect One (xlix.). [—An interpolation?—In those days the holy become victorious; the others (i.e. Gentiles) witness this and repent—they have no honour, but are saved in the name of the Lord of Spirits.] In those days earth, Sheol, and Abaddon give up what they hold. The Elect One arises, sits on God's throne, and chooses out the righteous amid universal rejoicing (li.). Enoch sees seven metal mountains (symbols of world-powers): they will serve the Anointed's dominion (lii. 4), and melt before the Elect One (lii. 6). Next he sees a deep valley with open mouths, and angels of punishment preparing instruments of Satan to destroy the kings and the mighty (liii. 1-5); after this the Righteous and Elect One shall cause the house of His congregation to appear (liii. 6). In another part he sees a deep valley with burning fire; here the kings and the mighty are cast in (liv. 1, 2), and iron chains made for Azazel's hosts, whom four archangels will cast into the burning furnace on that great day (liv. 3-6), after judgment by the Elect One (lv. 3, 4); angels of punishment with scourges are seen proceeding to cast the Watchers' children into the abyss (lvi. 1-4). [Fragments.—(a) liv. 7-lv. 2 (Noachic).—Punishment by waters impending, promise of non-recurrence. (b) lvi. 5-8.—The angels are to stir up the Parthians and Medes to tread upon the land of God's elect, but 'the city of my righteous' shall hinder their horses; they shall slay one another, and Sheol shall devour them in presence of the elect. (c) lvii. 1-3.—A host of wagons is seen, earth's pillars are shaken by the noise (return of Dispersion).]

lviii.-lxxi.—The Third Parable.—Endless light and life for righteous (lviii.). [Secrets of lightnings, an intrusion (lix.).] [Noachic fragment (for 'Enoch' read 'Noah' in lx. 1).—The Head of Days on the throne of glory announces the judgment (lx. 1-6, 25); Leviathan a female monster, and Behemoth a male, parted, one in the abysses of the ocean, the other in the wilderness to the east of the garden (Eden) where Enoch was taken up; they shall feed . . . (presumably till given as food to the elect as in 2 Bar. xxix. 4; 4 Ezz. vi. 52) (lx. 7-10, 24); chambers of winds, secrets of thunder, spirits of the sea, hoarfrost, snow, mist and rain (lx. 11-23).]

Third Parable resumed.—The angels are seen with long cords; they go to measure Paradise (lxx. 3) and recover all the righteous dead from sea or desert (lxi. 1-5); the Lord of Spirits places the Elect One on the throne of glory to judge (lxi. 6-9); all the heavenly hosts, Cherubim, Seraphim, and Ophanim, angels of power and of principalities, the Elect One, the powers on earth and over water, the elect who dwell in the garden of life, and all flesh shall join in praising God (lxi. 10-13). The kings and the mighty are called upon to recognize the Elect One, now seated on the throne; pained and terrified, they glorify God (lxii. 1-6) and adore the Son of Man; but are delivered to the angels for punishment (lxii. 9-12); the righteous had previously known the Son of Man, though hidden from the beginning, and shall eat and lie down and rise up for ever with Him, and be clothed with garments of glory and of life (lxii. 7, 8, 13-16); unavailing repentance and confession of the kings and the mighty (lxiii.); vision of fallen angels in prison (lxiv.). [Noachic fragment (lxv.-lxix. 25).—Noah calls on Enoch at the ends of the earth; he is told judgment is imminent because of sorcery and idolatry, and the violence of the Satans; Noah is to be preserved: from him shall proceed a fountain of righteous and holy (= Israel) for ever (lxv.); the angels of punishment hold the Flood in check (lxvi.); Noah is told that the angels are making an ark for him (lxvii. 1-3); God will imprison the angels, who had taught men how to sin, in the burning valley, which Enoch had shown Noah; thence proceed waters which now heal the bodies of the kings and the mighty (lxvii. 8), but it will one day become a fire ever-burning (lxvii. 13). Enoch gives Noah these secrets in the book of Parables (lxviii. 1). Michael and Raphael are astonished at the sternness of the judgment upon the fallen angels (lxviii. 2-5); the names of the fallen angels and Satans who led them astray and taught men knowledge and writing (lxix. 1-13); the hidden name and oath which preserve all things in due order (lxix. 14-25).]

Close of Third Parable.—Universal joy at the revealing of the Son of Man, who receives 'the sum of judgment' (lxix. 26-29). [Two fragments belonging to Parables: (a) lxx.—Enoch finally translated on the chariots of the spirit, and set between the north and the south (i.e. in Paradise). (b) lxxi.—'After this' he is translated in spirit; he sees the sons of God, the secrets of heaven, the crystal house, and countless angels and the four archangels, the Head of Days, the Son of Man, who brings in endless peace for the righteous.]

SECTION III.: chs. lxxii.-lxxxii.—The Book of the Courses of the Heavenly Luminaries.—The sun (lxxii.), the moon and its phases (lxxiii.), the lunar year (lxxiv.), the stars, the twelve winds and their portals (lxxvi.), the four quarters of the world, the seven great mountains, rivers, islands (lxxvii.), the moon's waxing and waning (lxxviii.), recapitulation (lxxix., lxxx. 1), perversion of Nature and the heavenly bodies owing to man's sin (lxxx. 2-8). Enoch sees the heavenly tablets containing men's deeds to all eternity, and is given one year to teach them to Methuselah (lxxxii.); his charge to Methuselah to hand on the books to the generations of the world; blessing on the observers of the true system of reckoning—year of 364 days (lxxxii. 1-9); stars which lead the seasons and the months (lxxxii. 10-20).

SECTION IV.: chs. lxxxiii.-xc.—Two Dream Visions: (a) lxxxiii., lxxxiv.; (b) lxxxv.-xc.—(a) Vision of earth's destruction: Mahalel bids Enoch pray that a remnant may remain (lxxxiii. 1-9); prayer of Enoch for survival of plant of eternal seed (= Israel) (lxxxiii. 10-lxxxiv. 6). (b) Second dream, in which Enoch sees Adam and other patriarchs under symbolism of bulls, etc. (lxxxv.); stars (= angels) fall from heaven, and unite with cattle (lxxxvi., lxxxvii.); the first star is cast into the abyss; evil beasts slay one another (lxxxviii.). In symbolism Enoch sees the history of Noah and the Deluge; Israel at the Exodus, crossing the Jordan, under the Judges; the building of the Temple; the two kingdoms; the Fall of Jerusalem (lxxxix. 1-67). Israel is entrusted to the Seventy Shepherds (= angelic rulers) from the Captivity to the Maccabæan revolt (lxxxix. 68-xc. 12); the enlightened lambs (= Chasids) and the great horn (= Judas Maccabæus) (xc. 6-12). The final assault of the heathen; a great sword is given to the sheep (= Jews); the Lord of the sheep intervenes (xc. 13-19); a throne is erected in the pleasant land for Him; the sealed books are opened; the sinning stars are cast into the abyss of fire, also the Seventy Shepherds; the blinded sheep into the abyss in the midst of the earth (= Gehenna) (xc. 20-27); the old house (= Temple) is removed; the Lord of the sheep brings a new house, greater and loftier; the sword is sealed up; all the sheep 'softer' (i.e. are enlightened); a white bull (= Messial) is born, and is adored by all; the others are all transformed into white bulls, and the Lord of the sheep rejoices over them all alike; Enoch awakes and weeps (xc. 23-42).

SECTION V.: chs. xci.-civ.—(a) Enoch's Book for his Children (xcii. 1).—God has appointed days for all things; the righteous are to arise from sleep and walk in eternal light, and sin is to disappear (xcii.). Methuselah and his family are summoned and exhorted to love righteousness; violence must increase, but judgment will follow; idols will fail, and the heathen be judged in fire for ever; the righteous are to rise again (xci. 1-11).

(b) Apocalypse of Weeks.—1st week: Enoch born. 2nd: the first end; Noah saved. 3rd: Abraham elected as the plant of righteous judgment. 4th: the law for all generations made. 5th: house of glory . . . built. 6th: all Israel blinded; Elijah ascends to heaven; the Dispersion. 7th: general apostasy; the elect righteous elected to receive seven-fold instruction concerning all creation (= Enoch's revelations). 8th: week of righteousness and of sword; Temple rebuilt for ever; all mankind converted. 9th: righteous judgment revealed to the whole world; sin abolished. 10th: great eternal judgment on angels; new heaven; thereafter weeks without number for ever (xciii., xci. 12-17).

(c) Warnings and woes.—Warnings against paths of unrighteousness (xciv. 1-5); woes against oppressors and rich (xciv. 6-11) and sinners (xcv. 2-7); hope for righteous (xcvi. 1-3); their prayer heard (xcvii. 5); woes against the luxurious and the rich (xcvi. 4-8, xcvii. 1-10). Warnings against indulgence; sin is of man's own devising, and every sin is every day recorded in heaven (xcviii. 1-8); sinners are prepared for the day of destruction; they will be given into hands of righteous (xcviii. 9-16). Woes on godless and law-breakers (xcix.); the righteous are to raise prayers and place them before the angels, who are to place the sin of sinners for a memorial before the Most High (xcix. 3). Sinners are to destroy one another (c. 1-3); angels descend into secret places and gather all who brought down sin (i.e. fallen angels); the righteous and holy receive guardians till an end is made of sin; though the righteous sleep long, they have nothing to fear; angels, sun, moon, and stars will witness to the sins of sinners (c. 4-13); God is obeyed by all Nature, therefore His law should be observed by men (ci.). Terrors of the judgment-day; the righteous who died in misery are not to grieve but await judgment (cii. 1-5). Taunts of sinners—after death we and the righteous are equal (cii. 6-11). Enoch knows a mystery from the heavenly tablets—the spirits of the righteous dead shall live and rejoice (ciii. 1-4); woes of sinners who died in honour—their spirits descend into darkness, chains, and burning flame (ciii. 5-8); woes of the righteous (ciii. 9-15); yet in heaven the angels remember them for good, and their names are written; they shall shine as lights of heaven (civ. 1, 2); 'cry for judgment, and it shall appear' (civ. 3). The writings of Enoch are to be given to the righteous—they give joy, uprightness, and wisdom (civ. 9-13).

[Messianic fragment (cv.).—God and the Messiah to dwell with men.] [Noachic fragment (cvi.-cvii.).—Lamech has a wondrous son; Methuselah inquires of Enoch at the ends of the earth about him; Enoch replies that a Deluge is to come because of sin introduced by the fallen angels; this son shall alone be saved—sin will arise again after him till the final annihilation of evil.] [An independent addition (cviii.).—Another book written by Enoch 'for his son and those who keep the law in the last days': the righteous are to wait for the destruction of the ungodly, whose spirits suffer in fire (cviii. 1-6); the spirits of the humble who lived ascetic lives and belonged to the generation of light shall God bring forth in shining light and seat each on the throne of his honour in never-ending splendour (cviii. 7-15).

2. Title.—The work is referred to under several titles. Of these the oldest are (a) the Books of Enoch (Test. Jud. xviii. 1, Test. Lev. x. 5 [A]; Origen, c. Celsum, v. 54, in Num. Hom. xxviii. 2—this title is implied in the division of the work into books; 1 En. xiv. 1, lxxii. 1, lxxxi. 1, xcii. 1, cviii. 1; Syncellus, Chronographia [ed. Dind., 1829, i. 20, etc.]); (b) the Words of Enoch (Jub. xxi. 10; Test. Benj. ix. 1; cf. 1 En. i. 1, xiv. 1). Other titles are (c) the Book of Enoch (Test. Lev. x. 5 [a]; Origen, de Princ. i. iii. 3, etc.); (d) the Writing of Enoch (Test. Lev. xiv. 1; Tertullian, de Cultu Fem. i. 3); (e) Enoch (Jude<sup>14</sup>; Ep. Barn. iv. 3; Clem. Alex., Eclog. Proph. [ed. Dind., 1869, iii. 456, 474]; Origen, in Ioannem, vi. 25, c. Celsum, v. 54; Tertullian, de Cultu Fem. ii. 10, de Idol. iv., xv.).

3. Canonicity.—That the work was recognized as inspired in certain Jewish circles appears from the above references in Jubilees and the Test. XII. Patriarchs. St. Jude quotes a passage from it as an authentic prophecy of Enoch. The Epistle of Barnabas (xvi. 5) refers to it in the words λεγει γαρ ἡ γραφή; Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christianis, 24) as ἡ τοῖς προφήταις ἐκπεφωνηται; Tert. (de Idol. xv.), 'Spiritus . . . prececinat per . . . Enoch'; (de Cultu Fem. i. 3), 'scio scripturam Enoch . . . non recipi a quibusdam, quia nec in armarium Judaicum admittitur . . . cum Enoch eadem scriptura etiam de Domino praedicarit, a nobis quidem nihil omnino rejiciendum est, quod pertineat ad nos. . . . A Judaeis potest jam videri propterea reiecta, sicut et cetera quae Christum sonant.' Origen, however, in c. Celsum, v. 54, says: ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις οὐ παντὶ φέρεται ὡς βεβαίᾳ τὰ ἐπιγεγραμμένα τοῦ Ἐνὼχ βιβλία. Chrysostom (Hom. in Gen. vi. 1), Jerome (Com. in Ps. cxxxii. 3), and Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xv. xxiii. 4) denounce the work as apocryphal, and this opinion henceforward prevails.

4. Critical structure and dates.—That the work was composite might be inferred from the external evidence of the titles, 'Books' or 'Words of Enoch,' under which the work is quoted in other writings. But internal evidence is more decisive. The frequent headings, such as 'the book written by Enoch' (xcii. 1), 'another book which Enoch wrote' (cviii. 1), and the divergence of historical outlook, of method of treatment, of ideas and phrases, in the various parts, point even more clearly to the fact that the work in its present form is a redaction of several of the more prominent writings belonging to a diffuse and varied cycle of literature passing under the name of Enoch. The work as we have it falls naturally into five quite distinct main sections as shown in 1 above:

SECTION I.: Visions and journeys (for contents see above).—xii.-xxxvi. belong to the earliest Enochic portion of this section; they are pre-Maccabæan, as, unlike lxxxi.-xc., they make no reference to Antiochus' persecution. They fall into subsections: xii.-xvi. (out of their original order), xvii.-xix., xx.-xxxvi. Chs. vi.-xi. belong to the earlier Book of Noah (see below). Chs. i.-v. appear to be an introduction written by the final editor of the entire work. The problem in this section is the origin of evil, which is traced to the fall of the Watchers. There is no Messiah; God Himself is to abide with men (xxv. 3); all the Gentiles will become righteous and worship God (x. 21); the righteous are admitted to the tree of life and live patriarchal lives with very material joys and blessings.

SECTION II.: The Parables (formerly known as 'the Similitudes').—There are three Parables (xxxviii.-xliv., xlv.-lvii., lviii.-lxix.), while xxxvii. forms an introduction, and lxx. a conclusion to them. Ch. lxxi. belongs to the Third Parable. There are many interpolations. Some are from the Book of Noah—lx., lxx.-lxix. 25 confessedly, and probably xxxix. 1-2, liv. 7-lv. 2 as well. Behind the Parables proper lie two sources, as Beer (Kautzsch's Apok. und Pseud. ii. 227) has shown: one deals with the 'Son of Man'—xl. 3-7, xlvi.-xlviii. 7, lii. 3-4, lxi. 3-4, lxii. 2-lxiii., lxix. 26-29, lxx.-lxxi., and has 'the angel who went with me' as Enoch's interpreter; the other deals with 'the Elect One'—xxxviii.-xxxix., xl. 1-2, 8-10, xli. 1-2, 9, xlv., xlviii. 8-10, l.-lii. 1-2, 5-9, liii.-liv. 6, lv. 3-lvii., lxi. 1-2, 5-13, lxii. 1, and has the 'angel of peace' as interpreter of the vision (so Charles, Enoch, p. 65). Only the former source attributes pre-existence to the Son of Man (xlvi. 2). This section is full of peculiar features, e.g. 'Lord of Spirits' as a Divine title; Phanuel replaces Uriel as the fourth archangel. The angelology is more developed: besides Cherubim, we have Seraphim, Ophannim, angels of power and of principalities. And so is the demonology: the origin of evil is traced back to the Satans and an original evil spirit-world. The Messiah is eternally pre-existent, and all judgment is committed to Him. The date of this section appears to lie between 95 and 64 B.C. and probably between 95 and 79. 'The kings and the mighty' are evidently the later Maccabean princes and their Sadducean supporters. The mighty cannot refer to the Romans; it must refer to the Sadducean nobles, who did not support the Herods. The problem is the oppression of the righteous by the kings and mighty, and the solution consists in a vision of the coming liberator and vindicator, the Messiah of supernatural power and privilege.

SECTION III.: The Book of the Heavenly Luminaries.—Chs. lxxii.-lxxviii., lxxxii., lxxxix. are original to this section; lxxx. and lxxx. are interpolations. The conceptions at times approach those of i.-xxxvi., but the points of divergence are very numerous. The date is not ascertainable. The object is to establish the solar year of 364 days as a Divine law revealed as early as the time of Enoch (lxxiv. 12 as emended. Cf. Jub. vi. 32-36).

SECTION IV.: The Dream Visions.—There is only one interpolation—xc. 14<sup>b</sup>. xc. 13-15 and xc. 16-18 are doublets. There is close agreement with and evident knowledge of vi.-xi., but no dependence on them. The conceptions are more spiritual and developed. The date would be before 161 B.C., as Judas Maccabæus is still warring (xc. 13); the end is expected to be about 140 B.C., as the fourth period of twelve shepherds would end then. The problem is the continued depression of Israel after the Return, which is attributed to the neglect of its seventy angelic guardians.

SECTION V.—This section really commences with xcii. 1 (see heading), and the original order of the first four chapters was xcii., xci. 1-10, 18-19, xciii. 1-10, xci. 12-17, xciv.; of these xciii. 1-10, xci. 12-17 form the short 'Apocalypse of Weeks.' There is a close resemblance throughout xci.-civ. to i.-xxxvi., in phrases, references, and ideas, but the divergences are not less numerous (see Charles, p. 219 ff.). The righteous alone rise, and in spirit only, not in body, to walk in eternal light in heaven. Contrast the crude materialism of i.-xxxvi. The date is determined by the interpretation we put on ciii. 14, 15—'the rulers . . . did not remove from us the yoke of those that devoured us and dispersed us and murdered us.' If the massacre of the Pharisees by John Hyrcanus is meant, the date must be later than that year—94 B.C. (cf. Parables). Otherwise, 104-95 B.C. (so Charles). The problem is ethical (the seeming impunity of the prosperous wicked—who, however, at death descend to Sheol and the flame for ever), not national, as in lxxxiii.-xc.

cv.—An independent Messianic fragment; cvi.-cvii.—part of the earlier Book of Noah; cviii. presupposes i.-xxxvi. and xci.-civ., and is later in date, and strongly ascetic, if not Essene, in tone.

Book of Noah.—Scattered through the work we find a series of more or less fragmentary passages—vi.-xi., liv. 7-lv. 2, lx., lxx.-lxxix. 25, cvi.-cvii., and probably xxix. 1, 2<sup>a</sup>)—which generally refer to Noah and the Deluge. Their inclusion appears to be due to the final editor, who forced into what are often awkward contexts fragments of this earlier work, or series of works, which we also know from Jub. vii. 20-39, x. 1-15, xxi. 10.

5. The text.—The text is not extant in the original Semitic form, but we possess a Greek translation of a part, and an Ethiopic version of the whole.

(1) The Greek version exists in duplicate to some extent. (a) The superior in point of text is to be found in Syncellus (Chronographia, ed. Dind. i. 20-23, etc.), who quotes vi.-x. 14, xv. 8-xvi. 1, and also gives viii. 4-ix. 4 in variant form. He also gives a quotation 'from the first book of Enoch concerning the watchers' (ed. Dind. i. 47) which does not occur in our present text. (b) The longer but less accurate text for i.-xxxii. (and xix. 3-xxi. 9 in duplicate) was discovered in 1886-7 at Akhmim, and published by Bouriant in 1892. Another fragment, in tachygraphic characters, exists in a Vatican Greek MS—no. 1809 (see at end of this art.).

(2) The Ethiopic version, which is a translation from the Greek, is known in 29 MSS, of which 15 are in England. The best are numbered gg, mgtu in Charles's Ethiopic text (q.v.). This text is inferior to that of the Syncellus Greek and is much nearer to that of the Akhmim Fragment (known generally as the 'Gizeh Greek').

(3) The Latin version is a mere fragment, cvi. 1-18, discovered in 1893 by M. R. James in the British Museum and published by him in that year in TS ii. 3.

(4) The quotations, both Greek and Latin, except for those in Syncellus, add little to the restoration of the true text. See Lawlor, art. in Journal of Philology, xxv. [1897] 164-225, and Charles's Introductions under 'Influence on Patristic Literature' in his two recent editions.

6. Original language.—The original language is now admitted to be Semitic—either Hebrew or Aramaic. Chs. vi.-xxxvi. were almost certainly in Aramaic. The transliterations φουκά (xviii. 8), μανδοβαρά (xxviii. 1), and βαβδθρά (xxix. 1), all show the Aramaic termination; while in vi. 7 and viii. 3 the proper names are only appropriate in Aramaic. To the rest of the book (except lxxxiii.-xc., which was possibly in Aramaic) Charles unhesitatingly assigns a Hebrew original. In xxxvii.-lxxi. Schmidt (OT and Semitic Studies, 1908, ii. 336-343) argues for Aramaic, but is answered by Charles.

7. Poetical element.—This bulks largely in 1 Enoch, but was first recognized by Charles, who prints it in verse form in his two recent editions. Its recognition is of use in helping at times to restore the true order, and at times to excise dittographs.

8. Influence on NT.—(1) DICTION AND IDEAS.—(a) The Epistle of St. Jude is remarkable for containing, with the possible exception of 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, the only two direct citations from pseudepigraphs in the NT. And of these two citations the only one made by name is from the Book of Enoch, which is quoted as though it possessed much the same authority as a canonical book of prophecy. It may be instructive to compare the words in Jude with the text of Enoch as restored by Charles:

Jude 14. 15—'Ἰδοὺ ἦλθεν Κύριος ἐν ἀγlais μυριάσιν αὐτοῦ, ποιῆσαι κρίσιν κατὰ πάντων, καὶ ἐλέγξει πάντας τοὺς ἀσεβεῖς περὶ πάντων τῶν ἔργων ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν ὧν ἠσέβησαν καὶ περὶ πάντων τῶν σκληρῶν ὧν ἐλάλησαν κατ' αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτωλοὶ ἀσεβεῖς.	1 En. i. 9—'Ἰδοὺ ἔρχεται σὺν ταῖς μυριάσιν αἰγίας αὐτοῦ, ποίησαι κρίσιν κατὰ πάντων, καὶ ἀπολέσει πάντας τοὺς ἀσεβεῖς καὶ ἐλέγξει πᾶσαν σάρκα περὶ πάντων ἔργων τῆς ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν ὧν ἠσέβησαν καὶ σκληρῶν ὧν ἐλάλησαν λογῶν κατ' αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτωλοὶ ἀσεβεῖς.
--	---

For the σκληροὶ λόγοι cf. 1 En. v. 4, xxvii. 2. Further, St. Jude's description of Enoch as 'the seventh from Adam' is identical with that in the Noachic interpolation in the Parables (lx. 8).

The Epistle is full of reminiscences of Enoch. Cf. Jude<sup>4</sup>, 'denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ,' with 1 En. xlviii. 10, 'they have denied the Lord of Spirits and His Anointed'; Jude<sup>6</sup>, 'angels which . . . left their proper habitation,' with 1 En. xii. 4, 'the Watchers . . . who have left the high heaven,' and xv. 7, 'as for the spiritual ones of the heaven, in heaven is their dwelling'; Jude<sup>6</sup>, 'kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day,' with 1 En. x. 4-6, 'Bind Azazel . . . and cast him into the darkness . . . and cover him with darkness, and let him abide there for ever . . . and on the day of the great judgment he shall be cast into the fire,' and x. 11, 12, 'Bind Semjaza . . . bind them fast for seventy generations . . . till the judgment that is for ever and ever is consummated'; Jude<sup>13</sup>, 'wandering stars,' with 1 En. xviii. 15, xxi. 2, 3, 6.

(b) 2 Peter is closely related to Jude, and 2 P 2<sup>1</sup> is more than an echo of Jude<sup>6</sup>. The fuller details, indeed, may be due to 1 Enoch, while the juxtaposition of the first judgment on the angels in 2 P 2<sup>1</sup> with the Deluge in 2 P 2<sup>5</sup> is characteristic of 1 Enoch as it stands, especially in its Noachic interpolations, e.g. x. 1-16, lxv. 1-lxvii. 4. As Noah is called 'a preacher of righteousness' in 2 P 2<sup>5</sup>, we might venture to assume that this title implies that he, and not Christ, was taken to be the preacher to the spirits in prison in 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> by the author of 2 Peter. If this be admitted, 1 P 3<sup>19, 20</sup> might possibly be claimed as witnessing to the original form of the Noah Apocalypse in which it was not Enoch but Noah who was sent to reprimand the Watchers (see 1 En. xii. 1-4, 'Enoch was hidden . . . and his activities had to do with the Watchers. . . . "Enoch, thou scribe of righteousness, go declare to the Watchers"'). In support of this view we may note (a) that the references to the sin of the angels are all (except lxxxvi. 1) in Noachic passages; (β) that in defiance of chronology and the context the name 'Noah' has been altered to 'Enoch' in lx. 1; that 'the longsuffering of God waited' in 1 P 3<sup>20</sup> seems to echo 1 En. lx. 5, 'until this day lasted His mercy; and He hath been merciful and longsuffering. . . . Cf. too lxvi. 2 and lxvii. 2, where angels hold the waters in check and other angels are constructing the ark, with 1 P 3<sup>0</sup>, 'while the ark was a-preparing.' On the other hand, of course, there are great exegetical difficulties in 1 P 3<sup>19, 20</sup> in the way of this view, though 'the spirits . . . which aforesaid were disobedient' suggests angelic and not human offenders, and the prison of the angels is a commonplace in 1 En. (x. 4, 12, xix. 1, xxi. 10, lxvii. 4, etc.).

(c) In St. John's First Epistle we have the frequent contrast between light and darkness so characteristic of 1 Enoch: e.g. 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 'walk in the light' || 1 En. xcii. 4; 1 Jn 2<sup>5</sup> 'the darkness is passing away' || 1 En. lviii. 5. The warning in 1 Jn 2<sup>15</sup>, 'love not the world, neither the things that are in the world,' has a close parallel in 1 En. cviii. 8, 'loved not any of the good things which are in the world,' and in xlviii. 7.

(d) For St. James's woes against the rich (5<sup>1-6</sup>), only paralleled in the NT by our Lord's words on the danger of trusting to wealth, cf. 1 En. xlvi. 7, lxiii. 10, xciv. 8-11, xcvi. 4-8, xcvii. 8-10.

angels offer men's prayers to God (Rev 8<sup>3, 4</sup>; cf. 5<sup>8</sup>) || 1 En. ix. 1-3, xlvii. 2, xcix. 3; angels of winds (Rev 7<sup>1</sup>) and of waters (16<sup>5</sup>) || 1 En. lxix. 22. (β) Demonology.—'A star from heaven fallen unto the earth' (Rev 9<sup>1</sup>)—for phrase cf. 1 En. lxxxvi. 1; 'Satan . . . accuser of our brethren . . . before our God' (Rev 12<sup>9, 10</sup>) || 'Satan . . . before the Lord of Spirits . . . to accuse them who dwell on the earth' (1 En. xl. 7); the false prophet 'deceiveth them that dwell on the earth' (Rev 13<sup>14</sup>) || the 'hosts of Azazel . . . leading astray those who dwell on the earth' (1 En. liv. 56); idolatry as demon worship (Rev 9<sup>0</sup>) || 1 En. xix. 1, xcix. 7. (γ) Boasting of rich.—'I am rich and have gotten riches' (Rev 3<sup>17</sup>) || 'we have become rich with riches and have possessions' (1 En. xcvi. 8). (δ) Stages of judgment.—Prayer of saints for vengeance (Rev 6<sup>10</sup>) || 1 En. xlvii. 2, etc.; terror of the kings and the great at the sight of 'him that sitteth on the throne' and at 'the wrath of the Lamb' (Rev 6<sup>16</sup>) || 'when they see that Son of Man sitting on the throne of His glory' (1 En. lxii. 5); the sinners' blood rises to the horses' bridles (Rev 14<sup>20</sup>) || to the horses' breasts (1 En. c. 3); books opened (Rev 20<sup>12</sup>) || 1 En. xc. 20; book of life (Rev 20<sup>12</sup>) || books of the living (1 En. xlvii. 3); Satan bound for a thousand years (Rev 20<sup>2</sup>) and then cast into lake of fire (20<sup>10</sup>) || Semjaza and his associates bound for seventy generations (1 En. x. 12) and then led off to the abyss of fire (x. 13). (ε) Resurrection.—The sea, death, and Hades give up their dead (Rev 20<sup>13</sup>) || the earth, Sheol, and hell (1 En. li. 1), the desert and the sea (lx. 5) restore their dead. (ζ) The future rewards of the righteous.—'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord' (Rev 14<sup>13</sup>) || 'Blessed is the man who dies in righteousness' (1 En. lxxx. 4); saints in white raiment (Rev 3<sup>3</sup>) || angels clothed in white (1 En. xc. 31) and saints (clad) in shining light (cviii. 12); 'fountains of waters of life' (Rev 7<sup>17</sup>) || a 'bright spring of water' (1 En. xxii. 9; cf. xlviii. 1); eat with Christ (Rev 3<sup>0</sup>) || 'with that Son of Man shall they eat and lie down and rise up for ever' (1 En. lxii. 14); sit on throne with Christ (Rev 3<sup>1</sup>; cf. 20<sup>4</sup>) || 'I will seat each on the throne of his honour' (cviii. 12); Christ will spread His tabernacle over them (Rev 7<sup>15</sup>) || 'I will cause my Elect One to dwell among them' (1 En. xlv. 4); 'no curse any more' (Rev 22<sup>3</sup>) || 'no sorrow or plague,' etc. (1 En. xxv. 6).

(f) In Acts we have a parallel with 1 Enoch: Ac 10<sup>4</sup> 'thy prayers . . . are gone up for a memorial before God' || 1 En. xcix. 3 'raise your prayers as a memorial. . . before the Most High.'

(g) Hebrews.—With He 4<sup>13</sup> cf. 1 En. ix. 5 'all things are naked and open in thy sight, and thou seest all things and nothing can hide itself from thee'; cf. also He 11<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> (the heavenly Jerusalem built by God Himself) with 1 En. xc. 29; 11<sup>5</sup> refers to the translation of Enoch and understands 'walked with God' in Gn 5<sup>24</sup> as 'pleased God.' Cf. 1 En. xv. 1.

(h) St. Paul's Epistles.—1 Th 5<sup>8</sup> || 1 En. lxii. 4 'then shall pain come upon them as on a woman in travail'; Ro 8<sup>38</sup> (cf. 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup>) || 1 En. lxi. 10 'angels of power and . . . of principalities.' With 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup> cf. 1 En. xxxviii. 4 'the Lord of Spirits has caused his light to appear (so Charles) on the face of the holy, righteous, and elect'; 2 Co 11<sup>31</sup> || 1 En. lxxvii. 1 'He who is blessed for ever'; Gal 1<sup>4</sup> || 1 En. xlviii. 7 'this world of unrighteousness'; Ph 2<sup>10</sup> || 1 En. xlviii. 5 'shall fall down and worship before him (=Son of Man)'; Col 2<sup>3</sup> || 1 En. xlv. 3 'the Son of Man . . . who revealeth all the treasures of that which is hidden'; 1 Ti 1<sup>9</sup> || 1 En. cviii. 4 'a law shall be made for the sinners'; 1 Ti 1<sup>15</sup> || 1 En. xciv. 1 'worthy of acceptance'; 1 Ti 5<sup>21</sup> || 1 En. xxxix. 1; 1 Ti 6<sup>16</sup> || 1 En. xiv. 21 'none of the angels could enter and could behold his face by reason of the magnificence and glory, and no flesh could behold him.'

(i) NT in general.—Phrases which recur in the NT are 'Lord of lords and King of kings' (1 En. ix. 4, Rev 17<sup>14</sup>; cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>15</sup>); 'holy angels' (1 En. lxxi. 1, etc., Rev 14<sup>10</sup>, etc.; cf. Ac 10<sup>22</sup>); 'the generation of light' (1 En. cviii. 11); cf. Eph 5<sup>8</sup> 'children of light'; 1 Th 5<sup>5</sup> 'sons of light' (so Lk 16<sup>8</sup> Jn 12<sup>36</sup>).

(2) THEOLOGY.—(a) The Messiah.—The 'Son of Man' in the Parables is pre-existent: 'before the sun and the signs were created, before the stars of the heaven were made, his name was named before the Lord of Spirits' (xlvi. 3), 'for this reason hath he been chosen and hidden before him, before the creation of the world and for evermore' (xlvi. 6), 'for from the beginning the Son of Man was hidden, and the Most High preserved him in the presence of his might, and revealed him to the elect' (lxii. 7; cf. xxxix. 6, 7, xli. 1-3). For 'before the creation' cf. Col 1<sup>17</sup>, and for 'from the beginning' cf. Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, Rev 17<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>23</sup>, and for 'revealed' cf. 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup>, and esp. 1 P 1<sup>0</sup>. He is a supernatural being. In Dn 7<sup>13</sup> the 'one like unto a son of man' is brought before God and dominion is bestowed on him. In 1 En. xxxix. 6, 7, xli. 1, 2, lxii. 7 the 'Son of Man' is with God (cf. Jn 1<sup>1</sup>) and will sit on His throne (li. 3). He is the ideally Righteous One (xxxviii. 2)—'the Righteous and Elect One' (liii. 6; cf. xli. 3); cf. Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>52</sup> 22<sup>14</sup> 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>. He is the Elect (xl. 5, xlv. 3, 4, xlix. 2, 4, etc.); cf. Lk 9<sup>35</sup> 23<sup>35</sup>; the Anointed or Christ (xlvi. 10, lii. 4). He has all knowledge (xli. 3, xlix. 2, 4), all wisdom (xlix. 1, 3, li. 3), all dominion (lxii. 6; cf. Mt 28<sup>18</sup>). 'The sum of judgment' is 'given unto the Son of Man' (lxix. 27; cf. Jn 5<sup>22</sup> 27). God 'appoints a judge for them all and he judges them all before Him' (xli. 9; cf. Ac 17<sup>31</sup>). He judges both men and angels (li. 2, lv. 4, lxi. 3, lxii. 2, 3). He is Vindicator of the righteous (but not redeemer of mankind). He has 'preserved the lot of the righteous' (xlvi. 7) and will be 'the hope of those who are troubled of heart' (xlvi. 4). He has been revealed to the righteous (lxii. 7) and in due time will 'cause the house of his congregation to appear' (liii. 6). Outside the Parables God Himself is the Judge (cf. 1 P 1<sup>17</sup>, Rev 20<sup>12</sup>). In the Parables it is the Son of Man (cf. 1 P 4<sup>5</sup>, Rev 6<sup>16</sup>, 17 22<sup>12</sup>, etc.). It is an unforgeable sin to deny the Anointed One (xlvi. 10). The words 'in his name they are saved' in xlvi. 7 must refer to the Lord of Spirits, not to the Son of Man, as Charles takes it. For the phrase, however, cf. Ac 4<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>.

(b) Messianic Kingdom.—Whereas in i.-xxxvi. there is a very sensuous conception of Messianic bliss, and the scene of the Kingdom is the existing Jerusalem and Holy Land purified from sin, in lxxxiii.-xc. we find a more advanced conception. The centre of the Kingdom is now to be a new Jerusalem brought to earth by God Himself (cf. He 12<sup>2</sup>, Rev 3<sup>12</sup> 21<sup>2</sup>), and the citizens of it are to be transformed after the likeness of the Messiah, whose origin is, however, natural and human. In xci.-civ. we have a Kingdom of limited duration, followed by the last judgment (cf. Rev 20<sup>4</sup> 5. 11-15). In the Parables we have a new heaven and a new earth, under a supernatural head, the fount of wisdom, righteousness, and power.

(c) The Resurrection in i.-xxxvi. is of soul and body to a limited life in an eternal Messianic Kingdom on earth. In the Parables the resurrection is to a spiritual Kingdom, in which the holy are clothed with a spiritual body, 'garments of life . . . of glory' (lxii. 16; cf. 1 Co 15<sup>53</sup>, 54, 2 Co 5<sup>4</sup>). In xci.-civ. there is a resurrection of the spirit only.

(d) The Judgment in 1 Enoch precedes the Kingdom, except in xci.-civ. (for which cf. Rev 21<sup>11-15</sup>). See under 8 (2) (a) above.

(e) Sheol or Hades in 1 En. xxii. is a place of souls, good and bad, in the intermediate state, in 1 En. lxiii. 10, xcix. 11, ciii. 7 of wicked souls in their final state of woe; cf. Rev 20<sup>13,14</sup> (of wicked only?) in intermediate state).

(f) Retribution and salvation.—In xci.-civ. the tone is extremely 'other-worldly,' and the contrast between the present prosperity of the wicked and the sufferings of the righteous and their future destinies is emphasized throughout. Judgment will be according to works, which 'the Son of Man will try' (xlv. 3) and judge, 'and in the balance shall (men's) deeds be weighed' (lxi. 8; cf. xli. 1). These works, however, are the outcome of faith on the part of 'the righteous whose elect works,' as also they themselves, 'hang upon the Lord of Spirits' (xxxviii. 2; cf. xl. 5, xli. 8). The 'elect' is a frequent title of the righteous, and implies dependence upon God's grace.

(g) Sin and repentance.—Man's will is free, and the two ways of righteousness and violence lie before him for his choice (xci. 18, xciv. 3). Though sin goes back in origin to the fallen angels and the Satans, 'man of himself has created it' (xviii. 4; cf. Ja 1<sup>13-16</sup>). 1 En. xl. 9 assigns to Phanuel the oversight of 'repentance unto hope of those who inherit eternal life.' On the other hand, repentance will be unavailing for men after the manifestation of the Son of Man on the throne of glory (lxiii. 1-11), and at all times for fallen angels (xii. 6, xiv. 4, lxv. 11).

(h) Angels.—Marriage is forbidden to them (xv. 7; cf. Mt 22<sup>23-33</sup>); 1 Co 11<sup>10</sup> possibly refers to the seduction of angels by women, which, however, agrees with the narrative of the angels' fall in Jubilees rather than in 1 Enoch.

(i) The conversion of the Gentiles is expected generally in 1 Enoch, e.g. x. 21, l. 2, xc. 30, 33, xci. 14.

ENVY.—Envy is the feeling of mortification or ill-will occasioned by the contemplation of the superior advantages of others.

'Base envy withers at another's joy,
And hates that excellence it cannot reach'
(Thomson, Seasons, 'Spring', 283).

In the NT the word is used to translate two Gr. terms, φθονος and ζήλος, the former of which is invariably (with the possible exception of Ja 4<sup>5</sup>) taken in malam partem, while the latter is frequently used in a good sense.

(1) Those who are given up to a reprobate mind are 'full of envy' (μεστους φθόνου, Ro 1<sup>29</sup>), and the character of the word is strikingly indicated by the company it keeps, φθόνος and φόνος ('murder') going together. Among the works of the flesh are 'envyings' (Gal 5<sup>21</sup>), such as are occasioned by quarrels about words (1 Ti 6<sup>4</sup>). Christians can recall the time when they were 'living in malice and envy' (Tit 3<sup>3</sup>); and even now they need the injunction to 'put away all envies' (1 P 2<sup>7</sup>); it ill becomes them to be seen 'provoking one another, envying one another' (Gal 5<sup>26</sup>). In Rome St. Paul found, with mingled feelings, some men actually preaching Christ from envy, moved to evangelical activity by the strange and sinister inspiration of uneasiness and displeasure at his own success as an apostle (Ph 1<sup>15</sup>) (see FACTION). If the RV of Ja 4<sup>5</sup> is correct, φθονέω has its usual evil sense, and this difficult passage means, 'Do you think that God will implant in us a spirit of envy, the parent of strife and hate?' But it may be better to translate, either, 'For even unto jealous envy ('bis zur Eifersucht' [von Soden]) he longeth for the spirit which he made to dwell in us,' or 'That spirit which he made to dwell in us yearneth for us even unto jealous envy.' If either of the last two renderings is right, φθονος is for once ascribed to God, or to a spirit which proceeds from Him, and the word has no appreciable difference of meaning from the ζήλος ('jealousy') which is so often attributed to Him in the OT (θεός ζηλωτής, Ex 20<sup>5</sup>, etc.). He longs for the devotion of His people with an intensity which is often present in, as well as with a purity which is mostly absent from, our human envy. Very different from this passion of holy desire was the φθόνος of the pagan gods (το θεῖον πᾶν ἐστὶ φθονερόν, says Solon, Herod. i. 32; cf. iii. 40)—that begrudging of uninterrupted human happiness which Cresus and Polyrates had so much reason to fear.

that which is an attribute of God, most pure in its quality, and making its possessor intensely solicitous for the salvation of men.

In 2 Co 9<sup>2</sup> the RVm suggests 'emulation of you' as the translation of ὁ υμῶν ζήλος. William Law, who calls envy 'the most ungenerous, base, and wicked passion that can enter the heart of man' (A. Whyte, Characters and Characteristics of William Law<sup>4</sup>, 1907, p. 77), denies that any real distinction can be drawn between envy and emulation.

'If this were to be attempted, the fineness of the distinction would show that it is easier to divide them in words than to separate them in action. For emulation, when it is defined in its best manner, is nothing else but a refinement upon envy, or rather the most plausible part of that black and poisonous passion. And though it is easy to separate them in the notion, yet the most acute philosopher, that understands the art of distinguishing ever so well, if he gives himself up to emulation, will certainly find himself deep in envy.'

If this were the case, there would be an end of all generous rivalry and fair competition. But it is contrary to the natural feeling of mankind. Plato says, 'Let every man contend in the race without envy' (Jowett<sup>1</sup>, 1875, v. 75), and St. Paul frequently stimulates his readers with the language of the arena. The distinction between φθόνος and ζήλος (in the good sense) is broad and deep. The one is a moral disease—'rotteness in the bones' (Pr 14<sup>30</sup>), 'aegritudo suscepta propter alterius res secundas' (Cicero, Tusc. iv. 8); the other is the health and vigour of a spirit that covets earnestly the best gifts. Nothing but good can come of the strenuous endeavour to equal and even excel the virtues, graces, and high achievements of another. Ben Jonson has the line, 'This faire æmulation, and no envy is,' and Dryden 'a noble emulation heats your breast.' ζήλος (from ζέω, 'boil') is, in fact, like its Hebrew equivalent חַיָּל ('heat,' 'ardour'), an ethically neutral energy, which may become either good or bad, according to the quality of the objects to which it is directed and the spirit in which they are pursued. It instigated the patriarchs (ζηλώσαντες, Ac 7<sup>9</sup>) to sell their brother into Egypt, and the Judaizers (ζηλοῦσιν, Gal 4<sup>17</sup>) to seek the perversion of St. Paul's spiritual children. Love (ἀγάπη) has no affinity with this base passion (οὐ ζήλοί, 1 Co 13<sup>4</sup>). Love generates a rarer, purer zeal of its own, and 'it is good to be zealously sought in a good matter at all times' (καλὸν δὲ ζηλουσθαὶ ἐν καλῷ παντοτε, Gal 4<sup>18</sup>).

JAMES STRAHAN.

EPÆNETUS (Ἐπαίνετος, Ro 16<sup>5</sup>—a Greek name).—Epænetus is saluted by St. Paul and described as 'my beloved' and as 'the firstfruits of Asia unto Christ' (τὸν ἀγαπητὸν μου, ὃς ἐστὶν ἀπαρχὴ τῆς Ἀσίας εἰς Χριστόν). The only other persons described in Ro 16 as 'my beloved' are Amphiatus (τὸν ἀγαπητὸν μου ἐν κυρίῳ, v.<sup>8</sup>) and Stachys (v.<sup>9</sup>). Persis, a woman, is saluted perhaps with intentional delicacy as 'the beloved' (v.<sup>12</sup>). Epænetus was probably a personal convert of the Apostle's, and as such specially dear to him. He was the first to become a Christian in the Roman province of Asia (the TR reading Ἀχαΐας must be rejected in favour of Ἀσίας, supported by the overwhelming authority of ABCD). Assuming the Roman destination of these salutations, Epænetus must have been at the time of writing resident in or on a visit to Rome. (The discovery of an Ephesian Epænetus on a Roman inscription is interesting but unimportant [Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, 1902), p. 421].) But the reference to Epænetus, together with the salutation of Prisca and Aquila (v.<sup>3</sup>), who appear in 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup> and again in 2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup> as living in Ephesus, has given rise to the suggestion that this section of Romans was originally addressed to the Church of Ephesus. Epænetus, however, is not said to have been an Ephesian (see Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, 1893, p. 301).

For the designation 'firstfruits' we must compare the description of the 'household of Stephanas' (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>)—'the firstfruits of Achaia' (ἀπαρχὴ τῆς Ἀχαιᾶς)—and note the suggestion that ministry in the Church was connected at first with seniority of faith, a suggestion more than supported by Clement of Rome, Ep. ad Cor. xlii. Nothing could be more natural than that the work of superintending the local Christian communities should be entrusted to those among the first converts who were found capable of undertaking it. The term 'firstfruits' had a special religious significance—that of dedication to God—and this idea must have been present when the original nucleus of a church was so called. Epānetus, as the senior Christian, had a position of responsibility; and that he was actually a leader would appear from his place in these salutations—second only to 'Prisca and Aquila my fellow-workers' (Ro 16<sup>3</sup>). Cf. also Andronicus and Junias (or Junia), who are said to 'have been in Christ' before St. Paul, and the possibility that they were known as apostles (v. 7); also the prominence given to Mnason as an 'original' disciple in Ac 21<sup>16</sup>. The position thus given to the earliest converts of the missions and the services demanded from them may have been analogous to the privileges and obligations of the relations of the Lord. Blood-relationship with Jesus gave to those who could claim it an official status in the Church which was handed on to their descendants (see A. Harnack, Constitution and Law of the Church, Eng. tr., 1910, pp. 32-37).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

EPAPHRAS (shortened probably from Epaphroditus, but not to be identified with the evangelist so named).—Epaphras was a native or citizen of Colossæ (Col 4<sup>12</sup>), the founder, or at least an early and leading teacher of the Church there (Col 1<sup>7</sup>, where καί, 'also,' is omitted in the oldest MSS), who had special relations with the neighbouring churches of Laodicea and Hierapolis (4<sup>13</sup>). St. Paul had not yet visited this community when he wrote Col.; but if the reading πρὸς ἡμᾶς ('on our behalf,' 'as our delegate') be accepted in 1<sup>7</sup> (as by RV on the authority of the three oldest MSS), the Apostle, during his long residence at Ephesus, when 'all who dwelt in Asia heard the Word' (Ac 19<sup>10</sup>), must have specially commissioned Epaphras to evangelize Colossæ in his (St. Paul's) name (Col 4<sup>12-13</sup>). Epaphras' intimate association with St. Paul is shown by the designations 'beloved fellow-bondsman' (1<sup>2</sup>) and 'fellow-captive' (Philem<sup>23</sup>). The latter word (cf. Col 4<sup>10</sup>, Ro 16<sup>7</sup>), if it be not here used metaphorically, suggests either that Epaphras' friendship with St. Paul created suspicion and thus led to his arrest, or that he voluntarily shared the Apostle's captivity (Lightfoot, Colossians<sup>3</sup>, 1879, p. 34 f.).*

When Col. was written, Epaphras had recently arrived in Rome, and had given St. Paul a report of the Church of Colossæ. The Apostle assures the Colossian Christians of Epaphras' great zeal as well as fervent prayers for them; and he conveys to them the friendly greeting of their townsman, who remained in Rome with St. Paul (Col 4<sup>12-13</sup>). The report about the Church of Colossæ was on the whole favourable. Epaphras testifies to the spiritual life and fruitfulness of its members; to their conspicuous faith, hope, and charity (1<sup>4-6</sup>). There was, however, a disquieting account of a peculiar heresy, which had broken out in the community—a combination of Judaistic formalism with Oriental theosophy (see COLOSSIANS). Epaphras, filled with anxiety, had wrestled (ἀγωνίζεσθαι) in prayer for his converts 'that they might stand fully assured in all the will of God' (4<sup>1</sup>). Probably one reason of his visit to Rome was to consult St. Paul about this new peril. The solicitude of Epaphras was shared by the Apostle, who, amid thanksgiving for the spiritual progress of the Colossians, admonishes them (1<sup>23</sup>) to abide in the truth, 'grounded and steadfast.' Epaphras sends salutations to the household of Philemon, the letter to whom was dispatched along with the Epistle to the Colossians. Thenceforth Epaphras disappears from reliable history; later traditions represent him as 'bishop' of Colossæ, as suffering martyrdom, and eventually having his bones interred under the Church of Sta. Maria Maggiore in Rome.

EPAPHRODITUS (= 'favoured by Aphrodite [Venus], 'comely').—Epaphroditus was a leading member and delegate or messenger of the Philippian Church, mentioned only in Ph 2<sup>5</sup> and 4<sup>18</sup>. He arrived in Rome during St. Paul's earlier imprisonment with a substantial 'gift' (presumably of money) from the Philippian Christians to the Apostle, of whose impoverishment they had heard. After fulfilling his commission, and strengthening, through his own warmly affectionate personality, the bond of communion between the Apostle and his 'dearly beloved' Philippian converts, Epaphroditus remained in Rome partly to render personal service to St. Paul, as the representative of the devoted Philippians, and partly to take a share in the 'work of Christ' as the Apostle's colleague in missionary ministry. St. Paul describes him as 'my brother, and fellow-worker, and fellow-soldier,' implying at once 'common sympathies, labours undertaken in common, and community in suffering and struggle' (J. S. Howson, Companions of St. Paul, p. 235). The 'true yoke-fellow,' also, of Ph 4<sup>3</sup> is believed by Lightfoot (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 158) to be most probably Epaphroditus, since 'in his case alone there would be no risk of making the reference unintelligible by the suppression of the name.' His evangelistic zeal, however, combined with devotion to St. Paul, over-taxed his strength, and became the occasion of severe illness which almost issued in death (2<sup>27-30</sup>). It is notable that St. Paul, whose power of working miracles is frequently referred to (Ac 14<sup>10</sup> 23<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>), did not exercise it in the case of Epaphroditus. It was a power which, 'great as it was, was not his own, to use at his own will' (Barry in Ellicott's Com. on NT, 1884, Ph 2-7). Some inner voice doubtless enabled apostles to know when the time for working a miracle had come. But 'the prayer of a righteous man availeth much'; and earnest supplications were doubtless offered up in Rome by St. Paul and the Church there for the recovery of Epaphroditus. These prayers were heard. 'God had mercy upon him, and not on him only but on me also, lest I should have sorrow on sorrow' (Ph 2<sup>27</sup>).

Meanwhile the Philippians had heard of their delegate's illness, and by and by their anxiety became known at Rome. Partly to relieve that solicitude and to satisfy the 'longing' of Epaphroditus; partly to convey the Apostle's grateful acknowledgment of the recent gift; partly also, we may presume (although with delicate consideration this reason is not expressly stated), in order that the invalid's health may be fully restored through entire rest such as he would not take in Rome, the Apostle sends him back to Philippi with a cordial testimony to his zealous labours and chivalrous service. Epaphroditus thereafter disappears from NT history, leaving behind him the fragrant memory of self-forgetful and self-sacrificing devotion at once to the person of St. Paul and to the cause of Christ.

Theodoret (Com. on Ph 2<sup>3b</sup>) represents Epaphroditus (with some hesitation) as 'bishop' of Philippi. Pseudo-Dorotheus includes him (without probability, however, since nothing suggests that he was a Hebrew) among the Seventy of Lk 10<sup>1</sup>; and he calls him 'bishop' of Andriace, the port of Myra in Lycia. In virtue of the designation ἀπόστολος (Ph 2<sup>3b</sup>) the Greek Church places Epaphroditus in the same rank with Barnabas, Silas, and others; but the context suggests the original meaning, 'messenger.'

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Date and place of writing.—From internal evidence, there is little difficulty in determining the circumstances under which Ephesians was written. St. Paul is a prisoner at the time (3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>20</sup>), and writes from prison to 'the saints which are in Ephesus.' His imprisonment has lasted long enough to give rise to grave anxiety among the Christian communities (3<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>22</sup>). He speaks of himself as 'the prisoner' (3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>), as though that were a title of honour consecrated by long use. This in itself makes it natural to date the Epistle from Rome rather than from Caesarea. Other internal evidence, though slight, points in the same direction. St. Paul's captivity permits at least some liberty in preaching (6<sup>19, 20</sup>; cf. Ac 28<sup>30, 31</sup>, Ph 1<sup>13, 14</sup>). The phrase 'I am a chained ambassador' (6<sup>20</sup>) certainly has more point after the appeal to Caesar, and suggests that St. Paul has reached Rome to bear witness for the gospel 'before kings.' And the grand, almost imperial, width of outlook which the Epistle shows may well have been inspired in the provincial citizen from Tarsus when he came at last to see with his own eyes the city which ruled the world, with its centralized authority and its citizenship open to every land and race (cf. Lock, art. 'Ephesians' in HDB). It is thus natural to date the Epistle c. A.D. 60.

This result would be quite inevitable if it could be maintained that Eph. is a later work than Phil., which must certainly have been written from Rome (Ph 1<sup>13</sup>, etc.). This has been argued by such writers as Bleek, Lightfoot (Philippians<sup>1</sup>, 1878, p. 30 ff.), Sanday (Smith's DB<sup>2</sup> i. [1893] 627), Hort (Judaistic Christianity, 1894, p. 115 f.), Lock (loc. cit.). It is true that Phil. resembles the earlier Epistles in style and manner more than do the other Captivity Epistles. But it is impossible to postulate an orderly development in these things in such a writer as St. Paul. There is nothing in Eph. or Col. more startling as a development of Pauline doctrine than Ph 25-11. And the note of urgency and anxiety in Phil. marks it out as dating from the last days of the captivity at Rome (cf. Moffatt, LNT, pp. 168-170; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 357 f.).

A more certain result as to Eph. is given by its relation to Col. and Philemon. The three Epistles are all sent by the hand of Tychicus to the same district. Col. and Philem. at least were sent together, and the literary connexion between Col. and Eph. is so close that it seems inevitable to associate Eph. with the other two. Philem. at least must have been sent from Rome, despite the arguments of Reuss and Meyer; and this carries with it the conclusion that Eph. was sent from the same place (see art. COLOSSIANS).

2. Occasion and purpose.—This Epistle stands alone among the Pauline literature. The other twelve writings ascribed to St. Paul have all some special and more or less urgent occasion and purpose, whether personal or controversial. Here neither purpose nor occasion can be clearly traced. The writer is not concerned to press his claims against rivals or opponents. The bitter controversy with Judaizing teachers lies in the past, and only faint echoes of the battle can be heard (2<sup>11, 14, 17</sup>). The troubles at Colossæ are in the background (1<sup>10, 21</sup> 2<sup>2, 8</sup> 3<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>), but do not ruffle the serenity of the writer's mind. No special dangers seem to lie before the readers. Apart from the address, indeed, it would be difficult to see that any special readers are intended, though in the main the Epistle is addressed to Gentile converts (1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>13</sup> etc.). Some danger of false teaching is perhaps suggested in 4<sup>14, 18</sup>, but the references are quite general in character. Controversy is laid aside for the time being, and the writer deals with the problems of the Gentile Church in a spirit at once detached and lofty. Two special points emerge, half the Epistle being devoted to each. Chs. 1-3 deal with the respective positions of Jew and Gentile in the unity of the Church, from which we may conjecture that this was one of the main difficulties in the churches founded by St. Paul. It was, indeed, inevitable that it should be so, as the controversies of a few years before had shown. But now the position is changed. The danger is no longer that of the Judaizing teacher, but rather lest the growing Gentile communities should tend to despise the Jewish Christians in their midst (2<sup>1-8</sup> 11-18; cf. 1<sup>12-14</sup>). Chs. 4-6 deal with the most constant danger of the Gentile convert—the danger of relapse into the vices of paganism.

But neither of these dangers has come to the front in any special form, and the dominant note of the Epistle is not one of warning, but one of praise and thanksgiving. The writer's mind is full of one great theme—the unity of the Church in Christ, predestined from all eternity to all eternity, bound together in faith and love. And, as he takes up his argument, the style rises in dignity and strength until we seem to be listening to a Eucharistic hymn. Against the dangers of the hour he sets the inspiration of a great ideal, the One Body of Christ who died for Jew and Gentile alike, the One Church, ordered by Christ Himself, in which every man, if he will, may lead the life of the Spirit.

3. Analysis.—(A) Chs. 1-3. The unity of the Church, regarded as that in which Jew and Gentile are at last one. The whole of this section is an expansion of the typical thanksgiving and prayer with which St. Paul usually opens his letters.

(1) 1<sup>1-2</sup>. Salutation.

(2) 1<sup>3-14</sup>. Thanksgiving for the privileges bestowed in Christ upon the Church. This section falls into three strophes, marked by the refrain 'unto the praise of his glory,' and corresponding to the three Persons of the Trinity.

(a) vv. 3-6. Thanksgiving for the 'adoption as sons,' predestined by the Father before the foundation of the world.

(b) vv. 7-12. Thanksgiving for the revelation of God's good pleasure in Christ, in whom we have redemption from sin, grace to live anew, and knowledge of our place in God's purpose to sum up all things in Him.

(c) vv. 13-14. Thanksgiving that in the Holy Spirit both Jew and Gentile have even here and now an earnest of that great heritage.

(3) 1<sup>15-23</sup>. Prayer that the readers may grow to a fuller understanding of the work of Christ.

(a) vv. 15-19. Prayer that they may realize more fully the threefold blessing of vv. 3-14—their adoption as sons, their heritage in Christ, their new life in the Spirit.

- (b) vv. 20-23. Prayer that they may come to see Christ as He really is, the consummation of all things in heaven and earth, and supreme Head of His Church.
- (4) 21-22. A further thanksgiving for all that is implied in this conception of the Church, worked out especially in relation to the position of Jews and Gentiles therein.

(a) vv. 1-10. The power of God which was shown in Christ has been shown too upon all individual Christians, whether Gentile (vv. 1-2) or Jew (v. 3), raising them from the death of sin (v. 6; cf. 120), causing them to ascend with Christ into the heavenly sphere (v. 6; cf. 1-9), and giving them a place in the Church, through which God has purposed to work (vv. 7-10; cf. 1-1-23).

(b) vv. 11-13. Thus the divisions of humanity are healed. The Gentile who was once far off is 'made nigh in the blood of Christ' (vv. 11-13). The barriers set up by the Jewish Law are broken down (vv. 14-15). Jew and Gentile now stand together in one fellowship, both having their access to the Father through Christ in one Spirit (vv. 16-18). So is the Temple of God built, with Christ as its chief corner-stone (vv. 19-22).

- (5) 31-32. A further prayer that the readers may apprehend the fullness of this great life in Christ, in which all the saints join (vv. 1-19), and a doxology, closing this section of the Epistle (vv. 20-21).

This section is interrupted by a passage (vv. 2-13) in which the writer dwells upon his own position as the 'chosen vessel' through whom this mystery of the Church was to be preached to the Gentiles. The appointed time and means had been fixed by the purpose of God, and the revelation given in the Church affected not only earth but also all heaven. The sufferings of the writer are thus no cause for discouragement. They too lie in the purpose of God.

(B) Chs. 4-6. The unity of the Church, regarded as a principle of conduct, enabling all to lead the higher life.

- (1) 4<sup>1-5</sup>. A general appeal addressed to the whole Church.

(a) 4<sup>1-3</sup>. Exhortations to lead the life of love, which is the life of the Spirit.

(b) vv. 4-6. The unity of the Church, upon its practical side, which rests upon the unity of God (vv. 4-6). It is by God's gift that the organization of the Church exists in diverse ministries (vv. 7-11). And the purpose of it all is 'the perfecting of saints, that each may take his place in the living whole of the Body of Christ, perfect in faith and knowledge and love' (vv. 12-16).

(c) vv. 17-24. The old Gentile life, based upon ignorance and resulting in impurity, contrasted with the new life, based upon knowledge of Christ and resulting in 'righteousness and holiness of truth.'

(d) 4<sup>25-52</sup>. A more detailed description of the Christian life as it should be lived by members of the Church.

(i.) 4<sup>25</sup>. Truthfulness—a lie to another Christian is a lie to oneself.

(ii.) vv. 26-27. Control of temper, for fear of the accuser, i.e. either of the Satan in heaven, or of calumniators on earth.

(iii.) v. 28. Honesty, as the basis of right giving.

(iv.) vv. 29-30. Pure conversation, lest others be injured, and the Holy Spirit be grieved.

(v.) vv. 31-32. Gentleness, as God was gentle in Christ.

(vi.) 5<sup>1-2</sup>. Love, as Christ loved.

(vii.) vv. 3-4. Purity of speech and action, even to the avoidance of the foolish word and jest, as unworthy of our calling (vv. 3-4), as incurring God's wrath (vv. 5-6), as wholly foreign to the life of light in Christ (vv. 7-14).

(viii.) vv. 15-17. Wise use of time, since the days are evil.

(ix.) vv. 18-21. Temperance and orderly thanksgiving in public worship, and in particular at the love-feasts (in the spirit of 1 Co 11-14).

- (2) 5<sup>22-6<sup>9</sup></sup>. An exhortation to members of Christian families. The writer takes the family as the type of the Church (cf. 3<sup>15</sup>), and applies the general principles of the unity of the Spirit to the details of family life.

(a) 5<sup>22-24</sup>. Wives are to recognize the position of the husband as head of the family, as Christ is head of the Church.

(b) vv. 25-33. Husbands are to love their wives, with whom they have been made one, as Christ loves the Church, with which He is one.

(c) 6<sup>1-3</sup>. Children must obey their parents, as is naturally right, and as God has commanded.

(d) v. 4. Parents ought to train their children wisely.

(e) vv. 5-8. Slaves are to obey loyally, since their obedience is to God Himself.

(f) v. 9. Masters must treat their slaves justly, since they themselves are but slaves of a Master in heaven.

- (3) 6<sup>10-24</sup>. A general exhortation to all Christians to fight God's battle in His strength (v. 10) and clad in His armour (vv. 11, 13-17), seeing that the enemy is more than man (v. 1-). The section passes into a request for prayer for the writer in prison (vv. 19, 20), and thus it naturally leads up to a commendation of Tychicus, the bearer of the letter, and then to a final greeting.

4. Authorship.—The above analysis will make it clear how carefully constructed and worked out Ephesians is. The long sentences, cumbrous and difficult to follow as they are, are yet almost rhythmic in their balance. Everything is connected and co-ordinated with the one great idea, and the result is a composition quite unlike any other writing assigned to St. Paul. Yet the claim to Pauline authorship is quite explicit. It not only occurs in the address (1<sup>1</sup>) and in the final messages (6<sup>20</sup>), but is woven into the very structure of the Epistle in 3<sup>1</sup> and 4<sup>1</sup>. Either we have a genuine work by the Apostle or else a pseudonymous writing, composed at a very early date by a disciple upon whom had fallen a double portion of the Apostle's spirit. And of such a disciple we have no other trace.

(1) Internal evidence.—The very simplicity of the references to St. Paul is a strong argument for the authenticity of the Epistle. There is a great contrast between Eph. and 2 Pet. in this respect. The laboured allusions of the latter to St. Peter's life are not convincing; but could even a close disciple have coined the beautiful and simple phrase, 'I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus'? Or would he have been likely to refer to his great master as 'less than the least of all saints' (3<sup>8</sup>) even with 1 Co 15<sup>9</sup> before him? On the other hand, there are one or two phrases, apart from questions of style and doctrine, which will be discussed later, which seem to some critics to be 'watermarks of a later age' (Moffatt, LNT, p. 386). Such is the phrase, 'built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets' (2-9), an expression not very suspicious in itself, but rendered suspect by the phrase 'his holy apostles and prophets' (3<sup>5</sup>). Such language would certainly be natural at a later date, and it is hardly like St. Paul to include himself under the term 'holy apostles.' Two explanations have been given. (a) It is suggested that the word αγίους is not part of the original text. It is true that Origen and Theodoret show traces of a text which omitted the word, but this is not very strong evidence. Yet it might easily have been added at an early date by a reverent scribe, or have crept in by dittography from ἀποστόλοις (TOICΑΓΙΟΙCΑΠΟCΤΟΛΟΙC), or by confusion with Col 1-6. (b) It is pointed out, e.g. by Salmond ('Ephesians' in EGT, pp. 223 and 304), that ἅγιος does not mean 'holy' in our modern sense, but simply 'consecrated to God's service.' This is its sense in the Pauline salutations and in 3<sup>8</sup>, and it is thus possible to conceive St. Paul including himself under the phrase in 3<sup>5</sup>. But (c) it is not obvious that he does so. St. Paul had always stood apart from the original Twelve, and though sometimes, as in Gal. and 2 Cor., he is concerned to defend his commission, he was fully aware of a real difference of position (1 Co 15<sup>9</sup>). Here some real point seems to lie in the distinction. St. Paul is arguing that he was specially chosen of God for this ministry. Humble though he was, he had shared the revelation given to the Twelve (cf. St. Peter and Cornelius), and he, and not they, had been called to proclaim the mystery of the Church to the Gentiles (3<sup>8</sup>). The words in 3<sup>7-8</sup> seem to distinguish him from the 'holy apostles' of 3<sup>5</sup>, where St. Paul is not thinking of himself at all. If this is so, 3<sup>7</sup>, though certainly unique, is not unnatural. In any case, whatever be the explanation of 3<sup>7</sup>, 3<sup>8</sup> remains a 'watermark' of St. Paul himself, as indeed does the whole passage, 3<sup>7-14</sup>, in its abrupt intrusion into the sequence of thought. The passage 'whereby, when ye read, ye can perceive my understanding . . .' (3<sup>4</sup>) also sounds to Moffatt characteristic of a disciple of St. Paul rather than of St. Paul himself, but the conclusion is not at all necessary.

(2) External evidence.—This preliminary investigation, then, rather favours the authenticity of the Epistle than otherwise, and this result is entirely borne out by the external evidence of early writers. Ephesians is one of the best-attested books of the NT. By the middle of the 2nd cent. it was widely known. Both the Old Latin and the Syriac Versions had it. The evidence of Hippolytus shows that it was used by the Ophites (Philosophoumena, v. 8), the Valentinians (vi. 34, 35), and perhaps by Basilides (vii. 25, 26). Marcion included it in his Pauline Canon, under the title 'to the Laodiceans' (see below). It seems to be quoted by Hermas (cf. 4<sup>4</sup> with Sim. ix. 13). Earlier still Polycarp quotes 2<sup>8,9</sup> in Phil. i. 3, and, still more definitely, 4<sup>6</sup> in Phil. xii. 1 (Lat.). The evidence of Ignatius is almost equally certain: Polyc. v. 1 is a definite quotation of 5<sup>2</sup>, and allusions may be seen to 1<sup>23</sup> and 2<sup>16</sup> in Smyrn. i. 4, to 4<sup>2,3</sup> in Polyc. i. 2, to 5<sup>1</sup> in Eph. i. 1, x. 3. The passage in Eph. xii. 'Paul . . . ὁς ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ μνημονεύει' cannot be translated as a definite reference to our Epistle, and is indeed evidence (see below, § 5) that the traditional address is in error. Traces of Eph. have been found in Clement of Rome and in the Didache, but they cannot be called certain.

This evidence is sufficient to throw the Epistle into the 1st cent., and provides at least a strong presupposition that it is Pauline.

5. Destination.—An immediate difficulty arises with the acceptance of Eph. as the work of St. Paul. He was very well known in Ephesus. He had spent over two years of his ministry there (Ac 19<sup>8-10</sup>). The leaders of the Church there had been his close friends, and had parted from him at Miletus with every display of affection (20<sup>36-38</sup>). And yet Eph. conveys no personal greetings. There is no hint that St. Paul was known to the readers, or they to him. All that we can gather from the letter is that they are Gentile Christians (Eph 1<sup>13</sup> 21. 11. 13. 17 31). St. Paul has heard of their faith in Christ (1<sup>15</sup>). He does not seem certain whether they all know how definitely and specially he had been commissioned to preach to the Gentiles (3<sup>7</sup>), and hence the whole digression 3<sup>7-13</sup>. If the letter was actually sent to Ephesus (so Schmidt in Meyer<sup>5</sup>; Alford), this is incredible. And even if the Pauline authorship is given up it remains quite impossible to think that a disciple of St. Paul should have written in his master's name so cold a letter to St. Paul's friends. The evidence of Ignatius raises a further difficulty, since he definitely writes to Ephesus about 'all the letters' of St. Paul (Eph. xii.), without any hint that the most sublime of them all had been definitely addressed to the Ephesians themselves.

This being so, it is a relief to find that the address is very doubtful. The title 'to the Ephesians,' though known to Tertullian (adv. Marc. v. 11) and given in the Muratorian Canon, does not go far back into the 2nd century. There is very little doubt that the original text of 1<sup>1</sup> had no allusion to Ephesus at all. The vast majority of MSS have τοῖς ἀγίοις τοῖς ὁδοῦν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, but the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ are absent in the first hand of Σ and B. They are cancelled by the corrector of 67, who had access to very good textual material. The more ancient copies known to Basil omitted the words. Origen evidently did not read them in his text, since he translates τοῖς ὁδοῦν 'those that have real existence,' illustrating the meaning from the use by Christ of the phrase 'I am.' Jerome and others repeat this interpretation, which was also known to Basil. Most important of all, Marcion's copy evidently lacked the words, since he regarded the Epistle as addressed to the Laodiceans. And that Tertullian's text was the same is shown by the fact that Tertullian only abuses Marcion for changing the title, but says nothing about corruption of the actual text (adv. Marc. v. 11, 17).

This evidence makes it almost impossible to think that any place-name, whether Ephesus, or Laodicea, or another, stood in the original text of 1<sup>1</sup>, since no reason is apparent for its wide-spread omission and corruption. The evidence of Basil shows that our present reading grew up only shortly before A.D. 370. And in any case it is most unnatural Greek. Harnack (Die Adresse des Epheserbriefs des Paulus, 1910) has recently argued that Eph. was originally addressed to Laodicea, being in fact the letter 'from Laodicea' of Col 4<sup>16</sup>. He conjectures that the change in the address took place about the beginning of the 2nd cent., with the decline of the Church of Laodicea (Rev 3<sup>14, 15</sup>), on the grounds that such a church had no claim to own a Pauline letter. The conjecture is certainly brilliant, but there is no parallel for such treatment of the NT books, and the MSS with no place-name at all remained unexplained (see Moffatt, Expositor, 8th ser. ii. [1911] 193 f.). What then may be inferred from the textual evidence? Three alternatives are possible.

(a) It is suggested that the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ should be omitted, and that our present text is then correct (so e.g. Moffatt, and the majority of those who reject the Pauline authorship). Unfortunately, as indeed Origen's attempt at explanation shows, the reading so obtained gives rather poor sense. The translation 'the saints who are also believers . . .' (Meyer) is hardly possible, and 'the saints who are also faithful . . .' (Lightfoot, Salmond) is still difficult. It is very hard to suppose that St. Paul would make so pointed an allusion at this stage to 'saints' who were unfaithful. The difficulty arises not so much from the meaning of ἁγίος, which here, as in 3<sup>5</sup>, has the Jewish sense of 'consecrated,' as from the general force of the passage.

(b) Again, omitting the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, we may suppose that a blank was left after ὁδοῦν in which Tychicus could insert the names of different churches. This view presupposes, with Beza, that Eph. was sent not to any one church, but to the group of churches in Asia founded, like Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, not by St. Paul, but by such agents as Epaphras. This would account for the impersonal tone of the Epistle, and for the absence of any clear trace of special local problems. The view that Eph. is such a Pastoral, with a blank left for the address, is due to Archbishop Ussher, and has been held by most conservative critics (e.g. Hort). In its broad outline this theory is probably right. The whole character of the Epistle shows that it is addressed to a wide circle of readers, and not to any one church. That the readers addressed lived in the neighbourhood of Ephesus is suggested (1) by the relations, especially in thought, with Col.; (2) by the fact that Eph. is sent by the hand of Tychicus; and above all (3) by the tradition associating it with Ephesus, where the original was probably preserved (Haupt and Zahn). This view relieves the difficulty as to the Pauline authorship due to the impersonal tone of the letter.

It does not, however, solve the problem of 1<sup>1</sup> (see Zahn, Introd. to NT, i. 479-483, 488 f.), for (1) there is no parallel for such a method of correspondence; (2) if the blanks had been filled in with different names in different copies, we should not have had MSS with no name at all; (3) the order in the Greek is unnatural. The place-names should come elsewhere (cf. Col 1<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1</sup>).

(c) These difficulties have driven many scholars to think that the text of 1<sup>1</sup> is unsound, whether, as P. Ewald suggests, through the wearing of the papyrus or otherwise. Ewald himself suggests τοὺς ἀγαπητοὺς οὖσιν καὶ πιστοῖς, 'those who are beloved and faithful.' Zahn prefers to follow the reading of D, τοῖς ἁγίοις οὖσιν καὶ πιστοῖς, 'those who are holy and faithful.' This is at least easy, but hardly accounts for the corruptions (though dittography might have brought in the second τοῖς). Others think that St. Paul, in accordance with his general custom, must have mentioned some definite destination. The most ingenious conjecture of this kind is that of R. Scott (The Pauline Epistles, p. 182)—ἐν ἔθνεσιν for ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, i.e. 'the saints among the Gentiles.' This, however, is not free from some of the above objections, and is wholly without supporting evidence.

Holtzmann's effort to explain 1<sup>1</sup> as a bungling attempt by the writer to adapt Col 1<sup>1</sup> to his more general purpose is effectively refuted by Zahn (op. cit. p. 517 f.).

As a result of the above discussion, 1<sup>1</sup> remains an unsolved problem, but it is clear that the traditional address of Eph. is no part of the text of the Epistle. Its existence is best explained on the hypothesis of a circular letter, sent by the hand of Tychicus to the churches in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. To explain the early title 'to Ephesians,' as does Baur, from 6<sup>21</sup> and 2 Ti 4<sup>12</sup> ('Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus') is far-fetched. Whether, as Harnack thinks, Eph. should be identified with the letter 'from Laodicea' to be brought, presumably, by Tychicus to Colossæ, must remain doubtful (see art. COLOSSIANS). Whatever be the exact facts, no objection to the Pauline authorship of Ephesians remains on the score of the destination of the Epistle.

This view of Ephesians as a Pauline pastoral has been held (with varying theories of 1<sup>1</sup>) by, e.g., Bengel, Reuss, Lightfoot, Hort, Weiss, Abbott, Salmund, Zahn, Peake. Nevertheless, its authenticity has been widely disputed since the time of Schleiermacher, on three main grounds: (a) the doctrinal standpoint; (b) the vocabulary and style; (c) the connexion with Col. and with other NT writings.

against Gnosticism. Pflieger, e.g., sees in 4<sup>20f.</sup> an allusion to 'a Gnostic theory which separated the Christ of speculation from the Jesus of the evangelical tradition' (Primitive Christianity, iii. 303). He finds that the quotation of Ps 68<sup>18</sup> in 4<sup>8f.</sup> depends on the 'Gnostic myth of the victorious descent to hell and ascent to heaven of the Saviour-god to which allusion is also made in Col 2<sup>15</sup>' (p. 311). He traces the use of 'pleroma' to Gnosticism, ignoring the fact that it was a good Pauline word (e.g. Ro 11<sup>25</sup>), and that it is certainly not used in any Gnostic sense.

The external evidence alone is sufficient to rule out such theories, throwing the Epistle back to a date before the technicalities of Valentinianism had been developed. More plausible is the view of Holtzmann, who regards Ephesians as written at about the end of the 1st cent., in view of incipient Gnosticism and of ecclesiastical needs. He thinks that an old letter to Colossæ by St. Paul existed and that Eph. and Col. were composed by a single writer, in the one case using its ideas and in the other expanding it. The proof, however, that there is nothing necessarily un-Pauline in Col. (see art. COLOSSIANS) does away with the need for this theory, which is in any case hampered by two difficulties: (a) that of finding a writer capable of composing such a work and at the same time of being so servile in his adherence to the language of Colossians; and (b) that of finding a historical setting for the Epistle. There must surely be a greater gulf between it and Ignatius with his violent attacks on Judaizers and Docetists and his emphasis on the monarchical episcopacy.

It is, therefore, more common nowadays among those who find difficulties in the Pauline authorship to assign Eph. to a Paulinist writing quite soon after St. Paul's death (see e.g. Moffatt, op. cit. p. 388). It is argued that the theology of the Epistle marks a transition stage between St. Paul and the Johannine literature.

'This does not involve the assumption that Paul was not original enough to advance even beyond the circle of ideas reflected in Colossians, or that he lacked constructive and broad ideas of the Christian brotherhood. It is quite possible to hold that he was a fresh and advancing thinker, and yet to conclude, from the internal evidence of Ephesians, that he did not cut the channel for this prose of the spiritual centre' (Moffatt, op. cit. p. 389).

Upon this view, the theology of Eph., though quite continuous with that of St. Paul, is a later development, under the influence of Johannine, and possibly Lucan, ideas.

Such a view is too intangible to admit of very easy refutation. At the same time, it should be noted that it provides very little ground for disputing the strong and early tradition of the Pauline authorship of the Epistle. A discussion of the doctrinal standpoint of Eph. will serve to put the matter in a clearer light.

(a) The Church.—The whole Epistle turns upon the doctrine of the unity of the Church. This is made the key both to the relations of Jew and Gentile (2<sup>11-22</sup>) and to the problems of the Christian life (4 and 5). Its unity is not merely that of any human organization, but rests directly upon the unity of God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (4<sup>6-8</sup>). That unity is derived from the Father (3<sup>15</sup>), by whom it was fore-ordained in Christ (1<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>6</sup>). It is ideally complete in Christ and in Him is to become actually complete (1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>21</sup> 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>1-16</sup>). Even now it has as its principle of life the One Spirit (1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>). In some sense it is the completion of the Incarnation (1<sup>23</sup>; cf. Armitage Robinson, 'On the meaning of πληρωμα' in Ephesians, p. 255 ff.), for in it Christ comes into all the saints (3<sup>17</sup>) and all the saints into Him (2<sup>6</sup> 13 4<sup>1-16</sup>). The organization of the Church is simply the expression of this unity, and the means, given by Christ Himself, whereby it is being actualized (47<sup>12</sup>). Baptism is the door of the Church (4<sup>5</sup> 5-6), faith its bond of union (4<sup>6</sup>), love the expression of that union (4<sup>2</sup> 5-, etc.). The unity even extends beyond this earth into the heavenly regions (2<sup>6</sup>; cf. 1<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>).

Such an emphasis upon the Church is certainly not found elsewhere in St. Paul. Yet there is no one feature which is specifically un-Pauline, and no reason can be given why St. Paul should not in a time of leisure, undisturbed by the clash of controversy, have set down for the churches he had founded those principles which had underlain all his ministry.

It has been urged that St. Paul dealt only with individual churches, and that the use of the term 'church' (ἐκκλησία) in Eph. is foreign to his writings. But as a matter of fact the idea of one Church Universal underlies all St. Paul's thought. Especially in 1 Cor. he appeals throughout to general church practice (e.g. 1 Co 10<sup>32</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>33</sup> 36). He speaks of the churches as a whole (Ro 16<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>). They are 'one body in Christ,' with an articulated, organized membership (Ro 12<sup>5</sup>), and this conception is expanded in 1 Co 12<sup>1-7</sup>. They form one Church (ἐκκλησία, in the singular; cf. 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, Gal 1<sup>13</sup>). The same conception and usage are repeated in the later Epistles (Ph 3<sup>6</sup>, Col 1<sup>18</sup> 24). The statements in Col. are, indeed, quite as full in idea as those in Ephesians. The conception of Christ as awaiting 'fulfilment' or completion in some sense in His Body, the Church, is present in Col 1<sup>24</sup>. The organic unity of Christ with the Church as its Head is in Col 1<sup>18</sup>. The conception of the Church as extending into the heavenly regions is directly involved in St. Paul's answer to the Colossian heretics (Col 1<sup>19</sup> 20). This adaptation of his thought is quite natural, though its first clear formulation in his mind may have been due to the troubles at Colossæ, leading him to correlate his views on angelology (see art. COLOSSIANS) with his views on Christ and the Church. The thought is present, in an unapplied form, in Ph 3<sup>20</sup> (with which also cf. Eph 2<sup>19</sup>, Ph 1<sup>27</sup>).

It is urged that it is new in St. Paul to find the unity of the Church traced back to Christ's cosmic position (Moffatt, op. cit. p. 393). But this is really rather a question of Christology than of the doctrine of the Church. Solidarity in Christ is the most characteristic part of St. Paul's teaching. The thought of the early chapters of Romans is simply its application to anthropology, the problem of sin. In Eph., with a wider purpose in view, it is applied to the problems of humanity regarded as a whole in its relation to God. The cosmological form which the argument takes is doubtless due in part to the situation at Colossæ. But Ro 8<sup>20</sup> 21 is a hint that there were similar elements in St. Paul's thought at an earlier date.

The fact that in Eph. the writer seems to pose as the defender of Jewish against Gentile Christians has been regarded as proof that he is not the St. Paul of the Galatian controversy. But it may well have been that by A.D. 60 there was danger that the Gentile Christians in the churches of Asia might outnumber and tend to despise their Jewish brethren. St. Paul's concern was always to secure the position of both Jew and Gentile in the Church. His argument in Eph. is really exactly like that in Romans. Both Jew and Gentile are brought down to one level by sin (Ro 3<sup>9-20</sup>, Eph 2<sup>1-5</sup>; cf. Gal 3-2), and are therefore joined in one redemption (Ro 10<sup>1-11</sup> 32, Eph 2<sup>16-18</sup>). In Ro 11 we find the same attitude of apology for the Jews as in Eph 2 (cf. also Ro 7<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>18</sup>). Gal 3<sup>23-25</sup> also gives an argument practically identical in substance with that of Ephesians.

Some have thought that the interest in church organization is un-Pauline, and that the details mentioned involve a later date. It would be possible to argue that the very reverse is the case. The mention of 'apostles and prophets' as foremost in the ministry of the Church (4<sup>11</sup>) is exactly paralleled by 1 Co 12-3. Thus there is nothing unnatural in the special position given to them in 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>. From the earliest days the ministry of prophets had existed in the Church, and it is very doubtful whether by the end of St. Paul's life the beginnings of the organization which superseded them were not beginning to appear. By the time the Didache was written the position of the prophet was becoming equivocal, and the allusions in Eph. could hardly have been written. The mention of 'evangelists' (4<sup>11</sup>) is no mark of a later date, since no such office became definitely established. The general interest in church order shown in Eph. is no greater than in 1 Cor. (especially 1 Co 12).

It has been noted as curious, in the light of 1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>, that the Eucharist is not mentioned in connexion with church unity. The reference to 1 Cor., however, is not quite in point, since the passage is concerned not with unity but with the dangers of idolatry. And there is no other hint either in St. Paul or in Acts that the Eucharist was regarded as a bond of union among the churches.

(b) God the Father.—This doctrine receives no peculiar expansion in Eph., though it is certainly emphasized, the title 'Father' occurring eight times as against four in Romans. It is brought into direct connexion with the ideal unity of the Church (4<sup>9</sup>), which springs from the eternal purpose of the Father acting through and in the Son (14. 5-2. 23 21<sup>0</sup> 11). The unique Fatherhood of God is the principle underlying all human or angelic solidarity (3<sup>15</sup>), and it is for this reason that St. Paul treats the family, in which this solidarity is exhibited on a small scale, as an exemplar of the Church itself. There is no real inconsistency, as has been alleged, between the view of family life in 5<sup>2-23</sup> and the personal preference for celibacy expressed in 1 Co 7<sup>8</sup>.

The emphasis on God's eternal purpose is also found in Romans. Its effect in the ultimate restoration of all creation appears in Ro 8<sup>18</sup>, its effect in uniting Jew and Gentile in Ro 9-11.

(c) Christology.—The Christology of Eph. is closely akin to that of Colossians. In both Christ is presented as being, in the eternal purpose of God, the bond of union for a divided creation, including within His unity heaven and earth alike, which were created not only in Christ but also for Him (1<sup>10</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup> 17). This consummation and restoration of all things, including the angelic world, in Christ is to come about through the restoration of man in the Church, which is His Body, His fullness (14. 21-23 3<sup>9-11</sup>, Col 1<sup>18-20</sup>). The emphasis on Christ's pre-existence is much more clearly marked in Col. (1<sup>15</sup> 16. 17), though in Eph. it is perhaps implied in God's purpose 'in him' (14. 11 3<sup>11</sup>; cf. also 2<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 10), and in the title 'Beloved' (1<sup>6</sup>). In this, however, there is nothing really new, except that the Pauline angelology, of which traces appear in the earlier Epistles, is here clearly correlated to the doctrine of Christ. It was at Colossæ that the angels were being exalted almost to the position of Christ Himself, and it is in Col. that the statements of Christ's eternal supremacy take their highest form. But the restoration in Christ of the dislocated creation appears in Ro 8<sup>18</sup>. The share of the angels in this is alluded to in 1 Co 6<sup>3-4</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>. The pre-existence of Christ finds expression in Ro 8<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> (probably), 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup> 15<sup>17</sup> (and context), 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>, and is clearly connected with His relation to the Creation in 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, where the emphasis on unity closely resembles the thought of Ephesians. At a slightly later date, almost every point in the Christology of Col. and Eph. is embodied in Ph 2<sup>5-11</sup>.

It has been noted as un-Pauline that the result of the Cross should be seen in the reconciliation of Jew and Gentile rather than in relation to sin. But this objection is due to imperfect exegesis. It is because the Cross frees all, both Jew and Gentile, from sin that they are able to come into the unity of Christ. The emphasis on individual redemption is just as much present in Eph 2<sup>1-10</sup> as in Ro 1-7. The Pauline doctrine is stated directly in 1<sup>7</sup> (cf. 2<sup>13</sup>). The annulling of the Law by the Cross (2<sup>15</sup>) is the very point of St. Paul's argument in the Galatian controversy (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, etc.; cf. also the parallel passage in Col 2<sup>14</sup>). The thought in Ephesians may be carried rather further, but it is wholly Pauline. That there is no definite allusion to expiation or propitiation is not of any real significance. The idea was unnecessary to the purpose of Ephesians.

Again it is said that there is in Eph. no hint of the Parousia, the coming of Christ in the near future, and that the idea is replaced, on Johannine lines, by a vista of long ages before the final judgment (2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). But the reference in 2<sup>7</sup> is probably to ages after the Second Coming, as is perhaps shown by the parallel in 1<sup>1</sup> (see § 3 above), and this may also be the meaning in 3<sup>2</sup>. In any case, the same language occurs in Ro 1<sup>5-9</sup> and in Gal 1<sup>5</sup>, a close parallel to 3<sup>2</sup>. References to the Parousia may perhaps be seen in 4<sup>30</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>. It is true that there is no emphasis on the doctrine, but St. Paul was never a fanatic about it, as 2 Thess. shows (cf. Ro 11<sup>25</sup>).

Other points which are said to be rather Johannine than Pauline also find parallels in the earlier Epistles. Love is emphasized as the relation of Christ to us (2<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>25</sup>; cf. Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Ro 8<sup>35-37</sup>), as our relation to Christ (6<sup>24</sup>; cf. 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>) and to one another (4<sup>2, 15</sup> 5<sup>2, 25</sup>; cf. 1 Th 5<sup>13</sup>). Cf. the Hymn to Love in 1 Co 13. The emphasis on the light of Christ amid the darkness (5<sup>8-14</sup>; cf. 4<sup>18</sup>), while typical of St. John, is found in 1 Th 5<sup>4, 5</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>, Ro 13<sup>12</sup>.

(e) Man and sin.—This is the special subject of Rom. and not of Ephesians. Yet the hints in Eph. are quite in accordance with St. Paul's earlier teaching. The doctrine of the σάπξ, the root-idea in the conception of original sin, appears in 2<sup>3</sup>. The characteristic emphasis on the grace of God which saves man by faith and not by works is found in 2<sup>5-8</sup> (cf. 3<sup>12</sup>). Predestination to life is the theme of 1<sup>4, 11-14</sup>, though the problem of free-will is not raised, being unessential to the matter in hand.

It has been suggested that there is an un-Pauline emphasis on knowledge, more on the lines of the Fourth Gospel (e.g. Jn 17<sup>3</sup>), in 1<sup>8, 17</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>. But this does not really conflict with St. Paul's opposition to the wisdom of this world in 1 Co 1-4, from which the knowledge alluded to (ἐπίγνωσις; cf. Armitage Robinson, Ephesians, p. 248 ff.) is a very different thing. Cf. also Ro 10<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>6, 7</sup>, Ph 1<sup>9</sup>, Col 1<sup>9, 10</sup> 2<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>.

This sketch of the doctrine of Eph. will serve to show how closely it resembles in most of its details the doctrine not only of Colossians, but of the earlier Pauline Epistles. It is only in emphasis and in the sustained, almost lyrical, exposition that there is any real contrast. And this may well be explained by a difference of circumstances both in St. Paul's own position and in the audience to which he is writing.

7. Style and language.—(1) Language.—The vocabulary as a whole presents phenomena very similar to those of the other Pauline letters. There are 37 words not used elsewhere in the NT (as compared with 33 in Gal., 41 in Phil., 95 in 2 Cor.), and 39 which occur elsewhere, but not in the recognized Pauline writings (Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe, p. 101 f., whose list is critically discussed by Zahn, op. cit. pp. 518-522; cf. also Moffatt, op. cit. p. 385 f.). This number is not in itself suspicious, and Zahn's analysis has shown that the majority of the words are of little significance. Some are due to the occasion and the turn of the metaphor, e.g. those that occur in the account of the Christian armour. Some—e.g. ἀνεμος (4<sup>14</sup>), ὕδωρ (5<sup>26</sup>)—are terms for which no synonym was readily available. Some are cognate to forms used elsewhere by St. Paul, e.g. καταρτισμός (4<sup>12</sup>), προσκαρτέρησις (6<sup>18</sup>), ἀγνοία (4<sup>18</sup>). And against these are to be set about 20 words found only, outside Eph., in the earlier Pauline Epistles.

Some special cases have been thought suspicious. The phrase 'holy apostles' (3<sup>9</sup>) has been dealt with above (§ 4). The use of διάβολος (4<sup>27</sup> 6<sup>11</sup>; cf. 1 Ti 3<sup>6</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>26</sup>) is curious, as St. Paul elsewhere employs the name 'Satan' (also in the Pastorals, 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup>). But there is no reason why he should not have varied in his usage in this way (as happens in 1 Tim.). And, indeed, the reference in 4<sup>27</sup> may not be to Satan but to human calumniators; or perhaps both ideas may be present, and the usage here may also have affected 6<sup>11</sup>. The phrase 'in the heavenlies,' which occurs 5 times, is curious, but might well have been coined by St. Paul in working out the theme of Eph. (cf. 1 Co 15<sup>40, 48, 49</sup>). The word 'mystery' is difficult in 5<sup>32</sup>, but is used in the ordinary Pauline manner in 1<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>3, 4, 9</sup>. οἰκονομία has a somewhat changed sense in 3<sup>9</sup>. The unique use of περιποίησις in 1<sup>14</sup> is paralleled by other transferences of words from an abstract to a concrete sense. On the whole, then, the peculiarities of language are no more than might be expected in any one short document.

(2) Style.—This problem presents more difficulty. The sentences are unusually long and cumbersome, subordinate clauses being strung together in a loose connexion which is frequently difficult to analyze, e.g. 1<sup>3-14</sup> 2<sup>1-7</sup> 3<sup>2-7</sup>. Yet they are most carefully wrought and in places are almost poetical in form and balance (esp. 1<sup>3-14</sup>, which falls into three stanzas<sup>1</sup>). There are one or two elaborate parentheses (2<sup>11, 1</sup> 3<sup>1-13</sup>). These features are only partially paralleled in Col., and present a wide contrast to the impassioned rhetoric of the earlier letters. In this respect Eph. stands by itself. To many critics the general impression produced by the style and tone of the letter is the strongest argument against its authenticity. Yet it is very rash to make assumptions as to the possibilities of so mobile and powerful an intellect as that of St. Paul. In none of his other writings is the clash of controversy or the appeal of friendship wholly absent. At leisure in his prison he may well have looked back over the triumphs of his life and have sat down to write in a mood of quiet yet profound thanksgiving for which his earlier career had seldom given opportunity.

8. Relation to other NT writings.—(a) Relation to Colossians.—The relation of Eph. to Col. is, from the point of view of literary criticism, its most striking feature. It has been estimated that 78 out of the 155 verses of Eph. contain phraseology which occurs in Colossians. This is not merely due to the connexion of ideas, which is also close (see above), but is of a character to show that the two Epistles are closely connected in their composition. The details have been elaborately worked out by Holtzmann, De Wette, and others (for a good summary of the facts see Moffatt, op. cit. pp. 375-381; Holtzmann's results are criticized by Sanday, art. 'Colossians' in Smith's DB<sup>2</sup> and by von Soden in JPTH, 1887; cf. his Hist. of Early Christian Literature. The writings of the NT). Results differ widely. Holtzmann's discussion went to show that neither Epistle could be regarded as wholly prior, and therefore he postulated a Pauline Col., expanded at a later date by a writer who also composed Eph. upon its basis. But the evidence for the division of Colossians has very largely broken down, with the wider view of the Pauline angelology (see art. COLOSSIANS). The tendency among scholars is now to assert the authenticity of Col. (so, among those who reject Eph., von Soden [in the main], Klöpper, von Dobschütz, Clemen, Wrede, Moffatt). This, if Holtzmann's results are accepted, proves the authenticity of Eph. also. The two Epistles must have been written by one author at about the same time. The alternative is to regard Eph., with De Wette, as a weak and tedious compilation from Col. and the earlier Epistles—a position which will appeal to few—or, more sympathetically, with Moffatt, 'as a set of variations played by a master hand upon one or two themes suggested by Colossians' (op. cit. p. 375). But this does no justice to the real independence of thought in Ephesians. The two main themes—the reconciliation of Jew and Gentile in the Church, and the fact of the Church as influencing Christian life—do not appear in Colossians at all, or only by allusion. The theology is the same, the application very different. Further, it is hard to think that so original a writer would have followed the very structure of Colossians. The rules for family life, e.g., are an integral part of Eph., but have no very clear connexion with the rest of Colossians. It is most natural to suppose, e.g. in Col 3<sup>18-1</sup>, that the writer is summarizing what he has written in Eph 5<sup>22-64</sup>, even at the risk of some obscurity. So, too, Col 2<sup>19</sup> has no clear connexion with its context, and must depend upon the fuller Eph 4<sup>15, 16</sup> for its explanation.

No parallel for the curious inter-connexion of language is to be found in the employment of sources by Matthew and Luke or of Jude by 2 Peter. There we have frank copying. Here there is nothing of the kind. Again and again phrases are used in Eph. to express or illustrate ideas with which they are not connected at all in Col. (cf. Eph. 2<sup>15, 16</sup> || Col 2<sup>14</sup> 1-9, Eph. 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>13</sup> || Col 2<sup>9</sup>, Eph 2<sup>16</sup> 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>27</sup> || Col 1<sup>22</sup>). The writer's mind is steeped in the language and thought of Col., but he is writing quite independently. The only probable psychological solution of the problem is that one writer wrote both Epistles, and at no great interval. And if so, that writer must have been St. Paul. It is quite likely, indeed, that Col. was composed while Eph. was still unfinished, since the latter is clearly the careful work of many hours, perhaps of many days.

(b) Relation to 1 Peter.—There is a considerable amount of resemblance of thought, structure, and language between Eph. and 1 Peter. This is especially obvious in the directions for family life (note the curious phrase 'your own husbands' in 1 P 3<sup>1</sup>, which seems to depend on Eph 5-). Other parallels quoted are 1<sup>3</sup> with 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>, 3<sup>5</sup>, with 1 P 1<sup>10</sup> (where it is quite unnecessary to argue that 1 Pet. is prior: the two passages may be independent), 1<sup>4</sup> with 1 P 1<sup>18-20</sup>, 2<sup>1</sup> with 1 P 2<sup>4</sup>, 1<sup>4</sup> with 1 P 2<sup>9</sup> (the use of περιτομῆς in Eph. is not dependent on that in 1 Pet., being quite different; the former is concrete, the latter not), 1<sup>10</sup> with 1 P 3<sup>22</sup>; 6<sup>10</sup> with 1 P 5<sup>8, 9</sup>; 4<sup>9</sup> with 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>. These analogies are not unnatural, on the assumption that St. Peter knew Eph., and certainly do not demand the priority of 1 Pet., as Hilgenfeld and others have argued.

(c) Relation to the Lucan and Johannine writings.—Numerous analogies, mainly of thought, have been found in Eph. to almost every book of the NT, but especially to those connected with the names of St. Luke and St. John. Parallels of language and idea have been seen in the farewell address at Miletus (Ac 20<sup>18-35</sup>; cf. Moffatt, op. cit. p. 384); and Lock (loc. cit.) draws out the parallels of thought with the Eucharistic prayer in Jn 17. It is true that many of the conceptions of Eph. are found in the Fourth Gospel, but this is not at all unnatural. The parallels of language are by no means striking. The connexion with Rev., emphasized by Holtzmann, is very slight, and that with Heb. is not much more definite (details in Salmond, 'Ephesians,' in EGT, p. 212 ff.).

The general impression made on the present writer by the study of these various affinities is the outstanding resemblance in general thought, and even in expression, between Eph. and Romans—a resemblance which the difference of style does not obscure. This in itself is a strong witness to the authenticity of the Epistle.

LITERATURE.—The following is only a small selection from a very voluminous literature. I. Commentaries.—Besides the older Commentaries, such as E. W. E. Reuss (1878), H. Alford (1874), and C. J. Ellicott (1864), the most notable are those of A. Klöpper (1891), G. G. Findlay (Expos. Bible, 1892), H. von Soden (Hand-Kommentar, 1893, also artt. in JPTH, 1887, and Hist. of Early Christian Literature. The Writings of the NT, Eng. tr., 1906), T. K. Abbott (ICC, 1897, largely linguistic), E. Haupt (in Meyer's Krit.-exeg. Kommentar über das NT, 1902, very valuable exegetically), J. Armitage Robinson (1903, exegetical and philological, no introduction), S. D. F. Salmond (EGT, 1903), B. F. Westcott (1906), P. Ewald (in Zahn's Kommentar zum NT, 1910). Fundamental for modern critical studies is H. J. Holtzmann's Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe, 1872.

II. Against Pauline authorship.—Besides Baur, Schwegler, Hitzig, are S. Davidson, Introd. to NT<sup>3</sup>, 1894; C. v. Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., 1894-95; E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., 1904; O. Pfeiderer, Primitive Christianity, Eng. tr., 1906-11; R. Scott, The Pauline Epistles, 1909; J. Moffatt, LNT<sup>2</sup>, 1912.

III. For Pauline authorship.—F. J. A. Hort, Prolegomena to Romans and Ephesians, 1895; A. Robertson, art. 'Ephesians' in Smith's DB<sup>2</sup>, 1893; W. Lock, art. 'Ephesians' in IIDB; T. EPHESUS (Ἐφέσος, a græcized form of a native Anatolian name).—The town of Ephesus was a little south of latitude 38° N., at the head of a gulf situated about the middle of the western coast of Asia Minor. It lay on the left bank of the river Cayster, at the foot of hills which slope towards the river. In ancient times the river reached to the city gates, but its mouth has gradually silted up so that the city is now some four to six miles from the sea. The effect of the river's action has been to raise the level of the land all over. The ruins, the most extensive in Asia Minor, give an idea of how large the ancient city was. The extent of the area covered by it cannot now be exactly estimated; but, as the population in St. Paul's time was probably about a third of a million, and in ancient times open spaces were frequent and 'sky-scrapers' unknown, the city must have been large, even according to our standards. The temple of Artemis (see DIANA), the ruins of which were discovered by Wood, lies now about five miles from the coast, and was the most imposing feature of the city. Its site must have been sacred from very early times, and successive temples were built on it. Other notable features of the city were the fine harbour along the banks of the Cayster, the aqueducts, and the great road following the line of the Cayster to Sardis, with a branch to Smyrna. The heat in summer is very great, and fever is prevalent. The harvest rain storms are violent. The site was nevertheless so attractive that it must have been very early occupied. The ancients dated the settlement of Ionian Greeks there early in the 11th cent. B.C., and the city long before St. Paul's time had become thoroughly Greek, maintaining constant intercourse with Corinth and the rest of Greece proper.

The history of the city, with its changing government, need not be traced here. It fell under Roman sway, with the rest of the district, which the Romans called 'Asia' (q.v.) by the will of Attalus III. (Philometor), the Pergamene king, in 133 B.C. In 88 B.C. the inhabitants sided with Mithridates, king of Pontus, and slaughtered all resident Romans. They were punished in 84 by Sulla, who ravaged the city. During the rule of Augustus the city was embellished by a number of new buildings.

✓ When Ephesus came into contact with Christianity, it still retained all its ancient glory. With its Oriental religion, its Greek culture, its Roman government, and its world-wide commerce, it stood midway between two continents, being on the one hand the gateway of Asia to crowds of Western officials and travellers, as Bombay is the portal of India to-day, and on the other hand the rendezvous of multitudes of Eastern pilgrims coming to worship at Artemis' shrine. Traversed by the great Imperial highway of intercourse and commerce, it had all nationalities meeting and mingling in its streets. No wonder if it felt its ecumenical importance, and believed that what was said and done by its citizens was quickly heard and imitated by 'all Asia and the world' (ἡ οἰκουμένη, Ac 19<sup>27</sup>).

• In Ephesus a noble freedom of thought and a vulgar superstition lived side by side. The city of Thales and Heraclitus contained many men of rich culture and deep philosophy, who were earnest seekers after truth. Prominent citizens like the Asiarchs (q.v.), who were officially bound to foster the cultus of Rome and the Emperor, yet regarded St. Paul and his message with marked friendliness (Ac 19<sup>31</sup>). Nothing but a wide-spread receptivity to fresh ideas can account for the wonderful success of the first Christian mission in the city, and for the reverberation of the truth 'almost throughout all Asia' (v.<sup>28</sup>). The best mind of the age was wistfully awaiting a new order of things. Having tried eclecticism and syncretism in vain, it was 'standing between two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born.' When, therefore, the startling news came from Syria to Ephesus that the Son of God had lived, died, and risen again, it ran like wildfire; its first announcement created another Pentecost (v.<sup>6</sup>); and in two years 'all they who dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks' (v.<sup>10</sup>).

Every spiritual revival has ethical issues, and Ephesus quickly recognized that the new truth was a new 'Way' (v.<sup>-3</sup>). The doctrine now taught in the School of Tyrannus, formerly the home of one knows not what subtle and futile theories, had a direct bearing upon human lives. That was why it made 'no small stir' (v.<sup>-3</sup>). The message which St. Paul delivered 'publicly and from house to house' (20<sup>20</sup>), admonishing men 'night and day with tears' (v.<sup>31</sup>), was morally revolutionary. It was a call to repentance and faith (v.<sup>21</sup>); and, though no frontal attack was made upon the established religion of Ephesus, and no language used which could fairly be construed as offensive (19<sup>37</sup>), yet it soon became apparent that the old order and the new could not thrive peacefully side by side. The gospel of mercy to all was a gage of battle to many. St. Paul, therefore, found that, while Ephesus opened 'a door wide and effectual' (ἐνεργῆς) there were 'many adversaries' (1 Co 16<sup>9</sup>).

This did not surprise or disappoint him. The fanatical hatred of Ephesus was better than the polite scorn of Athens. As the city of Artemis lived largely upon the superstition of the multitude, not only the priests who enjoyed the rich revenues of the Temple, but also the artisans who made 'shrines' for pilgrims, felt that if Christianity triumphed their occupation would be gone. Religion was for Ephesus a lucrative 'business' (ἐργασία, Ac 19<sup>24, 25</sup>), and the 'craft' (τὸ μέτρον, this branch of trade) of many was in danger. Indeed, the dispute which arose affected the whole city, being regarded as nothing less than a duel between Artemis and Christ. If He were enthroned in the Ephesian heart, she would be deposed from her magnificence, and the greatest temple in the world 'made of no account' (19<sup>27</sup>). The situation created a drama of real life which was enacted in and around the famous theatre of Ephesus. The guild of silversmiths, led by their indignant president Demetrius (q.v.); the ignorant mob, excited to fanatical frenzy; the crafty Jews, quick to dissociate themselves from their Christian compatriots; the brave Apostle, eager to appear before 'the people' (τὸν ὄχλον) of a free city; the friendly Asiarchs, constraining him to temper valour with discretion; the calm, dignified, eloquent Secretary (γραμματεὺς), stilling the angry passions of the multitude; and behind all, as unseen presences, the majesty of Imperial Rome, the sensuous charm of Artemis, the spiritual power of Christ—these all combined to give a sudden revelation of the soul of a city. The practical result was that a vindication of the liberty of prophesying was drawn from the highest municipal authority, who evidently felt that in this matter he was interpreting the mind of Rome herself. To represent Christianity as a religio licita was clearly one of the leading aims of St. Luke as a historian.

The fidelity of St. Luke's narrative in its political allusions and local colour has received confirmation from many sources. As the virtual capital of a senatorial province, Ephesus had its proconsuls (ἀνθύπατοι, Ac 19<sup>38</sup>), but here the plural is merely used colloquially, without implying that there could ever be more than one at a time. As the head of a conventus iuridicus, Ephesus was an assize town, in which the judges were apparently sitting at the very time of the riot (v.<sup>38</sup>). Latin was the language of the courts, and ἀγοραῖοι ἀγοραῖ is the translation of conventus aguntur. As a free city of the Empire, Ephesus had still a semblance of ancient Ionic autonomy; her affairs were 'settled in a regular assembly' (v.<sup>39</sup>), i.e. either at an ordinary meeting of the Demos held in the theatre on a fixed day, or at an extraordinary meeting called by authority of the proconsul. Irregular meetings of the populace were sternly prohibited (v.<sup>40</sup>); and, indeed, the powers of the lawful assembly were more and more curtailed, till at last it practically had to content itself with registering the decrees of the Roman Senate. The proud claim of Ephesus to be the temple-warden (νεωκόρον, lit. 'temple-sweeper') of Artemis (v.<sup>35</sup>) is attested by inscriptions and coins (W. M. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, 1895, i. 58; Letters to the Seven Churches, 232). The Asiarchs who befriended St. Paul had no official connexion with the cult of Artemis; they were members of the Commune whose function it was to unite the Empire in a religious devotion to Rome.

St. Paul's pathetic address at Miletus to the elders of Ephesus (Ac 20<sup>18-35</sup>), in which he recalls the leading features of his strenuous mission in the city—his tears and trials (v.<sup>19</sup>), his public and private teaching (v.<sup>20</sup>), his incessant spiritual and manual toil (vv. 31-34)—and declares himself pure from the blood of all men (v.<sup>28</sup>), presents as high an ideal of the ministerial vocation as has ever been conceived and recorded. There is no reason to doubt that it gives an approximate summary of his original words (cf. J. Moffatt, LNT, p. 306).

With the religious history of Ephesus are also associated the names of Priscilla and Aquila (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>), Apollos (18-4, 1 Co 16<sup>12</sup>), Tychicus (Eph 6<sup>21</sup>), Timothy (1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>9</sup>), and especially John the Apostle and John the Presbyter. After the departure of St. Paul the Ephesian Church was injured by the activity of false teachers (Ac 20-9, 30, Rev 2<sup>1</sup>), but the Fall of Jerusalem greatly enhanced its importance, and the influence of the Johannine school made it the centre of Eastern Christianity. In the time of Domitian it had the primacy among the Seven Churches of Asia (Rev 2<sup>1</sup>). The Letter to the Church of Ephesus is on the whole laudatory. The Christian community commanded the writer's respect by its keen scrutiny of soi-disant apostles, by its intolerance of evil, and its hatred of the libertinism which is the antithesis of legalism. But it had declined in the fervent love which alone made a Church truly lovable to the Apostle. A generation later, however, Ignatius in his Ep. to the Ephesians uses the language of profound admiration:

'I ought to be trained for the contest by you in faith, in admonition, in endurance in long-suffering' (§ 3); 'for ye all live according to the truth and no heresy: hath a home among you; nay, ye do not so much as listen to any one if he speak of aught else save concerning Jesus Christ in truth' (§ 6); 'you were ever of one mind with the Apostles in the power of Jesus Christ' (§ 11).

Ephesus had a long line of bishops, and was the seat of the council which condemned the doctrine of Nestorius in A.D. 431. The ruins of the ancient city, on Coressus and Prion, are extensive and impressive. The theatre in which the riot (Ac 19) took place is remarkably well preserved, and in 1870 the foundation of the Temple of Artemis was discovered by J. T. Wood. The modern village lying beside the temple bears the name of Ayasoluk, which is a corruption of āyios θεολόγος, the title of St. John the Divine which was given to the Church of Justinian.

EPICUREANS.—The Epicurean philosophers are mentioned only once in the NT, viz. in Ac 17<sup>18</sup>. During his second missionary journey St. Paul met with them in Athens. Though he stayed there not more than four weeks, the Apostle was deeply moved by the sight of so large a number of statues erected in honour of various deities. Not content with preaching in the synagogue to Jews and proselytes, he sought pagan hearers in their famous market-place, thus imitating Socrates 400 years before. The market-place was 'rich in noble statues, the central seat of commercial, forensic, and philosophic intercourse, as well as of the busy idleness of the loungers' (Meyer, Com. on Acts, Eng. tr., 1877, ii. 108). As the 'Painted Porch' in which the Stoics taught was situated in the market-place, and the garden where the Epicureans gathered for their fraternal discussions was not far away, it is not surprising that some members of these two schools of philosophy were among the Apostle's listeners. Athens was the home and centre of the four great philosophies founded by Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, and Epicurus. The two first, however, had at this time been supplanted by the two last; thus, in encountering the Stoics and Epicureans, St. Paul was face to face with the most influential philosophies of the day. Unfortunately, we know but little of the character of the interview or its results. The discussion was probably not hostile on the part of the philosophers, though Cheyne seems to incline to this view (EBi, vol. ii. col. 1323 n.). That St. Paul's teaching must have been antagonistic to theirs seems obvious.

1. Epicurus and the Epicureans.—(1) Epicurus.—Epicurus was born in 341 B.C., probably at Samos, an island off the coast of Asia Minor, and lived about 70 years. His father Neocles was an Athenian, who had gone to Samos as a colonist after the Greeks had expelled a large number of the natives. His occupation was that of a humble schoolmaster, and his son is said to have assisted him for some time. At the age of 18 Epicurus left for Athens, returning home a year later to Colophon, where his father now lived. Of the beginnings of Epicurus' acquaintance with philosophy our knowledge is slight and uncertain. Two of his teachers were Nausiphanes, a disciple of Democritus, and Pamphilus, a Platonist. But, as the former owed much to Pyrrho, the well-known Sceptic, it is hardly likely that Epicurus failed to share in that obligation. He claims to have been his own teacher, and this is true to the extent that he rejected the prevalent philosophies of his time and turned to such predecessors as Democritus, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus. It was at Mitylene that he began to teach philosophy, and at Lampsacus his position as the head of a school was recognized. He returned to Athens in 307 B.C., and settled there for the remainder of his life. There he purchased a house and garden, the latter becoming famous as the home of a large band of men and women who became his devoted disciples and friends. He died in 270 B.C. He had never enjoyed robust health, and his general feebleness and ailments were the ground upon which his enemies based charges of evil living.

(2) The Epicureans.—The community lived its own separate life. The calls and claims of public life were ignored and the usual ambitions of men stifled. From all the political upheavals through which Athens passed the Epicureans held strictly aloof, exemplifying their principles by indifference to environment and the endeavour to extract the maximum of tranquil gratification from life by the prudent and unimpassioned use of it. They passed their time in the study of Nature and Morality, and their friendly intercourse with each other supplied the necessary human elements. Most serious charges were made from time to time against both Epicurus himself and the community, but the accusers were generally either disaffected ex-disciples or rivals, and their motives were malicious. One cannot but admit that the ideal of 'pleasure' was well calculated to produce the most disastrous results except in the case of the noblest of men; and it is hard to believe that the garden contained only such. Yet consideration must be given to the extraordinary devotion of the brotherhood towards their head, in whom they recognized their deliverer from the worst fears and desires of life. An example of their unceasing allegiance to their master may be found in the statues erected in Epicurus' honour after his death. Simplicity was the note of the community's life. For drink they had water with a small quantity of wine on occasion, and for food barley bread. In a letter Epicurus writes: 'Send me some Cynthian cheese, so that, should I choose, I may fare sumptuously.' And during the severe famine which afflicted Athens, Plutarch informs us that the Epicureans lived on beans which they shared out from day to day (Demetrius, 34). But the bond which held this remarkable company together was the personality of Epicurus, who regarded his followers not only as disciples but as friends.

2. Teaching.—Epicurus is said to have written 300 books, but all have disappeared, and we are dependent for our knowledge on writers two centuries later. This misfortune is probably due to the teacher's habit of summarizing his system so that the disciples might commit it to memory. His reputed lack of style may have contributed to the same end. Nevertheless, the main outlines of his teaching are clear enough, though on important details uncertainty prevails. Epicurus had no interest in theories, except as they aided practical life. Mere knowledge was worthless, and culture he despised. His theoretical teaching treated of Man and the Universe (his Physics); his practical teaching used the knowledge so gained for the regulation of human conduct (his Ethics). Underlying these was his peculiar Logic. Real Logic of the Aristotelian type he could not tolerate. All he wanted was a criterion of truth, or to ascertain the grounds on which statements of fact could be based. This is usually called the Canonic.

(a) Canonic.—The criteria of truth or reality according to Epicurus may be grouped under two heads.—(1) Sensation. Every sensuous impression received by the mind is produced by something other than itself, and is infallibly true. When these feelings are clear, distinct, and vivid, the knowledge they afford is real. Even the sensations of the dreamer and lunatic are true, since they are caused by some other object operating on the mind. Any error arising from sensations is due not to the sensations themselves but to the mind's misinterpretation of them. But Epicurus does not make clear what that vividness is which is reliable and incapable of misinterpretation. (2) Conceptions or pre-conceptions, i.e. ideas which have been left in the mind by preceding sensations. Here memory, which recalls past impressions, and reasoning, which interprets them, have been active, with the result that the mind unconsciously confronts every new sensation with impressions which may modify any effect it may make. These conceptions, the repetition of earlier observations, are true. But it is well that they should be brought from time to time into immediate connexion with the sensation itself. Thus, if a distant square tower appear round, closer examination will discover the error and modify the impression for the future. It is difficult to see how Epicurus would apply this admirable criterion to his theory of the 'atoms' and the 'void.'

(b) Physics.—Epicurus relied on the senses alone as the true basis of knowledge, and they reveal only matter in motion. Consequently, matter is the only reality. The incorporeal is the same as the non-existent, i.e. void, and this applies even to mind. When Epicurus explains the nature of matter, the influence of Democritus is at once evident. The immediate impression of the senses suggests large masses of matter, but this is not reliable. In reality the apparent masses are composed of extremely minute, invisible particles or atoms which differ only in weight, size, and shape, and, though near to each other, do not touch. Around each is a void. By analogy he argues that this is true not only of the nearer world but also of that which is most distant. He reaches this explanation by the elimination of all other possible theories. Atoms then being presumed, in what way do they move? Aristotle had taught that celestial bodies move in a circular manner, and fire upwards. But Epicurus claimed that the only movement of which we are aware is that of the fall of bodies to the earth—downward movement. All atomic movement then is eternally straight downward. But this brings us to the conception of relative stagnation, as every body is moving in the same direction and at the same rate. To avoid this difficulty, Epicurus fell back upon our individual experience of power to resist forces and cause them to deviate from their original direction. He then claimed for atoms something of the same power. How, where, and when this strange power operates we are not informed; but, by assuming it, Epicurus arrives at an explanation of those vast aggregates of apparently concrete combinations of which our senses are conscious. The only difference between mind and matter is that the former is composed of minuter and rounder particles which pervade the body like a warm breath. To explain our consciousness of taste, colour, sound, etc., Epicurus resorts to a curious theory. In addition to the primary particles which each body possesses, there are secondary particles which vary in each case. These 'thin, filmy images, exactly copying the solid body whence they emanate,' are continually floating away from it; and when they reach the various human organs, they produce within the mind the sensations of which we are conscious. This theory also accounts not only for our visions of the ghosts of departed friends, whose secondary particles may float about long after their death, but also for our perceptions of the gods; for, though they are composed of much finer particles than mortals, their 'films' may fall with impact upon the human organism.

Though charged with atheism, Epicurus never questioned the existence of the gods, though he taught their remoteness from, and indifference to, human concerns. He ridiculed ancient mythology, whose effect on men had been wholly injurious, and explained such portents as eclipses, thunder, etc., on purely natural grounds. He likewise denounced the belief in fate—a belief he considered even more hurtful than the belief in Divine intervention. His teaching being frankly materialistic, Epicurus naturally disbelieved in immortality. For these reasons, he argued, man need have no fear: the gods do not concern themselves with him; there is no such thing as fate; and death is nothing but the end of all.

(c) Ethics.—Passing by the idealism of Plato and Aristotle, Epicurus had recourse to the doctrine of Aristippus of Cyrene, who taught that 'pleasure' is the supreme good and 'pain' the sole evil. Socrates, while admitting the importance of pleasure, regarded the pleasures of the mind as greater than those of the body. Aristippus preferred the latter because of their greater intensity. His ideal was the intensest pleasure of the passing moment, entirely undisturbed by reason, its greatest foe; not merely the absence of pain, but pleasure that was active and positive. The difficulty he found in attaining this ideal led him to allow some value to prudence as an aid thereto.

Epicurus differed from Aristippus in the following respects: men should consider less the fleeting pleasure of the moment and aim at that of the whole life; intense, throbbing ecstasy is less desirable than a tranquil state of mind which may become perpetual; indeed, at times, the highest possible pleasure may be merely the removal of pain; the pleasures and pains of mind are more important than those of body, because of the joy or distress which may be accumulated by memory and anticipation. Much greater emphasis is likewise laid on the virtue of prudence, which he calls 'a more precious thing even than philosophy.' Prudence is in fact the chief virtue of all. By its means rival pleasures are judged; and even momentary pain may be chosen, that a tranquil life may be furthered.

Epicureanism does not indulge in high moral ideals or insist upon any code of duties, whether public or private, save as these may minister to one's own pleasure, but neither does it inculcate (in theory) low, sensual delights. These have their place, but what that place is must be decided by prudence, with a view to securing a complete life of tranquil pleasure. Epicurus is to be regarded as the founder of Hedonism.

EPIMENIDES.—See QUOTATIONS.

EPISTLE.—In dealing with ancient literature we have become accustomed to make a distinction between the epistle and the letter. In that sphere we frequently meet with a so-called letter, which, from the purely external point of view, shows all the characteristics of a genuine letter, and yet is in no sense designed to serve as a vehicle of tidings and ideas between one person and another, or between one person and a definite circle of persons, but on the contrary has been written in the expectation, and indeed with the intention, of gaining the notice of the public. Now, in designating such a document an 'epistle,' and reserving the term 'letter' for a letter in the true sense, we must remember that, while the distinction itself was quite familiar to the ancients, our terminology is modern. By 'epistle' we mean, accordingly, a letter expressly intended for the general public. Yet it must be admitted that, in the sphere of ancient literature, it is not always easy to decide whether a particular document is a letter or an epistle, as will appear from the following considerations. (1) In many such compositions there is nothing to indicate whether the writer desired to address the general public or not. (2) The art of the epistle-writer consisted very largely in his ability to personate a true letter-writer, so that the reader should never have the faintest suspicion that the writing in his hands was anything but a genuine letter. (3) Even in letters properly so called the writer did not always allow his words and thoughts to flow freely and spontaneously, but sometimes—and especially in the latter part of the ancient era, when rhetoric prevailed everywhere—as we find even in correspondence whose private and confidential nature is beyond doubt, invested the structure and style of his letter with rhetorical features such as we might expect to meet with in writings designed to influence the public mind, and therefore of necessity far removed from the free and easy prattle of a letter. (4) Finally, it is not easy to specify the point of transition between the limited circle to which the private letter may be addressed and the general public to which the epistle makes its appeal. In most cases, no doubt, it is possible to decide whether an epistle is meant for the public eye, but it is frequently far from certain whether a particular letter addressed to a limited public, as e.g. a church or a group of churches, or, say, the bishops of a metropolitan province, has not lost all claim to be regarded as a real letter. Notwithstanding these considerations, however, the distinction between epistle and true letter has every right to be retained. Like all such distinctions, it doubtless fails to make due allowance for the living current of literary development, but it teaches us to keep an open eye for the diversities and gradations of literature, and thus also, when rightly used, helps us to define more accurately the character of the epistolary writings in the NT.

Now, as the Christian writers of the Apostolic Age adopted the 'epistle,' and, we may even say, made use of it with a zest that may be inferred, in particular, from the fact that they enriched the literary side of the Gospel and the Apocalypse by means of the epistolary form (cf. Lk 1st, Rev 1st), it is necessary to give due weight to the following points: (1) that in this as in other respects the Apostolic Age was embedded in the same literary tradition of later antiquity as we are able to trace in various Greek and Latin prototypes of non-Christian origin; (2) that, nevertheless, the structure, style, and diction of the primitive Christian epistles nearly always carry us into a different sphere of culture from that associated with the extant post-classical epistolary literature composed on classical models; and, finally, (3) that the influence of the hortatory addresses of Christian preachers in the primitive Church is clearly traceable in these Christian epistles.

Among the 'epistles' of the Apostolic Age the present writer would include the following: James, 1 Peter, Jude, Hebrews, 1 John, and Barnabas. These for the most part differ in no essential point from hortatory addresses to a congregation, and the epistolary form, where it is present at all, or where, as in Hebrews, it is no more than suggested, is merely a form, which, in fact, is completely shattered by the contents. Among these Epistles there is not one which in virtue of a refined or even well-schooled art could claim to be considered a true letter. But this is itself a striking evidence of the significant fact that the Christian writers of the Apostolic Age, greatly as they had been affected by the stream of literary activity in the grander style of the ancients, were now feeling their way towards new forms in which to communicate their religious ideas to a wider public. With this end in view, therefore, they had recourse to the epistle, as the literary eidos at once of the simplest character and lying closest to their hands; but here—even in the case of a writer like the author of Hebrews, who has obviously been powerfully influenced by the elements of Greek rhetoric—the substance of the message was for them of much greater importance than the form. The fictitious, pseudonymous epistle is a literary phenomenon that first makes its appearance in the post-Apostolic Age.

ERASTUS (Ἐραστος).—1. In Ro 16<sup>23</sup> Erastus is 'the treasurer of the city' (ὁ οἰκονόμος τῆς πόλεως, arcarius civitatis) of Corinth, who sends salutations with 'Quartus the brother.' His office was an important one. He stands almost alone in the NT as a convert of position and influence.

2. In Ac 19-- the name is given to one of two—Timothy being the other—who 'ministered' to St. Paul in Ephesus, and who were sent by him on some errand into Macedonia.

3. In 2 Ti 4<sup>20</sup> Erastus is a companion of St. Paul, said to have remained in Corinth, i.e. during the interval between the first and second imprisonments.

Are these three to be identified? It is possible that 2 and 3 are the same man, but on account of the nature of the office held by 1 it seems unlikely that he could have been a missionary companion and messenger of the Apostle. To meet this difficulty, it might be suggested that he had resigned the treasurership on becoming a Christian. Again, if 1 and 3 are identical, there would seem to be little point in St. Paul's informing Timothy that an important city official 'abode at Corinth.' It is held by some scholars that these salutations from Corinthian Christians in the postscript of the 'Roman' Epistle point to an Ephesian destination of the passage. It is easier to believe that the members of the Church at Corinth had friends at Ephesus than at Rome; but, as Lightfoot reminds us, personal acquaintance was not necessary in the Apostolic Church to create Christian sympathy. Also, 'the descriptive addition "the steward of the city" is much more appropriate if addressed to those to whom his name was unknown or scarcely known, than to those with whom he was personally acquainted' (Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, 1893, p. 305). If we could accept the theory of the Ephesian destination, we should be more inclined to identify all three names.

ESAU (Ἡσαῦ).—(1) St. Paul (Ro 9<sup>10-13</sup>) uses the pre-natal oracle regarding Esau and his brother (Gn 25<sup>23-24</sup>) as an illustration of the principle of Divine election. Before they were born, when neither had any merit or demerit, the elder was destined to serve the younger. As the prophet Malachi (1<sup>2-3</sup>) has it, 'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated.' In both of the OT passages quoted there was a reference not merely to the children but to their descendants. The first part of the oracle runs, 'Two nations are in thy womb, and two peoples shall be separated from thy bowels' (Gn 25<sup>23</sup>); and the Prophet's words are, 'Was (or 'is,' RVm) not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I (have) loved Jacob; but Esau (have) I hated, and made his mountains a desolation, and gave (given) his heritage to the jackals of the wilderness. Whereas Edom saith,' etc. (Mal 1<sup>3-4</sup>).

St. Paul is engaged in proving that the Divine promise has not failed though the majority of the children of Abraham have been excluded (or have excluded themselves by unbelief) from a share in its fulfilment in Christ. His purpose is to sweep away a narrow, particularistic doctrine of election, according to which God's action ends in Israel, and to replace it by a grand universalistic conception, according to which the world, or all humanity, is the end of the Divine action, and election itself is controlled by an all-embracing purpose of love. He accomplishes his purpose partly by a very effective argumentum ad hominem. The Jews so little understood the humbling principle of election, which ascribes all the merit of salvation to God, that they prided themselves on having been chosen, while their neighbours, Ishmael and Edom, had been rejected. Since Jacob—in the prophetic words which were so dear to them—had been loved and Esau hated, it was clear to them that they were the objects of a peculiar Divine favour. To turn the edge of this argument, St. Paul had only to remind them that many of the rejected—e.g. Esau and all his descendants—were children of Abraham. If God could make a distinction in the chosen family in former times, without being untrue to His covenant, He might do so again. A whole nation might lose its birthright like Esau.

(2) The writer of Hebrews (12<sup>16</sup>) instances Esau as a profane person, who for a single meal (ἀντι βρωσεως mâs) sold his birthright. 'Profane' (βεβήλος), when applied to things, means 'unconsecrated,' 'secular.' The word occurs in the LXX of Lv 10<sup>10</sup>, 'ye shall put difference between the holy and the common (τὸν βεβήλῳ). It was the fault of Esau, who was not without admirable qualities, that he made no such distinction. To him the most sacred things were common, because he had no spiritual discernment. He despised 'this birthright' (Gn 25<sup>31</sup>) as a thing of no worth. He did not despise the blessing which had material advantages attached to it, and he imagined he could retain it even after he had sold the birthright. But the poignant moment of disillusionment came, when he realized that the blessing was gone beyond recall. His regrets were vain: 'he found no place for repentance.' This signifies that there was no means of undoing what he had done; the past was irreparable.

IV. THE PAULINE TYPE OF EARLY CHRISTIAN ESCHATOLOGY.

1. Eschatology of St. Paul.
2. Eschatology of early Gentile-Christian churches.

Scope of the article.—Our subject is the eschatology of the Apostolic Church down to A.D. 100. By 'eschatology' we understand (1) the doctrine of a certain series of events associated with the end of this world-era and the beginning of another; and (2) the destiny of the individual human soul after death. We shall deal first with the earliest type of Christian eschatology, as it was taught by the first disciples of our Lord, in the primitive Judæo-Christian communities; and then we shall endeavour to trace the various lines along which this primitive teaching was developed and modified.

I. THE EARLIEST CHRISTIAN ESCHATOLOGY.

—1. The sources.—In studying the characteristics of the earliest Christian doctrine of the Last Things, it seems not unreasonable (in view of the trend of recent scholarship) to base our conclusions with some confidence upon the Acts of the Apostles, as a history 'which in most points, and those essential points, stands the test of reliability' (Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1909, p. 303). The evidence from the speeches must, perhaps, be used with a little more reserve, but even here there appears to be a growing tendency to recognize a real historical value. Evidence supplementing that of Acts may be drawn from the Epistles of the NT, particularly James, Hebrews, and 1 Peter, all of which belong to a Judæo-Christian type of thought, though somewhat later in date than the earliest preaching recorded in Acts (see artt. on JAMES, EP. OF; HEBREWS, EP. TO; PETER, EP. OF). From these NT writings it is possible to gain a fairly clear and definite conception of the earliest Christian eschatology.

2. The Jewish background of ideas.—The type of thought reflected in these early Christian writings is thoroughly and distinctively Jewish. Especially is this the case in the earlier chapters of Acts, where the ideas of Jewish apocalyptic form the 'background' of the preaching—a background so familiar that it never needs to be explained or expounded in detail, but yet never allows itself to be altogether forgotten. The men who preached the earliest Christian doctrine of the Last Things had for the most part been brought up in a religious atmosphere impregnated with eschatological ideas. The Judaism in which they were living was the Judaism which produced apocalyptic writings such as the Book of Jubilees, the Assumption of Moses, the Apocalypse of Baruch, 4 Ezra, etc.; and they were accustomed to think and speak of their religious hopes in the terms of Jewish apocalyptic. Now, although the details of apocalyptic eschatology vary from book to book (see e.g. R. H. Charles in HDB i. 741-749), yet a few fixed points stand out in every case, arranged according to a scheme which had become almost stereotyped in the apocalypses, and which is accepted as axiomatic in the apostolic preaching. This scheme is as follows: (1) the signs foreshadowing the end, (2) the Coming of the Messiah, (3) the resurrection of the dead, (4) the Last Judgment, (5) the inauguration of the Kingdom of God. The NT passages in which this 'eschatological scheme' is implied are too numerous to be cited; for typical examples, see Ac 2<sup>17-36</sup> 3<sup>20f.</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>42</sup> 15<sup>15-18</sup> 17<sup>31</sup>, Ja 5<sup>3-9</sup>, He 1 and 2, 1 P 4<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 4 and 5, 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup>, etc.

The comparative uniformity with which these 'fixed points' recur in the Jewish apocalyptic eschatology may be traced in part to the Jewish idea of predestination. The events were conceived of as already fixed in the mind of God, and (in a sense) already pre-existent in heaven; so that the progress of history may be regarded as an 'apocalypse' or unveiling of the Divine plan which is even now 'ready to be revealed in the last times.' It is necessary to realize this if we would understand the force of the Judæo-Christian appeal to the Old Testament. Modern writers generally hold that the value of prophecy consists primarily in its insight into spiritual truths, and only indirectly in its foresight into the future; but to the Jew, a coincidence between a prophetic prediction and a subsequent event was a signal proof of Divine inspiration, for it showed that God had 'unveiled' before the vision of His prophet some detail of that future which was already predestined and lying spread out before His all-seeing eyes (cf. Ac 1<sup>16f.</sup> 5<sup>17-34</sup> 31<sup>8-22</sup> 4<sup>25-28</sup> 11<sup>28</sup> 13<sup>32-41</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> 18<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>22f.</sup> etc., He 4<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>23</sup>, and esp. 1 P 1<sup>1-5</sup>).

But, while emphasizing the background of ideas common to primitive Christianity and Jewish apocalyptic, we must not ignore the distinctiveness of the former; and this now claims our attention.

3. The new Christian message.—(1) The Messiah has come, in the Person of Jesus.—The belief that Jesus of Nazareth was and is the Christ, and that His life fulfilled the Scriptural prophecies, is the central truth of the apostolic preaching (Ac 2<sup>36</sup> 3<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>2f.</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, He 1, 1 P 3<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>, etc.). In the Jewish apocalypses, two Messianic ideals are manifested. On the one hand, there was the old prophetic expectation of a warrior-king of David's line, raised up from among God's people to rule them in righteousness and truth (Pss.-Sol. xvii. 23-51, etc.). On the other hand, there was the purely apocalyptic conception of a heavenly Being descending, like Daniel's Son of Man, from the clouds of heaven, endowed with supernatural powers, and presiding as God's viceroy at the Great Judgment. It is to be noticed that the NT conception of our Lord's Messiahship, while higher than any previously set forth, is much more nearly related to the Danielic 'Son of Man' than to the political type of Messiah (Ac 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, etc.). Now, if Jesus was the Messiah, then, since He had actually come, and had been rejected by His people, several consequences seemed (to Jewish minds) to follow inevitably, viz.:

(2) The Last Days are now in progress.—In Jewish apocalyptic, the coming of the Messiah is invariably associated with the end of this world and the beginning of the New Era. So, when the apostles proclaimed that the Messiah had come, they thereby conveyed to their Jewish hearers the impression that the Last Days had also come—not merely that they were at hand, but that they had actually begun and were in progress. And in fact this belief is implied in many NT passages, the full meaning of which often escapes the notice of the casual reader, who is full of modern ideas. But if once this eschatological outlook is realized, the early narratives of Acts are filled with new meaning. In particular, it will be noticed that the 'appeals to prophecy,' which occur so frequently in Acts, are often connected with the desire to prove that the Last Days have at length come; e.g. the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost is hailed by St. Peter as the fulfilment of Joel's prophecy, which expressly referred to 'the Last Days' (Ac 2<sup>16-33</sup>; cf. J1 2<sup>28-32</sup>). His argument is that, since the prophecy has been fulfilled, it follows that the 'Last Days' foretold therein must have come. Similarly, the charismata, and the gifts of healing and of tongues, which were prevalent in the early Church, lent themselves readily to the view that they were a part of the miraculous 'signs of the end' foretold by prophets and apocalypists (Ac 2<sup>18</sup> 33. 43 4<sup>30f.</sup> 5<sup>12-16</sup> 16<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>6</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>). Again, the Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of our Lord were proclaimed by the apostles, not merely as interesting historical events, but as part of the miraculous portents which were to form the 'birth-pangs of the Kingdom of God' (Ac 2<sup>24-36</sup> 31<sup>4-26</sup> 26<sup>8</sup>). All these things combined to deepen in the minds of the first disciples of our Lord the conviction that 'it was the last hour.'

(3) The Messiah is immediately to return as Judge.—Jesus, the Messiah, has been rejected by His people, but there remains yet another act in the great drama of the Last Things. His life on earth has fulfilled some of the Messianic prophecies; but others (e.g. Daniel's vision of the Son of Man) are still awaiting fulfilment. So the Messiah is about to come again immediately in glory on the clouds of heaven to judge all mankind (Ac 1<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>31</sup> 24<sup>25</sup>, Ja 5<sup>8</sup> 9, 1 P 4<sup>5</sup>) and to destroy the apostate city of Jerusalem and the inhabitants thereof (Ac 6<sup>14</sup>). Thus the apostolic preaching was in part a stern denunciation and a warning of judgment to come. But it did not end here.

(4) God is granting one more opportunity.—Herein lay the 'good tidings' of the apostolic preaching. Although the Jews had incurred the severest penalties of the Divine judgment by crucifying the Messiah (Ac 3<sup>14f.</sup>), yet another opportunity is being offered, by which all men may escape 'the wrath to come,' and receive the Divine forgiveness. The only conditions demanded by God are (a) belief in Jesus as Lord and Messiah (Ac 16<sup>30f.</sup>; cf. 2<sup>3f.</sup>, etc.), and (b) repentance (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 31<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>21</sup>). Those who 'believe' and 'repent' will be saved in the Judgment from the condemnation which is impending over all the world (Ac 2<sup>40</sup> 31<sup>9</sup> 23-26), and will be forgiven by the Lord Jesus, who, as Messianic Judge, alone has the authority to grant such pardon (Ac 5<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>43</sup>). Thus it will be seen that 'salvation' and 'forgiveness,' as terms of Christian theology, are in their origin eschatological, though they have been found capable of development along non-eschatological lines (see below). And it was just because of this eschatological background that the apostolic 'gospel' was so intensely fervent and urgent; for there was not a moment to spare; 'the Judge was standing before the doors' (Ja 5<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1 P 4<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>), and every convert was indeed a brand plucked from the burning (Ac 2<sup>33-40</sup> 47 31<sup>9-26</sup>). So the apostolic preaching was transformed from a denunciation and a warning of impending judgment into an evangel of salvation and forgiveness.

(5) The free gifts of God.—To describe the apostolic gospel simply as a promise of escape from the wrath to come would be inadequate; it was a promise rich with new gifts and blessings—e.g. the outflowing of the Divine Spirit (Ac 2<sup>33</sup>, 38st, 5<sup>22</sup>), and the 'seasons of refreshing,' which would sustain the elect until the return of the Messiah and the 'restoration of all things' (Ac 3<sup>19-21</sup>; see below, I. 4 (5)). And these blessings were not to be laboriously earned, but were freely offered to all who would 'repent' and 'believe.'

4. The application of the apostolic message to the chief doctrines of the Last Things.—The ideas underlying the most primitive Christian eschatology, as we have outlined it above, are so unfamiliar to us that their bearing upon the great problems of the future life is not at first sight evident, and requires a brief consideration.

(1) The Second Coming of our Lord.—Most early Christians doubtless conceived of this in the traditional dramatic form, in accordance with the teaching of Enoch and other Jewish apocalypses. On the other hand, it should be remembered that (a) the 'unearthly' conception of the Messiah set forth in the Enochic 'Son of Man' would be modified by the recollection of the historical human personality of Jesus the Messiah; and (b) the apocalyptic idea of Messiahship, though one-sided, and therefore inadequate for a satisfactory Christology, was yet a high and transcendent ideal—one which needed to be supplemented and enlarged, rather than corrected. It formed a good foundation, upon which Christian thought and experience were able to build a fuller and truer doctrine of our Lord's Person and Second Coming.

(2) The Last Judgment.—This also was, in primitive Christian thought, closely linked with the Person of our Lord as Messianic Judge. It was thought of as limited in time to a date in the near future, and probably localized at some place on the earth (perhaps Jerusalem; cf. Ac 6<sup>14</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>17</sup>). Such ideas, however crude, were capable of being 'spiritualized' in course of time, without any breach in the continuity of Christian teaching. A more serious problem is raised by the difficulty of reconciling the doctrine of a universal Judgment (Ac 17<sup>31</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>5</sup>) with the doctrine of forgiveness, by which some men are 'acquitted' beforehand in anticipation of the Judgment. This is a hard, perhaps an insoluble, problem; but it is not peculiar to eschatology; for it confronts us wherever the ideas of forgiveness and justice are placed side by side.

(3) The Intermediate State.—So long as the Return of the Lord was expected to occur immediately, there was little room for any speculations with regard to the state of those who had 'fallen asleep in Christ.' The 'waiting-time' seemed so brief that it did not invite much consideration. To expect to find in the NT authoritative statements either for or against prayers for the dead, or formal distinctions between an intermediate state of purgation and a final state of bliss, is to forget the peculiar eschatological outlook of primitive Christianity, and to look for an anachronism. The beginnings of Christian speculation concerning the Intermediate State come before us at quite an early stage (e.g. in 1 Thess.); but they do not belong to the earliest stage of all.

The case was somewhat different with regard to the faithful who had died before Christ came. Christians naturally wished to know how these would be enabled to hear the 'good tidings,' and share in the forgiveness and salvation now offered by Christ. Two well-known passages in 1 Peter bear upon this point: the 'preaching to the spirits in prison' (1 P 3<sup>19</sup>), and the 'preaching to the dead' (1 P 4<sup>6</sup>). A detailed discussion is impossible here; see the Commentaries ad loc. In the present writer's Primitive Christian Eschatology, p. 254 ff., it is contended that the passages should be interpreted in accordance with the methods of Jewish apocalyptic; and that their main purpose is to teach that the 'good tidings' have been proclaimed by Christ to those who had died before His Coming, so that at His Return they may have the same opportunities of repentance as those who are alive at the time. Broadly, too, we may see in these passages Scriptural warrant for the view that there may be opportunities for repentance after death.

(4) The Resurrection.—Questionings with regard to the nature and manner of the resurrection are scarcely seen at all in the earliest eschatology as reflected in Acts and the Judæo-Christian Epistles (see Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, p. 91 f.). Generally the references apply to our Lord's Resurrection, and even where the general resurrection is implied (Ac 23<sup>6-8</sup>, 24<sup>15</sup>, 26<sup>6-8</sup>) no details as to the manner thereof are forthcoming. In Ac 24<sup>15</sup> its universal scope ('both of the just and unjust') is asserted; and in He 6<sup>1-2</sup> ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν is included among 'the principles of Christ' which are too well known to need a detailed exposition. But we find nothing corresponding to the Pauline discussion as to the nature of the resurrection-body. In the Jewish apocalypses, the doctrine fluctuates from an extremely material conception to one which is purely spiritual; and probably the early Christians inherited various views on this point. The idea that our Lord's Resurrection was a 'first-fruits' of the general resurrection is implied in Ac 26<sup>23</sup>, and this was destined in time to influence the Christian doctrine of the resurrection.

(5) Final destinies.—Here again, no detailed scheme of doctrine is yet put forward. Broadly, it is implied that supreme joy will be the reward of the 'believers,' and that a dreadful fate awaits unbelievers (Ac 3<sup>23</sup>). The phrase 'restoration of all things' (Ac 3<sup>21</sup>) might be taken to imply a 'universalistic' view of future destinies, or even some idea of 'world-cycles' by which the eras that are past are brought back in course of time; but a similar phrase is found in Mal 4<sup>2</sup> (LXX), and may be no more than a general term for the perfection of the Messianic Kingdom.

5. The extent and importance of the apocalyptic element in the earliest Christian eschatology.—Until recent years, the apocalyptic element in the NT received but scant notice; but of late a new theory as to the teaching and 'tone' of apostolic Christianity has been put forward (see e.g. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, or Schweitzer, Paul and his Interpreters). It is contended that the 'gospel' of primitive Christianity was exclusively an eschatological message, foretelling, in terms of current Jewish apocalyptic, the approaching end of this world-era and the beginning of the next. If the interpretation given above be correct, there is a measure of truth in this 'Consistent Eschatological' view of apostolic eschatology; for the new faith did not at once sweep away the old methods of thought, and we should miss the force and full significance of NT eschatology unless we interpreted it in the light of Jewish apocalyptic.

On the other hand, the 'Consistent Eschatologists' do not appear to give sufficient place to other factors: e.g. (1) the 'political' type of Jewish thought, in which the Messiah is conceived of as an earthly Monarch, and the Kingdom of God as an extensive Jewish Empire. Some such political ideas were clearly in the minds of the apostles at the first (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>), and they may well have existed in the primitive Church side by side with the purely apocalyptic eschatology. And (2) the 'Consistent Eschatologists' under-rate the importance of the new and distinctively Christian element in the apostolic eschatology. Also (3) a study of the NT shows that, from the very first, moral teaching held a place second to none in the apostolic preaching. In view of these facts, it would appear to be an exaggeration to speak of the primitive apostolic 'gospel' as though it were exclusively, or even predominantly, an eschatological message.

6. The relation of the primitive apostolic eschatology to the teaching of our Lord.—It was from the teaching and work of our Lord that the apostolic preaching derived its primary inspiration, and hence it is evident that the apostolic doctrine of the Last Things was intended to be founded upon His. And since recent study of the NT seems to have shown that eschatology held an important place in our Lord's teaching, we may not regard the eschatological 'tone' of the primitive apostolic message as an element foreign to the mind of Christ, or one invented by the apostles merely to satisfy their own predilections. It does not follow, however, that the apostolic teaching coincided precisely with that of our Lord. It was only natural that the apostles should tend to emphasize those aspects of His teaching which were most full of meaning to themselves, and to lay but little stress upon whatever appeared to them unfamiliar or incomprehensible. And so the proportions of the message undergo some modification: for instance, in the apostolic preaching, the expectation of the Second Coming is set forth more definitely than in the words of the Master Himself.

But in one point the community of spirit between the eschatology of Christ and His followers is most noteworthy: the close link between the eschatology and practical morality. From the first, the call to repentance always accompanies the eschatological message (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, etc.); and the 'repentance' of the primitive Christians involved a very real change of life. Herein, from the very first, lay a difference between Jewish and Christian eschatology: the former was often only a comfortable theory, to give encouragement in times of trouble; the latter was always an inspiring call to a new life of faith and love. This was an essential element of the apostolic eschatology, destined to survive when the forms and phrases of Jewish apocalyptic gave way under the trials of the long delay in the Master's Return.

7. The decline of the earliest type of Christian eschatology.—The form of the earliest Christian doctrine of the Last Things, as we have estimated it above, was congenial only to Jewish surroundings, and it soon began to undergo some modification. Some of these lines of development may be traced to the influence of Gentile thought, as reflected, e.g., in St. Paul's Epistles; to the deepening of the spiritual ideas underlying the dramatic eschatology, as we see in the Johannine writings; and to the rise of the Christian apocalyptic literature, with its close resemblance to Jewish apocalyptic. For the present, our consideration of these may best be deferred. But in certain quarters the primitive Judæo-Christian eschatology appears to have been but little modified by external influences; only it shows a steady decline and a gradual loss of its original vitality and power. The beginnings of this decline may be seen even in the NT writings which we have already been considering, viz. Acts, James, Hebrews, 1 Peter; its later stages are reflected chiefly in Jude, 2 Peter, the Didache (if the early date be accepted), and some of the Apostolic Fathers. The Johannine and Pauline writings also indirectly throw light upon this subject.

(1) Causes of the decline.—(a) The recollection of our Lord's teaching.—If, as we have contended, the eschatology of our Lord was wider and deeper than the apostolic interpretation of it, it was natural that some of the half-understood sayings of the Master—particularly the parting commissions, Mt 28<sup>0</sup>, Ac 17<sup>8</sup>, which are so notably non-eschatological—should remain in the memory of the apostles, and that in course of time a fuller meaning should dawn upon their minds. So it would come to pass that the moral and spiritual aspects of the gospel, and the world-wide scope of its mission, would claim an increasing pre-eminence in the apostolic preaching. (For the influence of our Lord's teaching on St. Paul, see Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, pp. 96–101.)

(b) A keen sense of moral values.—'Practical morality' was from the first held in the highest esteem in the Judæo-Christian communities (see, e.g., the Epistle of James), and this tended to draw the centre of Christian interest away from eschatology to morality. It is difficult to illustrate this by detailed quotations; perhaps the best proof may be obtained by a rapid perusal of Acts, by means of which the steady diminution of the eschatological expectation as the narrative proceeds is readily noticed. In the later speeches of St. Paul, at Miletus (Ac 20<sup>18–35</sup>) or at Jerusalem (Ac 22), eschatology is almost ignored; and St. Paul before Felix reasons of 'righteousness and temperance' as well as of 'judgment to come' (Ac 24<sup>25</sup>). Also the teaching of 1 Peter, and most of all of James, suggests that moral and spiritual values are far more esteemed than eschatological problems.

(c) The charismata.—The spiritual gifts, e.g. of healing or of tongues, while originally regarded by Jewish Christians as 'signs of the end' (see above, I. 3 (2)), soon began to acquire an intrinsic value of their own in the eyes of the Christian community. Men knew, as a fact of Christian experience, that they had been freed from the power of sin and from the sense of guilt before God; and so they began to use the terms 'salvation,' 'justification,' etc., to describe their own spiritual experiences rather than purely eschatological hopes. (In Ac 16<sup>31</sup>, e.g., 'salvation' scarcely seems eschatological; and in Ac 10<sup>38</sup> our Lord is described simply as 'one who went about doing good and healing'.)

It will be noticed that the influences we have been considering tended to alter the proportions of Christian teaching by emphasizing non-eschatological factors at the expense of eschatology. But there were also other influences at work, directly tending to break up the primitive doctrine of the Last Things.

(d) The delay in the Return.—This was the most potent of all the factors which changed the 'tone' of Christian eschatology. As the days and months passed, and the Son of Man did not appear on the clouds of heaven, it was impossible to repeat with the same assurance the old message: 'The time is at hand.' Yet the old hope persisted long in Judæo-Christian circles, not only in the earlier writings, e.g. Ja 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>7</sup>, but until the close of the 1st cent., e.g. 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>, Didache 16, and even in the Apology of Aristides.

But we see the change of 'tone' in St. Paul's charge to the Ephesian elders (Ac 20<sup>28–32</sup>), which, so far from anticipating an immediate Return of the Lord, looks forward to a period of apostasy, and to an extended ministry in the Church. We see it even more plainly in 2 P 3<sup>4ff</sup>, where the mocking question, 'Where is the promise of His coming?' is met by the old answer of Jewish apocalyptists: 'One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day' (2 P 3<sup>8</sup>; cf. Slavonic Enoch, § 32). Such an argument virtually implies that the primitive confidence in an immediate Return had been surrendered. The gradual weakening of that confidence will come before us again in St. Paul's Epistles [see below]. In Didache, 16, the Return, though near, is to be preceded by the rule of Antichrist; and the rise of 'Chiliasm' in the 2nd cent. thrust the final consummation still further into the future.

(e) The problem of sin in the Christian community.—This, though not at first sight an eschatological question, indirectly helped to modify the primitive doctrine of the Last Things. The early Christian conception of final destinies was simple and consistent: those who believed and repented would be saved; those who believed not would be condemned. This view assumed that Christian practice would always be in complete accord with Christian profession; and, so long as this was the case, it was not open to objection. But in practice it was soon found that professing Christians were not always consistent in their lives (Ja 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1-2</sup>; cf. Ac 20<sup>30</sup>). So the simple two-fold division of mankind into 'saved' and 'not-saved' became unsatisfactory to man's sense of justice, for it did not correspond to the facts of experience; and similarly the two-fold division of final destinies into 'eternal bliss' and 'eternal woe' became open to the charge that it imputed to God a line of action not wholly just.

This difficulty was met in two ways. (a) The stricter minds insisted that post-baptismal sin forfeited the right to salvation, and incurred condemnation (He 6<sup>4-6</sup>). By this means all Christians guilty of sin were classed among the 'not-saved,' and the two-fold division of retribution could logically be maintained. (β) A more lenient view admitted the possibility of a second repentance after post-baptismal sin, at least if the sin were atoned for by penance. Soon after the year A.D. 100 we find this view prevalent (2 Clem. 7; Shepherd of Hermas: Vis. iii., Sim. vi., etc.). This view, while rich in charity, surrendered the ideal of a consistent Christian life, and is far removed from the logical simplicity of primitive Christian eschatology. A further application of the idea of 'penance' to the future life resulted in the doctrine of purgatory, whereby the primitive two-fold division of the other world becomes three-fold. (For the beginnings of the doctrine of purgatory, see Shepherd of Hermas: Vis. iii. 7; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 14; and some of the Christian apocalypses.)

(f) The influence of Jewish apocalyptic.—We have already referred in general terms to this influence under 'the Jewish background of ideas' (see above, I. 2), and its full results will come before us at a later stage, under II. At this point, however, it is worth noting that a deliberate imitation of the Jewish apocalypses in writings not themselves apocalyptic marks the decline of the Judæo-Christian type of eschatology. Jude and 2 Peter are the most notable instances in the NT. Although the language is at first sight that of primitive Christianity, there is a real difference. Instead of the bold outlines of the good tidings concerning Jesus the Messiah, we find a mass of detailed revelations about angels, and fallen stars, and cosmic convulsions (Jude 6-16, 2 P 2<sup>11</sup> 35-13), such as the Jewish apocalypsists delighted to describe, but which had ceased to attract the first generation of Christians, because of the all-absorbing interest of the 'good tidings.' The general tone of these Epistles is also far more pessimistic than that of the earliest Christian preaching, and reflects the position of men conscious of a reaction after a great spiritual revival (Jude 3<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>11</sup> 31-3). This again agrees with the normal characteristics of Jewish apocalyptic. It should be noted also that Jude 14<sup>1</sup> is a direct quotation from Enoch i. 9.

A still later stage in the decline of the primitive Judæo-Christian eschatology under apocalyptic influence is seen in Papias, where the apocalyptic details have become simply puerile, and the old virility and strong moral associations of eschatology have practically vanished (see, e.g., the quotation from Papias in Iren. adv. Hær. v. xxxiii. 3 f.).

(2) Results of the decline.—A number of causes, some of which we have briefly considered above, slowly but surely modified the primitive doctrine of the Last Things, as preached in Judæo-Christian circles. The expectation of an immediate Return of the Messiah, which had been its main inspiration, died away; and nothing replaced it. The result was that this type of eschatology ceased to be a living force in the Christian Church. Where it was elaborated by apocalyptic details, it continued for a time (as we shall see in the case of the Christian apocalypses) to enjoy some measure of popular favour; or again, where it was interpreted and re-stated by master-minds, such as St. Paul and St. John, its abiding value was revealed, and has never ceased to be recognized by thoughtful minds. But in its original form it was not fitted to survive, and so, unless it was transformed, it slowly expired.

II. THE CHRISTIAN APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.—So far, we have been considering what appears to have been the 'normal' type of early Christian eschatology; and we have seen that the ideas and phraseology of the Jewish apocalypses often occur in Christian literature which is not properly 'apocalyptic' in its literary form (e.g. Acts, 2 Peter, etc.). In these cases the apocalyptic influence may be called indirect or incidental. But there are other Christian writings in which the literary form of Jewish apocalyptic is deliberately imitated in detail; and in these writings—especially those of later date—we see a distinct modification of the earliest type of Christian eschatology, such as we have considered above.

1. The Revelation of St. John.—(1) General scheme of the book.—This, the greatest, and perhaps the earliest, of the Christian apocalypses, contains such a wealth of material bearing upon eschatology that a detailed treatment is here impossible. If (as the majority of scholars hold) the book belongs to the times of Nero, Vespasian, or Domitian (c. A.D. 65-70, or 95), it is an extremely important witness to the history of early Christian eschatology, whatever be the final decision with regard to its authorship.

Various attempts have been made to dissect the book into strata of different dates; but, viewed as a whole, the book conveys a strong impression of literary unity. In particular, with regard to the eschatology, the various parts resemble each other in tone far more nearly than they resemble any other known apocalypse. Also, the book, if regarded as a whole, offers an intelligible scheme: (a) the Introduction (1<sup>1-8</sup>); (b) the letters to the Seven Churches (1<sup>9-32</sup>), which show the immediate purpose for which the author wrote the book; (c) the vision of the opening of the Sealed Book (4<sup>1-11</sup>), which enforces the general message that 'the end is at hand' (see below); (d) the vision of the Fall of Rome (12<sup>1-18</sup>), which sets forth in detail the particular element of the last great crisis which for the moment seemed the most important; (e) the vision of the Last Judgment (19<sup>1-20</sup>); and (f) the vision of the new City of God. These may be regarded as component parts of one great apocalypse. It will be seen that they form, broadly, an intelligible and progressive narrative, on the lines of normal Jewish apocalyptic; and though it may be that in parts the visions are 'concurrent rather than successive' (MacCulloch in ERE v. 387), there seems no sufficient reason to postulate a 'literary patchwork.'

(2) The book as a type of apocalyptic literature.—

The writer is steeped in apocalyptic thought and language, to a greater extent than any other NT writer. To the average modern reader the book appears strange and unintelligible; but to those familiar with Jewish apocalyptic there is scarcely a phrase altogether new or without parallel. From this, two important consequences follow. (a) The interpretation of the details should accord with the methods of interpretation applied to apocalyptic literature in general. It should be remembered, e.g., that the apocalyptists were in the habit of 'heaping up' details in their description of the Messianic woes and the last catastrophe, rather with a view to creating a vivid picture of chaos and terror than with the intention of depicting some definite event by each separate illustration. So it is probable that many of the details of the NT Apocalypse are not intended to bear a too careful analysis or interpretation. (b) If the author of the Apocalypse be identified with the author of the Fourth Gospel and the Johannine Epistles, it is clear that the primitive Christians were able to 'put aside' their apocalyptic language and ideas at will, and to see behind the dramatic imagery to the underlying spiritual truths thus symbolized. And, conversely, in early Christian writings which are apparently non-apocalyptic, it is likely that eschatological ideas are never far absent from the mind of the writer, and may appear incidentally at any point.

(3) The writer's hope of an immediate Return of the Lord.—The writer begins by claiming to reveal 'the things which shall shortly come to pass' (Rev 1<sup>1</sup>), and closes with the Divine promise: 'I come quickly' (Rev 22<sup>0</sup>). Clearly, then, the hope of the Second Coming in the near future had not yet faded from his mind. Indeed, the main purpose of the book is similar to that of all apocalypses—viz. to encourage the faithful in times of trouble with the assurance that the hour of deliverance is at hand. In particular, this may be seen in the vision of the opening of the Sealed Book (chs. 4–11). We read that the opening of the first five seals is followed by victory (6<sup>1,2</sup>), war (vv. 3, 4), famine (vv. 5, 6), death (vv. 7, 8), and the cry of martyred saints (vv. 9–11). So far, the vision may well be taken as describing the position of the Church at the close of the 1st cent. A.D., when Rome's victories had brought famine, war, death, and persecution in their train. But when we pass to the opening of the sixth and seventh seals, we are at once confronted with cosmic convulsions and miraculous portents, which form the 'birth-pangs' of the New Era (6<sup>12–17</sup> 8.9). If we interpret this vision as we interpret other apocalypses, we shall conclude that the writer was living in the times of the breaking of the fifth seal, so that the vision up to that point is an apocalyptic retrospect of history, and after that point is an apocalyptic prediction of the 'Messianic woes,' which were about to begin immediately. This leads on to the vision of the two witnesses, their destruction by the Beast, their resurrection (11<sup>1–13</sup>; probably a picture of the last great struggle with Antichrist), and the inauguration of the Kingdom of God (11<sup>15–19</sup>). In other words, the gist of these chapters is a message of encouragement, assuring the persecuted Christians that the time of their redemption has come.

(4) The political element in the eschatology.—The Roman Empire was, to the mind of the writer, the greatest enemy of Christ—almost, indeed, the Antichrist himself. So he devotes seven chapters (12–18) to a vision of the Fall of Rome, which forms a kind of supplement to the vision of the opening of the Sealed Book, and deals with the political aspect of the Last Things. The details offer many difficult problems for solution; we find a medley of ideas, mainly from Jewish apocalyptic, blended perhaps with the popular expectation that 'Nero' would return once more as a great world-ruler (13<sup>11–18</sup>; see Swete's Apocalypse, Introduction, ch. vii.). The political outlook of these chapters, with their intense hostility to the Roman Empire, is widely different from that of most NT writers (e.g. St. Paul in 2 Th 2<sup>6</sup> or Ro 13<sup>1–2</sup>). In so far as the spirit of opposition to Christ was at that time bound up with the policy of the Empire, the vision is true to deep principles of Christian eschatology; but some of the passages have lent themselves to political or ecclesiastical bias and party-spirit.

(5) The doctrine of the Millennium.—The vision of the Last Judgment in chs. 19 and 20 contains a doctrine of the Millennium. There is to be a first resurrection of the faithful dead, who will 'reign with Christ a thousand years,' during which time 'the rest of the dead live not till the thousand years are finished' (20<sup>4–5</sup>). Then follows a second resurrection, and a second judgment of all mankind, when the assignment of final destinies is made to each soul (vv. 11–15).

The idea of a Millennial reign of the Messiah on earth is found in Jewish apocalypses (e.g. cf. 4 Ezra vii. 28–31; Slav. Enoch, 33); but there is no authority for it in the teaching of our Lord. It seems difficult to attach to it any meaning of permanent spiritual value; moreover, in its materialistic forms it has been a source of weakness rather than of strength to Christian eschatology. For the later history of Chiliasm, see Didache, 16 (closely based on Rev 19 and 20); Papias (quoted Iren. adv. Hær. v. xxxiii.); Ap. Bar. xxxix. 5; Ep. Barnabas, 15; Justin, c. Tryph. 80; Iren. adv. Hær. v. xxxiv. f., etc. Justin, while holding strongly to a belief in the Millennium on earth, admits that the belief was not held 'ubique et ab omnibus' in the Church.

(6) The distinctiveness of the Johannine Apocalypse.—The resemblance between the NT Apocalypse and other apocalypses is, as we have seen, striking; but not less striking are the distinctive features of the former.

(a) Alone of all the apocalypses, Jewish or Christian, it is given under the name of the writer, and not under an assumed name of some great hero of the past. This is most significant; for it shows the prophetic character of apostolic eschatology. Unlike apocalyptists in general, the writer did not shelter himself under the authority of the past; but he dared to speak boldly in his own name, under a strong conviction that he had a new message from God to deliver.

(b) The central position given to the Person of Jesus the Messiah is also of importance. The writer seems to feel that no language is too lofty to describe the Person of our Lord. At the very outset, the Danielic vision of the Almighty is applied to our Lord without the least hesitancy; and throughout the book the Christology, though apocalyptic in form, implies the most exalted conception of Messiahship (Rev 1<sup>5–7</sup> 17. 5<sup>5</sup>, 9–14 19<sup>11–16</sup>, etc.). This is the more noteworthy when we remember that in many of the Jewish apocalypses, especially those contemporary with primitive Christianity (e.g. 4 Ezra and Apocalypse of Baruch), the figure of the Messiah plays but an insignificant part.

(c) The lofty spirituality of the book is another distinctive feature. No book of the NT has given more noble expression to the highest aspirations of man for the future life than the Apocalypse of St. John. Certainly no other apocalypse offers anything to rival its masterly word-pictures of the Kingdom of God (see, e.g., Rev 7 21<sup>1–7</sup> 21<sup>2–22</sup>). Such passages show us the heights to which the apocalyptic type of Christian eschatology could attain in the mind of an inspired master-thinker.

2. The non-canonical Christian apocalypses.

—(1) The chief writings of this type.—The Apocalypse of St. John stands as the only representative of Christian apocalyptic in the NT; but one or two other Christian apocalypses appear to belong—at least in part—to the 1st cent. A.D. The determination of their dates is, however, a difficult matter, and by no means established beyond doubt. Such are:

(a) Parts of the Sibylline Oracles (e.g. the Proœmium, bk. iv. and bk. viii. 217–429; see HDB v. 63).

(b) Parts of the Ascension of Isaiah. Charles (Introd. to Asc. Is.) assigns chs. iii.–v. and vi.–xi. to the close of the 1st. cent. A.D.; but Armitage Robinson (HDB ii. 500b) assigns the Christian element in Asc. Is. to the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D.

(c) The Epistle of Barnabas, though not strictly an apocalypse in form, is apocalyptic in tone, and has been assigned to the times of Vespasian (so Lightfoot), Nerva, or Hadrian. There are also several Christian apocalypses which probably contain elements belonging to the 2nd. cent. A.D.—e.g. the Apocalypse of Peter, the Testament of Abraham, the Testament of Isaac, the Vision of Paul, etc. These help us to realize more clearly the distinctive features of the Christian apocalyptic literature, as it developed in later times.

(2) The eschatology of these writings.—The Christian apocalypses, like most of the Jewish apocalypses, were probably designed for circulation among the less educated sections of the community. The average tone is puerile and petty; we find a mass of trivial details and crude dramatic colouring, but an entire absence of deep or illuminating thoughts. Nearly all these books bear the marks of Egyptian or Alexandrian origin; and it would seem that the religious atmosphere of these parts was favourable to the growth of 'apocalyptic' (cf. many of the Jewish apocalypses—Slav. Enoch, parts of Sib. Or., etc.). The most noteworthy features of the eschatology are:

(a) The profusion of detailed 'revelations.'—While the normal Jewish scheme of eschatology is retained, the broad outlines are almost obscured by the mass of detailed description and prophecy; and the result is a type of eschatology very far removed from that of our Lord, or of the majority of NT books. In Asc. Is. we find graphic descriptions of the Seven Heavens (Asc. Is. iii. and iv.) and of the manner of the resurrection, which is apparently to be bodiless (iv. 14 f.). In the later apocalypses these details become more and more profuse: the conditions of the Intermediate State, the punishments of the wicked, the geography of the other world, are expounded with minute precision. But a full discussion of these does not properly belong to 'apostolic eschatology.'

(b) The prevalence of foreign ideas.—In these apocalypses Babylonian, Egyptian, and Zoroastrian legends are found strangely mingled with Christian ideas, just as they were doubtless mingled in the minds of the cosmopolitan populace of Alexandria.

(c) The coming of Antichrist.—This is a feature far more prominent in these apocalypses than in any other known group of writings. The idea seems derived from various sources: e.g. the Jewish expectation of a last leader of the hosts of evil (Ezk 38. 39, Dn 11<sup>36</sup>, Apoc. Bar. xxxix., 4 Ezra v. 6, Pss.-Sol. ii. 33, etc.); the Zoroastrian 'Satan,' chief of the evil spirits (of Asc. Is. ii.); the Babylonian Dragon-myth (see Bousset, Antichrist Legend, 1896); and, in particular, the expectation of Nero's return to resume the sovereignty of the world (see Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, p. 78 ff.). This dread of Nero's return seems to have been an outstanding feature of Christian eschatology as reflected in these apocalypses—see, e.g., Asc. Is. iii. and iv., Sib. Or. iv. 117–122, 137 ff., v. 138–141, 413–422, viii. 88–90, 169–213, etc. For other early Christian conceptions of Antichrist cf. 2 Th 2<sup>3, 4</sup> (see below, and article MAN OF SIN), 1 Jn 4<sup>3</sup> 2 Jn<sup>7</sup> (see below); Didache, 16 (where he is to appear 'as Son of God,' i.e. as a pseudo-Messiah); Ep. Barn. 4. The conception (like the corresponding one of the Messiah) varies from that of a human monarch to that of a supernatural being, sometimes closely akin to 'Satan.' Various titles are used—e.g. 'Beliar' (Asc. Is.), 'the World's Deceiver' (Didache), 'the Black One' (Ep. Barn.), 'the Man of Sin' (2 Thess.); but in all cases the destruction of Antichrist is set forth as one of the last and greatest acts of the true Messiah. The idea of a coming reign of Antichrist tended to 'throw back' the Second Coming of the true Messiah into a somewhat less immediate future than it occupies in the earliest Christian message.

(d) The allegorical interpretation of Scripture.—By allegorizing the narratives of Scripture, some of the Christian apocalypsists were able to find prophecies of the Last Things in unpromising fields of study. In Ep. Barn. 15, e.g., we find Gen 1 interpreted as an 'apocalypse' of the world's history, in a manner that reminds us of both the Alexandrian-Jewish apocalypses (e.g. Slav. Enoch) and the Christian Fathers of Alexandria.

(3) Value of the Christian apocalypses.—These Christian writings are valuable, because they show us one of the lines along which the primitive Judæo-Christian eschatology developed and decayed. The primitive enthusiasm for the few great truths of the gospel faded away, and it was replaced by a dilettante curiosity about the things of the other world, which ran riot in extravagant superstition, and eventually died—as it deserved to die. In these writings we may also see the beginnings of doctrines absent from primitive Christian eschatology, but prevalent in later ages of the Church, e.g. purgatory (Vis. Pauli, 22), or prayers for the dead (Test. Abr. 14). But these, again, scarcely fall within our present scope.

III. THE JOHANNINE TYPE OF EARLY CHRISTIAN ESCHATOLOGY.—The Gospel and Epistles traditionally ascribed to St. John so far resemble each other in their eschatological outlook that for our purpose it seems best to consider them together, as expressing a distinctive type of eschatology (see A. E. Brooke, The Johannine Epistles [ICC, 1912], Introd., p. xxi). As illustrations of the history of Christian doctrine, the Johannine Epistles are easier to interpret than the Gospel, because in the latter it is often exceedingly difficult to differentiate between the purely historical element, based upon the teaching of our Lord Himself, and the 'Johannine' element, due to the Evangelist. But since the eschatology in both Gospel and Epistles partakes of the same 'tone,' which is not found (to the same extent) elsewhere in the NT, it seems reasonable to attribute this distinctive element to the writer in both cases, although not therefore denying the likelihood that it may be indirectly due to our Lord's own teaching and influence. The chief points to note are:

1. The 'spirituality' of the teaching.—'Spirituality' is perhaps the best word to describe the distinctive characteristic of the Johannine eschatology. It bears the impress of a mind retentive of traditional forms of belief, but not content with the surface-meaning of current teaching. The old phraseology is not rejected; but it is regarded as a parable, half concealing and half revealing the deep spiritual truths over which the writer had pondered in the hours of meditation. The signs of foreign influence in the Johannine writings are very slight; the signs of the inner working of the writer's mind are very marked indeed. Hence we find the following characteristics:

(a) The Jewish phraseology retained.—The 'dramatic setting' of Jewish eschatology is as vividly displayed in the Johannine writings as in any part of the NT. Our Lord is portrayed as the Messianic 'Son of Man,' who has 'descended out of heaven' (Jn 3<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>38, 42</sup> 8<sup>23, 58</sup>); who is the Messianic Judge (Jn 5-2<sup>27</sup>); who has returned to heaven (Jn 6<sup>62</sup> 20<sup>17</sup>), and thence as glorified Messiah pours out the Spirit on His disciples (Jn 7<sup>39</sup>); and who will one day come again (Jn 21<sup>22</sup>). His Return will be preceded by the Messianic woes (Jn 15<sup>20</sup> 16<sup>2, 33</sup>, etc.), by the Coming of Antichrist (1 Jn 2-4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>7</sup>), and by the general Resurrection (Jn 5-8<sup>5</sup>); and will be followed by the Last Judgment (Jn 12<sup>48</sup>). The writer of the Epistles believes he is living in 'the last hour'—i.e. the 'interim' between the First and Second Comings of the Lord (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>). In the Gospel the time of the Return seems more distant; e.g. in Jn 14 and 15 the instructions given do not suggest a very brief 'interim' on earth.

(b) The inner meaning of eschatology emphasized.—Although the Johannine eschatology so far agrees with the normal Jewish doctrine, there is a difference. The writer does not seem to regard this 'dramatic eschatology' merely as a prediction of coming events, but rather as a parable or illustration of great spiritual principles, which are continuously at work in all history, albeit specially manifest in the spiritual experiences of Christians. In this sense, the Johannine eschatology may be called 'timeless'; the Resurrection, the Judgment, the Coming, are always taking place, though they will attain their consummation at the Last Crisis (cf. Brooke, The Johannine Epistles, p. 37). Speculations regarding the time of the Second Coming are discouraged (Jn 21<sup>2</sup>). The gift of eternal life in the present (Jn 3<sup>36</sup> 11<sup>25</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>) tends to displace the dramatic picture of 'entering into the Kingdom' at the Last Day, while spiritual union with Christ at once endows the believer potentially with the resurrection-privilege, which, to the Jew, was as yet in the unexperienced future (Jn 6<sup>39-54</sup> 7<sup>37</sup> 11<sup>25</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>).

Again, while the word 'Antichrist' (1 Jn 2<sup>22</sup>, etc.) is taken from Jewish apocalyptic, the idea is completely 'spiritualized'—so much so that commentators have found it most difficult to be certain what the writer himself intended to signify by the term. Broadly, it appears here to designate the spirit of evil in its most dangerous form, and, in particular, the danger which came from perverted ideas concerning the Person of our Lord (1 Jn 2-2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>7</sup>). Throughout, the writer makes us feel that, while he uses Jewish phraseology, he is not enslaved to it. He realizes the folly of idle speculations regarding the future (cf. Jn 21<sup>2</sup>); he feels the need for reverence and restraint; yet he is sure that Heaven will not fall short of our deepest spiritual experiences, nor of the highest ideals we have known—'Beloved, it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is.'

(c) Apparent paradoxes.—Hence the paradoxical nature of the Johannine eschatology; the writer feels that the whole truth is beyond the grasp of the human mind, and he sets forth first one aspect, then another, prepared to appear inconsistent rather than one-sided. Our Lord's First Coming, e.g., was not for the Judgment (Jn 3<sup>37</sup>), yet it was a judgment (Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>39</sup> 12<sup>31</sup>); the hour of the general resurrection is still to come (Jn 5-8<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>40</sup>), yet the resurrection is a fact of Christian experience in the past (Jn 5<sup>21</sup> 24), and this latter is the more important of the two truths (Jn 11<sup>23-26</sup>).

2. The place of the sacraments in the Johannine doctrine of salvation.—Schweitzer has recently maintained that in the Fourth Gospel the sacraments are regarded as the normal channel by which eternal life is bestowed on the believer (Paul and his Interpreters, pp. 200-203). 'The elements of the Lord's Supper, . . . being the flesh and blood of the Son of Man, possess the capacity of being vehicles of the Spirit. As a combination of matter and Spirit which can be communicated to the corporeity of men, they execute judgment. The elect can in the sacrament become partakers of that spiritual substance, and can thus be prepared for the resurrection' (p. 200). And Christ, we are told, taught 'that in the future, water, in association with the Spirit, would be necessary to life and blessedness. . . . Jesus came into the world to introduce the era of effectual sacraments' (p. 202 f.). This theory, if true, would introduce into the scheme of Johannine eschatology a factor which has commonly been supposed to be of later origin in the history of the Church.

Certain passages may seem to lend themselves conveniently to this theory: e.g. Jn 3<sup>35</sup> 6<sup>41-53</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>8</sup>, and the use in the Johannine Epistles of phraseology suggestive of the Mysteries (e.g. χρισμα in 1 Jn 2<sup>20, 27</sup>; ἀντίσω in 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>); but they are far from conclusive. On the other hand, we find many passages where the gift of 'eternal life' is described simply as a free gift received by faith, without any mention of a sacramental medium (Jn 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>36</sup> 6<sup>47</sup>); and the idea that eternal life is normally bestowed by sacraments seems distinctly contrary to such passages as Jn 3<sup>8</sup>: 'The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the voice thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit'; or Jn 6<sup>63</sup>: 'the words that I speak unto you are spirit and are life' (cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup> 'the word of life'). In these passages the gift of eternal life is conveyed through the influence of Christ's personality upon the human mind, either by the spoken word or by some unseen method, not through a visible ceremonial act. And in the Johannine Epistles 'eternal life' has a strong ethical content (1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>); it is 'in Christ' (1 Jn 5<sup>11, 20</sup>; cf. 2<sup>5</sup>), but no reference is made in this connexion to the sacraments.

Under the circumstances, it seems that Schweitzer's theory of 'eschatological sacraments' in the Fourth Gospel is not supported by the evidence.

3. The later history of the Johannine type of early Christian eschatology.—Just as there is no real parallel in the sub-apostolic literature to the Johannine books of the NT, so there is no real parallel to the Johannine eschatology—at least, none worthy to be compared with it for width of outlook and depth of feeling. Generally, the traditional eschatology is interpreted very literally, even prosaically. But the emphasis on the spiritual significance of eschatology recurs wherever the writers show signs of deep meditation on the problems of life. In the Pauline Epistles we shall meet with a similar tendency in places. In the Odes of Solomon it is very noticeable (see e.g. Odes iii. and xv.), and in the Alexandrian Fathers an allegorical interpretation of eschatology is found (e.g. Clement, Exhort. ad Gentes, 9), which, though widely different from the Johannine doctrine, resembles it in so far as it seeks to go behind the purely chronological aspect of eschatology.

IV. THE PAULINE TYPE OF EARLY CHRISTIAN ESCHATOLOGY, AND THE ESCHATOLOGY OF THE GENTILE-CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.—1. The eschatology of St. Paul.—In view of the trend of recent criticism, it seems reasonable to accept as a working hypothesis the view that all the 'Pauline' Epistles of the NT are genuine letters of the Apostle, though in the case of the Pastoral Epistles the verdict can hardly be regarded as decisive. This long series of letters is of unique value as an illustration of the history of early Christian doctrine, as taught by one of its greatest exponents. Several problems of considerable importance demand consideration in connexion with St. Paul's eschatology.

(1) The development of thought in St. Paul's Epistles.—Several recent writers, approaching the subject from widely different standpoints, have urged that the supposed change in St. Paul's outlook as time went on is mainly a phantom of the critical imagination (e.g. Schweitzer, Paul and his Interpreters, p. 75f.; S. N. Rostron, The Christology of St. Paul, 1912, pp. 23-28). To the present writer, however, the signs of a real development of doctrine are unmistakable, if the Epistles are studied broadly in their generally accepted chronological order. The divergence of opinion regarding the date of Galatians—before or after the Thessalonian Epistles—does not seriously affect the problem, because Gal. is dominated by one problem of immediate urgency, and does not deal at length with other topics, such as eschatology. In Gal. the supreme emphasis is laid on moral virtues, faith and love (5<sup>6</sup>; cf. 2<sup>10</sup> 3-26); neither 'dramatic eschatology' nor 'eschatological sacraments' receive any detailed notice. But if we study the rest of the Pauline Epistles under the four main groups—(a) 1 and 2 Thess.; (b) 1 and 2 Cor., Rom.; (c) Col., Eph., Phil.; (d) 1 and 2 Tim., Tit.—the outlines of St. Paul's change of standpoint seem clear beyond doubt.

(a) 1 and 2 Thessalonians.—In these Epistles the outlook is as purely and consistently Judæo-Christian as in the earlier chapters of Acts. The hope of an immediate Second Coming of the Lord holds the front place in the interests of both St. Paul and his readers. The 'wrath' of the Last Crisis is impending (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> 2<sup>16</sup>); the Christians are waiting for the Son of Man to descend on the clouds of heaven, while they are yet alive on earth (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>13-18</sup> 5<sup>1-11</sup>, 23, 2 Th 1<sup>3-10</sup> 2<sup>1-11</sup>). The language which St. Paul uses in these Epistles to describe the Second Coming is such as any Jewish apocalypticist who accepted the Messiahship of Jesus might have used; there is no trace of Gentile influence, and he himself expects to be 'in the body' at the time of the Return (1 Th 4<sup>17</sup>; cf. 5<sup>23</sup>). Again, the eschatological problems discussed in these Epistles are such as would present themselves to Jewish minds; and St. Paul answers the difficulties as a Jew speaking to Jews. The problem of the faithful departed (1 Th 4<sup>13-18</sup>) was one that inevitably arose as soon as some of the 'brethren' had died before the Lord returned. How would they be enabled to share in the joy of the Parousia? St. Paul's answer is that they will be raised in time to join in the Lord's Coming (1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>). That such a question should have already come to the front is significant, because it marks perhaps the earliest of the many perplexities which arose in the minds of the faithful when the Lord did not return at once, and when consequently the simple scheme of the primitive Christian eschatology no longer sufficed to solve every difficulty. The gradual change of doctrinal outlook which resulted from this affected the whole Church, and there is no reason to doubt that St. Paul himself was influenced by it.

In 2 Thess. the perplexity caused by the delay has become much graver, and St. Paul counsels patience. Again he adopts a thoroughly Jewish line of argument: his language still implies that the Return will be comparatively soon; but he reminds his readers that certain of the 'signs of the end' have not yet been fulfilled; and these must precede the final consummation. The 'signs' which he mentions are: (a) the falling away (ἡ ἀποστασία, 2 Th 2<sup>3</sup>), (β) the revealing of the Man of Sin (2 Th 2<sup>3f.</sup> 7-9), (γ) the taking away of 'the Restrainer' (ὁ κατέχων, or τὸ κατέχον, 2 Th 2<sup>6</sup>). St. Paul implies that he is speaking of ideas familiar to his readers (2 Th 2<sup>5f.</sup>), and similar phrases are found in the descriptions of the signs of the end in the Jewish apocalypses; e.g. an 'apostasy' is part of the Messianic woes in Jubilees, 23; Test. XII. Patr. (Levi 10, Dan 5), etc. Again, the description of the 'Man of Sin' offers close parallels to the figure of Antichrist (alias 'Beliar' or Satan) in many of the apocalypses (e.g. in the contemporary writings of the Ap. Bar. xxxix. and 4 Ezra v. 6, and also in the later Christian apocalypses, notably Asc. Is. iii. and iv., and Sib. Oracles [see above]). (For fuller details, see article MAN OF SIN, and Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, pp. 207-221.) For the 'taking away of the Restrainer' it is not easy to find an exact parallel in Jewish apocalyptic; but from Daniel onwards we find that the close of a dynasty is often regarded as one of the signs of the end; and so the use of ὁ κατέχων might well suggest to St. Paul's readers the idea of Imperial Rome, whose downfall would surely mark the close of a world-epoch. The important point to realize is that in this passage, so obscure to us, St. Paul is not inventing a new doctrine of the Last Things, but is taking familiar phrases and ideas and applying them to the problems which were then confronting the Christian community.

Thus the characteristic of 1 and 2 Thess. is that the eschatology is the 'central' theme, and is completely Judæo-Christian in form. At the same time, it is closely linked with moral teaching (1 Th 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>3-8</sup>, etc.); and this practical aspect of St. Paul's eschatology (which in this respect is in complete accord with that of our Lord) remains unchanged throughout all his writings.

(b) 1 and 2 Corinthians, Romans (and perhaps Galatians).—In these Epistles, which form the second group of Pauline writings, the Jewish form of eschatology is still prominent, especially in 1 Corinthians. The Christians addressed are 'waiting for the apocalypse of our Lord' (1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>), which is near at hand (Ro 13<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>29, 31</sup>), and will be associated with the Resurrection (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>) and the Judgment (1 Co 4<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, Ro 2<sup>16</sup>). All this resembles 1 and 2 Thess.; yet the eschatology no longer occupies the centre of interest in these Epistles; other themes receive a larger share of attention. The spiritual gifts which the Christians possessed, and the spiritual power which had transformed their lives, begin to claim a pre-eminent place; and phrases originally eschatological are adopted to describe spiritual experiences in the past and present; e.g. 2 Co 1<sup>10</sup>, ὅς . . . ἐρρύσασθε ἡμᾶς, καὶ σώσεισθε (cf. 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>16f.</sup> 5<sup>17</sup>). And in Romans we see how 'justification,' which is properly an eschatological term (signifying the act by which the Messianic Judge pronounces the believer 'not guilty' at the Great Judgment [Ro 2<sup>13-16</sup>]), is becoming weaned from its old associations. For St. Paul teaches that the believer who has faith is pronounced 'not guilty' here and now, in anticipation of the final verdict; and so 'justification' becomes severed from eschatology, and linked with the spiritual experience known to Christians as 'the sense of forgiveness' or 'assurance' (cf. Ro 5<sup>1</sup>, etc.).

In this group of Epistles we also see signs of Gentile influence, modifying the Jewish methods of thought. In dealing with the Resurrection, St. Paul uses a distinctly non-Jewish line of argument (see below), and his vision of the final consummation (Ro 11<sup>25f.</sup>, etc.) is far wider than that current in Jewish circles. Moreover, in 1 Co 15<sup>2-23</sup> St. Paul teaches that a 'kingdom of Christ' on earth must precede the final consummation when 'he shall deliver the kingdom to God, even the Father' (15<sup>-4</sup>; cf. the Parable of the Tares, Mt 13<sup>41-43</sup>). Such a conception implies that the certainty of an immediate coming of the end is being abandoned.

(c) Colossians, Ephesians, Philippians.—In this group of St. Paul's letters we find the modifying tendencies noted above still further developed. The 'dramatic' eschatology, though still present (Col 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>, Ph 1<sup>6</sup> 10 3<sup>0</sup>, Eph 4<sup>30</sup>), has receded still further from the central position it held in 1 and 2 Thess., and the use of eschatological terms in a non-eschatological sense becomes more and more frequent (Col 1<sup>13</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>, Eph 1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>51</sup>, etc.). There is no distinct assertion that the Return is near at hand (it may be implied, Ph 3<sup>20</sup>); and some passages suggest that a prolonged future lies before the Church on earth (e.g. 'the building up of the body of Christ,' Eph 4<sup>11-15</sup>; and the ingathering of the Gentiles, Eph 2 and 3). In such passages St. Paul's thoughts seem to be far from the normal tone of Jewish apocalyptic.

(d) The Pastoral Epistles.—Here eschatology appears to rise once more into greater prominence; but it is not quite the same as before. The earlier Christian eschatology had sprung from enthusiastic hopes: 'The Last Days have come, because Messiah has appeared.' But in the Pastoral Epistles the message is sadder, and more like that of the Jewish apocalyptists: 'The Last Days are at hand, because the times are evil' (1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>1-5</sup> 4<sup>1-8</sup>). There is a note of disappointment, as the Apostle speaks of prevalent apostasy (2 Ti 2<sup>16</sup>), which accords well with the supposition that these Epistles were written in a period of spiritual reaction, when the early hopes were being strained by the prolonged delay. Under such circumstances, it was necessary to guard against one-sided doctrines of the resurrection (2 Ti 2<sup>18</sup>) and to emphasize the objectivity of the Last Things (1 Ti 6<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1-8</sup>, Tit 1-).

A broad survey of the Pauline Epistles thus shows that the Apostle's eschatological teaching underwent considerable modification in the course of time, from the somewhat conventional Jewish outlook of 1 and 2 Thess. to the broad and deep spiritual teaching of Eph.; and finally, in the Pastoral Epistles, we see signs of a renewed emphasis upon old truths which were in danger of being obscured.

(2) St. Paul's doctrine of Judgment, Intermediate State, Resurrection, Final Destinies.—(a) Judgment.—The 'dramatic' conception of the Judgment recurs frequently in the Pauline Epistles (2 Th 1<sup>4</sup>, Ro 2<sup>5</sup> 9<sup>-16</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>), but there are very few signs of the Johannine idea of a continuous judgment-process being worked out in history. The Judgment is to be universal (1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>); but the Christian is free from condemnation (Ro 8<sup>1-33</sup>), and indeed has already been 'justified' (see above).

(b) The Intermediate State.—As long as St. Paul expected the Return in the immediate future, there was no logical place for any thought of the Intermediate State of the 'dead in Christ.' Probably St. Paul, like many Jews, believed in a 'waiting-place' for the faithful souls of former generations, who had been evangelized by the 'Descent into Hell' (Eph 4<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>). But the Christian, when he departs, will be 'with Christ' (Ph 1<sup>23</sup>)—a phrase scarcely applicable to an 'Intermediate State' (cf. 2 Co 5<sup>1-10</sup>). If (as seems most probable) Onesiphorus was dead when 2 Ti 1<sup>18</sup> was written, St. Paul did not scruple to pray for the dead. Yet such a prayer is but the instinctive act of a spiritually-minded man, to whom friendship is a bond too strong to be severed by death; and it would be unwise to deduce from it that St. Paul held a reasoned-out theory concerning the possibility of moral change in the life to come, to say nothing of a clear-cut doctrine of 'purgatory.'

(c) The Resurrection.—To the Jews a doctrine of the resurrection did not appear strange, though the question 'In what shape shall the dead rise?' is found, e.g. in Apoc. Baruch, xlix. 2. But among the Gentiles, even where a belief in immortality was present, a resurrection was incredible (Ac 26<sup>8</sup>). So, as long as St. Paul 'spoke as a Jew,' he simply affirmed the resurrection without comment (e.g. 1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>); but, when he had to commend the gospel to educated Gentiles, a new line of argument became necessary, such as we find in 1 and 2 Corinthians. A brief outline of the famous passages 1 Co 15, 2 Co 4 and 5 is all that can be attempted here. The chief points to note are: (a) he bases the Christian hope on the historical fact of Christ's Resurrection (1 Co 15<sup>4-11</sup>); (β) he argues from the analogy of the seed (1 Co 15<sup>36</sup>)—an argument which would appeal to the Gentile no less than to the Jew; (γ) he teaches an upward movement in history (1 Co 15<sup>46</sup>), implying that the resurrection-life will be no mere replica of this life, but something higher and greater; (δ) the resurrection-body will not be 'flesh and blood' (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>), but a 'spiritual' body (1 Co 15<sup>44</sup>). Herein St. Paul differs alike from the materialistic conception of the resurrection and from the Gentile idea that the soul at death is freed from the encumbrance of a body. In some passages St. Paul does indeed seem to disparage the body (2 Co 5<sup>6</sup>); but he clearly teaches that the highest ideal is not to be stripped of the body, and lead a bodiless existence (which would render self-expression unthinkable), but rather to be 'clothed upon' with a higher type of body, adapted to be the organ through which the 'ego' may fully express itself in the 'spiritual' sphere of existence (2 Co 5<sup>-4</sup>; cf. 1 Co 3<sup>21</sup>). This 'transformation' of our mode of life is to take place at the Last Day (1 Co 15<sup>51</sup>); yet the spiritual transformation of the believer in this present life is described in similar language (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>); and indeed the two are not irreconcilable, for the last-named is an 'earnest' of the future resurrection (cf. Ph 3<sup>10</sup>, 11, 2 Ti 2<sup>18</sup>).

The Chiliastic doctrine of a reign of Christ on earth, in an intervening period between a 'first' and 'second' Resurrection (cf. Rev 20<sup>5-15</sup>), does not appear in St. Paul; the 'reign of Christ' in 1 Co 15<sup>-5</sup> is far more applicable to the working of Christ through the Church, which was in progress when St. Paul wrote.

Whether St. Paul believed in a general resurrection of all men seems doubtful; some passages (e.g. Ro 8<sup>11</sup>) suggest that the resurrection is conditional upon the possession of the Spirit of Christ; but since he taught that the judgment is to be universal, we may perhaps infer that the scope of the resurrection will be co-extensive.

(d) Final destinies.—Normally St. Paul adopts the usual view that the wicked go to 'eternal destruction' and the believers to 'eternal life' (2 Co 2<sup>15</sup>, etc.); but the latter aspect receives much greater emphasis than the former. The thought of the 'unendingness' of final destinies is not prominent in the Pauline Epistles; sometimes the word αἰώνιος seems used to express intensity rather than interminable duration (e.g. 'eternal destruction,' 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, or 'an eternal weight of glory,' 2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>). There are some passages where St. Paul's words suggest the hope of the final salvation of all men (1 Co 15<sup>-3</sup>; cf. Ro 11<sup>36</sup>). Such a conclusion seems naturally to follow from the infinite love of God; but it is hard to reconcile with the fact of human sin.

(3) The influence of Gentile thought upon St. Paul's eschatology.—(a) Greek influence.—On this subject various views are held: some contend that 'the eschatological views of Paul mark a transition from purely Jewish to Hellenistic notions' (P. Gardner, The Religious Experience of St. Paul, 1911, p. 126); others will scarcely admit the possibility of any Gentile influence, and maintain that St. Paul, from first to last, lived and spoke and wrote as a Jew (Schweitzer, Paul and his Interpreters, pp. 94, 227, 240, etc.). On the whole, the change which came over St. Paul's theology seems explicable simply as the natural development of an active mind constantly reconsidering the problems of Christian experience. On the other hand, St. Paul's avowed championship of the rights of Gentile Christianity may well have led him to be favourably inclined to Gentile ideas, and to loosen his affection for purely Jewish methods of thought. But the actual proofs of non-Jewish ideas are to be seen in the gradual modification of his teaching to which we have referred above, rather than in the presence of distinctively Hellenic language. The latter may perhaps be seen in the depreciation of the body (2 Co 5<sup>2-6</sup>), in the description of transformation (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>; cf. Seneca, Ep. vii. 1, 'non emendari tantum, sed transfigurari'), in the comparison of the body to an earthen vessel (2 Co 4<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>), and in the distinction between the ἐξω ἄνθρωπος and the εσω ἄνθρωπος (2 Co 4<sup>16</sup>; see Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its non-Jewish Sources, p. 68 ff.). But, in so far as Greek influence is visible in these passages, it is rather due to unconscious than to conscious borrowing (ib. p. 204).

(b) Influence of the Oriental cults.—Apart from the Mysteries (see below), these exercised very little influence on St. Paul's eschatology. The idea of being 'clothed upon' (2 Co 5<sup>12</sup>) is perhaps derived from Parsiism (Clemen, op. cit. p. 174), and other parallels have been traced; but they may be mere coincidences (ib. pp. 171-198).

(c) The influence of the Mysteries upon St. Paul's eschatology.—The Mysteries claimed to make men partakers of immortality, by means of initiatory rites and ceremonies, through which a 'sacramental grace' was conveyed to the worshippers (see Cumont, Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism, pp. 91 f., 151). It has recently been maintained (e.g. in Lake's Earlier Epistles of St. Paul) that Christianity was commonly regarded among the Gentiles as 'a superior kind of Mystery-Religion,' and that, to them, its central message was the promise of eternal life given through the Christian Sacraments. Thus the Sacraments were intimately connected with eschatology, and the Gentile-Christian gospel, like the Jewish-Christian gospel, was essentially eschatological. But there was this distinction between the two types of Christianity: 'to the average Gentile Christian in, for instance, Corinth . . . the centre of Christianity was the Sacraments. . . . On the other hand, for a Jewish Christian, the expectation of the Parousia was probably quite central' (Lake, op. cit. p. 437). Of St. Paul's own view Lake says: 'Baptism is, for St. Paul and his readers, universally and unquestioningly accepted as a "mystery" or sacrament which works ex opere operato' (op. cit. p. 385).

Schweitzer, in Paul and his Interpreters, adopts a line of argument which is somewhat different; but his conclusions as to the substance of St. Paul's teaching show some notable points of resemblance to Lake's view. Though he utterly denies the possibility that St. Paul was influenced by Greek thought or by the Mysteries (op. cit. pp. 208, 240, etc.), yet he affirms that the Apostle held a doctrine of 'eschatological sacraments' which, after all, would make the sacraments not unlike the rites of a 'Mystery.' 'In Paul we find the most prosaic conception imaginable of the opus operatum' (p. 213). 'Everywhere in the Pauline sacraments the eschatological interest breaks through. . . . Their power is derived from the events of the last times. They put believers in the same position as the Lord, in that they cause them to experience a resurrection a few world-moments before the time, even though this does not in any way become manifest. It is a precursory phenomenon of the approaching end of the world. . . . The sacraments are confined to the time between the resurrection of Jesus and His parousia, when the dead shall arise' (p. 216 f.). During this 'interim' period, the present world-era and the world to come are 'in contact,' and only while this contact lasts can men pass by means of the sacraments from one world to the other (p. 224). Similarly, of St. Paul's doctrine of baptism he says: 'The dying and rising again of Christ takes place in him without any co-operation, or exercise of will or thought, on his part. It is like a mechanical process' (p. 225 f.). This doctrine of 'eschatological sacraments' can be understood, according to Schweitzer, 'entirely on the basis of Jewish primitive Christianity' (p. 240). On the other hand, Clemen (Primitive Christianity and its non-Jewish Sources, p. 266) affirms that 'it is simply false to say "that baptism as well as the Lord's Supper already within the books of the NT underwent the fateful transformation from symbolic act to sacramentum efficax." But, if St. Paul's teaching is rightly interpreted either by Lake or by Schweitzer, it would follow that the doctrine of the sacraments was a more important factor in early Christian eschatology—and indeed, in early Christianity at large—than has commonly been supposed.

An adequate discussion of the problem thus raised is impossible here; but one or two points may be noted:

(a) St. Paul certainly associates baptism with 'death' and 'resurrection' (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>), and with the reception of the Spirit (1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>). But, while these passages, and certain others regarding the Eucharist (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>27-30</sup>), may be consistent with Schweitzer's theory of 'effectual sacraments,' they are also explicable on the view that St. Paul is regarding the rite as the symbol of grace conferred—a symbol normally linked with the spiritual gift, but not so necessary that without the rite the gift cannot be conveyed, nor yet mechanically conveying the gift ex opere operato. In one of the above passages (Col 2<sup>12</sup>) the context (21<sup>4</sup>) is full of highly metaphorical language. From these passages we are driven to conclude that the theory of a Pauline doctrine of 'effectual sacraments' is 'Not proven.'

(β) But, further, there are other passages where St. Paul's arguments are definitely against the view that sacraments convey the new life ex opere operato. In 1 Co 8<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>14-32</sup> he clearly teaches that the effect of partaking in a communion-feast is dependent on the state of mind of the recipient. The partaking becomes serious if it arouses uneasy doubt in the mind of the 'weaker brother' who witnesses his act; but, apart from this possibility, and if the recipient is clear in his own conscience, the partaking will have no effect ex opere operato. The argument here refers to non-Christian 'sacraments,' but it is consistent with the Apostle's general attitude towards external rites and ceremonies: 'In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith working through love' (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>; cf. 6<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>2</sup>, etc.). The omission of any reference to the Christian sacraments in such passages would be strange indeed, if the future salvation of the Christian was normally conveyed to him only through baptism and the Eucharist.

(γ) The references to the sacraments in St. Paul's Epistles, viewed as a whole, are hardly sufficient to warrant the theory that the sacraments held a central place in his theology. Lake contends that this silence shows that the importance of the sacraments was universally accepted in the Church, and needed no further emphasis (op. cit. p. 233 n.). But we may reasonably ask for some positive evidence that the sacraments had already sprung into a position of central importance in the Church, before we set aside the 'argument from silence.' 1 Co 11<sup>4</sup>, 'I thank God that I baptized none of you,' does not suggest that St. Paul put baptism in the place of central importance in the gospel.

(δ) When Schweitzer tells us that St. Paul 'found already existing a baptism and a Lord's Supper which guaranteed salvation' (op. cit. p. 215; cf. p. 242), and that his doctrine of the sacraments 'is integrally, simply, and exclusively eschatological' (p. 244), we may reasonably ask what evidence is forthcoming from the Jewish apocalypses to justify such assertions. Schweitzer adduces no such evidence; nor is the present writer acquainted with any.

We conclude, then, that the evidence does not support the theory that the primitive Church as a whole believed that eternal life was conveyed normally by the sacraments, but rather that it was a free gift received immediately by faith. At the same time, it is likely enough that the less educated Christians did regard Christianity as a kind of Mystery-Religion, with sacraments of a magical character. The obscure custom of 'baptism for the dead' may have been associated with some such ideas (1 Co 15<sup>29</sup>), but it does not appear that they were shared by St. Paul, or by any of the NT writers. (For a careful discussion of this subject, see Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its non-Jewish Sources, pp. 223-250.)

2. The eschatology of the early Gentile-Christian churches.—(1) The fruit of St. Paul's teaching.—St. Paul may fairly be regarded as the precursor of a Gentile type of Christian eschatology; for, although the instances of definitely Greek ideas in his writings are but few, he was in sympathy with non-Jewish ways of approaching the problems of life, and he was the champion of Gentile claims within the Church of Christ. Without his efforts Gentile thought would have been debarred from having free scope in the Church. But in the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic Ages, as we trace the doctrine of the Last Things through Clement of Rome, Ignatius, 2 Clement, Aristides, and Justin, down to Irenæus at the close of the 2nd cent., there is but little evidence of a distinctively Gentile type of Christian eschatology. Jewish ideas and phraseology show no signs of disappearing entirely; and indeed Christian eschatology is never likely to lose all traces of its Jewish antecedents.

(2) Distinctive features of Gentile-Christian eschatology.—Yet the following changes may be attributed in great measure to the influence of Gentile thought. (a) The technical Jewish terms are replaced by others of a more 'prosaic' character: e.g. in Clem. ad Cor. we find the Return described as an ἐλευσις (17) rather than as a παρουσία or an ἀποκάλυψις. And in Ignatius the term 'Parousia' is applied to the First Coming of our Lord at His Nativity (ad Phil. 9). Such changes show that the traditional Jewish scheme is undergoing a measure of 're-statement' at the hands of men who were unaccustomed to the apocalyptic scheme of the Last Things.

(b) Occasionally we meet with clear signs of Greek thought, e.g. Ign. ad Rom. 3, 'Nothing visible is good.' And some thirty years later we find the Epistle to Diognetus reflecting a thoroughly Greek theory of the relation of the soul to the body (7, 10).

(c) The conception of the Eucharist as a 'Mystery,' through which immortality is conveyed to the believer, though (as we have contended above) not sanctioned by St. Paul himself, seems to be implied in some of the sub-apostolic writings: e.g. Ign. ad Eph. 20, 'Breaking one bread, which is the medicine of immortality, and the antidote that we should not die, but live for ever'; cf. Iren. adv. Hær. iv. 8, 'Our bodies, when they receive the Eucharist, are no longer corruptible, having the hope of resurrection to eternity.'

(d) The idea that 'salvation' is a future blessing, to be gained by external acts, or by membership of an organized society, may also be traced to the sub-Apostolic Age: e.g. Ign. ad Phil. 3, 'If any man followeth one that maketh a schism, he doth not inherit the Kingdom of God.'

As a result of these and other modifications, early Christian eschatology in the Gentile churches gradually assumed a form which, though Jewish in phraseology, was sufficiently intelligible to those who were not familiar with the presupposition of Jewish apocalyptic. With the exception of a few doctrinal features, such as Chiliasm, which proved to be but temporary phases of thought, the eschatology of the Church of the 2nd. cent., as seen, e.g., in Irenæus, had discarded its distinctively 'primitive' characteristics, and was not far from the normal type of Christian eschatology as it has been taught in subsequent ages of the Church.

The two last-named works apply the 'Consistent Eschatological theory' to the apostolic writings.

ESDRAS, THE SECOND BOOK OF.—This book is quite different in character from 1 Es., which it follows in the English Apocrypha. It belongs to the apocalyptic order, and is closely related in time and thought to the Apocalypse of Baruch (q.v.). Some early writers cite it as prophetic—Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 16) and Ambrose (de Excessu Satyri, i. 64, 66, 68, 69) in particular; but Jerome speaks slightly of it as a book he had not read or required to read, because it was not received in the Church (c. Vigilant. ch. 6). In the authenticated edition of the Vulgate, it is relegated to an appendix, along with 1 Es. and the Prayer of Manasses. It is not reckoned canonical by the Church of Rome, nor is it used in the English Church.

1. Contents.—As it stands in our Apocrypha, 2 Es. consists of 16 chapters; but the first two and last two are separate works which have been added to the original book, and have no inward connexion with it. The prefixed chapters (1. 2), though written in the name of Esdras, exhibit an anti-Jewish spirit, in striking contrast to that of the chapters that follow. They speak of the rejection of the Jews and the call of the Gentiles as a Western Christian of the 2nd cent. might have done. A connexion has been suggested between them and the Apocalypse of Zephaniah, of which fragments are extant in Coptic. The subjoined chapters (15. 16) make no mention of Esdras, and their contents are colourless enough to admit of either a Jewish or a Christian author. In imitation of Jeremiah's prophecies, they predict wars and tumults, denounce God's wrath on the wicked, and encourage the righteous to endure. The probable quotation of 16<sup>59</sup> in Ep. xxix. of Ambrose—'extendit coelum sicut cameram'—would indicate that these chapters were known in the middle of the 4th century. Possibly they had their origin about a century previously, in the wars of the Arabian Odenathus and Sapor I. of Persia.

Divested of these additions, 2 Es. is a series of seven visions, separated for the most part, in the experience of the seer, by periods of fasting and prayer. Their purpose is to shed light on the mysteries of the moral world, and restore the faith in God and reliance on His justice which had been shaken by the downfall of Jerusalem. At the outset the seer announces himself as Salathiel, with the parenthetical explanation that he is also Esdras. In the first four visions (chs. 3-10) the angel Uriel appears, to resolve the doubts of the seer, and comfort him with the hope of God's speedy intervention. In the fifth (chs. 11, 12) a great eagle is seen, with three heads, twelve wings, and certain wings of smaller size. She is encountered and annihilated by a lion, and Esdras learns that the eagle is the fourth kingdom of Daniel, and the lion the Messiah. The sixth vision (ch. 13) reveals the Messiah as a wondrous man, coming out of the sea, destroying His enemies, and gathering the righteous and peace-loving to Himself. In the seventh (ch. 14) Esdras is warned that the end is near, and instructed to have ninety-four books written, but only to publish twenty-four of them (the usual Talmudic reckoning of the books of the OT). On the accomplishment of his task, Esdras is translated to heaven.

2. Text and versions.—The original text no longer exists; but versions are extant in Latin, Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic (two), and Armenian. Some fragments in Sahidic have also come to light (in 1904), and traces have been found of an old Georgian translation. The Latin version is in every respect the most important, as well as the only one which contains the four additional chapters. It was through this version that the book found its way into the appendix of the Vulgate, and thence into our Apocrypha. The Oriental versions are of value chiefly for the assistance they afford in testing and correcting the Latin. A curious illustration of their usefulness in this way was given by Bensly in 1875, when he discovered a missing fragment of the Latin text consisting of 70 verses, the existence of which had been suggested by the presence of these verses in the Oriental versions. This long passage has now been restored to its place in our Apocrypha, between verses 35 and 36 of the seventh chapter. The basis of all the existing versions, with the possible exception of the Armenian, is generally acknowledged to be a Greek text, now lost; but some difference of opinion has arisen as to whether that was the original text. While the more prevalent view that the book was composed in Greek has found such defenders as Lücke, Volkmar, and Hilgenfeld, some recent scholars, including Wellhausen, Charles, Gunkel, and Box, contend for a Hebrew original.

Some confusion of nomenclature has been caused by the varying titles of the versions. The Latin MSS mostly distinguish five books of Ezra: the first being the canonical Ezra-Nehemiah, the second the prefixed chapters of 2 Es., the third the 1 Es. of the Apocrypha, the fourth chs. 3-14 of 2 Es., and the fifth its subjoined chapters. According to this arrangement, our book is now commonly denominated 4 Ezra, although the title Ezra-Apocalypse, suggested by Westcott as the probable form in the lost Greek text, has also come into use.

3. Literary structure.—Of late years, the question of the literary structure of the book has assumed increasing prominence. Its essential unity, as coming from the hand of a single writer, who may, however, have used and failed to assimilate adequately material previously existing, is still maintained by such scholars as Gunkel, Porter, and Sanday. On this theory, its date is fixed with some degree of unanimity between A.D. 81 and 96, the Fall of Jerusalem, which gives occasion to it, being rightly referred to the destruction by Titus in A.D. 70, and the difficult Eagle Vision being interpreted of the succession of Roman Emperors (Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian) after that event. Another theory, however, ascribing a composite character to the book, has recently been worked out with much ingenuity by Kabisch, Charles, and Box. The last-mentioned finds five independent works in our Apocalypse: (1) a Salathiel Apocalypse (S=chs. 3-10), composed about A.D. 100; (2) the Eagle Vision (A=chs. 11, 12), belonging to the time of Domitian or possibly Vespasian; (3) the Son of Man Vision (M=ch. 13), written before A.D. 70; (4) the Ezra Legend (E<sup>2</sup>=ch. 14), dating about A.D. 100; and (5) extracts from an old Ezra Apocalypse (E), interpolated in S, and belonging to some period before A.D. 70. These separate documents were welded into a single book by a redactor (R), and published about A.D. 120. Whatever may be said for this analysis, it helps to elucidate certain features of the book which have hitherto been puzzling and obscure: divergent eschatological conceptions, varying historical situations, breaks of thought, and linguistic transitions.

4. Value and relation to NT.—On either theory, the book remains of great importance, especially for the understanding of later developments of Judaism, and the environment of the early Christian Church. A fine expression of later Judaism, it reveals a passionate clinging to the merciful goodness of God, notwithstanding a measure of disappointment with the Law, and the most disastrous experience. Its spirit may be somewhat narrow, its style not infrequently tedious, its later visions lacking in imaginative power, and its solutions of the moral problem disappointing; yet it strikes a truly reflective note, and breathes throughout an unconquerable faith in God and the vindication of His righteousness. In these characteristics, perhaps, no less than in its unconscious admission of the weakness of Judaism, lay the strength of its appeal to Christian readers; but its present-day value is chiefly historical, as it is practically contemporaneous with the NT literature, and shows points of contact with it. Direct dependence can hardly be established, yet there are similarities of thought and language to most of the NT books, while, as Gunkel has clearly shown, there are marked affinities with the Pauline letters and the Book of Revelation.

(a) The speculations of St. Paul are closely paralleled by the discussions of moral and religious problems in the earlier part of 2 Esdras. Our author presumably belonged to the school in which the great Apostle was trained; and, especially in his treatment of sin and the weakness of the Law as a redemptive power, has much in common with him. Sin is essentially transgression of the Law, and alienates from God (2 Es 9<sup>36</sup> 7<sup>48</sup>; cf. Ro 5<sup>13</sup>, 20). Its origin is to be found in the Fall of Adam and the evil heart (cor malignum) which he has transmitted to his descendants (2 Es 7<sup>118</sup> 3<sup>20-2</sup>, 25-26 4<sup>30</sup>; cf. Ro 5<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>21</sup>). Accordingly it is universal, and has universally as its result not only spiritual corruption and infirmity, but physical death (2 Es 3<sup>7</sup>; cf. Ro 5<sup>12</sup>, 14, 15, 17, 21). In further agreement with St. Paul, and in opposition to the usual Rabbinical doctrine, our author despairs of the efficacy of the Law to redeem and save the sinner (2 Es 9<sup>36</sup>; cf. Ro 3<sup>20</sup>). Its promised rewards have little encouragement or inspiration for beings so constituted as to be unable to keep it (2 Es 7<sup>116-131</sup>). At the best, though the world is perishing, it may still be hoped that a few may be saved (9<sup>15</sup> -). It is all a puzzle and pain to the apocalypticist. Unacquainted with the great solvent ideas in which the Apostle found satisfaction for heart and mind, he resigns himself to the inscrutableness of God's ways, the limitations of human intelligence, and the pre-determined Divine purpose in the history and end of the world, while taking what comfort he may from the assurance of God's faithfulness and love to His ancient people (4<sup>7-11</sup>, 28-31, 33-43 5<sup>31-40</sup>).

This attitude of mind may not have been uncommon among the Jews of his time.

(b) The points of comparison with the Johannine Apocalypse are of an eschatological kind, and appear most prominently in the later chapters of 2 Esdras. The same visionary method of Divine revelation is pursued; the schemes of the Last Things run upon similar lines; Rome is again the hostile world-power standing in the background; and there are not wanting resemblances of diction close enough to suggest a common source (cf. 2 Es 9<sup>35</sup> and Rev 6<sup>9-11</sup>, 2 Es 4<sup>41</sup> and Rev 1<sup>18</sup>). In 2 Es., too, especially when the earlier chapters are compared with the later, an inconsistency of eschatological representation is revealed, which is reflected not only in the Book of Revelation, but in other NT books as well. Probably it attached to the current conceptions of the time, and did not greatly trouble the author or redactor of our book. In the earlier chapters, the eschatology is entirely of an individual character, concerning itself with the future of the soul, and postulating, immediately after death, a personal judgment and entrance into an eternal world of punishment and reward (7<sup>78ff.</sup>). The later chapters (11. 12) are prevailingly political, and revive the old eschatology of the nation, with its scheme of preliminary woes, world-judgment, and earthly Messianic kingdom of indefinite duration. Some attempt is made in the book to adjust these points of view by the introduction of a temporary reign of the Messiah before the final consummation, which ushers in the glorious Heavenly Kingdom. This reign seems to have been expected to compensate the nation for the years of oppression in Egypt; and, by a comparison of Gn 15<sup>13</sup> with Ps 90<sup>15</sup>, its length was fixed at 400 years (7<sup>6-30</sup>). By a similar process of inference Slavonic Enoch had determined the duration of the temporary Messianic kingdom as 1000 years, or a millennium. On this matter the Book of Revelation follows Enoch.

Withal, there are still left in 2 Es. a number of divergent ideas. At one time the Messiah is presented as a purely human being, an earthly, temporal ruler of the line of David (12<sup>32ff.</sup>); at another time he appears as a superhuman, pre-existent being, to whom the title 'Son of God' can be applied (7<sup>28</sup>, 29 13<sup>31-37</sup>, 52 14<sup>9</sup>). In some passages the Judgment is personal and individual, and takes place immediately after death (7<sup>78-101</sup>, 117. 126). In others it is universal, and reserved for a great day at the end of the world (7<sup>33</sup>, 43. 44 8<sup>1</sup>). Now the Messiah is Judge (12<sup>33-33</sup>), now God Himself (6<sup>6</sup>). Side by side with the old restricted view of a resurrection of the righteous only stands the later view of a general resurrection (7<sup>3-44</sup>), the one at the beginning, the other at the close of the Messianic period, as in the Book of Revelation. These discrepancies belonged to the environment of the early Church, and it was part of her intellectual task to combine them into a harmonious belief.

ESSENES.—The Essenes were a Jewish monastic order, probably long preceding, not long surviving, the founding of Christianity.

1. Authorities.—Essenes are not mentioned either in the NT or in the Talmud. Our chief authorities are (1) Josephus (BJ II. viii., Ant. XVIII. i. 5, XIII. v. 9, xv. x. 4 ff.); (2) Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, 12, 13); (3) Philonic fragment in Eusebius (Præp. Evang. VIII. xi.); (4) Pliny (HN v. 17, probably drawn from Alexander Polyhistor). Some additional details are to be found in the Fathers (esp. Hippolytus) who deal with Judæo-Christian heresies. Probably there is need of criticism of the main sources, but we may take them as trustworthy as to the facts adduced.

2. Name.—This occurs as Essenoi (Jos. 14 times, Hippol., Synesius); Essaioi (Philo, Hegesippus, Porphyry, Jos. 6 times); and in varying forms in Epiphanius—Ossaioi, Ossenoi, Iessaioi. For a discussion of various etymologies see Lightfoot (Colossians, 1875, p. 115 ff.). The name is best taken from Syr. hāse, in plur. absol. hasen, emphat. hasaiā; 'Essene' thus = 'pious.' For our purpose we are not concerned with giving a full account of the Order, nor with tracing its history, and speculating as to the origin of its peculiarities. We have merely to give a brief outline of its main features, and deal chiefly with the influence it exerted on the development of Christianity.

3. Organization and characteristics.—The Essenes were organized as a close Order on a basis of celibacy and absolute communism (Jos. BJ II. viii. 3 f.; Philo in Euseb. Præp. Evang. VIII. xi. 4). Josephus speaks of a branch who allowed marriage (BJ II. viii. 13), but this must have been a minority. The officials were elected, and were implicitly obeyed (II. viii. 6). The Order was recruited by voluntary adhesions, or by adopting children (viii. 2). Candidates passed through a two-stage novitiate. For a year they lived under discipline, then they were admitted to the solemn initiatory ablution which separated them from the world, and after other two years they received full privileges of table-fellowship. They bound themselves by a fearful oath to reverence God; to do justice; hurt no man voluntarily or on command; obey the officials; conceal nothing from fellow-members, and divulge nothing of their affairs even at the risk of death; be honest and humble; communicate doctrines exactly as they had been received; and preserve carefully the sacred books and the names of the angels (II. viii. 7).

For morality the Essenes ranked high. 'In fact, they had in many respects reached the very highest moral elevation attained by the ancient world' (EBR<sup>11</sup> ix. 780<sup>a</sup>). Their lives were abstemious, humble, helpful. Sensual desires were sinful; passions were restrained. Their word was as good as an oath, and they forbade swearing. Their modesty was excessive. They condemned slavery (BJ II. viii. 2, 5, 6; Philo in Euseb. Præp. Evang. VIII. xi. 11).

In devotion to the Law and in ceremonial cleansings they out-Phariseed the Pharisees. The Order was in four grades, and contact with one of a lower grade constituted a defilement. Where the Pharisee washed, the Essene bathed. Their food was carefully prepared by priests. Their sabbatarianism was extreme, and their reverence for Moses was such that they treated any disrespect to his name as blasphemy worthy of death (BJ II. viii. 9).

As to worship, they differed from normal Judaism in two important points: (a) they rejected animal sacrifice, and sent to the Temple only offerings of incense (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 5); (b) in some sense they worshipped the sun; 'daily before the rising of the sun, they address to it old traditional prayers as though supplicating it to rise' (BJ II. viii. 5).

In doctrine they held strongly a doctrine of Providence, appearing to Josephus to be fatalists (Ant. XIII. v. 9). They took a dualistic view of man's nature. Through evil desire souls fell into uniting themselves with bodies. Free from the body, the soul of the good will rise joyously, as if delivered from long bondage, and find a resting-place of felicity beyond the ocean, whereas for the bad is reserved a dark, cold region of unceasing torment (BJ II. viii. 11).

They revered certain esoteric books which probably dealt with angelology, magic, and divination. They were in repute as prophets (BJ II. viii. 12). They commended speculation in theology and cosmogony, and made researches into medicine (viii. 6), probably magical. They abhorred the use of oil (viii. 3); and that they abstained from flesh and wine has been often asserted, but is very uncertain.

4. Relation to Christianity.—That in several points Essenism, as described, is in agreement with Christianity, is beyond question. On the ground of those resemblances, some, e.g. De Quincey, have held that the Essenes are but Christian monks. This view cannot be taken seriously. Others, e.g. Ginsburg, have made Christianity a development of Essenism, and represented Christ as a member of the holy Order. With the question as to the relation of Jesus to Essenism we are not concerned (Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 153 ff., may be consulted). We merely note that the differences between the two are as pronounced as the resemblances.

(1) Was James an Essene?—We may, however, deal with an assertion, sometimes made, that James, the writer of the canonical Epistle, was an Essene. Those who believe so found their belief upon the account of James given by Hegesippus (in Euseb. HE ii. 23), who flourished about A.D. 170. He asserts that James abstained from flesh, wine and strong drink, and the bath; that he allowed no razor to touch his head, no oil to touch his body, and that he wore only fine linen (which was the dress of the Essenes). If this account were reliable, it would not prove that James was an Essene. Those who believe so must hold the common, but quite wrong, opinion that all Jews were Pharisees, Sadducees, or Essenes, and that all showing asceticism were Essenes. James might be an ascetic without being an Essene, as one may to-day be an abstainer without being a Good Templar. In the notice of Hegesippus itself we have conclusive evidence that James could not be an Essene, for he abstained from the bath, which to the Essenes was of such importance. Besides, as Lightfoot shows (Col. p. 168), Hegesippus is far from trustworthy here. There is no evidence at all for the identification of James with the Essenes.

(2) Did the Apostolic Church copy the Order?—The resemblances are striking, and we shall mention and examine the most important.

(a) The temporary communism of the early chapters of Acts reminds us of the communism of the Essenes. But the Christians were a brotherhood, not an Order, and the surrender of property was a voluntary act, not necessary for recognition as a brother (Ac 5<sup>4</sup>). The Christian communism admits of easy explanation from the belief in the almost immediate Return of the Lord. (b) Celibacy is recommended as a 'counsel of perfection' in 1 Co 7<sup>1-8</sup>. It is clear from v. 29 that this too depends on the belief in the nearness of the end. (c) The Essenes substituted a sacramental for a sacrificial worship. The importance of this has very seldom been appreciated, though it is a point which makes the Order of great interest in the history of religion. Apart from their multitudinous ordinary lustrations, there was the solemn initiatory ablution at the end of the first novitiate. It cleansed outwardly and inwardly and made the ordinary man an Essene (so Bousset, Religion des Judentums, p. 436). Here we have a parallel with Christian baptism and baptismal regeneration. In their common meal we have a parallel with the Christian love-feast, if not with the Eucharist. We quote Josephus's description:

'They assemble together in one place, and having clothed themselves in white veils, they bathe their bodies in cold water. After this purification, they assemble in an apartment of their own, into which it is not allowed to any stranger to enter . . . They enter as if it were some holy temple, and sit down quietly. . . . The priest prays before meat, and none may eat before prayer is offered, and when they have made their meal, he again prays over them. . . . And when they begin and when they end, they praise God. . . . Nor is there ever any clamour or disturbance . . . which silence appears to outsiders as some tremendous mystery' (BJ II. viii. 6; cf. Ant. xviii. i. 6).

As noted above, novices were not admitted to the Table; similarly Christian catechumens retired before the celebration of the Eucharist. It must be admitted that here we have a striking resemblance, but to conclude that the Church owed its sacraments to the Essenes is a rash proceeding. The love-feast has many other parallels elsewhere, and could grow up independently of any of them. Any association of men will naturally develop something similar. Baptism, too, is no rare phenomenon. We conclude that, while the parallel is interesting, the Christian development cannot be shown to be borrowed from Essenism, and is intelligible without any reference to it.

Other resemblances have been noted (a list will be found in HDB, art. 'Essenes'), but they are trifling and unconvincing. The fact, e.g., that Christians are admonished to obey them that have the rule over them gives a point of resemblance to the Essenes certainly, but also to every human association that ever was organized on principles of common sense. It is useless to draw out laborious parallels of this sort. We may hold that the early Church cannot be proved to have owed anything to Essenism, and can be explained without it. On the other hand, Essenism, in its super-Pharisaism, its retirement from the world, its avoidance of the Temple (cf. Ac 3<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>), its views of the body, its sun-worship and magic, is in sharpest contrast to Christianity. Of the silence of the NT regarding the Essenes there are only two possible explanations. One is that Christianity is one with Essenism—a view we have rejected. The other is that Essenism was so unimportant, so entirely out of relation to Christianity, or any active movement of the time, that there was no occasion to mention it. When we remember that Pliny knows of Essenes only as inhabiting the desert shore of the Dead Sea, we are confirmed in choosing this alternative.

5. Influence on heresies.—If it is doubtful whether the Church in her normal development owed anything to Essenism, it is not doubtful that its influence is discernible in the rise of a number of heresies. Here too, however, its influence has sometimes been exaggerated. It is highly questionable whether Essenes have, or possibly could have, any connexion with the 'weaker brethren' of Romans or the errorists of Colossians. The former, as seems indicated in Ro 15<sup>7</sup>, are probably Gentiles given to the asceticism which was not uncommon in the heathen world at that time (A. C. McGiffert, Christianity in the Apostol. Age, 1897, p. 337). The latter, though scholars like Lightfoot and Weiss regard them as clearly Essenic, are really as likely to be Alexandrian as Palestinian Jews (p. 368). According to all our authorities, Essenes were confined to Palestine. We have stated Pliny's view above; Philo knew of them in many towns and villages of Judæa; Josephus knew them all through Palestine. The last two authorities are obviously anxious to make the most possible of the Essenes, and had they had a wider distribution, we may be sure we should have been informed of it. The Essenes arrived at their peculiarities by uniting heathen elements with Judaism; and wherever Jews came in touch with like influences, similar results might be produced. Leaving out the Roman and Colossian errorists as doubtfully Essenic, to say the least, we proceed to those heretical movements where, with great probability, Essenism is influential.

(a) The Essenes are of undoubted interest for the history of Gnosticism (q.v.). They may be called 'the Gnostics of Judaism.' Their fondness for speculation on cosmogony, their allegorizing of the OT, of which Philo speaks, their dualistic views, which involve a depreciation of matter, their magic and their esoteric books—all connect them with Gnosticism. And they are important as showing that in essence there was a pre-Christian Gnosticism. (b) They influenced those Jewish Christians who came into contact with them (see art. EBIONISM). The Ebionites, as described by Epiphanius, show traces of Essenic influence in their asceticism and frequent baptisms. The Elkesaites are Essenized Ebionites. Epiphanius (Hær. xix. 2, xx. 3) identifies Elkesaites with Sampsæans (sun-worshippers), and calls them a remnant of the Essenes who had adopted a debased form of Christianity. (c) The history of the Essenes after the Fall of Jerusalem is obscure. They suffered severely, and endured bravely, in the persecution, and probably their Order was broken up (Lightfoot, Col. p. 169). Many would attach themselves to the neighbouring Christians, with whom they would find several affinities, and carry elements of their Essenism with them. In the Palestinian Judæo-Christian heresies, then, we may, with practical certainty, trace Essenic influence.

6. Conclusion.—The whole subject of Essenism is wrapped in obscurity: the Essenes remain, and will remain, the 'great enigma of Jewish history.' The obscurity is all the more tantalizing because we know enough to perceive that for the history of religion the Essenes are of surpassing interest and importance. In them the Western world saw for the first time a monastic Order and a sacramental worship. In them, too, Gnosticism began its career. These are three points of vast importance. The 'regions beyond Jordan' are of special interest for the syncretism of which they were the scene. There, first Judaism and later Christianity were unable to maintain themselves in their original form. In a general way, we can understand the process of this syncretism. In that region Perso-Babylonian, and even perhaps Buddhistic, influences, pressing westward, impinged upon Judaism, and Essenism is the most prominent of the various amalgams that resulted. In the more obscure Sampsæans, Nasaræans, Hemerobaptists, etc., we have, no doubt, other examples. And as it was with trans-Jordanic Judaism, so it was with trans-Jordanic Judaistic Christianity. It found in Essenism and its cognates what they had found in eastern heathenism—an influence too strong to be resisted. But as to the precise details of both syncretisms, we are left in ignorance, and nearly every statement must begin with 'probably.' As has been indicated, in estimating their influence on Christianity, Catholic and heretical alike, we must beware of the tendency to exaggerate it. Our view is—the Essenes had no appreciable influence on the development of Catholic Christianity, but in Judæo-Christian heresies their influence is considerable, while for the history of Gnosticism they are of great interest.

LITERATURE.—This is very abundant. We mention only P. E. Lucius, Der Essenismus, 1881; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians, 1875; E. Schürer, HJP II. ii. [1885] 188 ff.; A. ETERNAL, EVERLASTING.—'Eternal' and 'everlasting' are employed in the AV of the NT somewhat indiscriminately to render three Greek words—αἰδιος, αἰων (used adjectivally in genitive plural), and αἰωνιος. αἰδιος is found only in Ro 1<sup>20</sup> and Jude<sup>6</sup>, AV rendering 'eternal' in the first case and 'everlasting' in the second. 'Eternal' is the translation of των αἰώνων in Eph 3<sup>11</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>17</sup>. αἰωνιος is of very common occurrence; but while AV in most cases gives 'eternal,' it not infrequently substitutes 'everlasting,' and sometimes does so, apparently, for no other reason than to avoid the repetition of the same English word (cf., e.g., Ac 13<sup>46</sup> with v.<sup>48</sup>; Ro 6<sup>22</sup> with v.<sup>23</sup>). For αἰδιος (a contraction for αἰδιος, fr. αἰ 'ever') RV properly reserves 'everlasting.' For των αἰώνων it gives the literal meaning 'of the ages.' For αἰωνιος (fr. αἰων) it regularly gives 'eternal,' except in Philem<sup>15</sup>, where αἰωνιος is treated as an adverb and rendered 'for ever.' 'Eternal' for αἰωνιος is etymologically correct, since Lat. æternus (for aveternus) comes from ævum, the digammated form of αἰων, from which αἰωνιος is derived. Moreover, no better English word can be suggested—unless the transliteration 'æonian' could be accepted. None the less, 'eternal' is misleading, inasmuch as it has come in English to connote the idea of 'endlessly existing,' and thus to be practically a synonym for 'everlasting.' But this is not an adequate rendering of αἰωνιος, which varies in meaning with the variations of the noun αἰων, from which it comes.

The chief meanings of αἰων in classical Greek are: (1) a lifetime; (2) an age or period; (3) a period of unlimited duration. In the LXX, which is largely determinative for NT usage, αἰων (usually representing Heb. עוֹלָם) is employed with the same variations as in the older Greek literature; and the length of time referred to must be determined from the context. In some cases ἐς τὸν αἰῶνα refers to the duration of a single human life (Ex 19<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>); in others it is applied to the length of a dynasty (1 Ch 28<sup>4</sup>), the lasting nature of an ordinance (2 Ch 2<sup>4</sup>), the national existence of Israel (2 Ch 9<sup>8</sup>), the perpetuity of the earth (Ec 1<sup>4</sup>), the enduring character of God (Ps 9<sup>7</sup>) and of the Divine truth and mercy (117<sup>2</sup> 118<sup>1</sup>). Similarly αἰωνιος is applied to the ancient gates of Zion (Ps 24<sup>7</sup>), to certain Levitical ordinances (Lv 16<sup>30</sup> 34), to the covenants of God with men (Gn 9<sup>16</sup> 17, etc.), to the Divine mercy (Is 54<sup>8</sup>) and love (Jer 31<sup>3</sup>). Only rarely do we find the word applied directly to God Himself (Gn 21<sup>3</sup>, Is 40<sup>28</sup>). Passing from the LXX, we have to notice the bearing upon NT usage of the distinction made in the later Jewish theology (see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 133) between the present age (עוֹלָם הַהוּא) and the coming or Messianic age (עוֹלָם הַבָּא), a distinction which reappears in the NT in the expressions ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος and ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων or ὁ ἐρχόμενος.

Coming now to the NT with the previous history of αἰὼν and αἰωνιος in view, we find that the terms are still used as before with various connotations. In 1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>, unless St. Paul is writing by way of pure hyperbole, αἰων can refer only to his own lifetime. In Ac 3<sup>21</sup> it refers to the age of prophecy. Its frequent employment in the plural suggests that in the singular the word denotes something less than unending time; while the phrases πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων (1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>) and τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων (10<sup>11</sup>) point to ages that were conceived of, not as everlasting, but as having a beginning and coming to an end. Even the coming or Messianic αἰὼν, as contrasted with the present time (Mk 10<sup>30</sup>, Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, etc.), is not conceived of by St. Paul as endless. In 2 P 1<sup>11</sup> Christ's Kingdom is described as αἰωνιος; but St. Paul anticipates a time when Christ shall deliver up His Kingdom to God the Father (1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>).

The use of the adjective is again similar to that of the noun. Whether αἰώνιον is treated as an adverb or an adjective in Philem<sup>15</sup>, it is evident that the meaning must be restricted to the lifetime of Onesimus and Philemon. The χρόνοι αἰώνιοι of Ro 16<sup>5</sup> are the ages during which the mystery of the gospel was kept secret, in contrast with the age of its revelation. Those χρόνοι αἰώνιοι, moreover, are not to be thought of as stretching backwards everlastingly, as is proved by the πρὸ χρόνων αἰώνων of 2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>, Tit 1<sup>2</sup>. The αἰώνιος θεός of Ro 16<sup>26</sup> carries with it unquestionably the idea of everlastingness; but it is worth noting that this is the only occasion in the NT when the term is applied to God, and that the doxology in which it occurs is of doubtful genuineness.

It is when we come to consider the expression ζωὴ αἰώνιος (cf. σωτηρία [He 5<sup>9</sup>], λύτρωσις [9<sup>12</sup>], κληρονομία [v. 12]), which is of very frequent occurrence in the Johannine and Pauline writings, together with the contrasted conceptions πῦρ αἰώνιον (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>, Jude<sup>7</sup>), κόλασις αἰώνιος (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>), δεδεσμένος αἰώνιος (2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>), κρίμα αἰώνιον (He 6<sup>7</sup>), that we find the real crux of the difficulty of translating the term. It has often been insisted that the meaning of the word is the same in either case, and that if 'æonian fire' is less than everlasting, 'æonian life' must also be less. Sometimes this argument has been met by the objection that αἰώνιος is not a quantitative but a spiritual and qualitative term, expressing a kind rather than a length of being. That the word is frequently so used in the Johannine writings appears evident (e.g. Jn 17<sup>3</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>, 5<sup>13</sup>); and in the Pauline Epistles also we have various examples of its employment in a sense that is intensive rather than extensive—notably the equation in 1 Ti 6<sup>1-19</sup> (1<sup>19</sup>) between 'eternal life' and 'the life which is life indeed.' And yet it must be admitted that the whole history of the term points to the underlying idea of duration, and not of duration only, but of a duration that is permanent. With equal clearness, however, that history shows that the permanence affirmed is not absolute, but relative to the nature of the subject. When applied to the loving service of a Christian slave to a Christian master, αἰώνιος denotes a permanence as lasting as the earthly relation between master and slave will permit. When used of the ages before the gospel was revealed, it means throughout the whole length of those ages. When applied to God or to the Spirit (He 9<sup>14</sup>), it means as everlasting as the Divine nature itself. And when we come to 'eternal life' on the one hand and 'eternal fire' or 'eternal destruction' on the other, they also must be rendered according to our conception of the inherent nature of the thing referred to. And many will hold that while good, as emanating from God, is necessarily indestructible, evil, as contrary to the Divine nature and will, must eventually cease to be—that God may be all in all' (1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>). 'Æonian fire,' therefore, may mean a fire that goes on burning until it has burned itself out; 'æonian destruction,' a destruction that continues until there is nothing left to destroy. But 'æonian life,' being life in Christ Jesus our Lord (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>11</sup>), must be as enduring as the Divine immortality. If the spirit of life in Christ Jesus dwells in us, nothing shall be able to separate us from the love of God (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, 11. 35-39). See, further, LIFE AND DEATH.

ETHICS.—It is proposed in the present article not to discuss the vast subject of ethics in general, but to attempt to ascertain what were the most striking points in which the ethical ideas of the Christians of the Apostolic Age differed from those of earlier speculators on the subject.

1. Sources of information.—All our first-hand information is contained in the writings of the NT and of the Apostolic Fathers. Indirectly the works of later Christian authors, who treated the subject more systematically, may throw some light by way of inference on the conceptions of the Apostolic Age: for instance, if the treatment of the cardinal virtues by St. Augustine and others shows a marked difference from the treatment found in pre-Christian writers, it may perhaps be rightly inferred that the difference is due to ideas which already prevailed in the first generation of Christians. But inferences of this sort are precarious, for it is hardly possible to ascertain accurately how far the other influences which contributed to the thought of the later writers were operative in the earliest age; and in any case it is probable that later writings would not add anything of great importance to the general outline, which is all that is being attempted here. Attention will therefore be confined to the contemporary documents. And with respect to these, critical questions may be ignored. The accuracy of the historical narrative is not in question, and whatever may be the authorship or the precise date of the documents reviewed, they are all sufficiently early to reflect ethical ideas which belong to the Apostolic Age, and not those which belong to a later period.

2. General characteristics of ethical thought.

(1) Absence of systematic treatment.—Ethical questions are constantly touched upon in the NT, but always more or less in connexion with particular cases as they arise, and never in connexion with a complete and thought-out system. Here there is a striking contrast with Greek philosophy. The philosophers tried to find a rational basis for human life in all its relations. In ethics they discussed the question of the supreme good—whether it was knowledge, or pleasure, or virtue; they classified the virtues, and discussed in the fullest manner their various manifestations. There is nothing of this sort in the NT. The morality of the Jews, again, was very different from that of the Greeks, for the Jews took little interest in purely philosophical problems; but they also had a system, and a very elaborate one, of law and of ceremonial observance, with which their morality was closely bound up. Although the Christians inherited so much from the Jews, this system, after being, as it were, raised to its highest power in the Sermon on the Mount, was definitely set aside in the Apostolic Age. And in the place of a system we find an overpowering interest in certain historical facts. The Synoptic Gospels are occupied with a fragmentary narrative of the life of Christ, in which a good deal of moral teaching is contained. But it is such as arises incidentally from the facts recorded in the narrative, and it is not presented as part of a scheme of ethics. In the Fourth Gospel there is something more nearly resembling systematic moral discussion, but even here the discourses arise out of a historical framework, and the prevailing interest is not ethical but spiritual and mystical. The Acts contains little but narrative, and the teaching recorded in it centres almost monotonously around facts. In the Epistles ethical questions are constantly dealt with, but the problems are practical, and arise out of the circumstances of the time. This is not to say that in these writings there is no new point of view, but that ethics is nowhere treated in a complete and systematic way, and that there appears to be no consciousness on the part of the writers that they are in possession of a new ethical theory or philosophy. The difference, therefore, between pre-Christian and Christian ethics does not consist in a new theory or system. The subject was treated in the Apostolic Age from the practical point of view.

(2) The moral ideal.—A new element is, however, introduced into ethics by that very concentration upon a single historical life which has been noted above. The ideal man had figured largely in earlier ethical systems, but the ideal man of philosophy had been entirely a creation of the imagination, and his actual existence never seems to have been thought of as a practical possibility. Now, however, an actual human life is put forward as a model of perfection, and it is assumed without discussion that all ethical questions, as they may happen to arise, may be, and must be, tested by this.

(3) The new life.—There is, moreover, in the consciousness of the Apostolic Age something more potent than belief in a historical example. There is a sense which pervades every writing of this time that a new force has come into existence. It is not necessary to insist upon the prominence in early Christian teaching of the belief in the Resurrection. The continued life and activity of the Person who is the centre of all their thought were the greatest of all realities to the early Christians. With it was combined the belief in the continual indwelling and inspiration of the Holy Spirit. And this seems to explain the apparent indifference to ethical theory which has been noted. For to the early Christians 'outward morality is the necessary expression of a life already infused into the soul' (Strong, Christian Ethics, p. 69). It is in this respect that the Christian conception presents the most marked contrast to pre-Christian thought. There was a note of hopelessness in the moral speculation of the Greeks. Even a high ideal was a thing regarded as practically out of reach for the mass of mankind. Plato looked upon the ideal State as a necessary condition for the exercise of the highest virtue, and its conception was a wonderful effort of the philosophical imagination; but it was not considered possible. Even the apparently practical conceptions of Aristotle require a complete reconstruction of society. The Stoic philosophers abandoned this dream, and could suggest nothing better than the withdrawal of the wise man from all ordinary human interests. The Neo-Platonist went further, and sought complete severance from the world of sense. Jewish thought was on different lines, but there was an even keener sense of sin and failure, although this was redeemed from despair by the hope of a Messianic Age which would redress all the evils of the existing order. Above all there was no sufficient solution, and among the Greeks little attempt at a solution, of the problem of how the human will was to be sufficiently strengthened to do its part in the realization of any ideal. In the writings of the Apostolic Age, on the other hand, there is found not only a belief in a perfect ideal historically realized, but also a belief in an indwelling power sufficient to restore all that is weak and depraved in the human will.

(4) The evangelical virtues.—In the NT there is no regular discussion of the nature of virtue, and no formal classification of virtues. The Greek philosophers, while they differed in their views of what constituted the chief good, were agreed in accepting what are known as the four cardinal virtues—prudence, temperance, fortitude, and justice—as the basis of their classification. This division, from the time of Plato onwards (and he appears to assume it as familiar), is generally accepted as exhaustive, and other virtues are made to fall under these heads. But although this classification must have been familiar to a large number of the early Christians, and although it had been adopted in the Book of Wisdom (8th), it is not mentioned in the NT. The cardinal virtues reappeared in Christian literature from Origen onwards, and were exhaustively treated by Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, and mediæval writers, but this kind of discussion does not make its appearance in the Apostolic Age. Such lists of virtues as that which occurs in Gal 5th are clearly not intended to be exhaustive or scientific, and the nearest approach to a system of virtues is made by St. Paul in 1 Cor., where he expounds what became known as the three theological virtues of faith, hope, and love. These three are also closely associated in Ro 5th, 1 Th 1st, and Col 1st; and two other NT writers (He 10th and 1 P 1st) mention them in conjunction in a suggestive manner. It seems that they were generally recognized as moral or spiritual states characteristic of the Christian life. And the reason for this appears to be that they are regarded as the means by which the Christian is brought into personal relation with the historical facts, and with the new life brought by them into the world, which have been spoken of above as the point on which the Christians of the first age centred their attention. The insistence on these spiritual virtues brings out two distinct characteristics of the ethical thought of the Apostolic Age, which are nowhere defined or discussed in the NT, but which nevertheless appear to be consistently implied. These characteristics are a new doctrine of the end of man, and consequently a new criterion of good and evil, and a new view of human nature.

(a) These three virtues all take a man outside himself, and make it impossible for him to be merely self-regarding. They bring him into close relation not only with his fellow-men but with God. So union with God becomes the highest end of man. This union, moreover, is not absorption: whatever may have been the case of some later Christian mystics, the most mystical of the early writers, St. Paul and St. John, never contemplate anything but a conscious union with God, in which the whole individuality of man is preserved. 'From first to last the Christian idea is social, and involves the conscious communion between man and man, between man and God. And no state of things in which the individual consciousness disappears will satisfy this demand' (Strong, op. cit. p. 88). Faith, hope, and love all relate to a spiritual region above and beyond this present life, but the existing world is not excluded from it. The Kingdom of God, which occupies so large a place in the thought of the Apostolic Age, is regarded as future and as transcendental, but it is also regarded as having come already, so far as the rule of Christ has been made effective in this life. Thus a new standard for moral judgments is set up: those actions and events are good which advance the coming of the Kingdom, and those are evil which impede it.

(b) Further, the evangelical virtues assume a unity in human nature which pre-Christian systems of thought failed to recognize. Greek thought either regarded human nature as unfallen, or it adopted more or less an Oriental view of evil as immanent in matter. When evil could not be ignored it might be ascribed either to ignorance or to the imprisonment of the soul in an alien environment. In neither case could human nature be regarded as a whole which in its own proper being is harmonious. The body and the emotions which are closely connected with it were looked upon as things which must either be kept in strict subjection to the intellect, or, as far as possible, be got rid of altogether. In early Christian thought, on the other hand, hope and love are mainly emotional, and faith is by no means exclusively intellectual. In St. Paul's use of the term it includes a strong element of emotion—it 'worketh through love' (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>); and it is almost more an act of the will than of the intellect. And although asceticism played a great part in some departments of later Christian thought, in the Apostolic Age there can be no doubt of the importance assigned to the body. The conspicuous Christian belief in the resurrection of the body assumes a very different point of view from that of Oriental or even of Greek philosophy. It is clear that the first generation of Christians regarded human nature as fallen indeed, but as capable in all its parts of restoration, and they believed that none of its parts could be left out from the salvation of the whole.

(5) The conception of sin.—Speaking generally, it may be said that the non-Christian view of sin regards it as natural, and that the Christian view regards it as unnatural. This is, however, a broad generalization, and requires further definition. No system of ethical thought can altogether ignore the fact of sin, though it is sometimes minimized. But there are wide differences in the way in which it is regarded. In pre-Christian thought it was often almost identified with ignorance. It was assumed that a man cannot sin willingly, because no man desires evil for himself. Virtue is therefore knowledge, and the possibility of knowing what is right and doing what is wrong need not be considered. This was the teaching of a large section of Greek philosophy. Again, wherever Oriental ideas had influence, the seat of evil was thought to be in matter. Sometimes the strife between good and evil was explained as a contest between two rival and evenly-balanced powers. Sometimes a good deity was conceived as acting upon an intractable material. The practical conclusion was usually some form of asceticism—an attempt to be quit of the body and all that it implied; and this asceticism, by a process easy to be understood, not infrequently led to licence. These tendencies often make their appearance in Church history, and traces of them are to be found in the writings of the NT, but during the Apostolic Age the dangers of Gnosticism and Antinomianism were but rudimentary. In modern times the view of evil which regards it as undeveloped good, or as the survival of instincts that are no longer necessary or beneficial, has some points in common with the old dualisms. The common feature of all these views is that they regard evil as more or less inevitable and according to nature. It would not be true to say that they altogether disregard the human will, or deny human responsibility, but they treat the body rather than the will as the seat of evil, and they tend to look upon evil as, upon the whole, natural and necessary. The Christian view of sin, as it appears in the writings of the Apostolic Age, is in the sharpest contrast to this. It is the Jewish view, carried to its natural conclusion, and its chief characteristics may be set down under three heads.

(a) First, the freedom of the will is not considered from the philosophical point of view at all. The metaphysical difficulties are not even touched upon, nor is any consciousness shown of their existence. But the responsibility of man is always assumed. Nor is it for his actions alone that he is responsible. The Sermon on the Mount brings home to him responsibility for every thought, and for his whole attitude towards God. And in doing so it brings to its natural conclusion the course of ethical thought among the Jews. If, however, the root of sin is in the will, it follows that it is not in matter, or in the body, or in anything distinct from the will of man. The whole universe is good, because it is created by God, and sin consists in the wilful misuse of things naturally good. Asceticism therefore, except in the sense of such training as may help to restore the will to a healthy condition, is excluded.

(b) Secondly, the idea of the holiness of God, as forming a test of human action and a condemnation of human shortcomings, is another conception inherited from Judaism. Early Jewish ideas about God are anthropomorphic, but the anthropomorphism is of a very different kind from that of the Greeks. The deities of Greek mythology who aroused the contemptuous disgust of Plato were constructed out of human experience with all the evil and good qualities of actual men emphasized and heightened. To the Jew God is an ideal, the source of the Moral Law, rebellion against which is sin. So in the Sermon on the Mount the perfection of God is held up as the ideal for human perfection, and St. Paul makes the unity of God the ground for belief in the unity of the Church.

(c) Thirdly, sin was regarded as a thing which affects the race, and not only individuals. The beliefs of the Apostolic Age with regard to Christ's redemptive work imply that there is a taint in the race, and that human nature itself, and not only individual men, has to be restored to communion with God, and requires such a release from sin as will make communion with God possible. Some practical results of this belief in the solidarity of mankind are conspicuous in early Christian writings. One is the exercise of discipline. It was felt that the actions and character of individuals compromised and affected the whole body, and that they could not therefore be left to themselves. The injury done by the rebellion of one injured and imperilled the whole community. Both for his own sake and for the sake of the Church a corporate censure was required, extending if necessary to the cutting off of the offending member (1 Co 5, 2 Co 2, Mt 18<sup>15-20</sup>, etc.). Another result of the belief in solidarity is the emphasis laid upon social virtues in connexion with the corporate character of the Church (e.g. Ro 12, 1 Co 12-14, Gal 5, etc.). It partly accounts for that special prominence of humility in Christian ethics which has been so often commented on from different points of view, for humility is regarded not only as a duty enforced by the example of Christ, but also as the practical means for preserving the unity and harmonious working of the body (Ph 2<sup>3-6</sup>, etc.).

3. Conclusion.—Ethics in the Apostolic Age did not consist in a re-statement of old experience or in a system of purely ethical theory, but in the recognition and acceptance in the sphere of conduct of the practical consequences of what was believed to be an entirely new experience of spiritual facts.

ETHIOPIANS.—Ethiopians are only twice mentioned in the NT, and then in the same passage, viz. Ac 8<sup>7</sup>, where Candace, queen of (the) Ethiopians, and her ευνουχος δυνάστης are mentioned in connexion with Philip the Deacon (see artt. CANDACE, ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH, and PHILIP). The word is there doubtless, as in the OT, the Greek equivalent of the Heb. Kushî. It seems probable that Αἰθίοψ (?='Redface') is only a Grecized form of some native word, not a proper description of their facial characteristic, but what that word was can only be conjectured. 'Ethiopia' in NT times would appear to mean the southern part of Egypt, now called the Sūdān, the ancient kingdom of Meroë. In earlier days Napata, a town on the Nile, somewhat north of Meroe, which was likewise on the Nile, had been the capital; but though Napata still retained some of its prestige as the sacred city, yet the seat of government had been removed to Meroë. Another kingdom, that of Axum in the mountain region of Abyssinia proper, seems to have taken its rise about the middle of the 1st cent. A.D., but that does not come into view in our present inquiry.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.—Philip the Deacon's convert (Ac 8<sup>7a</sup>) is described as Αἰθίοψ εὐνοῦχος δυνάστης Κανόακης βασιλίσσης Αἰθίοπων, ὃς ἦν ἐπὶ πάσης τῆς γᾶς αὐτῆς. Αἰθίοψ has been briefly discussed above, εὐνοῦχος implies that he was one of the Court officials and perhaps subject to the physical disability which the name ordinarily implies, but not 'chamberlain' in the strict sense of the term, as he 'was in charge of all her treasure' (see CANDACE). Becker (Charicles, Eng. tr., 1895, p. 365) notes that eunuchs were prized for their reputed fidelity (παρα τοῖσι βαρβάροις [Herod. viii. 105]), and hence were employed as treasurers (ἐπεικὺς γὰρ εἰσθεσάν εὐνοῦχους ἔχειν γαστροφυλάκας [Plutarch, Demetr. 25]). δυνάστης suggests that he possessed unusual power and influence at Court; the word is not found in a similar connexion elsewhere in the NT (it is used of God in 1 Ti 6<sup>15</sup> and of kings in Lk 1<sup>62</sup>), but we have two good instances in Xenophon (Anab. I. ii. § 20: τῶν ὑπάρχων τινα δυνάστην, and Cyrop. IV. v. § 40: τοῦ βασιλέως καὶ ἄλλων δυναστῶν; cf. Herod. ii. 32 and Plato, Rep. 473). There are no means hitherto available for identifying this personage who so early in the history of the Church was admitted to her fold by holy baptism* from the Gentile world; but the fact that he was returning from worship at Jerusalem, and was reading Is 53<sup>7-8</sup> in the LXX version, which here differs somewhat from the Hebrew text, shows that he was acquainted with the Greek language and had been drawn to the religion of the Jews, although he was not very deeply versed in the Scriptures (v.<sup>34</sup>). He was not actually a proselyte, and in any case his physical condition probably disqualified him.

C. L. FELTOE.

ETHNARCH.—This comparatively rare term is derived from ἔθνος, 'a race,' and ἄρχειν, 'to rule'; perhaps the nearest English equivalent is 'chief.' The word is not known before the 2nd cent. B.C., and appears to indicate a ruler appointed by or over a people who were themselves part of a larger kingdom or empire, the appointment being made or recognized by its overlord or suzerain as valid. The purpose of such an appointment was perhaps primarily to safeguard the religion of a people. The earliest instance of an ethnarch known to us is that of Simon Maccabæus. In 1 Mac 14<sup>47</sup> Simon accepts from the people the following offices—ἀρχιερατεῦσαι καὶ εἶναι στρατηγὸς καὶ ἐθνάρχης τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἱερέων καὶ τοῦ προστατῆσαι πάντων ('to be high priest and to be general and ethnarch of the Jews and their priests and to rule over all'); and in 15<sup>2</sup> a letter of King Antiochus of Syria is addressed to him as ἱερεὶ μεγάλῳ καὶ ἐθνάρχῃ ('great priest and ethnarch'). From 15<sup>1-2</sup> it is clear that the ἔθνος was the Jews themselves, and indeed almost everywhere where the term 'ethnarch' occurs, it refers to a ruler over Jews. Josephus (Ant. XIV. vii. 2) shows us that the large Jewish community in the great city of Alexandria had an 'ethnarch' over it, and he defines his duties precisely thus: διοικεῖ τε τὸ ἔθνος καὶ διατὰ κρίσεις καὶ συμβολαίων ἐπιμελεῖται καὶ προσταγμάτων, ὡς ἂν πολιτείας ἔρχων αὐτοτελοῦς ('he governs the race and decides trials in court and has charge of contracts and ordinances as if he were an absolute monarch').

An inscription (Le Bas-Waddington, Voyage archéologique en Grèce et en Asie Mineure, Paris, 1847-77, vol. iii. no. 2196 = W. Dittenberger, Orientis Græci Inscriptiones Selectæ, Leipzig, 1905, vol. ii. no. 616) from a village, El-Malikije in the Hauran, mentions by the names 'ethnarch' and 'general (or prætor) of nomads' a chief of nomad Arabs of the time of Hadrian or Antoninus Pius who must have submitted to the Emperor.

These passages will help to illustrate the reference in 2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>. The man there mentioned was doubtless ruler of the Jews in Damascus and its territory, who were 'permitted to exercise their own religious law very freely and fully' (Ramsay, Pictures of the Apostolic Church, London, 1910, p. 99). He was under Aretas, who has the title βασιλεὺς ('king,' i.e. of Arabia), and, indeed, as has been said, the ethnarch was always lower than a king. This fact is illustrated by interesting passages in Josephus (BJ II. vi. 3, Ant. XVII. xi. 4), where Cæsar Augustus makes Archelaus not βασιλεὺς, but ἐθνάρχης, of half of the territory that had belonged to Herod, promising him the higher title later, if certain conditions were fulfilled; and in Pseudo-Lucian (Macrob. § 17, ed. Jacobitz, Leipzig, 1896, vol. iii. p. 198), where a man is 'proclaimed βασιλεὺς instead of ἐθνάρχης of the Bosphorus.'

EUBULUS (Εὐβουλος).—A friend of St. Paul and Timothy, Eubulus was present with the Apostle in Rome during his last imprisonment, and along with Claudia, Pudens, and Linus sent greetings to Timothy (2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>). Probably he was a member of the Church of Rome; and, as his name is Greek, he may have been a slave or a Roman freedman. Nothing, however, is known regarding him.

EUCHARIST.—1. Scope of article.—The scope of this article is limited to the observance of the Eucharist in the Apostolic Church, with especial reference to St. Paul. The Gospels are expressly excluded. Therefore the question as to the possibility of the accounts in the Synoptic Gospels having been influenced by Pauline ideas, and the many questions which are raised by the Gospel according to St. John, will not be treated in this article. The evidence which will be used will be that which is furnished by the Acts of the Apostles and the Pauline Epistles. Other evidence will only be adduced in so far as it has a direct bearing upon this.

2. The Acts of the Apostles.—In Acts we have a description of the life of the earliest Christian community in Jerusalem. We are told that 'they continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread (τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου) and the prayers' (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>). Further, we read that 'Day by day continuing stedfastly with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread (κλῶντες ἄρτον) at home, they partook of food with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God and having favour with all the people' (vv.<sup>46-47</sup>). The latter passage contrasts their breaking of bread at home with their attendance at the Temple-worship. But the passage may be no more than a general description of the life of the community—that it was cheerful and social. In the former passage, however, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου must have some religious significance. It has indeed been held that it has nothing to do with the Last Supper, that community of goods led to community of meals, and that no more than that is intended by the phrase. But the growing belief in the fact of redemption through the Death of Christ, together with certain visions of the Risen Lord, who appeared to His disciples, on some occasions, according to our accounts, at meals, led to a connexion being established, in the minds of Christians, between the Last Supper and the common meal. Thence the development is clear; and there is no difficulty in seeing how they came to believe in some mysterious Presence of Jesus. Thus was evolved the Pauline doctrine.*

It is true that it is impossible to prove any connexion between the 'breaking of the bread' of Ac 2<sup>17</sup> and the Last Supper. But that there was a religious significance attached to the former seems clear from the way in which it is mentioned. And the general course of the history is most easily explained if we suppose that already in the primitive community at Jerusalem the connexion existed. It does not seem probable that St. Paul's churches differed wholly in their usage from other churches, and the facts are best explained by the supposition that, from the first, Christians commemorated their Master at their common meal. The suggestion, to which allusion has been made, that visions of the Risen Christ led to the connexion being established, fails to account for the fact that it is Christ's Death that came to be commemorated, and that, because of this, the Eucharist bore from very early times a sacrificial character. The evidence is not sufficient to lead to any certain conclusions; but on the whole it seems to point to the germ of the later conception being contained in these earliest 'breakings of bread.' Whether the 'breaking of bread' denotes the common meal, or a particular action at the common meal, is again not clear. Batiffol† maintains the latter, but his arguments are not conclusive;‡ and the matter must be left doubtful.

In Ac 20<sup>7-11</sup> we read that the Christians of Troas met together on the first day of the week in the evening to 'break bread.' That is stated to be the purpose of the meeting. The writer of the Acts is himself present, and gives an account of the scene. There are many lights in the upper room. St. Paul, who is leaving Troas the next day, discourses until midnight. Then he breaks bread, and tastes it, and, after a further long conversation, departs at dawn. There is no indication here of a common meal; for the inference drawn from the use of the word 'tasting' (γευσάμενος), which is said by some § to imply a meal, is surely unjustified. The 'breaking of bread' here appears to denote a ceremonial action. The language employed does not indeed exclude the possibility that this action, and the partaking by those present of the bread so broken, may have taken place during a meal which was held about midnight. But there is no hint of any such meal. It is noteworthy that this meeting takes place on a Sunday. There does not appear to have been a similar one daily during St. Paul's stay. And the whole narrative, with its mention of the 'many lights,' suggests a solemn gathering for worship. It must be remembered that in this passage we have to do with a Pauline church; and therefore we cannot safely argue back to the passages in Ac 2. But there can be no question that the 'breaking of bread' in this passage does denote a significant religious act; and, in the light of the evidence which we possess in 1 Cor. about the customs of St. Paul's churches, we conclude that the 'breaking of the bread' derives its significance from the Last Supper, and is in some way a commemoration of the Lord's Death. Significant it certainly was; and its significance is fixed by our evidence about the Church of Corinth.

3. St. Paul's doctrine.—We owe to purely accidental circumstances the preservation of an account of St. Paul's doctrine of the Eucharist, and a description of the Eucharist in the Church of Corinth. Disorders had arisen in that Church in connexion with the attitude of Christians towards meals in idol-temples and in connexion with the Eucharist. St. Paul finds it necessary to deal with these matters in 1 Corinthians. Had it not been for this necessity, we might have supposed that the Pauline churches were without any special sacramental teaching, for in none of the other Pauline Epistles is there any allusion to the subject. This, however, is accidental. For St. Paul's language to the Corinthians makes it certain that he must have given similar teaching to his converts elsewhere, and indeed the account of the 'breaking of bread' at Troas, when read in the light of the passage in 1 Cor., makes it clear that there too the Eucharist was the central point of the Christian assembly.

It appears from 1 Co 11<sup>20-34</sup> that from time to time—presumably on Sundays—the members of the Church met together 'to eat the Lord's Supper.' This supper was a real meal, and the food was provided by those who attended it. But, whereas it ought to have been a fraternal gathering, a bond of unity, the selfishness and greed of the rich made it most unsatisfactory; for they insisted upon keeping for themselves the food they brought, whereas all the food brought ought to have been put together and divided among the whole number. The result of this was that some who attended had not enough to eat and drink, and some had too much. There were even cases of drunkenness. This conduct of the rich naturally led to divisions. Groups were formed, and the general spirit of fraternity was broken.

St. Paul reminds the Corinthians of the great solemnity of the Lord's Supper. He reminds them how he had told them before of the Last Supper itself, and how Jesus had instituted there a rite by which Christians were to proclaim His Death until He should come again. He reminds them that they came to enter into communion with the Body and Blood of Christ; that this is a solemn matter; that self-examination is necessary, and care to recognize the distinction between what is received and common bread; that those who fail to come up to what is required of them in this matter, those who receive unworthily, have in many cases already received striking punishments from God, for the objects to be received are so holy, that not only does worthy reception bring great benefits, but unworthy reception brings stern judgment.

In 1 Co 10 St. Paul warns the Corinthians of the dangers of idolatry. He holds up before them the example of the Israelites, who, though they were 'baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea,' and ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink, yet died in the wilderness because of their sins (vv. 1-6). There is a clear analogy with the case of Christians, who receive spiritual food and drink, and yet are liable to perish, in spite of their privileges, if they too sin. The particular sin of which he warns them is idolatry. He affirms that those who partake of a meal in an idol's temple really enter into communion with the demons who are at the back of idolatrous worship. Communion with the Body and Blood of Christ is incompatible with communion with demons. 'You cannot drink the Lord's cup and the cup of demons. You cannot share the Lord's table and a table of demons' (v. 21). In his conception the meat is offered to the idol and becomes the property of the demons, so that the demons are, as it were, the hosts at the sacrificial banquet. It is their cup which is drunk by those who attend. It is their table at which the guests sit. The parallel which St. Paul draws between these demonic banquets and the Lord's Supper suggests that in the same way the bread and the cup are offered to the Lord, so that He becomes the host. Therefore the Supper is His Supper, and it is His Cup and His Table. But the thought goes further than this. For not only do the communicants enter into communion with Christ by being, as it were, His guests at Supper; but they enter into communion with His Body and His Blood. The use of these expressions makes it clear that what is meant is that the communicant enters into communion with Christ's Death. It is the language of sacrifice which is here employed. The sacrificial Death of Christ is an essential part of St. Paul's thought. The worthy communicant feeds upon that sacrifice, and so appropriates the blessing won thereby.

But while it is true that it is only the worthy communicant who obtains the blessing, St. Paul's language clearly implies that the bread and the wine are not merely symbols. They are really to the communicant the Body and Blood of Christ—the Body broken and the Blood shed in His sacrificial Death. They have this wonderful character in themselves, apart from the faith of the communicant. For the unworthy communicant receives them at his peril, and the dangers of irreverence are very great. The communicant must discern the Body. The suggestion which has been made that 'the Body' in this phrase means Christ's mystical Body, the Christian Church, is worthy of very little attention. It is true that the word is sometimes so used, but here the context makes it necessary to understand by it the Body of Christ which is represented by the bread and partaken of by the communicant.

This communion takes place at a common meal. The Christians of the community come together, probably on the first day of the week, to a common meal. The question arises as to whether the whole meal is a communion, or whether communion takes place during or after the meal. v. 16 suggests that the latter is the true view. 'The cup of blessing which we bless,' 'the bread which we break,' suggest that during or after the meal there was a solemn blessing of a cup, and a solemn breaking of bread, in virtue of which the cup becomes 'the cup of blessing,' and both it and the bread which is broken assume their special character. It seems clear that the 'blessing' is a solemn liturgical act, and the parallelism with the breaking of bread indicates that that has the same character. The 'cup of blessing' is the cup over which a blessing has been said, or the cup which has been blessed. There is no necessary reference to any cup used in the Passover. St. Paul speaks of the cup which 'we bless,' but this does not necessarily mean that the whole assembly blessed the cup, or broke the bread. In fact, the language of Ac 20<sup>11</sup>, where it is said that at Troas St. Paul himself 'broke the bread,' suggests that the 'liturgical' action was performed by a single person, who was presiding. A definite 'blessing' of a cup and 'breaking of bread' would seem to imply that the supper as a whole was not the communion, though the supper as a whole was the Lord's Supper, for the Lord was host. But during supper, or more probably after supper (cf. 1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>), the president blessed the cup and broke the bread; and the cup so blessed and the bread so broken assumed their special and sacred character. As we have seen, the supper is a real and not a symbolical meal. But St. Paul's suggestion that the Corinthians' own houses are the proper places in which to eat and drink, and his injunction that if they are hungry they should eat at home (11<sup>22, 34</sup>) indicate the way in which the setting of the Eucharist came so soon to be altered. For these injunctions lead straight to the conclusion that the Christian assembly at which the Lord's Death is shown forth is not a suitable occasion for the satisfaction of bodily needs. It is therefore not surprising that we find, when next we have any evidence, that the Eucharist has been detached from its setting as part of a common meal.

There are two further points which deserve notice before we come to consider in further detail St. Paul's view of the effects of communion. The first is the fact that in 10<sup>16</sup> St. Paul puts the cup before the bread. We find the same thing in the Didache; and if the shorter text of St. Luke's Gospel be the right one, we find it also there. This is certainly a noticeable point. But, whatever may be the explanation in St. Luke and in the Didache, it is not possible to suppose that at Corinth the cup actually did precede the bread. For the form of the narrative of the Last Supper which St. Paul gives (11<sup>23-25</sup>) places the bread before the cup, and it is most unlikely that that order was reversed in the Corinthian Church. The explanation may be, as M. Goguel suggests,* that the parallelism between the Lord's Cup and the cup of libation at a heathen sacrifice was closer than that between the eating of a piece of bread and anything that took place there. It may be for this reason that the cup is mentioned before the bread. Or it may be merely that the bread is put second because St. Paul is to speak at further length about it in the next verse. But in any case it is misleading to regard 10<sup>16</sup> as having any real connexion with a tradition of the cup having preceded the bread at the Last Supper.

The second point is the phrase in 11<sup>26</sup>: 'Ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come.' The addition 'till he come' is reminiscent of Mk 14<sup>5</sup> and parallels, though the saying, as recorded in the Gospels, says nothing about the Lord's return, but speaks only of the joys of the Messianic Kingdom, to be shared by Him with Christians. The idea implied in the phrase 'till he come' is similar—namely, that the Eucharist is but a provisional rite, and looks forward to the day when communion with Him shall be more direct in His Kingdom.

We may now consider St. Paul's view of the effects of communion, and here the main thing to notice is the realistic character of St. Paul's thought. Participation in the one loaf produces a unity among Christians. 'Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body, because we all partake of that one bread' (10<sup>17</sup>). This unity is not the cause but the effect of the communion. There is a close parallel to the effect produced by participation in an idol-sacrifice, in which the worshippers are united to one another as well as to the demon. Besides this unity of believers which is produced by participation, there is of course the communion with the Body and Blood of Christ. It seems clear that the parallel with the heathen sacrifices still holds good. The communicant really enters into communion with Christ conceived as a sacrificial Victim. Whether this will be for his benefit or for his undoing depends upon his own disposition; but, whatever his disposition may be, in no case is that which he receives ordinary food. The bread since it has been broken, and the cup since it has been blessed, have assumed special characters. And it is no light matter for anyone to partake.

Here the question must be faced whether St. Paul's views on the subject of the Eucharist differed from those of the Corinthians. It has been held by W. Heitmüller† that St. Paul's conception differed from theirs in that he believed that it was the dying Christ with whom the communicant entered into communion, whereas they thought rather of the glorified Christ. According to this idea, in ch. 10 St. Paul adopts the view of the Corinthians, but in ch. 11 he gives them his own view. It is true that the behaviour of the Corinthians at the supper would suggest at first sight that their beliefs about it were of no very solemn character, and it may seem strange that men who believed that they were actually commemorating Christ's Last Supper and Death, should treat the meal as an opportunity for self-indulgence; but it is by no means impossible that this may have been so. St. Paul's attitude throughout is that of a man who is reminding others of what they already know rather than of one who is giving new instruction. His view of the nature of the Eucharist rests ultimately upon his view of the institution, and as to this he expressly states that he had given them instruction before (11<sup>23</sup>). It is not an uncommon thing for men to need to be reminded of a fact with which they are perfectly well acquainted, nor indeed is it uncommon for men to act in a way which is quite inconsistent with their religious beliefs, even though these beliefs are quite honestly held. What the Corinthians had learned about the Eucharist they had learned from St. Paul. It is therefore unlikely that their view of the Eucharist was essentially different from his, though no doubt they may not have wholly understood it. Some of his language suggests that they thought that communion would benefit them mechanically, and that their dispositions did not much matter. This is in line with the general view of them which we get from the Epistle as a whole.* They laid stress on the value of γνώσις and attached insufficient importance to morality. If there is any point in which their views differed from St. Paul's, it is probably to be found here. It may be that when he speaks of the possibility of eating and drinking judgment unto themselves, he is giving them new teaching. But this does not involve the consequence that their intellectual belief about the Eucharist was seriously different from his, but rather that their conscience needed to be awakened.

* Op. cit. p. 144, following Heinrici.

4. St. Paul's account of the institution of the Eucharist.—The investigation of the relation between the various accounts which we possess belongs properly to the study of the Gospels. It will be sufficient here to notice that, in spite of verbal differences, St. Paul's account is much the same as that of St. Mark and St. Matthew, except that it contains the command of repetition, 'Do this in remembrance of Me,' which is otherwise found only in the longer text of St. Luke. Whether this indicates Pauline influence upon the Gospels is a difficult question, but one which does not fall within the scope of this article. St. Paul refers the communion at Corinth back to an institution by our Lord on the night of His betrayal—an institution at which He alluded to His Death in sacrificial terms, and commanded the performance of the rite in memory of Himself. This narrative of the institution (1 Co 11<sup>23-24</sup>) is introduced by the words ἐγὼ γὰρ παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τοῦ Κυρίου. It has been supposed that by this expression St. Paul means to claim that he had received the whole narrative of the institution, which he goes on to give, by direct revelation from Christ. If this were his claim, it would very seriously affect the historic value of St. Paul's evidence in the matter. But his words do not necessarily bear any such meaning. The theory has been put forward that we have in these words an indication that the Eucharist as a rite was invented by St. Paul, and that he was the first to connect the social meal of the Christians with the Last Supper of the Lord. But it seems by no means improbable that the words imply merely that he had received it from the Lord through tradition. There is no indication of any disagreement between St. Paul and the other apostles on this subject. And it has been pointed out that it is most improbable that we owe to St. Paul the mention of Christ's Body and Blood. If he had himself been inventing his terms, he would in all probability have spoken of Flesh and Blood.* He seems to be following tradition, or, at any rate, to be under the impression that he is following tradition, in his account of the Eucharist. The idea that St. Paul's own views were much influenced by conceptions current among Corinthian Christians has no support in our authorities. He explicitly states that the account of the institution is no new teaching, but that he has taught it himself to the Corinthians before; and it is on this account of the institution that his doctrine is based.

Moreover, the theory that St. Paul's doctrine of the Eucharist was peculiar to himself, and arose in the first place owing to purely local causes at Corinth, fails to account for the universality of the Eucharist. If it was only St. Paul and some of his converts for whom the Eucharist was a real religious rite—if, that is to say, it was St. Paul who gave a religious significance to what was at first merely a social meal—the universal adoption of St. Paul's ideas constitutes a serious historical problem. Other doctrines of St. Paul by no means met with such wide-spread acceptance. His doctrine of justification was hardly understood at all by anyone until the time of St. Augustine. But we know of no church without a Eucharist. Even in the Didache it is a definite rite, though its significance is doubtful. It stands with Baptism as one of the two rites which belong to Christianity. Development no doubt there was. The 'breaking of the bread' in the primitive community at Jerusalem did not carry with it all the ideas which were associated with the Eucharist at Corinth. But even there it is a religious rite, and not a mere social meal.

The Didache appears to show us a community where the doctrine of the Eucharist had not developed on Pauline lines. There is no clear reference to its connexion with the Last Supper. It is tempting to bring into line with this the 'breaking of the bread' in the Acts, and to suppose that there too there was no thought of the Last Supper. And in favour of this view might be alleged the fact that there is no mention of the Eucharistic cup in the Acts of the Apostles, which may be supposed to indicate an absence of sacrificial conceptions. But all this is a most dangerous form of the argument a silentio. For the writer of the Acts has no occasion to speak of the ideas which Christians associated with the 'breaking of the bread.' So his silence on the matter is absolutely worthless as negative evidence. And, though there is no mention of a Eucharistic cup, it is extremely unlikely that at Troas there was no such cup, in view of the fact that Troas was a Pauline church. The Acts makes no mention of a cup. This is natural enough, for the writer is not giving a full account of the proceedings. But exactly the same consideration applies to the 'breaking of the bread' at Jerusalem. The fact that no cup is mentioned is no sort of evidence that the meal did not include the blessing and partaking of a cup. If it did so, the writer of the Acts could hardly have framed his sentence so as to include a mention of it; and there is no reason why he should have done so. As has been pointed out above, if it had not been for accidental circumstances at Corinth, we should not have heard anything about the Eucharist in * Heitmüller, op. cit. p. 26.

* See art. CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE.

St. Paul's Epistles, and should have supposed that the Pauline churches in St. Paul's time knew of no such rite. This fact is in itself a sufficient warning against the danger of drawing conclusions from the silence of a writer.

In the absence of more definite evidence, no theory can be more than a hypothesis. But the facts are best accounted for by the hypothesis that the 'breaking of bread' was from the beginning a religious rite associated with a social meal, in which Christians commemorated the Last Supper of our Lord with His apostles. As Christians came increasingly to realize the significance of our Lord's Death as a sacrifice, a conception which was popularized by St. Paul, but which had its roots in the consciousness and teaching of Jesus about the necessity of His Death for the coming of the Kingdom, they came to realize increasingly the significance of this rite, and of the words which Jesus had spoken at the Last Supper. These words could not be understood until the sacrificial aspect of the Lord's Death was realized. But, when that was understood, then the rite of the 'breaking of the bread' was bound to be seen by Christians to have the significance which St. Paul attached to it and which was implicit in it from the first, although not fully understood—the significance of the participation by the communicant in Christ, conceived of as the sacrificial Victim. It may be supposed that the Church represented by the Didache had not attained to the understanding of the sacrificial character of Christ's Death, and therefore had failed to appreciate the meaning of the Eucharist.

5. The Greek mystery-religions.—The view which has been widely held, that St. Paul derived his conceptions about the Eucharist from the Greek mystery-religions, is excluded by the hypothesis which has just been put forward. No doubt there is a real sense in which Christianity is a mystery-religion. It meets and satisfies the same needs which are met by mystery-religions in the Græco-Roman world, and it is certainly possible that St. Paul may have been influenced by the intellectual and religious atmosphere of the world in which he was born and in which he laboured. But it must be remembered that he was educated in Jerusalem at the feet of Gamaliel. And his Rabbinical training certainly exercised a great influence upon his mind. It is hardly conceivable that the author of the 1st chapter of Romans would have allowed himself to be directly influenced by any particular heathen cult. It is true that he treats the Eucharist as analogous to the heathen sacrificial feasts, but it is only to emphasize the contrast between them. He is certainly unconscious of any borrowing from them.

We know exceedingly little about the mystery-religions which were current in the time of St. Paul.* But it may be noted that Johannine Eucharistic teaching has at first sight much more in common with the later mysteries than that of St. Paul. The very able argument of A. Schweitzer,† by which St. Paul's Eucharistic doctrine is explained on the basis of Jewish eschatology, perhaps hardly carries conviction as a whole, but his criticism of those who allege Greek influence is very telling. He points out that St. Paul's theology exercised very little influence on the Græco-Roman world, and was not understood by the Greek Fathers. This carries with it the strong probability that St. Paul's theology was not really Greek, but Jewish. Schweitzer's interpretation is that we are to look for an explanation of St. Paul's sacramental doctrine in the condition of the world between the Death of Jesus and His Coming, expected to be immediate. 'The Apostle asserts an overlapping of the still natural, and the already supernatural, condition of the world, which becomes real in the case of Christ and believers in the form of an open or hidden working of the forces of death and resurrection.*' He maintains that this is not Greek, but Jewish. It should, however, be admitted that the form of some of St. Paul's statements may be due to the atmosphere in which he lived and worked. What is here maintained is that the general teaching of St. Paul on the subject is more easily explained by the hypothesis that it is not drawn from Greek sources, but is an explication of something that was already implicit in the 'breaking of bread' of the earliest community, and was a true interpretation of the actual intention of Jesus.

EUNICE (Εὐνίκη; the spelling Εὐνελκη of TR is erroneous).—Eunice, the mother of Timothy (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>) is referred to in Ac 16<sup>1</sup> as a Jewess who believed. Her husband, however, was a Greek, and we find that, although she was a Jewess, she had refrained from circumcising her son, probably out of respect for her husband's opinions. The grandmother of Timothy is alluded to as Lois (q.v.), and she was in all likelihood the mother of Eunice. Some have put forward the conjecture that, as both Lois and Eunice are Greek names, the women were Jewish proselytes, but this is improbable; nor is it likely that the father of Timothy was in any way attached to the Jewish religion. The Apostle refers to the faith of both Lois and Eunice (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>) and to their careful training of Timothy in the Jewish scriptures (3<sup>15</sup>). As we find Eunice described as a 'Jewess who believed,' on St. Paul's second visit to Lystra (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>), she was probably converted to Christianity on the Apostle's first visit to the town. One of the cursives (25) adds the word χρησας in Ac 16<sup>1</sup>; and although this is undoubtedly a marginal gloss that crept into the text, it may refer to an early tradition that Eunice was a widow at the date of the Apostle's visit to Lystra, and would give added emphasis to the injunction of 1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup> regarding the treatment of widows by their children or grandchildren. W. F. BOYD.

EUNUCH.—See CHAMBERLAIN and ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.

EUODIA (Εὐδία).—The AV reads Euodias. The word in the Greek text occurs in the accusative case, Euodiam, and the translators mistakenly regarded this as the accusative of a masculine form Euodias, and supposed the bearer of the name to be a man. But the word is the name of a woman corresponding to the male form Eὐδίδιος, which is also found in Greek literature, several early Christian bishops being so called.

Euodia was a woman, prominent in the Church of Philippi, who had a difference of opinion with * Op. cit. p. 244 f.

Syntyche (q.v.). The Apostle exhorts them to be 'of the same mind in the Lord' (Ph 4-). We have no means of ascertaining the nature of the controversy between the two women, who may have been deaconesses, but were more probably prominent female members of the Church, of the type of Lydia of Ac 16<sup>14-15</sup>. In fact, it has been suggested that one of the two may have been Lydia (q.v.) herself, as the term 'Lydia' may not be a personal name at all, but may mean simply 'the Lydian,' or the native of the province of Lydia in which Thyatira, the home of the woman, was situated. This, however, cannot possibly be verified. The difference between the two was more probably of the nature of a religious controversy than of a personal quarrel. The Apostle in the following verse refers to their previous services on behalf of the gospel as a reason why they should be given every assistance to come to a better state of mind. The Synzygus (AV 'true yoke-fellow,' but probably a proper name), whom the Apostle exhorts to help the women towards reconciliation and who is reminded of their previous assistance to the Apostle, may have been the husband of one or other of the women (see SYNZYGUS). The theory of Baur and the Tübingen school that Euodia and Syntyche are symbolical names for the Jewish and Gentile tendencies in the early Church is untenable, and has fallen into disrepute. It is inconsistent with the simple tenor of the Epistle as a whole, and such a mysterious reference would certainly not have been understood by the first readers.

EUPHRATES.—The Euphrates was a famous river of Mesopotamia. Its chief interest for us in the Apostolic Age is its adoption as a term in the allegorical apparatus of Christian polemic and apologetic. In Rev 9<sup>14</sup> the sixth angel is ordered to release the four angels who were bound at the river Euphrates, and in 16<sup>12</sup> the sixth angel dries up the Euphrates for the coming of the kings of the East. We have here an allusion to the Nero-legend which told that Nero had fled to the East, to the Medes and Persians, beyond the river Euphrates, and would again cross the river accompanied by myriads of soldiers and make war on Rome (Sib. Or. iv. 119-122, 137-139). In accordance with this legend, a second pseudo-Nero appeared on the Euphrates under Titus in A.D. 80 (cf. R. H. Charles, The Ascension of Isaiah, 1900, pp. lviii-lxi). In both the Apocalyptic verses, however, we have more than an allusion to a Parthian incursion. In the allegorical language of the period, as Egypt was the type of bodily life, so was Mesopotamia of spiritual (cf. Hippol. Ref. v. 3: 'Mesopotamia is the current of the great ocean flowing from the midst of the Perfect Man'). On the other hand, by another symbol the Euphrates stood for the power of the earthly kingdom and the waves of persecutors (e.g. in Bede, Explan. Apoc. ii. 9 [Migne, Patr. Lat. xciii. 159]), or for the human as opposing the Divine.

Thus, interpreting the mind of the apostolic period by its legacy to subsequent ages, Rupertus understands the waters of Euphrates in the Apocalypse as the foolish reasonings of men dried up by the judgment of God in order that the saints of Him who is the 'East' may destroy 'the deceits of the magi, the vain inventions of philosophers and the fictions of the poets' (Com. in Apoc. ix. 16 [Migne, Patr. Lat. clxix. 1123]). Also, as the Euphrates was the boundary of Paradise and of the realm of Solomon, it came to signify the reason of man as the boundary to be passed by the spiritual man before he could see the light of the eternal day. In this way the evil condition of Euphrates passed easily into the conception of it as the water of baptism. Philo has yet another interpretation (de Somn. ii. 255). Referring to Gn 15<sup>18</sup>, he says that the river of Egypt represents the body and the river Euphrates the soul, and that the spiritual man's jurisdiction extends from the world of change and destruction to the world of incorruption, the two terms 'river of Egypt' and 'river Euphrates' being thus opposed as blame and praise are opposed, so that man may choose the one and eschew the other.

EURAQUILO (εὐρακύλων).—This word is found nowhere in ancient literature except in Ac 27<sup>14</sup>. It is the name given to the tempestuous wind (ἄνεμος τυφωνικός, vorticatus, 'whirling') which, suddenly beating down from the central mountains of Crete, caught St. Paul's ship in its passage from Fair Havens to Phoenice, drove it to the island of Cauda, and finally wrecked it on the coast of Malta. The word is a hybrid, made up of Eurus (εὐρος), the east wind—an ordinary meaning in the Latin poets, though εἶρος properly meant the south-east—and Aquilo, the north-east wind, so that it denotes the east-north-east wind. 'Euro-auster' (= εὐρόνοτος) is an analogous compound. Enraquilo corresponded to the Greek καίκλας, for which the Latins had no specific name: 'Quem ab oriente solstitiali excitatum Graeci κακίαν vocant, apud nos sine nomine est' (Seneca, Nat. Quaest. v. 16). St. Luke avoids the correct Greek term, characteristically preferring the vivid language which he had doubtless heard the mariners themselves use. His addition ὁ καλούμενος perhaps indicates that he knew the word to be confined to nautical slang. It was doubtless coined by the sailors and traders of the Levant, whose successors at the present day still call the dreaded wind the 'Gregalia'—the final form of the corruption of 'Euraquilo,' just as 'Egripou' is of 'Euripus.'

εὐροκλύδων (TR; 'Euroclydon,' AV) is one of a great number of textual variants. It appears in two 9th cent. uncials, H and L, and the majority of the cursives. The oldest authorities, NAB, have εὐρακύλων; in the Codices Bezae and Ephraemi the account of the voyage is wanting. A reviser of the Vaticanus has inserted T over A and A after K, and has altered ΔΩΝ into ΔΩΝ, but in so doing he has left the right foot of the Δ visible beyond the corner of his own Δ.

EUROCLYDON.—See EURAQUILO.

EUTYCHUS (Εὐτυχός).—A young man who listened to St. Paul preaching at Troas on his final journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20<sup>7-12</sup>). As the Apostle was leaving the next day, he continued his speech till midnight, evidently in a crowded and overheated upper room where many torches were burning. Eutychus, who was seated at the window, fell asleep, and, falling down from the third storey, was 'taken up dead' (ἤρθη νεκρός). The narrative states that St. Paul went down, embraced the lad, and told the company not to trouble themselves as life was still in him. Then he went upstairs, broke bread, and continued speaking till morning. As they were departing Eutychus was brought to them alive.

Various theories have been put forward to explain or explain away this incident. Some suppose that the youth was only stunned by his fall, and appeared to the spectators to be dead; others that the whole story is unhistorical, and merely intended as a parallel to the narrative of St. Peter's raising of Dorcas (Ac 9<sup>38-43</sup>). But the narrative leaves little doubt of the intention of the historian to relate a miracle. As Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 291) points out, the passage belongs to the 'we' sections of Acts, and Luke, as a medical man, uses precise medical terms, and as an eyewitness certainly means to state that Eutychus was really dead. The words ἤρθη νεκρός can only bear that significance, otherwise we should have, as in Mk 9<sup>26</sup>, ὥς νεκρός, 'as one dead.' There is no doubt that the incident is related as an instance of the power of the Apostle to work miracles, and that the historian believed him to have done so on this occasion.

EVANGELIST.—'Evangelist' comes from εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, 'to evangelize' or 'publish good tidings,' a verb which is fairly common in the LXX, and is very frequent in the writings of St. Luke and in the Epistles, especially the four great Epistles of St. Paul. This verb is derived from εὐαγγέλιον, 'good tidings,' especially the good tidings of the evangel or gospel. 'Evangelist' is found in only three passages in the Bible. Philip, one of the Seven, is so called in one of the 'we' sections of Acts (21<sup>8</sup>), which may mean that he was the evangelist out of the Seven, i.e. the only one, or far the best. Again, St. Paul, in his list of five kinds of ministers which have been given by Christ to His Church (Eph 4<sup>11</sup>), places 'evangelists' after 'apostles' and 'prophets' and before 'pastors' and 'teachers'; and 'evangelists' may be classed with the two groups which precede. 'Apostles, prophets, and evangelists' were itinerant ministers, preaching wherever they found a door opened to them, while 'pastors and teachers' were attached to some congregation or locality. Philip was a travelling missionary. He went from Jerusalem to preach in Samaria, was on the road to Gaza when he converted the eunuch, was afterwards at Azotus (Ashdod), and passing through he preached the gospel to all the cities, till he came to Caesarea' (Ac 8<sup>5, 26, 40</sup>). Possibly prophets commonly preached to believers, evangelists to unbelievers, while apostles addressed either. This would agree with the frequently quoted dictum, that 'every apostle is an evangelist, but not every evangelist is an apostle.' There is at any rate some evidence that those who acted as missionaries to the heathen were called evangelists. The word itself points to this—'publishers of good tidings.' It is when the first Christians were 'scattered abroad, and went about preaching the word' after the martyrdom of Stephen, that the verb 'to publish the good tidings' is often used by St. Luke (Ac 8<sup>4, 12, 25, 35, 40</sup>), and Philip 'the evangelist' is one of these preachers. An evangelist would know the gospel narrative thoroughly, and would be capable of explaining it, as Philip did to the eunuch. But we need not suppose that Eph 4<sup>11</sup> gives us five orders of ministers specially appointed to discharge five different kinds of duties. No such organization existed. The distinctions of ministry lay in the work that was done by individual workers, and that depended on their personal gifts, which often overlapped (Westcott, Ephesians, 1906, pp. 169-171). Philip was called 'the evangelist' because of his good work in preaching to the heathen. The third passage is 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>, where Timothy is charged to 'do the work of an evangelist' in addition to his other duties. He is in charge of the Church at Ephesus in place of St. Paul; but he is not to omit the work of endeavouring to convert unbelievers.

'Evangelist,' rare in the NT, is not found in the Apostolic Fathers or in the Didache. The use of the word for a writer of a Gospel is later, and the use for one who read the gospel in public worship is perhaps later still. When the reader (αναγνώστης or lector), an official first mentioned by Tertullian (de Præscr. 41), expounded what he read, he resembled the evangelists of apostolic times; but the latter had no written gospel to expound; they expounded the oral gospel, which they knew by heart. The description of them given by Eusebius (HE iii. 37), though somewhat rhetorical, is worthy of quotation.

'They preached the gospel more and more widely and scattered the saving seeds of the Kingdom of Heaven broadly throughout the whole world. For, indeed, very many of the disciples of that time (i.e. disciples of the apostles), whose soul had been stricken by the Divine Word with a more ardent love for philosophy (i.e. the ascetic life), had previously fulfilled the Saviour's injunction by distributing their possessions to the needy. Then setting out on long journeys they performed the duty of evangelists, being eager to preach Christ to those who had never yet heard anything of the word of faith, and to pass on to them the Scripture of the Divine Gospels. These men were content with simply laying foundations of the faith in various foreign places, and then appointed others as pastors, entrusting them with the husbandry of those newly reclaimed, while they themselves went on again to other countries and nations with the grace and co-operation of God.'

Harnack (Mission and Expansion of Christianity, 1908, i. 321 n.) thinks that 'evangelists' has been inserted in Eph 4<sup>11</sup> into the usual list of 'apostles, prophets, and teachers' because this circular Epistle is addressed to churches which had been founded by missionaries who were not apostles; also (p. 338) that 'evangelists' were not placed next to the 'apostles,' because the combination 'apostles and prophets' was too well established to be disturbed. There was no such close connexion between 'prophets' and 'teachers.' The shortness of the list of gifted and given persons in Eph 4<sup>11</sup> as compared with the three lists in 1 Co 12 may be taken as evidence that the regular exercise of extraordinary gifts was already dying out. Yet in the short list in Eph 4<sup>11</sup> there are two items which are not found in any of the other lists, viz. 'evangelists' and 'pastors.'

A. PLUMMER.

EVE (Ἔβα).—Eve was (according to J, Gn 3<sup>20</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>) the wife of Adam (g.v.) and the mother of the human race. (1) St. Paul recalls the story of her fall as a warning to his young and attractive, but weak and unstable, Corinthian Church. As God presented Eve, a pure virgin, to Adam, so St. Paul has espoused his Church to Christ, and hopes to present her as His bride at His speedy return. He fears, however, that as the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness, so the Church may be corrupted from the simplicity and purity of her devotion to Christ. St. Paul's noun παρουσία (craftiness) represents the Heb. נָחָשׁ of Gn 3<sup>1</sup> better than the adjective φρόνιμος of the LXX does. It was apparently the teaching of the Rabbis that the serpent literally seduced Eve (4 Mac 18<sup>6-8</sup>; cf. Iren. c. Hær. i. xxx. 7); and a Church which should let herself be drawn away from Christ, who has the right to His bride's whole-hearted love, would be guilty of spiritual fornication. The identification of the serpent with the devil, which was far from the thoughts of the writer of Gn 3, first appears in Wis 2<sup>4</sup>, 'But by the envy of the devil death entered into the world' (cf. Ro 16<sup>20</sup>, Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>).

(2) The writer of 1 Tim. (2<sup>13-14</sup>) uses the story of the Fall for the purpose of proving woman's natural inferiority to man. He remarks that man was not beguiled, but that 'the woman'—a word spoken with the same accent of contempt as in Gn 3<sup>12</sup>—being beguiled, fell into transgression. The writer appears to think, like Milton, that the man knew better, and sinned, not under stress of temptation, but in generous sympathy with his frail partner, whose fate he resolved to share. This is, of course, a man's account of the origin of sin, and happily the original story, with all the Rabbinical and other unworthy inferences that have been drawn from it, is no longer among the Christian credenda. EVIL.—This article is not a study of the word 'evil' as substantive, adjective, or adverb in the two senses of 'bad' and 'hurtful,' for which the use of a concordance may suffice; but of the conception of evil in the apostolic writings. Three senses of the term have been distinguished by Leibniz: metaphysical—the necessary imperfection of the creature as compared with the Creator; physical—pain, suffering, sorrow, death; and moral—sin. Although the NT does assert the difference between God and the world and man, and the inferiority of the made to the Maker, it does not conceive creatureliness as itself evil, but expresses its limitation and impotence in the term 'flesh.' For this aspect see art. FLESH. The art. SIN deals with the third sense of the word 'evil.' It is thus with physical evil alone that we are here concerned. Its existence in manifold forms is assumed by all the apostolic writers; but generally it is with the sufferings of Christian believers, including persecution, that they are concerned, in order to encourage patience, offer comfort, or assure deliverance.

What these sorrows were, Paul's account of his own experience shows (Ac 20<sup>18-35</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>4-10</sup> 11<sup>23-33</sup>. cf. Ro 8<sup>35-36</sup>). This experience is regarded as a sharing of Christ's sufferings (2 Co 1<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>), and even as a completion of that suffering for the good of the Church (Col 1<sup>24</sup>). 'Paul does not claim to fill up the defects in Christ's earthly suffering or in the sufferings of the Church, but in the sufferings which he has to endure in his flesh, which are Christ's sufferings, because he and Christ are one' (Peake, EGT, 'Col.', 1903, p. 515). Suffering is a means of entering into closer fellowship with Christ (Ph 3<sup>10</sup>). As suffering was a condition of perfecting Christ Himself for His work (He 2<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>723</sup>), so also it perfects Christian character if properly endured (Ro 5<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>3</sup>, He 10<sup>36</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>10</sup>). It is to be regarded not as penal, but as chastening (He 12<sup>7-11</sup>, Ja 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>). It cannot separate from the love of God (Ro 8<sup>35-39</sup>), and it prepares for, and secures, the glory hereafter (Eph 3<sup>13</sup>, Rev 7<sup>14</sup>), with which it is not worthy to be compared (Ro 8<sup>18</sup>), since the companions of Christ's sufferings will also be the partners of His reign (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>5</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>11-13</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>). Of all evils death is regarded as the greatest, and in Paul we find a painful shrinking from it (2 Co 5<sup>1-8</sup>); accordingly, it is evident how precious a comfort was the Christian hope of immortality and resurrection (Ro 8<sup>23-25</sup>). Since death is regarded as the penalty of sin (Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> 6<sup>21-23</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>1-17</sup> 58), the salvation in Christ includes deliverance from death for the believer, and finally the abolition of death (1 Co 15<sup>24-28</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>) and all other evils (Rev 21<sup>4</sup>). Behind death, sin, and all evil, the Apostolic Church saw the devil and other powers of wickedness (Eph 4<sup>27</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>5</sup>, He 2<sup>14</sup>, Ja 4<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>3</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>, Rev 12<sup>9</sup>), and accordingly Christ's work, especially His death (Col 2<sup>15</sup>), was regarded as a victory over all evil powers (1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup>).

This teaching is for the most part experimental and practical, and can still minister comfort and encouragement to the Christian believer. There are two speculative elements in it which modern Christian faith cannot unquestioningly accept—the connexion of death with sin as its penalty, and the existence of the devil and other evil powers. As regards the first point, the writer ventures to repeat a few sentences he has written elsewhere. 'It is generally admitted that death is a natural necessity for animal organisms such as man's, and that before man was in the world death prevailed. It seems vain to justify Paul by speculations such as these: that God anticipating sin introduced death into the natural order as a penalty already prepared for sin, or that, had man preserved his innocence, he might have risen above this natural necessity. Paul's interest is primarily in the moral character and the religious consciousness. What he was concerned with was man's sense of the mystery and dread of the desolation of death, man's looking for judgment after death. In such totality, including what man thinks of, and feels about, death, surely Paul's view of the connexion between sin and death is not altogether false. It is man's sense of guilt that invests death with its terror (1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>). Nor are we warranted in saying that conscience here is playing tricks on man, frightening him with illusions. If there be indeed a moral order in the world, an antagonism of God to sin, and if, as there is reason to believe, there is a moral continuity between this life and the next, such a change as death is may be conceived as fraught with moral significance, as introducing the soul into such conditions as have been determined by the judgment of God on the moral character of this life' (Studies of Paul and his Gospel, 1911, pp. 146-7). As regards the second point, one sentence regarding Paul will suffice. 'In his cosmology, angelology, and demonology, as well as his eschatology, he remains essentially Jewish' (op. cit. p. 17); and this is equally true of the whole Apostolic Church. Christian faith need not burden itself with this load of Jewish beliefs.

There are two passages in which Paul attempts a theodicy (Ro 8<sup>18-25</sup> and 9-11), the first dealing with Nature and the second with human history. In the first passage he attributes to Nature consciousness of, and a dissatisfaction with, its present imperfection—a desire for, and an expectation of, its completion. He includes Nature in man's grievous disaster, but also in his glorious destiny. As by the sin he has committed he has brought misery, so by the grace he will receive he will impart blessing. We are unable to accept 'Paul's account of the origin of physical evil as altogether due to man's sin. There can, however, be no doubt that man has a vital, organic relation to his environment. The evolution of the world and the development of humanity are not independent but connected processes. If we are warranted in believing in the progress of the race, we are justified in hoping for a correspondent and consequent transformation of the universe. For the perfect man we may expect the perfect home' (Romans [Century Bible, 1901], p. 193). In the second passage we are not here concerned with the argument as a whole, but only with Paul's conclusion, that, as the unbelief of the Jews has opened the door for the faith of the Gentiles, so the gathering in of the Gentiles will lead to the restoration of the Jews. 'For God hath shut up all unto disobedience, that he might have mercy upon all' (Ro 11<sup>32</sup>). Without ascribing to Paul on the ground of this and similar passages a dogmatic universalism, against which there is contrary evidence throughout the NT, we may assign to the Apostolic Church the hope of the final victory of Christ over all evil. The apostolic attitude towards the problem of evil cannot be described as optimism, for the reality of sin and pain is too seriously and sympathetically recognized, nor as pessimism, for the possibility of redemption is too confidently and persuasively urged, but it may be spoken of as meliorism, for it has the faith which claims a present salvation for every believer, and the hope of a final fulfilment of God's purpose of grace, and both are linked with a love that sees in human need and pain an opportunity for service and sacrifice, in which man can regard himself as a fellow-worker with God in the solution of the problem of evil. To revert to the distinctions made in the beginning of this article, the apostolic view recognizes no metaphysical evil, for to be the creature, subject, and child of God, is for man only good; it links physical with moral evil, and makes deliverance from pain dependent on salvation from sin; and it throws all the emphasis on moral evil; for it is concerned not with the speculative intellect, but only with the moral conscience and religious consciousness of man.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

EVIL-SPEAKING.—In Greek, as in English, there is a rich vocabulary expressive of different shades of this prevalent sin.

(1) καταλαλεῖν is 'to speak down,' 'to detract.' κατάλαλοι is translated 'backbiters' (Ro 1<sup>30</sup>), and κατάλαλαι 'backbitings' (2 Co 12<sup>20</sup>), but evil-speaking does not necessarily take place behind the back, or in the absence of the person hated. κατάλαλοι form one of the many types which are the outcome of the reprobate mind (Ro 1<sup>30</sup>), and Christian converts, as new-born babes, must put away all κατάλαλαι (1 P 2<sup>1-2</sup>; cf. Ja 4<sup>11</sup>). The best people in the world cannot escape the breath of detraction, and in the Apostolic Age the Christians were regarded as 'genus hominum superstitionis novae et maleficae' (Suet. Nero, 16), accused of 'odium generis humani' (Tac. Ann. xv. 44), and suspected of committing the most infamous crimes in their secret assemblies. In such an atmosphere of calumny they made it their endeavour to live in such a manner that their detractors should not only be put to shame (1 P 3<sup>16</sup>), but even constrained by their good works to glorify God (2<sup>12</sup>. cf. Mt 5<sup>16</sup>).

(2) βλασφημεῖν (βλάσφημος, βλασφημία) is a stronger term, including all kinds of evil-speaking against men as well as against God. In a number of passages it is difficult to decide whether 'blasphemy' or 'rail' is the precise meaning of the word (Ac 13<sup>45</sup> 18<sup>6</sup> 26<sup>11</sup> etc.). St. Paul has a full share of βλασφημία; he is 'evil spoken of' (1 Co 10<sup>30</sup>) and 'slandereously reported' (Ro 3<sup>8</sup>). While the Gentiles speak evil of the followers of Christ (1 P 4<sup>4</sup>), the latter must calumniate no man (Tit 3<sup>2</sup>); railing (βλασφημία) is one of the sins of temper and tongue which they are repeatedly enjoined to put away (Eph 4<sup>31</sup>, Col 3<sup>3</sup>). At the same time they must strive to prevent their 'good,' or 'the word of God,' or 'the way of truth,' or 'the name of God and the doctrine,' from being blasphemed, or evil spoken of (Ro 14<sup>16</sup>, Tit 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>1</sup>). St. Paul affirms that the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of the Jews (Ro 2<sup>24</sup>). The false teachers and libertines of the sub-Apostolic Age spoke evil of the powers of the unseen world (2 P 2<sup>10</sup>, Jude 10); and their empty logomachies gave rise to mutual railings (βλασφημιαί, 1 Ti 6<sup>4</sup>). See, further, art. BLASPHEMY.

(3) διάβολος (from διαβάλλω, Lk 16<sup>1</sup>), which denotes, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, the 'chief slanderer,' or 'devil,' is applied also to any ordinary calumniator. Women who are called to the office of the diaconate must not be slanderers (1 Ti 3<sup>11</sup>), and the same applies to aged women who are to influence the younger by their words and example (Tit 2<sup>3</sup>). In grievous post-apostolic times, which seemed the last, many bad types of character became prominent, including διάβολοι (2 Ti 3<sup>3</sup>).

(4) λοιδορεῖν (a word of uncertain derivation) is invariably translated 'revile' in the RV, whereas the AV has 'rail' and 'speak reproachfully' as variations. St. Paul says of the apostles that being reviled they bless (1 Co 4<sup>12</sup>); that the so-called brother who is a reviler (λοιδορός) is to be shunned (5<sup>11</sup>); and that revilers shall not inherit the Kingdom of God (6<sup>10</sup>). For seeming to revile the high priest Ananias in a moment of just anger, St. Paul was quick to make apology (Ac 24<sup>4</sup>). In a time of persecution St. Peter turns the minds of his readers to the perfect example of Christ, who, being reviled, reviled not again (1 P 2<sup>23</sup>), and bids them render, as He did, 'contrariwise blessing' (3<sup>9</sup>).

(5) Analogous terms are κακολογεῖν, 'to speak evil of' (Ac 19<sup>9</sup>), ἀντιλέγειν, 'to speak against' (2S<sup>22</sup>), and δυσφημία, 'evil report,' which the servant of Christ learns to accept, equally with εὐφημία, as part of his lot (2 Co 6<sup>8</sup>). 'Being defamed (δυσφημούμενοι), we bless' (1 Co 4<sup>13</sup>).

EXALTATION.—See ASCENSION.

EXCOMMUNICATION.—Excommunication is a form of ecclesiastical censure involving exclusion from the membership of the Church. Such exclusion may be temporary or permanent. It may cut off the offender from all communion and every privilege, or it may be less severe, allowing some intercourse and certain benefits.

1. The term.—The word 'excommunication' is not found in AV or RV, nor are the obsolete forms 'excommunion' (Milton), 'excommenge' (Holinshed), 'excommunicated' (Gayton). There are general references to the subject, and one or two cases are mentioned with some detail. The Greek verb ἀφορίζω signifies 'mark off from (ἀπό) by a boundary (ὄρος). It is used sometimes in a good sense (e.g. Ac 13<sup>2</sup>, Ro 1<sup>1</sup>, Gal 1<sup>15</sup>), and sometimes in a bad one (e.g. Lk 6<sup>22</sup>; note the three degrees of evil treatment—ἀφορίζωσιν, ονειδίζωσιν, ἐκβάλλωσιν τὸ ὄνομα). See also Mt 13<sup>49</sup> 25<sup>32</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>1</sup>, Gal 2<sup>12</sup>. It is employed by various Greek writers—Sophocles, Euripides, Plato, and others—and is found frequently in the LXX. Excommunicatio is a Latin word of later origin. It is used in the Vulgate.

2. Warrant for the practice in the Apostolic Church.—Excommunication in apostolic times rested upon a threefold warrant.

(1) Natural and inherent right.—Every properly constituted society has the right and power to exclude members not conforming to its rules. The Church has authority to exercise a right which every society claims. An analogy is sometimes drawn between the Church and the State. The State has power to send into exile, to deprive of civil rights, and even claims and exercises the power to inflict a death-sentence. So, in spiritual matters, the Church may pass sentences of separation more or less complete, and though the supreme judge alone can pronounce the sentence of death in an absolute sense, yet the Church can pass such a sentence in a relative sense—the offender being regarded as dead from the standpoint of the ecclesiastical court. Upon this point—whether in excommunication and in 'binding and loosing' the power of the Church is final and absolute—two divergent views have been held. As typical of these two schools of thought, see Dante, de Mon. III. viii. 36 ff., and Tarquini, Juris eccl. Inst., Rome, 1875, p. 98. The former declares it is not absolute, 'sed respectiva ad aliquid. . . Posset [enim] solvere me non poenitentem, quod etiam facere ipse Deus non posset'; the latter states that St. Peter (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>) is invested with 'potestas clavium, quae est absoluta et monarchica.'

(2) The example of the Jewish nation and Church.—In the Pentateuch it is stated that certain heinous sins cannot be forgiven. By some form of excommunication or by death itself the sinner is to be 'cut off.' Thus the sanctity of the nation is restored and preserved. In the later days of Judaism the penalties became somewhat milder as a general rule. The foundations of Jewish excommunication are Lv 13<sup>46</sup>, Nu 5<sup>2, 3</sup> 12<sup>14, 15</sup> 16, Jg 5<sup>23</sup>, Ezr 7<sup>26</sup>, Neh 13<sup>25</sup>. The effects are described in Ezr 7<sup>26</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>. The Talmud mentions three kinds of excommunication, the first two disciplinary, the third complete and final expulsion. There was separation, separation with a curse, and final separation with a terrible anathema. For Gospel references see Lk 6-, Jn 9<sup>22, 34, 35</sup> 12<sup>12</sup> 16<sup>2</sup>. The sentence might be pronounced on twenty-four different grounds.

(3) The authority of Jesus Christ.—The main basis of authority for the Christian Church is the teaching of its Founder. The passages of most importance on the subject under consideration are Mt 16<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup>. Excommunication must be preceded by private and public exhortation, conducted in the spirit of love, with caution, wisdom, and patience. Only as a last resort, and when all else has failed, must the sentence of banishment be pronounced (see Mt 13<sup>24-30, 36-43, 47-50</sup>). From Christ Himself the Church received authority, not only to 'bind' the impenitent and unbelieving and to 'loose' the penitent believer, but also, in its properly constituted courts, to condemn and expel gross offenders and to forgive and re-instate them if truly penitent.

3. Legislation in the Apostolic Church.—The general methods of procedure are made clear by St. Paul's method of dealing with the case of the incestuous person at Corinth (1 Co 5<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>6-11</sup>). The excommunication of the offender was a solemn, deliberate, judicial act of the members of the Church specially gathered together 'in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ' for the purpose, and equipped with the authority and 'power of our Lord Jesus Christ.' The act of exclusion was that of the Church itself and not of the Apostle Paul. The power was not in the hands of an official, or body of officials. Wherever it has become the prerogative of a priesthood it has led to great abuse and the results have been disastrous both to priests and people.

The object of this act of discipline was to reform the sinner (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>), and to preserve the purity of the Church. Where a difference of opinion existed as to the course to be pursued, the verdict was decided by the majority (2 Co 2<sup>9</sup>). The sentence might be modified or rescinded according to subsequent events (2<sup>o-8</sup>). 'To deliver such a one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus' (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>), is an obscure passage. Perhaps St. Paul thought that a sin of the flesh was more likely to be cured by bodily suffering than in any other way. In his opinion certain afflictions of the body were due to the operations of Satan (2 Co 2<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>). Probably he thought that, in accordance with the sentence of the Church, God would allow Satan to inflict some physical malady that would lead the offender to repentance. If we may take 2 Co 2<sup>6-11</sup> to refer to the same case, the desired result was reached.

'It cannot have been unknown to Paul that he was here using a form of words similar to the curses by which the Corinthians had formerly been accustomed to consign their personal enemies to destruction by the powers of the world of death. It seems not open to doubt that the Corinthians would understand by this phrase that the offender was to suffer disease and even death as a punishment for sin; and Paul goes on to add that this punishment of the flesh is intended to bring salvation ultimately to his soul (ὡς τὸ πνεῦμα σωθῇ): by physical suffering he is to atone for his sin. . . . The whole thought stands in the closest relation to the theory of the confession-inscriptions, in which those who have been punished by the god thank and bless him for the chastisement' (Ramsay in ExpT x. [1898-99] 59).

For cases in which physical ill followed ecclesiastical censure see Ac 5<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>-9</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>. Some hold that the 'delivery to Satan' was by virtue of the special authority of St. Paul himself, while the Church had power to expel only. There is nothing in the text to support such a view. This punishment must not be confounded with the anathema of Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8, 9</sup>. 'The attempt to explain the word (ἀνάθεμα) to mean "excommunication" from the society—a later use of the Hebrew in Rabbinical writers and the Greek in ecclesiastical—arose from a desire to take away the apparent profanity of the wish' (Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> [ICC, 1902], p. 228). Calvin and some other reformers thought the expression ἀνάθεμα. Μαὶὰν ἀθὰ (1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>) was a formula of excommunication. Buxtorf (Lex. Chald., Basel, 1639, pp. 827, 2466) says it was part of a Jewish cursing formula from the Prophecy of Enoch (Jude<sup>14</sup>). There is no reason for such an opinion. It was not held until the meaning of the words was lost or partially so. They are neither connected nor synonymous as some have supposed, and are rightly separated in RV—'If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema. Maran atha' (cf. Ph 4<sup>5</sup>).

In addition to the specific case at Corinth and general references in such passages as 1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>14</sup> (cf. Ro 16<sup>17</sup>, Ja 5<sup>16</sup>), we find more precise directions in later books—the Pastoral Epistles and General Epistles of St. John (see 1 Ti 5<sup>19, 20</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>, Tit 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>8, 9</sup> 5<sup>16</sup>, 2 Jn 1<sup>0</sup>, 3 Jn 9<sup>10</sup>). Heresy, schism, insubordination, usurpation of the authority of the Church by a section, became grounds of excommunication. The morals, doctrine, and government of the Church were all imperilled at times and could be preserved only by strict discipline and severe penalties upon wrong-doers. As in the Jewish community, the sentence of excommunication might be lighter or heavier, the exclusion being more or less complete. It might mean only expulsion from the Lord's Table, but not from the Lord's House; or it might be utter banishment from the Lord's House and an interdict against all social intercourse with its members.

It is beyond the scope of this article to trace the history of excommunication in the Christian Church. Suffice it to say that the distinction between the minor (ἀφορισμός) and major (παντελής ἀφορισμός ἀνάθεμα) forms of it, which existed from very early times, if not from the Apostolic Age itself, were continued for centuries with a wealth of elaborate detail as to the exact penalties involved in each, and as to the attitude of those within the Church to those without its pale. Unfortunately, excommunication often became an instrument of oppression in the hands of unworthy men. In mediæval days it frequently entailed outlawry and sometimes death.

'The censures of the Church, reserved in her early days for the gravest moral and spiritual offences, soon lost their salutary terrors when excommunications became incidents in territorial squabbles, or were issued on the most trivial pretext; and when the unchristian penalty of the interdict sought to coerce the guilty by robbing the innocent of the privilege of Christian worship and even of burial itself' (A. Robertson, Regnum Dei [Bampton Lectures, 1901], p. 257).

EXHORTATION. — Exhortation (παράκλησις) played an important part in the apostolic ministry. As a technical term for a specific kind of Christian teaching, it first emerges in Acts and in the Epistles. No mention of it (as such) appears in the Gospels. They record the facts and teaching of Christ upon which the later exhortations were founded. Exhortation, or παράκλησις, may be described as a summons to the will, an appeal—urgent, persuasive, and even authoritative—which was based sometimes on Scripture (Ac 13<sup>15</sup>) or apostolic teaching (1 Ti 6<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), but more especially on Christian prophecy (Ac 15<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>3, 31</sup>). It was what we call in modern sermons the ‘application.’ Prophesying and exhorting naturally went together in the proclamation of salvation. Cremer holds that exhortation belongs ‘to the domain of prophecy, and is like this a special charisma (Ro 12<sup>8</sup>), though it does not appear to have manifested itself separately as such’ (Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek<sup>3</sup>, p. 337). Generally, no doubt, it was given by the Apostle or prophet himself, e.g. by St. Peter (Ac 2<sup>40</sup>), by Barnabas (Ac 11<sup>3</sup>), by St. Paul (Ac 13<sup>15</sup>), but at times, so it would appear from Ro 12<sup>8</sup>, the one who did the ‘exhorting’ might be a different speaker from the one who gave the ‘prophecy’ or ‘teaching.’ Frequently, indeed, especially in times of persecution or unrest, it consisted in a mutual exchange of encouragement or warning among believers (1 Th 4<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>, He 3<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>25</sup>).

As the word παράκλησις has many shades of meaning, so the ‘exhortations’ referred to in the NT have many tones of emotional stimulus. In fact, the character of the exhortation was determined by the circumstances which called it forth. In times of threatened apostasy it was admonitory; amid persecution and danger it promoted comfort. Often παράκλησις can only mean ‘comfort’ (q.v.), and in all such instances it is so translated in both AV and RV (Ac 9<sup>31</sup>, Ro 15<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>3</sup>); but in all cases where the AV renders it ‘exhortation’ the RV does the same (except in 1 Co 14<sup>3</sup>, where it might with advantage be retained instead of ‘comfort’). Similarly the verb παράκαλεω is often appropriately translated ‘comfort’ in both versions, but, again, wherever in AV the sense requires ‘exhort’ it so appears in the text of RV (except in Ac 18<sup>27</sup> ‘encourage’ and 2 Co 9<sup>5</sup> ‘intreat’). To grasp the meaning of ‘exhort’ and ‘exhortation,’ as technical terms, it should be noticed that the verb παράκαλεω is, in many cases, translated ‘pray’ or ‘desire’ in AV, and ‘beseech’ or ‘intreat’ in RV when, however, the appeal so expressed springs from some personal wish or judgment, whereas the terms ‘exhort’ and ‘exhortation’ are retained for instances where the basis of appeal is some Divinely-given truth or revelation (cf. παρεκάλουν, ‘besought,’ Ac 13<sup>4</sup>, and παρεκαλούντες, ‘exhorting,’ Ac 14<sup>2</sup>). Exhortation proper (i.e. as part of the apostolic ministry), while it contained elements of personal entreaty (‘we beseech and exhort’ [1 Th 4<sup>1</sup>]), partook more of the nature of a spiritually authoritative message (‘as though God were intreating, or exhorting [θεοῦ παρακαλούντος], by us,’ 2 Co 5<sup>0</sup>; cf. 1 Th 2<sup>36</sup>), reproving (Tit 2<sup>15</sup>), encouraging (1 Th 2<sup>11</sup>), commanding (2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>), strengthening (Ac 14<sup>22</sup>, 15<sup>3</sup>), edifying (1 Th 5<sup>11</sup>), and, where successful, leading the hearers to a proper state of mind or to right conduct (Tit 2<sup>6</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>15</sup>).

to the congregations, generally in their meetings for edification, either verbal (Ac 13<sup>15</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>3</sup>) or epistolary (Ac 15<sup>3</sup>, He 13<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>12</sup>, Jude<sup>3</sup>).

Naturally exhortation was prominent at a time when a speedy Second Coming of Christ was expected (‘exhorting . . . so much the more as ye see the day drawing nigh,’ He 10<sup>25</sup>; cf. 1 Th 4<sup>15</sup>). The power of exhortation was regarded as one of the charismata, or ‘gifts’ bestowed by the Holy Spirit, for the edification of believers (Ro 12<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>3</sup>). Barnabas, or ‘son of exhortation,’ was so surnamed by the apostles (Ac 4<sup>36</sup> RVm) because he was endowed with a large measure of this gift (Ac 11<sup>3</sup>). But it was a gift that could be cultivated. Its intensity and power could be increased by proper attention, and so St. Paul urged Timothy to ‘give heed to exhortation’ as well as to reading and teaching (1 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>).

M. SCOTT FLETCHER.

EXORCISM.—1. Origin and definition.—It is pointed out in the art. DIVINATION that man, at a very early period, came to think of himself as surrounded by innumerable spirits, many of whom could enter into and influence him. He realized that it was his duty, and for his advantage, to cultivate friendly relations with these spirits, and one of the forms which this effort took developed into divination. The coming of a spirit into close relations with a man brought on him either calamities or blessings, and from these opposite results the spirits came to be grouped into good and bad. The entrance of a good spirit—a spirit of purity or truth—caused health of body or clearness of mind. Such indwelling in its highest form is inspiration (Job 32<sup>8</sup>). The entrance of a bad spirit—a dumb, unclean, or evil spirit—caused disease of body or disorder of mind. In its most decided form this is possession (q.v.). The spirits, and the divinities into which some of them developed, were free to enter into or leave a person, but their freedom was limited. As ‘the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets’ (1 Co 14<sup>32</sup>), so certain persons came to know how, by a proper use of special words and acts, to make the spirits, within certain limits, obedient to them. (1) Such experts were able to bring a person into such close contact with a spirit, or the thing in which a spirit or divinity dwelt, that the spirit could deal effectively with the person. Such bringing into contact developed, (a) where the person was able or willing, into administering to him an oath; (b) where unable or unwilling, into solemnly adjuring him. (2) An expert could call up, call upon, or permit a spirit to enter another person, to work his will in him; or enter into himself to work with him or reveal secrets to him. (3) He could compel a spirit to come out of a person or thing into which it had entered; with the result, if the spirit was an evil one, that the baneful consequences of possession immediately ceased. The expert who could do this was an exorcist, and his work was exorcism.

2. Derivation.—The word δρκος seems primarily to have referred to a spirit, or an object made sacred by the indwelling of a spirit, and so came to mean the thing that brought a spirit into effective touch with a person, hence ‘an oath.’ ορκίζω, in the same way, came to mean to bring these two together, hence (a) ‘to administer or cause to take an oath’ (Gn 50<sup>6</sup>, Nu 5<sup>19</sup>); or (b) ‘to adjure’ (Jos 6<sup>26</sup>, 1 K 22<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ch 18<sup>15</sup>, Ac 19<sup>13</sup>). When the high priest said to Jesus ορκίζω* σε κατα τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζώντος (Mt 26<sup>63</sup>), he thereby brought the prisoner into such effective touch with Jahweh that the latter could punish him if he did not speak the truth. ἐξορκίζω, on the other hand, meant the separating of the spirit from the person, and from it comes ἐξορκισμός, the Latin exorcismus, and the English 'exorcism.'

'The formula ἐξορκίζω is of Oriental origin. It is absolutely unknown in Greek and Italian tabellae from the fifth century B.C. to the second century A.D.; and, when it does appear, it appears only in tablets which make mention of Oriental deities' (F. B. Jevons, 'Defixionum Tabellae,' in Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, 1903, vol. ii. p. 138). A heathen amulet has the inscription ἐξορκίζω ὑμᾶς κατὰ τὸν ἁγίου ὀνόματος θεραπεύσαι τὸν Διονυσίον; and 'the adjective is of constant occurrence in the magic papyri' (Moulton and Milligan, 'Lexical Notes from the Papyri' in Expositor, 7th ser. vii. [1909] 376).

3. History.—As the cause of disease was the incoming of an evil spirit, so the cure of the disease consisted in its expulsion. All exorcists were not equally clever at their work; but, though a patient might, like an old Babylonian, complain that 'the exorcist has not handled my illness successfully' (F. B. Jevons, Comparative Religion, 1913, p. 7), still failures were overlooked and forgotten, and exorcism prevailed among all the nations of antiquity, and prevails among all uncivilized peoples to-day (G. T. Bettany, Primitive Religions, 1891, pp. 20, 113, 128; The Book of Ser Marco Polo, tr. H. Yule, 1871, vol. ii. pp. 71, 78).* Sometimes, as in the lustratio of the Romans (W. Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, 1911, p. 209) and the Anthesteria of the Greeks (Gilbert Murray, Four Stages of Greek Religion, 1912, p. 30), the exorcism was national and periodic.

In private life, when a person became ill ('was possessed'), an exorcist was at once called in who by various means attempted a cure. David by music expelled the evil spirit from Saul (1 S 16<sup>14-23</sup>), though, when the spirit came mightily, he failed (19<sup>9</sup>; Jos. Ant. vi. viii. 2 and xi. 3). Embracing (another form of exorcism) is mentioned in 1 K 17<sup>1-2</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>34</sup>, Ac 20<sup>10</sup>. Solomon, according to tradition, acquired a great reputation as an expert practitioner of the art—'a science,' says Josephus (Ant. viii. ii. 5), 'useful and sanative to man.' He composed incantations by which cures were effected, and also formulas by which demons could be expelled. These were used as late as the time of Vespasian, a notable instance being recorded by Josephus (loc. cit.; see also his account of the root of Baaras [BJ vii. vi. 3]). In the OT Apocrypha there are such references to the art as that in To 6<sup>16-17</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>. Our Lord† accepted the beliefs of His time on this as on other matters. His words and deeds show us the evil spirits going out of a patient (Mt 17<sup>18</sup>, Mk 5<sup>8</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>, Mk 9<sup>5-26</sup>); entering into lower animals (Mt 8<sup>28</sup>, Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>33</sup>); wandering through waterless places (Mt 12<sup>43</sup>, Lk 11<sup>24</sup>); co-operating with other spirits (Mt 12<sup>45</sup>, Lk 11<sup>26</sup>); and re-entering the patients from whom they had been expelled (Mt 12<sup>45</sup>, Lk 11<sup>26</sup>). In contrast to the exorcists of His time (Mt 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 11<sup>19</sup>), our Lord exhibited exceptional skill and unbroken success in the expulsion of evil spirits. He healed 'all who were tyrannized over by the devil' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>).‡ Exorcism, it must be observed, is not nearly so prominent in the First Gospel as in the Third, and all instances of its use are omitted in the Fourth (J. Moffatt, The Theology of the Gospels, 1912, pp. 13, 120; J. M. Thompson, Miracles in the NT, 1911, p. 63). It is especially noteworthy that our Lord in expelling evil spirits employed no outward means (except once, the spittle [Jn 9<sup>6</sup>]); He simply commanded and it was done.* Perhaps the secret of His power, His triumphant and universal success, and of the failure of others, is revealed in His words, 'this kind cometh not out except by prayer' (Mk 9<sup>29</sup>).† Prayer is the complete opening up of one's entire personality to the incoming of the entire personality of God. Jesus was able to do this and did it; others failed and fail.

The Twelve, after being chosen, were ordained to be with Jesus in order that they might go forth (a) to preach, (b) to have power to heal diseases, and (c) ἐκβάλλειν τὰ δαιμόνια (Mk 3<sup>14, 15</sup>, Mt 10<sup>1</sup>). When He did send them forth, He gave them power to cast out all unclean spirits (Mt 10<sup>1</sup>, Mk 6<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>1</sup>). St. John reported to Jesus that he and other disciples saw one casting out demons in His name (Mk 9<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>49</sup>); while, on the other hand, the disciples sometimes failed in their efforts at expulsion (Mt 17<sup>19</sup>). Our Lord sent out the Seventy (a) to heal, (b) to proclaim the nearness of the Kingdom (Lk 10<sup>9</sup>). When they returned, they reported that the spirits were subject to them in His name‡ (Lk 10<sup>17</sup>). Finally, Jesus bequeathed to those who should believe power in His name to cast out demons (Mk 16<sup>17</sup>). After the death of Jesus the apostles continued to cure those troubled (or 'roused,' ἐχλουμένους, Lk 6<sup>18</sup>) with unclean spirits (Ac 5<sup>16</sup>), and a similar power was exercised by other Christians over spirits which came out 'shouting with a loud cry' (Ac 8<sup>7</sup>).

When the Christian missionaries penetrated into the Roman Empire, they met the victims of possession, and had to deal with them. At Philippi, St. Paul and Silas encountered a young girl, the slave of a group of masters, who was possessed by a spirit—a Python,§ which enabled her to utter predictions.|| The girl so forced herself upon the missionaries' attention that at last St. Paul, 'in the name‡ of Jesus Christ,' commanded the spirit to come out of her, which it immediately did (Ac 16<sup>16-18</sup>). Again, at Ephesus, a city in which exorcism flourished, St. Paul seems to have cast out spirits in the name‡ of Jesus. Further cures of a somewhat uncommon (οὐ τὰς τυχούσας) character were effected, for on certain articles of dress which had been in immediate contact with the body (ἀπὸ τοῦ χρωτός¶) of St. Paul being applied to those afflicted, the evil spirits came out of them (Ac 19<sup>11</sup>).

Such success roused a competitive spirit in the minds of other exorcists and revealed to them the power which lay in the use of the name of Jesus. Seven sons of Sceva, a Jewish high priest, who formed a company of strolling exorcists, determined to utilize the new power. Over a man afflicted with an evil spirit they pronounced this formula: ὀρκίζω ὑμᾶς τὸν Ἰησοῦν ὃν Παῦλος κηρύσσει. The effort proved more than futile, for the recitation of the formula, instead of bringing Jesus into such effective touch with the man that the evil spirit had to yield possession to Him, roused the spirit to stir into activity that abnormal muscular strength often possessed by those mentally deranged (cf. Lk 8<sup>9</sup>), and, leaping on the exorcists, the man assaulted them and drove them out of the house stripped and wounded (Ac 19<sup>13-16</sup>). The men who had become Christians realized the incompatibility of loyalty to Jesus and the practice of such magical arts, and they publicly burned their copies of the famous Ἐφέσια γράμματα (v. 19).

That this did not mean the absolute abandonment of exorcism the subsequent history of the Church all too clearly proves. The reference to 'doctrines of demons' (1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>) and 'the spirits of demons performing signs' (Rev 16<sup>14</sup>) shows how exorcism still lingered in the Church. The words which shed light on the struggle from the higher Christian standpoint are those in Ja 4<sup>7</sup>: 'resist the devil, and he will flee from you'—words which were an exhortation to the Christians not to resort to exorcism, but to rely on the successful resistance which sprang from a strong exertion of their sanctified wills aided by the power of God. The means employed by exorcists differ in different times and countries. Four only are referred to in the Apostolic Age—hands, cloths, the name of Jesus, and shadowing.

When we pass to the literature of the Fathers, we cannot help being struck with the almost total absence of references to exorcism. This is possibly to be accounted for by the fact that the work of these writers forced them to think more of evangelism and apologetic than of combating the evils of the heathen world. In the spurious Ignatian Epistle to the Philippians (ch. v.) Christ is by way of honour called 'this magician' (μάγος οὗτος), and in the spurious Epistle to the Antiochians (ch. xii.) we find 'the exorcists' (ἐπορκιστάς) mentioned among the Church officials.

The practice of exorcism continued in the Church. The ordinary Christian practised it, Gregory Thaumaturgus even casting out devils by sending letters to the person possessed. As a rule, however, the practice was confined to the clergy, and by A.D. 340 the ἐπορκιστής constituted a special order, some of whom were ordained, others merely recognized. The rescripts of the Emperors granted to them, as well as to the other orders of clergy, exemption from civil offices. Their work was the care of the possessed, the εὐεργουμένοι, the catechists, heretics, and schismatics, the exorcism being in each case connected with the rites of exsufflation and insufflation (see J. Bingham, Origines Ecclesiasticæ, 1843, vol. i. p. 362 ff. and vol. iii. p. 277 ff.; Smith and Cheetham, DCA, 1875, vol. i. p. 650; ERE, art. 'Abrenuntio', vol. i. p. 38). The office of exorcist continued to be important: we read, e.g., of St. Patrick landing in Ireland with a number of officials among whom were skilled exorcists (A. R. Macewan, History of the Church of Scotland, vol. i., 1913, p. 36).

EXPEDIENCY.—In the NT 'expedient' is several times used in translating the Gr. συμφέρι, or neut. συμφερον (2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>). Other translations of the word are 'it is profitable,' 'it were better,' 'it is good.' It will be seen when we come to consider some of the passages in which συμφερι occurs that it is always used in its better sense, or, we may say, in its original sense, i.e. without that element of selfishness, or the attainment of personal advantage at the expense of genuine principle, in which sense the word 'expedient' is now generally employed. It is never found in the sense of what is convenient, as against what is right; nor has it the meaning of 'expeditions,' as e.g. in Shakespeare:

'Expedient manage must be made, my liege,
Ere further leisure yield them further means.'
(Richard II., i. iv. 39).

We shall first of all refer briefly to some of the passages in the Gospels and the Acts where συμφερι occurs, and then examine the general question of Christian expediency as it is treated in the Epistles.

1. The Gospels.—(1) In Mt 5<sup>24</sup> we have what may be called the expediency of self-denial. Here Christ deals with the question of adultery, and shows how certain members of the body, such as the eye and the hand, which are in themselves serviceable and necessary, may become the occasion of sin for us, and, therefore, it is expedient (συμφερι) for a man that one of his members should perish and not his whole body be cast into hell. There is no need to ask here how far these words of Christ are to be understood literally (cf. A. Tholuck, Sermon on the Mount, 1860, p. 211 ff.). They certainly mean that whatever may bring temptation to a man, it is expedient—it is the best and wisest course—for him to resign; that it is better to live a maimed life, than with all our faculties about us to be destined to moral death. Christ here grounds His precept of the most rigid and decisive self-denial on considerations of the truest self-interest.

(2) In Mt 19<sup>10</sup> we have a reference to the expediency of celibacy. The teaching of Christ concerning divorce led His disciples to the conclusion that, without freedom to divorce, 'it is not good (RV 'expedient') to marry.' Jesus then refers to three classes of persons for whom marriage is inexpedient: (a) eunuchs 'which were so born from their mother's womb,' i.e. those whose physical constitution unfitted them for marriage; (b) eunuchs 'which were made eunuchs of men,' i.e. those who by actual physical deprivation or compulsion from men are prevented from marrying; (c) eunuchs 'which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake,' i.e. those who voluntarily abstain from marriage, not for their own sake only, but also for the sake of all that the Kingdom of Heaven implies. In the case of these three classes it is expedient that they live a celibate life (cf. 1 Co 7<sup>35</sup>).

(3) In Jn 11<sup>50</sup> we have the expediency of Christ's death spoken of by Caiaphas. Here we have 'a good principle basely applied, not in the interests of self-sacrifice, but to cover a violation of justice and truth' (J. A. McClymont, St. John [Cent. Bible, 1901], p. 245). For the preservation of his power and influence, together with that of his confederates, Caiaphas says that it was expedient to put Jesus to death. The falsity of this statement, says F. W. Robertson (Sermons, 1st ser., 1875, p. 132 ff.), lies in its injustice. Expediency cannot obliterate right and wrong. Expediency may choose the best possible when the conceivable best is not obtainable; but in right and wrong there is no better and best. Better that the whole Jewish nation should perish than that a Jewish legislature should steep its hand in the blood of one innocent. That this saying of Caiaphas has made a deep impression upon St. John is evident from his reference to it again in 18<sup>14</sup>. He regards the words as having an origin higher than him who spoke them. It was an unconscious prophecy.

(4) In Jn 16<sup>7</sup> Christ refers to the expediency of His Ascension. 'Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away,' etc. However much the disciples might regret their Master's departure from them, this was not only necessary, but would also be to their advantage, inasmuch as the glorified Christ working in them would be better than the visible Jesus present among them (cf. 14<sup>16a</sup>).

2. The Acts.—In Ac 20<sup>20</sup> we have the expediency of discrimination in teaching. Here St. Paul reminds the elders of Ephesus that he had kept back nothing that was profitable (των συμφερόντων) unto them. As in the case of the Corinthians (1 Co 3<sup>4</sup>) the Apostle confined his statement to the things that were profitable or expedient. In each case he considered what was required by the capacity of his disciples. It is the question of expediency in the matter of truth to be declared. The teacher must discriminate. He must, on the one hand, not cast his pearls before swine, must not give to men what they are incapable of appreciating (Pr 9th, Mt 7<sup>6</sup>); nor must he, on the other hand, give strong food to the weak (He 5th). He must consider what is expedient, profitable.

3. The Epistles.—(1) St. Paul's general attitude in 1 Corinthians.—Here we shall have to deal chiefly with the Epistles to the Corinthians, more especially 1 Corinthians. These Epistles represent the campaign and slow victory of the new Christian spirit over the debasing influence of the Corinthian ideal, which was the relentless pursuit of his own life by each individual. In 1 Cor. the question of expediency is treated in connexion with several matters relating to Christian conduct. This Epistle has been aptly called 'the Epistle of the doctrine of the cross in application' (Findlay, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle, p. 83). Social and other questions are discussed in their bearing on the relationship of men to Christ, and upon principles deduced from the word of the Cross. And so the keynote of the Epistle is found in 16th 'Let all you do be done in love.' The first direct reference to expediency is found in 6th 'All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient' (ἀλλ' οὐ πάντα συμφέρει). It is probable that St. Paul here refers to some saying of his, which was subsequently drawn out of its limiting context by some members of the Corinthian Church who were inclined to exaggerate Christian liberty, so that they could please themselves in the matter of food, drink, etc.; or, still worse, that with an easy conscience they might satisfy their own sinful lusts. Consequently, the Apostle shows that, while he still held to what he had said, the words have by no means an unlimited application. It was necessary to show the Corinthians that there is an essential contrast between things in themselves indifferent and things in their very nature evil. The latter can be neither lawful nor expedient to the Christian, since they are grossly inconsistent with his union with Christ.

It must be remembered that pagan sentiment viewed ordinary sexual laxity in anything but a serious light; in fact, it was a prevalent belief among the heathen in apostolic times that fornication was no sin. Hence the need for its prohibition by the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15).

On the other hand, there are many things lawful which are not always expedient. Meyer (ad loc.) describes expediency as 'moral profitableness generally in every respect, as conditioned by the special circumstances of each case as it arises.' In all things must the Christian ask not only, Is it lawful? or Does it lie within the range of my liberty? but also, Is it calculated to promote the general welfare of those around me? There is no place for individualism in the Christian life. One must ask not merely, What does my liberty permit? but, How will my conduct help or hinder my brother? While all things that are in themselves indifferent (ἀδιάφορα), i.e. not anti-Christian, are lawful, still it must be remembered that this liberty is the minister of love. For example, although in itself one kind of meat is neither better nor worse than another, the law of Christian love imposes restraint where indulgence would cause offence or lead to a violation of conscience. This love enables the Christian to take the right attitude to what is allowed; he will solve the questionable (casuistic) cases and collisions, not by rules which only lead into endless reflexions about their applicability or inapplicability, but by immediate tact, and by the power of the personality.

Again, this limited freedom is also in truth the highest freedom. 'All things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any' (6th). St. Paul's was not a freedom to destroy freedom. That some at Corinth exposed themselves to this danger is quite evident. By indulging in impurity of life, as though that were as legitimate as eating and drinking, they tended to alienate their liberty, and bring their soul into bondage to sin. It is when one recognizes those limits within which freedom is to be exercised that one enjoys that perfect freedom which knows no subjection save to Christ alone.

Christian freedom, then, is a freedom which must not be applied to the injury of others or of oneself. In the exercise of liberty one must have regard to expediency; one must consider what course is the most likely to promote the best interests of oneself and others. In this section (chs. 6-10) in 1 Cor. St. Paul tells us again and again how in all things indifferent he thought of others. All his actions were founded on the ground of the higher expediency. Being free from all men, yet he made himself servant unto all, that he might gain the more (9th). He became all things to all men (9th). He pleased all men in all things, not seeking his own profit (τὸ ἐμαυτοῦ συμφέρον), but the profit of many (10th).

By some modern critics St. Paul is described as hard and inflexible, and as incapable of anything like compromise and accommodation under any circumstances. But the above passages, as well as many others which could be quoted, by no means confirm this judgment. That he could be as firm and as inflexible as a rock where a question of principle was at stake is amply proved by his statement in Gal 2<sup>5</sup>, e.g., in the matter of the attempt to compel Titus to be circumcised: 'to whom we gave place in the way of subjection, no, not for an hour.' In his teaching of principles he was from first to last most resolute and uncompromising. But in things indifferent he was ever ready to go any length in order to avoid giving offence to others. In such matters it was with him always a question of expediency, not of rights; what was profitable, not what was lawful. To the Romans he says (Ro 15<sup>1</sup>): 'We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.' And again, he tells the Corinthians (1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>): 'Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.' While he held tenaciously to great principles, and was even ready to sacrifice life itself in their defence, yet in practical conduct he was willing to submit to any privation and suffering to meet the scruples and prejudices of the weak. And in this mode of conduct he claims to be following the example of Christ (Ro 15<sup>1st</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>).

It will be seen that consideration must be had, not only for the weak members of the Church of Christ, but also for those who are without the pale of the Church. Cf. 1 Co 10<sup>3</sup>, where the sphere of moral obligation is enlarged. Jew and Greek, as well as the Christian Church, are to be objects of our Christian solicitude.

(2) The dangers of expediency.—(a) As regards what is immoral, and so, strictly prohibitive. The question of expediency involves that of accommodation and compromise. Hence in an endeavour to win men over one must always guard against allowing oneself to countenance what is unlawful.

It is evident that some at Corinth had taken St. Paul's words 'All things are lawful unto me' as a general maxim. Such persons are always inclined to have regard to the lawfulness of an action rather than to its expediency, and so require, for their own good, to be firmly treated. 'A great many cannot be pleased unless thou cocker their lust; so that if thou wilt be gracious with a many, thou must not so much regard their salvation as satisfy their folly; neither mayest thou respect what is expedient, but what they covet to their own destruction. Thou must not, therefore, study to please such as like nothing but that is evil' (Calvin on Ro 15<sup>2</sup> [ed. Beveridge, 1844, p. 396]).

(b) As regards what is indifferent. (i.) It is possible for the Church to show itself over-scrupulous—a thing which would lead to government by the weak, and legislation by the unintelligent. And so, while the law of love calls upon the strong not to use their liberty in a reckless manner, and demands that in certain cases they should abstain from certain disputed modes of action, in order not to shock the weak members, and thus to break down the Church instead of building it up, still this love requires that this submission shall not be unlimited. For then the weak would only be confirmed in their mistake, whilst the strong would be hindered in their progress. It is for the strong, therefore, to seek to lead the weak to a clearer knowledge, and to show them that the matters in dispute may be contemplated from another point of view than the merely worldly and unethical. Thus accommodation is to be combined with correction.

(ii.) But perhaps there is less danger of this than of over-assertiveness, i.e. a strong and persistent maintaining of one's rights, against which St. Paul again and again warns his readers. By indifference to external observances we may injure another man's conscience. To ourselves it is perfectly indifferent whether we conform to a certain observance or not. But we are called upon to conform for the sake of our weak brother. Still, this call to submission is not to be always or in all circumstances.

(iii.) Another danger to which a man who always considers the expediency of his actions is exposed is that of being misjudged. A mode of conduct largely regulated by consideration for others is always open to misconception. And that St. Paul did not escape the charge of being a mere obsequious time-server, with no steadfast principle, aiming only at pleasing men, is evident from his writings. We can easily understand how readily such accusations would be set on foot, and how plausible they could be made to appear. That they painfully affected the Apostle's mind is evident from the frequency of the references he makes to them, and from the earnestness and deep pathos of feeling which not infrequently mark these references. It is to such sinister criticism that he alludes when in 2 Co 5<sup>11</sup>, after saying 'we persuade men,' he adds, 'but we are become manifest unto God'; i.e. although he did make a habit of aiming at persuading (=making friends of) men, still the unselfishness and sincerity of his action were known to God. Another reference to this matter is found in Gal 1<sup>10</sup> 'For am I now persuading men, or God? or am I seeking to please men? if I were still pleasing men, I should not be a servant of Christ.' Possibly the reference here is to his action in the matter of the Jerusalem Decree (Ac 15) and the circumcision of Timothy (Ac 16<sup>3</sup>).

It will be observed that the case of Timothy and that of Titus (Gal 2<sup>8</sup>) are totally different. The former being by birth 'a son of the law' on his mother's side, might naturally conform to the usages of what was so far his national religion. Titus, on the other hand, was a pure Gentile, and his circumcision was urged as necessary, on principle, and not as a voluntary sacrifice to expediency for the greater good of others. Hence it is clear that St. Paul acted with perfect consistency. There is no betrayal of principle, no unworthy endeavour to win the approval of men.

To sum up, we see that expediency in its NT sense is quite consistent with loyalty to principle. It denotes the noble aim of one seeking 'the greatest good of the greatest number.' It is not the action of a trimmer ever seeking the applause of men, but rather of a strong man willing to curb his own personal inclinations for the sake of others. And it may be said that the more steadfast one is when principles are at stake the more ready one is to give way on non-essentials.

EXPIATION.—See ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION, SACRIFICE.

EYE.—In the analogy drawn by St. Paul between the human body and the Church, the eye (ὀφθαλμός) is named as a member superior in rank to either the ear or the hand (1 Co 12<sup>16, 21</sup>), though dependent on the co-operation of both. In virtue of this superiority, the eye becomes proverbial for that which is precious (Ep. Barn. xix. 9), and St. Paul writes of the affection of the Galatian Christians, 'ye would have plucked out your eyes and given them to me' (Gal 4<sup>15</sup>). Partly in view of those words, many have argued that St. Paul's 'stake in the flesh' (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>) was ophthalmia (e.g. Creighton, EBi ii. col. 1456; Macalister, HDB iii. p. 331; against this view, see the weighty arguments of Lightfoot, Galatians<sup>10</sup>, 1892, p. 191 n.). The blindness with which St. Paul was seized on the way to Damascus has been medically described as 'a temporary amaurosis, such as that which has been caused by injudiciously looking at the sun' (Macalister, loc. cit.); the reference to the removal of 'scales' in the account of his recovery is a comparison, not a pathological detail (Ac 9<sup>8, 18</sup>). Elymas was smitten with temporary blindness as a punishment for his opposition to St. Paul (13<sup>11</sup>). The account of the miraculous restoration of Dorcas to life (9<sup>40</sup>) shows that it was customary in Palestine, as elsewhere, to close the eyes of a corpse.

The eyes are frequently named by apostolic writers in connexion with spiritual blindness or sight. St. Paul sees the fulfilment of prophecy in the closed eyes of the Jews in Rome (Ac 28<sup>27</sup>; cf. Ro 11<sup>8, 10</sup>), and is sent to open the eyes of the Gentiles (Ac 26<sup>18</sup>). Hatred of a brother is a darkness blinding the eyes (1 Jn 2<sup>11</sup>). Christ says to the Laodicean Church, 'buy eye-salve to anoint thine eyes, that thou mayest see' (Rev 3<sup>18</sup>). On the other hand, he who knows Christ has the eyes of his heart enlightened (Eph 1<sup>18</sup>; cf. 1 Clem. xxxvi. 2, lix. 3; also the reference in Mart. Polyc. ii. 3 to tortured martyrs, who, 'with the eyes of their heart,' gaze upon the good things reserved for them). The realities revealed by the Spirit of God are 'things that eye saw not' (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>; cf. Ep. ad Diognetum, ii. 1). But these spiritual realities are built upon historic facts; the basis of the Christian gospel was that which apostles had seen with their eyes (1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>). As a cloud hid Jesus from their eyes at His Ascension (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>), so, when He comes with clouds, every eye shall see Him (Rev 1<sup>7</sup>). When He is seen in vision, His eyes are (searching) as a flame of fire (Rev 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>12</sup>); so, to the eyes of God, all things are naked and laid open (He 4<sup>13</sup>; cf. 1 P 3<sup>12</sup>). The many eyes of the 'living creatures' and of the Lamb of the Apocalypse symbolically denote vigilance and range of vision (Rev 4<sup>6, 8</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>).

There are several references to the psychical and moral qualities of the eye, according to that ‘peripheral consciousness’ of Hebrew psychology (see art. EAR), which is so amply illustrated in the OT (examples in Mansfield College Essays, 1909, p. 275). No doubt, ‘the lust of the eyes’ (1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>) can be satisfactorily explained to a modern mind as ‘all personal vicious indulgence represented by seeing’ (Westcott, ad loc.), but a deeper meaning, corresponding to St. Paul’s idea of sin in the flesh (see art. MAN), underlies this phrase, as also that referring to ‘eyes full of adultery’ (2 P 2<sup>14</sup>; read μοιχεύας with Bigg, ad loc.). The most striking apostolic reference to the eye is that in which St. Paul rebukes the Galatians for letting themselves be bewitched by (the ‘evil eye’ of envious) false teachers, when he had already ‘placarded’ Christ crucified before their eyes, who should have arrested their gaze and averted peril (Gal 3<sup>1</sup>; cf. Lightfoot, ad loc.). This expresses the characteristic emphasis in apostolic teaching on the positive side of truth, the expulsion of the false by the true. Those whose eyes are turned to Christ are transformed into the same image, from glory to glory (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>; cf. Odes of Solomon, xiii. 1); those who look at things unseen find their inward man renewed day by day, even in the midst of visible affliction (2 Co 4<sup>16-18</sup>).

FABLE.—In the NT (AV and RV) ‘fable’ is the translation of μῦθος. But it is not the myth charged with high moral teaching as in Plato, for both word and thing have degenerated into the expression of fantastic, false, and profitless opinions. μῦθος is opposed to the historic story (λόγος) or to actual fact (ἀλήθεια); cf. art. ‘Fable’ in HDB, vol. i. This is seen in the references: 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> ‘Neither to give heed to fables . . . the which minister questionings rather than a dispensation of God’ [RV]; 1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> ‘profane and old wives’ fables’; 2 Ti 4<sup>4</sup> ‘turn aside unto fables’; Tit 1<sup>14</sup> ‘not giving heed to Jewish fables’; 2 P 1<sup>16</sup> ‘We did not follow cunningly devised fables.’

The Pastoral Epistles give a vivid picture of the state of religious feeling in Ephesus, and the Roman Province of Asia generally, in the years A.D. 60–70. It was a favourable soil for the rank growth of the fables and curiously wrought embellishments of OT history, mention of which we find in the Pastorals. There is no difference of opinion as to their origin. They were Jewish, and the Gnosticism supposed to be found in them is as yet incipient and hardly conscious of itself.

For an explanation of the origin of these fables we must turn to the accretions of legend and allegory that grew up in the Jewish mind round the great scenes and personages of the OT. It was said that an oral law, ‘the law that is on the lip,’ supplementary to the written law, had also been given on Sinai, and handed down by teachers from Moses through the centuries. This was added to and illustrated by the teaching of the Rabbis, and in course of time became a supplement to the written law of the Pentateuch—a supplement so ponderous that often the text was overlaid and almost buried in the commentary. To this our Lord made reference when He asked ‘Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God because of your traditions?’ (Mt 15<sup>3</sup>). These rank growths, in deference to which they ‘paid tithes of mint and anise and cummin and left undone mercy and faith,’ had run riot in the Asian Church. Men were turning back from the worship of ‘the King, eternal, incorruptible, invisible, the only God,’ to old wives’ fables, the profane and senile curiosities of people in their dotage. Jewish and heathen speculations had seduced their minds from the essential parts of the Christian faith.

We have specimens of these ‘feigned words’ in the numerous legends of the Talmud, the far-fetched subtleties of Rabbinical teaching, and in the allegorizing of Philo. Timothy, therefore, was sent to recall the Church to the pure milk of the word, and to nourish it on ‘the words of the faith.’ ‘Such,’ says J. H. Newman, ‘was the conflict of Christianity with the old established Paganism; with the Oriental Mysteries, flitting wildly to and fro like spectres’ (Development of Christian Doctrine, 1878, p. 358). In 2 P 1<sup>16</sup> the writer is replying to a taunt by which the opponents of Christianity tried to turn the tables on the teachers of the Faith. These had denounced the religious fables with which men were deluding themselves, and to that the reply was a ‘tu quoque.’ The Christian doctrine, they said, was also built upon fable, and its preachers were fraudulent and sophistical persons (σεσοφισμένοι) who for ambition or filthy lucre’s sake were exploiting the churches. To this the author of 2 Peter replies: ‘We did not follow cunningly devised fables.’ In proof of his religious certainty—certitudo veritatis—he writes, ‘we were eye-witness of his majesty’; and for certitudo salutis he adds, ‘we have the day-star rising in our hearts.’ The answer is still valid. Against the charge of following sophistical fables the modern apologetic turns to ‘the fact of Christ,’ and the heart stands up and answers, ‘I have felt.’

W. M. GRANT.

FACTION.—Among the works of the flesh are ἐρις and ἐριθείαι, ‘strife’ and ‘factions’ (Gal 5<sup>9</sup>). ἐριθεία is selfish intriguing for office (Aristotle, Pol. v. 2, 3), partisanship, party-spirit.

(1) Faction was rampant in the free cities of Greece. Personalities were frequently exalted above principles, and the public good was sacrificed to private ends. Men were partisans before they were patriots. The same spirit penetrated the Church. While St. Paul, Apollos, and Cephas, differing only in personal idiosyncrasies, preached essentially the same gospel, their names quickly became the party-cries of wrangling sects in the Corinthian Church. ‘There are contentions (ἐριδες, ‘rivalries’) among you’ (1 Co 1<sup>11</sup>); ‘there is among you jealousy and strife’ (ἐρις, 3<sup>6</sup>), wrote St. Paul to these typical Hellenes. He had to use all his resources of reason and appeal to overcome their ‘strife, jealousy, wraths, factions’ (2 Co 12<sup>30</sup>).

(2) St. Paul’s arrival in Rome awoke another, stranger kind of partisanship in the Roman Church (Ph 1<sup>16-18</sup>). His presence moved the preachers of the city; it quickened the evangelical pulse; but, while some began to preach Christ in good-will to him (δι’ εὐδοκίαν), others did it through envy and strife (διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν), out of faction (ἐξ ἐριθείας), not purely or sincerely (αγαπῶς). They emulated his labours in the hope of robbing him of his laurels; then actually imagined that their brilliant successes would ‘add affliction to his bonds.’ But the Paul whose amour propre might have been wounded by shafts of that kind had long ago been 'crucified with Christ.' The Paul who lived, or rather in whom Christ lived (Gal 2-9), only rejoiced if there were indeed greater preachers than himself in Rome. Among true apostles and evangelists there is no room for jealous contention, ignoble rivalry, in the publication of the gospel. Only one thing matters—that Christ be preached and His name glorified. St. Paul's great-mindedness is similar to that expressed in Browning's Paracelsus:

'Lo, I forget my ruin, and rejoice
In thy success, as thou! Let our God's praise Go bravely through the world at last! What care Through me or thee?'

FAIR HAVENS (Καλὸι Λιμένες).—Fair Havens is a small bay in the S. coast of Crete, where St. Paul's ship, after working slowly westward under the lee of the island, found shelter in rough weather (Ac 27<sup>b</sup>). It is not referred to in any other ancient writing besides Acts, but its name is still preserved in the modern dialect—Λιμένας Καλοῦς. While exposed to the E., it was protected on the S.W. by two small islands. In this roadstead the Apostle's ship remained 'a considerable time' (ἱκανοῦ χρόνου) weather-bound, strong N.W. winds apparently continuing to blow. Two leagues westward is Cape Matala, where the coast abruptly trends to the N., so that if an attempt were made to round the point the ship would certainly be exposed to the full force of the wind. But as it was feared that Fair Havens was not commodious enough to winter in, a council was held, the account of which affords a vivid and instructive glimpse into life on an ancient government transport. While the captain and ship-master (ὁ ναυκλῆρος) thought it better to make a dash for Port Phoenix (φ.ν.), St. Paul considered it more prudent to remain where they were. The Roman centurion naturally 'gave more heed' to the nautical experts than to the landsman, as did the majority (οἱ πλείους); but, as Smith remarks, 'the event justified St. Paul's advice.'

'It now appears . . . that Fair Havens is so well protected by islands, that though not equal to Lutro, it must be a very fair winter harbour; and that considering the suddenness, the frequency, and the violence with which gales of northerly wind spring up, and the certainty that, if such a gale sprang up in the passage from Fair Havens to Lutro, the ship must be driven off to sea, the prudence of the advice given by the master and owner was extremely questionable, and that the advice given by St. Paul may probably be supported even on nautical grounds' (J. Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1880, p. 80).

FAITH.—1. In the Acts of the Apostles.—In the Acts faith is spoken of as (1) inspired by Christ, (2) directed to Christ, (3) corresponding to Christian teaching.

(1) After St. Peter had healed the lame man, he explained that the miracle had been wrought by the power of God by faith in the name of the 'Prince of life, whom God raised from the dead'; 'yea, the faith which is through him (ἡ δι' αὐτοῦ) hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all' (3<sup>16</sup>). The health-bringing faith both in the apostles and the cripple had been inspired by Jesus, the Holy One.

(2) More frequently the faith is directed to Jesus Christ. Thus the general statement is made: 'Many believed on (ἐπι) the Lord' (9<sup>42</sup>). St. Paul enjoins the Philippian jailer: 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ' (16<sup>31</sup>). Similarly Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, 'believed in the Lord with all his house' (18<sup>8</sup>); ἐπίστευσεν τῷ κυρίῳ = 'believed the Lord'. In all these cases the faith is directed to the Lord Jesus Christ.

(3) In several passages 'the faith' is equivalent to the Christian faith or Christian religion. In describing the multiplying of the disciples in Jerusalem it is said: 'A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith' (6<sup>7</sup>). In Cyprus Elymas opposed the apostles, 'seeking to turn aside the proconsul from the faith' (13<sup>8</sup>). St. Paul returned to the towns in Asia, 'confirming the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith' (14<sup>22</sup>). In each of these cases 'the faith' has already become the phrase to express all that is implied by believing in Christ.

We can see the transition from (2) to (3) in the expression used by St. Peter when speaking of the work of God among the Gentiles. He says that God made no distinction, 'cleansing their hearts by faith' or 'by the faith' (15<sup>9</sup>).

This leads us to note that in Acts faith is made the medium for healing, cleansing, and salvation. The largest result of faith is announced by St. Paul when he promises to the jailer salvation for himself and his household as the blessing given to faith in Jesus Christ. The gift of the Holy Spirit is associated with faith in Christ, as in the case of Cornelius and his friends who welcomed the preaching of the gospel by St. Peter, so that 'while Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Spirit fell on all them which heard the word' (10<sup>44</sup>). More generally the gift of the Holy Spirit follows baptism and the laying on of hands, as in the case of the disciples of John the Baptist (19<sup>2</sup>) and the Samaritans whom Philip had led to believe in Jesus Christ (8<sup>17</sup>).

It is noteworthy that in describing both Stephen and Barnabas it is said of each that he was 'full of faith and of the Holy Spirit' (6<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>24</sup>), and probably it is implied that each had received not only the permanent gift of the Spirit (δωρεάν, 2<sup>38</sup>) but also the graces (χαρίσματα, 1 Co 12<sup>9</sup>) imparted by Him through a full and obedient faith.

2. In the Epistle of St. James.—This Epistle must have been written either in the very earliest apostolic times or in a period that is almost post-apostolic. The whole Epistle is practical and undogmatic, and lays the chief emphasis on ethical observance. The writer appreciates the value of faith when he refers to those who are 'rich in faith' (2<sup>5</sup>) and to the 'prayer of faith' (5<sup>15</sup>); but in the section of the Epistle which deals with faith and works, it is not too much to say that he looks upon faith with a measure of suspicion. In this argument (21<sup>4-26</sup>) the writer evidently defines 'faith' in his own mind as intellectual assent to Divine truth, and with his undogmatic prepossessions he becomes almost antidogmatic in tendency. The Apostle describes this faith not as false or feigned, but as having such reality only as the faith of demons in the oneness of God. To him 'faith' is far from being an enthusiastic acceptance of a Divine Redeemer.

If the Epistle was written in very early times, the argument must move more on Judaic than on Christian grounds, and a certain corroboration of this is found in the fact that the illustrations are taken from OT examples like Abraham and Rahab, and that the typical example chosen is belief in the unity of God, which was the war-cry of the Jew as it became in later days that of the Muhammadan. If the later date is chosen, then time must be left for a general acceptance of Christian truth so that 'faith' had become assent to Christian dogma. In either case the argument of the Epistle cannot be regarded as a direct polemic against the teaching of St. Paul. The two writers move in different spheres of thought, so that, while words and phrases are alike, their definitions are as the poles asunder. An instance of this is found in the words with which St. James closes the section on 'faith.' The Apostle has already declared: 'Faith, if it have not works, is dead in itself' (21<sup>7</sup>), so now he sums up: 'As the body apart from the spirit is dead, even so faith apart from works is dead' (2<sup>6</sup>). Here we find that so far from faith being the inspiration of works, as St. Paul might suggest, St. James teaches that works are the inspiration of faith. Faith may be a mere dead body unless works prove to be an inner spirit to make it alive. This declaration agrees with the writer's whole attitude, for throughout this letter he insists that the practical carrying out of 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ' is found in obedience to 'the royal law': 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' This practice of the will of Christ makes faith to be alive.

3. In the Epistles of St. Paul.—In the writings of St. Paul 'faith' and 'grace' are the human and the Divine sides of the great experience that revolutionized his own life and the lives of many to whom the gospel was brought. Occasionally faith is spoken of as being directed to God, but commonly it is directed to Jesus Christ. Thus in Gal 2<sup>16</sup> St. Paul writes: 'Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, save (but only, ἐάν μιν) through faith in Jesus Christ, even we believed on Christ Jesus that we might be justified by faith in Christ.' Here the reiteration is singular, but the insistence on 'faith in Christ' is characteristically Pauline. To St. Paul the only faith that is of value is the faith that rests on Jesus Christ our Lord, who was made in the likeness of men, died for our sins, and rose again from the dead. The Death of Christ occupies so large a place in his thought that he is determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>), while he insists so strongly on the Resurrection as to declare: 'If Christ hath not been raised, your faith is vain' (15<sup>17</sup>).

This revolutionizing faith is awakened by the preaching of the gospel: 'Belief cometh of hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ' (Ro 10<sup>14</sup>), i.e. by the word concerning Christ, or, as it is called earlier (Ro 10<sup>8</sup>), 'the word of faith,' i.e. the word that deals with justifying faith. This faith, according to St. Paul, brings salvation. Thus in Eph 1<sup>13</sup> 'the word of the truth' is the medium by which faith comes, and through faith comes salvation. So in Eph 2<sup>3</sup> it is said: 'By grace have ye been saved through faith' (διὰ τῆς πίστεως, not διὰ τῆν πίστιν, i.e. through faith as a means, not on account of faith as a ground of salvation). Hearing and faith are associated in a similar way in the Epistle to the Galatians, as the means by which the gift of the Spirit came. 'Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?' (Gal 3<sup>2</sup>), and the meaning varies little whether we conceive of faith as the accompaniment of hearing or as its product. It is possible to infer from Eph 1<sup>13</sup>, that the gift of the Spirit was received after, not contemporaneously with, the act of faith. 'Having also believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise.' The sealing with the Spirit is posterior to the act of faith and may be associated with the rite of baptism, which came to be known as a sealing ordinance.

St. Paul dwells frequently upon faith as a definite act in his own life and in the lives of Christian converts. Two instances only need be given. In Gal 2<sup>16</sup> he says: 'We believed on Christ Jesus,' where the verb ἐπιστεύσαμεν denotes one definite act in the past when they turned in faith to (εἰς) Christ Jesus. Even more marked is the sentence in Ro 13<sup>11</sup>: 'Now is salvation nearer to us (ἢ ὅτε ἐπιστεύσαμεν) than when we believed,' i.e. than when we by a definite act of faith became Christians. In St. Paul's experience and teaching this act of faith leads to a life of faith, so that he can write of himself: 'That life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). Faith is not a solitary act but a continuous attitude of the inner life towards Christ Jesus. But this does not imply that either at the beginning or during its course this faith is perfect; it may be halting even when real, and when living it grows ever stronger 'by faith unto faith' (Ro 1<sup>17</sup>). Faith is weak in the experience of many, sometimes in opposition to the enticing power of evil when flesh lusts against spirit, sometimes in opposition to law as a ground of salvation, and sometimes in failing to appreciate what Christian truth implies. This last form of weakness is discussed by St. Paul towards the close of the Epistle to the Romans (14), where those weak in faith do not understand the extent of their freedom in Christ, and find themselves bound in conscience by irritating non-Christian customs. St. Paul commends a faith that is stronger and freer, but he declares that none must act in defiance of their faith. They must be clear in mind and conscience before they break even these customs. 'Whatsoever is not of faith is sin' (Ro 14<sup>23</sup>). Even when Christians are perfect (τέλειοι, Ph 3<sup>15</sup>), possessors of a mature faith as well as full knowledge, they have not reached the goal, but they must still press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (v. 14).

For St. Paul faith was an experience that touched the inmost part of his nature, but it had perforce to find outward expression. Faith and profession are necessarily united. The believer in Christ must be a witness for Christ. The statement of Ro 10<sup>10</sup> puts succinctly what St. Paul constantly implies: 'With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.' These are not so much independent acts as two sides of the same act. Internally faith in Christ brings a change of heart, externally it implies confession of the Lord. This confession finds its formal expression in baptism, and the Apostle expected that in this way as well as in more homely ways this public confession would be made. In St. Paul's view the believer in Christ must be a professing Christian.

If faith must be associated with such outward testimony it must be even more intimately associated with many Christian graces, and especially with love or charity. St. Paul in his eulogy of love (1 Co 13) declares that among the great abiding virtues love is the chief. 'If I have all faith so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing' (1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>). This exalted praise of love is the more remarkable because St. Paul is the champion of faith in the great controversy of which we get his own statement in the Epistles to Galatians and Romans (Gal 2 and 3, Ro 1-5). St. Paul's experience on the way to Damascus when he was convinced of the Messiahship and Lordship of Jesus of Nazareth became the dominant factor in all his life, and led to his abandonment of allegiance to law and to the strenuous vindication of the place of faith in the religious life. Before his conversion St. Paul had sought justification with God by a religious obedience to the Law, but faith in Jesus Christ changed his whole attitude and revolutionized his whole thought. Faith in Christ was not conceived by him primarily as bringing a new power in attaining the end that he had previously kept in view, for now he believed that justification had been attained at once through faith in Christ by the grace of God. Justification was the beginning of true life, not a blessing to be attained at the end (Gal 2<sup>16</sup>).

The faith which receives this blessing is faith in Christ Jesus. This faith is conceived by St. Paul not as a mere intellectual assent or as a recognition of the unseen world, but as an enthusiastic trust in Christ as Saviour, and as a complete devotion to Him as Lord. The whole inner nature, including mind, heart, and will, is committed to Him in trust and devotion. In receiving Jesus as Christ, St. Paul gave himself to Jesus as Lord. This saving faith became the medium of all Divine blessing to St. Paul, and, drawing upon his own experience, he taught that it would be and must be the medium of blessing to all. Hence he gloried in the gospel, 'for therein is revealed a righteousness of God by faith unto faith' (Ro 1<sup>17</sup>). The gospel could thus become a universal message for mankind, for it dealt with all men alike as sinners, and offered to all who believed in Christ the righteousness of God, 'being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus' (3<sup>24</sup>).

After this illuminating experience of the grace of God came to St. Paul he turned back to the OT and found in its pages that in the religious experience there narrated the blessings of God had come also through faith. Thus 'to Abraham his faith was reckoned for righteousness' (Ro 4<sup>9</sup>, Gal 3<sup>6</sup>). So David pronounced blessing upon the man unto whom God reckoneth righteousness apart from works (Ro 4<sup>6</sup>). He found that God's method had always been the same. His grace had reached its end when a human heart had responded in faith. This truth is utterly opposed to St. Paul's former belief that righteousness came by the Law, and both in Rom. and Gal. he labours to prove that, whatever the work of the Law was, it was not to gain a right standing with God. It had a mission even concerning faith, but it was the mission of an attendant slave to bring those who were in ward unto Christ; but when that mission was fulfilled, they were no longer under law, but were all sons of God, through faith in Christ Jesus (Gal 3:1-26). Thus the Christian life is regarded as a free, loving, spiritual service, of which faith in Christ is the prime origin and the constant inspiration.

In the Pastoral Epistles that are usually associated with the name of St. Paul we find 'the faith' frequently used as equivalent to the Christian faith or teaching. Thus in 1 Tim. we find: 'Some made shipwreck concerning the faith' (1<sup>19</sup>). Deacons must hold the 'mystery of the faith in a pure conscience' (3<sup>9</sup>). 'In later times some shall fall away from the faith' (4<sup>1</sup>). 'If any provideth not for his own, and specially his own household, he hath denied the faith' (5<sup>8</sup>). It is inferred by some that the use of 'the faith' in this sense implies a late date for this Epistle, possibly considerably after St. Paul's death; but it is significant that in Gal., which is among the very earliest of the Pauline Epistles, there is found the expression: 'Before the faith came, we were kept in ward under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed' (Gal 3:3). Here the Apostle describes the early period not as the time before faith came, for faith was found already in the OT, but as the time before the faith came, i.e. the faith of Christ. Thus in this early Epistle we have the starting-point for the later use.

4. In the Epistle to the Hebrews.—In this Epistle faith has not the content that has been found in the Epistles of St. Paul. It is true that when the writer is speaking of 'the first principles of Christ' he mentions first, in a manner suggestive of St. Paul's phrases, the 'foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God' (ἐπι θεόν, 6<sup>1</sup>). But even here 'dead works' is not used in the Pauline sense as works done apart from Christ or as works of themselves, and 'faith' is not the enthusiastic trust in Christ which St. Paul enshrines as the central feature of experience and dogma. In Heb., faith may be defined in general terms as the human response to the word of God. When man refuses to respond, he is guilty of unbelief and of hardness of heart; when he responds to God speaking to him, then he believes. God sent His word through agents, such as angels (2<sup>2</sup>) and prophets (1<sup>1</sup>), but especially in the last times He has spoken through His Son, and has borne witness to this message by 'signs and wonders, by manifold powers, and by gifts of the Holy Ghost' (2<sup>3-4</sup>). Faith is the obedient response to this word of God, and has been found in all those who have become 'the cloud of witnesses' (12<sup>1</sup>). The secret of the assurance, devotion, and endurance of the OT saints is found in their unceasing confidence in the God who revealed Himself to them (1<sup>1</sup>). The greatest example of this faith was Jesus Himself, 'the author and perfecter of faith' (12:2), who led the way in the career of faith and embodied in His own life its full realization. This believing response to the word of God produces within the mind certain activities, the chief of which the writer describes when he gives faith its well-known definition (11<sup>1</sup>): 'Faith is the assurance of things hoped for (or it gives substance to things hoped for), the proving of things not seen (or the conviction of unseen realities.)' Faith is the conviction of the reality of things not made known through the senses, and, so far as religion is concerned, it is produced by the word of God.

It ought to be observed that throughout this Epistle there is also implied a faith in the work of God by Christ, the great High Priest and Mediator of a new covenant. Possibly this work ought to be regarded as a part of the word of God, for the writer conceives of God's word coming in the OT through such works as the arrangements of the tabernacle (9<sup>8</sup>), as well as by spoken message, and the work of Christ may be conceived as in its entirety the message of God to men. On the other hand, it is possible that the writer, having described the complete priestly work done by Christ, regards faith as the response to the call then made by God to enter into His immediate fellowship. Those who respond will draw near to God 'in full assurance of faith' (ἐν πληροφορίᾳ πιστεως, 10<sup>22</sup>).

5. In the Epistles of St. Peter.—There is little that is distinctive in the doctrinal teaching of these Epistles, and analogies may be found with both St. Paul and St. James. The writer of 1 Pet. makes Christ the object of faith, 'on whom (ἐς ὃν), though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable' (1<sup>9</sup>). He also makes Christ the means of faith in God: Christ 'was manifested at the end of the times for your sake, who through him (δι' αὐτοῦ) are believers in God' (ἐς θεόν, 1:5-21). Similarly those who are suffering greatly are called upon to 'commit their souls in well-doing unto a faithful Creator' (4<sup>19</sup>), where in a unique phrase God as Creator is presented as the object of trust. Throughout 1 Pet. salvation is regarded as future, certainly near at hand, but still as an inheritance to which Christians are to look forward. Hence those who are begotten unto this living hope must look upon the trials they are undergoing as tests of their faith (1<sup>6</sup>), and must recall that, as Christ suffered in the flesh, they must arm themselves with the same mind (4<sup>1</sup>). But the real defence is the power of God, by which they are guarded through faith (1<sup>3</sup>). Faith brings under the power of God those who are tried, so that at last they will receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls (1<sup>9</sup>).

6. In the Epistles of St. John.—'Faith' is not the dominant conception in these Epistles, but 'light,' 'knowledge,' 'love.' Faith and love are presented as twin commands: 'This is his commandment, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another' (1 Jn 3<sup>23</sup>). The thought is somewhat varied when the writer says that a believer in Christ receives new life from God, and one sign of that new life is that he loves God who begat him, and also every other one who is begotten in the same way (5<sup>1</sup>). True faith includes genuine love. The knowledge of God, of Christ, and of ourselves leads to faith. 'We know and have believed the love which God hath in us' (4<sup>16</sup>); but faith also develops into a deeper and surer knowledge: 'These things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, even unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God' (5<sup>13</sup>).

Through faith there comes also victory over the world and all the powers of the world. 'This is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith' (5<sup>4</sup>). Thus he that believes that Jesus is the Son of God passes by the way of forgiveness, knowledge, and love into an assured confidence and a great victory over the world and the things that are in the world.

7. In the Apocalypse.—It is unnecessary to examine the Apocalypse in detail, for it does not deal with either the nature or the defence of faith. In some respects it rises to a higher level as poetic and prophetic expression is given in it to the energy of the deep religious faith that abounds in the heart of the writer. In the Apocalypse we have described for us in words and pictures the unity and power of God, the dominion of Christ over the Church and the world, and the triumphant victory of the Kingdom of God over all the powers of evil. With all its problems and mysteries, this book has proved in times of despair the means of begetting and sustaining faith in Jesus Christ as 'the ruler of the kings of the earth' (1<sup>5</sup>).

8. Conclusion.—In whatever ways the apostles differ in their method of regarding faith, they agree in the underlying thought that in and by it there is oneness with Jesus Christ. This union is dwelt upon by St. Paul especially in passages that deal with the 'unio mystica' (Eph 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>12</sup>, etc.), but it appears also in the argument of 1 Jn. (2<sup>24</sup>). To make this oneness real, there is required less mere intellectual discernment than willingness of heart to commit soul and life to God in Christ. This faith is the answer of the heart to the grace of God, and is associated always with repentance and is accompanied by love and other Christian graces. Thus the writer of 2 Pet. is at one with all the apostles in saying to Christians that when they become partakers of the Divine nature (1<sup>4</sup>) they are bound to add to the faith—that is fundamental—virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, love of the brethren, love. Faith, that makes a believer a sharer in Christ's salvation, makes him also a sharer in Christ's mind and character.

FAITHFULNESS.—1. Faithfulness of God.—The apostolic writers agree with the general biblical teaching in ascribing faithfulness to God as 'keeping covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations' (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>). Two general examples may be given. (1) Among the faithful sayings in the NT letters, there is found one in 2 Ti 2<sup>11-13</sup>, where the writer speaks of the sufferings that he gladly endures, for 'if we died with him, we shall also live with him . . . if we are faithless, he abideth faithful; for he cannot deny himself.' God's faithfulness rested upon His own nature and not upon any human contingencies.

(2) The writer of Hebrews elaborated this truth when he dealt with the blessings that were to come in and through Abraham. In order that he and all believers might have greater assurance, God not only made gracious promises, but also interposed with an oath so that He might show more abundantly unto the heirs of the promise the immutability of His counsel. God's faithfulness was assured both by promise and by oath (He 6<sup>13-20</sup>).

This Divine faithfulness was made by the apostles the ground of forgiveness and cleansing to those who confessed their sins (1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>), of deliverance in temptation from the power of evil (1 Co 6<sup>13</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>3</sup>), and of confidence in the final salvation of those who were called into the fellowship of Jesus Christ (1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>4</sup>).

2. Faithfulness of Christ.—It is noteworthy that in the Apocalypse, where Christians are being encouraged to endure, the faithfulness of Christ is made prominent. Thus He is called the faithful witness (Rev 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>), and victory is ascribed to Him who is 'faithful and true' (19<sup>11</sup>). But it is in Hebrews again that we find this faithfulness enlarged upon. In the earlier sections of that Epistle, where the writer is comparing the work of Christ with that wrought by angels and prophets, he shows that both Moses and Christ were examples of faithfulness, but Christ excelled, inasmuch as a son's faithfulness over God's house excels in quality that of a servant in the house. 'He hath been counted of more glory than Moses, by so much as he that built the house hath more honour than the house' (He 3<sup>1-6</sup>).

3. Faithfulness of Christians.—In the background of every Christian life the apostles placed the example of Christ and the attributes of God, and thus the faithfulness they sought to practise and instil was linked with the faithfulness of God. For this reason St. Paul repelled with heat the charge of fickleness that had been brought against him by critics in Corinth (2 Co 1<sup>19-22</sup>). He acknowledged that there had been an alteration in certain details of his plans, but he asserted that this was due not to any passing inconsistency in his mind, but to greater faithfulness to his unchangeable desire to help them. He had not changed his plans capriciously, saying 'Yes' to-day and 'No' to-morrow, but he had adhered to principles as unchangeable as the gospel he preached. As God was faithful to His promise, so the Apostle did not vacillate; as Christ was unchangeable, so was St. Paul. The steadfastness of St. Paul and of all Christians found its source in the Divine establishing in Christ. This is only one example of the apostolic belief that constant faithfulness in Christian life came from faith in Christ, 'the faithful and true,' while apostatizing from the living God came from an evil heart of unbelief (He 3<sup>12</sup>).

The faithfulness urged by the apostles covered the whole of life. It must be shown by Christians in their ordinary callings. When many were inclined, in view of the near approach of the Day of the Lord, to abandon their ordinary occupations, St. Paul wrote to the Thessalonians that all must work with quietness and eat their own bread, and that none must leave their common work and live in idleness (2 Th 3). In like manner St. Paul wrote more than once that those who were called to be Christians must abide faithfully in their callings and perform their duties. Masters must put a new spirit into their oversight; slaves must become only the more diligent and faithful in their service; husbands and wives must remain faithful to their marriage vows, even when the new bond to Christ has been fashioned.

Within the Christian Church those called to any duty were required to exercise their gifts faithfully. He who was called to be a minister of God was reminded that a steward must be found faithful (1 Co 4<sup>2</sup>). Each one must be faithful to the graces given by the Spirit, whether of prophecy, teaching, giving, or ruling (Ro 12<sup>6</sup>). St. Paul claimed that he exhibited his faithfulness in teaching when he was dealing with the case of fathers and their unmarried daughters (1 Co 7<sup>25</sup>). When he was expressing his judgment on this matter he said that he had no 'command' (ἐπιταγήν) to convey, but he gave his settled 'opinion' (γνώμην), conscious that in so doing he was faithful to his stewardship under Christ.

As apostles were expected to be faithful in their teaching, so all Christians were expected to be faithful to the teaching they had received. As some of them were in danger of being 'carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, in craftiness, after the wiles of error' (Eph 4<sup>14</sup>; cf. He 13<sup>9</sup>), they must all be on their guard to hold fast the faith of Christ, and, in spite of all anti-Christian influences, they must hold the traditions which they were taught, whether by word or by Epistle of the Apostle (2 Th 2<sup>10</sup>). Indeed, in the Epistle to the Hebrews faith itself is almost identified with steadfast loyalty to the Unseen God, and thus passes into faithfulness, which marks the believer under manifold trials.

In the apostolic life faithfulness to friends, and especially to those who were fellow-workers, was greatly prized. The first necessity for a Christian worker is that he should be, like Lydia, 'faithful to Christ' (πίστην τῷ κυρίῳ, Ac 16<sup>10</sup>); but he should be also, like Timothy, 'faithful in Christ' (πίστον ἐν κυρίῳ, 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>), i.e. faithful in the sphere of Christian duty. This faithfulness is required to be shown not only to those for whom work is done, but also to those with whom it is done. Thus when St. Paul speaks in the Epistle to the Colossians of Tychicus his messenger as 'the beloved brother and faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord' (Col 4<sup>7</sup>), and of Onesimus as 'the faithful and beloved brother' (4<sup>9</sup>), he has before his mind chiefly the fidelity of these two brethren to himself the apostle and prisoner of the Lord. In 2 Tim. we have represented the unfaithfulness of Demas, who had forsaken the Apostle, 'having loved this present world'; the faithfulness of St. Luke his companion—the beloved physician, who had remained true to him to the end; and the renewed faithfulness of John Mark, who had deserted St. Paul at one time, but who in later years was a proved and faithful servant (2 Ti 4<sup>10, 11</sup>).

Christian faithfulness was to be observed throughout the whole of life, and especially through the many trials and tribulations of Christian experience. In the Epistles of St. Paul we find the Apostle on no fewer than six different occasions calling upon his readers to 'stand fast': 'Stand fast in the faith' (σῴκετε, 'stand firmly and faithfully,' 1 Co 16<sup>13</sup>); 'stand fast in the liberty' (Gal 5<sup>1</sup>); 'in one spirit' (Ph 1<sup>27</sup>); 'in the Lord' (Ph 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>8</sup>); 'and hold the traditions which ye were taught' (2 Th 2<sup>15</sup>). St. Paul was urgent that believers should be faithful to the highest in all their varied experiences. In the Apocalypse we find the same insistence. The Church at Smyrna was exhorted to be 'faithful unto death' (Rev 2<sup>10</sup>), and the Church at Pergamum was commended for faithfulness even in the days when 'witnessing' for Christ became 'martyrdom' in the later meaning of that word (v. 13). This extreme faithfulness was founded on faith in God and love to Christ, but it was glorified still further by the expectation of 'receiving the promise' (He 10<sup>36</sup>), of enjoying the 'great recompense of reward' (v. 35), and of being awarded 'the crown of life' (Rev 2<sup>10</sup>). Even when faithfulness meant for apostolic Christians their resisting unto blood, they were sustained by the thought of the Master, who after enduring the Cross had entered into His joy and was set down at the right hand of the throne of God (He 12<sup>2</sup>).

FALL.—It is now generally recognized by scholars that the story of the Fall in Genesis is to be regarded neither as literal history, as Irenæus, Tertullian, and Augustine taught, nor as allegory, as Clement and Origen, following Philo, held; but as a myth, common to the Semitic group of religions, in which an attempt is made to explain the origin of the evils from which mankind suffers. This myth has, however, been transformed to bring it into accord with the 'ethical monotheism' of the Hebrew religion. For the present purpose, the exposition of the apostolic (in this case exclusively the Pauline) doctrine, it is not necessary to examine any alleged similar myth in other religions, to cite any of the supposed Babylonian parallels, to enter into the details of the narrative in Genesis, or to exhibit the truth under the mythological form, which expositors have found in the story (for all these particulars the artt. in HDB i. 839, SDB p. 257, and DCG i. 571 may be consulted).

There is no evidence that the teaching of the OT as a whole on the subject of sin was in the slightest degree affected by the narrative in Gn 3, as the instances cited to the contrary disappear on closer scrutiny; but the universality of man's sinfulness is asserted as a fact, although no reason for it is offered. It is only when we come to the apocryphal Jewish literature that the story is given the significance of doctrine. Although, as the evidence from this source shows, Jewish theology in the time of Jesus had taken up the question of the origin of sin and death, yet in the teaching of Jesus there is not the faintest echo of Jewish thought upon the subject. His standpoint is that of the OT, although His revelation of God's Fatherhood and man's sonship gives to the sin which separates God and man a more tragic import. St. Paul, however, has given a place in his theology to this contemporary Jewish doctrine, and, on account of the light it throws upon his teaching, it will be necessary to examine it more closely.

1. The connexion of St. Paul's doctrine with Jewish teaching.—(a) While in the OT we have the beginnings, but only the beginnings, of the later doctrine of Satan (Job 1<sup>9-12</sup> 2<sup>1-6</sup>, the unbeliever in, and slanderer of, man's goodness and godliness; Zec 3<sup>1</sup>, the adversary of man to hinder God's grace; 1 Ch 21<sup>1</sup>, the tempter; cf. 2 S 24<sup>1</sup>, where it is the Lord who moves David to number the people), yet it is not till we come to Wis 2<sup>1-4</sup> that he is identified with the serpent who tempted Eve: 'But by the envy of the devil death entered into the world, and they that are of his portion make trial thereof.' This identification is assumed in Ro 16<sup>20</sup> and Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>2</sup> and is also implied in Jn 8<sup>44</sup> (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>8, 12</sup>).

(b) Woman's share in this tragedy for the race is mentioned in Sir 25<sup>24</sup>: 'From a woman was the beginning of sin; and because of her we all die.' Of this detail of the narrative St. Paul also makes use by way of warning: 'But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness, your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity and the purity that is toward Christ' (2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>). It is not impossible that in this allusion St. Paul has in view the opinion of apocalyptic and Rabbinic writers that the temptation was to unchastity.

'The thought which pervades this passage is that of conjugal loyalty and fidelity to one husband, and it is difficult to resist the conclusion to which Everling (Die Paulinische Angelologie u. Dämonologie, 51-57) comes in his able discussion of the passage, that the mention of Eve in this connexion in a clause introduced by ως, makes it necessary to understand the sin into which she was betrayed as similar to that into which the Corinthian Church is, figuratively speaking, in danger of falling, namely, unchastity and infidelity to her husband' (H. St. J. Thackeray, The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, 1900, p. 52; cf. Tennant, The Fall and Original Sin, 1903, p. 251).

If this was St. Paul's belief, it adds force to his argument for woman's subordination in 1 Ti 2<sup>14</sup> 'Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression.' Here again St. Paul is either echoing, or in accord with, Jewish thought, for in the Slavonic Secrets of Enoch, xxxi. 6, we read: 'And on this account he [Satan] conceived designs against Adam; in such a manner he entered [into Paradise] and deceived Eve. But he did not touch Adam' (cf. Thackeray, op. cit. pp. 51, 52). Such an opinion would explain the harshness of his tone and the hardness of his dealing with women.

(c) These are, however, subordinate features of the narrative; but St. Paul is, in his assertion of human depravity, not only in accord with some of the sayings in the OT, but with such explicit teaching as is found in 2 Es 4<sup>11</sup> 'How can he that is already worn out with the corrupted world understand incorruption,' and 7<sup>68</sup> 'For all that are born are defiled with iniquities, and are full of sins and laden with offences.' But such a view does not seem to have been universal, for Edersheim says expressly of the teaching of the Talmud: 'So far as their opinions can be gathered from their writings, the great doctrines of Original Sin, and of the sinfulness of our whole nature, were not held by the ancient Rabbis' (LT<sup>4</sup>, 1887, i. 165; cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>6</sup> [ICC, 1902], p. 137).

(d) Man's present racial condition is traced back to Adam's fall (παράπτωμα; Wis 10<sup>1</sup> 'Wisdom guarded to the end the first formed father of the world, that was created alone, and delivered him out of his own transgression'). The teaching in Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> is very fully anticipated in 2 Es 3<sup>21-22</sup>: 'For the first Adam bearing a wicked heart transgressed, and was overcome; and not he only, but all they also that are born of him. Thus disease was made permanent; and the law was in the heart of the people along with the wickedness of the root; so the good departed away, and that which was wicked abode still'; 4<sup>20</sup> 'For a grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning, and how much wickedness hath it brought forth unto this time! and how much shall it yet bring forth until the time of threshing come!'; 7<sup>13</sup> 'O thou Adam, what hast thou done? for though it was thou that sinned, the evil is not fallen on thee alone, but upon all of us that come of thee.' While it is generally assumed that in these passages man's moral corruption in the sense of inherited depravity is traced to Adam's transgression as its cause, yet Tennant maintains that the available evidence does not support the view.

'The only parallels adduced by Sanday and Headlam from approximately contemporary literature are the passages of 4 Ezra [the passages given above] relating to the cor malignum. But the cor malignum is certainly the yezer hara of the Rabbis, regarded by Pseudo-Ezra, as well as by talmudic writers, as inherent in Adam from the first, and as the cause, not the consequence, of his fall. St. Paul, curiously enough, nowhere appears to make use of the current doctrine of the evil yezer; certainly not in connexion with the Fall. There would seem to be no evidence that St. Paul held, even in germ, the doctrine of an inherited corruption derived from Adam' (op. cit. p. 264 f.).

To the explicit challenge of a common understanding of St. Paul's doctrine we must return when dealing with it in detail in the next section; but meanwhile it may be made clear that it is not the assertion of a connexion between Adam's fall and man's sinfulness which is denied in these passages, but the inference from them that Adam's fall is regarded as the cause of moral depravity, and not merely as its first instance.

Support is given to this interpretation of the evidence by Weber's summary of the teaching of the Talmud (Altst. Theol. p. 216, quoted by Sanday-Headlam, op. cit. p. 137): 'By the Fall man came under a curse, is guilty of death, and his right relation to God is rendered difficult. More than this cannot be said. Sin, to which the bent and leaning had already been planted in man by creation, had become a fact; the "evil impulse" (= cor malignum) gained the mastery over mankind, who can only resist it by the greatest efforts; before the Fall it had had power over him, but no such ascendancy (Uebermacht). After this quotation Sanday-Headlam continue the discussion in the words: 'Hence when the writer says a little further on that according to the Rabbis "there is such a thing as transmission of guilt, but not such a thing as transmission of sin (Es gibt eine Erbschuld, aber keine Erbsünde)," the negative proposition is due chiefly to the clearness with which the Rabbis (like Apoc. Baruch) insist upon free-will and direct individual responsibility' (op. cit. p. 137 f.).

The conclusion to which one is led is that a common doctrine cannot be confidently affirmed; and that if St. Paul does teach that man's moral nature was changed for the worse by the Fall, he is not following a clearly expressed and generally accepted Jewish doctrine on the subject. The bearing of his distinctive doctrine of the flesh on, and the meaning of, 1 Co 15<sup>47-48</sup> in relation to the Jewish doctrine of the cor malignum must be reserved for subsequent discussion, while the feature referred to in the above quotation may here be illustrated.

(e) There can be no doubt of the distinctness and emphasis with which Jewish thought insists on man's individual responsibility, sometimes even, it would seem, in opposition to the view of a moral solidarity of the race, as the following passages show: 2 Es 3<sup>26</sup> 'In all things doing even as Adam and all his generation had done: for they also bare a wicked heart'; 8<sup>50, 60</sup> 'The Most High willed not that man should come to nought; but they which he created have themselves defiled the name of him that made them, and were unthankful unto him which prepared life for them'; 9<sup>11, 12</sup> 'As many as have scorned my law, while they had yet liberty, and, when as yet place of repentance was open unto them, understood not, but despised it; the same must know it after death by torment.' The strongest assertion of the exclusion of the derivation of any guilt from Adam is found, however, in Apoc. Bar. liv. 15, 19: 'For though Adam first sinned and brought untimely death upon all, yet of those who were born from him each one of them has prepared for his own soul torment to come, and again each of them has chosen for himself glories to come. . . . Adam is therefore not the cause, save only of his own soul, but each one of us has been the Adam of his own soul' (Charles's translation in Apoc. and Pseudepigr. of the OT, 1913, ii. 511 f.). While St. Paul is constant in his assertion of individual liberty, yet he does not think of opposing it to, or trying to harmonize it with, the common sin of the race, sprung from Adam. Either he was not conscious of any contradiction, or regarded it as a problem insoluble by man's wisdom.

(f) On the connexion between Adam's sin and the introduction of death there is no such uncertainty in the evidence. The curse that rests on man since the Fall is mentioned in Sir 40<sup>1</sup>: 'Great travail is created for many men, and a heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam.' The connexion between death and the woman's sin stated in 25<sup>24</sup> and between death and the devil's envy affirmed in Wis 2<sup>24</sup> has already been referred to. More explicit is the reference to the narrative of Genesis in 2 Es 3<sup>7</sup>: 'And unto him thou gavest thy one commandment: which he transgressed, and immediately thou appointedst death for him and in his generation.' So also the Apoc. Bar. xvii. 3: 'Adam . . . brought death and cut off the years of those who were born from him' (cf. xxiii. 4). There are two passages, however, that seem to teach that man was by nature mortal, and that the Fall only hastened the process: 'Adam first sinned and brought untimely death (mortem immaturam) upon all' (liv. 15); and 'Owing to his transgression untimely death (mors quae non erat tempore eius) came into being' (lvi. 6). Apart from the two classical passages in St. Paul's letter on the relation of Christ and Adam in Ro 5 and 1 Co 15, which must be discussed in detail, death is connected with sin as its penalty in Ro 6<sup>23</sup> 'The wages of sin is death,' and in Ja 1<sup>15</sup> 'Sin, when it is fullgrown, bringeth forth death.' We must now pass to the discussion of St. Paul's doctrine of the Fall.

2. St. Paul's doctrine of the Fall.—Although the classical passage on the subject is Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>, yet there are references to Adam in 1 Co 15<sup>21, 22, 45, 49</sup> which may be briefly examined in so far as they present doctrine supplementary to that in Ro 5.

(a) 1 Co 15<sup>21, 22</sup> states the same doctrine. The contrast is emphasized in v. 45 by the description of the first Adam, in accordance with the account of his creation in Gn 2<sup>7</sup>, as living soul, while Christ, the last Adam, is a life-giving spirit. Adam was given life by the breath or spirit of God, but could not impart any; Christ not only has life, but gives it. The psychic order of the first Adam necessarily preceded the pneumatic order of the last (1 Co 15<sup>46</sup>): so far there is no moral censure of the first Adam implied, and the Apostle's statement corrects an error into which theological speculation on man's primitive condition often fell. 'The Apostle,' says Godet (ad loc.), 'does not share the notion, long regarded as orthodox, that humanity was created in a state of moral and physical perfection. . . . Independently of the Fall, there must have been progress from an inferior state, the psychic, which he posits as man's point of departure, to a superior state, the spiritual, foreseen and determined as man's goal from the first' (quoted by Findlay, EGT, '1 Cor.', 1900, p. 938). This inferior state did not include for St. Paul the cor malignum, which Jewish thought assigned to Adam. It is not so certain that the next statement, 'The first man is of the earth, earthy: the second man is of heaven' (v. 47), refers only to physical origin, and does not indicate moral character.

χοϊκός, as Ph 3<sup>19</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup> suggest, seems to have a moral connotation. But even if this be so, it does not make certain that St. Paul assigned the yezer hara to the unfallen Adam, as, since the reference in the 'second man from heaven' is not to the pre-existent Word, but to the Risen Lord, the contrast is between Adam fallen as the source of death to mankind and Christ risen as the fountain of its eternal life. If v. 49 be not merely a prediction, but an exhortation, as many ancient authorities attest (see RVm), this moral reference becomes certain. This whole passage, accordingly, does disprove the view that man's primitive condition was one of such perfection that there was no need of progress; but it offers no support to the assumption that St. Paul regarded Adam's position as so inferior morally that the Fall would to him appear as inevitable. As Ro 5<sup>14</sup> shows, he assigns to Adam a greater moral culpability than to his descendants before the Law was given, for he transgressed a definite commandment of God. Nor does St. Paul's doctrine of the flesh (q.v.) justify any such assumption about the moral defect of man's state before the Fall, as it is not a physical, but an ethical, conception, and relates to mankind as it is for man's present experience, not to any previous state of man. If we cannot, therefore, identify the flesh with the yezer hara of unfallen man, unless we leave in St. Paul's system the antinomy of a two-fold origin of sinfulness, one individual, the other racial, we are forced to conclude that in some way he did connect the presence of the flesh in sinful mankind with the entrance of sin at the Fall.

(b) The further discussion of this topic brings us to the closer consideration of Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>. (a) The purpose of the passage must be clearly kept in view. St. Paul is not proving man's universal sinfulness—he has done that by an empirical proof, a historical induction, in chs. 1-3; nor is he concerned to explain the origin of sin. He assumes as not needing any proof that man's sinfulness is the result of Adam's fall. From that fact he deduces the conclusion that one person can be so related to the race as to be the author to it of both sin and death. If that be so in the case of Adam, it can be and is so in the case of Christ as the Author of righteousness and life, and even so much more as Christ is superior to Adam. The purpose of the passage is to show that Christ can and does bring more blessing to man than Adam has brought curse. We go beyond what St. Paul's own intention warrants in asserting that his doctrine of salvation in Christ rests on, and falls to the ground without, his teaching on the Fall. As his proof of the sinfulness of mankind is empirical, so his certainty of salvation in Christ is rooted in his experience, and not in the opinions he shared with his contemporaries regarding the origin of sin. It is important at the outset of this discussion to assert this consideration, as it will relieve us of the painful anxiety, which many exponents of this passage hitherto have felt and shown, to justify in some sense or another this story of the Fall, in spite of the origin criticism now assigns to it, as an essential constituent of Christian theology.

(β) In v. 12 St. Paul affirms the entrance of sin into the world, and death as its penalty, as the result of Adam's transgression, and the diffusion of death among mankind in consequence either of Adam's sin alone, or of the spread of sin among all his descendants. There is this ambiguity about the meaning in the clause 'for that all sinned,' which is not only grammatically irregular, but seems even to be logically inconsistent. To fix his meaning we must examine his language very closely. The connective phrase ἐφ' ᾧ has been variously interpreted. It is improbable that ᾧ is masculine and the antecedent either Adam or death; taking it as neuter, the rendering 'because' is more probable than 'in like manner as' or 'in so far as.' In what sense did 'all sin' (πάντες ἥμαρτον)?

(1) The Greek commentators take the obvious sense of the words, regarded apart from the context: 'all as a matter of fact by their own choice committed sin.' To this interpretation two objections from the context may be urged. Firstly, if individual death is the penalty of individual sin, Adam is not responsible for the sin or the death, and so there is no parallelism with Christ as the source of righteousness and life to all; but the purpose of the whole argument is to prove a connexion between Adam and the race similar to that between Christ and redeemed humanity. Secondly, in the next verse St. Paul goes on to show that till the time of Moses, in the absence of law, the descendants of Adam could not be held as blameworthy as Adam himself was; while sin was in the world it could not be imputed as personal guilt, incurring of itself, apart from the connexion with Adam, the penalty of death.

(2) Some connexion with Adam must be asserted; but of what kind? An explanation accepted by many commentators, while on grammatical grounds not rendering  $\epsilon\phi\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\omega$  'in whom' but 'because,' yet treats the sentence as conveying the equivalent meaning. Bengel presents this view in its classical expression: omnes peccarunt, Adamo peccante. If St. Paul had meant this, why did he not supply the words? it is often asked. But when we observe the irregularity of the structure of the very sentence, introducing such ambiguity into St. Paul's meaning, we do not seem entitled to expect him to express himself with such logical precision. On this ground alone we must not set aside the explanation. But even if we accept it, what sense are we to attach to the statement that in Adam's sin all sinned?

(i.) Firstly, there is the realistic explanation: that as Adam was the ancestor of the race, so all his descendants were physically included in him, even as Levi is represented to have paid tithes to Melchizedek 'in the loins' of Abraham (He 7<sup>9-10</sup>). But such a physical explanation only increases the difficulty of understanding the connexion.

(ii.) Secondly, there is the legal explanation, so prominent in the federal theology of the Reformed Church. Adam acted, not for himself alone, but as representative of the race, and so the race shares the responsibility of his act. But to this explanation there is the obvious objection that a representative must be chosen by those for whom he acts, if they are to be in any sense responsible for his acts; and the race had no voice in the choice of its first ancestor. If the objection is met by appealing to a Divine appointment, the plea of injustice is not answered, but the will of God is represented as overriding the rights of man. In a Calvinistic theology alone could such an explanation carry conviction.

(iii.) Thirdly, the explanation more generally accepted is that from Adam all mankind has inherited a tendency to evil, which, while not abolishing individual liberty and responsibility so as to make individual transgression inevitable, yet as a fact of experience has resulted in the universal sinfulness of the race. This is the view of Sanday-Headlam (op. cit. p. 134), and they support it with the references to Jewish literature already noted. The writer of this article in his Commentary on Romans (Century Bible, 1901) accepted this conclusion. 'Without expressly stating it, Paul assumes the doctrine of original sin in the sense of an inherited tendency to sin, for what he affirms beyond all doubt here is that both the sin and the death of the human race are the effects of Adam's transgression' (p. 154). A further study of the problem has led him, however, to recognize at least the possibility of another explanation. Tennant, who of modern writers has made this subject specially his own, in his three books, The Origin and Propagation of Sin (1902), The Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin (1903), and The Concept of Sin (1912), has not only contended against the doctrine of such an inherited tendency, but has also maintained that this idea is not present in St. Paul's mind in this passage. Referring to Sanday-Headlam's objection to Bengel's explanation that the words 'in Adam' would have been given had St. Paul intended that meaning, he presses a similar objection to their view.

'That suggested by Dr. Sanday and Mr. Headlam, from whose weighty opinion it is here ventured to diverge, is an equally important element to be "supplied." Indeed, it may be asked whether the idea of inherited sinfulness, as the cause of death to all who come between Adam and Moses, does not call at least as loudly for explicit mention, if St. Paul's full meaning be expressible in terms of it, as that signified by Bengel's addition of "in Adam"? Would it not be equally novel to the reader, so far as our knowledge of the thought of that age goes, and more remote from the actual language of the verse and its context?' (The Fall and Original Sin, p. 261).

Reserving for subsequent treatment the wider issue of whether this is or is not an inherited tendency to evil, we must meanwhile look at the explanation Tennant himself offers of this verse.

(iv.) Though he rejects the realistic explanation in any form, either as already mentioned or as presented in Augustine's theory 'which makes human nature a certain quantum of being and treats descent from Adam as a division of this mass of human nature into parts' (Stevens, The Pauline Theology, 1892, p. 136 f.), he accepts the following explanation:

'Much more probable, in the opinion of the present writer, is the suggestion that, in his identification of the race and Adam, St. Paul was using a form of thought occurring by no means exclusively in the particular verse of his writings with which we are here concerned. Stevens has appropriately named it "mystical realism." "It is characteristic of Paul's mind," says this writer, "to conceive religious truth under forms which are determined by personal relationship. These relations, especially the two just specified (that of unregenerate humanity to Adam, and of spiritual humanity to Christ), may be termed mystical in the sense of being unique, vital, and inscrutable; they are real in the sense that sinful humanity is conceived as being actually present and participant in Adam's sin . . ." (op. cit. p. 32 f., and elsewhere). This mystical realism is a style of thought, a rhetorical mode; it is not a philosophy: the realism is only figurative. St. Paul identifies the race, as sinners, with Adam in the same sense that he identifies the believer with Christ. "The moral defilement of man is represented as contracted in and with the sin of Adam" (op. cit. p. 37). . . . This attractive interpretation of St. Paul's meaning has the great virtue of explaining his words, which involve so many difficulties when taken, as they generally have been, with too much literalness, as only a particular case of a mode of speech which is characteristic of the apostle. And so long as it is not so far pressed as to lose sight of the undeniable connexion between the apostle's teaching and the somewhat indefinite belief which he inherited from Jewish doctors as to the connexion between the Fall and human sin and death, it would seem to supply the best key to the thought of this difficult passage' (The Fall and Original Sin, pp. 262-3).

If it be the case that, as Tennant maintains, Jewish thought assigned the cor malignum or the yezer hara to Adam even before his Fall as well as to his descendants, and so did not teach a moral corruption of man's action as a result of the Fall (see op. cit. pp. 264-5), it does appear more likely that St. Paul did not hold the doctrine, and that accordingly it cannot be here introduced to explain his meaning. If this alternative must be excluded, although the writer is not finally convinced that it must, the explanation Tennant accepts does appear the most probable among all the others already mentioned. It must be frankly admitted that we cannot reach certainty on this matter, and it does not seem at all necessary for a modern reconstruction of Christian doctrine that we should. Whatever St. Paul's view of the Fall and its consequences may have been, seeing that it rests ultimately on a narrative which modern scholarship compels us to regard as a myth, however purified and elevated in the new context given to it in the record of the Divine revelation, and is influenced directly by contemporary Jewish thought, it cannot be regarded as authoritative for our Christian faith, however great may be its historical interest as an instance of the endeavour of a great mind to find a solution for a great problem.

3. The doctrine of the Fall and modern Christian thought.—Although the writer holds the conviction that it is not necessary for the Christian theologian to try and save as much as he dare of the wreckage of the doctrine of the Fall, after the storm of literary and historical criticism has passed over it, a few sentences may be added in closing this article as to the relation of modern Christian thought to the doctrine.

(a) What has already been urged must be repeated: that the teaching of the OT regarding sin and salvation does not rest at all on the narrative in Gn 3, but on the reality of human experience and the testimony of human conscience; that the teaching of Jesus about man as the child of God, though lost, has not this doctrine as its foundation, but comes from the moral insight and spiritual discernment of the sinless Son of God and Brother of men; that, apart from a few casual allusions in the rest of the NT, the two passages which have been considered in Ro 5 and 1 Co 15 are the only express statements of the connexion of sin and death with the Fall; and that when we look more closely at the mode in which the classical passage in Ro 5 is introduced we find that its primary intention is not to prove either man's sinfulness or to offer an explanation of its origin, but to demonstrate the greater efficacy of Christ's obedience than of Adam's transgression in their consequences for the race. These are surely weighty reasons why modern Christian thought should no longer assign to the doctrine of the Fall the prominence hitherto accorded to it.

(b) It is with the presence, guilt, and power of sin in individual experience and racial history, as the human need which the Divine grace in Christ meets, that Christian theology is alone concerned, and all other questions of the origin of sin or death are speculative, and not practical, and should be assigned the secondary place that properly belongs to them.

(c) Guided by these two considerations, we may lastly ask the question, How much remains of this doctrine for our modern Christian thought? (1) While the unity of the human race has not been demonstrated by science, this theory is not at all improbable, and so descent from one pair of ancestors is not incredible. (2) While death as physical dissolution is proved by science to have been antecedent to man's appearance on earth, and while death seems a natural necessity for man as a physical organism, we need not try to justify St. Paul by assuming either that God, anticipating human sin, introduced death as its penalty into the very structure of the world at the Creation, or that, had man not sinned, he would so have developed morally and spiritually as to have transcended the natural necessity of death, and have attained immortality (because these speculations have no contact with experience). But we may recognize that for him death was not physical dissolution merely, but death in its totality as it is for the human consciousness, and may press the question, Can it be denied that the terror and darkness of death for the mind and heart of man are due in large measure to his sense of guilt, and the effects of sin on his reason, conscience, and spirit? Between death as such an experience and sin we can even to-day admit that there is a connexion. (3) While the common assumption that the savage represents primitive man is unwarranted, and we may infer that, since man's mental, moral, and spiritual development in history proves the great distinction between him in his natural endowments and all the lower animals, man was even at the earliest stage of that development already far removed from the brute, yet all speculation as to what he originally was is precarious, as it rests on no solid foundation of assured knowledge. (4) While the dispute as regards the inheritance of acquired characters does not directly affect Christian thought (as it has yet to be proved that the laws of physical and mental or moral inheritance must be identical), yet the Christian theologian is bound to admit that the resemblances we do find between parents and children may be explained by social as much as by physical heredity, by the influence of the moral environment in youth as much as by the inheritance at birth of the moral characteristics of parents. While the writer is not convinced that Tennant has proved his contention, that the appetites and impulses of the child are entirely natural, and that the factor of heredity may be excluded from the origin of sin in the individual, he has at least compelled a reconsideration of the whole question. The sin in the race does affect the development of each member of it whether by social or by physical heredity; but when, where, or how sin first entered we do not know, for that neither can man discover nor has God revealed.

FAMILY.—1. The idea of 'family' is represented in the NT by πατριά, οἶκος, and οἰκία.—(a) πατριά is used in Lk 2<sup>4</sup> for 'lineage,' 'descendants' (of David); in Ac 3<sup>25</sup> (in plural) for 'races' of mankind; and in Eph 3<sup>15</sup>, where there is a play on words between πατήρ and its derivative πατριά: 'the Father, from whom all fatherhood (RV text: 'every family,' AV wrongly: 'the whole family') in heaven and earth is named.' Though 'family' is here the literal translation, yet, since the English word 'family' is not derived from 'father,' the above paraphrase suggested by J. Armitage Robinson (Com. in loc.), who here follows the Syriac and the Latin Vulgate, is best, and overcomes the difficulty presented to the English reader by the existence of 'families' in heaven, in opposition to Mt 22<sup>30</sup>. Fatherhood, in a real sense, there must be in heaven, and it is 'named' from God the Father. Thackeray, indeed, suggests (The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, 1900, p. 148 f.) that orders of angels are meant, and he quotes a Rabbinical phrase, 'His family the angels'; but 'families' (plural) of angels are not mentioned, and the suggestion is hardly necessary. Another way out of the difficulty is seen in the v.l. φάρια (= φάρτρα), i.e. 'tribe,' but this is an obvious gloss which spoils the sense. Cf. πατριάρχης in He 7<sup>1</sup>. Abraham the 'father of the whole family of faith' (Westcott); the word is used of David and of the sons of Jacob in Ac 2<sup>29</sup> 7<sup>8</sup>.

(b) οἶκος, besides being used for 'house' in the sense of a structure, represents (like domus) familia, the 'family' in its widest sense (see also HOME). It is used (1) for all living under one roof—father, mother, near relations, and dependents—frequently in the NT: Ac 7<sup>10</sup> (Pharaoh), 10<sup>2</sup> and 11<sup>14</sup> (Cornelius), 16<sup>31</sup> (Philippian jailer: so v. 3<sup>4</sup> παιοὶ 'with all his house,' here only in NT), 18<sup>8</sup> (Crispus), 1 Co 1<sup>16</sup> (Stephanas), 1 Ti 3<sup>4c</sup> (the bishop), 5<sup>4</sup> (the widow), 2 Ti 1<sup>16</sup> and 4<sup>19</sup> (Onesiphorus, who apparently was dead, and whose household is nevertheless named after him: see below, 2 (d)), He 11<sup>7</sup> (Noah), and, in plural, 1 Ti 3<sup>12</sup> (deacons), Tit 1<sup>11</sup> (Christians generally); (2) for descendants, Lk 1<sup>27</sup> 2<sup>4</sup>; (3) for God's family, the house of God (see below, 3).

2. Members of the family.—(a) Father.—The father, if alive, is the head of the family (paterfamilias), and exercises authority over all its members.* He is the 'master' or 'goodman' of the house (οικοδεσπότης), Mt 24<sup>43</sup>, Mk 14<sup>14</sup> (in Lk 22<sup>11</sup> οικοδεσποτης της οικίας), and the 'lord' (κύριος) of the household (οικετα), Mt 24<sup>45</sup>. That in some sense he is the priest of his own family appears from He 10<sup>-1</sup>, where the spiritual family, the house of God, has our Lord as 'a great priest over' it (see below, 3). The subordination of the family to the father is a favourite subject with St. Paul, who, though the Apostle of liberty, carefully guards against anarchy. His liberty is that of the Latin collect: 'Deus . . . cui servire regnare est' (paraphrased: 'O God . . . whose service is perfect freedom'). He lays down the general principle of subordination for all Christians in Eph 5<sup>-1</sup> (cf. Ro 13<sup>-1</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>, and 1 P 5<sup>-1</sup>), and then applies it to Christian families. The husband is the head of the wife as Christ is Head of the Church; husbands must love and honour their wives, for they are one flesh, and wives must be in subjection to their husbands and reverence them (Eph 5<sup>22-23</sup> 28-33, Col 3<sup>18</sup>, Tit 2<sup>4</sup>; cf. 1 P 3<sup>-7</sup>). For children and dependents see below, and for the relation of husband and wife, see MARRIAGE.

(b) Mother.—On the other hand, the position of the mother in the family is a very important one; to this day in Muhammadan countries, where the women are more in the background than among the Oriental Christians (for even there Christianity has greatly raised the position of women), the influence of the mother is immense. We find many traces of this in the NT. In 1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup> even young mothers are said to 'rule the household' (οικοδεσποτεῖν). In 1 P 3<sup>1</sup> the heathen husband is gained by the influence of the wife. The household at Lystra in which Timothy was brought up was profoundly influenced by the 'unfeigned faith' of his mother and grandmother, Eunice and Lois (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>; cf. 3<sup>15</sup>), and the influence of the former over her Greek husband (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>) may have been in St. Peter's mind. In Mt 20<sup>20</sup> 'the mother of the sons of Zebedee' (a curious phrase) is put forward to make petition for her children. Further, if the mother was a widow, she, rather than one of the sons, seems, at least in some cases, to have been the head of the household. Thus we read of the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, not of the house of Mark (Ac 12<sup>12</sup>); and of the house of Lydia (Ac 16<sup>15</sup>), who was probably a widow, trading between Philippi and Thyatira, a city famous for dyeing, with a guild of dyers evidenced by inscriptions (the supposition that Lydia was the 'true yokefellow' of Ph 4<sup>3</sup> rests on no solid basis). It was Lydia who entertained St. Paul and his companions, not her sons or brothers. A similar case is perhaps that of Chloe; she seems to have been a widow whose household ('they of Chloe,' 1 Co 1<sup>11</sup>) traded between Ephesus and Corinth. Other prominent women in the apostolic writings are Damaris (Ac 17<sup>34</sup>), whom Ramsay thinks not to have been of noble birth, as the regulations at Athens with regard to the seclusion of women were more strict than in some other places, and a well-born lady would hardly have been likely there to come to hear St. Paul preach (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 252); Phœbe, a deaconess who had been a 'succourer of many'

* Ramsay points out (Galatians, 1899, p. 343) that pater has a wider sense than our 'father'; he was the chief, the lord, the master, the leader.

(Ro 16<sup>14</sup>); Euodia and Syntyche, who were prominent church workers at Philippi (Ph 4<sup>24</sup>). It has often been noticed that the position of mothers of families was especially strong in Macedonia and in Asia Minor, and particularly in the less civilized parts of the latter. Of this there are some traces in the NT. Thus the influential women at Pisidian Antioch, the 'devout women of honourable estate,' are, with the chief men (πρωτοι) of the city, urged by the Jews to arouse feeling against St. Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13<sup>50</sup>), and the 'chief women' are specially mentioned at Thessalonica (17<sup>4</sup>) and Berea (17<sup>-1</sup>). There are even instances (not in the NT) of women holding public offices, and of descent being reckoned through the mother (see further J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians, 1903 ed., p. 55f.; Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, pp. 67, 160-2). It is curious that Codex Bezae (D) waters down the references to noteworthy women: e.g. in Ac 17<sup>34</sup> it omits Damaris; it seems to reflect a dislike to the prominence of women which is found in Christian circles in the 2nd century.

(c) Children.—The duty of obedience to parents is insisted on by St. Paul in Eph 6<sup>-4</sup>, Col 3<sup>20</sup>, where the two-edged injunction of the Fifth Commandment is referred to as involving duties of parents to children as well as of children to parents. The relation of the younger to the elder in the family must have been greatly simplified by the spread of monogamy in the OT (see MARRIAGE), and in Christian times there would have been very few complications in this respect. Yet it was often the case, as it still is in Eastern lands, that several families in the narrower sense made up a 'family' in the wider sense, and lived under one roof: thus a son would ordinarily bring his bride to his father's house, as Tobias brought Sarah to that of Tobit, so that his parents became her parents, and the Fifth Commandment applied to her relationship with them (To 10<sup>9-11</sup>). So we note in Mt 10<sup>35</sup>, Lk 12<sup>52</sup> that the mother-in-law and daughter-in-law are of one family or household (οικιακοι Mt., 'in one house' Lk.). The brethren of our Lord (whatever their exact relationship to Jesus) appear during His ministry to have formed one household with Mary (Jn 2<sup>-1</sup>, Mt 12<sup>46</sup> 13<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>; Joseph was probably dead), notwithstanding that they themselves, or some of them, were married (1 Co 9<sup>-1</sup>). It is because of this custom that hathān ('bridegroom') and kallāh ('bride') and their equivalents in cognate languages represent the relationship of a married man and woman to all their near relations by affinity. In the case of a composite 'family' of this nature, the father still retained some authority over his married sons.

(d) Slaves and dependents.—These formed a large portion of the more important families; the 'dependents' would be chiefly freedmen. On the other hand, it appears that hired servants were not reckoned as part of the family (HDB iv. 461). Among the Israelites the slaves were comparatively few, while in Greek and Roman families they were extremely numerous. In Athens the slaves were reckoned as numbering four times the free citizens, and elsewhere the proportion was even greater. Some Roman landowners had ten or twenty thousand slaves, or more (Lightfoot, Colossians, 1900 ed., p. 317ff.). These slaves were entirely at their master's disposal, and under a bad master their condition must have been terrible (see Lightfoot, p. 319, for details). Yet their inclusion in the 'family' somewhat mitigated the rigours of slavery even among the heathen in NT times; and this mitigation was much greater in Christian households. The Church accepted existing institutions, and did not proclaim a revolutionary slave-war, which would only have produced untold misery; but it set to work gradually to ameliorate the condition of slaves. On the one hand, slaves are enjoined by St. Paul to obey and be honest to their masters, whether Christian or not, as in Eph 6<sup>3-8</sup>, Col 3<sup>2-4</sup>. (where the great detail was doubtless suggested by the Onesimus incident), 1 Ti 6<sup>11</sup>, Tit 2<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1 P 2<sup>18</sup>. These exhortations were probably intended to take away any misapprehension that might have arisen from such passages as Gal 3<sup>28</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>21</sup>, which assert that in Christ there is neither bond nor free. Christianity did not at once liberate slaves, and St. Paul does not claim Onesimus' freedom, though he indirectly suggests it (Philem 13<sup>1</sup>). On the contrary, it taught those 'under the yoke' to render true service. At the same time, St. Paul points out that the Fifth Commandment lays a duty on masters as well as on slaves (Eph 6<sup>9</sup>, where the double duty is referred to just after the application of this Commandment to fathers as well as to children). The Christian head of the house must provide for his own household, or be worse than an unbeliever (1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>). By Christianity masters and slaves become brethren (1 Ti 6-). In Philem 16 Onesimus is said to be 'no longer a slave, but more than a slave, a brother beloved.' We cannot doubt that we have here a reminiscence of such words of our Lord, orally handed down, as 'no longer slaves but friends' (Jn 15<sup>15</sup>; cf. He 2<sup>11</sup> 'not ashamed to call them brethren'). It was owing to the good example set by Christian slaves to their heathen masters that Christianity, which at first took root in the lower social circles of society (1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>), spread rapidly upwards.

The domestic servants of the family are called 'they of the house'—οἱ ἐν τῇ οἰκῇ, Ac 10<sup>7</sup>; or οἱ ἐν τῇ οἰκῇ, 1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup> (cf. Eph 2<sup>19</sup> fig.); or οἱ οἰκῆτορες, Mt 10<sup>25</sup>.<sup>36</sup> (this includes near relations); or 'the household,' οἱ ἐν τῇ οἰκῇ, Mt 24<sup>45</sup> RV (= θεραπεία, Lk 12<sup>42</sup>). They included in their number, in the case of great families, many who would now be of the professional classes, but who then were upper slaves, such as stewards or agents, librarians, doctors, surgeons, oculists, tutors, etc. (for a long list, see Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 172). Thus in the NT we find (1) the steward, οἰκονόμος, Lk 12<sup>4</sup> (cf. Mt 24<sup>45</sup>); such were the unjust steward of the parable (Lk 16<sup>11</sup>); the word οἰκονομεῖν is used for 'to be a steward' in v. 2), and the stewards of 1 Co 4<sup>2</sup>, Gal 4<sup>2</sup>. The 'steward' of a child was the guardian of his property (Ramsay, Gal. p. 392). Metaphorically οἰκονόμος is used of Christian ministers (1 Co 4<sup>1</sup>; of 'bishops,' Tit 1<sup>7</sup>), of Christians generally (1 P 4<sup>10</sup>)—the idea is doubtless taken from our Lord's words about the 'wise slave whom his lord had set over his household to give them their food in due season' (Mt 24<sup>45</sup>). (2) The guardian of a child, ἐντροπός, was concerned with his education (Gal 4<sup>2</sup>); perhaps this is the same as the following. (3) The pedagogue or tutor (παιδαγωγός, Gal 3<sup>24</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>15</sup>) was a slave deputed to take the child to school (not a teacher or schoolmaster, as the AV); this was a Greek institution adopted by the Romans, for in education Greece led the way. (4) The physician (ἰατρός, Col 4<sup>14</sup>) was also regarded as an upper slave. It has been pointed out by Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 316) that a prisoner of distinction, such as St. Paul undoubtedly was (ib. p. 310 f.), would be allowed slaves, but not friends or relations, to accompany him, and that St. Luke, who (as the pronoun 'we' shows) accompanied him on his voyage to Italy, as also did Aristarchus (Ac 27<sup>2</sup>, Col 4<sup>10</sup>), must have done so in the capacity of a slave, taking this office on himself in order to follow his master.

Under this head we may notice four households mentioned in the NT: the 'household of Caesar' (ἡ Καίσαρος οἰκία), Ph 4<sup>22</sup>; 'they of Aristobulus,' Ro 16<sup>10</sup>; 'they of Narcissus,' Ro 16<sup>11</sup>; and 'they of Chloe,' 1

Co 1<sup>11</sup>. For the last see above (b); but the first three households were probably all part of the Imperial 'family' at Rome. That 'Caesar's household' does not necessarily or even probably mean near relations of the Emperor is shown by Lightfoot (Philippians, p. 171 ff.); the meaning seems to be 'the slaves and freedmen of Caesar.' Lightfoot with much ingenuity and probability identifies several of the names mentioned in Ro 16 with the household. The curious phrases in Ro 16<sup>10</sup> are probably due to the fact that Aristobulus and Narcissus were dead (for their identification with well-known characters see Lightfoot, and Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> [ICC, 1902], p. 425), and that their households were absorbed in that of Caesar, but still retained their old names. 'They of Aristobulus' would be equivalent to 'Aristobuliani,' and 'they of Narcissus' to 'Narcissiani.' (If the view that Ro 16 is not a real part of the Epistle be correct, this argument fails; but its verisimilitude is some ground for rejecting that view.)

3. The Christian Church as a family.—In the NT the word 'house' (οἶκος) is used figuratively of the Christian community, as in He 3<sup>2</sup>.<sup>6</sup> (Christians successors to the house [of God] in the Old Covenant), 10<sup>21</sup> (see above, 2 (a)), 1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup> (where οἶκος is explicitly defined as 'the Church of the living God'; the phrase follows the instructions as to the homes of bishops and deacons; see HOME), 1 P 2<sup>9</sup> (a 'spiritual house'), 4<sup>17</sup>. The metaphor is further elaborated in Eph 2<sup>20-22</sup> where the foundation, corner-stone, and each several stone that is laid (such is the best paraphrase of πᾶσα οἰκοδομή) together result in a holy temple, of which Christians are stones, 'built together for a habitation of God.'

The conception is based on the Fatherhood of God and on our position as His children. It is carried out by various analogous metaphors. The Church is the Bride of Christ—this is the outcome of Eph 5<sup>22</sup>; cf. Rev 19<sup>7</sup>.<sup>9</sup> 22<sup>17</sup>—and He is the Bridegroom, Mt 9<sup>15</sup> 22<sup>28</sup>. 25<sup>6</sup>, Mk 2<sup>19</sup>, Jn 3<sup>29</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>; Christians are the οἱ ἐν τῇ οἰκῇ, members of the household, of the faith, Gal 6<sup>10</sup>; Christ is their brother, He 2<sup>11</sup>; the Church is a brotherhood, 1 P 2<sup>17</sup>, filled with brotherly love (φιλαδελφία), Ro 12<sup>10</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>, He 13<sup>1</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>7</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup>. The most usual designation of Christians among themselves is 'the brethren' (Acts, passim); even heretics are 'false brethren,' 2 Co 11<sup>-6</sup>, Gal 2<sup>1</sup>. 'A brother,' 'brethren,' denote Christians as opposed to unbelievers in Philem 16, 1 Ti 6<sup>2</sup>; and so in 1 Co 9<sup>5</sup> 'a sister, a wife' means 'a Christian wife' (the 'apostle' may have a Christian wife; cf. 7<sup>39</sup> 'only in the Lord'); in 1 Co 7<sup>15</sup> 'the brother or the sister' means the Christian spouse of an unbeliever (cf. v. 14 and 5<sup>11</sup>); in Ro 16<sup>23</sup> RV ('Quartus the brother') the definite article seems to distinguish this Christian from some unbelieving Quartus. Cf. also 2 Co 8<sup>18</sup> ('the brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the churches': but some translate 'his brother'—i.e. the brother of Titus, and interpret the phrase as applying to St. Luke) 8<sup>22</sup>, Philem 7, Ro 16<sup>1</sup>, Ja 2<sup>15</sup> 2 Jn 13, and 1 Th 4<sup>6</sup>, where see Milligan's note.

In this connexion also we may note the symbolical use of words denoting family relationships. The Israelites of old were 'the fathers' (Ro 15<sup>9</sup>), just as early Christian writers are called by us. Abraham is father of spiritual descendants, believing Jews and Gentiles alike (Ro 4<sup>11</sup>. 16<sup>11</sup>, Gal 3<sup>7</sup>; in Ac 7<sup>2</sup>, Ro 4<sup>1</sup>, and probably in Ja 2<sup>21</sup>, physical descent is referred to). The teacher is father of his disciples (1 Th 2<sup>11</sup>), though sometimes he calls himself 'brother' (Rev 19, 'I John your brother'; cf. Ac 15<sup>23</sup> RV, 'elder brethren'). Also 'father' is used of any old man (1 Ti 5<sup>1</sup>); in this verse (unlike v. 17) πρεσβύτερος cannot refer to a presbyter. So 'mother' is used of any old woman in v.<sup>2</sup>; younger men and women are 'brothers' and 'sisters' (v.<sup>11</sup>). Jerusalem is called 'our mother' in Gal 4<sup>26</sup>, just as Babylon in Rev 17<sup>5</sup> is called 'the mother of the harlots.' In Ro 16<sup>13</sup> 'mother' is a term of affection ('Rufus and his mother and mine'). Similarly the expressions 'without father,' 'without mother,' in He 7<sup>3</sup> must be taken figuratively. Melchizedek's parentage is not recorded in Holy Scripture: 'he is not connected with any known line: his life has no recorded beginning or close' (B. F. Westcott, Hebrews, 1889, p. 172). Disciples, likewise, are called 'sons' or 'children' of their master, as in 1 P 5<sup>13</sup> (Mark), Gal 4<sup>19</sup> (the Galatians), 1 Ti 2<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> and Ph 2<sup>2</sup> (Timothy), 1 Co 4<sup>14</sup> (the Corinthians), Philem 10 (Onesimus), 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup> etc., 3 Jn 4.

4. The Christian family as a church.—We often read in the NT of families or households becoming Christian as a body; e.g. those of Cornelius (Ac 10<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>), Lydia (16<sup>15</sup>: the first in St. Paul's history), the jailer at Philippi (16<sup>31-33</sup>), Crispus (18<sup>7</sup>). So in Jn 4<sup>23</sup> it is recorded that the king's officer (βασιλικός) at Capernaum believed 'and his whole house.' Hence, in the absence of public churches, which persecution made impossible till a later date, a family became a centre of Christian worship, in which not only the household itself but also the Christian neighbours assembled. Thus, probably the house of Lydia was the beginning from which the Church at Philippi developed; those of Stephanas, whose family was 'the firstfruits of Achaia' (1 Co 1<sup>16</sup> oikos, 16<sup>15</sup> oikia), Titus Justus (Ac 18<sup>7</sup>), Crispus (18<sup>8</sup> oikos), and Gaius (Ro 16<sup>3</sup>) perhaps became centres of worship at Corinth. Such, again, was Philemon's house at Colossæ (Philem 2<sup>1</sup>); probably Apphia was his wife, and possibly Archippus his son (Philem 2<sup>1</sup>, Col 4<sup>17</sup>). Archippus was clearly a church official; he had received the ministry (διακονία) in the Lord, and was in some way connected with Philemon; we are led to think of him as 'bishop' of the Church at Colossæ, or, less probably, with Lightfoot, of the neighbouring Church at Laodicea (so Apost. Const. vii. 46, which makes Philemon bishop of Colossæ; but it is more likely that Philemon was a layman). At Laodicea we read of Nymphas or Nympha (Col 4<sup>15</sup>; the gender is uncertain), and 'the church that is in their house' (RV)—i.e. probably all who met to worship there are regarded as one family. Lightfoot thinks (Colossians, p. 241) that there were perhaps more than one such 'church' at Laodicea, as there certainly were in Rome (see below).

In Jerusalem such a private house was at first used for the Eucharist (Ac 2<sup>46</sup>: κατ' οίκον, 'at home,' as opposed to 'in the Temple'), and so doubtless at Troas (20<sup>7</sup>). For preaching to outsiders, the apostles made use of the synagogues (17<sup>14</sup>: 'as his custom was'), or the Temple at Jerusalem, or the 'school of Tyrannus' at Ephesus, which was probably open to all (19<sup>9</sup>), or other public places; but for the instruction of the faithful the Christians gathered in a private house (5<sup>42</sup> 'every day in the Temple and at home'; cf. 20<sup>6</sup>); in Jerusalem probably in that of Mary the mother of John Mark (12<sup>1</sup>), for her family was certainly such a centre of worship. As St. James the Lord's brother was not present in the house where the people were assembled to pray for St. Peter (v.<sup>17</sup>), it has been suggested that there were more than one such ἐκκλησία in Jerusalem; but this is uncertain. At Caesarea we are tempted to think of Philip's household as such a centre (21<sup>8</sup>); at Cenchræ of that of Phœbe the deaconess (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>). For Ephesus we have mention of Aquila and Prisca (or Priscilla), and 'the church that is in their house'—their 'family' formed a Christian community (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>). Here we have a remarkable feature, for about a year later we find these two workers credited with another 'church' in Rome (Ro 16<sup>3-5</sup>), and this has been adduced as disproving the integrity of Romans as regards the last chapter. But it is not an improbable supposition that they gathered the Christians together in their own household wherever they were; and as Sanday-Headlam remark (op. cit. p. 418 f.), they were, like many Jews of the day, great travellers. We read of Aquila in Pontus, then of him and his wife in Rome A.D. 52, when they were expelled from the capital with their fellow-countrymen (Ac 18<sup>14</sup>); then we read of them at Corinth, where they met St. Paul (Ac 18<sup>14</sup>), and of their going with him to Ephesus (v.<sup>18</sup>), where they remained some time. Thence, probably, the old decree of expulsion having become obsolete, they returned to Rome, between the writing of 1 Cor. and Rom., and the 'church in their house' in Rome was then founded. Its site has been identified with that of the old church of St. Prisca on the Aventine, and this is quite possible, though there is no evidence of importance to support the identification. Hort suggests (Prolegomena to Romans and Ephesians, 1895, p. 12 ff.) that Prisca was a Roman lady of distinction, superior in birth to her husband; and this would lend probability to the supposition that their home was a centre of Christian worship; but Sanday-Headlam think that they were both freed members of a great Roman family.

There are traces of other centres of worship in Rome. In Ro 16 both v.<sup>14</sup> and v.<sup>15</sup> indicate communities or 'families' of Christians at Rome in addition to that of Aquila and Prisca in v.<sup>5</sup>. In v.<sup>14</sup> only men are mentioned, and yet they form a community; cf. 'the brethren that are with them.' In v.<sup>15</sup> Philologus and Julia were probably husband and wife; Nereus and his sister, and also Olympas, would be near relations, living with them, but hardly their children, for it would not be likely that Philologus' daughter should be referred to here as 'the sister of Nereus.' This household seems to have been a large Christian centre: 'all the saints that are with them' are mentioned. The multiplying of centres in one city at a time when persecution was present or imminent may be illustrated by the account of the trial of Justin Martyr before the prefect in Rome (T. Ruinart, Acta Prim. Mart. 2, 1713, p. 59). Justin tells the prefect that the Christians in the city do not all assemble at one place, for 'the God of the Christians is not circumscribed in place, but, being invisible, fills heaven and earth, and everywhere is adored by the faithful and His glory praised.' Justin is pressed to say where he and his disciples assemble, and he replies that hitherto he has lived in the house of one Martin. The Acta may probably be said at least to contain the traditions current in the 3rd cent. as to Justin's death (see Smith's DCB iii. [1882] 562).

Another Christian family in Rome has left a relic of its house as a centre of worship in the church of San Clemente. This now consists of three structures, one above the other; the highest, now level with the ground, is mediæval, but contains the Byzantine furniture (ambones, rails, etc.); the middle one is of the 4th cent. (?) and used to contain this furniture; while underneath is the old house, now inaccessible through the invasion of water. This last building, there is little reason to doubt, was the meeting-place of the Christians of the 1st cent., and though now far beneath the surface, was once level with the ground. Local tradition makes it the house of St. Clement the Bishop, and it is highly probable that he worshipped in it; but it is not unlikely, as Lightfoot suggests, that it was the house of Flavius Clemens the Consul, whom tradition declares to have been buried in it, and who was perhaps 'patron' to his namesake the Bishop (Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. i.: 'Clement,' 1890, vol. i. p. 91 ff.). The Consul was a near relative of the Emperor Domitian, and was put to death by him, perhaps because he was a Christian; at least his wife Domitilla was a believer (ib. p. 53), and it is quite probable that their household became a Christian ἐκκλησία.

A further illustration of the 'family' as a Christian community is furnished by the Church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo, in Rome. The present church is built above the house of the martyrs so named, who perished, according to tradition, in the reign of Julian the Apostate. The house was probably used at that time for worship.

On the other hand, Ro 16<sup>6</sup> does not refer to a number of ἐκκλησίαι at Ephesus. St. Paul here speaks on behalf of the whole of the communities of Christians which he had evangelized, or perhaps of all throughout the world, as in 16<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>17</sup>. It should be noticed that the word ἐκκλησία is not used for a church building till a much later date.

In two places we read of private prayers at fixed hours in houses: Ac 10<sup>9</sup> (Peter at the sixth hour, on the flat roof: see HOUSE) and 10<sup>31, 30</sup> (Cornelius keeping the ninth hour of prayer in his house). But these were private prayers, not family worship. Before public daily worship became generally customary, in the 4th cent. after the cessation of persecution, these and other hours of prayer, taken over from the Jews, were frequently observed by Christians, apparently in their families. See the present writer's Ancient Church Orders, 1910, p. 59 ff.

LITERATURE.—This is given in the course of the art., but special reference is due to the Prolegomena to J. B. Lightfoot's Colossians and Philemon (1900 ed.) and Philippians (1903 ed.). For other aspects of the subject see artt. on 'Family' by W. H. Bennett in HDB and E. G. Romanes in SDB (these both deal almost exclusively with the OT); by C. T. Dimont in DCG (especially for the teaching of our Lord in the Gospels) and J. Strahan in ERE ('Family, Biblical and Christian,' dealing chiefly with the OT). There are several articles on the 'Family' in ERE from the point of view of other nations of the world.

FAMINE.—'Famine' is used throughout in the RV to translate λιμός, having taken the place of 'dearth' in Ac 7<sup>11</sup> and 11<sup>28</sup> (AV). The remaining passages are Ro 8<sup>35</sup>, Rev 6<sup>8</sup> 18<sup>8</sup>. The most important of these references is Ac 11<sup>28</sup>, where μεγάλην, followed by ἦν, the reading of the best MSS, proclaims the noun as feminine. In Lk 15<sup>14</sup> it is of the same gender, but in 4<sup>25</sup> it is masculine. In Josephus, Ant. XX. v. 2, τὸν μέγαν λιμόν appears.

We deal first with the great famine which seems to be common to Josephus and the Book of Acts. As it is spoken of in both places in the same terms, so both passages are taken to refer to one and the same event. Uncertainty attaches to the scope of the famine, which, according to St. Luke, was spread over the whole world as then known, but which, according to Josephus, was restricted to Judæa. Schurer (GJV i. [1901] 567) is inclined to regard the statement of Acts as unhistorical generalization, and for this he compares Lk 2<sup>1</sup>. The Bible historian is defended by W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 49): 'he merely says that famine occurred over the whole (civilized) world in the time of Claudius: of course the year varied in different lands.' As a matter of fact, local famines did frequently occur during that reign (see Schürer, loc. cit., and HDB, s.v. 'Claudius') in lands other than Judæa. The date of the Judæan famine may be approximately determined by Herod Agrippa I.'s death, which took place in A.D. 44 (cf. Ac 11<sup>29, 30</sup> and 12<sup>23, 25</sup>). The dates assigned by chronologists range from that year up to A.D. 46 (see HDB v. 480, and Ramsay, op. cit. 68, 254). For the actual situation in Palestine compare Josephus, Ant. III. xv. 3, XX.

ii. 5, v. 2; in the last two paragraphs the succour given by Queen Helena is detailed.

St. Luke, while careful to maintain the position of Agabus as a prophet, here in the sense of one foretelling the future (cf. Ac 21<sup>11</sup>), himself reviews the situation from a point outside the reign of Claudius, which terminated in A.D. 54. He therefore could survey the general feature of that reign, viz. as being an age of famine, and at the same time give particular attention to the local famine in Judæa, which involved Barnabas and Saul.

The whole position during the Apostolic Age may be regarded as perilous to the food supply. It was so for the Empire, owing to State policy, and for Palestine because of the insecurity of the times, culminating in the siege of Jerusalem, during which famine was extreme. Natural causes may have added to the straits, as the allusions of classical writers show. This matter has been considered from a novel point of view, viz. the relation between famine and the rainfall, by Ellsworth Huntington, who concludes that 'the second half of the first century may have been slightly drier than the first half, for at that time famines prevailed to an unusual extent' (Palestine and its Transformation, 1911, p. 327). He supports his main theory of pulsatory changes in climate by calling in the evidence of inscriptions, and he finds that the decades A.D. 61-70, 91-100, are without inscriptions (true for Syria), and these are taken to be intervals of desiccation and consequent scarcity. While illuminating the general situation, this does not bring us nearer than the historians do to fixing the date of specific famines.

The condition pictured in Rev 6<sup>5, 6</sup> is one of scarcity, when wheat and barley are to be weighed out with care to prevent a worse condition arising. In the next vision (v. 8) this worse condition is described, when death results from famine, among other evils.

In the rhetorical appeal addressed by St. Paul to the Christians in Rome famine appears in the catalogue of afflictions (Ro 8<sup>35</sup>). Assuming that Babylon the Great is to be identified with Rome, it is a fitting sequel to the probable experience of the Christians there, that famine should be one of the plagues by which the Imperial city is to be finally overtaken (Rev 18<sup>8</sup>).

Famines of OT times are recalled: (1) in Egypt and Canaan (Ac 7<sup>11</sup>); (2) in Israel (Ja 5<sup>17, 18</sup>, the absence of rain implying lack of earth's fruit; cf. Lk 4<sup>25</sup>, where famine is named).

FAST, THE (Ac 27<sup>9</sup>).—The passage in which the reference occurs is part of the account of the voyage of St. Paul. It reads: ικανού δὲ χρόνου διαγενομένου καὶ ὄντος ἤδη ἐπισφαλούς τοῦ πλοῦς διὰ τὸ κατὰ τὴν νηστειὰν ἤδη παρεληλυθέναι, παρήγει ὁ Παῦλος, κτλ. ('Seeing that a considerable time had elapsed, and that already sailing was dangerous, and also the Fast was by this time over, Paul exhorted, etc.). St. Luke is anxious to emphasize the fact that the period when, according to ancient custom, navigation must cease, was imminent. The Romans reckoned the period of mare clausum from 11 Nov. to 10 March (Vegetius, de Re Milit. iv. 39; Pliny, HN ii. 47). Previous to this was a period (24 Sept. [the autumnal equinox]-11 Nov.) when sailing was regarded as attended with great risk (Caesar, Bell. Gall. iv. 36, v. 23). For the Jew, navigation was possible only from the Feast of Pentecost to the Feast of Tabernacles (Lewin, Life and Exp. of St. Paul, 1875, ii. 192 n., quoting Schöttgen, Horæ Heb. i. 482). By general consent the 'Fast' referred to by St. Luke is regarded as the great Day of Atonement (Lv 16:29 23:6-32; Jos. Ant. XIV. xvi. 4), although unsuccessful attempts have been made to refer it to the third day of the Athenian Thesmophoria, or to some nautical mode of expression (= extremum autumni) (cf. Knowling, EGT, 1900, in loco). This Fast occurred five days before the Feast of Tabernacles, when, according to Jewish reckoning, sailing was no longer possible. The problem to be solved is to account for the emphatic way in which the language is heaped up, so as to imply that the situation for those on board was really critical, and to explain the advice given by St. Paul to remain where they were, which was disregarded (Ac 27<sup>10-21</sup>). The sailing-master and captain were anxious to reach Phœnix, a Cretan port further on, not only because they thought it a safer port to winter in, but also, no doubt, that they might lose less time, and perhaps gain the glory that accrued to the bringing in of the first corn-ship to Rome in the spring (cf. W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 322 ff., where the whole situation as between St. Paul and the responsible authorities is clearly explained). St. Paul snowed himself not only the more prudent sailor, but as having the greater regard not merely for human life, but also for the guidance of God. This purpose in St. Luke's mind is revealed in his use of καί before τὴν νηστείαν, 'also the Fast was now gone by.' In other words, less than five days remained from the date (Feast of Tabernacles) when to sail would be contrary to the will of God. The implication is that they actually did set sail within these five days.

Two questions of critical interest emerge from a careful consideration of the use of νηστία in this passage.

1. Chronological.—The word seems to afford an important clue to the exact year in which the voyage of St. Paul to Rome took place. In this connexion we must note that, in all probability, the phrase ὁντος ἡδὴ ἐπισφαλοῦς τοῦ πλοῦς refers to the Roman mode of reckoning, and that there is a studied contrast (implied in καί) in the verse between the Roman and the Jewish Calendar. The καί reproduces vividly the note of apprehensiveness. 'It seems to follow, therefore, that Luke is writing of a year in which the Great Fast is subsequent to the Autumnal Equinox, or is at all events very late indeed' (W. P. Workman, in ExpT xi. [1899-1900] 317). Workman deduces, after a careful examination of the various dates proposed, especially of A.D. 56, 58, 59, that A.D. 59 is the one that fits in best with St. Luke's statement. The Fast took place on Tishri 10, which is calculated by adding 173 days to Nisan 14; the calculation of the latter date presenting some difficulty only in A.D. 56, which for other reasons is unsuitable, although championed by Blass and Harnack. Turner in HDB i. 862, art. 'Chronology,' argues for A.D. 58, but in that year Tishri 10 is 16 Sept., eight days previous to the equinox. If Workman's interpretation of the contrast in St. Luke's mind between the two modes of reckoning is correct, A.D. 58 is therefore unsuitable, and the only possible year is A.D. 59, in which Tishri 10 falls on 5 October. This is the year contended for on other grounds by Ramsay and others. Another advantage is that, by this means, the chronological difficulty created by the 'three months' stay in Malta (Ac 28<sup>11</sup>) is somewhat alleviated; for the party could not possibly set sail again until the very beginning of February at the earliest. The spring equinox occurred on 9 Feb. (cf. Turner, HDB i. 422; Zahn, Introd., iii. 454). St. Paul would of course reckon after the Jewish Calendar

(1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>), and it is quite natural that St. Luke, a Gentile Christian, should also do so (Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles [NT Studies iii.], p. 21 [= Beiträge zur Einleitung in das NT, iii. (1908)]).

2. Authorship of Acts.—Does the mention of the Fast imply that St. Paul observed it? This question can be answered adequately only in connexion with a full investigation of his attitude towards Judaism. Such an investigation has a very important bearing on the question of the Lucan authorship, and cannot be entered upon here (see art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES). It may, however, be pointed out that, on the most probable supposition that St. Paul, along with his companions Aristarchus and Luke, did observe the Fast, the fact is illuminative for the question of his attitude to Judaism generally, notwithstanding his principle that the Law is abrogated. Waiving the general question as to whether such conformity on the Apostle's part is inconsistent with the doctrine of the Epistles (cf. Ac 21<sup>27a</sup>, 23<sup>6</sup> 26<sup>6</sup>), and the assumption that on this account the portrait of St. Paul in Acts is therefore a Tendenz-product, we may find in this passage an important confirmation of Harnack's position that a mere theory of accommodation to Jewish customs for the sake of peace on St. Paul's part is neither worthy nor satisfying. No such motive could be in place under such circumstances. He observed the Fast because he was a Jew, who at the same time did not seek to bind such observances on Gentile Christians. His one aim was to promote a sense of brotherhood 'in Christ' between Jew and Gentile. 'St. Paul, indeed, took up a position even then no longer tenable when he regarded "Judaism" as still possible within the Christian fold, while he himself, by his mission to the Gentiles, had actually severed Judaism inside Christianity from its roots' (Harnack, Date of Acts and Synoptic Gospels [NT Studies, iv.], p. 76 [= Beiträge, iv. (1911)]).

FATHER.—See FAMILY.

FATHERHOOD OF GOD.—See GOD.

FATHOM.—The only instance of this measurement is found in Ac 27<sup>23</sup>, where by successive soundings a depth of 20 and 15 fathoms is obtained. The word employed (ὀργυια; cf. Herod. ii. 149. 4) denotes the length from finger tip to finger tip of the outstretched arms, measuring across the breast. In tables of length it appears = 4 cubits = 6 feet. The actual measurement thus depends on the length of the cubit or foot. According to recent authorities, the Roman-Attic ft. is given as equivalent to .971 English ft., which yields 70 in. (approximately) as the length of the fathom. This is slightly under our present-day measure of 6 feet. For the fathom of Julian of Ascalon (74-49 in.) see EBi, art. 'Weights and Measures.'

FEAR (φόβος, φοβεῖσθαι, φοβερός; ἀφόβως, 'without fear'; ἐκφοβος, 'exceedingly afraid').—While there is a natural fear in the presence of danger—e.g. in a hurricane at sea (Ac 27<sup>17</sup>)—which is not specifically human, spiritual fear is distinctive of man, whose motives and actions lack their finest quality unless they are influenced by it. The last count in the indictment which St. Paul draws up against both Jew and Gentile—comprehensive and explanatory of all the rest—is that there is no fear of God before their eyes (Ro 3<sup>18</sup>). This is the stupid, unthinking fearlessness of men who are blind to the realities of the spiritual world to which they belong. If they but knew God, they could not but fear Him, supposing they are guilty of even a fraction of the sins which are here laid to their charge. So soon as their eyes are opened, and their consciences quickened, they discover that it is a fearful thing (φοβερόν) to fall into the hands of the living God (He 10<sup>31</sup>). But if, conscious of demerit, they cry to Him for mercy, their sins are forgiven, and henceforth they live as in His sight, recognizing that to fear God and keep His commandments is the whole duty of man.

This was the religion of the devout Jew, and when the Gentile, dissatisfied alike with the old gods of Olympus and the cold abstractions of philosophy, came to the synagogues of the 'dispersion' in search of a higher faith and a purer morality, he was taught to 'fear God.' He became a φοβούμενος (or σεβόμενος) τὸν θεόν, though he might never completely judaize himself by accepting the mark of the covenant. The God-fearer is very frequently referred to in the Apostolic Age (Ac 10-2. 23 13<sup>16</sup>. 26 etc.), and many of the earliest Gentile converts to Christianity were men and women whose fear of God had prepared them for the reception of the gospel. The Torah was thus a tutor to bring them to Christ. The religion of law, in which God was a Sovereign to be obeyed and a Judge to be dreaded, was consummated by the religion of love, in which God is a Father and Christ a Saviour-Brother. It is the distinctive message of Christianity that God wills men to serve Him without fear (ἀφόβως, Lk 17<sup>4</sup>), with a love which casts out fear (1 Jn 4<sup>18</sup>), with a boldness which seeks His immediate presence (He 10<sup>19</sup>), with a freedom and familiarity which prompt the cry 'Abba, Father' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>). 'Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of sonship.' 'Ελευθερία, πατρῷσια, and ἀγάπη—dominant notes in the gospel of St. Paul, the writer of Hebrews, and St. John—are all antipodal to fear. The atmosphere of the household of God is filial trust, not servile suspicion and dread.

In the Christian life, nevertheless, there is a new place for the old instinct of fear. Wearing a fresh livery, it is transformed into a guardian of the believer's dear-bought possessions. Godly repentance has wrought—what fear! (2 Co 7<sup>1</sup>). Thus there is an ethical fear which accompanies a great responsibility, a passionate love, and a noble heroism. There is a fear which is the opposite of high-mindedness (Ro 11<sup>-9</sup>), and without which no man can work out his salvation (Ph 2<sup>1</sup>-) or perfect his holiness (2 Co 7<sup>1</sup>). There is a fear of personally coming short and permitting others to come short (υστερεῖν, He 4<sup>1</sup>). There is the paranymp'h's jealous fear lest the Bridegroom should lose His bride (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>), the Apostle's anxious fear lest his converts should be found unworthy (12<sup>20</sup>). There is the scrupulous fear of Bunyan's Mr. Fearing, who 'was, above many, tender of sin; he was so afraid of doing injuries to others, that he often would deny himself of that which was lawful, because he would not offend' (cf. 1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>). There is a fear, like that of the angels in Sodom, animating those who snatch erring ones as brands from the burning, while they hate even the garment spotted by the flesh (Jude 3<sup>1</sup>).

From the natural fear which listens either to the whispers of inward weakness or the threats of outward despotism, Christianity suffices to deliver men. For the sensitive human spirit, which often pathetically confesses its 'weakness and fear and much trembling' (1 Co 2<sup>3</sup>; cf. 2 Co 7<sup>5</sup>), Christ indeed shows the utmost tenderness, and again and again St. Paul received night-visions in which his Lord bade him 'Be not afraid' (μὴ φοβου, Ac 18<sup>9</sup>, 27<sup>24</sup>). But for the timidity which sacrifices principles and shirks duties Christianity has no mercy. To this fear it gives a special name, calling it not φόβος but δειλία (2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>), a fearfulness which is synonymous with cowardice, and the fearful (οἰλοί, Rev 21<sup>8</sup>), who prove apostates in the hour of danger, denying Christ and worshipping Cæsar, stand first in the black list of those who go down to the second death.

The NT shrinks from attributing φόβος to Christ, yet something would have been lacking in His matchless character if He had not given the best illustration of the presence of fear in even the most filial life. In the hour of His agony, when His Father's will was the one certainty which nothing could obscure, His godly fear of swerving an inch from the line of duty gave Him the supreme moral victory. He was heard for His ευλάβεια, that perfect reverence which dictated a perfect submission: 'exauditus pro sua reverentia' (Vulg.).

JAMES STRAHAN.

FEASTING.—1. Pagan feastings.—These are dealt with in this article only in so far as they are alluded to in the apostolic literature. The allusions are incidental, and no attempt is made at minute description.

(1) We find κῶμοι or drinking-bouts mentioned (Ro 13<sup>13</sup>, Gal 5<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>3</sup>), and the licentious conduct of those who participated in these orgies may have suggested to St. Paul the famous passages in which he speaks of the works of darkness (cf. Eph 5<sup>11-14</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>4</sup>), for these bouts took place at night as distinguished from the tempestiva convivium which ended in daylight: 'those that be drunken are drunken in the night' (1 Th 5<sup>7</sup>).

'When night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, down with insolence and wine'
(Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 500 ff.).

To Plato also they suggested a picture of the licentious tyrannical soul (Rep. ix. 573): 'there will be feasts and carousals and revellings and courtézans, and all that sort of thing; Love (Ἔρως) is the lord of the house within him, and orders all the concerns of his soul.'

Flagrant, shameless immorality was the invariable result of such feasts, and so we find associated with them ἀσέλγεια, μέθαι, οἶνοφλυγία, δωρία. 'Wine, women, and song' went together. Plato speaks of οἶπνα καὶ συν αὐλητήρσι κῶμοι (Theæt. 173 D), and it may be that, when St. Paul exhorts Christians to use psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, he is contrasting the grand reverent music of Christian meetings with the ribald songs of pagan feasts. One may compare the phrase in Pliny's correspondence (Epp. x. 97): 'carmen Christo quasi Deo secum invicem.' A favourite topic of conversation at such gatherings was ἔρως, which is interesting when one thinks of the Christian Agape.

Although philosophers might be able to discuss this topic on a high moral plane (cf. Plato, Symposium), yet ordinarily the 'love' spoken of was simply 'lust.'

St. Paul knew that just as Judaism could descend to this worldly, sensual plane of living when God was forgotten, so also could Christianity. The motto of this kind of life was 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die'—perhaps the philosophic creed of a few, but certainly the practice of many. Hence St. Peter calls it the 'will of the Gentiles' (1 P 4<sup>3</sup>), and St. Paul contrasts it with the 'will of the Lord' (Eph 5<sup>17</sup>). The great moralists of paganism condemned these bouts, and St.

Paul (1 Co 15<sup>33</sup>) quotes Menander (acc. to Jerome on Gal 4<sup>94</sup>)—himself an Epicurean—against the view of life summed up in the aphorism, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' The Corinthians, doubting the resurrection-life, must wake up from drunkenness in a righteous fashion. Such deeds of darkness as were associated with these κῶμοι were to be utterly left alone (cf. Ro 13<sup>13f.</sup>, a passage for ever associated with the conversion of St. Augustine). Christians were to be filled with the Spirit, not with wine, which leads to profligacy (ἀσωτία). Profligacy is associated with drinking-bouts in 2 Mac 6<sup>4</sup> and Test. Sud. xvi. 1: 'There are four evil demons in wine—lust, burning sensual desire, profligacy, base greed of gain.'

Disregard of a future life easily led to sensualism (see Meyer's Kommentar on 1 Co 15<sup>33</sup> for inscriptions on drinking-cups recently discovered). Christians would of course be looked on by their former pagan associates as austere, gloomy Puritans for leaving aside these practices. So St. Peter declares, and Tertullian later on says: 'What a jolly boon companion that young man was, and now he is good for nothing; he has become a Christian. What a gay woman that was, how agreeably wanton, and now one dare not utter the least indecency in her presence' (Apol. 3).

(2) It was not simply gross, licentious, heathen feasts that came into conflict with the moral earnestness of Christianity, but also feasts connected with religious cults. These cults were everywhere, and the cult of the Emperor was sometimes associated with them. They constituted a grave danger owing to the religious sanction they gave to immorality and the easy path they opened up towards virtual apostasy. To participate in these religious feasts was distinctly forbidden, although, according to St. Paul at least, the meat offered for sale in the open markets could be bought.

Christian converts had been brought up in an atmosphere where the belief in the influence of demons was taken for granted, and indeed the common belief of Judaism was similar. The Jew incurred pollution through partaking of food offered to idols. It was believed that the evil spirit entered the food and resided even in those portions sold in public; 'lying hid there for a long time, they (i.e. demons) blend with your souls' (Clem. Hom. ix. 9). An extreme form of this view is found in Eusebius (Præp. Evang. iv. 23—a quotation from Porphyry): 'Bodies are full of demons; for they particularly delight in foods of various kinds. So when we eat they seize upon the body.' It was therefore absolutely imperative to abstain from festivals connected with idol-worship.

'Where the feast is held under the auspices of a heathen god and as a sequel to his sacrifice,' then abstinence must follow; 'participation under these circumstances becomes an act of apostasy, and the feaster identifies himself with the idol as distinctly as in the Lord's Supper he identifies himself with Christ' (G. G. Findlay in EGT ii. [1900] 732).

(3) It was not as easy, however, to decide the right Christian attitude in the case of civic and business festivities. Trade-gilds and social clubs were numerous and gave their members many social and commercial advantages. They could hold property, and they gave relief in cases of need to their members. These gilds were under the patronage of some deity who was honoured in feasts—common meals of a sacramental kind at which members ate and drank reclining on couches. These meals were often scenes of revelry (see Ramsay in HDB iv. 758-9), and it required great constancy on the part of Christian members of such gilds to keep their faith. St. Paul recognizes the impossibility of absolute aloofness from these and from social gatherings; but while he maintains the nonentity of idols, he recognizes the practical power of demonic influence. He allows freedom of intercourse to the strong Christian—provided he keeps from idolatry and fornication—but he recognizes the danger. This was threefold. The weak brother might be made to stumble, the strong Christian might himself be enticed, and the heathen might conclude that the Christianity of the Christian participant meant little. There were three dangers the Apostle had to face in settling this question. There was the danger of asceticism, the danger of a relapse into Judaistic rites, and the danger of antinomian laxity. The danger of asceticism is met in the Colossian Epistle. St. Paul combats abstinence (see art. ABSTINENCE). From his mention of angel-worship and στοιχεῖα it seems clear that the demonic influences referred to above were believed in by the errorists of Colossæ. Judaistic influence is also discernible (see art. COLOSSIANS). The Judaistic errors are met in the Galatian Epistle. It is the libertine antinomian error that seemed most likely to overcome the Gentile Church. St. Paul meets it in 1 Corinthians. The letters to Pergamos and Thyatira meet it with forcible denunciation and threatening (see such artt. as BALAAM, JEZEBEL, NICOLAITANS), and in 2 Peter and Jude we have an attitude similar to that of St. John (Revelation).

2. Christian feasts (for the Jewish feasts mentioned in the NT see artt. NEW MOON, PASSOVER, PENTECOST, SABBATH, etc.). We have the Lord's Supper as a distinctively Christian feast (see EUCHARIST), and at least once Agape occurs (see LOVE-FAST). The well-known Church festivals are of later origin. St. Paul once (1 Co 5<sup>8</sup>) uses the term 'feast' in a metaphorical sense of the whole life of the Christian community. Philo had interpreted in this fashion before him (de Migr. Abrah. 16). This is suggested to St. Paul by the Lord's Supper, and the thought is found recurring in later writers. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the whole Christian life of the true Gnostic as a holy panegyric (joyful assembly) (Strom. vii. 7). Chrysostom also says that for Christians their whole life is a feast owing to the superabundance of the good gifts bestowed on them (quoted by Findlay, EGT, on 1 Co 5<sup>8</sup>). This feast, says St. Paul, must be held in sincerity and truth.

In 2 P 2<sup>13</sup>, Jude<sup>12</sup> we have an account of libertines who frequent the Christian feasts, but who turn them into occasions of pleasure. The textual questions involved need not be raised here. Even if we read ἀπάταις in 2 Pet. for ἀγάπαις (as in Jude<sup>13</sup>), the reference seems in both places to be to the Christian love-feasts (the term εὐωχία is used of the love-feast by Clem. Alex. Ped. ii. 1. 6), and a class of men is brought before us who live immoral lives while yet claiming the right to participate in the Christian love-feasts.

These Christian feasts were early misunderstood by pagans. Christians were accused of atheism, of immorality, and of cannibalism. Pliny, by speaking of the innocence of Christian feasts, implies that he had heard these accusations. Similar charges are repudiated by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 26), and later by Tertullian (Apol. 7, 8). The Christians defended themselves on the ground that such accusations were baseless, or else that they could only be brought against heretics (cf. Iren. i. xxv. 3, and Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 26). For a later defence see Eusebius, HE 4. 7. That there was some ground for the charge of immorality, even Peter and Jude bear witness, but they testify also to the stern morality of true Christianity.

FEET.—The tendency to individual detail, which gives so much vividness to Semitic narrative, accounts for some of the references to the feet (πόδες) in apostolic writings, as, for example, the reference in St. Peter's judgment on Sapphira: 'the feet of those who buried thy husband are at the door' (Ac 5<sup>9</sup>; cf. 7<sup>5</sup>, He 12<sup>13</sup>, Rev 1<sup>15</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>). The sinner's feet are 'swift to shed blood' (Ro 3<sup>15</sup>), but the Christian's are to be 'sandalled' with readiness to proclaim the gospel of peace (Eph 6<sup>15</sup>), and are made beautiful by that mission (Ro 10<sup>15</sup>). Behind such allusions, however, there is something more than the love of graphic detail. The whole body enters much more into biblical ideas of personality than the modern reader usually recognizes (see artt. EAR, HEAD). In St. Paul's analogy between the human body and the Church, the head needs the service of the feet, and the foot must not refuse its ministry because its service is humbler than that of the hand (1 Co 12<sup>16, 21</sup>; cf. 1 Clem. xxxvii. 5). In the mystical body of the Odes of Solomon (xlii. 18) the feet represent the saints.

Other references to the feet are derived from Oriental customs. The sandals are removed in holy places (Ac 7<sup>33</sup>), as before entering the mosque of to-day. The removal of the master's sandals is a slave's work (13<sup>-5</sup>). To wash the dusty feet of guests is a rite of hospitality (cf. Lk 7<sup>44</sup>, Jn 13<sup>4</sup>), and the habit of rendering such service to the 'saints' is mentioned amongst the qualifications of 'widows' (1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup>; see art. WIDOW). Since the Jewish teacher taught whilst sitting, with his scholars at a lower level around him, St. Paul can say literally that he was 'brought up at the feet of Gamaliel' (Ac 22<sup>3</sup>). Contributions to the common fund are laid at the feet of the apostles, who are thus represented sitting as teachers (4<sup>35</sup>; see Holtzmann, ad loc.). The clothes of the 'witnesses' who stoned Stephen were laid at the feet of Saul, already prominent against the new sect (7<sup>38</sup>). The Oriental habit of prostration before the feet of a superior, in fear or reverence, is illustrated by Sapphira (5<sup>10</sup>), Cornelius (10<sup>26</sup>), John (Rev 1<sup>17</sup> 19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>8</sup>; cf. 3<sup>9</sup>; Hermas, Vis. iii. ii. 3). The ancient custom according to which the victor literally trampled the conquered under his feet (Jos 10<sup>24</sup> and the monuments), to register and confirm the conquest, accounts for the frequent phrase 'under the feet,' to denote subjugation (1 Co 15<sup>25, 27</sup>, Eph 1<sup>22</sup>, He 2<sup>8</sup>, Ro 16<sup>7</sup>; cf. Rev 10<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>). In the spirit of dramatic symbolism, Agabus (q.v.) bound his hands and feet with St. Paul's girdle, to prophesy the Apostle's coming bondage (Ac 21<sup>11</sup>). St. Paul and Barnabas shook off the dust of their feet against Pisidian Antioch (13<sup>51</sup>; cf. Mt 10<sup>14</sup>) in token of complete separation from its doom.

H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

FELIX (Ac 23<sup>34ff.</sup>).—A freedman, and a brother of Pallas, Felix was the favourite of the Emperor Claudius. Tacitus (Hist. v. 9) calls him 'Antonius Felix.' Of his public life prior to his appointment to his procuratorship in Palestine, nothing is known; of his private life, only that he had married a granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra, whom Tacitus (loc. cit.) calls Drusilla, confusing her, no doubt, with the Jewish princess with whom Felix allied himself later. Suetonius knows of yet another marriage—also to a princess (Claud. 28).

Josephus and Tacitus are at variance as to the time and circumstance of the sending of Felix to Palestine. According to Josephus (BJ ii. 12; Ant. xx. 6 f.), Felix was appointed to succeed the procurator Cumanus, when the latter was condemned and banished for his misrule. According to Tacitus (Ann. xii. 54), Cumanus and Felix were contemporaneously procurators, the one of Galilee, the other of Samaria. It seems reasonable to follow Schürer (HJP i. ii. [1890] 174) in giving preference in this matter to 'the very detailed narrative of Josephus.' This fixes the arrival of Felix in Palestine in A.D. 52, or early in the following year.

The historians are entirely at one in their estimate of Felix and of the manner in which he exercised his functions. His countryman Tacitus (Hist. v. 9) describes him as using 'the powers of a king with the disposition of a slave,' and says (Ann. xii. 54) 'he deemed that he might perpetrate any ill deeds with impunity.' Under his government the state of Palestine grew rapidly worse. If there had been occasional disorders under Cumanus, 'under Felix rebellion became permanent.' The boundless cruelty with which he repressed the more open opposition of the 'Zealots' to the Roman rule stimulated the formation of the secret associations of the 'Assassins' (Sicarii), whose hand was against all—Jew not less than Roman—who did not further their designs. Not less significant of the misery of the people was their readiness to answer the call of religious fanatics like 'the Egyptian' mentioned in Ac 21<sup>38</sup>, whom Josephus (BJ ii. xiii. 5) credits with a following of thirty thousand. In any such movement Felix suspected 'the beginning of a revolt,' and adopted measures which only served to increase the popular disaffection. For the intrigue by which he possessed himself of the youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa I.—the newly wedded wife of King Azizus of Emesa—see art. DRUSILLA.

The cynical disregard of Felix for justice, and his inordinate greed are alike brought to view in his treatment of the Apostle Paul. Although possessed of information 'concerning the Way,' which would have justified him in releasing the prisoner when he was first brought before him, he decided to adjourn the case indefinitely (Ac 24<sup>2</sup>), partly to curry favour with the Jews, and partly to serve his own rapacious ends. The interview with the Apostle recorded in Ac 24<sup>24</sup> was probably intended by the procurator and his wife to be somewhat of a diversion—it ended for Felix in terror. He had frequent communings with St. Paul during the time he detained him as his prisoner at Cæsarea; but seemingly on these later occasions Felix kept control of the conversation and directed it, though unavailingly, towards his mercenary aim.

Two years after St. Paul was brought to Cæsarea, Felix was recalled to Rome in connexion with a strife which had broken out at Cæsarea between the Jews and the Syrians in that town—the Jews asserting for themselves certain exclusive rights, which the others denied. The matter was referred to the Emperor. The investigation proved so damaging to Felix that 'he had certainly been brought to punishment, unless Nero had yielded to the importunate solicitations of his brother Pallas' (Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 9).

Of the subsequent life of Felix, nothing is known.

FELLOWSHIP.—Nothing is so prominent in early Christianity as its sense of fellowship. The Corinthians, with their extreme individualistic tendencies, are an exception among the Pauline communities. 1. This fellowship is primarily a religious fact: it is fellowship with the heavenly Lord, who, though hidden in heaven (Ac 3<sup>21</sup>), is yet sensibly present to His followers (Mt 18<sup>-0</sup> 23<sup>-0</sup>). Even the individual believer knows that he is in fellowship with Christ. St. Paul, using a mystical form of expression, says that it is Christ and not himself who lives and acts in him (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). He speaks also of 'the fellowship of his sufferings' (Ph 3<sup>10</sup>), which allows his own sufferings to participate in the saving power of Christ's afflictions for His Church (Col 1<sup>24</sup>, Eph 3<sup>13</sup>). The fellowship with Christ to which God has called Christians (1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>) has not yet been fully realized, but is still to be hoped for. To be with Christ for ever is the whole desire of the Apostle (1 Th 4<sup>17</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>); in the present time he has but a foretaste of the joy to come. St. John emphasizes the fact that this present fellowship with Christ (1 Jn 1<sup>6</sup>) is fellowship with the Father and with the Son (1<sup>3</sup>). Since it is the Holy Ghost who mediates between Christ and His believers, St. Paul speaks of 'fellowship of the Spirit' (Ph 2<sup>1</sup>) as well as of 'communion of the Holy Ghost' (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>), the same Greek word (κοινωνία) being used in both passages. Fellowship with the heavenly Lord, who sits at the right hand of God, and makes intercession for His followers (Ro 8<sup>34</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>, He 2<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>15</sup> 7<sup>-5</sup> etc.), is realized in prayers which are heard (2 Co 12<sup>32</sup>), and in revelations (2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>, Gal 2<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1 Th 4<sup>15</sup>). Fellowship with the Holy Ghost is realized in certainty of salvation and boldness in prayer (Ro 8<sup>15</sup> 26; cf. He 4<sup>16</sup>), in moral strength (Ro 8<sup>13</sup>, Gal 5<sup>16</sup>), and miraculous gifts of every kind—the ecstatic gifts of prophecy and speaking with tongues, and the natural gifts bestowed by the Spirit, such as governing and helping in the Church (1 Co 12<sup>31</sup> 28<sup>2</sup>).

2. Fellowship of the faith (Philem 6) is fellowship of the faithful. This is an exclusive fellowship: 'what fellowship have righteousness and iniquity? or what communion hath light with darkness?' (2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>). St. Paul, and still more St. John, strive hard to maintain this exclusiveness in their churches—not for reasons of utility, as in the case of the Greek clubs; not from national prejudice, as in the case of the Jewish synagogues; but from the standpoint of Christian morals: the fulfilment of the high ordinances of the gospel is only possible in the midst of a Christian congregation (1 Co 6<sup>1-11</sup>). The separation of the members of the Church from social relationship with the heathen world, which St. Paul endeavoured to effect (cf. his scruples regarding invitations to heathen houses or temples, 1 Co 10<sup>27</sup>), was carried out in later times (1 P 4<sup>4</sup>, 3 Jn 7); and the leaders in the Church even began to insist on avoiding all fellowship with Christians of doubtful character (2 Jn 10<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>12</sup>, Rev 2<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>, Jude 19<sup>2</sup>).

To this exclusiveness in externals there corresponds an inward intensity: to be of one accord, to have the same mind (1 Co 1<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>11</sup>, Ph 2<sup>2</sup>, Ro 12<sup>16</sup>), to love the brethren (Ro 12<sup>10</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>, etc.), are oft-repeated commands. 'Bear ye one another's burdens' is a law of the Church (Gal 6<sup>2</sup>); all are members of one body (1 Co 12<sup>1-27</sup>), and so all have joy and sorrow in common (1 Co 12<sup>-6</sup>, Ro 12<sup>15</sup>). One sign of this fellowship is mutual intercession (2 Co 1<sup>11</sup>, Col 4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>), another is the kiss of peace (2 Co 13<sup>12</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>20</sup>). At the so-called Apostolic Council, James, Peter, and John gave Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship in token of their mutual recognition of one another as fellow-workers in their different mission fields (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). Later on it became customary to send messengers and letters from one church to another. St. Paul mentions not only his fellow-workers (Ro

3. Fellowship—and this is the main point—is to be exercised actively towards all members of the community. In this sense fellowship is one of the chief characteristics of the primitive Church of Jerusalem (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>); it is characteristic, too, of the relationship between the Pauline communities. St. Paul praises the Philippians for their fellowship in furthering the gospel (Ph 1<sup>5</sup>), i.e. taking part in the Apostle's missionary work by personal activity, prayers, and contributions of money. In this way they had fellowship with his afflictions (Ph 4<sup>14</sup>). The churches of Macedonia besought the Apostle 'with much intreaty in regard of . . . the fellowship in the ministering to the saints' (2 Co 8<sup>4</sup>), i.e. that they might be allowed to join in the collection for the poor of Jerusalem. Thus the word κοινωνία acquires a meaning which the EVV have tried to express by the rendering 'contribution' (Ro 15<sup>-6</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>13</sup>· AV 'distribution') or 'communicate' (He 13<sup>16</sup>). He that is taught in the word is advised by St. Paul to communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things (Gal 6<sup>6</sup>). Fellowship, then, becomes a system of mutual help—the care of the poor and the sick, the feeding of widows and orphans, the visiting of prisoners, hospitality, the procuring of labour for travelling workmen (Didache, xii. 3 ff.), are some of the proofs of fellowship. By these means early Christianity showed itself to be a social power far surpassing all rival organizations and religions.

FESTUS.—No information is forthcoming concerning Porcius Festus, who succeeded Felix in the procuratorship of Judæa, other than that supplied by Ac 24<sup>27</sup> 26<sup>32</sup> and by Josephus, Ant. XX. viii. 9 f., ix. 1, and BJ II. xiv. 1. According to Josephus, Festus set himself with vigour and success to restore order to his province, which he found distracted with sedition and overrun by bands of robbers. 'He caught the greatest part of the robbers, and destroyed a great many of them.' More particularly it is added that he 'sent forces, both horsemen and footmen, to fall upon those that had been seduced by a certain impostor, who promised them deliverance and freedom from the miseries they were under, if they would but follow him as far as the wilderness. Accordingly, those forces that were sent destroyed both him that had deluded them and those that were his followers also.' The only other incident in the administration of Festus which Josephus relates shows him, in association with King Agrippa II., withstanding 'the chief men of Jerusalem' (Ant. XX. viii. 11), and permitting an appeal to Cæsar—an interesting combination in view of the narrative in Acts. The circumstances, as stated by Josephus, were these: Agrippa had made an addition to his palace at Jerusalem, which enabled him to observe from his dining-hall what was done in the Temple. Thereupon 'the chief men of Jerusalem' erected a wall to obstruct the view from the palace. Festus supported Agrippa in demanding the removal of this wall, but yielded to the request of the Jews that the whole matter might be referred to Nero, who upheld the appeal and reversed the judgment of his procurator.

Josephus evidently regards Festus as a wise and righteous official, affording an agreeable contrast to Albinus, his successor, of whom he says that 'there was not any sort of wickedness that could be named but he had a hand in it' (BJ II. xiv. 1).

Turning to the Book of Acts, we find that there, while justice is done to the promptness with which Festus addressed himself to his duties and to the lip-homage he was ready to pay to 'the custom of the Romans,' he appears in a less favourable light, and the outstanding fact meets us of the estimate which St. Paul formed of him. St. Paul preferred to take his chance with Nero to leaving his cause to be disposed of by this fussy, plausible official. 'I appeal unto Caesar,' is the lasting condemnation of Festus. He was persuaded that the Apostle was innocent of the 'many and grievous charges' brought against him, yet he was quite prepared to sacrifice him, if thereby he 'could gain favour with the Jews'; hence the preposterous proposal of a re-trial at Jerusalem. The noble use which St. Paul made shortly after of the opportunity given him by Festus to speak for himself before Agrippa and Berenice should not blind us to the callousness of the man who planned that scene with all its pomp and circumstance, and deliberately exploited a prisoner in bonds for the entertainment of his Herodian guests. Festus died after holding his office for a brief term—'scarcely two years' (Schurer, HJP i. ii. [1890] 185). See art. DATES for discussion of the chronology of the procuratorship of Festus.

FEVER.—In the single passage (Ac 28<sup>8</sup>) in which the word occurs, it is associated with dysentery (q.v.). Fever is a rise in bodily temperature above the normal of 98.4° F. It may be caused by physiological conditions—a mechanical interference with the nervous system which prevents heat-elimination, as in sunstroke. It is also a symptom of the reaction of the body to infection by micro-organisms or other poisons by which the heat-regulation apparatus is disturbed. The effects of this are evident in further derangements in the digestive glands, the liver and kidneys, the alimentary canal, the nervous organism, and the blood. The name is given to many diseases of which fever is the leading symptom, as e.g. typhoid fever. At a time when it was not possible to explain diseases by reference to a single cause, it was very natural to describe the derangement by two or more of the principal symptoms, as in the instance under consideration. C. A. BECKWITH.

The meaning of Ja 3<sup>12</sup> is clear: a tree is known by its fruits; a fig-tree cannot bring forth olives, neither can an olive-tree bring forth figs; a man's 'works' are, in short, an infallible index to his 'faith' (Ja 2<sup>18</sup>). In Rev 6<sup>13</sup> figs form part of the imagery in the vision of the Opening of the First Six Seals. The Seer beholds the stars of heaven falling to the earth 'as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs, when she is shaken of a great gale.' In the ordinary way these winter figs (δλυνθος) did not ripen, so here the judgment predicted is not about to cut off prematurely those who if spared would develop into matured and useful fruit, but those who are 'without hope and without God in the world'—in short, the 'cumberers of the ground.'

The fig-tree is native to Palestine and is found either cultivated or wild all over the country. Those which are wild are usually barren or at all events bear no edible fruit, and they are known as 'male' fig-trees. There are many varieties of fig-trees cultivated, some of which yield a sharp, bitter fruit, and others a sweet, mellow one. It is noticeable that in the description of the Promised Land (Dt 8<sup>8</sup>) fig-trees are mentioned as one of its leading natural characteristics. They are of moderate size, though sometimes attaining a height of 25 ft., while the stem is sometimes over 3 ft. in diameter. The bark is smooth, and the size and thickness of the leaves readily explain the point of the Jewish proverb—'to sit under one's own vine and one's own fig-tree' (1 K 4<sup>25</sup>, Mic 4<sup>4</sup>, Zec 3<sup>10</sup>). As a matter of fact, its foliage affords better shade and protection than any other tree in Palestine. It is one of the earliest trees to shoot, and its first fruit-buds appear before its leaves (cf. Mt 24<sup>32</sup>, Mk 13<sup>28</sup>, Lk 21<sup>29, 30</sup>). The fruit is an enlarged succulent hollow receptacle, containing the imperfect flowers in its interior; consequently the flowers are invisible till the receptacle has been opened. The figs are eaten both fresh and dried, and they are often compressed into a cake (cf. 1 S 25<sup>18</sup> 30<sup>12</sup>, 1 Ch 12<sup>40</sup>). The time the tree comes into leaf and fruiting varies according to the situation, and is later in the hill-country than in the plains. On the hills, the branches which have remained bare and naked all through the winter put forth their early leaf-buds about the end of March, and at the same time diminutive figs begin to appear where the young leaves join the branches. These tiny figs continue to grow with the leaves until they reach about the size of a cherry, then the majority of them fall to the ground or are blown down by the wind. These are the δλυνθοι of Rev 6<sup>13</sup> (see above).

FINISHER.—See AUTHOR AND FINISHER.

FIRE.—The term 'fire' is used literally to denote the familiar process of combustion, with its accompaniments of light and heat. In nearly all the passages in which it occurs from Acts to Revelation, it is used in a figurative sense. (1) A few of these have affinity with passages in the OT in which fire, as one of the most impressive of natural phenomena, is a form of the Divine manifestation. In some of the theophanies, in which fire is a prominent feature, it seems to express the conception of God as He is in Himself and in His nature (e.g. Ezk 1<sup>4, 27</sup>); in others it is a manifestation of Him in His character as Avenger or Judge (Ex 19<sup>16, 18</sup>, Ps 18<sup>8</sup> 50<sup>3</sup>, Is 30<sup>30</sup>). The NT furnishes some analogous cases in which the theophanic fire is simply a manifestation of the Divine presence or attributes (Ac 2<sup>3</sup>, Rev 1<sup>14, 45</sup>), and others in which it is an accompaniment of the Divine judgment (2 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>10-11</sup>). (2) The use of fire as a testing and purifying agent has led to its figurative application as a criterion for distinguishing between what possesses genuine moral worth and what does not, and as a means of purifying human character (1 Co 3<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>7</sup>). (3) One of the most patent characteristics of fire is its destructiveness, with the inevitable effect of suffering in the case of all forms of organic being. The vivid and forcible appeal which it makes to the imagination is due to the acute sensations it produces in the physical organism by the combination of intense brightness with intense heat. Fire is thus fitted to serve as an appropriate symbol of the Divine judgment upon sin. The OT frequently applies imagery borrowed from this source to denote the punitive aspects of God's nature, or punitive instruments employed by Him, and thus lays the basis for the use of similar imagery in the NT.

1. Fire as a form of Divine manifestation.—(a) In this section may be grouped passages in which fire is simply an indication of the Divine presence, or symbol of Divine attributes other than those specially displayed in the punishment of sin. (a) In Ac 2<sup>3</sup> one of the two outward manifestations attending the descent of the Spirit on the disciples seated in the upper room is compared with fire. The appearance of fire (ὡσεὶ πῦρ) assumed by the tongues referred to the Divine presence, which, in this instance, conferred on those assembled together the 'gift of tongues,' symbolized by the tongue-like flames that sat on the head of each. The reality corresponding to the appearance was the miraculous power of ecstatic utterance, now displayed for the first time, but afterwards a familiar feature in the worship of the Apostolic Church (v. 4; cf. 10<sup>46</sup>, 1 Co 14 passim). That the gift thus imparted had a Divine origin was certified by the visible accompaniment of fiery tongues.

(γ) 'The seven torches (AV and RV 'lamps') of fire burning before the throne' (Rev 4<sup>5</sup>) describe the Spirit of God in His manifold powers, 'the plenitude of the Godhead in all its attributes and energies' (Alford, ad loc.), under the emblem of fire. 'Fulness, intensity, energy, are implied in the figure, which reflects the traditional association (in the primitive mind) of fire and flame with the divinity, and especially with the divine purity or holiness' (J. Moffatt, EGT, 'Rev.', 1910, p. 379). There appears to be a reference also to the illuminating power of the Spirit, by which the prophets, with whom the apocalyptic writer identifies himself, were qualified for bearing their testimony, especially with regard to the future (Rev 2<sup>7</sup> 4; cf. 19<sup>10</sup>).

(b) Passages in which fire is an accompaniment of the Parousia.—(a) According to the rendering of 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup> in AV, fire is the instrument with which Christ, at His Second Advent, executes vengeance on Gentile and Jewish enemies of the Gospel. The RV, more accurately, separates the first clause of v. 8, 'in flaming fire,' from what follows, and connects it with v. 7. The 'flame of fire,' an expression containing a reminiscence of OT theophanies of judgment, is the element or medium by which the glory of Christ is revealed at His Return, not the means by which He inflicts punishment on the wicked. Like the lightning, which is everywhere visible at the same time (Mt 24<sup>27</sup>), this feature is fitted to arrest the attention and impress the mind of all beholders.

(β) Literal fire is associated in 2 P 3<sup>10-12</sup> with the Parousia ('the day of the Lord') as the means by which the visible universe is to be destroyed. Once temporarily destroyed by the waters of the deluge, the earth and the heavens have been 'stored up for fire' (v. 7) and now at the Coming of the Lord 'the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat' (v. 1-2). The old creation is to be dissolved, and pass away in the final world-conflagration which prepares the way for the advent of new heavens and a new earth. Other passages of Scripture anticipate that the present material order, having had a beginning, is destined to come to an end. They also foreshadow the emergence of a new order, free from the defects of the old, which is to be the future abode of the redeemed (Is 65<sup>17</sup> 66<sup>2</sup>, He 12<sup>26-28</sup>, Rev 20<sup>11</sup> 21<sup>1</sup>). In the NT these great cosmic changes are associated with the last Advent. In 2 Pet. alone are the means described by which the transition destined to result in a renovated universe is effected. It is to be by fire, which is the only agent adequate to the accomplishment of a destruction so thorough and complete. Science maintains that the end of the universe, as at present constituted, is to be brought about by the gradual loss of radiant heat. The steady reduction of temperature is to render the continuance of life on the planet impossible. Mayor (Ep. of St. Jude and Second Ep. of St. Peter, 1907, p. 209) suggests that this theory requires revision, in view of 'the stores of energy in the chemical elements, and of the varieties of radiant energy to which attention has been prominently directed by the discovery of radium. But assuming the reasonableness of this conjecture, the passage under discussion sheds no light on the constitution of the new environment in which a spiritual body takes the place of a natural body (1 Co 15<sup>44</sup>).

2. Fire as a testing and purifying agent.—Fire and water are the two elements used for purification, and of the two, fire is the more drastic and searching. In the process of refining, fire is the means of separating the precious metals from dross or alloys (Zec 13<sup>9</sup>). In the art of assaying, the same agent is employed for testing the quantity of gold or silver in ore or alloys.

(a) The use of fire for these purposes has led to the word being figuratively applied to the trials, especially in the form of severe persecutions, which the early Christians were called on to endure at the hands of their heathen oppressors (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>). From the searching ordeal by fire, it was the Divine design that their faith might emerge, more precious than gold, thoroughly tested and approved as genuine. In a later passage (4<sup>12</sup>) the extremity of their sufferings, arising from the same cause, is compared to a burning or conflagration (πυρρός) by which character is tested and purified; and the sharp discipline they are undergoing is spoken of appropriately, considering its extreme severity, as judgment (κρίμα) already begun, from which the righteous escape with difficulty (v. 17<sup>1</sup>; cf. 1 Co 3<sup>15</sup>).

(b) The figure is used in a somewhat similar manner to describe the judgment by which the work of Christian teachers is to be tested at the Parousia. 'The day (of Christ's Second Coming) is to be revealed in fire' (cf. 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>), 'and the fire itself shall prove each man's work of what sort it is' (1 Co 3<sup>13-15</sup> RV). The fire in which the whole fabric built on the One Foundation is involved, detects and exposes the flimsy and worthless materials by consuming them, but leaves uninjured the solid and durable materials that are fire-proof. In the one instance, the skilful builder has the gratification of seeing his work survive, and himself rewarded. In the other, the unskilful builder has the mortification of seeing his work destroyed and his labour lost; and although he himself escapes, it is with difficulty, as one escapes from a burning house—'saved, yet so as through fire.' The picture presented is that of a general conflagration. It may have been suggested by 'the conflagration of Corinth under Mummius; the stately temples standing amidst the universal destruction of the meaner buildings' (A. P. Stanley, Epistles to the Corinthians<sup>2</sup>, 1858, p. 67). The main point of the illustration is not the purification of character, but the decisive testing of the difference between solid and worthless achievement. The fire is not disciplinary, and, needless to say, it contains no allusion to 'purgatorial fire, whether in this or in a future life' (J. B. Mayor, 'The General Epistle of Jude,' in EGT, 1910, p. 276).

3. Fire as an instrument of Divine punishment.

—(a) In this section may be grouped together passages in which fire is a symbol of God's temporal judgments on human sin. Such passages have a close affinity with frequent references in the OT, in which God is represented 'as surrounded by, or manifested in, fire, the most immaterial of elements, and at the same time the agency best suited to represent symbolically His power to destroy all that is sinful or unholy' (S. R. Driver, Daniel [Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1900], p. 85; cf. Gn 15<sup>17</sup>, Nu 16<sup>35</sup>, Ps 50<sup>3</sup>, Is 30<sup>27</sup> 33<sup>14</sup>, Jer 4<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 21<sup>31</sup>, Dn 7<sup>9t</sup>, Am 5<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>4</sup>).

(a) In accordance with this usage, fire is employed in Jude<sup>23</sup> to represent the present judgment which overtakes the second of the three classes enticed into licentious living by the antinomian teachers (cf. v. 4). There is no reference here to the fire of future judgment. There is an evident allusion in the phrase, 'snatching them out of the fire' (RV), to Am 4<sup>11</sup>, where persons who had just escaped with their lives from the earthquake, are referred to; and to Zec 3<sup>2</sup>, where the high priest Joshua is described as a brand plucked out of the Babylonian captivity. Fleshly indulgence exposes those addicted to it to present penalties as well as to future ones, and it is from this perilous position that their rescuers are to snatch them hastily, and almost violently.

(b) Fire, as an image of God's temporal judgments, appears in the symbolism of the Apocalypse. When the Church was engaged in a life-and-death struggle with Imperial Rome, her members regarded terrible visitations, in the shape of the three historic scourges, war, famine, and pestilence, as signs of the approaching end of the age and Christ's Return. The NT Apocalypticist heightens the effect of the lurid pictures in which he forecasts the judgments impending on the enemies of Christ and His Church, by the introduction of fire, in one case literal, material fire, as a token of those judgments. In answer to the prayers of suffering saints, the angel fills the censer with fire from the altar, and casts the burning contents on the earth, as a sign that the Divine vengeance is about to descend upon it (Rev 8<sup>7</sup>; cf. Ezk 10<sup>2</sup>). The horror which the countless host of horsemen is fitted to inspire, is intensified by the circumstance that fire and smoke and brimstone issue out of their mouths (9<sup>17t</sup>). In 14<sup>18</sup> it is the angel who has power over the fire—in this instance the symbol of Divine wrath—that brings the angel with the sickle the message that the vintage is to begin, because the world is ripe for judgment. The sea of glass before the Throne, by the side of which stand the victors in the conflict with the Beast, is flushed red with the fire of impending judgments—the seven last plagues which are the precursors of the downfall of Babylon (15<sup>1t</sup>; cf. 17<sup>1</sup>).

(γ) Literal, material fire is the means by which the total and final destruction of the harlot-city, mystic Babylon, is effected (18 passim). Nero Redivivus and his Parthian allies, to whom the burning of the city is attributed, are only the human instruments in God's hand for executing His judgment upon her (18<sup>20</sup>, 24 19<sup>2</sup>).

(δ) Supernatural fire is the agent by which the nations, Gog and Magog, are consumed, and their attempt to capture 'the beloved city' frustrated (20<sup>9</sup>).

(b) Fire is the symbol of God's future and final judgment on the wicked.—(a) In view of the near approach of the Parousia (He 10<sup>37</sup>), those in danger of the wilful sin of apostasy from the Christian faith are reminded of the terrible consequences which await those succumbing to the great temptation—'a fierceness of fire which shall devour the adversaries' (v. 27 RV). The solemn reminder is repeated in connexion with the declaration that the present transient order of things must give place to the new and eternal order (12<sup>27</sup>). In contrast with the material fire that manifested His presence at Sinai, God is Himself in His very essence what that consuming fire denoted—immaculate purity which destroys everything incompatible with it (v. 29; cf. Dt 4<sup>24</sup>).

(β) Outside the Synoptic Gospels, there is only one explicit reference to the penal fire of the future world as the fire of hell (Gehenna). The Epistle of James traces to it as the ultimate cause the wide-spread mischief caused by the tongue, which is compared to a spark setting fire to a great forest (3<sup>6</sup>).

(γ) The only parallel to the expression Eternal Fire, used in the Synoptic Gospels to denote the future punishment of the wicked, is found in Jude<sup>7</sup>, where the writer declares that the cities of the Plain are 'set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance (RV 'punishment') of eternal fire' (πῦρ αἰώνιον). According to the renderings of AV and RV, which regard πῦρ as grammatically depending on δίκην, the burning of these cities is spoken of as still persisting. In favour of this idea Wis 10<sup>7</sup> is cited, and appeal is made to the volcanic phenomena in the region of the Dead Sea as likely to suggest the continued existence of subterranean fire. Further confirmation of the idea is sought in the Book of Enoch (lxvii. 6f.), where it is said that 'the valley of the angels burned continually under the earth.' An alternative rendering to that of the AV and RV, takes δειγμα with πῦρ in the sense of 'an example (or 'testimony') of eternal fire,' the punishment which began with the destruction of the cities, and still continues, fitting them to serve as such example. Whichever view be taken, it is evident that the example, in order to be effective, must point to the fate which awaits the wicked after the Last Judgment. Whatever may be the condition of the impenitent between death and the Judgment, it is implied by the uniform teaching of the NT on the Last Things that the decisive sentence which determines their ultimate condition is not pronounced till the Last Judgment. The πῦρ αἰώνιον would have little relevancy to the warning which the passage seeks to enforce if that expression had no relation to future retribution. That being so, the much-debated question as to the meaning of αἰώνιος arises. 'This verse,' remarks Charles (Eschatology<sup>9</sup>, 1913, p. 413), 'shows how Christians at the close of the first century A.D. read their own ideas into the OT records of the past. Thus the temporal destruction by fire of Sodom and Gomorrah is interpreted as an eternal punishment by fire beyond the grave.' The attempts made to substitute the expression 'age-lasting' for 'eternal' as the meaning of the Greek adjective, so as to prove that it does not imply the idea of unlimited duration, are not particularly convincing. 'It is surely obvious,' says Moffatt (British Weekly, 28 Sept. 1905), 'that the NT writers assumed that the soul of man was immortal and that its existence beyond death, in weal or woe, was endless, when they used this term (αἰώνιος) or spoke of this subject. How else could they have conveyed what corresponded in their minds to the idea of "eternal"?'. It must be admitted, at the same time, that the term takes us out into a region where the categories of time and space do not apply, and where 'objects are presented in their relation to some eternal aspect of the Divine nature' (A. Bisset, art. 'Eternal Fire,' in DCG vol. i. [1906] p. 537<sup>b</sup>; see the whole article for a thoughtful and temperate discussion of the expression 'eternal fire' in its eschatological bearings).

(δ) In the Apocalypse the Lake of Fire is the place of final punishment to which are consigned (1) the Beast and the False Prophet (19<sup>a</sup>), (2) Satan (20<sup>10</sup>), (3) Death and Hades (20<sup>14</sup>), (4) the dupes of Satan, whose names are not written in the Book of Life (20<sup>15</sup>; cf. 13<sup>b</sup> 14<sup>9f</sup>. 19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>8</sup>). The figure of 'the lake of fire,' otherwise described as 'the lake of fire burning with brimstone,' seems to have been suggested by a shallow pool (λίμνη) of blazing sulphur such as is sometimes found in volcanic districts. Nothing is said as to its locality. 'Volcanic forces, indicating the existence of subterranean fire, might well lead the ancients to place their Tartarus and Gehenna in the under-world' (W. Boyd Carpenter, 'Rev.' in Ellicott's NT Com. iii. [1884] 622). Swete (Apoc. of St. John<sup>2</sup>, 1907, p. 258) remarks that the conception of 'the lake of fire' may have already been familiar to the Asian Churches, and that 'possibly it was a local expression for the γέεννα του πυρός which was familiar to Palestinian Christians.' The expression does not occur in the apocalyptic writings, but in the Book of Enoch 'the abyss of fire' is the doom in store for the fallen angels in the Day of Judgment (x. 13; cf. xxi. 7-10), and in the Secrets of Enoch (x. 2), among the torments of 'the place prepared for those who do not know God' is 'a fiery river.' The terse outline in the Apocalypse referring to the place of woe, appears in these writings as a finished picture filled in with elaborate details. The reference in the imagery to 'fire and brimstone' is evidently derived from the historical account of the destruction of Sodom in Gn 19<sup>24</sup>, mediated by passages such as Is 30<sup>38</sup>, in which Topheth is a symbol of God's burning judgments, and Is 66<sup>24</sup>, in which the valley of Hinnom, with its fire continually burning, is the scene of final judgment on God's enemies. In the interval between the close of OT prophecy and the time of Christ, the idea of penal fire, confined in the OT to the present world, was projected into the unseen world as an image of endless retribution. During this period the writers of the apocalypses sought relief from the glaring anomaly presented by the contrast between character and condition in the present life, by transferring the scene of rewards and punishments to the world beyond the grave. In accordance with this view—the view recognized throughout the NT—the enemies of God and Christ, who often escape His righteous judgments here, are reserved for the severer penalties of the world to come. There, deceivers and deceived together share one common doom in 'the lake of fire,' which is identified in 20<sup>14</sup> with 'the second death,' 'the nearest analogue [in the new order] of Death as we know it here' (Swete, op. cit. p. 274). 'It is not certain,' says Swete again, in his commentary on v. 10 (p. 270), 'that these terrible words can be pressed into the service of the doctrine of the Last Things. . . . It is safer to regard them as belonging to the scenery of the vision rather than to its eschatological teaching. But beyond a doubt St. John intends at least to teach that the forces, personal or impersonal, which have inspired mankind with false views of life and antagonism to God and to Christ will in the end be completely subjugated, and, if not annihilated, will at least be prevented from causing further trouble. From the Lake of Fire there is no release, unless evil itself should be ultimately consumed; and over that possibility there lies a veil which our writer does not help us to lift or pierce.'

FIRST AND LAST.—See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

FIRST-BORN, FIRST-BEGOTTEN (πρωτότοκος; Vulg. primogenitus in the NT except in He 11<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>23</sup>).—1. The privilege of the first-born: the birthright (τα πρωτοτόκια, Vulg. primitiva) is spoken of once in the NT, in He 12<sup>16</sup>, which refers to Esau's act in selling it (Gn 25<sup>38</sup>); the act was profanity, for the sacred privilege was despised. The first-born was the heir to the headship of the family, and received a double portion of his father's property (Dt 21<sup>17</sup>); this was always the case unless for some special cause the birthright was taken from him, as in the cases of Esau, Reuben (1 Ch 5<sup>1</sup>), and Manasseh (Gn 48<sup>14-19</sup>). Ishmael, the eldest son of Abraham, had not the birthright because he was the son of a slave woman (Gn 21<sup>10</sup>), though he was not, according to Hebrew ideas, a slave (see ROMAN LAW).

2. Usage in the NT.—The word 'firstborn' is used in the NT both literally and figuratively. In Lk 2<sup>7</sup> our Lord is spoken of as Mary's 'firstborn'; in Mt 1<sup>25</sup> the word, though found in CD and some versions, is clearly an interpolation. It implies in Lk. the privilege of the birthright; but neither there nor in the OT does it necessarily imply other children, and therefore it has no bearing on the identity of the 'brethren' of our Lord. Another, and still more important, deduction from this fact is that there is no contradiction between 'Only-begotten' and 'Firstborn' applied to the pre-existent Christ (see below). The latter title does not imply that there are other sons in the same Divine sense.—For the 'redemption of the first-born' at the Presentation of Jesus in the Temple see DCG i. 596f. The word πρωτότοκος (Vulg. primitiva) is used literally in He 11<sup>28</sup>, of men and animals, with reference to the Egyptians.

The title 'Firstborn' is given figuratively to our Lord in three different aspects.—(a) It refers to His pre-existence in Col 1<sup>15</sup> ('firstborn of all creation,' πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως; see Lightfoot's exhaustive note in Colossians<sup>3</sup>, 1879, p. 144), and in He 1<sup>6</sup>, where it is used absolutely: 'the First-born.' This interpretation of Col 1<sup>15</sup> is required by the context: 'the image (εἰκών) of the invisible God . . . in him were all things created . . . all things have been created through him, and unto him, and he is before all things, and in him all things consist (cohere).' This is also the exegesis of all the earlier Fathers; but, as the Arians used the text to show that our Lord was a creature, several (but not all) of the Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers interpreted it of the Incarnate Christ, while the later Greek Fathers went back to the earlier interpretation (see the references in Lightfoot, p. 146f.). The phrase denotes that the Son was before all creation; to the Arians it was pointed out that the word used is not πρωτοκτιστος, which would have had the meaning they assigned to πρωτότοκος. The phrase further denotes that He is the Lord of all creation, for He has the right of the Firstborn. The title 'Firstborn' was used figuratively by the Jews of Messiah, from Ps 89<sup>27</sup> (which they generally interpreted in a Messianic sense), and of Israel in Ex 4<sup>22</sup>; this paved the way for the NT usage. Lightfoot (p. 144) remarks also that both πρωτοτοκος and εἰκων were taken from the Alexandrian doctrine of the Logos (see also ONLY-BEGOTTEN).

(b) In Col 1<sup>18</sup> Jesus is called 'firstborn from the dead,' because He was the first to rise; for Lazarus and others only rose to die again. So also in Rev 1<sup>5</sup>: 'firstborn of the dead.' The phrase is parallel with 'the firstfruits (ἀπαρχή) of them that are asleep' in 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup>.

(c) In Ro 8<sup>3</sup> the relation of the first-born to his brethren is spoken of. Here, as in Col 1<sup>18</sup>, εἰκων occurs, but it is the image of the Son, not of the Father: 'whom he foreknew (took note of), he also conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren.' The conformity of the Christian to the image of the Son is parallel with the fact that the Son is the image of the Father; and the result of it is that all Christians become members of the family of God the Father, in which Jesus is the First-born, and brother of them all (He 2<sup>11</sup>).

The title is used in the plural of Christians in He 12<sup>23</sup>: 'the church of the firstborn' (Vulg. primitivorum). Here we have an extension of the privilege; there is not only one first-born in the family, but many. We may, with Lightfoot, take the reference to be to all Christians as being first-born because all are kings (Rev 1<sup>6</sup>); the idea of ruling is so closely attached to the title that it can be thus extended, though the metaphor becomes confused—indeed, it was used by some Rabbis of God Himself (Lightfoot, p. 145). Some, however, interpret the phrase of the faithful departed who have gone before, and so are in a sense the first-born of the dead (cf. Grimm, Lex. in libros NT, Leipzig, 1879, s.v. πρωτότοκος). For some modification of these views see Westcott on He 12<sup>3</sup>. In any case the 'firstborn' are men, not angels, to whom the word would be inapplicable, and who could not be described as 'enrolled in heaven' (Westcott).
A. J. MACLEAN.

FIRST-FRUIT (ἀπαρχή, class. Gr. usually ἀπαρχαί, from ἀπαρχομαι, 'offer firstlings or first-fruits').—The word occurs six times in the Pauline Epistles, once in James, and once in Revelation. Its significance depends largely on the belief, which the Hebrews shared with many ancient nations, that first-fruits were peculiarly sacred, and on the custom which prescribed them for the services of Jahweh. The offering of first-fruits made the rest of the crop lawful. In LXX ἀπαρχή is the usual equivalent of עֲרֵכָה. In the Jewish institution of first-fruits, see HDB ii. 10 f.; ERE vi. 46 f.; and Schürer, HJP ii. i. [1885] 237–242.

The reference to this institution is best seen in Ro 11<sup>16</sup>: 'and if the firstfruit is holy, so is the lump,' where the allusion is to the heave-offering mentioned in Nu 15<sup>18–21</sup>. The Pauline argument is what Jowett has called 'an argument from tendencies'—'as the beginning is, so shall the completion be; as the cause is, so shall the effect be; as the part, so the whole' (Epp. of St. Paul to Thess., Gal., Rom., 1855, ii. 273). There is exegetical difficulty here, for ἀπαρχή and ῥίζα seem to denote different phases of the argument; but there is little doubt that St. Paul refers to the future when mankind shall be redeemed, a future that is foreshadowed by the present conversion of individuals.

In the same manner other passages are to be interpreted, though they have not obvious references to Hebrew customs. In Ja 1<sup>18</sup> Christians of apostolic times are called ἀπαρχή τῆς, 'a kind of firstfruits.' From Clement of Rome's Ep. ad Cor. xlii., we learn that the apostles, during their missionary journeys, appointed their 'firstfruits,' when they had approved them, to be bishops and deacons; and it is interesting to find that St. Paul mentions two men who were outstanding in their helpfulness—Stephanas and Epænetus. Thus 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>: 'Ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of Achaia, and that they have set themselves to minister unto the saints.' In Ro 16<sup>5</sup> the same words are used, though here 'Achaia' should be 'Asia,' i.e. proconsular Asia, with the addition of εἰς Χριστόν. These men, with all likeminded, were the first-fruits of a new creation achieved by the spirit of Christianity, and they were the pledge of others who would follow their inspiring example.

In Rev 14<sup>4</sup> the reference is to a specially favoured class who have been 'purchased from among men, the firstfruits unto God and unto the Lamb.' Ro 8<sup>23</sup> speaks of Christians who have already been blessed by the Spirit, and who have the sure hope of a greater harvest of blessing when mankind shall be fully sanctified.

The most notable passage is 1 Co 15<sup>20, 23</sup>, where Christ is called the 'Firstfruits.' There may be in v. <sup>20</sup> a reference to the offering of a sheaf of ripe corn on the second day of the Feast of Passover (cf. Lv 23<sup>10, 11</sup>); but even without that reference the exegesis is plain. Just as the first-fruits are the earnest of later harvesting, so the Resurrection of Christ is the guarantee of our resurrection. 'Christ is risen! We are risen!', and we shall rise.

In the early Church the custom and doctrine of first-fruits were used to support the practice of levies on behalf of the priesthood (see Didache, § 13).

ARCHIBALD MAIN.

FLESH (σάρξ, κρέας).—Of the two words rendered 'flesh' in the EV of the NT, κρέας is found only twice (Ro 14<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>), and in both cases applies to the flesh of slaughtered animals eaten as food. σάρξ occurs very frequently and in various significations, of which the following are the most important.

1. Its most literal and primary meaning is the soft tissues of the living body, whether of men or beasts (1 Co 15<sup>39</sup>, Rev 19<sup>18</sup>), as distinguished from both the blood (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>) and the bones (Eph 5<sup>30</sup> TR; cf. Lk 24<sup>39</sup>).

2. As the chief constituent of the body, and that which gives it its visible form, 'flesh' frequently indicates the whole body (Gal 4<sup>13a</sup>), which it designates, however, not as an organism (σῶμα, 1 Co 12<sup>1</sup>), but with reference to its characteristic material substance (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>).

3. It is further employed, just as in the OT (Gn 29<sup>14</sup> 37<sup>27</sup>), to denote relationship due to natural origin through the physical fact of generation. Thus St. Paul describes Jesus Christ as 'born of the seed of David according to the flesh' (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>), and refers to the Jewish people as 'my kinsmen according to the flesh' (9<sup>3</sup>), or even as 'my flesh' (11<sup>14</sup>). Similarly he calls Abraham 'our forefather according to the flesh' (4<sup>1</sup>), and the author of Heb. characterizes natural fathers as 'the fathers of our flesh' in contrast with God as 'the Father of spirits' (He 12<sup>9</sup>).

4. Again σάρξ is used, in the same way as σῶμα, to designate the lower part of human nature in contrast with the higher part, without any depreciation of the corporeal element being thereby intended. Thus 'flesh' is combined or contrasted with 'spirit' (Ro 2<sup>28, 29</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>), as 'body' is with 'soul' (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>) or 'spirit' (1 Co 6<sup>0</sup>, Ja 2<sup>6</sup>), apart from any idea of disparagement, and only by way of indicating the fact that man is a unity of matter and spirit, of a lower part which links him to the outer world of Nature and a higher part which brings him into relation with God, both of them being essential to the completeness of his personality (1 Co 6<sup>19, 20</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1-4</sup>).

5. In many instances 'flesh' assumes a broader meaning, being employed to denote human nature generally, usually, however, with a suggestion of its creaturely frailty and weakness in contrast with God Himself, or His Spirit, or His word. 'All flesh' (Ac 2<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>4</sup>) is equivalent to all mankind; 'no flesh' (Ro 3<sup>0</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>) has the force of 'no mortal man.' Similar to this is the use of the fuller expression 'flesh and blood,' as when St. Paul says that he 'conferred not with flesh and blood' (Gal 1<sup>16</sup>), and that 'our wrestling is not against flesh and blood' (Eph 6<sup>1</sup>). That this use of 'flesh,' although pointing to human weakness, is free from any idea of moral taint, is sufficiently shown by the fact that it is employed to describe the human nature of Christ Himself (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, Ro 1<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, He 2<sup>14</sup>) by writers who are absolutely convinced of His sinlessness (Jn 8<sup>46</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>, He 4<sup>15-26</sup>).

6. In Heb. we have a special use of 'flesh' to designate earthly existence—a use which must be distinguished from those that have been already dealt with. 'In the days of his flesh' (He 5<sup>7</sup>) does not mean in the days when He possessed a body, or in the days when He bore our human nature; for the author firmly believes in the continued and complete humanity of our heavenly High Priest (4<sup>14</sup>). It evidently means in the days when He lived upon earth as a man amongst men. Similarly, 'through the veil, that is to say, his flesh' (10<sup>20</sup>) points to His life in those same 'days of his flesh'—the whole period of His suffering humanity; and when the writer describes the rites of the OT Law as 'ordinances of flesh' (δικαιώματα σαρκός, EV 'carnal ordinances,' 9<sup>10</sup>) and contrasts these with the blood of Christ in respect of atoning efficacy, the antithesis in his mind, as the context shows, is not so much between the material and the spiritual as between the earthly and the heavenly, the passing and the permanent, the temporal and the eternal. In the same way he draws a contrast between 'the law of a carnal (σαρκίνης) commandment' and 'the power of an endless life' (7<sup>16</sup>).

7. In addition to the foregoing, which may all be characterized as natural meanings of 'flesh,' we find the word used by St. Paul in a distinctly theological and ethical sense to denote the seat and instrument of sin in fallen humanity, as opposed to the 'mind,' or higher nature of man, which accepts the Law of God (Ro 7<sup>25</sup>), and the 'spirit,' which is the principle of life in the regenerate (8<sup>45</sup>, Gal 5<sup>16ff</sup>, 6<sup>3</sup>). In precisely the same way he employs the adj. 'fleshly' or 'carnal' in contrast with 'spiritual' (Ro 7<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>1</sup>, etc.; see, further, CARNAL). Pfleiderer and others have sought to explain this peculiar usage by supposing that in the Pauline anthropology there was a fundamental dualism between 'flesh' and 'spirit,' and that the Apostle saw in the physical or sensuous part of man the very source and principle of sin. Such a view, however, is contrary to St. Paul's thoroughly Hebrew conception of the unity of body and soul in the human personality (see 4), and is expressly negated by his teaching on such subjects as the sinlessness of Jesus (2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>) and the sanctification of the body (1 Co 6<sup>15, 19</sup>), and by his application of the epithet 'carnal' (3<sup>9</sup>) and of the expression 'works of the flesh' (Gal 5<sup>19ff</sup>) to sins in which any sensuous or physical elements are entirely wanting. The most probable explanation of this Pauline antithesis of 'flesh' and 'spirit' is that it amounts to a contrast between the natural and the supernatural. Sin in St. Paul's presentation of it comes in the case of fallen man through natural inheritance—all mankind descending from Adam 'by ordinary generation'—and is therefore characterized as 'flesh'; while the life of holiness, as a gift of the Divine Spirit, is described as 'spirit' with reference to its source.

FLOCK.—One of the most familiar pictures in the OT is that of the Church or people of God as a flock. In Gn 48<sup>15</sup> the correlative figure is found in 'the shepherding God,' and is repeated in the Blessing of the Tribes ('the Shepherd of Israel,' Gn 49<sup>4</sup>; cf. also Ps 23 and Ezk 34<sup>31</sup>). In Is 40<sup>11</sup> the figure is directly employed: 'He shall feed his flock like a shepherd' (in the OT generally ποιμένες λαῶν meant 'civil rulers,' as in Homer, but in the NT the phrase stands for 'spiritual guides and teachers').

The OT metaphor is carried over into the NT, where το ποιμνιον is used exclusively in the figurative sense of 'church' or 'congregation.' It appears thus in the tender address of our Lord: μή φοβου, τὸ μικρὸν ποιμνιον, 'Fear not, little flock' (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>). The words continued to beat like a pulse in the breast of the Church, and are renewed again and again.

(1) St. Paul says to the elders of Ephesus: προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς καὶ παντὶ τῷ ποιμνίῳ . . . ποιμαίνειν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ, 'Take heed unto yourselves and to all the flock . . . to feed the Church of God' (Ac 20<sup>28-29</sup>). The overseers are themselves part of the flock (ἐν ᾧ), and this suggests the insight, sympathy, closeness of intimacy, and the personal knowledge with which the flock is to be superintended. 'The bishop is and remains a sheep of the flock, and must thus exercise his oversight both on himself and the whole flock' (Stier, The Words of the Apostles, 1869, p. 328). 'Feed' and 'guide,' therefore, include the two great tasks of the ministry.

(2) Jesus had said to Peter: βόσκει τὰ ἀρνία μου . . . ποιμαίνε τὰ πρόβατά μου, 'Feed my lambs . . . tend my sheep' (Jn 21<sup>15, 16</sup>). Accordingly the Apostle, 'in a personal reminiscence' (W. H. Bennett, The General Epistles [Cent. Bible, 1901], p. 36) and, in 'unobtrusive allusions to Christ's life which harmonize with his discipleship' (Moffatt, LNT, 1911, p. 335), says as a fellow-elder: ποιμανετε τὸ ἐν υμῖν ποιμνιον τοῦ θεοῦ . . . τύποι γινόμενοι τοῦ ποιμνίου, 'Tend the flock of God which is among you . . . making yourselves ensamples to the flock' (1 P 5<sup>2, 3</sup>; cf. Pss.-Sol. xvii. 45). 'To feed the flock' takes in the whole varied duties of the pastoral office. 'It is not right that a man should only preach a sermon every Sunday, and after that pay no regard to the people' (Stier, op. cit., 328, quoting Gossner). 'All modes of watchfulness and help are to be displayed. Fold as well as feed them; guide and guard and heal them' (Hastings, Great Texts of the Bible, 'St. John,' 1912, p. 422). In the AV of 1 P 5<sup>3</sup> the flock is called 'God's heritage,' but θεοῦ is not in the text, and it is better to read with RV 'the charge allotted to you' (cf. Tindale's Version: 'be not as lords over the parishes'). 'The charge allotted to you' is therefore parallel to 'the flock of God which is among you,' i.e. the particular Christian society committed to your care. 'Each separate ἐκκλησία was thought of as the "portion" (κλήρος) of the presbyter who watched over it' (E. H. Plumptre, Camb. Bible, 'St. Peter and St. Jude,' 1880, p. 154).

It is evidence of how completely the thought of the shepherd and the flock possessed the mind of the early Church, that in the Catacombs the figure of a shepherd with a sheep on his shoulder and a crook in his hand is the most frequent of all symbols.

FLOOD (κατακλυσμός, which is used in the LXX for בְּבַל).—In exhibiting faith as the principle which has all through history ruled the lives of the saints, the writer of Heb. (11<sup>7</sup>) instances the faith of Noah, who, warned of things not yet seen, i.e. of the coming flood, prepared an ark for the saving of his house. 1 Pet. (3<sup>20</sup>) alludes to the ark in which eight souls were saved through water. 2 Pet. (2<sup>5</sup>) illustrates the retributive justice of God by the fact that He brought a flood upon the world of the ungodly, and (3<sup>7</sup>) contrasts with the world which was overflowed with water the heavens and the earth which are stored up for fire. The writers of these Epistles, being apostles and evangelists, not men of science, had no thought of verifying historical documents or investigating natural phenomena, their sole desire being to awaken or strengthen the faith, to purify and ennoble the lives, of their readers. Like the writers and compilers of the deluge stories in Gen. (6-9<sup>17</sup>), they doubtless believed—as most Christians did until a comparatively recent period—in a universal flood which destroyed all men and animals except those preserved in the ark. In the light of science and criticism, the Gen. narratives of the deluge are now regarded as a part of the folk-lore of Babylonian or Accadian peoples, from whom it was borrowed by the Canaanites.

LITERATURE.—The discussion of the problems connected with the story of the flood—whether, e.g., it is a highly coloured legend based on actual occurrences or a Nature-myth which has assumed the form of a history—is relevant to the interpretation of the narratives in Genesis, but would cast little or no light upon the literature of Apostolic Christianity. It is therefore enough to refer to F. H. Woods' art. 'Flood' in HDB and 'Deluge' in ERE, and T. K. Cheyne's art. 'Deluge' in the EBI and EBR<sup>11</sup>; R. Andree, Die Flutsagen, Brunswick, 1891; C. J. Ball, Light from the East, London, 1899; Elwood Worcester, Genesis in the Light of Modern Knowledge, New York, 1901.

FOOL.—The diversity in the conceptions of folly is strikingly illustrated by the use in the writings of the Apostolic Church of the terms 'fool' and 'foolish,' translating the Greek words ἄφρων, μωρός, ἄσοφοι, ἀνόητος, ἄσυνετος, and related forms.

1. There appears to be a reference to folly as intentional clownishness in Eph 5<sup>4</sup>. The Christian must avoid 'foolish talking or jesting' (μωρολογία καὶ εὐτραπελία).

2. Unseemly and undignified conduct is folly. Thus St. Paul, vindicating his apostleship, is reluctantly led to a self-commendation, such as, in other circumstances, only a fool in the folly of boasting would offer (2 Co 11<sup>18, 21, 22</sup>; cf. 5<sup>13</sup>). There is, however, a deeper folly—unwarranted boasting (12<sup>6</sup>). Twice in these 2 Cor. passages a certain play on the idea of folly is presented. St. Paul in self-defence is compelled to speak as a fool, yet are not the real fools the Corinthians, ironically φρονιμοί, for tolerating fools, namely the false teachers? (11<sup>17, 19, 20</sup>). Again the Apostle, having acknowledged 'I speak as a fool' (in my boasting), presently comes to the mere supposition that these false teachers are servants of Christ—the sense of the parenthesis changes—'Now indeed, I do speak out of my mind' (vv. 21, 23).

3. The term 'fool' (ἄφρων), signifying mental stupidity, is applied to the imaginary controversialist of 1 Co 15<sup>36</sup>, who finds unnecessary difficulties in the Resurrection (cf. the 'foolish controversies' of 1 Ti 6<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>23</sup>, Tit 3<sup>9</sup>).

4. The 'foolish Galatians' (ἀνόητοι) appear to be rebuked for bad judgment, rather than for moral perverseness. They must be 'bewitched' to have so readily accepted another teaching (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>).

5. Instances of moral folly are provided by those who live without regard to the chief end of life. These are ἄσοφοι and ἄφρονες (Eph 5<sup>15-17</sup>). Foolish are the lusts of the rich (1 Ti 6<sup>9</sup>), and the unregenerate life is one of foolishness (Tit 3<sup>3</sup>).

6. Heathenism supplied a conspicuous and illuminating case of moral and intellectual folly (Ro 1<sup>18</sup>; cf. 2<sup>20</sup>). To St. Paul, the worship of wood and stone indicated an underlying moral defect of liking for the unreal rather than for the real—for make-belief rather than for belief (v. 25), which found expression in morality as well as in worship (v. 24<sup>1</sup>). This moral folly led to intellectual foolishness, which 'learned disputations' disguised and fostered. There must be a moral element in sane intellectual judgment (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>10-12</sup>, and Carlyle's comment upon Napoleon: 'He did not know true from false now when he looked at them,—the fearfulest penalty a man pays for yielding to untruth of heart' [Heroes and Hero-worship, 1872, 'The Hero as King,' p. 221]).

7. In the judgment of the critical Greek intellectualists, the preaching of 'Christ crucified' was folly (1 Co 1<sup>18, 21, 23, 25</sup>). A gospel centred in the person of an ignominiously executed criminal, and finding indeed a mystic value in that death, was likely to provoke the contempt of a highly philosophical community. In contrast, St. Paul presents, as the true norm whereby wisdom and folly are to be judged, a mystic γνῶσις: to the unspiritual, foolishness (2<sup>14</sup>), but to the initiated, the power and wisdom of God (2<sup>6, 10, 12, 30</sup>)—a presentation which invites comparison with the γνῶσις of the Mysteries. Probably the distinction here suggested is that between the intuitional, mystic experience of God and His power, and the intellectual theorizing about God and His dealings with the world. Religious 'wisdom' must be judged primarily in terms of spiritual experience rather than of theology. At the same time, St. Paul had no love for obscurantism (1 Co 14).

8. The evil of the intellectualism within the Church, indicated in 1 Cor., was not that it challenged the distinctive forms of Christian faith, but that it gave rise to the bitterness of religious controversy—sacrificed the love which never failed in value for the sake of the mere forms of knowledge, which at the best necessarily passed away in the coming of greater light (1 Co 13<sup>11</sup>). Let these childishly (1 Co 3<sup>1, 3</sup>) 'wise' become 'fools' that they may gain the wisdom of the childlike (vv. 18-23).

9. 'Fools for Christ's sake'—so St. Paul describes himself and his fellow-evangelists in 1 Co 4<sup>10</sup>. The epithet may have been applied on account of the 'foolishness' of the preaching (7); the contrast, however, with the φρόνιμοι ἐν Χριστῷ, prudentes in Christo, suggests that the reference is to the worldly-wiseman's view of the sanctified 'abandon' of St. Paul and his kindred spirits, their flinging aside of policy and cunning, their counting as nought the things which the world deems precious. The Apostle is actually regarded by Festus as out of his mind (Ac 26<sup>24</sup>).

FORBEARANCE.—See LONGSUFFERING.

FOREIGNER.—See STRANGER.

the concluding warning of his Second Epistle when he reminds his readers of their 'knowing these things beforehand' (3<sup>17</sup>).

In the remainder of the references given above it is the Divine foreknowledge which is in the mind of the Apostle, the object or objects being not facts or things but persons—these persons being objects of favourable regard—and the theme under consideration being some aspect of the Divine purpose of grace towards men. When St. Peter, in addressing the Jewish multitudes on the day of Pentecost, describes them as having by the hand of lawless men crucified and slain Jesus of Nazareth, he speaks of Him as 'delivered up by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God' (Ac 2<sup>23</sup>). That death had been designed and planned in the counsels of eternal love, and the 'foreknowledge of God' had rested with satisfaction upon the Divine sufferer who had undertaken, by the sacrifice of Himself, to win redemption for men. Of the same purport is the expression used by St. Peter when in his First Epistle he speaks of the blood of Christ, a Lamb without blemish and without spot, 'who was foreknown indeed before the foundation of the world, but was manifested at the end of the times for your sake' (1<sup>20</sup>). Mere prescience in the sense of previous knowledge does not exhaust the meaning in either of the foregoing passages. Hort (The First Epistle of Peter, 1898, ad loc.) sees in the latter reference 'previous designation to a position or function.' And he notes the pregnant sense of 'know' in such passages as Jer 1<sup>5</sup>, 'Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee'; Is 49<sup>1</sup>, 'The Lord hath called me from the womb; from the bowels of my mother hath he made mention of my name'; and Ex 33<sup>1</sup> (spoken of Moses), 'I know thee by name, and thou hast found grace in my sight' (cf. 2 Ti 2<sup>19</sup>). The pregnant sense belonging to 'knowledge' may well belong also to 'foreknowledge' (1 P 1<sup>2</sup>, κατα προγνωσιν θεου πατρός).

'This knowledge,' says Hort in his note on the expression, 'is not a knowledge of facts respecting a person, but a knowledge of himself; it is, so to speak, a contemplation of him in his individuality, yet not as an indifferent object but as standing in personal relations to Him who thus "foreknows" him. It must not therefore be identified with mere foreknowledge of existence or acts (prescience); or again, strictly speaking, with destination or predestination (ορίζω, προορίζω), even in the biblical sense, that is, in relation to a Providential order, much less in the philosophical sense of antecedent constraint.'

When we turn to St. Paul's more exact and precise exposition of doctrine we see that 'foreknowledge' is still directed to persons as its object, and also that 'prescience,' 'knowing beforehand,' is inadequate to the expression of the mysterious thought conveyed. With St. Paul 'foreknowledge' is the first link in the chain of the Divine purpose of grace, the first step in the spiritual history of the believer (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, οὗς προέγνω), 'foreordination' the second, 'effectual calling' the third, 'justification' the fourth, 'glory' the fifth and last.

'Mere prescience [on God's part] of human volition,' says C. J. Vaughan, 'leaves man the originator of his own salvation, in utter contradiction to Scripture here and everywhere. That πρόγνωσις which is made the first step in the spiritual history seems to express, not indeed so much as προδetermination (which would confuse προέγνω with προώρισε), but yet a resting of the mind of God beforehand upon a person with approval (cf. Ex 33<sup>12</sup>, Ps 16), which can only be mentally and doctrinally severed from the second step, προώρισε' (St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans<sup>3</sup>, 1870, ad loc.).

That the expression is used also of Israel by St. Paul is quite in keeping with this pregnant sense: 'God did not cast away his people which he foreknew' (Ro 11<sup>2</sup>). It is 'the chosen people,' 'the covenant people' (ὁ λαός), of whom the Apostle declares that God 'foreknew' them. Here, again, 'foreknowledge' is thought of as directed not to a person or a people simply, but to a person or a people in relation to a function, for Israel was 'designated afore' to fill that place in the purpose of God which has been theirs among the nations.

There is no ground in the teaching of St. Paul for the view that because God foreknew that certain persons would respond to the gospel call, and remain true to their first faith to the end, He therefore foreordained them to salvation. Those whom God foreknew as His own of sovereign grace, He also foreordained to be conformed to the image of His Son; but St. Paul makes this conformity to be the result, not the foreseen condition, of God's foreordination. 'Foreknew' points backward to God's loving thought of them before time began; their conformity to the image of His Son points to the realization of this thought of God and its being carried to its furthest goal in the course of time. Of any 'foreknowledge' by God of others than those who are effectually called according to the Divine purpose neither St. Paul nor any other NT writer has anything to say. According to the teaching of the two apostles already referred to, the Divine foreknowledge represents the first step in the scheme of redemption, marking out the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world which taketh away the sin of the world, and the first movement of grace in the heart of God towards those who shall be saved.

The Patristic usage of the word takes no notice of its theological significance as we find it in St. Peter and St. Paul. Clement speaks of the first apostles being endowed with 'perfect foreknowledge' to enable them to hand on to approved successors the ministry and service they had fulfilled (1 Clem. xlv. 2). Hermas attributes to the Lord the power of reading the heart, and with foreknowledge knowing all things, even the weakness of men and the wiles of the devil (Mand. iv. iii. 4).

FOREORDINATION.—See PREDESTINATION.

FORERUNNER.—This word occurs only in He 6<sup>20</sup>, where it is used of our Lord, who has entered within the veil as the Forerunner of redeemed mankind. It is a military term (πρόδρομος) used of the troops which were sent in advance of an army as scouts (Herod. i. 60, iv. 121, 122; Thuc. ii. 22, etc.). Again, a forerunner was sent in advance of a king to prepare the way for him (Is 40<sup>3</sup>). In the NT the Baptist becomes the forerunner of the Christ (Mt 11<sup>10</sup>). The author of the Epistle shows that the promise made to Abraham still awaits its complete fulfilment—a promise which is made doubly sure, being confirmed by an oath. This promise has been fulfilled by Christ, so that hope may now enter where Jesus, the Son of Man, has already entered to make atonement for us.

The use of this term πρόδρομος emphasizes the fact that Jesus has entered heaven, not as the Jewish high priest entered the Holy of Holies, to return again, but to open a way by which His people may follow, and to prepare a place for them (Jn 14<sup>2</sup>). MORLEY STEVENSON.

FORGIVENESS.—The purpose of this article is not to discuss the large theological problems involved (see ATONEMENT), but to consider the passages in which the term actually occurs in the Acts and the Epistles. The general word is ἀφήμι, of very common occurrence in the NT, especially in the Gospels, meaning 'send away from oneself' (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>), 'let go' (4<sup>20</sup>), 'turn away from' (19<sup>29</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>11</sup>), 'pass over' or 'neglect' (He 6<sup>1</sup>, Mt 23<sup>23</sup>), 'relinquish one's prey' (used of robbers [Lk 10<sup>30</sup>] or a disease [Mt 8<sup>15</sup>, Mk 1<sup>31</sup>, Lk 4<sup>39</sup>, Jn 4<sup>52</sup>]), or simply 'leave a person free' (Mk 10<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>, Jn 11<sup>14</sup>, Ac 5<sup>38</sup>), or treat him as if one had no more concern with him. Hence it is used of remitting a debt (Mt 18<sup>27</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, 14), equivalent to ὁ λογιζέσθαι (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>; see also Sanday-Headlam, Romans 5 [ICC, 1902], 100); the creditor tears up the bill, so to speak, or never enters the debt in his ledger. The verb, however, is rare outside the Gospels in the sense of 'forgive.' It occurs in Ac 8-- (the forgiveness of the thought of Simon's heart), Ja 5<sup>10</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>12</sup> (in each case with 'sins'), and, as a quotation, in Ro 4<sup>7</sup> (the forgiveness of 'lawlessnesses,' ἀνομιαί).

Side by side with these instances, however, we must put the noun, ἀφεσις. This is very rare in the Gospels (it is never attributed to Christ Himself, save in quotations and in the institution of the Eucharist in Mt 26<sup>28</sup>—not in the parallels). It is more frequent in the Acts—2<sup>38</sup> (baptism for forgiveness of sins in the name of Christ), 5<sup>31</sup> (repentance and forgiveness of sins), 10<sup>43</sup> (forgiveness of sins through His name), 13<sup>38</sup> (through Him the forgiveness of sins is preached), 26<sup>18</sup> (forgiveness of sins . . . by faith that is in Christ). Here, the object is always 'sins'; forgiveness is sometimes explicitly joined to repentance and baptism; but more particularly connected with Christ, Christ's name, or faith in Christ. The procedure suggested by these passages is simple: preaching Christ, belief in Christ, and the resultant acceptance of the new position of freedom from sin. This might be all that was explicit in the experience of the early believers; it is obviously not the last word for the preacher, the theologian, or the believer himself. Hence, the fuller expression of St. Paul in Eph 1<sup>7</sup>, 'in whom we have our redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of our transgressions' (cf. Col 1<sup>14</sup>). Here, the figure of the cancelling of a debt is joined to another—rescue from some usurping power; and this (in the passage in Eph., not in Col.) is definitely connected with the shedding of the blood of Christ at His death; so in He 9<sup>2</sup> ('apart from shedding of blood there is no remission of sins'). The only other passage in the Epistles where the word occurs is He 10<sup>18</sup>, where forgiveness of sins and lawlessnesses is regarded as equivalent to their being remembered no more (Jer 31<sup>34</sup>), and so needing no further sacrifice.

At first sight, it would seem strange that ἀφίημι is not used oftener; it does not occur at all in Rom. in the sense of forgiveness, save in a quotation (Ro 4<sup>7</sup>, from Ps 32<sup>1</sup>). But the reason is not far to seek. The conception, as already said, was not final; it was a figure, and one of several possible figures; and it was a single term applied to a mysterious and far-reaching experience which required further analysis. The writers of the Epistles do not neglect the experience, but they pass beyond the expression. In the primitive apostolic teaching of the Acts, it was enough to announce that Jesus was the Messiah, that He had risen from the death to which the rulers of the Jews had condemned Him, and that in Him the old promises of forgiveness of sins were fulfilled—forgiveness even for the sin of putting Him to death. The cardinal notes of the apostles' early preaching are the facts of the Resurrection and Messiahship of Jesus, and the necessity of believing in Him for the promised spiritual change. But it was inevitable that further questions should arise. How can this forgiveness be reconciled with God's unchanging abhorrence of sin? What is the connexion between the death of Christ and the change in me? To answer these, St. Paul takes up the suggestion implied in the word ἀφεσις, 'a cancelled debt,' already familiar to Pharisaic thought, and develops it into his doctrine of justification: there is a debt—all men owe it—caused by the non-performance of the necessary works; judgment must therefore be given against us; but with the Judge who would pronounce the sentence there is also grace. Christ the Son of God dies for our sin; and this same death we also die, by faith, to sin; hence, we are justified before God—that is, we are like men who have never contracted a debt; and there is nothing for us but acquittal. This forensic figure is worked out by St. Paul more fully than any other; but he lays equal stress on the more mystical conceptions of redemption (see above) and death to sin (Ro 6<sup>11</sup> 'estimate yourselves to be mere corpses with regard to sin'). The importance of faith, however, is never left unexpressed, faith being at once surrender to, reliance on, and identification with its object. Here, St. Paul brings us to the circle of the thought of St. John, which only once refers to forgiveness (see above), but moves round the act of believing which joins man to God.

As kindred expressions we may notice the words χαρίζεσθαι—properly, 'do a favour to a person,' or, with the accusative of the thing, 'make a present of'—sometimes in the sense of making a present of an act of wrong-doing, i.e., not insisting on the penalty for it (2 Co 12<sup>13</sup>, Col 2<sup>13</sup>); παρεσις (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>), 'a temporary suspension of punishment which may be one day inflicted,' and therefore entirely distinct from forgiveness (see R. C. Trench, NT Synonyms<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 110 ff.); καλυπτειν, 'to conceal, cover over' (cf. the Hebrew kipper) (Ro 4<sup>7</sup> [quoting from Ps 32], 1 P 4<sup>8</sup>) and λευειν, 'to loose' (Rev 1<sup>5</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Forgiveness has very little modern literature devoted to it; but it is discussed in all literature dealing with Atonement and Reconciliation, and, at least indirectly, in that referring to Sin and Conversion. See the artt. ATONEMENT, CONVERSION, JUSTIFICATION, REPENTANCE, SIN, with the Literature there cited. Reference may also be made to G. B. Stevens, Theology of the NT, 1899; A. W. F. LOFTHOUSE.

FORM.—The first occurrence of this word in the Epistles is in Ro 2<sup>20</sup>, where St. Paul speaks of the Jew as 'having in the law the form of knowledge and of the truth.' The word he uses is μορφωσις, which is found again only in 2 Ti 3<sup>5</sup> ('having the form of godliness'), where it clearly has a disparaging sense and may be taken to mean an affectation of or an aiming at the μορφή of godliness. μορφή itself is that which manifests the essence or inward nature of a thing, 'outward form as determined by inward substance,' in contrast with σχημα which means 'outward form as opposed to inward substance.' μορφωσις occupies an intermediate position between these words; the Apostle hesitates to use σχημα, yet he will not use μορφή. The term happily expresses his meaning in Ro 2<sup>0</sup>—the Law, so far as it went, was an expression, one might even say an embodiment, of Divine truth. It did not go far enough to be called μορφή, yet it was more than mere outward fashion (σχημα). There is not the same note of disparagement about the word here as in 2 Ti 3<sup>5</sup>; it is rather one of incompleteness.

We may turn now to the well-known use of the word μορφή itself in Ph 2<sup>6</sup>, where Christ is said to have been in the form of God and to have taken the form of a slave. The first thing to bear in mind is that St. Paul used the common speech of his day, and this word, like many others, had wandered far from the accurate metaphysical sense in which it was used by Plato and Aristotle. The lengthy and thorough discussions of the word and its relation to οὐσία, φύσις, εἶδος, and similar terms by Lightfoot (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 127 ff.) and E. H. Gifford (The Incarnation, 1897, p. 22 ff.) remain as examples of fine scholarship, but it is now generally recognized that St. Paul uses μορφή here in an easy, popular sense, much as we use the word 'nature.' Several passages in the LXX (c.g. Job 4<sup>16</sup>, Dn 5<sup>8</sup>, Wis 18<sup>1-4</sup>, 4 Mac 15<sup>4</sup>) witness to the same tendency—μορφή is the appearance or look of some one, that by which onlookers judge. But, while St. Paul avoids metaphysical speculations on the relation of the Son to the Father, he implies here, as elsewhere, that Christ has, as it were, the same kind of existence as God. The closest parallels are εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ (Col 1<sup>15</sup>) and πλουσιος ὢν (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>), the latter passage reminding us of the great antithesis in Ph 2<sup>6</sup>—between the μορφή θεοῦ and the μορφή δούλου. δούλος stands for man in opposition to God and must not be pressed literally. It is worth noting that St. Paul insists on Christ's direct exchange of the one form for the other, in contrast to Gnostic views which represented Him as passing through a series of transformations. To return to μορφή, which here denotes, as it usually does, an adequate and accurate expression of the underlying being, and so points to the Divinity of the pre-existing Christ, one may, without any detraction from this honour, point out that St. Paul always regards the Death and Resurrection of Christ as adding something to it. It is after the return to glory that Christ is declared the Son of God 'with power' (Ro 1<sup>3-4</sup>), and becomes Lord (Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>). It only remains to point out that Christ's assumption of the 'form' or 'nature' of a servant does not imply that His 'Ego,' the basis of His personality, was changed. (See further art. CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY, p. 193f.)

Before leaving this word, we may notice the use of the verb μορφῶ in a beautifully expressive passage, Gal 4<sup>19</sup>, where the Apostle adopts the figure of a child-bearing mother; he is in travail for the spiritual birth of Christ within his Galatian friends, straining every power to shape their inner man afresh into the image of Christ. The use of the word 'form' in Ro 9<sup>20</sup> and 1 Ti 2<sup>13</sup> (in each case translating πλάσσω) calls for no remark.

Two other passages in the Epistles demand consideration. In Ro 6<sup>17</sup> St. Paul is glad that the Romans have become sincerely obedient 'to that form of teaching' to which they were delivered; and in 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup> there is an exhortation to 'hold the form (RV 'pattern') of sound words which thou hast heard from me.' The word used in Rom. is τυπος, which must be taken in its usual Pauline sense of 'pattern,' 'standard.' No special type of doctrine is meant (see F. J. A. Hort, Prolegomena to Romans and Ephesians, 1895, p. 32); the reference is to a course of simple instruction, like that in the first part of the Didache ('The Two Ways'), which preceded baptism. In 2 Tim. we have the compound υποτυπωσις, lit. an 'outline sketch,' and so a 'pattern' or 'example.' It is the emphatic word in the sentence, and the meaning is best brought out by the translation, 'Hold as a pattern of healthy teaching, in faith and love, what you heard from me.' A. J. GRIEVE.

FORMALISM.—As thought needs language and soul needs body, so the spirit of religion can maintain, manifest and propagate itself, can relate itself to its environment, only as it is embodied in external form. It takes intellectual form in doctrines and creeds; its emotional necessities create forms of worship; its social instincts express themselves in ecclesiastical organization and sacramental rites, in all its instruments and symbols of corporate action. Hence arises inevitably the danger of formalism: the 'form of godliness' (2 Ti 3<sup>5</sup>) may persist after the power which originally created it has evaporated, and it may be inherited or adopted by those who have never had experience of the inward reality. Formalism in this proper sense of the word is to be distinguished from hypocrisy (the consciously fraudulent assumption of the externals of religion), and other varieties of unreality in religion. The typical formalist is the angel of the church in Sardis, of whom it is written: 'Thou hast a name that thou livest, and thou art dead' (Rev 3<sup>1</sup>). Unlike his Laodicean neighbour, who is 'neither cold nor hot,' he sets a high value upon the Christian name, and firmly believes that to do so is to be earnestly Christian. He mistakes zealous performance of acts of worship for real devotion, and punctilious orthodoxy for living conviction. He sincerely respects the badges and expressions of spiritual life, believes them to be necessary and effectual unto salvation, while he is ignorant of, and without desire for, the reality which they express. He is a 'well without water' (2 P 2<sup>17</sup>).

In the apostolic writings formalism of various kinds is detected and rebuked.

1. The substitution of religious observances for religious reality.—(a) Such observances may be sacramental, belonging to the prescribed ritual; and to these the danger of formalism always attaches in a high degree, the performance of the ritual act being always regarded by the unspiritual man as setting him in a right relation to God. Thus St. Paul accuses the Jews of formalism with regard to circumcision (Ro 2<sup>5-29</sup>), admonishing them that 'he is not a Jew who is one outwardly . . . circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter.' Otherwise it is become 'uncircumcision,' a falsehood against which the virtue of the unprivileged Gentile will rise up in judgment. In St. Paul's controversy with the Judaizers, the issue was between a legal and a spiritual conception of religion rather than between formalism and reality. Yet the latter element also was involved, and is emphasized by his repeatedly contrasting both circumcision and uncircumcision with the inward essence and ethical manifestation of Christianity—'a new creature' (Gal 6<sup>15</sup>), 'faith that worketh by love' (5<sup>6</sup>), 'keeping the commandments of God' (1 Co 7<sup>19</sup>). Here with deep insight St. Paul places 'uncircumcision' on the same footing with 'circumcision.' If the advocates of freedom supposed that there was any virtue in uncircumcision per se, they were only substituting one fetish for another. As there are persons who make a convention of unconventionality, so in religion repudiation of form may become only a different species of formalism.

(b) Not only ritual or sacramental acts, but all observances which are labelled 'religious,' even those which are most directly designed for instruction and edification, are exposed to the same danger. Having exhorted his readers to 'receive with meekness the implanted word,' St. James (1<sup>21-25</sup>) hastens to preclude the notion that such 'hearing,' as a mere opus operatum, has any religious value. Without 'doing' it is no less barren of good result than a cursory glance at one's own image in a mirror (cf. Ro 2<sup>13</sup>). Closely akin to this formalism of 'hearing' is that which substitutes fluent religious talk for religious conduct (Ja 1<sup>26-27</sup>). The pure undefiled θρησκεία, the true Christian cultus, is to 'visit the widows and the fatherless in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world.'

2. The formalism of intellectual orthodoxy.—The classical passage is Ja 2<sup>14-26</sup>. Signifying by 'faith' not the vital spiritual act, but the orthodox confession which is its proper 'form,' the writer vigorously declares that such faith, 'if it have not works,' is dead in itself (v. 16), a body uninhabited by the quickening spirit (v. 6). St. Paul advances even beyond this position when (1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>) he asserts that one may have 'all faith, so as to remove mountains,' yet if it be 'without charity, he is nothing.' The First Epistle of St. John is occupied with the exposure of intellectual formalism (for though the Gnostic tenets, against which it is directed, are regarded as the rankest heterodoxy, the principle is the same). To imagine that we 'know God,' while not keeping His commandments (2<sup>1-6</sup>), or that we are 'in the light,' while hating our brother (2<sup>9</sup>); to credit ourselves with 'knowing Christ' in whom is no sin, while continuing in the practice of sin (3<sup>6</sup>), is to stand convicted of being a 'liar.' Only he who loves can know God, who is Love (4<sup>8</sup>).

3. Formalism within the ethical domain.—While religious observances and credal orthodoxy are always to be submitted to the test of ethics, the last hiding-place of formalism is within the ethical domain itself. There is the formalism to which the possession of a high moral ideal stands for high morality. This is scathingly rebuked by St. Paul in Ro 2<sup>17-24</sup>. The typical Jew gloried in the lofty moral standards of his race, 'resting upon the law,' 'approving the things that are excellent'; but according to the Apostle's indictment he too often regarded an enlightened sense of duty as the goal rather than as the starting-point of moral life. It is a still subtler formalism when the ethical impulse exhausts itself in lofty and generous sentiment, or in clothing such emotion with appropriate verbiage (Ja 2<sup>15-16</sup>). This possibility is suggested, with a touch of delicate irony, in 1 Jn 3<sup>16-18</sup>, where the law of self-sacrificing brotherhood is first stated in its highest terms—'We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren,' and then, lest any one should mistake the emotion awakened by such magnificent expressions of duty for the discharge of duty itself, the issue is brought down to the pedestrian level of the everyday use of 'the world's goods' for the relief of the need that is before one's eyes. Here, again, St. Paul is still bolder (1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>), pointing out that conduct may fill out to the utmost the 'form' of self-sacrifice ('If I give all my goods to feed the poor, and if I give my body to be burned'), and yet lack the inward reality. Ethical reality is attested not by the sensational exploit, but by that 'walking in love' which is so inimitably described in the following verses.

FORNICATION (πορνεία, and cognates). — 1. Meaning of term.—(1) πορνεία is used sometimes in the strict sense of 'prostitution' or 'fornication' (1 Co 6<sup>13</sup>). It is thus different from μοιχεία, or 'adultery' (He 13<sup>4</sup> [cf. Mk 7<sup>21</sup>] Didache, 2 f.). This strict sense, however, can be retained with certainty only when the two words occur side by side. In the pagan world, while μοιχεία was regarded as sinful on a woman's part mainly on the ground that it infringed the husband's rights, fornication or sexual intercourse outside the marriage bond or even by husbands was allowable. St. Paul (1 Th 4<sup>3ff.</sup>) demands chastity from married men. The wife (interpreting σκεῦος as 'wife' [see Milligan's Thess., London, 1908, for opposite view]) is to be had in holiness and honour. Christian morality is contrasted with pagan in this respect. Illicit sexual intercourse with a married woman is not only an infringement of the husband's rights, but violence done to the Holy Ghost. Christianity regards fornication and adultery alike as sinful. Cato looked on fornication as a preventive against libidinous intrigues with married women (Horace, Sat. i. 2). Cicero says it was always practised and allowed (pro Caelio, xx). It was defended not only as customary but as a necessity of nature. Alexander Severus furnished governors with concubines. The Cynic and early Stoic philosophers excused it on the ground that 'naturalia non sunt turpia.' This St. Paul combats (1 Co 6<sup>12-9</sup>). It is not a natural thing like food; for, while the nutritive system of man belongs to the perishing schema of this world, the body is the organ of the spirit and the temple of the Holy Ghost, bought by Christ for His own service. To unite it to a harlot is an act of sacrilege, of self-violation, and it breaks the union between Christ and the believer.

How different this is from the lame censure of Epictetus (Enchir. 33) and the practice of Marcus Aurelius, who had his concubine (see Lecky, History of European Morals<sup>3</sup>, London, 1888, ii. 314 ff.).

(2) πορνεία is used also in a generic sense, μοιχεία being specific. In Pauline terminology μοιχεύω is found in quotations from the LXX (seventh commandment), while πορνεία is used for immorality in general (cf. Theophylact on Ro 1-9: πασαν ἀπλῶς τὴν ἀκαθαρσίαν τῷ τῆς πορνείας ὄνματι περιέλαβεν). This is probably the meaning in Ac 15-9, though some interpret it of marriage within the prohibited degrees (Lv 18-9). The Jews allowed proselytes to marry even with their nearest relatives, and, according to John Lightfoot (Hor. Heb., new ed., Oxford, 1859, iv. 132), the case of incest in Corinth (1 Co 5<sup>1f.</sup>), where a Christian had married his father's wife, while the father was possibly still alive, arose out of this custom. This is highly doubtful. In Ac 15<sup>20, 29</sup> πορνεία is used in the general sense of immorality. We are not concerned in this article with the vexed question of what constituted fornication in the case of re-marriage after divorce. Our Lord's teaching on this point is doubtful, owing to the absence of the qualifying expression in Mark, although the existence of the qualification in Matthew indicates that in the early Church re-marriage was allowed to the guiltless party. Whether, again, marriage within the prohibited degrees constituted πορνεία is not discussed in the NT.

But from the richness of the phraseology for sensual sins we can gather how wide-spread and multiform this evil was. We find uncleanness (ἀκαθαρσία), licentiousness (ἀσελγεία) often side by side with πορνεία (2 Co 12<sup>21</sup>, Gal 5<sup>19</sup>, Eph 4<sup>19</sup>). So often is πλεονεξία found alongside πορνεία that many are inclined to regard the former as itself a form of sensuality. But it is best to regard both as characteristic sins of heathendom. Others associate them psychologically, saying that forgetfulness of God compels the creature to either one or other (Bengel and Trench). The NT seems to have a genetic account of this sin (fornication) in more than one place. Our Lord (Mk 7) deduces it from evil thoughts; St. Paul from the desire of evil things (1 Co 10<sup>8</sup>), from the lusts of the flesh (Gal 5<sup>19</sup>), and from ἀδικία (1 Co 6<sup>13f.</sup>). The lists of vices, however, are not arranged in groups following a psychological order. They have their counterparts in pagan literature (see Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 406 ff.; and Deissmann, Licht vom Osten<sup>2</sup>, Tübingen, 1909, p. 238 f.). They vary in different places. The connexion between drunkenness and vice is also recognized (Eph 5<sup>18</sup>; cf. Test. Jud. xvi. 1). Groupings of vices and virtues early arose, arranged in connected lists for catechetical and homiletic purposes, but the order is variable (cf. Hermas, Vis. 3). There was no public opinion in paganism to suppress fornication. Hetairai moved about the streets freely, and often played a large role in public affairs. One thinks of Phryne and others. Religious associations sanctioned vice. The temples had their courtesans (ιερόδουλοι; see Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. [Oxford, 1895], 94 f.). The cult of Aphrodite Pandemos at Corinth may be mentioned, as well as smaller cults like that of the Cabiri at Thessalonica and the Chaldaean Sybil at Thyatira. Trade-gilds (ἐργασταί), which were numerous, afforded means of corruption. Almost everywhere the air was tainted, so that to have no intercourse with fornicators was like going out of the world. Christianity never formed itself into a ghetto, and so the danger of moral pollution was always present. The very fact that the pagan gods were represented as prone to sensuality had a degrading influence on ordinary morality, however much the stories of the gods may have been ridiculed or allegorized in enlightened coteries. 'If a god does so, why should not I a man?' (Terence, Eunuch. III. v. 42). Ancient custom, the callosity of public feeling, the contamination of commerce and religion, the sanctions of libertine enlightenment—all these had to be combated and overcome in the interests of purity.

(3) πορνεία is sometimes used also to indicate apostasy from God—so often in Revelation. This meaning lies very near the surface whenever the word occurs in conjunction with idol-worship or meats offered to idols. In the Apostolic Decree this thought is latent. To buy meat in the open market was dangerous—bidden in Ac 15<sup>9</sup>, Rev 21<sup>4, 20</sup>, though by St. Paul it was allowed. He bases the right on the law of expediency, but he recommends regard for the weak brother's conscience (1 Co 8<sup>4-13</sup> 10<sup>18</sup>, Ro 14<sup>20f.</sup>). The Greek Church still regards this law of meats as binding, though the Western Church followed St. Paul from early times. But everywhere fornication is prohibited. At Thyatira, as at Corinth, some defended fornication on Gnostic grounds, as Jezebel; but not only fornication but idol-meats also are prohibited by the seer. The Christians had to break away from their trade-gilds to avoid contamination; and this involved serious sacrifice. The example of Israel tempted by Moabitish women to apostasy and lust at Balaam's instigation was a warning (Rev 21<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 10). See art. NICOLAITANS. It is probable that we can understand the conjunction of fornication and idol-meats in Rev 21<sup>4, 20</sup> and 1 Cor. only on the early Christian view of demonic influence acting through food and thus tempting to lust (see B. W. Bacon in Expositor, 8th ser. vii. [1914] 40 ff.).

2. Attitude of Christianity towards fornication.—Christianity opposed fornication in every form, not only overt acts but even lustful thoughts. There were things that should not even be named among Christians. It saw in marriage a preventive against fornication; St. Paul, though desiring the unmarried to remain as they were, yet, rather than run the risk of incontinence or the fire of lust, allowed them to marry. So strong was the reaction against impurity that St. John regards the chaste unmarried (παρθένους) as a select group (Rev 14<sup>4</sup>). Fornication is a sin against the body; it is a defilement of God's temple; it is a violation of the self in a special sense; for it the wrath of God comes on men, and God's judgment awaits it. The very beginning of sanctification is incompatible with fornication. St. Paul condenses into one sentence the Christian attitude: 'Flee from fornication' (1 Co 6<sup>18</sup>). It is directly opposed to God's righteousness, and St. John brands fornicators with the opprobrious terms κυνες, 'dogs', 'defiled' (Rev 17<sup>4</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>, etc.). These cannot enter the city of God. St. Paul's dealing with the Corinthian case indicates that fornication excludes from church fellowship.

* Perhaps he has in mind sodomy (παιδοφθορία or pæderasty of Ro 12<sup>7</sup>, 1 Ti 10<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>9</sup>, Didache, 21.).

FORTUNATUS.—Fortunatus was one of three deputies from the Church in Corinth who visited St. Paul in Ephesus, perhaps bearing letters, and to whom he refers in 1 Co 16<sup>17, 18</sup>. Nothing more is known of him. It seems unlikely that all the deputies would belong to one household, as Weizsäcker (Apostol. Age, Eng. tr., i. [1897] 305) suggests, or that all were slaves (so T. C. Edwards, ad loc.). Clement refers to a Fortunatus (in Ep. ad Cor. § 65) as accompanying his messengers from Rome to Corinth, but distinguishes him from them; the name, however, is too common for identification (see ACHAICUS and STEPHANUS).

J. E. ROBERTS.

FOUNDATION.—In the NT, 'foundation' represents two different Greek words: (a) καταβολή (active, except in He 11<sup>11</sup>, and always in the phrase καταβολή κόσμου); (b) θεμέλιος, -ον (pass.), with both a literal and a figurative meaning (HDB, art. 'Foundation'). Cheyne (EBI, art. 'Foundations', 1558) says "'corner-stone" and "foundation-stone" are synonymous terms in the Hebrew Scriptures.' The metaphorical sense of the word chiefly has religious importance for students of the NT, and will be noted as it occurs in the apostolic writings. The figurative use of θεμέλιος goes back to our Lord's Parable of the Wise Builder—ὃς ἐσκαψε καὶ ἐβάθυνε, καὶ ἐθηκε θεμέλιον ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν—'who digged and went deep and laid a foundation upon the rock' (Lk 6<sup>48</sup>).

The significance of the word in the Epistles will be found in an exegesis of the passages, viz.: (1) in Ro 15<sup>9</sup> St. Paul expresses his determination not to build upon another man's foundation: ἵνα μὴ ἐπ' ἄλλότριν θεμέλιον οἰκοδομῶ. He covets the work of a pioneer on new ground, for in the wide field of evangelization (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι), with so much to do and so little done, all narrow jealousies are senseless and to be avoided. He is not desirous to preach in occupied fields; his ambition is to spread the gospel and not to make it the subject of rivalry. The rivalries of the Christian Church in heathen lands, while whole tracts are lying unevangelized, are a sad sight.

(2) To the Church of Christian Corinth, St. Paul writes: ὡς σοφὸς ἀρχιτέκτων θεμέλιον ἐθηκα, 'as a wise master-builder, I laid a foundation' (1 Co 3<sup>10</sup>), and again: θεμέλιον γὰρ ἄλλον οὐδὲς δύναται θῆναι παρὰ τὸν κείμενον, ὅς ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, 'for other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ' (1 Co 3<sup>11</sup> RV). J. E. McFadyen (The Epistles to the Corinthians, London, 1911, p. 50) translates the phrase 'alongside of (παρὰ with acc.) the one laid' and comments: 'Jesus is the foundation: the church is founded upon a Person, not upon a system of truths . . . so that this name is a confession,—the earliest, simplest, profoundest of the church.' So F. W. Robertson (Expos. Lectures on St Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, London, 1873, pp. 48, 49): 'Christianity is Christ. . . Christianity is a Life, a Spirit'—'That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death'. Thus St. Paul lays down once for all 'the absolute religious significance of Jesus, in all the relations of God and man' (J. Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, London, 1908, p. 23). Denney (p. 380 ff.), in the interests of faith and Christian unity, pleads for such a simplification of creeds as will bind men to Christ in the light of St. Paul's declaration that the building is related to the foundation-stone alone, and not to anything laid alongside: 'We remain loyal to our Lord and Saviour only because He has apprehended us, and His hand is strong' (p. 411).

(3) In Eph 2<sup>20</sup> St. Paul describes believers as ἐποικοδομηθέντες ἐπὶ τῷ θεμελίῳ τῶν ἀποστόλων καὶ προφητῶν, 'Being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets.' The latter are of course NT teachers and exhorters (the omission of the article before prophets indicates members of the same class). They had a special message and function to the Church already gathered out of paganism, in contrast to the missionary and pioneer work of the apostles.

Considerable variety of opinion has been expressed as to the meaning of 'the foundation of the apostles and prophets.' A careful summary is given by Salmond (EGT, 'Ephes.', 1903, p. 299) of the possible interpretations of the article: (a) gen. of apposition=the foundation which consists of apostles and prophets; (b) gen. of originating cause=the foundation laid by them; (c) gen. of possession=the apostles' foundation on which they themselves were built. Ellicott (Ephesians<sup>3</sup>, 1864, in loc.) favours (a), so that St. Paul by a change of metaphor (1 Co 3<sup>11</sup>) presents the apostles and prophets as themselves the foundation, and Christ as the corner-stone 'binding together both the walls and the foundations.' But the consensus of interpretations tends to (b), the gospel of the apostles and prophets (HDB, ii.), the doctrines which they preached (H. C. G. Moule, Cambridge Bible, 1886, in loc., also Appendix F, 163 f.). G. G. Findlay (Expositor's Bible, 'Ephes.', 1892, p. 152) combines (a) and (b)—'These men have laid the foundation—Peter and Paul, John and James, Barnabas and Silas, and the rest. They are our spiritual progenitors, the fathers of our faith. We see Jesus Christ through their eyes; we read His teaching, and catch His Spirit in their words. . . . Nor was it their word alone, but the men themselves—their character, their life and work—laid for the Church its historical foundation. This "glorious company of the apostles" formed the first course in the new building. . . . They have fixed the standard of Christian doctrine and the type of Christian character.' In a lesser degree this is true of all religious founders and teachers. For generations the churches bear the impress of the men who gave them their beginning.

(4) The figure of 'the foundation' is used in an unusual form (condensed metaphor) in 1 Ti 6<sup>19</sup>: ἀποθησαυρίζοντας ἐαυτοὺς θεμέλιον καλὸν εἰς τὸ μέλλον, 'laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come' (cf. Sir 1<sup>15</sup>: καὶ μετὰ ἀνθρώπων θεμέλιον αἰῶνος ἐνόσσευσε, 'and with men she [Wisdom] built a foundation of everlastingness'). The somewhat involved metaphor is perhaps due to a reminiscence of our Lord's Parable (Lk 16<sup>9</sup>), but specially of Mt 6<sup>20</sup> where the verb is the same and also the duty enjoined: θησαυρίζετε δὲ ὑμῖν θησαυροὺς ἐν οὐρανῷ, 'lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven.' Bengel (Gnom., in loc.) with a happy illustration gives the sense 'Mercator naufragio salvus, thesaurus domum praemissos invenit.' Cheyne (loc. cit.) favours the emendation κειμήλιον, 'gift' or 'valued memorial,' which straightens out the metaphor but at the expense of the text. If there were any authority for the reading, one might agree that this 'must surely be right.'

(5) In 2 Ti 2<sup>19</sup> ὁ μέντοι στερεὸς θεμέλιος τοῦ θεοῦ ἔστηκεν, 'Howbeit the firm foundation of God standeth' (RV), the Church itself is described as the foundation of a still greater building—'the holy temple in the Lord in whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God in the Spirit'

(Eph 2<sup>21, 22</sup>). 'The term "foundation," here used for the Church of God on earth, is remarkable, and points to a great truth: that, after all, this life is but a beginning, and that "His Church" here is but a foundation—is only the first and early storey of that glorious Church the Divine Architect has planned, and will complete in heaven' (Ellicott, in loc.; cf. also He 11<sup>10</sup>). This 'foundation,' in reminiscence of ancient custom as to foundation-stones, bears a two-fold inscription, expressing both its origin and purpose: 'The Lord knoweth them that are his' ('the Lord will show who are his, and who is holy' [Nu 16<sup>5</sup>]) and 'let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness.'

(6) In He 6<sup>1</sup> there occurs the warning μὴ πάλιν θεμέλιον καταβαλλόμενοι, 'not laying again (and again) a foundation.' The meaning is apparent from the opening words of the chapter: 'wherefore let us cease to speak of the first principles of Christ, and press on unto perfection (full growth).' 'Let us be borne on to perfection' in 'personal surrender to an active influence' (Westcott, Hebrews, 1892, p. 143). The subject is the duty of progress, and the contrast is between the elementary (νήπιος [5<sup>13</sup>]) and the full grown (τέλειος) in the Christian life. The different elements that constitute the foundation, which is not to be laid again, are three, taken in pairs: (i) personal attitudes of heart and mind: repentance from dead works and faith toward God; (ii) church ordinances: baptism and laying on of hands; (iii) leading beliefs: resurrection and judgment. These are to be accepted once for all—they are the foundation. In the subjects alluded to as foundation facts there is perhaps a reference to some well-known formula for the instruction of the catechumen; perhaps the allusion is to the usual evangelistic presentation of the gospel. 'The phrase implies that certain things have been done and certain teaching has been given to the readers at the outset of their Christian life as a basis on which more advanced teaching may be built' (A. S. Peake, 'Hebrews' in Century Bible, 1902, p. 141). But such a foundation needs to be laid only once, and the use of it is for subsequent building; therefore progress not only in knowledge, but towards the full maturity of Christian character, is incumbent on all believers.

He 6<sup>1</sup> has, it may be feared, been but a counsel of perfection in certain church circles, while 'to preach the gospel' has often meant a formal and dry presentation of a few elementary truths, that by wearisome repetition have had all their freshness rubbed away. Yet this has been called 'dwelling on fundamentals.' But we do not dwell on a foundation; we build upon it. Many modern evangelistic efforts split upon this rock, and the falling away of professed converts has often arisen from the refusal of them or their spiritual guides 'to have done with the elementary doctrines and to go on towards full growth.' The complaint is sometimes heard that the first fresh and joyful emotions are so soon lost; and to revive and recover these, men are tempted, or invited, to go back in thought and desire to some former visitation of the Spirit. But the remedy is not back, but forward. We cannot recover the emotions that are behind, but we can have other emotions and more joyful experiences new-born, by going forward to explore more deeply the great things of God. Therefore the Apostle says: let us surrender ourselves to the influence which will carry us on. 'The influence and the surrender are continuous (φερώμεθα) and not concentrated in one momentary crisis' (Westcott, op. cit. p. 143).

FRANKINCENSE (λίβανος).—Frankincense, which is mentioned (Rev 18<sup>13</sup>) as part of the vast merchandise of Imperial Rome, is a gum-resin yielded by certain species of trees of the genus Boswellia. In ancient times the most famous of these grew in Hadramant, S. Arabia. To obtain the frankincense a deep incision is made in the trunk of the tree, and below the incision a narrow strip of bark is peeled off. As the Heb. לְבָנָה (from which the Gr. is derived) signifies, the resin exudes as a milk-like juice (spuma pinguis, Pliny, xii. 14), which in about three months attains the necessary degree of consistency. Frankincense was sold in semi-opaque, round, or ovate tears or irregular lumps, which were covered with a white dust as the result of their friction against one another. It was valued for its sweet odour when burned, and it often served for illumination in place of oil lamps. As it was one of the ingredients of incense, great quantities of it were required for the sacrificial ritual. As a perfume it was used for the care of the body and for the flavouring of wine. It was also in high repute as a medicine.

FREEDOM OF THE WILL.—1. Introduction.—

Properly speaking, the phrase 'the freedom of the will' is a misnomer. As Locke pointed out, the question is not whether the will is free, but whether man is free. Either the will is in the same psychological category as the desires, in which case it is obviously limited by a man's mental universe and his powers of concentration, or it is identical with the man's self. It is quite evident that a man is not determined always by external force, and that neither others nor he himself can always predict what he will do. But this alone does not make him free. On the other hand, set any two men among the same alternatives, and their attitude will be different; in each case it will be conditioned by education, tastes, habits, range of perceptions—in fact, by the whole previous life, by all that goes to make up what we call character. Yet the consciousness of freedom persists; we feel that between given alternatives we have the power of effective choice. Hence, the antinomy has often been solved by the word 'self-determination'; but this only moves the difficulty further back. What of the self which determines? Is that distinct from the other self? If so, what is its relation to environment and character? And if not, how can anything be the agent of its own determination?

The interest of the question is great, but it is speculative or else merely juristic; that is, whatever the answer may be, men will continue to form their own ends and pursue them, and to 'weight the alternative' in trying to influence the conduct of others. It is not determinism, but fatalism, which has any power to influence conduct, and fatalism is something entirely different. The only result of determinism in practical life is in the formation of judgments with regard to personal responsibility and the infliction of punishment. Punishment would become, what it is indeed at present often held to be, non-retributive; it would be only disciplinary and deterrent. But this too would leave a man's way of conducting his own life untouched.

The theoretical problem is hardly noticed in the NT. The interest of the NT writers is predominantly practical. All that does not directly or indirectly affect a man's relation to his universe is ignored. At the same time, the intellectual world of the NT is identical with that of the OT, but invaded and fertilized by the conceptions of the Incarnation and Redemption of Christ. For the thought of the OT, the problem of freedom did not exist. Not only were there no practical considerations to call attention to it; it was excluded by the heartiness with which the Hebrew mind accepted the two convictions of the responsibility of man and the omnipotence of God. Even for Ezekiel, who came nearest to realizing the antinomy, the problem was one of individual and social responsibility rather than of freedom and necessity (see 14, 18, 33). On the other hand, God can always intervene, though man may still be answerable (1 K 22<sup>4-6</sup>, Am 3<sup>6</sup>, 2 S 24<sup>1</sup>, compared with 1 Ch 21<sup>1</sup>).

2. The attitude in Acts.—The same ingenuous yet serviceable attitude (to pass over instances in the Gospels) is found in the Acts of the Apostles. While actions are regularly spoken of (as in all normal literature) as originated by their agents, yet new powers, unattainable otherwise, are bestowed by the Spirit (e.g. 2<sup>1</sup>), whose coming, however, may be hastened or caused by prayer (8<sup>18</sup>). Men may be frustrated in some purpose by the Spirit of Jesus (16<sup>7</sup>), constrained by the Word (18<sup>5</sup>), or bound in the spirit (20-). So, too, they may act in ignorance (3<sup>17</sup>); or sin may even be the result of Satan's 'filling their heart' (5<sup>3</sup>, but contrast v. 9). But this interference with normal powers of choice is neither felt to limit man's freedom, nor does it affect the writer's faith therein. The conception of some Divine power as temporarily displacing a man's control over his speech or thought was by no means strange to the Hebrews, or to the Greeks and Romans, who had not learnt to think in terms of the sub-conscious; and when we, forgetting or improving on our philosophy, say 'he was not himself,' they would have said 'God, or some evil spirit, entered into him' (1 S 16<sup>14</sup>; cf. Verg. Æn. vi. 77 ff.). But while cases of more or less permanent possession by demons were familiar, the entrance of the Spirit of God was felt chiefly on special occasions (Ac 19<sup>38</sup>; cf. 4<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>).

This persistence of familiar categories of thought in the presence of new experiences is seen especially in references to the Holy Spirit. He 'falls upon' the disciples; he gives them to speak with 'other tongues' (cf. also 18<sup>5</sup> 20<sup>-3</sup>); but from the Acts alone it is impossible to say how far this is regarded as permanent; we must go to the Epistles for descriptions of the power of the Spirit in renewed lives, quickened hopes, and abiding impulses of joy; and although the choicest graces of the Christian life are set down as the fruit of the Spirit (as opposed to the works of the flesh, Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup>), yet they are all subjects of exhortation as well (e.g. Ro 12<sup>18</sup>, Ph 2<sup>18</sup>).

3. St. Paul's view of the problem.—But when we turn to St. Paul, we find a definite recognition and discussion of the problem of freedom. Yet it is not the freedom of the will or even of the self. It appears in two forms, each arising from St. Paul's own experience or observation, and each approached only when necessitated by some unavoidable antagonism. First, the actual experience of slavery to sin, or (what to St. Paul himself was involved in this) to the Law. Second, the apparent inability of an individual or groups of individuals (Esau, Pharaoh, Israel) to will what is right because of some dealing of God with them. A third aspect is also suggested, though St. Paul seems to offer a formula for its solution without recognizing its difficulty. What is the relation of the redeemed soul to God's indwelling and inworking? Yet a fourth form of the problem appears, which is predominantly ethical. What actions am I as a Christian man at liberty to perform? What restraints, if any, am I bound to observe? This, however, springs naturally out of the first form of the problem. It will be advisable to consider these in order.

(1) The problem of freedom from sin and from the Law.—To St. Paul, as a Hebrew sprung from Hebrews, the great end of man is righteousness. It was to him more than an end: it was a passion. But he felt it to be unattainable: a mountain height which he had no strength to scale. His life was one long fruitless struggle towards it. He could only describe that life as a bondage, as if he had been sold like a slave to a master who would always prevent him from following his own wishes (Ro 7<sup>14</sup>), or as if he were actually tied to a weight which kept him from moving—the weight of a dead body (v.<sup>24</sup>). This master was sin; but as in a fevered dream the patient sometimes imagines his own pain to be external to himself and torturing him, so St. Paul speaks of sin as something external, exercising an alien and hateful tyranny over him which can only end in death (5<sup>21</sup>). It is not that his will is not free; it is not that he cannot will in a particular way; it is that he cannot act as he wills. The compulsion is external. And this tyranny further makes a tyrant of what should have been a guide, namely, the Law. The term 'law,' it must be remembered, is used by St. Paul in at least three ways: for the Law of Moses, for the natural law, written 'on the heart' of the Gentiles, and for the Law of Moses considered as a system of law in general. Now the Law, either as known to the Gentiles, or revealed more fully to the Jews, with its lists of forbidden acts, should have helped man to righteousness; but, enslaved as he was, it only pointed out in detail what he had no power to do, thus making his tyrant doubly hateful, and himself doubly a slave (2<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>).

Now, it will be observed that there is no metaphysics here, and no psychology, though it may be that St. Paul is giving us data for both. He is simply stating his own experience—an experience which in his case was happily only temporary, and which, as he believed, was intended to be only temporary for others. No conclusions could be drawn from it as to the will in general. For what happened? In this hopeless extremity a solution was found in Christ. St. Paul could not free himself; but Christ, as the Son of God, was free; and through His reconciliation the spirit of freedom, of sonship, of life, was sent forth (8<sup>11</sup>, 15, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>). To exercise faith in Christ was to be placed, so to speak, where Christ was, i.e. in the position of one to whom complete righteousness was possible and actual. We cannot consider here the rationale of St. Paul's conception of the Atonement (see art. ATONEMENT); but just as his active and untiring mind worked out into a Divine drama what to most of his contemporaries was the simple experience of the consciousness of forgiveness of sins through Christ, so, to him, ability to do right was imaged forth as the change from being the slave of a tyrant to being a son in the house of his father. He is no longer kept from doing what he longs to do; he does it as if he had been born to do it. And this is what has happened: he has been born anew, he is a new creature.

Yet we must be careful not to drive the figure too far; or rather, we must be prepared to go far enough. The change has not simply been wrought for him, but in him. It is not merely a change from a master to a father; but from the spirit of a slave to that of a son, by the spirit of sonship. Cowed and overpowered before, acquiescing, with a true slave's mind, in the very things he hated, now he is confident, self-controlled as a son; not an emancipated slave, apt to mistake a broken chain for a charter of licence; his freedom from sin is freedom for righteousness. He can thus speak of the old Law as replaced by a new one. He is actually a slave once more; but a slave to Christ. He has gained his freedom, only to surrender it; or rather, he has surrendered it, only to find it in a form which is entirely stable and absolutely satisfying (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>, no more 'veils, reservations, inconsistencies' now [A. Menzies, Second Ep. to Cor., 1912, ad loc.], 5<sup>14</sup>, Ro 7<sup>6</sup>, Gal 5<sup>8</sup>; Christians are even slaves to one another, because slaves to Him whose law is love. Ro 8-6<sup>18</sup>; cf. 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>, Jn 8<sup>34ff.</sup>).

This experience St. Paul regarded as normal for all Christians. But in the Galatian church he was confronted with a return to the Jewish Law by those who ought to have learnt that circumcision could profit nothing. This raised once more the question of freedom. To go back to the Law was to go back to bondage; not, however, to the exact type of bondage from which St. Paul himself had been delivered at his conversion. There, the real tyrant had been sin, and the Law, coming in upon it, had made it appear in its true character (Ro 5<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>13</sup>). But at the same time its hold upon its prisoner was tightened. Here the Law is regarded in its other aspect, as a παιδαγωγός, a boy's slave-attendant; and thus as an integral part of the Divine plan (Gal 3<sup>24</sup>). Man is intended to live as a son in his father's house, with a son's freedom; but before this is possible, he must obey; he has to submit himself to attendants (who, in a Hellenic or Roman household, would themselves generally be slaves). Only as he grows up and 'puts away childish things' does he leave behind him this regime, and become a son in actuality. But, having once left this state of things behind, to return to it is preposterous. It is like preferring the state of the handmaid to that of the wife, Hagar to Sarah; or leaving Jerusalem, our mother, for the barren heights of Sinai (4-4<sup>30</sup>). It is not simply refusing to live as a son; it is rejecting the spirit of sonship, bestowed on him, which made such a life possible.

This is what the Galatians were doing in listening to their Judaizing teachers. It was more than a relapse from freedom to bondage; it was a relapse from Spirit to flesh. Instead of the free impulse of the Spirit within them, or of Christ's living in them, they were being guided by rules which demanded a merely external obedience and appealed to merely selfish desires, aptly symbolized by an operation on the external surface of the body. The case might not be so serious if entire obedience to these rules could ever be given. But even if this were possible, the spirit of a life so lived would still be hopelessly wrong. Freedom is life; and its absence is nothing less than death.

This is not the place to discuss St. Paul's whole view of the relation of the Law and the works of the Law to grace. But the bearing of the question on freedom will be best seen by comparing the position of St. Paul with that of Kant. At first sight, the two might seem to be absolutely opposed. Kant finds freedom just where St. Paul denies its presence—in strict obedience to the Moral Law. But law has a very different meaning for Kant and for St. Paul. Law to Kant is essentially that which does not speak from without but from within. It appeals to no interested motives, either of hope or fear; it promises no rewards, threatens no punishments. It speaks with the sole authority of reason; its voice is the voice of the man himself. It is the experience of his true and proper rational self. 'The will is not subject simply to the law, but so subject that it must be regarded as itself giving the law, and on this ground only subject to the law' (Kant, 'Metaph. of Morals,' in Theory of Ethics, ed. Abbott, 1879, p. 70f.). Hence, only by obedience to it is freedom possible; for freedom is not determination by oneself; it is obedience to oneself. To be influenced by anything else is to recognize the right of an external authority, to relate oneself, as a Stoic would say, to things outside one's power. But this recognition of external authority is just what St. Paul means by the Law; whether he thinks of it as the assessor of a tyrant, as in Romans, or the slave-attendant in the father's house, as in Galatians. And what Kant calls law, St. Paul calls sonship. The difference—for of course there is a difference—is that Kant is barely a theist, St. Paul is wholly a Christian. Where Kant is conscious only of an imperative within his emancipated breast, St. Paul is conscious of a Divine Power who has sent forth the spirit of sonship into him, and a Saviour who has lifted him clean out of the sweep of every influence of heteronomy. Freedom, for Kant, is obedience to self; for St. Paul, obedience to a Person in whose will he acquiesces with enthusiasm. Both systems, however, are definitely opposed to Butler's expedient of placing 'reasonable self-love' on a level with conscience. In so far as Butler's conception of conscience corresponds with Kant's categorical imperative, reasonable self-love leads to sheer heteronomy; and if we may compare obedience to conscience with the new life of freedom which, in St. Paul's view, is enjoyed by the Christian, self-love is nothing more than obedience to the flesh which the Christian has crucified with the passions and lusts thereof (Gal 5<sup>24</sup>).

One word, however, may usefully be added at this point with reference to Spinoza, as enthusiastic an exponent of freedom as Kant or St. Paul. Human freedom Spinoza defines as 'a form of reality which our understanding acquires through direct union with God, so that it can bring forth ideas in itself, and effects outside itself, in complete harmony with its nature, without, however, its effects being subjected to any external causes, so as to be capable of being changed or transformed by them' (Short Treatise on God, Man, and Human Welfare, ch. xxvi.). In the moral system of Spinoza, God is as central as in that of Kant. He is peripheral; and since God alone has freedom, the soul can be really free only through union with God. Such a view lays every pantheist open to one retort: if God is substance, or the All, and therefore universally immanent, how can union with Him be a thing which the soul may possess or lack? Spinoza does not attempt to grapple with this difficulty. St. Paul, on the other hand, does not habitually think in terms of union with God, either in the sense of Spinoza or of the Fourth Gospel. The centre of his system is not God, as a Divinely immanent Being, so much as the will of God, with which his own will has been brought to move in entire conformity. With St. Paul, freedom implies no merging in a wider Being; the man who is a Christian is like the son who not only lives in his father's house, but moves in the atmosphere of perfect sympathy and understanding, confidence and obedience (cf. also He 3<sup>9</sup>). The thought underlying the references to freedom in Jn 8<sup>32-36</sup> is substantially the same. There is no mention of law, but sin is felt to mean slavery; and freedom is only attained through the gift of the Son. Through Him we know the truth, and recognize and receive the message which the Son brings of the Father's love and of His purpose that men through faith in the Son should be, as He is, members of the Divine family (cf. 15<sup>15</sup>). This breaks the slavery: to believe in the Son makes the believer himself a son.

(2) Relation of individual will to purpose of God.—We now pass to the second question, which seems to touch more closely the familiar questions of modern philosophy. Two things, however, are here to be noticed. The discussion is not philosophical, but religious: it deals with the relation of the human will to the purpose of an omnipotent

God. And it is not general but specific: how can we explain the fact that the Jews have been rejected? And this leads to a third point, namely, that the question of freedom is raised only by accident. The real question is approached thus. In Ro 8 the Apostle's thought has reached the victorious love of Christ. But the Jews are outside. Is then God's promise to them broken by the rejection of His people? No: to suppose this would be to limit God's power; for He was supreme enough to put conditions on that promise (Isaac was chosen, and not Ishmael; Jacob, and not Esau). Thus, St. Paul carries the supremacy of God further than his opponents; his argument is similar to that of the prophets, who had to oppose the rooted Israelite belief that Jahweh must save His people. But the argument does not stop here. God's will is not capricious. His real purpose is to secure 'the righteousness which is of faith' (9<sup>30</sup>), which the Jews rejected. Hence, a new element enters into the discussion: human responsibility. As far as the Jews themselves are concerned, faith is open to all (10<sup>8</sup>), and preaching can be heard by all (10<sup>-1</sup>). Thus, the Jews have only themselves to thank for their fate. Then, St. Paul returns to his original question. Are God's people rejected? (11<sup>1</sup>). No, their revolt was their own sin; the salvation of the remnant is His grace. But if there is revolt, God confirms, yet only so as to over-rule; it is all the better for the Gentiles, and, in the end, for the Jews also. Next, St. Paul turns to the Gentiles: 'You too will find that resistance is followed by severity. But, behind all, is goodness. If there has been blindness, it is in part; the gifts and calling of God are without repentance' (11<sup>21-29</sup>).

A contradiction between chs. 9 and 10 has often been felt. This is because St. Paul in ch. 9 is looking at only one side, viz. God's power to shut out or reject. But we must remember that he is arguing about Isaac, not Ishmael; Jacob, not Esau. It is the same with his reference to Pharaoh (9<sup>17</sup>). He is writing as a Jew, and his purpose in mentioning Pharaoh is to show the sweep of God's power, not the limitations of Pharaoh's freedom. Otherwise, he would doubtless have written in accordance with the general principle which we find in ch. 1: 'God gave them up' (vv. 24, 26; cf. also Ac 13<sup>46</sup>, 'we turn to the Gentiles,' 18<sup>6</sup>). Two analogies will illustrate St. Paul's thought: that of a disease, in which morbid conditions and acts, if persisted in, become hopeless; and that of family life, wherein conditions are laid down by a father to fulfil his desire of mutual love—if the son refuses to accept these conditions, he is rejected. These are not analogies simply; they show the working of the same universal law. St. Paul's view of freedom is not atomic. Are we free at any given moment? No, we are conditioned by our past, and by our environment. To St. Paul, the past can be made up for; and the environment is one of love. Hence, St. Paul's conclusion: mercy is the supreme law. All are 'shut up' unto disobedience, in order to come under the scope of mercy; i.e. all are allowed to suffer the inevitable results, both of ignorance and of rejection, so that God's mercy may have its way with them (Ro 11<sup>32</sup>).

If, however, there were any inclination to press ch. 9 as identifying St. Paul with a specific speculative opinion, it would be enough to point out that his whole attitude, to both Jews and Gentiles, belies it. Practice even went beyond theory: men might be 'given up'; but this did not prevent a single appeal to them. If St. Paul turned to the Gentiles in one town, he would go straight to the synagogue in the next. Thus the two questions, though apparently unrelated in St. Paul's mind, really point to the same general view. The spiritual, like the natural, world rests on certain sequences: if A takes place, then B follows. We are responsible for choosing or not choosing A, and so for the consequent presence or absence of B. The only modifications are that (a), if we may judge from the practice of St. Paul and of all early Christian evangelists, we are never justified in acting as if the consequences of evil were finally fixed; and (b) even when the time for choice seems to have gone by, and man, racially or individually, is dead in trespasses and sins, the atoning death of Christ provides means for another appeal to the will (see art. ATONEMENT). In reality, therefore, freedom and necessity are not exclusive states. If psychology, in common with all observation, would point out that choice is never unconditioned, religious insight shows that it is never to be treated as non-existent.

(3) Relation of redeemed soul to God's indwelling and inworking.—The third form of the question of freedom arises when St. Paul is analyzing the distinctively Christian experience. Here also puzzling antinomies are met with. The Christian is in Christ, saved; he shows the fruit of the Spirit; all things are his. Yet he must watch and pray, and 'buffet his body' (1 Co 9<sup>27</sup>): his salvation is not complete; it needs working out. Each Epistle ends with practical exhortations, often quite elementary. Here St. Paul takes refuge in what seems a contradiction in terms: 'work out your own salvation . . . for it is God that worketh in you' (Ph 2<sup>1</sup>). The meaning here is, however, 'you must no longer be dependent on me; you must live your life yourselves as Christians; and you need not be apprehensive; for it is God that worketh in you.' The exact question of the relation of the human to the Divine will is not raised here (see art. WILL); but a conception is implied which is of the first importance. When a man is freed, i.e. made a son instead of a slave, he is not simply transferred to a new kind of obedience; he is entered by a new spirit; his freedom is the freedom of the Father Himself; he suffers no cancelling of personality; nor is he really subjected again to law in any full sense; he attains the only freedom which is complete. But this is obviously not freedom of choice; nor can God's freedom be so described: it is rather freedom of unimpeded activity; not self-determination, but self-manifestation (see art. GOD, UNION WITH GOD).

(4) What actions is a Christian at liberty to perform?—The fourth form is practical and ethical, raised by a community which, newly rescued from the licence of heathenism, recognizes the need of laws for its guidance as well as of guidance for its attitude to law. This was particularly necessary for a community of Gentile converts, at once containing a Jewish leaven which held to the whole body of Mosaic restrictions (cf. the discussions in the Aboda Zara), and, apart from this, liable to various puzzles, e.g. about food which, offered for sale in heathen markets, had been contaminated by connexion with idolatry. On such points 'strong' and 'weak' brethren would easily differ. 'We are free from the Jewish Law; but how far does that freedom take us?' St. Paul is unhesitating; he does not even refer to the Jerusalem Decree (Ac 15<sup>2</sup>); he replies: 'all things are lawful; freedom is absolute; but not all things are expedient; and the inexpedient must be avoided' (1 Co 6<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>). Was this a back-stairs way for the return of law? Not in reality. The contrast is expressed later in 'all things do not build up' (v. 23). There is for the Christian no body of Jewish regulations; but the Christian is not therefore left to do as he likes. That would, in the end, involve falling under the old tyranny of desire and passion. He gained his freedom from law by coming into the family of God.

The new relation to God means a new relation to men. His freedom is that of a member of a free society. Obviously this means that he will always act in full recognition of his fellow-members. To deny their claims would be to deny his own existence. It would destroy freedom and everything else. He can no more do that which will hinder his brother's life than he can take the limbs of Christ and join them to a harlot. But is not this, then, after all, simply exchanging one law for another? Yes; the difference is that under the old Law there could be no acquiescence, and hence there was always a stimulus to disobedience and sin. The essence of the new Law is that the Christian sees in it the expression of the life that he has chosen. It becomes once more the embodiment of the real Torah ('law,' properly and by derivation 'instruction') as we meet it, e.g., in Ps 119, the actual out-working in detail of the experience of the grace of God in the heart.

4. Other NT books.—The remaining NT writings call for little notice. The well-known passage in St. James (1<sup>25</sup>) speaks of the law of freedom into which the doer of the word looks, as opposed to the careless glance at the reflexion of himself in a mirror, as it were, which is cast by the man who is only a hearer. There is nothing except propinquity to suggest that St. James is here referring to what a few verses later he calls the royal law: 'thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (2<sup>8</sup>); and he says nothing further in explanation of a phrase which would have aptly summarized St. Paul's argument. But a metaphor which he had just used (1<sup>18</sup>), though with no direct reference to freedom, may be referred to at the close of this article, as summing up one aspect of NT teaching: 'of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth.' The paragraph begins with a call to resist temptation; it goes on to show the inevitable results of attending to the suggestions of evil; it ends with the assertion that God brought us forth to be first-fruits, as it were, of His own creation—that is, around man's freedom of choice lies God's purpose of blessing and salvation; and we complete the NT view if we add that the fulfilment of this purpose means a freedom which is no more of choice but of absolute oneness with the great orbital movement of God's love.

5. Apostolic Fathers.—These two views—of St. Paul and St. James—are implied, sometimes more, sometimes less clearly, in the Apostolic Fathers. But they are only implied; and in general, we find the two opposite convictions, of man's choice and God's omnipotence, held with hardly a suspicion that they might be opposed. Here, as elsewhere, the sub-Apostolic Age is far nearer to the OT, or to the early chapters of Acts, than to the Pauline and Johannine writings. In 1 Clem. the Corinthians are said to have conflict for all the brotherhood, that the number of God's elect might be saved (2). We are not justified through ourselves, but through faith (32). None can be found in love, save those to whom God shall vouchsafe it (50). A similar paradox is found in Ignatius, Ep. ad Ephes. 8: 'let none deceive you, as indeed ye are not deceived, seeing ye belong wholly to God.' Ignatius himself dies of his own free-will (ἐκὼν), yet as a freedman (ἀπελευθερος) of Christ; and he will rise free in Him (ad Rom. 4). So in the Ep. Barn.: 'Before faith, the heart is given up to evil' (16); and even now, accurate knowledge of salvation is necessary lest the Evil One should enter and fling us away from our life (2).

It has often been pointed out that friendship occupies an apparently much smaller place in the NT than in the OT or than in the writings of pagan antiquity. But this is only a superficial view. The name may not be conspicuous, but the reality is there. There are some who hesitate to speak of the relationship of Jesus to the Twelve and to the wider circle of disciples which included the household at Bethany, the goodman of Jerusalem at whose house the Last Supper was eaten, and the women who so affectionately ministered to the Master, as one of friendship. To do this is to deny the humanity of Jesus—a loss that nothing can compensate. That there were elements in this relationship that transcended friendship as ordinarily conceived and experienced all will admit; but friendship as we know it was none the less there, and Jesus was not only giver but receiver. When, for example, Martha was feverishly busy with domestic cares, Mary was with Jesus, not saying much perhaps, nor even listening in that hour to parable or precept, but ministering to Him the 'one thing needful'—the quiet, loving, sympathetic response to One who eased a heavy spirit to her as He could not do to His uncomprehending apostles.

When we pass from the Gospels to the passages enumerated at the beginning of this article there are only two that need even a brief comment. The 'friends' at Sidon whom St. Paul was permitted to visit probably mean Christians in that city; the more usual term would be 'brethren' (ἀδελφοί). In 3 Jn 1<sup>4</sup> the word may have the same force, but there is probably behind it an allusion to a more intimate and personal relationship. But 'friends' (οἱ φίλοι) did not become a technical name for Christians in these early days. As Harnack puts it (Mission and Expansion of Christianity, 1908, i. 421), 'the term οἱ φίλοι did not gain currency in the catholic church owing to the fact that οἱ ἀδελφοί was preferred as being still more inward and warm.' The Gnostics of the 2nd cent., on the other hand, were more addicted to its use, and Valentinus wrote a homily 'On Friends,' while Epiphanius, the son of Carpoerates, founded a guild of friends on the Pythagorean model. Among the first generation of Christians the glow of love was cast over all the old relationships of life, and family and friendly associations alike were sublimated in the sense of belonging to the household of God. The bond that held the soul to Christ held also all who were thus bound; and that which had hitherto been called friendship was so enriched and quickened that the old term was felt to be inadequate for its newly reinforced content. Thus instead of 'friends' and 'friendship' we read much of 'brothers' and 'fellowship' (κοινωνία).

As has been said, the reality was there—the kinship of spirit, the association in service, the giving and taking, the mutual self-sacrifice, the oneness of aim and purpose, the reciprocal opening of the heart—all that we associate with true friendship. The greatest of that generation might indeed have said of himself, as Myers has said of him in his St. Paul:

'Paul has no honour and no friend but Christ,' and that:

'Lone on the land and homeless on the water
Pass I in patience till the work be done.'

But he would be quick to add:

'Yet not in solitude if Christ anear me
Waketh him workers for the great employ,
Oh not in solitude, if souls that hear me
Catch from my joyance the surprise of joy.
Hearts I have won of sister or of brother
Quick on the earth or hidden in the sod,
Lo every heart awaiteth me, another Friend in the blameless family of God.'

We have only to think of the travelling comrades of the Apostle—of Barnabas and Silas, of Timothy and Mark, of Luke and Titus, of Priscilla and Aquila—to realize that, so far from being friendless, he enjoyed the richest resources of that relationship that were to be had in that age. So far as we know, he never laboured alone, except in Athens. In his letters he nearly always associates with himself one or more of his colleagues as joint authors, and those who have been named above were the ablest Christian thinkers and workers of the time. And when he speaks of others, like Urban, Epaphroditus, Clement, and Philemon, as his fellow-workers, or, like Andronicus, Junias, and Aristarchus, as his fellow-prisoners, or, like Archippus, as his fellow-soldiers, it would be very puerile criticism to say that because he does not term them technically his friends there was no friendship between him and them. In the vicissitudes of travel, in the new campaigns that were undertaken, in the different problems that each province and city presented, in the failures and successes that attended his mission, there must have been that close-knit sympathy and entire fellowship that mark the intercourse of friends. Nor can we hesitate to apply the word to the intimacy that existed between the Apostle and those who became responsible for the work of Christ and the guidance of the Church in every place where it was established. Wherever he worked there were those who delighted to be known as the friends of St. Paul and whom he was well pleased to call his friends.

In the churches themselves the term 'brethren' would be held to include all that was involved in friendship. Despite the shadows of the Apostolic Age and the imperfections of a nascent infantile Christianity, it is not hard to discern the signs of true friendship. The records of the 2nd cent. continue the tale, and the affectionate loyalty of Christians to each other in times of peril deeply impressed their enemies and persecutors. In some cases, as in earlier days with Peter and John, Andrew and Philip, the friendship preceded and was sanctified by the Christian tie, in others it grew out of that bond.

FRUIT.—1. The word in its literal sense.—Before considering the use of this term in spiritual metaphor it will be convenient to enumerate those passages in the apostolic writings where it is employed in its natural sense. (a) General.—These are Ja 5<sup>7-18</sup> (in illustration of patience and prayer), Ac 14<sup>17</sup> (God's gift of rain and fruitful seasons), 1 Co 9<sup>7</sup> (in support of the apostles' right to sustenance; cf. 2 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>), Rev 18<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>—passages which, like some of the others, are on the borderland between the literal and the symbolic. Jude<sup>12</sup> compares the 'ungodly' of the day with 'trees in late autumn when the fruit is past.' In Ac 2<sup>30</sup> the word is used in its physiological sense.

(b) Specific.—References to specific fruits are not numerous. Ja 3<sup>12</sup> asks whether a fig-tree can yield olives or a vine figs. St. Paul in Ro 11<sup>17</sup> uses the curious idea of grafting a wild olive on to a good olive tree ('contrary to nature,' v. 17) to illustrate the participation of the Gentiles in the promises made to Israel. Rev 11<sup>4</sup> identifies the 'two witnesses' (perhaps St. Peter and St. Paul) with the 'two olive trees' of Zec 4; and Rev 6<sup>13</sup> in its mention of a fig-tree casting her unripe figs in the spring tempests recalls Is 34<sup>4</sup>. Rev 14<sup>1-20</sup> is a vision of the harvest and vintage of the earth when the grain and the grapes are fully ripe. St. Paul's use of the grain of wheat in the great Resurrection argument of 1 Co 15 is familiar to all, and is an echo of Christ's word in Jn 12-4<sup>25</sup>.

2. The term in spiritual metaphor.—We may begin our study of the spiritual lessons inculcated under the image of fruit with another passage from Corinthians. In 1 Co 3<sup>9</sup> the Apostle reminds his readers that they are 'God's husbandry,' i.e. His 'tilth' or 'tilled land.' This recalls the Parable of the Vineyard spoken by Jesus (Mt 21, Lk 20); Christian churches and lives are fields and gardens from which the owner who has spent love and time and care over them may reasonably expect good results, 'fruit unto God' (Ro 7<sup>4</sup>). And those too who are His overseers, those who plant and water, naturally look for produce and the reward of their toil. Thus the Apostle hopes, as he looks forward to his visit to Rome, that he may 'have some fruit among' the people of that city as he had in Corinth and Ephesus (Ro 1<sup>13</sup>). Two passages in Phil. may be glanced at here: (a) the difficult reference in 1-7, which probably means that, though death would be gain, yet if continuance in living means fruitful labour ('fruit of work' = fruit which follows and issues from toil), St. Paul is quite ready to waive his own preference; (b) 4<sup>17</sup>, where, thanking the Philippians for their kindly gift, he says he welcomes it not so much for himself as on their behalf; it is a token that they are not unfruitful in love, and it will, like all such evidences of Christian thought and ministry, enrich the givers as much as the recipient (cf. 2 Co 9<sup>6</sup>).

(1) The way is now clear for a brief survey of the main topic—the fruits of the new life in Christ Jesus. The 'fruit of the light,' says St. Paul (Eph 5<sup>9</sup>), 'is in all goodness and righteousness and truth,' and the more familiar passage in Gal 5-2 speaks of the 'fruit of the Spirit' as 'love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control.' Trees are known by their fruit, and the existence of these virtues in an individual or a community are the surest, if not the sole, signs that the life is rooted with Christ in God, that the branches are abiding in the True Vine. It was the Apostle's greatest joy when he could congratulate a church like that at Colossæ on its share in the fruit-bearing which the gospel was accomplishing wherever it was proclaimed and accepted (Col 1<sup>6</sup>), when it bore fruit in every good work (v. 10). The fruit of the new life is regarded in Ro 6-2 as sanctification. On the other hand, St. James (3<sup>17</sup>) gives it as one of the characteristics of the 'wisdom that is from above'—which is perhaps his way of speaking of the Spirit—that it is 'full of . . . good fruits,' by which he no doubt means 'good works.' In the next verse he says that 'the fruit (i.e. the seed which bears the fruit) of righteousness is sown in peace for them that make peace.' The 'fruit of righteousness' is an OT phrase, and meets us again in Ph 1<sup>11</sup> and He 12<sup>11</sup>, where 'righteousness,' or conformity to the highest moral standard, is described as the 'peaceful fruit' of discipline patiently endured.

Returning to the locus classicus, Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, it is worth noticing that St. Paul introduces the nine virtues which he enumerates as one 'fruit.' Like the chain of graces in 2 P 1<sup>5-7</sup>, they are all linked together as though to suggest that the absence of any one means the nullity of all. We need not press too heavily the suggestion that the nine fall into three groups describing (a) the soul in relation to God; (b) its attitude to others (this is to make 'faith' = faithfulness, and though St. Paul usually thinks of faith as the basis of Christian character, he was not so rigidly systematic as not to see in it, or at least in an increase of it, a fruit of the Spirit); (c) principles of daily conduct. There is more perhaps in the antithesis between the 'works' of the flesh (v. 19) and the 'fruit' of the Spirit. Yet the dispositions enumerated show themselves in good works, though these are not expressly specified, being infinitely varied and adaptable to changing conditions. The list may be supplemented, for example, by He 13<sup>15</sup>, where 'praise' is the fruit of a thankful heart expressed by the lips, and Ro 15-8, where the generosity of the Gentile Christians towards the Judæan poor is the fruit of the spiritual blessing which St. Paul's converts had received.

(2) The unfruitful.—The other side of the picture can be briefly dismissed. Those who walk in darkness are spoken of as unfruitful (Eph 5<sup>14</sup>). 'What fruit had you then in those things of which you are ashamed?' asks St. Paul in Ro 6-1, though we might possibly translate, 'What fruit had you then?—Things (gratifications of sense) of which you are now ashamed.' In Ro 7<sup>4</sup> the Apostle describes the unregenerate life as producing fruit 'unto death,' and if we desire an enumeration of these poisonous products we shall find them in Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup> (cf. Col 3<sup>5-9</sup>). For the final harvesting we have the picture of Rev 14.

(3) The time of fruit-bearing.—It is the will of Jesus that His disciples should bear 'much fruit'; in His words on this theme (Jn 15) He does not seem to contemplate the possibility of bearing a little. It is much or none. The trouble is that churches and individuals only too often look like orchards stricken by a blight, and where a little fruit is found it is not so mellow as it might be. We need not be in too great a hurry to see the full fruit in young lives. There is a time for blossom and a time for ripe fruit, and the intervening stage is not attractive though it is necessary. There is a time for the blade and a time for the full corn in the ear, but before we get this harvest there is the period of the green and unsatisfying ear. We sometimes speak of a harvest of souls following on a series of revival or mission services; but it is only the blade pushing up into the light—the harvest is still far distant.

A day now and again with a fruit-grower on his farm will have much to teach the preacher as to natural law in the spiritual world. He will learn amongst other things how vital is the process of pruning, and how no stroke is made at random. He will learn how to guard the nascent life against frosts and chills, its need of nutriment from soil and sun and rain. The wonderful exploits of the Californian fruit-grower, Luther Burbank, will open up a whole universe of possibilities; the story of what irrigation and scientific culture have done in Australia will show how deserts may become orchards. And as palm trees are said to bear their heaviest clusters in old age, the life that abides in Christ may be confident of escaping the reproach of crabbed and withered senility—it shall bring forth fruit in old age. But it need not wait for old age—it shall be like the tree of life that bears its fruit every month—fruit that is for the delectation and the healing of the world.

A. J. GRIEVE.
FULNESS.—The word to be considered is pleroma (πλήρωμα). Nouns of the -μα termination properly denote the result of the action signified by the cognate verb; and therefore πλήρωμα (from πληρουν = 'to fill,' or, metaphorically, 'to fulfil') primarily means that which possesses its full content, an entire set or series, a completed whole regarded in its relation to its component parts, or in contrast with a previous deficiency of any of these parts. The full crew of a ship or 'strength' of a regiment is a pleroma; the soul becomes a 'pleroma of virtues by means of those three excellent things, nature, learning, and practice' (Philo, de Præmiis et Pœnis, 11).

This is the sense in Gal 4<sup>4</sup>: 'when the fulness of the time came,' i.e. when the entire measure of the appointed period had been filled up by the lapse of successive ages. So the 'fulness' of the Jews (Ro 11<sup>4</sup>) and of the Gentiles (Ro 11<sup>5</sup>) is the full complement, the entire number contemplated (however determined—by predestination or otherwise). Lightfoot in his classical discussion of the word (see Literature) denies any other than this passive sense; but his argument is far from convincing. When we think of a pitcherful of water, we may regard the water as a completed entity, which by successive additions has reached its full quantity and become a pleroma of water; but much more naturally we think of it as that which fills the pitcher, and is its pleroma. This active sense must be accepted in Mt 9<sup>10</sup>, Mk 2<sup>1</sup>, where τὸ πλήρωμα can only mean the patch that fills the hole in the worn-out garment; in Mk 8<sup>20</sup>, where σπυρίδων πληρώματα inevitably means 'basketfuls'; in 1 Co 10<sup>6</sup>, where 'the earth and the pleroma thereof' cannot be made to signify anything else than 'the earth and all that it contains,' the abundance that fills it. So also in Ro 13<sup>10</sup>, 'love is the pleroma of the law,' the context ('he that loveth his neighbour has fulfilled the law') shows that pleroma is not to be taken passively, as the law in its completeness; but actively, as that which fills up the whole measure of the law's demands.

The use of the word as a theological term is confined in the NT to those closely related writings, Colossians, Ephesians, and the Fourth Gospel. In Col 1<sup>19</sup> it is predicated of Christ that 'it pleased the Father that in him the whole pleroma should dwell,' and in 2<sup>9</sup>, with greater precision of statement, 'in him dwelleth the whole pleroma of the Godhead in a bodily fashion' (cf. Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). Here the meaning of the word is beyond dispute. All that God is in Christ; the organic whole of Divine attributes and powers that constitute Deity (θεότης) dwells permanently in Him.

The term with such an application is a startling novelty in NT phraseology, and is an instructive example of the hospitality of early Christian thought, of the promptitude with which it appropriated from its complex intellectual and religious environment such categories as it could convert to its own use. Since the connotation of the word is assumed to be familiar to the Apostle's readers, it is evident that it must have played an important part in the speculations of the Colossian heresy, as it did also in the Hermetic theology (R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, 1904, p. 26). In the developed Gnostic systems of the 2nd cent., and especially in the scheme of Valentinus, the conception of the Pleroma became increasingly prominent, as signifying the totality of the Divine emanations. But for a full account of the Gnostic usage, the reader is referred to Lightfoot's exhaustive note (see Literature) or, in briefer compass, to the art. 'Pleroma' in HDB and 'Fullness' in DCG.

The problem with which religious thought was wrestling, as for centuries it had done and was still to do, was how to relate the transcendent God to the existent universe, to effect a transition from eternal spirit to the material or phenomenal, from the absolutely good to the imperfect and evil. And in Colossæ the solution was sought not in a Gnostic series of emanations, but, on the lines of Judaistic speculation, in a hierarchy of 'principalities,' 'dominions,' and 'powers,' the στοιχεῖα who ruled the physical elements and the lower world, among whom the Divine Pleroma was, as it were, distributed, and to whose generally hostile rule men were continually subject. Against this doctrine, without denying the existence and activity of such beings, St. Paul lifts up his magnificent truth of the 'Cosmic Christ' and his vision of a 'Christianized universe.' Christ is not one of a series of mediators; in Him the whole Pleroma dwells. He is not only Head of the Church, but Head over all things, delivering His people from bondage to the hostile elements, and translating them into His own Kingdom, that new cosmic order in which God will finally reconcile all things unto Himself.

In Ephesians the emphasis is not so much upon Christ's possession of the Divine Pleroma as upon His communication of it to the Church. The Church is His Body, 'the pleroma of him that filleth all in all' (1<sup>23</sup>; for exegetical details, see Armitage Robinson in loc.). Whether πλήρωμα be understood in an active sense (the Church is Christ's complement, that by which He is completed as the head is by the body) or in a passive sense (the Church is Christ's fulness, because His fulness is imparted to it and dwells in it), the result is practically the same—the one sense implies the other. The Church is the living receptacle and instrument of all that is in Christ, all grace and truth, all purpose and power. But the ideal character thus claimed for the Church is yet to be achieved in the sphere of human aspiration and effort. Its rich diversity of gifts and ministries is bestowed for this very end, that 'we all' may be brought to that unity and many-sided completeness of spiritual life in which we shall collectively form a 'perfect man,' attaining thus to the 'measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (4<sup>13</sup>). And, as in the Apostle's thought the fulness of the Godhead descends through the One Mediator to the Church, so again it ascends through Him to the first creative source. The end of all prayer and of all attainment is 'that we may be filled unto all the fulness of God' (3<sup>19</sup>). The Church, redeemed humanity in its vital spiritual unity, grown at last to a 'perfect man,' to the 'fulness of Christ,' which is the 'fulness of God'; God thus possessing in man the fulfilment of His eternal purpose, His perfect image, the consummate organ of His Spirit—even this is possible to Him who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think (3<sup>20</sup>).

GAIUS (Γάιος = Caius, a Latin name, very common as a Roman prænomen).—1. In 1 Co 1<sup>14</sup>, a member of the Church of Corinth, baptized by St. Paul, who points out that in his case, as in the case of Crispus and in that of 'the household of Stephanas,' he thus deviated from his usual practice. Crispus was 'the ruler of the synagogue' (Ac 18<sup>8</sup>), and Gaius was presumably also a convert of some importance.

2. In Ro 16<sup>23</sup>, a member of the Church of Corinth, whom St. Paul in the postscript to Romans calls his 'host' and the host of 'the whole church,' and whose salutations are sent to the readers of the letter. He was evidently a man of position and means (the greeting from him immediately precedes that from Erastus, 'the treasurer of the city'), whether his hospitality took the form of keeping open house for Christians and Christian visitors like the Apostle at Corinth or of allowing the Christians to meet for common worship and edification under his roof.

Everything points to the identification of 1 and 2. The same Gaius who was converted and baptized on St. Paul's first visit to Corinth entertained him on his second visit. Now it is perhaps easier to believe that this Corinthian would have friends, whom he would wish to salute, at Ephesus rather than at Rome, and these salutations in Ro 16<sup>23</sup> are thought by some scholars to point to an Ephesian destination of the passage. But as Lightfoot remarks, in the Apostolic Church personal acquaintance was not necessary to create Christian sympathy (Biblical Essays, 1893, p. 305).

3. In Ac 19<sup>24</sup>, a companion of St. Paul, who with Aristarchus was seized at Ephesus. They are described as 'men of Macedonia' (Μακεδόνας), there being very little support for another reading, 'a man of Macedonia,' referring to Aristarchus only.

4. In Ac 20<sup>4</sup>, a companion of St. Paul, who accompanied him from Greece to Asia Minor. He is described as 'of Derbe' (Δερβαιοί), possibly intentionally to distinguish him from 3.

Attempts have been made to identify 3 and 4. It is natural to do so, as the passages stand so close together. Emendations of the text have been suggested by which 'of Derbe' is taken with 'Timothy,' but these are purely conjectural, and Timothy was apparently a Lystran (Ac 16<sup>1-2</sup>). See W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 280.

5. In 3 Jn<sup>1</sup>, the person to whom 3 John is addressed. He is described as 'the beloved' (ὁ ἀγαπητός), and is commended for his hospitality (v.<sup>5</sup>). Nothing is known of this Gaius, and there is no reason to suppose him to have been any one of those of the same name associated with St. Paul.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

GALATIA (Γαλατία).—Galatia was the name given by Greek-speaking peoples to that part of the central plateau of Asia Minor which was occupied by Celtic tribes from the 3rd cent. B.C. onwards. It corresponded to the Roman Gallugræcia, or land of the Gallogræci (= Ἑλληνογαλάται [Diodorus, v. xxxii. 5]), who were so named in distinction from the Galli of Western Europe. Manlius in Livy (xxxviii. 17) professes to despise them—'Hi jam degenerant sunt: mixti, et Gallogræci vere, quod appellantis.'

About 280 B.C., the barbarians who had been menacing Italy for a century began to move eastward. A great Celtic wave swept over Macedonia and Thessaly. Under the leadership of Leonorios and Lutarios a body of 20,000 invaders—half of them fighting men, the rest women and children—crossed into Asia at the invitation of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who desired their help in his struggle with his brother (Livy, xxxviii. 16). His success, however, proved costly both to himself and to his neighbours, for his new barbaric allies established themselves as a robber-State and became the scourge of Asia Minor, exacting tribute from all the rulers north and west of Taurus, some of whom were fain to purchase exemption from their degradations by employing them as mercenary soldiers.

Attalus I. of Pergamos (241-197) was the first to check the fierce barbarians. Defeating them in a series of battles, which are commemorated in the famous Pergamene sculptures, he compelled them to form a permanent settlement with definite boundaries in north-eastern Phrygia. The Galatian country, an irregular rectangle 200 miles long from E. to W. and about 100 miles wide, became 'in language and manners a Celtic island amidst the waves of eastern peoples, and remained so in internal organization even under the empire' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire<sup>2</sup>, 1909, i. 338).

Like Caesar's Gaul, the country was divided into three parts, formed by the rivers Halys and Sangarius. The Tectosages settled round Ancyra, the Tolistobogii round Pessinus, and the Trocmi round Tavium. According to Strabo (XII. v. 1), the three tribes 'spoke the same language and in no respect differed from one another. Each of them was divided into four cantons called tetrarchies, each of which had its own tetrarch [or chief], its judge, and its general. . . . The Council of the twelve tetrarchies consisted of 300 men who assembled at a place called the Drynemetum.'

The term 'Galatians,' which at first denoted only the Gaulish invaders, was in course of time extended to their Phrygian subjects, and the 'Galatian' slaves who were sold in the ancient markets had really no Celtic blood in their veins. For two centuries the proud conquerors formed a comparatively small ruling caste in the country, like the Normans among the Saxons of England. As a military aristocracy, whose only trade was war, they left agriculture, commerce, and all the peaceful crafts to the Phrygian natives. Averse to the life of towns and cities, the chieftains established themselves in hill-forts (φρουρία [Strabo, XII. v. 2]), where they kept up a barbaric state, surrounded by retainers who shared with them the vast wealth they had acquired by their many conquests. For siding with Antiochus the Great in his war with Rome, and frequently breaking their promise to refrain from raiding the lands of their neighbours, the Galatians ultimately brought on themselves a severe castigation at the hands of Cn. Manlius Vulso in 189 B.C. (Livy, xxxviii. 12-27, Polyb. xxii. 16-22). About 160 B.C. they obtained a large accession of territory in Lycaonia, including the towns of Iconium and Lystra. Thereafter they came under the influence of the kings of Pontus, but Mithridates the Great (120-63 B.C.), doubting their loyalty, ordered a massacre of all their chiefs, and this savage and stupid act at once drove the whole nation over to the Roman side. Their new alliance proved greatly to their advantage, and at the settlement of the affairs of Asia Minor by Pompey in 64 B.C., Galatia was made a Roman client-State. Three chiefs (tetrarchs) were appointed, one for each tribe, of whom the ablest and most ambitious, Deiotarus, the friend of Cicero (ad Fam. viii. 10, ix. 12, xv. 1, 2, 4), contrived to seize the territories of the others, and, in spite of the hostility of Julius Caesar, ultimately got himself recognized as king of all Galatia. He died in 40 B.C., and four years later his dominions were bestowed by Mark Antony on Amyntas, the Roman client-king of Pisidia, who had formerly been the secretary of Deiotarus. This brave and sagacious Gaul, 'whose career was in many points parallel to that of Herod in Palestine' (H. von Soden, Hist. of Early Christian Lit., Eng. tr., 1906, p. 59 f.), transferred his allegiance from Antony to Augustus after Actium, and became the chief instrument in establishing the Pax Romana in southern Asia Minor. Having overthrown Antipater the robber-chief, he added Derbe and Laranda to his dominions, but lost his life in an attempt to subdue the Homanades of Isauria. Galatia then ceased to be a sovereign State, and was incorporated in the Roman Empire (in 25 B.C.).

Caesar (Bell. Gall. vi. 16) says of the Western Gauls, 'Natio est omnis Gallorum admodum dedita religionibus.' But the faith which the invaders of Asia brought with them did not live long in the new environment. The unwarlike Phrygians whom they subdued were in one respect inflexible, and, as in so many instances, 'victi victoribus leges dederunt.' If the Phrygian religion, with its frenzy of devotion, its weird music, its orgiastic dances, its sensuous rites, made a profound impression even upon the cultured Greeks, one need not wonder that the simple Gallic barbarians were fascinated by the cult of Cybele, and that their chiefs were soon found by the side of the native rulers in the great temple of Pessinus. There 'the priests were a sort of sovereigns and derived a large revenue from their office' (Strabo, XII. v. 3). When the old warlike spirit of the Gauls languished, as it naturally did after the establishment of a peaceful provincial government, the two races gradually approximated in other things than religion, but a long time was needed for their complete amalgamation. 'In spite of their sojourn of several hundred years in Asia Minor, a deep gulf still separated these Occidentals from the Asiatics' (Mommson, op. cit. i. 338). Even in the 4th cent. the far-travelled Jerome found at Ancyra, alongside of Greek, a Celtic dialect differing little from what he had heard in Trèves (Preface to Commentary on Galatians).

The province Galatia included the greater part of the wide territory once ruled by Amyntas, viz. Galatia proper (the country of the three Galatian tribes), part of Phrygia (including Antioch and Iconium), Pisidia, Isauria, and part of Lycaonia (with Lystra and Derbe). For nearly a century Galatia was the eastern frontier province, and every fresh annexation to it marked the progress of the Empire in that direction.

Paphlagonia was added in 5 B.C., Amasia and Gazelonitis in 2 B.C., Komana Pontica (forming with Amasia the district of Pontus Galaticus [Ptolemy, v. vi. 3]) in A.D. 34, and Pontus Polemoniacus (the kingdom of Polemon II. [Ptolemy, v. vi. 4]) in A.D. 63. The south-eastern part of the province was somewhat contracted in A.D. 41 by the gift of a slice of Lycaonia, including Laranda, to Antiochus of Commagene (called after him Lycaonia Antiochiana), so that Derbe became the frontier town and customs' station. Ptolemy defines the province in his Geog. v. 4, and Pliny in his HN v. 146, 147.

Antioch and Lystra (qq.v.) were made Roman colonies by Augustus; Iconium and Derbe (qq.v.) were remodelled in Roman style by Claudius, and named Claud-Iconium and Claudio-Derbe. In these cities, planted in the most civilized and progressive part of central Asia Minor—the region traversed by the great route of traffic and intercourse between Ephesus and Syrian Antioch—many Greeks, Romans, and Jews swelled the native Phrygian and Lycaonian populace.

The meaning of 'Galatia' is one of the questiones vexatae of NT exegesis. Are 'the churches of Galatia' (Gal 1-; cf. 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>) to be sought in the comparatively small district occupied by the Gauls, about Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium, or in the great Roman province of Galatia, which included Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe? In the absence of definite information, we have to make probability our guide, and to the present writer the balance of evidence appears to favour the South Galatian hypothesis. The chief difficulty is created by the simultaneous use of a Roman and a non-Roman nomenclature. It was the policy of the Imperial government to stamp an artificial unity upon all the diverse parts of a province, often with but little regard to historical traditions and local sentiments. The old territorial designations were of course still popularly used, but among all who looked at things from the Imperial standpoint—e.g. the Roman governor, the coloni of cities founded by the Romans, the incolae of semi-Roman towns, and the Roman historians—such terms as Galatia and Galatæ, Asia and Asiani, Africa and Afri, denoted the province and the people of the province.

Tacitus (Hist. ii. 9) mentions 'Galatiam ac Pamphyliam provincias'; in Ann. xiii. 35 he says, 'et habiti per Galatiam Cappadociamque dilectus'; and in Ann. xv. 6 he has 'Galatarum Cappadocumque auxilia.' An Iconian inscription to an Imperial officer (CIG 3991) designates his administrative district Ταλατική ἐπαρχία, or 'Galatic province'. Pliny frequently uses 'Galatia' as designating the province (HN v. 27, 95, etc.). For other instances see T. Zahn, Introd. to the NT, 1909, i. 184 f.

The crucial question is whether St. Paul assumed the Imperial standpoint and wrote like a Roman. Zahn (op. cit. i. 175) holds that 'he never uses any but the provincial name for districts under Roman rule, and never employs territorial names which are not also names of Roman provinces.' The Apostle's employment of the terms Achaia, Macedonia, Dalmatia, Judæa, Arabia, Syria, and Cilicia is regarded as consistently Imperial. Of the divisions of Asia Minor he names only Asia and Galatia, and 'it is unlikely that he meant by these anything else than the Roman provinces so called, for the very reason that he mentions no districts of Asia Minor whose names do not at the same time denote such provinces' (op. cit. i. 186). Ramsay similarly maintains that St. Paul always thinks and speaks with his eye on the Roman divisions of the Empire, i.e. the Provinces, in accordance with his station as a Roman citizen and with his invariable and oft-announced principle of accepting and obeying the existing government. This view is contested by the South Galatian theorists. Mommson, e.g., held that 'it is inadmissible to take the "Galatians" of Paul in anything except the distinct and narrower sense of the term' (quoted in Moffatt, LNT, p. 96), and P. W. Schmiedel contends that 'it is quite unpermissible to say of Paul that he invariably confined himself to the official usage' (EBi ii. 1604). Both the old, or North Galatian, hypothesis and the new, or South Galatian, are championed by an apparently equal number of distinguished scholars.*

It is certain that St. Paul's first mission north of Taurus was conducted in the Greek-speaking cities of Antioch and Iconium (which were Phrygian), * Among the North Galatian theorists are Lightfoot, Jowett, H. J. Holtzmann, Wendt, Godet, Blass, Holsten, Lipsius, Sieffert, Zockler, Schürer, von Dobschütz, Jülicher, Bousset, Salmon, Gilbert, Findlay, Chase, Moffatt, Steinmann; among the South Galatians are Perrot (who first popularized the theory in his de Galatia Provincia Romana, 1867), Renan, Hausrath, Pfeleiderer, Weissäcker, O. Holtzmann, von Soden, J. Weiss, Clemens, Belser, Gifford, Bartlet, Bacon, Askwith, Rendall, Weber.

Lystra and Derbe (which were Lycaonian)—all in the Provincia Galatia, but far from Galatia proper. The historian gives a graphic account of the founding of churches in these four cities (Ac 13<sup>14-14</sup>), and from these churches St. Paul got some of his fellow-workers (16<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>). What more natural, ask the South Galatian theorists, than that this much-frequented district should become the storm-centre of a Judaistic controversy, and that the Apostle should write the most militant and impassioned of all his letters in defence of the spiritual liberty of the converts of his pioneer mission? On the North Galatian theory, the founding of churches, say in Pessinus, Ancyra, and Tivium, and their subsequent development, had much more to do with the extension and triumph of apostolic Christianity among the Gentiles—which was St. Luke's theme—than the planting of the South Galatian churches, and the historian who manifests no interest in North Galatia stands convicted of shifting the centre of gravity to the wrong place. It is difficult, however, to believe that the mission in which the Apostle was welcomed 'as an angel from heaven, as Christ Jesus' (Gal 4<sup>14</sup>), and the thrilling experiences which must have filled his mind and heart at the moment when he joined St. Luke in Troas (Ac 16<sup>11</sup>), are alluded to in no more than a single ambiguous sentence (16<sup>6</sup>), which Ramsay characterizes as 'perhaps the most difficult (certainly the most disputed) passage' in the whole of Acts (Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 74 ff.).

The North Galatian school accounts for the historian's neglect of Galatia proper, and for the curtness of his narrative at this vital point (Ac 16<sup>7-8</sup>), by his desire 'to get Paul across to Europe' (Mollatt, LNT, p. 94); but another explanation seems more natural.

'I would rather say that the writer passed on rapidly, because the journey itself was direct, and uninterrupted by any important incident such as the supposed preaching and founding of churches in Northern Galatia. St. Paul's mission to Europe was, according to the indications given in the narrative, the divinely appointed purpose of the whole journey. Twice he is forbidden to turn aside from the direct route between Antioch and Troas. "To speak the word in Asia," "to go into Bithynia," would each have been a cause of much delay; and in each case the Apostle found himself constrained by the Spirit's guidance to go straight forward on his appointed way. One of these Divine interpositions occurred before, and one after the supposed digression into Northern Galatia. Do they not make an intermediate sojourn in that district, which must have been of long duration, and of which the writer gives no hint whatever, quite inconceivable?' (E. H. Gifford, in Expositor, 4th ser., x. [1894] 15).

Similarly Renan (Saint Paul, 1869, p. 128): 'The apostolic group thus made almost at one stretch a journey of more than one hundred leagues, across a little-known country, which, from an absence of Roman colonies and Jewish synagogues, did not offer them any of the facilities which they had met with up to that time.'

It is sometimes confidently asserted that the South Galatian theory 'is shipwrecked on the rock of Greek grammar' (F. H. Chase, in Expositor, 4th ser., viii. [1893] 411, ix. [1894] 342). On the second missionary tour St. Paul and Silas 'went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia (την Φρυγιαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν), having been forbidden of the Holy Ghost to speak the word in Asia' (Ac 16<sup>6</sup>), and in the third tour 'they went through the region of Galatia and Phrygia (την Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγιαν) in order, establishing all the churches' (18<sup>3</sup>). Ramsay interprets both the Greek phrases as 'the Phrygo-Galatian country,' i.e. the regio which is ethnically Phrygian and politically Galatian, accounting for the variation by the fact that in the one instance the district was traversed from west to east, and in the other from east to west. He takes the phrases to denote, in part or in whole (here his exegesis wavers), the South Galatian country which St. Paul had already evangelized in his first tour. Now it must be admitted that if the modern theory, which Ramsay has so long and strenuously advocated, were bound up with this interpretation, there would be no little difficulty in accepting it. For the natural reference of the words 'they went through (διήλθον) the Phrygo-Galatic region, having been forbidden (κωλυθέντες) . . . to speak the word in Asia' is to a district east of Asia and north of Iconium and Antioch, South Galatia being now left behind. Ramsay, however, contends that κωλυθέντες is not antecedent to, but synchronous with, the verb διήλθον, and translates 'they went through the Phrygo-Galatic region forbidden . . . to speak the word in Asia.' The grammatical point is fully discussed by E. H. Askwith (The Epistle to the Gal., 1899, p. 34 ff.), who produces a number of more or less similar constructions (cf. Gifford, loc. cit. 16 ff.). ἀσπασάμενοι in Ac 25<sup>18</sup> would be the most striking parallel, but here Hort thinks that some primitive error has crept into the text. And at the best the proposed exegesis, admittedly unusual, is very precarious, while the South Galatian theory is really independent of it. Many advocates of this theory prefer the alternative offered by Gifford, who holds (loc. cit. p. 19) that in the present context 'the region of Phrygia and Galatia' can only mean 'the borderland of Phrygia and Galatia northward of Antioch, through which the travellers passed after "having been forbidden to speak the word in Asia."' This is substantially the view of Zahn (op. cit. i. 176; cf. 189 f.), who is willing to make a further concession. 'It could be taken for granted, therefore, in spite of the silence of Acts, which in 16<sup>6</sup> mentions merely a journey of the missionaries through these regions, that Paul and Silas on this occasion preached in Phrygia and a portion of North Galatia; and that the disciples . . . whom Paul met on the third missionary journey to several places of the same regions (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>) had been converted by the preaching of Paul and Silas on the second journey.' Only, as Zahn himself is the first to admit, 'everyone feels the uncertainty of these combinations.'

The present tendency of the North Galatian theorists is greatly to restrict the field of the Apostle's activity in Galatia proper. Lightfoot's assumption that he carried his mission through the whole of North Galatia is felt to be 'as gratuitous as it is embarrassing' (Schmiedel, EBi, ii. 1606). Tivium and Ancyra are now left out of account, and only 'a few churches, none of them very far apart,' are supposed to have been planted in the west of North Galatia (ib.); but the more the sphere of operations is thus limited, the more difficult does it become to believe that 'the churches of Galatia' are to be sought exclusively in this small and hypothetical mission-field, while the great and flourishing churches of South Galatia are heard of no more.

The following points, though severally indecisive, all favour the South Galatian theory. (1) The baneful activity of Judaizers in Galatia suggests the presence of Jews and Jewish Christians in the newly planted churches, and there is abundant evidence of the strength and prominence of the Jews in Antioch (Ac 13<sup>14-51</sup> 14<sup>19</sup>), Iconium (14<sup>1</sup>), and Lystra (16<sup>1-3</sup>; cf. 2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>), whereas even Philo's inflated list of countries where Jews were to be found in his time (Leg. ad Gaium, xxxvi.) does not include Galatia proper, and among the Jews who made the journey to Jerusalem at Pentecost there were Asians and Phrygians but apparently no Galatians (Ac 2<sup>9</sup>). (2) The writer of Acts, who in general uses ethnographic rather than political terms, avoids 'Galatia,' which would have been taken to mean Old Galatia, and twice employs the phrase 'Galatic region.' Ramsay's view is that the term 'Galatic' excludes Galatia in the narrow sense, and that 16<sup>6</sup>, in the light of contemporary usage, implies that St. Paul did not traverse North Galatia (Church in the Roman Emp., p. 81). The evidence for a definite usage, however, is scanty, 'Pontus Galaticus' (which occurs in Ptolemy and inscriptions) not being quite a parallel case; and other explanations of the phrase 'Galatic region' are certainly admissible (Moffatt, LNT, p. 93). (3) The pronoun υμᾶς in Gal 2<sup>5</sup> seems to imply that the Galatian churches existed when St. Paul was contending for the spiritual freedom of the Gentiles at the Jerusalem Council, which was held before the journey on which, according to the old theory, he preached in North Galatia. Some think that St. Paul here merely claims to have been fighting the battle of the Gentiles, or the Gentile Christians, generally; but in that case he would probably have said 'you Gentiles' (Eph 2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). (4) It is possible to make too much of the parallel between Gal 4<sup>4</sup>, 'ye received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus,' and the account of the Apostle's remarkable experience at Lystra, where the people regarded him and Barnabas as gods (Ac 14<sup>11-14</sup>). Still the coincidence, as Zahn says (op. cit., p. 180), is probably more than 'a tantalising accident.' The pagans who acclaimed the coming of Jupiter and Mercury would be likely enough, when partially Christianized, to think themselves recipients of a visit of angels. Even Lightfoot (Galatians<sup>2</sup>, 1876, p. 18) admits that here is one of the 'considerations in favour of the Roman province.' (5) The charge which the Judaizers apparently made against the self-constituted Apostle of freedom of being still a preacher of circumcision (Gal 5<sup>11</sup>) is best explained by a reference to the case of Timothy (Ac 16<sup>1-3</sup>), in which the South Galatian churches had a special interest, Timothy being a native of Lystra. (6) The repeated allusion to Barnabas (Gal 2<sup>1.3.13</sup>), who was one of the founders of the South Galatian Church, would have much less appositeness in an Epistle addressed to North Galatia, where that apostle was not personally known. It is true that he is referred to once in each of two other letters (1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>, Col 4<sup>10</sup>), but in both cases there were special reasons for the mention of his name (Zahn, op. cit., p. 179). (7) While some of St. Paul's helpers came from South Galatia (Ac 16<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>4</sup>), and while Gaius and Timothy may have been delegated by 'the churches of Galatia' (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>) to carry their offerings to the saints at Jerusalem (a somewhat doubtful inference from Ac 20<sup>4</sup>), North Galatia did not, as far as is known, provide a single person 'for the work of ministering.' (8) There is evidence that Christianity penetrated North Galatia much more slowly than South Galatia. 'Ancyra and the Bithynian city Juliopolis (which was attached to Galatia about 297) are the only Galatian bishoprics mentioned earlier than 325: they alone appear at the Ancyran Council held about 314' (Ramsay, Hist. Com. on Gal., 1899, p. 165).

The Roman character of the nomenclature in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> is rarely questioned. It is evidently the writer's purpose to enumerate all the provinces of Asia Minor, with the exception of Lycia-Pamphilia, where 'the elect' were still few (as may be inferred from Ac 13<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>25</sup>), and Cilicia, which was reckoned with Syria (15<sup>3-41</sup>). And just as he includes the Phrygian churches of the Lycus valley—Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Col 1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>)—the Church of Troas (Ac 20<sup>6-12</sup>), and the Churches of the Apocalypse (Rev 1<sup>11</sup>), in the province of 'Asia,' so he reckons the Churches founded by St. Paul in Lycania and Eastern Phrygia as belonging to the province of 'Galatia.'

In 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> the RV has 'Gaul' as a marginal alternative to 'Galatia.' Ν and C actually read Γαλλία instead of Γαλατία, and, besides, the latter word was often applied by Greek writers to European Gaul. If it could be assumed that St. Paul was able to carry out his purpose of going westward to evangelize Spain, he might be supposed to have visited Southern Gaul en route, and Crescens might afterwards have gone to this region. Eusebius (HE iii. 4), Epiphanius (Hær. li. 11), and Theodoret (in loco) certainly understand that Gaul is meant; and the early Christian inhabitants of that country naturally liked to believe that their Church had been founded by an apostolic emissary, if not by an apostle. But they had nothing better to base their belief upon than conjecture, and it is much more likely that the reference is here to Asiatic Galatia, since the other places named in the context—Thessalonica and Dalmatia—are both east, not west, of Rome.

The meaning of Γαλαταί in 1 Mac 8<sup>2</sup> is disputable. The RV says that Judas Maccabæus (c. 162 B.C.) 'heard of the fame of the Romans, that they are valiant men. . . . And they told him of their wars and exploits which they do among the Gauls,' etc. A reference to Spain in the next verse might suggest European Gauls, but on the whole it is much more likely that reports of Manlius's victories over the Celtic invaders of Asia Minor had come to the ear of the Jewish leader.

JAMES STRAHAN.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. The Apostle, the Galatians, and the Judaizers.—The 'churches of Galatia' to which the Epistle is addressed (1-) owed their Christianity to the preaching of St. Paul (1<sup>3</sup>). Humanly speaking, one may say that their conversion was due to an accident. Apparently the Apostle had set out with some other goal in view, but he was led to visit Galatia, or was detained there, because of some bodily ailment (4<sup>13</sup>). The nature of his malady was such as made him painful to behold (4<sup>14</sup>), but in spite of it the Galatians welcomed him 'as an angel from heaven,' and listened eagerly while he proclaimed to them Christ crucified as the only way of salvation (3<sup>1</sup>). They accepted his glad tidings and were baptized (3<sup>27</sup>). They had made a good start in the Christian race (5<sup>7</sup>), strengthened by the gift of the Holy Spirit, whose presence within them was visibly manifested in works of power (3<sup>5-5</sup>).

Once again* St. Paul visited the Galatian churches. A little plain speaking was necessary concerning certain matters of doctrine and conduct (1<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>), yet on the whole it would seem that he found no grave cause for alarm.

Subsequently, however, the steadfastness of the Galatian Christians was greatly disturbed by the appearance of Judaistic opponents of St. Paul (1<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>), who denied both his apostolic authority and the sufficiency of the gospel which he preached. From the form in which the Apostle cast his defence of himself and of his teaching (Gal 1-2, 3-5), it is not difficult to deduce the doctrinal position of these disturbers and the arguments by which they bewitched the Galatians (3<sup>1</sup>).

'The promise of salvation,' said they, 'is given to the seed of Abraham alone (3<sup>7</sup> 16. 29). Gentiles like the Galatians, who wish to be included in its scope, must first be incorporated into the family of * The implied antithesis to τὸ πρῶτον (4<sup>13</sup>) is not τὸ δεύτερον but τὸ νῦν. The contrast is not between the first and the second of two visits, but between the former happy state of things and the changed circumstances at the time of writing. The expression τὸ πρῶτον has no bearing on the number of St. Paul's visits to Galatia (Askwith, Galatians, p. 73 f.).

Abraham. This means, not only that they must be circumcised, but also that they must undertake to keep the whole of the Mosaic Law (4<sup>10</sup>, 21 5<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>). Only on these conditions, by exact performance of all the works of the Law, can a Gentile win his way to membership in the Christian Church (2<sup>16</sup>, 21). St. Paul was silent about these conditions because he wished to curry favour with you (1<sup>10</sup>), yet on occasion even he has declared by his action that circumcision is binding upon Gentile Christians (5<sup>11</sup>). But it must be remembered that he is not an apostle in the same sense as our teachers, the great apostles of the circumcision, Peter, James, and John. They received their authority directly from Jesus Christ; his was derived from them. They preach the whole truth, he withholds a part' (1<sup>9</sup>-2<sup>14</sup>).

The effect of this insidious reasoning was like that of leaven in a lump of dough (5<sup>9</sup>). St. Paul's authority was undermined, and it seemed likely that his labour would prove to have been wasted (4<sup>11</sup>). With amazing rapidity (οὐτως ταχέως [1<sup>6</sup>]) the Galatians were turning aside from the gospel of Christ to the perverted gospel of the Judaizers (1<sup>7</sup>). They were minded to give up the freedom Christ had won (5<sup>1</sup>), and to take upon them the yoke of the Law with all its burdens (4<sup>10</sup>).

At the time when St. Paul first heard of their defection, he was for some reason unable to pay a visit to Galatia (4<sup>20</sup>). To meet the needs of the moment, therefore, he wrote a letter to the Galatians, denying the insinuations of his opponents with respect to his subordination to the apostles at Jerusalem, and pointing out the fatal consequences of the error into which the Galatians were being led—an error which, pressed to its logical conclusion, was equivalent to the statement that Christ's death was gratuitous and unnecessary (2<sup>21</sup>).

To the attack on his personal authority he replies by stating the facts of his immediate Divine call to apostleship, and of his relations with the apostles of the circumcision (1<sup>9</sup>-2<sup>14</sup>). In answer to the Judaizers' insistence on the necessity of circumcision and the observance of the Law, he sets forth the true position of the Law in God's scheme of redemption. It was a temporary provision, inserted parenthetically between the promise to Abraham and its fulfilment in Christ. The Law itself bears witness of its own impotence 'to justify' (3<sup>9-11</sup>), and now that its purpose is served it has become a dead letter. The gospel of Christ declares that we are 'justified by faith and not by works of law' (2<sup>16</sup>).

Finally, the Apostle meets the charge of pleasing men by exposing the motives of the Judaizers, whose main object was to escape persecution and to gain applause (6<sup>1-13</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>); with this he contrasts his own self-sacrificing love for his converts (4<sup>19</sup>) and the hardships he has suffered for his fearless proclamation of the truth (5<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>17</sup>).

2. Summary of the Epistle.—The Epistle falls into three main divisions.

1<sup>1-5</sup>. The customary salutation is so framed, with its insistence on the writer's apostolic authority, as to lead up to the main subject of the Epistle.

1<sup>6-10</sup>. The usual thanksgiving for past good progress is displaced by an expression of astonishment at the Galatians' sudden apostasy, a denunciation of the false teachers, and a declaration of the eternal truth of St. Paul's gospel.

1<sup>11-21</sup>. This gospel was derived from no human source, but was directly revealed by Jesus Christ. Obviously it could not have been suggested by the Apostle's early training, which was based on principles diametrically opposed to the gospel freedom (1<sup>11-14</sup>). Nor could he have learnt it from the earlier apostles, for he did not meet them till some time after his conversion (1<sup>15-17</sup>). When at length he did visit Jerusalem, he saw none of the apostles save Cephas and James, and them only for a short time. Finally, he left Jerusalem unknown even by sight to the great majority of Christians (1<sup>18-23</sup>).

When he visited Jerusalem again, fourteen years later, he asserted the freedom of the Gentiles from the Law by refusing to circumcise Titus.* On this visit he conferred privately with the apostles of the circumcision, on terms of absolute equality. They on their side commended the work he had already done amongst Gentiles, and treated him as a fellow-apostle (2<sup>1-10</sup>). His independent apostolic authority was further demonstrated at Antioch, where he publicly rebuked St. Peter for virtually denying the gospel by refusing to eat with Gentiles (2<sup>11-14</sup>). The particular argument used by St. Paul against St. Peter gradually expands into the general argument which forms the second section of the Epistle.

2<sup>15-21</sup>. St. Peter himself and all Jewish Christians, by seeking justification through faith in Jesus Christ, tacitly admitted the impossibility of attaining salvation through works of the Law. St. Paul's own experience had taught him that only after realizing this impossibility, which the Law itself brought home to him, had he come to know Christ as a vital power within. If salvation were attainable by obedience to the Law, then would the Cross be superfluous.

3<sup>1-9</sup>. The Galatians must be bewitched, after having experienced the reality of justification by faith, to turn to works of law as a more perfect way of salvation. Faith, not works of law, makes men true children of Abraham and inheritors of the blessing bestowed on him.

3<sup>10-18</sup>. The Law brings no blessing but a curse, to free us from which Christ died a death which the Law describes as accursed. Through faith in Him we receive the fulfilment of the promise made to Abraham—a promise which is older than the Law and cannot be annulled by it.

3<sup>19</sup>-4<sup>11</sup>. The Law was a temporary provision to develop man's sense of sin, and to make him feel the need of salvation. It was the mark of a state of bondage, not contrary to, but preparing for, the gospel. Under the Law we were in our spiritual minority. Now, as members of Christ, we have reached the status of full-grown men. Being one with Him, we are the true promised seed of Abraham. We have outgrown the limitations of childhood and come to the full freedom of spiritual manhood as sons and heirs of God. How then can the Galatians desire to return to the former state of bondage?

4<sup>1-9</sup>. The Apostle begs them to pause, appealing to their recollection of his personal intercourse with them, which he contrasts with the self-interested motives of the false teachers.

4<sup>21-31</sup>. The witness of the Law against itself is illustrated by an allegorical interpretation of the story of Sarah and Hagar. Hagar, the bondwoman, and her descendants stand for the old covenant and its followers, who are in bondage to the Law. These are thrust out from the promised inheritance and remain in bondage. But Isaac, the child of promise, born of a free woman, represents the true seed of Abraham, namely, Christ, and them who are united to Him by faith. These possess the inheritance, for they are free.

5<sup>1-12</sup>. The Galatians should therefore cling to the freedom which Christ has won for them. To follow the Judaizers and accept circumcision is to break away from Christ and return to bondage under the yoke of the Law.

* The 'Western Text,' which omits οὐδέ (25), implies that Titus was circumcised. This is also a possible interpretation of the generally accepted reading. On the whole question see K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, p. 275 ff.

<sup>513-26</sup>. Yet liberty must not be confused with licence. The fundamental Christian law of love declares that true freedom is freedom to serve others. The works which result from the indwelling of Christ's Spirit cannot possibly be mistaken, nor can those of the flesh.

<sup>61-10</sup>. The freedom of Christian service must be practically manifested, in forbearance and brotherly love and liberality.

<sup>611-18</sup> Peroration, summing up the main points of the Epistle, and the final benediction. The Apostle calls attention to the fact that at any rate for these closing verses he has dispensed with the services of the customary amanuensis, and written his message in his own large handwriting (<sup>611</sup>). Possibly the words ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ may refer to the whole Epistle.

3. Leading ideas.—(a) Righteousness and justification.—St. Paul and his Judaistic opponents alike expressed their teaching in conventional Jewish terminology. Both agreed that the object of all religion is the attainment of 'righteousness' (δικαιοσύνη [<sup>221</sup> <sup>321</sup> <sup>57</sup>]). The metaphor underlying the word 'righteousness' is forensic, and has its roots far back in the usage of the OT. In its most primitive sense the word 'righteous' (δικαίος, Heb. דָּקָא) is used to describe that one of two litigants whom the judge pronounces to be 'in the right.' 'Righteousness' (δικαιοσύνη, Heb. דִּקְיָה or דִּקְקָה) is the status of one who is in the right. The verb which denotes the action of the judge in pronouncing him 'righteous' (Heb. הִדְקִי) is represented by the Greek word δικαίουν and the English 'to justify' (Lk <sup>735</sup>). Used in the religious sense, 'righteousness' means the status of one who is in a right relation towards God, in a state of acceptance with God. 'To justify' (δικαίουν) is to declare one to be in a state of righteousness (cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, p. 28 ff.).

(b) Works and faith.—The fundamental difference between St. Paul and his opponents was not concerning the nature of righteousness, but concerning the way in which it may be attained. The Judaizers maintained that righteousness is the reward of man's own effort. It is the fruit of perfect obedience to the will of God. The Law of Moses is the most complete expression of the Divine will for man. Whether for Jew or Gentile, therefore, righteousness, the condition of salvation, depends upon an exact performance of all the Mosaic ordinances. We are 'justified by works of the law' (<sup>216</sup> <sup>21</sup> <sup>54</sup>).

St. Paul exposes the fundamental defect of this position. The doctrine of 'justification by works' takes no account of the inborn weakness of human nature. If righteousness be attainable by perfect obedience to the Law, then the Incarnation was unnecessary. Christ's death was superfluous and meaningless (<sup>221</sup>), for men can save themselves. But experience shows that human nature is so constituted as to be incapable of perfect obedience. The search for justification by works has been tried and has failed. Those who sought most eagerly have been most acutely conscious of their failure (<sup>215-19</sup>). The Law could not help them. All it could do was to make clear the Divine commands, and pronounce sentence on such as failed to keep them (<sup>313</sup>). From its sentence no man escapes. The actual result of the giving of the Law was to teach man by bitter experience that 'by works of the law shall no flesh be justified' (<sup>216</sup>).

But that righteousness which man cannot win by his own individual efforts he can now receive as a free gift won for him by Christ (<sup>13</sup> <sup>313</sup> <sup>14</sup>).

On man's side the one condition of justification is 'faith.' Faith is much more than mere intellectual belief. It is an entire surrender of the whole self to Christ, the conscious act of entering into vital union with Him. This union is no mere metaphor, but a living personal reality. At baptism the believer 'puts on Christ' (<sup>3-7</sup>). Thenceforward he is 'in Christ,' 'Christ is formed in him' (<sup>419</sup>), until he can say, 'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me' (<sup>219-20</sup>). Thus 'they that are of faith' (<sup>39</sup>) are justified, not, as by a legal fiction, by the imputation to them of a righteousness which is not really their own, but because, as members of Christ, they have become living parts of that perfect human nature which alone is completely righteous, i.e. in complete union with God. Christ's righteousness is theirs because they are one with Him (<sup>318</sup>).

But there can be no justification without the faith which is absolute self-surrender. Christ must be everything or nothing. If men persist in relying on their own unaided power to obtain righteousness by works, they cut themselves off from Christ and have no share in the righteousness which human nature has achieved in Him (<sup>57</sup>).

(c) The Law and the promise.—God made a promise to Abraham, that in him and in his seed all nations should be blessed (<sup>39</sup>). That promise is fulfilled in Christ. He is the true seed of Abraham (<sup>317-9</sup>), and the blessing received by the human race is the gift of the Spirit (<sup>314</sup>), which is the evidence of man's justification. But, when the promise was given, no mention was made of works or law. The Scripture speaks only of the 'faith' of Abraham (<sup>36</sup>). The promise given to Abraham was of the nature of a covenant signed and sealed. The Law, therefore, which came more than 400 years later, cannot annul it or add to it a new clause insisting on the necessity of works (<sup>315</sup> <sup>17</sup>). The promise came first; the Law came later. The promise is absolute, the Law conditional. The promise was spoken directly by God; the Law was issued through mediators, human and angelic (<sup>314</sup>). These facts prove that the Law is subordinate and inferior to the promise, though it would be impious to imagine a contradiction between the two, since one God gave both (<sup>321</sup>). The Law had a real purpose to serve. By its exact definition of transgressions and the consequent deepening of man's sense of sin and helplessness (<sup>319</sup>), it prepared the way for his acceptance of the fulfilment of the promise, the offer of justification by faith in Christ. But now that the promise is fulfilled the Law is no longer necessary (<sup>3-3</sup> <sup>-5</sup>).

His redemptive work centres in His death. He 'gave himself for our sins,' thereby 'delivering us from the present age with all its evils' (<sup>14</sup>). He 'redeemed' us from the curse pronounced by the Law, by Himself 'becoming a curse for us' (<sup>313</sup> <sup>14</sup> <sup>44</sup>), i.e. by dying a death which the Law describes as accursed (Dt <sup>2123</sup>).

(e) The Holy Spirit.—The indwelling of the Holy

* Dt <sup>2123</sup> קָלַל אֱלֹהִים מָלְאָהוּ means not that 'a curse rests on him who is impaled,' but that 'his unburied corpse is an insult to the God of the land which by its presence it defiles.' St. Paul quotes the LXX, which takes אֱלֹהִים wrongly as subjective genitive. St. Paul means simply 'Christ died a death in connexion with the outward circumstances of which the Law mentions a curse.'

Spirit is the evidence of our adoption into the family of God (4<sup>5, 6</sup>). His presence is manifested in the inward sense of sonship (4<sup>6</sup>), and outwardly in works of power (3<sup>2</sup>) and in the manifold Christian graces (5<sup>22-24</sup>). He is personally distinct from the Father and the Son, yet the three act as one. 'The Father sends the Spirit of the Son' (4<sup>6</sup>).

4. Relation to other books of the NT.—(a) Galatians and Acts.—The autobiographical details given by St. Paul in Gal 1<sup>13-24</sup> cover a period of which a second account is provided by the writer of Acts. The task of reconciling the two narratives is beset by many difficulties, most of which centre round St. Paul's two visits to Jerusalem.

(1) The Epistle asserts that St. Paul's conversion was followed by a visit to Arabia, a 'return' to Damascus, and then, 'after three years,' a visit to Jerusalem. This visit is described as being of a purely private nature. St. Paul saw none of the apostles except St. Peter and St. James, and departed to Syria and Cilicia unknown even by sight to the faithful in Judæa (1<sup>16-18</sup>).

Acts, on the other hand, seems to imply that after his conversion St. Paul returned directly from Damascus to Jerusalem (9<sup>23-26</sup>). The expression ὡς δὲ ἐπληροῦντο ἡμέραι ἰκαναί (9<sup>23</sup>) suggests that the Apostle spent a considerable time at Damascus, but nothing is said concerning any visit to Arabia. Moreover, the description in Acts of his visit to Jerusalem differs considerably from that in the Epistle. It speaks of a period of public preaching sufficiently widely known to give rise to Jewish plots against his life (9<sup>36</sup>). If this be true, it is difficult to believe that St. Paul's stay in the city was limited to fifteen days (Gal 1<sup>18</sup>), or that he was unknown by sight to the Christians of Judæa, unless it be assumed that 'Judæa' means the outlying districts exclusive of Jerusalem (cf. Zec 12<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>14</sup>).

Yet it is clear that both accounts refer to the same visit, for both place it between St. Paul's return from Damascus and his departure to Cilicia (Ac 9<sup>30</sup>, Gal 1<sup>1</sup>). Nor do the two narratives appear irreconcilable, when the different objects with which they were written are borne in mind. St. Paul's purpose was to give a complete account of his movements so far as they brought him into contact with the apostles. Consequently, in connexion with his visit to Jerusalem, he omits everything except his intercourse with Cephas and James. The object of the writer of Acts was to trace the growth of the Church. He might well omit, as irrelevant to his purpose, all mention of St. Paul's visit to Arabia, which the Apostle himself describes as a temporary absence in the course of a long stay in Damascus (ὑπεστρέψα [Gal 1<sup>7</sup>]).

(2) Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> describes a second occasion, when St. Paul visited Jerusalem in company with Barnabas, and interviewed the apostles of the circumcision. According to Acts, St. Paul and Barnabas went up to Jerusalem together twice: * (a) during the famine of A.D. 46 (Ac 11<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>5</sup>); (b) at the time of the so-called Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15<sup>2</sup>) some years later. By Ramsay, Lake, Emmet, and other scholars, the visit of Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> is identified with (a); by Lightfoot, Zahn, and the majority of modern critics with (b).

In favour of the former identification it is urged:

(i.) That the natural inference from the language of the Epistle is that St. Paul's second interview with the other apostles occurred during his second visit to Jerusalem, and Acts places his second visit in the time of the famine; (ii.) that, in three details at least, the circumstances of Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> agree with the account of Ac 11<sup>30-30</sup>: the journey was suggested 'by revelation' (Gal 2<sup>2</sup>, Ac 11<sup>27</sup>); St. Paul's com-

In support of the alternative view it is argued:

(i.) That in Ac 15 and Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> the chief persons are the same—St. Paul and Barnabas on the one hand, St. Peter and St. James on the other; (ii.) the subject of discussion is the same, i.e. the circumcision of Gentile converts; (iii.) the result is the same, i.e. the exemption of Gentile converts from the enactments of the Law, and the recognition by St. Peter, St. James, and St. John of the apostleship of St. Paul and Barnabas (Lightfoot, Gal.<sup>5</sup>, p. 123 ff.).

The acceptance of either view involves difficulties. Against the former it has been objected:

(i.) That Acts does not mention any meeting between St. Paul and the three in connexion with the 'famine visit,' but rather suggests that they were absent from Jerusalem at the time. This is not a serious difficulty. The argument from silence is always precarious, and the only passage which suggests that the apostles were not in Jerusalem is the statement that, from the house of John Mark's mother, St. Peter went εἰς ἑτέρον τόπον (Ac 12<sup>17</sup>), which need not necessarily mean that he left the city.

(ii.) That the language of Gal 2<sup>2</sup> (τρέχω ἢ ἔδραμον) implies that St. Paul had already done much missionary work amongst Gentiles, whereas the events of Ac 11<sup>27-30</sup> took place before his first missionary journey. It is doubtful, however, if this objection has any weight, in view of the fact that at any rate fourteen years had elapsed since the Apostle first realized his special vocation to preach to the Gentiles (Ac 22<sup>21</sup>).

(iii.) That it is chronologically impossible. The date of the famine (and therefore of St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem) is fixed by the independent evidence of Josephus between A.D. 46 and 48. On this theory, therefore, the date of St. Paul's conversion would be not later than A.D. 33, even if the fourteen years of Gal 2<sup>1</sup> are reckoned from that event, and as early as A.D. 30, if they are reckoned from his first visit to Jerusalem (Gal 1<sup>18</sup>). Most recent students of NT chronology, however (except Harnack, who accepts the date A.D. 30), place St. Paul's conversion between A.D. 33 and 37. The difficulty is real but not fatal. All chronological schemes for the period A.D. 29-46 are merely tentative, and those who argue for the later date usually take their stand on the assumption that the visit of Gal 2 is the same as that of Ac 15.

The alternative theory, that Gal 2 and Ac 15 refer to the same occasion, presents special difficulties of its own.

(i.) St. Paul's account of his dealings with the mother church is incomplete. He is guilty of concealing his second visit to Jerusalem, and thereby his personal defence against the Judaizers is invalidated. The usual answers to this objection are: (a) St. Paul omits his second visit because he did not meet the apostles on that occasion (see above), or (β) St. Paul refers only to those visits of which his adversaries had given a distorted account.

(ii.) The most obvious inference from the narrative of Gal 2 is that St. Paul's dispute with Cephas at Antioch (2<sup>11</sup>) took place after the apostolic meeting at Jerusalem * (2<sup>1-10</sup>). But such a dispute is quite incomprehensible if the relation between Jewish and Gentile converts had already been settled. It is just possible, however, that the quarrel occurred before the meeting. It may be that the absence from 2<sup>11</sup> of the ἐπειρα of the earlier sections (1<sup>18-21</sup>) indicates that the writer is no longer following strict chronological order.

(iii.) Ac 15 states that the Council of Jerusalem

* McGiffert (History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, p. 172 ff.) is almost alone in arguing that the two visits of Ac 15 and Ac 11 are really one and the same.

* Gal 2<sup>11-16</sup> forms the climax, from St. Paul's point of view, in his triumphant assertion of the free Christian rights belonging to Gentile converts' (Moffatt, LNT, p. 101).

dealt with and settled the very question which St. Paul discusses in the Epistle. It is incredible that the Apostle should describe a private interview with the three which occurred at the time of the Council without alluding either to the Council itself or to its decrees, although the official decision, that Gentiles need not be circumcised, would have provided a conclusive argument against the Judaizers. Again, St. Paul could not truthfully have said οὐδὲν προσανέθεντο (Gal 2<sup>6</sup>), after accepting the 'Gentile food restrictions' * passed by the Council (Ac 15<sup>9</sup>). These objections are as weighty as any argument from silence can be. They are satisfactorily met only by the assumption that the Acts' account of the Council is wholly or partly unhistorical.

The identity of the visit of Gal 21-10 must be left uncertain. If it be that of Ac 11, the narrative of Galatians is free from difficulties, but some alteration is necessary in the generally accepted chronology of the primitive Apostolic Age. If it be that of Ac 15, doubt arises as to the historicity of the Acts' account of the Council, and the reason for St. Paul's silence concerning his second visit to Jerusalem must be left to conjecture.

See, further, ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, II. 2 (b).

(b) Galatians and Romans.— 'Almost every thought and argument in the Epistle to the Galatians may be matched from the other Epistle' (sc. Rom. [Lightfoot, Gal.<sup>5</sup>, p. 45]). A detailed comparison of the parallel passages shows that this agreement exists not only in general ideas, but also in unusual turns of expression and argument such as would not arise inevitably from the nature of the subject (ib.). More or less consciously the writer must have had the one Epistle in mind when he wrote the other, and there can be no doubt as to which is the earlier† of the two. 'The Epistle to the Galatians stands in relation to the Roman letter, as the rough model to the finished statue' (ib. p. 49). Yet it cannot be argued from the close connexion between the two Epistles that they must have been written about the same time. Even after the lapse of several years, it would be quite natural for a writer returning to an old topic to slip into the old arguments and the old expressions.

(c) Galatians and St. James.—The subject of 'faith and works' is treated in the Epistle of St. James (214-26). The same OT illustration (Gn 15<sup>9</sup>) is used as in Gal., but the conclusion—'faith is vain apart from works' (2<sup>0</sup>)—seems to be a direct contradiction of St. Paul's teaching. Yet the contradiction is only apparent, for the two writers use the terms 'faith' and 'works' in totally different senses. To St. James 'faith' means intellectual assent to a proposition (21<sup>9</sup>), 'works' are the manifold Christian virtues. To St. Paul 'works' are acts of obedience to the Law considered as the ground of salvation, 'faith' is a personal relation to Christ. The statement that 'faith is made complete by works' (Ja 2--) is almost exactly equivalent to the assertion, 'by the hearing of faith ye received the Spirit . . . the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace,' etc. (Gal 3-5--).

5. The locality of the Galatian churches.—The question of the identity of the Galatian Christians is the centre of a fierce controversy. The point at issue is the meaning of 'Galatia' in 1<sup>2</sup> (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>). Two rival theories hold the field:

(1) The North Galatian theory—i.e. that 'Galatia' means the old kingdom of Galatia, the region inhabited by the descendants of the Gauls who settled in Asia Minor in the 3rd cent. B.C. (see Lightfoot, Salmon, Chase, Jülicher, Schmiedel, etc.).

(2) The South Galatian theory—i.e. that 'Galatia' signifies the larger Roman province of that name, which included, together with Galatia proper, those portions of the old kingdoms of Phrygia and Lycaonia in which lay Antioch, Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium. The Epistle to the Galatians was addressed to the Christian communities of these cities (see Ramsay, Zahn, Rendall, Bartlet, Bacon, Askwith, Lake, etc.).

In itself either meaning of 'Galatia' is admissible. Which one is intended by St. Paul must be decided by the internal evidence of the Epistle itself, and the information supplied by the account given in Acts of St. Paul's travels.

(a) Evidence of Acts.—The Apostle undoubtedly visited the cities of S. Galatia more than once (Ac 13. 14. 16). Have we any grounds for supposing that he ever visited Galatia proper? This is the first question to be faced. The only evidence for such a visit is derived from two phrases of doubtful meaning, which occur in the narrative of the second and third missionary journeys (Ac 16<sup>6</sup> 18<sup>23</sup>).

(a) The meaning of τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν (Ac 16<sup>6</sup>).—The crucial point is the exact significance of Ac 16<sup>6</sup>. The preceding verses tell how the Apostle passed through Syria and Cilicia (15<sup>41</sup>) to Derbe and Lystra (16<sup>1</sup>). Thence, it seems to be implied, he went on to Iconium (16<sup>2</sup>). His next undisputed stopping-place was somewhere on the borders of Bithynia 'over against Mysia.' The route by which he travelled thither is concealed in the words, διήλθον δὲ τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, κωλυθέντες ὑπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος λαλῆσαι τὸν λόγον ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ. What is the district described as τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν?

(i.) It is argued that the participle κωλυθέντες must be retrospective. The missionaries went through τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν because they had received the prohibition against preaching in Asia, and consequently after they had received it. But such a prohibition was not likely to be given before they had actually entered Asia, or were on the point of doing so. It follows, therefore, that the journey through τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν began only when the cities of S. Galatia were left behind. Since, then, the 'Galatic region' is distinguished from S. Galatia, it can only be Galatia proper. Φρυγίαν must be a noun (cf. Ac 21<sup>0</sup> 18<sup>23</sup>), and the whole phrase τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν must mean 'Phrygia (Asiana) and (some North) Galatic region.' The strength of this explanation is that it needs no serious straining of grammar or syntax. Its weakness is firstly that it involves an inconsistency: διερχεσθαι in Acts seems to have the special sense of 'making a preaching journey,' and Phrygia Asiana, where ex hypothesi such a journey was made, lay in the region where preaching was forbidden; secondly, it gives no explanation of the absence of the article before Γαλατικὴν χώραν, nor any real reason for the use of Γαλατικὴν χώραν instead of Γαλατίαν.

(ii.) The alternative explanation rests on the conviction that the single article in the phrase τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν proves conclusively that one single district is in view. τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν means that region which is both Phrygian and Galatian, 'the Phrygo-Galatic region.' The only district which really answers to this description is that part of the old kingdom of Phrygia which was included in the Roman province of Galatia, i.e. the country which extended westward from Iconium to Antioch and beyond, south of the Sultan Dagli.

That St. Paul had passed through the whole of S. Galatia before he was forbidden to preach in Asia is a mere assumption. At Iconium two roads lay before him—one to the north, leading via Laodicea into Phrygia Asiana, the other to the west, leading to Phrygia Galatica. It is permissible to suppose that Iconium was the point at which he became conscious of the Divine command not to preach in Asia, and that, because of it, he chose the western rather than the northern road. Sooner or later he was bound to enter Asia; but, by taking the western road, he was enabled to travel as long as possible through a region where missionary work was allowed.*

* This difficulty would disappear if we could accept as original the 'Western' text of Ac 15<sup>2</sup>, which by omitting the words καὶ πικτόν transforms the 'food law' into a 'moral law' (see K. Lake, op. cit. p. 43 ff.).

† The only modern scholar of repute who places Romans before Galatians is C. Clemen (Chronol. der paulin. Briefe, Halle, 1893).

The chief objections to this interpretation of the phrase are: (a) in the NT Φρυγίαν is elsewhere used only as a noun (Ac 2<sup>10</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>); (b) it is straining language to give καί the force of 'or': καί suggests two districts, not one (cf. τὴν Μακεδονίαν καὶ Ἀχαΐαν [19<sup>21</sup> and 27<sup>3</sup>]).

(β) The meaning of τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>).—Of this phrase, which indicates the route by which St. Paul started on his third journey, only one translation is possible, i.e. 'the Galatic region and Phrygia.' The exact meaning attached to the expression will depend on the interpretation given to the words of Ac 16<sup>6</sup>. It can be adapted to either of the alternatives.

(i.) On the first hypothesis, τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν will mean 'Galatia proper' as in 16<sup>6</sup>, and Phrygia will be 'Phrygia Asiana.'

(ii.) On the second, τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν signifies that part of the province of Galatia in which were Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium (Lycaonia Galatica). 'Phrygia' means either 'Phrygia Galatica' (i.e. the district described in 16<sup>6</sup> as τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν) or 'Phrygia Galatica and Phrygia Asiana,' for the Apostle would have to pass through both regions in order to reach Ephesus by way of τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>). The absence of any further definition of Phrygia in Ac 18<sup>3</sup> is naturally explained by the fact that on this occasion preaching in Asia was not forbidden.

The impartial critic must admit that the evidence of these two passages is not sufficient to prove conclusively whether St. Paul ever visited N. Galatia or not. In favour of the N. Galatian interpretation, it must be granted that it represents the most straightforward and obvious reading of the verses, and that it gives a uniform meaning to the phrases τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν and Φρυγίαν. Yet it fails to explain some things—e.g. why the writer of Acts should say τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν where Γαλατίαν would be sufficient, and why he should state in the same verse that (a) preaching in Asia was forbidden, (b) therefore the Apostle preached in Asia. Again, the Acts usually tells its story at greater length when the gospel is being taken into a new district for the first time, but passes over as briefly as possible second visits to places already evangelized. The extreme brevity of the reference to τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν (16<sup>6</sup>) suggests that it is not new ground to the missionaries.

The S. Galatian interpretation avoids these special difficulties, but only at the cost of some forcing of interpretation and straining of grammar. The great stumbling-block to its acceptance is the fact that when Acts is actually speaking of the S. Galatian cities, it does not describe them politically as 'Galatian,' but ethnographically—'Antioch in Pisidia' (13<sup>14</sup>), 'Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia' (14<sup>6</sup>). The contribution of Acts towards the discovery of the destination of the Galatian Epistle is simply this. St. Paul certainly visited the cities of S. Galatia; he may or may not have visited N. Galatia.

* The contention that καλυθέντες may be predicative, and therefore that the prohibition may have been given at the close of the journey through τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν (Askwith, p. 35 ff.), cannot be regarded as proved.

(b) Evidence of the Epistle itself.—This evidence is slight, and is claimed by both sides.

(a) For the N. Galatian theory it is claimed that:

(i.) St. Paul addresses his readers as Γαλάται (3<sup>1</sup>). This term applies only to the people of N. Galatia. The inhabitants of Antioch, Derbe, and Lystra were Phrygians and Lycaonians. But it is difficult to see what other general term could be used to include the inhabitants of all these cities. It was true politically if not ethnographically.

(ii.) Assuming that Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> refers to the time of the Council, we should expect, on the S. Galatian theory, that some reference to the evangelizing of Antioch, Derbe, and Lystra would follow Gal 1<sup>21</sup>. It would also be natural to look for some mention in Ac 13. 14 of the Apostle's illness (Gal 4<sup>13</sup>).

(β) For the S. Galatian theory it is urged that:

(i.) The circumstances of the conversion of the Galatians (4<sup>1-13</sup>) correspond closely to the account of the evangelizing of S. Galatia given by Ac 13<sup>14-14</sup>. The arguments of St. Paul's sermon at Antioch in Pisidia reappear in Galatians (Ramsay, Gal., pp. 399-401).

(ii.) The repeated mention of Barnabas (2<sup>1-9</sup> 13) implies that he was personally known to the readers. But Barnabas was no longer with St. Paul on his second journey.

(iii.) The reference to the circumcision of Timothy, supposed to lie behind Gal 5<sup>1</sup>, is more naturally understood if St. Paul was writing to Timothy's native place.

None of these arguments taken singly or combined are strong enough to bear the weight of either theory.*

(c) A priori arguments.—Zahn (Introd. to NT, i. 177), who accepts the S. Galatian view of Ac 16<sup>6</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>, brings against the N. Galatian theory of the Epistle's destination two a priori arguments.

(a) It is not likely that the churches of N. Galatia would have been dismissed so briefly in Acts if they had been the centre of a fierce controversy; nor is it probable that the important churches of S. Galatia should be left with scarcely a trace of their subsequent development in the NT.

(β) It is strange that Judaistic teachers from Jerusalem, setting out to oppose St. Paul's influence, should have passed by the cities of S. Galatia without starting any considerable anti-Pauline movement, and begun their campaign in the unimportant churches of a remote district.

The only force such arguments could have would be to strengthen a theory proved independently. By themselves they have little weight.

Summary.—The equal division of opinion even amongst critics of the same school suggests that the evidence is insufficient. Absolute impartiality demands an open verdict. If St. Paul did actually found churches in N. Galatia, it is the most natural—though not inevitable—conclusion that the Epistle was addressed to them. The Apostle undoubtedly founded the churches of S. Galatia, but the arguments which have been advanced prove no more than the possibility that they were the recipients of the letter.

6. Date and place of writing.—It is generally agreed that St. Paul wrote his letter to the Romans from Corinth on the eve of his departure to Jerusalem at the close of his third missionary journey. Most scholars fix the actual date + A.D. 58. This gives the terminus ad quem for dating the Galatian Epistle (see above, 4).

The terminus a quo is not so easily determined.

* Arguments which have been used, but which are now abandoned, are: (a) that the fickle temperament of the Galatians of the Epistle points to the N. Galatians, who were partly of Celtic descent (Lightfoot); (b) that N. Galatia was not likely to be visited by a sick man (Gal 4<sup>13</sup>), owing to the difficulty of the journey; (c) that the legal terms used in the Epistle would be intelligible to S. Galatians but not to N. Galatians (Ramsay).

The Epistle itself supplies but few hints. These are: (a) More than fourteen—perhaps more than seventeen—years have elapsed since St. Paul's conversion, during which he has paid at least two visits to Jerusalem (1<sup>13-214</sup>). (b) St. Paul has paid at least two visits to his readers before writing the Epistle (1<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>).

As to the place of writing, one suggestion alone is given. St. Paul implies that some reason prevented him from visiting Galatia when he wrote the Epistle, though he longed for a personal interview with his converts (4<sup>20</sup>).

(a) Date on the N. Galatian theory.—If the N. Galatian theory be accepted, the choice of dates is limited. The Epistle must have been written during St. Paul's third missionary journey, after his second visit to Galatia (Ac 18<sup>23</sup>), and before the end of his sojourn at Corinth—i.e. either (i.) while the Apostle was on his way from Galatia to Ephesus, or (ii.) during his stay at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>1-19</sup>), or (iii.) during his journey through Macedonia, or (iv.) early in his stay at Corinth (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>).

There is little to choose between these suggestions. The objection brought against (i.) and (ii.), that from Ephesus it would be easy to pay a visit to Galatia, is not serious. The obstacle in St. Paul's way (Gal 4<sup>20</sup>) need not necessarily have been the length of the journey. On the other hand, Lightfoot's attempt to prove by a comparison of the thought and language of the two letters that Galatians must be later than 2 Cor. cannot be regarded as convincing (Gal.<sup>5</sup>, p. 49).

(b) On the S. Galatian theory.—Some supporters of the S. Galatian hypothesis are willing to agree with their opponents as to the date of the Epistle (e.g. Askwith, p. 99 ff.). Others avail themselves of the opportunity given by this theory of placing the Epistle earlier in St. Paul's career.

(i.) Ramsay suggests that it was sent from Syrian Antioch just before the beginning of St. Paul's third missionary journey (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 189 ff.). A serious objection to this date is the fact that the Epistle does not suggest that St. Paul is planning a visit to Galatia, but rather the reverse (4<sup>20</sup>).

(ii.) Various points in the course of the second missionary journey have been suggested: (a) Macedonia (Haustrath), or (b) Athens (L. Albrecht, Paulus, Munich, 1903, pp. 114 f.; C. Clemen, Paulus, Giessen, 1904, i. 396 f.), or (c) Corinth (Zahn, Bacon, Rendall). The arguments used in favour of (b) and (c) are that the Epistle must be placed as soon as possible after St. Paul's second visit to Galatia, and at a time which will explain the absence of any mention of Silas and Timothy. Silas and Timothy were not with St. Paul at Athens or at the time of his arrival in Corinth.

(iii.) But any date subsequent to the Council of Jerusalem makes it very difficult to explain the silence of the Epistle with regard to the Council itself and to its decrees. To some scholars this argument alone seems sufficient to prove conclusively that the Epistle was written before the Council (see Calvin, Beza, Bartlet, Round, Emmet, Lake). Consequently, it is suggested that St. Paul wrote from Antioch just before going up to the Council of Jerusalem (W. A. Sheppard, ExpT xii. [1900-01] 568; Round, Date of Galatians), or in the course of his journey from Antioch to Jerusalem (C. W. Emmet, Expositor, 7th ser., ix. [1910] 242 ff.; Lake). This theory would be very attractive if the absolute historicity of Ac 15 could be established, but grave doubts exist on this point (cf. EBi, art. 'Council of Jerusalem').

Summary.—The date of the Epistle is almost as difficult to determine as its destination. To a large extent the two questions are intertwined.

If it can be proved, on independent grounds, that the Epistle must have been written before the events which lie behind the narrative of Ac 15, then the S. Galatian theory must be accepted, and the visit of Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup> identified with that of Ac 11, or with some visit unrecorded in the Acts. On the other hand, if the N. Galatian theory can be established on independent grounds, the date of the Epistle is confined within narrow limits, and is in any case later than the Council. Unfortunately, conclusive proof of either position cannot be obtained.

7. Authenticity and permanent value.—(a) Authenticity.—That Galatians is a genuine Epistle written by St. Paul to his converts has never been questioned except by those eccentric critics who deny the existence of any authentic Pauline Epistles (e.g. EBi, art. 'Paul'). Such a theory scarcely needs refutation. Its supporters cut away the ground from beneath their own feet. If no genuine works of St. Paul have survived, no standard of comparison exists by which to decide what is genuinely 'Pauline' and what is not (cf. Knowling, The Witness of the Epistles, pp. 133-243). External testimony to the genuineness of Galatians is as strong as can be expected in view of the scantiness of the records of the sub-Apostolic Age. It is quoted as Pauline by Irenæus (c. A.D. 180) and Clem. Alex. (c. A.D. 200); it is cited by Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) and Athenagoras (c. A.D. 170); it is included in the canon of Marcion (c. A.D. 140) and in the old Latin version of the NT. Earlier still, clear references to its phraseology are found in Polycarp (Phil. iii. 5 [c. A.D. 110]).

The internal evidence of the Epistle is irresistible. It is unmistakably the work of a real man combating real opponents. It contains nothing which would explain its motive if it were a forgery, and much that no forger would be likely to have written. The question with which it deals belongs to a very early stage in the history of the Church. The existence before A.D. 70 of large churches of Gentiles who had not been compelled to accept circumcision, proves conclusively that by that time the controversy about Gentile circumcision was a thing of the past. Consequently the Epistle must have been written within St. Paul's lifetime, and no valid reason remains for denying the traditional belief that he wrote it.

(b) Permanent value.—The value of the Epistle is unaffected by uncertainties concerning its date and destination. It is the most concise and vigorous, as Romans is the most systematic, expression of St. Paul's evangel. It displays the Apostle's power of penetrating to the heart of things. He passes beyond the immediate question of circumcision and the observance of the Jewish Law to the ultimate principle which lies beneath.

Universal experience has shown that men cannot by their own efforts attain perfect righteousness. The power to overcome the inherent weakness of human nature is God's free gift to man in Christ. But man must receive it on God's own terms, 'by faith'—that is, by the complete self-surrender which brings him into vital union with Christ's perfect humanity. Such self-surrender is possible to all who realize their own utter helplessness (cf. Mt. 18-); but if 'life eternal' (6<sup>8</sup>) were dependent on the complete obedience to God's will of unaided human nature, it would be for ever beyond man's reach. The truth on which St. Paul so strongly insists lies at the very heart of the Christian faith, and is a living message to all ages.

In pressing home his point, the Apostle uses the dialectic methods of the Rabbinic school in which both he and his opponents received their training—e.g. the play on the word κατά (3<sup>14</sup>); the argument of 3<sup>16</sup>, which is based on the use of the singular σπέρμα, although the noun is collective and in this sense has no plural; the allegorical use of the story of Hagar and Ishmael (4<sup>11a</sup>).

This style of reasoning no longer appeals to us with any force, but it must be remembered that these are not the real arguments on which the Apostle's teaching rests. He uses the OT in the manner most natural to a Jew of the 1st cent. to support and illustrate a conclusion really reached on independent grounds. The ultimate basis of the Apostle's doctrine of 'justification by faith' is his own personal experience, both of the hopelessness of the search for righteousness by works, and of the sense of peace and new power which came to him when he could say, 'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me' (2<sup>20</sup>; cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, p. 26 f.).

F. S. MARSH.

GALBA.—Sernius Sulpicius Galba (after his elevation to the purple, Sernius Galba Imperator Cæsar Augustus), son of Sernius Sulpicius Galba and Mummius Achaica, and great-grandson of Quintus Latunus Catulus, was born on 24 Dec. 5 B.C. and died in his seventy-third year (15 Jan. A.D. 69). His native place was near Tarracina (modern Terracina) on the Appian Way by the sea. He was adopted by his stepmother, and took the names of Lucius Liuius Ocella in consequence. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have predicted that he would become Emperor. He attained the dress of manhood in A.D. 14 and married Æmilia Lepida. After her death and that of their two sons he remained unmarried. His friendship with Liuia, the widow of Augustus, gave him great influence from the start. On her death (A.D. 29) he inherited largely, but his inheritance was reduced by the Emperor Tiberius, Liuia's son. He was, however, permitted to hold senatorial offices before the legal age. It is recorded that when as prætor he gave exhibitions to the people, he showed elephants walking on tightropes, a sight up to that time unknown in Rome. About A.D. 31 or 32 he was for one year legatus pro prætore (governor) of the province of Aquitania (S.W. Gaul). He held office as consul for six months of A.D. 33. Having been thereafter appointed legatus pro prætore provincie Germanie Superioris (governor of S. Germany), he held in check the barbarians who had already invaded Gaul. As legatus in 41 he conquered the Chatti and gained a great reputation as a general. He attended the Emperor Claudius on his expedition to Britain (see under CLAUDIUS), and attained the proconsulship of Africa, the blue ribbon of a senatorial career. Besides being awarded triumphal ornaments, he was elected to various priesthoods. His last ordinary promotion was to the governor-ship of the province of Hispania Tarraconensis, which he held for eight years, from A.D. 60 to 68. In the latter year, as the result of long dissatisfaction with the Neronian government, C. Iulius Vindex, legatus pro prætore provincie Gallie Lugudunensis, revolted from Nero, and Galba gave him his support. Vindex, however, was defeated by the legions in Germany, and committed suicide. Galba was then himself saluted Imperator by his soldiers. Though he declared himself representative of the Senate and People of Rome, the Senate adjudged him a public enemy. When the news of the death of Nero reached him, he accepted the title of Cæsar from his soldiers, and marched to Rome. Elected consul for the second time for A.D. 69, he was put to death on 15 Jan. 69, and buried in his suburban villa near the Via Aurelia.

As Galba's rule lasted only seven months, there is little to say about it. That he was an able general there can be no doubt whatever. He is credited also with other virtues, which, like those of Vespasian, serve to recall the old Roman type. He was the earliest of all the Emperors not of Cæsarian blood, and he first manifested clearly that the election to the principate lay in the hands of the army. Supported by the prætorian guards, the 'household troops' at Rome, he was recognized by the Senate, a deputation from which met him at Narbo Martius (Narbonne). A number of pretenders arose about the same time, but were mercilessly crushed. What ruined Galba was on the one hand his lack of the genius for rule, and on the other his parsimony. One of Tacitus' immortal phrases has reference to him: 'omnium consensus capax imperii, nisi imperasset' (Hist. i. 49). He used severity where it was uncalled for, and thus alienated many who would have settled down quietly under the new regime. He stirred up against himself one of his supporters, M. Saluius Otho (see OTHO), who expected to be adopted by Galba as his successor in the Empire. The soldiers declared him Imperator and put Galba to death.

LITERATURE.—The chief authorities are Tacitus, Historiæ bk. i.; Plutarch, Galba (ed. E. G. Hardy, London, 1890); Suetonius, Galba; Dio Cassius, lxi. lxi. lxi., etc., and inscriptions. The facts are given most succinctly in P. de Rohden and H. Dessau, Prosopographia Imperii Romani sæc. i. ii. iii., pars iii., Berlin, 1898, p. 284 ff. (no. 723). A. SOUTER.

GALILEE.—Galilee is seldom mentioned in the NT outside the Gospels. The only references are in the early chapters of Acts (1<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>37</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>37</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>). Most of the apostles belonged to this northern province (1<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>). Judas, the leader of an agitation in the days of the enrolment of Quirinius, is described as 'of Galilee' (5<sup>37</sup>). After Saul's conversion, peace descended upon the Christians in Galilee, as well as in Judæa and Samaria (9<sup>31</sup>). Walking in the fear of the Lord and the comfort of the Holy Spirit, their numbers greatly increased.

1. The name.—The name 'Galilee' is derived from the Heb. גליל (Galil), through the Gr. Γαλιλαία and the Lat. Galilæa. The Hebrew word, denoting 'ring' or 'circle,' was used geographically to describe a 'circuit' of towns and villages. As applied to this particular district in north-western Palestine, the form used is either גליל, 'the district' (Jos 20<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>2</sup>, 1 K 9<sup>11</sup>, 2 K 15<sup>29</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>6</sup>), or גליל הַעַמִּים, 'district of the nations' (Is 9<sup>1</sup>). Given originally to the highlands on the extreme northern border, this name gradually extended itself southwards over the hill-country till it reached and eventually included the Plain of Esdraelon (G. A. Smith, HGHL<sup>4</sup>, pp. 379 and 415). For the most part, however, Esdraelon seems to have been a frontier or arena of battle, rather than an actual part of Galilee.

2. The boundaries.—The natural boundaries of Galilee never agreed with its political frontiers. The natural limits are Esdraelon, the Mediterranean Sea, the Jordan valley, and the gorge of the river Litany. But the actual borders have shifted from time to time. At the period of widest extension, they may be set down as the Kasimiyeh or Litany gorge on the N., the southern edge of Esdraelon on the S., Phœnicia (which always belonged to Gentiles) on the W., and the Upper Jordan (with its two lakes) on the E. These boundaries, excluding Carmel and the area of the lakes, enclosed a province about 50 miles long by 25 to 35 miles broad—an area of about 1600 square miles. Within these limits lay 'a region of mountain, hill, and plain, the most diversified and attractive in Palestine' (Masterman, Studies in Galilee, p. 4).

3. The divisions.—Josephus (BJ III. iii. 1) gives the divisions, in his time, as two, called the Upper Galilee and the Lower. The Mishna (Shebuth ix. 12) states that the province contained 'the upper, the lower, and the valley.' The latter are certainly the natural divisions. The mountains separate very clearly into a higher northern and a lower southern group, and the 'valley' is the valley of the Upper Jordan.

(a) Upper Galilee is less easily characterized physically than Lower. 'It appears to the casual observer a confused mass of tumbled mountains, to which not even the map can give an orderly view' (Masterman, p. 11). It is in reality 'a series of plateaus, with a double water-parting, and surrounded by hills from 2000 to 4000 feet' (G. A. Smith, HGHL<sup>4</sup>, p. 416). The central point is Jebel Jermak (3934 ft.), the highest mountain in western Palestine. The scantier water supply of Upper Galilee is compensated for by the copiousness of the dew-fall throughout the later summer months.

(b) Lower Galilee is easier to describe. It consists of parallel ranges of hills, all below 2000 ft., running from W. to E., with broad fertile valleys between. The whole region is of great natural fertility, owing to abundance of water, rich volcanic soil, the gentleness of the slopes, and the openness of the plains. The great roads of the province cross this lower hill-country. The dividing-line between Upper and Lower Galilee is the range of mountains running right across the country along the northern edge of the Plain of Rameh.

(c) The Valley consists of the Upper Jordan and its two lakes, Huleh and Gennesaret. The river, taking its rise from springs and streams in the neighbourhood of Banias and Tel-el-Kadi, flows south in a steadily deepening channel, through Huleh, till it empties itself into the Sea of Gennesaret, at a depth of 689 ft. below sea-level. It has fallen to this depth in about 19 miles. Six miles north of the lake, the river is crossed by the 'Bridge of the daughters of Jacob,' on the famous Via Maris of the Middle Ages, the principal thoroughfare between Damascus and the Mediterranean ports. The Lake of Galilee could never be sufficiently praised by the Jewish Rabbis. They said that Jahweh had created seven seas, and of these had chosen the Sea of Gennesaret as His special delight. It had rich alluvial plains on the north and south, a belt of populous and flourishing cities round its border, abundance of fish in its depths, and a climate that attracted both workers and pleasure-seekers to its shores. At the beginning of the Christian era, it presented a reproduction in miniature of the rich life and varied activities of the province as a whole.

4. The physical characteristics.—These are principally two: (a) abundance of water, and (b) fertility of soil. As to (a), the words of the ancient promise, 'for the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths springing forth in valleys and hills' (Dt 8<sup>7</sup>), are literally true of Galilee, particularly in its southern half. Large quantities of water are collected during the rainy season among the higher slopes and plateaus, and are thence dispersed by the rivers and streams over the lower-lying tracts, where they become stored in springs and wells. There are the two lakes already mentioned—Huleh, 3½ miles long by 3 miles wide (the Samechonis of Josephus, but probably not the Waters of Merom of Jos 11<sup>5,7</sup> [cf. Masterman, Studies in Galilee, p. 26 f., and EBi iii. 3038]); the Lake of Galilee (Gennesaret), 13 miles long by 8 miles broad at its widest point. Round its shores are the ruins of at least nine ancient cities or towns. These are Chorazin, Capernaum, Magdala, Tiberias, Taricheæ, Hippos, Gamala, Gergesa, and Bethsaida. The principal rivers of the province are the Jordan, the Litany, the Kishon, and the Belus. In addition to these lakes and rivers, there are many greater streams and innumerable springs and wells. These waters, together with the copious dews of the summer, give Galilee the advantage over Samaria and set it in marked contrast to Judæa.

As to (b), all authorities unite in celebrating the natural wealth of Galilee. The other half of the promise made to the Hebrews was also true of this highly favoured province. It was 'a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig trees and pomegranates; a land of oil olives and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it' (Dt 8<sup>8,9</sup>). Josephus bears witness that the soil was universally rich and fruitful, and that it invited even the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation (Jos. BJ III. iii. 2). Even to-day, when such large tracts lie uncultivated, no part of Palestine is more productive. The chief products were oil, wine, wheat, and fish. 'In Asher, oil flows like a river,' said the Rabbis, who also held that it was 'easier to raise a legion of olive trees in Galilee than to raise one child in Judæa.' Gischala was the chief place of manufacture. There were also large stores at Jotapata during the Roman War. Considerable quantities were sent to Tyre and to Egypt. Made from the olive trees, the oil was used principally for external application, for illumination, and in connexion with religious ritual. Wine was made in many quarters of the province, the best qualities coming from Sigona; while wheat and other grains were plentifully raised all over Lower Galilee, especially round about Sepphoris and in the fields of the Plain of Gennesaret. The fish, for which the province was always noted in ancient times, was caught in the inland lakes, particularly in the Lake of Galilee. It formed a large part of the food of the lake-side dwellers, and a considerable trade was carried on by the fish-catchers and fish-curers of the large towns on the shore. The best fishing-grounds were, and still are, at el-Bataiha in the north, and in the bay of Tabigha, at the N.W. corner. Taricheæ, in the south, was another centre of the industry. In addition to the above-mentioned commodities, Galilee produced flax from which fine linen fabrics were woven, pottery, and a rich dye made from the indigo plant. The prosperity of the province was enhanced by its proximity to the Phœnician ports, and by the network of highways which crossed it in all directions.

5. The inhabitants.—To-day Galilee possesses a remarkably mixed population, and its inhabitants are physically finer than those of the southern provinces (cf. Masterman, pp. 17–20). In apostolic times, the same was true. Along the western and northern borders were the Syrophœnicians (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>), or Tyrians (as Josephus calls them), while from the east nomadic Bedouins were continually pressing in upon the lower-lying tracts. But besides these Semitic elements, Greeks and Græcized Syrians were distributed over parts of the land (Masterman, p. 120), and Romans made their influence felt throughout a large area of the province. Only in the more secluded towns among the hills would Jewish life be preserved in its characteristic purity. In spite, however, of the mingling of nationalities, the Galileans were thoroughly and patriotically Jewish during the 1st cent. of the Christian era. Wherever a true Jew settled abroad, he kept himself distinct from his neighbours, clinging tenaciously to his religion and to his racial customs. And the same thing happened with the Jew at home, when Gentile immigrants settled within his borders. His contempt for foreigners and foreign ways helped him to keep his own character and traditions intact. The Galileans were industrious workers—the bulk of them being cultivators of the soil or tenders of the fruit-trees. They were brave soldiers too, as may be learned from the chronicles of Josephus.

* The Galileans are inured to war from their infancy, and have been always very numerous; nor has their country ever been destitute of men of courage' (Jos. BJ iii. iii. 2).

There does not seem to be any sufficient ground for the dislike and contempt in which the Galileans were held by their religiously stricter brethren of Judæa. Possibly they were less exact in their observance of tradition. But they were devoted to the Law, and their country was well supplied with synagogues, schools, and teachers. If they were less orthodox, from the Pharisaic standpoint, the Messianic hope burned brightly in their souls, and they crowded to the ministry of Jesus. They were certainly more tolerant and open-minded than the Judæans, and it was from them that Jesus chose most of the men who were to give His teaching to the world.

The population of Galilee in apostolic times was considerably greater than it is to-day. At the present time, it is estimated to be somewhere about 250,000 (including children), spread over an area of 1341 square miles and inhabiting some 312 towns and villages. This gives 186 to the square mile. Josephus' figures mean that the population in his day amounted to something like three millions. He speaks of 204 cities and villages (Vita, 45), the smallest of which contained above 15,000 inhabitants (BJ iii. iii. 2). This estimate, in spite of the arguments of Merrill (Galilee in the Time of Christ, pp. 62-67), can hardly be correct. Good reasons have been given for believing that 400,000 is a much more likely figure, which means a population of 440 to the square mile. A village of 1,500 inhabitants is reckoned to be a very large one to-day, and the largest towns (with the exception of Safed) contain fewer than 15,000 people. See Masterman, pp. 131-134.

6. History and government.—At the partition of west Palestine among the twelve tribes, Galilee fell to the lot of Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, who did not drive out the original inhabitants. The population, therefore, continued to be a mixed one, and the borders of the province were constantly being pressed upon by foreigners. In 734 B.C., Tiglath-Pileser III. carried away most of the inhabitants, and after this depopulation very few Jews re-settled in the district till the extension of the Jewish State under John Hyrcanus (135-104 B.C.). At this time, or a little later, Galilee became thoroughly judaized. The settlers were placed under the Law, and quickly developed a warm patriotism, which made them ever afterwards zealous and persistent champions of their national rights and traditions. Later on, the province was the principal scene of our Lord's life and ministry. Later still, it succeeded Judæa as 'the sanctuary of the race and the home of their theological schools' (G. A. Smith, HGHL<sup>4</sup>, p. 425).

From 4 B.C. to A.D. 39, Herod Antipas was tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, by appointment of the Roman Emperor. Antipas appears to have been a capable ruler on the whole. Like his father, he was fond of building and embellishing cities. He re-built and fortified Sepphoris, his first capital, and a little later erected a new capital city on the west shore of the lake, calling it Tiberias, after the Emperor whose favour he enjoyed. Having secured the banishment of Antipas in A.D. 39, Herod Agrippa I. received the tetrarchy of Galilee, in addition to the territories of Philip and of Lysanias which he had previously obtained. From Claudius (in A.D. 41) he also obtained Judæa and Samaria, thus establishing dominion over all the land formerly ruled by Herod the Great. After Agrippa's death, in A.D. 44, Claudius reverted to the method of government by procurator—a change which greatly displeased the Jews as a whole and especially stirred the animosity of the zealots. Under the administration of the new procurators, the people's patience became exhausted, and in the time of Gessius Florus (A.D. 64-66) the revolt began which ended in the destruction of the Jewish State. In the spring of A.D. 67 Vespasian assembled his army at Ptolemais and began the reduction of Galilee. This was accomplished in the course of the first campaign, despite the courage and persistence of the inhabitants. But it was not till after the lapse of another three years that Jerusalem fell (A.D. 70) and the Jewish State was dissolved.

Though the general administration of Galilean civil affairs lay (till A.D. 44) with the tetrarchs, the details of daily life were regulated by the Jews' own religious laws (DCG i. 633). The Sanhedrin at Jerusalem exercised the chief authority, but there were also local 'councils' (Mt 5<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>) which had limited jurisdiction. But, throughout the whole period, over all and influencing all, was the firm rule of Rome.

GALLIO.—Gallio governed Achaia as a proconsul of prætorian rank. His name was Marcus Annæus Novatus; but he was adopted by L. Junius Gallio, a Roman orator, and took his name. He was the elder brother of Seneca the philosopher, to whose influence at court he may have owed his governorship. There is no other direct evidence that Gallio governed Achaia than St. Luke's statement (Ac 18<sup>1</sup>). But Seneca's reference to Gallio's catching fever in Achaia and taking a voyage for a change of air so far corroborates St. Luke. Gallio came to Corinth, the residence of the governor, during the time of St. Paul's labours there (c. A.D. 50-53).* Angered by the conversion of prominent members of the synagogue, the Jews took advantage of the new governor's arrival to lay a charge against St. Paul which they tried to put in such a serious light as to merit a severe penalty. But Gallio was not so complaisant or inexperienced as they hoped. He elicited the true nature of their complaint, and, cutting short the trial, he abruptly dismissed the case as referring only to interpretations of Jewish law, not to any civil wrong or any moral outrage of which Roman law took cognizance.

Two effects of this decision are noted. (a) It was a snub which gave the Greek bystanders grounds for venting their animus against the Jews, by seizing and beating Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue. This seems the true interpretation of a scene which has been supposed to describe Jews beating a Christian—or even their own leader—in revenge for their defeat. But such a savage and illegal protest against Gallio's decision could not have passed unnoticed by him; on the other hand, a public demonstration against the unpopular and disputatious Jews whom he had just dismissed might appear to him a rough sort of justice which he could afford to overlook, especially as it put the seal of popular approval on his action (see SOSTHENES).

(b) The decision seems to have influenced St. Paul in another direction. Gallio being governor of Achaia, his judgment would become a precedent and would have far-reaching influence. It gave St. Paul a new idea of the protection he could gain from the Roman law. Although Judaism was a religio licita, evidently the Imperial Government did not consider Christian preaching illegal. This amounted to a declaration of freedom in religion of immense value to Christians. From this point of view Gallio's treatment of the Jewish complaint was a landmark in St. Paul's missionary labour, and did a great deal to confirm his confidence in Roman protection for his preaching.

Gallio's private character is eulogized by Seneca in glowing terms. He was very lovable and fascinating; amiable, virtuous, just, and witty. The casual glimpse we get of him in Ac 18<sup>12-17</sup> shows him in a favourable light as governor. The clause 'Gallio cared for none of these things' does not bear in the least the interpretation put upon it by proverbial Christian philosophy. No doubt he had more than a touch of the Roman aristocrat's contempt for religious quarrels and for all Jews. But he appears as an astute judge, seeing quickly into the heart of things, firm in his decisions, and not too pompous or punctilious to turn a blind eye to a bit of rough popular horseplay. He seems to have shared the fortunes of his more famous brother, and was put to death by Nero.

GAMALIEL (גמליאל, Γαμαλιήλ, 'reward of God').

—1. Son of Simon and grandson of Hillel, a 'pharisee, a doctor of the law, had in honour of all the people,' and a member of the Sanhedrin, who intervened in the trial of St. Peter and the other apostles (Ac 5<sup>33-39</sup>). He is also represented by the Apostle Paul as his early teacher (Ac 22<sup>3</sup>). Gamaliel was a representative of a broader and more liberal school among the Pharisees, the school of Hillel as opposed to that of Shammai. He was interested in Greek literature and encouraged his students to study it. His teaching tended towards a broader and more spiritual interpretation of the Mosaic Law, and encouraged the Jews to friendly intercourse with foreigners, allowing poor strangers equal rights along with Jews to the gleanings of the corn, while he exerted himself for the relief of wives from the abuses of the law of divorce and for the protection of widows from the greed of children (Gittin 32, 34). He was held in such esteem that it is related in the Mishna (Sota ix. 15), 'with the death of Gamaliel the reverence for the law ceased and purity and abstinence died away.'

Gamaliel's attitude towards the apostles has been variously estimated. His advice to let them alone is supported by the reason 'if this counsel or work be of men, it will come to naught: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God' (Ac 5<sup>38, 39</sup>). Some see in this the mark of a humane, tolerant, generous, liberal-minded man (C. D. Ginsburg in Kitto's Bibl. Cycl., s.v. 'Gamaliel I. '); others regard it as the statement of a time-server without definite convictions, and incline to compare him unfavourably not only with the apostles, but with his colleagues in the council, who were consistent and convinced traditionalists. Perhaps the view of Milligan (in HDB ii. 106) is the most satisfactory. He is of the opinion that Gamaliel's conduct is to be attributed rather to a 'prudential dread of violent measures than to a spirit of systematic tolerance.' The persecuting zeal of his pupil Saul of Tarsus does not seem to indicate that universal tolerance was part of the systematic teaching of Gamaliel, though a pupil may depart from the views he has been taught.

The influence which Gamaliel on this occasion exercised in the Sanhedrin has been explained by the acceptance of a Rabbinic tradition to the effect that he was president of the Sanhedrin; but not until after the destruction of Jerusalem, when the priesthood had lost its importance, do we find a Rabbi occupying this position (cf. A. Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, 1896, Appendix iii., p. 522 ff.; also Schürer, GJV<sup>4</sup> ii. 257, 431). The influence of Gamaliel is better accounted for by the predominating influence of the Pharisaic party, which was represented in the Sanhedrin (Ac 23<sup>8</sup>; Jos. BJ II. xvii. 3, Vita, 38, 39), and also by the personal influence of the man himself. The importance of this latter factor is borne out by unanimous Rabbinic tradition and is attested by the fact that Gamaliel was the first among the seven teachers who received the title Rabban—a higher form of Rabbi, which in the form Rabboni is applied to the risen Jesus by Mary Magdalene (Jn 20<sup>16</sup>). Another incident bearing upon his commanding position in the Sanhedrin is related in the Mishna (Edajoth vii. 7). The council had recognized the need for appointing a leap-year, but, as Gamaliel was absent, resolved that their decision should take effect only if it received the subsequent sanction of their leading man.

The tradition that Gamaliel was a secret Christian and was baptized by St. Peter and St. Paul is purely legendary (cf. A. Neander, Hist. of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church, ed. Bohn, i. [1880] 46 ff.). He died c. A.D. 57-58.

The historical events referred to in the speech ascribed to Gamaliel in Ac 5<sup>36ff.</sup> have given rise to much discussion. According to St. Luke's narrative, he speaks of a rising under Theudas as taking place before the rising of Judas of Galilee (A.D. 6). Josephus (Ant. XX. v. 1) refers to a rising under a certain Theudas which was put down by the procurator Cuspius Fadus (c. A.D. 46). Is the Theudas of St. Luke identical with the Theudas of Josephus? Has one or other historian erred as to his facts, or were there two risings under two men of the same name, one in A.D. 6 and the other in 46? Or are we to suppose that the whole speech of Gamaliel in Acts is unhistorical? For further discussion of these questions see art. THEUDAS.

2. Gamaliel II., grandson of the former and the third teacher to receive the title Rabban, the most outstanding Jewish scholar at the end of the 1st century. He presided over the court of Jabne, recognized as the highest Jewish authority of the day. He is often confused with 1 (Schürer, GJV<sup>4</sup> ii. 35).

3. Gamaliel III., son of R. Juda-ha-Nāsi (Aboth ii. 2), the fifth scholar to receive the title Rabban. He is credited with having expressly recommended the combining of the study of the Law with manual labour or business activity (Schürer, GJV ii. 379).

4. The last Ethnarch or Patriarch of the Jews, deposed by the Emperor Theodosian II. in the year 415 (Schürer, GJV iii. 121).

GAMES.—The word 'games,' which is not found in the AV, appears twice in the RV, viz. in 1 Co 9<sup>25</sup> and 2 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>. In the former passage αγωνίζομενος, 'striving,' is the Greek term employed, and in the latter αθλῆ (and ἀθληση), 'contend.' It will be seen that in each case 'in the games' is supplied in accordance with the obvious sense of the verb. This provides a starting-point for the discussion of the numerous references to games that are found in the NT, the Gospels being left out of account.

1. Metaphors of St. Paul.—αγων, with derivatives, both simple and compound, supplies most of the material. This word is itself derived from αγω, 'gather,' which reveals the spectacular nature of the games of antiquity. While private games of many kinds were known and practised, either as simple pastimes, or for the exhibition of skill, or to satisfy the gambling instinct, games of a public order predominated, and this was more than ever the rule in the Apostolic Age. The difference remarked by Gibbon (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ch. xl. § ii. [ed. Bury, vol. iv.<sup>3</sup>, 1908, p. 218]) between the games of Greece and Rome was now very pronounced: 'the most eminent of the Greeks were actors, the Romans were merely spectators.' While the demand of the age was for spectacles, a supply of competitors had still to be found; which means that professional athletes existed, who in the case of Rome seem to have been mostly imported from Greece. It is perhaps significant of the spirit of the times that the strictly professional term (αθλῆς) is but rarely used in the NT (2 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>; cf. Ph 1<sup>27</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>, He 10<sup>32</sup>). Degeneracy had set in, and the onlookers were out of all proportion to the trained athletes who provided the sport.

This being the case, it is all the more surprising to find that metaphors and similes drawn from the sphere of athletics should enter so largely into the language of the NT, in particular into the letters of St. Paul. It has been customary to explain this feature of the Apostle's writings as the outcome of his experience and from his actual presence at great athletic assemblies, but now the idea is gaining ground that he drew rather upon the word-treasury of past generations, and used such figures of speech because they had become stereotyped in language and arose naturally to the mind. The same fondness for the imagery of the athletic ground has been remarked in Philo (HDB v. 206<sup>b</sup>; W. M. Ramsay, Luke the Physician, 1903, p. 294), and the opinion is widely entertained that St. Paul owed the particular metaphor of the race (e.g. 1 Co 9<sup>24ff.</sup>) to the Stoics, with whom it was a favourite idea (C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Eng. tr., 1912, p. 67). Light-foot has called attention to the striking similarity in this respect, as in many others, between the language of St. Paul and that of Seneca (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, pp. 288 and 290).

Modern exegesis has brought to view the full scope of the imagery from games, obscured in the renderings of the AV, which are retained for the sake of euphony in the RV (e.g. 1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup> and 2 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>, literally, 'strive the good strife,' 'I have striven the good strife'). It is not apparent that in 2 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> the figure of speech in the first two clauses is uniform and drawn from the athletic ground (contrast 2<sup>3-5</sup>). An improved reading of 1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>, incorporated in the RV, gives ἀγωνιζόμεθα, 'strive,' instead of ὀνειδιζόμεθα, 'suffer reproach' (AV). The same idea of contest or striving, with the same basal form αγων, appears in Ro 15<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Ph 1<sup>30</sup>, Col 1<sup>29</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup>, He 12<sup>1-4</sup>, Jude<sup>3</sup>. Specific features of the athletic contest are found in 'course' (δρόμος; Ac 13<sup>25</sup> 20<sup>34</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>), 'run' (τρέχω; Ro 9<sup>16</sup>, Gal 2<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>, Ph 2<sup>16</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>1</sup>), 'press on' (διώκω; Ph 3<sup>12ff.</sup>), 'stretching forth' (ἐπεκτεινόμενος; Ph 3<sup>14</sup>), κατὰ σκοπόν ('mark,' AV, 'goal,' RV; Ph 3<sup>14</sup>), while relevant, is not technical to racing (HDB iii. 244).

Thus far the language is suggestive of the stadium, particularly of the foot-race, although it is not forbidden to think of the hippodrome and of chariot-racing. Another event in the games is recalled by the expressive term πυκτενω (1 Co 9<sup>26</sup>), rendered by 'fight,' 'box' (RVm), and the no less expressive δερνω (v.<sup>26</sup>), 'beating,' and υποπιαζω (v.<sup>27</sup>), 'buffet' or 'bruise' (under the eye). ἡμῖν ἡ πάλη, 'our wrestling' (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>), seems like an intrusion of the imagery of the athletic ground into the metaphor of the complete warrior.

Not the least interesting part of the Pauline figures of speech now being considered is related to the laws and regulations governing the public games, both beforehand and during the actual contest (1 Co 9<sup>12ff.</sup>), and the conditions attending the giving of the prize (στεφανος, 'crown' or 'wreath'). The reward to the victor follows upon the decision of the umpires (βραβεύται), and the herald's announcement (κηρύσσειν; cf. 1 Co 9<sup>27</sup>). βραβεῖον (Ph 3<sup>14</sup>) is the word used for the prize bestowed according to the laws of the games (compare βραβεύεω, Col 3<sup>15</sup>, 'rule,' 'arbitrate,' RVm, and καταβραβεύεω, 2<sup>15</sup>, 'rob you of your prize'). The immediate prize in the shape of a wreath suggests the idea of something better than itself, not only in connexion with the actual contest, where further honours were afterwards bestowed upon the victor, but also in the Christian thought of St. Paul (1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Ph 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>19</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>) and other NT writers (Ja 1<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>4</sup>, Rev 2<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>11</sup> 4<sup>4</sup> etc.). Some reluctance has been felt to admit the use by Jewish writers of this figure drawn from the ceremonial of the heathen games (R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, 1865, p. 76 f.), but it is probable that they were indirectly indebted to this outstanding phase of ancient life (HDB iv. 555<sup>b</sup>; cf. Ramsay, op. cit., p. 290 f.).

While we are willing to believe that the profitable aspect of bodily training (1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>) was not altogether in abeyance during the Apostolic Age, we are chiefly impressed by the historical evidence for the gross degeneracy of the public games during the 1st cent. A.D. For this deterioration the Romans must be held responsible. It is not necessary to dwell on the details of the lust for blood, both human and animal, which disfigured the public displays of the Imperial city and to a less extent of the provinces. The motto of the age was 'bread and races' (panis et circenses), and coupled with this was the cry: 'The Christians to the lions!' (Christiani ad leones). The Christians thus had a tragic interest in the ludi circenses, especially in the cruel displays of the amphitheatre. St. Paul's experience at Ephesus may be taken as typical. There he fought with beasts (ἐθνηριομάχησα, 1 Co 15<sup>32</sup>), an expression which is generally understood figuratively (see art. BEAST), but which is considered by McGiffert (Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 280) and von Weizsäcker (Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> [1897] 385) as setting forth actual fact. In the same city the Apostle and his friends Gaius and Aristarchus came near experiencing the violence of the mob in the theatre (Ac 19<sup>3ff.</sup>), which was the recognized place of assembly, and even of execution following judgment (Jos. BJ vii. iii. 3). Originally designed for scenic exhibitions of a bloodless type, the theatre had developed, or rather had deteriorated, into the amphitheatre with its wholesale butcheries.

The theatre supplies NT writers with two similes: θέατρον = θέαμα, 'a spectacle,' 1 Co 4<sup>9</sup>, and θεαριζόμενοι (He 10<sup>33</sup>), translated by 'gazingstock.' In addition to this the atrocities of the amphitheatre doubtless underlie many of the references to persecutions, being most patent in 1 Co 15<sup>32</sup> and 2 Ti 4<sup>17</sup>: 'I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.' It should be noted that this last-named experience has also been refined into a proverb (C. Clemen, op. cit., p. 134; EBi iv. 5090 n.). Considerable uncertainty attaches to the language of He 12<sup>1</sup>: 'Ye have not yet resisted unto blood,' in which it is tempting to see a repetition of St. Paul's metaphor from boxing (1 Co 9<sup>5ff.</sup>), or even a reference to the extreme penalty of martyrdom suffered by some, after the example of 'the author and perfecter of our faith.' The blood may have been shed in sight of the circle of spectators in the amphitheatre (cf. περικείμενον, He 12<sup>1</sup>).

2. History and archæology.—The Jews were not exempt from the current treatment of those who had incurred the wrath of the State. At Caesarea Titus caused more than 2,500 Jews to be slain in a day, fighting with the beasts and with one another (Jos. BJ vii. iii. 1; cf. vii. ii. 1). Under this same monarch a commencement was made to the building of the Colosseum, which was dedicated and first used for gladiatorial and other exhibitions (e.g. venationes) in the reign of Vespasian (A.D. 80). The provinces soon learned to copy the evil example of the mother country (W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 317 ff.).

Already in the East, under Hellenic influence, ample provision had been made to satisfy the craze for public amusements. In the cities of the Decapolis there were in some instances two amphitheatres, while some possessed a ναυμαχία; and annual Παγκράτια or games of all kinds were held (G. A. Smith, HGHL<sup>4</sup>, 1897, p. 604). King Agrippa I. continued the policy of Herod the Great, building at Berytus a theatre and an amphitheatre, and giving exhibitions both there and at Caesarea (Jos. Ant. xix. vii. 5, viii. 2; cf. Ac 12<sup>19-23</sup>). When Roman influence fully pervaded the East, the zest for sports and for blood became still more pronounced. Nero himself lent patronage, but not lustre, to the Grecian games, and took a personal part in them (A.D. 67). In the Roman province of Asia festivals with games were held, probably under the presidency of the Asiarchs (HDB i. 172). The climax was reached in the 2nd cent. A.D. (see Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, p. 317 ff.). Confirmation of the wide-spread love of sport at this time is found in the well-preserved ruins of trans-Jordanic towns—e.g. Gerasa, Philadelphia, and elsewhere (G. A. Smith, op. cit., p. 598 ff.; E. Huntington, Palestine and its Transformation, 1911, pp. 280 f., 295).

Such facilities for games even on the verge of the Empire speak for the universal practice of heathendom. The Christians stood aloof from these displays, and became steeled against them more and more with the lapse of time. In the 3rd cent. 'no member of the Christian Church was allowed to be an actor or gladiator, to teach acting, or to attend the theatre' (A. Harnack, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity<sup>2</sup>, 1908, i. 301).

According to the Talmud, the religious leaders of the Jews were only slightly less rigid, although they could not altogether prevent attendance at the theatre and participation in games of chance (E. Schurer, HJP ii. i. [1885] 32 f., 36).

GANGRENE (Gr. γάγγραινα, 'an eating, spreading sore,' from γαλναιν, 'to gnaw,' AV 'canker.' Two very early translations of 2 Ti 2<sup>17</sup> may be cited: 'Ase holi writ seið, "hore speche spret ase cauncere"' [Ancr. Rules, 98, ann. 1225; see 'canker' in OED]; 'The word of hem crepith as a kankir' [Wyclif, Bible, ed. 1382; changed to 'canker' in 1388 ed. The Vulgate has 'ut cancer']].—Until about A.D. 1600, 'canker' signified corroding ulcerations generally, and was earlier derived from Italian and medical Latin cancro. 'Gangrene' is the term applied to necrosis or mortification of a part of the animal body, attacking especially the extremities, which, as it moves upward, unless arrested, involves more and more healthy tissue, and finally results in death. In its figurative use it symbolizes anything that slowly but surely and malignantly corrupts, depraves, and consumes what is good. The cause of the 'gangrene' referred to in 2 Ti 2<sup>17</sup> is incipient Gnosticism, which subverted the Christian teaching concerning the resurrection, alleging that it had occurred already, in opposition to the belief of the apostles that the resurrection was future, being not merely spiritual but involving the whole man. In Ja 5<sup>3</sup> 'cankered' in the AV is in the RV translated 'rusted.'

GARLANDS (Gr. στέμματα).—This word is found only once in the NT, and it is used in connexion with heathen sacrifices. In the temples of the ancient world it was customary to make large use of floral decoration, and especially of wreaths or garlands, on the occasion of religious festivals. Often the priests, the worshippers, and, in particular, the sacrificial victims, were adorned with such wreaths of flowers or leaves at the time of sacrifice. The Romans had a specific name for the wreath or garland worn by the priest and worshippers when taking part in sacrificial worship—the corona sacerdotalis, or 'priestly garland.' We have repeated references in classical writers of both Greece and Rome to the practice of adorning the sacrificial beasts with garlands or fillets of flowers or leaves (cf. Virgil, Æneid, v. 366; Euripides, Heracleidae, 529). This association of garlands with heathen worship led the early Christians to object to their use altogether (cf. Tertullian, de Corona Militis).

In Ac 14<sup>18-19</sup> we are told that, on the healing of a lame man by the Apostles Paul and Barnabas at Lystra in Asia Minor, the people imagined the wonder-workers to be incarnations of the gods Jupiter and Mercury, and declared, 'The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men' (v. 11). In accordance with this idea, and probably also with a view to reaping the fruits of the religious excitement that had been aroused, the priest of Jupiter brought forth oxen and garlands to the gates of the city for sacrifice (v. 13). The garlands here were wreaths or chaplets of flowers or leaves intended for the victims and probably also for those taking part in the service.

The Gr. word στέφανος, which is usually translated 'crown' in the English version, is more correctly rendered 'wreath' or 'garland,' and, like the στεμματα (fillets) of Ac 14<sup>13</sup>, consisted of leaves or flowers, and was not only used in sacrifices but awarded as a prize to victors in war or at the games (cf. art. CROWN).

GATE.—Two terms, πύλη and πυλών, are rendered 'gate' in EV, but in certain cases the latter is differentiated by 'porch,' 'portals' (Mt 26<sup>1</sup>, Rev 21, RVm passim). The distinction between the two seems to turn upon architectural features. Where the entrance alone is contemplated, πύλη is used; but where the whole complex of buildings bound up with the entrance is present to view, πυλών is the term employed. The pylon is associated mainly with Egyptian Temples, and consists of the imposing towers flanking the gate by which access was given to the court. When the space between these towers was filled in above, the entrance became a portal, and in this sense the term is employed for private houses as well. An interesting example falling within this period is Ac 12<sup>13</sup>, where mention is made of την θύραν τοῦ πυλῶνος. This shows that the portal or gateway was closed by means of a door placed at the end fronting the street. The passage may have been closed in similar fashion at the other end, which opened on the court (see, further, DOOR). A similar use with reference to a private house occurs in Ac 10<sup>17</sup>. In each case the singular is used. With these we have to contrast Ac 14<sup>13</sup>, where the plural is found. Opinion is divided as to whether a private entrance, or the city gate, or the sanctuary precincts should here be understood. The most reasonable interpretation is that the πυλώνες go together with the Temple buildings outside the city (Lystra), being near the point where sacrifice was wont to be made. Barnabas and Paul 'sprang forth,' or 'rushed out,' as probably from the city gate as from a private house. The remaining instances may be classed together (Rev 21<sup>1-13, 15, 21, 25, 22<sup>14</sup></sup>), where the marginal reading 'portals' gives the best conception of what is represented.

In cases where the gate of a city is referred to, πύλη is the usual term. It is used thus of Damascus (Ac 9-4) and Philippi (Ac 16<sup>13</sup>—here AV renders 'city'—a not unnatural substitution). With these instances may be ranked He 13<sup>1</sup>—Christ suffering without the gate (of Jerusalem). We remark the singular form in all but one instance (Ac 9-4, where the plural is warranted). There is one example to be classed alone, which shows how an entrance was filled up. It is found in Ac 12<sup>10</sup>, where the epithet 'iron' applied to gate is attached to πύλη (it would not suit πυλών). Modern structures lead us to think of iron throughout, but it is more likely the gate was of wood and faced with iron. That the more solid form was not impossible we gather from the Temple doors (Jos. BJ vi. v. 3; cf. discoveries at Pompeii, and Vergil, Æn. vi. 552-4). If we accept the addition of Cod. Bezae, seven steps led down from this gate to the level of the street.

The Beautiful Gate of the Temple (Ac 3-10) has been treated under art. DOOR. Although it is spoken of as a gate (πύλη), we have reason to think this was a portal of a very elaborate type (SDB, art. 'Temple').

GAZA (Γάζα).—Gaza, the most southern of the five chief cities of Philistia, was important as the last place of call on the road to Egypt. It was 'the frontier city of Syria and the Desert, on the south-west, as Damascus on the north-east'

(Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, London, 1877, p. 259). Writing about the beginning of the Christian era, Strabo (xvi. ii. 30) describes it as 'once famous, but razed by Alexander [the Great] and remaining deserted' (καὶ μένουσα ἔρημος). The last clause can scarcely be correct, for Gaza was a strong city in the time of Jonathan the Maccabee (1 Mac 11<sup>614</sup>), and it stood a year's siege before it was destroyed by Alexander Jannæus in 96 B.C. (Jos. Ant. xiii. xiii. 3). This was Old Gaza (ἡ παλαιὰ Γάζα), so called by Diodorus and Porphyry (see the references in Schürer, HJP II. i. [Edinburgh, 1885] 70). New Gaza (ἡ νέα Γάζα) was built by Gabinius, Governor of Syria (Jos. Ant. xiv. v. 3), apparently at some distance from the former site (Jerome, Onomast., ed. Lagarde, Göttingen, 1870, p. 125). In the time of Claudius, Mela describes it as 'ingens et munita admodum' (i. 11). It is said to have been destroyed by the Jews in A.D. 65 (Jos. BJ II. xviii. 1), but the ruin cannot have been more than partial. In the time of Eusebius and Jerome it was still a notable Greek city, where paganism stoutly resisted Christianity; and it played an important part in the time of the Crusades. To-day it is a flourishing town of 16,000 inhabitants, built on and around a hill rising 100 ft. above the plain, and separated from the sea by three miles of yellow sand-dunes. Well watered, with broad gardens, and a great olive grove stretching northwards, it drives a considerable trade with the nomadic Arabs.

Gaza is mentioned once in the NT (Ac 8<sup>26</sup>): 'Arise,' said the angel of the Lord to Philip, 'and go toward the south (marg., at noon) unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem to Gaza: the same is desert' (αὕτη ἐστὶν ἔρημος). It is a much-disputed point whether 'the same' refers to the way or to Gaza. (1) If the former interpretation, which is the ordinary one, is right, the tract which the road traversed was 'desert' only in a qualified sense, for the writer expressly states that in passing through it Philip came upon water, in which he baptized the eunuch. The guiding angel's words may refer merely to the solitariness of the road, being spoken 'to bring out Philip's trustful obedience, where he could not foresee the end in view' (J. V. Bartlet, Acts [Century Bible, 1901], p. 214), or simply to prepare him for the uninterrupted interview which he enjoys with the eunuch. It is always possible that 'the same is desert' is a remark added by the narrator himself. (2) G. A. Smith (HGHL, London, 1897, p. 186 ff.) and Cheyne (EBi, 1650) hold that 'the same' (αὕτη) refers to Gaza. The former, to whom it seems impossible to describe any route from Jerusalem to Gaza as desert, suggests that while New Gaza was built by the seashore, the road to Egypt passed the inland and at least comparatively deserted Old Gaza. This view, however, puts a strained meaning upon 'the same,' while Schürer (II. i. 71) holds that the new city, to which αὕτη would naturally refer, also lay inland, probably a little distance to the south of the old. Some scholars (Beza, Hilgenfeld, Schmiedel, and others) have contended that 'the same is desert' is an explanatory gloss. Schmiedel suggests that it was set down in the margin by a reader who had been misled by Strabo, and then incorporated in the text.

GENEALOGIES.—The value attached by the Hebrew people to genealogies is seen in the long and, to modern readers, somewhat wearisome, lists of Scripture. Their exaggerated importance was in some measure due to family pride, which loved an old descent; and therefore it was considered a laudable ambition to build up legendary pedigrees of heroes and founders such as are met with, e.g., in the Book of Jubilees. As Judaism became politically impotent, it took to dreaming of the glories of the past, and there sprang up a 'rank growth of legend respecting the patriarchs and other heroes' (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, Cambridge and London, 1894, p. 136). This genealogical matter is found in Hebrew and in Greek, and appears in both Philo and Josephus.

In the genealogies a religious interest is also apparent. We know from the NT how obstinately the later Judaism clung to the merely positive and perishable precepts of the Law, and how at the same time, under a narrow and literal doctrine of inspiration, the attempt was made to extract nourishment for the spiritual life from every part of the OT. The most fantastic doctrines were drawn, even from the names in the genealogical lists, in the interests of a supposed edification.

For a time Judaism bitterly opposed the Church; then, entering it as Judaistic Christianity, it sought to capture the new movement, in the interests of a sect, by binding upon it the yoke of the Law, which Peter, in the Jerusalem Council, said 'neither our fathers nor we were able to bear' (Ac 15<sup>10</sup>). 'Lastly, it becomes a fantastic heresy inside the Church, and sinks into profane frivolity. "Pretended revelations are given as to the names and genealogy of angels; absurd ascetic rules are laid down as 'counsels of perfection,' while daring immorality defaces the actual life'" (Plummer, The Pastoral Epp. [Expos. Bib., London, 1888], p. 34; also Expositor, 3rd ser., viii. [1888] 42); cf. Rev 2<sup>9</sup> 'I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews and they are not.'

With this 'unwholesome stuff' (Hort, p. 137) there was combined the doctrine of æons of the Jewish philosopher Philo—the incipient Gnosticism of the Colossian heresy. The γυνώσις of the NT is the special lore of those who interpreted mystically the OT, especially the Law (cf. Hort, pp. 139–144). This so-called Gnosticism may be traced through Philo, the Book of Wisdom, and Sirach, 'back to the Persian speculations with which the Jews became familiar during the Captivity' (Dods, Introd. to NT, London, 1888, p. 141 f.). This is the situation, atmosphere, and tendency lying behind the stern rebukes of the Pastoral Epistles.

In 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> the warning is given, μηδὲ προσέχων μύθοις καὶ γενεαλογίαις ἀπεράντοις, αἵτινες ἐκζητήσεις παρέχονται, 'neither to give heed to fables and endless genealogies, the which minister questionings.' These genealogies are 'legendary pedigrees of Jewish heroes' and 'haggadic embroidery of Jewish biographies' (Moffatt, LNT, Edinburgh, 1911, pp. 406, 408). They are called ἀπεράντοι (ἀπᾶς λεγ. in NT)—'endless,' because they led nowhere, and, where all meanings were equally possible and equally worthless, one interpretation was as good as another. 'They minister questionings'—that was their end. 'Fanciful tales merely tickle the ears and loosen the tongue. They have no relation to the serious business of life. . . . They end in conversation, not conversion' (J. Strachan, The Captivity and the Pastoral Epistles [Westminster NT, London, 1910], p. 203, where Kohler is quoted [p. 205]: 'the author can think of no more striking contrast than that between the endless prattle of the false teachers and the gospel of the glory of the blessed God' [1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup>]). Life is a stewardship of God (οἰκονομία θεοῦ), but this 'trashy and unwholesome stuff,' which occupied

'men's minds to the exclusion of solid and life-giving nutriment' (Hort, p. 137), hinders the fulfilment of the trust of life. It is contrary to sound doctrine. It does not belong to the healthy (ὡφελή) mind. In Tit 3<sup>9</sup> the warning is repeated: 'shun foolish questions and genealogies.'

The scornful method adopted by the Pastoral Epistles of dealing with these 'silly questions and genealogies' has been objected to as un-Pauline, and is cited as an argument for the late date of the Epistles. Without raising the question of authorship, one may feel, on general considerations, that, in the interests of the Church, the question was a vital one—should Christianity be allowed to degenerate into a blend of Mosaism and Gentile philosophy or theosophy? Even in religious controversy, rank growths are not to be eradicated with a pair of tweezers. Moffatt's rejoinder (EBi 5083) to McGiffert (Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 402) may be regarded as justified and satisfactory: 'This movement [represented by fables, genealogies, etc.] is met by . . . methods, which seem denunciatory merely because we no longer possess any statement of the other side, and are, therefore, prone to forget that such rough and decisive ways are at times the soundest method of conserving truth. . . . Firmness and even ridicule have their own place as ethical weapons of defence.' See FABLE.

W. M. GRANT.

GENERATION (γενεά, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>: 'a chosen generation,' AV=γένος ἐκλεκτόν='an elect race,' RV).—The use of γενεά in the NT closely reproduces, as in the LXX it translates, the Hebrew יָרָא. The two words, however, reach their common significance from different directions. Etymologically, γενεά expresses the idea of kinship. It signifies descent, or the descendants, from the same ancestral stock; then those of the same lineage who are born about the same time; then the lifetime of such (measured from birth of parent to birth of child), or, more generally, an 'age' or lengthened period of time. The root-idea of יָרָא, on the other hand, is a period of time: hence it comes to mean the people whose lifetime falls approximately within a given period, and finally acquires the genealogical sense of a 'generation' (see Liddell and Scott and Oxford Hebrew Lexicon, s.v.).

In the apostolic writings, the primary meaning of the word is (a) the body of individuals of the same race who are born about the same time (He 3<sup>10</sup>, Ac 13<sup>36</sup>, AV and RVm); but this sense usually passes into that of (b), the period covered by the lifetime of such (Ac 13<sup>36</sup> RV, 14<sup>16</sup> 15<sup>21</sup>, Eph 3<sup>5</sup>); and thus the plural, γενεαί, comes to mean (c) all time, past or future, as consisting in the succession of such periods. In Col 1<sup>6</sup>, 'the mystery hath been hid from the ages and from the generations,' the 'generation' is a subdivision of the 'age' and is added for the sake of emphasis, and in Eph 3<sup>1</sup> the Apostle, struggling to express the idea of the Eternal Future, not only describes it as 'the age of ages' (the age whose component parts are themselves ages), but adds to the picture the endless succession of 'generations' which constitute each 'age'—'unto all the generations of the age of ages' (cf. Ps 102<sup>24</sup>, Enoch ix. 4). Finally (d) the word is used, as often in the OT (Dt 32<sup>5</sup>, Ps 127<sup>24</sup> etc.), with a moral connotation, as in Ph 2<sup>15</sup> and Ac 2<sup>40</sup>. In the latter passage the term has an eschatological colouring. 'This crooked generation' is the present, swiftly transient period of the world's history, which is leading up to the Day of Judgment and the New Age.

GENTILES (τὰ ἔθνη, 'the nations,' as opposed to Israel, ὁ λαός. The opposition comes out clearly in Lk 2<sup>32</sup>, Ac 26<sup>17, 23</sup>, Ro 15<sup>10</sup>. Cf. 'am and goyim in Dt 26<sup>18, 19</sup> 32<sup>43</sup>, Is 42<sup>9</sup>. In Ro 11<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>27</sup> 16<sup>1</sup>, Gal 2<sup>12, 14</sup>, Eph 3<sup>1</sup> ἔθνη=Gentile Christians; but in 1 Co 12<sup>2</sup>, Eph 2<sup>11</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>5</sup> St. Paul lays stress upon the moral separation of such from the ἔθνη [cf. Harnack, Expansion, i. 67, n. 1]. The Vulg. has gentes for ἔθνη, but nearly always Gentilis for Ἑλλην [Ἑλληνίς]. This may have led our translators to render Ἑλλην six times by 'Gentile' [uniformly 'Greek,' however, in RV]. When the Koine [vernacular and business Greek] became the international language, those Jews who spoke it began to apply the handy designation of 'Greeks' to all non-Jews in order to distinguish them from themselves; hence the phrase Ἰουδαῖοι τε καὶ Ἕλληνες came to be the colloquial equivalent of ὁ λαός καὶ τὰ ἔθνη. But there are passages in the NT where Ἕλληνες appears to retain its proper national sense [Ac 16<sup>1, 3</sup> 21<sup>3</sup>, Ro 1<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>22</sup>, Gal 2<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup>; cf. Zahn, Introd. to NT, i. 373; Harnack, Acts of the Apostles, p. 51].—Introductory.—The account of what occurred at Pisidian Antioch when St. Paul and Barnabas preached there the second time (Ac 13<sup>44</sup>) may be taken as a short outline of the principal part of the history of the Apostolic Age. The Jews, filled with jealousy, contradict and rail at the preaching of the gospel. The two apostles then speak out boldly, and say: 'It was necessary that the word of God should first be spoken to you. Seeing ye thrust it from you . . . lo, we turn to the Gentiles.' The Gentiles receive the word with joy, and many of them believe. The history of the Apostolic Age is mainly the history of how Christ was brought to the Gentile world, and how the Jewish nation 'hardened its heart more and more against the appeal of Christianity' (Harnack, op. cit. p. xxx). Add another important feature to the history of this period—that the door which was set wide open for the admission of the Gentiles into the Kingdom of God was kept wide open in spite of the attempt of a large section of the Judæo-Christian Church to shut it—and the outline is complete.

1. The Gentiles and the purpose of God.—When we speak of God's revealing Himself, we mean His opening man's eyes to such a sight of His nature and will as meets a universal want of man's spirit. We believe that, since man's history began, there has never been an age or a country in which 'the Father of spirits' has not entered into close relation with His spiritual children. We agree with Justin Martyr when he says that the wise heathen lived in company with 'The Word,' and that all that they have truly said is part of Christianity (Apol. i. 46, ii. 13). The revelation which most concerns us is the special one contained in the Holy Scriptures. In the OT, it disclosed certain fundamental principles which, when we study them in the light of Christianity, we perceive to have been also promises of a purpose of mercy for the whole world. One is the Unity of God. This implied that God should be the one object of worship to the whole human race. Another is His entering into successive covenants with men of various periods. This pointed to a progressive purpose which should finally be realized in His drawing all men unto Himself. Further, the announcement of His design of blessing all the families of the earth through that family which He chose to be the special depository of His revealed will, was virtually His calling Abraham and his descendants to be fellow-workers with Himself in bringing all nations to love and obey Him. Those principles and promises, understood now in the light of the gospel, convey to us the assurance that the cause of the salvation of the Gentiles is to be found 'in the bosom and counsel of God.'

2. The OT and the Gentiles.—When we turn our attention to the OT on its human side, we meet with a confusing variety of opinions respecting the Gentiles. There is no consistency of view, no authoritative standard of judgment whereby conflicting utterances may be reconciled; and the effect of this is often depressing to those readers who do not bear in mind that 'we have the treasure in earthen vessels,' or that the instruments whom God employed in revealing His will were imperfect men. OT writers often speak of the Gentiles in the language of reprobation. In Ps 9<sup>17</sup> the goyim are synonymous with the resha'im, 'the wicked' (cf. Dt 9<sup>5</sup>); they are the 'am-nābhāl, 'the foolish people,' in Ps 74<sup>18</sup> (cf. Sir 50<sup>26</sup>); they are the bnē-nēkhār, 'the strangers' (in a hostile sense), 'whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood,' in Ps 141<sup>11</sup> (cf. Zeph 3<sup>18</sup>). Israel is strictly prohibited from 'walking in their statutes,' or following their idolatrous practices (hukkōth hag-gōyim [Lv 18<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>23</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>8</sup>]).

The virtues of individual Gentiles, it is true, are often referred to with approval. The native chiefs of Canaan treat Abraham with respect; the Pharaoh who makes Joseph lord of his house calls him 'a man in whom the spirit of God is'; the daughter of the Pharaoh of the oppression is moved with compassion at the sight of the child Moses, and brings him up as her son; Jethro receives Moses when an exile into his family, guides him in the desert, and instructs him in the art of governing; Rahab and Ruth 'take refuge under the wings of the God of Israel,' and their names are in the regal genealogy; Ittai the Gittite cleaves to David, when almost all have forsaken him; the Queen of Sheba comes to hear the wisdom of Solomon; the Tyrian Hiram supplies him with materials when building the Temple, having been 'ever a lover of David'; the widow of Zarephath, nearly destitute herself, feeds the famishing Elijah; and Naaman, the Syrian general, confesses his faith in the God of Elisha as the one true God; Ebed-melech, an Ethiopian slave, rescues Jeremiah from death, and is rewarded with a promise of personal immunity from danger; Job, an Arabian shaikh, is the lofty teacher of how 'to suffer and be strong'; Cyrus the Persian is the Lord's anointed, and the deliverer of His people.

Nor is the fundamental principle of the unity of the human race (Gn 1-11), or of God's having 'made of one every nation of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Ac 17<sup>26</sup>), ever lost sight of by OT writers. He who brought up Israel from Egypt, Amos says (9<sup>7</sup>), is the same God who brought the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir. But neither in this saying nor in the later one about 'all the nations over whom my name has been called' (cf. Driver on Am 9<sup>7</sup>) does the prophet voice the belief that He who made all 'loveth all,' or will admit all into the covenant of His grace.

Very little is taught by the pre-Exilic prophets as to the world being Israel's mission-field, but much is said about God's chastising the nations. In the great post-Exilic book of national consolation the proof of Jahweh's Godhead is followed by the proclamation of salvation to all mankind: 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth' (Is 45<sup>22</sup>). When we read those words, and 'the Servant of the Lord Songs,' with their bright outlook on the Gentile world, the expectation is raised that the missionary calling of Israel is about to be fulfilled. It is true that a beginning was made, but only by the Jews of the Dispersion. The home-Jews, led by Nehemiah, took the course of setting up an impenetrable fence between them and their nearest neighbours. E. G. Hirsch says that the necessities of the situation justified the narrower policy in this case (JE v. 616<sup>a</sup>). But we cannot fall in with this view, when we think of the books of Job, Jonah, and Ruth—of the larger hope of the later Psalmists (Ps 67, 87, 100, 117, 145), and the remarkable assertion of Malachi (1<sup>11</sup>) that the name of God is honoured by the sincere worship offered to Him among the Gentiles from East to West.

From the Wisdom Literature the national feeling against Gentiles is almost entirely absent. But it is far otherwise with Jewish apocalyptic, the Book of Daniel and its numerous extra-canonical successors—far inferior to it in religious value—in which much true spiritual insight is mixed with carnal views and human passion. The noble Maccabean struggle, which was contemporaneous with the rise of this class of literature, saved Israel from becoming hellenized; but it had the result also of intensifying the exclusiveness and intolerance of which Tacitus speaks (Hist. v. 5: 'adversus omnes alios hostile odium').

The teaching of the OT respecting the Gentiles may be characterized as hostile, hesitating, and hopeful by turns. It is to be observed that in many of its most liberal utterances a position of superiority is assigned to Israel. The Gentiles are still servants, not equals. In Is 60<sup>14</sup> they come and bend at Israel's feet as suppliants and vassals. Even in Is 19<sup>3-25</sup>, while Egypt and Assyria are admitted into covenant with God, Israel is still distinguished as His inheritance, His peculiar possession. 'His house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples' (Is 56<sup>7</sup>), but it is Jewish feasts that the nations shall keep there (Zec 14<sup>16-19</sup>), and they shall be joined to Israel by absorption, not by co-ordination (Is 45<sup>20-25</sup>, Jer 12<sup>16</sup>, Zeph 3<sup>9</sup>, Zec 8<sup>20-3</sup>). A great concession in the direction of equality is made in Is 66<sup>1</sup>, if it be Gentiles whom God is to take to minister in His sanctuary; but the promise may relate to Jews of the Dispersion. In the magnificent prophecy of Is 2<sup>2-4</sup>, Mic 4<sup>1-4</sup> the Temple-mountain is still the centre from which the laws of God go forth to the subjects of a kingdom of universal peace. But the material and spiritual elements in this prophecy are combined in a way that the Christian Church will not fully comprehend before the coming of a glory that shall be revealed.

3. Christ and the Gentiles.—Was there present to the mind of Christ, while accomplishing the work of Him that sent Him, a purpose of salvation that included the Gentiles? Did He look beyond 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' to other sheep far off from the mountains of Canaan, who had also to be sought and found? When Satan showed Him the kingdoms of the world, did He turn away from the sight of the world with the repugnance of a Jew of His time, or did the sight move Him to compassion, and enkindle a great hope in His heart? It is not easy to see how the Christian Church can cease believing that Christ had a purpose of mercy for the world, and the expectation of subduing it unto Himself, unless she is to revise her whole doctrine of the Person of her Lord. 'The day and the hour' may be unknown to Christ as the Son, but the Father's purpose of love for the world cannot be unknown; if He be the Son, He must have made that purpose His own.

It has been contended that although His preaching contained 'a vital love of God and men, which may be described as "implicit universalism," the Gentile mission cannot have lain within the horizon of Jesus.' It was the Spirit of Jesus that led His disciples to the universal mission, but He issued no positive command to them to undertake it (Harnack, Expansion, i. 40 ff.). This conclusion is based upon an exhaustive, but biased, exposition of the relevant texts in the Synoptic Gospels, the Fourth being set aside with the frank avowal that it 'is saturated with statements of a directly uni-versalistic character' (p. 47). It is to be admitted that the view in question largely owes its air of credibility to that perplexing feature of the narrative of Acts—the delay of the original apostles in undertaking the Gentile mission. On this delay, which is one of the unsolved problems of Apostolic Christianity, something will be said later. At present, let us endeavour to appreciate the strength of our position by surveying its defences.

(1) As the fundamental principle of the unity of God implied that He was the God of all nations upon earth, so our Saviour's calling Himself 'the Son of man' expressed His universal relation to the human race. And if a reference to Dn 7<sup>13</sup> be admitted, His using the title also pointed to His coming Lordship over the world. There is thus an antecedent probability that Mt 28<sup>18-20</sup>, which so well agrees with the meaning of the title, is a genuine utterance of the Risen Lord.

(2) He accepted the confession at Cæsarea Philippi, 'Thou art the Christ,' with an emotion of which we feel the glow every time we read Mt 16<sup>16-17</sup>. It follows that, from the time when the Voice from heaven had proclaimed Him to be God's Beloved Son, and from the beginning of His 'training of the Twelve,' Jesus had been conscious of His right to 'the name in which all the hopes of the OT were gathered up' (EBi iii. 3063). The announcement of His Death and Resurrection which immediately followed showed what His being the true Messiah meant for Him, although His disciples were 'slow of heart to believe' that it could mean what He said. The OT picture of the suffering Saviour, placed as it was side by side with that of the ruling descendant of David, became, as Ed. König says (Expositor, 8th ser., iv. [1912] 113, 118), dimmed in the centuries preceding His Advent. Christ relumined the whole picture by His suffering, and then by His being 'the first by the resurrection of the dead to proclaim light both to the people and to the Gentiles' (Ac 26<sup>3</sup>).

(3) To His limiting the mission of the Twelve to Galilee and Judæa on His first sending them forth (Mt 10<sup>5-6</sup>), we may apply the words of Is 28<sup>16</sup>: 'He that believeth shall not make haste.' It was consistent with the highest wisdom not to propel them into a wider field than the one in which, with the training they had hitherto received, they could labour with profit. His words, 'Go not into any way of the Gentiles,' reveal His wisdom in another way. By giving His disciples this charge, He abstained from needlessly offending His fellow-countrymen, to whom it was His first object to commend the gospel. His heart's desire for them was that they might be saved; He called the season of His earthly activity among them 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (Lk 4<sup>19</sup>), and, after His departure to heaven, extended their opportunity of 'knowing the things which belonged unto their peace' (cf. Lk 19<sup>42</sup>) for forty years (cf. He 3<sup>9-17</sup>). In the story of the Syrophœnician, we hear Jesus first telling His disciples that He limited His own mission of healing, as He had previously limited theirs, to the afflicted in Israel; but in another moment we see Him recognizing in the illustrious faith with which a poor Gentile woman met His refusal of her petition the indication of His Father's will that those limits should be transcended, and that His saving mercy should go forth to all, without distinction of race, who had faith like hers to receive it. The words reported by St. Mark (7<sup>27</sup>), 'Let the children first be filled,' also suggest that Jesus had in view, when He spoke them, the Gentiles, who should not have long to wait before they too could come to His full table.

(4) If the Gospel of Mark was written 'at the latest in the sixth decade of the first century' (Harnack, Date of the Acts, p. 126), and 'was known to both the other Synoptists in the same form and with the same contents as we have it now' (Wellhausen, Einleitung, p. 57, quoted in Burkitt, Gospel Hist. and its Transmission, p. 64), it follows that the sayings, 'The gospel must first be preached unto all the nations' and 'Whosoever the gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world' (13<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>9</sup>), were put on record in little more than twenty years after they were spoken. 'The Kingdom of God shall be taken away from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof,' is, as Burkitt says (op. cit., p. 188), the motto, the special doctrine, of St. Matthew's Gospel. This sentence occurs in one of the last parables of judgment (21<sup>43</sup>), but other sayings reported before lead up to it, as: 'Many shall come from the east and west'; 'The field is the world'; 'The last shall be first, and the first last' (8<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>38</sup> 20<sup>16</sup>). From St. Luke's account of our Lord's discourse at Nazareth it is clear that His hearers understood the references to the ministries of Elijah and Elisha as pointing to the admission of Gentiles into the Kingdom (4<sup>28</sup>). In Luke, too, Samaritans are exhibited as excelling Jews in compassionate and grateful love (10<sup>33</sup> 17<sup>16</sup>). The value of his report of the commission given by our Lord to His disciples in the upper room (24<sup>47-49</sup>), and repeated at the Ascension (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>), is heightened by the fact that 'it seems now to be established beyond question that both books of this [Luke's] great historical work were written while St. Paul was still alive' (Harnack, Date of the Acts, p. 124).

(5) Finally, as a historical account of certain incidents and crises in the life of Christ which showed Him to be the Son of God (Jn 20<sup>31</sup>), the Fourth Gospel claims to have the authority of an eye-witness behind it. The truth of this claim has never been disproved. This Gospel is the crowning proof that there was present to the mind of our Lord from the beginning a purpose of salvation which comprehended the Gentile world. It clinches the argument, it is the keystone of the arch. For here Jesus calls Himself 'the light of the world,' speaks of 'giving his flesh for the life of the world,' and of 'sending his disciples into the world in like manner as the Father sent him into the world'; to the woman at the well He speaks of the hour when, not the coming to God at the ancient sanctuaries, but the coming to the Father 'in spirit and truth,' will be the mark of the sincere worshipper; He resides two days with the Samaritans; He proclaims to the leaders of the Jewish Church that He has 'other sheep, not of this fold,' whom He must bring, and who will recognize in His voice that of their Shepherd; above all, on the eve of those sufferings whereby He was to enter into His glory, He beholds in certain Greeks desiring to see Him a prospect so satisfying to His heart that, in the exultation of His saving love, He cries: 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.' The preservation of such sayings as these made the work of this Evangelist a gospel of consolation to the Gentile churches of Asia Minor at the close of the 1st cent.; and the assurance of the members of St. John's immediate circle is now ours: 'We know that his witness is true' (21<sup>24</sup>).

4. Preparation of the Gentile world for Christ.—That Christ came into a world which God had slowly been preparing in the course of ages for His appearing was perceived by St. Paul and St. John, each from his own special point of view. St. Paul is thinking of Christ as the Redeemer from sin and its curse when he says that 'God sent forth his Son in the fulness of the time,' and again, that 'Christ died for the ungodly in due season' (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>, Ro 5<sup>6</sup>). St. John is thinking of Christ as the Incarnate Word when he says: 'There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man coming into the world' (1<sup>9</sup> 1<sup>10</sup>); cf. 6<sup>33</sup> tr. by Gwatkin: '[The Bread] is ever coming down, and ever giving life unto the world'. This fascinating subject also engaged the attention of many early Christian writers. Its interest has been heightened in our day by the fuller knowledge brought us by archaeological research and the study of comparative religion. Thus it is now more clearly seen that Christianity, as Pfleiderer said, came as 'the ripe fruit of ages of development in a soil that was already prepared' (Early Christian Conception of Christ, 1905, p. 152).

(1) Philosophy.—The early Fathers often spoke of Greek philosophy as a προπαρασκευή or προπαιδεία for Christ. Plato, whose Timæus marks the transition from the polytheism of early Greek ages to monotheistic belief, exercised a profound influence on religious thought and speculation during the two or three centuries preceding our Saviour's birth; and his teaching was still a living force, although, when St. Paul visited Athens, 'its Acropolis was still as full of idols as it could hold' (Ac 17<sup>16</sup> [Gwatkin]). The Epicureans and Stoics who encountered the Apostle on that occasion (v. 18) represented the two chief Schools of the period; and both Schools, the one by the gentle humanity of its teaching, the other by its moral earnestness, are justly regarded as having a place in the preparation for the Christian faith. The Stoic philosophy, with its watchwords 'Endure' and 'Refrain,' was that with which the Roman mind had most affinity; and its great teacher Seneca († A.D. 65) commended self-discipline and self-renunciation as the true healing of the diseases of the soul, with a passion approaching that of the Christian preacher (Dill, Roman Society, 298, 321; cf. Tertullian, de Anima, xx: 'Seneca sæpe noster: . . .').

(2) Religion.—'The world,' says Dill, 'was in the throes of a religious revolution, and eagerly in quest of some fresh vision of the Divine'; and he has traced in his great work the rise and progress of that 'moral and spiritual movement which was setting steadily, and with growing momentum, towards purer conceptions of God, of man's relations to Him, and of the Life to come' (op. cit., pp. 82, 585). The old Roman religion, which from the Second Punic War had been falling into decay, was revived by Augustus as the formal religion of the State, but could not retard the progress of this movement. People sought satisfaction for their religious cravings and emotions in the rites and mysteries of Eastern lands, which had little in common with old Roman religious sentiment; especially in the worship of Mithra, which, as recent investigation has shown, contained a moral element that made it a real help to a truer and purer life, till in the light of the higher and more effectual help to sanctification held out in Christ it too faded away and was forgotten.

(3) The Empire and social life.—The most signal illustration of the historical preparation of the Gentile world for Christ is seen in the vast extent and wonderful cohesion of the Roman Empire. Its political unity, though not of such a nature as to lead in any marked degree to the recognition of human brotherhood, yet materially helped the diffusion of the message of the Cross and the Resurrection which made men conscious of a new fellowship with each other. Communication between the Imperial city and her officials at a distance was easy and rapid: sandy wastes, trackless mountains, and broad rivers presenting no barriers which she had not been able to overcome. The subject peoples enjoyed under the Romans peace, prosperity, and freedom; and 'just and upright governors were the rule and not the exception' (Dill, p. 3). The good treatment which St. Paul received from Roman officials has often been commented upon; less frequently has it been noted that his missionary journeys were never impeded by military movements or interrupted by an outbreak of hostilities in any part of the Empire.

As to the state of society in Rome and the provinces, attention has been so concentrated upon its darker side, that what there was in it of 'virtue and praise' (Ph 4<sup>8</sup>) has been unduly lost sight of. The lines of Arnold's well-known poem (Obermann Once More), in which he depicts the ennui, hardness, and impiety of the old Roman world (cf. Seneca, de Brev. Vit. xvi. 'tarde ire horas queruntur . . . transilire dies volunt'), are oftener quoted than those in which he also does justice to the sense of void and unslaked thirst which led it to the gospel whereby hope lived again. The intense indignation at corruption and baseness that bars the pen of a Juvenal or a Tacitus bears witness that in a considerable part of society a high standard of virtue still existed. Roman inscriptions, though they hold out no hope of a life beyond, testify to the affectionate regard in which family life was held. Household slavery had its compensations: masters often treated their slaves as humble friends, and felt that they had a moral duty towards them apart from the legal conventions of Rome (for instances, see Dill, p. 181 f.). Many manumitted slaves rose to honourable positions in the service of the State (ib. p. 100). Still another kind of preparation for Christianity is found in the institution of the sodalitia or collegia, which were 'nurseries . . . of the gentle charities and brotherliness' which 'the young Church' was able to teach with greater effect and with more Divine sanctions (ib. p. 271). Enough has been said to indicate the moral resources that lay still undeveloped in Roman society, waiting to be changed into the spiritual wealth of the Kingdom of God (Is 60<sup>5, 11</sup> RV).

5. The Gentile mission.—The call of Jesus, 'Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, that they are white already unto harvest' (Jn 4<sup>35</sup>; cf. Mt 9<sup>37, 38</sup>), was not addressed to the disciples with reference to the coming to Him of the men of Sychar only. It had a wider bearing. At the great harvest festival of Pentecost, which followed the forty days during which He had manifested Himself to them as the Risen Lord, the Twelve made their first day's ingathering of about 3,000 souls; and it was clearly foreshown to them by word and sign that those that were far off were to be made nigh (Ac 2<sup>3, 5, 11, 17, 39</sup>). We should have expected that the apostles, after having been so amply endowed and encouraged for the work of 'making disciples of all the nations,' would have proceeded to adopt measures for entering upon that work. Their delay in undertaking the Gentile mission has been accounted for on the ground that the giving witness at Jerusalem of the Resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and the piloting of the newly launched vessel of the Church, engrossed their attention. But when we study carefully the history of how the Gentile mission was started, we perceive that the Twelve, bold and resolute as the Spirit of Jesus had made them in the face of Jewish opposition, were far from being well qualified for immediately undertaking it. Their question at the Ascension (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>) showed that they did not share the wide outlook of Jesus; their mental horizon was still limited by their national feelings. They had, as the event proved, to count but loss much that at present appeared gain to them, before they could go out into the world and build a Church in which there should be no middle wall of partition. The terms on which Gentiles were to be received had not been explicitly laid down by Jesus in His parting commission: that He had given the apostles other important directions besides those which are recorded is an idea that we cannot entertain. He had made them fully acquainted with the nature of the work to be done, and had promised them the guidance of His Spirit. But the guidance of the Holy Spirit was not intended to supersede the use of their own understanding, or the knowledge that they were to gather from the teaching of events, as to the practical form which this new departure should take.

This is best illustrated by the case of Peter. The first thing that seems to have shaken his Jewish prejudices was the sight of what the grace of God effected among the Samaritans through the gospel (Ac 8<sup>14</sup>); the next, the miraculous conversion of Saul the persecutor (9<sup>7, 28</sup>). We may conjecture that to have time for meditation upon what the latter event meant for the Church was one purpose of Peter's residence at Joppa; and there, while he gazed from the house-top over the waters of the Mediterranean, he received his singular vision, and heard the Voice that interpreted it, 'What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common.' But, having baptized Cornelius and other Gentiles, he did not proceed a step further in the direction pointed out by the Voice which he had heard; the discouraging reception which his admitting a Gentile met with at Jerusalem may partly explain this. Philip the evangelist's baptism of a Gentile had preceded Peter's; we cannot help wondering whether some connecting link existed between Peter's visit to Cornelius of Caesarea and Philip's residence there (Ac 8<sup>38-40</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>).

As far as we can make out, it was not till eight years after Peter's vision that some unknown Cypriote and Cyrenian Jews of the Dispersion took the momentous step of 'preaching the Lord Jesus' to the Gentiles at Antioch (Ac 11<sup>20</sup>, where 'Ελληνες is the true reading). The Gentile mission is thus for ever bound up with the very name of 'Christians'; for 'the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch' (11<sup>26</sup>). We hear the decisive hour of this mission strike in Ac 13<sup>4</sup>: these four verses are among the most important that St. Luke ever wrote.

The work in 'the third city of the Empire' had been greatly blessed. The question was, Could it be extended? Ought the Christians of Antioch to make a serious effort to propagate the gospel in the lands beyond Syria, in Asia Minor and the islands? Barnabas and Saul were well aware that the Lord designed them for a wider mission than that in which they were now engaged; had the time for it arrived? They referred the matter to the congregation, hoping that an expression of the Divine will would be given through one of their gifted prophets. This hope was fulfilled. The Holy Ghost said: 'Separate unto me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them.' The way was then clear; uncertainty was at an end. Another meeting of the congregation was held, probably on the next Lord's day, at which, with fasting and prayer, and by 'the laying on of hands'—the already 'familiar and expressive sign of benediction'—the two apostles were solemnly set apart for the mission; and, having been 'let go,' or 'bidden God speed,' by the whole congregation (ἀπέλυσαν; Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 67), they immediately set forth on their new enterprise. 'So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, went down to Seleucia, and from thence they sailed to Cyprus' (Barnabas's island, to which he would naturally feel that missionary work was first of all due). The Creator-Spirit, who with His Divine breath called the Church into being at Pentecost, thus proclaimed Himself to be the Author of missions and the Patron of missionaries, signifying that their work of showing the things of Christ to all the nations upon earth was His work, and making their preaching of them effectual unto salvation in every part of the Empire. After this, St. Luke's principal object is to describe the triumphant progress of the gospel from Antioch to Rome.

It does not fall within the scope of this article to trace the history of the attempt made by a large section of the adherents of Judaistic Christianity to obstruct and even to wreck the Gentile mission. Before St. Paul's missionary labours were ended, it was evident that this attempt had completely failed. The energetic remonstrance which he had addressed to St. Peter at Antioch on his withdrawing himself from table-fellowship with the Gentiles, and of which we may infer from 1 Co 3<sup>2</sup> that St. Peter had acknowledged the justice, probably had an important effect in settling the question of Gentile rights. Fourteen or fifteen years later, St. Paul had the happiness of testifying to what his eyes had seen of 'the mystery of God' now revealed, 'that the Gentiles are fellow-heirs, and fellow-members of the body, and fellow-partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel' (Eph 3<sup>6</sup>). While Gentile Christianity increased, Judaistic Christianity decreased, and, after losing its local centre at Jerusalem, it became 'the shadow of a shade.' In the striking words of Guthe (EBi 2277), 'When Christianity and Judaism gradually separated, it was as if a mighty river had changed its bed: a feeble current still crept along the old channel, but the main, the perennial stream flowed elsewhere.' (For the countries in which the Gentile mission had gained a footing before the close of the Apostolic Age, see Gwatkin, Early Church Hist. i. 113.)

GIDEON (Γεδών).—Gideon was a man of valour who, according to Jg 6-8, received a visit from Jahweh's messenger, overturned the altar of Baal, saved Israel from the hand of Midian, chastised the men of Succoth, and finally refused a crown. He is merely named in Hebrews (11<sup>32</sup>) among the ancients who wrought great deeds by faith, time failing the author to recount the achievements of all his heroes.

GIFTS.—We may distinguish for the purpose of this article between gifts and giving generally, and the particular endowments which are connoted by the term χαρίσματα, translated in AV and RV 'gifts.'

1. General.—It is clear that in the Apostolic Age the Church had learnt the implications of the fact of the Incarnation. From the literature of the time we note the connexion between the gift of God's grace in Christ, the 'unspeakable gift' (2 Co 9<sup>15</sup>), and the ethical practice of Christ's followers. The Greek verbs δίδωμι and δωρέομαι are hallowed by new associations and duties to which both the theology and ethic of Christianity give notable contributions. Specific deeds of charity and kindness (see ALMS) enter naturally, as the result of our Lord's teaching, into Christian practice (see art. CHRISTIAN LIFE for the appointment of deacons and systematic giving in the Church). The generosity of Stephanas (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>), which impelled him at his own expense to journey to the Apostle with Fortunatus and Achaicus (his slaves), is singled out by St. Paul for special mention, as setting forth a new duty to the Church on the lines of the old Greek leitourgia or service done to the State. The same Epistle (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>) emphasizes the duty of the Christian community in the matter of the collection (g.v.): St. Paul insists on the duty of supporting not only the Church and its ministry but also poorer churches at a distance (2 Co 8<sup>1-5</sup> 9<sup>1-13</sup>) and of supplying a portion for the communion-meal, while his eulogy of cheerful giving (2 Co 9<sup>7</sup>) in general sets the standard and model of Christian liberality and of systematic gifts to spiritual objects, to the support of the poor and helpless (cf. Aristides, Apol. xv.), as well as to the furtherance of the gospel. Philanthropy is bound up with the Christian life and can never be dissociated from it.

The group of words translated 'gift' (δῶρον, δωρεά, δόμα, δοσις, δώρημα) forms an interesting study, upon which see note on Ja 1<sup>17</sup> in J. B. Mayor's Commentary (<sup>3</sup>London, 1910). δώρημα (Ja 1<sup>17</sup>, Ro 5<sup>16</sup>) is used of a gift of God, and so is δωρεά whenever we find it in the NT; δῶρον is used of offerings to God; δόμα (except in Eph 4<sup>8</sup>, a quotation from LXX) is used of human gifts; while δοσις may refer to either a human or a Divine gift. The use of δωρεά as the 'free gift' of God, springing from His χάρις, or 'grace,' is found in Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>45</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>, Ro 5<sup>15</sup>, 17, 2 Co 9<sup>15</sup>, Eph 3<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>, He 6<sup>4</sup>, and is also used by apostolic writers like Clement (cf. 1 Clem. xix. 2, xxiii. 2, xxxii. 1) and Ignatius (Smyrn. vii. 1).

Christ is pre-eminently the gift of God's voluntary favour to the race, and is at once the type and source, along with the Holy Spirit, of all spiritual impartations and endowments. It remains to add that all gifts of love are gifts to God in the apostolic teaching. Gifts of the sacrificial order are mentioned by the author of Heb. in connexion with the Jewish priesthood only to be elevated into the region of Christian thought and to be liberated from the externalism and legalism of the Mosaic system. The gifts of the one High Priest, 'the mediator of a better covenant,' are inward; the new law is written on the heart, and the covenant is one of forgiveness and grace (He 5<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>1ff.</sup>). Likewise, the approach to God by the believer is 'a new and living way' in that it is by the medium of the soul and conscience, unaccompanied by outward gift or sacrifice, except that, like his Lord, the believer offers himself, or rather his body (cf. Ro 12<sup>1</sup>). This is the foundation of all giving, as St. Paul hints in 2 Co 8<sup>5</sup>, the giving up of self to God being the act that hallows all other gifts. The sanctions of Christian magnanimity, practical sympathy, and liberality are rooted in Christian doctrine, and especially its doctrine of God as the eternal love eternally imparting itself and historically manifest in the gift of His Son. The grace of God and His kindness (φιλανθρωπία) have both appeared (Tit 2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>); and the Apostle asks elsewhere 'shall he not with him also freely give (χαρίζεται) us all things?' (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>).

2. Special.—The quotation last given reminds us that χαρίσμα ('charism'), formed from the verb χαρίζομαι, means a 'free gift,' not of right but of bounty. Unlike δωρεά, which has a similar meaning, χαρίσμα comes to be used almost in a technical sense in Christian terminology, of gifts or qualifications for spiritual service. F. J. A. Hort (The Christian Ecclesia, London, 1897, p. 153 f.) thus defines χαρίσμα as used by St. Paul and by one other writer only in the NT, namely St. Peter:

'In these instances it is used to designate either what we call "natural advantages" independent of any human process of acquisition, or advantages freshly received in the course of Providence; both alike being regarded as so many various free gifts from the Lord of men, and as designed by Him to be distinctive qualifications for rendering distinctive services to men or to communities of men.'

Even in the passages in the Pastoral Epistles which refer to the charism of Timothy (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>) Hort does not regard the specific gift of the young Apostle as a supernatural endowment suddenly or by miraculous means vouchsafed for a special mission or service: 'it was a special gift of God, a special fitness bestowed by Him to enable Timothy to fulfil a distinctive function' (p. 185); but also an original gift, capable of being awakened into fresh life* by his own initiative; it was so distinctive as to mark Timothy out as a fit colleague of St. Paul himself, the fitness being authenticated to the Apostle by a prophetic oracle or message, and consecrated by a solemn act of benediction—the laying on of the hands of the body of elders. Schmiedel (EBi, s.v. 'Spiritual Gifts') distinguishes between the non-technical use of χαρίσμα in such passages as Ro 5<sup>15</sup> (where the term means 'the whole aggregate of God's benevolent operation in the universe'; cf. Ro 1<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>29</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>11</sup>), and its technical use elsewhere, where 'charism' and 'charisms' denote distinctive aptitudes on the part of Christians; cf. Ro 12<sup>6</sup> (where 'the grace of God' is mentioned as the source of the several capacities designated), 1 Co 7<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>4</sup> 9. 28. 31, 1 P 4<sup>10</sup>. In the great passage of Eph 4<sup>11</sup> (with which Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Tryph. xxxix. is to be read) the term χαρίσμα is not mentioned, but it is implied in the words 'He gave' (αὐτὸς ἔδωκεν) with which the specification of functions or services commences. The term is not found in the Apostolic Fathers; in the Did. i. 5 it is used only once, and then of temporal blessings in the general sense.

The locus classicus for charisms is 1 Co 12<sup>1-12</sup> and v.<sup>28</sup>, which has to be studied along with Eph 4<sup>11</sup>. The latter, which specifies the ministries of apostles, prophets (see PROPHECY, PROPHET), evangelists, pastors, and teachers, indicates the types of Christian service which tended to become permanent in the life of the Church. The Corinthian passage, on the other hand, in addition to the more stable and authorized modes of ministry, mentions several others of a special order, perhaps peculiar to the Corinthian Church with its exuberant manifestations of spiritual energy, and certainly, as the evidence of later Church history shows, of a temporary character, and exhausting themselves (cf. H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, London, 1909, p. 320) in the Apostolic or sub-Apostolic Age. The Apostle mentions 'diversities of gifts,' 'diversities of ministrations' (διακονιών), and 'diversities of workings' (ἐνεργημάτων); these are but different aspects of the same function; but, whereas the two last are appropriately related to the Lord Christ and God the Father, χαρίσματα are regarded as the graces bestowed by the Holy Spirit

(cf. a similar three-fold relationship with the three Persons of the Trinity in Eph 4<sup>1</sup>). St. Paul mentions, first, charisms of the intellectual order, 'the word of wisdom' and 'the word of knowledge'; second, miraculous gifts: (a) 'faith,' (b) 'gifts of healing,' (c) 'workings of miracles'; third, 'prophecy,' or the gift of spiritual instruction; fourth, 'discerning of spirits,' or the gift of discrimination, the discerning between the true and the false; and finally, 'tongues' and 'the interpretation of tongues' (see TONGUES), or ecstatic powers and the power of interpreting them. Then in 1 Co 12<sup>8</sup> we have the following classification: 'God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, then miracles, then gifts of healings, helps (ἀντιλημψεις), governments (κυβερνήσεις, literally 'piloting'), divers kinds of tongues'; this is a classification of charisms in order of spiritual rank and dignity. It has been suggested that 'helps' and 'governments' indicate the services rendered respectively by 'deacons' and 'bishops,' in which case we have here 'the faint beginnings of the separation of offices' (T. C. Edwards, Comm. on 1 Cor.<sup>2</sup>, London, 1885, in loc.). The absence of any reference to officials later designated as 'bishops,' 'presbyters,' 'deacons,' 'pastors' (in Eph 4<sup>11</sup>), suggests a rudimentary church organization, or rather a purely democratic government in the Christian community at Corinth; and it may be that the profusion of services and functions with the accompanying perils of spiritual pride and disorder suggested to the Apostle the necessity of the more disciplined and edifying forms of service and administration which afterwards prevailed in the apostolic churches. In fact, this is the burden of the Apostle's teaching in 1 Co 14, following on the exhortation to 'covet earnestly "the greater charisms"' (1 Co 12<sup>31</sup>), and the noble hymn (1 Co 13) which sets forth love as 'a still more excellent way' in that it transcends all the χαρίσματα and is the real foundation of the Church. It is love that is to regulate the use of the spiritual gifts, inasmuch as under its influence the individual will subordinate himself to another, will avoid ostentation and self-advertisement, and will do all things 'decently and in order'—that is, he will keep his own place and exercise his particular functions, so that unity may be attained in variety, and each several capacity may be subordinated to the good of the Church as a whole.

As to the meaning and nature of the charisms, guidance must be sought in the particular articles which deal specifically with them; nor can we enter into a detailed examination of the problems which such a classification as 'faith,' 'gifts of healing,' 'workings of miracles' creates. Suffice it to say that, though love is the charism par excellence, the fount and source of all others, faith is second only to it in the order of ethical dignity. It is a charism out of which spring others described in 1 Co 12<sup>9</sup> as 'charisms of healing,' where the plural appears to indicate different powers for healing different forms of disease, and 'workings of powers or miracles.' The relation of faith and its offspring prayer to healing and miracles generally is clearly seen in the Gospels which record our Lord's cures and in His declaration that faith is the sole condition of miracle-working (cf. Mt 17<sup>20</sup>, Mk 11<sup>3-4</sup>); while the use of physical means such as oil (see the notable passage in Ja 5<sup>14</sup>) in combination with prayer is paralleled not only by our Lord's method, but by the method employed by the Twelve in Mk 6<sup>13</sup>. The charisms of miracle-working lasted down to the 2nd cent., if we may trust the evidence of Justin Martyr (Apol. ii. 6); they never were intended, as the extreme faith-healer of to-day contends, to supersede the efforts of the skilled physician; they represent the creative gift, the power of initiating new departures in the normal world of phenomena, which is rooted in faith (see A. G. Hogg, Christ's Message of the Kingdom, Edinburgh, 1911, pp. 62-70); and as such reveal a principle which holds good for all time.

To sum up, an examination of the passages in apostolic literature which treat of spiritual gifts inevitably brings us to the conclusion that the life of the early Church was characterized by glowing enthusiasm, simple faith, and intensity of spiritual joy and wonder, all resulting from the consciousness of the power of the Holy Spirit; also that this phase of Spirit-effected ministries and services was temporary, as such 'tides of the Spirit' have since often proved, and gave way to a more rigid and disciplined Church Order, in which the official tended more and more to supersede the charismatic ministries. At first, as E. v. Dobschütz remarks (Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., London, 1904, p. 283), this strikes us as 'a limitation and a moral retrogression'; but on reflexion we see that while the principle of spiritual gifts as originating in the individual with the immediate action of the Holy Spirit is a permanent truth for the Christian consciousness, the transient character of many of the charismatic gifts is due largely to the abuses to which they were liable. The growing ethical standard of the Church rejected all self-chosen teachers or ministers who were proved by the test of character to be without a Divine call. By their fruits they were known; and the χάρισμα, which, however admirable in itself, was not associated with personal worth and holy influence, could not in the nature of things be recognized as making for edification and order in the Church life. The particular injunctions in the Pastoral Epistles as to the character of bishops and deacons point to a developing sense of Christian fitness in the official life of the Church and a growing feeling for the honour of Christianity. Thus, sooner or later, the true charismatic was sifted from the false charismatic, whose personal vanity and self-seeking nullified all usefulness. The increase of discipline of course had its own perils. Sometimes, as in Jn 3, we detect the narrow intolerance which resented any new influence or development in the Church life, Diotrephes being a type of mind which is ecclesiastically conservative and 'so loses impulses of the greatest value' (E. v. Dobschütz, op. cit., p. 221 f.). To Diotrephes the Ephesian John is a charismatic itinerant preacher, whose letters must be withheld from the Church and whose messengers must not be welcomed. Here we see the seed of conflict, which was afterwards to germinate into the Montanist controversy. But the authority of St. Paul determined once for all the inner character of Christian community life. His symbol of the single body with many members (Ro 12<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>12-27</sup>) shows that he aimed at a unity in which the witness of the individual should have free play and yet be subordinated to the welfare of the community. The Christian Church gave full scope to the individual χάρισμα; nevertheless, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit the impulse towards association, so far from being overpowered, was most powerfully intensified by the encouragement which St. Paul (cf. Harnack, Mission and Expansion, Eng. tr.<sup>2</sup>, i. 433) gave to the development of spiritual capacity in the individual. While pointing to errors of unregulated spiritual enthusiasm, he none the less pleads with his converts to 'quench not the Spirit' and 'despise not prophesyings' (1 Th 5<sup>19</sup>).

GIRDLE.—The references to girdle (ζώνη), the article itself being either expressed or implied, admit of a three-fold classification: (1) The girdle in everyday use, which (a) was put on before one went forth (Ac 12<sup>9</sup>), and (b) was laid aside indoors (Ac 21<sup>11</sup>). From the fact that such a girdle could be used to bind hands and feet, we may infer that it was of soft material, such as linen. (2) The girdle as an article of military wear, which enters into the metaphor of Eph 6<sup>13a</sup>. This transfers us to quite another environment, and to a girdle whose materials were stiffer, e.g. leather or metal, or a combination of these. Presumably (1) and (2) were worn upon the loins, and their use was such as to give rise to the figure of speech which is found in 1 P 1<sup>13</sup> (cf. Lk 12<sup>35</sup>), viz. girding up the loins (of the mind). (3) The girdle in its ornamental aspect, as appearing in Rev 1<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>6</sup>. The epithet 'golden' is to be taken as applicable to cloth and not metal, i.e. the gold was inwrought in a girdle of linen material (cf. Dn 10<sup>5</sup>, a similar passage, where 'pure gold of Uphaz' [Heb.] is rendered βυσσιν in LXX). A noteworthy difference emerges in the location of the girdle, loins (Dan.) being replaced by breasts in Rev. (πρὸς τοὺς μαστοῖς [1<sup>13</sup>], περὶ τὰ στήθη [15<sup>6</sup>]). The girdle is thus an 'upper' girdle, and is suggestive of Greek and Roman custom. See also the description in Josephus, Ant. III. vii. 2. Cf. art. APRON.

GLASS.—See HOUSE, MIRROR, SEA OF GLASS.

GLORY.—It is not proposed to embrace in this article all the words which our English versions render by 'glory'; it is confined to the most important of these—δόξα.

As applied to men and things, δόξα has two principal meanings: (1) honour, praise, good repute (2 Co 6<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>6</sup>); (2) that which by exciting admiration brings honour or renown; a natural perfection (1 P 1<sup>24</sup>: 'the glory of flesh'; 1 Co 15<sup>40, 41</sup>: 'glory of the celestial . . . the terrestrial,' etc.; 1 Co 11<sup>15</sup>: 'long hair is a glory to a woman'); or a circumstance which reflects glory upon one (1 Th 2<sup>20</sup>: St. Paul's converts are a 'glory' to him; Eph 3<sup>13</sup>: St. Paul's sufferings are a 'glory' to his converts; 2 Co 8<sup>23</sup>: worthy Christians are the 'glory' of Christ; Rev 21<sup>24, 26</sup>: the kings of the earth and the nations bring their 'glory' into the New Jerusalem. Cf. Hag 2<sup>7-9</sup>).

Minor significations are (a) that which is falsely regarded as bringing honour to oneself (Ph 3<sup>19</sup>), and (b) persons endued with glory (Jude<sup>8</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>10</sup> = 'dignities' in both AV and RV, the reference probably being to angelic powers).

In the numerous and important passages where the idea of 'glory' is associated with God and the heavenly world, with Christ, Christians, and the Christian life here and hereafter, we find the same two principal meanings. There is the glory which belongs to the Divine Being in itself, in which God manifests Himself to His creatures, so far as such manifestation is possible, and the glory which He receives back from His creatures; the outshining (Erscheinungsform) of the Divine nature, and the reflexion of that outshining in the trust, adoration, and thanksgiving of men and angels, as also in the silent testimony of His works, and especially by the results of the Divine redemption in the character and destiny of the redeemed.

I. 1. The glory which is native to the Being of God.—To the modern mind the chief difficulty of this conception, as presented in the NT, is due to that fusion in it of the physical, the rational, and the ethical, which is characteristic of biblical psychology throughout. In biblical thought these elements are conceived not abstractly, as if constituting separate spheres of being, but as they are given in experience, as inter-dependent and integral to the unity of life. Thus, whatever ethical content comes to be associated with the Glory of God, the basis of the conception is physical—the splendour which is inseparable from the Divine Presence in the celestial world. In the OT, when Jahweh lifts the veil that hides Him from mortal eyes, the medium of theophany is always Light, a supra-mundane but actually visible radiance (which is localized and assumes a definite uniformity in the Shekinah-glory).

For later Judaistic developments, see Weber's Jüdische Theologie, pp. 162 ff., 275 ff. In apocalyptic the 'glory' is definitely associated with the sovereignty of God in the heavenly world (1 En. xxv. 3), and is especially connected with the Divine Throne (ib. ix. 4, xiv. 20). In the Ascension of Isaiah (x. 16, xi. 32) it is equivalent to the Person of God; God is ἡ μεγάλη δόξα. δόξα in this sense of 'radiance' is unknown to ordinary Greek literature. Deissmann's suggestion, that this may have been an ancient meaning which survived in the vernacular and so passed into the dialect of the LXX, seems more probable than Reitzenstein's, who, on the ground of certain magical papyri, claims for it an origin in Egyptian-Hellenistic mysticism.

In the NT the same idea lies behind the use of the concept δόξα. Wherever the celestial world is projected into the terrestrial, it is in a radiance of supernatural light (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, Ac 26<sup>13</sup>, Mt 28<sup>3</sup>, Ac 12<sup>7</sup>, etc.); and this is ultimately the radiance that emanates from the presence of God, who dwells in 'light unapproachable' (1 Ti 6<sup>16</sup>). To this the term δόξα is frequently applied—at Bethlehem (Lk 2<sup>9</sup>), and at the Transfiguration (2 P 1<sup>17</sup>); the 'glory' of God is the light of the New Jerusalem; Stephen looking up saw the 'glory of God' (Ac 7<sup>55</sup>); and the redeemed are at last presented faultless before the presence of His glory (Jude<sup>24</sup>; cf. 1 En. xxxix. 12).

With St. Paul the conception is less pictorial; the rational and ethical elements implicit in it come clearly into view. With him also the δόξα is fundamentally associated with the idea of celestial splendour, to which, indeed, his vision of the glorified Christ gave a new and vivid reality; but the idea of revelation, of the Glory as God's self-manifestation, becomes prominent. St. Paul's thought does not rest in the symbol, but passes to the reality which it signifies—the transcendent majesty and sovereignty that belong to God as God; and for St. Paul the most sovereign thing in God, divinity in the Divine, is the sacrificial sin-bearing love revealed in the Cross. God's glory is displayed in His mercy (Ro 9<sup>23</sup>), in the 'grace' which he freely bestowed upon us in the Beloved' (Eph 1<sup>6</sup>); its perfect living reflexion is in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). Yet it is the glory, not of an ethical ideal, but of the Living God, God upon the Throne, self-existent, supreme over all being. It is especially associated with the Divine κράτος (Col 1<sup>11</sup>, Eph 3<sup>19</sup>) and πλοῦτος (Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, Ph 4<sup>19</sup>, Eph 3<sup>19</sup>) by which the Apostle expresses the irresistible sovereign power and the inexhaustible fullness of God in His heavenly dominion. Believers are 'strengthened with all power, according to the κράτος of his glory,' i.e. in a measure corresponding with the illimitable spiritual power signified by the glory which manifests the Divine King in His supra-mundane Kingdom. Every need of believers is supplied 'according to his riches in glory, in Christ Jesus' (Ph 4<sup>19</sup>), i.e. according to the boundless resources which belong to God as Sovereign of the spiritual universe, and are made available through Christ as Mediator. Christ is raised from the dead through 'the glory of the Father' (

Ro 6<sup>4</sup>). The precise sense of this expression has not yet been elucidated (in Pss.-Sol. xi. 9 there is what seems to be a parallel to it: ἀναστήσαι Κύριος τὸν Ἰσραὴλ ἐν δυνάμει τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ), but it would seem that the 'glory of the Father' is practically equivalent to the κράτος, the sovereign act of Him who is the 'Father of glory' (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>). To formulate is hazardous; but perhaps we may say that for St. Paul the δόξα is the self-revelation of the transcendent God, given through Christ, here to faith, in the heavenly world to that more direct mode of perception which we try to express by saying that faith is changed to sight.

2. The Divine glory as communicated.—(a) As originally given to man, it has been lost (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>).

According to Rabbinic doctrine, when Adam was created in the image of God, a ray (וַי) of the Divine glory shone upon his countenance, but among the six things lost by the Fall was the וַי, which went back to heaven (Weber, Jüdische Theologie, p. 222). At Sinai the וַי was restored to the children of Israel, but was immediately lost again by their unfaithfulness (ib. p. 275). There can be little doubt that this pictorial rendering of spiritual truth lies behind the Apostle's peculiar mode of expressing the fact of man's universal failure to represent the Divine ideal (see Sanday-Headlam loc. cit.). The same allusion may possibly serve to explain the obscure passage, 1 Co 11<sup>7</sup>.

(b) But the departed glory is more than restored in Christ, the second Adam, to whom as the Image of God it belongs (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>), who is the Lord of Glory (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>), and in whose face it shines forth in the darkened hearts of men, as at the Creation light first shone upon the face of the earth (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). Here the conception is emphatically ethical; it is above all the glory of Divine character that shines from the face of Christ and in the hearts of believers. Yet here again the glory is not that of an ethical ideal merely; it is the full, indivisible glory of the Living God of which Christ is the effulgence (ἀπαύγασμα [He 1<sup>3</sup>]).

(c) By Christ as Mediator the Divine glory is communicated, not only to believers, but to every agency by which He acts: the Spirit (1 P 4<sup>14</sup>, Eph 3<sup>18</sup>), the gospel (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup>), the 'mystery'—God's long-hidden secret, now revealed, the eternal salvation of men by Christ (Col 1<sup>27</sup>). The whole Christian dispensation is characterized by 'glory' (2 Co 3<sup>7-18</sup>). As the inferior and temporary nature of the old dispensation is typified in the veiled and fading splendour of Moses, its mediator, the perfection and permanence of the new are witnessed in the unveiled and eternal glory of Christ, which is reflected partly here, more fully hereafter, on His people (a merely figurative interpretation is excluded by the very terms εἰκὼν and δόξα). Their transfiguration is in process—already the 'Spirit of glory and the Spirit of God' rests upon them (1 P 4<sup>14</sup>); at His appearing it will be consummated (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>, Jn 3<sup>3</sup>).

(d) In the majority of cases in which 'glory' is predicated of Christ, of Christians, and of the environment of their life, the sense is distinctly eschatological. The sufferings of Christ are contrasted with their after-glories (1 P 1<sup>14-17</sup>); also those of believers (1 P 4<sup>18</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). As already in Jewish eschatology, δόξα is a technical term for the state of final salvation, the Heavenly Messianic Kingdom in which Christ now lives and which is to be brought to men by His Parousia. This is the 'coming glory' (Ro 8<sup>18</sup>), 'about to be revealed' (1 P 5<sup>1</sup>), the 'inheritance of God in his saints' (Eph 1<sup>18</sup>) unto which they are prepared beforehand (Ro 9<sup>23</sup>), called (1 P 5<sup>10</sup>), led by Christ (He 2<sup>10</sup>); it is their unwithering crown (1 P 5<sup>11</sup>), the manifestation of their true nature (Col 3<sup>4</sup>), their emancipation from all evil limitations (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>); in the hope of it they rejoice (Ro 5<sup>2</sup>); for it they are made meet by the indwelling of Christ (Col 1<sup>27</sup>) and by the discipline of the present (2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>).

II.—The second chief sense in which 'glory' is predicated of God or Christ is that which may be termed ascriptional in contrast with essential. Passing over the strictly doxological passages, we note that 'glory' is given to God (or to Christ) (a) by the character or conduct of men: by the strength of their trust (Ro 4<sup>9</sup>), in eating, drinking, and all that they do (1 Co 10<sup>31</sup>), by thanksgiving (2 Co 4<sup>15</sup>), brotherly charity (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>), the fruits of righteousness (Ph 1<sup>11</sup>), repentance and confession of sin (Rev 16<sup>9</sup>); (b) by the results of God's own saving work, the Exaltation of Christ (Ph 2<sup>11</sup>), the faithful fulfilment of His promises in Christ (2 Co 1<sup>9</sup>), the reception of both Jews and Gentiles into the Church (Ro 15<sup>7</sup>), the predestination of believers to the adoption of children (Eph 1<sup>5</sup>), the whole accomplishment of that predestination, by faith, the sealing of the Spirit, and final redemption (Eph 1<sup>14</sup>), by the marriage of the Lamb, the final and eternal union of Christ with the redeemed, sanctified, and glorified Church (Rev 19<sup>7</sup>).

LITERATURE.—There is, so far as known to the present writer, no satisfactory monograph on the subject, either in English or in German. W. Caspari, Die Bedeutungen der Wortsippe כבוד im Hebräischen, Leipzig, 1908, is not without value for the student of the NT. H. A. A. GNOSTICISM.—Gnosticism (Gr. γνῶσις, 'knowledge') is the name of a syncretistic religion and philosophy which flourished more or less for four centuries alongside Christianity, by which it was considerably influenced, under which it sheltered, by which at last it was overcome. Gnosis is first used in the relevant specific sense in 1 Ti 6<sup>9</sup>: γνῶσις ψευδώνυμος—'science falsely so-called.' By Christian writers the word 'Gnostics' was at first applied mainly to one branch: the Ophites or Naasenes (Hippol. Philos. v. 2: 'Naasenes who call themselves Gnostics'; cf. Iren. i. xi. 1; Epiphanius Hær. xxvi.). But already in Irenæus the term has a wider application to the whole movement. Gnosticism rose to prominence early in the 2nd cent. though it is much older than that, and reached its height before the 3rd century. By the end of the latter century it was waning.

The above description will require justification. What may be termed the popular view of Gnosticism has been to regard it as a growth out of Christianity, an overdone theologizing on the part of Christians, who under foreign influences simply carried to extreme lengths what had been begun by apostles. Meantime it may be said that, in the view of the present writer, such a theory is an entire misconception, and historically untenable. Gnosticism and Christianity are two movements originally quite independent, so much so that it would scarcely be an exaggeration to say that, had there been no Christianity, there could still have been Gnosticism, in all essentials the Gnosticism we know.

1. Authorities.—Of the vast literature produced by Gnostics little has survived, and what has survived is almost entirely from the last stages of the movement. We may mention as survivals Pistis Sophia, the Coptic-Gnostic texts of the Codex Brucianus, the two Books of Jeu, and an unnamed third book described by C. Schmidt, 'Gnost. Schrift' in kopt. Sprache aus dem Codex Brucianus' (TU viii. [1892]). Then we know something of works deeply tinged with Gnosticism, such as the Acts of Thomas. But our chief sources of knowledge are the writings of those Fathers who oppose Gnosticism, and who often give lengthy quotations from Gnostic works. These fragments have been carefully collected by Hilgenfeld in his Ketzergeschichte. Most important of the Fathers for our purpose are Irenæus (adv. Hær. i. 4), Hippolytus (Philosophoumena), Clement of Alexandria (Stromateis, Excerpta ex Theodoto), Tertullian (adv. Marcionem, adv. Hermogenem, adv. Valentinianos), Epiphanius (Panarion).

2. Main features of Gnosticism.—Gnosticism has often been described as a hopelessly tangled mass of unintelligible fantastic speculations, the product of imagination in unrestrained riot, irreducible to order. In its various, and especially its later forms, it shows a wealth of details which are fantastic, but, if we do not lose ourselves in too keen a search for minutiae, we shall find in it an imposing and quite intelligible system. Probably Gnostics themselves regarded as unessential those details which to us seem so fantastic (cf. Rainy, Ancient Catholic Church, p. 119). Gnostic schools generally were at one in holding a system the main features of which were as follows.

(1) A special revelation.—The word γνῶσις has misled many into thinking that Gnostics are essentially those who prize intellectual knowledge as superior to faith. By gnosis, however, we have to understand not knowledge gained by the use of the intellect, but knowledge given in a special revelation. Not greater intellectual power than the Christians possessed, but a fuller and better revelation, was what the Gnostics claimed to have. They took no personal credit for it; it had been handed down to them. Its author was Christ or one of His apostles, or at least one of their friends. In several cases they professed to be able to give the history of its transmission. Thus Basilides claims Glaucias, an interpreter of St. Peter (Strom. vii. 17 [766], 106 f.), or Matthias (Hipp. vii. 20). Valentinus claims Theodas, an acquaintance of St. Paul's (Strom. loc. cit.). The Ophites claim Mariamne and James (Hipp. v. 7). Or they appealed to a secret tradition imparted to a few by Jesus Himself (so Irenæus frequently).

(2) Dualism.—This is the foundation principle of all Gnostic systems, and from it all else follows. In the ancient world we meet two kinds of dualism, one in Greek philosophy, the other in Eastern religion. Greek dualism was between φαινόμενα and νοούμενα, between the world of sense-appearance and the realm of real being. The lower was but a shadow of the higher; still it was a copy of it. The contrast was not, to any great extent at least, between the good and the evil, but between the real and the empty, formless, unreal. Eastern dualism, on the other hand, drew a sharp distinction between the world of light and the world of darkness, two eternal antagonistic principles in unceasing conflict. In Gnosticism we have a primarily Eastern dualism combined with the Greek form. The world of goodness and light is the Pleroma ('fullness'), i.e. the realm of reality in the Greek sense; the kingdom of evil and darkness is the Kenoma ('emptiness'), the phenomenal world of Greek philosophy. Hence the Gnostic dualism comes to be between God and matter, two eternal entities, and the ὕλη ('matter') is essentially evil.

(3) Demiurge.—As the Gnostic surveyed the world of matter, he found patent traces of law and order ruling it. How did matter, in itself evil and lawless, come to be so orderly? The Gnostic took the view of Nature which J. S. Mill took, and argued that either the Creator was not all-good or He was not all-powerful. The Gnostic reasoned that the world which with all its order is yet so imperfect cannot be the work of God who is wholly good and all-wise; it must be the production of some far inferior being. The world, then, it was taught, was the work of a Demiurge—a being distinct from God. The character of this Demiurge was variously conceived by different schools; some, e.g. Cerinthus, made him a being simply ignorant of the highest God. The tendency became strong, however, to make him hostile to God, an enemy of Light and Truth (the blasphemia Creatoris). The God of the Jews was identified with this Demiurge. As to the origin of the Demiurge, some held him to belong ab initio to the realm of evil. But the characteristic view was that he was a much-removed emanation from the Pleroma. This theory of emanations is a prominent feature of most of the systems, and it is here that Gnosticism ran into those wild fancies that to some make the whole system so phantasmagoric. The view was that from God there emanated a series of beings called 'Æons,' each step in the genealogy meaning a diminution of purity; and the Demiurge was the creation of an Æon far down, indeed the very lowest in the scale. Nature and human nature, then, are productions of a Demiurge either ignorant of, or positively hostile to, the true God. While in a few schools there was only one Demiurge, most spoke of seven as concerned in cosmogony. The origin of this is clear. The seven are the seven astronomical deities of Perso-Babylonian religion. The fusion of Persian and Babylonian views resulted in those deities, originally beneficent, being conceived of as evil (Orig. c. Cels. vi. 22; Zimmern, KAT ii. 620 ff.).

(4) Redemption.—Christian and Gnostic agree in finding in this world goodness fettered and thwarted by evil. They differ entirely in their conception of the conflict. The familiar Christian view is that into a world of perfect order and goodness a fallen angel brought confusion and evil. The common Gnostic view is that into a world of evil a fallen Æon brought a spark of life and goodness. The fall of this Æon is variously explained in different systems, as due to weakness (the Æon furthest from God was unable to maintain itself in the Pleroma), or to a sinful passion which induced the Æon to plunge into the Kenoma. Howsoever the Æon fell, it is imprisoned in the Kenoma, and longs for emancipation and return to the Pleroma. With this longing the world of Æons sympathizes, and the most perfect Æon becomes a Redeemer. The Saviour descends, and after innumerable sufferings is able to lead back the fallen Æon to the Pleroma, where He unites with her in a spiritual marriage. Redemption is thus primarily a cosmical thing. But in redeeming the fallen Æon from darkness, the Saviour has made possible a redemption of individual souls. To the Gnostic, the initiated, the Saviour imparts clear knowledge of the ideal world to be striven after, and prompts him so to strive. The soul at all points, before and after death, was opposed by hostile spirits, and a great part of Gnostic teaching consisted in instructing the soul as to how those enemies could be overcome. Here comes in the tangle of magico-mystical teaching, so large an element of the later schools. All sorts of rites, baptisms, stigmatizings, sealing, piercing the ears, holy foods and drinks, etc., were enjoined. It was important also to know the names of the spirits, and the words by which they could be mastered. Some systems taught a multitude of such 'words of power'; in other systems one master word was given, e.g. caulacau (Iren. I. xxiv. 5).

(5) Christology.—Gnosticism in union with Christianity identified its Saviour, of course, with Jesus. As to the connexion see below. All Christianized Gnostics held a peculiar Christology. Jesus was a pure Spirit, and it was abhorrent to thought that He should come into close contact with matter, the root of all evil. He had no true body, then, but an appearance which He assumed only to reveal Himself to the sensuous nature of man. Some, like Cerinthus, held that the Saviour united Himself with the man Jesus at the Baptism, and left him again before the Death. Others held that the body was a pure phantom. All agreed that the Divine Saviour was neither born nor capable of death. Such a view of Christ's Person is Docetism, the antithesis of Ebionism.

(6) Anthropology.—Man is regarded as a microcosm. His tripartite nature (some had only a bipartism)—spirit, soul, body—reflects God, Demiurge, matter. There are also three classes of mankind—carnal (υλικοί), psychic (ψυχικοί), spiritual (πνευματικοί). Heathen are hylic, Jews psychic, and Christians spiritual. But within the Christian religion itself the same three classes are found; the majority are only psychic, the truly spiritual are the Gnostics. They alone are the true Church.

(7) Eschatology.—While Gnostics alone were certain of return to the Kingdom of Light, some at least were disposed to think charitably of the destiny of the psychics, who might attain a measure of felicity. Gnostics denied a resurrection of the body, as we should expect. The whole world of matter was to be at last destroyed by fires springing from its own bosom.

(8) Old Testament.—While there existed a Judaistic Gnosticism, represented by Essenes, Gnostic Ebionites, and Cerinthus (qq.v.), who with various modifications accepted the OT, the great mass of Gnostics were anti-Judaistic, and rejected the OT. This followed logically from their identification of the God of the Jews with the Demiurge, an ignorant, and in some cases an evil, Being. No doubt they found also some plausible support in Pauline anti-Judaism. We can see here what ground some schools could have for making heroes of the characters represented as wicked in the OT. If it was inspired by an ignorant or wicked Being, truth would be found by inverting its estimates.

Such in outline is Gnosticism as a system, though schools varied in detail under every heading (cf. Harnack, Dogmengeschichte; P. Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr., London, 1903-04; Schaff, Church History, 'Ante-Nicene Christianity').

(9) Gnostic cultus and ethic.—The full development of these (as of the whole system), of course, lies outside our period, but of the latter we see the tendencies in the NT itself; and it is desirable to say something of the former, to make our sketch of the main features of Gnosticism complete.

(a) As to cultus, Gnosticism produced two opposite movements which are comparable with puritanism and ritualism respectively. The abhorrence of matter led some consistently to the utmost simplicity of worship. Some rejected all sacraments and other outward means of grace, and the Prodigians rejected even prayer (Epiphanius, Hær. xxvi.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 15 [304], vii. 7 [722]). On the other hand, many groups, especially the Marcosians, went to the opposite extreme with a symbolic and mystic pomp in worship. This, while inconsistent with the Gnostic views of matter, is in line with the ideas of magico-mystical salvation indicated above. Sacraments were numerous, rites many and varied. It seems clear that they led the way in introducing features which became characteristic of the Catholic Church. They were distinguished as hymn-writers (Bardesanes, Ophites, Valentinians). The Basilideans seem to have been the first to celebrate the festival of Epiphany. The Simonians and Carpocratians first used images of Christ and others (see Church Histories of Schaff, Kurtz, etc.).

(b) The ethic also took two directions—one towards an unbridled antinomianism, the other towards a gloomy asceticism. Antinomian Gnostics (e.g. Nicolaitans, Ophites) held that sensuality is to be overcome by indulging it to exhaustion, and they practised the foulest debaucheries. The Ascetics (e.g. Saturninus, Tatian) abhorred matter, and strove to avoid all contact with flesh as far as possible. This led them to forbid marriage and indulgence in certain kinds of food. This ethic in both branches is the unflinching outcome of the primary dualism characteristic of Gnosticism. Wherever dualistic notions are influential, we find this twin development of antinomianism and asceticism. In the NT we find both kinds of error referred to (see below). It is to be remembered that neither by itself is sufficient to indicate Gnosticism. There are many sources conceivable, for asceticism especially.

3. Origins.—The older view was that Gnostics are Christian heretics, i.e. errorists within the Church who gradually diverged from normal Christianity, under an impulse to make a philosophy of their religion. To fill up the blanks of the Christian revelation, they adopted heathen (mainly Greek) speculations. Mosheim was among the first to perceive that the roots of what is peculiar in Gnosticism are to be sought in Eastern rather than in Greek speculation. In recent times there has taken place a thorough examination of all Gnostic remains, and knowledge of Eastern speculation has advanced. The result of the two-fold investigation has been to show that Gnosticism is far more closely in affinity with Eastern thought than had been imagined, not only in its deviations from Christianity, but as a whole.

It is well known that the age with which we deal was marked by nothing more strongly than by its syncretism. All the faiths and philosophies of the world met, and became fluid, so to say. Strange combinations resulted, and were dissolved again for lack of something round which they might crystallize. Alike in philosophy and religion, attempts were made to establish by syncretism a universal system out of the confusion. Gnosticism owes its being to that syncretism. In view of the lack of definite information, any attempt to trace or reconstruct its actual history must be made with diffidence. Probably we should regard its primary impulse as philosophical rather than religious. It was an answer to the problem, Whence comes evil? (Tert. de Præsc. Hær. vii.; Euseb. HE v. 27; Epiphani. Hær. xxiv. 6). This led to the other question, What is the origin of the world? Oriental thought identified the two questions. In the origin of the world was involved the existence of evil. A full explanation of the one included an explanation of the other.

In Perso-Babylonian syncretism, we take it, Gnosticism has its primary root, and from that alone many of its features may be plausibly derived. To this is to be added some influence of Judaism. There was a syncretistic Judaism of varied character. We know definitely of three forms: (1) Essenic (see art. ESSENES); (2) Samaritan, which had been going on for centuries B.C., and from which sprang the system of Simon Magus (with his predecessor Dositheus, and his successor Menander), who is distinguished by the Fathers as the parent of Gnosticism; (3) Alexandrian, represented mainly by Philo, who produced an amalgam of Judaism with Greek philosophy. Probably it would be justifiable to add as a fourth example the Jewish Kabbala. It is a body of writings unfolding a traditional and, partly at least, esoteric doctrine. Its most characteristic doctrines are found also in the two Gnostic leaders, Basilides and Valentinus (A. Franck, La Kabbale, Paris, 1843, p. 350 ff.). It is difficult, however, to prove that the Kabbalā is not later than Gnosticism, though there is practical certainty that its history was a long one before it took final shape.

A third and very important element manifest in the fully developed Gnostic systems is Greek philosophy. Genetically, then, Gnosticism may be defined as largely a syncretistic system rising from Perso-Babylonian religion, modified to some extent, difficult to estimate, by Judaism, and in some particulars borrowing from, and as a whole clarified by contact with, Greek philosophy. These elements might be effective in very varied degrees, and produced varied systems as this or that element predominated. But from those three sources, apart altogether from Christianity, Gnosticism in all essentials may be derived. And all three were in active interaction before the appearance of Christianity. An important consideration follows, viz. that it is absolutely no proof of a late date for any NT writing that it contains allusions to even a comparatively well-developed Gnosticism.

4. Connexion with Christianity.—How is this connexion to be conceived or explained? What did Gnosticism owe to Christianity? Before Christianity we picture Gnosticism as vague, fluid, unstable. When Christianity was thrown into the mass of floating opinions in the ancient world, it afforded the vague Gnostic movements a point round which they could crystallize and attain a measure of permanence and definiteness, so that out of more or less loose speculations systems could be built. Men imbued with Gnostic views (the loose elements of the system described) would easily find points of resemblance between themselves and Christianity. It dealt in a way with the very problems that interested the Gnostic. And in apostolic teaching, especially in St. Paul, there were many points which it took little ingenuity to transform into Gnostic views. The world was to be overcome; it lay in wickedness; the flesh was to be mortified; there was a law in the members warring against the spirit. Divorced from the general teaching of the apostles, this could be claimed as just the Gnostic position. It is, we take it, a misconception to regard such apostolic teaching as the starting-point of Gnosticism. In our view Gnosticism had already a considerable history, and had attained a considerable development as a system, before Christianity appeared. But in such teaching Gnosticism found points of attachment to Christianity, and other points might be added. Gnosticism then came to shelter within the Church, never learning her essential spirit, but going on its own evolution. Growing at first from distinct roots of its own, it twined itself about the Church and became a parasite.

It is not easy to answer the question, Is the soteriology of Gnosticism borrowed from Christianity, or is it too an independent thing? Some points are quite plain which may justify our accepting the latter alternative. It is clear that between the Gnostic Σωτήρ (Saviour) and the historical Jesus there is no discernible likeness. The redemption of the fallen Æon by the Soter has nothing to do with a historical appearance on earth and in time. The Gnostic redemption-story is a myth, an allegory, not a historical narrative. But under the influence of Christianity, laborious attempts were made to bring this soteriology into union with the Christian account of the historical Jesus. The attempt was not a success. 'In this patchwork the joins are everywhere still clearly to be recognized' (EB,<sup>11</sup> xii. [1910] 157*). Indeed some Gnostics made no secret of the difference between their Soter and the Christ of ordinary Christians—the Soter was for Gnostics alone, Jesus Christ for 'Psychics' (Iren. i. vi. 1). The fact that one school required its members to curse Jesus is not without significance in the same direction. The most probable view is that Gnosticism in all its elements was independent of Christianity, but strove to put over itself a Christian guise, and represent itself as a fuller Christianity. But even the master minds which formulated the great systems of the 2nd cent. were baffled to conceal effectively what could not be hidden, the essentially alien nature and origin of their speculative flights.

5. Allusions in the NT.—In the NT there are several clear indications that the invasion of Christianity by Gnosticism is already in progress.

(1) We note regarding Simon Magus (Ac 8<sup>9a</sup>) only this, that in the narrative we have an allegory of what we conceive the relation of Gnosticism to Christianity to have been. He was attracted to the apostles, was baptized, and still remained in the 'bond of iniquity.' For this alone he may well be named the father of the Gnostics (see art. SIMON MAGUS).

(2) There are some passages which seem not only to be designed to state the Christian position, but to be directed against errors characteristic of Gnosticism: (a) against Docetism; most striking is He 2<sup>14-18</sup>; (b) against the demiurgic idea (Jn 1<sup>3</sup>, He 1<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>16a</sup>).

(3) A definite polemic against errorists who are almost certainly Gnostics is found in the following passages:

(a) Colossians.—The errorists in question claim a superior knowledge (2<sup>8-18</sup>), pay great regard to angels—beings intermediate between God and man (v. 18)—teach asceticism (vv. 21-23); and probably their demiurgic notion is refuted in 1<sup>6</sup>. These are the elements of Gnosticism, and most likely the Colossian errorists are Judaistic Gnostics of the same type as Cerinthus.

(b) Pastoral Epistles.—The references to Gnosticism are so clear here that some find in them a main ground for assigning a late date to the Epistles. Gnosticism has already appropriated the name γνῶσις (1 Ti 5<sup>9</sup>). The errorists profess a superior knowledge (Tit 1<sup>6</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>7</sup>). Their profane and vain babblings (2 Ti 2<sup>16</sup>), old wives' fables (1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>), foolish questions and genealogies (Tit 3<sup>9</sup>), denial of the resurrection of the body (2 Ti 2<sup>18</sup>), asceticism and depreciation of 'creatures' (1 Ti 4<sup>3-4</sup>), and in other cases their antinomianism (2 Ti 3<sup>6</sup>, Tit 1<sup>16</sup>)—all are tokens of Gnosticism.

(c) Peter and Jude.—The gross errorists denounced in 2 P 2 and Jude show close affinity with the Ophite sect, the Cainites (q.v.) (Hippol. viii. 20; Strom. vii. 17 [767]; Epiph. Hær. xxxviii.). They made Cain their first hero; and, regarding the God of the Jews as an evil being, and the Scriptures as, in consequence, a perversion of truth, honoured all infamous characters from Cain to Iscariot, who alone of the apostles had the secret of true knowledge. Naturally, they practised the wildest antinomianism, holding it necessary for perfect knowledge to have practical experience of all sins. The 'filthy dreamers,' who 'speak evil of dignities' and 'go in the way of Cain,' are certainly closely allied to this position.

(d) 1 John.—There is throughout a contrast between true knowledge and false. Beyond reasonable doubt the Epistle has mainly, if not exclusively, Cerinthus in view. He is interesting in the history of heresy for his combination of Ebionite Christology with a Gnostic idea of the Creator (see art. CERINTHUS). It is mainly the former that is in view in 1 John (2<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>3a</sup>), but 2<sup>4-9</sup> are directed against Gnostic antinomianism.

(e) Revelation.—Here we have definite mention of a Gnostic sect, by name the Nicolaitans (2<sup>6-15</sup>). They derived their name from Nicolas of Ac 6<sup>5</sup>. 'They lead lives of unrestrained indulgence, . . .

teaching that it is a matter of indifference to practise adultery, and to eat things sacrificed to idols' (Iren. Hær. i. xxvi. 3). Clem. Alex. (Strom. iii. 4 [436 f.]) says that the followers of Nicolas misunderstood his saying that 'we must fight against the flesh and abuse it.' What Nicolas meant to be an ascetic principle, they took to be an antinomian one.

We have notice of another branch of antinomian Gnosticism in 2<sup>9</sup>, where the 'prophetess Jezebel' in Thyatira is 'teaching and seducing' the faithful.

Gnosticism thus plays no inconsiderable part in the NT itself. It is, however, to exaggerate that, to find references to Gnosticism in verses where terms occur that afterwards became technical terms in Gnostic systems, viz. pleroma (e.g. Eph 1<sup>23</sup>), æon (e.g. Eph 2<sup>2</sup>), gnosis (frequently). These had meaning before Gnostic systems made them peculiarly their own, and the passages in question may be understood without any reference to Gnosticism.

6. Concluding remarks.—If it be difficult to indicate accurately what Gnosticism owed to Christianity, it is no less difficult to determine to what extent Christianity was permanently influenced by Gnosticism. Theological prejudice will always affect the answer, and some will find in the Christological and other definitions of Ecumenical Councils a fruit of what Gnostics began. It is easy to see what indirect service Gnosticism rendered Christianity. In opposition to Gnosticism the Church was compelled (a) to develop into clear system her own creed; the true γνῶσις had to be opposed to the false; (b) to determine what writings were to be regarded as authoritative; against the Gnostic schools, each with its own pretended special revelation, the Church formed a Canon of what were generally regarded as authentic apostolic writings; (c) to seek for a just view of the relation of Judaism to Christianity, and of the permanent value of the OT which Gnostics rejected. This is, it may be said, an unsolved problem still. In opposition to Gnosticism the Church was perhaps betrayed into the other extreme, as, to secure permanent authority for every part of the OT, a fanciful system of allegorizing was adopted.

As to direct influence, we have indicated above that Gnostics led the way in some developments of worship which found a permanent place in the Catholic Church. Probably also they led the way to the magical conception of Sacraments which became so prominent. The clearness with which the false character of Gnosticism was perceived, and the successful struggle against it, are among the most remarkable and praiseworthy things in the history of the early Church. It remains to be said that the various phenomena which constitute Gnosticism have appeared again and again in the history of the Church since then. Its speculative flights into regions where revelation does not guide and reason cannot follow; its special new revelations; its view of the world as essentially evil in itself; its stern asceticism or antinomian excess—all have appeared repeatedly.

GOAD (κέντρον).—This was a pole about 8 ft. in length, carried by Eastern ploughmen. Armed at one end with a spike and at the other with a chisel-shaped blade, it was used now to urge the yoked beasts to move faster, now to clean the share. Only one hand being required to hold and guide the light plough, the other was free to wield the goad. The kicking of oxen against the goad (AV the pricks) suggested a popular metaphor for futile and painful resistance—σκληρον σοι προς κέντρον λακτίζειν (Ac 26<sup>14</sup>; all uncials omit these words in 9<sup>b</sup>). The same figure is found in Pind. Pyth. ii. 173; Æsch. Prom. 323; Eurip. Bacch. 795; Terence, Phorm. i. ii. 28. JAMES STRAHAN.

GOAT (τράγος).—The Greek word signifies a 'he-goat' (Lat. hircus), and is used in the LXX as the equivalent of the Heb. words אֵז, עִז, פִּז (all = 'he-goat'). The only NT references to the 'goat' outside the Gospels are in the Epistle to the Hebrews (9<sup>1-13</sup>, 19 10<sup>a</sup>). In 9<sup>12</sup>, 19 it is associated with calves (i.e. bullocks), and there is doubtless an allusion in these two passages to the sacrificial rites of the Day of Atonement. On this occasion, the high priest offered up a bullock as a sin-offering for himself (Lv 16<sup>11</sup>), and a goat as a sin-offering for the people (Lv 16<sup>10</sup>). The usual phrase to designate sacrifices in general is used in 9<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>a</sup>, 'bulls and goats' or 'goats and bulls.'

The general meaning of 9<sup>1-13</sup> is quite clear. The writer says: 'if—and you admit this—the blood of goats and bullocks, as on the Day of Atonement, could sanctify unto the cleanness of the flesh, how much more could the Blood of Christ, the Divine-Human sacrifice, cleanse the conscience from dead works to serve the living God!'

In 10<sup>a</sup> the writer abandons his rhetorical style and categorically asserts that 'it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins.' He here uses the general term for sacrifices, and thereby denies that any of the sacrifices of the old Law ever did or ever could 'take away sins.'

Many different breeds of domesticated goats are known in Syria, the most common of which is the mamber or ordinary black goat. These animals attain a large size, and pendent ears about a foot long are their most characteristic feature. Their peculiar ears are apparently alluded to in Am 3<sup>12</sup>. They generally have horns and short beards. Another breed found in N. Palestine is the angora, which has very long hair. Goats supplied most of the milk of Palestine (cf. Pr 27<sup>-7</sup>), and the young were often killed for food, being regarded as special delicacies, as they are to-day (cf. Gn 27<sup>9</sup>, Lk 15<sup>-9</sup>). Their long silky hair was woven into curtains, coverings of tents, etc. (cf. Ex 35<sup>-6</sup>, Nu 31<sup>-9</sup>), and as goat's-hair cloth, called cilicium, was made in the province of which Tarsus, the birth-place of St. Paul, was the capital, and was exported thence to be used in tent-making, it is reasonable to suppose that the Apostle was engaged in this very trade (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>). Their skins were sometimes used as clothing, and doubtless the hairy mantle of the prophets (cf. Zec 13<sup>4</sup>) was made of this material (cf. also He 11<sup>37</sup>), but they were more often converted into bottles. The early inhabitants of Palestine (cf. Gn 21<sup>19</sup>, Jos 9<sup>4</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>18</sup>, Mt 9<sup>17</sup>, Mk 2-, Lk 5<sup>37</sup>), just like the modern Bedouins, utilized the skins of their cattle and their flocks for the purpose of storing oil, wine, milk, or water, as the case might be. The animals whose skins were generally chosen for the purpose were the sheep and the goat as at the present day, while the skin of the ox was used for very large bottles. The legs, or at all events the lower part of the legs, together with the head, are first removed, the animal is next skinned from the neck downwards, great care being taken to avoid tearing the skin; all apertures are then carefully closed, and the neck is fitted with a leather thong which serves as a cork.

In view of the numerous uses which the goat has been made to subserve, it is not surprising to find that it was highly valued in ancient times even as it is now. A large part of the wealth of Laban and of the wages he paid to Jacob consisted of goats, while 'a thousand goats' is mentioned as one of the principal items in Nabal's property (1 S 25-). They thrive in hilly and scantily watered districts, where they are much more abundant than sheep, and pasture where there is much brush-wood, the luxuriant grasses of the plains being 'too succulent for their taste' (Tristram in Smith's DB<sup>2</sup> 1200<sup>b</sup>). They are largely responsible for the barrenness of the hills, and the general absence of trees in Palestine.

GOD.—1. General aspects of the apostolic doctrine.—The object of this article is to investigate the doctrine of God as it is presented in the Christian writings of the apostolic period; but, in view of the scope of this Dictionary, the teaching of our Lord Himself and the witness of the Gospel records will be somewhat lightly passed over.

The existence of God is universally assumed in the NT. The arguments that can be adduced, e.g. from the consent of mankind and from the existence of the world, are only intended to show that the belief that God is is reasonable, not to prove it as a mathematical proposition. But undoubtedly the fact that the doctrine is by such arguments shown to be probable will lead man to receive with more readiness the revealed doctrine of God's existence. The biblical writers, however, did not, in either dispensation, concern themselves to prove a fact which no one doubted. Ps 10<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>5</sup> 53<sup>1</sup> are no exceptions to this general consent. The ungodly man (the 'fool') who said in his heart 'There is no God,' did not deny God's existence, but His interfering in the affairs of men. 'The wicked . . . saith, He will not require it. All his thoughts are, There is no God.'

The apostolic doctrine of God as we have it in Acts, Revelation, and the Epistles does not come direct from the OT. It presupposes a teaching of our Lord. At first this teaching was in the main handed down by the oral method, and the Epistles, or at least most of them, do not depend on any of our four Gospels, though it is quite likely that there were some written evangelic records in existence even when the earliest of the Epistles were written (Lk 1<sup>1</sup>). St. Paul, writing on certain points of Christian teaching, tells us that he handed on what he himself had received (1 Co 11<sup>2</sup> 23 15<sup>3</sup> the expression απο του κυριου in 11<sup>23</sup> probably does not mean 'from the Lord without human mediation': it was tradition handed on from Christ).

In approaching the apostolic writings we must bear in mind two points. (a) The NT was not intended to be a compendium of theology. The Epistles, for example, were written for the immediate needs of the time and place, doubtless without any thought arising in their writers' minds of their being in the future canonical writings of a new volume of the Scriptures. We should not, therefore, a priori expect to find in them any formulated statement of doctrine. (b) There is a considerable difference between the Epistles on the one hand and the Gospels on the other in the presentation of doctrine. The Gospels are narratives of historical events, and in them, therefore, the gradual unfolding of Jesus' teaching, as in fact it was given, is duly set forth. This is especially the case with the Synoptics, though even in the Fourth Gospel there is a certain amount of progress of doctrine. At the first the doctrines taught by our Lord are set forth, so to speak, in their infancy, adapted to the comprehension of beginners; and they are gradually unfolded as the Gospel story proceeds. In the Epistles, on the other hand, the writer treats his correspondents as convinced Christians, and therefore, though he instructs them, he plunges at once in medias res. There is no progress of doctrine from the first chapter of an Epistle to the last.

The question we have to ask ourselves is, What did the apostles teach about God? Or rather, in order not to beg any question (since it is obviously impossible in this article to discuss problems of date and authorship), we must ask, What do the books of the NT teach about God?

2. Christian development of the OT doctrine of God.—It is an essential doctrine of the NT writers that a new and fuller revelation was given by the Incarnation and by the fresh outpouring of the Holy Ghost.

(a) The revelation by the Incarnate.—That the Son had made a revelation of old by the part which He took in creation (see below, 6 (e)) is not explicitly stated, but is implied by Ro 1<sup>20</sup>, which says that creation is a revelation of God's everlasting power and Divinity (θεός, 'Divine nature and properties,' whereas θεοτης is 'Divine Personality' [see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 1902, in loc.]). But the Incarnate reveals God in a fuller sense than ever before: 'God . . . hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in [his] Son' (He 1<sup>14</sup>). The revelation by the Incarnation is a conception specially emphasized in the Johannine writings, not only in the Gospel, but also in the First Epistle and the Apocalypse. The Prologue of the Gospel says that 'God only begotten' (or 'the only begotten Son' [see below, 6 (c)]) 'which is in the bosom of the Father, hath declared him' (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>). 'What he hath seen and heard, of that he beareth witness' (3<sup>2</sup>). The revelation of the Son is the revelation of the Father (14<sup>7-11</sup>). The 'life which was with the Father' was manifested and gave a message about God (1 Jn 1<sup>1-5</sup>). The revelation of eternal life which is in the Son was made when God bore witness concerning His Son (5<sup>10a</sup>). This new and fuller revelation is that with which the Apocalyptist begins his book (Rev 1<sup>1</sup>): 'the revelation (apocalypse) of Jesus Christ, which God gave him to shew unto his servants' (see Swete, Com. in loc., who gives good reasons for thinking that the revelation made by Jesus, rather than that made about Jesus, is meant; cf. Gal 1<sup>1</sup>).

We find the same teaching, though in a somewhat less explicit form, in the Pauline Epistles. Christ is 'the power of God and the wisdom of God . . . made unto us wisdom from God' (1 Co 1<sup>4-30</sup>). In Him 'are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden' (Col 2<sup>3</sup>). In the new 'dispensation of the fulness of the times' God has 'made known unto us the mystery of his will' (Eph 1<sup>9f</sup>, a passage where 'mystery' specially conveys the idea of a hidden thing revealed, rather than one kept secret). To St. Paul personally Jesus made a revelation (Gal 1<sup>12</sup>; see above). That our Lord made a new revelation is also stated in the Synoptics: 'Neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willet to reveal [him]' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>; cf. Lk 10-). So in Acts, Jesus bids the disciples 'wait for the promise of the Father, which [said he] ye heard from me' (1<sup>4</sup>); and St. Peter (1<sup>3b</sup>) calls the new revelation 'the word which [God] sent unto the children of Israel, preaching good tidings of peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all).' Sanday (IIDB ii. 212) points out that the passages about our Lord being the 'image' of God, and 'in the form of God' (see below, 6 (c)), express the fact that He brings to men's minds the essential nature of God.

(b) The revelation by the Holy Ghost.—The new revelation of the nature of God by the full outpouring of the Spirit, in a manner unknown even in the old days of prophetic inspiration, is also, as far as the promise is concerned, a favourite Johannine conception (see especially Jn 14-16). The promise is, however, alluded to by St. Luke (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>, Ac 1<sup>4</sup>), and its fulfilment is dwelt on at great length in Acts, which may be called the 'Gospel of the Holy Spirit,' and in which the action of the Third Person in guiding the disciples into all the truth (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>) is described very fully. Jesus gave commandment to the apostles 'through the Holy Ghost' (Ac 1<sup>2</sup>). The guidance of the Spirit is described, e.g., in 2<sup>17</sup>, 8<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 11<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>2</sup> 16<sup>6f</sup>, 20<sup>23</sup> 21<sup>11</sup>, though these passages speak rather of the practical leading of the disciples in the conduct of life rather than of the teaching of the truth. St. Paul says that 'the things which eye saw not' (he seems to be paraphrasing Is 64<sup>4</sup>) have been revealed by God 'unto us' (ἡμῖν is emphatic here) 'through the Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God' (1 Co 2<sup>9f</sup>; so v. 13). It is the Holy Spirit only who can teach us that 'Jesus is Lord' (12<sup>3</sup>).

3. Attributes of God in the NT.—Before considering the great advance on the OT ideas made by the Christian doctrine of God, we may notice certain Divine attributes which are emphasized in the NT, but which are also found in the OT.

(a) God is Almighty.—The word used in the NT (as in the Eastern creeds) for this attribute is παντοκράτωρ, chiefly in the Apocalypse (1<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>, 19<sup>6</sup>, 15 21<sup>22</sup>), but also in 2 Co 6<sup>18</sup>, as it is used in the LXX, where it renders ἡδὴ ὁὐθ and Shaddai. We notice in each instance in Rev. how emphatically it stands at the end: 'the Lord God, which is and which was . . . the Almighty,' 'the Lord God, the Almighty'; not 'Lord God Almighty' as AV (the AV translates the word by 'omnipotent' in Rev 19<sup>6</sup> only). The word omnipotens occurs in the earliest Roman creed.—But what does 'Almighty' imply? To the modern reader it is apt to convey the idea of omnipotence, as if it were παντοδύναμος, i.e. 'able to do everything,' on account of the Latin translation omnipotens. So Augustine understands the word in the Creed (de Symbolo ad Catechumenos, 2 [ed. Ben. vi. 547]), explaining it, 'He does whatever He wills' (Swete, Apostles' Creed, p. 22). Undoubtedly God is omnipotent, though this does not mean that He can act against the conditions which He Himself makes—He cannot sin, He cannot lie (Tit 1<sup>2</sup>, He 6<sup>18</sup>; so 2 Ti 2<sup>13</sup> of our Lord). As Augustine says (loc. cit.), if He could do these things He would not be omnipotent. But this is not the meaning of 'Almighty.' As we see from the form of the Greek word (παντοκράτωρ), and as is suggested by the Hebrew words which it renders, it denotes sovereignty over the world. It is equivalent to the 'Lord of heaven and earth' of Ac 17<sup>4</sup>, Mt 11<sup>25</sup>. Everything is under God's sway (see Pearson, Expos. of the Creed, art. i., especially notes 37-43). The Syriac bears out this interpretation by rendering the word ahdh kul, i.e. 'holding (or governing) all.'

(b) God is 'living.'—He has 'life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>). He is 'the living God' (Rev 7<sup>2</sup>), 'that liveth for ever and ever' (10<sup>9</sup>); and therefore is eternal, the 'Alpha and Omega, which is and which was and which is to come' (ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος), 'the beginning and the end' (Rev 1<sup>8</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>; cf. 16<sup>5</sup>)—these words are here (but not in 22<sup>10</sup>; see below, 6 (e)) rightly ascribed by Swete to the Eternal Father. 'One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day' (2 P 3<sup>8</sup>; cf. Ps 90<sup>4</sup>; see also Ro 1<sup>20</sup>).

(c) God is omniscient.—He knows the hearts of all men (καρδιολογῶσα πάντων, Ac 1<sup>4</sup>; cf. 15<sup>8</sup>; the prayer in 1<sup>4</sup> is perhaps addressed to our Lord); He knows all things (1 Jn 3<sup>20</sup>). St. Paul eloquently exclaims: 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God!' (Ro 11<sup>33</sup>), and ascribes glory 'to the only wise God,' i.e. to God who alone is wise (16<sup>7</sup>; the same phrase occurs in some MSS of 1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>, but 'wise' is there an interpolation). Even the uninstructed Cornelius recognizes that we are in God's sight (Ac 10<sup>32</sup>). Such sayings cannot but be a reminiscence of our Lord's teaching that 'not one of them is forgotten in the sight of God' (Lk 12<sup>6</sup>). They are summed up in the expressions 'God is light' (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>) and 'God is true' ('This is the true God,' 1 Jn 5<sup>20</sup>; for the reference here see A. E. Brooke's note in ICC, 1912, in loc.). God 'cannot lie'; see above (a).

(d) God is transcendent.—This Divine attribute had been exaggerated by the Jews just before the Christian era, but it is nevertheless dwelt on in the apostolic writings. The 'things of God' are indeed 'deep,' so that man cannot, though the Spirit can, 'search them out' (1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>; cf. Job 11<sup>7</sup>). God, who 'only hath immortality,' dwells 'in light unapproachable, whom no man hath seen nor can see' (1 Ti 6<sup>16</sup>; cf. Jn 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1-20</sup>). He is spirit (Jn 4<sup>24</sup> RVm) and invisible (Col 1<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>, He 11<sup>27</sup>), unchangeable (He 6<sup>17</sup>; cf. Mal 3<sup>6</sup>, Ps 102<sup>27</sup>), infinite, omnipresent (Ac 7<sup>48</sup> 17<sup>27</sup>; cf. Ps 139<sup>7</sup>). These statements do not mean, however, that God is altogether unknowable by men; for God in His condescension reveals Himself to man (see above, 2).

(e) God is immanent.—That God dwells in man is stated several times. 'God is in you indeed,' says St. Paul (1 Co 14<sup>5</sup> AV and RVm; RV text has 'among'; the Gr. is ἐν ὑμῖν). 'There is one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all' (Eph 4<sup>6</sup>). 'God abideth in us' (1 Jn 4<sup>12</sup>). His 'tabernacle is with men' and He 'shall dwell with them . . . and be with them' (Rev 21<sup>3</sup>). For the immanence of the Son and the Spirit in man see below, 6 (e) and 7.

(f) Moral attributes.—God is love (1 Jn 4<sup>8, 16</sup>); love is His very nature and being, and therefore love is the foundation of all true religion; love is of God (v. 7; see Brooke's notes on these verses [op. cit.]). The love of God is specially emphasized by Christianity; cf. also Jn 3<sup>16</sup> (the kernel of the gospel message), Ro 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>31-39</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup> ('the Son of his love'), 2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>14</sup> (desire of universal salvation), 1 Jn 2<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>. The 'love of God' may be God's love for us, or our love for God; but the latter, as St. John teaches (see above), comes from the former.

He is righteous for the meaning of this see below, 6 (e)); St. Paul not only speaks of the 'righteous judgment' (δικαιοκρατία, Ro 2<sup>5</sup>; cf. 2 Th 1<sup>5</sup>), but of the 'righteousness' (δικαιοσύνη), of God (Ro 1<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>). On this phrase, δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ, see an elaborate investigation by Sanday in HDB ii.

* The word ἅγιος (equivalent to the Latin pius) 'represents God as fulfilling His relation to His creatures, even as He requires them to fulfil theirs towards Himself' (Swete, Com. in loc.).

209-212; it was familiar to the Jews, and to them meant the personal righteousness of God. Many commentators take it, as used in the NT, to mean the righteous state of man, of which God is the giver. But in either case it predicates righteousness of God. In Ph 3<sup>9</sup> we find τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην, 'the righteousness which is of God.' The Apocalypticist also emphasizes this attribute (Rev 15<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>5, 7</sup>).

God is merciful (Ro 11<sup>32</sup> 15<sup>9</sup>, etc.). This is really the same attribute as love; but it is not the same as the Musliman idea of the mercy of God, which can scarcely be distinguished from indifference. Love and justice combined produce the true Divine mercy.

He is the God of hope (Ro 15<sup>13</sup>). A despairing pessimism is rebellion against the good God who makes us to hope, and who promises to overthrow Satan.

4. The Fatherhood of God.—We now pass to the great developments made by the Christian doctrine of God. In the OT it had been freely taught that God was Father; but the conception scarcely went further than a fatherhood of the chosen people. 'Israel is my son, my first born. . . . Let my son go that he may serve me,' is Jahweh's message to Pharaoh (Ex 4<sup>2</sup>). The Deuteronomist goes no further (8<sup>5</sup> 32<sup>6</sup>, and especially 14<sup>1</sup>): 'Ye are the children of the Lord your God . . . for thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth'. The restrictive words of Ps 103<sup>13</sup> are very significant: 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.' The prophets made no advance on this. 'To Judah and Israel God says: 'Ye shall call me, My father' (Jer 3<sup>19</sup>; cf. Is 63<sup>16</sup> 30<sup>19</sup>, Mal 1<sup>6</sup>); 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt' (Hos 11<sup>1</sup>).

The NT greatly develops this doctrine. It teaches that God is Father of all men, though in a special sense Father of believers. But, above all, God is the Father of our Lord in a sense quite unique.

(a) The Father of our Lord.—Jesus ever makes a difference between the Father's relationship to Himself and to the rest of the world. The striking words of the twelve-year-old Child: 'Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' (or 'about my Father's business,' ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου, Lk 2<sup>49</sup>) are the first indication of this. Jesus speaks of 'my Father' and 'the Father' and 'your Father,' but never of 'our Father,' though He teaches the disciples to use these words (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>). In Jn 20<sup>17</sup> the Evangelist represents our Lord as using what would otherwise be an unintelligible periphrasis: 'My Father and your Father, and my God and your God.' This same distinction is kept up in the rest of the NT. Thus in Ro 8<sup>3</sup> St. Paul calls our Lord God's 'own Son' (τὸν αὐτοῦ υἱόν), in a manner in which we could not be designated 'sons'; we can only be 'conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (v.<sup>79</sup>), while Jesus is 'his own Son' (του ιδίου υιού, v.<sup>32</sup>; cf. Col 1<sup>13</sup>: 'Son of his love'). St. Paul exhibits a fondness for the phrase 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 15<sup>6</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, Eph 1<sup>3</sup>; cf. Col 1<sup>3</sup> 'God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ'), which is re-echoed by St. Peter (1 P 1<sup>3</sup>), and in the Apocalypse (Rev 1<sup>6</sup>: 'his God and Father'). (On the other hand, in Eph 1<sup>17</sup> we read: 'the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory.') In Rev 3<sup>21</sup> our Lord is speaking, and uses the words 'my Father.' This distinction is at the root of the Johannine title 'Only-begotten,' applied to our Lord (1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, Jn 1<sup>14.18</sup> 3<sup>16.18</sup>). See ADOPTION, ONLY-BEGOTTEN.

(b) The Father of all men.—This relationship is expressly affirmed by St. Paul in his speech at Athens (Ac 17<sup>28</sup>). God has created us; 'in him we live and move and have our being, as certain even of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring.' And he endorses this heathen saying by continuing: 'Being then the offspring of God,' etc. (v.<sup>29</sup>). We may compare our Lord's saying: 'that ye may be sons of your Father which is in heaven, for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>); 'he is kind towards the unthankful and evil' (Lk 6<sup>35</sup>). The same thought seems to be at the root of St. Paul's saying that all fatherhood (πάσα πατριά) in heaven and earth is named from God the Father (Eph 3<sup>14</sup>; see FAMILY). 'There is one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all' (Eph 4<sup>6</sup>). 'To us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things and we unto him' (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). In several passages in the Epistles where we read 'our Father' (Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, Eph 1<sup>2</sup>, Ph 4<sup>20</sup>, etc.), there is no special restriction to God's relationship to Christians, such as we find with regard to the chosen people in the OT passages. St. James speaks of 'the Father of lights' (Ja 1<sup>17</sup>), i.e. of the created heavenly bodies. And the writer of Hebrews refers to a universal Fatherhood due to creation. As contrasted with the 'fathers of our flesh,' God is 'the Father of spirits'—the Author not only of our spiritual being but of all spiritual beings (He 12<sup>9</sup>; see Westcott, Com. in loc.).

(c) The Father of believers.—Side by side with the doctrine of universal fatherhood is the special relationship of God to believers, not only as Saviour (1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>) but as Father. Here the apostolic writers ascribe to Christians the prerogatives of the chosen people in the old covenant. This special fatherhood is brought out in the passages where St. Paul applies the metaphor of adoption to Christians (Ro 8<sup>14-17.23</sup>, Gal 4<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>; see ADOPTION; cf. also 1 P 1<sup>17</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, Jn 1<sup>12</sup>, etc.).

(d) 'The Father' in general.—In many passages we find the absolute expression 'the Father,' comprehending any or all of the above meanings, as, e.g., 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, Gal 1<sup>1</sup>, Eph 5<sup>20</sup> ('give thanks in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to God, even the Father'), Col 1<sup>12</sup>, Ja 3<sup>9</sup> RV ('the Lord and Father'), 1 Jn 2<sup>13.15</sup>; and 2 P 1<sup>17</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup>, where there is a special reference to our Lord.

The word 'Father' stands at the head of most Christian creeds, but it is probable that it was not originally in that of Rome. The Creed of Marcellus of Ancyra, an early Western specimen, though coming from an Eastern bishop, begins: 'I believe in Almighty (παντοκρατορα) God' (Epiphanius, Haer. lxxii. 3). The language of Tertullian (de Virg. vel. 1—one of his later works) leads us to suppose that the creed used by him began similarly; he speaks of 'the rule of believing in one only God omnipotent, the Creator of the universe, and His Son Jesus Christ.' But thenceforward it appears in the Western creeds (see Swete, Apostles' Creed, p. 191.).

5. The Holy Trinity.—(a) The technical terms by which the Christian Church has expressed the faith that it derived from the Scriptures were not invented for a considerable time after the apostolic period. Thus no one would expect to find the terms 'Trinity' and 'Person' in the NT. It is usually said that the word 'Trinity,' referred to God, was first used by Theophilus of Antioch (ad Autol. ii. 15; c. A.D. 180), as far as extant Christian literature is concerned. This is true, but the context shows that it was not then an accepted technical term. The first three days of creation are said to be 'types of the trinity (τριάς), God, and His Word, and His Wisdom.' Theophilus goes on to say that the fourth day finds its antitype in man, who is in need of light, so that we get the series: God, the Word, Wisdom, Man. Swete justly remarks that an author who could thus 'convert the Divine trinity into a quaternity in which Man is the fourth term, must have been still far from thinking of the Trinity as later writers thought' (Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, p. 47). Or we should perhaps rather put it that Theophilus did not use the word 'Trinity' in the technical sense which immediately afterwards is found; as when Tertullian speaks of 'the Trinity of the one God-head, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit' (de Pudic. 21; cf. adv. Prax. 2), and as when Hippolytus says: 'Through this Trinity the Father is glorified, for the Father willed, the Son did, the Spirit manifested' (c. Noet. 14).

The words which we render 'Person' (ὕποστασις, πρόσωπον, persona) are of a still later date, and at first exhibited a remarkable fluidity of signification. Thus ὑποστασις was used at one time to denote what is common to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, what we should call the Divine 'substance,' at another it was used to distinguish between the Three; so that in one sense there is one ὑπόστασις in the Holy Trinity, in the other there are three. With regard to the word 'Person,' the student must necessarily be always on his guard against the supposition that 'Person' means 'individual,' as when we say that three different men are three 'persons'; or that 'Trinity' involves tritheism, or three Gods. These technical expressions are but methods of denoting the teaching found in the NT that there are distinctions in the Godhead, and that, while God is One, yet He is not a mere Monad. These technical terms are not found in the apostolic or sub-apostolic writers; with regard to the second of them, it may be remembered that the idea of personality was hardly formulated in any sense till shortly before the Christian era; and its application to theology came in a good deal later.

(b) The name 'God' used absolutely.—In considering the distinctions in the Godhead taught by the NT, it must be borne in mind that, when the name 'God' is used absolutely, without pronoun or epithet, it is never, with one possible exception, applied explicitly to the Son as such or to the Spirit as such. It is, indeed, most frequently used without any special reference to the Person. But it is often, when standing absolutely, used in contrast to the Son or to the Spirit, and then the Father is intended. Instances of this are too numerous to mention; but we may take as examples Ac 2<sup>22</sup> ('Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God . . . by mighty works . . . which God did by him'), 13<sup>30</sup> ('God raised him from the dead'), Ro 2<sup>16</sup> ('God shall judge the secrets of men . . . by Jesus Christ'), Eph 4<sup>30</sup> ('the Holy Spirit of God'). This is sometimes the case also when 'God' is not used absolutely, as in Ac 3<sup>13</sup> ('the God of our fathers hath glorified his Servant [ταῖς] Jesus'), 5<sup>30</sup> ('the God of our fathers raised up Jesus'), 22<sup>14</sup>, Ro 1<sup>8</sup> ('I thank my God through Jesus Christ'). In Rev 3<sup>2.1</sup>—our Lord calls the Father 'my God'; compare the similar Pauline phrases quoted above, 4 (a). See below, 8.

The one possible exception is Ac 20<sup>28</sup>: 'to feed the church of God which he purchased with his own blood.' This is the reading of  $\kappa\beta$  and other weighty authorities (followed by  $\Delta V$  and  $R V$  text), but  $\Delta C D E$  read 'the Lord' instead of 'God,' and it is decidedly more difficult than the other variant. At first sight, to say the least, the word 'God' (if read) must refer to our Lord, and yet this usage is unlike that of the NT elsewhere, and a scribe finding  $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$  would readily alter it to  $\kappa\upsilon\tau\iota\omicron\upsilon$  because of the strangeness of the expression. Thus both because of superior attestation, and because a difficult reading is ordinarily to be preferred to an easier one,  $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$  has usually been accepted here (so WH, ii. [1882] Appendix, p. 98). To get rid of the strangeness of the expression, it has been suggested that the reference is to the Father, and that 'his own blood' means 'the blood which is his own,' i.e. the blood of Christ who is essentially one with the Father; but this seems to be a rather forced explanation. A somewhat more probable conjecture (that of Hort) is that there is here an early corruption, and that the original had 'with the blood of his own Son.' The best reading of the last words of the verse, supported by overwhelming authority, is  $\delta\iota\alpha\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \alpha\iota\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \iota\delta\iota\omicron\upsilon$ ; and this conjecture supposes that  $\nu\iota\omicron\varsigma$  has dropped out at the end (cf. Ro 8<sup>32</sup>). However this may be, it would seem that the verse as we have it in  $\kappa\beta$  was so read by Ignatius, and gave rise to his expression 'the blood of God' (Eph. 1)—a very early instance of what later writers called the communicatio idiomatum, by which the properties of one of our Lord's natures are referred to when the other nature is in question, because of the unity of His Person (see 6 (b)). Another early instance is perhaps to be found in Clement of Rome (Cor. ii. 1):  $\tau\alpha\ \pi\alpha\theta\eta\mu\alpha\tau\alpha\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon$  ('his sufferings'),  $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$  having just preceded; but the reading, though accepted by Lightfoot, is not quite certain. On these two passages see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 'S. Ignatius and S. Polycarp', 1889, ii. 291, 'S. Clement of Rome,' 1890, ii. 13-16. Tertullian uses the expression 'the blood of God' (ad Uxor. ii. 3).

(c) Trinitarian language.—In the NT teaching the Son and the Spirit are joined to the Father in a special manner, entirely different from that in which men or angels are spoken of in relation to God. Perhaps the best example of this is the apostolic benediction of 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, which has no dogmatic purpose, but is a simple, spontaneous prayer, and is therefore more significant than if it was intended to teach some doctrine. The 'grace of our Lord,' the 'love of God,' and the 'communion of the Holy Ghost' are grouped together, and in this remarkable order. In many passages Father, Son, and Spirit are grouped together, just as the Three are mentioned together in the account of our Lord's Baptism (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>), only in a still more significant way. Thus in Ac 5<sup>34</sup>, we read that God exalted Jesus to be a Prince and a Saviour, and gave the Holy Ghost 'to them that obey him.' Stephen, being full of the Holy Ghost, saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God (7<sup>55</sup>). The Holy Ghost is in one breath called by St. Paul the 'Spirit of God' and the 'Spirit of Christ' (Ro 8<sup>9</sup>). See also 1 Co 12<sup>3-6</sup> ('the Spirit of God . . . Jesus is Lord . . . the same Spirit . . . the same Lord . . . the same God'), Ac 2<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup> ('foreknowledge of God the Father,' 'sanctification of the Spirit,' 'sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ'), Tit 3<sup>4-6</sup> ('the kindness of God our Saviour' [the Father], 'renewing of the Holy Ghost,' 'through Jesus Christ our Saviour'), 1 Jn 4<sup>2</sup>, and especially Jude 20, where the writer's disciples are bidden to pray in the Holy Spirit, to keep themselves in the love of God, and to look for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the greeting of all the Pauline Epistles but one, the Father and Son are joined together as the source of grace and peace; e.g. 'Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 1<sup>7</sup>); the only exception being Col 1<sup>2</sup>  $R V$ , which has 'grace to you and peace from God our Father.' And this Pauline usage is also found in 2 Jn 3. It is difficult to conceive the possibility of this zeugma unless our Lord be God. With this compare St. James's description of himself as 'a slave of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ja 1<sup>1</sup>), and many other passages such as 'one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him' (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>; see above, 4 (b)); 'in the sight of God and of Christ Jesus' (2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>); 'fellowship with the Father and with his son Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>); 'he that denieth the Father and the Son' (2-); 'the same hath both the Father and the Son' (2 Jn 9); 'the Lord God, the Almighty, and the Lamb are the temple thereof' (Rev 21<sup>22</sup>); 'the throne of God and of the Lamb' (22<sup>1-3</sup>).

These expressions are the counterpart of our Lord's words in the Fourth Gospel: 'I am in the Father and the Father in me' (Jn 14<sup>10</sup>). We might try the effect of substituting for 'Son' and 'Spirit' the names of 'Peter,' 'Paul,' or even of 'Michael,' 'Gabriel,' to see how intolerable all these expressions would be on any but the Trinitarian hypothesis. St. Paul uses a similar argument in 1 Co 1<sup>13</sup>: 'Was Paul crucified for you, or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?'

These passages are taken from the NT outside the Gospels. The Fourth Gospel, which is full of the same doctrine, is here passed by. But one passage of the Synoptics must be considered. How did St. Paul come by the phraseology of his benediction in 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>? Some would say that he invented it, and was the real founder of Christian doctrine (see below, 9). For those who cannot accept this position—and the Apostle betrays no consciousness of teaching a new doctrine, but, as we have seen (above, 1), professes to hand on what he has received—the only conclusion can be that the benediction is based on teaching of our Lord. In the Synoptics there is one passage (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>) which would at once account for St. Paul's benediction. According to this, our Lord bade His followers 'make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα) of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.' This passage has been criticized on three grounds. (1) It has been said not to be an authentic part of the First Gospel. This, however, is not a tenable position (see BAPTISM, § 4); but it is important to distinguish it from the view which follows. (2) It has been acknowledged to be an authentic part of Mt., but said to have been due to the Christian theology of the end of the 1st cent., to the same line of thought that produced the Fourth Gospel; and not to have been spoken by our Lord. (3) In support of this it is urged that as a matter of fact, the earliest baptisms, as we read in Acts, were not 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost,' but 'in the name of the Lord Jesus,' or the like. But may there not be a mistake here on both sides? It is quite unnecessary to suppose on the one hand that the passages in Acts describe a formula used in baptism, or, on the other, that our Lord in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> prescribed one. All the passages may, and probably do, express only the theological import of baptism (for authorities, see BAPTISM as above).* It was not the custom of our Lord to make minute regulations, as did the Mosaic Law. He rather laid down general principles; and it would be somewhat remarkable if He made just one exception, in regulating the words to be used in baptism. (The justification of the Christian formula is the general consent of the ages, dating from immediately after the apostolic period.) Nor is it necessary to suppose that Mt 28<sup>19</sup> gives us—any more than the other Gospel records do—the ipsissima verba of Jesus. It is almost certain that such teaching, if given, would be much expanded for the benefit of the hearers, and that we have only a greatly abbreviated record. But that our Lord gave such 'Trinitarian' teaching in some shape on the occasion of giving the baptismal command is the only way of accounting for the phenomena of Acts, Epistles, and Revelation. This would explain not only the apostolic benediction, but also the whole trend of the teaching of the NT outside the Gospels.

* We are not here concerned with the meaning of 'in' or 'into the name.' The argument is independent of the disputed interpretation of these words.

Having now considered the general scope of apostolic teaching with regard to distinctions in the Godhead, we must consider in particular the doctrine with regard to the Godhead of our Lord and of the Holy Ghost.

6. The Godhead of our Lord.—In historical sequence the realization of our Lord's Divinity came before the teaching which we have already considered. The disciples first learnt that their Master was not mere man, but was Divine; and then that there are distinctions in the Godhead.

(a) Jesus is the Son of God.—Of this the apostles were fully convinced. The passages are too numerous to cite, but they occur in almost every book of the NT, whether they give the title to our Lord in so many words, or express the fact otherwise (see above, 4 (a)). Before considering the meaning of the title, we may ask if the name παῖς ('child' or 'servant') applied to our Lord (Ac 3<sup>13</sup>, 26 4<sup>27</sup>, 30) has the same signification. Sanday points out (HDB iv. 574, 578) that παῖς is taken in the sense of 'Son' in the early Fathers, as in the Epistle to Diognetus (viii. 9 f.; c. A.D. 150?). This may also be the meaning of St. Luke in Acts; but it is equally probable that he refers to the OT 'servant of Jahweh.' This is clearly the meaning in Mt 12<sup>18</sup>, where Is 42<sup>1</sup> is quoted: 'Behold my servant whom I have chosen,' etc.

But what is the significance of the title 'Son of God'? It was not exactly a new title when used in the NT, though Dn 3<sup>5</sup> cannot be quoted for it ('a son of the gods,' RV; AV wrongly, 'the Son of God'). It is probable that Ps 2<sup>7</sup> was the foundation of the Jewish conception of Messiah as Son.* And therefore the title 'Son of God' had probably a different meaning in the mouth of some speakers from that which it had in the mouth of others. Thus when the demoniacs called Jesus the Son of God (Mk 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>, Mt 14<sup>3</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup>), they would mean no more than that He was the promised Messiah, without dogmatizing as to His nature. The mockers at Calvary would use the word in the same sense. 'If thou art the Son of God' is the same as 'If thou art the Christ' (Mt 27<sup>40</sup>). The Centurion, if (as seems probable) his saying as reported in Mk 15<sup>39</sup>, Mt 27<sup>54</sup> is more correct than that given in Lk 23<sup>47</sup>, where 'a righteous man' is substituted for 'the Son of God,' would have borrowed a Jewish phrase without exactly understanding its meaning, and thus St. Luke's paraphrase would faithfully represent what was passing in his mind.

But Jesus gave a higher meaning to the title, and this higher meaning is the keynote of the teaching of His disciples. It is true that in Lk 3<sup>38</sup> the Evangelist calls Adam a [son] of God (for 'son' see v. 23), as being created directly by God; but this is not the meaning in the NT generally. There seems to have been a suspicion in Caiaphas' mind of the higher meaning given to the title by Jesus, when he asked Him whether He was 'the Christ, the Son of God' (Mt 26<sup>63</sup>). There is almost an approach here to the Johannine saying that the Jews sought to kill Him because He 'called God His own Father, making himself equal with God' (Jn 5<sup>18</sup>). To the disciples the confession that Jesus was the 'Son of God' (11<sup>27</sup>, Martha) or 'the Holy One of God' (6<sup>69</sup> RV, Simon Peter) meant the belief that He partook of the nature of God. This, indeed, might have meant only that Jesus was a Divinely inspired man. But the teaching of Jesus lifts the title to the highest level (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 5<sup>19-26</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>, etc.; for St. John's own teaching see, e.g., Jn 3<sup>36</sup>). In this sense there is only one 'Son of God,' who is the Only-begotten, the Beloved (μονογενής and ἀγαπητός are both translations of ἰδιος; see ONLY-BEGOTTEN). And so in the Epistles the title expresses the Divinity of our Lord. The apostolic message was to preach that Jesus is the Son of God (Ac 9<sup>20</sup>, Jn 20<sup>31</sup>). While the first Christian teachers proclaimed the true humanity of the Lord (e.g. Ro 1<sup>3</sup>: 'concerning his Son who was born of the seed of David according to the flesh'), they also proclaimed His true Godhead (v. 4: 'declared to be the Son of God with power'). The saying of Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 22) exhibits no advance on apostolic doctrine: 'The Word of God was born of God in a peculiar manner' (ιδίως).

The Arians distinguished 'Son of God' from 'God,' and denied that the 'Son' could be in the highest sense 'God.' The Clementine Homilies (which used to be thought to be of the 2nd or 3rd cent., but are now usually, in their present form, ascribed to the 4th [JThSt x. (1908-09) 457]) make the same distinction (xvi. 15). St. Peter is made to say: 'Our Lord . . . did not proclaim Himself to be God, but He with reason pronounced blessed him who called Him the Son of that God who has arranged the universe.' Simon [Magus] replies that he who comes from God is God; but St. Peter says that this is not possible; they did not hear it from Him. 'What is begotten cannot be compared with that which is unbegotten or self-begotten.' Sanday (HDB iv. 577b) refers to this passage as an isolated phenomenon; but now that the book has been with much probability assigned to the later date, we may say that the teaching just quoted was not heard of, as far as the evidence goes, till the 4th century.

(b) Jesus is the Lord.—The significance of this title (ὁ κύριος) in the Apostolic Age is not at once apparent to the European of to-day. The name 'Lord' seems to him applicable to any leader of religious thought. To the present-day Greek κύριε is no more than our 'Sir,' and ὁ κύριος is the way in which any gentleman is spoken of, as the French use the word Monsieur. But to the Greek-speaking Christian Jew of the 1st cent., ὁ κύριος had a much deeper signification; deeper also than the complimentary Aramaic title 'Rabbi' (lit. 'my great one'). For the Jews habitually used the word 'Lord' as a substitute for 'Jahweh.' That sacred name, though written, was not pronounced. In reading the Hebrew OT, 'Adonai' was substituted for it. And so the Hellenistic Jews, in reading their Greek translation of the OT, found ὁ κύριος where the original has 'Jahweh.' When, then, St. Paul declares that 'no man can say, Jesus is Lord, but in the Holy Spirit' (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>), or bids the Roman Christian 'confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord' (Ro 10<sup>9</sup> RV; cf. Ph 2<sup>11</sup>), he does not mean merely that Jesus is a great teacher, but he identifies Him with 'the Lord' of the Greek OT, that is, with Jahweh. St. Peter uses the same identification when he says: 'Sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord' (1 P 3<sup>15</sup> RV; the AV reading is not supported by the best authorities); here he quotes Is 8<sup>13</sup> LXX (κύριον αὐτὸν ἀγιάσατε), actually substituting τὸν Χριστὸν for αὐτόν. (C. Bigg [ICC, 1901, in loc.] renders 'sanctify the Lord, that is to say, the Christ,' but this does not affect the present argument.) This identification is frequent in the NT. The title 'the Lord' is used both of the Father and of the Son. A remarkable passage is Ja 5<sup>4-15</sup>, where we read in quick succession of 'the Lord of Sabaoth,' 'the coming of the Lord,' 'the Lord is at hand,' 'the prophets spake in the name of the Lord,' 'the Lord shall raise (the sick man) up'; 'the Lord' means here sometimes the Father and sometimes the Son (in 3<sup>9</sup> RV it is explicitly used of the Father). With this compare the way in which in 4<sup>12</sup> God is said to be the one 'lawgiver and judge, who is able to save and to destroy,' while in 5<sup>9</sup> Jesus is the judge who 'standeth before the doors.' The passage 1 Co 10<sup>9</sup> would be still more striking if we could be sure of the text. According to the AV and RVm, St. Paul speaks of the Israelites who sinned against Jahweh in Nu 21<sup>5a</sup> as 'tempting Christ'; but the reading τὸν Χριστὸν is not quite so well attested as τὸν κύριον. Another identification of Jesus with Jahweh is to be seen in the taking over of the expression 'the day of the Lord' ('the day of Jahweh') from the OT (cf. Am 5<sup>18</sup>, etc.) and the using of it to denote the return of Jesus, in 1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>10</sup>, which have 'the day of the Lord,' and 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>, which have 'the day of [our] Lord Jesus.'

* We are not here concerned with the connexion between the thought of Israel as Son and Messiah as Son.

Again, Jesus is in the NT called 'Lord' in a manner which is equivalent to 'Almighty,' i.e. 'all ruling' (see above, 3 (a)); e.g. Ac 10<sup>36</sup> ('he is Lord of all'), Ro 14<sup>9</sup> ('Lord of the dead and the living'), Ph 3<sup>20f</sup>. ('the Lord Jesus Christ . . . is able even to subject all things unto himself'), 1 Co 2<sup>8</sup> ('crucified the Lord of glory'—an approach to the communicatio idiomatum [see above, 5 (b)]), Rev 1<sup>5</sup> ('ruler of the kings of the earth'), 17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup> (the Lamb, the Word of God, is 'Lord of lords and King of kings'—a phrase used in 1 Ti 6<sup>15</sup> of the Father); cf. He 1<sup>3c</sup> 8 ('the Son . . . upholding all things by the word of his power') and Ro 9<sup>5</sup> ('who is over all'). God is commonly addressed by the disciples as 'Lord,' as in Ac 1<sup>4</sup> (see see above, 3 (c)) 4<sup>29</sup> (explicitly the Father; see v.<sup>30</sup>) 10<sup>4</sup> 14 11<sup>8</sup>; and this is the way in which Saul of Tarsus and Ananias address the Ascended Jesus in their visions (Ac 9<sup>5</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> [see v.<sup>15a</sup>] 22<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>15</sup>; cf. Mt 25<sup>11</sup>, etc.).

The title 'our Lord' for Jesus, which became the most common designation among the Christians, is not very common in the NT. In Rev 11<sup>19</sup> it is used of the Father ('our Lord and his Christ'). In 11<sup>8</sup> AV it is used of Jesus, but all the best MSS here have 'their Lord.' It is, however, found in Ja 2<sup>1</sup> ('our Lord Jesus Christ [the Lord] of glory') and in 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>8</sup>, He 7<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>15</sup>, etc.

(c) Our Lord's Divinity stated in express terms.—Many of the passages about to be given in this subsection have been keenly criticized, but it is impossible to pass over the whole of them. This passage or that may possibly be explained otherwise than is here done, or in some cases the reading may be disputed; but the cumulative effect of the whole is overwhelming. Yet it must be remarked that the doctrine of the Godhead of our Lord does not depend merely on a certain number of leading texts. The language of the whole of the apostolic writings is inexplicable on the supposition that their authors believed their Master to be mere man, or even a created being of any sort, however highly exalted.

In Ro 9<sup>5</sup> St. Paul says that Christ is 'over all, God blessed for ever.' Such is the interpretation of the AV and RV (RVm mentions the translations of 'some modern interpreters'), adopted 'with some slight, but only slight, hesitation' by Sanday-Headlam in their exhaustive note (ICC in loc.). The alternative interpretations insert a full stop, and make the latter part of the verse an ascription of praise to the Father.

In 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup> Christ is called the 'image' (εἰκὼν) of God; with this we must compare the remarkable passage, He 1<sup>3a</sup>, where the Son is called 'the effulgence (ἀπαύγασμα; cf. Wis 7<sup>26</sup>) of his glory and the very image of his substance' (χαράκτῃ τῆς υποστάσεως αὐτοῦ), and is declared to be higher than, and worshipped by, the angels, and to have eternal rule; the quotation from Ps 45<sup>6</sup>, beginning 'Thy throne, O God,' is referred to the Son. It is remarkable that whereas no Epistle emphasizes our Lord's humanity so strongly as Hebrews, its beginning should dwell so forcibly on His Divine prerogatives. The meaning of these expressions 'image,' 'effulgence,' is seen by studying the passage Col 1<sup>15a</sup> with Lightfoot's notes (Colos- sians<sup>2</sup>, 1879, in loc.). Christ is 'the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation' (see FIRST-BORN for Patristic interpretations). But our Lord is not the 'image' of God in the same way as all men are (1 Co 11<sup>7</sup>, Ja 3<sup>9</sup>, Gn 1<sup>26</sup>; Clement of Rome uses χαράκτῃ in the same sense [Cor. xxxiii. 4] though he quotes Gn 1<sup>26</sup> with εἰκὼν). Christ is the revelation of the invisible God because He is His 'express image.' He is the 'firstborn of all creation,' as being before all creation, and having sovereignty over it (Lightfoot). There can be little doubt that St. Paul here refers to the pre-incarnate Christ as the earlier Fathers, and eventually the later Greek Fathers, held. He adds that 'in him all the fulness (πληρωμα) dwells' (Col 1<sup>19</sup>), and that 'in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (2<sup>9</sup>): the totality of the Divine power and attributes (Lightfoot) are in the Incarnate Jesus.

In Ph 2<sup>6-8</sup> St. Paul says that our Lord 'being (υπαρχων) in the form of God, counted it not a prize [a thing to be grasped at] to be on an equality with God, but emptied (ἐκένωσε) himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of man.' This passage, which has given rise to the word 'Kenotic,' is elaborately treated by Lightfoot (see his Philippians<sup>2</sup>, 1873, p. 111 f., and especially his appended Notes, pp. 127-137). It expresses Christ's pre-existence, for He 'emptied himself.' Of what He emptied Himself is seen from the preceding words. He was originally (υπαρχων, denoting 'prior existence,' but not necessarily 'eternal existence' [Lightfoot]) in the form of God, participating in the οὐσία of God. Yet He did not regard His equality with God as a thing to be jealously guarded, a prize which must not slip from His grasp.

We cannot lay great stress on Ac 20<sup>28</sup>, for which see above, 5 (b), because of the uncertainty of the reading; but by all grammatical canons (though this has been denied) Tit 2<sup>13</sup> must apply the name 'God' to our Lord: 'our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ' (RV; τοῦ μεγάλου θεοῦ καὶ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), and this interpretation is borne out by the word ἐπιφάνεια ('manifestation') which immediately precedes, and by the whole context, which speaks of our Lord (v.<sup>14</sup>). The phrase in 2 P 1<sup>1</sup> is similar: 'our God and Saviour Jesus Christ' (RV text).

The explicit ascription of Divinity is found frequently in the Johannine writings. In 1 Jn 5<sup>20</sup>, indeed, the phrase 'This is the true God' may be applied either to the Father or to the Son (see above, 3 (c)); and in Jn 1<sup>18</sup> the reading is disputed (see ONLY-BEGOTTEN); 'God only begotten' (μονογενὴς θεός) is somewhat better attested than 'the only begotten Son' (ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός) and is the more difficult reading; Westcott (Com. in loc.) judges both readings to be of great and almost equal antiquity, but on various grounds thinks that the former must be accepted. But, whatever view we take of these two passages, St. Thomas's confession, 'My Lord and my God' (20<sup>28</sup>), is quite explicit; and so is the preface to the Fourth Gospel: 'The Word was with God, and the Word was God' (1<sup>1</sup>), and so are our Lord's words, 'I and the Father are one' (ἐν ἑσμῇ, 10<sup>30</sup>). The Johannine doctrine of the Logos or Word, which cannot be altogether passed over even in an investigation which deals chiefly with the NT outside the Gospels (though the title 'Word of God' occurs only in Rev 19<sup>13</sup> outside the Fourth Gospel, for He 11<sup>3</sup> [ρηματι θεοῦ] is no exception to this statement), is equivalent to the Pauline doctrine of the Image. The Logos is an eternally existent 'Person' through whom God has ever revealed Himself; who was in a true sense distinct from the Father, and yet 'was God' (Jn 1<sup>1</sup>); who 'was incarnate,' 'became flesh and tabernacled (ἐσκήν- ωσεν) among us' (1<sup>14</sup>). The Logos is identified with Jesus Christ, whose glory the disciples beheld.

(d) Pre-existence of our Lord.—This is stated frequently in the NT. Besides the passages just quoted in (c), we may notice Ro 8<sup>3</sup> ('God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh'); 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup> (the Israelites of old 'drank of a spiritual rock that followed them, and the rock was Christ' [note the past tense 'was': it is not a mere type]); 15<sup>47</sup> ('the second man is of heaven'; the best MSS omit 'the Lord,' but this does not affect the present point; Robertson-Plummer, however [ICC, 1911, in loc.], think that the reference is to the Second Advent rather than to the Incarnation); 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> ('though he was rich, for your sakes he became poor' (ἐπώρυξε)—if He had no previous existence, there never was a previous time when He was rich); Col 1<sup>17</sup> ('he is before all things, and in him all things consist' [hold together]: see above (c)); 1 Ti 1<sup>15</sup> ('Christ Jesus came into the world'); 3<sup>16</sup> ('He who was manifested in the flesh': the reading θεός for δς [i.e. Θς for OC], which would have made this verse an explicit statement of our Lord's Divinity, has 'no sufficient ancient evidence' [RVm], but this ancient hymn, as it appears to be, is good witness for the pre-existence); 2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup> ('which was given us in Christ Jesus before times eternal, but hath now been manifested by the appearing of our Saviour Christ Jesus'); He 1<sup>6</sup> ('when he bringeth in the firstborn into the world'); 1 P 1<sup>20</sup> ('who was foreknown indeed before the foundation of the world, but was manifested at the end of the times for your sake'); 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup> (He 'was manifested'); 4<sup>2</sup> ('Jesus Christ is come in the flesh'). See also below (e). Some of these expressions might have been interpreted, though with difficulty, of an ordinary birth; but such an interpretation is impossible when we compare them all together.

With these passages from the Epistles we may compare a few examples taken out of the Fourth Gospel. The Word was 'in the beginning' and 'became flesh' (Jn 1<sup>1-14</sup>). Jesus speaks of Himself, or the Evangelist speaks of Him, as 'he that cometh from above, he that cometh from heaven' (3<sup>1</sup>), 'whom thou hast sent' (17<sup>9</sup>), as 'he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven' (3<sup>13</sup>); the last four words are omitted by 8B and some other authorities, and are thought by WH [Appendix, p. 75] to be an early but true gloss. Pre-existence does not in itself imply Godhead; but, on the other hand, if our Lord was not pre-existent, He cannot be God.

(e) Divine attributes ascribed to our Lord.—At the outset of the apostolic period St. Peter speaks of Jesus as the 'Prince' (or 'Author', ἀρχηγός) 'of life'; He could not be holden of death (Ac 2<sup>24</sup>). This resembles the sayings of the Fourth Gospel that Jesus has 'life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>; see below, 8), and that He has power to lay down His life and to take it again (10<sup>18</sup>). Jesus 'abolished death and brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel' (2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>). He is 'the first and the last, and the Living One,' who 'was dead' but is 'alive for evermore' and has 'the keys of death and of Hades' (Rev 1<sup>17</sup>); He is the 'Alpha and Omega' (22<sup>13</sup>), a title which had just before been given to the Father (1<sup>8</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>; see above, 3 (b)). The Lamb, as well as the Father, is the source of the river (Rev 22<sup>1</sup>) which is the gift of the Spirit (see Swete, Com. in loc.; cf. Jn 7<sup>38</sup>). Christ, being the Living One, is called 'our life,' the giver of life to us, in Col 3<sup>4</sup>; cf. 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup> as above, and Jn 6<sup>57</sup> ('he that eateth me, he also shall live because of me'; see 8). And therefore He is 'in us' (Ro 8<sup>10</sup>, etc.).

Our Lord is represented as receiving the worship of angels (He 1<sup>6</sup>), and of the four-and-twenty elders (Rev 5<sup>8</sup>), and of the angels and living creatures and elders (vv. 11-14). He took part in the creation of the world (Col 1<sup>16</sup>, He 1<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, Ro 11<sup>36</sup>, Jn 1<sup>3</sup>). Both He and the Father are called 'the Saviour.' The ascription of this title to the Father is characteristic of the Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 1<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>, Tit 1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>; cf. 2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>) and is also found in Jude<sup>25</sup> RV, Lk 1<sup>47</sup> (cf. Ja 4<sup>12</sup>); but it is given to our Lord in 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>, Tit 1<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>6</sup> (in each case just after it had been given to the Father), as it is given in Eph 5<sup>23</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>0</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>, Lk 2<sup>11</sup>, Jn 4<sup>42</sup>, Ac 5<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>23</sup> (cf. also Jn 12<sup>47</sup>, He 7<sup>25</sup>). His human name of Jesus was given Him with that very signification (Mt 1<sup>21</sup>). It was the foundation of the gospel message that 'Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners' (1 Ti 1<sup>15</sup>). It is in the same way that the Father is sometimes said to be the Judge, sometimes our Lord. The Father judges through the Son (Jn 5<sup>2</sup>; cf. Ja 4<sup>12</sup> with 5<sup>9</sup>). He that sat on the white horse 'doth judge and make war' (Rev 19<sup>11</sup>), though during His earthly ministry our Lord did not judge (Jn 8<sup>15</sup>). These two considerations, that Jesus is Saviour and Judge, might not be so conclusive as to His Divinity, if it were not for another office ascribed to Him, that of the One Mediator (1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>). He is Himself man (v. 6), or He could not mediate; and by parity of reasoning He is Himself God. A mediator must share the nature of both parties to the mediation. A mere man can only supplicate; God not incarnate can be merciful; but God incarnate alone can mediate.

The great attributes of God—love, truth, knowledge, holiness, righteousness (including justice)—are ascribed to our Lord. His love is spoken of in some of the most pathetic passages of St. Paul: 'the Son of God who loved me and gave himself up for me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>), 'the love of Christ which passeth knowledge' (Eph 3<sup>19</sup>; cf. 5<sup>25</sup>). The Apocalypticist declares that 'he loveth us and loosed us from our sins by his blood' (Rev 1<sup>5</sup>). It is because of this Divine attribute of love that 'Christ forgave' sinners (Eph 4<sup>32</sup>). His forgiving sins was a great scandal to the Jews (Mk 2<sup>5-7</sup> 10). Well might they ask, from their point of view, 'Who can forgive sins but one, even God?' The forgiveness of sins by our Lord differs in kind, not in degree, from human absolutions pronounced by Christian ministers, who do not profess to be able to read the heart or to perform any but a conditional and ministerial action.—For the attribute of truth see Rev 3<sup>7-14</sup> ('the Amen') 6<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>11</sup> (in these Jesus is [ὁ] ἀληθινός, the 'ideal or absolute truth,' not merely 'veracious'), Jn 1<sup>14</sup> ('full of grace and truth') 14<sup>6</sup> ('I am the way and the truth and the life'). Our Lord, then, is absolute Truth; and with this attribute is associated that of knowledge: 'He knew all men . . . he himself knew what was in man' (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>); without this He could not be the Judge (see also 1 Co 1<sup>24</sup> 30, Col 2<sup>3</sup>).—Most emphatically is our Lord called holy. His is an absolute sanctity (Rev 3<sup>7</sup>: 'He that is holy, he that is true'); not only the holiness of a good man who strives to do God's will, but absolute sinlessness. This attribute is insisted on with some vehemence in 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, He 4<sup>15</sup> 7<sup>26</sup> ('holy' [ἅγιος; see 3 (f) note], 'separated from sinners'), 1 P 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>5</sup>; note also Ro 8<sup>3</sup> ('in the likeness of sinful flesh'). Sanday-Headlam justly remark (ICC in loc.) that 'the flesh of Christ is "like" ours inasmuch as it is flesh; "like," and only "like," because it is not sinful.' For this attribute see also Ac 3<sup>14</sup> ('the Holy and Righteous One') 4<sup>27</sup>, Rev 6<sup>10</sup>; and, in the Gospels, Mk 1<sup>24</sup>, Jn 6<sup>69</sup>, etc. Both the demoniacs in a lower sense and the instructed disciples in a higher one call our Lord 'the Holy One of God.' It was announced by Gabriel that from His birth Jesus should be called holy, the Son of God (Lk 1<sup>35</sup> RV).—Lastly, the attribute of righteousness is ascribed to our

(f) Christ's Godhead is not contrary to His true humanity.—In weighing all the above considerations, we must remember the great stress that is laid in the NT on the true humanity of Jesus (e.g. Ac 17<sup>31</sup>, Ro 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>, Rev 1<sup>13</sup>), though this does not come within the scope of this article. The apostles did not make their Master to be a mere Docetic or phantom man. Jesus really suffered in His human spirit as well as in His human body. But when we review all the passages given in the preceding paragraphs, and others like them, whatever deductions we may make because of a doubtful reading here or a questionable interpretation there, we cannot doubt that the apostles taught that Jesus is no mere man, or even a created angel, but is God. See further below, § 9.

7. Personality and Godhead of the Holy Ghost.—Much is said in the OT of the Spirit of God, who from the first had given life to the world (Gn 1<sup>2</sup> 27, Job 33<sup>4</sup>). The 'Spirit' in Hebrew, as in Greek and Latin, is the Breath of God (רוח, pneuma, spiritus), who not only gave physical life at the first, but is the moving power of holiness. The Psalmist prays: 'Take not thy holy spirit from me' (Ps 51<sup>11</sup>). But the OT teachers had not yet learnt what Christian theology calls the personality of the Holy Ghost (see above, 5 (a)), though in the teaching about 'Wisdom,' which is in some degree personified in the OT, e.g. in Pr 8 and the Sapiential books of the Apocrypha, and also in the phraseology of such passages as Is 48<sup>16</sup> 63<sup>10</sup>, they made some approach to it. In Christian times, while there has been on the whole little doubt about the Godhead of the Spirit (though in the 4th cent. the Arians asserted that He was a created being), yet men have frequently hesitated about His distinct personality, and have thought of Him merely as an Attribute or Influence of the Father. It is therefore important to investigate the apostolic teaching on the subject. We must first notice that the NT writers fully recognize that the Holy Spirit had worked in the Old Dispensation; He 'spoke by the prophets' [the enlarged 'Nicene Creed']; the words quoted from the OT are the words of the Holy Ghost (Ac 1<sup>16</sup> 28<sup>25</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>21</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, etc.). The Pentecostal outpouring was not the first working of the Spirit in the world. But the apostolic writers teach a far higher doctrine of the Spirit than was known in the OT.

(a) The Godhead of the Holy Ghost.—We have already seen (above, 5 (c)) that the Spirit is in the NT teaching joined to the Father and Son in a manner which implies Godhead. The 'Spirit of God' (see below) must be God. When Ananias lied 'to the Holy Ghost,' he lied not 'unto men but unto God' (Ac 5<sup>34</sup>; cf. v. 9, where he and Sapphira are said to have 'agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord'). With this we may compare Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, where blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is said to have 'never forgiveness'; the || Mt 12<sup>31</sup> adds: 'Whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man it shall be forgiven him.' The inference is that if the Son is God, the Spirit is God.—Divine attributes are predicated of the Spirit. In particular, He is throughout named holy. We may ask why this epithet is so constantly given to Him, for it is obviously not intended to derogate from the Father or the Son. May not the reason be sought in the work of the Spirit? It is through Him that man becomes holy, through Him that God works on man. In this connexion we may notice two points. (1) In the OT we do not find the absolute title 'the Holy Spirit,' though the Spirit is called 'holy' in Ps 51<sup>11</sup> ('thy holy spirit') and Is 63<sup>10</sup> ('his holy spirit'). The use of the title 'the Holy Spirit' is a token of advance to the conception of personality; see below (b). (2) In the NT there is frequently a difference between the title when used without the article and when used with it, so that πνεῦμα ἅγιον ('Holy Spirit') is a gift or manifestation of the Spirit in its relation to the life of man, while the same words with the article (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον or τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα) denote the Holy Spirit considered as a Divine Person (Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, 1909, p. 396 f.).—Again, knowledge of the deep things of God is predicated of the Spirit (1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>). He is the truth (1 Jn 5<sup>7</sup>; cf. Jn 15<sup>26</sup>). He is the Spirit of life (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>), and immanent in man (Ro 5<sup>5</sup> 8<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>19</sup> [cf. esp. 2 Co 6<sup>16</sup>] 7<sup>40</sup>, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>, Jn 14<sup>17</sup>, etc.). He is eternal (He 9<sup>14</sup>; but on this verse see Swete, p. 61).

(b) The Personality of the Holy Ghost.—This needs careful consideration. Is He but an Influence of the Father? The NT writings negative this idea; for, though they join together the Spirit with the Father and the Son, as above, 5 (c), yet they represent the Spirit as being in a real sense distinct from both. In Jn 14<sup>16</sup> our Lord says: 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another (ἄλλον) Comforter.' He is sent by the Father (14<sup>26</sup>), proceeds from the Father (15<sup>26</sup>), and is sent by the Son from the Father (15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>). He is called by St. Paul in the same context 'the Spirit of God' and 'the Spirit of Christ' (Ro 8<sup>6</sup>). The Father is not the same Person as the Son, and if the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of both, He must be distinct from both. This is seen also, though in not quite so close and striking a context, in many other passages. He is called 'the Spirit of God' also in 1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>, 14<sup>7</sup>, Eph 4<sup>30</sup>, Ph 3<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>2</sup>, 12, as in Mt 12<sup>28</sup> (where the || Lk 11<sup>20</sup> has 'the finger of God' instead, the meaning being that God works through the Holy Ghost); He is called 'the Spirit of your Father' in Mt 10<sup>20</sup>; and 'the Spirit of Christ' or 'of Jesus' or 'of the Son' in Ac 16<sup>7</sup> RV, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>, Ph 1<sup>19</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup>; note especially Gal 4<sup>6</sup>: 'God sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts.' Again, that the Spirit is distinct from the Son is clear from Jn 16<sup>7</sup> ('if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I go I will send him unto you') and v. 14 ('he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you').

Personal acts are frequently predicated of the Holy Ghost. In Ac 13<sup>2</sup> we read: 'They ministered to the Lord, and the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. . . . So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost,' etc. In Ac 15<sup>28</sup> the formula which became the common usage of later Councils is used: 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us.' So we read that the Spirit wills (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>), searches (1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>), is grieved (Eph 4<sup>30</sup>), helps and intercedes (Ro 8<sup>26</sup>), dwells within us (above (a)), and distributes gifts (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>).

In the sub-apostolic period there is found some confusion between the Son and the Spirit: e.g. Hermas, Sim. v. 6, ix. 1; pseudo-Clement, 2 Cor. ix., xiv.; Justin, Apol. i. 33. Thus Justin says: 'The Spirit and the Power which is from God must not be thought to be aught else but the Word who is God's First-begotten.' Hermas seems to identify the Spirit with the pre-existent Divine nature of Christ: 'The holy pre-existent Spirit which created the whole earth God made to dwell in flesh. . . . That Spirit is the Son of God.' But the meaning of these writers seems to be merely that the pre-existent Logos was spirit and was Divine. Swete (Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, p. 31) remarks of this period that 'there was as yet no formal theology of the Spirit and no effort to create it; nor was there any conscious heresy. But the presence of the Spirit in the Body of Christ was recognized on all hands as an acknowledged fact of the Christian life.'

8. Subordination.—This is the term by which Christian theology expresses the doctrine that there are not three sources in the Godhead, but that the Son and the Holy Ghost derive their Divine substance from the Father, and that, while they are equal to Him as touching their Godhead, yet in a real sense they are subordinate to Him. This, however, does not involve the Arian conception of a Supreme God and two inferior deities. It must be remembered that human language is limited, and unable to express fully the Divine mysteries; so that just as the technical terms 'Trinity,' 'Person,' may be misused in the interests of Tritheism, so 'subordination' may be misused in the interests of Arianism.

It is noteworthy that the 'spiritual Gospel,' as Clement of Alexandria calls Jn. (quoted in Eusebius, HE vi. xiv. 7), though it insists so strongly on the Godhead of our Lord, yet equally emphasizes the doctrine of subordination. It is the Father who, having 'life in himself,' gave 'to the Son also to have life in himself,' and 'gave all judgment unto the Son' (Jn 5-26). Jesus says: 'I live because of the Father' (6<sup>57</sup>; cf. 10<sup>18</sup>). It has been disputed whether Jn 14<sup>28</sup> ('the Father is greater than I') refers to Jesus' humanity, as the Latin Fathers ordinarily explain it, or to His Divinity, as the Greek Fathers interpret; if to the latter, we have here a striking instance of subordination (see Liddon, Bampton Lectures, 1868, 1878, lect. iv. p. 199 f.). We find the same thing in St. Paul: 'The head of Christ is God' (1 Co 11<sup>3</sup>); 'then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all' (15<sup>28</sup>); cf. 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, 'of whom are all things.' Subordination is also suggested by the frequent phrase 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' and the words 'my God' used by our Lord in Rev 3<sup>3</sup> RV 3<sup>12</sup>, and especially in Jn 20<sup>17</sup>, where Jesus distinguishes 'my God' and 'your God' just as He distinguishes 'my Father' and 'your Father' (above, 4 (a)).

Both the Godhead and the subordination of our Lord are expressed by the phrases 'God of (ἐκ) God,' 'Very God of very God' of the Nicene Creed. The Father is the fount or source of Godhead, and there is none other.

The subordination of the Spirit is implied in much that has been quoted above. The very title 'the Spirit of God' denotes that He is subordinate to the Father and derives from Him. Note also Jn 16<sup>13</sup>: 'He shall not speak from himself, but what things soever he shall hear, [these] shall he speak . . . he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you,' with which we must compare 15<sup>18</sup>: 'all things that I heard from my Father I have made known unto you.' This refers to the temporal mission of the Holy Ghost, and so, probably (at least in its primary aspect), does the saying that He 'proceedeth from the Father' (15<sup>26</sup>). The procession of the Holy Ghost has been much discussed, and the controversy has been complicated by the addition of a word (Filioque) to the Nicene Creed by the Western Church; but most of those who have engaged in this theological warfare might probably agree in the statement that He who is 'the Spirit of Christ' proceeds, in eternity as well as in time, from the Father through the Son. In any case, procession involves what is meant by 'subordination.'

9. The Divine unity.—Although the apostolic writers emphasize the distinctions in the Godhead, they at the same time reiterate the OT doctrine that God is One. They show no consciousness of teaching anything but the unity of God. The saying of Dt 6<sup>4</sup> (cf. Is 44<sup>8</sup>) that 'The Lord our God is one Lord' is repeated by the Master in Mk 12<sup>29</sup>. 'There is no God but one,' says St. Paul (1 Co 8<sup>4</sup>; so v. 9); 'There is one God,' 'the only God' (1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup> 1<sup>17</sup>). St. James makes the unity of God a common ground between his opponents and himself; even the demons believe [this] (Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). As a matter of fact, Christianity was never seriously accused of polytheism. Aubrey Moore remarks (Lux Mundi<sup>2</sup>, 1890, p. 59) that at the present day polytheism has ceased to exist in the civilized world; every theist is by a rational necessity a monotheist. And this tendency had begun at the commencement of the Christian era. But the Jews of that day made the Divine unity to be self-absorbed. The Divine attribute of love implies relations within the Divine Being; and hence the Jewish idea of God was a barren one, as is the Muhammadan idea to-day. The world needed a re-statement of the doctrine of God, and this was given by Christianity. The Christian doctrine steers its way between Tritheism, which postulates three Persons like three individuals, and Sabellianism, which teaches that Father, Son, and Spirit are but three aspects of God. It does not profess to be 'easy'; it was the desire for 'easiness' that led to Arianism and its cognates, which taught that the Son and the Spirit were inferior and created Divine beings; and, indeed, it was the same desire that led to all the old Christian heresies. But we need not expect that the 'deep things of God' (1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>), which cannot adequately be expressed in human language, will be readily comprehensible to our limited human intelligence.

To whom is this re-statement of the doctrine of God due? Was it made in sub-apostolic times, or by the apostles, or by our Lord Himself? Those who deny that St. Paul wrote any Epistles, or at least any that have survived, and who make the Fourth Gospel, and perhaps the First, to be 2nd cent. writings, may take the first view. Only it is difficult to imagine what unknown genius in the sub-apostolic age could have made such a revolution in thought. This view, however, may safely be passed over, as involving a thoroughly false criticism of the NT books. More attention must be paid to the view that the re-statement of doctrine is due to St. Paul; that he was, in reality, the founder of Christian doctrine, and that the 'original Christianity is better represented by Ebionism.' It has been well pointed out by Gore (Bampton Lectures, 1891, Appended Note 26, p. 254 ff.) that this view is contrary to all the evidence. Those books of the NT which are most independent of St. Paul, such as the Second Gospel, the Epistle of St. James, and the Apocalypse, give the same doctrine that the Apostle of the Gentiles gives. There was no opposition on the subject of the Person of Christ between St. Paul and his judaizing opponents, as would certainly have been the case had Ebionism been the original Christianity. The re-statement of the doctrine of God was fully received at least within a generation of the Ascension. For example, Sanday points out (HDB iv. 573<sup>a</sup>) that the use of 'the Father' and 'the Son' as theological terms goes back to a date which is not more than 23 years from that event (1 Th 1<sup>1-10</sup>). It is impossible to account for such a rapid growth unless the re-statement came from Him whose bond-servants the apostles loved to profess themselves. The concurrence of so many independent writers can only be due to the fact that 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. No man hath seen God at any time; God only begotten [or the only begotten Son], which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (Jn 1<sup>17</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Out of a vast number of works it is not easy to give a small selection which will be useful to the reader; and therefore only English works are here mentioned, and only those which bear on the apostolic period. Reference may be made to J. Pearson, An Exposition of the Creed (first published in 1659; a monument of theological learning, of which the foot-notes, giving the Patristic quotations, are specially valuable); C. Gore, The Incarnation of the Son of God (Bampton

GODLINESS.—This word appears in the EV of the NT as the translation of the Gr. εὐσεβεία (1 Ti 2-3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>, 8, 2 Ti 3<sup>5</sup>, Tit 1<sup>1</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>, also Ac 3<sup>12</sup> RV). In 1 Ti 2<sup>10</sup> it translates θεοσεβεία. Cf. also 2 Clem. xix. 1 (εὐσεβεία), xx. 4 (θεοσεβεία). 'εὐσεβεία is a more general word than θεοσεβεία, and is almost equivalent to the Latin pietas, due esteem of superiors, whether human or Divine, while θεοσεβεία is restricted to God as its object. However, in the NT εὐσεβεία always has reference to God' (J. H. Bernard, The Pastoral Epistles [Camb. Greek Test., 1899], p. 39 f.).

It will be seen from the above references that the word εὐσεβεία (θεοσεβεία) is particularly characteristic of the Pastoral Epistles. H. J. Holtzmann speaks of the idea represented by it as one of the most individual ideas of these letters, and points out that its appearance in them (cf. also εὐσεβὴς ζῆλος [2 Ti 3<sup>12</sup>, Tit 2<sup>12</sup>]) is connected with the recession of the one-sidedly religious interest of the great Pauline Epistles (Gal., Rom., 1 and 2 Cor.), and the coming to the front of an ethical conception of the business of life (see his NT Theol.,<sup>2</sup> Tübingen, 1911, ii. 306). In the original Paulinism the supreme stress lies on the religious relation to God, and the central idea is that of justification by faith; while the ethical note is struck only in the second place, and in connexion with the peculiar Pauline mysticism. The Christian united to Christ in His Death and Resurrection is a new man, and must accordingly live as such. In the Pastoral Epistles, however, it is justification by faith and the specifically religious relation to God which are in the background; while the ethical demand of Christianity comes to the front in connexion with a fresh idea—that of adhesion to the Church, its doctrine and practice. It is just this latter point of view as a whole which is summed up in the word εὐσεβεία. 'It is above all significant of the tendency of our epistles, that this conception serves to gather up in one both of these lines, in which the entire thought and effort of the author moves, viz. the ecclesiastical and the practical character of the type of religion recommended by him' (Holtzmann, loc. cit.). On the one hand, therefore, godliness, as adhesion to the Church, appears as guaranteeing true doctrine (the teaching which is according to godliness [1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>], the knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness [Tit 1<sup>1</sup>], the mystery of godliness [1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>]; cf. Ap. Const. iii. 5: κατηχεῖσθαι τὰ τῆς εὐσεβείας δόγματα). On the other hand, godliness evidences itself in good works and a life without reproach (1 Ti 2<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>). It is in fact because of the practical and ethical character of Christianity that its doctrine in opposition to the heretical speculations of Gnosis is sound speech (Tit 2<sup>2</sup>), sound teaching (1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>3</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>), sound words (1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>); cf. 'to be sound in the faith' (Tit 1<sup>13</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>). On all this see Holtzmann, op. cit.

Holtzmann, of course, does not accept the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles. Bernard, who does, says that the group of words connected with εὐσεβεία was within St. Paul's sphere of knowledge, as they are all found in the LXX and are common in Greek literature; as a matter of fact, too, St. Paul uses the corresponding forms ἀσεβεία and ἀσεβής in Romans. 'But why he should not have used them before and yet should use them so often in these latest letters is among the unsolved problems of the phraseology of the Pastorals, although corresponding literary phenomena have been often observed' (op. cit. p. 39). The problem created by the use of these words is, however, only a part of the larger problem of the whole change in thought and atmosphere which has taken place between the 'Hauptbriefe' and the Pastoral Epistles (see the writer's Man, Sin, and Salvation, London, 1908, pp. 137-140).

In conclusion, it may be observed, and it has a bearing on the question of the authorship of the Pastorals, that the idea of 'godliness' serves to bind these letters together with the certainly late and unauthentic 2 Peter and 2 Clement. In 2 Pet., moreover, εὐσεβεία serves to denote, just as in the Pastorals, the religion of the Church, in opposition to that of a heretical Gnosis (1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>14</sup>).

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

GOG AND MAGOG.—In the Book of Revelation (20<sup>7</sup> 8) the seer tells that Satan, after being bound for one thousand years, shall be loosed and go forth to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle. This is conceived in the Apocalypse as the last great battle between the powers of evil and the armies of God, and as the occasion of the final overthrow of the wicked, when fire comes forth from heaven to devour them. In this passage Gog and Magog are represented as nations dwelling in the four quarters of the earth and symbolic of the enemies of the Lord. The names are taken from the prophecy of Ezekiel (chs. 38 and 39), where Gog is represented as a person, 'the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' and Magog as the name of his land (38<sup>3</sup>). The prophet depicts this prince as leading a great host against the restored Israel, and being utterly defeated and overthrown. In the ethnological table in Gn 10 Magog is represented as the son of Japheth and brother of Gomer. As to the etymology of the names, considerable difference of opinion exists. Driver (in SDB, art. 'Gog') states that the name Gog recalls that of Gyges (Gr. Γύγης, Assy. Gugu), the famous king of Lydia of whom Herodotus (i. 8-14) tells us, and who, Assurbanipal states (KIB ii. 173-5), when his country was invaded by the Gimirra (Cimerians), expelled them with Assyrian help. The name may have reached Palestine as that of a successful and distant king of barbarian tribes and may have been used by Ezekiel as symbolic of powers hostile to the Kingdom of God. Another interesting explanation is that of Uhlemann (ZWT v. [ed. Hilgenfeld, 1862], p. 265 ff.). He points out that Magog originally signified 'dwelling-place,' or 'land of Gog,' and that the name Gog itself means 'mountain.' According to Uhlemann, all etymological and geographical indications point to the nation of Gog being the inhabitants of the Caucasus, as the καυκάσιον ὄρος of Herodotus is simply the Asiatic 'Kauk' or the Asiatic 'mountain range.' Others, such as Augustine and several ancient commentators, connect the word with Heb. גֹּג, 'roof,' 'cover' or 'protection,' but it is unlikely that there is any connexion.

The Jews themselves regarded Gog and Magog as vague descriptions of northern barbaric nations, with whom they were very slightly acquainted. Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 1) identifies them with the Scythians—a term which was generally used to describe vaguely any northern barbaric people. Perhaps even in Ezekiel, where Gog is the prince and Magog the name of his country, the terms are little more than symbolic names for the opponents of God and His people. The picture that Ezekiel gave of their overthrow gave rise to the apocalyptic conception that finally the enemies of God and His people would be utterly overthrown in a great battle, and the names Gog and Magog frequently appear in later Jewish apocalyptic literature as leaders of the hostile world powers (cf. Sib. Orac. iii. 319, 322; Mishna, Edyoth, 2. 10). This final and abortive attack on the part of the powers of evil is referred to in Rev 19<sup>17a</sup>, while in 20<sup>8</sup> the names of Gog and Magog appear as the description of hostile nations. Probably Rev 19 and 20, like most of the book, is part of a Jewish apocalypse which has been transformed by the Christian writer. The Christian seer, like the Hebrew prophet, looks for a day when the enemies of God and His saints will be utterly overthrown.

Many and varied are the interpretations that have been given of Gog and Magog by those who, ignoring the poetical and pictorial nature of apocalyptic literature, regard the Apocalypse as a prophecy of actual historic events. Thus the names have been applied to nations beyond the bounds of the Roman Empire, to Bar Cochba, the Jewish Messianic pretender, and frequently to the Turks. These interpretations depend on the view taken of the 'thousand years' and the 'first resurrection.' For a full discussion of the subject, see artt. ESCHATOLOGY, PAROUSIA.

W. F. BOYD.

GOLD (χρυσός, χρυσόν, 'gold'; χρύσεος, 'golden'; χρύσω, 'adorn with gold,' 'gild').—This mineral may, from one point of view, be classed with 'any other yellow pebbles' (Ruskin, Unto This Last, §29), but as a universal standard of value and means of adornment it claims a special attention. From the earliest times the imagination of man has been fired by the thought of reefs and sands of gold. There is a naïve wonder in the first and last biblical references—'and the gold of that land was good' (Gn 21-), 'and the street of the city was pure gold' (Rev 21<sup>21</sup>). There are good reasons for the unquestioned supremacy of gold among metals; the supply of it is neither too great nor too small; its colour and lustre are permanent; it is the most malleable and one of the most ductile of substances; it can be melted and re-melted with scarcely any diminution of quantity. In its state of perfect purity it is too soft for most purposes, but a small admixture of copper gives it sufficient hardness for coinage and for jewellery.

Gold is often found in solid masses, but generally in combination with silver and other ores, from which it requires to be purified. Peter (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>) refers to 'gold proved by fire' (χρυσίου δια πυρός δοκιμαζόμενου; cf. Rev 3<sup>18</sup>).

'Strabo states that in his time a process was employed for refining and purifying gold in large quantities by cementing or burning it with an aluminous earth, which, by destroying the silver, left the gold in a state of purity. Pliny shows that for this purpose the gold was placed on the fire in an earthen vessel with treble its weight of salt, and that it was afterwards again exposed to the fire with two parts of salt and one of argillaceous rock, which, in the presence of moisture, effected the decomposition of the salt; by this means the silver became converted into chloride' (EBD<sup>1</sup>, art. 'Gold,' xii. 190).

India, Arabia, Spain, and Africa were the chief gold-producing countries of the ancients. Arabia, containing the lands of Seba, Havilah, and Ophir, was the Eldorado of the Hebrews. Herodotus (vi. 47) tells of the Phœnician quest for gold in the island of Thasos: 'a large mountain has been thrown upside down in the search.' Pliny describes the gold-mining of Spain (HN xxx. 4. 21). The art of the goldsmith flourished in all the ancient civilizations. The gold-work of the Greeks, Etruscans, and Romans may be rivalled, but can scarcely be excelled, and that of the Egyptians of 2,000 years earlier was no less exquisite.

Gold was used for many purposes, secular and sacred. Crowns were made of it (Rev 4<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>7</sup> 14<sup>14</sup>), rings (Ja 2-), vessels of great houses (2 Ti 2<sup>20</sup>), idols (Rev 9<sup>-9</sup>; cf. Ac 17<sup>-9</sup>). Many articles of gold were in the merchandise of Rome (Rev 18<sup>12</sup>); the great city itself was decked with it (18<sup>16</sup>); the scarlet woman's cup of abomination was made of it (17<sup>4</sup>). Much of the furniture of the real Temple, as of St. John's ideal one, was of gold—the ark of the covenant (overlaid with it, He 9<sup>4</sup>), the censer (He 9<sup>4</sup>, Rev 8<sup>3</sup>), the altar of incense (8<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>13</sup>), the bowls full of incense (5<sup>8</sup>), the pot of manna (He 9<sup>4</sup>), the candlesticks (Rev 1<sup>12</sup> 13. 20 21). But servants of God have a spiritual rather than a material standard of values; for them 'the true veins of wealth are purple—and not in Rock, but in Flesh' (Ruskin, op. cit. §40). They have been redeemed not with gold, but with blood (1 P 1<sup>18</sup>). Apostles, though poor, have something more precious to offer than gold (Ac 3<sup>9</sup>). Women have a finer adornment than jewels of gold (1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>3</sup>). It is assumed that even the noblest metal may be rusted (Ja 5<sup>3</sup>), and if this is only a popular fancy, at any rate gold is ultimately as perishable as all other material things (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>).

It is natural, however, that gold should be a universal symbol of purity and worth. The golden age, the golden rule, golden opinions, golden opportunities are in common speech the best of such things. Gold is likewise an inevitable category of apocalyptic prophecy. The Son of Man wears a golden girdle (Rev 1<sup>13</sup>), as does each of the seven angels of the seven golden bowls (15<sup>6</sup> 7). The twenty-four elders have on their heads crowns of gold (4<sup>4</sup>). An angel receives a golden reed to measure the New Jerusalem (21<sup>10</sup>), and the city itself is pure gold (21<sup>18</sup> 21. cf. To 13<sup>16</sup> 17). The gold of the Apocalypticist, moreover, has a transcendent quality: differing from our opaque yellow metal, it is 'like unto pure glass,' clear and transparent as crystal. The gold of heaven is finer than earth's finest.

GOOD.—The adj. 'good' (ἀγαθός, καλός) may be used of any quality, physical as well as moral, thing, or person that may be approved as useful, fit, admirable, right. In the moral sense it connotes in the NT not only righteousness but kindness, helpfulness, love. For Jesus, God alone was good without limitation or qualification (Mk<sup>10</sup> 18, Lk 18<sup>19</sup>); and while His own moral discipline on earth was going on, He disclaimed that epithet for Himself (cf. Mt 19<sup>17</sup>, with its attempt to escape the apparent difficulty of the disclaimer). This Divine perfection is shown in an impartial, universal beneficence (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>), which men are to imitate (v. 48). The same conviction of what God is, and what man, therefore, should be, is found in St. Paul's counsels (Eph 4<sup>31</sup>-5<sup>2</sup>). Jesus Himself is the expression and activity of this Divine perfection, and so it is characteristic of Him to go about 'doing good' (Ac 10<sup>36</sup>), as He Himself indicates in His reply to the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>4</sup> 5); and this, too, He enjoins as the practice of His disciples (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>; cf. Mt 25<sup>34</sup>, Mk 14<sup>7</sup>, Lk 19<sup>6</sup> 9). St. Paul echoes the teaching of Jesus when he bids the Romans 'overcome evil with good' (Ro 12<sup>-1</sup>), and assures them that such conduct will have its reward (2<sup>10</sup>). The distinction St. Paul makes between 'a righteous man' and 'the good man' (Ro 5<sup>7</sup>) deserves special attention. Just as God because He is righteous reckons righteous (Ro 3<sup>26</sup>), so it is because God is good in Himself that He is ever showing His goodness to all men, especially in Christ and His Cross (Ro 5<sup>8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>32</sup>) and calling all men to be the imitators of His goodness (1 Co 13).

Although the following article is dealing with the Christian moral ideal as 'goodness,' this brief statement in introducing the subject of 'the good' as man's 'chief end' has been made for two reasons. (a) In the Christian view, God Himself is man's chief good, for in His fellowship alone is man's perfection, glory, and blessedness, and it is God's goodness that man enjoys for ever; and (b) it is because of this goodness—this self-giving of God's perfection as love—that the chief good is given to man. It is in Christ that man so possesses God, and it is through Christ that God so communicates Himself to man. The total impression of the apostolic writings is that Christ Himself is the Good, for in Him and through Him alone man has God as Love.

We must note, however, that the chief good is presented to us in three distinctive phrases in the different types of teaching in the NT. In the Synoptics, on the lips of Jesus Himself, it is 'the kingdom of God' (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>); in the Fourth Gospel it is 'eternal life' (Jn 20<sup>30, 31</sup>), although we also find the second representation in Mt 19<sup>16</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18</sup>, and the first in Jn 3<sup>5</sup>; in the Pauline Epistles it is 'the righteousness of God' or 'of faith' (Ph 3<sup>9</sup>), or, more generally, salvation (Ro 16. 17).

The idea of the good combines character and condition; it includes rightness and happiness, holiness and blessedness, or, as the Shorter Catechism puts it: 'man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever.' Man, by claiming God's goodness, enjoying and praising it, and by showing a like goodness, glorifies God: that is, sets forth the honour, worth, beauty, and majesty of God's moral perfection (Ro 15<sup>6, 9</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>18</sup>; cf. Col 3<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>10, 11</sup>). As God is grace, God's claim on man is for faith, and this is his supreme duty (He 11<sup>6</sup>). Thus the two aspects of the good pass into one another: man fulfils his obligation to God by making fully his own the salvation God offers in Christ. We need not then further pursue the idea of the good as duty, but may confine ourselves to it as boon.

(1) For Plato and Aristotle the good necessarily included both well-being (eudaimonia) and also well-doing; a man must have health, wealth, beauty, and intellect as well as the virtues to attain fully the good. Here the first great distinction of the Christian view emerges. A man's good is independent of his outward circumstances. As Jesus taught His disciples not to be anxious about food or raiment, but to leave all to the care and bounty of the Heavenly Father, who would add all these things to those who first sought His Kingdom and righteousness (Mt 6<sup>19-34</sup>), so St. Paul assures Christian believers that even the very worst circumstances imaginable cannot really injure them, for 'all things work together for good to them that love God' (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>). The declaration has some affinity with Stoic thought; but the difference lies in this, that for Stoic self-sufficiency there is substituted the possession of the love of God in Christ as the satisfying portion of the soul (v.<sup>39</sup>). While there is this independence of outward circumstances, there is no cynic-like contempt for bodily needs, and the labour that meets these (1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>10</sup>, Ro 12<sup>11-17</sup>). Private property even may become part of the Christian's good, as affording the opportunity for the generosity which is so highly recommended as a Christian grace (Ro 12<sup>8, 13</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>1-15</sup>).

(2) A second feature of the Christian view that distinguishes it from the Greek is that the good is not the result of fortune or the reward of merit, but the gift of God's grace (Ro 5<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>). It does include a duty to be done, but it is primarily a boon to be claimed. Hence the pre-eminence of faith as the primary, if not the supreme, grace of the Christian life. For human self-sufficiency there is substituted dependence upon God (2 Co 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>5, 6</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>).

(3) A third characteristic is the emphasis on sin in the Christian view as the evil from which there must be escape. The good includes deliverance from sin in the two-fold sense, corresponding to the two-fold reference of sin in relation to God, and in relation to a man's own nature. There is forgiveness of sin, reconciliation with God, the peace of God (Ro 3<sup>22-26</sup> 5<sup>10</sup> 17<sup>21</sup>, etc.); a man is set in right relation with God, so that God's approval and not His displeasure rests upon him, and he does not distrust, or feel estranged from, God, but is at home with God as a child with a father. There is also the breaking of the power of sin, and the banishment of the love of sin, by a new motive and a new strength (Ro 6<sup>1-11</sup> 7<sup>25</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, Ph 4<sup>13</sup>). There is a present conquest of evil, and victory over the world. This is a present good claimed more or less, according to the measure of faith; but as Christians are not merely owners of the present but also heirs of the future good (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, Tit 3<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>4</sup>; cf. He 11<sup>9</sup>), hope as well as faith is necessary to claim the full salvation (Ro 8<sup>24</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>).

(4) Into the contents of the Christian hope, the details of the apostolic eschatology (q.v.), it is beyond the scope of this article to enter; but one feature, because of its distinction from, or even opposition to, the Greek view, may here be mentioned. The Greek thinker, if he did hope for a future life, looked for the release of the soul from its imprisonment in the body—for a disembodied immortality; but the Christian good includes not merely the survival of the soul in death, but resurrection—the restoration of the entire personality (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1-4</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). This does not involve the absurdity of a material identity of the body buried and the body raised, for St. Paul expressly distinguishes the one from the other as the natural and the spiritual (1 Co 15<sup>4-44</sup>), but only the conviction that the future life will be a completely human one.

(5) As we may surely reckon as an element in the Christian good the fellowship of believers, the membership of the body of Christ (1 Co 12<sup>12-31</sup>, Eph 1<sup>23</sup>), the κοινωνία of the Spirit (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>: the common life of the Church in the Spirit), so the Christian life is not individual but universal; it is the subjection of all things to Christ, the destruction of all evil, the cessation of all pain and grief, the victory of the saints, and God all and in all. No such wider hope inspired the Greek thinkers. It is true that the expectation of an immediate return of Christ in power and glory precludes our interpreting this universal good as a historical evolution of mankind in manners, morals, laws, institutions, and pieties to so glorious and blessed a consummation, and we are left uncertain as to the mode in which the process is to be conceived. But the hope is a fact of apostolic life.

(6) There is one feature in the Christian good peculiar to St. Paul. As a Pharisee he had felt the burden and the bondage of the Law, and groaned under its judgment, but he had discovered its impotence, and so for him the Christian good included the end of the Law (Gal 4<sup>21-51</sup>), for Christian morality is not legal—the observance of the letter—but spiritual—the expression of the new life found in Christ (2 Co 3<sup>1-11</sup>). It may be doubted, however, whether even all believers in the Apostolic Age were morally mature enough to be released from all outward restraints, and to be left only to inward constraint; and St. Paul's counsels and commands even in his letters show that this end of the Law was ideal rather than actual. It is certain that the Christian Church in the course of its history generally has been legal rather than spiritual in its morality, and so this part of the Christian good has been unrealized.

(7) In the apostolic view of the Christian good there are two features which may be regarded as of temporary and local rather than of permanent and universal significance for Christian faith: (a) the expectation of the speedy Second Advent of Christ in power and glory to usher in the Last Things, which faded out of the Christian consciousness, with from time to time futile attempts to revive it, as the course of human history contradicted it; and (b) the belief which became more prominent in subsequent centuries than it was in the Apostolic Age, that the evil to be overcome and destroyed was embodied in personal evil principles and powers, over whom Christ gained the victory, and from whom He effected deliverance for the believer (Ro 8<sup>33-39</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>, Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, Col 2<sup>15</sup>). For the details on both these subjects the relevant articles must be consulted, as all that is here necessary is merely the mention of them for the completeness of the treatment of the present topic.

Such is the Christian good; is it regarded as destined to be universal? Does the NT offer us a theodicy? It has been already indicated that the Christian hope does include the victory of Christ over all His foes, and the subjection of all things to Him, and at last of Himself to God (1 Co 15<sup>4-8</sup>); but these confident predictions do not clearly or fully answer the question whether all men will at last be saved—that is, become sharers of the good. While there are a few passages pointing towards universal restoration, there are others indicating eternal punishment, and some even on which has been based a theory of conditional immortality. This problem seems insoluble even with the data not only of the Scriptures, but also of human experience; and accordingly, whatever Christian wishes and hopes may be, we cannot affirm that the Christian good presents the final destiny of the race in cloudless sunshine without any shadow; and thus the believer must walk not by sight, but by faith, in the belief that whatever the Heavenly Father does is wisest, kindest, best. As has been shown in the art. EVIL, the Christian attitude is neither optimism nor pessimism, but meliorism—the belief that the world not only needs redemption, but is being redeemed in Christ.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

GOODNESS (HUMAN).*—Two applications go side by side in the general usage of the word 'goodness' and are also found in the NT. On the one hand, it denotes an inherent quality without regard to its effect; on the other hand, the 'goodness' is predicated in view of the effect. In the latter case, however, the thought of the inherent quality as producing the effect is never quite absent from the field of consciousness. It is not possible to call either of these two uses the older and more original one and to stamp the other as secondary and developed. Already in Homer (Od. xv. 324, Il. xiii. 284) ἀγαθός occurs of inherent quality as a designation of the well-born class, as distinguished from the common people (cf. our 'better class,' 'aristocracy'). When these are at the same time called ἀγαθοί in the sense of 'brave,' this but shows the close connexion between the inherent and the transient reference of the word. Bravery is the goodness of the aristocracy in action. Hence in the frequent sense of 'efficient,' 'adequate,' the adjective does not describe a momentary or spasmodic efficiency, but the habitual one of quality. Good objects, good circumstances, 'goods,' in the sense of wealth or of delicacies, are all so designated because of their inherent adaptation to benefit the owner or receiver. The force of the word in such connexions can perhaps be felt best from the opposite πονηρός. Both meanings are transferred to the moral sphere. The ethical use of the word is, however, in profane Greek a comparatively late development, not being frequent until the philosophical writers (e.g. Plato).

In the NT both the sub-ethical and the ethical use are represented. For the former see Mt 7<sup>17</sup>, Lk 1<sup>53</sup> 8<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>18</sup>, 19 16<sup>25</sup>, Ro 8<sup>28</sup> 10<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>, Gal 6<sup>6</sup>, He 9<sup>11</sup>, Ja 1<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>10</sup>. For the latter, used of persons, see Mt 5<sup>45</sup> 12<sup>34</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>, 17 20<sup>15</sup>, Mk 10<sup>18</sup>, Lk 18<sup>19</sup> 23<sup>50</sup>, Jn 7<sup>12</sup>, Ac 11<sup>24</sup>, Ro 5<sup>7</sup>, Tit 2<sup>5</sup>; of things, Mt 12<sup>34</sup>, 35 19<sup>16</sup>, Lk 8<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>42</sup>, Jn 5<sup>3</sup>, Ac 23<sup>1</sup>, Ro 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>13</sup>, 18. 19 9<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>, 21 13<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>19</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, Eph 4<sup>29</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>17</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>, 19, Tit 2<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>11</sup>, 13. 16, and frequently in the formula 'good works.'

It will be observed that the ascription of goodness to persons is rare in the NT. The reason for this is not to be sought in the biblical doctrine of sin as excluding human goodness, for on that view the affirmation of goodness with reference to works ought to be equally rare, which is not the case. The true explanation seems to lie in the God-centred estimate which Scripture places upon man's moral character. Man is measured with strict reference to the nature and will of God as his norm. The conception of 'goodness,' while not excluding, and even presupposing, an objective standard of this kind, does not in itself express it. It describes the quality either as inherent or as affecting others, but does not explicitly relate it to God. This the word δικαίος does, for δικαιοσύνη means goodness as conformity to the Law of God and as approved by the Divine judgment. The full and positive conception of δικαιοσύνη therefore covers all that is ἀγαθός and adds to this the God-related element just named. It is not at variance with this that δικαίος occasionally occurs in a negative sense, more closely adhering to the profane and popular usage—a sense which places it below ἀγαθός in the ethical scale. Thus in Ro 5<sup>7</sup> the δικαίος ('righteous') is one who merely is free from fault, who does what in the ordinary relations of life can be required of him, but does not go beyond this to the spontaneous exercise of virtue as the ἀγαθός does. The term 'good' is reserved for the latter. But as a rule δικαίος is not less comprehensive than ἀγαθός, covering the Divine demand in all its reach (Ro 3<sup>10</sup>).

In the ethical application the inherent and the beneficent sense lie so close together that it is not always easy to determine which stands in the foreground and which is the mere concomitant of thought. In the Hebrew יָדַע, as used of God, both meanings are present, but the sense of beneficence preponderates (cf. Ps 34<sup>9</sup>). In regard to Mt 19<sup>17</sup> (= Mk 10<sup>18</sup>, Lk 18<sup>19</sup>), usually understood as raising the question of absolute ethical perfection, G. Dalman (Die Worte Jesu, 1898, i. 277) advocates the same meaning of beneficence. Among the passages which refer to human persons Ro 5<sup>7</sup> not only extends the reach of 'goodness' beyond that of 'righteousness,' but also finds this overlapping in the spontaneous, benevolent character of the former. In Lk 23<sup>50</sup> the same distinction may be found, although here the sequence shows that the righteousness before God is estimated higher than the mere benevolence towards men. In 1 P 2<sup>18</sup> the 'good' and 'gentle' masters are so described from the point of view of their treatment of servants rather than of inherent quality. In Jn 7<sup>12</sup> there is some doubt as to whether 'a good man' (in opposition to one who 'deceiveth the people') means a man of good character or one of good influence. Ac 11<sup>24</sup> and Tit 2<sup>5</sup> seem to be the only clear instances of the use of the word to describe inherent goodness.

The same difficulty recurs where the predicate applies not to persons but to things in the ethical sphere. The 'good things' and the 'evil things' spoken of in Mt 12<sup>34-35</sup> are, of course, in themselves morally right or wrong, yet in the context the reference is to blasphemy, so that the element of the good or bad intent and effect can scarcely be excluded. When St. Paul in Ro 7<sup>1</sup> says that the commandment is αγα καὶ οὐκ ἀγαθὴ, the inherent perfection of the Law is affirmed not only by the first and second but also by the third attribute; still the ensuing question, 'Was then that which is good made death unto me?' proves that 'the good' is felt as that which has naturally combined with it a good effect. The same thought must be present in Ro 12<sup>1</sup>. The 'good' of the neighbour which is to be promoted according to Ro 15<sup>2</sup> is his ethical good ('unto edification'), but it is in part so called because it promotes his spiritual welfare. In Eph 6<sup>8</sup> the element of profitability is plainly indicated by the context (cf. v. 7). The 'good work' which God began in the Philippians (Ph 1<sup>6</sup>) is good primarily because it has a beneficent, saving purpose, but probably the notion that it is productive of what is inherently good in them is also present. In Philen<sup>14</sup> (cf. v. 6) the AV renders τὸ ἀγαθὸν σου correctly by 'thy benefit' (RV 'thy goodness'). The context decides in favour of 'beneficent' in 1 P 3<sup>13</sup> (cf. v. 11 and 3 Jn 11). 'A good conscience' (Ac 23<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>19</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>21</sup>) is a conscience deriving its quality from its content, and therefore presupposes that the acts approved by it are good in themselves. The phrase 'good works' admits equally well of both interpretations. There can be no doubt that in Ac 9<sup>36</sup>, Ro 13<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>17</sup>, Tit 1<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> the reference is mainly to the good intent and effect of the deed. In other passages, however, like Ro 2<sup>10</sup>, Eph 2<sup>10</sup>, Col 1<sup>10</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>17</sup>, the emphasis seems to rest not on the outward beneficent tendency, but on the inherent good character of the work, as conformable to the Divine Law.

The Jewish usage of the conception favours this, for in it not the helpfulness, but the meritoriousness, the religious significance of the observance of the Law, stand in the foreground. While St. Paul denies, of course, the meritoriousness of good works as a ground of justification, he nevertheless is at one with Judaism in emphasizing their specific religious importance. It is not in harmony with the Pauline teaching to deem of importance only the spirit and intent of the deed, and not its external performance. Such a judgment is possible only where the ethical point of view is man-centred and virtue regarded as completed in itself. St. Paul's point of view is God-centred—the virtue, the disposition exist for the sake of God; and in order that they may accrue to the full glory of God, it is necessary that they shall issue into act. For the reality of the good work the presence of the disposition behind it is indispensable, but it is no less true that, for the completion of the good as it exists in the heart, its embodiment in the good work is essential.

Greek translations of the OT and in St. Paul) probably in each case describes that form of goodness which seeks the benefit of others. In Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, standing among a number of other virtues, it must have this specialized sense. This is favoured also by the connexion in Ro 15<sup>14</sup> ('able to admonish one another'). In Eph 5<sup>9</sup> there is at least nothing to contradict this meaning. In 2 Th 1<sup>11</sup>, 'Our God . . . may fulfil every desire of goodness and every work of faith with power,' the desire and the work stand related as the wish and the execution, which secures for ἀγαθωσύνη here likewise the same sense of beneficence as is associated with the 'work of faith.' ἀγαθωσύνη then differs from αγαθότης (likewise a word of the later Greek) as benevolentia does from bonitas.

GOSPEL.—1. The meaning of the term.—'Gospel,' a compound of the O.E. god, 'good,' and spel, 'tidings,' has been employed from the beginnings of English translation of the NT to render the Greek εὐαγγέλιον. In the classics this term denotes (a) the reward for good tidings, and is so used in the LXX (2 S 4<sup>10</sup>), ὃ ἔδει με δοῦναι εὐαγγέλια (pl.), 'the reward I had to give him for his tidings'; but (b) in later Greek the word stands for the glad message itself. In the NT, however, εὐαγγέλιον refers not to the written record, as in the modern usage of 'gospel'='book,' but to the message as delivered and proclaimed. The gospel of N., e.g., is the good news as N. announced it, and St. Paul's gospel is the message brought by the Apostle in his preaching. As long as oral teaching and exhortation could be had from eye-witnesses and intimates of our Lord's ministry, 'gospel' was reserved for this testimony; accordingly, the Apostle John (1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>) writes, ὃ ἡν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, δ' ἀκηκοαμεν, δ' ἑώρακαμεν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς ἡμῶν, δ' ἔθεασάμεθα καὶ αἱ χεῖρες ἡμῶν ἐψηλάφησαν, περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς, 'that which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands have handled, concerning the Word of life.' These are the credentials of his message, and the persuasion of it to the hearts of his hearers. Among the early Christians these memories—ἀπομνημονεύματα—were most prized, and that word rather than εὐαγγέλιον was the primitive term for the gospel (cf. Moffatt, LNT, 1911, p. 44, with foot-note).

But as the eye-witnesses and their immediate successors passed away, believers had to fall back, perforce, upon a written record. The earliest certain use of the word in the modern sense is found in Justin Martyr (c. 150 A.D.)—'The apostles in the memoirs written by themselves, which are called "Gospels"' (Apol. i. 66; cf. SDB, DCG, and HDB, s.v.).

The passage which rules the use of εὐαγγέλιον in the NT is Mk 1<sup>14</sup>, ἦλθεν δ' Ἰησοῦς εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν κηρύσσειν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ (the gen. is both subj. and obj.; all aspects are included), 'Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of God.'

The word, probably, came into favour through the use by the LXX of the cognate εὐαγγελίζω and εὐαγγελίζεσθαι in 2 Is. and in the Restoration-Psalms (cf. our Lord's discourse [Lk 4<sup>18</sup>] in the synagogue of Nazareth concerning the glad tidings of His Mission, based on Is 61<sup>1</sup>). But, while the term (noun and verb) is of fairly frequent occurrence in the Synoptics, it owes its predominance in apostolic Christianity to the Apostle of the Gentiles. 'It evidently took a strong hold on the imagination of St. Paul in connexion with his own call to missionary labours (εὐαγγέλιον sixty times in Epp. Paul, besides in Epp. and Apoc. only twice; εὐαγγελίζεσθαι twenty times in Epp. Paul, besides once mid. seven times pass.)' (Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, p. 5 f.).

In Mk 1<sup>1</sup>, ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and Rev 14<sup>6</sup>, καὶ εἶδον ἄλλον ἄγγελον . . . ἔχοντα εὐαγγέλιον αἰώνιον εὐαγγελίσει, we see the word in almost the transition stage between a spoken message and a book. Before the Death and Resurrection of Jesus, 'gospel' was the glad message of the Kingdom, brought and proclaimed by Himself and those whom He sent out to prepare the way before Him. But in Ac 20-4 'the gospel of the grace of God,' Ro 1-3 'the gospel of God regarding His Son,' and 2 Co 4 'the gospel of the glory (manifested perfection) of Christ,' the second stage is approached.

2. The content of the gospel.—As to the subject-matter of the apostolic gospel, one can scarcely say that the content varied; it was rather that the emphasis was changed. In his synagogue ministry to the Dispersion, St. Paul found the soil in some measure prepared. The παιδαγωγός had brought men so far that certain beliefs might be taken for granted as a foundation laid by the Spirit of Revelation in the OT Scriptures both legal and prophetic. This would rule the content of his gospel message to them. The case was different, however, in purely missionary and pioneer work, not only in rude places such as Lystra, but also among the more cultured, though equally pagan, populations in the great cities of the Empire, both in Asia and in Europe. The pioneer gospel, therefore, would have notes of its own. Then, again, after a district had been evangelized and churches planted, we can see how the emphasis of the message would change, as apostolic men, prophets and teachers, sought to lead the primitive Christian communities up to 'the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (Eph 4<sup>13</sup>; cf. He 6<sup>1</sup>).

From 1 and 2 Thess. we may gather the content of St. Paul's evangelistic gospel in his heathen mission. 'Those simple, childlike Epistles to the Thessalonian Church are a kind of Christian primer' (A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, p. 15 ff.). From the address on Mars' Hill (Ac 17<sup>30-31</sup>) we have further indications of the staple of his message to those outside. But, perhaps more succinctly and perfectly than anywhere else, in 1 Co 15<sup>3-8</sup> we have the evangelistic Pauline gospel—'for I delivered to you, among the most important things (ἐν πρώτοις), that which also I received, that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried; and that he has been raised on the third day according to the scriptures; and that he appeared unto Cephas; then to the twelve: then he appeared to above five hundred brethren at once; of whom the majority survive to this day, though some have fallen asleep. Then he appeared to James; then to all the apostles. And last of all, as to the one untimely born, he appeared to me also.' This summary of the Christian Creed reveals what, to St. Paul, constituted the essential content of the gospel (cf. J. E. McFadyen, The Epistles to the Corinthians [Interpreter's Com., 1911], p. 205 ff.).

To this synopsis of his gospel St. Paul adds (1 Co 15<sup>11</sup>), 'Whether then it be I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.' In all essentials St. Paul stood on the same ground as the Twelve—St. Peter, St. James, and St. Paul were absolutely unanimous. Had it been otherwise, one can hardly see how he could have won recognition among 'the pillars' or been accepted by the Church. His gospel was not a different (ἕτερος) gospel, though his rapidly changing spheres, and the pressing need of the occasion, may have shifted the accent. This he acknowledges when, speaking of the evangelical mission of the Church, he says (Gal 2<sup>7</sup>), 'I had been entrusted with the gospel of (for) the uncircumcision, even as Peter with the gospel of (for) the circumcision.' But it was the same gospel in all its manifold adaptability. There is no schism in the NT as to the content of the gospel message. The opinion that there is has been well called a 'perversity of criticism.' Thus (HDB, s.v.) the apostolic gospel may be defined as 'the good tidings, coming from God, of salvation by His free favour through Christ.' But as the 'gospel' of a church is to be sought not only in the message of its preachers, but also in its condensed creeds and in its hymns, there ought to be added to the above summary at least two splendid fragments that have the true liturgical ring about them:

(1) Christ exalted: 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> (ὁς, not θεός, is the subject, RV)—

ὁς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκί, ἐδικαιώθη ἐν πνεύματι,
ὥσθι ἀγγέλοις,
ἐκηρύχθη ἐν ἔθνεσιν,
ἐπιστεύθη ἐν κόσμῳ,
ἀνελήμφθη ἐν δόξῃ.

'This fragment, in its grand lapidary style, is worthy to be placed by the side of the Apostles' Creed (Kohler, quoted by J. Strachan, Captivity and Pastoral Epistles [Westminster NT, 1910], p. 218 f.).

(2) God glorified: 1 Ti 6<sup>16-18</sup>—

ὁ μακάριος καὶ μόνος δυνάστης, ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν βασιλευνόντων καὶ κύριος τῶν κυριευόντων, ὁ μόνος ἔχων ἀθανασία,
ὡς οἰκῶν ἀπόρσιτον,
ὃν εἶδεν οὐδεὶς ἀνθρώπων
οὐδὲ ἰδεῖν δύναται.
ὧς τιμὴ καὶ κράτος αἰώνιον.

3. The relation of the gospel to the Law.—Ac 13 records the opening of St. Paul's official missionary labours, and there (vv. <sup>28</sup>, <sup>39</sup>) we have the first indication of the Pauline attitude to the Law. In his address in the synagogue of Pisidian Antioch, he generalizes the incident of Cornelius: 'Be it known unto you therefore, brethren, that through this man (Jesus) is proclaimed unto you remission of sins: and by him every one that believeth is justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.'

But Ro 7, with its logical conclusion in ch. 8, is the crucial passage for the understanding of the relations of Law and gospel in the life of St. Paul, and in that of the NT Church generally. It is the Apostle's account of the struggle, 'often baffled, sore baffled,' that filled the years before his conversion. He also was a rich young ruler troubled with the haunting question, 'What shall I do to inherit eternal life?' For years he had struggled to put down sin in his own heart, to be righteous in the sight of God, passionately longing to have the assurance of the forgiveness of sins, that in peace he might will his will and work his work. In this respect he is like his spiritual kinsmen, Luther and Bunyan. In some respects, St. Paul sharpened the antithesis between Law and grace to a point that was extreme, in that it did not take account of the prophetic element in the Old Testament which was not legal. Jeremiah, 2 Isaiah, and Hosea may be instanced.

But in his day, as a general rule, it was the legal aspect of the OT that held the thought of the Jewish people. Judaism knew but one answer to such questionings as St. Paul's—'Keep the law'; and if a man replied, 'I cannot,' the answer came back remorselessly: 'Nevertheless, keep it.' 'Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet stumble in one point, he is become guilty of all' (Ja 2<sup>10</sup>, Gal 3<sup>10</sup>).

As the Apostle looked back on the long, weary way over which he had come, he found that he had travelled into 'a dark and dreadful consciousness of sin and disaster' (Rainy in The Evangelical Succession, p. 20). And this refers to the observance not of one part of the Law but of the whole; what appealed to the conscience of men everywhere, ceremonial Judaism, and the tradition of the elders—all that νόμος means is included.

'All his experience, at whatever date, of the struggle of the natural man with temptation is here [ch. 7] gathered together and concentrated in a single portraiture. [But] we shall probably not be wrong in referring the main features of it especially to the period before his Conversion' (Sanday-Headlam, op. cit. p. 186). But of course, as St. Paul presents it to the churches, it is his own experience universalized. There is no possibility of winning a standing before God by the Law—

'For merit lives from man to man,
And not from man, O Lord, to Thee.'

He had discovered also that there was no life to be hoped for from the Law. Such had never been its intention. The 'parenthesis' of the Law had for its purpose to create the full knowledge of sin (δια νόμου ἐπίγνωσις αμαρτίας), to produce in the conscience the conviction of it.

Moreover—such is the weakness of human nature—the Law tended to stir sin into dreadful activity, for every commandment seemed to bring up a new crop of sins into his life.

But to the Law St. Paul held on as long as possible; his sudden conversion means as much. The Law was the one outlet to the hopes of Judaism; while to the patriotism of St. Paul Christianity seemed anti-national. Therefore he hung on till he could hold no longer—'O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me out of the body of this death?' (Ro 7<sup>24</sup>). 'Any true happiness, therefore, any true relief, must be sought elsewhere. And it was this happiness and relief which St. Paul sought and found in Christ. The last verse of Ro 7 marks the point at which the great burden which lay upon the conscience rolls away; and the next chapter begins with an uplifting of the heart in recovered peace and serenity; "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus"' (Sanday-Headlam, op. cit. p. 189). He had found salvation by grace, redemption in Christ, and righteousness by faith and union with Him; 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death' (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>). The very essence of St. Paul's gospel is to be found in his conception of Christ's relation to the condemning Law. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, because He stood condemned in their place, and took their condemnation upon Himself; therefore St. Paul is bold to say, 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us' (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>).

It is characteristic of his rebound and gladness of spirit that he, by pre-eminence in the NT, called his message the good news (εὐαγγέλιον), and the discovery sent him out everywhere ('Woe is me if I preach not the gospel') to the multitudes of burdened souls, who were held, as he had once been held, in this strange captivity. Through all his letters, the contrast between Law and gospel as mutually exclusive is developed in the antitheses, law and faith, works and grace, wages and free gift—'Ye are severed from Christ, ye who would be justified by the law; ye are fallen away from grace' (Gal 5<sup>4</sup>). In the Third, the Pauline, Gospel, we have our Lord's story of the two debtors, both of whom, when they had nothing to pay, were frankly forgiven. In the days before his conversion, St. Paul had been painfully trying to pay that debt. Brought to the knowledge that he had nothing wherewith to pay, he made the great discovery that Christ had paid the debt and set him free. And, as he who has been forgiven much will love much, therefore evangelical love burned in St. Paul's heart, as perhaps never in the heart of man besides, to the 'Son of God who loved me and gave himself for me.'

Though the idea of the Law in the Epistle to the Hebrews is so different that it is impossible for Gal. and Heb. to have come from the same pen, yet the contrast between the Law and the gospel is 'without doubt identical with that of St. Paul, although the writer of Hebrews possibly reached that position by a different road' (A. B. Davidson, Hebrews [Handbooks for Bible Classes], p. 19). Both writers hold that Christ is the end of the Law to every one that believeth, and through Him is the Atonement made once for all. But inasmuch as the question between Jews and Gentiles had in the days of Hebrews passed beyond the stage of keen controversy, and a free gospel was preached everywhere, the writer did not feel it needful to develop the contrasts between Law and gospel in the Pauline manner. Yet 'the ceremonial observances are in themselves worthless (He 7<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>1-4</sup>); they were meant to be nothing more than temporary (9<sup>8-10</sup> 8<sup>13</sup>); for God Himself in OT Scripture has abrogated them (7<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>); and the believing Hebrews are exhorted to sever all connection with their countrymen still practising them (13<sup>13</sup>)' (A. B. Davidson, op. cit. p. 19). When the Sun has risen, all other lights pale and fade. The substance has come, the shadow disappears.

It has already been pointed out that there is no sufficient reason for assuming a schism re Law and Faith in the apostolic writings. St. Paul stood on substantially the same ground as the Twelve; his recognition by them (Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>), and much more his acceptance by the Church, imply as much. Nor is there on a fair and careful interpretation any antagonism between the Epistle to the Romans and the Epistle of James. The question turns on the meaning of πίστις. St. James is not denouncing the Pauline πίστις, but the caricature of it in a narrow Judaism, which has reduced this noble faculty of the soul to the mere intellectual acceptance of a dogma—a fides informis, ethically fruitless—a faith without works (Ja 2<sup>26</sup>). St. Paul, on the other hand, thinks of a fides formata, 'faith which worketh by love' (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>). Words mean different things to different men. To St. Paul 'works' mean ἔργα νόμων, while to St. James they correspond to what St. Paul calls 'the fruits of the Spirit.' Thus, 'so far as the Christian praxis of religion is concerned, James and Paul are at one, but each lays the emphasis on different syllables' (Moffatt, LNT, p. 465). It is nothing strange that both go to the story of Abraham (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>) for an apposite example, for it has been pointed out (Lightfoot, Gal.<sup>3</sup>, 1876, p. 157) that this passage was a stock subject of discussion in the Jewish schools and in Philo. St. Paul, quoting Genesis, affirms that the initial act for which Abraham was accepted in the sight of God was his faith; and St. James, thinking more of Gn 22<sup>12</sup> than of Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, says that his faith was made clear, 'seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me.' 'Faith alone justifies, though the faith which justifies does not remain alone.' Thus we read (Tit 3<sup>8</sup>), 'I will that thou affirm confidently to the end that they which have believed God may be careful to maintain good works' (cf. the Scots Paraphrase [56], 'Thus faith approves itself sincere, by active virtue crowned'). But while all real opposition between the apostles (whatever may be the temporal relation between Romans and James) may be disallowed, it need not be denied that the formal differences which appear in the Epistles may well have risen from the extremities to which the controversy was pushed in the different schools of thought in the Church (paulinior ipso Paulo). The Apostle was not oblivious of misinterpretation (Ro 6<sup>1-15</sup>), and the school of St. James doubtless had those who carried their master's doctrine to extreme lengths. But in the balance of Holy Scripture, the truths of which St. James and St. Paul are protagonists are not contradictory, but safe and necessary supplementaries in the body of Christian doctrine. (For the relation between the doctrines of St. Paul and St. James re the Law and Faith, reference may be made to Romans<sup>5</sup> [ICC], p. 102 ff.; James [Cambridge Bible, 1878], p. 76 ff.; The General Epistles [Century Bible, 1901], p. 163 ff.; Moffatt, LNT, p. 465.)

W. M. GRANT.

GOSPELS.—I. THE FIRST THREE GOSPELS.—1.

Date.—(a) The central factor here is the date of the Second Gospel. The conspectus of dates given in Moffatt (LNT, p. 213) will show that this Gospel is dated by modern writers between A.D. 44 and 130, and that recent opinion narrows these limits to 64-85. Moffatt himself decides on a date soon after 70 on the following grounds: (1) Irenæus, adv. Hær. iii. i. 1, dates the Gospel after the death of St. Peter and St. Paul. This is doubtful (see below). (2) 'The small apocalypse' (ch. 13) suggests a date soon after 70. This is based on the very precarious inference that Mk 13 could not have been substantially spoken by Christ. He need not have had more than the prophetic insight of a Jeremiah to have spoken everything contained in this chapter.

Since the publication of Moffatt's book Harnack has re-opened the whole question of the date of the first three Gospels by arguing that Acts was written at the end of St. Paul's imprisonment in Rome.* It would follow, of course, that the Third Gospel must be earlier, and the Second, since it is one of the sources of the Third, earlier still. The fundamental question here is the evidence of Irenæus. The whole passage should be read carefully. One clause in it has generally been taken to mean that St. Mark wrote his Gospel after the death of St. Peter and St. Paul. But J. Chapman,† and now Harnack, argue that the words 'after the death of' do not date the writing of the Gospel, but, taken in the light of the whole context, mean that the apostolic preaching did not come to an end with the death of the apostles, but was handed down after their death, in written books, about the date of the composition of which nothing is said.

Harnack is thus left free to place the Second Gospel before St. Paul's imprisonment. He thinks that the late evidence of Clement of Alexandria,‡ which connects the Gospel with Rome, may perhaps mean that Mark edited there his previously written Gospel. Harnack does not attempt to date the Second Gospel more narrowly.

But we may carry the argument further. If the writing of Acts at the end of St. Paul's imprisonment affords a limit after which the Second Gospel could not have been written, the relationship between the Second Gospel and the First, which presupposes it, may furnish another.

(b) The First Gospel is assigned by most modern writers to the period 65-90 (see Moffatt). Harnack thinks that it must have been written near the Fall of Jerusalem, but not necessarily before it. Moffatt is clear that it must have been written after that event.

Apart from its relationship to St. Mark, the inclination to date the First Gospel relatively late is due to a belief that it reflects the atmosphere of a period in which the Church has become organized and developed. It is, it is argued, 'Catholic' in tone. This method of argument seems wholly due to the fact that modern critics read the Gospel through 'Catholic' spectacles. Read it from the standpoint of a Jewish Christian of Antioch about the period of the controversy as to the admission of Gentiles into the Church, and everything is in place. In particular, two lines of thought in the Gospel point to this period: (1) the writer's belief in the permanent validity of the Mosaic Law, (2) his eschatology. On the first see St. Matthew<sup>3</sup> (ICC, 1912), p. 326, and ExpT xxi. [1909-10] 441. As to the second point, a few words may here be added in addition to what is written in St. Matthew<sup>3</sup>, p. lxix, and ExpT xxi. 440.

The First Gospel is, as is well known, the most apocalyptically coloured of the Synoptic Gospels. But there are many who do not realize how deeply the apocalyptic element penetrates the book. It is, e.g., urged by E. Buckley* that the presence of passages like 24<sup>29,34</sup> does not presuppose an early date for the Gospel, because the Evangelist, writing comparatively late, might have preserved such sayings if he found them in his sources. He might of course have done so, but the question is not one of a few isolated passages; it affects the whole Gospel. V. H. Stanton† also says that the language of ch. 24 need not make for an early date, because the writer could quite well have left unaltered expressions of his source. This misses the whole point. Not only does the editor leave unaltered expressions of his sources, but he also alters St. Mark in order to bring that Gospel into line with the idea of the nearness of the Parousia which was so prominent in his own mind (cf., e.g., Mt 16<sup>28</sup> with Mk 9<sup>1</sup>, Mt 24<sup>29</sup> with Mk 13<sup>34</sup>). It is not only one or two isolated passages in one of his sources, it is the Evangelist himself giving preference to one eschatologically coloured source (Q) and revising another source (St. Mark) in accordance with its ideas. There are many who think that the prominence of the apocalyptic element in the First Gospel is due to the Evangelist forcing it in upon the tradition of Christ's sayings. The truth is rather that the Evangelist had one source full of this element, and that he was so heartily in sympathy with it that he not only preserved large sections of it, but also allowed himself to transfer sayings of an apocalyptic nature from it into appropriate sections of St. Mark's Gospel.

That the apocalyptic colouring of the First Gospel, in so far as it is peculiar to that book, is due to the Evangelist himself and not to one of his sources seems wholly incredible. Allow that the Gospel was written about the year A.D. 50 by a Jewish Christian of the party who wished to enforce the keeping of the Law upon the Gentiles, and the writer, as one who was anxious to preserve all those sayings of Christ which represented Him as One who taught that He was the Messiah of the Jews who would shortly inaugurate the Kingdom, is in his natural place in the development of the Church. He is contemporaneous with the apocalyptic period of St. Paul's teaching. Would the Church ever have received a book into which the writer had thrust his own conception of Christ as an utterer of apocalyptic fantasies at a later period when they had a Gospel of St. Luke? Its reception by the Church seems explicable only on the ground that it was a book written early in the history of the Church, received at first in the district where it was written by a community which was in agreement with its apocalyptic teaching, and that it thus held a place in the Church from which it could not be deposed.

B. H. Streeter* argues that the Apocalypse, written towards the close of the century, proves that there were at that period circles with a strong liking for apocalyptic literature, and seems to think that the First Gospel may therefore have been written comparatively late. But the two cases are not in the least parallel. The Gospel was read in the Church at an early date and everywhere received. The use of the Apocalypse was long contested. Moreover, it was one thing for the Church to value an Apocalypse placed in the mouth of the Ascended Christ; it would have been quite another matter for it at a date when, as the Third and Fourth Gospels show, the tendency was rather to diminish than to enhance the apocalyptic element in the Lord's words, to accept a Gospel in which (according to the theory) there were placed wholesale in His mouth during His earthly life sayings couched in technical apocalyptic language which He never used. A Gospel so judaized, as would be the First Gospel on this theory, in idea and in language, would have been recognized as alien to the true tradition of Christ's life, and would have stood little chance of being received as an apostolic writing.

Notice may be taken here of a few passages which are supposed to suggest a late date.

Chs. 1 and 2 are certainly early. Harnack now recognizes that nothing in them need have been written later than A.D. 70. The sayings about the Church (16<sup>1ff.</sup> 18<sup>16ff.</sup>) are certainly early, for they are couched in language in which the Jewish colouring is very remarkable. The word 'Church' is supposed to betray a late date, but why? About A.D. 52 St. Paul was using it of the Church at Thessalonica. When the Evangelist wanted a Greek word to represent the Aramaic word used by Christ, whatever that may have been, what other word would he be likely to choose than the ἐκκλησία of sacred usage?

* As to the last point (the use of 'Church') it is enough to note that the word occurs nearly a hundred times in the LXX. Not only is the rest of the vocabulary essentially Jewish, but it must come from a quarter in which the Jewish origin and relations of Christianity were strongly marked, i.e. from a source near the fountain head.†

The trinitarian formula in 28<sup>19</sup> need not be late. St. Paul, says Harnack, did not create it (op. cit. p. 108; cf. also The Constitution and Law of the Church, Eng. tr., London, 1910, p. 259 ff.).

The narratives peculiar to St. Matthew are, as Harnack recognizes, of a very archaic character.

If then we are right in dating the First Gospel about A.D. 50, we have a further limit for St. Mark. His Gospel must be prior to that date, and fall between 30 and 50. Now it is clear from the early chapters of Acts that St. Peter was prominent in Jerusalem as leader of the little society of disciples of Jesus the Messiah (the First Gospel reflects this rightly). There about the year 39 St. Paul stayed with him for a fortnight. But in 44 St. Peter was obliged to leave Jerusalem (Ac 12<sup>17</sup>), and we do not find him there again until the Council some five years later (Ac 15). During this interval the Second Gospel may well have been written. The absence of Peter from Jerusalem would suggest the writing down of his teachings to compensate for the loss of his personal presence, and no one was so fitted for this work as John Mark. If written at Jerusalem, the Gospel would naturally have been composed in Aramaic, and there is much in its style and language to suggest this. But St. Mark did not stay long in Jerusalem. He left with his cousin Barnabas for Antioch, and there (c. 44-47) it may have been found desirable to translate the Gospel into Greek. When the controversy between the Churches of Antioch and Jerusalem broke out a little later, the writer of the First Gospel took St. Mark's work as his basis, and wrote a longer Gospel, inserting from another source much of the Lord's teaching as preserved at Jerusalem. The Second Gospel may quite well have been re-edited at Rome; but if so, the changes made in it cannot have been many, for it is clear that the editor of the First Gospel had St. Mark before him much as we have it.

(c) The Third Gospel is generally dated c. A.D. 80 (see Moffatt). But if Harnack is right about the date of the Acts, the Gospel must of course be earlier, i.e. it must have been written somewhere between A.D. 47 and 60.*

2. Authorship.—(a) The tradition which assigns the Second Gospel to St. Mark is so strong that it requires some boldness to set it aside. It goes back as early as Papias (c. A.D. 140), who gives it on the authority of 'the Elder' (Eus. HE iii. 39), and it is now very widely accepted (cf., e.g., Peake, [Critical Introd. to NT, p. 121], Harnack, Moffatt, Bacon [The Making of the NT, p. 159]).

(b) The majority of modern writers are also agreed in referring the First Gospel to an unknown writer. The reasons for this are the following. (1) The earliest witness, Papias or the Elder quoted by him, speaks of a work of St. Matthew which he describes as τά λόγια. This term does not describe aptly such a book as our First Gospel, but would more naturally apply to a collection of utterances or sayings (see Moffatt, p. 189). (2) Moreover, this work is said by the same witness to have been written in the Hebrew dialect (=Aramaic?). Now our First Gospel is certainly not a translation of an Aramaic or Hebrew work. It was written in Greek by a writer who used at least one Greek source, the Second Gospel, and who used also the Greek OT (see St. Matthew<sup>3</sup> [ICC], pp. xiii ff. lxii).

But the inference is a natural one that the name of St. Matthew was given to the book because it largely embodies the work of that Apostle referred to by Papias. Modern criticism has therefore been largely absorbed in an endeavour to reconstruct this Matthaean work. Foreign scholars for the most part refuse in any way to identify the discourse source which has been used in the First Gospel with Papias' Matthaean Logia (Harnack, however, admits that it may well have been an apostolic work). They prefer to give it a name which will beg no questions as to its authorship, and call it simply Q (= Quelle, 'source'). Three main views as to its contents exist: (1) that of Bernhard Weiss,† who assigns to it not only material found in both Mt. and Lk., or in one of them, but also a good deal that is common to all three Gospels, because he believes that St. Mark borrowed from Q,‡ which therefore lay before

* For a refutation of the argument that the Gospel presupposes the Fall of Jerusalem see Harnack, Beiträge, iv. 81 ff.

† Die Quellen der synoptischen Überlieferung, Leipzig, 1908.

‡ The question whether St. Mark used Q has been much discussed recently. F. Nicolardot (Les Procédés de rédaction des trois premiers Évangélistes, Paris, 1908) thinks that he did so largely. B. H. Streeter (in Sanday, Oxford Studies in the * Interprete, viii. [1911] 37 ff.

† W. Sanday, in Minutes of Evidence before Royal Com. on Divorce, iii. 241.

Mt. and Lk. in a double form—(i.) its original form, (ii.) as reproduced in Mk. (2) Harnack,* again, assigns to it only material found both in Mt. and Lk. and not in Mk. (cf. also Hawkins and Streeter in Sanday, Oxford Studies in the Synoptic Problem). One serious objection to this theory is that, since it is almost incredible that Mt. and Lk. should either have both embodied the whole of Q or both have selected the same sections from it, a reconstruction on these lines must give us an incomplete Q, and possibly one so incomplete that no sure inferences can be drawn from it as to the nature and character of the whole work. (3) Finally, Allen (Oxford Studies, p. 236 ff.) believes that Q is best represented in the First Gospel. He thinks that if most of the sayings and discourses peculiar to Mt., and those common to Mt. and Lk., are grouped together, the result forms a collection of discourses of a very primitive character which may well be the Matthean work referred to by Papias. He thinks that this work was not used directly by Lk., but that many sayings drawn from it passed through intermediate stages into St. Luke's Gospel, one of these intermediate stages being possibly the First Gospel.

(c) The authorship of the Third Gospel is bound up with the question of the authorship of Acts. Critics, like Jülicher, who date Gospel and Acts about A.D. 100 and deny that the writer of the 'we' sections in Acts can be identified with the writer of the whole book of Acts, cannot of course accept the tradition that St. Luke, a companion of St. Paul, wrote both Acts and Gospel. But recent criticism has moved decisively in the direction of affirming the truth of the tradition. Harnack, following on the lines of W. K. Hobart,† argues that the style and language of Gospel and Acts, including the 'we' sections, decisively prove that both works were written by one person and that he was a physician.‡ Moffatt says that the supposition that both works did not come from a single pen may nowadays be 'decently interred' (LNT, p. 298). It is probable that criticism, after long wandering in a labyrinth of speculation upon this point, will return to the traditional belief in the Lucan authorship of both books. It is accepted in such recent works as that of Peake. For a summary of the linguistic argument, see Harnack, Luke the Physician, or Moffatt, LNT, p. 297 f.

Some of those who reject the Lucan authorship of the two books are inclined to think that Luke may have written the 'we' sections (so Bacon, Introduction to NT, p. 211).

3. Characteristics.—(a) The Second Gospel is neither a history nor a biography. It contains no dates, and the writer is at no pains to give any details of time or place which would help to make the narrative intelligible to a reader previously unacquainted with it. The central figure of the book is introduced under the description 'Jesus Messiah, Son of God' (1<sup>1</sup>), but nothing is said of His human parentage, His early life, or the period in which He lived. If we set aside the last five chapters, which describe in detail, disproportionate to the rest of the book, the last few days of the Messiah's life, the account of His doings in 1<sup>14</sup>–10<sup>32</sup> is strangely disconnected and without sequence. No hint of the length of time occupied by the narrative is given, long periods are passed over without comment, whilst the events of a single day are recorded in detail.

Synoptic Problem) argues that he did so only to a limited extent. Harnack thinks that 'this assumption is nowhere demanded' (Sayings of Jesus, p. 226; so Moffatt, LNT, p. 298).

This incompleteness and fragmentariness suggest the writer's intention. He wished to put into permanent form such of the incidents of the Messiah's life as were well known from St. Peter's teaching to the community in which he lived. Behind the book there lies as the only explanation of it the Christian community (at Jerusalem?) orphaned of its chief teacher. If this be lost sight of, the book remains as a mere narrative of disconnected incidents in the life of one Jesus of Nazareth.

If a keynote to the Gospel be wanted, it may be found in the phrase 'having authority' (1<sup>22</sup>). Jesus is depicted as one whose words and deeds proved Him to be endowed with power, and so to be the Son of God. Cf. the following:—1<sup>22</sup>: 'He was teaching as having authority'; 1<sup>27</sup>: 'a new teaching, with authority he commands'; 2<sup>10</sup>: 'the Son of Man hath authority'; 5<sup>30</sup>: 'knowing the power which had gone forth from him'; 6<sup>2</sup>: 'the powers (miracles) done by him.' In accordance with this is the emphasis in the Gospel upon the impression made by Him upon the peasantry. Cf. the following:—1<sup>22</sup>: 'the crowds were astonished at his teaching'; 2<sup>12</sup>: 'all were astonished'; 5<sup>42</sup>: 'they were astonished with great amazement'; 6<sup>2</sup>: 'the populace were astonished'; 7<sup>37</sup>: 'they were above measure astonished'; 11<sup>18</sup>: 'the crowd were astonished at his teaching'; 1<sup>33</sup>: 'the whole city was gathered at the door'; 1<sup>45</sup>: 'He could no longer enter into a city, but was without in desert places, and they came to him from all sides'; 2<sup>2</sup>: 'They were gathered together, so that the space about the door could no longer contain them'; 3<sup>9</sup>: 'He bade his disciples prepare a boat, because of the crowd'; 3<sup>20</sup>: 'the crowd again gathers, so that they could not even eat'; 4<sup>1</sup>: 'and there gathers to him a very great crowd, so that he embarked into a boat'; 6<sup>31</sup>: 'There were many coming and going, and they had no opportunity to eat.'

(b) If the Second Gospel is a book of reminiscences, or rather of notes of a great teacher's reminiscences of the life of his Master, the First Gospel is a theological treatise in narrative form. Its purpose is to prove that Jesus of Nazareth was, though rejected by the rulers of His people, the true Messiah, in whom were or would be fulfilled all the Messianic expectations of the OT. The phrase 'that it might be fulfilled' may be taken as the keynote of the book. Characteristic of the book are the following: (1) its apologetic aspect; it is a defence of the Messiahship of Jesus against (i.) current slander (cf. esp. chs. 1, 2), (ii.) the hard fact that the Jewish authorities rejected Him; (2) its consequent polemic against the recognized authorities of the Jews; (3) its conception of the Church or Society of the Messiah as consisting of Jews or proselytes still under the authority of the Mosaic Law; (4) its conception of the Kingdom as to be inaugurated shortly when the Messiah returned on the clouds of heaven. See on these points St. Matthew<sup>3</sup>, pp. 309 ff., 326 ff.; Expt xxi. 439 ff.; and art. 'Matthew (Gospel)' in DCG.

(c) In the Third Gospel we come at last to a professed biography or history of a life. It is best treated when taken as the first part of a great historical work of which Acts is the second volume, and some of the following features characterize both works: (1) if in the First Gospel Jesus is 'He who fulfils' and in the Second He is the one having authority and power, in the Third He is the Divine Healer; (2) there is a strong universalistic note. Jesus is the Second Adam, and His gospel is for all peoples (cf. 2<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>6</sup>); (3) prominence is given to women in both Gospel and Acts; (4) there is considerable emphasis upon prayer, the influence of the Holy Spirit, and upon Chris-

Out of his many sources St. Luke has composed a wonderful book. About the first part of the Gospel hangs the peace of God, clothing it like a soft garment. Into the world has entered the Prince of Peace, bringing healing to the souls and bodies of men—not of Jews only but of all mankind, not for the rich and privileged classes but for the poor and the outcast, not for men alone but for women also. To those who are Christ's disciples the gates of prayer are ever open, and they live in an atmosphere where praise is upon their lips and joy in their hearts. About the second part hangs still the feeling of the joy and peace which Christianity brings with it. But there is now a new note of triumph. The Christian Church as St. Luke describes it in the Acts marches victoriously through the Roman world from conquest to conquest. Harnack somewhere fitly quotes as a keynote to the work the words of the old Latin hymn 'The Royal banners forward go.'

II. THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—The Fourth Gospel is dated by many modern writers in the early part of the 2nd cent. (so recently Clemen* and Bacon†). This of course precludes its apostolic authorship. The line of argument which leads up to this position is as follows. (a) The Fourth Gospel conflicts with the first three in facts such as the date of the Crucifixion, the cleansing of the Temple, and the account of John the Baptist; it is therefore hopelessly unhistorical, and cannot have been written by an apostle. (b) It conflicts with them in its presentation of the Person of Christ. The Christology is so different from that of the Synoptic Gospels that the sayings put into the mouth of Christ must be mainly the work of an author (not an apostle) who is writing under the influence of Jewish Alexandrian Philosophy and of Stoicism.‡ (c) What then of the 2nd cent. attribution of the Gospel to the Apostle? This is hopelessly misleading. Irenæus misunderstood Polycarp and attributed the Gospel to John the Apostle when he ought to have assigned it to John the Elder. Irenæus is wrong again when he said that John the Apostle lived to a good age and spent the last part of his life at Ephesus. As a matter of fact, he suffered early martyrdom at the hands of the Jews.§

We may consider further some points in this argument. (a) The historical inaccuracy in matters of fact needs at least considerable qualification. In many respects the writer is remarkably accurate in his representation of Palestine as it was before the Fall of Jerusalem, e.g. in geographical and topographical detail, in his knowledge of Jewish custom, the relationship between Jewish parties, their religious beliefs. Moreover, the Synoptic tradition is too one-sided to be taken as a measure or gauge.

(b) The contrast drawn between the Christology of the Synoptic Gospels and that of the Fourth Gospel is open to the same criticism. What right have we to regard the first three Gospels as an adequate presentation of the Person of Christ, and not as three slightly varying forms of a tradition which represented a very meagre part of a life which was many-sided? For hints in the Synoptic Gospels of a Judæan ministry see Moffatt, LNT, p. 541. With respect to the teaching of Christ, the Synoptic Gospels give us a significant hint that there were sides of this teaching which they have left almost wholly unrecorded. The saying Mt 11<sup>27</sup> = Lk 10<sup>-2</sup>, with its emphasis upon the unique Sonship of Christ, implies the whole Johannine Christology, and is no doubt a fragment from a whole cycle of teaching such as that which has survived in the Fourth Gospel. And St. Mark has another allusion to this teaching in 13<sup>32</sup> ('the Son'). The modern critic fashions out of the first three Gospels a Jesus after his liking, and then denies that the Christ of the Fourth Gospel is compatible with this Jesus whom his literary criticism has created. But is it not more likely to be the case that the Jesus of history was One too lofty in personality, too many-sided in character, to be understood by His contemporaries? The Synoptic tradition has given to us one impression as it was left upon some of His followers (though even here there are many aspects of character—teacher of virtue, critic of Pharisaic religion, mystic, doer of miracles, apocalyptic seer, etc.); the Fourth Gospel has preserved another side of His character. It may well be that, had others set themselves to describe the life, we should have had information which would have given us quite a fresh conception of Him. It is, moreover, easy to draw quite false antitheses between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics. It is, e.g., true that the writer of the Fourth Gospel dwells by preference upon the teaching as to the present possession of Christian privileges rather than upon that as to their future consummation (the apocalyptic teaching of the Synoptic Gospels). But the whole cycle of this apocalyptic teaching is presupposed. There is to be a general resurrection (5<sup>-3</sup>). Eternal life involves a resurrection at the last day (6<sup>40</sup>). The very conception of eternal life is apocalyptic, involving the thought of the permanence of the individual life and its future entry into a Kingdom which will be a fulfilment of the partial manifestation of the kingdom in the present. The retention of these passages in the Gospel is not a deliberate departure from the writer's view of life as present, and a falling back on a primitive eschatological view (Scott, Fourth Gospel, p. 249). Rather they are a hint that there is another side of the doctrine of eternal life which the author knows to have been taught by Christ, and which he will not altogether omit because it is the necessary corollary of such teaching on eternal life as he records. They who have eternal life cannot die for ever, and there must be a sphere in which their life will be manifested. That is pure apocalyptic.

The conception of the Christology of the book as being the work of a writer strongly influenced by Alexandrian philosophy is probably a false one due to the fact that modern writers on the Gospel know something about Alexandrian philosophy because Philo wrote in Greek, but little or nothing about Jewish theology in the time of Christ, except at second hand, or in so far as it can be ascertained from Greek sources (the apocalyptic literature). The Gospel is probably thoroughly Hebraic in language, in method of argument, in idea, and it will be seen to be so when Christian scholars take the trouble to set themselves to the work of critically editing the Rabbinical literature, with a view to ascertaining how much of its theology they must carry back into the period of the life of Christ.*

(c) With regard to the 2nd cent. tradition, it is significant that decision as to its value seems to depend upon a prior question—that of the possibility of an apostolic authorship for the Fourth Gospel. That is, critics who find the Gospel so unhistorical as to render its composition by an apostle impossible all depreciate the value of the 2nd cent. witness to St. John as the author. And indeed what need to trouble about explaining away this witness if the Gospel on its own showing cannot be apostolic? On the other hand, all who do not find the Gospel to be so unhistorical as to make its composition by an apostle, or its dependence upon him, incredible, find the 2nd cent. attestation to be good. The most recent critical work, that of Clemen,* decides in favour of the literary unity of the Gospel; denies a confusion between two Johns, a presbyter and an apostle; argues that there is no valid ground for denying that the apostle settled in Ephesus at the end of his life, and none for supposing his early martyrdom. Clemen believes the Gospel to be too far removed from history to have been written by the apostle himself, but thinks that Johannine tradition is a main element in it.

Recent attempts to analyze the Gospel into sources seem to have failed,† and it is little likely that for the present any fresh light on the book will be forthcoming. It may be hoped that we shall one day have an editor of the Gospel who is trained in Rabbinic exegesis, as well as in Western scholarship. Such a one may find that the Gospel is certainly the work of a Jew, and may see no reason for denying that its author may have been John the son of Zebedee. If he prefer historical evidence as to Christ's teaching and Person to preconceived ideas about Him, he may also see no reason for denying that both Synoptic and Johannine pictures of Jesus are substantially true, yet equally one-sided, and that the Jesus of history must have been One of whom all our knowledge can be only partial, enough to elicit our devotion and to silence our criticism.

GOSPELS (UNCANONICAL).—Introductory.—1. 'The Church,' as Origen said—or rather, as the translator of Origen's Homilies on Luke (i.) said for him—'the Church has four Gospels, heresy has many.' This could be said by the middle of the 3rd century. A century earlier, with the rise of the Gospel canon, a sharp distinction had been drawn between the four Gospels of the NT and all other writings of this class. The present article deals with the latter, not in relation to the former but rather in the light of their own genesis and structure as products of early Christian literature. Still, two preliminary remarks must be made in connexion with the distinction drawn by Origen. One is, that while the Church had only four Gospels in the sense of Scriptures relating to the life of Jesus, which were authorized to be used in public worship and for purposes of doctrine, the early Christians did not by any means confine their reading to the canonical Gospels. Their piety was nourished upon some Gospels which found no place in the canon. And these Gospels were not always tinged with definite heresy. We can see, for example, from the evidence which Eusebius rather grudgingly furnishes for the repute of the Gospel of the Hebrews in certain circles, that an uncanonical Gospel like this had a vogue which was only partially affected by the necessity of excluding it from the canon. Also, before the canon gained its full authority, a Gospel like that of Peter could still keep some footing within a community. The Church might have its four Gospels as classical and standard documents for the life and teaching of Jesus; fortunately, it felt obliged to stamp these with the special mark of inspired authority. But Gospels already in circulation did not disappear at once, even when they were excluded from ecclesiastical use. Nor again—and this is the second remark to be made—did the fixing of the canon put a stop to the composition or the editing of such Gospel material. Literature of this kind continued to be produced, not only in circles which were more or less semi-Christian, but especially in the Egyptian Church. It belonged to the category of religious fiction for the most part. Still, it followed in the wake of the canonical Gospels, and what has survived the wreck, reaching us partly on the planks of versions and partly on broken pieces of the original, forms a considerable section of the material for our present survey.

To study these Gospels against the background of the canonical, and to measure them by the standards of the latter, is to do them too much honour. But it is also to do them, or some of them, an injustice. As we shall see, it is a mistake to speak of the uncanonical Gospels as if they were a homogeneous product. They vary widely, not only in age but in spirit. Some of them are documents of 'heresy,'* and were never meant to be anything else; the motive for their composition was to adapt one or more of the canonical Gospels to the tenets of a sect or party on the borders of the catholic Church. But others were written to meet the needs of popular Christianity; their aim was to supplement rather than to rival the canonical Gospels, and in some cases they can be shown to be almost contemporary with the latter—certainly prior to the formation of the canon itself. The problem is still further complicated by the probability that now and then a Gospel of unheretical character was re-issued in the interests of later parties, while a Gospel originally Gnostic, for example, may occasionally have been pruned of its objectionable features and started on a career within the Church.† Certain phenomena seem to point to both of these practices in early Christian literature. An uncanonical Gospel might experience either change; it might rise or fall in the world of the Church. And this would be all the more possible just because it was uncanonical. Neither its text nor its contents ensured it against degeneration or stood in the way of its appropriation by the hands of the orthodox. Either the Church or 'heresy' could drag over a document which lay close to the border, and fit it to strange uses. However this may be, recent phases of critical research in the uncanonical Gospels show us pretty plainly that within as well as without the early Church there was sometimes a good deal of what not only later generations but even contemporaries did not hesitate to call 'heresy,' that this 'heresy' assumed many forms, and that the uncanonical Gospels, as we now have them, often represent heterogeneous and varied interests of such Christian or semi-Christian piety.

2. The extant fragments, mainly Greek and Latin, were first collected in a critical edition by J. A. Fabricius (Codex Apocryphus Nov. Test. . . . editio secunda, emendatio, Hamburg, 1719 [1st ed., 1703]); A. Birch (Actuarium codicis Apocryphi Novi Testamenti Fabriciani continens plura inedita alia ad fidem codd. mss. emendatius expressa, Copenhagen, 1804); J. C. Thilo (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, Leipzig, 1832); and C. de Tischendorf (Evangelia Apocrypha<sup>2</sup>, Leipzig, 1876). Later discoveries were mainly incorporated in the texts issued by E. Nestle (Novi Testamenti Supplementum, Leipzig, 1896); E. Preuschen (Antilegomena: die Reste der ausserkanonischen Evangelien und urchristlichen Ueberlieferungen, herausgegeben und uebersetzt<sup>2</sup>, Giessen, 1905); and E. Klostermann (in H. Lietzmann's Kleine Texte, 3, 8, and 11, Bonn, 1903-04). But Thilo and Tischendorf still form the basis for research, so far as the Greek and Latin texts of several important documents are concerned. In E. Hennecke's Neutestamentliche Apokryphen (Tübingen and Leipzig, 1904) there are valuable translations, with introductions and notes, of the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of the Ebionites, the Protevangelium Jacobi, and the Gospel of Thomas (by A. Meyer), of the Gospel of Peter (by A. Stilcken), of the Traditions of Matthias and some Coptic fragments, etc. (by the editor). The French edition in course of preparation by J. Bousquet and E. Amann (Les Apocryphes du Nouveau Testament, Paris), includes the original texts, but as yet only the Protevangelium Jacobi has appeared (1910).

The eighteenth century brought Augustin Calmet's Dissertation sur les Évangiles apocryphes in his 'Commentaire', Paris, 1709-16, vol. vii.; Jeremiah Jones' New and Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, London, 1726-27 (written on the basis of Fabricius, along apologetic lines); and J. F. Kleuker's similar Ueber die Apokryphen des NT, Hamburg, 1798; followed in the nineteenth century by Arens' essay de Evang. apoc. in canonicis usu historico, critico, exegetico, Göttingen, 1835; K. F. Borberg's Bibliothek der neutestamentlichen Apokryphen, gesammelt, uebersetzt, und erläutert, Stuttgart, 1841; J. Pons (de Nègrepélisse), Recherches sur les Apocryphes du Nouveau Testament (thèse historique et critique), Montauban, 1850; and * R. Clemens' Die geheimgehaltenen oder sog. apokryphen Evangelien, Stuttgart, 1850 (volume of German translations). A French tr. of Thilo was issued in 1848 by G. Brunet (Les Évangiles apocryphes<sup>2</sup>, Paris, 1868), and a poor English compilation, based on Fabricius, Thilo, etc., was published four years later by J. A. Giles (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, London). W. Hone's worthless and unworthy Apocryphal NT, London, 1820, included the Protevangelium Jacobi. Useful volumes of English tr. translations were published, however, by A. Walker (in the Ante-Nicene Chr. Lib., xvi, [Edinburgh, 1873]); B. H. Cowper (The Apoc. Gospels, London, 1867, 41874); and B. Pick (Paralipomena: Remains of Gospels and Sayings of Christ, Chicago, 1908). Two French treatises overshadowed any English criticism during this period, one a critical study by M. Nicolas (Études sur les évangiles apocryphes, Paris, 1865); the other a Roman Catholic counterpart by Joseph Variot (Les Évangiles apocryphes, Paris, 1878).

In W. Wright's Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament, London, 1865, Syriac versions of the Protevangelium Jacobi (a fragment) and the Gospel of Thomas the Israelite were published and translated with notes. Otherwise, the main contributions to the subject during the last century were monographs upon special points and aspects, like P. J. Peltzer's Historische und dogmenhistorische Elemente in den apok. Kindheits- Evangelien, Würzburg, 1864; A. Tappehorn's Ausserbiblische Nachrichten, oder die Apokryphen über die Geburt, Kindheit und das Lebensende Jesu und Mariä, Paderborn, 1885; and J. Hayer's Die apokryphischen Evangelien, auch ein Beweis für die Glaubwürdigkeit der kanonischen, Halberstadt, 1898-99; with S. Baring-Gould's Lost and Hostile Gospels, London, 1874, p. 119 f.; J. Chraszcz's Die apokryphen Evangelien, insbesondere das Evangelium secundum Hebræos, Gleiwitz, 1888; and C. Bost's Les Évangiles apocryphes de l'enfance de J.-C. avec une introduction sur les récits de Matthieu et de Luc, Montauban, 1894.

The older monographs upon their relation to the sources for the life of Jesus, by R. Hofmann (Das Leben Jesu nach den Apokryphen, Leipzig, 1851); J. de Q. Donehoo (Apoc. and Legendary Life of Christ, London, 1903); and L. Couard (Altchristl. Sagen über das Leben Jesu, Gütersloh, 1906) have been largely superseded by the exhaustive work of W. Bauer (Das Leben Jesu im Zeitalter der neutest. Apokryphen, Tübingen, 1909).

An excellent survey of recent Oriental discoveries and discussions in this field is given in Felix Haase's Literarische Untersuchungen zur orientaltisch-apokryphen Evangelienliteratur, Leipzig, 1913; the Slavonic versions are chronicled by E. Kozak in JPTH, 1892, p. 127 f., as well as by Bonwetsch in Harnack's Altchristl. Litt. i, [Leipzig, 1893], p. 907 f.

The principal general articles on the subject are by G. Brunet in Migne's Dict. des Apocryphes, i, [1856] 961 f.; R. A. Lipsius in DCB ii, [1880] 700-17; B. F. Waitz, in PRE<sup>3</sup> xxxii, [1913] 79-93; and L. St. A. Wells, in ERE vi, [1913] 346-352. The discussions of Lipsius, Zahn, and Harnack are most important, together with the criticisms of Tasker and Waitz.

In several NT Introductions the uncanonical Gospels are included, especially by F. Bleek (Einleitung in das NT<sup>4</sup>, Berlin, 1886, p. 406 f.); G. Salmon (Introduct. to the NT<sup>5</sup>, London, 1899, pp. x-xi); and J. E. Belser (Einleitung in das NT, Freiburg i. B., 1905, p. 789 f.); there is a chapter on them in E. Renan's L'Eglise chrétienne, Paris, 1879, ch. xxvi, as well as in F. C. Burkitt's Gospel Hist. and its Transmission, Edinburgh, 1906, p. 324 f.; and a recent Spanish monograph by E. C. Carillo (Los Evangelios Apócrifos, Paris, 1913); also the relevant paragraphs in Resch's Apographa (TU v. 4, Leipzig, 1889) and in Histories of Christian literature, e.g. C. T. Crutwell's Lit. Hist. of Early Christianity, London, 1893, i. 160-174; K. Krüger's Altchristl. Litt.<sup>2</sup>, Freiburg, 1898, § 16; and P. Wendland's *Die urchristl. 3. Writing at the close of the 1st cent. A.D., St. Luke observes in the preface to his Gospel that 'many' had already undertaken to compose a narrative of the life of Jesus: πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν ἀναρτᾶσθαι διήγησιν, κτλ. (I<sup>1</sup>). He does not intend to convey any impression of disparagement by the term ἐπεχείρησαν. He is not satisfied with their work, but he does not dismiss his predecessors as unauthorized. Nor does he claim for himself any special inspiration. What others have done he proposes to do; only, it is to be in a more complete and orderly fashion.

The Muratorian Canon, in its extant form, does not happen to mention any uncanonical Gospels which are to be avoided by the faithful, unless we are meant to understand some of them as included in the obscure closing words. But more than a hundred years after St. Luke wrote his preface, Origen commented on it as follows: 'Possibly the term ἐπεχείρησαν contains an implicit condemnation of those who betook themselves hastily and without any spiritual gift (χαρίσματος) to the composition of Gospels. Thus Matthew οὐκ ἐπεχείρησεν, but wrote under the impulse of the Holy Spirit; so did Mark and John, and similarly Luke. But those who composed the Gospel called Κατ' Αὐγουπτίους and that entitled τῶν Δωδεκα, they ἐπεχείρησαν. There is also a Gospel Κατὰ Θωμᾶν current. Basilides has also ventured to write a Gospel Κατὰ Βασιλίδην. Many indeed ἐπεχείρησαν: there is the Gospel Κατὰ Μαθθᾶν and many others; but the Church of God accepts only the four.' It is not certain whether Origen intended to suggest that the first two or three Gospels which he named were among the uninspired predecessors of Luke. Probably he did. But the interest of the passage for us lies in the names of the Gospels which his erroneous interpretation of ἐπεχείρησαν leads him to mention. They must have been among the most prominent of those known to him.

In the 4th cent. Eusebius (HE iii. 25) ends his catalogue of the canonical or accepted Scriptures with the remark that his object in drawing it up has been 'that we may know both these works and those cited by heretics under the name of the apostles, including, for example, such books as the Gospels of Peter, of Thomas, of Matthias, or of any others besides them. . . . They are not to be placed even among the rejected writings (ἐν νοθοῖς), but are all to be put aside as absurd and impious.' Further down in the same century we come upon Ambrose (CSEL xxxii. p. 10 f.), in his prologue to an exposition of Luke, following Origen almost verbatim. He admits that some of these uncanonical Gospels are read by orthodox Christians, e.g. the Gospel of the Twelve, the Gospel of Basilides, the Gospel of Thomas, and the Gospel of Matthias ('novi alind scriptum secundum Matthian'). But 'we read, lest we should be ignorant; we read, not in order to keep but to repudiate them'!

In the prologue to his commentary upon Matthew, Jerome (A.D. 346-420) also mentions some of the uncanonical Gospels, but his information adds nothing to the data supplied by Origen, from whom he probably derived in the main his knowledge of these documents. After quoting Luke's preface, he applies its language to Gospels 'like that according to the Egyptians, and according to Thomas, and according to Matthias, and according to Bartholomew, also the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, and of Basilides, and of Apelles, as well as others which it would take a very long time to enumerate.' Following Origen, he interprets Luke's επεξεργασαν of unauthorized, uninspired attempts. To them the prophetic word of Ezekiel applies (13<sup>3-6</sup>): 'Woe to them that prophesy out of their own heart, who walk after their own spirit, who say, Thus saith the Lord, and the Lord has not sent them.' Also, the word of Jn 10<sup>8</sup>: 'all who came before me were thieves and robbers.' Note, says Jerome, 'they came'; not 'they were sent'!

In Pope Innocent's Epistle (A.D. 405) to Jerome's friend, Bishop Exsuperius of Toulouse, the canonical list is followed by a note of 'cetera autem quæ uel sub nomine Mathiæ siue Iacobi minoris; uel sub nomine Petri et Iohannis, quæ a quodam Leucio scripta sunt; uel sub nomine Andreæ, quæ a Xenocaride et Leonida philosophis; * uel sub nomine Thomæ; et si qua sunt alia; non solum repudianda uerum etiam noueris esse damnanda.' This is a fair specimen of the opinions held by the authorities of the Western Church; but the official view did not represent the popular, and, as Leopoldt observes,† 'such opponents of the apocryphal Gospels were doubtless in the minority. The majority of theologians treated books like the Gospels of James and Thomas not indeed as canonical but still as genuinely apostolic.'

Finally, the so-called 'Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis' includes a list of apocryphal Gospels which, by the 6th cent., were supposed to have been in existence:

'Evangelium nomine Mathiæ
 " " Barnabæ||
 " " Iacobi minoris
 " " Petri apostoli
 " " Thomæ quibus Manichei
 ntuntur
 Evangelia nomine Bartholomæi
 " " Andreæ
 " quæ falsavit Lucianus
 " " Hesychius
 Liber de infantia saluatoris
 " nativitate saluatoris et de Maria vel obstetrici.'

By a gross blunder, arising perhaps from a misreading of Jerome's prologue to the Gospels, the writer mistakes the textual recensions of the Gospels made by Lucian and Hesychius for apocryphal Gospels. This does not encourage hopes of accurate information with regard to the other works, particularly when this blunder is regarded as a misunderstanding of what Jerome had written. Thus the writer appears to have had no independent knowledge of the Gospels of Bartholomew and Andrew; his allusion to the former, as well as to the Gospel of Mathias (= Παραδόσεις Μαθθία), is probably drawn from Origen, his reference to the latter from Innocent. He also confines himself to Gospels bearing apostolic names.

It is not necessary to go further down for ecclesiastical strictures upon uncanonical Gospels. Those already mentioned will suffice to give a fair idea of the principal writings belonging to this class which were from time to time banned by the authorities. Some, no doubt, were not Gospels at all; * some were only censured from hearsay; others, as we shall see, existed and flourished in a more or less provincial or surreptitious fashion. But the point is that they had to be banned, and that the ban was often ineffective.

4. We now pass from verdicts upon the uncanonical Gospels to an outline of the information yielded by their extant fragments. But before turning into this rank undergrowth of popular literature in early Christianity, we must state and define one or two general principles and methods of criticism which are essential to any survey of the position.

(a) The present state of research offers almost as many problems as results. In five directions, especially, further inquiry is necessary before the materials which are now accessible can be critically arranged and assimilated. (i.) The Coptic, Sahidic, and Ethiopic fragments, which are being still recovered, require to be sifted. In some cases, as e.g. with regard to the Gospel of Bartholomew, they may prove to furnish data for reconstructing Gospels which hitherto have been mere names in early Church history; in other cases, they may compel the re-valuation of material already known. (ii.) The entire problem of the Jewish Christian Gospels has been re-opened by the researches of critics like Schmidtke and Waitz; the relevant factors are mainly supplied by the higher criticism of writers like Origen, Jerome, and Epiphanius, but the outcome of the discussion seriously affects the estimate of primitive Gospels like that of the Hebrews or of the Egyptians. The subject-matter here is not so much new material as allusions and quotations which require, or seem to require, fresh study. (iii.) Several uncanonical Gospels are still unedited, from the standpoint of modern critical research; even the extant Greek and Latin MSS are not properly collated, in many cases. The Gospels of Thomas and of Nicodemus are instances in point. There is some prospect of these defects being remedied systematically by French scholars, but English investigation has been sadly indifferent to such pressing needs in the field of early Christian literature. (iv.) Even where texts have been edited thoroughly, problems of higher criticism arise. In the case of Gospels, e.g., like the Protævangeliū Jacobi, we are confronted with composite productions whose sources go back to different circles and periods; literary problems of structure have to be solved. The numerous versions of some uncanonical Gospels might seem to compensate for the fragmentary condition of others, but in reality the versions are often equivalent to fresh editions rather than to translations, and in this way the recovery of the primitive nucleus is sometimes rendered more difficult than ever. (v.) Finally, the form and the content of the uncanonical § 'Apocryphum' ('apocrypha'), which is appended to each title, has its later opprobrious meaning.

 || If there ever was a Gnostic Gospel of Barnabas, it may have supplied part of the basis for the Muhammadan (Italian) Gospel of Barnabas—a curious, doctetic production (ed. L. and L. Ragg, Oxford, 1907). Cf. W. E. A. Axon in JThSt iii. [1901-02] 441-451. The Gospels of Barnabas and Matthias appear also at the end of the list of the 60 books in Cod. Barocc. 206.

* Tatian's 'Gospel,' e.g., was simply the Diatessaron; the Gospel of Andrew was probably the Gnostic Περιοδοί of that apostle; the Gospel of Nicodemus was part of the Acts-literature of the 2nd cent.; and several so-called Gnostic 'Gospels' were no more than treatises on religion, as, for example, the Valentinian 'Gospel of the Truth' (Iren. iii. 11. 9).

Gospels open problems of their own. The stories occasionally show the naïve popular imagination working upon the Old Testament, but their methods are wider. There is more in them than merely Haggadic fancy. 'Les évangiles apocryphes,' says Renan, 'sont les Pouranas du christianisme; ils ont pour base les évangiles canoniques. L'auteur prend ces évangiles comme un thème dont il ne s'écarte jamais, qu'il cherche seulement à délayer, à compléter par les procédés ordinaires de la légende hébraïque.' But it was not simply Semitic methods of compiling a midrash that were followed by the authors of the uncanonical Gospels. Allowance has also to be made for the influence of Hellenistic romances, particularly in the light of recent investigations by Norden and Reitzenstein.* This line of inquiry has not yet been followed up; it will lead probably to valuable conclusions with regard to the literary texture of certain strata in these Gospels. More attention has been paid to the influence of Buddhistic and Egyptian religion upon the matter of Gospels like those of the Egyptians, of Thomas, and of Peter. Here also problems are emerging which require careful scrutiny, in view of contemporary research into the syncretistic religious situation of the 2nd cent., particularly but not exclusively with regard to the elements of Gnosticism. In the edifying romance of Barlaam and Ioasaph a later writer adapted boldly the story of Buddha to the ends of Christian monasticism. The Indian traits in our uncanonical Gospels are less plain, but they are probably present under passages which at first sight are almost covered with Christian fancy and doctrine.

(b) The close connexion between the extant fragments and the agrapha renders it necessary to lay down a special† principle of criticism, viz. that when the same saying, in slightly different versions, recurs in more than one fragment, three possibilities are open to the critic. (i.) The early Christian writer who quotes the saying as part of some Gospel may be quoting loosely from memory, and, either for that reason or for some other, confusing one Gospel with another. (ii.) On the supposition that the quotation is correctly assigned, it may have been preserved in more than one Gospel; it is unlikely that certain sayings were monopolized by one document. Or, when this possibility is set aside, (iii.) one Gospel may have borrowed from another. There has been a tendency to ignore the second of these possibilities, in particular. What we know of certain Gospels may be enough to show that a given quotation is incompatible with their idiosyncrasies, but not all quotations possess this characteristic quality, and room should be left for the hypothesis that some allied Gospels contained a good deal of common matter.

One illustration of this may be quoted, for the sake of clearness. Take the well-known saying, 'He who seeks shall not cease till he finds, and when he has found he shall wonder, and wondering he shall reign, and reigning he shall rest.' The last two clauses are cited by Clement of Alexandria as part of the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Strom. ii. 9. 45), but elsewhere (Strom. v. 14. 96) he quotes the whole saying, without mentioning its origin, in order to illustrate Plato's aphorism that wonder is the beginning of philosophy. Independently, the entire saying has turned up among the agrapha of the Oxyrhynchite Papyri, apparently as part of a collection of words addressed by Jesus to some disciples, including Thomas. In the later

Acts of Thomas (ed. Bonnet, 1883, p. 243) an echo of the saying also recurs: 'Those who partake worthily of the good things there [i.e. in the treasury of the holy King] rest, and resting they shall reign,' and, as if this were not enough, the problem is further complicated by what sounds like an echo in 2 Clem. v. 5 ('know, brothers, that the sojourning of the flesh in this world is little and for a brief time, whereas the promise of Christ is great and wonderful, is rest in the kingdom to come and in eternal life'), and by a very faint echo in the Traditions of Matthias, if we can trust Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 9. 45), who cites from the latter, 'Wonder at what is before you,' to illustrate again the Platonic doctrine of wonder.

Now it is tempting to deduce from this, among other indications, that the common source of the Oxyrhynchite Logia and the quotations in 2 Clem. was the Gospel according to the Egyptians, or that this saying is a water-mark of some Thomas Gospel. The former hypothesis would be corroborated if the source of the quotations in 2 Clem. could be proved to be the Gospel of the Egyptians, for the echo in 2 Clem. follows close upon one of these quotations (see p. 495), and upon the whole this is the least improbable hypothesis. But the second of the possibilities (ii.) is as feasible as the third (iii.). It is at any rate hasty to assume that such a saying was only accessible in a single document.

(c) It is also fair to remember that some of the early uncanonical Gospels are known to us only in fragments and quotations made usually for the purpose of proving their outré character. This easily gives a wrong impression of their contents. Suppose, for example, that all we knew of the canonical Matthew amounted to a few passages like 2<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>18-19</sup> 7<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>34</sup> 17<sup>24-27</sup> 19<sup>12</sup> and 27<sup>52-53</sup>, suppose that Luke's Gospel was preserved in stray quotations of 2<sup>42-49</sup> 4<sup>5</sup> 6<sup>20-21</sup> 8<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>9</sup> 18<sup>8b</sup> and 24<sup>42-43</sup>—would our impression of the Gospels in question be very much more misleading than may be the case with Gospels like those of the Hebrews or of the Egyptians or of the Nazarenes? It is possible that some of the uncanonical Gospels may not have been so eccentric as they seem to us. But, even when allowance is made for this possibility of an error in our focus, the general character of most of the uncanonical Gospels must be recognized (cf. § 1). When Archbishop Magee preached before the Church Congress at Dublin, an Irish bishop is reported to have said that the sermon did not contain enough gospel to save a tom-tit. An evangelical critic might say the same about the uncanonical Gospels, for the most part, and he would not be saying it in haste. It is rare, upon the whole, to come across any touches or traditions which even suggest that by their help we can fill out the description of the Synoptic Gospels. As we read Marlowe's Faustus or Goethe's Faust for reasons quite other than a wish to ascertain the facts about the real Faustus of the 16th cent., so it is with the majority of the uncanonical Gospels. Their interest for us is not in any fresh light which they may be expected to throw upon the character of the central Figure, but in the evidence they yield us for ascertaining the popular religion of the early Christian Churches, the naïve play of imagination upon the traditions of the faith, and the fancies which the love of story-telling employed to satisfy the more or less dogmatic or at any rate the pious interests of certain circles in Syria and Egypt especially. The large majority of the uncanonical Gospels belong to Church history rather than to NT criticism, and to a period of Church history which is mainly post-apostolic. Their varying background covers several centuries and soils. They were being produced as late as the Muhammadan era, and as early as the 1st cent. A.D. But, with one or two exceptions, we cannot do justice to them unless we set them not over against the Gospel literature of the first hundred years after the Death of Jesus but among the currents and movements which occupy the subsequent two hundred years of Christianity in the Mediterranean basin. The interests which led to their composition were sometimes doctrinal. There was a constant desire* to convey esoteric teaching under the guise of revelations made by the risen Christ to His disciples, between the Resurrection and the Ascension, for example; there was also a desire to recast or amplify the Synoptic traditions in order to express certain views of the Christian gospel. Furthermore, dogmatic interests led to the elaboration of stories about the birth of Mary as well as of Jesus, and to the composition of tales which filled up the childhood of Jesus. But the latter were as often due to naïve curiosity as to dogmatic aim, and a much larger part must be assigned to the former motive (if it can be called a motive) than is usually allowed. Here the influence of Oriental folk-lore and mythology would naturally operate, in addition to the desire to mark the fulfilment of OT prophecies. And it would operate not as a purely literary motive but as one result of preaching and teaching. The same interests which led to the rise of midrashic literature among the Jews led to the rise of uncanonical Gospel-stories among the early Christians. The popularity of the latter was too strong to be put down by ecclesiastical decisions. Not even the strict use of the canonical Gospels in the worship of the Churches was able to check the popular appetite for such tales and traditions as survive in the uncanonical Gospel literature; they were read for private edification† even when they were not used in worship; and recent discoveries have proved how numerous and wide-spread were the versions of such Gospels even when the term 'apocryphal' in its opprobrious sense was being applied to them by the authorities. The historical critic has something better to do than look in these Gospels for primitive, authentic traditions about the teaching and ministry of Jesus, which may correct or supplement the nucleus preserved in the canonical Gospels; if he does so, he will be likely as a rule to look for a kingdom and find asses. On the other hand, he has something better to do than to pour indiscriminate ridicule on these popular documents. Their ends and motives, however little they may appeal to a modern mind, were not always perverse. For example, in one of the extant Sahidic Gospel-fragments (TS iv. 2 [1896], pp. 165, 237), the narrator, after describing (partly as in the Protevangelium Jacobi, 21; see below, p. 484) how the star of Bethlehem had 'the form of a wheel, its figure being like a cross, sending forth flashes of light; letters being written on the cross, This is Jesus the Son of God,' anticipates an objection. 'Some one will say to me, Art thou then adding a supplement to the Gospels?' Unfortunately, the fragment breaks off here, and we have no means of knowing how the writer answered his critic, unless from a Coptic sermon of Euodius, who praises such supplements—evidently as justified by Jn 20<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>25</sup>. It is not often that we come upon any such self-consciousness in the writers of the uncanonical Gospels. Usually we have to infer their spirit and aim from the contents of their work. But even so, the naïve temper which characterizes several of the leading uncanonical Gospels is as noteworthy as the theological tendencies which dominate others.

† But not, of course, an exceptional one. It bears also upon the criticism of the Synoptic Gospels, particularly in the differentiation of Mark and Q.

5. The very fact that such Gospels were composed is significant, in view of the fact that 'Gospel' in the 2nd cent. began to be limited to the sayings and deeds of Jesus.* It proves the steady interest in Jesus, even in circles where the interest was due to tendencies more or less semi-Christian in character. No doubt, several of the uncanonical 'Gospels,' as we shall see,† were not originally called Gospels at all, while even those which professed to be such should be rather described as religious handbooks or treatises; still, even after we make such qualifications, we must recognize that, whether an uncanonical Gospel wished to make Jesus more or less of a human being than the Synoptic or Johannine tradition presented, there was a wide-spread desire to convey new ideas by means of a tradition about His personality. Acts of various apostles were not sufficient; even apocalypses did not meet the demand. Gospels were necessary, and Gospels were supplied.‡

This involved not only a dissatisfaction with the canonical Gospels, on the score of what they contained as well as of what they omitted, but a certain dependence upon them, in several cases. The unknown authors, as Renan neatly puts it, 'font pour les évangiles canoniques ce que les auteurs des Post-homerica ont fait pour Homère, ce que les auteurs relativement modernes de Dionysiennes ou d'Argonautiques ont fait pour l'épopée grecque. Ils traitent les parties que les canoniques ont avec raison négligées; ils ajoutent ce qui aurait pu arriver, ce qui paraissait vraisemblable; ils développent les situations par des rapprochements artificiels empruntés aux textes sacrés.' For a certain class of the uncanonical Gospels, this is fairly accurate, but others make remarkably little use of the canonical narratives except as points of departure. Renan's subsequent remark also requires modification: 'Comme le catholicisme dégénéré des temps modernes, les auteurs d'évangiles apocryphes se rabattent sur les côtés puérils du christianisme, l'Enfant Jésus, la sainte Vierge, saint Joseph. Le Jésus véritable, le Jésus de la vie publique, les dépasse et les effraye.' Renan is thinking here of the Gospels of the Infancy.§ But since his day discoveries of papyri and manuscripts have shown that even the Mission and Manhood of Jesus did not entirely escape the notice of the uncanonical Gospels.

This enables us to fix upon a principle of arrangement for these Gospels. It is open to the critic at this point to follow one or other of three paths. One is to group them on a principle which partly estimates their form and partly takes into account their character, viz. Gospels of the Syn-

* Which, as we learn from Clement of Alexandria (Eus. HE ii. 1), was by no means confined to Gnostic Christians (see W. Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien, 1901, p. 216 f.).

† There is a significant indication of this in Jerome's letter to Laeta, advising her how to bring up her daughter (Ep. cvii. 12). The girl is to read 'the Gospels, which are never to be laid aside. . . . Let her eschew all apocryphal writings; if she desires to read them not for the truth of their doctrines but out of reverence for their miracles, let her understand that they are not the work of those whose names they bear, that many faulty things are mixed up in them, and that it requires great discretion to look for gold among mud.' This was written in A.D. 403.

* Cf. Harnack's Constitution and Law of the Church, 1910, p. 308 f.

† E.g. the Gospels of Nicodemus and of Andrew (p. 480), besides the later 'Eternal Gospel' of Abbot Joachim (beg. of 10th cent.) based on Rev 14th. The Gospel of Thaddæus owes its existence apparently to a variant reading of 'Matthias' as 'Matthæi' in the text of the Decretum Gelasianum (cf. von Dobschütz's note in TU xxxviii. 4 [1912] p. 293).

‡ The literary form of 'Gospel' came to be indistinguishable more than once from that of 'Acts' (cf. the 'Gospel of Mary') as well as from that of 'Apocalypse.'

§ An admirable account of their motives and characteristics is given by Meyer in Hennecke's Neutest. Apok., pp. 96-105.

optic type which have some claim to represent early tradition; Gospels which are Gnostic or heretical; and Gospels which aim at supplementing the gaps in the canonical stories especially of the Birth and Resurrection. This is the usual method since Harnack. Another is (cf. Nicolas, op. cit. p. 17f.) to divide them into (a) pro-Jewish, i.e. Gospels mainly practical, in which Christianity is presented as the renovation of the OT; (b) anti-Jewish; and (c) unsectarian. But there are serious difficulties in carrying out this arrangement, and it is best, upon the whole, to classify them according to their subject-matter, viz. those devoted to the parents and birth of Jesus, those which cover the course of His life, and those which narrate the Passion and Resurrection. Tischendorf's plan was different: 'Quod ita instituum ut tria liberorum horum evangelicorum genera distinguam, quorum primum comprehendit qui ad parentes Jesu atque ipsius ortum, alterum qui ad infantiam eius, tertium qui ad fata eius ultima spectant.' But materials have accumulated since Tischendorf wrote, which show that the middle part of the life of Jesus was not left untouched by the authors of this literature. It used to be argued, indeed, that the uncanonical Gospels showed next to no interest in the central part of the life of Jesus, between His Baptism and the Passion. Even if this were the case, it would not be quite so remarkable as might appear. Such a concentration of interest upon the beginning and end of the life was natural to the early Church. For example, after finishing an account of the origin of the four Gospels, the author of the Muratorian Canon proceeds: 'Consequently, although various elements are taught in the several books of the Gospels, this makes no difference to the faith of believers, inasmuch as by one controlling Spirit all things are announced in all of them with regard to the Nativity, the Passion, the Resurrection, His intercourse with His disciples (conversatione cum discipulis suis), and His two-fold advent.' Here the salient points selected lie outside the central part of the life of Jesus, unless we admit a partial exception in the allusion to intercourse with the disciples. But the uncanonical Gospels do not entirely ignore this section. Even apart from the famous correspondence of Jesus* and Abgar (Eus. HE i. 13), or—in the form which it assumes in the Doctrina Addai—His oral message to that monarch, we possess several Gospels which must have covered the ministry of our Lord, and the Oxyrhynchite fragment (see below, p. 499) now swells their number. Any classification has its own drawbacks, owing to the heterogeneous and fragmentary character of the extant materials; but the triple arrangement proposed has, upon the whole, fewer obstacles than either of its rivals. In the following discussion, therefore, the uncanonical Gospels will be treated as follows:

(1) Gospels relating to the Birth and Infancy of Jesus; (2) general Gospels, covering His entire life and ministry, from the Birth to the Resurrection, either on the type of Matthew-Luke or of Mark-John; (3) Gospels of the Passion and Resurrection.

I. GOSPELS RELATING TO THE BIRTH AND INFANCY OF JESUS.—(a) The Protevangelium Jacobi.—A certain element of romance attaches to this uncanonical Gospel. During his travels in the East, William Postel, a French humanist of the 16th cent., who devoted himself to Oriental languages and comparative philology, came across an edifying treatise which was read in several churches. He procured a copy of the work, and cherished great expectations about his find.* Here was the original prologue to Mark's Gospel, 'evangelii ad hunc diem desiderata basis et fundamentum, in quo suppletur summa fide quicquid posset optari.'

Postel's Latin version was published in 1552 by Theodore Bibliander (Proteuangelion seu de natalibus Jesu Christi et ipsius matris virginis Mariæ sermo historicus divi Jacobi minoris . . .). The Greek text was first published by M. Neander (Apocrypha; hoc est narrationes de Christo, Maria, Josepho, cognatione et familia Jesu Christi extra Biblia . . . inserto etiam Proteuangelio Jacobi graece, in Oriente nuper reperto, necdum edito hactenus . . . 1563, re-issued in 1567), who did not share Postel's or Bibliander's enthusiasm† for the treatise. One of Tischendorf's MSS (A) was edited by C. A. Suckow in 1840 (Proteuangelium Jacobi ex codice ms. Venetiano descriptis, prolegomenis, varietate lectionum, notis criticis instructum edidit), and a Fayyûm parchment fragment containing 72–101 was published in 1896 by B. P. Grenfell (An Alexandrian Erotic Fragment and other Greek Papyri, pp. 13–19). In spite of these and other contributions, however, 'the Greek MSS—the oldest of which is a Bodleian fragment from Egypt of cent. v–vi—are very numerous and very incompletely known; the versions have not been exhaustively studied; and many important questions, especially those affecting the integrity of the book, must still be regarded as open' (M. R. James, in JThSt xii. [1910–11] 625).

The work itself professes to be a ιστορία or διήγησις (25<sup>1</sup>), and the narrative runs as follows.

The first part (1–18<sup>1</sup>) opens by describing how the wealthy Joachim and his wife Anna lamented over the fact that they had no child. Joachim is told, to his chagrin, by Reuben (the high priest?) that his childlessness disqualifies him from presenting his offerings to God. Anna, praying in the garden and looking up to heaven, is reminded afresh of her childlessness by the sight of a sparrow's nest in a laurel bush; she breaks into the following lament (3: spoiled in the Syriac, and omitted in the Armenian, version):

'Woe is me! who begat me, and what womb produced me?
For I was born accursed before the sons of Israel,
I am reproached, and they have driven me with jeers from the Lord's temple.

Woe is me! what am I like?
I am not like the birds of heaven, for the birds of heaven are fruitful before thee, O Lord.

Woe is me! what am I like?
I am not like the beasts of the earth, for even the beasts of the earth are fruitful before thee, O Lord.

Woe is me! what am I like?
I am not like these waters, for even these waters are fruitful before thee, O Lord.

Woe is me! what am I like?
I am not like this earth, for even this earth bears its fruits in season and blesses thee, O Lord.'

An angel assures her that God will give her a child, and eventually Mary is born—the idea of the story corresponding thus to that of John the Baptist's birth in Lk 1<sup>54</sup>. Anna now proceeds to fulfil her vow of consecrating the child to God.‡ The baby is not allowed to walk on the common earth till her parents take her, at the age of three, to Jerusalem, where she is welcomed by the priest and left in the temple, 'like a dove nestling * Hallam describes him as 'a man of some parts and more reading, but chiefly known . . . for mad reveries of fanaticism' (Introd. to the Literature of Europe<sup>3</sup>, 1847, i. 468).

† Henry Stephen, in his Introduction au traité de la conformité des merveilles anciennes avec les modernes, ou traité préparatif à l'apologie pour Hérodote (1566), openly expressed his disgust at Postel's production, whose origin and popularity he could explain only as a deliberate manoeuvre of Satan!

‡ Anna's song of praise (68) is more appropriate than is usually the case with such songs in the Bible:

'I will sing a song to the Lord my God, for he has visited me and taken from me the reproach of my enemies;
the Lord has given me fruit of righteousness, a single fruit but many-sided in his sight.
Who will tell the sons of Reuben that Anna is suckling?
Hearken, hearken, ye twelve tribes of Israel: Anna is suckling.'

there.' Her parents, in a transport of wonder at her, depart. They vanish from the story,* which at once (8) hurries on to describe the action taken by the priests when this wonder-child reached the age of puberty (twelve or fourteen years—the MSS vary). An angel bids Zechariah, the high priest, summon the widowers ('bachelors,' in the Armenian version) of Israel: 'let each bring his rod, and whoever has a sign shown him by the Lord, his shall the woman be.' Joseph is then suddenly introduced (9<sup>1</sup>). 'And Joseph, throwing aside his axe'—it is assumed that the readers know he was a carpenter or joiner—went out to meet the heralds (or, the widowers). A dove emerges from his rod, and he is reluctantly assigned the charge of Mary. He protests, 'I have sons, and I am an old man,† while she is a girl. I am afraid of becoming ridiculous to the sons of Israel.' But he is warned of the penalties attaching to disobedience, and eventually agrees. Only, to ensure the credibility of the virgin-birth, the author observes that Joseph left her at once in his house and went off to a distant task of building. Meanwhile the Annunciation takes place, Mary visits her kinswoman Elizabeth, and returns home. When she is six months pregnant, Joseph returns home, and is distressed at her condition. He has been put in charge of this virgin, and he has failed to keep his charge! 'Who has deceived me (her)? Who has done this evil deed in my house and defiled the maiden? Has not the story of Adam been re-enacted in my case? As the serpent came and found Eve alone, and beguiled her, when Adam was singing praise, so with me.' In a dream, however, an angel reassures Joseph. Nevertheless, when the authorities of the Temple discover Mary's condition, Joseph is charged with the crime of having secretly married a virgin whom he undertook to guard. First he, and then Mary, are made to undergo the ordeal of Nu 5<sup>1</sup>. They pass the test scatheless. 'And the priest said, "Since the Lord God has not disclosed your sins, neither do I condemn you" (οὐδε ἐγὼ κρίνω ὑμᾶς; cf. Jn 8<sup>11</sup>). So he sent them away. And Joseph took Mary and went home, rejoicing and glorifying the God of Israel.'‡

The story then (17–18<sup>1</sup>) describes Joseph and Mary travelling to Bethlehem as in Lk 2<sup>1</sup>. On the road, 'Joseph turned and saw she was sad; but he said to himself, "Perhaps what is in her is paining her." Again Joseph turned and saw she was laughing. So he said to her, "Mary, what does this mean? Why do I see your face now laughing and now sad?" And Mary said to Joseph, "Because I see with my eyes two peoples, one wailing and lamenting, the other rejoicing and exulting."§ As the time of her delivery is imminent, Joseph leads her into a cave (σπήλαιον), leaves her in charge of his sons, and goes off 'in search of a Hebrew midwife in the district of Bethlehem' (18<sup>1</sup>).

At this point (18<sup>2</sup>) the narrative|| suddenly changes to the first person: 'and I Joseph was walking and not walking, etc.' All nature is still and silent.

* The Armenian version (3) kills them both off 'in one year' at this point.

† In his vehement attack on Helvidius, Jerome insists that Joseph as well as Mary was a virgin. The Protevangelium is content to show how he could not have been the real father of Jesus.

‡ This must have been a serviceable episode for apologetic purposes; the story of Mt 1<sup>18f</sup>. did not vindicate Mary to anyone except her husband. But it was specially essential to the argument of our author, who is at pains to show that there was no question of a real marriage between Joseph and Mary.

§ This prophetic vision is a blend of Lk 2<sup>34</sup> and Gn 25<sup>23</sup> (where the two nations are in Rebecca's womb). In pseudo-Matthew they become the Jews and the Gentiles. Here they are probably no more than the unbelieving and the believing. Mary suffers no birth-pangs; her sorrow is purely spiritual.

The birds of the air are motionless; so are all animals and human beings within sight. Joseph secures a midwife, carefully explaining to her that Mary has conceived by the Holy Spirit. But in the middle of their conversation the narrative again* resumes the third person (19<sup>1</sup>), and a further abrupt touch† occurs in 19<sup>2</sup>, where the midwife leaves the cave 'and Salome met her.' Salome, like Thomas (Jn 20<sup>25</sup>), refuses to believe the story of the virgin-birth without tangible evidence. This she receives, with a temporary punishment for her incredulity. She carries the child, in obedience to an angel's command, crying, 'I will worship Him (i.e. God),‡ for a great King has been born for Israel.' The narrative then proceeds (20<sup>4</sup>): 'and she went out of the cave justified (δεδικαιωμένη). And lo a voice said to her, "Salome, Salome, do not proclaim the miracles (παράδοξα) you have seen, till the child reaches Jerusalem." And (21<sup>1</sup>) Joseph was ready to go into Judæa.'

Here the line of the narrative is again broken abruptly. Joseph is never mentioned again. 21<sup>1</sup>–22<sup>1</sup> re-tells Mt 2<sup>1a</sup>, with elaborations. The magi have seen 'a star of enormous size, shining among these stars and eclipsing their light.' The star conducts them to the cave, where the magi see 'the infant with his mother Mary; and they brought out of their wallet gifts of gold, incense, and myrrh. And being instructed by the angel not to enter Judæa, they went to their own land by another road.'§ The omission of Joseph would not of itself be significant (in view of Mt 2<sup>1-12</sup>), were it not that in 22<sup>1-2</sup> the initiative is assigned to Mary instead of to Joseph (as in Mt 2<sup>13a</sup>). Hearing of Herod's order to massacre all children of two years and under, Mary hides the child Jesus in an ox-stall. Evidently, the original narrative ignored the flight to Egypt. But what it substituted for this remains a mystery, for at this point (22<sup>3</sup>) the story suddenly breaks into an account of John the Baptist and his parents. The child John is among the infants sought for by Herod, and Elizabeth in despair prays to a mountain in the hill-country, 'O mountain of God, receive mother and child.' The mountain immediately parts in two and shelters them, protected by a light ('for an angel of the Lord was with them, watching over them'). Herod, unable to make Zechariah (who is high priest) confess the whereabouts of his child, has him murdered inside the Temple, on the ground that 'his son is to be king over Israel.' At day-break, as Zechariah does not come out, one of the priests ventures inside; he sees clotted blood beside the altar, and hears a voice saying, 'Zechariah has been murdered, and his blood shall not be wiped up until his avenger comes.' His body is never found, but his blood turned to stone. The Simeon of Lk 2<sup>3</sup> is chosen by lot to succeed him, and with this the story ends. The epilogue runs: 'I, James, the writer of this history, when a riot arose in Jerusalem at the death of Herod, withdrew myself to the desert till the riot in Jerusalem ceased, glorifying the Lord God who gave me the gift and the wisdom to write this history.' The book thus professes to be written not only by an eye-witness but immediately after the event.

In spite of Zahn's and Conrady's arguments to

† Possibly echoed in Clem. Strom. vii. 16. 93.

‡ Jesus, in the Syriac as in pseudo-Matthew (see below, p. 488).

§ The simplicity of the story is noticeable; in the primitive form (expanded in the versions and later MSS) the magi do not even adore the child, and no attempt is made to name them, as in the Armenian version, which calls them Melchior, prince of Persia, Baltasar, prince of India, and Gaspar, prince of Arabia. The angel goes to them at once after the Annunciation, 'and they were led by the star for nine months, and then came and arrived in time for the birth from the holy virgin.' This is reproduced in the Coventry Nativity play.

the contrary, it is almost necessary to postulate the composite character of the Protevangelium, although the sources cannot be disentangled with much precision. Even in 1-18<sup>1</sup> there are traces of different strata, e.g. the sudden introduction of Joseph in 9<sup>1</sup>, and the episode of Mary sewing the purple and scarlet * for the veil of the Temple (10, 12). The latter episode could be parted from the context not only without difficulty but with a gain to the sequence of the narrative.† On the other hand, neither 1-18<sup>1</sup> nor 18<sup>2</sup>-22<sup>2</sup> can be regarded as complete sources. The legend of Zechariah's murder in 22<sup>3</sup>-24, on the other hand, is a watermark of late origin. In the light of the investigations by A. Berendts,‡ it is clearly subsequent to Origen, who knows quite a different version of Zechariah's death—one which connects it closely with the virginity of Mary (he was murdered, according to this tradition, between the Temple and the altar, for having permitted Mary to enter the court of the virgins after she had given birth to Jesus). Had Origen read 22<sup>3</sup>-24 in his βιβλος Ἰακωβου, he would not have written as he has done upon Mt 23<sup>35</sup>. For the existence of the legend in the form of 22<sup>3</sup>-24 the first evidence is from Peter of Alexandria († A.D. 311), and even this evidence is not absolutely decisive.

Whether the composite work underwent successive expansions or, as is less likely, was recast by a Gnostic author, 1<sup>1</sup>-18<sup>1</sup>, which is practically a γέννησις Μαρίας, probably belonged to the book of James, from which Origen quotes. His quotation is based on this part, and on this part alone; the rest of the book never mentions the other children of Joseph. If the conclusion (25) was part of the original romance, the story must have included the incidents of Herod's massacre, though in a form differing from that preserved in the Apocalypse of Zechariah § as it now appears in 22<sup>3</sup>-24. For some reason, the latter must have been substituted for the original conclusion, or added to a narrative which had lost its ending. Whether 18<sup>2</sup>-21<sup>1</sup> was also an extract from some Apocryphum Josephi, which became appended to 1-18<sup>1</sup>, or whether the author of the book of James himself combined the fragment with his other source, is a problem which cannot be decided definitely either way, in view of the obscurity surrounding the literary origins of this as of most other pseudepigrapha.

Here, too, as in the Oxyrhynchite fragment (cf. p. 499), the attempt to describe the conditions of Jewish ritual shows the writer's ignorance. That Joachim should be repelled from his right to offer in the Temple on the score of childlessness (12), and that girls could remain within the Temple like vestals, are only two of the unhistorical touches which indicate unfamiliarity with the praxis of Judaism. The romancer knows his OT better.

And he knows it in Greek. The attempt to establish a Hebrew original for the Protevangelium has been unsuccessful; it is bound up with a desire to put it earlier than the Synoptic Gospels, on which, as on the LXX, it plainly depends. But, as it is uncertain whether Justin Martyr owes to it touches like that of the cave|| and the curious

* Perhaps, like the emphasis on the wealth of her parents, a reply to the current depreciation (Orig. Cels. i. 281.) of their position. But the wealth of Joachim is probably taken over from that of his namesake in Sus 14.

† The obscure sentence in 10, 'At that time Zechariah was dumb, and Samuel took his place, until Zechariah spoke,' may be an interpolation; but even if 'Simeon' (cf. Lk 2<sup>25</sup>) is read for 'Samuel' with some MSS, it remains an erratic block. It seems to presuppose the story (or the tradition) of Lk 16<sup>6</sup>.

§ Some details from this seem to underlie the Armenian version in ch. 3.

phrase about Mary in Dial. 100 (cf. Protev. 12<sup>2</sup>), the date of the earliest section cannot be assigned definitely to the first quarter of the 2nd century.

In the Armenian Church the Protevangelium formed the basis for the first part of a large work which included a Gospel of the Infancy and later apocrypha on the life and miracles of Jesus. According to F. C. Conybeare, who prints one or two chapters of the section based on the Protevangelium (AJTh i. [1897] 424-442), the entire work consists of 28 chapters, and goes back to an older Syriac text which was used by Ephrem Syrus. The short Syriac fragment published by Wright (Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the NT, p. 17 f.) gives merely a somewhat abbreviated form of 17-25. The larger, complete, Syriac version published by Mrs. A. S. Lewis (Studia Sinaitica, xi. [1902]), is in all probability a version of some Greek text practically corresponding to Tischendorf's. Both in the Syriac and in the Armenian versions the Protevangelium forms only the introduction for subsequent apocrypha on the Nativity or on Mary. Versions of the Protevangelium abound, testifying to its wide popularity as a religious story-book in the early Church. In addition to the Armenian, there were Arabic and Slavonic versions or editions, as well as Egyptian. A small Sahidic fragment has been edited by Leipoldt (ZNTW, 1905, p. 106 f.).

The popularity of the Protevangelium, even apart from its advocacy of the absolute virginity of Mary, is not unintelligible. The story is told with much simplicity and pathos, in its original form. There are vignettes of peasant life, of nature, and of domestic affection, which single it out from the other uncanonical Gospels—glimpses, for example, of Anna standing at the door as her husband drives home his flocks, and running to embrace him; of Elizabeth dropping her needlework and running to the door when Mary knocks; or of Anna (in the Armenian text) tossing her baby merrily in her arms. None of the Infancy Gospels is so free from extravagance and silliness. The child Jesus is a child, and, if the halo has begun to glow round the head of Mary, she is still a woman. No tinge of Docetism makes her unreal. Even the narrator keeps himself strictly in the background. The skill with which the author has contrived to tell his story is best appreciated when we compare the crude, coarse handling to which some of its materials are subjected in the Gospel of Thomas or the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew.

Occasionally there are touches which remind the reader of Buddhist legends; e.g. in the 1st cent. (A.D.) life of Buddha (cf. Chinese version in SBE xix. [1883]) Buddha is born miraculously, 'without causing his mother pain or anguish' (11<sup>9</sup>), and at his birth 'the various cries and confused sounds of beasts were hushed, and silence reigned' (11<sup>33</sup>). But the proofs of Buddhist influence are not cogent (cf. von Dobschütz in ThLZ, 1896, pp. 442-446); the comparative study of folk-lore in its modern phases renders hesitation on this point prudent.

SPECIAL LITERATURE.—L. Conrady's hypotheses of its Semitic original and its priority to the birth-stories of Matthew and Luke are printed in SK (1889) 723-784, and Die Quelle der kanonischen Kindheitsgeschichte Jesus, Göttingen, 1900. The best editions are both French, by Émile Amann, Le Protévangile de Jacques et ses remaniements latins, Paris, 1910 (Greek text of Protev., Latin texts of pseudo-Matthew 1-17 and the Nativity of Mary, with French translation, introduction, and notes); and C. Michel, Protévangile de Jacques, pseudo-Matthieu, Évangile de Thomas, textes annotés et traduits, Paris, 1911 (with the Coptic and Arabic versions of the History of Joseph the Carpenter, translated with notes by Peeters); cf. Haase, pp. 49-60.

(b) The Gospel of Thomas.—

The Παδικά, or Gospel of Thomas, survives in two Greek recensions, one (A) longer than the other (B),* but the MSS are not earlier than the 14th or 15th century. The Latin version (L), however, survives in a Vienna palimpsest as yet undeciphered, and the Syriac (S) in a MS of the 5th or 6th century.

No satisfactory edition has yet appeared, but Tischendorf's Greek texts have been edited and translated by C. Michel, Évangiles Apocryphes, i. (1911), Protévangile de Jacques, pseudo-

* In Peregrinus Proteus, 1879, p. 39 f., J. M. Cotterill tries to show that A and B are from the same hand, and that the author not only uses the LXX of Ecclesiastes but deliberately parodies some verses of Proverbs—two equally hazardous hypotheses.

Matthieu, Évangile de Thomas; S is published in Wright's Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament, pp. 6-11, etc.

According to Haase (pp. 38-48), L represents in the main a version of A, while S also, though independently, resembles A; but all imply a common source which is not extant.

We know from Hippolytus (Philosoph. v. 2), that the Naassenes appealed, on behalf of their tenets, to a passage in 'the Gospel according to Thomas,' which ran as follows: 'He who seeks Me will find Me in children of seven and upwards (ἐν παιδίοις ἀπὸ ἑτῶν ἑπτά), for hidden there I shall be manifested in the fourteenth age (οὐ αἰὼν, αἰῶνι).'* No other citation has been preserved.* Indeed, apart from the reference of Eusebius (HE iii. 25. 6), it is only mentioned again by Cyril of Jerusalem, who twice warns Christians against it as a Manichæan production (Catech. iv. 36, 'There are only four Gospels in the NT; the rest are pseudepigrapha and noxious. The Manichæans wrote a Gospel according to Thomas which, invested with the fragrance of the evangelic name, corrupts simple souls'; vi. 31, 'Let no one read the Gospel according to Thomas, for it is not by one of the Twelve, but by one of Manes' three wicked disciples'). Since the Manichæans possessed a Gospel of Thomas as well as a Gospel of Philip (see below, p. 501), this Manichæan Scripture may have been the Gospel mentioned by Hippolytus, possibly in a special form.

Zahn attempts to date the original Gospel quite early in the 2nd century. He regards the second half of the quotation made by Hippolytus as a Naassene comment, and thus is free to minimize the Gnostic character of the work. He further argues that Justin's description of Jesus (Dial. 88) as a maker of 'ploughs and yokes' in His native village is derived from the story in A 13 = S 13 = L 11 (Joseph, who 'made ploughs and yokes,' had an order from a rich man to make a bench. One plank turned out to be too short, but Jesus rose to the emergency, pulled the plank out to the proper length, and thus relieved His father). This may be no more than a coincidence, and Justin might have derived the touch from oral tradition. But it is certainly remarkable how little Gnostic fantasy pervades the Story of the Infancy, in any of its extant forms; apart from the 'great allegories' of the letter Alpha which the lad Jesus is reported to have taught His teacher, the stories and sayings are naïve rather than speculative. On the other hand, the childhood of Jesus is possibly filled with miracles owing to a desire of heightening His Divine claims prior to the Baptism. It is usually argued that this motive also implies a Docetic interest, since the miracles represent Jesus as not really a human child, but exempt from the ordinary conditions of human nature. This, however, is not a necessary or even a probable interpretation of the stories. They exaggerate the supernatural element, but they do not suggest a wraith or phantom in the guise of a child. In S 6-8, the reply of Jesus to His teacher does recall dogmatic interests ('I am outside of you, and I dwell among you. Honour in the flesh I have not. Thou art by the law, and in the law thou abidest. For when thou wast born, I was . . . When I am greatly exalted, I shall lay aside whatever mixture I have of your race'), but the tone and even the wording are not remote from the Fourth Gospel; and, as the Gospel evidently passed through several editions or phases, it may have accumulated such elements in the gradual course of its development. The above-quoted passage, for example, is peculiar to S, as we can see from the remark of Epiphanius (li. 20). There was even a tendency among orthodox Christians* to accept stories of miracles during the boyhood, in order to refute the Gnostic theory that the Divine Christ did not descend upon Jesus until the Baptism—a tendency which helps, among other things, to account for the tenacious popularity of such tales. From this very natural point of view, the rise of these stories may have been due to interests which were not distinctively Gnostic, whatever be the amount of dogmatic tendency that must be ascribed to their later form.†

There is no ground for denying that some Gnostic Gospel of Thomas existed during the 2nd century. The quotation preserved by Hippolytus does not occur in any of the extant recensions of the Thomas Gospel which afterwards sprang up; but even these, for all their size, cannot have corresponded to the entire work, which (on the evidence of Nicephorus) extended to no fewer than 1300 stichoi, almost double the length of the longest extant recension. Even in these extant recensions it is probable that the orthodox editor (or editors) must have removed the majority of Gnostic or Docetic allusions. And the Hippolytus quotation would naturally be one of these. Furthermore, we have an indirect proof that such a Thomas Gospel did exist prior to Irenæus. In describing the tenets of the Marcosians, that Church Father charges this Gnostic sect with introducing apocryphal and spurious scriptures (i. 20. 1), and with circulating the following legend. 'When the Lord was a boy, learning his letters, and when his master said to him as usual, "Say Alpha," he said "Alpha." But when the master went on and ordered him to say "Beta," the Lord replied, "You tell me first what Alpha means, and then I will tell you what Beta means."' The Marcosians, Irenæus adds, told this story to show that Jesus alone knew the mysterious significance of Alpha. The legend illustrates the mystic content which the sect put into the letters of the alphabet,‡ but its immediate interest for us lies in the fact that this story occurs in the Story of the Infancy.

Irenæus proceeds (i. 20. 2) to show how the Marcosians also misinterpreted the canonical Gospels to suit their propaganda; e.g. Lk 2<sup>49</sup> they explained to mean that the parents of Jesus did not know He was telling them about the Father; in Mt 19<sup>16-17</sup> (quoted as, 'Why call me good? One is good, my Father in the heavens') the word 'heavens' denotes 'æons'; and the word 'hidden' in Lk 19<sup>42</sup> denotes the hidden nature of the Depth (βαθος). Among these quotations from 'the Gospel' (i.e. the canonical Gospels) Irenæus includes one which does not occur in our four Gospels: 'His saying, I have often desired to hear one of these words, but I had no one to tell me, indicates (they allege), by the term one, Him who is truly one God.' This curious and unparalleled Logion may have been quoted by mistake from an uncanonical Gospel like that of Thomas, but we cannot do more than guess upon a point of this kind. In an 11th cent. Athos MS of the Gospels (cf. Stud. Bib. v. [1901-03] 173) there is a note to the effect that the pericope adulteræ belonged to the Gospel of Thomas (τὸ κεφάλαιον τοῦτο τοῦ κατὰ Θωμᾶν εὐαγγελίου ἔστιν); if so, it must have occurred in an edition which has not been preserved.

The extant recensions, to which we have just referred, are versions of a Story of the Infancy (τὰ Παιδικὰ τοῦ Κυρίου) narrated by Thomas, which is, and may have been intended to form, a sequel to * Even this one is echoed only once, and that vaguely, in the pert reply of Jesus to the Jewish schoolmaster preserved in pseudo-Matthew 304 ('I was among you with children, and you did not know me').

* Usually, Jn 21 was held, as e.g. by Euthymius Zigabenus, to rule out such legends of miracles done by the boy Jesus.

† The influence of Egyptian mythology is asserted, but exaggerated, by Conrady in SK (1903) 397-459.

‡ e.g. Alpha and Omega. One of the Marcosian fantasies was that the dove at the Baptism indicated the perfection of Christ's nature, the symbol of a dove being Omega and Alpha.

the stories of the Protevangelium Jacobi. The resemblances and differences between the four recensions may be seen by comparing their accounts of an incident which happens to be recorded by all the four, viz. the unpleasant story of how Jesus once became unpopular.

A 4-5

Again, he was passing through the village, and a boy ran and knocked against his shoulder. Jesus was angry, and said to him, 'Thou shalt not go back as thou camest.' And at once he fell and died. Some who saw what happened said, 'Whence was this child born, for every word of his becomes act and fact?' And the parents of the dead boy went to Joseph and blamed him, saying, 'With such a child, thou canst not dwell with us in the village. Or, teach him to bless and not to curse; for he is killing our children.'

And Joseph called the child apart and admonished him, saying, 'Why dost thou such things? These people suffer, and hate us, and persecute us.' Jesus said, 'I know these words of thine are not thine. Still, I will say nothing, for thy sake. But they shall bear their punishment.' And immediately his accusers were blinded. And those who saw it were terribly afraid and perplexed; they said of him, that every word he uttered, good or bad, became fact and proved a marvel. And when they [he?] saw Jesus had done such a thing, Joseph rose and took hold of his ear and pulled it hard. The child was much annoyed and said to him, 'It is enough for thee to seek and not to find. Certainly thou hast not acted wisely. Knowest thou not that I am thine? Do not vex me.'

B 4-5

Some days later, when Jesus was passing through the town, a boy threw a stone at him and struck him on the shoulder. Jesus said to him, 'Thou shalt not go thy way.' And at once he fell down and died. Those who happened to be there were astounded, saying, 'Whence is this child, that every word he utters becomes act and fact?' And they went off and complained to Joseph, saying, 'Thou canst not dwell with us in this town. If thou desirest to do so, teach thy child to bless and not to curse; for he is killing our children, and everything he says becomes act and fact.'

Joseph was sitting on his seat, and the child stood in front of him; and he caught him by the ear and pinched it hard. Jesus looked at him steadily and said, 'That is enough for thee.'

L 5

A few days later, as Jesus was walking with Joseph through the town, one of the children ran up and struck Jesus on the arm. Jesus said to him, 'Thou shalt not finish thy journey And all of a sudden he fell down the earth and died. But when they saw these wonders, they cried out, saying, 'Whence is that boy?' And they said to Joseph, 'Such a boy must not be among us.' Joseph went off him, and brought him, but they said to him, 'Go away from this place; but if you must be among us, teach him to pray and not to curse. Our children have been insensate.'

Joseph called Jesus and reproved him, saying, 'Why dost thou curse? These inhabitants hate us.' But Jesus said, 'I know these words are not mine but thine; for thy sake I will say nothing; let them see to it these were children of the bed in their wisdom!' Immediately those who spoke against Jesus ceased cursing. These shall not be blinded; and they walked up and down, saying, 'All the words that proceed from his accusing him. But Joseph heard what Jesus had said to him, and pulled it. Then he angrily caught him by the ear. Jesus in a passion said to Joseph, 'It is enough for thee to see me, not to touch me. And finding me (obedient); for thou knowest not who I am; thou hast acted foolishly.' If thou knowest that, thou wouldst not irritate me. And although I am with thee now, I was made before thee.'

S 4-5 (tr. Wright).

And again Jesus had gone with his father, and a boy, running, struck him with his shoulder. Jesus says to him, 'Thou shalt not go thy way.' And at once he fell down the earth and died. And all who saw him were astounded, saying, 'Whence is this boy born, that all his words become facts?' And they said to the family of him who was dead Joseph, 'Such a boy must not be among us.' Joseph went off him, and brought him, but they said to him, 'Go away from this village unless you teach him to bless.'

And he drew near to the boy, and was teaching him and saying, 'Why dost thou these (things)? And these people hate thee.' And these people said, 'If the words of my father were not wise, he would not know how to instruct children; but for thy sake I will say nothing; let them see to it these were children of the bed in their wisdom!' Immediately those who spoke against Jesus ceased cursing. These shall not be blinded; and they walked up and down, saying, 'All the words that proceed from his accusing him. But Joseph heard what Jesus had said to him, and pulled it. Then he angrily caught him by the ear. Jesus in a passion said to Joseph, 'It is enough for thee to see me, not to touch me. And finding me (obedient); for thou knowest not who I am; thou hast acted foolishly.' If thou knowest that, thou wouldst not irritate me. And although I am with thee now, I was made before thee.'

A fair idea of the characteristic contents of this Gospel may be derived from one or two extracts, such as the story of Jesus and the sparrows (B 3): 'Jesus made out of that clay twelve sparrows. It was the Sabbath-day. And a child ran and told Joseph, saying, "Behold, thy child is playing about the stream and he has made sparrows out of the clay, which is not lawful." When he heard this, he went and said to the child, "Why dost thou do this, profaning the Sabbath?" But Jesus did not answer him; he looked at the sparrows and said, "Fly off and live, and remember me." And at this word they flew up into the air. And when Joseph saw it, he marvelled.' On the strength of this anecdote Variot (op. cit., p. 228 f.) ventures to compare the Gospel of Thomas to the Fioretti of St. Francis. Another tale is that of Jesus and the boy's foot (L 8): 'A few days afterwards a boy in that town was splitting wood, and he cut his foot. As a large crowd went to him, Jesus went with them. And he touched the foot which had been hurt, and at once it was healed. Jesus said to him, "Rise up, split the wood, and remember me." It is as a thaumaturgist that Jesus appears in A 11: 'When he was six years old, his mother gave him a pitcher and sent him to draw water and bring it into the house. But he knocked against someone in the crowd, and the pitcher was broken. So Jesus unfolded the cloak he wore, filled it with the water, and carried it to his mother.* And when his mother saw the miracle which had taken place, she kissed him. And she kept to herself all the mysteries she saw him, he did to him nothing more but stretched out his hand to him and blew upon the bite, and it was healed' (from Ac 28<sup>3-5</sup>).

A closes with quite a sober version of Lk 24<sup>1-52</sup>, which substitutes for v.<sup>50</sup> the following passage: 'The scribes and Pharisees said, "Are you the mother of this child?" She said, "I am." They said to her, "Blessed art thou among women, for God has blessed the fruit of your womb; such glory, such virtue, such wisdom we have neither seen nor heard." S also ends in this way, but the passage first quoted occurs at the close of L (in substantially the same form), to round off a miraculous cure (15: 'A few days later, a neighbouring child died, and its mother grieved sorely for it. On hearing this, Jesus went and stood over the boy, knocked on his breast, and said, "I tell thee, child, do not die but live." And at once the child rose up. Jesus said to the mother of the boy, "Take your son and give him the breast, and remember me"') which occurs earlier (in A 17).

The data are so scanty that even conjectures must be tentative, but we may attempt to explain the literary problems by assuming that an original Gospel of Thomas was afterwards used (edited?) by the Marcosians and Naassenes, and that it subsequently formed the basis for the story of the Infancy in its various recensions. Was another version of it circulated among the Manichæan Christians? Or was the Gospel of Thomas which

* The Manichæan literature is said by Timotheus to have included also, among its 'devilish' and 'deadly' contents, 'the living Gospel' (cf. Photius, Bibl. 85). Diodorus devoted the first seven of his twenty-five books against the Manichæans they used an independent (native or Indian) work? These are questions to which, in the present state of our knowledge, no definite answer can be given.

Protests were repeatedly made against the Παδικά, from Chrysostom onwards; but the work must have enjoyed a popularity among Oriental Christians which orthodox censures were unable to check. One proof of this popularity may be found in the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew and the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, which have worked up materials furnished by the Thomas Gospel into independent collections of stories for the edification of pious Christians. The second of these two Gospels seems to have circulated among Jews and Muhammadans as well.

(c) The Gospel of pseudo-Matthew.—The Gospel of pseudo-Matthew owes its present title to Tischendorf, the first editor of the Latin text, since the MS he used was headed: 'incipit liber de ortu beatæ Mariæ et infantia Salvatoris a beato Matthæo evangelista hebraice scriptus et a beato Hieronymo presbytero in latinum translatus.' Thilo had already given this title to the Gospel of the Nativity of Mary. Both pieces (the former at least in one or two MSS) are prefaced by the forged correspondence between Jerome and two bishops, in which the latter plaintively bewail the apocryphal and heterodox character of the current books upon the birth of Mary and the Infancy of Jesus; they have heard that Jerome has come into possession of a Hebrew volume on the subject by the evangelist Matthew, and beg him to translate it into Latin for the apologetic purposes of the faithful. Jerome agrees, explaining that the book was intended by Matthew for private circulation, and that in making it public he is not adding to the canonical Scriptures. This is the author's adroit* way of winning a welcome for his production and safeguarding it against suspicion. He had the fate of the Protevangelium Jacobi and the Gospel of Thomas before his eyes. But such a description of the writing's contents as this correspondence presents is obviously more suitable to the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew than to the little treatise on the Nativity of Mary, which never alludes to the Birth and Infancy of Jesus. Tischendorf's nomenclature is therefore more correct than Thilo's.

The Thomas Story of the Infancy has been exploited by the author in the third part of the book (25-42), but this is only one of his sources. The Protevangelium Jacobi is another (1-16). In fact, the Gospel must have carried the name of James occasionally; Hrotswitha, for example, the Abbess of Gandersheim (10th cent.), who paraphrased it in Latin hexameters for the benefit of her nuns, entitled her work, 'Historia nativitatís laudabilis conversationis intactæ Dei Genetricis, quam scriptam referi sub nomine sancti Jacobi fratris Domini.'

In the first part (1-17), which describes the birth and maidenhood of Mary, her marriage, the virgin-birth, and the escape from Herod, the features of moment introduced are as follows. The home of Mary's parents is definitely Jerusalem (in the Protevangelium this is only a matter of inference); Joachim does not offer sacrifices for forgiveness; he absents himself for five months instead of forty days; Anna's vow to consecrate her child is made before, not after, the angel's announcement; an angel bids her go to meet Joachim; in Protev. 7 Mary, aged three, dances when set down on the third step of the altar, but here (4) she runs up the fifteen steps to the Temple so rapidly that she never looks back; she is mature at the age of three, remains in the Temple as a paragon of virginal piety, fed daily by one of the angels, and often in conversation with them; any sick person who touches her goes home cured; her courteous greeting instituted the custom of saying 'Deo gratias'; she refuses to be married, and takes the vows of virginity; Joseph, already a grandfather, is chosen from the widowers to take charge of (not to marry) Mary; the jealousy of her five maids is rebuked by an angel; the Annunciation is made when she is working at the purple for the veil of the Temple; Mary does not hide during her pregnancy, nor does she visit Elizabeth;† Joseph does not upbraid her, and he apologizes to her for his suspicions; after she successfully passes the ordeal for virgins, the people kiss her feet and ask her pardon; the brilliant light in the cave at Bethlehem does not diminish; Salome adores Jesus‡ (not simply God, as in Protev. 20), and is not forbidden to declare the wonder of the virgin-birth; only angels witness the birth, and as soon as Jesus is born He stands on His feet; the star is the largest ever seen in the world; the magi offer gifts to 'the blessed Mary and Joseph' as well as to the child; Mary's fear of Herod's fury (Protev. 22) is omitted.

The second part (18-24) describes with picturesque detail the flight to Egypt and the residence of the holy family there. Some of the legends have sprung from the soil of the OT. For example, when Mary is terrified by dragons issuing from a cave (18), the infant Jesus leaves her bosom and confronts them, till they adore him and retire (from Ps 148†). Docile lions accompany and aid their oxen, and wolves leave them untouched (in fulfilment of Is 65‡). Again, when Mary and Jesus entered the Egyptian temple, all the idols bowed and broke (in fulfilment of Is 19§). The OT is enough to explain the last-named legend, without recourse to the later and rather different Buddha-legend in the Lalita Vistara (viii.). Athanasius, by the way, welcomes this incident (de Incarnatione Verbi Dei, 36), which he accepts without a shadow of suspicion, as a proof of the supreme glory of Jesus. Another pretty legend‡ occurs in 20-21, where Mary rests from the heat under a tall palm-tree and longs to eat some of the fruit hanging high overhead. Joseph tells her he is more concerned about the lack of water, since their water-skins are empty. 'Then the infant Jesus, resting with happy face in the bosom of his mother, says to the palm, "Bend thy branches, O tree, and refresh my mother with thy fruit." Immediately, at this word, the palm bowed its crest to the feet of the blessed Mary, and they gathered from it fruits with which all were refreshed. After they had gathered all its fruit, it remained bent, waiting his command to rise at whose command it had bowed down. Then Jesus said to it, "Raise thyself, O palm, be strong, and join the company of my trees which are in the paradise of my Father. And open from thy roots the vein of water which lies hidden in the earth; let the waters flow, that we may be satisfied therewith." At once the palm rose up, and at its root a spring of water began to trickle forth, exceed-to refuting what he thought was their 'vividum evangelium,' but which was really the 'modium evangelium' written by Adda.

* Except in one point. He makes Jerome plead love for Christ as the motive for his translation. Did he forget that the author of the Acts of Paul and Thecla had been condemned in spite of his plea that he had invented the Acts out of love for St. Paul?

† The cleaving of the mountain to shelter Elizabeth and John the Baptist from Herod's fury, and indeed the whole Zechariah legend, is omitted.

‡ The angels sing Lk 214 in adoration of the infant Jesus in the cave; the ox and the ass in the stable also incessantly adore him (14)—in fulfilment of Is 13 and Hab 32 (LXX, ἐν μέσῳ δυο ζώων γυνώσκουσιν).

§ Which passed into the Qu'ran (ed. E. H. Palmer [SBH vi. and ix., 1900], xix. 20-26) in a simpler form.

ingly clear, cool, and bright.' Next day, before leaving, Jesus rewards the palm by allowing an angel to transplant one of its branches to paradise. 'This palm,' he tells the terrified spectators, 'shall be prepared for all the saints in the place of bliss, as it has been prepared for us in this lonely spot.'

The third part (25-42) describes incidents in the boyhood of Jesus, from the return to Judaea, for the most part on the unpleasant lines of the Gospel of Thomas. The incident of the taming of the lions is new, however (35-36). Jesus, a boy of eight, went out of Jericho one day to the banks of the Jordan, and walked deliberately into a cave where a lioness lay with her cubs. The lions adored him. Jesus then improved the occasion by telling the astonished crowd, 'How much better are the beasts than you! They recognize the Lord and glorify him, while you men, made in God's image and likeness, do not know him! Beasts recognize me and are tame; men see me and do not acknowledge me.' Jesus then crosses the Jordan, accompanied by the lions, the waters dividing to right and left (cf. Jos 3<sup>16</sup>, 2 K 2<sup>8</sup>), and dismisses his wild companions in peace.

(d) The History of Joseph the Carpenter.—One of the latest developments of the legends relating to the Infancy of Jesus is represented by the History of Joseph the Carpenter, which purports to be the story, told by Jesus to the disciples on the Mount of Olives, of the life and death of Joseph. It is a genuinely native product of Egyptian piety, not earlier than the 4th century. At several points it recalls the 'Testament' literature, and probably it belongs to that category rather than to the Gospel category. Sahidic, Bohairic, and Arabic versions (cf. Haase, pp. 61-66) are extant.

(e) Unidentified fragments.—The four Sahidic fragments upon the life of the Virgin Mary, published by Forbes Robinson (TS, iv. 2 [1896], p. 2ff.), maintain her virginity after the Birth of Jesus, but abjure the ideas which afterwards developed into the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception ('Cursed is he who shall say that the Virgin was not born as we are') and the Assumption ('Cursed is he who shall say that the Virgin was taken up into the heavens in her body. But she died like all men, and was conceived by man's seed as we are'). The outline of the fragments generally resembles the story of the Protevangelium Jacobi and pseudo-Matthew, with some curious idiosyncrasies. Joachim her father was formerly called Cleopas (according to Codex B of pseudo-Matthew 32, Anna married Cleopas after the death of Joachim); he and Zechariah were brothers, and Anna was the sister of Elizabeth; a white dove (= Mary) flies to Anna in a vision; Mary in the temple 'never washed in a bath' (a favourite ascetic feature of the Egyptian nuns), nor did she use perfumes; she conceived 'by the hearing of her ears,' and she is the Mary who visits the tomb and receives the commission of Mt 28<sup>10</sup> (cf. Albertz in SK [1913] 483 f., on this point); she works miracles of healing after the Resurrection, but modestly forbids the apostles to record them; when she dies, her soul leaps into the arms of her Son. It is doubtful, however, if these fragments originally belonged to a Gospel at all. Probably they are part of the debris of the Mary literature (cf. Haase, p. 77f.) which developed out of the legends represented by Gospels like the Protevangelium Jacobi, where the main interest is really in Mary rather than in Jesus. It is through the channel of such religious fiction, from the Protevangelium Jacobi to the so-called Transitus Mariæ, formed in part by local legends and pagan views on the relation between sex and religion, that the mythology of the early Church flowed over into art and literature. Painters like Titian and Perugino, poems like the Byzantine Christus Patiens, and stories like the Golden Legend, were as indebted to this source as the calendar of the Roman Church's festivals.*

II. GENERAL GOSPELS, COVERING THE ENTIRE LIFE AND MINISTRY OF JESUS.—(a) The Jewish Christian Gospels (the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of the Nazarenes, the Gospel of the Twelve, the Gospel of the Ebionites).

SPECIAL LITERATURE.—The quotations from and the Patristic allusions to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, together with the Gospel of the Ebionites, are collected, with critical studies,† by E. W. B. Nicholson (Gospel acc. to the Hebrews, London, 1879), Zahn (Gesch. des Kanons, ii. 642-723), R. Handmann (TU v. 3, 1885), J. H. Ropes (TU xiv. 2, 1896, p. 77 f.), A. Meyer (in Hennecke's Neutest. Apok.), and A. Schmiedtke ('Neue Fragm. u. Untersuchungen zu den judenchristl. Evangelien,' TU xxxvii. 1, 1911); cf. also Waitz's important study, 'Das Evangelium der zwölf Apostel' in ZNTW (1912, p. 338 f., 1913, pp. 38 f., 117 f.). In the light of Schmiedtke's and Waitz's researches, it is no longer possible to treat the Gospel according to the Hebrews without handling the Gospel of the Nazarenes and the Gospel of the Ebionites, since the quotations usually assigned to the first are disputed. In the following section, therefore, these three Gospels will be discussed together.

The general problem may be stated thus. Four 'Jewish Christian' Gospels are mentioned and quoted in the literature of the early Church: the Gospel of the Hebrews (HG), the Gospel of the Nazarenes (NG), the Gospel of the Ebionites (EG), and the Gospel of the Twelve, i.e. of the Twelve Apostles (TG).‡ Were there really four Gospels of this kind? Or are some of these titles no more than different descriptions of the same Gospel? This is a problem which goes back to the 5th century. Jerome apparently held HG = TG, and this equation has been accepted by critics like Hilgenfeld, Cassels (Supernat. Rel., 1874-77, pt. ii. ch. iii), Lipsius, and Resch, with varying definitions of its age and content. One of the notable features in Schmiedtke's recent monograph is that he not only challenges the ordinary equation of HG = NG in recent criticism, but reconstructs an HG which absorbs practically all the material assigned to TG, so that HG becomes equal to EG, as Nicholson had already argued. The usual identification§ of EG = TG (Hilgenfeld, Zahn, Harnack, etc.) is combined by Waitz with a refusal to equate HG and NG.

Of these four, TG is mentioned much less often than HG; our first knowledge of it is of a Gospel bearing this title (i.e. with the twelve apostles as its authors or authorities) which is mentioned by Origen next to the Gospel of the Egyptians (see above, p. 479). We hear of NG first in Jerome, and for EG we are mainly indebted to Epiphanius. But we do not know to what extent these titles were interchangeable, and whether different writers meant the same work when they mentioned HG or TG, for example. The most hopeful method of arriving at some solution of the problem is to approach it along the line of the allusions to Jewish Christians in the early writers of the Church.

There were Jewish Christians, according to Justin (Dial. 88) who maintained that Jesus was born in the ordinary way. Whether all the Jewish Christians whom Justin knew held this position,

* There is a monograph by R. Reinsch on Die Pseudo-Evangelien von Jesu und Marias Kindheit in der romanischen und germanischen Literatur, Halle, 1879.

† The varying directions of criticism are traced by Handmann (cf. Moffatt, LNT, Edinburgh, 1912, pp. 259-261). Of the earlier studies, one of the most acute is in chs. vii.-viii. of R. Simon's Histoire critique du texte du Nouveau Testament, Rotterdam, 1689.

‡ A later Syriac Church-compilation with this title has been edited by J. Rendel Harris: The Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, together with the Apocalypses of each one of them, Cambridge, 1900. Whether the Coptic fragments edited by Revillout (Patrolog. Orient., ii. 2, Paris, 1903-05, p. 123 f.) belong to this, or to some allied Gospel of the Twelve, is a moot point (cf. Haase, p. 30 f.). It also seems doubtful whether this Syriac TG can be shown to rest on a source akin to the EG of Epiphanius.

§ Occasionally in the sense that EG is no more than an Ebionitic copy or edition of the original catholic HG.

or whether it was only some of them, is not quite clear; all he asserts is that the majority of Christians in his day preferred to believe in the virgin-birth. The real dividing line among Jewish Christians was drawn by their view of the Law (Dial. 47); the stricter party sought to enforce the Law upon Gentile Christians, while the more tolerant were content with obeying it themselves. It was over this question of practice, not over a Christological issue, that differences arose. With Irenæus the situation is different. Writing in the West, he is not acquainted with the varieties of Jewish Christians in Palestine and Syria; to him they are all 'Ebionites,' who believe Jesus was the son of Joseph, reject St. Paul as an apostate from the Law, and use no Gospel but that of Matthew (Hær. i. 26, 2, iii. 11. 7). Origen is better informed (Cels. v. 61). He recognizes the two-fold classification of the Ebionites or Jewish Christians, and holds that both rejected St. Paul (v. 65), but says nothing about any special Gospel used by those who rejected the virgin-birth. The difficulty presented by the statement of Irenæus remains, viz. how could any party in the Church adhere strictly and specially to the Gospel of Matthew, if they believed (iii. 21. 1) in the natural birth of Jesus? Must they not have omitted all or part of the first two chapters? Yet Irenæus seems to imply that they did not alter or abbreviate Matthew's Gospel,* for he contrasts them favourably with Marcion. 'The Ebionites, who use only that Gospel which is according to Matthew, are convicted out of that Gospel itself of holding wrong views about the Lord; whereas Marcion, who mutilates the Gospel according to Luke, is shown by the parts that survive in his edition to be a blasphemer against the only living God' (iii. 11. 7; cf. iii. 21. 1). The loose statement of Irenæus is corrected or explained by Eusebius of Cæsarea (HE iii. 27. 4); he declares that the Ebionite Christians, who took so low and 'poor' a view of Christ's person as to believe that He was born naturally, and who rejected St. Paul as an apostate from the Law, used the so-called Gospel according to the Hebrews, and attached little value to the other Gospels. But this HG was not the special possession of these Ebionite Christians. It was the particular delight of Christian Jews (iii. 25. 5: ἡ μάλα τὰ Ἑβραίων οἱ τὸν Χριστὸν παραδεξάμενοι χαίρουσι). More than that: the last-named passage from Eusebius proves that HG was ranked by the Church among the scriptures which 'though not within the canon but disputed are nevertheless recognized by the majority of the orthodox (παρα πλείστοις τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν γινώσκόμενα). This class of scriptures includes the Apocalypse of John (ἐλ φανεῖται, Eusebius puts in). 'And nowadays (ἡδὴ) some have also included the Gospel according to the Hebrews.' By 'some' Eusebius plainly means orthodox Christians, as distinguished from the Christian Jews whose enthusiasm for this Gospel was natural and taken for granted. He implies that this tendency to disparage the Gospel was comparatively recent.

Here we begin to suspect confusion. What Eusebius calls the Gospel καθ' Ἑβραίων was at once the sole† Gospel of the Ebionites, who denied the virgin-birth as well as the authority of St. Paul, and the favourite Gospel of Christian Jews. It was even regarded by some of the strictly orthodox as only second to the four canonical Gospels and distinctly above Gospels like those of Peter, Thomas, and Matthias!

The suspicion that καθ' Ἑβραίων* was being used loosely to describe more than one Gospel† is confirmed by two other lines of evidence.

(1) The first of these runs parallel to the references already quoted, and is derived from the statements of Jerome. It is to Jerome that we owe our knowledge of the existence of NG, but his statements about this Gospel and the Nazarenes who used it require to be carefully sifted, and when they are sifted they witness to a difference between HG and NG which Jerome for some reason ignored. At first sight, almost everything would seem to turn upon the interpretation of Jerome's famous allusion in his treatise contra Pelagianos, iii. 2: 'In the Gospel according to the Hebrews, written in the Chaldaic and Syriac tongue [i.e. Aramaic, or Western Syriac]‡ but in Hebrew letters, which the Nazarenes use to this day, (the Gospel) according to the apostles (secundum apostolos) or, as most suppose, according to Matthew, (the Gospel) which is in the library at Cæsarea, the story runs, "Behold the mother of the Lord and his brothers said to him, John the Baptist is baptizing for the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But he said to them, What sins have I committed, that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless perhaps what I have just said is (a sin of) ignorance." And in the same volume, "If your brother has sinned in word, he says, and made amends to you, receive him seven times in one day. Simon his disciple said to him, Seven times in one day? The Lord answered and said to him, Yes and up to seventy times seven, I tell thee. For even in the prophets, after they had been anointed with the Holy Spirit, matter of sin was found." The opening words§ seem to suggest that Jerome identified HG and TG (=the Gospel of the Ebionites), but he is simply reproducing at second-hand the conjecture about HG and the Gospel of the Ebionites, neither of which he seems to have known; as the only Semitic Gospel he knew was NG, he naturally attributes to it the floating titles and opinions which had gathered round the others.

This is corroborated by the fact that he sometimes uses 'Nazaraei' loosely for heretical Jewish Christians (practically = the 'Ebionites' of earlier writers), and sometimes speaks of them in special connexion with the local Church at Syrian Beroëa. Now, whatever Gospel or Gospels the former used, and whoever they were, it is plain that the latter class of Jerome's 'Nazaraei' could not have been the Ebionite Christians of Irenæus, Origen, and Eusebius, for, according to their interpretation of Is 8-9<sup>1</sup>, which Jerome quotes, they honoured St. Paul and his Gospel ('per evangelium Pauli . . . in terminos gentium et viam universi maris Christi evangelium splenduit').|| They were Jewish Christians of non-

* The size of the HG known to Nicephorus in the 6th cent. amounted to 2,200 stichoi, i.e. larger than Mark and smaller than Matthew—though such comparative calculations depend on the size of the writing being the same, which is not to be assumed invariably.

† This was felt long ago by Gieseler (Historisch-kritisch Versuch über Entstehung der schriftl. Evangelien, 1818, p. 8 f.), and elaborated by Credner (Beiträge, 1832, p. 399 f.), who almost distinguished EG, HG, and NG under the common title of καθ' Ἑβραίων. How easy it was for early Christians to fall into confusion of this kind may be seen from the fact that in some quarters Tatian's Diatessaron was actually called the Gospel 'according to the Hebrews' (Epiph. xlv. 1).

‡ The meaning of Jerome's words may be seen by comparing his remarks in his Preface to Sam. and Kings (= Prolog. Galeatus): 'Syrorum quoque et Chaldaeorum lingua testatur, quæ Hebræa magna ex parte confinis est.'

§ Ilandmann (p. 111 f.) thinks that Jerome wrote 'secundum apostolos' to prevent this Gospel from being confused with the heretical Gospel of the Twelve ('evangelium secundum xii. apostolos').

|| Their catholic attitude to the canonical Scriptures, including not only Matthew but Acts, John, and even St. Paul's Epistles, is excellently deduced by Schmidtke (p. 107 f.) from Jerome's

* Their Gospel must have been, apparently, EG; NG contained Mt 1-2, and HG could not be called a Matthean Gospel.

† At the same time, strict Jewish Christians who held the OT to be the revealed truth, and Christianity a consummation of the Jewish religion, would not necessarily attach the same canonical value to a Gospel as other Christians (cf. Ilandmann, p. 108 f.). This consideration may also serve to account for the targumistic features of NG and the freedom with which the text is treated in EG.

heretical opinions, as is implied in Jerome's account in de Viris illustribus, 3: 'Matthew who is also Levi, the apostle who had been a tax-gatherer, first in Judaea composed the Gospel of Christ in Hebrew letters and words for the benefit of those belonging to the circumcision who had believed. It is not quite certain who translated it afterwards into Greek. Further, the Hebrew (original) itself is kept to this day in the library at Caesarea which Pamphilus the martyr gathered most diligently. I was also given permission to copy it, by the Nazareni who use this volume in Beræa, a town of Syria.'

(2) The second line of proof which suggests that HG and NG were not identical is as follows. In his Epistle to the Church at Smyrna (iii. 1-2) Ignatius writes: 'I know and believe He was in the flesh even after the resurrection. And when He came to those with Peter, He said to them, "Take, handle Me and see that I am not a bodiless phantom." This may be a loose paraphrase of the Synoptic saying in Lk 24<sup>39</sup>, but the early Church preferred to regard it as a quotation from some uncanonical Gospel. Unfortunately, the three writers who mention it do not agree upon its origin. Origen (according to the Latin version of the preface to his de Principiis) said it came from a little book called the Teaching of Peter, which had no claim to be authentic ('ille liber inter libros ecclesiasticos non habetur . . . neque Petri est scriptura neque alterius cuiusquam qui spiritu dei fuerit inspiratus'). This sounds so definite that we are surprised to learn that Eusebius (HE iii. 36. 11) does not know what source Ignatius used. Jerome, however, twice asserts that it was the Gospel which he had translated. As both Origen and Eusebius knew HG, Jerome's statement must be an error, if he is referring to HG. But it is very difficult to suppose that he could have made such a mistake about a Gospel which he had translated, and the inference must be either that his HG was a different edition from that known to Origen and Eusebius, or more probably that it was not HG but NG. This latter hypothesis explains why Eusebius could not place the quotation, for Eusebius knew HG but not NG. There is no reason why such a quotation should not have occurred both in NG and in the pseudo-Petrine document mentioned by Origen. It is of course possible that one of them borrowed from the other; perhaps Ignatius used the Petrine document (Zahn), while NG used Ignatius or that document (Schmidtke). But the last-named hypothesis implies that Jerome had an extremely superficial knowledge of NG, and this is on other grounds unlikely. It is true that Jerome required an expert to translate the Chaldaean or Aramaic text of Tobit into Hebrew, that he might render it into Latin; and his acquaintance with the original of NG must have been equally second-hand. But this does not prove that he could not have known its contents with sufficient accuracy. There is no obvious reason to doubt his veracity, or to hold that he did not know, e.g., that this or that quotation occurred in NG, even supposing that he translated the latter as rapidly as he did Tobit.

references in his Commentary on Isaiah. But we do not see why it follows (pp. 125-126) necessarily that their Gospel could not have included the unhistorical legend about the appearance of the risen Jesus to his brother James. This was surely in line with St. Paul's own tradition (1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>). The latter no doubt puts the appearance to James fourth instead of first in chronological order, but, in view of the very different accounts in the Gospels (particularly Matthew and John), we can hardly lay stress upon the prominence assigned to James as if this were incompatible with the catholic position of the 'Nazareni'. After all, as Schmidtke himself admits, they were keen upon circumcision and the Law as national traditions. As Matthew's Gospel had no record of any appearances to individual disciples, the way lay open for a harmless legend of this kind in honour of James the Just. If St. Paul put the appearance to him before his own vision, why should not the 'Nazareni'?

Schmidtke's reconstruction is in outline as follows. At an early period the Church at Syrian Beræa broke up—or, at any rate, the local Jewish Christians soon formed a community of their own, apart from the Gentile Christian Church. It was these Jewish Christians who were the real 'Nazarenes' of the early Church. Outside Beræa there were none. When Epiphanius calls the Nazarenes a sect of the primitive Church, he is simply confusing them with the Nazarenes of Ac 24:14-15, where St. Paul protests, on being charged with being a ring-leader of της των Ναζωραίων αίρέσεως, 'I cherish the same hope in God as they (αὐτοὶ οὗτοι) accept.' Here αὐτοὶ οὗτοι means St. Paul's Jewish accusers, but Epiphanius mistook the words for a reference to the Nazarenes. In reality, these Nazarene Christians of Beræa preserved their consciousness of belonging to the Church; they accepted the virgin-birth of Jesus and honoured St. Paul as an apostle (see above, p. 490 n.), though they retained, like some of the Jewish Christians afterwards known to Justin, a number of Jewish peculiarities of custom and belief. Their Gospel was an Aramaic version (135-150 A.D.) of Matthew's Gospel, which was a sort of targum; it also included some touches from the other canonical Gospels. Now it was this document, according to Schmidtke, which caused all the subsequent misunderstandings of the Church about the Hebrew Gospel which formed the basis of the canonical Matthew. This version of Matthew was supposed to have been the original of Matthew. Papias was the first to go wrong, and he misled Eusebius and Apollinaris, as well as Irenæus and Origen. Even those who knew Hebrew and Syriac were misled into calling NG a Hebrew document, since they assumed it was the basis of the canonical Matthew with its Jewish Christian characteristics. The only writer who had a first-hand knowledge of it was Hegesippus (c. A.D. 180). Eusebius secured a copy only when he wrote the Theophania; he did not know it when he composed his Church History. And even when he did read it he imagined, thanks to Papias and others, that it was the Semitic original of Matthew.

The copy of Eusebius in the library of Caesarea fell into the hands of Jerome. But Jerome, like Epiphanius, for the most part depended not on this Gospel directly but on the information supplied by the distinguished scholar, Apollinaris of Laodicea, who had edited an exposition of Matthew, in which his Hebrew scholarship enabled him to quote fragments of this Nazarene Gospel. That dishonest and unreliable writer, Jerome, had no first-hand acquaintance with the Nazarenes, of whom he says so much. He was the Defoe of his age.

Hegesippus, as Eusebius points out, used both NG and HG. The latter* was an independent Greek work, equivalent to TG whereas NG was neither an independent work nor a Greek composition, but a Syriac document reproducing Matthew's Gospel in the main. The mistaken identification of HG and NG was Jerome's fault. He imagined that this Gospel of the Nazarenes which he saw in the episcopal library of Caesarea was the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and Schmidtke bluntly declares that his story about translating it (c. A.D. 390) is a fabrication.†

It is not necessary here to discuss the details of Schmidtke's brilliant and searching investigation. His strictures on Jerome (pp. 66-69) are too sweeping; his conjecture about the relation between Apollinaris and the extracts from the Nazarene Gospel is hardly more than ingenious; and his tendency to attribute misunderstanding to early Christian writers, although it is in the main justifiable, carries him into some extreme positions. But his analysis of the extant data has succeeded in showing afresh‡ the strong case for regarding HG and NG as different works. So much at any rate may be granted. On the other hand, the identification of HG and EG breaks down; Waitz is probably right in regarding EG as an independent work. The differentiation of HG, NG, and EG is a precarious task, however, and in the present state of our knowledge no reconstruction can claim to be more than conjectural. The probability is that there were several Jewish Christian Gospels approximating more or less closely to the type of Matthew. Jewish Christians who claimed * EG (see below) was also a Greek composition, but, unlike HG and like NG, it was allied to Matthew, though not so closely as NG.

† Bede, in the beginning of the 8th cent., made the fact of Jerome having quoted and translated the Hebrew Gospel the reason for holding that the latter was to be ranked 'not among apocryphal but among ecclesiastical histories' (in Luc. i. 1).

‡ The loose usage of καθ' Ἑβραίων as a Gospel title was seen by several earlier writers besides those already mentioned (p. 490). Holtzmann, e.g. (Einführung in das Neue Testament, 1892, p. 487 f.), suggested that it was applied to a whole series of more or less cognate Greek and Aramaic compositions. Lipsius preferred to regard HG as assuming different shapes in different circles and at different times. This is almost inevitable, when HG and TG are identified.

to be the true 'Hebrews,' and who saw in Christianity the completed form of Hebrew religion, could well, as Waitz observes, call their Gospel a 'Gospel according to the Hebrews,' even although it was written in Greek. There were varieties of such Jewish Christians, from the orthodox 'Nazaraei' to the extreme wing of the Ebionite Christians, and there is no reason to doubt that more than one Gospel was composed and circulated by them. If one of these was an Aramaic version of Matthew, it would be particularly easy for later writers to use καθ' Ἑβραίων loosely as a linguistic title, and thus to imagine that HG meant either a Hebrew Gospel or the supposed original of Matthew. One of the obstacles in dealing with the entire problem of the Jewish Christian Gospels is due to the fact that some early Christian writers and fathers often mention books which they seem never to have seen, and that their references to the Gospel books of the Jewish Christians are too loose and vague to be taken at their face-value. This applies particularly to Epiphanius and Jerome. When the latter, for example (de Vir. illustr. 2), introduces the quotation about the Lord's post-Resurrection appearance to His brother James, by declaring that it occurred in 'the Gospel called "according to the Hebrews,"' which I recently translated into Greek and Latin, and which Origen often uses,* he is surely confusing HG and NG. He is anxious to prove the importance of NG; that is why he says it was often cited by Origen.* But what Origen cited was HG. There is an error of memory here, at any rate. So with Epiphanius. He explains (Hæc. xxix. 7, 9) that the Nazoræans—Jewish Christians who practised Jewish habits of life, and who had their headquarters at Syrian Beroë—possessed and used the Gospel of Matthew in Hebrew; he declares that their edition was unmutilated (πληρῆστατον), but does not know if it contained the genealogy from Abraham to Christ. This is to distinguish the Nazoræans from sectarian Christians like the Cerinthians, who (Hæc. xxviii. 5, xxx. 14) used a mutilated Matthew, leaving out passages like 1<sup>1-17</sup> 10<sup>-5</sup> and 26<sup>18</sup>. Obviously, his remarks are contradictory. If he knew that the Gospel used by these Nazoræans was unmutilated, he must have known whether it contained Mt 1<sup>1-17</sup> or not. He is speaking about this NG either from hearsay or from a hasty perusal of Irenæus, and, with a carelessness which is characteristic of him, at several points confuses it with EG.

The rival theories thus are: (i.) HG and NG either identical or different editions of the same work; (ii.) HG and NG different works entirely. The latter seems preferable, but in any case it is essential to have the extant data before us.

(a) In the first place (cf. Schmidtke, pp. 1-31, 63 f.), we possess a number of marginal scholia on Matthew from a group of minuscule MSS which, partly on the basis of von Soden's researches and discoveries, Schmidtke regards as witnessing to a special type of text or a special edition of the Gospels dating not later than A.D. 500. These scholia are held to be exegetical notes, probably drawn from the Commentary on Matthew which Apollinaris of Laodicea wrote, prior to Jerome. They profess to quote the readings of τὸ Ἰουδαϊκόν (sc. εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Ματθαῖον). Perhaps the discredit into which the supposed Aramaic (original) Matthew was falling, on account of its use by heretical sects, led to the pious preservation of these brief extracts on the margin of Church copies. There is a good deal of speculation in the eye of this hypothesis. The scholia, however, are unmistakable.

* According to Schmidtke (p. 134 f.), Jerome betrays here the fact that he copied this story from Origen; but this is not a necessary inference (cf. p. 490 n.).

In Mt 4<sup>5</sup> the 'Jewish' Gospel read ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ for εἰς τὴν ἁγίαν πόλιν, in 522 it omitted ἐκκλῆ and in 613 the doxology to the Lord's prayer; at 7<sup>0</sup> it read: * 'If you are in my bosom and do not the will of my Father who is in heaven, I will cast you out of my bosom'; in 10<sup>16</sup> it read ὑπὲρ οὐφείας for ὡς οἱ οὐφείας, in 11<sup>12</sup> διαρπαζεται for βιάζεται, in 11<sup>25</sup> εὐχάριστω for ἐξομολογοῦμαι; in 12<sup>40</sup> it omitted the second 'three days and three nights'; in 15<sup>5</sup> it read κορβαν δ' ὑμεῖς ωφεληθήσεσθε ἐξ ἡμῶν; it omitted 16<sup>2b-3</sup> and read 'son of John' for Bar-Jonah in 16<sup>1</sup>; in 18-2 after 'seventy times seven' it read: καὶ γὰρ ἐν τοῖς προφῆταις μετὰ τὸ χρισθῆναι αὐτοὺς ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ εὐρίσκειτο ἐν αὐτοῖς λόγος ἀμαρτίας; in 26<sup>74</sup> it read: καὶ ἠρησάτο καὶ ὠμοσεν καὶ κατήρασατο; and in 27<sup>65</sup> it had: καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτοῖς ἄνδρας ἐνὸς πλοῦς ἵνα καθέζονται κατ' ἐναντίον τοῦ σπηλαίου καὶ τηρώσιν αὐτὸν ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτός.

(b) The extant quotations may best be classified according to the source:

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA cites HG twice—Strom. ii. 9. 45: 'as it is written also in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, "He who wonders shall reign, and he who reigns shall rest."'

Strom. v. 14. 96: 'He who seeks shall not rest until he finds; when he has found, he shall wonder, and wondering he shall reign, and reigning he shall rest.'

ORIGEN (in Joh. ii. 6) quotes a saying of the Saviour from the Gospel according to the Hebrews as follows: 'My mother, the Holy Spirit, took me just now by one of my hairs and carried me off to the great mountain Tabor.' He repeats the quotation in his Homilies on Jeremiah (xv. 4). It is evidently from a description of the Temptation, where Jesus had not His disciples beside Him, as He had at the Transfiguration. Origen quotes the passage in order to prove that the Word came into being through the Spirit; he adds that if one reads Mt 12<sup>50</sup> one cannot have any difficulty about understanding how the Spirit could be called the mother of Christ. In the Gospel, Jesus is the Son of the Spirit (= Wisdom; cf. Wis 14c 917, Lk 734-35).

The Latin version of his Commentary on Matthew (1916ff.) has the following passage: 'it is written in a Gospel called the Gospel according to the Hebrews (if anyone cares to receive this not as an authority but in illustration of the question before us),† "the other rich man said to him, Master, what good thing shall I do to live? He said to him, Man, do the Law and the prophets. He answered him, I have done them. He said to him, Go, sell all you possess and divide it among the poor, and come, follow me. But the rich man began to scratch his head, and was not pleased. And the Lord said to him, How do you say, I have done the Law and the prophets? For it is written in the Law, You shall love your neighbour as yourself. And lo, there are many brothers of yours, sons of Abraham, clothed in filth, dying of hunger, while your house is full of many goods, and nothing at all goes out of it to them. And turning he said to Simon his disciple, who was sitting beside him, Simon, son of John, it is easier for a camel to enter by the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven."'

This popular version of the story recounted in the Synoptic Gospels tallies partly with Mt. and partly with Lk.; if it represents a conversation at some rich man's table (Meyer), this is a Lucan affinity, for in Lk. (18<sup>18</sup>), as distinguished from Mt. and Mk., the incident is not described as an open-air episode.

EUSEBIUS declares that the story of the woman accused of many sins before the Lord, which Papias quotes, was contained in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (HE iii. 39. 16). In Theophan. Syr. iv. 12 (ed. Gressmann, 1904, p. 183 f.): 'the reason of the divisions between souls that take place in households [Mt 10 34-35] He taught—as we have found in one place in the Gospel which exists in Hebrew among the Jews, where it is said, "I (will) choose for myself the excellent [or, worthy] whom my Father in heaven gave to me." On the authority of Mai, another quotation from this Gospel has been usually referred to the Theophania, viz.: "Since the Gospel which has reached us in Hebrew characters pronounces the threat not against the man who hid the money but against him who lived riotously—"for he had ¶ three servants, one who spent the master's substance with harlots and flute-girls,** one who multiplied it, and one who concealed the talent; the one was accepted, the other was merely blamed, and the third was shut up in prison"—I judge that, according to Matthew, the threat immediately following the conclusion of the word spoken

† From the Jewish story of Bel and the Dragon (v. 36), where an angel lifts Habakkuk by the hair of his head and transports him to Babylon (cf. Ac 8-9). In the Christian Haggrada, the hairs become a single hair, which reminds us of Ezk 83.

‡ Origen hesitates to quote this Gospel as Scripture, not because it is heretical, but because the canon of the four Gospels was now dominant—as it had not been when Clement wrote.

§ So there were two: for Matthew's duplications, cf. 8<sup>23</sup> 2080. || On this passage, cf. J. A. Robinson in Expositor, 6th ser., v. [1897] 194 f.

¶ Or, 'it contained' (περιεῖχεν)—in which case we have only a summary, not a verbal quotation.

against him who did nothing does not apply to him, but was spoken by way of epanalepsis with reference to the man formerly mentioned, who had eaten and drunk with drunkards.' But Gressmann shows that this passage does not belong to the Theophania (cf. his ed. § 29); it belongs either to some other author altogether or to some other treatise of Eusebius (TU xxx. 3 [1906] 363). The version of the parable given in this extract witnesses to the dissatisfaction which was felt at an early date with what seemed to be the severe verdict of Mt 25:29-30.

In addition to corroborating the reading of the 'Jewish' Gospel in Mt 4<sup>s</sup> 1617 and 2674, and repeating (on Mic 7<sup>o</sup>) Origen's argument from and citation of the Tabor saying, JEROME affirms that in Mt 25 it * read 'Judah' not 'Judea'; in the narrative of the Baptism it contained the following conversation: 'Behold the mother of the Lord and his brothers said to him, "John the Baptist is baptizing for the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him." But he said to them, "What sin have I committed that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless perhaps what I have just said is (a sin of) ignorance"—and the following incident: 'But it came to pass when the Lord had ascended from the water that the entire fountain† of the Holy Spirit descended and rested on him, and said to him, "My son, in all the prophets I looked for thee, that thou mightest come and I might rest in thee.† For thou art my rest, thou art my firstborn son, who reignest to eternity"; in Mt 611 it read mahar, i.e. (bread) for to-morrow; at Mt 1210 it inserted, 'I was a stone-mason, seeking a livelihood by my hands; I pray you, Jesus, to restore my health, lest I beg food with shame'; it also read (at the passage corresponding to Mt 1821-22?), "'If your brother has sinned in word and made amends to you, receive him seven times in one day.'" Simon, his disciple, said to him, "Seven times in a day?" The Lord answered and said to him, "Yes, I tell you, and up to seventy times seven I for even in the prophets,§ after they had been anointed with the Holy Spirit, matter of sin was found" (cf. above, p. 490); in Mt 219 it read: 'Osanna barrama' (i.e. Hosanna in the heights); instead of 'son of Barachiah' || it read 'son of Jehoiada' at Mt 2333; at Mt 2751 it read, 'the lintel of the temple, which was of enormous size, broke and fell in pieces'; and it contained (in the neighbourhood of Mt 522 or 1316-17) a saying of Jesus to His disciples, 'Never be glad except when you look with love at your brother.'

These Jerome quotations show a Gospel in which Jesus is called 'Jesus' as well as 'the Lord' (only the latter in the Gospel of Peter), where the narrative of the Baptism has an apologetic purpose as Matthew's has (314<sup>c</sup>)—although the two differ—but which was characterized by naïve, popular traits rather than by any theological tendencies. It must have adhered to the general order and even material of Matthew; otherwise, as in the case of the scholia, it would have been out of place to chronicle slight variations of text.

It is more easy to feel that HG and NG were different than to assign these fragments to one or the other. This is the precarious side of the hypothesis advocated by Schmidtke and Waitz afresh. However, to HG we may assign the quotations of Clement and Origen, to NG those of Jerome and the Jerusalem scholia. But naturally there must have been some material common to both Gospels, and we have evidence of this in the fact that both Origen and Jerome witness apparently to the interpretation of Barabbas as 'son of (their) teacher' and to the Tabor saying¶ about the Spirit as mother. How far, if at all, the scholia of the 'Jewish' Gospel attest the text of HG as well as of NG it is impossible to say. The daemon-saying quoted by Ignatius came from NG, if it came from either of these Gospels. Probably, though not certainly (see note on p. 490), the following passage belonged to HG: 'But when the Lord had given the linen cloth to the servant of the high priest, he went to James and appeared to him; for James had sworn he would not eat bread from the hour when the Lord had drunk the cup until he saw him rise from those who sleep. . . . "Bring a table and bread," the Lord says. He took bread and blessed it and broke it and gave it to James the Just, and said to him, "My brother, eat your bread, for the Son of Man* has risen from those who sleep"' (quoted by Jerome). The Eusebius quotations are doubtful; the Theophania citations point to NG, but whether the story of the accused woman corresponds to that of Lk 7<sup>37</sup>, or to that of Jn 7<sup>53-810</sup>, the probability is that Eusebius means to say that it occurred in HG—a fresh indication that HG was not, like NG, a sort of 'Matthaean' composition or version. We do not know if HG had any Birth-story; † perhaps it resembled Mark or John in this respect. And its contents seem to have been different from the exact Synoptic or Johannine type.

Both HG and NG were known to Hegesippus, who brought forward material from both, as Eusebius informs us: ἐκ τε τοῦ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγελίου καὶ τοῦ Συριακοῦ καὶ ἰδίως ἐκ τῆς Ἑβραϊδὸς διαλέκτου τινὰ τίθησιν (iv. 22. 8; cf. iii. 25. 5). Unless we regard the καὶ between εὐαγγελίου and του as an error or interpolation (Nicholson, Handmann), the inference from this passage is that 'the Syriac (Gospel)' was used by this Jewish-Christian writer as well as the Gospel of the Hebrews.‡ Furthermore, since NG was probably used by Ignatius (cf. p. 491), it may be placed not later than the end of the 1st cent., subsequent to the composition of Matthew's Gospel. It was the special Gospel of the Jewish Christians at Berea, originally; it was not marked by anti-Catholic tendencies,§ but owing to its language it never attained the popularity and circulation of HG. The latter was not a translation but a Greek Gospel. It received the name of καθ' Ἑβραίων or 'Hebrew Gospel' from Christians who were not Jews; the title no more meant that it was written in Hebrew than the Gospel according to the Egyptians meant a Gospel written in Coptic. It was the readers, not the language, that suggested the sobriquet, in this case. Again, unlike NG or even EG, it had not Matthew's Gospel as its basis or prototype. Clement and Origen never quote it or refer to it as a work allied to Matthew. So far as we can judge from the few allusions and citations that may be accepted as belonging to it, the contents of HG must have been stamped with characteristics which differentiated it from the canonical Gospels and yet commended it for a time to others than Jewish Christians both in Palestine and Syria (probably its original home) and Egypt. But we do not possess any means of determining its date with certainty; whether it was contemporary with NG or written early in the 2nd cent., remains an open question. Later|| than NG at any rate, and further from orthodox teaching than either NG or HG, was EG, which seems to imply a * 'Sicut in ipso Hebraico legimus.' This might mean 'in the original Hebrew of the OT,' but the analogy of the other references favours the meaning of 'in the Hebrew Gospel.'

† For Jerome's argument (on Is 112), the emphasis falls upon the word 'entire.' The spirit of wisdom is 'poured out like water' on the Elect One in En. xlix. 11. (cf. LXX of Is 111<sup>c</sup>). Spitta (ZNTW, 1904, p. 316 f.), suggests that foñs represents ἡ κολυμβήθρα (πάντος τοῦ πνεύματος ἁγίου) in the original, and that κολυμβήθρα may have been confused with κόλυμβος (columba)—which would explain the remarkable absence of the dove here.

‡ Cf. En. xlii. 1-3.

§ The second allusion in these citations to the OT prophets.

|| In a Coptic fragment of some late Egyptian (Gospel?) treatise, Jesus denounces the Jews before Pilate for killing the prophets down to 'Zechariah the son of Barachiah and John his son' (Patrol. Orient. ii. 165)—identifying the Zechariah of the canonical Matthew with the other (cf. above, p. 485).

¶ As we can see from the Baptism-story in NG (see above, p. 490), no difficulty was felt about calling Jesus the Son of the Spirit and mentioning His human mother, any more than in the Synoptic tradition about mentioning His father Joseph and His Heavenly Father.

* This is one note of primitive origin or colour; the title 'Son of Man' is extremely rare outside the Gospels, and later writers of uncanonical Gospels never copied it.

† Hegesippus did say that Domitian dreaded the second appearance of Christ as Herod dreaded the first (Eus. HE iii. 20. 2), but it does not follow that he owed to HG this reference to Herod. Oral tradition (as Handmann suggests) might account for it.

‡ Waitz (ZNTW, 1913, p. 121) thinks it was EG that Hegesippus used, not HG; but his reasons are unconvincing. There is no ground for supposing that HG was confined to Egypt, and none for assuming that James was a vegetarian (see below), whose principles would be shared by the Jewish Christians—and expressed in their Gospel (i.e. EG).

§ It is still a question how far the text and traditions of NG represent earlier forms than those of the Synoptic narrative.

|| But if EG is used in the pseudo-Clementine κρηρύματα Πέτρον, and if the latter were written by the middle of the 2nd cent., as Waitz shows good reason for maintaining (cf. ZNTW, 1913, p. 49 f.), our Gospel may be put in the first half or even quarter of the 2nd century. This is corroborated by Irenæus (cf. above, p. 490), if his Ebionitic Christians used EG.

knowledge of Luke as well as of Matthew, although it is Matthaean, as HG does not appear to have been. This early 2nd cent. production is known to us from the quotations made by Epiphanius, which enable the following outline to be drawn:

(b) The Gospel of the Ebionites.—According to Epiphanius (Hær. xxx. 3), the Ebionites accepted no Gospel except that of Matthew. 'This alone they use, like the adherents of Cerinthus and Merinthus; they call it "the Gospel according to the Hebrews"—a correct description, since it was Matthew alone in the New Testament who composed the narrative and preaching of the Gospel in Hebrew and Hebrew characters.' It is true, he adds—and he repeats this in xxx. 6—that Hebrew translations of John's Gospel and of Acts were said to be kept in the Genizah at Tiberias, which had proved useful in the conversion of Jews. But Matthew's Gospel was the only one originally written in Hebrew. This idea of a Hebrew Matthew obsesses Epiphanius among other early Christian writers; it is needless* to spend words upon his explanation of καθ' Ἑβραίων as suitable to the original language of Matthew. What is more important for our present purpose is to notice how he proceeds to explain that this Gospel used by the Ebionites was not the canonical Matthew, however, but a mutilated and revised edition (xxx. 13). It began at 3'. (1) 'The beginning of their Gospel is: "It came to pass in the days of Herod king of Judæa that John came baptizing with a baptism of repentance in the Jordan river; he was said to be of the race of Aaron the priest, the son of Zechariah and Elizabeth. And all went out to him."' The story of the Birth and the genealogy were therefore absent from this Gospel. 'Cutting off the genealogies in Matthew, they make a beginning, as I have already said, in this way: "It came to pass in the days of Herod, king of Judæa, under the high priest Caiaphas, that a certain man named John came, baptizing with a baptism of repentance in the Jordan river"' (xxx. 14). This suggests that the author had Lk 3' in mind, but in the following extract (2), by making the Pharisees accept John's baptism, he differs from the Lucan tradition (Lk 3<sup>7f.</sup> 7-9-30): 'John came, baptizing, and the Pharisees went out to him and were baptized, and all Jerusalem. And John had raiment of camel's hair and a girdle of skin round his loins; and his food (says the Gospel) was wild honey,† the taste of which was the taste of manna, like a honey-cake dipped in oil' (xxx. 13). The account of the Baptism of Jesus, however, did not immediately follow, as in the canonical Matthew, but only after an interval (μετὰ τὸ εἰπεῖν πολλὰ). The author first of all brought Jesus on the scene, and placed the call of the twelve apostles prior to the Lord's Baptism, possibly to make it clear that they had not been originally disciples of John, more probably to convey the impression that they had been eye-witnesses from the very outset. (3) 'There was a man named Jesus, and he was about thirty years of age; he chose us . . . and entering Capharnaum he went into the house of Simon surnamed Peter, and opening his lips said, "As I walked beside the lake of Tiberias‡ I chose John and James, sons of Zebedæus, and Simon and Andrew and Thaddæus and Simon the zealot and Judas Iscariot; and I called thee, Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom, and thou didst follow me. You then I desire to be twelve apostles for a testimony to Israel"' (xxx. 13). The narrative of the Baptism (4) diverges in order and in some details from the Synoptic tradition. 'When the people had been baptized, Jesus also came and was baptized by John. And when he came up from the water, the heavens opened and he saw the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove descending and entering into him. And a voice came from heaven saying, "Thou art my Beloved, in thee I am well-pleased"—and again—"to-day have I begotten thee." And immediately a great light* shone round the place. Seeing this (says the Gospel), John says to him, "Who art thou, Lord?" And again a voice from heaven addressed him [or, said of him], "This is my son, the Beloved, in whom I am well-pleased." And then (says the Gospel) John fell down before him and said, "I pray thee, Lord, do thou baptize me." But he forbade him, saying, "Come, this is how it is fitting that all should be accomplished"' (xxx. 13). The divergence of EG from NG at this point is clear: the one has a dove, the other has not (cf. above, p. 493); and EG conflates the voices from heaven.

The Gospel must have included the middle part of the life of Jesus,† for two sayings are quoted, one (5) a curious protest against sacrifices ('I came to abolish sacrifices, and if you do not cease sacrificing, the Wrath will not cease from you,' xxx. 16), and the other (6) a version of Mt 12<sup>46-50</sup> = Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup> = Lk 8<sup>19-21</sup> ('They deny he is a man, on the ground, forsooth, of the word which the Saviour spoke when he was informed, "Behold, thy mother and thy brothers are standing outside." "Who is my mother and my brothers?" And stretching his hand out to his disciples he said, "These are my sisters and mother and brother, who do the will of my Father,"' xxx. 14). If (5) was substituted ‡ for Mt 5<sup>17</sup> (as in the case of (7)), and if the plural θελήματα in (6) means the various injunctions of the Law as God's will, we have two indications of the Jewish Christian syncretistic and anti-sacrificial§ tendency which dominated the Gospel.

The sole saying (7) which has been preserved from the Passion narrative illustrates the vegetarian tendency which we have already seen in the description of John the Baptist's food. The Lucan saying, 'With desire have I desired to eat this passover with you,' became: 'I have not desired to eat this passover of flesh with you' (xxx. 22).|| The Ebionites were vegetarians, probably because they objected to sexual relations as immoral, and consequently to animal food as the product of such relations even among the lower creatures.

The accuracy of Epiphanius is seldom beyond question, and it has been surmised that these quotations in whole or part came from other sources (so, e.g., Credner, Lipsius, Westcott, Schmidtke). Thus (5) may have come from the Clementine Recognitions (i. 39, 54) and (6) from Origen's comment on Jn 2<sup>12</sup>. But it does not follow that they were current only in these quarters. And as Epiphanius does show some close acquaintance with the tenets reminiscence. On the other hand, the Coptic fragments which some propose to connect with this Gospel (cf. 506) show marked Johannine colouring.

* See Justin's Dial. 88.

† Origen (de Princip. iv. 22) also quotes the Ebionites' interpretation of Mt 15<sup>24</sup>.

‡ Nicholson (p. 77) suggests that it was part of a paragraph answering to Lk 13<sup>1-3</sup>.

§ This led them (Epiph. xviii. 2, xxx. 8, 13) to criticize parts of the Law and even of the prophets, in spite of their admiration of the OT.

|| Or, 'Have I desired . . . you?'

* Even after Zahn's (Gesch. des Kanons, ii. 731 f.) argument that Epiphanius's statement is correct, and that since Origen the Ebionitic Christians had begun to appropriate for their own Gospel the honorific title of the Church's HG.

† The religious vegetarianism of the Ebionite Christians (Epiph. xxx. 15) made them change 'locusts' (ακρίδες, Mt 3<sup>4</sup>) into honey-cake (εγκρίς). The verse echoes LXX of Nu 11<sup>8</sup> (καὶ ἦν ἡ ἕδωρα αὐτοῦ ὡσεὶ γεύμα ἐγκρίς ἐξ ἐλαίου). Note James was an ascetic but not a vegetarian. The words of Ilegippus, which Eusebius quotes (IE ii. 23. 5), οὐδὲ ἐμψυχὸν ἐφάγεον, mean that he was careful to eat only 'kosher' meat (in the sense of Ac 15<sup>28</sup> and Jos. Ant. i. 102, χωρὶς αἱμάτων).

‡ This is almost the only touch in the extant fragments which recalls the Fourth Gospel (6<sup>21</sup>), and even this need not be a and practices of the Ebionites, it is fair to assume that his citations from their Gospel are not invariably inaccurate or imaginary. As the quotation (2) shows, by the substitution of ἐγκρίς for the Synoptic ἀρκίδες, the original text was Greek, not Semitic.

Origen (see p. 479) calls it τὸ ἐπιγεγραμμένον τῶν δώδεκα εὐαγγέλιον, instead of using κατά, as he does in describing the other Gospels on his list, and as the Latin translator renders it ('iuxta * duodecim apostolos'). The probability is that a saying like (3) gave rise to this title; it would suggest, and perhaps was intended by the writer to suggest, that the Gospel was composed by Matthew in the name of the twelve apostles, just like the Gospel of Peter or (according to one legend) the Fourth Gospel. It is true that a similar inference may be not unreasonably drawn, identifying this Gospel with HG, which also claimed to be a Gospel of Matthew; but the inference would not be so conclusive, for in any case the Gospel of the Ebionites, like the other Jewish-Christian Gospels, was based on the canonical Matthew. Its original title may have been 'the Gospel of the Twelve by Matthew' or 'the Gospel of the Twelve,' for 'the Gospel of the Ebionites' is naturally no more than a description of it which emanated from outside circles. It belonged to the Synoptic type; nowhere can it be proved to have derived from the Johannine Gospel.

(c) The Gospel of the Egyptians.—The 'Gospel of the Egyptians' means a Gospel current among the Egyptians, not a Gospel composed by them. The title (τὸ κατ' Αἰγυπτίους εὐαγγέλιον) first occurs in Clement of Alexandria, who observes that it was used by people (the Encratites) οἱ πάντα μᾶλλον ἢ τὴν κατὰ τὴν ἀληθειαν εὐαγγελικῶς στοιχήσαντες κανοῖν (Strom. iii. 9. 66). By the time that Origen wrote, it had been degraded to the rank of a heretical writing, but Clement's language implies an earlier attitude which was more favourable. Thus in Strom. iii. 13. 92 he remarks, à propos of one quotation, 'We possess this saying (ἔχομεν τὸ ρητόν) not in the four Gospels which have been handed down to us, but in the Gospel according to the Egyptians.'

The extant quotations are for the most part taken from dialogues between Jesus and Salome. (a) 'When Salome asked "How long shall death prevail?" . . . the Lord said, "So long as you women bear"' (Clem. Strom. iii. 8. 45). (b) 'Salome says, "How long shall men die?" . . . The Lord answers, "So long as women bear"' (Strom. iii. 9. 64; similarly in Excerpta Theod. 67). (c) 'Then,' said she [i.e. Salome], "I would have done well in not bearing?" as if child-bearing were not allowed. The Lord replies, "Eat every herb, but do not eat the bitter† one"' (Strom. iii. 9. 66). (d) A fourth quotation is less certain. 'Those who oppose what God has created, in their specious (or fine-sounding, εὐφήμων) continence adduce the words spoken to Salome which we have mentioned above. They occur, I think (φέρεται δὲ, αἰσῶς), in the Gospel according to the Egyptians; for they say, "The Saviour himself said, I came to destroy the works of the female"' (Strom. iii. 9. 63). The hesitation is curious, but it hardly justifies us in arguing that the quotation must have come from a work like the Ezēgelica of Cassianus rather than from the Egyptian Gospel. In any case, the leading idea of (c) and (d) is that the distinctions of sex are to be obliterated in the future kingdom, and that marriage as the bitter herb of bodily passion is therefore to be avoided. This is still more vividly put in (e), a fifth quotation. In reply to another question put by Salome upon the time when the kingdom was to be revealed, 'The Lord said, "When you tread under foot the garment of shame, when† the two become one, the male with the female, neither male nor female"' (Strom. iii. 13. 92). Here the 'garment of shame' is the body, which Cassianus regarded as the garments of skin in Gn 3<sup>21</sup>. The perfect state means the abolition of all sexual connexions and the physical organism which forms their opportunity, according to the Pythagorean theosophy or perhaps merely Philonic influence.

* By 'iuxta' he meant to render κατά, for he goes on to translate κατὰ Μαθίαν by 'iuxta Mathian.'

† G. Wobbermin's theory (Religionsgeschichtliche Studien, 1896, pp. 96–103) that Orphism has influenced this Gospel involves, among other improbabilities, the literal meaning of 'herb' here, as an indication of vegetarian tendencies.

‡ This kind of rhetoric became common in some circles; cf., e.g., the Acta Philippi, 140 (p. 90, ed. Tischendorf) and the Acta Petri, 38 (C. Schmidt, TU xxiv. [1903]). But the curious fantasy of the Logion quoted in these Acta does not necessarily imply a use of the Egyptian Gospel.

The dialogue form is common in contemporary Rabbinic tradition, and Salome for some reason was one of the Synoptic figures to whom the later Gnostics (cf. her dialogues with Jesus in Pistis Sophia, 102, 104, 114, 115, 343, 381) and the Carpocratians (Orig. Cels. v. 62) assigned an important rôle.

The allusions of Hippolytus and Epiphanius suggest that the Gospel must have contained passages capable of a pantheistic development, but it is naturally impossible to determine, with the scanty data at our disposal, how far these encratitic and modalistic theories of the later Naassenes and Sabellians were due to the text of the Gospel itself and how far to later interpretations.

The Gospel of the Egyptians was probably used by the author of the homily (+ A.D. 150) known as 2 Clement. This is not beyond question (cf. Zahn; Haase, p. 3; and Batiffol's plea in his study of the Gospel in Vigouroux's Dictionnaire de la Bible, ii. 1625–1627), but the evidence points strongly in favour of such a hypothesis. Thus the saying quoted in Strom. iii. 13. 92 reappears in 2 Clem. xii. 2: 'When questioned by someone when His kingdom would come, the Lord said, "When the two shall be one, the outward as the inward, the male with the female, neither male nor female."' If this is so, it proves that the Gospel of the Egyptians had a high place, next to the four Gospels, since it is quoted alongside of them. The writer of 2 Clement gives quite an orthodox and moral interpretation of the saying which he cites, and this would again corroborate the impression that the Gospel of the Egyptians was not originally Encratitic, but only that some of its contents lent themselves to such views. It is possible but hazardous to infer that the three other uncanonical quotations in 2 Clement are also derived from the Egyptian Gospel, viz. iv. 5 ('The Lord said, "If you are gathered with me in my bosom, and do not my commands, I will cast you out and will say to you, Depart from me, I know not whence you are, you workers of iniquity"'), v. 2–4 ('The Lord said, "You shall be as lambs in the midst of wolves." And Peter answered and said to him, "Supposing the wolves tear the lambs?" Jesus said to Peter, "Let not the lambs fear the wolves after death; and as for you, fear not those who kill you and can do no more to you, but fear him who after death has power over soul and body, to cast them into the fiery gehenna."'), and viii. 5 ('The Lord said in the Gospel, "If you did not guard what is small, who shall give you what is great? For I tell you that he who is faithful in what is least is also faithful in what is much"'). The attempts to identify the Oxyrhynchite fragment (see below, p. 499), the Oxyrhynchite Logia, the Strassburg Coptic fragments (cf. p. 506), the Fayyûm fragment, or the Gospel of Peter, with this Gospel, have not succeeded in almost any case in establishing a proof which is beyond question, although the affinities with the (first series of) Oxyrhynchite Logia perhaps justify us in assigning the latter provisionally to this Egyptian scripture (cf. J. A. Robinson in Expositor, 5th ser., vi. [1897] 417 f.).

The use made of it by men like Julius Cassianus, a leader of the Docetic movement who was tinged with Encratitic tendencies, and Theodotus, the Egyptian Valentinian, together with its popularity among Christian circles like the Naassenes and the Sabellians,† may have contributed to the dis-

* In the context of a passage like Mt 722f. ? Practically the same Logion occurs among the scholia of the HG (cf. above, p. 492). Does this mean that the Clement quotations go back to NG, or that the scholia borrowed from 2 Clement, or that the Logion lay in both NG and EG? Cf. Schmidtke, p. 297 f.

† According to Hippolytus (Philos. v. 7), it was one of the writings exploited by the Gnostic Naassenes; according to Epiphanius (ix. 2), the Sabellians used it (τοῦ καλουμένου Αἰγυπτίου εὐαγγελίου) in support of their tenets. Both notices corroborate the Egyptian provenance of the Gospel. The Sabellians used it along with the OT and the NT.

favour into which it afterwards fell. Originally its position relative to the canonical Gospels may have resembled that of the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Like the latter and the Gospel of Peter, it circulated for a while without incurring any suspicions or hostility on the part of the authorities.

Unlike the Gospel of the Hebrews, it seems neither to have been a translation nor to have been translated. Kar' Atypprios does not mean, 'in Coptic'; the most probable explanation is that it denotes a Gospel meant for and used by the native Egyptian converts, just as Kaθ' Eβpaλovs meant a Gospel originally designed for the Jewish Christians of Palestine. It is possible that the Gospel of the Hebrews reached the Jewish Christians of Alexandria (Egypt), and that the Gospel of the Egyptians was so named in order to distinguish it from its contemporary; but this is no more than conjecture, although Atypprios is known to have meant 'provincial' as opposed to 'Alexandrian.' Zahn accounts for the title and circulation of the Gospel by supposing that already, as in later days, the provincial churches of Egypt did not invariably follow the Alexandrian Church, and that, while the latter adhered more closely to the canonical Gospels, the country churches favoured the native product.* This meets the requirements of the situation during the later part of the 2nd cent. as fairly as any other hypothesis, and may be accepted tentatively as satisfactory. But there is no reason to suppose that the Egyptian Gospel only followed in the wake of the four canonical Gospels. Unfortunately, our knowledge of the origins of Christianity in Egypt is extremely scanty until the middle of the 2nd century. There is, further, the lack of adequate information about the exact contents of the Gospel of the Egyptians. But if the latter could be used by the author of a non-Egyptian document like 2 Clement by the middle of the 2nd cent., the Egyptian Gospel may have been current c. A.D. 125, if not earlier.

Schneckenburger, Ueber das Evangelium der Aegypter, Bern, 1834 (edition of the Gospel of the Hebrews, in the interests of an Egyptian Ebionite sect); Hilgenfeld, Ketzergesch. des Urchristenthums, Leipzig, 1884, p. 546 f.; D. Völter, Petrusevangelium oder Aegypterevangelium? Tübingen, 1893 (cf. ZNTW, 1905, pp. 368-372); O. Pfeiderer, Prim. Christianity, iii., London, 1910, pp. 225-228. It is possible (cf. Baumstark in ZNTW, 1913, pp. 232-247) that traces of the use of the Gospel of the Egyptians are to be found in the Ethiopic 'Testament of our Lord and Redeemer Jesus Christ,' recently edited by L. Guerrier and S. Grébaud in Patrologia Orientalis, ix. 3 [1913]; and an attempt has been made (by F. P. Badham and F. C. Conybeare, HJ xi. [1912-13] 805 f.) to show that, like the 'Ascensio Isaia,' it was read by the Cathars of Albi.

(d) The Gospel of Peter.—The Gospel of Peter was used, either for private reading or in public worship, by the Church at Rhossus on the coast of Syria, not far from Antioch, in the last quarter of the 2nd cent. Its use appears to have occasioned some doubt and dispute, however. Serapion, the bishop of Antioch (A.D. 190-203), who seems to have been either a casual or a tolerant person, at first declined to take any steps in the matter; he sanctioned the use of the Gospel, without troubling to examine it carefully. Subsequently, he borrowed a copy from some Docetic Christians, and discovered that 'although most of it belonged to the right teaching of the Saviour, some things were additions.' By the time Eusebius (HE vi. 12) wrote, it was definitely branded as illegitimate.† It is doubtful whether Eusebius knew it at first-hand, and the later allusions to it are probably borrowed from him. At the same time, it has to be remembered that the Gospel of Peter was not obliterated by the episcopal censure of Serapion. Its circulation was never wide, but it was tenacious. The Syriac Didascalia (cf. TU, new ser., x. 2 [1904], p. 324 f.) in the 3rd cent. and Syriac Jewish Christians as late as the 5th witness to its existence and popularity (cf. Theod. Hær. fabul. ii. 2)* in Syriac; and the discovery of the Akhmim fragment attests its circulation in Egypt. Still later traces are detected by Usener (ZNTW, 1902, p. 353 f.), Stocks (ZKG, 1913, p. 3), and Leipoldt (Geschichte des neutest. Kanons, i. 177 f.).

About A.D. 246 Origen, in his Commentary on Matthew (x. 17) observes that 'The citizens of Nazareth (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>) supposed Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary; as for the brothers of Jesus, some say they were sons of Joseph by a former wife who had lived with him before Mary, on the ground of a tradition in the Gospel entitled κατὰ Πέτρον or the book of James.' This tradition, we now know, existed in the primitive source of the Protevangelium Jacobi (cf. p. 484). But it does not follow that it did not also exist in the Gospel of Peter. If so, that Gospel belongs to our second class; and one consideration in favour of this is the extreme unlikelihood of Peter's name being specially attached to a Gospel which did not cover the ministry of Jesus. Till the winter of 1886-1887 this solitary reference was all that was known of the Gospel; but the discovery of an 8th cent. manuscript of fragments of Peter's Gospel, Peter's Apocalypse, and Enoch in Greek, at Akhmim in Upper Egypt, revealed more of the characteristics of this Gospel. Unluckily, the fragment begins and ends abruptly. It opens with the end of the trial; Pilate has washed his hands, but none of the other judges (including Herod) does so. Herod takes the leading part in what follows,† the aim of the author being to exculpate the Romans and emphasize the responsibility and guilt of the Jews. In the story of the Crucifixion one of the malefactors reproaches not his fellow-criminal but the Jewish by-standers, who retaliate by leaving his legs unbroken in order to prolong his agony. It is at this point that the Docetic and semi-Gnostic tendencies of the writer begin to show themselves. On the Cross the Lord 'was silent, as having no pain'; his last cry is, 'My Power, my Power, hast thou forsaken me?' When His dead body is lowered to the ground, there is an earthquake. The Jewish mob and their authorities then‡ repent, crying, 'Alas for our sins! the judgment, the end of Jerusalem, is nigh!' At this point the author§ brings Peter on the scene. 'I and my companions grieved, and, struck to the heart, we hid ourselves, for we were being sought for by them [i.e. the Jews] as malefactors and as intending to set fire to the temple.' Meantime Pilate has the tomb guarded, at the request of the Jews. The author then ventures to describe the Resurrection.|| 'There was a loud

* But Theodoret's evidence is not above suspicion. How could 'Nazarene' Jewish Christians make so anti-Jewish a book their favourite Gospel? Theodoret's reference, like several other references of the same kind, may be to a different volume from our 'Peter.'

† But it is difficult to understand why the writer did not draw material for his anti-Jewish representation from the vain appeals of Pilate to the Jews, or from their deliberate preference of Barabbas to Jesus. Perhaps these were noted in sections which have not been preserved.

‡ This is inconsequent; but here as elsewhere the fragment does not seem to have preserved the true order of the text. Or, possibly, it has omitted connecting material.

§ This Gospel, like the Protevangelium Jacobi and the Gospel of the Twelve, is definitely pseudonymous.

|| On the connexion between what follows and the Jewish doctrine of the heavenly Adam, see Stocks' essay in NKZ, 1902, p. 302 f., ib. 1903, p. 523 f. The Cross probably symbolizes the soul of Jesus (see, further, p. 500).

* The author is unknown, and no name was ever connected with it—which is one mark of early origin, at any rate of an origin apart from any special sect or tendency.

† The harsh censure of Eusebius (HE iii. 8) is repeated by Jerome (de Vir. illustr. 1).

voice in heaven, and they [i.e. the sentries] saw heaven opened and two men descending thence, with a great light, and approaching the tomb. The boulder at the opening moves of its own accord, the two figures enter, and the astonished soldiers (including the centurion and the elders) 'see three men coming out of the tomb, two supporting the third, and a Cross following them; the heads of the two reached as far as heaven, but the head of the One whom they escorted was higher than the heavens. And they heard a voice from the heavens saying, "Hast thou preached to them that sleep?" And from the Cross the answer came, "Yes." The next vision is that of a man descending from heaven and entering the sepulchre. The party of soldiers and Jews then retreat, and agree to say nothing about what they have seen. The following paragraph describes how Mary Magdalene took her friends on the morning of Sunday to wait at the tomb. They find a comely youth inside [= the man who had entered?]; he tells them that the Lord has risen to heaven [there is no Ascension], and they fly in terror. The fragment then breaks off abruptly: 'Now it was the last day of Unleavened Bread, and many went away home, since the feast was over; but we, the twelve disciples of the Lord, wept and grieved. Each left for home, grieved at what had occurred; but I, Simon Peter, and Andrew my brother, took our nets and went to the sea, and with us were Levi the son of Alphæus, whom the Lord . . .'

According to 'Peter,' there are no Resurrection appearances to the women or to the disciples in Jerusalem. The fragment breaks off on the edge of what seems to be an account of some appearance at the Sea of Galilee to Peter, Andrew, Levi (and some others?). This would tally with the appearance preserved in the appendix to 'John,' only, in 'Peter' it would be an appearance of the Ascended Christ, for the word of the young man (angel) to the woman at the tomb is, 'he has risen and gone away to where he was sent from' (ἀπεσταλῆν, i.e. from heaven, as in Lk 4<sup>48</sup>, where Mark's ἐξήλθεν, i.e. from Capernaum, is changed into ἀπεσταλῆν, i.e. from heaven). A further idiosyncrasy is the apparent length of interval between the Resurrection and the flight of the disciples from Jerusalem to Galilee. Did the writer really mean that a week elapsed? Or is his description due to chronological inaccuracy?

Whether the terminus ad quem for the composition of the Gospel can be carried back earlier than the last quarter of the 2nd cent. depends upon the view taken of its relation to Justin Martyr. It had been already conjectured by Credner and others that the Gospel of Peter might be one of the apostolic memoirs used by Justin, and this conjecture seems corroborated by the Akhmîm fragment, which apparently supplies the basis for the references in Apol. i. 35 (the seating of Jesus on the βῆμα), i. 40 ('The Spirit of prophecy foretold . . . the conspiracy formed against Christ by Herod, the king of the Jews, and the Jews themselves, and Pilate . . . with his soldiers'), and possibly i. 50, as well as in Dial. 103 (where Herod is termed 'a king'), Dial. 97 (λαχμὸν βάλλοντες—the phrase in 'Peter'), and Dial. 108. Upon the whole, this dependence of Justin upon the Gospel of Peter seems preferable (so, e.g., Harnack, von Soden, Lods) to the alternative hypothesis of von Schubert and Stanton (Gospels as Hist. Documents, i. [1903] 93 f., 103 f.) that the coincidences between the two are due to the use of a common source, viz. the Acts of Pilate, an official report of the trial of Jesus purporting to have been drawn up by the procurator and perhaps underlying the references in the later Acta Pilati and in Tertullian.

This fixes the date of the Gospel's composition

approximately within the first quarter of the second century. The terminus a quo depends upon the view taken of its dependence on the canonical Gospels. Those who find in it traces of all four—as if the writer knew them and employed them indifferently, quoting perhaps from memory, to suit his own dogmatic ends—naturally place the Gospel c. A.D. 125 as a very early attempt to employ the canonical traditions in the interests of a Gnostic propaganda. The dependence on Mark and even Matthew is, we think, to be granted. The coincidences between 'Peter' and Luke and John (cf. Lods, op. cit. 18 f.) are not quite so clear.* There is room still for the hypothesis that 'Peter' represents a popular, early type of the inferior narratives which Luke desired to supersede. At several points 'Peter' marks the same line of development which recurs in Luke and John, and as a composition from Syrian Antioch, with which the traditions of Luke and John are independently connected, it may even be conjectured to have arisen within the 1st century. To a modern reader, a comparison of its text with those of Luke and John seems at first sight to put its dependence on them beyond doubt. But doubts recur as soon as we recollect that the specific traditions which for us exist primarily in Luke and John were already in existence, at least orally, and that touches which are extant in literature in these canonical Gospels for the first time must have been current decades earlier. Take, for example, a piece of evidence like that of the 'garden' of Joseph. 'Peter' mentions this. The Fourth Gospel also does. Therefore, it is assumed, 'Peter' used the Fourth Gospel. Why? It is surely illogical for those who believe that this formed part of the authentic tradition to assume that the only access to it was through the text of a Gospel at the very end of the 1st century. And even apart from this, such a tradition may have been easily known orally decades before it was committed to writing.† The evidence generally alleged for the dependence of 'Peter' upon Luke and John must be sifted in the light of this consideration, and also with a desire to avoid the mistake of supposing that inferior traditions are invariably later, chronologically, than the written forms of what is more authentic. 'Peter,' like the Gospel of the Hebrews, is in danger of being read in the light of an uncritical assumption that the 1st cent. A.D. saw nothing but the circulation of good traditions about the life of Jesus, that the canonical Gospels swept up all of these into their pages, and that the uncanonical Gospels represent invariably the later, fantastic efforts of a generation which had to make up by the exercise of its imagination for the lack of sound materials.

The traces of Gnostic speculation confirm the hypothesis of a date early in the 2nd cent. if not within the 1st. They are too incipient and naïve to be described as related to the system of Valentinus; neither the personification of the Cross nor the allusion to Christ's Divine Power is much more than the popular setting of ideas which form the basis for the doctrines attacked in the First Epistle of John and in Ignatius. 'Peter' is not the attempt of a Gnostic theorist to work over the canonical texts in the interests of Docetism or Valentinianism.

As soon as the Akhmîm fragment was published,

* 'Peter,' e.g., introduces Herod among the judges of Jesus. So far he agrees with the tradition followed by Luke, but then he calls Herod 'the king,' whereas Luke corrects this (97) Marcan term (64) at an earlier stage, and never uses it in the Passion narrative.

† Even apart from the possibility of common written sources, the factor of oral tradition must be estimated if we are not here, as in the Synoptic problem, to be misled by the juxtaposition of printed texts with hypotheses which are ultra-literary and artificial.

it was conjectured by some critics that the Akhmim fragment of the Apocalypse of Peter might also be a part, or an elaboration of part, of the Gospel. The Apocalypse contains a vision of two righteous saints in heaven granted to the twelve on 'the mountain,' with a special revelation, granted to Peter alone, of hell. A similar problem emerges (cf. p. 504) in connexion with the so-called 'Gospel of Bartholomew.' The dividing line between Apocalypses and Gospels of our third class is naturally wavering, and if on other grounds it could be established that the Gospel of Peter was originally a Gospel of the Death and Resurrection, there would be less improbability about the conjecture that the Petrine Apocalypse and the Petrine Gospel were either the same work, to begin with, or organically related.

Repeated attempts have been made to connect this Gospel with material extant in other quarters. Völter (cf. p. 496) actually identifies it with the Gospel of the Egyptians; Harnack suggests that the Pericope Adulteræ originally belonged to it; and H. Stocks (ZKG, 1913, pp. 1-57) argues that lost fragments of it are embedded in Asc. Is. xi. 2-22, iii. 13<sup>b</sup>-iv. 18 (the latter passage describes, inter alia, how the Beloved appeared on the third day sitting on the shoulders of Gabriel and Michael, who had opened the tomb).

The remarkable phrase about Jesus feeling no pain (ὡς μὴδὲν πόνον ἔχων) on the Cross ought perhaps to be taken in the light of the description of the heroic Blandina amid her tortures (μηδὲ αἰσθησιν ἐν τῶν συμβαινόντων ἔχουσα διὰ τὴν ἐλπίδα κτλ., Eus. HE v. 1. 56).
