

CLASSIC REPRINT SERIES

DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

Vol. 2

by James Hastings

Forgotten Books

DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

Vol. 2

by

James Hastings

Published by Forgotten Books 2013

Originally published 1918

PIBN 1000250481

www.ForgottenBooks.org

Copyright © 2013 Forgotten Books

eBook Terms & Conditions

www.forgottenbooks.org

1. This eBook* may be

- a. Copied for personal and educational use.
- b. Printed for personal and educational use.

2. This eBook* may NOT be

- a. Distributed in any form.
- b Sold individually or as part of a package.
- c. Modified in any way.
- d. Reversed-engineered.

This eBook* and all its content including images are Copyright © 2014 FB &c Ltd - All rights reserved.
Forgotten Books is a registered trademark of FB &c Ltd.

FB &c Ltd, Dalton House, 60 Windsor Avenue, London SW19 2RR Company number 08720141. Registered in England and Wales.

*eBook' refers to this PDF and any of its content including pages and images in either electronic or printed form.

The paperback edition of this book can be purchased from amazon.com

amazon.co.uk

amazon.de

amazon.fr

amazon.es

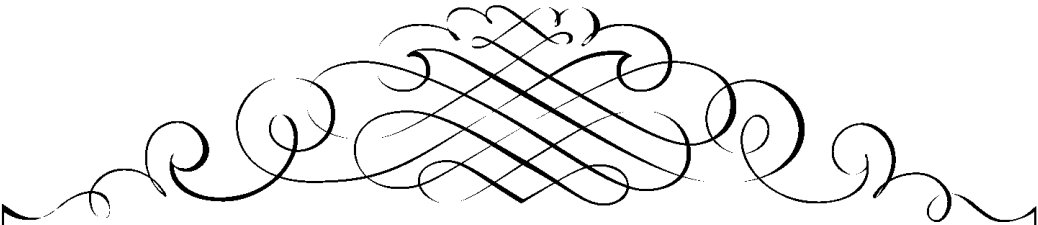

amazon.it

Over 1,000,000 eBooks are available to read at

Forgotten Books

www.forgottenbooks.org

484,473 eBooks
are available to read at

Forgotten Books

www.ForgottenBooks.org

Alchemy

“In changing the base metals into gold and silver by the projection of the Stone, it follows (by an accelerated process) the method of nature, and therefore is natural.”

The New Pearl of Great Price, by Peter Bonus, 1338 AD

www.ForgottenBooks.org/Alchemy

Free App Download

Available on the App Store

Windows Store

ANDROID APP ON

Google™ play

Enjoy

484,473 Books

wherever you go

www.ForgottenBooks.org/apps

Dictionary of the Apostolic Church

WORKS EDITED
BY JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS
DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. (Five Vols.)

THE ONE-VOLUME BIBLE DICTIONARY
DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS
DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

'THE SCHOLAR AS PREACHER' SERIES

THE GREAT CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES

THE GREAT TEXTS OF THE BIBLE

THE GREATER MEN AND WOMEN OF THE BIBLE

THE EXPOSITORY TIMES

Full particulars on application to the Publishers

EDINBURGH: T. & T. CLARK, 38 GEORGE STREET
LONDON: AT STATIONERS' HALL

487

Dictionary of the Apostolic Church

EDITED BY
JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
JOHN A. SELBIE, D.D.

AND
JOHN C. LAMBERT, D.D.

VOLUME II
MACEDONIA—ZION WITH INDEXES

151282
9-7-19

EDINBURGH: T. & T. CLARK, 38 GEORGE STREET
NEW YORK: CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, FIFTH AVENUE, AT 48TH STREET
1918

TO MY WIFE

[The Rights of Translation and of Reproduction are Reserved.]

AUTHORS OF ARTICLES IN THIS VOLUME

- ADAM (D. S.), M.A., B.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology and Church History in Ormond College, Melbourne, Australia.
Union with God.
- AGATE (LEONARD DENDY), B.A. (Cantab.), M.A. (Manchester).
Curate of Warton, Lancashire; author of Luther and the Reformation.
Metaphor.
- ALLWORTHY (THOMAS BATESON), M.A. (Camb.), B.D. (Dublin).
Director of Religious Education in the Diocese of Ely; Founder and First Warden of S. Anselm's Hostel, Manchester.
Narcissus, Phœbe, Quartus, Rufus, Sosipater, Tertius, and other articles.
- BANKS (JOHN S.), D.D.
Late Professor of Theology in the Wesleyan Methodist College, Headingley, Leeds; author of A Manual of Christian Doctrine.
Nazarene, Way (The).
- BATIFFOL (PIERRE), Litt.D.
Chanoine de Notre-Dame de Paris et prélat de la Maison du Pape, Paris; éditeur de Tractatus Origenis de libris scripturarum (1900), Les Odes de Salomon (1911); auteur de L'Eglise naissante et le Catholicisme (1908), La Paix constantinienne et le Catholicisme (1914).
Polycarp.
- BECKWITH (CLARENCE AUGUSTINE), A.B., A.M., S.T.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology in Chicago Theological Seminary; author of Realities of Christian Theology; departmental editor of the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge.
Palsy, Physician, Plague, Poison, Sickness, Tree of Life.
- BERNARD (JOHN HENRY), D.D. (Dublin), Hon. D.D. (Aberd.), Hon. D.C.L. (Durham).
Archbishop of Dublin; sometime Archbishop King's Professor of Divinity, Dublin, and Dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral; afterwards Bishop of Ossory.
Spirits in Prison.
- BOYD (WILLIAM FALCONER), M.A., B.D. (Aberd.), D.Phil. (Tübingen).
Minister of the United Free Church of Scotland at Melrose.
Mary, Matthew, Scythian, Synzygus, Tribes, Tyrannus, and other articles.
- BUCHANAN (JAMES ROBERTSON), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the United Free Church at Culross; Examiner in Hebrew to the United Free Church of Scotland.
New Jerusalem.
- BULCOCK (HARRY), B.A., B.D.
Minister of the Congregational Church at Droylsden, Manchester.
Mourning, Murmuring, Simplicity, Virtue, Woe.
- BURN (ANDREW E.), D.D.
Vicar of Halifax and Prebendary of Lichfield; author of An Introduction to the Creeds (1899), Niceta of Remesiana (1905), The Apostles' Creed (1906), The Nicene Creed (1909), The Athanasian Creed (1912).
Praise, Prayer, Psalms, Spiritual Songs, Thanksgiving, Worship.
- CARLYLE (ALEXANDER JAMES), M.A., D.Litt., F.R. Hist. Soc.
Lecturer in Economics and Politics at University College, Oxford.
Poor, Wealth.
- CASE (SHIRLEY JACKSON), M.A., B.D., Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament Interpretation in the University of Chicago; author of The Historicity of Jesus, The Evolution of Early Christianity; managing editor of The American Journal of Theology.
Peter, Peter (Epistles of), Seed, Theudas, Tribute.
- CLARK (P. A. GORDON).
Minister of the United Free Church at Perth.
Name, Possession, Python, Soothsaying, Sorcery, Surname.
- CLEMENS (JOHN SAMUEL), B.A., B.D., Hon. D.D. (St. And.).
Governor of the United Methodist College, Ranmoor, Sheffield.
New Moon, Passover, Pentecost, Right, Sabbath, Slave, Unrighteousness.

- COBB (WILLIAM FREDERICK), D.D.
Rector of the Church of St. Ethelburga the Virgin, London; author of Mysticism and the Creed (1914).
Mnason, Nicolaitans, Phygelus, Sodom and Gomorrah.
- COOKE (ARTHUR WILLIAM), M.A.
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Oxtou, Birkenhead; author of Palestine in Geography and in History, The Land of Israel and of Christ.
Medes, Mesopotamia, Parthians.
- COWAN (HENRY), M.A. (Edin.), D.D. (Aberd.), D.Th. (Gen.), D.C.L. (Dunelm).
Professor of Church History in the University of Aberdeen; Senior Preacher of the University Chapel; author of The Influence of the Scottish Church in Christendom, John Knox, Landmarks of Church History.
Onesimus, Philemon, Philemon (Epistle to).
- CRUICKSHANK (WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Kinneff, Bervie; author of The Bible in the Light of Antiquity.
Mantle, Penny, Shoe, Street, Talent, Tent, Thigh, Wall.
- DAVIES (ARTHUR LLYWELYN), M.A.
Warden of Ruthin, North Wales; formerly Simeon Research Student, Queen's College, Oxford.
Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.
- DIMONT (CHARLES TUNNACLIFF), B.D. (Oxon.).
Principal of Salisbury Theological College; Prebendary of Salisbury; Chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury.
Martyr, Witness, Work.
- VON DOBSCHÜTZ (ERNST), D.Theol.
Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the University of Breslau.
Philo of Alexandria.
- DONALD (JAMES), M.A., D.D. (Aberd.).
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Keith-hall and Kinkell, Aberdeenshire.
Nation, People, Proselyte, Stranger.
- DOW (JOHN), M.A. (St. And.).
Minister of the United Free Church at Montrose.
Mark (John).
- DUNCAN (JAMES WALKER), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Lassodie, Dunfermline.
Midian, Pharaoh, Red Sea, Shechem, Sinai, Zion.
- DUNDAS (WILLIAM HARLOE), B.D.
Rector of Magheragall, near Lisburn.
Power, Principality, Throne.
- EMMET (CYRIL W.), M.A.
Vicar of West Hendred, Berks; author of The Eschatological Problem in the Gospels, and of articles in Faith and the War and Immortality.
Romans (Epistle to the).
- FALCONER (ROBERT ALEXANDER), M.A., LL.D., D.Litt., C.M.G.
President of the University of Toronto.
Timothy, Timothy and Titus (Epistles to), Titus.
- FAULKNER (JOHN ALFRED), B.D., M.A., D.D.
Professor of Church History in Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N.J.
Salutations.
- FELTOE (CHARLES LETT), D.D.
Rector of Ripple, near Dover; sometime Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge; author of Sacramentarium Leonianum, The Letters and other Remains of Dionysius of Alexandria.
Matthias, Place (His Own), Steward.
- FLETCHER (M. SCOTT), M.A. (Sydney), B.Litt. (Oxon.), B.D. (Melbourne).
Principal of Wesley College, University of Sydney, New South Wales, Australia.
Preaching, Reading, Shadow, Substance, Teaching.
- FRANKS (ROBERT SLEIGHTHOLME), M.A., B.Litt.
Principal of the Western College, Bristol; author of The New Testament Doctrines of Man, Sin, and Salvation (1908).
Mercy, Obedience, Patience, Ungodliness.
[Principal Franks is the author of Beloved, Godliness, Hope, Humility in vol. i. His name was accidentally omitted from the list of authors in that volume.]
- FREW (DAVID), D.D.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Urr.
Pilate (Pontius), Silas or Silvanus.
- GARVIE (ALFRED ERNEST), M.A. (Oxford), D.D. (Glas.).
Principal of New College, London; author of The Ritschlian Theology, Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus, and other works.
Sin.
- GORDON (ALEXANDER REID), D.Litt., D.D.
Professor of Hebrew in McGill University, and of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis in the Presbyterian College, Montreal; author of The Early Traditions of Genesis, The Poets of the Old Testament.
Old Testament, Quotations, Scripture, Tradition, Trial-at-Law.
- GRANT (WILLIAM MILNE), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Drumoak, Aberdeenshire; author of The Religion and Life of the Patriarchal Age, The Founders of Israel, The Judges and Kings of United Israel.
Pillar, Tattlers, Wisdom.
- GRAY (GEORGE BUCHANAN), D.Litt., D.D.
Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis in Mansfield College; Speaker's Lecturer in Biblical Studies in the University of Oxford.
Psalms of Solomon.
- GRIEVE (ALEXANDER JAMES), M.A., D.D.
Principal and Professor of Systematic Theology in the Scottish Congregational Theological Hall, Edinburgh.
Presence.
- GROTON (WILLIAM MANSFIELD), S.T.D.
Professor of Systematic Divinity, and Dean of the Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.
Mystery.

HANDCOCK (P. S. P.), M.A.

Member of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law; Lecturer of the Palestine Exploration Fund; formerly of the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities in the British Museum; author of Mesopotamian Archaeology, Latest Light on Bible Lands.

Olive, Palm, Scorpion, Serpent, Vine, Wheat, and other articles.

HOOKE (SAMUEL HENRY), M.A. (Oxon.), B.D. (Lond.).

Professor of Oriental Languages and Literature in Victoria College, Toronto.

Paradise, Parousia, Resurrection, Sea of Glass.

JAMES (JOHN GEORGE), D.Lit., M.A.

Author of Problems of Personality, Problems of Prayer, The Coming Age of Faith, The Prayer-Life.

Offence, Rapture, Sleep, Trance, Vision.

JORDAN (HERMANN), Ph.D.

Professor der Kirchengeschichte und Patristik an der Universität Erlangen.

Writing.

KIRKPATRICK (ROGER SANDILANDS), B.D.

Minister of the Church of Scotland at Yarrow. Sacraments.

KOHLER (KAUFMANN), Ph.D.

President of Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Proseuche, Sanhedrin, Shepherd, Synagogue.

LAKE (KIRSOPP), M.A. (Oxford), D.D. (St. And.).

Professor of Early Christian Literature in Harvard University.

Theophilus.

LAMBERT (JOHN C.), M.A., D.D.

Late of Fenwick, Kilmarnock; author of The Sacraments in the New Testament.

Man of Sin, Michael, Mind, Pattern, Restitution, Soul, Spirit, Type, Uncorruptness.

LAW (ROBERT), D.D. (Edin.).

Professor of New Testament Literature in Knox College, Toronto; author of The Tests of Life: A Study of the First Epistle of St. John, The Emotions of Jesus, The Grand Adventure.

Majesty, Mortify, Pre-existence of Christ, Triumph, Unity, World, Worldliness.

LEWIS (THOMAS), M.A. (Lond.), B.D. (St. And.).

Principal of the Memorial College, Brecon, Wales; Member of the Theological Senate, and of the Theological Board, of the University of Wales.

Persecution.

LIGHTLEY (JOHN WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.

Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature and Philosophy in the Wesleyan College, Headingley, Leeds.

Philosophy, Science, Stoics.

LOFTHOUSE (WILLIAM F.), M.A.

Professor of Philosophy and Old Testament Language and Literature in the Wesleyan College, Handsworth, Birmingham; author of Ethics and Atonement, Ethics and the Family.

Repentance, Will.

MACKENZIE (DONALD), M.A.

Minister of the United Free Church at Tain; Assistant Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Aberdeen, 1906-1909.

Philippians (Epistle to the), Self-Denial, Sobriety, Temperance, Virgin, Widows.

MACLEAN (ARTHUR JOHN), D.D. (Camb.), Hon. D.D. (Glas.).

Bishop of Moray, Ross, and Caithness; author of Dictionary and Grammar of Vernacular Syriac; editor of East Syrian Liturgies.

Marriage, Miracles, Only-Begotten, Ordination, Passion, Roman Law in the New Testament, Sign, Transfiguration, Translation.

MAIN (ARCHIBALD), M.A. (Glas.), B.A. (Oxon.), D.Litt. (Glas.).

Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of St. Andrews.

Minstrel, Pipe, Trump.

MALDEN (R. H.), M.A.

Principal of the Clergy School, Leeds.

Oracle, Ordinance, Utterance, Vow, Word.

MARGOLIOUTH (DAVID SAMUEL), M.A., D.Litt., F.B.A.

Fellow of New College, and Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford; author of Mohammed and the Rise of Islam, Mohammedanism, The Early Development of Mohammedanism.

Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon.

MARSH (FRED. SHIPLEY), M.A.

Sub-Warden of King's College Theological Hostel, and Lecturer in Theology, King's College, London; formerly Tyrwhitt and Crosse Scholar in the University of Cambridge.

Thessalonians (Epistles to the).

MARTIN (A. STUART), M.A., B.D.

Formerly Pitt Scholar and Examiner in Divinity in Edinburgh University, and Minister of the Church of Scotland at Aberdeen; author of The Books of the New Testament.

Perseverance.

MINGANA (ALPHONSE), Ph.D.

Semitic Paleographer in the John Rylands Library; Lecturer in Arabic to the University of Manchester.

Odes of Solomon.

MOE (OLAF EDVARD), Dr. Theol.

Professor of Theology in the Church Theological Faculty of Christiania.

Moses.

MOFFATT (JAMES), D.Litt., Hon. D.D. (St. And.), Hon. M.A. (Oxford).

Professor of Church History in the United Free Church College, Glasgow; author of The Historical New Testament, and other works.

Righteousness, Sibylline Oracles, War.

MONTGOMERY (W. S.), B.D.

Minister of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland at Ballacolla, Queen's County.

Prison, Punishment, Rod, Scourging Stocks, Stoning, Thongs.

- MOSS (RICHARD WADDY), D.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology in Didsbury College, Manchester.
Melchizedek, Priest.
- MOULTON (WILFRID J.), M.A., B.D. (Cantab.)
Professor of Systematic Theology in the Wesleyan College, Headingley, Leeds; author of The Witness of Israel.
Will.
- MUIRHEAD (LEWIS A.), D.D.
Minister of the United Free Church at Broughty-Ferry; author of The Times of Christ, The Terms Life and Death in the Old and New Testaments, The Eschatology of Jesus.
Numbers.
- NICOL (THOMAS), D.D.
Late Professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberdeen; Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, 1914.
Predestination, Rejection, Reprobate, Schoolmaster, Tutor.
- NIVEN (WILLIAM DICKIE), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Blairgowrie; formerly co-examiner in Mental Philosophy in the University of Aberdeen.
Nazirite, Pharisees, Sadducees, Scribe.
- PATRICK (JAMES), B.D., B.Sc.
Minister of the United Free Church at Edinburgh; formerly Examiner in Divinity to the University of St. Andrews.
Oil, Ointment.
- PLATT (FREDERIC), M.A., D.D.
Professor of Systematic and Pastoral Theology in the Wesleyan College, Handsworth, Birmingham; author of Miracles: An Outline of the Christian View, Immanence and Christian Thought.
Propitiation, Ransom, Reconciliation, Sacrifice.
- PLUMMER (ALFRED), M.A., D.D.
Late Master of University College, Durham; formerly Fellow and Senior Tutor of Trinity College, Oxford; author of 'The Gospel according to S. Luke' in The International Critical Commentary, and other works.
Minister, Ministration, Pastor, Teacher.
- POPE (R. MARTIN), M.A. (Cantab. and Manchester)
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Keswick; author of Expository Notes on St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy and Titus, and other works.
Meekness, Pride, Prophecy, Self-examination, Tongues (Gift of), Vanity, Vengeance, Voice, Waiting, Watching.
- REID (JOHN), M.A.
Late Minister of the United Free Church at Inverness; author of Jesus and Nicodemus, The First Things of Jesus, The Uplifting of Life; editor of Effectual Words.
Novice, Preparation, Profession, Promise, Young Men, and other articles.
- ROBERTS (JOHN EDWARD), M.A. (Lond.), B.D. (St. And.)
Minister of the Baptist Church at Manchester; author of Christian Baptism, Private Prayers and Devotions, The Lord's Prayer.
Sergius Paulus, Simon Magus, Sosthenes, Stephanus, Titus Justus, Zenas.
- ROBERTSON (ARCHIBALD THOMAS), M.A., D.D., LL.D.
Professor of Interpretation of the New Testament in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.; author of A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research, and other works.
Master, Mediation, Perdition, Security, Treasure.
- ROBINSON (GEORGE L.), Ph.D., D.D., LL.D.
Professor of Biblical Literature and English Bible in McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago.
Mount, River, Rock, Sea, Sepulchre, Ship, Supper, Wing.
- ROBINSON (HENRY WHEELER), M.A. (Oxon. and Edin.)
Professor of Church History and of the Philosophy of Religion in the Baptist College, Rawdon; sometime Senior Kennicott Scholar in the University of Oxford; author of 'Hebrew Psychology in Relation to Pauline Anthropology' in Mansfield College Essays, The Christian Doctrine of Man, The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament.
Man, Mouth, Tongue, Woman.
- VON SCHLATTER (ADOLF)
Professor of New Testament Introduction and Exegesis in the University of Tübingen.
Paraclete.
- SHAW (JOHN MACKINTOSH), M.A.
Professor of Apologetics and Church History in the Presbyterian College, Halifax, N.S.
Resurrection of Christ.
- SIDNELL (HENRY CARISS JONES), B.A., B.D. (Lond.)
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Halifax.
Marks, Reproof, Restoration of Offenders.
- SLATER (JOHN WHITE), B.D.
Minister of the United Free Church at Scone.
Prize.
- SMITH (SHERWIN), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at York.
Pollution, Profane, Purification, Strangled.
- SOARES (THEODORE GERALD), Ph.D., D.D.
Professor of Homiletics and Religious Education, and Head of the Department of Practical Theology in the University of Chicago, Ill.
Regeneration.
- SOUTER (ALEXANDER), M.A., D.Litt.
Regius Professor of Humanity and Lecturer in Mediæval Palæography in the University of Aberdeen; formerly Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis in Mansfield College, Oxford; author of A Study of Ambrosiaster, The Text and Canon of the New Testament, A Pocket Lexicon to the Greek New Testament.
Nero, Province, Roads and Travel, Roman Empire, Rome, Trade and Commerce, Vespasian, and other articles.

SPOONER (WILLIAM ARCHIBALD), D.D.
Warden of New College, Oxford; Hon. Canon of Christ Church, Oxford; Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Peterborough.

Manæan, Nicolas, Philip the Evangelist, Stephen, and other articles.

STALKER (JAMES), M.A., D.D.
Professor of Church History in the United Free Church College, Aberdeen; author of The Life of Jesus Christ, The Life of St. Paul, Imago Christi, The Preacher and his Models.

Paul.

STEVENSON (MORLEY), M.A.
Principal of Warrington Training College; Hon. Canon of Liverpool; author of Handbook to the Gospel according to St. Luke, The Spiritual Teaching of 'In Memoriam'; joint-editor of The Prayer-Book Dictionary.

Moon, Schism, Star, Sun, Vessel, Wandering Stars.

STEWART (GEORGE WAUCHOPE), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Haddington (First Charge); author of Music in the Church.

Officer, Potentate, Prince, Queen, Sabbath, Tetrarch.

STONE (DARWELL), D.D.
Principal of Pusey House, Oxford.
Salvation.

STRACHAN (ROBERT HARVEY), M.A. (Aberd.), B.A. (Cantab.).
Minister of the Presbyterian Church at Cambridge.
Saint, Sanctification.

STRAHAN (JAMES), M.A., D.D.
Professor of Hebrew and Biblical Criticism in the Magee Presbyterian College, Londonderry; Cunningham Lecturer; author of Hebrew Ideals, The Book of Job, Life of Andrew Bruce Davidson.

Macedonia, Melita, Nazareth, Pergamus, Samaria, Temple, and other articles.

STRONG (ROBERT), M.A., B.Litt.
Minister of the United Methodist Church, London.

Man-Stealers, Murder, Robbers of Churches, Robbery, Stealing.

TASKER (JOHN G.), D.D.
Principal and Professor of Church History and Apologetics in the Wesleyan College, Handsworth, Birmingham.

Mysticism, Natural, Nature, Perfect, Religion.

TOD (DAVID MACRAE), M.A., B.D. (Edin.).
Minister of the Presbyterian Church of England at Huddersfield; formerly Hebrew Tutor and Cunningham Fellow, New College, Edinburgh.
Truth, Unbelief.

VOS (GEERHARDUS), Ph.D., D.D.
Charles Haley Professor of Biblical Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, N.J.
Peace, Pity, Wicked.

WADDY (P. STACY), M.A. (Oxford and Sydney).
Headmaster of the King's School, Parramatta, Australia; Fellow of St. Paul's College, University of Sydney.
Zeal.

WALKER (DAWSON), M.A., D.D.
Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the University of Durham; Principal of St. John's Hall, Durham.

Reformation, Remnant, Reproach, Reputation, Respect of Persons, Rest, Reward, Token.

WARFIELD (BENJAMIN BRECKINRIDGE), D.D., LL.D., Litt.D.
Charles Hodge Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, New Jersey.

Redemption.

WATKINS (CHARLES H.), D.Th.
Minister of the Baptist Church at Liverpool; Lecturer in the Midland Baptist College and University College, Nottingham; author of St. Paul's Fight for Galatia.
Neighbour, Oath.

WATSON (WILLIAM), B.D., D.Litt.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Oyne; Examiner in Biblical Criticism and Hebrew in the University of St. Andrews; Assistant to the Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Languages in the University of St. Andrews, 1907-1909.

Suffering, Temptation, Torment, Tribulation.

WILLIS (JOHN ROTHWELL), B.D.
Canon of St. Aidans, Ferns, and Rector of Preban and Moyne, Co. Wicklow.
Son of Man, Tithes.

WORSLEY (FREDERICK WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.
Sub-Warden of St. Michael's College, Llandaff; author of The Apocalypse of Jesus.

Market-Place, Mercury, Moloch, Rephan, Superstitious, Unknown God.

ZENOS (ANDREW C.), D.D., LL.D.
Professor of Historical Theology in the McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago.
Time.

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

I. GENERAL

App. = Appendix.
 Arab. = Arabic.
 art., artt. = article, articles.
 A.S. = Anglo-Saxon.
 Assyr. = Assyrian.
 AT = Altes Testament.
 AV = Authorized Version.
 AVm = Authorized Version margin.
 Bab. = Babylonian.
 c. = circa, about.
 cf. = compare.
 ct. = contrast.
 ed. = edited, edition.
 Eng. = English.
 Eth. = Ethiopic.
 EV, EVV = English Version, Versions.
 f. = and following verse or page.
 ff. = and following verses or pages.
 fol. = folio.
 fr. = fragment, from.
 Fr. = French.
 Germ. = German.
 Gr. = Greek.
 Heb. = Hebrew.
 Lat. = Latin.

lit. = literally, literature.
 LXX = Septuagint.
 m., marg. = margin.
 MS, MSS = Manuscript, Manuscripts.
 n. = note.
 NT = New Testament, Neues Testament.
 N.S. = New Series.
 OT = Old Testament.
 pl. = plural.
 q.v., qq.v. = quod vide, quæ vide, which see.
 Rhem. = Rhemish New Testament.
 rt. = root.
 RV = Revised Version.
 RVm = Revised Version margin.
 Sem. = Semitic.
 sing. = singular.
 Skr. = Sanskrit.
 Syr. = Syriac.
 Targ. = Targum.
 tr. = translated, translation.
 TR = Textus Receptus, Received Text.
 v. = verse.
 v.l. = varia lectio, variant reading.
 VS, VSS = Version, Versions.
 Vulg., Vg. = Vulgate.

II. BOOKS OF THE BIBLE

Old Testament.

Gn = Genesis.	Ca = Canticles.
Ex = Exodus.	Is = Isaiah.
Lv = Leviticus.	Jer = Jeremiah.
Nu = Numbers.	La = Lamentations.
Dt = Deuteronomy.	Ezk = Ezekiel.
Jos = Joshua.	Dn = Daniel.
Jg = Judges.	Hos = Hosea.
Ru = Ruth.	Jl = Joel.
1 S, 2 S = 1 and 2 Samuel.	Am = Amos.
1 K, 2 K = 1 and 2 Kings.	Ob = Obadiah.
1 Ch, 2 Ch = 1 and 2 Chronicles.	Jon = Jonah.
Ezr = Ezra.	Mic = Micah.
Neh = Nehemiah.	Nah = Nahum.
Est = Esther.	Hab = Habakkuk.
Job.	Zeph = Zephaniah.
Ps = Psalms.	Hag = Haggai.
Pr = Proverbs.	Zec = Zechariah.
Ec = Ecclesiastes.	Mal = Malachi.

Apocrypha.

1 Es, 2 Es = 1 and 2 Esdras.	To = Tobit.
	Jth = Judith.

Ad. Est = Additions to Esther.	Sus = Susanna.
Wis = Wisdom.	Bel = Bel and the Dragon.
Sir = Sirach or Ecclesiasticus.	Pr. Man = Prayer of Manasses.
Bar = Baruch.	1 Mac, 2 Mac = 1 and 2 Maccabees.
Three = Song of the Three Children.

New Testament.

Mt = Matthew.	1 Th, 2 Th = 1 and 2 Thessalonians.
Mk = Mark.	1 Ti, 2 Ti = 1 and 2 Timothy.
Lk = Luke.	Tit = Titus.
Jn = John.	Philem = Philemon.
Ac = Acts.	He = Hebrews.
Ro = Romans.	Ja = James.
1 Co, 2 Co = 1 and 2 Corinthians.	1 P, 2 P = 1 and 2 Peter.
Gal = Galatians.	1 Jn, 2 Jn, 3 Jn = 1, 2, and 3 John.
Eph = Ephesians.	Jude.
Ph = Philippians.	Rev = Revelation.
Col = Colossians.

III. BIBLIOGRAPHY

- AGG*=Abhandlungen der Göttinger Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften.
AJPh=American Journal of Philology.
AJTh=American Journal of Theology.
ARW=Archiv für Religionswissenschaft.
AS=Acta Sanctorum (Bollandus).
BJ=Bellum Judaicum (Josephus).
BL=Bampton Lecture.
BW=Biblical World.
CE=Catholic Encyclopedia.
CIA=Corpus Inscript. Atticarum.
CIG=Corpus Inscript. Graecarum.
CIL=Corpus Inscript. Latinarum.
CIS=Corpus Inscript. Semiticarum.
CQR=Church Quarterly Review.
CR=Contemporary Review.
CSEL=Corpus Script. Eccles. Latinorum.
DB=Dict. of the Bible.
DCA=Dict. of Christian Antiquities.
DCB=Dict. of Christian Biography.
DCG=Dict. of Christ and the Gospels.
DGRA=Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiquities.
DGRB=Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography.
DGRG=Dict. of Greek and Roman Geography.
EBi=Encyclopædia Biblica.
EBr=Encyclopædia Britannica.
EGT=Expositor's Greek Testament.
ERE=Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics.
Exp=Expositor.
ExpT=Expository Times.
GAP=Geographie des alten Palästina (Buhl).
GB=Golden Bough (J. G. Frazer).
GGA=Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen.
GGN=Nachrichten der königl. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen.
GJV=Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes (Schürer).
 Grimm-Thayer=Grimm's Gr.-Eng. Lexicon of the NT, tr. Thayer.
HDB=Hastings' Dict. of the Bible (5 vols.).
HE=Historia Ecclesiastica (Eusebius, etc.).
HGIL=Historical Geography of the Holy Land (G. A. Smith).
HI=History of Israel (Ewald).
HJ=Hibbert Journal.
HJP=History of the Jewish People (Eng. tr. of GJV).
HL=Hibbert Lecture.
HN=Historia Naturalis (Pliny).
ICC=International Critical Commentary.
ISS=International Science Series.
JA=Journal Asiatique.
JBL=Journal of Biblical Literature.
JE=Jewish Encyclopedia.
JHS=Journal of Hellenic Studies.
JPh=Journal of Philology.
JPTH=Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie.
JQR=Jewish Quarterly Review.
JRS=Journal of Roman Studies.
JThSt=Journal of Theological Studies.
KAT²=Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament² (Schrader, 1883).
KAT³=Zimmern-Winckler's ed. of the preceding (a totally distinct work), 1902-03.
- KTB*=Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek.
LCB=Literarisches Centralblatt.
LNT=Introd. to Literature of the New Testament (Moffatt).
LT=Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (Edersheim).
MGWJ=Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums.
NGG=Nachrichten der königl. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen.
NKZ=Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift.
NTZG=Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte (Holtzmann and others).
OED=Oxford English Dictionary.
OTJC=Old Testament in the Jewish Church (W. R. Smith).
 Pauly-Wissowa=Pauly-Wissowa's Realencyklopädie.
PB=Polychrome Bible.
PC=Primitive Culture (E. B. Tylor).
PEF=Palestine Exploration Fund.
PEFS=Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement.
PRE=Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche.
PSBA=Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology.
RA=Revue Archéologique.
RB=Revue Biblique.
REG=Revue des Études Grecques.
RGG=Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart.
RHR=Revue de l'Histoire des Religions.
 Roscher=Roscher's Ausführliches Lexikon der griech. und rom. Mythologie.
RS=Religion of the Semites (W. Robertson Smith).
SBAW=Sitzungsberichte der Berliner Akademie der Wissenschaften.
SBE=Sacred Books of the East.
 Schaff-Herzog=The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia.
SDB=Hastings' Single-vol. Dictionary of the Bible.
SEP=Memoirs of Survey of Eastern Palestine.
SK=Studien und Kritiken.
SWP=Memoirs of Survey of Western Palestine.
ThLZ=Theologische Literaturzeitung.
ThT=Theol. Tijdschrift.
TS=Texts and Studies.
TU=Texte und Untersuchungen.
 Wetzer-Welte=Wetzer-Welte's Kirchenlexikon.
WH=Westcott-Hort's Greek Testament.
ZATW=Zeitschrift für die alttest. Wissenschaft.
ZDMG=Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft.
ZKG=Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte.
ZKWL=Zeitschrift für kirchl. Wissenschaft und kirchl. Leben.
ZNTW=Zeitschrift für die neutest. Wissenschaft.
ZTK=Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche.
ZWT=Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie.

DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

M

MACEDONIA (Μακεδονία).—This was the land of the Macedones, a Doric branch of the Hellenic stock, who settled on the banks of the Haliacmon and Axios, above the Thermaic Gulf, and gradually extended their power over the hill-peoples in the N. and W., as well as the lowland tribes which separated them from the sea. Their enlarged country, with its 'vast plains, rich mountains, verdant prairies, extended views, very different from those charming little mazes of the Greek site' (E. Renan, St. Paul, Eng. tr., 1889, p. 82), was a meet nurse for a successful and conquering race. Centuries of undisturbed growth gave them a great reserve of moral as well as material strength. 'As for Macedonia, it was probably the region the most honest, the most serious, the most pious of the ancient world' (ib. p. 80). And ere long it had the opportunity of showing its quality. When Greece lay weakened by the mutual jealousy of her city-states and consequent incapacity for concerted action, the genius of Philip of Macedon unified and consolidated a group of free and hardy races, fostered their national spirit, and created the most effective fighting-machine known to antiquity. Entering on a splendid heritage, his greater son achieved the conquest of the world (1 Mac 1¹⁻⁹). Even a century later, when the Macedonians had to try conclusions with the Romans, whom in many respects they strikingly resembled, their strength and spirit were but little impaired, and 'with a power in every point of view far inferior' Hannibal was 'able to shake Rome to its foundations' (T. Mommsen, The History of Rome, Eng. tr., 1894, ii. 491). But the bravest armies can do little unless they are efficiently led, and at Cynoscephalæ (197 B.C.), and again at Pydna (168), the once invincible phalanx was broken at last.

The conquered nation was disarmed and divided. 'Macedonia was abolished. In the conference at Amphipolis on the Strymon the Roman commission ordained that the compact, thoroughly monarchical, single state should be broken up into four republican-federative leagues moulded on the system of the Greek confederacies, viz. that of Amphipolis in the eastern regions, that of Thessalonica with the Chalcidian peninsula, that of Pella on the frontiers of Thessaly, and that of Pelagonia in the interior' (Mommsen, op. cit. p. 508). No one was allowed to marry, or to purchase houses or lands, except in his own tetrarchy. The Macedonians compared the severance of their country to the laceration and disjoining of a living creature (Livy, xlv. 30).

It has been supposed that a reference to this partition is contained in Ac 16¹², where Philippi is described as πρώτη τῆς μερίδος Μακεδονίας πόλις, κολωνία. This cannot mean that Philippi was the first city of Macedonia reached by St. Paul, for he had landed at Neapolis. Following Blass, T. Zahn (Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 532 f.) therefore proposes to read πρώτης, and to paraphrase: 'a city belonging to the first of those four districts of Macedonia, i.e. the first which Paul touched on his journey.' But the interpretation is not plausible. Not only is the suggested detail regarding the Apostle's movements singularly flat and commonplace, but it is highly probable that the old division into tetrarchies had long ceased to have more than an antiquarian interest. For the best explanation of the difficult phrase 'the first of the district' see PHILIPPI.

In 146 B.C. Macedonia received a provincial organization, and Thessalonica was made the seat of government. Including part of Illyria as well as Thessaly, the province extended from the Adriatic to the Ægean, and was traversed by the Via Egnatia, which joined Dyrrhachium and Apollonia in the West with Amphipolis and another Apollonia in the East. Augustus made it a senatorial province in 27 B.C., Tiberius an Imperial in A.D. 15, and Claudius restored it to the senate in A.D. 44. In St. Paul's time it was therefore governed by a proconsul of prætorian rank.

In the Acts and the Epistles Macedonia is often linked with Achaia (Ac 19²¹, Ro 15²⁶, 2 Co 9², 1 Th 1⁷⁻⁸), and as the latter term can denote only the province, it is natural to suppose that Macedonia has also its official Roman meaning. St. Paul's entry into Europe was occasioned by the vision of 'a man of Macedonia' (Ac 16⁹). Ramsay (St. Paul, 1895, p. 202 ff.) has hazarded the suggestion that this man was no other than the historian of the Acts; in which case the night vision would doubtless be preceded and followed by substantial arguments by day. The theory is supposed to account for the abundance of detail, as well as the apparently keen personal interest, with which St. Luke tells this part of his story. He seems to hurry breathlessly over wide tracts of Asia Minor, until he gets St. Paul down to Troas and across the Aegean (Ac 16¹¹), after which his style of narration at once becomes leisurely and expansive (see LUKE). St. Paul founded Macedonian churches in Philippi, Berea, and Thessalonica; to two of them he wrote letters that are extant; and all of them were conspicuous for their loyalty to, and affection for, their founder. He had happy memories of 'the grace of God in the churches of Macedonia' (2 Co 8¹) and of 'all the brethren in all Macedonia' (1 Th 4¹⁰). He loved to re-visit his first European mission-field (Ac 19²¹ 20¹⁻³, 1 Co 16⁵, 2 Co 1²⁰ 2¹³ 7³ 8¹ 9²⁻⁴), and among other 'men of Macedonia' who aided and cheered him were Gaius and Aristarchus (Ac 19²⁹), Secundus of Thessalonica (20⁴), Sopater of Berea (20⁶), and Epaphroditus of Philippi (Ph 2²⁵). One of the most remarkable features of all the churches of Macedonia was the ministry of women, on which see J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, 1878, p. 56.

JAMES STRAHAN.

MADIAN.—See MIDIAN.

MAGIC.—See DIVINATION.

MAGISTRATE.—The word 'magistrates' in the NT is as a rule a translation either of the abstract word ἀρχαί (literally 'the authorities'), as in Lk 12¹¹, Tit 3¹, or of the cognate word, originally a participle, ἀρχοντες. The former term is the more general of the two, but an examination of the two passages suggests that ἀρχαί is an allusion to magistrates, while ἐξουσίαι is rather a reference to governors, if indeed we can distinguish words which had long been used by Greek-speaking Jews of the world of spirits. There is less doubt about the other equivalent, ἀρχοντες, which occurs in the singular in Lk 12⁵⁸, where the reference is clearly to two litigants going before a magistrate (corresponding to the English alderman and the Scottish bailie) in a civil case (a comparison with || Mt 5²⁵ will show that Luke is more explicit).

The variety of magistrates throughout the Roman Empire was infinite. In Rome the magistrates were called prætores (see art. PRÆTOR). Throughout the Italian and Western communities generally the city-constitution approximated to that of Rome. In coloniae it was a copy as nearly as possible. The names by which the magistrates were called varied. For example, at Arretium in Etruria (Persius, Sat. i. 130) and at Ulubrae in Latium (Juvenal, Sat. x. 102) they were called œdiles; an inscription at the latter place mentions also a præfectus iure dicundo, a special commissioner sent from Rome to try cases (see Mayor's note). At other places they were called prætores (cf. below), the original name of the consuls at Rome, e.g. at Fundi in Latium. (Horace [Sat. i. v. 34-36] mocks at the consequential airs and dress of one of them.) In yet other cases they were known as duo viri œdiles, with duo viri iure dicundo forming a board of four. They held office for one year. The competence of such magistrates was strictly defined, and higher cases were sent to Rome for trial. So in the provinces the governor had to try the most important cases, both civil and criminal, while ordinary cases were doubtless left to the judicial machinery already in existence in the province. The Romans commonly left the system current already in each country, unless it was radically bad.

St. Luke is an authority of primary value for the jurisdiction of magistrates in an Eastern town. From him we learn that in Philippi, a colonia, they were called στρατηγοί (an exact translation of prætores). They unknowingly transgressed the law in flogging the two Roman citizens, St. Paul and Silas, without trial. Their chagrin was all the greater as they prided themselves on their true Roman spirit. At Thessalonica St. Luke's accuracy is particularly evident, as there he applies to the magistrates a title comparatively rare throughout the Græco-Roman world, but attested for Thessalonica by a number of inscriptions—the title politarchs (πολιτάρχαι, Ac 17⁶⁻⁸); this title occurs also in Egypt. At Thessalonica the rabble were hostile to the new religion, but the politarchs and the better-educated classes generally looked upon it with more favour (see also AUTHORITIES, ROMAN EMPIRE, TOWN-CLERK, etc.).

LITERATURE.—On the subject in general see T. Mommsen, *Röm. Staatsrecht*³, Leipzig, 1888; A. H. J. Greenidge, Roman Public Life, London, 1901, chs. iv., viii., x., xi. especially; an admirable synopsis by B. W. Henderson in A Companion to Latin Studies, ed. Sandys, Cambridge, 1913, p. 372 f.; on the relations between Romans and non-Romans in provincial towns, see Mommsen in Ephemeris Epigraphica, vii. [1892] 436 ff.; on the scene at Philippi, W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 217 ff., JThSt i. [1899-1900] 114 ff.; and F. Haverfield, ib. p. 434 f.; Thessalonian inscriptions containing the title 'Politarch' collected by E. D. Burton in AJTh ii. [1898] 598 ff.; for the title in Egyptian documents, see Oxyrhynchus Papyrus, no. 745 (iv. [1904]).

A. SOUTER.

MAGOG.—See GOG AND MAGOG.

MAGUS.—See SIMON MAGUS.

MAJESTY.—Two words are so translated—μεγαλειότης and μεγαλωσύνη. According to formation (the first from μεγαλῆος = 'stately,' 'magnificent'; the second from μεγαλο- = 'great') they denote respectively the appearance and the fact of greatness, regal state, and regal might. On the whole, the distinction holds good in usage.

1. μεγαλειότης, 'magnificence,' is applied to Solomon (1 Es 1⁵), and in the NT (by Demetrius, the silversmith) to the Ephesian Artemis (Ac 19²⁷). In 2 P 1¹⁶ it is used of Christ's transfiguration-glory on the mountain-top, and, with interesting coincidence, in Lk 9³⁵ of the manifestation of Divine power in His healing of the demoniac boy at the mountain-foot (cf. Clement, Ep. ad Cor. xxiv., Ign. ad Rom. i.; τὰ μεγαλῆα τοῦ θεοῦ, Ac 2¹¹).

2. μεγαλωσύνη is used in the LXX as the translation of גָּדַל or גָּדַל. It is applied to David (2 S 7⁻¹) and to the kings of the earth (Dn 7²⁷); elsewhere to the sovereign greatness of God (Dt 32³, 1 Ch 29¹¹, Ps 145³⁻⁶, etc.). From the LXX it has passed into the vocabulary of Hellenistic Judaism (e.g. Book of Enoch, v. 4, xii. 3, xiv. 16), of the NT, and the Apostolic Fathers (Clement, Ep. ad Cor. xx., xxvii., lviii., lxi., lxiv.). In He 1³ 'the Majesty on high,' and in 8¹ 'the Majesty in the heavens,' is equivalent to God Himself in His heavenly dominion (cf. Book of Enoch, v. 4, 'ye spake hard words . . . against His Majesty'; Clement, Ep. ad Cor. xxvii., 'by the word of His Majesty all things were framed together'). Most frequently it is used in doxology (Jude 2⁵, 1 Ch 29¹¹; Clement, Ep. ad Cor. xx., lxi., lxiv.).

ROBERT LAW.

MALICE (κακία).—Malice is the propensity to inflict injury upon another, or to take pleasure in his misfortunes. In early English it denoted wickedness in general (HDB iii. 223), but the modern meaning is found in Shakespeare, e.g. in Othello's words:

'Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice'

(Act v. sc. ii. line 342).

κακία changed its connotation in much the same way. In classical Greek it was not a particular fault or vice, but that badness of nature or character (opp. to ἀρετή, 'virtue,' 'excellence') which is the root of all faults. Cicero discusses the point in Tusc. Disp. iv. xv. 34: 'Hujus igitur virtutis contraria est vitiositas. Sic enim malo quam malitiam appellare eam, quam Græci κακίαν appellant. Nam malitia certi cujusdam vitii nomen est; vitiositas omnium.' In the NT the context generally indicates that κακία is a specific fault or vice. The compound κακοθεία ('malicious disposition') designates but one of the many elements or workings of the reprobate mind (Ro 1²⁹). Christians recall the time, before 'the washing of regeneration,' when they were 'living in malice (ἐν κακίᾳ) and envy' (Tit 3³). κακία is one of the sins which the believer must resolutely put away (Eph 4³¹, Col 3⁸); he is not to eat the Christian passover with the leaven of malice (1 Co 5⁸); in malice he is to be a babe (14²⁰). Without apparent cause the Revisers prefer 'wickedness' in Ja 1²¹, 1 P 2^{1, 16}, relegating 'malice' to the margin. Only once is the wider meaning unquestionable: the κακία of which Simon the Magian is urged to repent is no specific fault, but the deep-seated wickedness of a man who is still in the gall of bitterness (Ac 8^{22, 23}).

JAMES STRAHAN.

MAN.—Introduction.—The fundamental fact for apostolic anthropology is the new value assigned to human nature by Jesus Christ, both through His personal attitude and teaching, and through His life, death, and resurrection. Jesus saw every man thrown into relief against the background of the kingly Fatherhood of God—encompassed by His mercy, answerable to His judgment. For Jesus, the supreme element in human personality was its moral content, as the supreme value in the life of men was human personality itself. This conception of human nature goes back to the Hebrew Scriptures, in which we can trace five principles, summarily stated in modern terms as follows. (a) Human nature is conceived as a unity; there is no dualism of body and soul as in Greek thought, and consequently no asceticism. Man becomes man by the vitalization of a physical organism (for which Hebrew has no word) by a breath-soul (nephesh, ruah); death is their divorce, and they have no separate history. (b) Man depends absolutely on God for his creation and continued existence; his inner life is easily accessible to spiritual influences from without, both for good and for evil. (c) Man is morally responsible for his conduct, because ultimately free to choose; if he chooses to rebel against the declared will of God, he will suffer for his sin. (d) The will of God gives a central place to the realization of social righteousness, the right relation of man to man. (e) In the purposes of God man has consequently a high place, as in the visible world he has a unique dignity. In the period between the OT and the NT, this conception of human nature received two important developments (cf. W. Fairweather, *The Background of the Gospels*², 1911, pp. 283–291). From the Maccabæan age onwards there is a much more pronounced individualism; along with this there is the extension of human personality into a life beyond death. Both developments are begun in the OT itself; but neither beginning is comparable in importance with the established doctrine of the time of Christ. These two developments, separately and in union, formed a most important contribution to the Christian interpretation of human nature. But its foundation was already laid in the OT, the main ideas of which Jesus liberated from the restraints of Jewish nationalism to incorporate them into a universal faith. He gave them a new religious significance by His conception of the Father. He added the purified ethical content of the prophetic teaching to the current supernaturalism of apocalyptic writers, purged of its vagaries. In His own person, He gave to man an example, a motive, and an approach to God which have made His teaching a religion as well as a philosophy. The result is seen in the Christian doctrine of man, pre-supposed by apostolic evangelism, and adumbrated in apostolic writings. Three types of this may be studied in the pages of the NT, viz. the Pauline and the Johannine (the latter in large measure a development of the former), and what may be called the non-mystical type, as inclusive of the other material (chiefly Hebrews, 1 Peter, James).

1. Pauline anthropology.—Perhaps any formal statement of St. Paul's conception of human nature is apt to misrepresent him. The data are fragmentary and occasional; the form is, for the most part, unsystematic; the interest of the writer is experiential, and his aims are practical. It is not easy to recover the full content of his thought-world. But we probably come nearest to it when we recognize that he continues the lines of OT thought indicated above, with a deepening of ethical contrast (not to be identified with Greek dualism), and, in particular, with an emphasis on the Spirit of God in Christ as the normal basis of the Christian life. This last is characteristically Pauline, and forms St. Paul's chief contribution to the present subject. Recognition of the outpouring of the Spirit of God belongs to early Christianity in general, and marks it off from the religious life and thought of contemporary Judaism (cf. W. Bousset, *Die Religion des Judentums*², 1906, p. 458). The specifically Pauline doctrine of life in the Spirit is a legitimate development of OT ideas. But it may well have been quickened by current Hellenistic ideas of a Divine πνεῦμα (on which see H. Siebeck, Geschichte der Psychologie, 1884, ii. 130–160). Similar influences may have contributed to the accentuation of the ethical contrast already indicated between the pneumatic and psychic, the inner and the outer man. But the real principle of this Pauline contrast is already implicit in the OT differentiation of ruah (πνεῦμα) and nephesh (ψυχή). On this side of Pauline thought, the Greek influences seem often to have been over-emphasized (e.g. by Holtzmann, Neutest. Theologie, 1897, ii. 13 ff.).

(a) St. Paul conceives human life as an integral element in a vast cosmic drama. This conception receives graphic illustration when he compares the suffering apostles with those doomed to death in the arena: 'We are made a spectacle unto the world, both to angels and men (1 Co 4⁹). Man plays his part before an audience invisible as well as visible; nor are those whose eyes are turned upon him mere spectators. There is arrayed against the righteous man a multitude of spiritual forces: 'our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places' (Eph 6¹²). At the head of this kingdom of evil is Satan, 'the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the sons of disobedience (Eph 2-; cf. 2 Th 2⁹), to whom is to be ascribed the power to work both physical (1 Co 5³, 2 Co 12¹) and moral (1 Co 7³; cf. 2 Co 11²) evil. Similar to this was the general outlook of contemporary Judaism; the distinctive feature in the case of St. Paul was his faith that victorious energies for good were mediated through Christ. This conception of 'the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3¹⁸) sprang from St. Paul's experience on the road to Damascus, by which he was convinced of the continued existence, the Divine authority, and the spiritual power of Christ. Union with Christ, thus conceived (1 Co 6¹⁷), brought the Christian into a new realm of powers and possibilities. No longer dismayed by the spiritual host arrayed against him, hitherto so often victorious over his fleshly weakness, the Christian became conscious 'in Christ' that God was for him, and convinced that none could prevail against him, through the practical operation of spiritual energies within him. He must indeed be made manifest before the judgment-seat of Christ, but that thought could bring no terror to one who was already 'in Christ.' The Christian warrior (Eph 6^{10c}) shares in the conflict of Christ, whose final victory (1 Co 15^{24f}) is to be the last act of the great cosmic drama. The fact that, at its culmination, God shall be all in all (v. ⁸) is significant of the whole character of this interpretation of life. There is here no Gnostic dualism; the evil of the world is moral, not physical, in its origin, and the cosmic issues are safe in the hands of the one and only God. The way in which the cosmic forces are imagined and described betrays Jewish origin; but this ought not to prejudice the great principles involved. There can be no doubt that this whole outlook gives to man's life a meaning and a dignity which are a fit development of the high calling assigned to him in the OT.

(b) Because this cosmic conflict is essentially moral, its peculiar battle-field is the heart of man. There the cosmic drama is repeated in miniature—or rather, there the issues of the world conflict are focused. The cardinal passage is, of course, Ro 7, and this chapter, rather than the 5th, should be the point of departure for any statement of Pauline anthropology. St. Paul is analyzing his own moral and religious experience prior and up to his deliverance by the Spirit of Christ. But he does this in general terms, implying that it is substantially true for all men, since even the Gentiles have the requirements of the Law written in their hearts (2¹³). The Jewish Law, 'whose silent rolls, in their gaily embroidered cover, the child in the synagogue had seen from afar with awe and curiosity' (Deissmann, Paulus, 1911, p. 64), became eloquent to St. Paul as a unique revelation of man's duty, imperfect only in the sense that devotion to it could not generate the moral energy necessary to the fulfilment of its high demands. Without such new motive power, man is helpless, for on his physical side he belongs to the realm of fleshly weakness, the antithesis to that of the Spirit to which the Law itself belongs (Ro 7¹⁴). Through this weakness, he has been taken captive by Sin, conceived as an external, personalized activity (vv. ⁸, ²³). Yet the voûs, or inner man, desires to obey that spiritual Law, for there is a spiritual element (ruh) in human nature (8¹⁶). St. Paul does not contemplate the case of the man who in his inmost heart does not desire to obey that Law, any more than the OT sacrifices provide for deliberate, voluntary sin. He is concerned with his own experience as a zealous Pharisee, eager to find the secret of morality, and discovering instead his own captivity to sin. The body of flesh is found to be, for a reason other than that of Plato's dualism, the prison-house of the soul. The actual deliverance from this death-bringing captivity St. Paul had found in the new spiritual energies which reinforced his captive will 'in Christ.' These gave him a present moral victory over his 'psychic' nature, and the promise of the ultimate replacement of this inadequate organism by a 'pneumatic' body. Sin thus lost the advantage gained by its insidious use of Law (7¹¹) and could be overcome by those who were led by the Spirit (8¹⁴, Gal 5¹⁸). For where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty (2 Co 3¹⁷).

Several points should be particularly noticed in this generalized, yet most vivid, transcript from experience. In the first place, St. Paul does not, here or elsewhere, regard the 'flesh' (sarx) as essentially evil, but as essentially weak. It is therefore accessible to the forces of evil, affording to them an obvious base of operations in their siege of the inner or 'spiritual' man. If it be urged that sin is not committed until the inner man yields to the attack of sin, we must remember that the Hebrew psychology (which supplies the real content of St. Paul's Greek terms) regarded the 'flesh' (basar) as a genuine element in human personality, alive psychically as well as physically. The man did sin when the weakest part of his personality, viz. the flesh, yielded to sin. The often alleged dualism of St. Paul thus becomes the conflict between the stronger and the weaker elements in the unity of personality. Secondly, the whole of Christian character and conduct is related to the dominating conception of the Lord the Spirit. Through this conception St. Paul was able to unite two lines of OT development, viz. the experience of continuous fellowship with God which sprang from the realization of ethical ideals, and the doctrine of the intermittent and 'occasional' Spirit of God. One of St. Paul's greatest services to Christian thought has been to unite these two lines, and to unite them in Christ. The Spirit of God, acting through Christ, becomes the normal principle of Christian morality, and, consequently, of permanent fellowship with God. Thirdly, St. Paul gives no indication that actual sin is anything but what the OT religion made it—the rebellion of the human will against the Divine. In Ro 7 he recognizes no 'original sin,' no hereditary influence even, as active in producing the captivity from which the Spirit of Christ delivers. That captivity is traced to the deceitful attack made on each successive individual by sin, the external enemy.

(c) From this point of view, we may best approach what St. Paul has to say of the racial history. For this the cardinal passage is Ro 5¹⁻¹¹—a passage difficult to interpret, not only because of its abrupt transitions, but even more because, in conventional theology, the later system of Augustinian anthropology has been welded into it. St. Paul is in these verses contrasting Adam and Christ as, in some sense, both unique in their influence on human history; the debatable point is, in what sense? The entrance of death into the world is clearly ascribed to Adam's sin, just as the entrance of new life is ascribed to Christ's obedience (v. ¹⁷). But when we read that 'through one man's disobedience the many were made sinners' (v. ¹⁹), we must not assume with Augustine that this refers to the peccatum originale handed down by the inherent concupiscentia of the sexual act; nor must we be influenced unconsciously by the popular science of to-day, so as to imagine that there is a reference to heredity. Here, as in the well-known saying quoted by both Jeremiah (31²⁹) and Ezekiel (18)—'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge'—it is not the biological succession of individuals that is in view, but the far-reaching conception of 'corporate responsibility,' as the protest of those two prophets makes evident enough. In their assertion of moral individualism St. Paul would have joined heartily; but his recognition of the individual relation of men to God does not prevent him from accepting the fact that the Ishmaelites were cast out in Hagar's son (Gal 4³⁰), and that the Edomites were 'hated' in Esau (Ro 9¹³). Just as Achan's sin brought death on his whole family, since it brought them as a group under the ban (Jos 7^{24, 25}), so Adam's sin brought death on the whole human race, since it constituted them 'sinners' as a group. As a matter of fact, St. Paul adds that all men have actually sinned, though, prior to the giving of explicit law, their sin was different in kind from Adam's wilful disobedience (Ro 5¹⁻¹⁴). But St. Paul does not connect this universality of actual sin in the race, which has justified the Divine sentence of death upon it, with the initial sin of Adam, in such a way as to make them effect and cause. Such a connexion may seem obvious to a mind prepossessed by Augustinian anthropology on the one hand, or by popular biological science on the other; but there is no proof that it was obvious to St. Paul. In fact, as we have seen, the evidence of Ro 7 is the other way. Adam's sin was, indeed, fatal to man, since it brought the Divine penalty of death upon the race; but St. Paul recognizes to the full the individual freedom and responsibility of its individual members, who followed in the footsteps of Adam. It should be noted that contemporary Jewish theology gives no sufficient warrant for ascribing a doctrine of 'original sin' to St. Paul's teachers, but only for ascribing to them the doctrine of the yezer hara, the evil impulse present in Adam and in successive individuals of his race, though not due to his sin (cf. F. C. Porter's essay on this subject in Biblical and Semitic Studies [Yale Bicentennial Publications], 1901, pp. 93-156). Men acted like Adam because they themselves had the evil heart (4 Ezr. iii. 26). In this way, 'every one of us has been the Adam of his own soul' (Apoc. Bar. liv. 19). We may reasonably conjecture, in the light of Ro 7, that this substantially represents St. Paul's position. But he has not definitely said this; in Ro 5 his interest lies in the relation not of Adam to the race, but of Adam to Christ, i.e., in the antithesis of death and life, of the psychic and pneumatic orders of humanity. His point in Ro 5 is fairly summed up in 1 Co 15: 'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.' The Church, as the body of Christ (1 Co 12¹² 27) is a new organism of life within the present general environment of death. The final redemption of the Christian will consist in the quickening of this mortal body of flesh—'the body of this death'—into a spiritual body (Ro 8¹¹, 1 Co 15⁴⁴), a body like that of the Risen Lord (Ph 3¹). Thus St. Paul looks forward to escape from the fleshly weakness of the body, not, as a Greek might have done, along the line of the soul's inherent immortality, but, as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, in the hope of receiving a body more adequate to the needs of the soul. The resurrection of the (spiritually transformed) body will create anew the unity of personality, which physical death destroys. In view of the assertion that 'flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God' (1 Co 15⁵⁰), we may perhaps suppose that St. Paul would postulate the original mortality of human nature, with a potential immortality lost through sin (Ro 5¹²).

2. Johannine anthropology.—The NT enables us to trace a further development of the Pauline anthropology in that of the Fourth Gospel and the First Epistle of John. 'John,' as Deissmann has said, 'is the oldest and greatest interpreter of St. Paul'; his writings form 'the most striking monument of the most genuine understanding of Pauline mysticism' (op. cit. pp. 4, 90). The Johannine development is towards greater affinity with Greek thought, the Logos doctrine (cf. the parallel phenomenon in Philo) being the most notable example of it. This greater adaptation to the thought and experience of a Greek world explains the greater influence of the Johannine presentation of the gospel on the earlier theology of the Church. The more Hebrew anthropology of St. Paul had, in large measure, to wait for those thinkers of the West who culminated in Augustine. St. Paul's more subjective and individualistic outlook is, indeed, harder to realize than that broad display of great contrasts which gives to the Fourth Gospel part of its fascination for simple souls. In these contrasts we may see the emergence of the opposing realms of Jewish apocalypse (cf. Fairweather, op. cit. p. 295). The sense of a present judgment, however, constituted by the simple presence of Christ, the Light of Life in this dark world (3¹⁹ 12³¹), replaces the eschatological outlook of the Synoptics.

(a) The opposition of the world and God is the primary Johannine emphasis. Interest is transferred from the Pauline struggle within the soul (e.g. Ro 7, Gal 5¹⁷) to the external conflict which gathers around the Person of Christ. The world (a characteristic Johannine term) is the realm of darkness (Jn 1⁵ 3¹⁹ etc.), sin (7⁷), and death (5⁴, 1 Jn 3¹⁴). Christ is the Light of the world (Jn 8¹²), its Saviour from sin (1²⁹ 3¹⁷), and its Life (3¹⁶ 6⁶). His conflict with that darkness which is sin, and issues in death, is continued by His Spirit (16⁷). Sin is defined in the characteristic Pauline (Hebrew) way as 'lawlessness' (1 Jn 3⁴); it is a voluntary act (Jn 9⁴¹), and reaches its culmination in the wilful rejection of life in Christ (3¹⁹; cf. 16⁹). Thus the conflict remains essentially ethical, though it is more objectively presented. The protagonist on the side of evil is the devil, who stands behind the evil-doer as his spiritual parent (8⁴⁴); the world lies in his power (1 Jn 5¹⁹), and he is its prince (Jn 12³¹ 14³⁰ 16¹¹).

(b) The spiritual transformation of individual men from lovers of darkness (3¹⁹) to sons of light (12³⁰) is conceived both biologically as a new birth, and psychologically as a product of faith; no formal attempt is made to correlate these two ways of describing the change, or to solve the problem of the relation of Divine and human factors in conversion. John specializes the Pauline idea of a 'new creation' (2 Co 5¹⁷, Gal 6¹⁵) into that of a new birth (Jn 3³), which springs from a Divine seed (1 Jn 3⁹). This spiritual birth (much more than a mere metaphor) is sharply contrasted with natural birth (Jn 1¹³). The new life it initiates is ascribed to the Spirit of God (3⁶), and is nourished sacramentally (3⁶ 6⁶). The contrast of Spirit and flesh is not, however, dualistic in the Gnostic sense (cf. the rejection of docetic tendencies); it springs, as in St. Paul's case, from the OT contrast of their respective power and weakness, as seen in their ethical consequences (1¹ Jn 2¹⁶). This new birth from the Spirit has its conscious side in the believer's faith (Jn 1¹); that there is no contradiction between the two ideas is shown by such a passage as 1 Jn 5¹: 'Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God.' Such belief primarily concerns the Divine mission of Christ (Jn 12⁴⁴ 17⁸ 21), knowledge of which is imparted through His 'words' (6⁶), which are themselves Spirit and life (v. 6⁶). It will be seen that faith has a more intellectual content for St. John than for St. Paul, though it does not forfeit its essentially mystical character; belief in the mission of Christ marks a stage of development later than the faith of direct moral surrender to Him. The ethical emphasis is still fundamental in this Johannine conception of faith, as is shown by the recognition that 'obedience is the organ of spiritual knowledge' (7¹⁷; cf. F. W. Robertson, Sermons, 2nd ser., 1875, pp. 94-105). The intimate relation of character and faith is further suggested by the assertion that 'Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice' (18³⁷), i.e., that there is an intrinsic affinity between truth and the Truth (14⁶).

(c) The product of this 'faith-birth' is eternal life, a term as central for St. John as 'righteousness' is for St. Paul, and one that characteristically marks St. John's more Greek and less Jewish atmosphere. This eternal life is life like Christ's (1 Jn 3³), and is nourished by such a relation to Him as the allegory of the Vine (Jn 15) suggests. The peculiar mark of this life is that 'love' which St. Paul had described as the greatest amongst abiding realities: 'We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren' (1 Jn 3¹⁴). In such life sin has no place as a fixed habit of character (5¹⁸); sin unto death (2¹⁹ 5¹⁶), in fact, would show that there had been no genuine entrance into life. For single acts of sin confessed there is forgiveness and cleansing (1⁹). The issue of sin is death (Jn 8⁴), whereas Christ teaches that 'if any man keep my word he shall never see death' (v. 51; cf. 11^{25, 26}). Except for one passage (5²⁰), in which the term 'the resurrection of judgment' may have become a conventional phrase, resurrection appears to be confined to the believer (6⁴⁰), and is intended, as with St. Paul, to restore the full personality. Eternal life is already the believer's possession (1 Jn 5¹³), and the future life is really the direct development of what is begun here. In this way, faith is the victory that hath overcome the world (5⁴).

3. Non-mystical anthropology.—The apostolic writings other than those of the Pauline and Johannine group hardly supply sufficient data to make a detailed statement of their distinctive conceptions of human nature practicable. There are, however, a number of incidental references of considerable interest. The psychology of temptation as given in the Epistle of James (1¹³⁻¹⁵) singles out desire as the parent of sin, and makes death the natural issue of sin, in a sequence that should be compared with the fuller Pauline analysis in Ro 1. The Epistle to the Hebrews teaches that the wilful sin of apostasy after a genuine Christian experience excludes a second repentance; the appended illustration of the fruitless land suggests that those who commit this sin are incapable of repentance (6⁴⁻⁸; cf. 12¹⁷). The Petrine reference to 'the spirits in prison' (1 P 3¹⁹⁻²⁰ 4⁵) has afforded a basis for much speculation on the possibility of moral change after death. Of more importance than these isolated points is the general characteristic that distinguishes Hebrews, 1 Peter, and James from the Pauline (and Johannine) writings, viz. the absence of the idea of faith as involving mystical union with Christ. In the Ep. to the Hebrews, according to the underlying idea of the high priest in the OT, Christ rather represents man before God than brings the energies of God into the world. Faith in His work means confidence to approach God through Him (4¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 10^{19, 22}). Through Christ, according to this Epistle, the realities of the unseen world (11¹) find their supreme substantiation; whereas, for St. Paul, Christ was primarily the source of new energy to achieve the ideal, a new dynamic within the believer who is mystically united to Him. The more objective conception of faith in the Ep. to the Hebrews (along a different line from that of the Johannine tendency noticed above) is further illustrated by the outlook in 1 Peter, where the example of Christ is specially emphasized (1¹⁵ 2²¹ 4¹). This non-mystical Christianity finds its most extreme example in the polemic of St. James against faith without works (2¹⁴⁻²⁶). The Pauline faith as a mystical energy is here apparently misunderstood and taken to be a bare intellectual assent. The presence within the NT of this more prosaic type of Christian experience is of considerable interest. It reminds us that the non-mystical temperament has its own legitimate place and can make its own characteristic contribution; indeed, the genuine mystic will probably always belong to the minority. This non-mystical background to the Pauline-Johannine anthropology is indeed more than background; it probably represents the general type of Christian ethics in the 1st century. A notable example of this may be seen in the Didache (c. A.D. 120). The first five chapters form a manual of instruction for baptismal candidates (cf. § 7, 'Having first recited all these things'), and are concerned with the moral distinctions of right and wrong in practical life—the 'Two Ways'—without a touch of Pauline 'mysticism.' This may be further illustrated from the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, at the end of the 1st century: 'If our mind be fixed through faith towards God; if we seek out those things which are well pleasing and acceptable unto Him; if we accomplish such things as beseech His faultless will, and follow the way of truth, casting off from ourselves all unrighteousness and iniquity, we shall be 'partakers of His promised gifts' (xxxv. 5). We have only to compare such an attitude with that underlying the moral exhortations of St. Paul in his Letters to the same Church (transformation through the Lord the Spirit) to feel the externalism of the later writer and the inwardness of the earlier. We must not, of course, forget the mysticism of Ignatius, to which must now be added that of the Odes of Solomon, as implying a deeper interpretation of human nature. But the Pauline anthropology can have been little understood, and in the neglect of it lay already some of the seeds of anthropological controversy in the days of Augustine and of the Reformation. Failure to understand the Pauline experience robbed the early Church of an important part of its inheritance.

Conclusion.—An exegetical survey of the apostolic anthropology must frankly recognize the existence of various problems—e.g. the relation of human freedom to Divine control—not only unsolved by the writers, but hardly realized by them. We must not, under the guise of 'exegesis,' read our later dogmatic or philosophical solutions into these lacunæ. But neither must we, because of their existence, under-estimate the value of the contribution made by these writers to a doctrine of human nature. Primarily, no doubt, the NT supplies data for all Christian theories rather than dogmatic solutions of the problems which Christian experience raises. But that experience, as recorded in the NT, rests on an acceptance of certain fundamental truths—on the one hand, the worth of human nature and its responsibility to God; on the other, the reality of that spiritual world which men enter through Christ. We are made most effectually to feel the far-reaching power of those truths in their simple majesty when we read the story of His life. But they are not absent from any of the pages of the NT. Indeed, its subtle fascination, its peculiar and unique atmosphere, its constant vision of a land of distances, are largely due to the presence and interaction of these truths. Even the book which reveals most clearly its debt to Jewish supernaturalism, the Apocalypse, begins with the vision of the Risen Lord amongst the golden lampstands of His Churches, and ends with the recognition of individual freedom and its momentous issues (Rev 22¹¹). These truths, like their Lord in His incarnation, may seem to have emptied themselves of their universality in taking the form natural to the first Christian generation. But, like Him, they have proved their power as the perennial basis of Christian thinking. Neither the science nor the philosophy of the present day has any quarrel with them. We are happily leaving behind us the naturalism which looked on men as 'streaks of morning cloud,' which soon 'shall have melted into the infinite azure of the past' (Tyndall's Belfast Address to British Association, 1874). The modern interest in the psychology of religion, combined with the growing emphasis of philosophy on personality, may well become the prelude to a genuine revival of Paulinism, destined to be not less influential than that of the Reformation.

LITERATURE.—(a) Relevant sections of the chief works on NT Theology, e.g. those of B. Weiss (Eng. tr., 1882-83), W. Bey-schlag (Eng. tr., 1895), H. J. Holtzmann (1911), J. Bovon (1902-03), G. B. Stevens (1899). (b) Biblical Anthropology: J. Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man, 1895; E. H. van Leeuwen, Bijselsche Anthropologie, 1906; R. S. Franks, Man, Sin, and Salvation (Century Bible Handbooks, 1908); H. Wheeler Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man, 1911; M. Scott Fletcher, The Psychology of the NT, 1912. (c) Special discussions of the Pauline doctrine of man, as a whole or in some of its aspects: H. Ludemann, Die Anthropologie des Apostels Paulus, 1872; J. Gloel, Der heilige Geist in der Heilserkundigung des Paulus, 1883; T. Simon, Die Psychologie des Apostels Paulus, 1897; C. Clemen, Die christliche Lehre von der Sünde, 1897; H. Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, 1899; E. Sokolowski, Die Begriffe Geist und Leben bei Paulus, 1903; F. R. Tennant, Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin, 1903; H. Wheeler Robinson, 'Hebrew Psychology in Relation to Pauline Anthropology,' in Mansfield College Essays, 1909; P. Volz, Der Geist Gottes, 1910; J. Moffatt, Paul and Paulinism (Modern Religious Problems, 1910); G. A. Deissmann, Paulus, 1911, Eng. tr., 1912.

H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

MAN OF SIN (2 Th ²³; RVm 'man of lawlessness,' substituting the better reading aroulas for anaprias of TR).—Apart from such apparent references to the subject as 2 Co 6¹⁵, Col 2¹⁵, St. Paul's doctrine of the Antichrist is found in the passage 2 Th 2¹⁻¹², in which he associates 'the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ' with a previous 'falling away' or apostasy (αποστασία) and the revelation of 'the man of lawlessness,' whom he also designates 'the son of perdition' (v.³), 'the opponent' (ἀντικείμενος) of God (v.⁴), 'the lawless one' (ὁ ἀνομος, v.⁸), whose future revelation in his own time, however, is anticipated even now by a working of 'the mystery of lawlessness' (v.⁷). The revelation of the man of lawlessness, he further says, is delayed by a restraining power which he refers to in v.⁶ as an impersonal influence (το κατέχον) and in v.⁷ as an actual person (ὁ κατέχων). From the days of the early Fathers the interpretations of this passage have been exceedingly various. A good summary of the history of previous opinion is given by H. Alford (Gr. Test., iii. [1871], Proleg., p. 55 ff.), but modern scholars are agreed in holding that the Apostle was speaking of an apocalypse of evil which was only a crowning manifestation of contemporary influences hostile to God and His Kingdom (v.⁷), and of a restraining power within the knowledge of the Thessalonians themselves (v.⁶). They are also generally agreed in the view that the two magnitudes which underlay the Apostle's cryptic language in regard to the man of lawlessness and the restrainer are to be found in Judaism and the Roman Empire as represented by its ruler. But at this point opinion divides into two exactly contradictory theories, each of which is able to point to some favouring considerations in the language used by the Apostle.

(1) According to one theory the man of lawlessness is Roman Imperialism with the Emperor at its head, while the restraining power is Judaism (for a clear and able exposition of this view see B. B. Warfield in Expositor, 3rd ser. iv. [1886] 40 ff.). The deification of the Emperors, and especially Caligula's attempt to set up his statue in the Temple of Jerusalem (cf. E. Schürer, HJP i. ii. [1890] 93 ff.), certainly afford a very direct explanation of the language of v.⁴ as to the blasphemous pretensions of the man of lawlessness. Moreover, the early history of Christianity suggests that it was part of the Divine plan that the new religion should be developed for a time under the protecting shadow of Judaism as a religio licita. The failure of the Roman authorities at first to distinguish the Church from the Synagogue (cf. Ac 18¹⁴⁻¹⁶) did shelter the former in its days of weakness from the persecuting rage of pagan Imperialism that burst upon it as soon as its separateness and its absolute claims were clearly recognized. But the objection to this theory is that it attributes to St. Paul, whose authorship of 2 Thess. may now be assumed with some confidence, an attitude to Judaism and to Rome respectively which finds no counterpart either in the Thessalonian Epistles or in any other of his writings. It was from Judaism, not from the Empire, that the opposition and persecution he had to encounter as the Apostle of Christianity invariably came (1 Th 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶; cf. Acts, passim). The philosophic historian may see in Judaism the protective sheath of the opening bud of Christianity; but it was not so that St. Paul regarded it. On the contrary, the language in which he describes its treatment of Christ and the gospel, and his denunciation of the wrath of God upon it (1 Th 2¹⁵), suggest that the 'mystery of iniquity' already at work (2 Th 2⁷) was nothing else than the secret ferment of its own anti-Christian spirit. And Rome with its Emperor could hardly be the man of lawlessness to St. Paul, not only because it had not yet begun to persecute the Church, but because he sincerely respected its authority as a power ordained of God (Ro 13⁷), and did not hesitate to appeal to Cæsar himself against his Jewish enemies (Ac 25¹⁰).

(2) The other and more probable theory, accordingly, takes the man of lawlessness to be anti-Christian Judaism coming to a head in the person of a pseudo-Messiah, and the restraining power to be the Roman Empire personified in the Cæsar himself. It is sometimes objected that under this theory an insuperable difficulty is presented by v.⁴, as it would be contrary to the rôle of a Jewish Messiah to sit in the Temple of God and set himself forth as God. But this is to overlook the fact that we have to do here with an apocalyptic picture coloured with the language of an OT apocalypse (cf. Dn 11³⁶) and influenced by the Antichrist tradition which had been developing in Judaism ever since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes (see art. ANTICHRIST, 1). To St. Paul as a Rabbinical scholar the portentous figure of the Jewish Antichrist, Satanic, blasphemous, and God-defying, must have been very familiar. His familiarity with it may be traced not only in the language of v.⁴, but in the references to the Beliar-Satan conception which are present in the passage. In v.⁹ the coming of the man of lawlessness is said to be 'according to the working of Satan.' And E. Nestle has pointed out (ExpT xvi. [1904-05] 472) that on the evidence of the LXX and Aquila ἡ ἀποστασία (v.³) is a rendering of Heb. לְאֵלֹהִים, הַאֲנֹכְרוּת (ἀνθρώπος τῆς ἀνουλίας (v.³) of לְאֵלֹהִים עֵשָׂא ('man of Belial'), and ὁ ἀντικείμενος (v.⁴) of עֵשָׂא. The Jewish conception of the Antichrist, not as a mere political figure but as an eschatological monstrosity in the shape of a diabolic opponent of God, St. Paul boldly transfers from the sphere of paganism in which Jewish apocalyptic had placed it, and sets down in the sphere of Judaism itself. Out of Judaism he pictured the Antichrist as coming, though there are features in his representation which imply that the sway of the man of lawlessness would extend far beyond the confines of Judaism—that he would cause an apostasy in the Church (v.³), that he would break down the restraining power of the Empire (v.⁷), that he would draw after him a deluded and perishing world (vv. 10-12). In the persistent malevolence of his own race against Christ and the gospel, the Apostle saw the mystery of iniquity working; but he conceived of that malevolence as culminating at length in the appearance of an Antichrist endowed with Satanic and superhuman qualities, who would deceive men by 'power and signs and lying wonders' (v.⁹); cf. Mk 13²¹⁻²³), and whose hostility to the truth of God which brings salvation would reach its climax in the blasphemous claim to be himself Divine. Then Christ would return to a world now ripe for judgment, slaying the lawless one with the breath of His mouth, and bringing him to nought by the manifestation of His coming (v.⁸).

LITERATURE.—Besides the references given in the art., and the Literature appended to art. ANTICHRIST, see A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., 1891, p. 117 ff.; B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, Eng. tr., i. [1882] 305 ff.; J. Moffatt, The Historical NT, 1901, p. 142 ff., LNT, 1911, p. 76 ff.

J. C. LAMBERT.

MANAEN (Heb. Menahēm).—As St. Luke prefaces his account of the Church of Jerusalem (Ac 1-5) by giving a list of the apostles who were its chiefs and leaders (1²³), so he prefaces his account of the Church of Antioch, and the missionary activity of which it was the centre, by a list of the most noted prophets and teachers who were connected with it: they were Barnabas, and Symeon called Niger, and Lucius the Cyrenian, and Manaen, the foster-brother of Herod the tetrarch, and Saul (13¹). What brought Manaen to Antioch we do not know. As foster-brother or playmate of Herod Antipas (for the Greek term bears either meaning) he must have been brought up mainly at Jerusalem. The connexion between Manaen and the Herod family seems to have been hereditary. Josephus tells (Ant. xv. x. 5) the story of an elder Manaen, father or uncle of the present one, a noted Essene, who made a prophecy to Herod the Great that he would become king of Judaea; and when the prophecy was fulfilled Herod treated Manaen, and the Essene sect to which he belonged, with great consideration. If, as tradition asserts, St. Luke was a native of Antioch and a resident there, he may well have known Manaen personally and have learnt from him the many details respecting the Herod family which he has introduced into both his Gospel and the Acts. Of Manaen's subsequent career we know nothing. W. A. SPOONER.

MANASSEH.—See TRIBES.

MANNA (μάννα).—1. Among the sacra contained in the Tabernacle the writer of Heb. mentions (9⁴) the pot of manna, which Aaron was directed to lay up before the Lord as a perpetual memorial of the miraculous food whereby the Israelites were sustained in the wilderness (Ex 16³³). The Heb. text does not describe the pot as golden, but the NT writer follows the LXX, which reads λάβε στάμνον χρυσοῦν ἕνα. In Solomon's Temple the two tables of stone were the sole contents of the ark of the covenant (1 K 8⁹), but the Rabbis assumed that the jar of manna was also deposited there, evidently basing their belief on the words 'before the Lord.'

2. The Message to the Church of Pergamos (Rev 2¹²⁻¹⁷) contains the promise that he who overcomes—refusing at all costs to eat things sacrificed to idols—shall be fittingly rewarded by receiving the hidden manna to eat. There is here probably an allusion to the Jewish tradition that, before the Fall of Jerusalem, the ark and its sacred contents were removed by Jeremiah and hidden in a cave of Mount Sinai (2 Mac 2¹), from which they were to be restored to their place at the coming of the Messiah, when all the old miracles would be repeated. 'And at that time,' says Apoc. Bar. (xxix. 8), 'the stores of manna shall descend again from above; and they shall eat of it in those years.' After manna had come to be named 'corn of heaven' (Ps 78²⁴), 'bread of the mighty' (78³⁰), 'heavenly bread' (105⁴⁰), panis angelorum (4 Ezr. i. 29), ἀγγέλων τροφή (Wis 16²⁰), ἀμβροσία τροφή (19²¹), it was naturally regarded not merely as material nourishment but as 'spiritual food' (βρώμα πνευματικόν [1 Co 10³]). Like the bread of Christ's own miracles, it had sacramental value, feeding the soul as well as the body (cf. Jn 6³¹⁻³³). JAMES STRAHAN.

MAN-STEALING.—See MEN-STEALERS.

MANTLE.—The word 'mantle' occurs in the RV in He 1¹, replacing 'vesture' of the AV. The passage is a quotation from Ps 102²⁸ (27); cf. Ps 104⁶. In both places the LXX περιβόλαιον is a translation of Heb. עִוָּל, 'clothing.' The term is appropriate to certain over-garments of ancient peoples, which were literally cast around the body, in contrast to the under-garments, which were put on. In a more restricted sense the same term is employed in 1 Co 11¹⁵ to denote 'veil.'

A description of the only specific mantle occurring in the relevant section of Scripture will be found under art. CLOKE. See also art. CLOTHES.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

MARAN ATHA.—See ANATHHEMA.

MARBLE (μάρμαρος, Lat. marmor; from μαρμαίρειν, 'sparkle,' 'glisten').—Marble is the name given to any limestone which is sufficiently close in texture to admit of being polished. It is mentioned as part of the merchandise of 'Babylon,' i.e. Rome (Rev 18¹²). It began to be used there for the adornment of buildings about the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C. For a time such luxury was viewed with jealousy by stern republicans (Pliny, HN xxxvi. 7), but the Empire effected a great change of sentiment, and Augustus boasted, not without reason, that he 'found Rome of brick and left it of marble' (Suet. Octav. xxix.). 'The Emperor obtained this result, seconded by his friend and minister, Agrippa, and succeeded in leaving behind him truly a city of marble, to which the Pantheon bears sufficient witness' (Mary W. Porter, What Rome was built with, 1907, p. 7). While the white marble of Luna (near the modern Carrara), Hymettus, Pentelicus, and Paros was used for statuary, many varieties of coloured marble were available for architecture. See, further, art. ROME.

LITERATURE.—F. Corsi, Delle pietre antiche, Rome, 1845; G. P. Merrill, *Stones for Building and Decoration*³, New York, 1903. JAMES STRAHAN.

MARK (JOHN).—The name appears eight times in the NT (Ac 12¹², 15³⁷⁻³⁹, Col 4¹⁰, 2 Ti 4¹¹, Philem 2¹, 1 P 5¹³), and the consensus of opinion assigns all the references to one individual. To the Jewish name (John) was added, for use in extra-Palestinian circles, the Latin prænomen Mark* (cf. 'Saul—Paul'; see CIG passim). The son of Mary, a prominent and well-to-do member of the early Christian society (Jn 18¹⁶, 17, Ac 12¹²), to whose house the brethren used to resort, Mark had easy introduction to the apostolic cabinet, and probably fell under the influence of the dominating personality of Peter. His non-aggressive temperament has carved out no clear line by which history can remember him. He shines here and there in the borrowed light of greater men and flits ever back into a tantalizing darkness. Hence conjecture has sought to find him at other points of his career, e.g. as the man carrying the pitcher of water, as one of the Seventy, as the young man of Mk 14⁵¹. Only one personal note comes to us, and that from the 3rd century. He is termed ο κολοβοδακτύλος† (Hippolytus, Philos. vii. 30). Possibly this infirmity was a natural one (cf. Codex Toletanus,

* The correct form of the name is Maarcus, Μάρκος, not Μάρκος, as in editions of the NT. This is clear from Greek and Latin inscriptions (cf. Blass, *Gramm. des neutest. Griechisch*², 1902, § 4. 2 (Eng. tr. 3, 1905).

† Several explanations of this term have been given: (1) that it means 'deserter' (Tregelles) and is applied to Mark because of his defection at Perga; but one so honourably remembered would not be so opprobriously nicknamed; (2) that Mark was a Levite and 'amputasse sibi post fidem pollicem dicitur ut sacerdotio reprobis haberetur' (Monarchian Prologues [TU xv. 1 [1896] 10]); but this is probably an inference from his kinship (ἀνεψιός) with Barnabas; (3) that the term is metaphorical and refers to the abrupt ending of the Second Gospel.

Preface in Wordsworth-White, Novum Testamentum Latine, 1889-1903, p. 171), and caused him to take habitually a secondary place throughout life, a servus servorum dei. He stands out successively as the assistant of Barnabas, Paul, and Peter.

1. Association with Paul and Barnabas.—Having displayed practical gifts probably in the famine relief work in Judæa, Mark returned to Syria with Paul and Barnabas and was chosen to journey with them (Ac 12²⁵ 13⁵). His duties may be assumed to have been not unlike those, mutatis mutandis, discharged by the secretary of a modern evangelistic campaign—the selection of routes, arrangement for hospitality, interviews and general detail (but cf. F. H. Chase, art. 'Mark (John)' in HDB). At Perga he cut himself adrift from the party—it may be because, being sensitively timid from his physical defect, he shrank from the hazardous venture across the Taurus; or, holding the narrower views of his teacher Peter concerning the Gentiles, he was out of sympathy with a campaign that had overshot its intentions; or because some filial duty called him (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 90). His reason certainly did not satisfy Paul. After the Jerusalem Council, when the two colleagues contemplated a return visit to their churches (Ac 15³⁶), Paul came into sharp collision with Barnabas, who wished again to take his cousin Mark with them, and they separated. Barnabas and Mark sailed for Cyprus, probably as unauthorized evangelists, while Paul with Silas left for Syria under the official benediction (παράδοξις τη χάριτι του κυρίου ἰπὸ τῶν ἀδελφῶν).

2. In Cyprus and Egypt.—The veil is not lifted on the doings of the missionaries to Cyprus. They were among their own people there. Barnabas was apparently a native (Ac 4³⁶), and his act of self-sacrifice on behalf of the cause he served may have predisposed the honest-minded among his compatriots to listen to him with peculiar attention. Mark, too, was a Hellenist and had Cyprian blood in his veins. The prophets, according to the late and unreliable Acts of Barnabas (Περίοδοι Βαρνάβα), had no honour in their own country, and Barnabas suffered martyrdom. Mark may then have passed to Egypt, and traditions certainly point that way. Eusebius (HE ii. 16), Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 8), the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46), and Epiphanius (Hær. li. 6) unite in their testimony on the point. Though their details will not precisely fit, we may possibly regard Mark as the founder of the Christian Church in Alexandria and as its first bishop. Jerome makes out that he died there in A.D. 62 ('Mortuus est autem octavo Neronis anno et sepultus Alexandria succedente sibi Anniano'). But 'the statement seems to be merely an unsound inference from the Eusebian date for the succession of Annianus' (Swete², p. xxvii) to the see of Alexandria.

3. With Paul.—Shall we say, then, that Mark returned from his Egyptian journey, his spurs won? He reappears in Paul's favour and serves under his direction. The Gentile Apostle commands that welcome be given him at Colossæ (Col 4¹⁰)—if he come. Is there just a touch of Paul's old distrust of Mark in the hypothetical phrase? He does not seem to have actually reached Colossæ. The lure of Egypt may have drawn him there instead. Later still he is stationed somewhere between Ephesus and Rome (2 Ti 4¹¹). Paul may have used his now trusted companion as a deputy to various churches. But particularly he had need of him often at the home base (Rome): there 'the ἱκνηρῆς of the first missionary journey became the σινεργός of the Roman imprisonment' (Col 4¹¹, Philm 4). The going Apostle needed just such personal services as Mark was specially fitted to give.

4. With Peter.—Assuming the genuineness of 1 Peter, we next find Mark, probably after the death of Paul, again in close touch with Peter. This apostle had helped to form Mark's early impressions by his visits to Mary's house, and claimed him by the affectionate title of son (ἱῶς), if indeed he was not a spiritual son (τέκνον). Now, if tradition be correct, he was destined to furnish Mark's mind with a treasure that has enriched the whole Christian Church. Peter spoke Aramaic ordinarily, and so he required an attendant who could translate easily into Greek. For this task of dragoman Mark was eminently suited. As his Latin name and Hellenistic descent implied, he was proficient in Greek as well as in Aramaic. As Peter preached Mark took mental note of his reminiscences of Jesus, and thence grew that memoir which is, or has become in expanded forms, the Second Gospel. The Fathers disagree as to how and when the compilation was made. Origen would even make Peter responsible for personal oversight of the work, but Irenæus is probably right in stating that it was after Peter's death that Mark wrote down the memoirs (cf. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel, p. 44 ff.).

5. In legend.—Later legend has been busy with the name of Mark. The most probable and earliest tradition is that already mentioned which links his name to Alexandria. A 7th cent. tradition speaks of a ministry in N. Italy, and from this springs Mark's association with Venice (notably the Church of St. Mark). Martyrologists claim him and represent him as dying a violent death by burning or by being dragged over stones. But the earliest mention of martyrdom is not of earlier date than the 4th or 5th cent. (Acta Marci).

The Acts of Barnabas profess to be written by the evangelist, but that compilation is of the 4th cent. at earliest. Attempts have been made to assign to him various books of the NT—Hebrews, the Apocalypse, Jude—but on quite inadequate grounds. A liturgy bears his name.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Swete, *Gospel acc. to St. Mark*², 1902, pp. xiii-xxviii; A. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel, 1901, Introduction, pp. 40-47; art. 'Mark, St.' in *EBR*¹¹, 'Mark (John)' in HDB, and 'Mark' in EBI; T. Zahn, NT Introd., Eng. tr., 1909, ii. 427 ff. For later legend cf. Molini, De vita et lipsaniis S. Marci Evangelistæ, ed. Fierlasi, 1884; R. A. Lipsius, Die apok. Apostelgeschichten und Apostellegenden, 1883-84; T. Schermann, Propheten- und Apostellegenden (TU, 3rd ser., i. [1907]).

JOHN DOW.

MARKET OF APPIUS.—See APPIUS, MARKET OF.

MARKET-PLACE.—Market-place (Ac 16¹⁹ 17¹⁷) is the translation of Gr. αγορά, which corresponds to Lat. forum. It was the favourite resort of the populace in a Greek city for social and political purposes. At Philippi St. Paul was taken there in order that he might be accused before the magistrates. This town being a colonia, the Roman custom, according to which the magistrates sat in the Forum, was followed. That St. Paul should preach in the Agora at Athens was only natural, since here he would find the greatest number of people gathered together. It was the new Roman Agora which lay to the north of the Acropolis in the Eretrian quarter. It was surrounded by porticoes of great beauty, embellished as they were by sculptures, and rich in associations dear to the heart of the Athenian. In the Stoa Basileios was the judgment-seat of the king archon; from the Stoa Poikile the Stoics received their name; and so forth. Here slaves were engaged in making purchases on behalf of their masters, students and philosophers met for conversation and discussion, and nobles lounged in easy state. It was the one place where general attention could be drawn to the new preaching.

F. W. WORSLEY.

MARKS, STIGMATA.—The word stigma, in addition to its literal and moral use, is employed technically in botany, anatomy, pathology, zoology, and geometry. The only uses that fail to be considered are the literal, moral, and pathological.

A στίγμα (from vb. στίζω; cf. Lat. stimulus, Germ. stecken, Eng. 'stick,' 'sting') is a mark upon the body produced by pricking, cutting, or branding. In the East such marking was very common in ancient times, and even yet cases may be found, though they are rare (Mrs. W. M. Ramsay, Everyday Life in Turkey, London, 1903, p. 7). The wounds were prevented from healing quickly so that broad scars might be produced. Sometimes, with the same end in view, coloured matter was rubbed into the brand-mark. These signs of ownership were impressed upon certain classes of the community.

(1) Temple-slaves (ιερόδουλοι) were branded with some token of the deity worshipped. See Herod. ii. 113: δρεω ἀνθρώπων ἐπιβαλῆται στίγματα ἰδᾶ, ἐωυτὸν διδοὺς τῷ θεῷ, οὐκ ἔξεστι τοῦτον ἀψασθαι, also vii. 233; Lucian, de Dea Syr. § 59, στίζονται δὲ πάντες οἱ μὲν ἐς καρποὺς οἱ δὲ ἐς αὐχένας; Philo, de Monarch. i. 8, ἐν τοῖς σώμασι καταστίζοντες αὐτὴν σιδήρῳ πεπυρωμένῳ πρὸς ἀνεξάλειπτον διαμονήν, οὐδὲ γὰρ χρόνῳ ταῦτα διαμαρύνονται. Ptolemy Philopator commanded the Jews of Alexandria to be branded with an ivy-leaf, the symbol of Dionysius. See 3 Mac 2²⁹: τοὺς τε ἀπογραφομένους χαράσσεισθαι καὶ διὰ πυρὸς εἰς τὸ σῶμα παραστήμῳ Διονύσου κισσοφύλλῳ; cf. Rev 13^{16, 17}: 'And he caused all, the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free and the bond, that there be given them a mark on their right hand, or upon their forehead ('in fronte, propter professionem: in manu, propter operationem' [Aug. Civ. Dei, xx. 9. 3]); and that no man should be able to buy or to sell, save he that hath the mark, even the name of the beast or the number of his name.' Sometimes the foreheads of the martyrs were branded with the name of Christ. Note also the references to the 'sealing' in Rev 7 14¹, 2 Mac 6⁷, 3 Mac 7³ 14¹ 22⁴.

(2) Household-slaves.—The Greeks and Romans branded those who were re-captured after attempting to escape, and those of bad behaviour. The common method was to press upon the forehead a red-hot iron with embossed letters. This custom is mentioned by Pliny (HN xviii. 3), Varro (de Re Rustica, i. 18), Suetonius (Calig. xxvii.), and other classical writers. Such slaves were called στυγματῆαι, literati, notati, inscripti, and were held in disgrace. Slaves of good character were not branded as a general rule (Pseudo-Phocyl. 212: στίγματα μὴ γράφης ἐπονείδισθον θεράποντα; Seneca, de Benef. iv. 37, 38).

(3) Captives taken in war were occasionally marked with the stigma of the captor.

(4) Soldiers sometimes bore on their bodies the name of their commander. So some Christians marked their hands and arms with the name of Christ or the sign of the cross (Deyling, Observationes sacrae, Leipzig, 1720–26, iii. 423–427).

The word στίγμα is used by St. Paul in Gal 6¹ only: ἐγὼ γὰρ τα στίγματα τοῦ [κυρίου, TR] Ἰησοῦ ἐν τῷ σώματι μου βαστάζω; Vulg.: 'Ego enim stigmata Domini Jesu in corpore meo porto'; RV 'for I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus.' Most modern commentators hold the view that St. Paul had in mind the ιεροδούλος, or Temple-slave, bearing the stigma of the deity worshipped. This custom would be well known in that part of Asia Minor, where the worship of Cybele was celebrated. A slave of this class is mentioned in a Galatian inscription (Textier, Asie Mineure, 1835, i. 135). Two objections to this theory have been raised. One is that St. Paul was not likely to refer to this custom because it was associated especially with the temple-women whose lives were notoriously immoral. The other is that St. Paul uses the simple form δοῦλος in his Epistles (cf. Ro 1¹, 1 Co 7²², 2 Co 4⁵, Gal 1¹⁰, Ph 1¹). He does not employ the compound word ιεροδούλος.

It is not likely that the Apostle had in mind the soldier, who deliberately marked himself with the name or token of his commander, as the context does not suggest any such idea, though elsewhere St. Paul manifests a liking for metaphors from military life (cf. 1 Co 9⁷, 2 Co 10⁴, Eph 6¹⁴, 1 Ti 6¹², 2 Ti 4⁷). That he refers here to the refractory slave, the runaway, the deserter from the army, is impossible.

In what sense did St. Paul use the word βαστάζω? It has a variety of meanings in the NT. It is employed for the taking up of stones (Jn 10³¹); for bearing the cross (Lk 14²⁷, Jn 19¹⁷); for undertaking a matter with calmness and sufficient strength (Jn 16¹², Gal 6⁵); for bearing the sentence of a judge (Gal 5¹⁰); for bearing or enduring (φέρειν is the classical word generally used) (Mt 20¹², Ac 15¹⁰, Ro 15¹, Gal 6³, Rev 2²⁴); for carrying (Mt 3¹¹, Mk 14¹³, Lk 7¹⁴ 22¹⁰, Rev 17, and passive in Ac 3² 21³⁵); for carrying knowledge by preaching (Ac 9¹⁵); for carrying on the person (Lk 10⁴, Gal 6¹⁷); for carrying the foetus in the womb (Lk 11²⁷); for sustaining (Ro 11¹⁸); for bearing away or carrying off (Mt 8¹⁷, Jn 12⁶ 20¹⁵). In this same chapter (Gal 6²⁻⁵; cf. 5¹⁰) the word is used in connexion with the bearing of burdens, and probably means 'bear as a burden' in 6¹⁷. There is, however, a suggestion of something more. Chrysostom's idea (Com. in loc.) has much to commend it: οὐκ εἶπεν, ἔχω, ἀλλὰ, βαστάζω, ὥστε τις ἐπὶ τροπαίοις μέγα φρονῶν ἢ σημείῳ βασιλικοῖς; cf. 2 Co 4¹⁰. No doubt he referred to the marks left upon him by the scourgings, stonings, imprisonments, privations, and toils of his missionary career (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 107, 304). On the pages of his flesh his personal history was inscribed (see 2 Co 11²⁴⁻²⁸). These stigmata proved that Christ was his Master, Commander, Owner. The metaphor was ready to his hand. In the dungeon everything suggested ownership—the marked walls, the marked chains, the marked slaves, the marked soldiers. He too was no longer his own but Another's. The servant was not a mere hiring, but a possession, made secure by the unbreakable bonds of mutual affection. It is significant that in the Epistle to the Romans, written soon after the Galatian letter, St. Paul describes himself as a δοῦλος, 'slave,' 'bond-servant' of Jesus Christ (Ro 1¹), distinctly adopting that title for the first time. This term is found in Phil., Tit., James, 2 Pet., Jude, 'showing that as the Apostolic Age progressed the assumption of the title became established on a broad basis' (Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans' 5, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 3).

Deissmann suggests that the stigmata were prophylactic against trouble and evil (Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895, p. 266 f.), but this view is not in harmony with the spirit of the Galatian Epistle in general, and the closing passage in particular. To understand Gal 6¹⁷ it is necessary to note Gal 1⁸⁻¹², 15¹, 21⁹, 41²⁻³⁰, and compare 2 Co 4¹⁰. Possibly the scars caused Lysias to conclude that St. Paul was the Egyptian bandit (Ac 21³⁸; cf. J. H. Moulton, ExpT xxi. [1909–10] 283–284).

Not only did the Apostle bear the physical stigmata, but he displayed also the spiritual 'marks of Jesus'—love, gentleness, humility, unselfishness (Jn 13³⁵, Ph 2⁵, 2 Ti 2²⁴).

In the 'Age of Faith,' in reality the 'Dark Age,' many believed that the body of the Apostle bore marks resembling the wound-prints on the body of the Crucified Jesus. A similar belief prevailed with regard to St. Francis of Assisi, upon whose body the marks were impressed on 15th Sept. 1224 by a seraph with six wings. Bonaventura says, 'Jam enim propter stigmata Domini Je-u quæ in corpore tuo portas, nemo debet tibi esse molestus' (Life of St. Francis, 13. 4). These words were paraphrased afterwards by Aquinas as follows: 'portabat insignia passionis Christi,' but what he says subsequently proves that he did not accept the view of Bonaventura. Another very famous instance is that of St. Catherine of Siena. Altogether there are about ninety cases of stigmatization on record. It is alleged that in some cases all the marks were present; in others some were visible and the rest caused pain but produced no outward sign; in others, again, there was no visible mark at all, but local pains were felt. Occasionally the marks became visible after death. There are fewer cases of stigmatization recorded amongst men than amongst women.

Investigation has proved that some instances were fraudulent, others the result of self-mutilation (cf. Mt 19¹), and some owing to a kind of hysteria. But all cannot be explained, or explained away, in these ways. The influence of the mind upon the body is great and mysterious. Beaunis states that rubefaction and vesication have been produced by suggestion in the hypnotic state (Recherches expérimentales sur les conditions de l'activité cérébrale). In certain varieties of religious ecstasy a bloody sweat may leave a red mark upon the skin, and such marks are caused also by capillary congestion. It has been maintained that transudation of blood through an unbroken skin is an unknown and impossible phenomenon. Pathological facts probably gave rise to the belief that the stigmata of the crucified body of Jesus were seen upon some of His followers.

LITERATURE.—Artt. 'Cuttings in the Flesh' and 'Mark' in HDB, 'Stigmata' in DGC; Commentaries on Gal 6¹⁷, by H. A. W. Meyer (41862), H. Alford (51871), J. A. Beet (1335), J. B. Lightfoot (21596), W. M. Ramsay (1599); 'Stigmatization' in EB11 and 'Stigmatisation' in PRE3; Lives of St. Francis of Assisi by Thomas de Celano (ed. Rosedale, London, 1904) and St. Bonaventura (ed. Amoni, Rome, 1888), Mrs. Oliphant (2do., 1871), Paul Sabatier (Fr. ed. 2^e, Paris, 1899, Eng. tr., London, 1901, etc.); H. Beaunis, Recherches expérimentales sur les conditions de l'activité cérébrale, Paris, 1886; P. Dearmer, Body and Soul: An Inquiry into the Effects of Religion upon Health, London, 1909; ExpT xx. (1908-09) 455-86.

H. CARISS J. SIDNELL.

MARRIAGE.—1. Christian conception of marriage.—During the Apostolic Age the Church was both Jewish and Gentile, and its ideas on marriage had a double background in those of the OT and the heathen. The gravest danger was that the laxity of heathenism with regard to marriage should remain among the Gentile converts. In the heathen world, though the marriage ceremony was in some sort a sacred act, the marriage itself was looked on as an easily-broken contract which either party might dissolve at will. It is not surprising, therefore, that one of the earliest questions which the Corinthians put to St. Paul should be on the subject of marriage (1 Co 7¹). The Apostle, writing as he does to Gentiles, dwells on the fact that marriage is a remedy against sin (v.-; cf. also 1 Th 4³, whether with most modern commentators we interpret τὸ ἐαυτοῦ σκευός in that passage of a man's wife, or, with G. Milligan, of the human body, for the context implies marriage), and gives many warnings against heathen impurities (Ro 12²³ [idolatry and impurity inseparable] 6¹² 13¹⁴, 1 Co 5¹⁻⁹⁻¹¹ 6¹³⁻²⁰, 2 Co 12²¹, Gal 5¹⁶⁻²⁴, Eph 2² 4¹⁻¹⁹ ['as the Gentiles also walk'] 5³, Col 3⁵⁻⁸, 2 Ti 2⁻). Other NT writers give like warnings (1 P 1¹⁴ 2¹¹ 4², 2 P 2¹⁸, Jude 16. 18).

The Jews had a much higher conception of marriage than the heathen. Almost all of them were married, as is the case at the present day with practically the whole of the Christian, Jewish, and Muslim populations of the Near East—the exceptions are very few. They looked on the saying 'Be ye fruitful and multiply' (Gn 1²⁸) as a universal command. Marriage was a sacred duty and was considered most holy. 'The pious fasted before it, confessing their sins. It was regarded almost as a Sacrament. Entrance into the married state was thought to carry the forgiveness of sins' (Edersheim, LT i. 352 f.). Yet the Jews had not escaped from heathen contamination; not only was divorce extremely common (below, 7), but, as frequent passages in the OT show, impurities of all kinds had to be strongly repressed. In Eph 2² St. Paul does not acquit his own nation in this respect, contrasting the pronouns 'ye' (Gentiles) and 'we also' (Jews).

Our Lord greatly raised the conception of marriage, even as compared with that of the Jews of the time. It was a Divine institution, which made man and one wife to become one flesh, for God had joined them together (Mk 10⁵⁻⁹, Mt 19⁴⁻⁶, quoting Gn 2²⁻⁴). The primeval marriage, the idea of which was obscured by the hardness of man's heart, was revived, and the teaching about divorce (below, 7) was revolutionized. Nevertheless, marriage was intended only for this life, for there are no marriages in heaven (Mt 22³⁰, Mk 12²⁵, Lk 20³⁵—these passages, it is needless to say, do not teach that loved ones will be parted hereafter). Jesus chose a marriage feast for His first miracle (Jn 2¹⁷). Following the Master's teaching, St. Paul insists on the holiness of marriage in Eph 5¹⁻³² (cf. He 13⁴); the quotation from Genesis is repeated (v. 3¹), and marriage is said to symbolize the union between Christ and His Church (vv. 2³⁻²⁵)—a metaphor drawn out in the ancient homily known as 2 Clement (§ 14: 'the male is Christ, and the female is the Church'). Hence St. Paul dwells on the love that ought to exist between husband and wife, even as Christ loved the Church (vv. 2⁵ 23 33: cf. Col 3¹⁹). St. Peter in a corresponding passage (1 P 3⁷) dwells rather on the honour due by the husband to his wife; and both apostles, speaking of the duty of wives to husbands in these passages, rather dwell on their subjection to their consorts [see FAMILY, § 2 (a)], though in Tit 2¹¹ the love of the wife to the husband is mentioned as well as her subjection. In 1 Co 7³⁷ St. Paul reminds married persons that they no longer are mere individuals, but belong to one another, and must not refuse cohabitation with one another except by consent for a season.

2. Christian conception of celibacy.—We must remember that celibacy was extremely uncommon both among the Jews and among the heathen in the first ages of the Church. It was not part of the Nazirite's vow (Nu 6³⁻⁵), though no doubt many Nazirites, like John Baptist (if indeed he was one of them), were celibates. And there were some, but not all, of the Essenes who preached the duty of abstinence from marriage, and admitted members to their body only after a probation of three years to test their continency (Josephus, BJ II. viii. 2, 7). In them we see the germ of Gnostic dualism, which taught the inherent evil of matter (Lightfoot, Colossians, ed. 1900, p. 85; see also his essay on this sect, p. 375 ff.). In this respect the Essenes were in direct antagonism with the Pharisees, who strongly supported marriage; but they had some influence in promoting Christian celibacy in the post-Apostolic Age. Among the heathen celibacy can hardly be said to have existed.

Our Lord, while teaching, as we have seen, the holiness of marriage, nevertheless commended celibacy for those 'to whom it is given' and who are 'able to receive it'; for so we must interpret the phrase 'which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake' (Mt 19¹²). As St.

Paul says (1 Co 7⁷), 'each man hath his own gift from God, one after this manner, and another after that.' Nowhere in the NT is marriage referred to as a state inferior to that of celibacy, however much the latter may be commended under certain circumstances to certain persons. And so, probably, we are to interpret our Lord's words about leaving 'house, or wife, or brethren, or parents, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake' (Lk 18²⁹; in || Mt 19²⁹, Mk 10²⁹ the best MSS omit 'or wife'). He could not have counselled a man to desert his wife or children if he had them. J. Wordsworth suggests (Ministry of Grace, London, 1901, p. 207) that the words may also include leaving an unbelieving and unfaithful wife, or a temporary separation by agreement, when the husband has to go to a part of the world where he cannot take a family (1 Co 7⁵ is somewhat analogous).

In the teaching of St. Paul we notice a certain change of view between the earlier and later Epistles. (a) In the earlier Epistles the Apostle plainly expected that the Parousia was imminent (cf. 1 Th 4¹⁷: 'we that are alive, that are left'; 1 Co 16⁻ and perhaps 15⁹¹). If that were the case, the increase of the race would not be of primary importance; and therefore, while marriage was entirely lawful (1 Co 7²⁻³), and indeed imperative for those who had not the gift of continency (vv. 2⁻⁹), celibacy was encouraged. 'It is good for a man not to touch a woman'; 'I would that all men were even as I myself'; 'it is good for them if they abide even as I' (vv. 1⁻⁷); 'it is good for a man to be as he is'—whether married or single (v. 28). Yet St. Paul does not say that celibacy is a higher state, but only that it is expedient by reason of the present distress (v. 6), because the time is shortened (v. 23), and he would have Christians free from cares (v. 32). The lawfulness of marriage is further emphasized by the assertion of the right to marry by St. Paul himself, 'even as the rest of the apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas' (9⁵). The meaning of these words is not quite plain; Cephas certainly was married (Mt 8¹⁴, Lk 4³⁸), but were all the other apostles and all our Lord's four brethren in like case? If so, why is Cephas mentioned separately? To the last question there is no clear answer, but the whole verse seems to show, especially in view of Jewish customs (see above), that at least a majority of the apostles and of our Lord's brethren were married, and that the married state was not inconsistent with the work of a travelling missionary. As a comment on this we have the fact that Aquila, a great Christian worker, travelled about with his wife Prisca (Ac 18⁻⁴, Ro 16³, 1 Co 16¹⁹, 2 Ti 4¹⁹). (b) In the Epistles of the Captivity marriage is mentioned as the normal state, and nothing is said in favour of celibacy (Eph 5^{31a}, Col 3¹²; cf. 1 P 3¹⁻⁷), while we notice also that in these Epistles little is said of the nearness of Christ's coming (Ph 4⁵ stands alone). (c) In the Pastoral Epistles marriage is recommended, or as some think required, for the local clergy (1 Ti 3²⁻⁴, Tit 1⁶; see HOME), and is also advised for young women (1 Ti 5¹⁴ AV, RVm) or for young widows (RV). Whatever may be the force of the phrase 'husband of one wife' (μίας γυναικὸς ἀνδρα) as excluding certain persons from the ministry (see below, § 5), the whole context would appear to show that St. Paul desired his local officials, the presbyters ('bishops') and deacons, to be, at least as a rule, married men, just as the Orthodox Eastern Church demands at the present day that her parish priests should be married, and that their wives should be alive. This does not depend on the untenable exegesis which makes μίας the indefinite article ('husband of a wife'), but on the word 'husband' and the context. There might perhaps be exceptions, of which the Apostle does not stop to speak. We must always bear in mind that it is a mistake to interpret a biblical passage with reference to the bearing that it has on later Christian practice; a disciplinary rule, by its nature, is not intended to be for all time, however suitable it may have been for the First Age. Another passage in these Epistles may also be noticed. St. Paul denounces as a heresy the prohibition of marriage (1 Ti 4³); though this does not involve any change of view as compared with the earlier Epistles. In what has been here said, the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles is assumed; if this be not allowed, the alteration of the Christian view as to the expediency of celibacy between the earlier and the later periods still holds good. But no argument against the Pauline authorship must be deduced from it, for a change of view is very natural in the course of a decade or more, during which a longer experience showed that the early expectation of Jesus' immediate return was founded on a too hasty assumption; and, moreover, the Epistles of the Captivity serve as a bridge between the earlier and the later views.

In the apostolic period we read of a few persons who led the celibate life. St. Paul himself was unmarried (1 Co 7¹⁻⁹); so were the four daughters of Philip the Evangelist who 'prophesied' (Ac 21⁹); St. John Evangelist was frequently known in the early Church as ὁ παρθένος, as in the 3rd cent. Gnostic work Pistis Sophia; Tertullian had already called him a 'celibate (spado) of Christ' (de Monogam. 17). It is not quite easy to say who are meant by the 'virgins' (mase) of Rev 14⁴. The word is interpreted by Tertullian (de Res. Carn. 27, referring to Mt 19⁻) of celibates; but Swete (Com. in loc.) gives good reasons for thinking that it must apply to married as well as unmarried chastity, and 'be taken metaphorically, as the symbolical character of the Book suggests. . . . No exclusion of the married from the highest blessings of the Christian life finds a place in the NT.'

In interpreting the NT it is of some importance to note the comments of those writers who immediately followed the apostles. Ignatius' idea of celibacy (Polyc. 5) does not go further than our Lord's teaching. 'My sisters' (he says) are to love the Lord and be content with their spouses (συμβίαις) in flesh and spirit; 'my brothers' are to love their spouses as the Lord loved the Church (cf. Eph 5⁻). If anyone can abide in purity (ἀγγελία, i.e. 'virginity') to the honour of the flesh of the Lord (cf. 1 Co 6¹⁵), let him abide without boasting. If he boast, he is lost; and if it be known beyond the bishop (πλεον τοῦ ἐπισκόπου: not 'if he be more famous than the bishop'), he is corrupted. All who marry should do so with the consent of the bishop, that the marriage may be after the Lord (cf. 1 Co 7³⁹). Thus, in Ignatius' opinion, the bishop is to be taken into the confidence both of those who marry and of those who wish to remain celibates; in the latter case the intention must not be noised abroad. Similarly Clement of Rome (ad Cor. i. 38) says: 'He that is pure (αγνός) in the flesh, let him be so, and not boast, knowing that it is Another who bestows his continence (ἐγκρατεῖαν) upon him.' We note that both Ignatius and Clement use αγνός or αγνεία of celibacy, though they do not say that celibacy is the higher state. Hermas, on the other hand, in his Shepherd (Mand. iv. 4), describes the chastity both of the married and of the unmarried as αγνεία. The phrase of Ignatius, 'virgins who are called widows' (Smyrn. 13), has been much discussed. It can hardly mean unmarried women included in the order of widows, for Ignatius in that case would have omitted in his salutation all those who were literally widows, and such a custom is treated as unheard of by Tertullian (de Virg. Vel. 9); and 'virgins' is therefore probably to be interpreted symbolically as in Rev 14¹ (above), of women who are pure in heart (see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii.: 'S. Ignatius and S. Polycarp,' London, 1889, ii. 323 f.).

3. Marriage ceremonies.—The betrothal preceded the actual marriage by several months, but not by more than a year (Edersheim, op. cit. i. 354). It is referred to in 2 Co 11-, where St. Paul says that he betrothed (ἡρυσσάμην, here only in the NT) the Corinthians to Christ; cf. Dt 28³⁰, Pr 19¹⁴. In arranging for the betrothal, the intended bridegroom took no part, and matters were settled, as they still are in the East, by the respective parents, or, if they were not alive, by the brother or nearest relative. In the parable the father is said to make a marriage, or a marriage feast (ποιεῖν γάμον), for his son (Mt 22²); so in the OT, Gn 24³ (Abraham and his steward for Isaac) 34⁴⁻⁸ (Hamor for Shechem) 38⁶ (Judah for Er), Jg 14¹⁻¹⁰ (Manoah for Samson). When the father was not available, the mother sometimes acted, as when Hagar acted for Ishmael (Gn 21²¹) or the mother for her son (2 Es 9⁴). It is instructive to see how marriage customs, as well as others, persistently survive in the East from biblical times, and we find that among the Oriental Christians of to-day the same practice obtains (Maclean-Browne, Catholicos of the East, p. 144); courtship in the Western sense of the term is little known, and the courting is done by the parents. The betrothal, having been accomplished by crowning with garlands and with some ceremony (Edersheim, loc. cit.), was, and is, absolutely binding, and a breach of it is treated as adultery in Dt 22²⁴ (cf. v. 23, Lv 19²⁰); this is illustrated by the position of Joseph as a betrothed husband in Mt 1¹⁹. It is suggested by Plummer (HDB i. 326) that the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8⁴) was betrothed, not married, as she was to be stoned, not strangled. This may be so, since stoning is mentioned in Dt 22²⁴, but not in Lv 20¹⁰, which gives the death-penalty for the adultery of married persons. Yet in Ezk 16³³⁻⁴⁰ married adulteresses seem to be meant, and there stoning is mentioned. Strangling was a later form of execution.

The night procession is perhaps the principal feature of the marriage. The bridegroom goes to fetch the bride at night, as in the parable of the Ten Virgins, and brings her to his house at midnight (Mt 25⁶), with lamps—not, according to Edersheim (ii. 455) and Trench (Parables, 248), with torches, as the Roman custom was. These lamps were placed in a hollow cup, affixed to a long pole. A relic of this custom is seen in the present day among the East Syrians (Nestorians), who have the procession in the daytime, but carry two unlighted candles before the bride (Catholicos of the East, p. 153); in their case the bridegroom does not fetch his bride himself, but sends his father or friends, whence the usual expression for 'to marry a son' is 'to bring a bride for him' (ib.). A reference to these lamps has been seen in 2 Es 10⁷, but this seems to refer to the lights in the guest-room. Before the bridegroom comes, the bride makes herself ready (Rev 19⁷) with the bath; this was the custom, and seems to be referred to in Eph 5²⁶⁻²⁷. The herald going before the bridegroom and crying, 'Behold the bridegroom, come ye forth to meet him' (Mt 25⁶), is a common feature of Eastern life, in which an expected magnate is usually preceded by such an announcement. But in the parable was the bridegroom returning with his bride to his own house, or going to fetch her? The latter view is taken by Edersheim (ii. 454 ff.), who thinks that the bridegroom was coming from a distance to the wedding in the bride's house; but the other view, held by most commentators, is much more probable. Normally the wedding is in the bridegroom's house, and in the absence of any requirement of the parable to the contrary the usual custom must be assumed. And there is an early interpretation of the meaning; the words 'and the bride' are added to Mt 25¹ by DXZ, Syr-sin, Syr-psh, Vulg., Arm., some Fathers, and some cursives. There is no doubt that these words are an interpolation, but their addition shows that the authorities named understood the bridegroom to be returning with his bride. It is true that in the best text she is not mentioned; but that is because she is not needed for the purpose of the parable. In a village it would be natural for some of the virgin friends of either party to await the couple outside the place of marriage; and, indeed, our own custom, by which the bridesmaids go to the door of the church to await the bride, is exactly parallel.

No benediction of the marriage is mentioned in the NT, though it will be remembered that the feast itself was a religious act, as was the Agape (ERE i. 166, 173 f.). According to Edersheim (i. 355) it was customary among the Jews for the benediction to take place immediately before the supper; a blessing was said over a cup, and presumably the bride and bridegroom drank of it. A benediction seems to be implied in Ignatius, Polyc. 5, where the 'consent' of the bishop is required (above, §2); and it, with a nuptial Eucharist, is expressly mentioned in Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii. 8. For the present custom among Eastern Christians see Catholicos of the East, p. 151. The benediction, which is much overshadowed by the marriage feast, should take place among the E. Syrians in church, but in practice is usually in the house; a little consecrated earth from the martyrs' tombs and the ring are put into a cup of wine and water, and both parties drink of it. They are crowned with threads of red, blue, and white, and many prayers are said.

The marriage supper follows the benediction, when the bridegroom has returned with his bride; γάμος and γαμοί properly mean this (Mt 22²⁴), and then come to mean marriage in general, as in He 13¹. The feast is given by the bridegroom's father (Mt 22²) or by himself; Samson provided it, though he came from a distance, and this is said to have been the custom of the time (Jg 14¹⁰). The supper was prolonged till late in the night (Lk 12^{36, 38}). The parable of the marriage of the king's son (Mt 22¹⁻¹⁴, apparently quite a different incident from that of Lk 14¹⁶⁻²⁴) gives an account of it. To refuse an invitation to it without good cause was counted a great insult (Mt 22⁷), for to be bidden at all was an honour; the bidding to the marriage of the Lamb conveys a blessing (Rev 19⁹; cf. Lk 14¹⁵). Before the supper a servant goes to summon the invited guests (Mt 22³⁴; cf. Est 6¹⁴); and this continues to this day in the East, where the absence of clocks makes the custom necessary. At the feast the guests are arranged in order according to their rank (Lk 14¹²). Not only is the bride arrayed in 'fine linen, bright and pure' (Rev 19⁸), but each guest wears a wedding garment (ἐνδύμα γάμου, Mt 22¹¹); the lack of it is an insult, whether or not we are to suppose a reference to the custom of giving garments as presents by kings and great men in the East (so Edersheim, Trench) —and refusing a gift is ever a sign of contempt (cf. the story of Esau and Jacob's presents, Gn 33); in the parable no excuse is offered. The feast lasts for seven or fourteen days (Gn 29²⁷, Jg 14¹², To 8¹⁹), and during this time all fasting is superseded (Mt 2¹⁹; cf. Edersheim, i. 663). The bride and bridegroom are treated as king and queen, and are crowned (cf. above), and the bride veiled (Gn 29^{23, 25}: this is why Jacob did not discover Laban's fraud).

The friend of the bridegroom (ὁ φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου, Jn 3²) is the same as the παράνυμφος or πάροχος γάμων (Aristophanes, Av. 1740) of ancient Greece; he accompanied the bridegroom to fetch the bride—in Palestine, no doubt, then as now, on horseback, but formerly among the Greeks in a chariot, for πάροχος means 'one who sits beside another in a chariot' (ὄχος). The corresponding feminine is παράνυμφος, the 'bridesmaid' (in Latin paranymphus is a 'bridesman,' while paranympha is a 'bridesmaid'). The 'friend of the bridegroom,' then, was the best man; according to Eidersheim (i. 148, 354 f.) his office was well known in Judæa, but did not exist in Galilee, and therefore he is not mentioned in Jn 2. But who, then, was the 'ruler of the feast' (ἀρχιτρίκλινος) in Jn 2⁹? Souter (DCG ii. 540) supposes that he was a steward or head waiter; but his language to the bridegroom is too familiar for this. More probably he was one of the guests (so apparently also in Sir 32¹), who was entrusted with the management of the feast, but did not in any way provide it himself; he compliments the bridegroom on doing this so successfully.

The sons of the bridechamber (Mt 9¹³, Mk 2¹³, Lk 5¹⁴) are the bridegroom's companions (cf. Jg 14¹¹—Samson had thirty of them), or probably (Eidersheim) all the guests. They may even include the bridesmaids (cf. Ps 45¹⁴ and the Ten Virgins of Mt 25).

After the marriage the bridegroom was excused military service for a year (Dt 24⁶; cf. Lk 14⁶), and also between the betrothal and the marriage (Dt 20⁷). For bride and bridegroom see also FAMILY.

4. Monogamy, polygamy, and bigamy.—The two last are not directly forbidden in the NT, but their unlawfulness for Christians is assumed. Among the Jews polygamy had greatly decreased since the time of the patriarchs, and at the commencement of the Christian era was little practised. This was perhaps largely in consequence of Roman influence. Josephus says, indeed, that it was sometimes found among the later Jews (BJ i. xxiv. 2, Ant. xvii. i. 2 f.). He is speaking of Herod and his sons, who were not pure Jews; yet their polygamy was not condemned by public opinion. In both passages it is implied that, though an old Jewish custom, it was uncommon. In Josephus' account of the laws of Moses (Ant. iv. viii. 23) two wives (at a time) are mentioned; but this throws no light on the custom of the later Jews. Polygamy among Jews in the 2nd cent. A.D. is, however, mentioned by Justin Martyr (Dial. 134). For Christians it was inconsistent with Jesus' elevated teaching about marriage, which assumes monogamy. W. P. Paterson points out (HDB iii. 265^a) that in the OT itself the polygamy of the patriarchs is spoken of apologetically. Noah was monogamous (Gn 7⁷); and monogamy was held to be symbolical of God's union with Israel (Hos 2^{19c}), while polygamy was symbolical of idolatry. We may also notice that spiritual monogamy is emphasized by St. Paul in 2 Co 11², where 'to one husband' is emphatic; he is speaking of God's union with His Church. It should be remembered that in most or all countries where polygamy is allowed, it is not in practice very common, because only the rich can afford more than one wife. Thus at the present day the great majority of Muslims are monogamous, though their law allows them four wives and an unlimited number of concubines.*

* In the 3rd and 4th cents. the Church had some difficulty with regard to the reception of heathens who had concubines. The Church Orders do not allow Christians to keep concubines; if a man has one and desires to become a Christian he must marry her or leave her (Egyptian Church Order, § 41, Ap. Const. viii. 32 [ed. Funk], Testament of our Lord, ii. 2); and

5. Digamy.—The re-marriage of widows and widowers stands on an entirely different basis from polygamy, and, though it was disliked by many Christians in the early ages of the Church, it was regarded by all, or almost all, as permissible. St. Paul allows it to widows (Ro 7^{2c}, 1 Co 7³⁹), and no reproach attaches to those who practise it, though the Apostle thinks that widowhood will give greater happiness than re-marriage (1 Co 7⁴⁰; see above, 2). If with RV we render νεωτέρας in 1 Ti 5¹⁴ 'younger widows' (AV and RVm 'younger women'), he encourages or commands digamy in some cases. 'I desire that' they 'marry, bear children, rule the household.' But it seems probable that he did not approve of 'digamy' for his local clergy, or the 'widows' who are on the Church roll, supported by the Church (1 Ti 5^{9, 10}). These widows must be over threescore years old, 'having been the wife of one man' (v. 9). This phrase, at least, is unambiguous (the participle γεγονυῖα applies both to this and to the preceding clause); it excludes bigamy, digamy, and marriage after divorce alike. The meaning of the qualification of the 'bishop' or 'presbyter,' that he 'must be . . . the husband of one wife' (1 Ti 3², so Tit 1⁶), a qualification repeated in the case of deacons in 1 Ti 3⁹, is on the negative side less clear; for the qualification on the positive side, see above, 2. It has been variously interpreted as forbidding, in the case of the Christian minister, polygamy, digamy, or marriage entered upon after a divorce—which for simplicity, and so as not to complicate the issue, we may suppose to have taken place in the clergyman's heathen days—or after a separation such as that contemplated in 1 Co 7¹⁵ (see below, 6 (b)). In favour of the phrase referring to polygamy, it has been said that as the Jews sometimes practised it in the apostolic period (above, 4), probably some Christians followed their example. But there is no evidence of Christian polygamy; and the very fact that the apostles did not find it necessary to forbid it explicitly prevents us from thinking that St. Paul merely meant that a 'bishop' or deacon must not be a polygamist. If this were the meaning, the prohibition of polygamy to the clergy would imply that it was not uncommon among the laity. We may therefore safely dismiss this view. No Christian would be allowed to be a polygamist. The other two interpretations may well be joined together, and that they give the true meaning of the phrase* is confirmed by the injunction about widows (1 Ti 5¹⁰). This clearly forbids the reception on the roll of a widow who at any time of her life has had, by divorce, or death, or otherwise, more than one husband. It is true that a widow, and a fortiori a widower, may lawfully marry again (above) after the death of their spouses; but a higher standard is required in the case of the clergy. It is necessary here again to remark that a disciplinary regulation, even of St. Paul, is not intended to be a cast-iron law for all time. But that it was a desirable regulation in the Apostolic Age we can well understand, for there was a considerable prejudice against digamy; and, however this is evidently the meaning of Can. of Hippolytus, xvi. [ed. Achelis, § 80], which says that a Christian who has lived with a single (specialis) concubine, who has borne him a son, must not cast her off, i.e. he must marry her. The clause common to these books apparently comes from their lost original, which may not improbably be assigned to Hippolytus, and be dated soon after A.D. 200. But some of these Orders say that under some circumstances a concubine of a heathen may herself be received.

* The Church Orders, if they deal with the matter at all, interpret the injunction of digamy, and some of them extend the prohibition to the minor orders (Maclean, Ancient Church Orders, Cambridge, 1910, p. 92). The Orthodox Eastern Church (see above, a) does not allow her parish priests to marry again after the death of their wives. In that case they must leave their parishes, and they usually enter a monastery. Marriage after ordination is not treated of in the NT.

unreasonable the prejudice might be, it was well not to give unnecessary offence to public opinion. This prejudice may be seen, for example, in Josephus, Ant. xvii. xiii. 4, where Glaphyra is reprimanded for re-marriage, in a vision, by her first husband; this was also a case of forbidden degrees, for her first and third husbands were brothers. Perseverance in widowhood was commended not only in the NT (Lk 2²⁷, 1 Co 7⁴⁰), but by the heathen Romans (Josephus, Ant. xviii. vi. 6: Antonia, widow of Drusus). In the 2nd cent. Hermas says (Mand. iv. 4) that digamy is not a sin, but that a widow [or widower] who remains single is commended. So Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 12), commenting on St. Paul, says that one who re-marries does not sin, but that he does not follow the most perfect course.

Digamy in a man was much less disliked than in a woman. The 'Epiphanian' view of the Brethren of our Lord, that they were Joseph's children by a former marriage, would hardly have been possible in the 4th cent. if there had been a very strong prejudice against a widower marrying again. Third and fourth marriages were strongly reprobated in the early Church (see ERE iii. 493).

6. Prohibited marriages.—We may in this section discuss certain prohibitions against marriage, leaving aside for the moment the question of marriage after divorce (see 7).

(a) Forbidden degrees.—Whatever were the forbidden degrees in the OT, they appear to have remained unaltered in NT times. There are a few passages which deal with the subject. In 1 Co 5¹⁻⁵ St. Paul deals with the case of a Corinthian who took his father's wife, evidently his stepmother, not his own mother. It is not quite clear if the father was alive; if 2 Co 7¹² refers to the same incident, as appears to the present writer the more probable supposition, he was alive; but if so, it is not clear whether he had divorced his wife and the son had married her. In any case, the inference is that even if it were only a case of marriage between a son and a stepmother it would be repugnant to the Apostle, as it would be even to the better heathen. Otherwise a heathen would have got over the difficulty by the father divorcing his wife and the son then marrying her; but the marriage or adultery of persons so closely related by affinity had shocked both Christians and heathens alike. Another case is that of Herod Antipas and Herodias his brother Philip's wife (Mk 6¹⁷). Here again it is immaterial whether Philip was alive or dead, or whether Herodias had been divorced; the connexion would be prohibited in any event (Lv 18¹⁶): 'it is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife' (she was also niece of both her husbands). Ramsay thinks (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 43) that the prohibited degrees are probably referred to in the Apostolic Letter (Ac 15²⁰⁻²¹), and he understands 'fornication' there to mean marriage within these degrees. Others deny this, and say that Gentile Christians had to be reminded that fidelity to the marriage bond was not a matter of indifference, and that fornication and idolatry went hand in hand. But it is not quite easy to see why this sin alone of all others is mentioned in the Letter, coupled as it is with such ceremonial injunctions as not eating things strangled or with the blood; and Ramsay's view appears to deserve greater support than it has generally received. The Letter, which is somewhat of the nature of a compromise, indicates what part of the Mosaic Law the Gentile Christians, to avoid scandal, ought to keep. The existence of prohibited degrees may be partly due in their origin to the general feeling that those of the same household, where several families (in the Western sense) lived in one house (see FAMILY), should not intermarry; and it is a striking fact that the East Syrian Christians, who have preserved the custom of several families living under one roof, have considerably extended the Table of Forbidden Degrees (Catholicos of the East, p. 146 f.).

The custom of the levirate does not affect this question. It was a special provision of the OT to prevent the dying out of a family (see ADORPTION). It was perhaps still practised in NT times, as it is referred to by the Sadducees, almost as if still existing, in Mt 22²⁸, Mk 12²⁸, Lk 20²⁸ (note παρ' ἡμῶν, Mt.). But at least it was obsolescent.

(b) Mixed marriages.—The Israelites in the OT had frequently been urged not to intermarry with the heathen nations, especially with the Canaanites (Dt 7³; cf. Nu 23⁶, etc.); and mixed marriages were one of the great troubles of Ezra and Nehemiah in restoring the captivity of the people (Ezr 9¹², Neh 13²⁸, etc.). The strict Jew would, like St. Peter, think it unlawful 'to join himself or come unto one of another nation' (Ac 10²⁸). Yet there were, both in OT and in NT times, many cases of mixed marriages, of which that of Timothy's parents is a later example (Ac 16¹; there seems to be a reference to it in Gal 2³, where St. Paul says that Titus, being a Greek, was not compelled to be circumcised—he was doubtless thinking of Timothy's circumcision, Ac 16³). For OT mixed marriages in practice see Ru 1⁴, 1 K 7¹⁴, 2 Ch 24², etc., besides the alliances of the kings. In dealing with Christian marriage, St. Paul tolerates the union of Christians with heathen (or Jews?) only when it has been entered into before conversion; in such a case the parties should continue to live together if the unbelieving partner is willing (1 Co 7¹²⁻¹⁶; see below, 7); the reason given is not only the well-being of the non-Christian spouse, but also that of the children (v. 14)—'now are they holy,' words which perhaps refer to the probability that the children of one Christian parent, if not separated from the other spouse, will be brought up in the faith. Marriage between one already a Christian and an unbeliever is forbidden: 'Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers' (2 Co 6¹⁴)—though these words have a wider application than marriage). If a widow re-marries, it must be 'in the Lord,' i.e. the second husband must be a Christian (1 Co 7³⁹). St. Peter's reference to mixed marriages (1 P 3¹) probably deals with a marriage before conversion and is parallel with 1 Co 7¹². The prohibition of mixed marriages among the Jews extended to those of free men and women with slaves (Josephus, Ant. iv. viii. 23). There is nothing on this head in the NT.

7. Divorce.—Whatever view we take of some controverted texts, there can be no doubt that our Lord completely revolutionized men's ideas on this subject. With the heathen divorce was the easiest possible thing; it was open to a husband or to a wife to terminate the marriage at will. The Roman satirist scoffs at the woman who had eight husbands in five autumns (Juvenal, Sat. vi. 224 ff.). Things were not much better with the Jews, though there was a difference of opinion among the Rabbis. Some held that a man could 'put away his wife for every cause,' interpreting the 'unseemly thing' of Dt 24¹ as anything for which he may dislike her. The great Hillel is said to have held this view, and Josephus so understood the matter (Ant. iv. viii. 23); this is probably what our Lord refers to in speaking of the bill of divorcement (Mt 5³¹). Others held that the husband could give his wife a bill of divorcement only if she were guilty of adultery, interpreting the 'unseemly thing' in this stricter sense (Edersheim, ii. 332 ff.).

Divorce was forbidden by our Lord, with at most one exception (Mt 5³², 19⁹, Mk 10¹¹, Lk 16¹⁸): 'what God hath joined together let not man put asunder.' St. Paul gives charge ('yet not I, but the Lord'—it is a Divine ordinance, not his private opinion) that a wife is not to depart from her husband; but that if she depart, she is to remain unmarried or else be reconciled to her husband; and 'let not the husband put away his wife' (1 Co 7^{10f.}). And, later, he repeats that 'a wife is bound for so long time as her husband liveth' (v.³⁰).

Postponing for the moment the exceptive clauses of Mt 5³²-19⁹, and therefore the signification of πορνευα, let us consider in detail our Lord's teaching about divorce. One who puts away his wife makes her an adulteress (5³²) and becomes an adulterer if he marries again (19⁹, Mk 10¹¹, Lk 16¹⁸); and a woman who puts away her husband and marries again commits adultery (Mk.); the second husband of a divorced wife commits adultery (Mt. twice, Lk.). All this is clear except the first saying. How does a wife, presumably innocent, become an adulteress because her husband divorces her? One reply (W. C. Allen, ICC, 'St. Matthew,' Edinburgh, 1907, p. 52; so Bengel, Alford) is that she is placed in a position in which she is likely to marry again, and a second marriage would be adultery. Lyttelton, however, suggests (Sermon on the Mount, p. 178) that 'adulteress' here means that the woman is placed in a different position in the eye of the law from that which she holds in the sight of God. 'According to the one she is a freed woman, not a wife; according to the other she is still a wife, still bound to her husband.'

We may now take the exceptive clauses found in both the Matthaean passages, but not in Mk., Lk., or 1 Cor., or indeed anywhere else in the NT. In Mt 5³² the Evangelist adds, 'saving for the cause of fornication' (παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας), and in 19⁹ 'except for fornication' (εἰ μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ), though in some MSS the text of 19⁹ is brought nearer to 5³². In the first place, are these words an authentic utterance of our Lord? Are they really part of the First Gospel? (these are two quite distinct questions). The view that they are not authentic is upheld by Votaw in HDB v. p. 27^b; for the view that they are an integral part of Mt. see Plummer, St. Matthew, London, 1909, pp. 81, 259, and J. R. Willis in DCG i. 31. Votaw upholds his view by the arguments that 'the account in Mt. is secondary,' that there is a divergence between Mt. and the other Synoptists and St. Paul, that the exceptive clauses are of a statutory nature while Jesus enunciates principles rather than legislative enactments, and that in our Lord's general teaching adultery is not enough in itself for divorce—the Gospel urges mercy rather than justice, and leaves time for repentance (cf. the story of the woman taken in adultery, Jn 8³⁸). Of these arguments the divergence between the Evangelists seems to the present writer to be the only important one; there is no real reason for saying that the exceptive clauses do not enunciate a principle just as much as the general teaching about divorce; and with regard to the last statement, it is to be noticed that the exceptive clauses do not state that adultery in itself dissolves marriage, but that it is a legitimate cause for dissolving it. On the other hand, every known authority for the Matthaean text attests these clauses—the assimilating of the two passages in some MSS is a very natural thing for a scribe to do, and does not show that the archetype of any of our MSS lacked the clauses; and the tendency found in some writers to reject words on purely a priori grounds, against all MSS and VSS, is one which is justly deprecated by scholars in this country. The evidence, then, is enough to bring us to the conclusion that the words were written by the First Evangelist. But were they uttered by our Lord? It seems to be a tenable view that they are a gloss by the Evangelist, or by his authority—that Jesus gave the general principle of non-divorce without explicitly naming any exceptions; and that the first disciples understood adultery to be such an exception, and therefore the exceptive words were added as a true interpretation. If so, it does not follow that the Church in later times could add other exceptions for which the Evangelist gives no warrant. On the other hand, it is a tenable, and perhaps more probable view, that our Lord gave the exception Himself, on some other occasion than that described in Mt 19⁹ and Mk. St. Luke (16¹⁸) gives the injunction as to divorce as an isolated fragment, without the context of the Pharisees' question. The fact that the First Evangelist gives the injunction twice leads us to suppose that in an authority other than Mk. he found the record of a second occasion on which our Lord taught about divorce, for otherwise why should he repeat the words? It may well be that he found there an exceptive clause. Thus the silence of the other authorities (always a doubtful argument) does not prohibit the supposition that Jesus spoke the exceptive words Himself (so Edersheim).

What then does πορνευα mean in the two Matthaean passages? It is distinguished from μοιχευα in Mt 15¹⁹, Mk 7^{21f.}, and in inferior MSS of Gal 5¹⁹; cf. 1 Co 6⁹ and He 13⁴ (πόρνοι and μοιχοί). Lyttelton (op. cit. p. 174 ff.) makes πορνευα the sin of the flesh, and μοιχευα the breaking of the marriage bond by πορνευα or otherwise. According to some, πορνευα denotes pre-nuptial sin, and the meaning is that a man who finds himself deceived in the woman he marries may repudiate her. But as Swete points out (St. Mark, London, 1902, p. 218), while πορνευα and μοιχευα, when named in the same context, are to be distinguished, πορνευα in the exceptive clauses can hardly have the meaning assigned; in Hos 2⁵, Am 7¹⁷ LXX, πορνευω is used of post-nuptial sin (see also Gore, Sermon on the Mount, p. 73). The fact that in Mt 5³² our Lord teaches that μοιχευα can be committed by intention somewhat militates against Lyttelton's view, and shows that there is not always a very sharp distinction in the NT between the two words. We may, then, probably take πορνευα in the exceptive clauses to signify adultery of any kind.

If these clauses are authentic, or are true glosses, do they allow re-marriage to either party, and if so to both husband and wife? Here it is instructive to note two 2nd cent. interpretations of our Lord's words. (a) Hermas (Mand. iv. 1) says that a husband must put away an adulterous wife if she continue in sin; he must divorce her, but he may not himself marry again—for, if he does, he commits adultery himself; he must receive her back if she repent, and the forbidding of re-marriage is expressly said to be for this reason. So a wife should not live with an adulterous husband who does not repent; yet she may not marry again. (b) Justin Martyr in his Second Apology (§ 2) tells of a woman who after becoming a Christian divorced her heathen, intemperate, and unchaste husband; but he implies that she did not, and could not, marry again.

Light is thrown on the matter by the further question whether a wife could divorce her husband or only a husband his wife. Greeks and Romans allowed divorce by a wife (see Swete on Mk 10¹²); but this was not in accord with Jewish custom (so expressly Josephus, Ant. xv. vii. 10, speaking of Salome, wife of Costobarus, to whom she 'sent a bill of divorce and dissolved her marriage with him'). Among the Parthians the custom obtained (Ant. xviii. ix. 6, where Mithridates' wife threatens to divorce him). In the NT apparently a difference was made between the marriage of two non-Christians one of whom was afterwards converted, and that of two Christians. In the former case St. Paul recognizes the legal right of a Christian woman to leave an unbelieving husband, though he urges her not to do so if he be content to keep her (1 Co 7¹³; see above, 6 (b)). And in that case the wife may re-marry; the same applies to the parallel case of a Christian husband and an unbelieving wife—the 'brother' or the 'sister' [see FAMILY] is 'not under bondage in such cases' (v.¹³). But the general rule for married Christians is that the wife is not to depart from her husband or re-marry (v.¹⁰). In Mk 10¹² there is a clause, not found in the parallels, which forbids a wife to put away her husband and marry another. Here the scribe of Codex Bezae (D), scandalized at the very idea of the possibility of a woman divorcing her husband, alters the phrase to 'if a woman leave' (ἐξέλθῃ ἀπὸ), etc.

On the whole question of re-marriage after divorce, and the interpretation of the NT teaching, there has long been a divergence of opinion between the more logical West and the less logical East. The former considers the question from the point of view of the possibility of adultery dissolving marriage; the latter from that of punishing an offence. While, then, for many centuries the West did not allow re-marriage in any case (other than in that of nullity of marriage), the East has always allowed the re-marriage of the 'innocent party.' Here we note that the Jewish law absolutely forbade the marriage of the adulterer with the adulteress (Edersheim, ii. 335); this was with a view to punishing the guilty, rather than for any theoretical cause. And the Christian East follows the same line of reasoning. Again, there is a great difference between 'blessing' a marriage, and so giving the Church's sanction to an act which she perhaps disapproves, and recognizing the existence of a valid marriage. For the Church's benediction, according to the once universal view—modified by the Council of Trent for those who receive its decrees—is not of the essence of marriage, as the consent of the parties is, but is only a solemn and edifying addition. The Church may therefore, if it sees fit, refuse to solemnize a marriage without thereby asserting that the marriage is non-existent.

Where two views are possible, the Church will do well to allow for both. This does not mean that she must necessarily allow divorce for adultery and recognize re-marriage by pronouncing her benediction on it; but only that she should keep an open mind on the subject, and that different parts of the Church may legitimately agree to differ in the regulations they make with regard to it.

LITERATURE.—A. Edersheim, LT, 2 vols., London, 1897; R. C. Trench, *Notes on the Parables of our Lord*¹³, do., 1877, chs. xii., xiii.; art. 'Marriage,' 'Divorce,' 'Bride,' 'Bridegroom,' etc., in HDB, SDB, DCG, and in EBI; art. 'Chastity (Christian)' and 'Celibacy (Christian)' in ERE. For Christian marriage in the East at the present day as illustrating NT customs see A. J. Maclean and W. H. Browne, The Catholics of the East and his People, London, 1892. For marriage generally see H. M. Luckock, History of Marriage, do., 1894; O. D. Watkins, Holy Matrimony, do., 1895; W. J. Knox-Little, Holy Matrimony, in 'Oxford Library of Practical Theology,' do., 1901. For divorce see E. Lyttelton, Studies in the Sermon on the Mount, London, 1906; E. Schürer, HJP ii. ii. (Edinburgh, 1885) 123; Edersheim (as above); S. R. Driver, *Deuteronomy*¹⁴, London, 1902; C. Gore, The Sermon on the Mount, do., 1897; C. W. Votaw, in HDB v., art. 'Sermon on the Mount.'

A. J. MACLEAN.

MARS' HILL.—See AREOPAGITE, AREOPAGUS.

MARTYR.—1. The name.—'Martyr' is given as the rendering of μάρτυς in the RV only in Rev 17⁶. The word is used in practically the same sense in Rev 2¹³ (Antipas) and Ac 22²⁰ (Stephen), but is in both passages translated 'witness.' As Jesus is said to have 'witnessed' by accepting death (Rev 1⁸; cf. 1 Ti 6¹³), the expression was appropriately transferred to His followers who suffered for Him. The absolute use of μάρτυρα and μάρτυρεῖν to signify this did not become fixed until the middle of the 2nd cent. (see J. B. Lightfoot on Clem. ad Cor. v. in Apostolic Fathers, i. ii. [1890] 26).

2. The position of Christians.—Our Lord warned His disciples that active hostility would be the normal attitude of the world toward the Church (Mt 5¹¹). The Apostolic Age provided a continuous commentary on this saying. It is customary to distinguish one or two epochs in that period as moments of great persecution. But this must not obscure the truth that persecution seldom ceased altogether. In the first days of the Church this was exclusively the work of Jews. Besides the attacks mentioned in the Acts there were others to which we have only passing allusions (e.g. 1 Th 2¹⁴, Ja 2⁶ 5¹⁰, He 10³⁴). These prove that the Jews, not only of Palestine, but also of the Dispersion, were active in compelling Christians to pay for their faith by enduring legal and social oppression. The Romans did not at first discriminate between Jews and Christians, and extended to the latter the privileged toleration accorded to the former. This confusion of thought appears in the statement of Suetonius (Claud. 25) that Jewish disorders were provoked by 'Chrestus,' and in the notion of Lysias that St. Paul was one of the Zealots (Ac 21²⁸). But under Nero the Imperial policy changed. The mere profession of Christianity now became matter for a capital charge (see this maintained in Hardy, Studies in Roman History, ch. iv., as against Ramsay, in Church in the Roman Empire, ch. xi. sect. 7). By both people and rulers it was held to involve 'odium humani generis.' It incurred popular hatred because of the divisions which it introduced into family and social life. It became a political crime through its incompatibility with Caesar-worship, its refusal to 'worship the image of the beast' (Rev 13¹⁵), which led the Roman authorities to regard it as anarchy. No special laws were passed against it, but there were standing police orders that it should be suppressed. This policy was steadily maintained, and such a reference as that made by Pliny in his letter to Trajan (Epp. x. 97) concerning an unknown persecution in Bithynia twenty years before shows that there must have been much official activity against Christians of which no record survives. The NT reflects the consciousness of the change in the attitude of the government. In Acts Rome is the power which protects Christians against Jewish assault (Ac 25¹⁰); in the Apocalypse Rome is drunk with the blood of the saints (Rev 17⁶).

3. The number of the martyrs.—Later ages naturally tended to exaggerate this in order to add glory to the Church. It was held that the truest following of Christ was found among those who had been put to death for His name. Legends grew up which in time invested every member of the apostolic college with the martyr's halo (a collection of these stories may be seen in the Ante-Nicene Christian Library, vol. xvi. [1873]). It is instructive to note that Clem. Alex. (Strom. iv. 9) quotes an early protest against supposing that salvation belonged to martyrs only, which is justified by citing the instances of some of the apostles who had died a natural death. But it remains true that the Biblical and other records leave the impression that great numbers of believers were slain in the 1st century. In the Jewish persecution Saul is said to have entered into every house (Ac 8⁹), and to have searched every synagogue for Christians. The number of converts was already considerable in Jerusalem (cf. Ac 2⁴¹, 7⁶⁷), so that, unless we hold (with R. B. Rackham, Acts of the Apostles, 1901) that he persecuted Hellenists only, the list of sufferers must have been very large. Imprisonment, beating, and even death, the Romans presumably committing, were the penalties incurred (Ac 22⁴ b. 19). On this occasion the leaders of the Church seem to have escaped, but the next onslaught affected them specially (Ac 12). James the son of Zebedee fell, and Peter was cast into prison. These attacks left a lasting impression on the Church (cf. 1 Th 2¹⁴).

Still heavier was the toll of martyrs exacted by the Roman persecutions of the 1st century. Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) speaks of a multitudo ingens of victims in the Neronian outbreak, and to this answers the πολὸν πλῆθος of Clem. Rom. (ad Cor. vi.). In Rev 13⁷ testimony is borne to the thoroughness with which the whole of the Empire was made to feel the effects of this policy. The same impression is conveyed by 1 P 3⁹. The adversary's rage is like the fury of a lion; all over the Roman world Christians are united in a community of suffering. It is noteworthy that both Jewish and Gentile persecutors seem to have found a special object of attack in the Christian prophets, who were no doubt brought into prominence by their preaching of the gospel (cf. 1 Th 2¹⁵, Rev 16⁶ 18²⁴). The horrors inflicted by the Roman torturers may be gathered from the two passages of Tacitus and Clement mentioned above. The victims were crucified, or, by a diabolical refinement of cruelty, clad in the skins of beasts to serve as the quarry of dogs. At nightfall they were smeared with pitch to stand as living torches in the gardens of Nero. For women there were brutalities more shameful than death.

4. The historic martyrs. — Among those who were done to death in the Jewish persecutions mentioned in the Acts the names of two only are preserved—Stephen, and James the son of Zebedee. Stephen was nominally charged with blasphemy, but the proceedings were no trial in any legal sense, and, if the Sanhedrin were ever called to account for them, they doubtless pleaded that a sudden and uncontrollable tumult had occurred. Of the martyrdom of James the account is in Ac 12² and in Eusebius, HE ii. 9, quoting Clement of Alexandria. James was beheaded, and his bearing so impressed his accuser that it converted him, and he suffered with the apostle. This must have been before A.D. 44, as in that year Herod Agrippa died. Attempts have recently been made (c.g. by W. Bousset, *Die Offenbarung Johannis*⁵, 1896, pp. 47-8) to establish the allegation of Philip of Side that Papias had said that John the Apostle was slain with his brother. But if this were so, the silence of Ac 12² is incomprehensible. We have no reason to suppose that John died anything but a natural death. The stories of his escape from 'the boiling cauldron before the Latin Gate, and of his drinking poison without harm, come from Gnostic Acts of John of the 2nd century. Some years after the passion of the first James, another James, 'the Lord's brother,' was murdered (? A.D. 61). Ananias, the high priest, in the interval between the death of Festus and the arrival of Albinus, caused him to be stoned. The dramatic account of his end given by Hegesippus is preserved in Eusebius, HE ii. 23. A shorter and more authentic record may be found in Josephus, Ant. xx. ix. 1 (see J. B. Mayor, *Ep. of St. James*⁵, 1910, p. xxxix).

In Rome the first shadow of the Neronian persecution fell upon Pomponia Graecina. The evidence of the Catacombs has made it almost certain that the 'foreign superstition' with which she was charged (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32) was Christianity (cf. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, i. i. 30). Her trial resulted in her acquittal (A.D. 57). Seven years later Rome was burnt, and Nero turned the popular rage against the Christians. His success cost the Church on earth the lives not only of a great host of unknown saints but also of St. Peter and St. Paul. Lightfoot points out (on Clem. Rom. ad Cor. v.) that the NT raises the expectation that these two would be martyrs. In Jn 21¹⁸ there is what is virtually a description of St. Peter's death, and in 2 Ti 4⁶. St. Paul writes as one who knew that his end was near. That they both suffered in Rome is a constant tradition. Clement (loc. cit.) couples them together as 'athletes' who 'struggled to the death,' and were familiar to Roman believers. Ignatius (ad Rom. iv.) implies that both had been teachers of authority in Rome. Eusebius (HE ii. 25) collects testimonies to the same effect. He cites Dionysius of Corinth as asserting that both apostles suffered about the same time in Rome, and adds, from the Roman Gaius, a minute description of their tombs. Tertullian (Scorp. 15, de Præscr. 36) affirms that St. Peter was crucified, and Origen (ap. Euseb. HE iii. 1) says that he was, at his own request, placed on the cross head downwards. The 'Domine, quo vadis?' story is preserved in pseudo-Ambrose, Sermo contra Auxentium. St. Peter's death may be dated in the early days of the Neronian persecution (A.D. 64). His Epistle implies an imminent onslaught, and the tradition which puts his grave in the Vatican suggests that he was among the victims butchered there after the great fire. Eusebius (HE iii. 30) repeats the story of Clem. Alex. that the Apostle before his own death saw his wife led away to execution, and comforted her in a manner typical of Christian martyrs. He 'rejoiced because she had been called and was going home.' Tertullian and Origen, in the passages to which allusion is made above, name Rome as the scene of St. Paul's martyrdom, and Tertullian's expression is to the effect that he was beheaded. Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. v.) alleges that the two apostles died on the same day. This, though supported by the commemoration of both on 29th June, is in itself improbable and the tradition varies (cf. L. Duchesne, Lib. Pont., 1886-92, i. 119).

The date of the death of Antipas of Pergamum (Rev 2¹³) was, according to legend, in the reign of Domitian, when he was burnt to death in a brazen bull. But the phrase 'in the days of Antipas' suggests a date some years before the words were written, and Antipas was probably killed in some unknown persecution under the earlier Flavians.

Under Domitian suffered three persons whose Christianity, if not absolutely certain, is highly probable. The Emperor's own cousin, the consul Flavius Clemens, was condemned, according to Suetonius (Domitian, 15), 'ex tenuissima suspicione.' If Clemens was a Christian, he would be unable to take part in public functions which involved Emperor-worship. This fits in with the assertion of Dio Cassius (lxvii. 14) that he was charged with atheism, i.e. 'sacrilege,' and with practising 'Jewish' ways. It also explains the scornful verdict of Suetonius that he displayed 'contemptible indolence.' At the same time his wife, Domitilla, was banished to Pontia (Jerome, Ep. 108 [or 86], 'ad Eustochium'). With these two Dio couples M'. Acilius Glabrio as a victim of Domitian's fury. The evidence as to his religion is inconclusive. Lightfoot's denial of his Christianity (Apostolic Fathers, i. i. 81 n.) is questioned by Ramsay (op. cit. p. 261).

With Trajan we reach the last martyr of this period. It is related in Eusebius, HE iii. 32, that Symeon the son of Clopas, 'the second bishop of Jerusalem,' was arrested on the ground that he was descended from David, and was a Christian. After many days of torture he was crucified. With him, in the opinion of Eusebius, passed away the last survivor of the Apostolic Age.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, London, 1911 (with full bibliography); A. J. Mason, Historic Martyrs of the Primitive Church, do., 1905; B. F. Westcott, The Two Empires, do., 1909, ch. ii.; H. M. Gwatkin, Early Church History, do., 1909, vol. i. chs. v.-vii.; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, do., 1897, chs. x.-xvi.; E. G. Hardy, Studies in Roman History (formerly, Christianity and the Roman Government), do., 1906; H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John, do., 1907, Intro., sect. vii.

C. T. DIMONT.

MARY (Gr. Μαρία, Μαριαμ, Heb. מרים).—Mary, one of the commonest Jewish names for women, was derived from Miriam the sister of Moses, and very frequently used in NT times because of the sympathy felt for the beautiful Hasmonæan princess, the ill-fated wife of Herod. As it was the name borne by the mother of Jesus, it became in its Greek form, which passed into all languages, the most familiar Christian name for women. Many and varied derivations have been suggested, but it is practically certain that the names Moses, Aaron, and Miriam are all of Egyptian origin. Miriam is probably mer Amon, 'beloved of Amon' (cf. Merenptah, 'beloved of Ptah').

In the NT we find several distinct persons bearing the name, although in some cases it is rather difficult to be certain that the same person is not referred to under slightly varied descriptions by the different evangelists. In all, the name is found in eight connexions, which are as follows: (1) the Virgin Mary; (2) Mary the mother of James and Josès; (3) 'the other Mary'; (4) Mary (wife) of Clopas; (5) Mary Magdalene; (6) Mary of Bethany; (7) Mary the mother of John Mark; (8) a Christian lady of Rome. It is almost certain that the same person is referred to in (2), (3), and (4). Some have identified (5) and (6), but this is extremely doubtful. Of the eight, only (7) and (8) belong properly to a Dictionary of the Apostolic Church. On the others see artt. in HDB iii. and DCG ii.

1. Mary the mother of John Mark.—In Ac 12¹ we read that St. Peter, after he had been released from prison by the angel, went to the house of Mary the mother of Mark, where several members of the Church of Jerusalem had assembled to pray for his deliverance. From this notice we gather that Mary was a Christian lady residing in Jerusalem in the early years of the Apostolic Church. As John Mark was a cousin (ἀνεψιός, Col 4¹⁰) of Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul on his first missionary journey, Mary was thus the aunt of Barnabas. She seems to have been a woman possessed of considerable wealth, as she was able to entertain the members of the Jerusalem Church. We cannot tell how long she remained in Jerusalem or whether she died there or not. Later writers believed that her house was situated on Mt. Zion and that it was the meeting-place of the disciples from the Ascension to the Day of Pentecost. The house was also reported to have escaped the destruction of the city by Titus and to have been used as a church at a later period (Epiphanius, de Mens. et Pond. 14; Cyril Jerus. Catech. 16). It is, however, not impossible that this Mary is identical with—

2. The Christian lady of Rome to whom the Apostle sends greeting (Ro 16⁵), and to whom he refers as 'Mary who bestowed much labour on us.' The fact that early tradition associates Mark with Rome and that his Gospel is undoubtedly intended for Roman Christians does not make at all impossible the idea that Mary the mother of Mark moved to Rome. Evidently the Mary of Ro 16⁵ had not bestowed labour on the Apostle in Rome, which as yet he had not visited at the date of writing the Epistle. If the Apostle by the reference 'who bestowed much labour on us' alludes to personal service to himself, it must have been at some place already visited, and the conclusion is unavoidable that Mary had recently settled in Rome. But it is not safe to draw any conclusion from this reference, because the reading 'you' (ὁμᾶς) is much better supported than 'us' (ἡμᾶς). In this case the Apostle may have known Mary only by reputation as a benefactress of the Roman Church, probably a woman of the type of Lydia of Ac 16¹⁴⁻¹⁵. The way in which the Apostle refers to her implies that she was well known to those he addressed. She may have held the position of a deaconess or a 'widow' at Rome. W. F. BOYD.

MASTER.—In the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse three words (κυβερνήτης, δεσποτης, κυριος) are translated 'master' in the RV. The AV has 'masters' for διδασκαλοι in Ja 3¹, the etymological meaning of magistri (so the Rhem. in He 5¹). The RV uses 'teacher' uniformly.

1. In Ac 27¹¹ the RV has 'the master' for ὁ κυβερνήτης (from κυβερνᾶν, Lat. gubernare, 'govern'), 'governor.' So also Rev 18¹⁷. The notion is that of steersman (cf. Ezk 27^{8, 21}).

2. The term δεσποτης is strictly the antithesis of δoulos, and signifies 'absolute ownership and uncontrolled power' (Grimm-Thayer). So we have it in 1 Ti 6¹², a pertinent warning to the Christian δουλοι not to presume on the new fellowship in Christ with their δεσποται, but to give them all the more honour and service. Christianity should make better δουλοι (cf. also Tit 2⁹). In 1 P 2¹⁸ δεσποτης is in contrast with οικέτης; so in 2 Ti 2²¹ it is ἡ οἰκία τοῦ δεσπότου. In 2 P 2¹ Christ is called δεσποτης as One Who has purchased His servants. So also Jude⁴ and possibly Rev 6¹⁰, though the latter may refer to God as in the LXX (cf. Gn 15^{2, 8} etc.) and Ac 4²⁴.

3. The other term, κυριος, has a wider meaning and is applicable to various relations and ranks of life, and does not necessarily suggest absolutism. The word is originally an adjective from κυρος, meaning 'valid,' 'authoritative' (ὁ ἔχων κυρος), and so the 'master' or 'owner.' It is applied to the 'masters' who exploited the poor girl for gain in Ac 16^{16, 19}. It stands in opposition to δουλοι, as in Eph 6^{5, 9}, Col 4^{1, 22}. In Ac 16³⁰ the jailer uses κυριοι merely as a term of respect to St. Paul and Silas. In 9⁵ (22³) St. Paul uses it in asking Jesus who He is, 'Who art thou, Lord?' It is not certain that St. Paul here meant more than respect. It is applied to God as the Ruler of the universe. κυριος used for God is translated 'Lord' (g.v.) (cf. Ac 17³, 1 Ti 6¹³, Rev 4⁸, etc.). With St. Paul, it may be noted, κύριος usually refers to Christ (cf. Ro 1⁴, Gal 6¹³) except in the OT quotations (cf. Ro 4⁸ 9²¹; but note 1 Co 3⁵). The use of κυριος for Nero makes 'a polemical parallelism between the cult of Christ and the cult of Caesar' (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr., 1911, p. 353).

A. T. ROBERTSON.

MASTERS AND SERVANTS.—See SLAVE, SLAVERY.

MATTHEW (Ματθαῖος TR, Μαθθαῖος Lach., Tisch., WH).—The person bearing this name in the NT is represented as one of the twelve apostles who before his call by Christ had been engaged as a publican or custom-house officer in Capernaum. He is also called Levi (Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁹), and many have supposed that he received the name Matthew after his call by Jesus, just as Simon became Peter. On the other hand, it seems to have been common in Galilee for a man to possess two names—a Greek and an Aramaic (cf. Edersheim, *LT*⁴, 1887, i. 514). In the various lists of the apostles, Matthew's name occurs seventh in Mk 3¹⁸ and Lk 6¹⁵ and eighth in Mt 10³ and Ac 1¹³. All the Synoptists narrate the story of the call of Matthew from his tax-gatherer's booth and the subsequent feast in his house which aroused the wrath of the Pharisees and led Jesus to defend Himself by the declaration: 'They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous but sinners' (Mt 9¹³, Mk 2¹⁴⁻¹⁷, Lk 5²⁷⁻³²). As a publican Matthew was employed collecting the toll at Capernaum on the highway between Damascus and the Mediterranean, and was no doubt in the service of Herod the Tetrarch.

Matthew is called the 'son of Alphæus' (Mk 2¹⁴), and the question has arisen whether he is to be regarded as the brother of James the son of Alphæus (Mt 10³, Mk 3¹⁸, Lk 6¹⁵, Ac 1¹³). In the four lists of apostles, while Matthew and James occur in the same group of four, the two are not placed alongside one another as is usual with the other pairs of brothers in the apostolic band. Again, if we identify Clopas of Jn 19²⁵ with Alphæus of the Synoptists (Aram. Chalphai; cf. 1 Mac 11³⁰), and consequently assume that James the Less of Mk 15⁴⁰ is the son of Alphæus, it is extremely unlikely that Matthew's name would be omitted in Mk 15⁴⁰ if he were one of the sons of Mary and the brother of James, Joses, and Salome. On the whole, it is almost certain that the two apostles were not related.

In the story of the Apostolic Church as we find it in the NT the name of Matthew occurs only once, viz. in the list of apostles in Ac 1¹³. Probably he became a preacher to the lost sheep of the house of Israel and for the most part confined his labours to the land of Palestine. His name became associated with the First Gospel either because he was supposed to be the author or because he was the author of one of the sources on which the work was based. Eusebius makes three interesting statements regarding Matthew. He says (HE iii. 24): 'Matthew and John are the only two apostles who have left us recorded comments, and even they, tradition says, undertook it from necessity. Matthew, having first proclaimed the gospel in Hebrew, when on the point of going also to other nations, committed it to writing in his native tongue, and thus supplied the want of his presence to them by his writings.' Again we find in HE iii. 39 the famous statement of Papias quoted by Eusebius, 'Matthew composed his logia in the Hebrew tongue, and everyone translated as he was able.' We also find in Eusebius' review of the canon of Scripture the statement: 'The first (Gospel) is written according to Matthew, the same that was once a publican but afterwards an apostle of Jesus Christ, who, having published it for the Jewish converts, wrote it in the Hebrew' (HE vi. 25). These varied quotations associate Matthew with a Hebrew Gospel or collection of the Sayings of Jesus which in some way or other is connected with or incorporated in our First Gospel. Probably Matthew the ex-publican and apostle did form such a collection of the Sayings of our Lord which were wrought into a connected narrative of the Life of Christ by the First Evangelist, a Palestinian Jew of the 1st century. But for full discussion see art. 'Matthew, Gospel of,' in HDB and DCG. Unfortunately, Eusebius does not tell us what the 'other nations' were to whom Matthew proclaimed the gospel, and we have no certain knowledge of his subsequent missionary labours.

W. F. BOYD.

MATTHIAS.—Matthias (= Theodore, 'God's gift') is only once mentioned in the NT, viz. Ac 1²³, where his appointment by lot to fill the place of Judas among the Twelve Apostles is described. We there gather (1) that he was one of those who had 'compared with' the apostles 'all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among' them, 'beginning from the baptism of John' until the Ascension; (2) that he was antecedently the less prominent of the two put forward, his bare name only being given, while Joseph is further described by a patronymic 'called Barsabbas,' and also by a surname 'Justus' (δικαιος); for, says Bengel, 'eo cognomine videri poterat præferri debere, nisi,' as he justly adds, 'postea demum hoc cognomen nactus est ut agnosceret quamvis Matthias electus esset, ipsum tamen sua lande non excedisse'; and (3) that anyhow the Lord who is καρδιογνωστῆς unerringly declared him (ἀναδείξαι) the more suitable for the apostleship. In view of these considerations, it is a good illustration of Bible methods that no further mention of him occurs in its pages. Matthias is said by Eusebius (HE i. 12, ii. 1) and Epiphanius (Har. i. 22) to have been one of the Seventy (Lk 10¹), and the former authority (HE iii. 25), as well as Origen (Hom. in Luc. i.), speaks of a spurious Gospel of Matthias, on which it seems likely that the Basilidian Gnostics based their teaching (Philos. vii. 20; Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 4, vii. 13). One early tradition assigns Ethiopia as the scene of his apostolic labours, another Jerusalem; but of these the former is the better attested. There is little probability in the identification which has been suggested of Matthias with Nathanael (which means 'God-given'). For a fuller discussion of this and other points the reader should refer to HDB, s.v.

There can be little doubt that the exact method by which the lots were cast was the ancient one by which the two names were put into a vessel, which was shaken until one of them leapt out, and that was chosen: the idea of a ballot is of later date and not Scriptural (see LOTS). C. L. FELTOE.

MEDES.—Medes are mentioned in Ac 2⁹ in connexion with the special events of the Day of Pentecost. These sojourners in Jerusalem would be descendants of Jewish settlers among the Medes, with perhaps a few Median proselytes. In Biblical times, the Medes are closely associated with the Persians, along with whom they occupied the western portion of Iran, extending north and south from the Caspian Sea to the Persian Gulf, and from the Zagros Mountains on the west to the nearer edge or the great desert separating Media and Persia from Bactriana and Sogdiana on the east. Along this western portion of Iran, Media Minor lay to the north, Media proper in the middle, and Persia to the south.

The Medes were Aryans using a cuneiform script of their own, and worshipping (after the earlier half of the 7th cent. B.C.) according to the faith of Zarathustra. Their art shows little originality or development, and their manners, simple and uncorrupted at first, quickly degenerated under foreign influence. The so-called Median Empire lasted from 647 to 550 B.C., after which date Cyrus founded the Medo-Persian dominion, in which the Persian branch, hitherto subject, became the ruling power.

A. W. COOKE.

MEDIATION, MEDIATOR.—For mediation in paganism and in the OT see W. F. Adeney's art. in HDB. For mediation in the Gospels see L. Pullan's art. in DCG. While no formal discussion of these matters occurs here, one cannot ignore the importance of a full knowledge of the OT teaching and the possible influence of the philosophy and religion of the Græco-Roman world upon the minds of the apostolic teachers of Christianity. It is easy to go to extremes in either direction. But the study of comparative religion does not dim the glory of Christ. The modern Christian rather claims that all the 'true light that lighteth every man' comes from Christ (Jn 1⁹). One can welcome all truth that may be taken up into Christianity (cf. C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, 1912; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions, 1913). It is hardly likely, however, that Jesus Himself felt the influence of this non-Jewish teaching. His conception of His own sacrificial death finds its roots in the OT, and appears in the oldest form of the Synoptic Gospels (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸; see also Mk 10³⁸, Mt 26²⁸). It may be said at once that the central place here given to the atoning death of Christ for the sins of men, emphasized also in the Fourth Gospel (1²⁹ 3¹⁶ 12³², etc.), is just that conception of the relative value of the Cross in the mediatorial work of Christ found in Acts and the rest of the NT. It is embedded in the primitive Christian tradition too deeply to be a mere theological interpretation of the apostles, read back into the thought of Christ (see J. Denney, The Death of Christ, 1902, and Jesus and the Gospel, 1913, where the writer powerfully argues that Christianity is justified in the mind of Christ). Mediation lies at the heart of all religion which assumes human sin and a righteous God who will forgive the sinner. The consciousness of sin demands a mediator to plead the cause of man with God; hence the existence of the priesthood in all religions worthy of the name. Paganism has its 'redeemer gods,' but Christianity is rooted in the OT. The head of the family was first the priest, then the patriarch of the tribe. Then the Aaronic priesthood, and in particular the high priest, exemplified the mediatorial office. There was also prophetic and angelic mediation (Ac 7⁵³, Gal 3¹⁹). Mediation took the form of intercession, of covenant, or of sacrifice. Christ sums up the whole mediatorial office as prophet, priest, and sacrifice. The term 'mediator' (μεσίτης) or 'middleman' occurs once of Moses (Gal 3^{19a}) as the mediator between God and the people in the giving of the Law. The other instances all refer to Christ, 'the one mediator between God and man' (1 Ti 2⁵), 'the mediator of a better covenant' (He 8⁶), 'the mediator of a new (καινῆς) covenant' (9¹⁵; veas in 12²⁴). In He 6¹⁷ God 'interposed with an oath' (ἐμεσίτησεν ὁρκῷ; here the notion of 'middleman' recedes). But the notion of mediation is far more common in the NT than the use of the word μεσίτης would imply. It is indeed regulative of the thought of the entire NT, as can be easily seen.

1. The Acts.—It is the living Christ, active in leading the disciples (Ac 1¹⁴), who meets us in the Acts. He was received up (v. 2), but He will come again (v. 11), and meanwhile His Name has power (3⁶). Jesus is Lord (κύριος, 1⁶ 2¹), and is addressed in prayer (1²⁴ 7⁵⁹) after the Ascension. Peter on the Day of Pentecost boldly interprets Jesus as the Messiah (2³¹) of whose resurrection from the dead they were all witnesses (v. 32). He is at (or by) the right hand of the Father, and is actively engaged in His Messianic work, of which the outpouring of the Holy Spirit is one evidence (v. 33). The death of Jesus is not an obstacle to His Messiahship. Peter does not here formulate a doctrine of the Atonement nor specifically mention the mediatorial work of Jesus, but he calls upon all the house of Israel to understand 'that God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified' (v. 36). On the strength of the claim that Jesus is both Lord and Messiah as shown by His resurrection, Peter urges repentance and baptism in the name of Jesus Christ. This address at Pentecost, as reported by Luke, is the first formal interpretation on the part of the disciples of the significance of the work of Christ. It is too early for the full perspective to be drawn, but at heart the message is the same as we find in the later years. Jesus Christ is central in Christianity. The place of the Cross is recognized, though not fully expounded. The Lordship of Jesus the Messiah is accented as the ground for repentance. Already the reproach of the Cross was felt, and Peter justifies the suffering of Christ as part of God's purpose as shown in the prophets (3¹⁵), though not excusing the sin of Christ's murderers (v. 15). Peter also calls Jesus God's 'servant Jesus' (v. 13), 'the Holy and Righteous One' (v. 14), 'the Prince of life' (v. 15), a Prophet like unto Moses (v. 22), the fulfilment of the covenant promise to Abraham for the blessing of all the families of earth (v. 25). The nearest statement to the later interpretation of redemption on the basis of the death of Christ comes in v. 18²⁷, where he says, 'Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out.' Here 'therefore' points back to v. 18, which presents the necessity of the sufferings of Christ, in particular His death on the cross. The clearness of Peter's conception of the power of the living Christ appears in 4¹⁰⁻¹², where he claims that the impotent man is made whole in the name of Jesus, and that Jesus is the Stone, rejected by the Jewish builders, but made the Head of the Corner by God in His Kingdom and the only hope of salvation for men everywhere (cf. 1 P 2⁴⁻⁶). Here the mediatorial work of Christ comes out sharply, and it is astonishing to note Peter's courageous boldness before the Sanhedrin. There is thus no doubt as to the immediate interpretation of the Risen Christ as Lord and Saviour from sin. His death was not of a piece with that of Stephen and James, who died as martyrs. The death of Christ was part of God's foreseen plan (2²³), was predicted by the OT prophets (3¹⁵), was the basis of repentance and forgiveness of sin (v. 19), and, with His resurrection, proved Him to be the sole hope of salvation (4¹⁰⁻¹²).

The absence of the later technical terminology in these early addresses is proof of the substantial correctness of Luke's report. The reference to Is 53 ('Servant Jesus') is natural, and has the essence of Christ's mediation, though the idea is not worked out. In his address to the household of Cornelius Peter pointedly says: 'That through his name every one that believeth on him shall receive remission of sins' (Ac 10⁴³). He is also 'the Judge of quick and dead' (v. 42). Peter also says that the Jews 'shall be saved through the grace of the Lord Jesus, in like manner as' Gentiles (15¹¹). Stephen called Jesus 'the Righteous One' (7⁵²), and died saying, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit' (v. 59). Immediately on his conversion Saul 'proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God' (9²⁰). At Antioch in Pisidia St. Paul announces the heart of his message about Jesus: 'Through this man is proclaimed unto you remission of sins: and by him every one that believeth is justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses' (13^{38a}). From this position St. Paul never swerved. His collision with the Judaizers (Ac 15) turned on the sufficiency of the work of Christ to save, apart from the Jewish ceremonialism. To the Philippian jailer he preached salvation through faith in the Lord Jesus (16³⁰). On the Areopagus he set forth the Risen Jesus as the Judge of the world, and urged repentance for that reason (17^{30a}). At Ephesus he interpreted the preaching of John the Baptist as urging faith in Jesus as the hope of salvation (19⁴). The elders of Ephesus he urged 'to feed the church of God' (correct text), 'which he purchased with his own blood' (20²⁸), where at once the deity of Jesus is asserted and also the atoning nature of His death.

Even Festus understood that St. Paul affirmed Jesus to be alive (25¹⁹). To the Jews in Rome St. Paul spoke 'concerning Jesus' (28²) and called his message 'this salvation of God' (v.²⁸), which the Gentiles at least will hear. The conception of Jesus as Mediator thus runs all through the Acts from the very beginning.

2. The Pauline Epistles (a) The First Group (1 and 2 Thess.).—At bottom the same conception of Christ appears here as in the later Epistles. The work of Christ comes out incidentally, but very clearly: 'For God appointed us not unto wrath, but unto the obtaining of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him' (1 Th 5⁹). St. Paul's whole gospel of grace is here set forth though in somewhat general terms—τὸν ἀποθάνοντος περὶ ἡμῶν, though WH give ὑπὲρ in the margin. These two prepositions (περὶ and ὑπὲρ) differ in etymology ('around' and 'over'), but in the Koine are sometimes used quite in the same resultant sense (Monlton, Grammar of NT Greek, vol. i., 'Prolegomena,' 1908, p. 105). There is no getting away from the idea that the death of Christ lies at the root of the obtaining of salvation on our part, though St. Paul does not here explain the relation of Christ's mediatorial work to our redemption. Another general phrase appears in 1 Th 1¹⁰: 'Jesus, who delivereth us from the wrath to come,' τὸν ρυόμενον ἡμᾶς ἐκ, κτλ. Here the historical Jesus is pictured as the present deliverer from the wrath—a complete deliverance (ἐκ). In 2 Th 2¹⁴ St. Paul says that we realize God's purpose 'through our gospel.' He does not, of course, mean to put mere creeds in the place of Christ. Already we find the mystic term 'in Christ' (1 Th 4¹⁶). No objective work on the part of Christ or man, no ordinance and no creed, can take the place of vital union with God in Christ, 'in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth' (2 Th 2¹³).

(b) The Second Group (1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Rom.).—We may still follow Lightfoot's grouping in spite of the doubt about the date of Galatians. Here the material is very rich. In 1 Co 1³⁰ St. Paul sums up his idea of the mediation of Christ: 'But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who was made unto us wisdom from God, both righteousness and sanctification and redemption.' Thus Christ is shown to be the wisdom of God. St. Paul magnifies 'the cross of Christ' (v.¹⁷). His message is 'the word of the cross' (v.¹⁸). 'We preach Christ crucified' (v.²). 'For I determined to know nothing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified' (2²). The death of Christ occupies the central place in St. Paul's message about salvation. He is aware that the Jews find it a stumbling-block and the Greeks foolishness, but he claims that it is 'God's wisdom in a mystery' (v.⁷), little as the philosophers supposed it to be true. The blood of Christ makes an appeal for holy living. He is our passover sacrifice (5⁷), in His name we were washed and justified (6¹¹), we were bought with a price (6²⁰ 7²³), and owe a life of holiness to Christ. It is thus no mere mechanical notion with St. Paul, but a vital union with Christ on the basis of His atoning death on the cross. Christ died 'for the sake of' (διὰ) the weak brother, who for that reason deserves consideration (8¹¹). His death for man has glorified humanity. This intimate bond between the disciple and his Lord, the blood-bond, is set forth by the ordinances of baptism and communion in a far wider sense than was contemplated by the 'mystery-religions' and their 'redeemer-gods' (1 Co 10¹⁶ 16²² 11²⁴⁻²⁵). Perhaps by πνευματικόν in 10³⁴. St. Paul means 'supernatural' (Denney, Death of Christ, p. 134 f.), but he does not teach that the ordinances impart the new life in Christ. They are symbols of the work of Christ made effective in the soul by the Holy Spirit, not the means for procuring the redemptive grace. Jesus Christ, not baptism and not the Lord's Supper, is the Mediator. St. Paul expressly places baptism on a lower plane than the gospel which he preached (1¹⁵⁻¹⁷), which he could not have done if it had per se saving efficacy or was the means of obtaining the benefit of Christ's mediatorial work. He interprets the Supper as symbolic, picturing 'the Lord's death till he come' (11²⁶), which ye thereby 'proclaim' (καταγγέλλετε). The ordinances are thus preachers of the death of Christ for sinners and of the new life in Christ. The cup proclaims 'the new covenant in my blood,' as St. Paul quotes from Jesus (v.²⁵), and is to be drunk 'in remembrance of me.' The worthy celebration of the ordinance consists in discerning the body of Christ (v.²⁹) and not making a mere meal of the emblems. All believers are members of the mystical body of Christ the Head (12¹²). St. Paul's gospel, in short, has as its first word that 'Christ died for sins' (15³). The preposition is ὑπὲρ ('over,' 'on behalf of'). This death would have been in vain had He not risen from the dead (v.¹⁷). But the resurrection of Christ is guarantee of His power to save, so that 'in Christ shall all be made alive' (v.²²). So then the Christian, the one in Christ (ὁ ἐν Χριστῷ), is victorious over sin and death 'through our Lord Jesus Christ' (v.⁵⁷).

In 2 Cor. St. Paul touches the very heart of his message about salvation in Christ. The challenge of the Judaizing sacramentalism called forth this passionate emphasis on the sufficiency of the redemptive and reconciling work of Christ. 'The sufferings of Christ abound unto us,' περισσεύει τα παθήματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς ἡμᾶς (1⁵). Here we have the notion of example rather than of redemption. St. Paul suffers as Jesus did. So as to 4¹⁰, 'always bearing about in the body the dying of Jesus.' His 'sufferings are killing him as they killed his Master' (Denney, Death of Christ, p. 139). See also 4⁶. The face of Jesus Christ gives the knowledge of God's glory. But the locus classicus is 5¹⁴⁻²¹, where the mediatorial work of Christ receives formal discussion. St. Paul is willing to be considered 'beside' himself (v.¹³) in this matter (cf. 1 Co 1²³). The love which Christ has for St. Paul keeps him in love (συνέχει), holds him intact whatever men think of him. Knowing the love of Christ, he deliberately interprets (κρίνω) His death: 'One died for all, therefore all died,' οὗτος εἰς ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀπέθανεν· ἄρα οἱ πάντες ἀπέθανον (5¹⁴). We need not stop to show that ὑπὲρ can be used where the notion of substitution is present. It is common enough in the ostraca and papyri of the Koine (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr., 1911, p. 153). But see also Jn 11⁵⁰, where εἰς ἄνθρωπος ἀποθάνη ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ is explained by καὶ μὴ ὅλον τὸ ἔθνος ἀπόλλυται. See further Gal 3¹³, to be discussed later. Suffice it to say that in 2 Co 5¹⁴ the ἄρα clause, though parenthetical, clearly means that οἱ πάντες died in the death of Christ and do not have to die in that sense again. Jesus therefore died in their stead. It is not here contended that this notion exhausts the meaning of the death of Christ. St. Paul himself speaks of the mystic crucifixion with Christ (Gal 2²⁰). No theory can set forth the wealth of meaning in the death of Christ, but St. Paul here places the notion of substitution to the fore. Love prompted this wonderful gift. God carries on the work of reconciliation (καταλλάγη). This is done 'through Christ' (2 Co 5¹⁸) and 'in Christ' (v.¹⁹). God offers Christ to the world as supreme proof of His love and as the ground of reconciliation. It is all 'of God' (v.¹⁸), and He even made Christ to be sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in Christ (v.²¹). No sin actually touched Christ, but He bore our sins as the sacrifice for sin that we might go free. So then St. Paul bears the message of reconciliation to men as the ambassador of Christ. All that he has said elsewhere is in accord with this central passage. See also 8⁹, where the voluntary poverty of Christ in place of His pre-existent state of riches in heaven was for our sakes (διὰ), that we 'through his poverty (τῇ πτωχείᾳ, instrumental case) might become rich.' Here the whole earthly life of Christ is brought into view, and not merely His death, as constituting the mediatorial work of the Saviour. Hence 9¹⁵, where Jesus is the unspeakable gift, ἐν τῇ ἀνεκδιγήτῳ αὐτοῦ δωρεᾷ. St. Paul is positive about his conception of Jesus—so much so that he calls the Jesus of the Judaizers 'another Jesus,' ἄλλον Ἰησοῦν, and that gospel 'a different gospel,' εὐαγγέλιον ἕτερον (11⁴). Only one historic Jesus in the sense of St. Paul is possible, so that he uses ἄλλον, not ἕτερον.

The aim of Galatians is to show that 'all Christianity is contained in the Cross; the Cross is the generative principle of everything Christian in the life of man' (Denney, Death of Christ, p. 152). The mediatorial work of Christ is set over against the legalistic bondage of the Judaizing gospel which St. Paul fiercely denounces as not 'another' (ἄλλο) gospel, but a 'different' (ἕτερον) gospel (1⁷), in reality a complete departure from the grace of God in Christ (5⁷). In 1³¹ St. Paul describes 'our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us out of this present evil world.' Here we have ὑπερ in the text and περὶ in the margin of WH's text before τῶν ἀμαρτιῶν. Justification before God is obtained by faith in Jesus Christ, not by works of the Law (2¹⁶). This is the truth of the gospel, the liberty in Christ as opposed to the bondage of the Law (vv. 3-5, 14¹), the weak and beggarly rudiments of the world (4^{9, 10}). The life of faith which St. Paul now lives in Christ, 'who loved and gave himself up for me' (ὑπερ ἐμοῦ), means that Christ has charge of his life, and St. Paul is in a mystic sense crucified with Christ (2²⁰). Christ did an objective work for St. Paul, but it has become effective through the subjective surrender to Christ, even identification with Him. A notable passage is 3¹³, 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us.' The meaning is plain enough. He is speaking not simply for Jews, but for all. The curse that came upon Christ is death. By Christ's death He 'brought us out from under' (ἐξῆγορασεν ἐκ) the curse of the law.' We escape spiritual death because Christ received in Himself the curse of the law for sin, though He Himself had no sin. The prepositions give the same picture. Those who rely on the law are 'under' (ὑπὸ) a curse.' Christ steps 'under' that curse and 'over' (ὑπὲρ) us. Thus we are rescued 'out from under' (ἐκ) the curse and go free. That is the inevitable teaching of St. Paul in this passage. It presents clearly the notion of substitution. It may be remarked that ἀντὶ does not itself mean 'instead' any more than ὑπερ does; that is a secondary notion with both prepositions. In the Koine it is quite common with ὑπερ and is not unknown in the older Greek. In Christ Jesus therefore the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles (3¹⁴). Christ is the seed promised to Abraham long before the Law (vv. 16-19). Christ is the schoolmaster, while the Law was merely the pædagogus to bring us to Christ, 'that we might be justified by faith' (v. 24). Through faith in Christ we become sons of God in the full sense of sonship (v. 23). The very incarnation of Christ, God's Son, 'born of a woman, born under the law,' made it possible for Him to redeem us from the Law and for us to receive the adoption of sons and to have the privilege of sons and heirs and say 'Abba, Father' (4¹⁻⁶). Christ, and Christ alone, set us free and called us for freedom (5¹⁻¹³).

But liberty is not licence (v. 24), and the Cross of Christ is the glory of St. Paul (6¹⁴).

Romans gives the same interpretation of the work of Christ as we find in Galatians, though with less passion and vehemence. The wrath of God rests upon both Gentile and Jew because of sin, which consists in violation of what conscience tells one is right (1¹⁸⁻²⁰). The Law brought a keener sense of sin, and all the world comes under the judgment of God. The Gentile is without excuse (1²⁰), as is the Jew (2¹) who is first in privilege and in penalty (v. 24). St. Paul expounds his gospel with care in 3²¹⁻³¹. The failure of man to obtain righteousness made plain the necessity for a revelation of God's righteousness, and this is found in the gospel and is mediated through faith in Christ (1¹⁶). Real righteousness is thus apart from Law (3²¹) and is purely of grace (v. 24). God 'justifies' the sinner, declares him righteous (δικαιῶν) 'freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus,' διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ (v. 24). The repetition of the article removes all ground for speculation as to St. Paul's meaning. Christ is thus the Redeemer, the Agent through whom (διὰ) redemption is secured, and it is a free gift on God's part, provided the sinner exercises faith in Christ, διὰ πίστεως (v. 25). More exactly St. Paul explains how this redemption is made possible in Christ, that we may obtain the righteousness of God (v. 25), 'that he might himself be just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus.' On man's part God requires faith (trust), which involves repentance from sin. This we can understand as proper. But what about the death of Christ as the ground for this free offer of mercy on God's part? Here we touch the fathomless depths of God's love and elective grace (11³³⁻³⁶). It is all 'of him, and through him, and unto him' (ἐξ, διὰ, εἰς). But St. Paul boldly puts forth the death of Christ as God's own solution of the problem: 'whom God set forth, to be a propitiation, through faith, in his blood' (3²⁵). The middle voice (προέθετο) accents the will of God in the matter. The word λασθήριον, as Deissmann has conclusively shown from the inscriptions (Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, pp. 124-135), means 'propitiatory sacrifice,' neuter adjective as substantive, and is not here used in the sense of 'cover' for the mercy-seat. He brands the old view as 'one of the most popular, most pregnant with results, and most baneful' of all exegetical errors (p. 124). The phrase ἐν τῷ αὐτοῦ αἵματι makes the meaning clear also. It is a propitiation in the blood of Christ, 'to show his [God's] righteousness' (3²⁵). As to how the death of Christ met the requirements of God's righteousness St. Paul gives us no light. We must let it go at that, save that we see the greatest love in it, in that Christ died for us while we were yet sinners (5⁶⁻⁸). Indeed, while we were yet enemies to God (v. 10), He showed His love to us by not sparing His own Son (8³²), so that 'we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son' (5¹⁰). The point here is, not that God needed to be reconciled, though He had to remain just when justifying (3²⁵), but that we were reconciled to God. Certainly we can understand to some extent the power of the appeal of the death of Christ for us while we were ungodly sinners, enemies of God. There is far more in the great mystery of Christ's death than this, but we can at least grasp something of that love for sinners that allowed the sinless Christ to be regarded as sin, and die for sinners, that they might become righteous in Christ (2 Co 5²¹). The great passage in Rom. (3²¹⁻²²) stands beside that in 2 Cor. (5¹⁴⁻²¹), and they concur. The rest of Romans confirms this view. In 4²⁵ the resurrection of Jesus is associated with His death. If He had not risen, the Death would have been in vain. We enjoy

'peace with God through (διὰ) Jesus Christ, through whom (δι' οὗ) we have had our access (προσάγωγη, 'introduction') by faith into this grace' (Ro 5¹¹). The reconciliation is accomplished through Christ (v.¹¹). We shall obtain final salvation because Christ ever lives (v.¹⁰). In some sense parallel with the relation of Adam to the race, Christ stands at the head of all who are redeemed, as the channel of life and grace (vv.¹²⁻²¹). Christ mediates to the believer more grace than Adam did sin and death (v.²⁰). But this wealth of grace brings obligation to holy living, not to licence (6¹ 7⁶). St. Paul uses the figures of death to sin as symbolized by baptism, the new slavery to God, and marriage to Christ, to illustrate the permanence of the bond with Christ. Jesus Christ set St. Paul free from the bondage of sin and the Law (7²⁵ 8³). God sending His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh condemned man's sin in the flesh of Jesus (8³). The absence of the article before ἐν τῇ σαρκί makes this interpretation probable. Christ is not merely the Mediator and Redeemer, but He dwells in the Christian (v.¹⁰). We are in Christ and Christ is in us. We are joint-heirs with Christ (v.¹⁷) and destined to be conformed to the image of the Son of God, the First-born among many brethren (v.²⁸). More than that, Jesus is now the champion of the elect and makes intercession for us at God's right hand (v.²⁴). St. Paul defies the universe to lay a charge against the elect, rescued by the death of Christ and preserved by His unchanging love (vv.³³⁻³⁹). It is God's plan, and He declares us righteous. St. Paul seems to call Christ God in 9⁵. Christ died and came to life again that He might be Lord of both the dead and the living (14⁹). So St. Paul interprets in Romans the mystery of the ages (16²⁵).

(c) The Third Group (Phil., Philem., Col., Eph.).—We shall treat these Epistles in this order, though the position of Philippians is disputed. These are the Epistles of the first Roman imprisonment. The standpoint of Phil. does not differ essentially from that of Gal. and Romans. St. Paul here emphasizes his notion of life with Christ (1²¹). The incarnation and death of Christ are treated as the supreme example of humility (2⁵⁻⁸). Christ in His pre-incarnate state left a place on an equality with God for the lowliest rank among men and for the shameful death of the Cross. All this brought its consequent exaltation (vv.⁹⁻¹¹), and thus some light is thrown upon the philosophy of the Cross of Christ. St. Paul uses the language of the mystic to express his passionate devotion to Christ and his purpose to realize all that Christ has in store for him (3⁷⁻¹⁸), 'that I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, becoming conformed unto his death' (v.¹⁰). The very difficulty of his language shows the wealth of meaning in his conception of his personal relation to Christ. Jesus was Mediator, but in no artificial way; rather He had grappled the whole of St. Paul's nature. Christ had become the passion of his life (ἐν δέ, v.¹³). Christ is the great reality of life to him, πάντα ἰσχύω ἐν τῷ ἐνδυναμοῦντί με. Christ brings all good (4¹⁹).

There is nothing distinctive in Philem. on the subject, though St. Paul urges Philemon to receive the converted runaway slave as a 'brother beloved' 'in the Lord' (v.¹⁶). Thus Christ sets free the slaves of the world.

In Col. and Eph. St. Paul combats the heresies of incipient Gnosticism with perhaps a tinge of the current 'mystery-religions.' The horizon is wider than the Roman Empire or even the earth itself. The whole range of the universe of spirit and matter comes into view, so far as the Ancients conceived it (τὰ πάντα). Already in Ro 8¹⁹—'the whole creation' is represented as being in some sense involved in sin and redemption. The Gnostic philosophy posited matter as essentially evil, and explained the Creation by the existence of sub-ordinate æons who came in between God and matter. Christ was conceived as one of these æons. Thus the Person of Christ is forced to the front, and St. Paul interprets Christ in relation to the universe. He places Him on a par with God in nature (Col 1¹⁴), and treats Christ as the Agent and Conserver of the material universe (vv.¹⁵⁻¹⁷). Thus he answers the degrading view of the Gnostics. Besides, Christ is also the Head of the spiritual universe (vv.¹⁸⁻²³), 'that in all things he might have the pre-eminence' (v.¹⁸). As Creator and Head of all things, as the fullness of God (v.¹⁹ 2⁹), Christ is able to reconcile unto God all things, καὶ δι' αὐτοῦ ἀποκαταλλάξαι τὰ πάντα εἰς αὐτόν (1²⁰). This peace of the universe is made possible by the blood of His Cross (1²⁰). Here the mediatorial work of Christ is lifted to the highest possible plane (cf. 1 Co 15²⁴⁻²⁸ for an adumbration of this conception). The triumph of the Cross is emphasized further in Col 2¹⁴. The Docetic Gnostics denied the real humanity of Christ, and so St. Paul mentions 'blood' and 'bodily.' The Cerinthian Gnostics separated the Christ from Jesus, and so St. Paul identifies them as one 'Christ Jesus the Lord' (v.⁹). It is essential for the Christian to hold fast the Head (v.¹⁹). The ἐμβατεῖν of v.¹⁸ is now known to be used, in an inscription in the sanctuary of Claros, of the initiate 'entering in' (cf. The Independent, 1913, p. 376). Some of these initiates in the mystery-religions had apparently dethroned Christ from His place as Head. Christ did not do all His mediatorial work on the Cross. He will keep it up, as we have seen (1 Co 15^{25ff.}), till the last enemy is put under His feet, when He shall deliver up the kingdom unto the Father (v.²⁴). Now He is at the right hand of God, and our life is hid with Christ in God and is doubly safe (Col 3¹⁻³). St. Paul is bold to speak the mystery of Christ (4³), who is the mystery of God (2²). In Eph 1³ every spiritual blessing is 'in Christ.' God chose us 'in him' (v.⁴). We become sons 'through Jesus Christ' (v.⁵). He bestowed His grace 'in the Beloved' (v.⁶). 'We have our redemption through his blood' (v.⁷). God purposed His will 'in him' (v.⁹), 'to sum up all things in Christ' (v.¹⁰), 'in whom also we were made a heritage' (v.¹¹), 'in whom ye also . . . were sealed' (v.¹³). Christ is Head of the Church, which is His body (v.²²; cf. Col 1¹⁸). This mystic body of Christ includes both Jew and Gentile, who have been made one in Christ and are drawn together by the blood of Christ, the middle wall of partition being thus broken down and both being united to God and to each other (Eph 2¹¹⁻¹⁴). This 'one new man' is the household of God, the holy temple of the Lord (vv.¹⁵⁻²²). Thus the wisdom of God is shown (3¹) 'according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.' Christ is not a mere official Mediator. He is the vital Head of the living body which is growing up to the fullness of Christ (4¹²⁻¹⁶). Christ loved His body, the Church (the Kingdom), and gave Himself up for it that in the end it might be without spot or wrinkle, holy and blameless (5²⁵⁻²⁷). This mystery is great (v.³²) in regard to Christ and the Church. It is the whole mystery of redemptive love.

(d) The Fourth Group (1 Tim., Tit., 2 Tim.).—The Pastoral Epistles, which in the present writer's opinion may be accepted as genuine, do not contain anything essentially new on this theme. In 1 Ti 1¹⁵ we read that 'Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' In 2⁵¹ we have the famous passage, 'one mediator also between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all.' Here the humanity of Christ is accented in His mediatorial work, and the word μεσιτης is applied directly to Jesus. But His atoning death as 'ransom for all,' ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, is emphasized (note both ἀντί and ὑπὲρ, to make plain the substitutionary character of Christ's death; cf. λύτρον ἀντί πολλῶν in Mt 20²⁸). In Tit 2¹⁴ the voluntary giving of Christ is presented to redeem us and purify for Himself a people of His own. The reference is to His death. In Tit 3⁴⁻⁶ the Pauline teaching of salvation by mercy and faith, not by works, appears, 'through Jesus Christ our Saviour.'

3. Epistle of James.—There is nothing in this book specifically on the subject, though the mediatorial work of Christ is assumed and implied in several passages. In 1¹ James terms himself 'a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ'; here the word κύριος is to be noted and also the fact that Christ is placed on a level with God in what may possibly be the earliest document in the NT. Still stronger is 2¹: 'Hold not the faith in our Lord Jesus, the glory'; if we accept the interpretation of Mayor and several other commentators, Christ is here the object of faith and so of worship, and τῆς δόξης is in descriptive apposition. 'The honourable (καλὸν) name which is called upon you' refers to Christ. There may be a reference to the death of Christ in 5⁶, though this is not certain; but the Second Coming is presented in v. 7. 'The Judge standeth before the doors' (v. 9). Though the stress in the Epistle is on the ethical side of Christianity, one notes the same doctrinal conception of Christ and His work at the basis of it all. The new birth is mentioned in 1¹⁸⁻²¹.

4. Jude.—There is a positive note in Jude's Epistle, as the writer describes 'Our only Master and Lord (τον μόνον δεσπότην καὶ κύριον ἡμῶν), Jesus Christ' (v. 4). Cf. v. 3, 'the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints,' clearly having Jesus as 'only Master and Lord.' See also 'our Lord Jesus Christ' in v. 1; 'the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life' (v. 2), where 'eternal life' is posited in 'the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ.' In v. 14 we are plainly told that we can be set before the presence of God's glory 'through Jesus Christ our Lord.'

5. Epistles of Peter.—The genuineness of these Epistles cannot here be discussed, nor their 'Pauline' features. They certainly give the same view of Christ's mediatorial office as we find in St. Paul's writings. This conception of Christ's sacrificial death meets us in 1 P 1², 'sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' (cf. Ex 24). The new birth comes to pass 'by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead' (1 P 1³). The readers of the Epistle receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls, 'through Jesus Christ' (1²). 'The sufferings of Christ' were prophesied beforehand by the Spirit of Christ (v. 11). Redemption is not with gold, 'but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ' (v. 19). Here the point of view of the Epistle to the Hebrews (chs. 9 and 10) is approached. Christ is the Living Stone through whom the living stones in the spiritual house 'offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God' (1 P 2⁵), a clear picture of the mediatorial work of Christ (cf. Mt 16¹⁸). In 2²¹ we are told expressly that 'Christ also suffered for you (ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν), leaving you an example (ὑπομιμνήσκων ὑπογραμμὸν), that you should follow his steps,' where the death of Christ is given as an example for us in suffering. But that this is not the sole idea in the atoning death of Christ we need only recall (1¹⁸), not to mention the rest of the sentence in 2²¹⁻⁴, where we read that Jesus 'did no sin' and 'his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed.' There is an evident reference to Is 53, and the substitutionary character of the death of Christ for sins is clear enough. St. Peter's own interpretation of ἐπαθεν ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν is thus quite pertinent. Hence it is plain what is meant in 3¹⁸: 'Because Christ also died (ἀπέθανεν, WH, but some MSS ἐπαθεν) for (πρὸς) sins once for all (ἅπαρ), the righteous for (ὑπὲρ) the unrighteous, that he might bring you (or us, υμᾶς or ἡμᾶς) unto God.' This significant passage pictures Christ as both Sacrifice and Priest (cf. Hebrews). In 3²¹ baptism is given a symbolic interpretation 'through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and in v. 22 the mediatorial work of Christ continues, 'who is on the right hand of God, having gone into heaven.' Christ suffered in the flesh (3¹⁸ 4¹). Through Jesus Christ God is to be glorified in all things (4¹¹). We are to rejoice if we become partakers of Christ's sufferings, only we must be innocent of wrong and suffer as Christians (v. 12¹). This imitation of Christ in suffering is ennobled by the fact that Jesus has bought us by His own precious blood (cf. 1¹⁸ 5¹⁰). St. Peter calls himself a witness of the sufferings of Christ and a partaker of the glory to be revealed (5¹).

In 2 P 1¹ the Greek text τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν καὶ σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (cf. 1¹¹: τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν καὶ σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ) calls for the translation, 'Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.' Thus the deity and redemptive work of Christ are presented. Cf. also 'the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1¹¹), 'the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 16). In 2¹ the heretics are described as 'denying even the Master that bought them.' In 3- Jesus is described again as 'the Lord and Saviour.' The Lord Jesus is to return for His people (ch. 3).

6. Epistle to the Hebrews.—The mediatorial work of Jesus is the distinctive note in this wonderful book. Everything turns on the peculiar qualifications of Christ in His humanity and deity to fulfil His mission as Redeemer from sin. The Jews had challenged the worth of Christianity in comparison with Judaism. They claimed the superiority of Judaism in the revelation in the OT, in the fact that this revelation was mediated through angels, in the greatness of Moses, in the glory of the Aaronic priesthood, in the promises to Israel. It was an impressive plea, and Christianity was made to appear barren beside the richness of ritual and worship present in Judaism. The reply is a striking apologetic for Christianity as in all points superior to Judaism by showing that in each of these points the former has the advantage. The revelation in Christianity comes through the Son of God as compared with the OT prophets (1¹⁻³); Christianity is mediated through the Son of God, who is superior to angels both in His Divine nature as God's Son (1⁴⁻²⁴) and in His human nature as the Son of man (2⁵⁻¹⁸); Jesus is superior to Moses since He is God's Son over God's house, not a servant in the house (3¹⁻⁴); the priesthood of Christ is superior to that in Judaism (4¹⁴⁻¹²³) since Jesus Himself is a better High Priest than Aaron (4¹⁴⁻⁷²³); He is the minister of a far better covenant (8¹⁻¹²); He now ministers in a better sanctuary (9¹⁻¹²); He offers a better sacrifice which is His own blood (9¹³⁻¹⁰¹⁸), and His work rests on better promises (10¹⁹⁻¹²³). The argument is masterful and complete, and furnishes the richest interpretation of the work of Christ in existence. It is a complement to the teaching of St. Paul in its emphasis (4¹⁴⁻¹²³) on the priestly work of Jesus. But for Hebrews we should have only glimpses of this aspect of Christ's mission. The wealth of material in the Epistle renders extended comments on important passages impossible. In the very first section (1¹⁻³) we see the nature of Christ's Person as the effulgence of God's glory and the very image of His substance. His work is described as universal in the cosmic relation (creation) and maintenance of the universe (cf. Col 1^{16c}); but He is described at once as the Priest who made purification of sins and as He Who sits on the right hand of the Majesty on high as the Mediator between God and man. Jesus—and the writer loves the human name—is qualified for His work as the Son of God, and is thus superior to angels (1^{4 23}) by the high inheritance as Son. But His humanity likewise equips Jesus for His task. He is the representative man (2⁵⁻⁹), fulfilling man's highest destiny 'because of the suffering of death,' which He tasted 'for every man' (v.⁹). The Incarnation perfected the human experience of Jesus through sufferings (v.¹⁰) and made Him a sympathetic High Priest as He makes propitiation (ἱλασμοῦ) for the sins of the people, equipped by suffering and temptation to succour the tempted (v.¹⁸). Our Mediator thus has power with the Father as His Son and commands our sympathy and confidence as our Elder Brother (v.¹⁴). Jesus is 'the apostle and high priest of our confession' (3¹). The double nature of Jesus as Son of God and Son of man makes a powerful appeal to Christians to come boldly to the throne of grace, for grace to help in time of need (4¹⁴⁻¹⁸). Jesus, like Aaron, has both human sympathy and Divine appointment (5¹⁻⁹). By His obedience and suffering He became the Author of eternal salvation (v.⁸). But Jesus is far superior to Aaron in that He is like Melchizedek (5^{10 7-8}). He has His priesthood unchangeable (7¹), 'wherefore also he is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them' (v.³). Being free from sin He is the kind of Priest that sinners need (vv. 2⁶⁻²³). He is 'the mediator of a better covenant' (8¹) in that this covenant is one of grace in the heart and not mere ineffective form. So He is the 'mediator of a new covenant' (9¹⁵). His sanctuary is heaven itself, 'the greater and more perfect tabernacle' (9¹¹), into which He entered once for all, having obtained eternal redemption (v. 1⁻). He is both Sacrifice and High Priest (cf. W. P. DuBose, High Priesthood and Sacrifice, 1908). His offering is His own blood, that of the God-man, which was voluntary and so with moral value in the realm of spirit (v. 1^{3c}). This offering was made once for all (ἅπασι, v. 2⁶) and really accomplishes cleansing from sin (10¹²⁻¹⁸). He will come a second time for salvation alone (9²⁸). The blood of Jesus has given us boldness to enter into the holy place (10^{19a}). There is no other sacrifice for sin if we reject this (v. 6). The heroes of faith hold on to the promise of the Messiah which has come true in Christ Jesus, who is Himself the best example of faith, the Author and Perfecter of our faith (11³⁹⁻¹²³). Once more the writer speaks of 'Jesus the mediator of a new covenant' (12²⁴). Christians should be loyal to Christ. He has not changed (13⁹). He suffered without the gate that He might sanctify His own people through His own blood, and, if need be, we should be willing to leave the camp of Judaism and take our stand with Jesus, bearing His reproach (v. 12¹). God brought from the dead 'the great shepherd of the sheep with the blood of an eternal covenant, even our Lord Jesus' (v. 4⁰).

7. The Johannine Epistles and the Apocalypse.—We can see clear teaching about the mediation of Christ in 1 John: 'The blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1¹). Here we have the picture of the continuous sacrificial efficacy of the blood of Christ (cf. Hebrews). 'And if any man sin, we have an Advocate (παράκλητον) with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous' (2¹). He pleads our cause with the Father (cf. Ro 8³⁴). 'And he is the propitiation (ἱλασμός) for (πενί) our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world'

(2²). Here the universal aspect of the work of Christ is presented. St. John opposes the Cerinthian Gnostics who distinguished between Jesus and Christ (2²²; cf. 5¹⁻⁵), and shows that confession of the Son brings knowledge of the Father (2²²). He presents also the purifying power of hope in Christ (3³). The Son of God destroys the work of the devil, who sins from the beginning (v. 5^{1c}). God showed His love for us by sending His only begotten Son into the world as a propitiation for our sins (4⁹). The Father has sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world (v. 1⁴). God abides in the man who confesses the Son (v. 1⁵). The water and the blood bear witness to Jesus and His work (5⁸⁻⁹), meaning probably the baptism and the blood. The baptism symbolizes the death and resurrection of Christ for our sins. By the Son of God we come to know the true God and eternal life (v. 2⁰). Confession of the true humanity of Jesus as opposed to the Docetic Gnostics is absolutely essential (4⁴, 2 Jn 7).

The Apocalypse gives a powerful picture of the mediatorial work of Christ. He 'loosed us from our sins by his blood' (Rev 1⁵). He will come again for judgment of the wicked (v. 7) and for the blessing of the redeemed (22⁴). He was dead and is now alive for evermore, with the keys of death and Hades (1¹⁷). Christ is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, victorious and able to open the seals of the book, because He is also as a Lamb standing, as though He had been slain (5⁶⁻⁷). Here the power of Christ is lodged in His atoning death. With His blood He purchased men of every land and nation (v. 9¹), who worship Jesus as God. Those arrayed in white robes in heaven have been washed in the blood of the Lamb (7^{14c}). Thus, as in Hebrews, Jesus is both Sacrifice and Priest. The Lamb is the Shepherd to guide unto fountains of water of life (7¹⁷). The Lord was crucified in spiritual Sodom and Egypt (11⁸). Christ is Conqueror at last, for the kingdom of the world is become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ (v. 1⁵). Because of the blood of the Lamb the accuser of our brethren is cast down by the authority of Christ (12^{10c}). The Lamb that has been slain has a book of life written from the foundation of the world (13⁸). The victors sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb (15³⁻⁴). The Lamb shall overcome, for He is Lord of lords and King of kings (17¹⁴). The Lamb will have His marriage supper, and the Bride is the company of those redeemed by His blood (19^{7a 21⁹}). As Victor His garments are sprinkled with (or dipped in) the blood of His enemies (19¹³). In the New Jerusalem the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb are the temple (21²²). The Lamb is the lamp, and only those are there whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life (21²³⁻⁷). Jesus is the Root and Offspring of David, the bright and morning Star (22¹⁸). He offers the water of life freely to all who will drink (v. 1⁷).

See also artt. ATONEMENT, PRIEST, PROPITIATION, RANSOM, RECONCILIATION, REDEMPTION, SACRIFICE, SALVATION, SAVIOUR.

LITERATURE.—See books on NT Theology by W. F. Adeney (1894), W. Beyschlag (Eng. tr., 1895), J. Bovon (21902-05), D. F. Estes (1900), H. J. Holtzmann (21911), G. B. Stevens (1899), B. Weiss (Eng. tr., 1882-83); A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894, The Humiliation of Christ, 1876; D. Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 1897; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions, 1913; W. M. Ramsay, The Teaching of Paul in Terms of the Present Day, 1913; W. P. DuBose, The Gospel according to St. Paul, 1907; works on the Atonement by J. M. Campbell (1907), R. W. Dale (1873), J. Denney (1903), J. Stalker (1908); works on Hebrews by A. B. Bruce (1899), F. Delitzsch (Eng. tr., 1868-70), M. Dods (EGT iv. (1910)), W. P. DuBose (High Priesthood and Sacrifice, 1908), G. Milligan (1899), A. Nairne (The Epistle of Priesthood, 1913), B. F. Westcott (1889).

A. T. ROBERTSON.

MEEKNESS.—Meekness was hallowed as a Christian virtue by the beatitude of Mt 5³, though it is not improbable that our Lord's use of the phrase 'the meek' implied the semi-technical connotation of the OT, where they are the godly remnant, often oppressed and nearly always obscure, in opposition to 'the rich,' the men of violence and pride, who dominated the society of Israel in the ages of warfare, defensive and offensive. Christ's own character (Mt 11²⁹) was the immortal witness of His sympathy with the saint, who was down-trodden, misunderstood, and persecuted, and who endured contradiction with courage and patience. 'Christ Himself is the Christian law,' and His moral pre-eminence was the ground of His claim to human obedience; but in calling upon the race to take His yoke, He speaks as One 'meek and lowly of heart,' i.e. as One who had Himself mastered self-will, especially in the form of 'the restless desire for distinction and eminence,' and had subordinated His nature to the love which seeketh not its own, but the things of others (cf. J. R. Seeley, *Ecce Homo*¹¹, 1873, ch. xv.). Thus, the meekness which He blessed and taught by His own conduct was the self-conquest which rendered Him indifferent to the glamour of external conditions such as wealth, ease, fame, and sovereignty, by which even the greatest minds have been dazzled; and further, it was opposed to the spirit of resentment, hatred, and pride, which is often the product of contumely, pain, unjust suffering, and obscurity. For the application of this principle to slavery in the Christian economy of life, see art. SLAVE, SLAVERY.

In apostolic literature the word 'meekness' (πραῦτης, also found in the form πραότης or πρῶτης, and πραῦτάθεια, only in 1 Ti 6¹¹ and Ign. ad Trall. viii. 1) is of frequent occurrence. St. Paul uses it eight times and the Apostolic Fathers about a dozen. In 1 Co 4¹ it is linked with 'love,' and indicates the forgiving spirit which has abandoned stern measures; in 2 Co 10¹ with εὐεικεία, and is used of Christ in a memorable phrase; in Gal 5²³ it is one of the fruits of the Spirit and in 6¹ is applied to the kindly treatment of an offender; in Eph 4² the context suggests the gentleness of patience (cf. Col 3¹, 2 Ti 2²⁵, and Tit 3¹). In Ja 1²¹ it refers to the attitude of humble receptivity, and in 3³ is a quality of Christian 'wisdom.' In 1 P 3⁵ it is united with φύλαξις as a safeguard against the calumny with which the opponents of Christianity pursued the believer.

In 1 Clem. xxi. 7 and xxx. 8 we find it allied with εὐεικεία (cf. Diog. vii. 4), and in lxi. 2 with εἰρήνη, in Ep. Barn. xx. 2 it stands side by side with υπομονή (cf. Did. v. 2). In Ign. ad Trall. iii. 2 it is described as 'the power of the bishop,' and later on, in iv. 2, as the weapon which is to destroy the ruler of this world (cf. ad Polyc. ii. 1 and vi. 2). Hermas (Mand. v. ii. 6) links it with ἡσυχία (cf. 1 P 3⁴ and 1 Clem. xiii. 4, where the corresponding adjectives are used, the former being defined by Bengel as mansuetus, 'one who does not cause disturbance,' the latter as tranquillus, 'one who bears calmly the disturbances of others') and (ib. xii. iii. 1) with πίστις.

Thus, it would appear that the ideas of patience under injury, the forgiving spirit, peaceableness of disposition and life, and gentleness toward the erring enter into the use of the word in apostolic and sub-apostolic literature.

R. MARTIN POPE.

MELCHIZEDEK.—The original meaning was probably 'My king is Zedek'; but the name is interpreted ideally in He 7¹, where it is taken to mean 'king of righteousness,' and at the same time, because of Melchizedek's rule over Salem (= 'peace'), 'king of peace.' Thus the personal and the official titles point to the actual character of the man. The typical hero, first righteous and therefore self-governed and blessed with the tranquillizing consciousness of the presence of God, appears to the writer as an anticipation of Him in whom alone righteousness and peace are completely realized both in His own person and life and in His gifts to men. Thereupon the writer proceeds to develop the comparison in the interest of his conception of the supreme and permanent priesthood of Jesus Christ.

1. The original source of the story is Gn 14^{17b-20}, of which the literary history is still uncertain. It is not an integral part of any of the principal documents, though the chapter as a whole has a few affinities with P. At present the only safe conclusion is that it comes from an independent source, of which the special characteristics cannot yet be determined. Nor is there any real evidence of a lack of historicity. The combination of kingly and priestly offices in one person, who was invested with a sacred character as a descendant of a deity, was a not unusual feature of government in the primitive ages (see J. G. Frazer, Lectures on the Early History of the Kingship, 1905, p. 29 ff.), and may well have prevailed among the Canaanite tribes. Yet the writer of Hebrews need not be regarded as a witness to the historicity of the narrative, or as concerning himself with such a question. He treats Melchizedek ideally rather than historically, and interprets the picture preserved in Genesis without committing himself to any opinion as to its literal or biographical accuracy. His object is not to confirm nor to question the narrative, but to work out a conception of priesthood which he found in the priestly archives of his nation; and in so doing he makes at least as much use of the silences of Scripture as of the assertions. Accordingly, B. F. Westcott (Hebrews, 1889, p. 199 f.) takes him as pronouncing no judgment on the historical problems, but as eliciting the typical and abiding value of the story.

2. Immediate source of the exposition.—The writer need not be conceived as going back through Ps 110⁴ to the original tradition in Gn 14 and working upon it independently; for there is sufficient reason to believe that the narrative had for a couple of centuries engaged the attention of some of the religious leaders of the people, and in the interpretation an interesting development may be traced. 'God Most High' (He 7¹) is a phrase of frequent occurrence in the Apocrypha (for the passages see E. Hatch and H. A. Redpath, Concordance to the LXX, 1892 ff.), especially in Ecclesiastics; and the title 'priest of the Most High God' was revived by the Maccabean princes, whilst John Hyrcanus (137–105 B.C.) combined in himself the triple functions of prophet, priest, and king (see Josephus, Ant. XIII. x. 7, BJ i. ii. 8; and R. H. Charles, Book of Jubilees, 1902, p. lxxxviii, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, 1903, p. li ff., with references there cited). Evidently the Melchizedek tradition was considered as pointing to the Maccabean leaders (cf. J. Skinner, Genesis, 1910, on 14²⁰), in whose period Ps 110 may have undergone its final liturgical revision. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs is a Palestinian book; but Philo is a witness for the prevalence of a similar interest in the ancient story in Egypt. He argues in favour of an identification of Melchizedek with the Logos, whose priesthood, however, is viewed as a symbol of the action of reason in bringing righteousness and peace to men (Mangey, i. 103, 533, ii. 34). The thought in Hebrews is clearly an advance, parallel in part to that between the Philonic and the Johannine Logos, but confronting the reader with a religion instead of a philosophy, and with a supreme personal Helper instead of with a dubious process of reasoning.

3. Significance in Hebrews.—The apparent object of the writer was to mark the adequate and final character of the priesthood of Jesus Christ. As a person He is compared with Melchizedek, whose order of priesthood was confessedly above that of Aaron (q.v.); while in regard to priestly acts and functions His efficiency and freedom from limitations are exhibited in comparison with the necessary defects of the Aaronic office. More particularly three features in the story of Melchizedek are singled out. (a) He was king as well as priest, and as priest-king he possessed the endowments of righteousness and peace, and was able to impart them with royal bounty. (b) He was dissociated from all the relations of time, neither qualified by priestly descent for his office, nor interrupted in its discharge by death (He 7^b). (c) Accordingly, through these timeless and regal qualities his priesthood becomes unique, incomparably above all Aaronic and Levitical institutions, and with nothing like it in human history until the Incarnate comes upon the stage and takes to Himself a Priesthood in which He admits no peer, and of which eternal and superabundant adequacy is the note (see PRIEST).

4. Later developments.—In the patristic literature of our period no objection appears to have been taken to the use of the story in Hebrews, though its classification among the alleged theophanies was early and had probably already begun. On the other hand, the Jewish writers adopt an interpretation of their own, either through dislike of the teaching in Hebrews, or in substitution for its application to John Hyrcanus, which had been discredited by the collapse of his influence before the end of his reign. Shem was identified with Melchizedek in early parts of the Talmud and Targums (Nedarim, 32b, Sanhedrin, 108b, Targ. Jonathan), and the narrative was taken to mean that the priesthood was transferred to Abraham, while the rest of the descendants of Shem were excluded. Another tradition distinguishes Shem from Melchizedek, but associates them in the work of transferring the body of Adam to Jerusalem. The story survives with many embellishments in the Ethiopic Book of Adam; and only for its beginnings, with mixed Jewish and Christian influences at work upon it, can a place be allowed within our century.

R. W. MOSS.

MELITA (Μελίτη).—Melita, now Malta, is an island in the Mediterranean, 47 miles S. of Sicily, 17 miles long, 9 miles broad, and 95 square miles in area. Its excellent harbours, together with its position in the track of ships sailing east and west, gave it commercial importance from very early times. Occupied by Phœnician settlers (Diod. v. 12), it was long under the power of the Carthaginians, who surrendered it to the Romans in the Second Punic War, 218 B.C. (Livy, xxi. 51), after which it was annexed to the province of Sicily. The identity of Malta with the island on which St. Paul was shipwrecked on his voyage to Italy (Ac 28¹) was formerly disputed, but is now universally admitted. The case for another Melita on the Dalmatian coast—the modern Meleda—was presented by Padre Georgi, a Dalmatian monk who was a native of the island (1730), and by W. Falconer in his Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage (1872). The theory was examined and refuted by James Smith in his admirable monograph on The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul (1880). It was based on two groundless assumptions: (1) that 'the Adria' through which St. Paul's ship drifted must have been the modern Adriatic, or Gulf of Venice, whereas the term is known to have included in the Apostle's time the whole expanse of sea between Sicily, Italy, Greece, and Crete (Adria); and (2) that the N.E. hurricane, which threatened to drive the ship upon the African quicksands, must have veered completely round and sent her northwards through the Strait of Otranto; an essential point, which the passenger St. Luke, whose narrative is the most vivid and instructive account of a voyage and wreck that has come down from antiquity, could not have failed to mention.

All the facts are in harmony with the theory that 'St. Paul's Bay' in Malta was the scene of the shipwreck. (1) If the E.N.E. wind, known to present-day sailors as the 'Gregalia' or 'Levanter,' continued to blow day after day, as it often does in the late autumn, the ship, having been laid to on the starboard tack (i.e. with her right side to the wind) to avoid being swiftly driven to the African coast, would move in the exact direction of Melita at the mean rate of 1½ miles an hour, covering the distance from Clauda—about 480 miles—in a little over 13 days (Ac 27²⁷). The nautical problem is worked out by Smith (p. 125 f.). (2) Driven in the direction indicated, the ship could not enter St. Paul's Bay without passing within a quarter of a mile of the low rocky point called Koura, and it was the ominous roar of the waves breaking on this headland—a sound at once detected by practised ears—that led the sailors to surmise that some land, which they could not see in the stormy night, was 'nearing' them (v. 27; προσάγειν is one of the many nautical terms which St. Luke heard the crew use; B* has προσάχειν = resonare). (3) At the first indication of danger, orders were given to heave the lead, and the successive measurements of 20 and 15 fathoms (v. 28) exactly correspond to modern soundings taken at the entrance of the bay. (4) As the rapid shoaling proved that not a moment was to be lost, four anchors were cast from the stern, not, according to the usual practice, from the bow, for in that case the ship would have swung round from the wind, and either have wrecked herself in so doing, or at any rate have put herself in the worst position for grounding on the following day. The anchors could not have held in the hurricane except in a bottom of extraordinary tenacity, and the Sailing Directions state that 'the harbour of St. Paul . . . is safe for small ships, the ground, generally, being very good; and while the cables hold there is no danger, as the anchors will never start' (Smith, p. 132). (5) On attempting at day-break to beach the ship, the sailors came unexpectedly upon 'a place where two seas met' (τόπον διθάλασσον, v. 41), which probably means (though there are other explanations of the difficult expression) the narrow channel between the little island of Salmonetta, on the western side of the bay, and the mainland. διθάλασος, 'two-sea'd,' was a term commonly used to describe the great Bosphorus (Strabo, II. v. 12), and St. Luke notes the fact that the ship met her fate at the end of a miniature Bosphorus. (6) When she grounded herself on a bank covered with water too deep for wading, 'the prow struck' (v. 41). This fits the conditions exactly, for the nearest soundings to the mud indicate a depth of 3 fathoms, which is what the corn-ship would draw; and the bottom which she struck is 'of mud graduating into tenacious clay, into which the fore part would fix itself and be held fast, whilst the stern was exposed to the force of the waves' (Smith, p. 144). (7) The only physical feature that is now missing is the sandy or shingly beach (αίγιαλος, v. 39), but there are indications that a creek (κόλπον δὲ τινα) 'must at one time have had a beach which has been worn away, in the course of ages, by the wasting action of the sea' (Smith, p. 247).

The scene of the wreck was about 8 miles N.W. of Valetta, and 5 miles N. of Medina, or Citta Vecchia, the old capital. The local tradition on the subject is certainly ancient, either dating back to the event itself, or resting on early and reasonable conjecture. The earliest maps of Malta, made in the 16th cent., contain the Cale di S. Paolo. To the Hellenist Luke the kind-hearted natives of the island were 'barbarians' (28⁴), a term which does not imply that they were savages, but merely that they did not speak Greek. They belonged to the highly civilized Phœnician race, of which the Carthaginians were a branch. The educated men in the island, of course, knew Greek, and bilingual inscriptions, in Greek and Punic, come down from the 1st century. St. Paul and his company spent three months in Melita, and Publius, the πρωτος, or chief man, of the island, who was subject to the prætor of Sicily, treated them with marked respect (vv. 7-10). That πρωτος was an official designation is proved by a Greek inscription bearing the name of Prudens, a Roman knight, πρωτος Μεταλων και Πατρων, and by a Latin one containing the words 'Municipii Melitensium primus omnium.' The fact that no snakes (v. 3), either venomous or harmless, are now found in Melita is accounted for by the increase of the population and the cultivation of the soil. St. Paul's further labours in Melita, apart from certain acts of healing (vv. 8-9), are left unrecorded by the historian, whose mind and pen hurry on to Rome. And one other fact which tells decisively against the Dalmatian Melita is the call which the Dioscuri made at Syracuse on the way to Puteoli (v. 12). There was a tradition, referred to by Chrysostom (Hom. 54) that St. Paul's stay at Melita resulted in the conversion of the inhabitants. The Maltese have attached the name of San Paolo to a church (1610) and a tower near the bay, and they drink out of the 'Ayin tal Razza', or Fountain of the Apostle.

LITERATURE.—Albert Mayr, Die Insel Malta im Altertum, 1909; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1900, p. 314f.; W. J. Conybeare and J. S. Howson, St. Paul, 1865, ii. 421 f.; R. L. Playfair, in Murray's Handbook to the Mediterranean, 1890. JAMES STRAHAN.

MEN-STEALERS.—The word occurs only once in the NT—in the First Epistle to Timothy (1¹⁰), where the writer includes the term in his list of those for whom the Law is intended. 'A law is not intended for a righteous man but for the lawless and unruly . . . for men-stealers (ἀνδραποδιστὰς, plagiariis [Vulg.]).' That kidnapping was regarded as a serious offence by the Hebrews is clear from the definite statements in Ex 21¹⁶ ('and he that stealeth a man . . . he shall surely be put to death') and in Dt 24⁷ ('if a man be found stealing any of his brethren of the children of Israel . . . then that thief shall die'). By the time of this Epistle, however, the term had less special colour and could describe that subtler form of man-stealing by which one man is made the victim of another's will and the instrument of his selfishness.

R. STRONG.

MERCURY.—'Mercury' (Ac 14¹² RV; AV 'Mercurius,' RVM 'Gr. Hermes'), like 'Jupiter' (q.v.), is used as the Greek equivalent of some local Lyaonian god. Hermes is the name of a Greek god (corresponding to the Roman Mercury) whose origin and real character are perhaps more difficult to define than is the case with any other Greek deity' (Ramsay, EBR xi. [1880] 749). He was the accredited messenger between gods and men. Besides this he was the god of social intercourse, and hence came to be regarded as the personification of cleverness; that he should then be regarded as the patron of thieves was but a step. He is also spoken of as conducting the souls of the departed to their last home—an idea inherited from the Vedic mythology. Because of his connexion with the wind he is generally represented as wearing winged shoes. St. Paul, however, was dubbed 'Hermes,' 'because he was the chief speaker,' which reminds us that this deity was thought of as the god of eloquence. The statue of the god by Praxiteles in the Heraion at Olympia conceived him as possessing peculiar beauty and grace, which accords ill with the traditional portrait of the Apostle. The fact is that the Lyaonians were so wrought upon by the miracle that had been performed, and so delighted at the eloquence of St. Paul, that they did not stop to consider such details.

F. W. WORSLEY.

MERCY (ἐλεος, οἰκτιρμός).—'Ἐλεος means properly 'a feeling of sympathy,' 'fellow-feeling with misery,' 'compassion.' In the sense of God's pity for human woe, which manifests itself in His will of salvation, ἐλεος is found not infrequently in the apostolic writings (cf. Ro 9²³ 15⁹, 1 P 1³, Jude 21, 2 Ti 1¹⁶, 18). It is found joined with ἀγάπη in Eph 2⁴, with μακροθυμία in 1 Ti 1¹⁶, and with χάρις in He 4¹⁶. We find the group, grace, mercy, peace, in the greetings of 1 Ti 1², 2 Ti 1², 2 Jn 3; mercy and peace together in Gal 6¹⁶, Jude 2.

The verb ἐλεῶ is found in a similar sense in Ro 9¹⁵, 16 11³⁰⁻³², 2 Co 4¹, 1 Ti 1¹²⁻¹⁶, 1 P 2¹⁰. It is also found of the mercy of man towards his fellow (Ro 12³, 1 Co 7²³ Ph 2⁷).

οἰκτιρμός also means 'compassion,' 'pity,' 'mercy,' and with the adj. οἰκτιρμών and the verb οἰκτεῖω is used both of God's compassion for men and of men's compassion for one another. In the NT οἰκτιρμός is mostly used in the plural, conformably to the Heb. רַחֲמִים, which it translates in the LXX. Cf., for οἰκτιρμός with reference to God, Ro 12¹, He 10²³. In 2 Co 1³ God is called 'the Father of mercies.' οἰκτιρμός is used of human pity in Col 3¹²; cf. οἰκτιρμών (of God) Ja 5¹¹, οἰκτεῖω (of God) Ro 9¹⁵.

In the sub-apostolic writings the usage is parallel. 1 Clem. is specially fond of both ἐλεος and οἰκτιρμός (cf. ix. 1, xviii. 2, xxii. 8, xxviii. 1, l. 2, lvi. 5, xx. 11, lvi. 1). In Polyc. Phil. we have 'mercy' (ἐλεος) and 'peace' in the introduction.

In conclusion, it may be pointed out that the doctrine of the Divine mercy is an OT rather than a NT doctrine. In the OT it is represented by the ascription to God of the following attributes: (a) tender compassion, rahāmīm, etc., for man's misery and helplessness; (b) a disposition to deal kindly and generously with man, hanan, etc.; (c) the divine affection and fidelity to man, on which man may confidently rely, as he would on the loyalty of his tribe or family, hegedh (W. H. Bennett in HDB iii. 345). Bennett points out that the NT use of the corresponding terms is neither frequent nor characteristic, and is only a faint reflexion of OT teaching. 'The great ideas represented in OT by rahāmīm, hanan, hegedh, and their cognates, are mostly expressed in NT by other terms than ἐλεος, οἰκτιρμός, etc. One might almost say that hegedh covers the whole ground of χάρις, ἐλεος, εἰρήνη (but see Hort on 1 P 1²), and implies the NT doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood.'

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, Eng. tr., 1880, p. 248 f.; W. H. Bennett in HDB iii. 345 f.

R. S. FRANKS.

MERCY-SEAT (ἱλαστήριον, propitiatorium).—The mercy-seat was the cover of the Ark (q.v.) of the Covenant in the Holy of Holies. It was sprinkled with the blood of the victim slain on the annual Day of Atonement (He 9⁵). 'Mercy-seat' is admitted on all hands to be an imperfect translation of the Greek word, being rather, like Luther's Gnadenstuhl, equivalent to θρόνος τῆς χάριτος (He 4¹⁶). It is also frequently contended that ἱλαστήριον, which is the LXX rendering of נָסֶה, is itself a mistake. In the view of Rashi and Kimchi, followed by many Christian scholars, the Heb. word means no more than a literal 'covering' (so RVM in Ex 25¹⁷, etc.). Ritschl maintains that in both the OT and the NT ἱλαστήριον designates 'the piece of furniture over the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies' (*Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung*², ii. [1889] 168). Nowack (Heb. Archäologie, 1894, ii. 60f.) also gives the word a material sense, regarding it, however, as denoting a kind of penthouse (Schutzdach, Deckplatte) for the ark. But the analogy of the Arabic kaffarat seems to justify Lagarde (and many others) in holding (1) that the LXX has rendered the original quite accurately, and (2) that ἱλαστήριον means 'the propitiating thing,' or 'the propitiatory gift.' Wherever the word is used by Philo (de Vit. Mos. iii. 8, de Profug. 19, de Cherub. 8, etc.) this is the meaning indicated by the context, and recently discovered inscriptions (W. R. Paton and E. L. Hicks, The Inscriptions of Cos, 1891) prove that ἱλαστήριον ordinarily bore this sense in the early Imperial period (cf. Dio Chrysostom, Or. xi. 355 [Reiske]).

With such a connotation the word lies at the heart of St. Paul's gospel (Ro 3²³). When he depicts Christ Jesus as set forth to be a ἱλαστήριον (or his word may be an adj., ἱλαστήριος), it is scarcely possible that he conceives the Messiah as a 'mercy-seat,' or 'covering of the ark,' sprinkled with blood—His own blood. The figure is inappropriate and unintelligible. But the Apostle's thought is at once apparent and impressive if he represents Christ as a Propitiatory. The exact shade of meaning which may thereafter be detected in the word—whether 'the means of propitiating,' or 'the propitiatory gift,' or 'the propitiatory One'—is of less importance. What is essential is the large and luminous idea of atonement. The Pauline teaching and the Johannine are here in agreement, each emphasizing the same central thought. Christ as the ἱλαστήριον (propitiatory) is the ἱλασμός (propitiation) for our sins (1 Jn 2²).

LITERATURE.—P. de Lagarde, Uebersicht über die im Aram., Arab. und Heb. übliche Bildung der Nomina, Göttingen, 1889; H. Cremer, *Bibl.-theol. Wörterbuch*³, Göttingen, 1895, p. 474 ff.; G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 124 ff., also art. in EBI.

JAMES STRAHAN.

MESOPOTAMIA.—Mesopotamia is referred to in Ac 2⁹, where it is evidently the well-known district between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris with which the name is generally associated, and also in Ac 7², where it is roughly parallel with 'the land of the Chaldeans' in v. 4. The name 'Mesopotamia' represents the Hebrew Aram-Naharaim in the OT, which is usually rendered 'Aram of the two rivers,' but is more correctly Aram Naharim or Naharin, i.e. 'Aram of the river-lands' (EBI i. 287). Mesopotamia reached, on the north, to the plains beneath the Masius range of hills. To the south its limits were about where Babylonia begins, at the so-called Median Wall, which runs from a little below Is (Hit), on the Euphrates, to a point just above Opis (Kadisiya), on the Tigris. It thus formed a deep triangle with the apex to the south and the base along the foot of the northern mountains. The country fell steadily from 1,100 ft. in the north to 65 ft. at its southern extremity, and consisted for the most part of a single open stretch of steppe-land.

The river Chaboras (Khabur), entering the Euphrates from the east near Circesium, marks off the three divisions of Mesopotamia—(a) the northern tracts on its west side, (b) the similar tracts to east of it, and (c) the steppe-land stretching away south to the Median Wall. As to (a), the north-western tracts bore the name of Osrhæne, or Orrhæne, in Seleucid times, and the chief city of the district was Urfa, the Edessa of the Greeks and Romans. To the south of Urfa lie the ruins of Harran, and along the western bank of the Habor stretched Gauzanitis, the Hebrew Gozan, to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria (2 K 17⁶). As to (b), the principal city of the north-eastern region was Nisibis, a busy trading centre and a place of frequent conflict between Roman and Persian armies. As to (c), the southern region of Mesopotamia contained several cities of importance. Among these may be mentioned Corsothe, Anatho, and Is (on the Euphrates), and Atræ and Cænæ (on the Tigris). Along the banks of the two rivers, in this southern country, was a belt of cultivated land, outside of which the conditions were (for the most part) those of the Syrian Desert.

Mesopotamia was constantly being crossed and traversed by armies and caravans in ancient times, and was repeatedly a scene of conflict between the nations of the West and of the Farther East. In the earliest times, its history was closely bound up with that of Babylonia on the south. The Babylonians held predominance for long periods, influencing the civilization to a very considerable extent. At the same time, the land lay open to Syria and Arabia, whose tribes were constantly breaking across its borders. From the Tel-el-Amarna tablets and certain Egyptian tribute-lists, it appears that a non-Semitic people, called Mitani, occupied the district of Naharin between 1700 and 1400 B.C. Harran was probably their capital city. After the Mitani supremacy, the country fell under the rule of the Assyrian kings, and in the 10th cent. B.C. seems to have become part of Assyria proper. When the Assyrian power declined, Mesopotamia was overrun (as it had been more or less all along) by Aramæan hordes from the west and south.

LITERATURE.—EBI iii. 3050-3057; H. Winckler, History of Babylonia and Assyria, Eng. tr., 1907.

A. W. COOKE.

MESSIAH.—See CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY.

METAPHOR.—Metaphor has been defined as 'the figure of speech in which a name or descriptive term is transferred to some object different from, but analogous to, that to which it is properly applicable' (OED, s.v.). Again, 'in metaphor a word in the sentence to be expressed is replaced by a word denoting an object in some respect similar; frequently it is an abstract word which is replaced by a concrete' (L. E. Browne, The Parables of the Gospels, p. 2). Simile, on the other hand, is used simply of explicit comparison, often introduced in English by either 'like' or 'as.' A parable is an extended simile, and an allegory an extended metaphor. It is only in modern languages that the various forms of figurative speech have become sharply distinguished. Thus the Greek παράβολή in the NT means not only 'parable' but 'comparison' (He 9⁹), and in Lk 4²³ the proverb or adage 'Physician, heal thyself,' is called παράβολή. Likewise the Heb. מִשְׁלָּה means not only 'parable' but 'by-word,' 'similitude'; and it is used more generally still of ethical maxims, didactic poems, or odes. But, though definitions differ slightly, the meaning of the English 'metaphor' is now generally standardized.

According to König, 'Metaphor springs from the putting together of comparable instances of the material and visible and the ideal spheres' (Stilistik, Rhetorik, Poetik in Bezug auf die biblische Litteratur komparativisch dargestellt). Thus he does not agree with W. Reichel, who in his Sprachpsychologische Studien (1897, p. 179) says: 'There is really no essential difference between actual and metaphorical designation.' 'According to my view,' says König, 'there is still an essential difference in method of expression when the sphere of existence of both ideas that appear in the subject and predicate is the same, and when it is different.'

König divides metaphor into four classes: (1) both ideas are in the inanimate sphere, such as the association of joy with light, and sorrow with darkness; (2) an idea is taken from the inanimate sphere to the animate, e.g. the term 'Rock' applied to God (frequently in the Psalms and elsewhere in the OT); (3) both ideas are in the animate sphere, e.g. the comparison of a man to a lion, bear, panther, dog or swine, serpent, eagle, raven, etc.; (4) an idea is transferred from the animate sphere to the inanimate, e.g. 'the tops of the mountains' (Heb. 'heads'), and the 'face of the waters' (Gn 1-). Closely connected with the last is the idea of personification: e.g. inanimate objects are bidden hearken to the word of God, as in Is 1-, 'Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth.'

Not only are there no parables outside the Synoptists, but the use of metaphorical language is both more complicated and more extended. We still have the familiar conceptions drawn from everyday life—sowing, reaping, and harvest, animals and birds, the seasons, light and darkness, life and death—but as the scene shifts from the hillsides of Nazareth and the streets of Jerusalem to the busy cities of the Græco-Roman world with their ceaseless and varied activity, there are many phrases and metaphors in the Acts, the Epistles, and the Apocalypse which could hardly have fallen from the lips of our Lord Himself. Many of these expressions, too, have since so become part of ordinary theological language that we do not always at first see that they are metaphors at all.

It will be convenient to divide the metaphors under discussion as follows:—

I. New Testament:

- (1) Acts.
- (2) Pauline Epistles.
- (3) Epistle to Hebrews.
- (4) Catholic Epistles.
- (5) Revelation.

II. Early Christian literature to A.D. 100:

- (1) Agrapha.
- (2) 1 Clement.
- (3) Odes of Solomon.
- (4) Didache.

I. IN THE NT.—1. Acts.—Not many metaphors are found in Acts; such as there are have mostly a Jewish flavour and are not remarkable. 2⁷: 'they were pricked in their heart' (κατενύγησαν τὴν καρδίαν; cf. Gn 34¹ LXX κατενύχθησαν οἱ ἄνδρες; Plutarch, de Tranquill. Animi, xix. [without prefix]). 5³³ 7⁵⁴: 'were cut to the heart' (the Gr. διαπλεῖν means 'to saw through,' used literally in Aristophanes, metaphorically particularly in late and ecclesiastical Greek). 7⁵¹: 'Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears' (cf. Lv 26⁴¹, Jer 6¹⁰ 9²⁶). 12¹: 'Herod the king put forth his hands' (this can fairly be called a metaphor; cf. Polyb. III. ii. 8, ἐπιβάλλειν χεῖρας τοῖς κατ' Αἰγυπτίον). 17²⁷: 'if haply they might feel after him.' ψηλαφᾶν, 'to grope,' is also found metaphorically in Polybius. This idea, like that in 17²³, 'in him we live, and move, and have our being,' may have come from contemporary philosophy. St. Paul like Stoic teachers 'had a profound disbelief in the power of men to find God for themselves' (P. Gardner in Cambridge Biblical Essays, 1909, p. 400 f.). 19²⁰: 'So mightily grew the word of the Lord.' 20²⁹: 'grievous wolves shall enter in' (men represented as beasts—a striking metaphor). 26¹⁴: 'kick against the goad.' κεντρον is also used metaphorically in 1 Co 10³⁵, 36 of the 'sting' of death.

2. St. Paul's Epistles.—It is obvious that in no writer of the NT is metaphor more important than in St. Paul. 'A Hebrew of the Hebrews' who had sat at the feet of Gamaliel, a student who had absorbed much of the intellectual culture of the Greek world of his day, and a citizen of the Roman Empire, it is not surprising that all the sides of his personality have left their mark on his language. Sometimes his metaphors are plain and straightforward: sometimes he passes imperceptibly from what is metaphor to what is not, weaving ideas into and out of one another in a way possible only for one who combined in such a rare degree spiritual freshness and intellectual subtlety. 'One of the most striking characteristics of St. Paul is a sort of telescopic manner, in which one clause is as it were drawn out of another, each new idea as it arises leading on to some further new idea' (Sanday-Headlam, *Romans*², p. lx ff.). Hence his metaphors become changed almost in the same sentence, while the thought is being developed. Some of his simple metaphors, however, claim consideration first.

(1) The way.—1 Th 1⁹: 'What manner of entering in (ὁποῖον εἰσοδόν) we had unto you,' εἰσοδόν being used of the act (as in 1 Th 2¹), rather than of the means, of entering (He 10¹⁹, 2 P 1¹¹). 1 Th 2¹: 'that ye should walk worthily of God.' Christianity is called ἡ ὁδός, 'the way' (Ac 9-, etc.), a metaphor which, as Milligan says (Epp. to Thess., ad loc.), though found in classical Greek, is Hebraistic and is characteristic of the LXX. The same idea appears again in κατευθύναι τὴν ὁδὸν ἡμῶν, 'direct our way' (1 Th 3¹: cf. Lk 1⁷, 2 Th 3⁵).

(2) The athletic ground.—This is obviously a metaphor which would appeal to Greeks. Ph 1³⁰: 'having the same conflict which ye saw in me and now hear to be in me.' 1 Ti 6¹⁴: 'Fight the good fight of faith' (this would also come under 'Warfare') (cf. 1 Th 2², He 10³²): the words ἀλλοτρίως, ἀθλῆν, 'contest,' 'to take part in a contest,' are obviously borrowed from the athletic ground; likewise ἀγών, 'conflict,' has not our sense of 'agony' at all but was simply used of the games, though the word appears metaphorically in Thuc. iii. 44. 1 Co 9²⁴: 'Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? . . . Gal 2²: 'lest by any means I should be running or had run in vain' (the metaphor here might almost equally well be taken from the 'Way'). The same thought is in Ph 2¹⁶: 'that I did not run in vain, neither labour in vain' (cf. Epictetus, Diss. iv. 4. 30: εἴθε ᾗδῃ ἐπὶ τὸν ἀγῶνα, δέξιν ἡμῶν τί ἐμαθες, πῶς ᾗδῃσας; 'Come now to the conflict, show us what thou hast learned, how thou hast contested'). In 2 Th 3¹, 'that the word of the Lord may run and be glorified' is a curious mixed metaphor in the typically Pauline style—one thought quickly passing into another.

(3) Warfare.—The athletic games lead on naturally to warfare. 2 Co 10³ 4: 'For, though we walk in the flesh, we do not war according to the flesh (for the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh, but mighty before God to the casting down of strongholds).' In Eph 6¹¹⁻¹⁸ the metaphor is sustained, and in the beautiful phrases 'the helmet of salvation,' 'the sword of the spirit,' 'the shield of faith' it is both elaborated and interpreted (cf. also 1 Co 6⁷, 1 Th 5⁸). In Ro 13¹²: 'let us therefore cast off the works of darkness and let us put on the armour of light,' the metaphor of warfare is combined with that of light and darkness—equally beautiful and equally Pauline. This idea is found in Is 11⁵ 59¹⁷, Wis 5¹⁷⁻⁹. For further metaphors drawn from warfare, see also 1 Ti 1¹³, 2 Ti 2²⁵.

(4) The family.—1 Th 2⁷: 'But we, brethren, being bereaved of you for a short season . . .' (ἀπορφανίζω, however, is used so widely that, as Milligan says, the metaphor can hardly be pressed). Another instance of this would be 1 Th 2⁷, where the text is uncertain, 'But we were babes in the midst of you, as when a nurse cherisheth her own children' (for νήπιοι, 'babes,' some MSS read ἡπιοι, 'gentle'; but the former reading seems to fit in better with the context).

(5) Building is a favourite Pauline metaphor.

Ro 11¹: 'to the end ye may be established,' i.e. strengthened or built up. 1 Th 3²: 'to establish you and to comfort you.' 1 Ti 6¹⁹: 'laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on the life which is life indeed' (here the metaphor is changed in the same sentence from 'building' to 'grasping'). 2 Ti 2¹⁹: 'Howbeit the firm foundation of God standeth . . .' Cf. too 1 Co 14⁴: 'He that speaketh in a tongue edifieth (lit. 'buildeth up') himself.'

(6) The sea.—Perhaps St. Paul's frequent voyages suggested to him nautical metaphors. Thus, 1 Ti 1¹⁶: 'holding faith and a good conscience; which some having thrust from them made shipwreck concerning the faith.' The Greek navayew is used literally in 2 Co 11²⁵: 'thrice I suffered shipwreck.' The word is also used metaphorically in Plutarch, Demosthenes, and Æschines.

(7) Mirror.—1 Co 13¹²: 'For now we see in a mirror darkly.' The significance of this would have been more apparent to an ancient than it is to a modern reader, for ancient mirrors were always of polished metal, and thus their reflexion was imperfect. According to Jewish tradition, Moses saw in a clear mirror but all the prophets in a dark one. Again, in 2 Co 3¹⁸: 'with unveiled face reflecting, as a mirror, the glory of the Lord.'

(8) First-fruits.—1 Co 15²⁰: 'But now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of them that slept.' 'On the morning of the 16th of Nisan, probably the very morning of the Lord's Resurrection, the first ripe sheaf of the harvest was offered to God. It was the consecration of the whole harvest to Him. So the Resurrection of Christ was the pledge of the Resurrection of all in union with Him' (Goudge, in loc.).

(9) Clothing.—1 Co 15⁵³: 'For this corruption must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.'

(10) Horticulture.—Ro 11²⁴: 'For, if thou wast cut out of that which is by nature a wild olive tree, and wast grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which are the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?'

(11) Law.—It is unquestionable that various legal metaphors, such as adoption, inheritance, tutelage, slavery, manumission, were consecrated by him to the high office of conveying his doctrine and facilitating its comprehension by heathen minds, impoverished of spiritual conceptions and strangers to the novel truths he proclaimed' (W. S. Muntz, Rome, St. Paul and the Early Church, 1913, p. 48). This point has been elucidated by Deissmann in Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr., p. 326): 'Among the various ways in which the manumission of a slave could take place by ancient law we find the solemn rite of fictitious purchase of the slave by some divinity. The owner comes with the slave to the temple, sells him there to the god, and receives the purchase money from the temple treasury, the slave having previously paid it in there out of his savings. The slave is now the property of the god; not, however, a slave of the temple, but a protégé of the god.' St. Paul refers to this in Ro 6¹⁷, Gal 4¹⁻⁷ 5¹, 1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³, etc. 'St. Paul's predilection for this whole group of images would be most beautifully accounted for if we knew him to have been previously acquainted with the Greek form of our Lord's deeply significant saying about the ransom (Mk 10⁴⁵=Mt 20²⁸). . . . But when anybody heard the Greek word λυτρον, "ransom," in the first century, it was natural for him to think of the purchase-money for manumitting slaves' (p. 331 f.). Papyri of the 1st cent. A.D. have been discovered granting remission of debt. Cf. Philm 18. In Col

2¹⁴ there is some reference to an ancient custom, but exactly what is uncertain.

(12) Miscellaneous metaphors.—An interesting passage is 2 Co 5⁴: 'For indeed we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but that we would be clothed upon, that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life.' There is here a double metaphor of house and garment. The explanation of the abrupt transition may be found 'in the image, familiar to the Apostle, both from his occupations and his birth-place, of the tent of Cilician haircloth, which might almost equally suggest the idea of a habitation and of a vesture' (A. P. Stanley, Corinthians, 1858, p. 427). σκήνος means a 'hut, tent,' and then the body as the tabernacle of the soul.

Thence we pass to another metaphor—that of swallowing up (the Greek καταπινω is also used metaphorically by Aristophanes). This passage is a further instance of St. Paul's method of developing one metaphor out of another.

1 Co 7⁹: 'it is better to marry than to burn'—the metaphor is obvious.

Tit 1¹²: 'Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, idle gluttons' (lit. 'bellies')—a quotation from Epimenides. For the comparison of men to beasts see also 2 P 2²². The metaphor of the sow is based on an apophthegm of Heraclitus (Wendland, quoted by Clemen in Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Eng. tr., p. 50).

So far the Pauline metaphors we have been considering have been simple and of fairly obvious interpretation. We must now pass to some less clear aspects of his figurative language, and this will take us rather deeper into his theology. 'The reader who passes from the early traditions of the life of Jesus to the letters of the apostle Paul feels himself at once in another atmosphere. A bewildering variety of ideas is suggested to him. Speculations of theology and philosophy, glimpses of Deity and hints of various modes of causation, large conceptions of Providence and Creation, strange and indistinct forms of Law and Sin and Death half persons and half powers, quasi-magical notions attached to particular material media, are all blended with the impassioned emotion with which the writer contemplates the love which prompted the Father to send forth his Son, and the love which moved the Son to forsake his high estate and give himself for men' (J. E. Carpenter in HJ, Suppl., 1909: 'Jesus or Christ,' p. 238 f.). This view of the Apostle's theology, though not always expressed so well or so clearly, is at the back of the minds of many modern critics of St. Paul. But is it not safer to say that St. Paul merely drew on contemporary philosophy and speculation when searching for metaphorical expressions wherein to convey the spiritual truths he so earnestly desired to emphasize?

A crucial passage is Ro 8³⁸: 'For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us . . .' 'St. Paul held that there was a world of spirits brought into being like the rest of creation by Christ.' 'It is quite in the manner of St. Paul to personify abstractions' (Sanday-Headlam, Romans, ad loc.). Now, if St. Paul really believed the creatures which he enumerates to have a spiritual existence in the heavenly spheres, we are brought at once into the region of mystical theology; if he is merely personifying for the sake of rhetorical effect, we are simply dealing with metaphors. St. Paul certainly believed in the existence of angels, but how did he regard sin and death? Sin is to him something more than an act or acts of transgression, more even than a state; it is a power, at least half personified in the mind of the Apostle. Thus his language in Ro 5¹², 'as through one man sin entered into the world and death through sin,' and v.¹⁴, 'death reigned from Adam until Moses,' is something more than metaphor. Sin and Death even if not persons are at least powers with objective existence. (The close connexion between Sin and Death had appeared before St. Paul—first perhaps in Sir 25²⁴—and was frequent in Jewish Apocalyptic.) But St. Paul passes quickly from what is metaphorical to what is not: thus in 1 Co 15⁵⁴ (quoting Is 25-): 'Death is swallowed up in victory'; in the mind of the Apostle, Death may be half personified, but victory hardly. Frequently it has to be left open what exactly St. Paul does mean. He does not define his terms; and his theology, here as elsewhere, is generally implicit rather than explicit. 'In ancient literature it is hard to distinguish between a person and a personification. Animistic ideas lie deep in the naïve, popular consciousness' (H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, 1904, p. 108 n.).

With these facts in view, we must now consider a few specially difficult and obscure passages.

1 Co 10⁴: 'And the rock was Christ.' St. Paul has just been referring to the passing of the Israelites through the sea. He says the Israelites 'ate the same spiritual meat' and 'drank the same spiritual drink.' It is more usual to conceive of the Jewish sacraments as types of the Christian. St. Paul refers to the Rabbinic legend that the rock followed the Israelites during their march. 'Wherever the Tabernacle was pitched, the princes came and sang to the rock, "Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it," whereupon the waters gushed forth afresh' (HDB, art. 'Rock,' iv. 290). It has been remarked: 'We must not disgrace Paul by making him say that the pre-incarnate Christ followed the march of Israel in the shape of a lump of rock!' (quoted by Findlay in EGT, ad loc.). But (1) it seems clear from elsewhere that St. Paul believed in the pre-existence of Christ (Ro 8³, 2 Co 8⁹); (2) St. Paul seems to follow his custom of personification. Sometimes water is personified in that it is made to speak; cf. Is 55¹⁻³, Wis 11⁴, Sir 24¹⁹⁻²¹, Rev 22¹⁷. Philo also (Quod deterius potiori, p. 31 [Mangey, i. 213]) calls the Divine Wisdom a rock, and makes it the same as the manna. E. A. Abbott (Son of Man, p. 649) has taken these passages in support of the conception of speaking waters. Meanwhile the other aspect of the metaphor is shown in the idea of God as a Rock (because He remains faithful and abides). 'As in Ro 9⁸ St. Paul affirms of Christ that He "is over all, God blessed for ever," so here He identifies Him with the "Rock of Ages" (Is 26¹ RVm)' (Otton, loc. cit. infra). It seems as if St. Paul, taking the Rabbinic legend, without necessarily accepting it as literal truth, blended with it the ideas of the 'speaking waters,' the manna, and the everlasting rock of Isaiah. All this is again linked up with baptism and the eucharist—the only place in the NT where the two great Christian sacraments are mentioned together. Again we see St. Paul's intellectual subtlety used as a vehicle of spiritual truth.

For further discussion of the 'Rock' see E. A. Abbott, The Son of Man, 1910, p. 648; Robertson-Plummer, 1 Corinthians, p. 201; HDB, art. 'Rock'; G. W. Otton, in Interpreter, x. [1914] 433-439; G. G. Findlay, in EGT, '1 Cor.,' 1900, ad loc.; H. St. J. Thackeray, Relation of St. Paul to Contemp. Jewish Thought, p. 210; K. Lake, Earlier Epp. of St. Paul, 1911, p. 213; C. Clemens, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, p. 213; see also below, II. 3.

Gal 4³: 'held in bondage under the rudiments (RVm 'elements') of the world.' 4⁹: 'how turn ye back again to the weak and beggarly rudiments' (RVm 'elements'). Col 2⁸: 'after the rudiments (RVm 'elements') of the world.' The difficulty here is the exact significance of στοιχεῖα, 'elements': it meant in classical Greek (1) a letter or syllable (Plato): in the Bible only in He 5¹²; (2) a shadow of a sundial (in Aristophanes): non-Biblical; (3) element (or ground stuff)—Plato, Philo, Josephus, Wis 7¹⁷; then specially the stars and planets; then, as every element has its deity, (4) divine spirit, demon or genius. In Gal. it may be (1) rudiments of religion; (2) physical elements; (3) the attendant deities of the physical elements. It is probably (3), and only if it were (1) would it really be a metaphor.

See for στοιχεῖα, C. W. Emmet, Galatians, 1912, ad loc.; J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians, 1878, ad loc.; C. Clemens, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, pp. 106-110.

Col 2¹³⁻¹⁹: a very difficult passage, where the text too is uncertain. It is related in idea to the last. 'Let no man rob you of your prize by a voluntary humility and worshipping of the angels, dwelling in the things which he hath seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, and not holding fast the Head, from whom all the body, being supplied and knit together through the joints and bands, increaseth with the increase of God.' To the student of metaphors no passage could be more interesting—first comes the metaphor of robbing, then the reference to angel-worship, the second metaphor of dwelling in things seen (or not seen), the third metaphor of being puffed up, the fourth metaphor of holding fast the Head, blended with the fifth of Head and body.

But the crux really is ἀ ἐώρακεν ἐμβατεύων (so N* ABD* 33* 314 424 L [vt. d^m] Boh. Eth. Meion. Tert. Orig. etc.) or ἀ μὴ (οὐν) ἐώρακεν (N* CD^b, etc. GH [Lvt⁸ vg] Syr. [vg hl] Aeth. Chr. etc.

Some have proposed slightly to emend the text and, dividing the letters differently, read: ἀέρα κερυμβατεύων, 'vainly treading the air' (or 'stepping on emptiness')—a suggestive metaphor; but there is no necessity to emend. According to Moulton (Grammar of NT Greek, 'Proleg.', 1908, p. 239), μὴ is 'indisputably spurious,' so we must follow the first reading. This has been elucidated by Ramsay (Teaching of St. Paul in Terms of the Present Day, 1913, p. 288): 'Among a series of very interesting inscriptions from the Sanctuary of Apollo of Klaros was one which instantly arrested attention: it contained the verb "entered" (ἐμβατεύων), describing the performance of some act or rite in the mystic ritual.' The Colossians knew the word in the mysteries. 'As a quoted word, it causes a certain awkwardness in the logical sequence; but when we take it as quoted and put it within inverted commas, we understand that it is like a brick imbedded in the living well of Paul's words' (p. 299).

3. Epistle to the Hebrews.—He 3-: 'In all his [God's] house.' οἶκος in the Gospels is used of the Temple, here of the people of God (cf. 1 P 4¹⁷, 1 Ti 3¹⁵). 4¹²: The word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword (διόρουρον is lit. 'double-mouthed'). That it 'pierces even to the dividing of soul and spirit' means that it penetrates to the very depths of a man's being. 5¹²: 'such as have need of milk' (cf. 1 P 2², 1 Co 3¹⁻⁵). Young students were called 'sucklings' by the Rabbis. 6⁴: 'and tasted of the heavenly gift.' The idea of 'tasting' divine things is from the OT. 6⁷⁻⁸: 'the land which hath drunk the rain . . . receiveth blessing': cf. Plut. de Educ. Puer. iii. and Eurip. Hecuba, 590-6; the idea is 'the free and reiterated bestowal of spiritual impulse' (Marcus Dods in EGT, ad loc.). 6¹⁹: 'anchor of the soul': ἀγκυρα is used metaphorically in Soph. fr. 612: μητρὶ παίδες ἀγκυραὶ βίου, 'children are anchors of life to their mother.' 7²: Jesus is the 'surety of a better covenant'; cf. St. Paul's legal metaphors (in his case drawn mostly from slavery). 10¹³: 'the footstool of his feet' (cf. Ps 110¹). 10²²: our hearts are sprinkled from an evil conscience. 12¹: 'cloud of witnesses,' 'the race.' 12¹⁵: 'root of bitterness.' 12²⁹: 'Our God is a consuming fire' (cf. Dt 4²⁴ 93). 13¹⁵: 'the sacrifice of praise' is the 'fruit of lips.' 13²⁰: the familiar Johannine metaphor of the 'shepherd of the sheep.'

4. Catholic Epistles.—(a) The Epistle of James is peculiarly interesting: traditionally, and in the opinion of many modern critics, the work of James, the Lord's brother, it shows many parallels with the Synoptic Gospels. 'The love of nature, the sympathy in all human interests, the readiness to find "sermons in stones and good in everything" must have characterized the child Jesus and coloured all His intercourse with His fellows from His earliest years. It is interesting, therefore, to find the same fondness for figurative speech in the Epistles of His brothers, St. James and St. Jude' (Mayor, Ep. of St. James, p. lxii). Thus Ja 1¹⁵: 'The lust, when it hath conceived, beareth sin: and the sin, when it is fullgrown, bringeth forth death.' The same metaphor is found in Ps 7¹⁴ and in Philo (ed. Mangey, i. 40, 149, 183). 1¹⁷: 'The Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning'; cf. Mal 4, Ps 27¹ 36⁹, Is 60¹. 19. 20, 1 Jn 1⁵, Wis 7²⁶; also Test. Abr. (ed. M. R. James, p. 37) (where the archangel Michael is called 'Father of all lights'), Philo (ed. Mangey, i. 579, 637), and Plato (Rep. vi. 505, vii. 517). Sometimes St. James, in his symbolical language, reminds us of the Synoptists. The remarkable passage 3⁵⁻¹² contains several metaphors; most striking is v. 6: the tongue 'setteth on fire the wheel of nature and is set on fire by hell.' The wheel, catching fire from the glowing axle, is compared to the wide-spreading mischief done by the tongue. γένεσις (tr. 'nature') means (1) birth; (2) creation; (3) the seen and temporal as opposed to the unseen and eternal; the 'wheel' means either the incessant change of life or (if the wheel is at rest) the circle of life. Other metaphors are 4¹⁴ 5², etc.

(b) 1 and 2 Peter.—1 P 1²: 'sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ.' 1¹⁵: 'girding up the loins of your mind.' 2⁶. 7: 'chief corner stone.' 2²⁰: 'shepherd of your souls.' The same metaphor appears again in 5-3. 4: 'flock of God,' 'chief Shepherd.' 5¹³: 'Babylon' may be either literal or metaphorical: probably the former. 2 P 1⁵: 'unfruitful.' 1¹³. 14: 'tabernacle' (cf. 2 Co 5¹). 1¹⁹: 'and the day-star arise in your hearts.' 2³: 'make merchandise of you.' 2¹⁷: 'springs without water.'

(c) The Johannine Epistles have not many metaphors—those there are are of course conceived of as are those in the Fourth Gospel, e.g. the dwelling on light in 1 Jn 1. In 4¹: 'prove the spirits, whether they be of God,' πνεύματα do not seem to be personified. 4¹⁸: 'perfect love casteth out fear.' In 1 Jn 2¹⁸ and 2 Jn⁷ we have mention of the Antichrist (see below under 'Revelation'). The phrase, 'Even now have there arisen many antichrists,' seems to show that the word is taken generally and metaphorically for false teachers.

(d) Jude has resemblances sometimes to James, sometimes to Revelation (cf. Jude⁹ with Rev 12⁷). In v. 6 that the angels are 'kept in everlasting bonds' is to be taken literally, not metaphorically.

In vv. 12. 13 we have a string of metaphors: the wicked are called 'hidden rocks,' 'shepherds that without fear feed themselves,' 'clouds without water,' 'autumn trees without fruit,' 'wild waves,' 'wandering stars.' v. 23: 'snatching them out of the fire' (cf. Zec 3²).

5. Revelation.—Metaphor in Revelation raises peculiar difficulty. Though elsewhere in the NT metaphors are frequent and not always sharply defined, here in an Apocalypse they are so much part and parcel of the whole book that, short of discussing them in detail along with allied problems of interpretation, the only possible course in a short article is to make a few brief generalizations. Ordinary metaphors shade off into theological and (occasionally) mythological conceptions, so that we cannot separate one from the other. But it is necessary to state briefly the method of interpretation of the Apocalypse without which the metaphors, as everything else in it, are obscure. This seems to be done satisfactorily only if we pursue concurrently several different lines of interpretation: (1) the contemporary-historical (reference to events of the writer's own day); (2) the eschatological (the foretelling of the end of all things under symbolic imagery); and (3) the mythological (particularly in ch. 12); also (4) the author undoubtedly had visions wherein he saw spiritual things portrayed; and (5) it is difficult to leave out of account the existence of sources. The danger of interpretation is not so much to refuse to see metaphor, as to see it where it is really not present at all: many things which to some critics have seemed only 'crude symbols' of spiritual truth were probably to the writer literal truth of things he had seen—none the less real because he had seen them not with his bodily eyes but with the eye of faith in a vision. How far this was so must remain uncertain, but the point must not be overlooked entirely. 'No scene in the great Christian Apocalypse can be successfully reproduced upon canvas; "The imagery . . . is symbolic and not pictorial" (Westcott) (Swete, Apocalypse, p. cxxxviii). But because we cannot pictorially conceive of a thing, we have no right simply to say it is a metaphor.

As an illustration of the difficulty of interpretation in this book we may take the conception of Antichrist, mentioned only by name in the Epistles of St. John. Here an ancient Babylonian myth, which has passed through various stages and has left traces in the OT, and which is referred to in 2 Th 3, is taken over by the Apocalyptist. The beast in Rev 13 and 17 is somehow Antichrist, though he may also stand for Nero and Domitian. Can we say that the term 'beast' is a 'metaphor' standing for a Roman Emperor? The value we attach to the Apocalypse is dependent on whether we think it substantially a divine vision vouchsafed to the Seer of Patmos or a mere interesting congeries of symbols. But a question of terminology shades off indistinctly into one of theology and interpretation.

For Antichrist see W. Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, Eng. tr., 1896; H. B. Swete, 'Antichrist in the Province of Asia', in Apocalypse of St. John, pp. lxxviii-xciii; A. E. Brooke, Johannine Epistles, pp. 69-79.

II. IN EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE TO A.D. 100.—1. Agrapha.—(a) Oxyrhynchus Logion 5 (No. 30 in HDB v., art. 'Agrapha'): ἔγειρον τὸν λίθον καὶ εὐρήσεις με, σκίσον τὸ ξύλον καὶ γὰρ ἐκεῖ εἰμι, 'I raise the stone and you will find me, cleave the wood and there am I.' The metaphor means that we shall find our Lord in the ordinary occupations of daily life. (b) Saying quoted in Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 28. 177 (No. 58 in HDB): γίνεσθε δὲ δόκιμοι τραπέζῃται, τὰ μὲν ἀποδοκιμάζοντες, τὸ δὲ καλὸν κατέχοντες, 'Show yourselves approved money-changers, rejecting some but keeping what is good' (τραπεζίτης in the NT only in Mt 25⁷). Origen, in Johann. xix. 7, also quotes δόκιμοι τραπεζίται γίνεσθε; and it is quoted elsewhere. Cf. the other Oxyrhynchus Logion (3) (No. 28 in HDB), 'and I found all men drunken and none was abstinent among them. And my soul is pained for the sons of men because they are blind in their heart and see not, poor and they know not their poverty.' In another fragment we have: 'Jesus saith, Who are they that draw us into the Kingdom, if the Kingdom be in heaven? Verily I say unto you, The birds of the heaven, and every creature that is under the earth and in the earth and the fishes of the sea, these are they that draw you' (see Grenfell-Hunt, Sayings of Our Lord, 1897, and New Sayings of Jesus, 1904).

2. 1 Clement.—viii.: ἐὰν ὡσιν αἱ ἀμαρτίαι ὑμῶν ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ἕως τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ ἐὰν ὡσιν πυρροτέραὶ κόκκων, καὶ μελανώτεραι σάκκων, 'if your sins reach from earth to heaven and are redder than scarlet and blacker than sackcloth . . .' (a reminiscence of Is 1¹⁸). xxx.: ἐνδυσάμεθα τὴν ομοιοῖαν, 'let us clothe ourselves with concord.' xxxiii.: ἐν ἔργοις ἀγαθοῖς πάντες ἐκοσμήθησαν οἱ δίκαιοι, 'All righteous men have been adorned with good works.' xxxvii.: Christians are compared to soldiers; the metaphor is sustained throughout the chapter. lvii.: κάμψαντες τὰ γόνατα τῆς καρδίας ὑμῶν, 'bending the knees of your hearts.' ἔδονται τῆς ἐαυτῶν ὁδοῦ τοὺς καρπούς, 'they shall eat the fruits of their way.'

3. Odes of Solomon.—These are full of beautiful and striking metaphors, of which the following are instances. i. 4: 'Thy fruits are full grown and perfect, they are full of thy salvation.' iv. 9: 'distil thy dews upon us and open thy rich fountains that pour forth to us milk and honey.' ix. 8: 'An everlasting crown for ever is truth. Blessed are they who set it on their heads.' xi. 5, 7: 'And I was established upon the rock of truth . . . and I drank and was inebriated with the living water' (cf. 1 Co 10⁴: 'the rock was Christ,' above). xiii. 2: 'Love His holiness and clothe yourself therewith.' xvii. 13: 'And I sowed my fruits in hearts, and transformed them into myself.' xxii. 4, 5: 'He who gave me authority over bonds that I might loose them; He that overthrew by my hands the dragon with seven heads' (Titus or Pompey [?]; cf. Ps 74¹⁴, Ezk 29³). xxv. 8: 'And I was clothed with the covering of thy Spirit, and thou didst remove from me my raiment of skin' (here and in xxi. 2 the reference is to Gn 3¹). xxxi. 2: 'error went astray and perished at His hand; and folly found no path to walk in, and was submerged by the truth of the Lord' (here, as elsewhere in Jewish and early Christian literature, qualities are personified).

See J. H. Bernard, Odes of Solomon (TS vii. 3 [1912]); J. Rendel Harris, Odes of Solomon, 1911, An Early Christian Psalter (abridged translation of Odes), 1909.

4. Didache.—i. 1: ὁδοὶ δύο εἰσὶ, μία τῆς ζωῆς, καὶ μία τοῦ θανάτου, 'the way of life and the way of death' (cf. Christianity as 'the way,' Ac 9², 2 P 2²). i. 6: ἰδρωτῶν ἡ ἐλεημοσύνη σου εἰς τὰς χεῖράς σου, 'Let thine alms sweat into thine hands.' vi. 2: εἰ μὲν γὰρ δύνασαι βαστάσαι ὅλον τὸν ζυγὸν τοῦ κυρίου, 'if thou art able to bear the whole yoke of the Lord.' xii. 5: χριστέμπορος, 'making trade of Christ.' xvi. 3: καὶ στραφίσσονται τὰ πρόβατα εἰς λύκους, 'and the sheep shall be turned into wolves.'

General results of study of metaphors.—The above lists, by no means exhaustive, of metaphors in the NT and early Christian literature, show how rich and various was the stock of ideas from which the writers of Christian antiquity drew to illustrate the gospel message with which their heart was aflame. It is obvious that to understand aright we must know something of the background of the Early Church in the pagan world, that welter of rites and cults in the Græco-Roman and Oriental world which modern research has done so much to make vivid. Yet some are probably mistaken in attaching too much importance, or the wrong sort of importance, to all this: the phraseology in which the gospel message was first clothed had often extraneous origin; the message itself was fresh and unique. External influences may account for the form but not for the fact. It may be that in some cases a metaphor or figure, not only of word but of thought, affected the thought which it clothed, and this is the sole argument for 'mythology' in the NT. This leads, in conclusion, to the psychological aspect of metaphor. Psychology 'proves the fundamental connexion between the religious and the non-religious aspects of Life and Thought' (S. A. Cook, Foundations of Religion, 1914, p. 91). All spiritual truths are conceived through imperfect symbols, but the symbol must be examined, and what is essential separated from the outward form, before the truth within can be clear.

LITERATURE.—For Metaphor as a whole: F. E. König, artt. 'Style of Scripture' and 'Symbols and Symbolical Actions' in HDB v., Stilistik, Rhetorik, Poetik, in Bezug auf die biblische Literatur, komparativisch dargestellt, 1900; L. E. Browne, The Parables of the Gospels (Hulsean Prize Essay), 1913; W. Sanday, Christologies Ancient and Modern, 1910, ch. ix: 'The Guiding Principle of Symbolism.'

For the books of the NT, the best Commentaries; especially Sanday-Headlam, *Romans*⁵ (ICC), 1902; Robertson-Plummer, 1 Corinthians (ICC), 1911; H. L. Goudge, 1 Corinthians (Westminster Com., 1903); J. Armitage Robinson, Ephesians, 1903; G. Milligan, Thessalonians, 1903; J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, 1873; J. B. Mayor, Ep. of St. James, 1910; A. E. Brooke, Johannine Epistles (ICC), 1912; H. B. Swete, *Apocalypse of St. John*², 1907.

General: C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Eng. tr., 1912; H. St. J. Thackeray, Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, 1900; G. A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr.³, 1911. Other authorities quoted in the text. L. D. AGATE.

MICHAEL (Heb. מִיכָאֵל, 'Who is like God?').—In Dn 10²¹ Michael is described as the 'prince,' i.e. the patron or guardian angel of Israel, in antithesis to the 'prince' of Persia and the 'prince' of Greece (v. 20). In the account of the troublous times of the Last Days in 12¹, Michael, 'the great prince,' is Israel's champion, by whom deliverance is wrought. These are the only references supplied by the OT, but they exercised a powerful influence upon the Jewish tradition that grew up regarding Michael (in which he further appears as one of the seven archangels and the chief of the four great archangels), and throned this upon NT conceptions. In the NT he is twice mentioned by name (Jude⁹, where he is described as 'the archangel,' and Rev 12⁷), and in both cases discharges functions that are in keeping with the position assigned him in Daniel. (1) In Jude⁹ (cf. Dt 34⁶), which is based on the apocryphal Assumption of Moses (see Orig. de Princ. iii. ii. 1), he stands forward as the representative of Israel to dispute the Devil's claim to possess the body of Moses, a claim made, according to the apocryphal book, on the two grounds that the Devil was the lord of matter and that Moses had been guilty of slaying the Egyptian (see Charles, Assumption of Moses, 1897, p. 105 ff.). (2) In Rev 12⁷ as in Dn 12 Michael plays a leading part in the conflict that is to issue in the Messianic triumph of the Last Days. In accordance with the Jewish eschatological idea of a celestial battle which is to precede this triumph (Sib. Orac. iii. 796 ff.), there is war in heaven, and Michael and his angels go forth to war with the great red dragon (otherwise described as 'the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan,' v. 9) and his angels, with the result that the latter are overthrown and cast down to the earth. The significant thing here is the position assigned to Michael. It is by him, not by the 'man child who is to rule all the nations with a rod of iron' (v.⁵), that the dragon is overcome and cast out from heaven (cf. Bousset, Der Antichrist, 1895, p. 151 ff.).

There are two other passages in the NT where Michael, though not mentioned, appears to be referred to. (1) In Ac 7³⁸ he is probably to be identified with the angel who spoke to Moses in Mount Sinai. According to Gal 3¹⁹ the Law was 'ordained by angels,' and in He 2² 'the word' is described as 'spoken by angels' (cf. Jos. Ant. xv. v. 3). In Jub. i. 27, ii. 1, however, it is the angel of the presence who instructs Moses and delivers to him the tables of the Law, and in what was probably the original Assumption of Moses (preserved only in Greek fragments) 'Michael the archangel' is expressly said to have taught Moses at the giving of the Law. (2) In 1 Th 4¹⁶ 'the voice of the archangel and the trump of God' suggests another reference to the Michael of Jewish tradition. This is the only place in the NT besides *Jude*⁹ where the word 'archangel' occurs, and though the archangel in this case is not named, it is natural to suppose that the great archangel is meant. 'The voice of the archangel' and 'the trump of God' are evidently to be taken as parallel expressions (cf. Mt 24³¹, 'He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet'), and it is a common feature of the later Jewish tradition of the Day of Judgment that the trumpet is blown by Michael the archangel (see Bousset, op. cit. p. 166).

J. C. LAMBERT.

MIDIAN (AV Madian, Ac 7²⁹).—This was the name of a people broken up into several clans and inhabiting N.W. Arabia. One clan, the Kenites, dwelt near Mount Sinai, and to it Moses fled from Pharaoh (Ex 2¹⁵). Its chief was Jethro (or Reuel), whose daughter Moses married (v. -). In the days of the Judges they extended further north and made inroads into central Palestine. But they were severely defeated by Gideon (Jg 6. 7), and are soon after lost to history. The town of Modiana mentioned by Ptolemy (Geog. vi. 7) as being on the N.W. coast of Arabia may be a late trace of them. Midian is probably used by later Jewish writers with a spiritual reference, symbolizing the Church's final triumph over its foes (e.g. Is 9¹ 60⁶, Hab 3⁷).

LITERATURE.—G. A. Smith, HGHL, 1897, p. 525; also art. 'Midian' in HDB.

J. W. DUNCAN.

MILETUS (Μίλητος).—Miletus was an ancient Greek colony on the coast of Caria, and became the most flourishing of the twelve free cities which formed the Ionian League. Five centuries before Christ it 'had attained the summit of its prosperity, and was accounted the ornament (πρόσχημα) of Ionia' (Herod. v. 28), being unquestionably the greatest of Greek cities at the time. Favourably situated on the S. shore of the Gulf of Latmos, and possessing four harbours, it controlled the trade of the rich Mæander Valley, and was without a rival in the commerce of the Aegean.

'The citizens,' says Strabo (xiv. i. 6, 7), 'have achieved many great deeds, but the most important is the number of colonies which they established. The whole Euxine, for example, and the Propontis, and many other places, are peopled with their settlers. . . . Illustrious persons, natives of Miletus, were Thales, one of the seven wise men, his disciple Anaximander, and Anaximenes the disciple of Anaximander.'

After the capture of Miletus by Darius, who massacred the inhabitants (494 B.C.), and by Alexander the Great (334), its days of greatness and glory were ended. The trade of the Mæander Valley was diverted to Ephesus, and, before the coming of the Romans, Miletus, though still called a 'metropolis' of Ionia, had become a second-rate commercial town, which the conquerors did not think it necessary to link up to any important city by one of their great roads. Having no longer any political importance, it became more and more isolated, and nature gradually completed its ruin by filling its harbours and almost the whole gulf with the silt of the Mæander (Pliny, HN ii. 91, v. 31). Its site—known as Palatia, from the ruins of its great theatre—is now 5 or 6 miles from the sea, and the island of Lade, which Strabo (xiv. i. 7) mentions as lying 'close in front of Miletus,' is now a small hill in the plain.

St. Paul did not select such a decaying city as a base of missionary operations, and its connexion with the record of his activity is a mere accident. At the end of his third journey, when he was hastening to Jerusalem to attend the Feast of Pentecost, he deliberately chose at Troas a ship which was not to touch at Ephesus, where it was probably still unsafe for him to appear, and where in any case his time would have been very short (Ac 20¹⁶). But when the coaster in which he was sailing, and whose movements he naturally could not control, came to Miletus, he unexpectedly found that he would be detained there for some days, and it occurred to him that in the interval he might send a messenger to Ephesus—30 miles distant in a straight line, and somewhat further by boat and road—and summon its elders to meet him.

If his ship sailed from Samos (or Trogyllium, according to D) early in the day, and thus took advantage of the northerly breeze which rises in the Aegean every morning during the summer and dies away in the afternoon, he would reach Miletus, 25 (or 20) miles distant, before noon. His messenger probably did not make the great detour by Heracleia at the head of the gulf, but waited for the gentle south wind (called the Imbat), which blows after sunset, to take him across to Pyrrha or Priene.

Strabo makes the ancient topography clear. 'From Heracleia to Pyrrha, a small city, is about 100 stadia by sea, but a little more from Miletus is Heracleia, if we include the windings of the bays. From Miletus to Pyrrha, in a straight line by sea, is 30 stadia; so much longer is the journey by sailing near the land' (xiv. i. 8, 9).

Passing through Priene, crossing Mt. Mycale, and speeding along the coast road, the messenger might reach Ephesus by midnight. The elders would travel south next day to Priene or Pyrrha, and get the northerly wind to take them over the bay to Miletus on the following morning. St. Luke writes as an eye-witness of the meeting, fellowship, and parting of St. Paul and the Ephesians, the record of which has given Miletus an abiding consecration. The Apostle's address to the elders, with its lofty ideal of pastoral duty, reads 'as an unconscious manifesto of the essence of the life and ministry of the most influential exponent of Christianity' (J. V. Bartlet, Acts [Century Bible, 1901], p. 327).

Miletus is mentioned again in 2 Ti 4²⁰: 'Trophimus I left at Miletus sick.' This has been regarded as proving that St. Paul, released from his Roman prison, resumed his work in the East, and after all revisited the scene of his pathetic farewell. But many scholars prefer a different construction. Assuming that the passage in question occurs in a brief note (2 Ti 4⁹ 11-13. 20. 21a) sent to Timothy from Macedonia, and afterwards editorially incorporated in a longer letter written to him from Rome, they date the visit to Miletus before the one recorded in Ac 20¹⁵. When St. Paul was leaving Ephesus, intending to return by Macedonia to Corinth (1 Co 16⁵), he may have had reasons for first visiting Miletus, and been obliged to leave Trophimus, who became sick there; or, though he did not personally visit Miletus, he might use a condensed expression, which meant that his friend, having been sent to Miletus and detained there by sickness, was unable to return to Ephesus before the time of sailing, and so was left behind.

Miletus has extensive ruins, of which the most remarkable is the theatre, and the site has been excavated by Wiegand for the Berlin Academy (SBAW 1900 ff.).

JAMES STRAHAN.

MILLENNIUM.—See ESCHATOLOGY, PAROUSIA.

MILLSTONE (μύλος; in Rev 18²¹ TR, following B, has μύλον; L WH, following A, have μύλινον; Chas μύλικον; Lat. mola).—The mill of the ancients (as of many Syrians to-day) was a quern—two circular stones, of which the upper and smaller rotated upon the other. The hard and monotonous labour of grinding was imposed on women; in wealthier houses, on female slaves (Ex 11⁵, Mt 24⁴¹). If the upper stone was small, it was turned by one person; if it was of greater size, two, three, or even four slaves required to work together at the task. The heavy toil was often somewhat lightened with a song. The writer of the Revelation alludes to these things in two successive verses. A great millstone flung impetuously (ορμήματι, 'with a rush,' or 'indignantly'; see LXX Hos 5¹⁰) into the sea, to rise no more, is his image of the overthrow of Imperial Rome (Rev 18-1). So complete is the desolation he foresees, that the sound of the mill (φωνή μύλου, the ψῶν ἐπιμύλιος of the classics; cf. LXX φωνή τῆς ἀλθροῦσης in Ec 12⁴), the familiar murmur of domestic life, will never be heard again in the ruined city, which will have become a city of death (Rev 18-).

LITERATURE.—J. Yates, art. 'Mola' in Smith's *DGRA*²; G. M. Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, 1903; W. Carslaw, art. 'Mill, Millstone' in HDB; A. R. S. Kennedy, art. 'Mill, Millstones' in EBI; C. M. Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta, 1888, ii. 179.

JAMES STRAHAN.

MIND.—1. The noun.—While in the OT 'heart' is used to represent man's whole mental and moral activity (cf. Gn 6⁵ 'every imagination of the thoughts of his heart'), psychological terms begin to be employed in the NT with more discrimination and precision, and 'mind' comes into use to denote the faculty of thinking, and especially the organ of moral consciousness; the fundamental Gr. word being νους, with which must be associated its derivatives νόημα, διάνοια, ἐννοια. It is suggestive, however, of the persistence of the OT psychology and terminology in the early Apostolic Church that, outside of the Pauline Epistles, νους, the specific word for 'mind,' occurs only in Lk 24⁴⁵, Rev 13¹⁸ 17⁹, though διάνοια and ἐννοια are occasionally found. In the AV of Ac 14-1, Ph 1⁷, He 12³ 'mind' represents ψυχή, which in the RV is properly rendered 'soul'; in Philem¹⁴, Rev 17¹³ it stands for γνώμη, 'judgment,' 'opinion'; in Ro 8⁷⁻²⁷ for φρόνημα, which denotes not the mental faculty itself, but its thoughts and purposes.

As illustrating St. Paul's use of νους and helping us to appreciate the distinctive meaning he attaches to the word, it is important to notice two contrasts in which he sets it, in the one case with 'flesh' (σάρξ) and in the other with 'spirit' (πνεῦμα). In Ro 7²³⁻²⁵ he contrasts the mind with the flesh, i.e. with the sinful principle in human nature; and the law of his mind, which is also the law of God, with the law in his members or the law of sin. Here the mind is clearly the conscience or organ of moral knowledge, man's highest faculty, by which he recognizes the will of God for his own life. And when in Ro 8⁶ the Apostle speaks of 'the mind of the flesh' (cf. Col 2¹⁸, 'fleshly mind'), the suggestion is that man's highest faculty has been debased to the service of what is lowest in his nature, so that the mind has itself become fleshly and sinful. In 1 Co 14¹⁴⁻¹⁵⁻¹⁹, again, where νους (which EV renders here by 'understanding') is contrasted with πνεῦμα, the antithesis is between man's natural faculty of conscious knowledge and reflexion and that higher principle of the Christian life which is Divinely bestowed, and which, as in the case of the gift of tongues, may manifest itself in ways that lie beyond the reach of consciousness. The mind, as man's highest natural faculty, thus stands between the flesh, as the lower and sinful principle in his nature, and the spirit, which is the distinctive principle of the Divinely given Christian life. And, as the mind may be dragged down by the flesh until it becomes a 'mind of the flesh,' so it may be upraised and informed by the spirit until it becomes a 'mind of the spirit' (Ro 8⁶; cf. 12-, Eph 4²³). See art. FLESH, SOUL, SPIRIT.

2. The verb.—The verb 'to mind' is used intransitively, in the sense of to intend or purpose, in Ac 20¹⁸ (Gr. μελλόντες, RV 'intending'). With the same signification 'to be minded' occurs in Ac 27²⁹ (Gr. βουλευσθαι, v. 17 (TR βουλευεσθαι, WH βούλεσθαι). More frequently 'to mind' (Gr. φρονεῖν) is found in the transitive sense of 'to think about,' 'to direct one's mind to' (Ro 8⁵, Ph 3¹⁶⁻¹⁹). Sometimes φρονεῖν is translated 'to be minded,' and in such cases the phrase is equivalent in meaning to the transitive verb (Gal 3¹⁰, Ph 3¹⁵). The participle 'minded' is met with in the AV in a number of phrases—'likeminded' (Ro 15⁶, Ph 2-), 'feeble-minded' (1 Th 5¹⁴), 'doubleminded' (Ja 1⁸⁻⁴⁸), 'highminded' (Ro 11²⁰ 1 Ti 6¹, 2 Ti 3⁴), 'sober-minded' (Tit 2⁶), which are represented in the original by various verbs and adjectives. For 'carnally minded' and 'spiritually minded' in Ro 8⁶ (τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκὸς . . . τοῦ πνεύματος) should be substituted as in the RV 'the mind of the flesh,' 'the mind of the spirit.'

LITERATURE.—Grimm-Thayer, Greek-Eng. Lex. of the NT, 1890, s.v. νοῦς; H. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, 1880, p. 435 ff.; J. Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man, 1895, p. 123 ff.; B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, Eng. tr., 1882-83, i. 475 f.; HDB, art. 'Mind.' J. C. LAMBERT.

MINISTER, MINISTRY In discussing these two terms we have to consider six groups of Greek words which occur in the Bible in connexion with ministering or serving. They run in triplets, each triplet consisting of a concrete noun, an abstract noun, and a verb—'minister,' 'ministry,' and 'to minister.' These six groups are—διάκονος, διακονία, διακονεῖν; δούλος, δουλεία, δουλεύειν; ὑπηρέτης, [ὑπηρεσία], ὑπηρετεῖν; [λάτρης], λατρεία, λατρεύειν; λειτουργός, λειτουργία, λειτουργεῖν; θεράπων, θεραπεία, θεραπεύειν. All these are found in the NT excepting ὑπηρεσία, which occurs in the LXX in Job and Wisdom, and λάτρης, which occurs only in the enlarged text of Job 2⁹. With regard to nearly all of them it will be found that both the AV and the RV use different English words to translate the same Greek word, while different Greek words are sometimes translated by the same English word. This could hardly be avoided without doing injustice to the meaning of various passages. In all languages words have different shades of meaning, and in some cases the same word has two or more very different meanings; there are very many instances of this in the Greek of the NT.

The fact that we have no less than six sets of words to express the idea of 'minister' and 'ministry' is strong evidence that there was as yet no regular organization of ministers with distinct titles indicating specific duties. This impression is confirmed when we find that English translators are unable to reserve a separate English word for each of the different Greek words. Evidently these different Greek terms do not each represent a class of officials; but individuals who undertake work of a similar character are called by the same name. On the other hand, the name varies, without there being in all cases a corresponding change of meaning. The same person, from somewhat different points of view, might bear four or five of the six names; and even from the same point of view might bear more than one of them. In the earliest congregations of Christians it was soon found that some individuals had certain gifts, and they exercised these gifts for the good of the congregation. Such useful persons were distinguished by words already in use for similar services. At a later time, when the Christian ministry became organized, some of these words acquired a technical meaning and designated Church officers with specific duties. It will be useful to exhibit the diversity of translation somewhat in detail.

διδάκωνος is found in Mt., Mk., and Jn., in all four groups of the Pauline Epistles, and nowhere else in the NT. In the Gospels it is rendered 'servant,' in the Epistles 'minister,' except Ph 1¹ and 1 Ti 3^{8, 12}, where it is rendered 'deacon.' διακονία occurs in Ac. and in all groups of the Pauline Epistles, except 1 and 2 Th.; elsewhere thrice. The usual translation is 'ministry'; but we have 'ministration' (2 Co 3^{7, 8, 9} 9¹³), 'ministering' (2 Co 8⁴ 9¹), 'relief' (Ac 11²⁹), 'serving' (Lk 10⁴⁰), also 'service' and 'administration.' The RV changes 'ministry' to 'service' (1 Ti 1¹²), 'service' to 'ministry' (Rev 2¹⁹), 'ministry' to 'ministering' (Eph 4¹, 2 Ti 4¹¹), 'ministry' to 'ministration' (2 Co 6³), and 'administration' to 'ministration' (2 Co 9¹³). διακονεῖν is always 'to minister' in Mt. and Mk., always 'to serve' in Jn., and nearly always 'to minister' in the Epistles: in Lk. and Ac. both translations are used—'to serve' most frequently. The RV changes 'administer' to 'minister' (2 Co 8¹⁹⁻²⁰), and 'use the office of a deacon' to 'serve as deacons' (1 Ti 3^{10, 13}). λειτουργία is rendered 'minister' in nearly all places; λειτουργία is 'ministration' in Lk., 'service' in Ph., and 'ministry' in Heb.; λειτουργεῖν is always 'to minister.' The translations of υπηρέτης vary between 'attendant,' 'minister,' 'officer,' and 'servant.' The RV changes 'minister' to 'attendant' (Lk 4²⁰, Ac 13³), and 'servant' to 'officer' (Mk 14³⁴). υπηρεῖν is 'to serve' (Ac 13³⁶) and 'to minister' (Ac 20²⁴ 24²³). These instances of variations in rendering the same word may suffice. The different shades of meaning between the groups of Greek words are of more importance; but the fact that 'minister' and 'servant,' with their cognates, appear in the translations of so many of the groups is evidence that the meanings frequently overlap.

The triplets connected with δουλος and θεράπων are somewhat closely allied. The δοῦλος, 'slave' or 'bondservant,' is in a permanent condition of servitude to the person whom he serves, and he cannot free himself from it. The θεράπων renders temporary and voluntary service. Both words may be used of man's relation to God: Moses is called the θεράπων (He 3³, the only place in the NT in which the word occurs) and the δοῦλος (Rev 15³) of God; and in the LXX both words are used to translate the same Hebrew word (ebed): e.g. Nu 12⁷, Jg 2⁹. θεραπεία is used (abstract for concrete) of a body of domestic servants (Lk 12⁴²), and of the special service of healing (Lk 9¹¹, Rev 22³). θεραπεύειν means 'to serve' in any way, and also 'to treat medically' and 'to heal.' The verb is very frequent in the writings of the beloved physician, and, except Ac 17²³, always in the medical sense. Except indirectly in the metaphor of the healing leaves (Rev 22³), this triplet is not used of spiritual ministry by man to man; and neither θεραπεία nor θεραπεύειν is found in any Epistle. Nor is the δοῦλος triplet used of man's spiritual ministry to his fellows. Both δουλος and δουλεύειν are used of service to God or to Christ, but the nearest approach to spiritual service to man is Ph 2⁷, where Timothy is said to 'serve' with St. Paul 'in furtherance of the gospel.'

It is probably correct to say much the same of υπηρέτης and υπηρεῖν. They indicate a more dignified kind of service than that of the δοῦλος, but they are commonly used of attendance to physical needs or external duties rather than of ministration to souls. The 'attendant' in Lk 4²⁰ is one who looks after the fabric and the books, not one who preaches in the synagogue. Ac 13³ probably means that John waited on Paul and Barnabas, attending to their bodily wants, so as to leave them free to preach. He had not been set apart for missionary work as they had been (Ac 13-). The exceptions are Lk 1-; Ac 26¹⁶, and 1 Co 4¹, where the idea of spiritual ministration is prominent. But in none of these three passages is there any allusion to the derivation of the word ('under-rower'), as if it meant a rower in a ship of which Christ was captain.

The three remaining triplets are different, for all of them are frequently connected with the idea of religious service. In the art. DEACON, DEACON-ESS it has been pointed out that διδάκωνος, which in classical Greek commonly implies ignoble service, such as waiting at table, in Christian language has high associations. We find the nobler use of the term in the teaching of that anima naturaliter Christiana, Epictetus. 'The philosopher should without distraction be employed only on the service of God.' 'I think that what God chooses is better than what I choose: I will attach myself as a servant to Him.' 'I obey, assenting to the words of the Commander and praising His acts; for I came into the world when it pleased Him, and I will also depart when it pleases Him.' 'I depart as Thy servant, as one who has known Thy commands and Thy prohibitions' (Diss. III. xxii. 69, xxiv. 65, xxvi. 28, IV. vii. 20). In the LXX διδάκωνος and διακονία are rare (ten times in all), and οιακονεῖν does not occur. St. Paul calls heathen magistrates 'servants (διδάκονοι) of God' (Ro 13⁴); and all idea of ignoble service is excluded when apostles are called διδάκονοι (1 Co 3⁵, 2 Co 3⁶, Eph 3⁷, Col 1²³). The whole triplet has for its root-idea the supplying of serviceable labour, whether to the body or the soul. διακονία is used often of the sending of money to help the poor brethren in Judæa (Ac 11²⁹ 12²⁵, 2 Co 8⁴ 9^{1, 12, 13}, Ro 15³¹). Archippus is told to take heed to the ministry (διακονία) which he had received in the Lord (Col 4¹⁷) for work in the Church of Colosse, but we are not told what kind of ministry it was.

There are several passages in which the διδάκωνος triplet seems to be used of personal service to St. Paul rather than of ministerial service in the Church: διδάκωνος (of Tychicus, Eph 6²¹, Col 4⁷), διακονία (of Mark, 2 Ti 4¹), διακονεῖν (of Timothy and Erastus, Ac 19²²; of Onesimus, Philem 13; and of Onesiphorus, 2 Ti 1¹⁸). διακονεῖν is clearly used of supplying bodily needs in Ac 6^{2, 3}, where the Seven are elected 'to serve tables.' But the Seven are not called διδάκονοι, and there is no evidence in the NT which can connect them with the 'deacons' at Philippi or Ephesus. To call the Seven the first deacons is a conjecture which can be neither proved nor disproved.

It may be mere accident that θεραπεία and θεραπεύειν are never used in the NT in the classical sense of Divine worship, although both are used in this sense in the LXX (Jl 1⁴ 2¹⁵, Is 54¹⁷, Dn 7¹⁰, Jth 11¹⁷). For Divine worship, the NT writers use either λατρεία and λατρεύειν or λειτουργία and λειτουργεῖν, words which may signify adoration of God in general and sometimes sacrifice in particular. λατρεία or λατρεύειν is used of heathen worship (Ro 1²³), of Jewish worship (Ac 7⁷, Ro 9⁴, He 8⁵ 9¹ 13¹⁰), of Christian worship (Ro 12¹, Ph 3³), and of worship in heaven (Rev 7¹⁵ 22³). In Apost. Const. viii. 15, ad fin., 'mystical λατρεία' is used of the eucharist. But in the LXX, in connexion with religious worship, the group λειτουργός, λειτουργία, λειτουργεῖν is more common. The classical use of these words for the rendering of public services, or contributions to the State, at Athens, prepared the way for the religious use; and it is probable that the employment of these expressions by the writers of the NT in describing Christian worship is not entirely due to the influence of the LXX. Numerous papyri of about 160 B.C. or earlier show that λειτουργία and λειτουργεῖν were frequently used in Egypt in this ceremonial sense (Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 140). The different members of the triplet occur in the writings of St. Luke and St. Paul, and all three in Hebrews: e.g. Lk 1², Ac 13², Ph 2¹⁷, He 8-6 10¹¹ (see Westcott, Ep. to Hebrews, 1889, ad loc.). In his full notes on Ph 2¹⁷ (*Philippians*⁴, 1878) Lightfoot remarks: 'The Philippians are the priests; their faith (or their good works springing from their faith) is the sacrifice: St. Paul's life-blood the accompanying libation. Commentators have much confused the image, by representing St. Paul himself as the sacrificer.' This passage is one of those which point to 'the fundamental idea of the Christian Church, in which an universal priesthood has supplanted the exclusive ministrations of a select tribe or class.' In the NT all Christians have in Christ that immediate access to God which is the special privilege of priests, and the sacrifices which they offer are spiritual—their wills, praises, and prayers. The priesthood belongs to Christians, not as individuals, but as members of the Church, in the 'royal priesthood' of which each has a share; and the sacrifice which each brings is service and self-consecration, made acceptable by union with the sacrifice offered by Christ. When certain selected individuals exercise priestly functions on behalf of the whole, they act as organs or representatives of the community. But we need to consider the point at which 'sacrifice' and 'priesthood' become metaphors.

LITERATURE.—F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 1897; T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, 1902; A. W. F. Blunt, Studies in Apostolic Christianity, 1909; C. H. Turner, 'The Organisation of the Church' in The Cambridge Medieval History, I. [1911] ch. vi., Studies in Early Church History, 1912; L. Duchesne, Early History of the Christian Church, II., Eng. tr., 1912.

A PLUMMER.

MINISTRATION (Ac 6¹).—Neither AV nor RV, except in the margin, indicates that 'ministration' (διακονία) in v.¹ and 'serve' (διακονεῖν) in v.² are cognate words; or that 'ministration' in v.¹ is the same word as 'ministry' in v.⁴. The 'ministration' or 'serving tables' is the distribution of food at the common meals: tables of exchange for money cannot be meant. Hellenist converts complain that Hebrew distributors 'overlooked' Hellenist widows. The Twelve forthwith initiate and regulate the first attempt at self-government made by the Church. They state the number and qualifications of the new officials, leave the election to the whole body of Christians, and ordain the elected.

A. PLUMMER.

MINSTREL (αὐλητής, from αὐλός, 'pipe').—The word appears twice in the NT. In Mt 9²⁸ αὐλητὰς is translated 'minstrels' in the AV, and more correctly in the RV 'flute-players.' In Rev 18⁷ αὐλητῶν is rendered 'pipers' in the AV, while the RV retains 'flute-players'; but the latter version specifies the general term μουσικῶν in the same verse as 'minstrels' (see PIPE, FLUTE).

ARCHIBALD MAIN.

MIRACLES.—In this article we may consider the meaning of the words used in the NT for 'miracles,' and the evidence for the apostolic belief in them; the evidence will then be compared with that for miracles in the succeeding ages, and the evidential value of miracles will be weighed. But the limits assigned preclude a general investigation of the a priori credibility of miracles as such. As, however, this has been done very fully by Bernard in HDB iii., it is scarcely necessary here to repeat what has there been well said.

1. Meaning of the words used.—(a) The principal NT words for what we should now call a 'miracle' are σημεῖον, τέρας, δύναμις, ἔργον. Of these, σημεῖον, 'sign,' denotes that which conveys spiritual and symbolic instruction; τέρας, 'wonder' or 'prodigy,' denotes a work above the ordinary working of nature; δύναμις denotes a work showing 'power'; while ἔργον, 'work,' is in itself a neutral word, the context of which in many passages, especially in Jn. (5³⁶ etc.), shows it to denote a 'miracle' (so Mt 11-; but in Jn 17⁴ the word includes the whole of Jesus' deeds). It is noteworthy that the mighty deeds of our Lord and His disciples are never called 'prodigies' (τεράρα) alone; the only apparent exception to this rule is in Ac 2¹⁹ ('I will show wonders in heaven'), which, however, is a quotation from Jl 2³⁰, and 'wonders in heaven' are coupled with 'signs on earth,' and both are interpreted by St. Peter as 'powers and wonders and signs' in v.²². A Christian miracle is not a mere prodigy exciting astonishment, but is intended for instruction; and here we see at once the great difference between the NT miracles and most of those of the apocryphal Gospels, which are mere exhibitions without any teaching purpose, and are often repulsive to the Christian sense of reverence. It must be added, also, that herein lies the difference between the NT miracles and most of those commonly known as 'ecclesiastical' (see below, 4). The mighty deeds related in the NT did, indeed, excite wonder and fear (Mk 2¹² 4⁴¹ 6⁵¹ 7³⁷, Lk 7¹⁶, Ac 3¹⁰), but this was not their only or even their chief object. Hence, when τερας is used it is always combined with σημεῖον (Jn 4⁴⁸, Ac 2¹⁹. 43 4³⁰ 5¹² 6⁸ 7³⁶ 14³ 15¹², and [of false prophets] Mt 24²⁴, Mk 13²², and [with δύναμις added] Ac 2²², Ro 15¹⁹, 2 Co 12¹², 2 Th 2⁹, He 2⁴); δύναμις and σημεῖον are joined in Ac 8¹³. It may be noticed that θαῦμα is not used in the NT of miracles, but θαυμάσια ('wonderful things') is used in Mt 21¹⁵, παράδοξα ('strange things') in Lk 5²⁶, ἐνδοξα ('glorious things') in Lk 13¹⁷.

(b) Turning to the English versions, we are struck by the confusion occasioned by the indiscriminate use of the word 'miracle.' In AV it often represents σημεῖον (in the singular in Lk 23⁸, Jn 4⁵⁴, Ac 4¹⁶. 22, and in the plural in Jn 2¹¹. 23 3-6 2²⁸ 7³¹ 9¹⁶ 11⁴⁷ 12³⁷, Ac 6⁸ 8⁶ 15¹², Rev 13¹⁴ 16¹⁴ 19²⁰); in these passages RV rightly substitutes 'sign' except in the text of Lk 23⁸, Ac 4¹⁶—, where 'miracle' is with some inconsistency retained. Again, in AV 'miracle' represents δύναμις in Mk 9³⁸, Ac 2²² 8¹³ 19¹¹, 1 Co 12¹⁰. 28, Gal 3⁵, He 2⁴, while in these passages there is an unfortunate confusion even in the RV text (though RVm gives 'power'), as we find 'mighty work' in the first two passages, 'miracle' in the next five, and 'powers' in the last; if 'powers' was thought somewhat unintelligible, 'mighty works' or 'mighty deeds' might with a little ingenuity have been used in all these places. The confusion in AV is increased by σημεῖα being translated 'wonders' in Rev 13¹² and 'miracles' in v.¹⁴, and by δυνάμεις being translated 'mighty deeds' in 2 Co 12¹²; in Mk 6⁵², AV unnecessarily inserts 'the miracle,' which is not in the Greek. It is a serious misfortune that 'miracle' should be so much used in the AV to represent σημεῖον, for the connotation of the English word is exactly what that of the Greek word is not, and it has given the English reader an erroneous idea of the purpose of the works of our Lord and the disciples; it was not so much to produce wonder as belief.

2. Evidence for miracles in the Apostolic Age.

—(a) The Gospels are all full of the mighty deeds worked by our Lord, nor is it possible to separate the miraculous from the non-miraculous in these histories. The Synoptic Gospels do not profess to be written by eye-witnesses, but the Fourth Gospel does claim to give first-hand testimony (Jn 21²⁴, confirmed by many internal indications), though it was written more than half a century after the events which are recorded. It narrates healings (4^{16ff.}, 5⁸ 6²), giving sight to the blind (9^{6ff.}), raising the dead (11⁴⁴), and several 'miracles of nature'—water made wine (2⁹), feeding the five thousand (6^{1ff.}), walking on the sea (6¹⁹), the miraculous draught of fishes (21¹); also the Resurrection (20. 21) and 'many other signs' (20³⁰). It is to be noted that in all the Gospels the evidence for 'miracles' of nature is as strong as that for miracles of healing, and that the evidence of Jn. does not differ in kind from that of the Synoptists. For the evidence of the Gospels, reference may be made to Sanday's art. 'Jesus Christ' in HDB ii. 625 f. Though the witness of the Synoptists is not in form at first hand, it still rests on very good authority, and there is excellent reason for believing that the evidence of Mk. is in effect that of St. Peter himself (see DCG ii. 121 f., and, for the autoptic character of the Second Gospel, ib. 124). Also the first-hand evidence of St. Paul that he himself had the power of working miracles (see below) indirectly gives good testimony to the fact that our Lord worked them, for we can hardly imagine that St. Paul could have thought that he himself had the power from Christ unless his Master also had it. For a classification of the Gospel miracles see DCG ii. 186 ff. (T. H. Wright).

Further, in the Gospels it is recorded that our Lord bade the disciples heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils (Mt 10⁸); and that they would have power to do so if only they had faith is implied in 17²⁰. So in the appendix to Mk. (16^{17ff.}) the signs which would follow believers are said to be casting out devils in Christ's name, speaking with new tongues, taking up serpents, drinking poison without hurt, and healing the sick by laying on of hands.

(b) We may proceed to consider how these predictions are borne out by the Acts and Epistles. It will be convenient to separate the evidence which is at first hand from that which is at second hand.

(i.) Under the former head will come those mighty deeds and outward charismata which are attested by those who claimed to see, or to do, or to possess them. In the 'we' sections of Acts (accounts of events in which the author took part) and in St. Paul's Epistles we read of several mighty works, prophecies, and visions, attested at first hand. In Ac 16¹⁸ the Python is cast out of the ventriloquist girl; in 16²⁶ there is an earthquake, the doors of the prisons are opened, and the prisoners' bonds are loosed; in 20¹² we read of the raising of Eutychus (q.v.), though it is not said that he was dead (the reverse seems to be implied in v. 10); in 21⁹ of the prophesying of Philip's daughters; in 21¹¹ of the prophecy of Agabus; in 28⁷ of St. Paul's shaking off the viper without hurt (cf. 'Mk' 16¹⁸ as above); and in 28³⁴ of the healing of Publius' father by St. Paul by the laying on of hands; and of the healing of others, in which St. Luke himself seems to have taken part (see v. 10: 'honoured us'). Further, the narratives in Ac 9^{3ff.}, 22^{6ff.}, 26^{12ff.} of the appearances of our Lord to St. Paul at his conversion are brought almost to the level of first-hand evidence by the corroboration of Gal 1¹⁻¹⁶. St. Paul claimed that Christ worked miracles through him (Ro 15^{18ff.}, 2 Co 12^{12ff.}), and testifies to the fact that some (not all) of his converts also had the power (Gal 3⁵, 1 Co 12²⁸⁻³⁰ 14²²). These works, which are instances of πνευματικά or spiritual [gifts], include healings and other 'powers,' speaking with tongues and interpretation of tongues, and prophecy. We have it at first hand that the Jews expected such signs of Christian preachers (1 Co 12²). The visions of St. Paul are attested by himself in 2 Co 12²⁻⁴.

(ii.) Of other works and charismata in the NT, we have not, outside the Gospels, first-hand evidence; yet even what we have must be pronounced exceptionally good when we remember the opportunities which St. Luke had of converse with those who actually saw the events. At the outset we note that St. Peter in his speeches attributes to our Lord 'power and wonders and signs' (Ac 2²²), and the healing of demoniacs (10³⁸). Then, signs and wonders, healings of the sick and of demoniacs, are attributed to the apostles generally (2⁴³ 5¹²⁻¹⁶). In 3⁷ 9³⁴ St. Peter heals the lame man and Æneas; in 5⁵⁻¹⁰ he inflicts sudden death on Ananias and Sapphira; in 9⁴⁰ he raises Dorcas from the dead; and in 5¹⁵ the sick are brought so that his shadow may fall on some of them, though it is not said that they were thereby cured. In 6⁸ Stephen works wonders and signs; in 8⁶⁻¹³ Philip works signs and powers at Samaria. In 15¹² Barnabas and Paul relate to the Apostolic Council how signs and wonders had been worked by them. In 13¹¹ St. Paul strikes Elymas blind; in 14¹⁰ he heals the impotent man at Lystra; in 19¹¹ he works 'special' (οὐ τὰς συχούσας) powers at Ephesus, and even his garments taken to the sick and the demoniacs heal them. In He 2⁴ the first preachers of the gospel are said to have worked signs and wonders and powers. Divine interpositions are recorded in Ac 5¹⁸ 12¹⁰, where an angel opens prison doors. We read of speaking with tongues and prophesying at Pentecost (2⁴) and at Ephesus (19⁶), and the same thing is probably implied in 8^{17ff.}, because Simon Magus saw that the Holy Ghost was given at Samaria. Another prophecy of Agabus (this time at second hand) is quoted in 11³. Numerous visions of our Lord are recorded: in Ac 1^{3ff.} (between the Resurrection and the Ascension), 9^{3ff.} etc. (to St. Paul at his conversion), 9¹⁰ (to Ananias), 22¹⁸ 23¹¹ (to St. Paul at Jerusalem); and something of this sort is implied by the direction of the Spirit in 16^{6ff.}. Visions of angels are recorded in 8²⁶ (to Philip), 10³ (to Peter), 27³ (to St. Paul on his voyage to Italy); in 16⁹ St. Paul sees the 'certain man of Macedonia.'

Miraculous deeds are ascribed to non-Christians and also to Satan and his ministers. The Jewish exorcists might expect to cast out demons, though as a matter of fact they were not successful in doing so (Ac 19^{13ff.}). Simon Magus by his 'magic' did wonderful things, so that he was named 'that power of God which is called Great' (8¹⁰). The Lawless One in 2 Th 2⁹ is marked by 'power and signs and lying wonders'; in Rev. the second beast (13^{13ff.}), the spirits of demons (16¹⁴), the false prophet (19²⁰), who is apparently to be identified with the second beast (see H. B. Swete, Apoc. 3, 1907, p. 206), work signs, just as our Lord had said that false Christs and false prophets should show signs and wonders (Mt 24²⁴, Mk 13²²).

3. Examination of the evidence.—In considering the facts enumerated above, it is quite possible, and even probable, that we must deduct several of the incidents mentioned as not being in any real sense miraculous, even though they might have seemed so to the bystanders. It is, for instance, probable that Eutychus was not really dead. Agabus' prophecies may have been but shrewd forecasts of events. The viper in Malta may not in reality have been poisonous. It is conceivable that Dorcas was in a state of coma and not really dead. The visions, the gift of tongues and of prophesying may not belong properly to the category of the miraculous. Yet when all possible deductions have been made, there can be no doubt that the NT is saturated with miracles, and that the writers were firmly persuaded that Jesus and His disciples had worked them.

How, then, are we to interpret the 'signs,' 'powers,' and 'wonders' of the NT? There is an increasing disposition at the present time among those who formerly would have denied all miracles to accept as genuine many of the NT narratives, especially those of healings and of expulsions of demons; and this is due to the greater knowledge which we now have of the power of mind over matter. But much depends on what we mean by a 'miracle.' To the man in the street it usually conveys the idea of a contravention of nature. This, however, is not a good definition. Augustine, in an often-quoted passage, remarks that a miracle (portentum) is not against nature, but against known nature (de Civ. Dei, XXI. viii. 2). What may appear to one eye to be a contravention of the laws of nature is often found in a later age to be in reality in accordance with them. As an example, wireless telegraphy would have seemed in the 1st cent. to be a miracle, whereas we now know it to be a natural phenomenon. Many, therefore, of the 'signs' of the NT, not only those which we are now beginning to see are no contravention of nature, such as the healings in nervous cases, but also others, may before long be found to be in accordance with law. When we ourselves shall have risen from the dead, and see 'face to face,' we may find that our Lord's resurrection and our own are the necessary outcome of law. The theory of 'relative miracles' was propounded by Schleiermacher, and has perhaps hardly been done justice to, though it is not possible to assent to all his reasoning. The theory substitutes for a contravention of nature a miracle of knowledge. Certain persons had a greater hold on the secrets of nature than their contemporaries; but this was by a Divine interposition. Even in the case of Jewish and heathen magicians this may to some extent be true; it is not necessary to brand men like Simon and Elymas and Apollonius of Tyana (a Cappadocian of the 1st cent. of our era) as mere impostors. It follows, then, that while the stories of miracles are narrated in the way that was best suited to the comprehension of the Apostolic Age, several of them, had they been written in our day, would have been given in different language (Sanday, HDB ii. 625a).

It is answered to what has been suggested here, that this reasoning makes the miracles to be no miracles at all. But this is not a substantial objection, and is based only on the presupposition that miracles are contraventions of nature. A miracle of knowledge implies Divine intervention as much as—nay, more than—a breach of natural law. Sanday remarks: 'The essential point is the Divine act; and that, I think, is proved. We are beginning to learn the lesson that an act is not less Divine because it is fundamentally in accordance with law' (Life of Christ in Recent Research, p. 218).

It may be that what has been said does not directly apply to all the 'signs' recorded in the NT. Yet these suggestions may at least give us pause if we are inclined to think that the excellent evidence which we possess cannot stand against the a priori improbability of a miracle happening.

4. Miracles in the sub-Apostolic and later ages.—It is important to compare NT records with those of subsequent ages in this respect.

(1) Let us first examine two actual miracles which have been thought to have happened in the 2nd century.

(a) Miracles at Polycarp's death (see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii.: 'Ignatius', 1889, i. 614 ff., iii. 392 f.).—The Letter of the Smyrnaeans (Martyrdom of Polycarp), written c. A.D. 156 immediately after the event, relates (§§ 9, 15 f.) that on the saints entering the stadium, a voice was heard from heaven, saying, 'Be strong, Polycarp, and play the man'; no one saw the speaker, but the bystanders heard the voice. A little later, they saw a marvel—the flame enveloping the martyr like a sail, and a fragrant odour was perceived. When the executioner stabbed Polycarp to death 'there came forth [a dove and] a quantity of blood, so that it extinguished the fire.' Here the only real 'miracle' is the dove; but all mention of it is omitted by Eusebius, who quotes the letter at length (HE iv. 15). It is therefore probable that περιστέρα καὶ is either, as Lightfoot thinks, an insertion by a later writer, perhaps by pseudo-Pionius, a 4th cent. biographer of Polycarp, or else a corruption, perhaps of περὶ στυράκα, 'about the sword-haft' (Christopher Wordsworth), or of περὶ στερὰ (Ruchat), or of ἐν ἀπιοτέρεα (Le Moyne). The life of pseudo-Pionius (for the text and translation of which see Lightfoot, 'Ign.'-i. iii.) describes several miracles, but the MS breaks off in the middle, and does not give Polycarp's death: the Life is followed in the MS immediately by the Letter of the Smyrnaeans.

(b) The Thundering Legion (c. A.D. 174).—A letter of Marcus Aurelius details the incident of the Christian soldiers praying for rain, and of its falling in abundance. The letter, however, is 'a manifest forgery' (Lightfoot, 'Ign.'-i. 488). There may be elements of truth in the story, but it can hardly be called a miracle, unless every answer to prayer be deemed such. Thus the two descriptions of actual miracles fail us.

(2) Next, let us examine the testimony of the writers who succeeded the apostles.

(a) Papias, a 'hearer of John and companion of Polycarp' (Iren. Hær. v. xxxiii. 4), in words quoted by Eusebius (HE iii. 39), says that in the time of Philip the Apostle one rose from the dead, and that Justus Barsabbas (Ac 1st) drank deadly poison without hurt. This, however, was in the Apostolic Age.

(b) The writer of the Didache (10 f.) and Hermas (Mand. 11) speak of the existence of true and false prophets in the Christian Church in their time.

(c) Justin testifies to the healing of demoniacs in his day (c. A.D. 150; Apol. ii. 6, Dial. 30, 76: in the last passage he apparently speaks of this as the fulfilment of the promise that they should tread on scorpions, etc., Lk 10¹⁹); he says that one received the gift of healing, another of foreknowledge, etc. (Dial. 39), and that 'prophetic gifts remain with us even to the present time' (82).

(d) Irenæus (c. A.D. 180; Hær. II. xxxii. 4) says that Christians 'in Christ's name perform [works] . . . some cast out devils . . . others have foreknowledge and see visions and prophesy, others heal the sick by laying on of hands. . . . Even the dead have been raised up and remained among us for many years.' Note the change of tense here. The raising of the dead in Irenæus' own time is not alleged, and the reference may be to Dorcas or to such a case as is mentioned by Papias. Irenæus ascribes the miracles of heretics to magic.

(e) At the end of the 2nd cent. Tertullian speaks of the healing of demoniacs in his day: Apol. 23, 37 ('without reward or hire'), 43 (heathen demoniacs healed).

(f) In the 3rd cent. Origen says (c. Cels. i. 2) that traces of the signs and wonders of the First Age were still possessed by those who regulated their lives by the precepts of the gospel; and (ib. iii. 24), speaking of heathen ascriptions of healings to Æsculapius, that by the invocation of Jesus' name some Christians of his time had marvellous power of healing; he would seem to speak chiefly of mental diseases.

These passages show that healings, especially in nervous cases, continued in the 2nd cent. and later; but there are indications that even they were not very frequent, and there is no good evidence of the other miraculous works of which we read in the NT being continued. In the Church Orders we read of the benediction of oil for healing and for the exorcism of candidates for baptism, and these features may probably be due to the lost original of several of the Orders, which may be dated about the beginning of the 3rd century. But here we have passed from the stage of miracle to that of ordinary liturgical usage. At the end of the 4th cent. Chrysostom implies that miracles had ceased—and this in the face of the fact that that century saw the rise of miracle-loving hagiography. He says (de Sacerd. iv. 6 [416]) that his contemporaries, though they all came together with myriads of prayers and tears, could not do as much as the 'aprons' (σικκίνθια) of St. Paul once did (Ac 19¹²).

The evidence, then, seems to show that miracles gradually died out, and that after the Apostolic Age they scarcely went beyond 'healing by suggestion.' The case is very different after the 4th cent., when lives of the saints and martyrs are full of miracle, and eventually the power of working miracles became a test of saintship, in direct contrast with the restraint of Holy Scripture, in which it is said that 'John did no sign' (Jn 10⁴¹), and no miracle is ascribed to the great majority of the heroes of the OT. Moreover, most of the 'ecclesiastical' miracles are mere prodigies, and can in no sense be called 'signs.' In many cases they are demonstrably the invention of later biographers, and contemporary writers show no knowledge of them. But we cannot a priori deny the possibility of miracles happening in any age of the Christian Church, and it is quite probable that some mighty deeds of later times, notably healings, may have a modicum of truth in them, and may be such as would have been termed σημεία in the NT. (For miracles in the Columban Church see J. Dowden, Celtic Church in Scotland, London, 1894, ch. viii.)

5. Evidential value of NT miracles.—The object of the miracles was to arrest attention (Jn 2²³ 3-); they were not, however, faith-compelling (Mt 11²⁰, Jn 12³⁷). Since the apostles believed (see above, 3) that even evil men and evil spirits could work miracles, they would not have said that a miracle-worker must be a true teacher. Now a miracle, because of its anomalousness, requires more proof than an ordinary event. The latter, if properly vouched, at once becomes probable; not so the former, unless it has a certain degree of a priori likelihood. Such we find in the belief in the spiritual world. If we believe in a God who is not aloof from the world, but loves His creatures, it is not improbable that He should, for good cause, intervene. The method of intervention may be unusual, and not in accord with the ordinary course of nature as we know it (cf. Augustine, above, 3); but if an unusual event such as the Incarnation happens, it is not improbable that such interventions should accompany it. It follows, however, that we cannot rest our argument for the existence of God, or for the truth of Christianity, merely on the fact that miracles happened, and it was a mistake in the reasoning of the 18th cent. apologists that they to a large extent did so. If for other reasons we believe in the Godhead of our Lord, we can also believe that He worked miracles, and empowered His disciples to do so—whether for one generation or for longer we need not stop to discuss.

It was never professed that miracles were worked to make those who were without any faith believe. The Risen Christ appeared only to believers, though this does not mean that the disciples believed merely because they wished to believe; here their 'hardness of heart' is of great evidential value. And miracles were only worked when there was a certain amount of faith (Mk 6⁵, Mt 13⁵⁸; cf. Lk 16³¹). Indeed, it is seen that miracles did not make the great impression on the First Age that they would make now. Did they happen now, the impression would be so great that they would be almost faith-compelling, and this is a very good reason for their having ceased. Even the disciples were not so much impressed by the Resurrection that they believed it without any doubt. Some of those who had seen the Risen Lord at first believed, then disbelieved (Mt 28¹⁷: 'some doubted'), and only after a time were fully confirmed in the faith. So, again, though the story of the raising of Lazarus made a stir at the time in Jerusalem, it is quite intelligible that the impression did not extend very far or last very long. To say, therefore, that St. Mark could not have known of the raising of Lazarus because he does not mention it in the account of Jesus' ministry in another part of the country is to import 20th cent. ideas into the narrative of the Apostolic Age.

The conclusion would seem to be that miracles have never been intended to be a direct proof of the truth of the gospel, or of the holiness of those who worked them; and their absence does not imply want of authority or of saintliness. But when at great crises of the world's history they were worked, they at once arrested attention, and so led men on to believe in doctrines which for other reasons commended themselves to the sense of humanity.

LITERATURE.—Out of a voluminous literature may be mentioned: W. Sanday, Life of Christ in Recent Research, Oxford, 1907, ch. viii., and art. 'Jesus Christ' in HDB ii. (section on the 'Miracles of Jesus'); J. H. Bernard, HDB iii., art. 'Miracle'; T. H. Wright, DCG ii., art. 'Miracles'; J. R. Illingworth, Divine Immanence, London, 1898; R. C. Trench, Notes on the Miracles of our Lord, do., 1870, which is never out of date; G. Salmon, Non-Miraculous Christianity, London, 1931. For other works see HDB and DCG as above.

A. J. MACLEAN.

MIRROR (ἑσπῆρρον, 1 Co 13¹², Ja 1²³; the classical word was κάτοπτρον, whence κατοπτρίζεσθαι, in 2 Co 3¹⁸; Lat. speculum, late Lat. miratorium, from mirari, whence Fr. miroir).—The mirrors of the ancients consisted of a thin disk of metal—usually bronze, more rarely silver—slightly convex and polished on one side. Glass mirrors coated with tin, of which there was a manufactory at Sidon (Pliny, HN xxxvi. 66, 193), were little used, and the art of silvering glass was not discovered till the 13th century. Corinthian mirrors were considered the best, and it is interesting that St. Paul's two figurative uses of the word occur in his letters to Corinth.

1. To bring home to the imagination the limitations of human knowledge, he says that in the present life we see only by means of a mirror darkly (δὲ ἑσπῆρρον ἐν αἰνίγματι, 1 Co 13¹²). In a modern mirror the reflexion is perfect, but the finest burnished metal gave but an indistinct image. To see a friend in a mirror, and to look at his own face, was therefore to receive two different impressions. So this world of time and sense, as apprehended by the human mind, imperfectly mirrors the true and eternal world, leaving many things 'enigmatic.' Mediate knowledge can never be so sure and satisfying as immediate. Plato (Rep. vii. 514) in his well-known simile of the cave compares our sense-impressions to shadow-shapes that come and go, giving but hints of the real world beyond; and the figure of the mirror is found in such Platonists as the writer of Wisdom (7²⁶) and Philo (de Decal. 21). J. H. Newman directed that his memorial tablet at Edgbaston should bear the words—Ex umbris et imaginibus in veritatem. Many writers have supposed that St. Paul refers not to a mirror but to a semi-transparent window-pane: 'velut per corneum speculari obsoletior lux' (Tertullian, de An. 53). But a window of tale would be διωπτρον (Lat. speculare), not ἐσοπτρον. Tertullian has indeed the right interpretation in adv. Prax. 16, 'in imagine et speculo et ænigmatē.'

2. St. Paul says that we all, with unveiled face mirroring (καρποφύμενοι) the glory of the Lord, are transfigured (cf. Mk 9-) into the same image (2 Co 3¹⁸). While Moses, who saw God and for a little while outwardly reflected His glory, gradually lost the supernatural radiance, the disciples of Christ steadily beholding (cf. Jn 1¹⁴) and reflecting His moral glory, become daily more like Him: 'the rays of Divine glory penetrate their innermost being and fashion them anew' (Bousset, Die Schrift-en des NT, 1908, ii. 179). The older interpretation—'beholding as in a mirror'—loses the parallel between Moses' direct vision of God and ours (by faith) of Christ, and fails to do justice to the 'unveiled face.'

3. James (1²³⁻²⁵) compares the law of liberty—a splendid paradox—to a mirror in which a man sees himself as he is. The mere hearer of the law is like a person who gives a hasty glance at his face in a mirror and then turns his attention to other things; but he who continues to look into the mirror of the law till the moral ideal fascinates him and the categorical imperatives win his passionate assent, so that his own will is more and more conformed to the will of God—that man shall learn the secret of true happiness. JAMES STRAHAN.

MITYLENE (Μιτυλήνη).—Mitylene, or—according to the usual spelling in classical writings and on coins—Mytilene, was the chief town in the island of Lesbos, lying on the S.E. coast, about 12 miles from the mainland of Asia Minor. Built on a peninsula which had once been an island, it had two excellent harbours, the northern for merchantmen, the southern for triremes.

Horace calls it 'Mitylene pulchra' (Ep. i. xi. 17), and Cicero praises it as 'urbis et natura de situ et descriptione adificiorum et pulchritudine, in primis nobilis' (Leg. Agr. ii. 41). Mitylene was the home of Alceus and of Sappho, 'an extraordinary person (θαυμαστόν τι πρόσωπον), for at no period within memory has any woman been known at all to be compared to her in poetry' (Strabo, xii. ii. 3). For its old renown the Romans left the city free—'libera Mitylene' (Pliny, v. 39).

Mitylene is mentioned only incidentally in Acts (20¹⁴). The ship in which St. Paul sailed from Assos to Patara in the month of April lay overnight either in the northern harbour of Mitylene (which Strabo mentions as μέγας καὶ βαθύς [xiii. ii. 2]), or else in the roadstead outside. Mitylene was about 30 miles S. from Assos—an easy day's sail. It was contrary to the general practice to sail at night in the Ægean, where, throughout the summer season, the N. wind commonly blows fresh in the morning and dies away towards evening. In later Christian times the whole island of Lesbos came to be called Mitylene. The Turks, who captured it in A.D. 1462, have corrupted its name into Midullü.

LITERATURE.—Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., London, 1877, ii. 261; H. F. Tozer, The Islands of the Ægean, Oxford, 1890, p. 134 f.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 291 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

MNASON.—Mnason, an 'early disciple' (ἀρχαῖος μαθητῆς, i.e., probably, a disciple from the beginning [cf. Ac 11¹⁵, ἐν ἀρχῇ]), is mentioned in Ac 21¹⁶ as the host of St. Paul in Jerusalem. The ambiguity of the text has caused much discussion. Grammatically it may mean either that Mnason accompanied St. Paul and his friends from Cæsarea to Jerusalem and then took in St. Paul, or that St. Paul's friends brought him to Jerusalem to lodge with Mnason. Moreover, Cod. D and Syr. p. marg. (Tisch.) introduce a variant reading which makes Mnason entertain St. Paul in a village on the way. But the difficulty is met by observing that the mind of the author of Acts is picturing the company after v. 15 as already in Jerusalem, as having Mnason as host, and being welcomed by the disciples. Nothing further is known of Mnason. The name occurs as a personal one some 30 times in the CIG, Græc. sept., vol. i., and also in Kaibel, no. 2393 (368). Cod. N and one or two Versions read 'Jason' for 'Mnason'; cf. 'Mambres' for 'Jambres' (see JANNES AND JAMBRES).

W. F. COBB.

MODERATION.—See TEMPERANCE.

MOLOCH.—Moloch (Ac 7⁴³) occurs in a quotation from Am 5²⁶. The Hebrew has 'your king'; thus the LXX may either be an explanatory gloss or represent another text. Moloch is spoken of in the OT as the god of the Ammonites, and is evidently the national deity, just as Chemosh is the god of Moab, and Jahweh the God of Israel, though the worship of other gods is not precluded. The Israelites regarded Moloch as an 'abomination,' and their temporary adoption of the worship of Moloch in the Valley of Hinnom gave rise to the ominous meaning attaching to 'Gehenna.'

F. W. WORSLEY.

MONEY.—See WEALTH.

MONOGAMY.—See MARRIAGE.

MONTH.—See TIME.

MOON.—There is only one reference to the natural light of the moon—there will be no need of the moon to shine in the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21²³). The change in colour or obscuring of the moon denotes some great judgment, e.g. the moon will be turned into blood before the great Day of the Lord (Ac 2³⁰). So again at the opening of the sixth seal 'the moon became as blood' (Rev 6¹²). At the sounding of the fourth trumpet a third of the moon's disk is obscured (Rev 8¹²). In Rev 12¹ the woman who appears as a sign in heaven has the moon under her feet as a footstool (see SUN). In Col 2¹⁶ St. Paul warns the Colossians to let no man judge them in respect of a holy day or of the new moon—a monthly festival of the Jews. These things had served their purpose under the old dispensation and were but shadows and types of the realities of the new. See HOLY DAY.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

MORALITY.—See ETHICS.

MORNING-STAR.—See DAY-STAR.

MORTIFY.—This word translates (AV and RV) θανατοῦν (Ro 8¹³) and νεκροῦν (Col 3⁵). Elsewhere in the NT the former word is applied only to the infliction of physical death (by the Greek medical writers to 'mortification' in the pathological sense), the latter to senile decay of the vital powers (Ro 4¹⁹, He 11¹²). In the passages cited the words are synonymous, and are used, as the contexts plainly show, in an ethical sense. Although St. Paul is far from disparaging the necessity of wholesome self-discipline (1 Co 9²⁷), the idea, readily suggested by the associations of the word 'mortify,' of a gradual subjugation of the bodily appetites by the practice of bodily austerities, is here foreign to his thought. His exhortation is to 'put to death the (evil) practices of the body' (Ro 8¹³), and this is to be done, not by physical means, but by the 'spirit'; and again to put to death 'the members which are upon the earth' (i.e. the impure and selfish lusts of which the bodily members are the natural instruments—fornication, uncleanness, etc.), and for this end the rules of an arbitrary asceticism are of no value (Col 2¹⁶⁻²³).

The main emphasis of St. Paul's doctrine of sanctification is ever on the positive issue of the believer's vital union with Christ—that 'newness of life' which by its native force expels and excludes the lustings of the lower nature (Ro 13¹⁴, Gal 5¹⁶, Eph 5¹⁸, 2 Ti 2²²); yet necessarily the negative principle is also involved. By man, in his present state, spiritual life is realizable only through the slaying of sin; union with the Crucified implies crucifixion of the passions and lusts (Gal 5⁴). While 'raised together with Christ,' we 'seek the things that are above' (Col 3¹), the converse fact that in Christ 'we died' (Col 3³) carries with it the converse requirement, as it does also the power, to kill out what is base and sensual and to hold all natural appetites in rigid subordination to the highest ends of life.

ROBERT LAW.

MOSES.—Just as, in the Synagogue, the Law (the Torah), was accounted the most important division of the Canon, and as Holy Scripture in its entirety might thus a parte potiori be designated the 'Law' (ὁ νόμος, the tôrāh), so in the primitive Church Moses was regarded as the supreme figure of the OT.

1. Moses as the author of the Pentateuch.—Moses was honoured as the author of the 'Law,' i.e. the Pentateuch: Ro 10⁵ ('Moses writeth'); cf. Ac 3²² 7³⁷. His name had become so closely identified with the books of the Torah that we even find it said, 'Moses is read' (Ac 15²¹, 2 Co 3¹⁵ [cf. v. 14]). The Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch was an assumption of Jewish tradition and, as such, seems to have been taken over by Jesus and His apostles without criticism of any sort. It is to be noted, however, that they attached no special importance to the belief that Moses himself wrote the Pentateuch. This is in no sense the point of the above references, as the name 'Moses' is used either metonymically for the Law ('the Old Covenant') as in Ac 15¹ and 2 Co 3¹⁵ (cf. v. 14), or as a designation of the correlative, i.e. the first, portion of Holy Scripture or Divine revelation; cf. e.g. Ro 10¹⁹ (where Moses is referred to only as the mouth-piece of God, exactly like 'Isaiah' in the next verse). Occasionally, however, special emphasis is laid upon the fact that Moses, as a prophet, gave utterance to certain sayings, since, as the recognized representative of Judaism, he forms in some sense a contrast to Jesus; cf. Ac 7³ and 3²² ('Moses said') with Jn 5⁴⁶ (Ro 10⁵).

2. Moses as a prophet.—Among the early Christians generally Moses was honoured as pre-eminently a prophet. While the religion of the OT revolved around the two foci, Law and Promise, primitive Christianity—in contrast to later Judaism—laid the chief emphasis upon the Promise; and, if the Jews exploited Moses in their controversies with the Christians, the latter could always appeal to his Messianic prediction; cf. Ac 3²² 7³⁷ 26²²⁻²⁸, Lk 24^{27, 44}, Jn 5⁴⁶⁻⁴⁷ (Dt 18¹⁵: 'The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me'). More especially in the speech of Stephen a strong emphasis is laid upon the prophetic character of Moses (Ac 7³¹); here, moreover, Moses does not merely foretell the coming of Christ, but in his calling, and even in his experiences, he is also, as indicated in the passage cited from Dt., a prototype of Christ, having been first of all disowned by his people (vv. 23-29), then exalted by God to be their leader and deliverer (v. 35), and at length once more rejected by them (vv. 39-41). St. Paul, too, uses the figure of Moses as a type of Christ: the Israelites in their exodus from Egypt 'were all baptized unto Moses' in the Red Sea (1 Co 10-); and in He 3- Moses is spoken of as typifying Christ's faithfulness in the service of God's house. That Christ is called the Mediator of the New Covenant (He 8⁶ 12²⁴) doubtless presupposes that Moses was the mediator of the Old (cf. Ac 7³⁸, Gal 3¹⁹). In the speech of Stephen the life of Moses is sketched at some length, and is furnished with certain particulars which were derived from the oral tradition of the Synagogue (the Haggada), as e.g. in Ac 7²² ('instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians')—just as the names of the Egyptian magicians, Jannes and Jambres, are given by St. Paul (2 Ti 3⁸). Further, among the heroes of the faith enumerated in He 11, Moses wins more than a passing reference as a pattern of faith (vv. 24-6).

High as Moses stands in the Old Covenant, however, his glory pales before that of Christ, as the transient and the material gives place to the permanent and the spiritual (2 Co 3¹⁷⁻¹⁸, He 3³⁻⁵). Moses was but the servant of God, while Jesus Christ is God's Son, who not merely superintends, but actually governs God's house, and was in fact its builder (He 3³⁻⁵). In the fading away of the dazzling glory on the face of Moses (Ex 34³³⁻³⁵) St. Paul finds a symbol of the transient glory of the Old Covenant mediated by Moses, while the glory of the Lord (i.e. Christ), and thus also of the New Covenant, is imperishable (2 Co 3¹²⁻¹⁸; cf. vv. 7-11).

3. Moses as the law-giver.—This brings us to the function of Moses as the law-giver. As Judaism became more and more definitely legalistic, an ever higher position was assigned to the great intermediary of the Law. He towered above every other character in the OT, and Judaism became neither more nor less than Mosaism. To impugn the Law in any way was to speak blasphemy, not only against Moses, but even against God (cf. the charge against Stephen, Ac 6¹¹). The primitive Church, on the other hand—as was said above—laid great stress upon the prophetic and prototypic character of Moses, as also upon his subordinate position in relation to Christ. But as long as Moses remained the great canonical standard, the Church could not renounce his legislative authority. Even the Lord Jesus Himself had sanctioned the Law of Moses, and co-ordinated it with the Prophets (Mt 5¹⁷⁻²⁰, Lk 16¹⁷; cf. vv. 23, 31), and the primitive community in Jerusalem could never have entertained the thought of disparaging the authority of Moses for Christians as well as Jews. Still, the relation of the disciples of Jesus to the Mosaic Law could not permanently remain the same as that of the unbelieving Jews; the differentiating factor of belief in Jesus was felt more and more to be paramount, and at length it was fully realized that salvation could be secured not by the Law but by faith, or grace, and that it came not from Moses, but from Jesus Christ.

Thus too had come the time when the believing Gentiles must be fully recognized as brethren, and received into the Church without circumcision.* Yet this does not in any sense imply that the mother church in Jerusalem and the rest of the Jewish Christians believed themselves to be exempt from the obligation of the Law. On the contrary, we are told in Acts that the many thousands of Jewish Christians continued to be 'zealous for the law' (21²⁰), and in a continuation of the passage we are shown that the rumour of St. Paul's having taught the Jewish Christians in his churches to forsake Moses was without foundation (vv. 1-26), while we learn from St. Paul's own letters that within certain limits he desired the distinction made by Moses between Jew and Gentile to be maintained in his churches (cf. 1 Co 7¹⁸, Gal 5²; see also art. LAW, p. 690^b). Furthermore, even as regards a Gentile Christian community, the Apostle could appeal to particular regulations of the Mosaic Law as expressions of the Divine will in contrast to the dictates of human reason (1 Co 9²⁴; cf. 1 Ti 5¹⁸, where the same OT passage—Dt 25⁴—is placed side by side with a saying of Jesus)—just as elsewhere he frequently refers to special provisions of the Law, or to the Law as a whole. Yet this in no way detracts from the validity of the principle that all things are spiritually judged (1 Co 2¹⁴), and that nothing is to be enforced according to the letter which killeth (2 Co 3⁶), the regulative canon being that the external statutes, 'the commandments in ordinances' (Eph 2¹⁵), are merely the shadow of things to come, while the body is Christ's (Col 2¹⁷)—whence it follows that the outward regulations of the Law are to be applied in a typological (or allegorical) way. A further result was a certain relaxation of the Mosaic ordinances relating to practical life, enabling the Jewish Christians to live in brotherly intercourse with the believing Gentiles.

* A detailed explanation of this development is given in the art. LAW.

In this connexion, however, certain difficulties arose which seemed actually to necessitate some limitation of Gentile Christian liberty, and it was this state of things that led the primitive Church to promulgate the 'Apostolic Decree.' According to Ac 15¹⁻²¹, St. James, the brother of the Lord, justified his proposal regarding the Decree by the circumstance that 'Moses from generations of old hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath.' The point of this statement is much debated. Does St. James mean thereby that the apostles do not need to trouble regarding the dissemination of the Mosaic legislation, and that they should therefore lay upon the Gentile Christians nothing beyond the four prohibitions specified by him, since Moses had from of old been sufficiently represented throughout the Diaspora (so e.g. Zahn)? If this be the true interpretation, the statement of St. James fails to explain why these particular prohibitions were fixed upon. We must thus rather look for an interpretation according to which v. 21 provides a reason why precisely these four injunctions were laid upon the Gentile churches. Such a reading of the passage would be as follows: Since, not only in the Holy Land, but also in heathen lands, the doctrines of Moses are every Sabbath inculcated upon those who attend the Synagogue, it is necessary that the believing Gentiles—like the so-called 'God-fearing' (οἱ σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν)—should give some consideration to the Mosaic Law, and should at least abstain from taking part in those heathen practices which were most revolting to the Jewish mind. The prohibitions of the Apostolic Decree, which resemble those imposed upon Jewish proselytes, were probably framed in conformity with Lv 17. 18, which contain, inter alia, laws to be observed by aliens resident in the land of Israel. They seem at first sight to be a strange mingling of moral and purely ritual laws, the prohibition of sexual immorality being conjoined with three interdicts about food (cf. Ac 15²⁹). But while this collocation has certainly an appearance of arbitrariness, a glance at Rev 2²⁰⁻²⁴ (where we undoubtedly hear an echo of the Apostolic Decree), as also a comparison with 1 Co 10⁷⁻¹⁰, shows us that abstinence from idolatrous sacrifices and abstinence from sexual immorality are closely related, and that πορνεία here refers not merely to the forbidden degrees of marriage but also to ceremonial prostitution; the Gentile Christians must abstain both from taking part in the sacrificial meals of the heathen world and from the immoralities connected therewith, i.e. from practices regarded among the heathen as adiaphora (cf. 1 Co 6¹⁴). As regards the other two restrictions, it is clear that they converge upon a single point—the supreme necessity of maintaining the sacredness of blood in every form, as already recognized in the so-called Noachian dispensation: the believing Gentiles must no longer partake of blood either in the flesh or by itself (e.g. mixed with wine, as drunk by the heathen in their sacrificial feasts); in other words, only the flesh of ritually slaughtered animals may be eaten.

The essential equivalence of these two prohibitions might also explain the uncertainty attaching to the reading πικρὸν in the textual tradition. Here, however, another consideration arises. In the Western text, which omits καὶ πικρὸν (πικρὸν), we find an addition which points to an entirely different conception of the Apostolic Decree, viz. καὶ οὐ μὴ ἐλάσσωσιν αὐτοῖς γινώσθαι ἐρέους μὴ ποτεῖν (15²⁰); so D, Iren., Tert., Cyr., some Minuscules, and the Sahidic. The 'golden rule' being thus added to the prohibitions of idolatrous sacrifices, fornication, and blood, the Decree is transformed into a short moral catechism, in which are forbidden the three cardinal vices—idolatry, fornication, and murder (αἷμα = 'shedding of blood'). But although the genuineness of this form of the text is defended by able scholars, such as Blass and Harnack, it should in all probability be rejected as of secondary origin. For not only is the golden rule introduced most inapily in a formal respect, but the purely ethical character of the decree as thus transformed presupposes the conditions of a later time—a time when the Church was no longer concerned with the specific problem that had called for the attention of the Apostolic Council; in the West, where the 'ethical' form of the Decree took its rise, Jewish Christianity was a relatively insignificant force, and what was wanted there was a brief compendium of the anti-heathen morality of Christianity. At the same time, however, the altered form of the Decree shows that the Church never regarded it as an inviolable law, but thought of it simply as a provisional arrangement which might be varied to suit local and temporary circumstances.

In Rev 2 the prohibitions of idolatrous sacrifices and (ritual) immorality are once more brought to view, while in 1 Co 6³⁻¹⁰ St. Paul urges the same restrictions, though without appealing to the Apostolic Decree. Nor, strangely enough, does he mention the Decree in Gal 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶; this, however, would be sufficiently explained on the ground that the Apostle had emphasized its provisions (which, be it remembered, were not new, but had already found a regular place in the Jewish propaganda) in his missionary labours in the Galatian region (Ac 16⁶). In that case it was not necessary that he should complicate the deliverance of the Council as to the recognition of his gospel and his apostolic status by mentioning the Decree, and all the less so because the account in Ac 15 does not imply that St. Paul himself was charged with the duty of enforcing its provisions in his missionary sphere.

We may sum up the whole by saying that while primitive Christianity originally set Moses and Jesus side by side, it came at length, in the process of development, to contrast them with each other, and St. John, in the Prologue to his Gospel, gives expression to this result in his great saying: 'The law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (1⁷).

LITERATURE.—H. H. Wendt, *Apostelgeschichte*⁸, in Meyer's Kommentar, 1899; G. Hoennicke, Apostelgeschichte, Leipzig, 1913; text-books of NT Theology, by B. Weiss (Eng. tr., 1882-83), H. J. Holtzmann (21911), P. Feine (1910), G. B. Stevens (1899); E. B. Reuss, Hist. of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., 1872-74, i. 139, 205, etc.; J. R. Cohn, St. Paul, 1911, p. 40 ff.; A. E. Garvie, Studies of Paul and his Gospel, 1911, p. 192 ff. OLAF MOE.

MOTHER.—See FAMILY.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN (ὄρος).—'Mountain' is a somewhat elastic term expressing not only an isolated peak, but an extended range, or even a whole district of high elevation. Palestine being an exceptionally mountainous country, it was natural that Biblical writers should often allude to its physical features; but it is noteworthy that they spend little time in describing the mere scenery. To the ancients mountains played a conspicuous part in religion; they were not infrequently the scenes of theophanies, and when great men, such as Aaron and Moses, died, they were buried on the tops of mountains. Mountains are also the natural image for eternal continuance and stability. But even these monuments of firmness and stability are pictured as moved out of their place in the final cataclysm (Rev 6¹⁴ 16²⁰).

In apostolic history four conspicuous mountains are especially referred to: the Mount of Olives, Sinai, Zion, and 'the Mount' (of Transfiguration).

1. The Mount of Olives (τὸ ὄρος τῶν ἐλαιῶν, Ac 1¹²).—In this passage it is related that after the Ascension the disciples returned 'unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet.' Apostolic history thus begins, geographically, where Gospel history leaves off (cf. Lk 24⁵⁰⁻⁵³, Mk 6¹⁹⁻²⁰). The Mount of Olives, called by the Muslims Jebel et-Tur ('Mountain of Light'), and Jebel ez-Zeitun ('Mount of Olives'), is the name of the somewhat elevated range (c. 2,650 ft.) lying due east of the Holy City and separated from it by the deep Kidron ravine. Its northern portion is called Scopus by Josephus (BJ v. ii. 3); its southern is known to the Arabs as Batn el-Hawa, and by many is identified as the 'Mount of Offence.' The distance from Jerusalem to its summit is 2,000 cubits, or about 6 furlongs. This was fixed by the Rabbis as the maximum distance to be travelled on the Sabbath day. The view from Olivet is one of the most extensive in all Palestine, including the Holy City, the hill country of Judæa, much of the Jordan Valley, a portion of the Dead Sea, and the broad sweep of the mountains of Gilead and Moab.

2. Mount Sinai (Σινᾶ, Ac 7³⁰⁻³⁸, Gal 4²⁴⁻²⁵, He 8⁵ 12¹⁸⁻²⁰).—In the first of these passages (Ac 7³⁰⁻³⁸) the martyr Stephen recalls to his murderers' minds Moses' vision of the Burning Bush (Ex 3^{1st}), and thus defends himself against the charge of speaking against Moses and the Law. In the second (Gal 4²⁴⁻²⁵) St. Paul makes Hagar, Abraham's bondwoman, representative of the earthly Jerusalem and the bondage of the Law, whereas Sarah was free and represents the heavenly Jerusalem and the freedom of the gospel. Hagar's son Ishmael was a child according to the course of nature, whereas the birth of Isaac was according to the promise, and therefore a Divine event. The whole OT story is here allegorized, and is intended to show the incompatibility of a spirit of bondage with a spirit of sonship. Mount Sinai is usually identified with Jebel Musa (c. 7,000 ft. in altitude), though some prefer to identify it with Jebel Serbal (c. 6,500 ft.), a few miles to the N.W. of the former, both being located in the southern portion of the Sinai Peninsula. Of the two passages in Hebrews, the first (8⁵) affirms that the tabernacle constructed in the wilderness was a mere copy and shadow of the heavenly things, made by Moses according to the pattern that was showed him in the Mount (cf. Ex 25⁴⁰). Even the furniture of the earthly tabernacle had its heavenly archetypes; so also the priesthood of Aaron and his descendants is but a copy of the priesthood of Jesus. In the other passage from Hebrews (12¹⁸⁻²¹) the terrors of the Old Covenant, given at Sinai, are contrasted with the glories of the New. The words 'a mount' are not in the original of v. 18, but they are implied by the words 'mount Zion' in v. 22 (cf. v. 20). The Apostle paints the theophany of Sinai (Ex 19) vividly, in order to appal his readers with the awful sanctity of the mountain where God proclaimed His Law. So great was the sacredness of the mountain, indeed, that even unconscious trespass was visited by death.

3. Mount Zion (Σιών, He 12²²).—Over against Sinai, which quaked at the giving of the Law, the Apostle places Zion, using it, however, in a spiritual sense: 'But ye are come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem,' etc. The contrast between the two Dispensations is thus emphasized: Sinai, sensible, provisional, and accompanied by the physical phenomena of the world; Zion, ideal, super-sensible, abiding, final, and pertaining to the world above. To the Apostle, Zion is here not the earthly Jerusalem, but the heavenly world of realities, 'Jerusalem the golden.' As there was a Zion below after the order of the world, there is also a Zion above true to the ideal; the one here is only the symbolic abode of God, that above is His real abode; yea, the abode also of the Lamb (Rev 14¹).

4. 'The Holy Mount.'—The expression occurs in St. Peter's description of the transfigured glory of Christ, 'when we were with him in the holy mount' (ἐν τῷ ὁρει τῷ ἁγίῳ, 2 P 1¹⁸). Doubtless the Mount of Transfiguration is meant (cf. Mt 17¹⁻¹³). This was very probably one of the spurs of Mount Hermon, Jebel esh-Sheikh, 'the mount of the chief.' It is the highest peak in all Palestine and Syria, rising 9,050 ft. above sea-level, and covered with snow during a great part of the year. The name 'Hermon' signifies that it was considered sacred.

5. The other references in apostolic history to 'mountains' are for the most part mere figures of speech. For example, St. Paul says in his matchless psalm on love (1 Co 13²), 'And if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains.' Mountains were the image of eternal stability, yet, though one had faith to remove the unmovable, without love one would be nothing. In He 11³⁸ there is an allusion to the sacrifices which the heroes of faith endured in OT times, wandering 'in deserts and mountains'—mountains being symbols of the difficulties and dangers of life. On the other hand, the apostle John, attempting to describe the terrors of the Final Judgment, pictures kings as hiding themselves 'in the caves and in the rocks of the mountains,' and as saying 'to the mountains and to the rocks, Fall on us and hide us, etc.' (Rev 6¹⁵⁻¹⁶), the swift agony of being crushed to death being considered preferable, as the implication is, to being left face to face with an angry God. The same Seer, when the second angel sounded, beheld a great burning mountain cast into the sea (Rev 8⁸). Perhaps he had seen such phenomena in his lonely life of exile amid the islands of the Aegean! The allusion in Rev 17⁹ is likewise figurative, 'The seven heads are seven mountains.' Finally, the Apostle is 'carried in the spirit to a mountain great and high' (Rev 21¹⁰), from which as a vantage-ground of elevation he saw 'the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God.' This was St. John's mode of describing heaven. There is a peculiar ecstasy associated with mountain tops, even to the most prosaic.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

MOURNING.—Mourning is primarily the expression of sorrow for the dead; but the term is also applied to the grief over sin and to the distress over calamity.

1. A list of mourning customs among the Hebrews will be found in the art. 'Mourning' in HDB. Among them are weeping and wailing of an intentionally demonstrative and unrestrained kind, the rending of garments, the wearing of sackcloth, the sprinkling of dust and ashes on the head, the striking of breast and head, fasting, ejaculations of woe, the recital of elegies for the departed. Reference is made to several of these customs in the description given in Rev 18 of the mourning over the destruction of Babylon. The worldly kings, the merchants and mariners, act as mourners: they weep and wail, cast dust upon their heads, utter exclamations of woe, and in turn dirgefully declare the past glories of the fallen (v. 10¹⁴). The term κόπτεον (used in Ac 8 to indicate the lamentation of the devout men over Stephen; cf. κόπονται [Rev 17 18⁹]; derivation, κόπτειν, 'to strike') indicates the association of the beating of head and breast with mourning. In Ac 9³⁶ the widows gather round the body of Dorcas, weep and recount her good deeds. In Ja 5¹ the rich are bidden to weep and howl, i.e. as wailing mourners.

2. The Pauline version of the eucharist introduces the words, 'Do this in remembrance of me' (εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν), and the rite is regarded as a proclamation of the Lord's death till He come (1 Co 11-14²⁶). This language suggests a comparison with the customs of commemorative mourning for the dead (cf. the annual lamentation for Jephthah's daughter [Jg 11⁴⁰]; see art. 'Jahrzeit' in JE). If the Pauline version of the eucharist has been influenced by the mysteries, the mourning customs for Attis and Adonis ('weeping for Tammuz,' see J. G. Frazer's Adonis, Attis, Osiris, 1914) may not be without significance for the study of this feature of the Lord's Supper.

3. The gravity with which sin was regarded is suggested by the application of terms of mourning to the grief over transgression. Sinners are bidden, as a sign of humble penitence, to be afflicted, mourn, and weep. Laughter is to be turned to mourning (Ja 4⁹; cf. 1 K 1²⁷). Among the welcome indications of a repentant Corinthian church is its mourning (ᾄδωνος [2 Co 7⁷]). The idea in the writer's mind in Rev 17 ('Behold, he cometh with the clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they that pierced him, and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn over him') was probably the mourning of guilt, regret, and shame—there was no need to mourn a living Christ returning in glory. Possibly, however, the words indicate that now all nations recognized that the ignominiously crucified One was worthy of a world's mourning.

4. National calamity is presented under the figure of a bereavement (cf. the mourning for Israel [Jl 1⁸⁻¹³]). Babylon in her strength boasts, 'No widow am I, and shall in no wise see mourning' (Rev 18⁷). In a day she knows the widowhood of retributive disaster (v. 8). The representation changes—widowed Babylon is herself mourned for by others (vv. 8-19); see 1.

5. The emphasis placed by the early Church on the overthrow of death as an elemental power by the resurrection of Jesus, on the certainty of a future life, the conception of a fuller, richer existence beyond the grave—a 'clothing upon' rather than a stripping of personality—all tended to rob death of its sting and the grave of its victory. The believer had no need to sorrow as did the rest that had no hope. On the other hand, it is significant that the parting of St. Paul from his children in the faith at Miletus, who expected to see him no more, was with loud lamentation (Ac 20³⁶), and the Apostle felt that the severance from the brethren at Caesarea was breaking his heart (21¹³). Faith lights up the tomb, but does not make the human heart unnatural. Human grief 'will have way' until, as in the Apocalyptic vision, God shall wipe away all tears from men's eyes, and death and mourning shall be no more (Rev 21⁴).

H. BULCOCK.

result of the particularization to which graphic description tends, especially in the Oriental world (e.g. Ac 3⁵ 11⁸, He 11³, Rev 3¹⁶). We may usually, however, trace the influence of Hebrew psychology, which ascribed psychical or ethical quality even to peripheral organs, regarding them as constituent parts of the unity of personality (cf. H. W. Robinson, in Mansfield College Essays, 1909, p. 275). Isaiah's lips were purged of their uncleanness by the coal from the altar (Is 6⁷); with this we may compare the command of the high priest to smite St. Paul on the mouth (Ac 23)—a command prompted by the apparent blasphemy of which that organ had been guilty. The same idea underlies the demand that the mouths of evil speakers be stopped (1¹ 11, ἐπιστομίσειν; cf. Ro 3¹⁹ and the contrasted statement of 2 Co 6¹¹). Even in such purely imaginative descriptions as those of Christ seen in vision, with the sword proceeding from His mouth (Rev 1¹⁶, etc.; cf. 2 Th 2⁸), or of the frog-vomiting mouths of the three evil powers in the Apocalypse (16¹³), the latent psychology helps to explain the harshness of the metaphor. 'The mouth as the organ of speech, the chief source of human influence, is frequently in the Apocalypse the instrument of good or evil' (H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, 1907, p. 207).^{*} The detached ethical quality of the organ of speech gives added force to such apostolic words as 'mortify your members . . . put away . . . shameful speaking out of your mouth' (Col 3⁸⁻⁹); 'in their mouth was found no lie' (Rev 14⁵); 'out of the same mouth cometh forth blessing and cursing' (Ja 3¹⁰); 'the poison of asps is under their lips' (Ro 3¹⁸ = Ps 140³).

In apostolic writings, the mouth has a three-fold function in regard to the proclamation of truth—viz. revelation, evangelization, and confession. It was the instrument of the original revelation of the OT, given, e.g., through the 'mouth' of David (Ac 1¹⁶ 4²⁵) or of the prophets (3¹⁸⁻¹⁹). It is the instrument of gospel-preaching (Ac 15⁷, Eph 6¹⁹; cf. Odes of Solomon, xlii. 6), and the Epistle of Barnabas claims that 'every word, which shall come forth from you through your mouth in faith and love, shall be for the conversion and hope of many' (xi. 8). It is the instrument of that confession which is necessary in order to unite the whole personality, body and soul, with its Redeemer: 'the word is nigh thee, in thy mouth . . . with the mouth confession is made unto salvation' (Ro 10⁸⁻¹⁰). This confession elsewhere appears as 'a sacrifice of praise,' 'the fruit of lips which make confession to his name' (He 13¹⁵; cf. Is 57¹⁹ and the LXX of Hos 14-). The unity of outer word and inner experience in the case of the true Christian is frequently emphasized in the Odes of Solomon, e.g. xxi. 7: 'my heart ran over and was found in my mouth: and it arose upon my lips.' On the other hand, the painful contrast possible between the spoken testimony and the real character of the life was not absent even from these early Christian communities; e.g. Hermas speaks of those 'that have the Lord on their lips, while their heart is hardened' (Mand. xii. iv. 4; cf. Sim. ix. xxi. 1, 1 Clem. xv. 2, 2 Clem. iii. 4).

See also artt. MAN and TONGUE.

H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

MURDER.—The prevalence of murder was one of the dark facts in the social and political background of the early Apostolic Church. Fanaticism of a fierce and ruthless type was in the air, and human life was frequently as little regarded as is normal under such conditions. The resentment of the Zealots against the authority of Rome was a

MOUTH, LIPS.—As in the OT, the mouth (στόμα) and lips (χεῖλη) are sometimes named simply as a persistent fact in the situation from the third decade to the final catastrophe in A.D. 70, and when cruelty and oppression were carried to excess by Felix it was inevitable that there should arise in opposition a body of extremists to whom murder was merely a detail in a policy.

^{*} In Rev 10⁹⁻¹⁰ the mouth is the organ of taste; according to the curious statement of Ep. Barn. x. 8, the weasel conceives through her mouth.

Thus during the time of Felix and Festus there arose the Sicarii (see ASSASSINS), whose Jewish patriotism took a murderous shape. Their weapons were daggers (sicæ; cf. Latin sicarius, 'a murderer.' The law passed under Sulla against murderers was Lex Cornelia de Sicariis). Armed with these, they moved with stealth through the crowds at festival seasons, seeking to remove their opponents by assassination. Then, in order to turn aside any possible suspicion, they gave way to loud expressions of grief. We find a reference to this group in Ac 21³⁸, where the chief captain (ὁ χιλιάρχος), finding that St. Paul speaks Greek, asks: 'Art thou not then that Egyptian, which before these days stirred up to sedition and led out into the wilderness the four thousand men of the Assassins (τετρακισχιλίους ἀνδρας τῶν σικαρίων)?' The Sicarii must have been the easy instrument at hand to every clever impostor, and the incident referred to here was the most notable example. An Egyptian Jew gave himself out as a prophet and held out to a crowd in the wilderness the alluring promise that the walls of Jerusalem would fall down at his word and so make the city theirs once more. Felix, however, put down the movement and took many prisoners. Josephus gives two accounts of this false prophet, in one of which (BJ II. xiii. 5) he says that the majority of the 30,000 followers were captured or slain, and in the other (Ant. XX. viii. 6) that four hundred were killed and two hundred taken prisoners.

That murder was not unknown even among those identified with the Church may be inferred from 1 P 4¹, where the writer addresses a warning to Christians. They are not to resent the fiery trial, but to rejoice as those sharing the sufferings of Christ—only 'Let none of you suffer as a murderer (ὡς φόνευσ).' In later days it was a commonplace of anti-Christian abuse to charge Christians with the horrors of child-slaying and cannibalism, but there seems to be no sufficient reason for reading into the passage quoted any reference to these charges. As C. Bigg has said, 'A Christian might quite well be guilty of murder. The times were wild, and conversions must often have been imperfect' (ICC, 'Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude,' Edinburgh, 1901, p. 177).

R. STRONG.

MURMURING.—The non-classical 'vernacular terms' (H. A. A. Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek, 1895, p. 33 ff.) γογγυσμός and γογγυζειν are used seven times in the LXX in reference to Israel in the wilderness. The verb is used in the same connexion in 1 Co 10¹⁰—'Neither murmur ye, as some of them murmured, and perished by the destroyer,' the allusion being apparently to the rebellion of Korah against the authority of Moses and Aaron, which was followed by the punishment of violent death (Nu 16). The OT reference and the evil of partisanship which had become conspicuous at Corinth (1 Co 1¹² 3⁴ 4⁶ 18¹) suggest that the 'murmuring' the Apostle had in mind was that of schismatic discontent in the Church, rather than that of complaint against Providence because of the limitations of the human lot—the sense which the term most naturally suggests to us.

The second Pauline passage where the term occurs ('Do all things without murmurings and disputations' [Ph 2¹⁴]), follows an appeal for Church harmony (vv. 1-4; cf. 4-) and is obviously a warning similar to that of 1 Co 10¹⁰. The quotation from the Song of Moses (Dt 32⁵ LXX) in the following verses hints that the history in the wilderness is again in the author's mind.

The 'murmurers' of Jude's letter (v. 16) are the false teachers who have crept into the Church and are fostering discontent for their own advantage, challenging (Church) authority and railing at 'dignities' (v. 8). Again there is a reference to the incident of Korah (v. 11).

The murmuring of the Grecian Jews against the Hebrews (Ac 6¹)—a complaint against Church administration—is the only instance where murmuring has not a conspicuous reproach. Even here the language of the Apostles (vv. 7-9) may hint censure.

In 1 P 4⁹ ('using hospitality one to another without murmuring') the reference appears to be to the grumbling against the obligation, imposed by Church tradition, of mutual hospitality among Christians (cf. the communistic spirit of Ac 2⁴⁴). The AV translation 'without grudging' (so also Weymouth) misses the above significance.

The term thus appears to have been used by the NT writers in a specific sense (suggested by the classical instance of Korah) of disloyalty in one way or another to the Church, its traditions, its harmony and unity. 1 Co 10¹⁰ and Jude 16 suggest that, as in the case of Korah, such murmurings are really against God Himself. H. BULCOCK.

MUSIC.—See PRAISE, and artt. on various Musical Instruments.

MYRA (Μύρα, a neut. plur.; often written Μύρρα, as in B).—Myra was 'a city of Lycia' (Ac 27⁵), situated on a hill 2½ miles from the sea (Strabo, XIV. iii. 7), and the name often included the seaport of Andriaca. In the time of the Ptolemys, Myra shared with other Lycian towns the benefits of a great maritime traffic which was developed between Egypt and Asia Minor; and when Rome became mistress of the world, the conditions of navigation in the Mediterranean made Myra a place of growing importance. The corn-ships of Alexandria, which brought food to the population of Rome, were in the habit of sailing due north to Lycia, making Myra a place of call, and then proceeding westward. This long route was the shortest in the end. Instead of sailing straight for Italy, and, in doing so, contending with the westerly winds which prevail in the Eastern Mediterranean during the summer months, it was better seamanship to make for the S.W. of Asia Minor, and then get under the protection of the south coast of Crete. When, therefore, the centurion who brought St. Paul from Cæsarea found an Alexandrian corn-ship in the harbour of Myra, about to continue her course to Italy, this was no surprising occurrence. It was not an unlucky event which made a disastrous change in his plans, as T. Lewin suggests (*The Life and Epistles of St. Paul*³, 1875, ii. 187). It was exactly what he had expected. Before he began his voyage he no doubt calculated on being able to trans-ship into one of the vessels of that great fleet of corn-ships which linked the names of Alexandria and Myra in the common talk of all men of the sea.

St. Nicholas, one of the bishops of Myra, became the patron saint of Levantine sailors. Myra was still an important city in the Middle Ages, being known as the portus Adriatici maris when 'the Adriatic' included the whole Levant.

Both Myra, which is now called Dembre, and Andriaca have some interesting ruins.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 298 f.; E. Petersen and F. v. Luschan, Reisen in Lykien, Milyas und Kibyratis, Vienna, 1893. JAMES STRAHAN.

MYSIA (Μυσία).—Mysia was an ill-defined country in the N.W. of Asia Minor, having the Ægean, the Hellespont, and the Propontis on the W. and N., Bithynia on the N.E., and the equally ill-defined regions of Phrygia and Mysia on the S.E. and S. The absence of landmarks between the land of the Mysians and that of the Phrygians gave rise to the saying, χωρίς τα Μυσῶν καὶ Φρυγῶν ὁρίσματα. 'The reason is this: strangers who came into the country were soldiers and barbarians; they had no fixed settlement in the country of which they obtained possession, but were, for the most part, wanderers, expelling others from their territory and being expelled themselves' (Strabo, XII. iv. 4). For the most part a mountainous country, Mysia was not so productive as Lydia and Caria. It was sometimes regarded as including the Troad in the W., sometimes as separated therefrom by the river Æsepus. The river Caicus and Mount Temnos were usually taken as the southern limits, and the district of Phrygia Epictetus, which extends a considerable distance eastward—as far as Dorylæum and Nakoleia—was at one time in the hands of the Mysians. The Romans, who showed little regard for ethnical distinctions, absorbed Mysia in the great province of Asia.

Mysia is referred to in an important but difficult passage of Acts (16⁸). St. Paul and Silas, having in the second missionary tour 'come over against Mysia' (ἐλθόντες κατὰ τὴν Μυσίαν), were restrained by the Spirit of Jesus from going into Bithynia; whereupon they turned westward, and 'passing by Mysia (παρελθόντες τὴν Μισίαν) they came down to Troas' (Ac 16⁸). For a discussion of the vexed question as to the apostles' movements before they came to the borders of Bithynia and over against Mysia see PHRYGIA and GALATIA. Assuming that St. Paul and Silas were travelling from Pisidian Antioch northward through Phrygian Asia, Ramsay observes that they would be 'over against Mysia' when they reached such a point that a line drawn across the country at right angles to the general line of their route would touch Mysia (The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 75n.). This point would be the city of Dorylæum. From there they turned due westward, and, 'passing by,' or neglecting, Mysia—this does not mean passing along its borders, but going straight through it without pausing to do any evangelistic work in it—they came down to the Ægean. The other reading, διελθόντες, preferred by Blass despite its weak authority (D and Vulgate), seems in Acts and the Pauline Epistles invariably to designate a missionary tour, which is in this case out of the question, as the apostles have just been forbidden to preach in Asia (Ac 16⁹). The distance from Dorylæum to Troas is about 240 miles. The route would lead through the valley of the Rhyndacus and the town of Apameia, where there is a local tradition of a Pauline visit (Expt x. [1898-99] 495). JAMES STRAHAN.

MYSTERY, MYSTERIES. — 1. Meaning and usage.—The word 'mystery' (μυστήριον) is derived from the Greek μνῆν, 'to initiate'; but it is also connected with μνῆν, 'to shut the eyes or the mouth.' Consequently it stands for rites and truths which must be closely guarded by those who possess them. J. E. Harrison (Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion, Cambridge, 1903, p. 154) ventures to suggest as its source μύσος, 'pollution.' And, since in her judgment the aim of the mysteries is primarily purification, the μύσος, or pollution, from which the liberation is desired, gives the ceremonies of purification their name. But this derivation restricts the compass of the word, and leaves its use in the Scriptures unintelligible. Whence did it come into Christian use? Was it taken over from pagan sources, or did it reach the writers of the NT and of the early Christian literature through Jewish channels? There is sufficient ground to decide for the latter view. The word occurs several times in the LXX (e.g. in Dn 218, 19, 27, 28, 29, 30, 47, 48) — it meets us again in some of the apocryphal books (Sir 3²², 22²², 27¹⁶, Wis 2²² 6²², To 12⁷, Jth 2³, 2 Mac 13-1). In these passages the word is applied to dreams and their interpretation, or else to the political and military plans of the king which have not been divulged. These plans are the king's secrets, which no one should know until he has revealed them or put them in operation (G. Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 144; Hans von Soden, ZNTW xii. [1911] 197). Von Soden says that without doubt the passages in the book of Daniel suggest the origin of the NT use of μυστήριον, 'mystery.' The idea of the king's secrets becomes that of God's secrets, the plans of God, which remain hidden until He reveals them. This is already apparent in the Book of Enoch (ciii. 2, civ. 10, cvi. 19). In the Gospels the word occurs in this sense. But singularly it is found in only one Synoptic passage (Mk 4¹¹, Mt 13³⁵, Lk 8¹⁰), which, according to Carl Clemen, contains no word of the Lord (Der Einfluss der Mysterienreligionen, p. 24), whereas in the Fourth Gospel, which some critics view as the most Hellenistic of all the Gospels, it is not found at all. From this solitary occurrence we may infer that the word had no attraction for the writers as a means for expressing their thought. But evidently it had a charm for St. Paul. He uses it 21 times in his Epistles, of which 1 Corinthians, Ephesians, and Colossians give us by far the largest number of examples. In every case the word retains its LXX meaning, which leads Von Soden to affirm that St. Paul did not borrow the word from the Greek, but from Jewish sources. It may have already become characteristic of Jewish eschatology, but Von Soden intimates that it was now a term of Jewish Christian theology which St. Paul both used and developed still further (see A. Schweitzer, Geschichte der paulinischen Forschung, Tübingen, 1911, p. 141 ff.). It is possible that St. Paul made this term conspicuous in his Epistles in order to oppose it to the same term as used in the mystery-religions. But it has yet to be demonstrated that he was familiar with their thought, terms, and rites. W. M. Ramsay's fine discussion of the matter in his Teaching of Paul in Terms of the Present Day, London, 1913, pp. 283-305, needs more proofs than those given by him to carry conviction. The only one of the mysteries prevalent in St. Paul's sphere of work was the Attis-cult, but he gives no hint of a knowledge of it save in the obscure passage in Col 2 discussed by Ramsay.

The word occurs in the early Church Fathers with noticeable infrequency. It is absent in the writings of Clement, Barnabas, and Hermas. It appears three times in the Epistles of Ignatius (ad Eph. xix. 1, ad Magn. ix. 1-3, ad Trall. ii. 3) and twice this number in the anonymous Epistle to Diognetus (iv. 6, vii. 1-2, viii. 10, x. 7, xi. 2, 5). In the Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, it occurs only once (xi. 11). In these passages μυστήριον is no central conception and no sacrament, although T. Zahn explains the term 'mysteries' in Ignatius, ad Trall. ii. 3, as baptism and the Lord's Supper (Ignatius von Antiochien, Gotha, 1873, p. 323)—an explanation rejected by both Lightfoot and Srawley. The mysteries are in the main the Incarnation and the Atonement of Christ.

The Apologists using the word took another step. In the writings of Aristides, Athenagoras, and Tatian the word is wanting; but in Justin it occurs many times, and usually signifies not any particular rite, but 'the whole complex of religion' in which the Passion of Christ pre-eminently appears (Apol. i. 13; Dial. 74, 91, 106, 121). It is placed by him on the same plane with symbol or parable or type, a usage which continues until the time of Augustine. The serpent is a mystery or symbol (Apol. i. 27); a prophecy is a mystery: 'that which God said to David symbolically [ἐν μυστηρίῳ] was interpreted by Isaiah as to how it would actually come to pass' (Dial. 68, quoted by E. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, Oxford, 1889, p. 60). Justin, however, does not go much beyond his predecessors except to emphasize cosmological and ethical aspects. But he is the first to compare the Christian μυστήριον in its individual features with the pagan mysteries (Apol. i. 66; cf. i. 25, 27). This was ominous, for it tended to weaken the idea that the Christian mystery is peculiar and distinct, although Justin shows in his condemnation of the pagan rite that he had no thought of bringing about this result.

Irenæus uses the term in a Gnostic sense. It stands for what he calls 'these portentous and profound mysteries,' against which he writes his famous work, c. Hæreses. Therefore little light is thrown by him on the word 'mystery' as it was used in the early Church. However, from him is drawn much of the information which enables us to determine to some extent the Gnostic conception of 'mystery.' Apparently he represents it as magical in character (see, e.g., Hæc. i. xiii. 2). The Gnostic conception is important, for it is regarded by some as introducing the change of the idea of mystery in the Christian Church. Carl Schmidt, Harnack, and others view the sacramentalism of Gnosticism as an anticipation of Christian sacramentalism. But to this Catholicism replies that the relationship was just the reverse, and, therefore, that Gnostic sacramentalism found its source in the sacramental ideas of the Church (Schmidt, TU viii. [1892] 525; A. Struckmann, Die Gegenwart Christi, Vienna, 1905, p. 97; CQR xlii. [1896] 412). Neither position has thus far been sufficiently substantiated to carry conviction.

Two great writers at the end of the 2nd cent. did exercise a marked influence on the Christian conception of 'mystery.' One was Clement of Alexandria, who brought the Christian sacramental idea still nearer to that of the pagan cults. Von Soden affirms that 'with him an essential extension and a hellenizing change of the use of μυστήριον begins' (ZNTIV xii. 205), and E. Bratke in his article 'Die Stellung des Clem. Alex. zum antiken Mysterienwesen,' in SK lx. [1887] i. 647 is an ardent advocate of the same belief. Anrich takes a similar view but is more cautious in his support of it (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 140). From the time of Clement the Christian sacraments began to be called the Christian mysteries; and, while it is possible that they already bore this name, the influence of Clement's writings must have done much to establish it. He speaks of Christ as initiating us into the mysteries, and quotes from Euripides, Bacchæ, 470-473: 'Seeing those who see he bestows his mysteries. Of what fashion are these mysteries? Secret except to the initiate' (Strom. iv. 25). Christianity is the true Divine mystery, a mystical miracle; consequently the Church is an institution of mysteries (Protrept. 11). We, as perfected Christians, are permitted by Jesus to communicate 'those divine mysteries' and 'that holy light' to persons capable of receiving them (Strom. i. 1). In the same chapter Clement says that 'there are some mysteries before other mysteries.' He also draws a direct parallel between Christianity on one side and the Eleusinian and Dionysiac cults on the other (Protrept. 12). Clement had no intention, as Bratke seems to imply (SK lx. 662; cf. Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 140), of breaking down all demarcations between Christianity and heathenism, nor was he bent on an accommodation of one to the other. But his use of mystery terminology, which he probably drew from the philosophy of his day rather than directly from the cults, must have affected the Christian conception of mystery and given it the idea of a secrecy that could be uncovered only to the initiated. His doctrine of the sacraments is still a matter of dispute; especially is his view of the Lord's Supper difficult to determine. Almost all the Protestant historians of dogma deny that he believes in a real presence of the body and blood of Christ within and under the consecrated elements. Catholic theologians confidently attribute to him this belief (C. Bigg, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria, Oxford, 1913, p. 105; A. Harnack, History of Dogma, ii. [London, 1896] 145; Struckmann, Die Gegenwart Christi, p. 117; P. Batiffol, L'Eucharistie, Paris, 1913, pp. 248-261).

The other great writer who exercised a marked influence on the Christian conception of 'mystery' was Tertullian. He accepted the term sacramentum as the Latin rendering of μυστήριον. The earliest use of the Latin word in connexion with Christian life occurs in one of Pliny's letters (Ep. x. 96 [97]) wherein he speaks of the Christians as binding themselves by an oath ('seque sacramento . . . obstringere'). But Pliny's use of the term throws no light on its ecclesiastical meaning, for ecclesiastical Latin had not yet come into existence (E. C. S. Gibson, The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England, London, 1896-97, vol. ii. p. 594). The adherents of the mystery-religions were familiar with the word as designating their rites of initiation, particularly the oath of allegiance taken at some point in them. It would be hazardous to state dogmatically how early the word took its place among their religious terms. But 'the votaries of Mithra likened the practice of their religion to military service. When the neophyte joined he was compelled to take an oath (sacramentum) similar to the one required of recruits in the army' (F. Cumont, Oriental Religions, p. xix). Livy records in his history of Rome the recognition, on the part of the Romans, of the use of the sacramentum in the mysteries. In a speech of one of the consuls condemning the Bacchanalian rites, the consul asks, 'Can you think that youths, initiated under such oaths as theirs, are fit to be made soldiers?' ('hoc sacramento initiatos juvenes milites faciendos censetis?', xxxix. 15; cf. x. 38). As an element in mystery terminology sacramentum would naturally assume a religious significance, and we understand why its use in the cults awoke hostile suspicions of them among the Romans of the Republic and the early Empire. Even Tertullian occasionally applies the word to the rites of the mystery-religions (adv. Marc. i. 13, adv. Valent. 30, Scorp. 10). Thus its association with the mysteries and its resulting religious character might easily suggest it as a rendering of μυστήριον itself. Points of contact between the two terms would become apparent (F. Kattenbusch, art. 'Sakrament' in PRE³ xvii. 250). And this must have happened speedily, for sacramentum represents μυστήριον in the old Latin texts, with some of which Tertullian was evidently familiar. But he himself employed the term in a varied application. On the one hand, he applied it to types and prophecies in the OT (adv. Marc. iii. 18, iv. 40; adv. Jud. 9, 10, 11, and many other passages in these two works). In this use it is purely a translation of the biblical μυστήριον. On the other hand, he employed it very frequently in the sense of an oath of allegiance or an obligation (de Cor. Mil. 11, adv. Valent. 30). Between these two applications all other uses of the word fall—namely, as designating baptism, the Eucharist, the rule of faith, salvation, and religion itself. Nothing could show more clearly that the word is not always a strict rendering of 'mystery,' and Tertullian at times seems to have realized this himself.

But how did sacramentum come to have the significance of obligation and pledge? Two conceptions are implied in the term: (1) that of a deposit of money, given by persons about to engage in a law-suit, relinquished to the deity by the loser, and thereby becoming actually a sacred or devoted thing; (2) that of the military oath of allegiance taken on the standard. The idea of sacred obligation is thus common to both conceptions. The two were brought closer together by the payment of award for military service (Tacitus, Hist. i. lv. 2). Thus sacramentum as a military oath assumed the meaning of a sacred bond between the pledge-giver and the pledge-receiver. This characteristic was carried into the significance of sacrament in the terminology of the Church and gave her sacramental rites the nature of pledges. But the idea embodied in μυστήριον was still retained, so that sacramentum became as well the outward sign of an inward meaning or a spiritual grace. From this it is apparent that sacramentum has a wider and more varied meaning than the Greek term, which it, rather than arcanum, was chosen to represent.

The full conception held by Tertullian of the sacraments is still a debated question. G. Thomasius (*Die christliche Dogmengeschichte*², Erlangen, 1886-89, i. 425), Harnack (History of Dogma, ii. 145, n. 2), and Roman Catholic theologians (Struckmann, Die Gegenwart Christi, p. 229 ff.) attribute to him realistic views, while the great majority of Protestant theologians believe that he held symbolical conceptions. But Harnack is quite sure that 'Leimbach's investigations of Tertullian's use of words have placed this [that Tertullian did not accept a symbolical doctrine] beyond doubt.'

2. The kinds of mystery-religions.—The mystery-religions differed from each other in various ways. Some were State religions, such as the mysteries of Eleusis, near Athens, and the mysteries of Samothrace, an island in the Thracian Sea. Others, enjoying no State recognition, were celebrated in secret associations by private individuals. To the latter class the Orphic mysteries and the mysteries of certain Oriental gods belong. Again, some centred about a male, others about a female divinity. The mysteries of Mithras constitute an example of the former, the mysteries of Cybele and Attis, and the mysteries of Isis, examples of the latter. Miss Harrison remarks (Prolegomena, p. 150 f.) that 'in general mysteries seem to occur more usually in relation to the cult of women divinities, of heroines and earth-goddesses,' which is a well-supported statement. In the majority of the cults the female deity plays the chief part; the male deity, Attis, or Adonis, or Osiris, occupies an inferior position. This may be explained by the assumption that the ceremonies of these cults had their remote source in pre-historic rites which were intended to renew the strength of the harvest field and enable it to produce abundant returns. Consequently Mother Earth, with her vegetation unfolding in the spring and disappearing in the autumn, was prominent in the primitive days, and retained her pre-eminence in the persons of the Egyptian Isis, the Phœnician Astarte, the Phrygian Cybele, and the Greek Demeter, although J. G. Frazer (*GB*³, pt. v., Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild, London, 1912, i. 40) distinguishes Demeter from Mother Earth. We reach here a striking contrast between the cults on the one side and Christianity on the other. While the pagan deity had his female associate, the Christ of the Christian in the earlier centuries was wholly unaccompanied. It was not until 400 years had elapsed that Mary the Virgin assumed a position in which her relation to Christ could feebly suggest the old association of female and male deities in the mysteries.

In many other respects the mysteries differed from one another. Dissimilarities marked off those of Eleusis from those of Isis; and the mysteries of Mithras possessed a genius or spirit of their own. And yet they were united in one purpose and aim. They were essentially similar; so that they mutually recognized each other and excluded no one on the ground that he belonged to another cult or compelled him on his initiation into the new to relinquish his membership in the old cult. Together they were supposed to confer on the initiate protection against danger, to bring healing to his infirmities, and to assure him of a happy pilgrimage through this world and a blessed immortality in the next. The question of the moral inspiration of the mysteries has been for some time, a centre of earnest discussion. Eminent scholars are in disagreement here. So great an authority as E. Rohde (Psyche, Freiburg i. B., 1894, i. 298-300) believes that the pagan cults were not uplifting in their effect on the initiate. Others, as H. Lietzmann (An die Römer [= Handbuch zum NT, ii.], Tübingen, 1906, on Ro 6¹⁻⁴) and K. H. E. de Jong (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 69), are equally positive in the belief that the moral effect of the mysteries was elevating and helpful. The fact that the mysteries were pre-eminently ritualistic and formal would support the former view. Their rites of initiation appear to have been regarded as fully capable of accomplishing all that was necessary to bring their subject into union with the deity. Amid such conceptions it is likely that little emphasis would be laid on the need of an upright moral life as an aid. On the other hand, the impressive and, in some respects, beautiful ceremonies would have their influence on the mind and heart of the candidates. It is possible that revolting features characterized the ceremonies of some of the cults. But, if such features, relics of the old Nature religions, accompanied the ceremonial, they were offset by others fitted to exercise an uplifting power. Isis herself was viewed and extolled as the guardian of chastity; and consequently her initiations could have been no stimulation to a careless life. The testimony of the early Christian writers, however, and even of Flavius Josephus (Ant. XVIII. iii. 4), concerning the moral tone of the mysteries should not be contemptuously dismissed. Granted that they were inclined to exaggerate the dark side of the ceremonial of the pagan cults, they can hardly be charged with complete falsification of their true character. On the whole, it is highly probable that Rohde was nearer the truth in his unfavourable estimation of the soundness of the moral tendencies of the mysteries.

(a) The mysteries of Eleusis.—Of the State cults the most famous were the mysteries of Eleusis and of Samothrace. The Eleusinian mysteries existed for at least 1,000 years, and were brought to an end in A.D. 395 by Alaric. The oldest documentary evidence of their existence is contained in the Hymn to Demeter (v. 274, 473-482), which may have been composed as early as the 7th cent. B.C. This poem narrates the story of the search of Demeter for her lost daughter Persephone, who while gathering flowers in a lonely field had been seized by Pluto and enthroned as his wife in his subterranean realm. Demeter, indignant at the outrage, checked the sprouting of sown grain and deprived the farmer of his harvest until her daughter should be restored to her. The rich fields lay desolate until Zeus, fearing lest the people should perish with hunger, commanded Pluto to surrender his bride to her mother. The unscrupulous ruler obeyed, but craftily induced Persephone to swallow the seed of the pomegranate, whose magic properties would compel her annually to come back to him and remain in the under world for a part of the year. Consequently Persephone returned to the world from which she had been stolen, and Demeter in her joy released the powers of the seed, and taught the happy Eleusinians her sacred rites and mysteries. The myth clearly had its origin in a time when men were used to deify the energies of the vegetable world, and to see in its springing life the embodiment of the deity herself. The gender of the deity was determined by causes which are still the sport of speculation; but in the Eleusinian mysteries the corn deity was a goddess, Demeter, who, originally solitary in her glory, was subsequently associated with a second goddess, Kore or Persephone. Demeter may have been the original Mother Earth, but Frazer (*GB*³, pt. v., Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild, i. 41), on the alleged authority of the Hymn to Demeter, regards her as separate from Mother Earth and as exclusively the personification of the ripened and harvested grain; while Kore represents the grain in its sown and sprouting state. As the corn goddess, reappearing from the soil, Kore naturally was related to Demeter as offspring and daughter, and appropriately received her celebration and worship in the early spring. But the perplexities which attend the myths will be dissipated only when the mythology of the old Ægean or Minoan civilization, which is just coming into view, is better known, for the myth of Demeter and the myth of Kore probably have their roots in it.

At the time of the composition of the hymn, Eleusis was a petty independent State, and celebrated its mysteries without the co-operation of the neighbouring Athens. Its government then was in the hands of a ruler who combined in himself the powers of both priest and king, and who always belonged to the family of the Eumolpidæ descended from Eumolpus, a supposed Thracian soldier and immigrant described in the hymn as founding the mysteries under the instructions of Demeter herself. As a result of the conquest of Eleusis by Athens the mysteries became the ruling cult of the whole of Attica, and subsequently, through the supremacy of Athens, the chief cult of the Greek world. But the conservatism of religion kept it centred at Eleusis and under the supervision of the Eumolpidæ. The hierophant, or revealer and interpreter of the sacred objects, was always chosen from this family, and was the object of such profound reverence that the mention of his name during his lifetime was a legal offence. The qualifications required for his election were advanced age, personal charm, and a beautiful voice, which was needed particularly for the recitation of the sacred formulae. As second in rank, another priestly family, that of the Kerykes or 'Heralds,' shared the authority of the Eumolpidæ. They were also the 'torch-bearers,' symbolizing under this term the search of Demeter for her lost daughter in the under world. These two families, the latter belonging to Athens, worked together for several centuries directing the mysteries, and apparently continuing in their co-operation the ancient council of Eleusis. With them were associated priestesses, few in number, belonging to the family of the Phillidæ and enjoying a dignity almost equal to that of the priests themselves, and performing functions of an important character. But the enumeration of these individuals does not exhaust the official life of the cult. For there were several officers, four in all, who were not of the priestly circle; they were chosen by the people of Attica, and had under their care the financial affairs of the cult. Yet this arrangement did not exclude the priestly families, for one of their number must always be a member of the financial committee. The polity of the mysteries is noticeable, for it had no influence on the polity of the Christian Church. Bratke, who believes that the mysteries, through the writings of Clement of Alexandria, strongly influenced the sacramental life of the Church, excludes their influence in relation to the official ordering of the Church (SK lx. 695 ff.). It is singular that, if their influence was so potent in her sacramental sphere, it should have failed to extend its activity to her polity also. But no sign of this activity is perceptible in the ecclesiastical official life. The Christian deaconess might be designated as corresponding to the Eleusinian priestess. But women performed important religious functions everywhere in the Western religious world, both in the State cults and in the mystery-religions, except the cult of Mithras; and it is quite in keeping with their general recognition that they should assume some prominence in Christian worship. They held in the primitive Church, however, a position far less official than that allotted to the pagan priestess, and it was only after the lapse of several centuries that the deaconess acquired her limited sacerdotal character.

As a primary stage of initiation into the mysteries at Eleusis, mysteries were celebrated in the month of February at Agra, a suburb of Athens. Our information concerning their rise, their ceremonial, and their mystic significance is very defective. It is probable that they were once exclusively Athenian, and on the incorporation of Eleusis became subordinated to the Eleusinian rites. Clement of Alexandria calls them the 'minor mysteries which have some foundation of instruction and of preliminary preparation for what is to come after,' namely, the great mysteries at Eleusis (Strom. v. 11). The goddess who presided over them appears to have been exclusively Kore or Persephone, the daughter of Demeter. We learn from Hippolytus, a writer of the 3rd cent., that 'the inferior mysteries are those of Proserpine [Persephone] below' (Philos. v. 3). The scholiast on the Plutus of Aristophanes (845) also tells us that 'in the course of the year two sets of mysteries are performed to Demeter and Kore—the greater were of Demeter, the lesser of Persephone, her daughter,' although the genuineness of this passage is subject to doubt. Dionysus, also, was a sharer in the mysteries, and was known by the name of Iacchos. On the Ninion Pinax, a monument dedicated by a woman named Ninion to the 'Two Goddesses,' he is represented as a full-grown man and as the bearer of the torch. Apparently he has no essential connexion with the mysteries, especially at Eleusis, and might be regarded as a visitor. The exact date of his entrance into the mysteries has not been determined. About these three deities the interest of the mysteries turns. On Demeter, Kore, and Iacchos the devotion of the worshippers is centred.

In the month of Boëdromion, early in the autumn (September), the initiation into the greater mysteries occurred. On the 13th of the month the ἐφηβοί, soldiers still in their young manhood, went out, armed with spear and shield, to Eleusis to bring back the 'holy things' to the Eleusinion, which lay at the foot of the Acropolis of Athens. The 'holy things' were really in charge of the priestess, and, on their arrival in Athens on the following day, they were met by the Athenian priests and magistrates. On the 15th of the month the real festival began. The candidates were assembled for initiation, and the order was proclaimed by the hierophant in the Stoa Poikile that no one of unclean hands or of unintelligible speech should share in the mysteries. Thus two classes of persons were rigorously excluded. The first was composed of those who had been guilty of murder or homicide. These were invariably denied admission to all cults. The second class was composed of barbarians, or else of persons with defective speech, which would prevent their pronouncing clearly and distinctly the sacred words. All others, including children, whatever their position in life might be, were eligible for the reception of the secret rites of Demeter. It has been doubted whether slaves were numbered among them, but the doubt is not well supported. No dogmatic questions were asked, as in the Samothracian mysteries, all being admitted without assent to confessions of any sort. The only requirement to which all alike were subjected was ceremonial purity. Consequently on the 16th of the month the candidates again assembled and began their march of six miles to the sea, shouting as they went, ἀλαδε μυσται, 'to the sea, ye mystics'. The salt waters of the mysterious ocean were supposed to possess great purifying powers, and a relic of the belief may be seen in the sacramental use of salt in Christian sacramental practice. Euripides (Iph. Taur. 1193) alludes to the belief in his words θάλασσα κλίζει πάντα τάνθρώπων κακά ('the sea washes away all evils of men'). Each candidate had provided himself with a young sacrificial pig which he drove before him, and on his arrival at the shore took it with him into the sea. Thus both were purified and the pig rendered fit for the sacrifice. The blood of the pig sprinkled on the candidate completed the purification, and the candidate himself, with head veiled, seated on a ram's skin and grasping a winnow, was ready for the initiation. But at this point the festival of Asclepius, the Epidauria, which had been recognized in Athens as early as 421 B.C. and which had no vital connexion with the initiation, intervened, and lasted throughout the 17th and 18th of the month. During its celebration the candidates for the Eleusinian mysteries remained quietly at home, while the interval gave an opportunity to late comers to begin their initiation, or to complete the initial ceremonies, if they had already realized a part of them. On the 19th day of the month, perhaps one of the most solemn in the celebration, the procession of purified candidates set out from the Eleusinion on its tedious march over the sacred way leading to Eleusis. It followed the sacred image of Iacchos, which was borne aloft before it, and it carried back to Eleusis the 'holy things' which the ἐφηβοί had brought to Athens. The number of those who composed it was comparatively great, sometimes 10,000 persons being in line; of course these could not all have been candidates, for the hall of initiation at Eleusis could not have contained so many. They were in part the initiated who accompanied the candidates and sang hymns in praise of Iacchos on the way, or at certain places indulged in coarse ribaldry and witticisms in order to hold aloof the evil spirits. On the evening of the 20th the mystics reached the 'holy city,' which they entered with flaming torches, and passed the following day in rest or in offering the sacrifice. Probably on the 22nd the initiation took place in the Telesterion, a large square building surrounded by thick walls to shield its secrets from prying eyes. It was set almost in the centre of an extensive enclosure, which contained the large and small propylæa or massive gateways, through which the candidates were conducted past the small temple of Pluto along the sacred way leading to the doors of the Telesterion. Seats of stone, partly hewn from the native rock and partly constructed, rose tier on tier around the hall with a capacity for accommodating about 3,000 persons. The original building of course did not have this magnitude, for the Telesterion was repeatedly rebuilt, each time on a larger scale. What part the outer buildings played in the initiation is not known. Possibly the descent of Kore into the under world and Demeter's search for her may have been represented in the temple of Pluto; but this is doubtful, for the ruins of the temple reveal no subterranean construction. It is more probable that the final initiation was begun, continued, and completed in the Telesterion. What the nature of the mystic ceremony was is not easy to determine. Clement of Alexandria tells us that 'Deo [mystic name for Demeter] and Persephone may have become the heroines of a mystic drama; and their wanderings, seizure, and grief Eleusis celebrates by torchlight processions' (Protrep. 2). Perhaps it would be precarious to take the word 'drama' literally. It may have had the character of a passion play, as L. R. Farnell suggests (EBr. xix. 120); or it may have expressed the rehearsal of the story of Demeter in the pantomimic dance accompanied by songs, sacramental words, and other ceremonies, as De Jong suggests (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 19f.). But beyond such conjectures we know nothing of the manner in which the experiences, of which Demeter and Kore were the subject, were presented. In some way they were rendered so vivid, solemn, and impressive amid the dim light as to lift the observer up into a consciousness of union, even of identity, with the immortal goddess. Nor do we know what the 'holy things' were which the hierophant revealed at the most solemn moment of the initiation. Farnell (EBr. xix. 120) suggests that they 'included certain primitive idols of the goddesses' and perhaps "'a cut corn-stalk.'" A. Dieterich (Eine Mithrasliturgie, Leipzig, 1903, p. 125) would find among them symbols significant of phallic worship. The presentation of the corn token rests on the authority of Hippolytus, who says that 'the Athenians, while initiating people into the Eleusinian rites, likewise display to those who are being admitted to the highest grade of these mysteries, the mighty, and marvellous, and most perfect secret suitable for one initiated into the highest mystic truths: [I allude to] an ear of corn in silence reaped' (Philos. v. 3). Hippolytus may not be trustworthy in his statement. But the majority of our authorities, such as Frazer, Farnell, and De Jong, are inclined to think that such a token was really shown. De Jong believes that the rendering of the words referring to it should be 'display . . . in silence a reaped ear of corn' (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 23, n. 1). Dieterich's suggestion of the presence of the phallic symbol rests on the retention of the old reading ἐργασάμενος, which C. A. Lobeck (Aglaophamus, p. 26) found unintelligible and changed to ἐργεσάμενος. His contention is that we have no right to alter a text, especially the text of a mystic formula, simply because we cannot understand it in its actual sense (Eine Mithrasliturgie, p. 125). If Dieterich's interpretation of the difficult term is correct, we can hardly regard this element in the Eleusinian mysteries as morally elevating, even taking into view its religious significance. It may be that at this point in the ceremonies a 'holy marriage' was celebrated in imitation of the marriage of Demeter and Zeus, or of Kore and Pluto. Its possibility rests mainly on the assertion of Asterius, who lived at the close of the 4th cent. and who briefly alludes to the act (Encomium in SS. Martyres [PG xl. 325]). De Jong seems to place great reliance on his witness (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 22), while Farnell regards the passage embodying it as doubtful. With this sacred marriage the words of Hippolytus may be connected: 'by night in Eleusis . . . [the hierophant] enacting the great and secret mysteries, vociferates and cries aloud, saying, "August Brimo has brought forth a consecrated son, Brimos," that is, a potent [mother has been delivered of] a potent child' (Philos. v. 3). Brimo is commonly believed to have been another name for Demeter; but Miss Harrison explains it as another name for the Thesalian Kore and designating in the Eleusinian mysteries simply a maiden (Prolegomena, p. 553). Brimos, the child, is understood by J. N. Svoronos ('Erklärung der Denkmäler des eleus. mystischen Kreises,' in Journal international d'archéologie numismatique, iv. [1901]) to be Pluto, by Dieterich to be Iacchos (Eine Mithrasliturgie, p. 138). Frazer attributes reality to this feature of the ceremonies, and explains it as magical, 'intended to make the fields wave with yellow corn' (*GB*³, pt. i., The Magic Art, London, 1911, ii. 138). If the 'holy marriage' really occurred in the mysteries, it must have been a relic of the old Nature-religions preserved in the cult and having the meaning which Frazer gives it. One more interesting feature of the mysteries of Demeter is the κυκεών, or sacred drink. Clement of Alexandria refers to it in the only confession he ascribes to the initiate: 'I have fasted, I have drunk the cup (κυκεών); I have received from the box; having done (having tasted) I put it into the basket, and out of the basket into the chest' (Protrept. 2). The κυκεών was a mixture of grain, water, and other ingredients, which was the first food that Demeter had taken after her long wanderings and fastings. Among these ingredients the sacramental wine must have been absent, for, while it was offered to other deities, it was not used in the cult of the underground gods (K. Kircher, Die sakrale Bedeutung des Weines im Altertum, Giessen, 1910, p. 21; P. Stengel, Opferbräuche der Griechen, Leipzig, 1910, p. 129). Stengel explains its absence on the ground that the chthonic cult reaches back to a remote time when the Greeks had not yet begun to cultivate the vine, and by reason of the conservatism of religion were disinclined, on the introduction of wine into use, to make any change in the practices of the religious cult. Moreover, the ancients were loath in their reverence for the chthonic deity to use anything which did not spring directly from the soil. However, the κυκεών was 'a sort of soup' (Miss Harrison, Prolegomena, p. 156) or 'a kind of thick gruel,' as Frazer describes it (*GB*³, pt. v., Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild, p. 161, n. 4). The part which it played in the progress of the ceremonies cannot be determined. But apparently it was not an important part, and therefore, in this respect, the κυκεών cannot be likened to the Lord's Supper. It was a feature of the experience of Demeter in her search for her daughter, and, as every feature of that experience was closely followed in the pantomime, the manner in which she broke her protracted fast would be imitated. It is quite possible that sharing in the sacred drink meant also a formal induction into the community life of the mysteries and a reinforcing of the bonds which were binding its new members to the old. More than this—e.g. that the reception of it implied a belief of the presence of the deity with, in, and under its elements—can hardly be claimed for it. On the 23rd day, the last day of the festival, the final ceremony was performed. The worshippers assembled and, casting water from two vessels, now toward the east, and again toward the west, looked up to the heavens with the brief cry 'Rain!' and then looking down to the earth cried 'Be fruitful!' or 'Conceive!' The prayer, pregnant with significance, throws back a bright light on the real meaning of the mysteries celebrated at Eleusis.

We have no means of determining the extent of the influence of these mysteries. Numerous sanctuaries, dependent on the main sanctuary at Eleusis, arose in other parts of Greece. We hear of a sanctuary or chapel even in Italy. Of these daughter institutions we know but little that we can call trustworthy. The 'truce of God,' which suspended all hostilities during the Eleusinian celebration, was proclaimed in lands as distant as Syria and Egypt. Emperors, such as Hadrian and Marcus Aurelius, gladly became initiated adherents of the cult, and when Valentinian I., in the year 364, forbade religious celebrations at night, he was obliged to make an exception of the ceremonies at Eleusis. An influence so extensive makes it possible that St. Paul knew of the mysteries. But if he did, it is singular that he did not allude to them in his speech at Athens on Mars' Hill. The slightest apparent allusion to them would have been eagerly seized by those who affirm his familiarity with mystery-religions. But his silence would seem to show that he knew little or nothing of the Eleusinian mysteries, or else viewed them with a disfavour which the courtesy of the moment compelled him to refrain from revealing. Their influence on the Church can only be assumed, not proved. Svoronos, as quoted by De Jong (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 29), affirms that the Greek Church is the successor of the Eleusinian cult, that she borrowed much from Eleusis. If this be true, the act of borrowing could have taken place only at a comparatively late period. Examples of this act are found in her celebration of important ceremonies at night, in her processions with their icons, in the revealing of holy objects, in the confession of sins before the Eucharist, and in the adoration of the Virgin Mary. With these are supposed to correspond the initiation at night in Eleusis, the procession bearing the image of Iacchos, the disclosure of 'holy things' in the Telesterion, the exclusion of the unworthy, and the practice of confession at Samothrace, the mourning of Demeter, having for her Christian parallel the 'mater dolorosa,' and the worship of Demeter, whose cult ceased just before the worship (hyperdulia) of the Virgin assumed unusual importance, and, therefore, seems to have replaced that of Demeter. One could speak more confidently of the exactness of these similarities if one knew accurately what the ceremonies in the Telesterion really were. Moreover, the origin of the ceremonial customs and rites of the Greek can be traced and has been traced to other sources than to the cult at Eleusis; and when more than one source can be ascribed to a practice, its assumed origin in a particular quarter is rendered doubtful. At all events, this comparison does not come within the limits of the primitive Church, for such rites as make the comparison possible had not yet been developed.

(b) The mysteries of Samothrace.—The Samothracian mysteries are far less known to us than the Eleusinian. They get their name from the fact that their chief seat was in the island of Samothrace, which was an object of superstitious regard from pre-historic times to a comparatively late period. The cult itself is very ancient, and seems to be a relic of the religious life of the old Pelasgian or Aegean civilization which flourished even as far as Sicily before the Greek civilization arose. The ruins of its ancient sanctuaries in Samothrace reveal remnants of the same massive, Cyclopean walls, which are found elsewhere in the islands and on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Its mysteries were important in ancient times, and from the 4th cent. rivalled the Eleusinian. They attained their greatest distinction under Philip and his queen Olympia, who were initiated into them, and under the Ptolemys, who patronized them and cared for their sacred buildings. Later the cult extended its influence among the citizens of the Roman Republic. Among its adherents were such Roman soldiers and leaders as M. Claudius Marcellus. We know little about its ceremonies and formulæ, which is a misfortune, for such knowledge might have thrown light on the growth of the religious terminology which St. Paul found and used. They centred in the Kabeiroi, concerning whom we have only the most meagre information. They seem to have belonged to the class of spirits known as demons, goblins, and satyrs. Originally they were chthonian deities or gods of the under world, as the excavations on the island reveal. Their name is probably of Phœnician origin, for it appears to be connected with the Semitic Kabeirim, the 'mighty ones.' They were really gods native to the islands of the Ægean sea; but inasmuch as they were gods of navigation, the Phœnician sailors naturally were interested in them and gave them the name by which they came to be generally known. On Samothrace they were called presumably Axieros, Axiokersos, Axiokersa, and Casmilos. Like all deities of indeterminate character, they were identified at various times with deities of another name. The possible affinity of their mysteries with those of Eleusis led to the subsequent retirement of these barbaric names, and the substitution in the place of the first three of the names of Demeter, Kore, and Pluto or Hades. Cybele and Dionysus rival Demeter and Pluto as usurpers of the native Samothracian names. A worship of the Kabeiroi existed near Thebes also at an early period. Excavations of the sanctuary belonging to the cult have brought to light pottery dating from the end of the 5th and beginning of the 4th centuries B.C., which bears on its surface a figure apparently of Dionysus with the word 'Kabiros' written just above it. The god is evidently chthonic in character. Probably the Kabeiroi were remotely deities of vegetation; but their office in historic times was to safeguard the mariner. He who had been initiated into their mysteries and had the purple thread bound about his person was secure from the perils of the sea. We know nothing more of their mystic festival than that it was ecstatic, and that it contained a sacramental communion, if we accept H. Hepding's interpretation of a Samothracian inscription (Attis, seine Mythen und sein Kult, Giessen, 1903, p. 185). Nor is there any way of determining their influence on the development of the religious life which finally found its complete satisfaction in the Christian faith.

(c) The mysteries of Andania.—The Andanian mysteries were celebrated at Andania in Messenia, the south-western part of Greece (Peloponnesus). Originally they were consecrated to Demeter and to Kore, who was called Hagne, 'the Holy One.' But at a later period Hermes, the Kabeiroi, and Apollo were added to these deities. The Andanian inscription of 91 B.C. gives us some information concerning their external rites. The manner in which the priests take the oath, the various crowns or head-dresses which the priests and the mystics should wear, the dress of linen in which they should be clothed, are described. Women are directed to be present with hair unbound and feet unshod, and the animals to be offered to the different deities are designated. Married women figure as priestesses, and grades of initiation appear here as in the Eleusinian mysteries. While evidences of required baptisms and anointings are apparent, there is no indication of a sacramental meal; but as such meals were customary in the secret cults, it is possible that it had a place in the Andanian mysteries. Of the purpose of these mysteries we know nothing, but we can conjecture that they were related to the harvest, and that they gave to the initiate a happy lot in the future world.

(d) The Egyptian mysteries.—As early as the XIXth dynasty the Egyptian cults had already begun to spread into other lands. They were founded on the legend of Osiris, who, like Demeter, was originally a deity of vegetation. The myth that centres about him is gathered from various sources, among which Plutarch's account may be regarded as the chief. He is usually represented as the son of the earth-god Keb and the sky-goddess Nut, which is the reverse of the customary relationship of the parental deities. On reaching manhood he ruled his country for twenty-eight years, and proved to be a beneficent monarch. He taught his subjects how to cultivate their fields, to train their vines, and to work with tools. He even left his country and carried everywhere his knowledge of the arts of a helpful life. On his return his evil-minded brother, Set, persuaded him to test the capacity of a chest to receive his body, and, as soon as he had stretched himself in it, Set shut the lid, fastened it down, and threw the chest into the Nile. Isis, the sister-wife of Osiris, in an agony of grief went everywhere seeking him, and, finally recovering the body, returned with it to Egypt and hid it among the reeds by the river. But Set, while hunting at night, discovered it under the moonlight, and, dismembering it, scattered the several parts throughout the country. Isis renewed her search, and on finding the fragments gave them a fitting burial. Another version of the story tells us that Anubis, sent by Ra, came to her aid, and with the help of Thot and of Horus (in Greek times Harpocrates) fitted the parts together, enveloped them in a linen winding-sheet, and then by his magical power restored him to life. From this moment Osiris presided over the under world as its king and judge. All disembodied souls had to appear before him, make their confession to him, and receive at his hands the award of their deeds. In this capacity Osiris was viewed as the representative and giver of immortal life. In order to receive it, one must have become even identified with him and be called by his name. His great festival began on 23th October and ended on 1st November.

It was not until the time of Ptolemy I. (306-285 B.C.) that the Egyptian mysteries made rapid progress. He seems to have given the first impulse to the syncretism, or amalgamation of cults and divinities, which for six or seven centuries was to direct the religious life and practice of men, and which is supposed by some scholars to have deeply influenced even the beginnings of Christianity. The first step in this syncretistic movement was the adoption of the name Serapis for that of Osiris. The origin of the name is still doubtful. Some find its source in the Chaldean Sar-apsi. But more probably it is simply the reduced form of Osiris-apis (Oser-hapi). The union of the god with the sacred bull, Apis, which was regarded as his incarnation, would suit Egyptian prejudices, and the name Serapis itself would appeal to the Greek mind. Thus Serapis, Isis, and Horns or Harpocrates were the leading deities in the Egyptian cults, Anubis, Jupiter Hammon, and the Sphinx ranking after them. They were invoked sometimes together, and sometimes separately. Usually the name Serapis leads the rest, and when alone is identified with Zeus and Helios, giving rise to the formula, inscribed on amulets, 'Zeus, Helios, and Serapis are one.' More frequently two names, Serapis and Isis, are united in one invocation, but Isis also often stands alone, as in Spain and Gaul, and receives the exclusive worship.

Under the Ptolemy the cults spread through the Aegean islands and found numerous adherents along the shores of Asia Minor. In the same period they had reached Greece, and they arrived in Sicily about the year 298 B.C. The later progress of Christianity was hardly more rapid. The ability of the cult of Serapis by itself to arouse the emotions and fancies, its capacity to answer the ascetic longings, its power to amalgamate itself with other cults, and to meet the monotheistic tendency, combined to give it a victorious career. However, it was Isis, the queen deity, that became the more celebrated of the two. The charm of her personality attracted the affections of many peoples. Her gracious attitude toward women, especially young women, enlisted in her following one of the most potential aids to the dissemination of a religious cult. Her dark temples, solemn and mysterious, drew, rather than repelled, the religiously inclined. About 150 B.C. her cult reached Italy, but did not enter Rome until the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. There it encountered a determined opposition, its altars and images being destroyed four times in the course of one decade. But the cult was tenacious. The emperor Tiberius dealt it another blow in A.D. 19. Soon after this resistance gave way, for the cult of Isis did what the State-religions were not doing—gave to the worshipper the consciousness of direct and personal communion with the deity. In A.D. 38 Caligula built the great temple of Isis on the Campus Martius, which figures in the story of Apuleius. In A.D. 215 Caracalla placed the cult on a level with the State-cults and built for the worship of Isis one of her finest temples. The goddess of countless names, Isis Myrionyma, had conquered. She is rightly called Domina, Victrix, Invicta, Mater, Panthea; and, had her worship finally prevailed, the Creator of all things visible and invisible would have been conceived as the feminine rather than as the masculine principle of the universe. But her reign ceased, although years after every other mystery-religion had vanished. Her cult lingered on in southern Egypt, where probably, in pre-historic times, the goddess began her career, and in A.D. 560 Justinian closed her only remaining temple on the little island of Philæ.

Our chief source of information concerning the mysteries of Isis is Metamorphoses, or Golden Ass, written by Lucius Apuleius (born A.D. 125). At the close of the work the author describes the experiences of one undergoing initiation into the Egyptian cult. We may accept the information with confidence, for the account is marked by too much sincerity to pass, like the story which precedes it, as a product of the imagination. Unfortunately, the information bears on the rites of preparation, not on the transactions in the sanctuary itself. We learn from it that the candidate for initiation had to await the summons of Isis, even after he had been assured by her that he was destined for her ministry. During this period of waiting he must carefully perform his religious duties and preserve a dignified silence. At the proper time Isis makes her will known to him in a vision, and the priest, to whom she has addressed herself at the same moment, in the 'darksome night' and by no 'obscure mandate,' informs him that Isis is ready to communicate to him her secrets. After certain ceremonies, whose significance is not disclosed, the priest 'washed and sprinkled him with the purest water,' and, after giving him further secret instructions, enjoined upon him abstinence for ten days from all but the simplest food. At the close of the fast he was led, clothed in new linen garments, to the inner recesses of the sanctuary, where the mysteries of the cult were revealed to him. Of course the revelations were inviolably secret, but no doubt they centred about the cruel treatment of Serapis, the search of Isis for his dead body, and the resurrection of the god. We should be glad to know what was said and done in the sanctuary.

'I would tell you,' answers Apuleius, 'were it lawful for me to tell you; you should know it, if it were lawful for you to hear. But both the ears that heard these things, and the tongue that told them, would reap the evil results of their rashness' (xl. 23).

The final initiation was consummated at night, as it was in all the mystery-religions; for it is in the midnight hours that mind and heart are the most deeply impressed.

In those hours, Apuleius goes on, 'I approached the confines of death, and having trod on the threshold of Proserpine, I returned therefrom, being borne through the elements. At midnight I saw the sun shining with its brilliant light, and I approached the presence of the gods beneath, and the gods of heaven, and stood near and worshipped them' (xl. 23).

In the morning he appeared crowned with palm leaves and dressed in a many-coloured robe, and was received by the people with joy and adoration. Apparently they regarded him as identified with the deity and worthy of divine honours. Christianity escaped this partial idolatry prevalent in all mystery-religions, for at no time in its history was the worshipper of Christ identified in like manner with the Christ Himself. No sacramental meal is mentioned as a part of the ceremony by Apuleius. He speaks of a 'religious breakfast' as a feature of the ceremonies of the third day; but this formed no element in the initiation itself. Since the Egyptian cults had become syncretistic they may have adopted the sacramental meal, for, as in the Semitic, so in the Egyptian religion, it was not emphasized in earlier times. The fact that it occurs in the Eleusinian mysteries is no proof of its presence in the mysteries of Isis; for, while the resemblances between the two cults are sufficiently striking, the differences are equally impressive. De Jong sums them up briefly: the respective tasks of Isis and Demeter are wholly unlike: the one sought her brother and husband, who is dismembered; the other sought her daughter, who remains physically sound. The initiation into the mysteries of Isis involved unreserved consecration to her service; initiation into the mysteries of Demeter did not make this extreme demand. In the one case the individual was initiated by himself; in the other the initiation embraced many individuals at once. The cult of Isis received the candidate at any moment, as her will decided, the cult of Demeter at a stated moment. The one was open to astrological ideas, the other was proof against them. These differences reveal a mutually independent development, although somewhere in pre-historic times they perhaps sprang from a common source.

The extent of the influence of the Egyptian cults can be more satisfactorily determined than the extent of the Eleusinian influence. Cumont regards it as very great. 'At the beginning of our era,' he says, 'there set in that great movement of conversion that soon established the worship of Isis and Serapis from the outskirts of the Sahara to the vallum of Britain, and from the mountains of Asturias to the mouths of the Danube' (Oriental Religions, p. 83). Again, he informs us that the priests of the Egyptian religion 'made proselytes in every province' of the Roman world (ib. p. 86). But Toutain disputes this conclusion and restricts the influence of the Egyptian mysteries. They did not take root in the provincial soil, did not modify sensibly the ideas and practices of the immense majority of the people, and remained always exotic cults in the Western world (Les Cultes païens, ii. 34). This conclusion is based largely on the absence of monuments and inscriptions in certain parts of the Roman Empire, and is, therefore, an inference from silence. But, as we determine the extent of the influence of a mystery-religion by the indications of its presence, the absence of such indications forms a reasonable basis for judgment. The Egyptian cults, however, were sufficiently extensive to make their influence felt in wide areas. Yet that influence cannot be said to have reached with any degree of potency the writings of the NT. Schweitzer seems to admit that St. Paul may have known of the cult of Serapis and Isis (G'sichte der paulinischen Forschung, p. 150, tr. W. Montgomery, Paul and his Interpreters, London, 1912, pp. 191-192). But, if he did, his knowledge must have been extremely limited, for it exercised no perceptible moulding power over his thought. The effects of the cult on the ceremonial of the Church are more apparent; but even here the resemblances take the form of analogy rather than of genealogy. The division of the followers of Isis into believer and initiate corresponds with the Christian division into catechumen and faithful. But the Christian parallel would be more striking had the Christian division been into layman and priest, as in the Egyptian cult. The Egyptian fasts, processions, morning and evening worship, have their answering Christian ceremonies, but are not causally related to them to the exclusion of all other sources. The tonsure, it is possible, came directly from the Egyptian cults into the Christian Church. From the earliest times it was practised by the priest of Isis and Serapis for the purpose of cleanliness at the sacrifice. It was peculiar to him, for the Attis priest wore his hair long, like the modern dervish. From the Egyptian cult it passed into the Christian communities of Egyptian ascetics, and thence, by the end of the 5th cent., to the Christian clergy. Again, the derivation of the adoration of Mary, the mother of Christ, from the worship of Isis is not wholly convincing, for the Christological controversies of the 4th and 5th centuries may have been the sole factor in bringing about this fateful result. All this took place at a comparatively late period. At any rate, as Clemen intimates (Der Einfluss der Mysterienreligionen, p. 9), the influence of the Egyptian mysteries in the 1st cent. must not be assumed to be extensive in the sphere of the Christian Church.

(c) The mysteries of Asia Minor.—The mysteries of Attis and Cybele were the most famous and influential in the early religious life of Asia Minor. Nowhere and at no time does Attis appear to be worshipped apart from Cybele. He is related to her now as her lover, now as her child. The story of this double relation, like other mythological tales of leading deities, is various. One, the Lydian story, represents Attis as killed, like Adonis, by a wild boar. The other, the Phrygian story, represents him as driven to frenzy by the jealousy of Cybele, and as dying from the effects of self-mutilation under a pine or fir tree, which thereby became sacred to him. Cybele herself was the greatest of the deities of Asia Minor. She bore many names, and the seat of her worship was in the Galatian city of Pessinus. Here in very early times the stone of meteoric character, 'a black aerolite' (Cumont, Oriental Religions, p. 47), which was to play an important part in the religious life of Rome, was to be found. And here was the grave of Attis, over whose death the Phrygians mourned in their annual festival.

The primitive history of the cult is unknown. The supremacy of Cybele seems to point back to a matriarchal order of social life. And the name of Attis, for which no explanation has been reached, appears to have belonged to some remote and forgotten speech. A few scholars suggest the Hittite tongue. But possibly it may yet prove to be a relic of the old Ægean civilization which had its seat in Crete and whose ruler bore the title of 'Minos,' as the ruler of the Egyptians bore that of 'Pharaoh.' Farnell thinks that 'in following back to its fountain-head the origins of this cult, we are led inevitably to Minoan Crete' (Greece and Babylon, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 92). It was Attis, not Cybele, who was the prominent figure in the mysteries. What Osiris was among the Egyptians, or Adonis among the Phœnicians, Attis was among the Phrygians. He bore the character of a chthonic deity, a god of vegetation, for he had his death and his resurrection, like the grain. His priests were called Galli, or Galloi, and the chief priest claimed the name of Attis himself. In honour of the god, and in a moment of extreme ecstasy, they unmannered themselves—an act which distinguishes the cult of Attis from all others, and whose source and explanation still baffle the investigator. In the year 204 B.C. the sacred stone of Cybele was taken from Pessinus and carried to Rome. This was done in obedience to a Sibylline oracle, which declared that the conquests of Hannibal in Italy would not cease until a sanctuary was established for the worship of Cybele in Rome. The stone was received with much ceremony and was placed in the temple of the goddess of victory on the Palatine. This inauguration of the worship of Attis and Cybele in Rome is regarded as the first step toward the conquest of the West by the Oriental cults. But at the outset the Phrygian cult gained no perceptible control over the Roman mind. Romans were forbidden by legislative acts to take part in its ceremonies. It was placed exclusively in the hands of Phrygian priests, who alone were permitted to perform its rites and to receive alms from the citizens for its support. This rigorous exclusion of Romans from the cult continued until the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41-54), who placed the Phrygian festival among the publicly recognized festivals of the city. The cause of this act is attributed by Cumont to the desire of Claudius to establish a rival of Isis, whose worship had already been favoured by Caligula, and whose processions were attaining a constantly increasing popularity. This early date is disputed, but both Heping (Attis, seine Mythen und sein Kult, p. 145) and Cumont (Oriental Religions, p. 55) agree on its correctness.

The festival of Attis was brilliantly celebrated in Rome at the spring equinox in the second half of the month of March. It evidently possessed the main characteristics of the wild and ecstatic worship as practised in the native home of the cult. It was introduced by a preparatory ceremony on 15th March, when the cannophori, or reed-bearers, had their procession, commemorating some forgotten event or rite in the remote ceremonial life of Asia Minor. The reed played an important part in the commemoration of Cybele, but only speculation can explain its connexion with her worship. A week later, on 22nd March, a pine or fir tree was cut down in the sacred grove of the goddess and was borne by the dendrophori, or tree-bearers, in procession to the temple of the Idæan mother on the Palatine. Its branches were garlanded with violets and its trunk swathed with woollen bands. It represented the dead body of Attis, and the garlands were woven of violets, because violets sprang from the blood-drops which fell from his person when he unmannered himself at the foot of the pine. Julius Firmicus Maternus, who wrote about A.D. 347, is responsible for the statement that the effigy of a youth, apparently of Attis, was bound to the tree (de Err. Prof. Relig. xxvii. 1). The succeeding day was passed in mourning the death of Attis. It is possible that on this day the mourners joined in the Tubilustrium, or the Feast of Trumpets, when the trumpets, used at the sacrifice, were purified. But our sources do not assure us of this. The 24th was the dies sanguinis, the day of blood, when the mourning reached its highest intensity. Under the shrill sounds of various instruments, the hoarse cries of the Galli, and the spectacle of their whirling dances, the crowd of worshippers were lifted to unrestrained ecstasy, in which they slashed themselves with knives that the blood might sprinkle the statue of the goddess, and when the neophyte, insensible to pain, emasculated himself in her honour with a sharp stone. His use of the sharp stone to complete his self-consecration to the deity is but another indication of the conservatism of religion, which preferred to retain in the sacred rite the ancient means rather than adopt the more modern means of metal. Our sources, however, give us but slight information concerning this stage of the ceremonies. The real initiation was probably consummated under the light of torches and in the sanctuary of Cybele during the hours of the succeeding night. This can be gathered only from hints of early writers and from a few existing monuments relating to the cult. The 25th was called the Hilaria, the joyous festival, when the announcement of the resurrection of Attis was made and the expressions of mourning were turned into extravagant expressions of joy. It was characterized by a sort of carnival, when a certain amount of freedom was permitted in the public streets. Later, in the 3rd cent., this masked and hilarious procession had become one of the most important among Roman festivals. The next day was given up to quiet and rest. But on the 27th, called the Lavatio, the ceremonies were resumed. The silver image of the goddess was borne on a wagon drawn by cows from the sanctuary on the Palatine through the Porta Capena to the Almo, which entered the Tiber not far from Rome. There the Archigallus bathed the image in the stream, and thoroughly washed the wagon and the rest of the sacra. On the return of the procession to the sanctuary the wagon was filled with flowers cast into it by the people who lined the way, and the Galli made good use of their opportunity to receive alms from the charitable. So the great celebration of the rites of Attis and Cybele was closed.

We infer from formulæ recorded by Firmicus and Clement of Alexandria that a sacramental meal was administered to the candidate during the initiation. Firmicus, quoting the Greek equivalent of his Latin formula, gives it as, 'I have eaten from the tambourine, I have drunk from the cymbal, I have become a mystic of Attis' (de Err. Prof. Relig. xviii. 1). Clement gives the same formula more fully (Protrept. ii. 15). It is probable that the rite was celebrated at the beginning of the initiation as a preparation for other rites, such as the 'holy marriage,' though we have but the slightest evidence that the 'holy marriage' figured in the cult. The elements of the communion were, according to M. Brückner (Der sterbende und auferstehende Gottheiland, Tübingen, 1911, p. 24) and Hepding (Attis, p. 186), bread, wine, and the fish. The belief that the fish was one of the elements is based by Hepding on the much-discussed inscription found on the tomb of Abercius, who he thinks was a follower of Attis, and not, as others affirm, a Christian bishop (Attis, p. 188). It is true that certain species of fish were sacred to Atargatis, the Phœnician goddess, and were eaten sacramentally by her priests. Phœnicia lay not far away from Phrygia. But the proof that the features of her communion meal characterized that of Phrygia resolves itself under close examination into mere supposition. Hepding himself confesses that his opinion rests only on assumption. How the Attis communicant regarded his sacramental meal is also open to conjecture. Dieterich, reasoning from words of Firmicus which follow his quotation of the Attis formula, concludes that the communicant recognized in this sacrament a real presence of the deity (Eine Mithrasliturgie, p. 103; see also O. Pileiderer, The Early Christian Conception of Christ, London, 1905, p. 127). O. Seeck says dogmatically that 'what he consumed was regarded as the flesh and blood of Attis, which he absorbed in order to deify his mortal body' (Geschichte des Untergangs der antiken Welt, iii. [Berlin, 1909] 128). Hepding falls back on the theory of Robertson Smith that the solemn act of eating and drinking together is the ceremonial introduction to personal relationship to the deity and to the common life of the community (RS, London, 1894, p. 265). Yet Hepding adds that, while in the mysteries the idea of admission to a brotherhood is not ignored, 'the personal relation of the individual to the deity was emphasized' (Attis, p. 188). Cumont takes a similar view of the sacrament (Oriental Religions, p. 69). But the evidence cited for the belief of the Attis worshipper in a real presence of the deity in, with, and under the elements is not wholly assuring. We do not know from any trustworthy source what conception he had of the elements, as consecrated, though the chances are that it was decidedly realistic. The position of the sacrament in the initiation is also unknown. It probably followed the fast, and, as Brückner suggests, was the first step in the ceremonies. The final ceremony was the resurrection of Attis. When the rites had reached their most impressive stage, amid the gloom and the singing of mournful hymns, a bright light suddenly irradiated the atmosphere; the tomb was opened, and the god arose. The priest whispered to the initiates, 'Be of good cheer, oh mystics, the god is saved; for there shall be salvation to you from your trials' (Firmicus, de Err. Prof. Relig. xxii. 1). The words are significant, for they reveal the aim of the mysteries of Attis—escape from perdition and the assurance of a bright immortality. Thenceforth, not through the sacrament, but through the resurrection of Attis and his share in it, the initiate was a mystic of Attis.

The taurobolium (less frequently criobolium, the offering of the ram) became a part of the rites of the cult after the middle of the 1st century. The mystic, swathed in linen as if prepared for burial, descended, while the spectators sang dirges, into a pit which was covered with lattice-work. The blood of the slaughtered animal streamed through the openings in the platform on the mystic below, who eagerly caught it, bathing himself with it and drinking it. When he ascended, red and dripping, from the pit, he was regarded as born again to eternal life, and was received by his associates with divine honours (Prudentius, Peristephanon, x. 1048). The idea of his re-birth was further emphasized by the nourishment of milk which was given him, as though he were a new-born babe. The taurobolium was not always regarded as lasting in its effects, but might be repeated by the individual after the lapse of twenty years in order to re-invigorate his spiritual life. In this respect it differed wholly from the Christian baptism by water, which was permanent and repeated only conditionally. The influence of the taurobolium on the formation of the sacramental doctrine of the Church could have been only very slight. It is more likely that the Christian idea of cleansing and purification 'in the blood of the Lamb' (Rev 7¹⁴) influenced the taurobolium. The source of the rite and even of its name is conjectural. It is not strictly Phrygian; it may be traced to the peoples of Syria, and even further to the deserts of Arabia. Cumont has changed his mind more than once concerning its origin, and his various conclusions are subjected by Toutain to sceptical criticism (Cumont, Oriental Religions, p. 66 ff.; Toutain, Les Cultes païens, ii. 86 ff.).

It was not until the second half of the 2nd cent. that the cult of Attis and Cybele began to command an extensive attention and interest in the Western world. In the time of Irenæus it was already present in Lyons, which became the centre of its extension in this part of the Roman Empire (Toutain, Les Cultes païens, ii. 112-114). It had been brought thither by a few of its devotees, whose missionary zeal may have been inspired by the success of the Church in her missionary enterprise. Two factors greatly aided the spread of the cult. One was the taurobolium already mentioned. Its assurance of spiritual purification and immortality gave it an inestimable value in the eyes of the converts. To have experienced the taurobolium was to be free of sin either temporarily or permanently, and to possess, with this cleansing, the grant of a happy life hereafter. The other factor was the agrarian character of the cult. What promises to men an abundance of food is also dear to them. Consequently, the processions around the sown fields with the image of Cybele borne aloft, the accompanying songs and dances in her honour, the resulting assurance of a rich harvest, increased the capacity of the cult to win the affections of the common people. Thus a joyful life here and the anticipation of a joyful life hereafter made it a centre of attraction wherever it went. By the middle of the 3rd cent. its taurobolia, at first private, had become public, and were offered even for the welfare of the imperial family. By this time the cult had established itself in Gaul, Spain, and Africa. Where its sanctuary stood in Rome, the original centre of its propagandism, rises now the dome of the cathedral of St. Peter.

(f) The mysteries of Persia.—Mithras was the centre of devotion and worship in the Persian cult. In early Persian times he was associated with the highest god, Ahura, and afterwards was a modification of him. Specifically he was the god of light—that is, the light of day. Daily from the eastern to the western horizon he rode in his chariot drawn by four white horses. In him the dawn, the brightness of the noon, and the sunset glow were embodied. He was also the god of vegetation, not because he possessed a chthonic character, but because his warming light quickened the seed and brought forth the abundant harvest. It is possible that Mithras also was remotely a chthonic deity, like Demeter and Attis. His association with the cave, his worship in the underground chamber, and the representations of vegetable life on his monuments, might imply it. But as he is portrayed in Persian mythology he was a celestial deity and is devoid of all chthonic features (J. Grill, Die persische Mysterienreligion im römischen Reich und das Christentum, Tübingen, 1903, p. 23). The life-giving power of Mithras was naturally extended by human reflexion to the moral sphere. He was regarded as the inspirer of truthfulness, honesty, and bravery in his subjects. Before him the oath was taken, and he was the avenger of the violation of treaties. Under the Persian kings he became, as their protector, the god of war. Thus he was a soldier's deity, which, in part, explains his charm for Roman legionaries. As the deity to whom appeal was made in battle, he became also a mediator between gods and men, and ruled the realm intermediate between the abode of Ahura and that of Ahriman.

The Mithras of the Roman Empire was not the same as the Mithras of the Persian kingdom. In the progress of his worship from Persia westward his cult experienced numerous additions and modifications. It is difficult to mark the moment when it became a mystery-religion, but the cult was already well advanced, theologically and sacramentally, in the 2nd cent. B.C. During its sojourn in Babylonia it fell under the influence of the Chaldean astrology and absorbed much of it. Consequently, the instructions given the candidate, probably in the later stages of his initiation, assumed a partially scientific character. When the cult reached the Greek-speaking peoples, it suffered fresh modifications, but these did not vitally affect it. While pliant under the Chaldean, it was unyielding under the Greek influence. This conservatism distinguishes it from other cults which were less sturdy in their capacity for resistance. The Romans, among whom it was to assume its greatest importance, first came into contact with it in their invasion of Asia Minor, especially when Pompey waged his war with Mithradates (66 B.C.), although a company of Mithraic worshippers had already appeared in Rome. The Roman soldiers, chiefly the officers, were at once drawn to this martial god, and, giving him their allegiance, became his most effective missionaries in the West. They carried his cult, as they moved from camp to camp, west of the Black Sea, up the Danube, to Central Europe, and then southward. However, only from the time of the Flavian emperors (A.D. 70-96) can it be said to have gained a foothold in the Roman Empire. In the meanwhile it failed to entrench itself on the shores of Asia Minor and in Greece. This failure had a serious effect on its destiny, for, when it came into conflict with the Christian faith, which had succeeded in capturing the culture of Greece, it found itself labouring under a great disadvantage. The religion which can interest the intellect to the greatest degree, as well as arouse the emotions, gains the day (A. Harnack, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums, Leipzig, 1902, p. 271; but see Grill, Die persische Mysterienreligion, p. 35 ff., for additional reasons). From the end of the 2nd cent. its foothold in Rome was assured. There it allied itself with the Attis cult and flourished under the protection of the privileges granted this cult by the State. The reign of Commodus (180-192) marks an epoch in the progress of Mithras. The emperor offered himself for initiation into the mysteries, and raised the god to the position of patron deity of the imperial power; and in the reign of Severus, his successor, we find the name of a chaplain of the imperial court in the service of Mithras. The influence of the cult steadily grew in the West during the century, though it secured but slight control in Egypt and Spain. In A.D. 307 Diocletian and his associates dedicated a sanctuary to Mithras at Carnuntum on the Danube, and in that dedication recognized him as the 'protector of the Empire.' Fifty years later Julian became sole emperor of Rome (361-363); and, although educated a Christian, immediately announced himself to be a follower of Mithras. The cult was introduced into Constantinople; but its ascendancy lasted only a brief time. It quickly lost it, and, on the ascent of Theodosius to undisputed power (A.D. 394), it led a precarious existence until it vanished in its last place of refuge in Cappadocia and its neighbourhood.

The cult always conducted its worship in a cave, or, if a natural cave were not available, in a subterranean chamber. The underground temple was rectangular in form, and provided with rows of seats for the accommodation of the worshippers. It bore the name of Mithræum, and could not have held more than 100 persons. Consequently, each congregation was small, but the limited number of 'brethren' was an advantage, for it brought the individual members into the closest acquaintance and sympathy with each other. Each congregation was well organized. It had its summus pontifex, or high priest, who had charge of the initiates, and, according to Tertullian, could marry but once. He superintended either in person or by delegated authority the numerous sacrifices, and kept the fire on the altar always burning. He directed the worship of the planets and the sun, to each of which a special day was devoted. Parallel with the duties of the priesthood there was also a system of duties assigned to elected officers of the corporation, which had the legalized right to hold property. A college of decurii governed it; besides these there were curators, who had charge of the financial affairs of the cult; advocates (defensores), who defended its interests in courts of law; patrons, whose private means helped to defray exceptional expenses. Thus its official ordering was somewhat similar to that of the cult of Isis (ERE vii. 436). Unlike the cult of Demeter, its polity seems to have been congregational, each community of worshippers being independent of every other.

The candidates for initiation passed through seven stages or grades, each possessing its own mask and robe, which the candidate wore on the completion of its rites. These seven stages answered to the spheres of the seven planets, which the soul of the devotee was supposed to traverse after it was liberated from the body. It was thus fitted to enter and leave in safety each sphere, for it was no longer a stranger to it, and knew how to answer the challenge of the guardian of it. At each grade the candidate received a special name, appropriate to the character of the grade—raven, occult or veiled, soldier, lion, Persian, sun's messenger, and father. This is now the accepted list, though the names are variously recorded by different early writers (Porphyry, de Abstinētia, iv. 16; Jerome, Ep. 107). But the bearer of the last of them, 'father,' held a pre-eminent place in the mysteries; in fact, all the priests of the cult were called 'fathers,' as in the Attis cult. The high priest himself received the name of 'father of fathers.' The holders of the first three grades were regarded as servants. But when they had passed through the grade of 'lion,' which is the most frequently mentioned in inscriptions, they entered the rank of companions or 'participants.' During the initiation a system of tests was brought to bear on the candidate in order to prove his capacity for endurance. Vows of strict silence concerning the things revealed to him were required. Baptisms for cleansing appear in the various rites; and there are indications of the practice of a sacrament of Confirmation. We learn from Tertullian that the brow of the 'soldier' was marked with a sign: 'Mithras set his mark on the forehead of his soldiers' (de Præscr. 40). A communion which Cumont describes (Textes et Monuments, Brussels, 1896-99, i. 320, tr. T. J. McCormack, Chicago, 1903, p. 158) figured among the rites. It belonged to an advanced stage of the initiation, and its elements were bread and water, though some (Cumont and Grill) believe that the water was mixed with wine, of which there is no convincing proof. Doubtless the communion was an imitation of the triumphant banquet, which Mithras, just before his glorious ascension, enjoyed with the sun-god. It was probably regarded by the communicant as magically imparting to himself the vigour of health, increased prosperity, illumination or mind, power to cope successfully with evil spirits, and finally a blessed immortality. De Jong appears to regard the communion as the culmination of the initiation. Others view the taurobolium, which was a rite in the Persian cult also, as the culmination, when the candidate emerged from his repulsive bath and received the homage of the people as one who had become identified with the god. Of the two opinions the latter may be viewed as the more correct.

The relation of the Persian to the Egyptian cult was close. There were Mithras-fathers who at the same time were priests of Serapis and Isis. It is significant that the priest who conducted Apuleius through the mysteries of Isis bore the name of Mithras. The idea of the service of the god as a life-long warfare was common to both; and the moral requirements received in them stronger emphasis than in the other mystery-religions. Further, the followers of Mithras, inasmuch as women with few exceptions were excluded from their cult, sought and received the admission of their wives and daughters into the Isis cult, where they were sometimes advanced to high official position. The relations of the Mithraic cult to the Attis mysteries were hardly less cordial. The Mithræum in Rome adjoined the temple of the Phrygian mother, and the possession of the taurobolium by both formed a bond of sympathy. The attitude of Mithraism to the growing Christian Church also was kindly until the rivalry between them became intense, when goodwill gave way to animosity, and the Mithraic priesthood early in the 4th cent. inaugurated through the emperor a determined persecution of the Christians.

It has been affirmed that this rivalry was deepened by the similarity between the tenets and practices of the two religions. The similarity is striking. The Fathers of the Church—Justin and Tertullian, for example—were impressed by the likeness, and attributed it to the effort of Satan to imitate the Christian teachings and rites. Each religion had a revelation, a mediator, who was both creator and redeemer; the story of his birth into the world, of his adoration by shepherds; an atoning sacrifice for the salvation of men, a last supper, and an ascent into heaven; a baptism, a communion, a confirmation, a belief in the immortality of the soul, in a final judgment, in the resurrection of the dead, in the end of the world by fire, in a heaven for saints and in a hell for the reprobate. This parallelism of teachings and practices has suggested to some students a borrowing on the part of Christianity from Mithraism, or the absorption of Mithraism into it. But with the similarities there are equally impressive differences. Mithraism presents a pantheon, a personification of abstractions and forces; Christianity, the one living God who is Spirit and Holy Love; the one an eternal dualism of good and evil, the other a creation subject to the will of an unrivalled Creator; the one the controlling and inexorable power of fate, the other the government of a wise and beneficent Providence; the one a mythological saviour, the other a historic person, who lived a real yet sinless life and died a heroic death to rescue the world from sin. Mithraism saved exclusively by sacramentalism, Christianity by faith with sacramentalism subordinate to it. These distinctions colour the two religions through and through, imparting their distinctiveness to the minor features which help to characterize them. Further than this, Mithraism was established in the Western world only after the Christian doctrines had been wrought out in the Church. Christianity becomes more wonderful in our eyes if it could have absorbed a religion so disparate from itself and so powerful without becoming itself radically affected by the act. De Jong is quite right in rejecting utterly the plea that Christianity borrowed any of its tenets from the Mithraic cult (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 60).

It was only at the end of the 2nd cent. that this mystery-religion began to assume importance in the life of the Empire, but it always remained local in its influence. It was a soldier's religion, and naturally followed the Roman army from encampment to encampment. One can trace the movements of the army on the soil of Europe by the surviving Mithraic monuments. Outside of the army posts it got a footing along the great routes of travel, frequented by the Oriental, who would naturally carry his religion with him. As a military religion it was confined socially to a limited social life—from the officers of legions, governors of provinces, to their captives and slaves. Under such conditions extensive territories would lie beyond its influence (Toutain, Les Cultes païens, ii. 150-159). And from these territories, which were not dominated by Mithraism, the religion of Christ drew in great measure its converts. Throughout its career, therefore, the Persian cult could have had but slight direct influence on the Christian faith.

(7) The Orphic mysteries.—Orphism is the speculative element in the Thracian worship of Dionysus. The oldest witness to Orphism is Herodotus (ii. 81), who emphasizes the agreement of some Bacchic and Orphic customs with the Egyptian (Rohde, Psyche, ii. 103). Orpheus was its founder, and from him it received its name. There are two main conceptions of him, the one laying the stress on his humanity, the other on his divinity. The first presents him as a historic figure, an immigrant from the South, perhaps Crete, into Thrace and Thessaly (Miss Harrison, Prolegomena, p. 456 ff.). The second presents him as a god, either chthonic or celestial. His assumed chthonic character is based on the derivation of his name from ὄφρη, the darkness of the nether world. If he was a god, he was originally identified with Dionysus. Seeck believes that the two were nearly related forms of the sun-god, whose cult was strongly influenced by that of Sabazius, who was Thracian as well as Phrygian, an unmistakable chthonic deity, his symbol being the serpent. But the problem of the original inter-relationship of Orpheus and Dionysus remains still unsolved. Miss Harrison confesses that 'mythology has left us no tangle more intricate and assuredly no problem half so interesting as the relation between the ritual and mythology of Orpheus and Dionysus' (Prolegomena, p. 455). Orpheus, however, failed to keep the position which his supposed identification with Dionysus gave him; for later he appears merely as a priest of Dionysus and a promoter of the Dionysiac mysteries. In spite of his close relationship to him there are distinctions which separate them and give to Orpheus an individuality of his own. Two distinguishing features characterize the cult, which often bears his name rather than that of Dionysus. The first was its capacity to embody the finer aspirations of the soul in fitting melody. This capacity was presumably due to Orpheus, whose soft and gentle music, varied in its expression, could easily be contrasted with the uniformly wild and strident strains, more customary among his actual or adopted countrymen. The second feature was its possession of an abundant sacred literature, such as was wanting in the other mystery-religions, with the exception, perhaps, of that of Isis. In its form it was poetical, and continued to increase in volume from the 6th cent. B.C. to the 4th cent. A.D. (Lobeck, Aglaophamus, pp. 341-347). In character it was dogmatic, presenting authoritatively its peculiar view of the world and of man. Time was the original generative power. Thence came Æther or the heavenly world, and Chaos, the mighty void (πελώριον χάσμα). Time produced a silver egg which Æther fructified and over which Chaos brooded. From the egg Phanes, the mystic principle of the world, was born. The new deity was two-fold in gender, male and female at once, and from its co-ordinated activities a universe emerged, which it reduced to harmonious arrangement. Then follows a succession of deities, among which are the Titans, and the sole ruler, Kronos, who swallows his own children and is finally conquered and supplanted by Zeus. Each succession of rulers introduces a new ordering of the world—a new epoch. At the end of the succession Dionysus appears, with the added name of Zagreus, possibly a chthonic deity. While he was still a child his father, Zeus, entrusted to him the government of the world. The evil Titans, the enemies of Zeus, approached him in disguise at the instigation of the jealous Hera, and gained his goodwill by gifts. While he was intent on one of the gifts they fell upon him, but Zagreus escaped from them by repeated transformations of himself. At last they caught him when he was in the form of a bull and tore him into pieces, all of which except the heart they swallowed. Zeus, hearing of his death, avenged it by smiting the Titans with a thunder-bolt, and out of their ashes the race of man arose, possessing according to its origin good qualities (dionysiac) and evil qualities (titanic). The legend which recounts the restoration of Dionysus to his former life and glory is varied. But he, as restored, introduced a new era in which mankind is now living. The story, thus briefly recounted, is very old. Onomacritus of Athens (530-485 B.C.) evidently had it under his hands. The Orphic theology begins with it and continues in it. For man by nature is dominated by an evil principle, from which he must seek to free himself. It is his original sin, which holds him down morally, and his hope of victory lies in Dionysus Zagreus, to whom the government of the world has again fallen. But in the effort to attain victory certain ritualistic practices are enjoined, such as abstinence from certain foods, meat, eggs, and beans, and wearing of white garments, and the offering of unbloody sacrifices.

The Orphic theology dealt with the soul not merely as it exists in this world, but with its fate in the future world. On the one hand, the Orphic doctrine of the state of the blessed dead was the reverse of the dreary conception which, applied to all but a few persons, was prevalent in the time of Homer. On the other hand, its doctrine of final retribution was almost as sombre as that of Chinese Buddhism. The idea of transmigration formed the central point of its view of the future. This idea, with others, seems to point to a close connexion at some early period between the cult and the Egyptian mysteries, and to sustain the theory that Orphism was derived mainly from Egypt. But the connexion of Orphism with Thracian beliefs and trends is too deep-seated and unmistakable to give room to this theory. The doctrine of transmigration, which we find alike in India and Egypt, must have been an extensive belief in remote times. No one knows whence it came, and it is likely to have been as native to Thrace and Thessaly or to lower Italy, where the cult early made its home, as to India or to Egypt. At a primitive period it made its way, as a religious conviction, into Orphic teaching, and so came, not from the philosophers to the priests, but rather from the priests to the philosophers (R. Falke, 'Die Seelenwanderung,' in Biblische Zeit- und Streitfragen, Berlin, 1913, p. 5).

About the year 600 B.C. the Orphic influence began its march southward through Greece, inaugurating one of the greatest conversions the world has experienced. It embodied itself in the form of the Dionysiac religion, and reinforced the waning worship of Dionysus which had established itself in Greece as early as the days of Homer. But its advent was not graciously received (Plato, Rep. 364 E). Nevertheless, its missionary spirit was ardent and persistent. It not only continued to found its own sanctuaries, but is supposed to have exercised a profound moulding power over other cults. Thus far the precise degree of its influence on them has not been determined. Much discussion has been centred on its influence upon the Eleusinian mysteries in particular. But the verdicts of individual judges differ widely. Miss Harrison (Prolegomena, p. 540 f.), Seeck (Gesch. iii. 19), and B. I. Wheeler (Dionysos and Immortality, Boston, 1899, p. 35) give it great weight; while Rohde (Psyche, i. 285), one of our most distinguished authorities, gives it no weight at all. De Jong (Das antike Mysterienwesen, p. 28) justly feels that the utter denial of it would be rash. But its influence in other directions is undoubted. If it failed to touch the Eleusinian cult, it certainly helped to mould the thought of Pindar and Plato; it evidently contributed to the Pythagorean philosophy (Rohde, Psyche, ii. 109); and its teachings were prized by the Stoics, the neo-Platonists, and the Gnostic sects. Its influence on the Scriptures of the NT is quite problematical. The witness for the origin in Orphism of the custom, mentioned in 1 Co 15², is too late to be important; and the story of the descent of Orpheus into Hades bears no close resemblance to that of Christ's descent into hell. And it is more than doubtful whether the passages Mt 11¹⁴ 17¹¹ 16¹⁴, Jn 9^{2.3} imply the Orphic view of the hereafter. Its degree of influence on the Christianity of later times is too elusive to be estimated. The painters of the Catacombs seem to have used Orpheus, 'charming the wild beasts,' as a symbol of Christ. But when one recalls the pantheistic trend of the Orphic conception of God, and the superficial character of its idea of redemption, one becomes sensible of the radical distinctions separating the Orphic and the Christian theologies.

On the whole, the mystery-religions exercised but a slight influence on the oldest Christianity (Clemen, Der Einfluss der Mysterienreligionen, p. 81). And when, after the beginning of the 3rd cent., they were in a position to exert it with any degree of potency, the Church had already substantially formed her doctrines. Similarities of terms used by both can be explained on the ground that both drew their expressions from a common stock of language, which the religious aspirations of the past had formed. St. Paul would naturally use the ordinary religious speech of his day, but the ideas expressed in it by him were not the ideas of the mystery-religions. They bore another character and breathed a different spirit. In its early ceremonies and customs Christianity gave no indication that it was a mystery-religion. Its Scriptures, its doctrines, even its sacraments, were open to the gaze of all. It was not until the 4th cent. that the secrecy which reminds us of that of the mystery-religions made itself conspicuous and began to be strictly enjoined on the communicant. But even then the substantial doctrines of Christianity, formed centuries before this, kept it steady under pagan accumulations, and enabled it in the course of years to throw off more or less of this accretion. For example, the secrecy, the arcani disciplina, attached to its rites in the time of Augustine fell away and disappeared not long after his death. Christianity can hardly be called a mystery-religion even of a higher order, and they who thus designate it have deceived themselves concerning the actual potency of the mystery-religions over it, or have forgotten the steady dominance and persistence of an inherited nature.

LITERATURE.—L. R. Farnell, The Cults of the Greek States, 5 vols., Oxford, 1896-1909, lii. and v.; F. Cumont, The Oriental Religions in Roman Paganism, Chicago, 1911; P. Gardner, The Religious Experience of St. Paul, London, 1911; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions, do., 1913; C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1912; J. G. Simpson, The Sacraments of the Gospel, London, 1914; W. M. Groton, The Christian Eucharist and the Pagan Cults, do., 1914; J. Toutain, Les Cultes païens dans l'empire romain, 2 vols., Paris, 1907-11; C. A. Lobeck, Aglaopharnus, Königsberg, 1829; C. Clemen, Der Einfluss der Mysterienreligionen, Giessen, 1913; R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Leipzig, 1910; K. H. E. de Jong, Das antike Mysterienwesen, Leiden, 1909; G. Anrich, Das antike Mysterienwesen in seinem Einfluss auf das Christentum, Göttingen, 1893; L. R. Farnell, art. 'Mystery,' in EB xix. 117 ff.; L. C. Purser, art. 'Mystery' and 'Orphica,' in Smith's DGR 43, London, 1890-01, ii. 202, 297; W. Kroll, art. 'Mysterien' in RGK iv. [1912] 580.

W. M. GROTON.

MYSTICISM.—There are definitions of mysticism which place the subject outside the limits of this work. Harnack says: 'Mysticism is Catholic piety in general, so far as this piety is not merely ecclesiastical obedience, that is, fides implicita. . . . If Protestantism is not at some time yet, so far as it means anything at all, to become entirely Mystical, it will never be possible to make Mysticism Protestant without flying in the face of history and Catholicism' (History of Dogma, Eng. tr., London, 1894-99, vi. 98 ff.). E. Lehmann asserts that 'the aim of mysticism . . . is and always has been quiescence and emptiness of soul, darkened consciousness, and the suspension of natural understanding. All this eventually ends in conventual practices and the technics of the confessional' (Mysticism in Heathendom and Christendom, London, 1910, p. 235). But Christian mysticism cannot be identified with either its scholastic or its ecclesiastical forms; even Lehmann, in his sympathetic account of Santa Teresa, 'the greatest saint of mysticism,' significantly describes her thoughts as 'almost Protestant. . . . Union with God did not mean union in a pantheistic sense, but rather a transformation of the soul through love, leading up to a condition of perfect acquiescence to the will of God' (op. cit. p. 234). Harnack also acknowledges that 'that Mysticism cannot certainly be banished which at one time is called Quietism, at another time "Spurious Mysticism"; for the Church continually gives impulses towards the origination of this kind of Christianity, and can itself in no way avoid training it, up to a certain point' (op. cit. vii. 100). That mysticism degenerated into fanaticism which has no warrant in apostolic teaching is indisputable; it is, for this reason, essential that the false mysticism should be distinguished from the true. 'It was always the Ultra's, who, by making an appeal to them, brought discredit upon the "Church" Mystics' (Harnack, op. cit. vi. 105 n.).

Mysticism and historical religion are sometimes regarded as mutually exclusive alternatives. S. W. Fresenius, having expounded Luther's teaching in his de Libertate Christiana, says: 'that is historical religion as the Reformers understood it, but it is not Mysticism' (Mystik und geschichtliche Religion, Gottingen, 1912, p. 94). There may, however, be a mystical element in Christianity, although it does not rest upon a mystical basis. Christianity is a historical religion founded on facts, apart from which the experience of Christian believers is inexplicable; that experience is mystical in proportion as the soul has direct personal intercourse with God through Christ. But this is not to affirm that every Christian realizes the mystical implications of his own experience. From Apostolic Christianity it is impossible to exclude the mysticism which has been defined as 'the type of religion which puts the emphasis on immediate awareness of relation with God, on direct and intimate consciousness of the Divine Presence. It is religion in its most acute, intense, and living stage' (Rufus Jones, Studies in Mystical Religion, London, 1909, p. xv).

The result of the contact of Christianity with non-Christian philosophies was the intrusion of non-Christian elements into Christian mysticism. But its corruptions ought not to be identified with its essence. The mysticism which Harnack condemns had its origin in the philosophy of Dionysius the Areopagite (4th cent.): 'The mystical and pietistic devotion of to-day, even in the Protestant Church, draws its nourishment from writings whose connection with those of the pseudo-Areopagitic can still be traced through its various intermediate stages' (op. cit. i. 361). But Christian mysticism differs essentially from the 'Platonic mysteriosophy' of Dionysius with its pantheistic tendency and its exclusive insistence on the via negativa (W. R. Inge, Christian Mysticism, London, 1899, p. 105). The mystical element in the Christian religion is found in the earliest stages of its history. Divine revelation could not possibly 'leave untouched the mystical yearnings of mankind. . . . Not only in John, but also in Paul, there are plentiful traces of Mysticism' (S. M. Deutsch, 'Theologie, mystische,' in PRE xix. [1907] 635; cf. ExpT xix. [1907-08] 304). To some of these traces attention must now be directed; it will then be necessary to inquire how far the apostles had the mind of Christ.

1. Pauline mysticism.—Inge has shown that the mystical element in St. Paul's theology has been under-estimated; that 'all the essentials of mysticism are to be found in his Epistles,' and that his authority has been wrongly claimed for two false and mischievous developments of mysticism, namely, 'contempt for the historical framework of Christianity,' and 'extreme disparagement of external religion—of forms and ceremonies and holy days and the like' (op. cit. p. 69 ff.). Von Hügel finds 'in St. Paul not only a deeply mystical element, but mysticism of the noblest, indeed the most daringly speculative, world-embracing type' (The Mystical Element of Religion, London, 1903, i. 35). Referring to St. Paul as an ecstatic mystic, this able Roman Catholic interpreter of mysticism supplies a salutary test for such experiences: 'Visions and voices are to be accepted by the mind only in proportion as they convey some spiritual truth of importance to it or to others, and as they actually help it to become more humble, true, and loving' (op. cit. ii. 47). Inge says: 'These recorded experiences are of great psychological interest; but . . . they do not seem to me to belong to the essence of Mysticism' (op. cit. p. 63 f.).

The most important elements of St. Paul's mysticism are derived from his experience of fellowship with the living Christ. W. K. Fleming gives a useful summary of 'the special points with regard to which Mysticism gains its inspiration and direction from St. Paul' (Mysticism in Christianity, London, 1913, p. 30 ff.). The subject is more extensively and most luminously treated by Miss Underhill (The Mystic Way, London, 1913, ch. iii.), though the technical phraseology of the great mystics is, at times, too rigidly applied to the Apostles' spiritual experiences. Rufus Jones holds that the term 'mystic' more properly belongs to St. Paul than to St. John, because 'Paul's Christianity takes its rise in an inward experience, and from beginning to end the stress is upon Christ inwardly experienced and re-lived'

(op. cit. p. 16). St. Paul's explanation of his initiation into the spiritual life is: 'It was the good pleasure of God to reveal his Son in me' (Gal 1st). In his doctrine of mystical union with Christ he gives pregnant expression to his own consciousness of oneness with Christ: 'when he came to analyze his own feelings, and to dissect this idea of oneness, it was natural to him to see in it certain stages, corresponding to those great acts of Christ, to see in it something corresponding to death, something corresponding to burial . . . and something corresponding to resurrection' (Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans', 1902, p. 162, note on Ro 6¹⁻¹⁴). Appealing from Kant and Ritschl and Herrmann to Luther and his doctrine of the unio mystica, Söderblom argues that 'the mystical union . . . is a genuine constituent of evangelical Christianity, inasmuch as its mysticism is inseparably bound up with the essentials of every Christian life, that is to say, with the forgiveness of sins and with justification' (Religion und Geisteskultur, vi. [1912] 293 ff.; cf. ExpT xxiv. [1912-13] 117). Another truth which St. Paul put in the forefront of his teaching finds its highest expression in his great hymn in praise of Love (1 Co 13), for therein he 'declares the conditions, and sets the standard, to which the whole of Christian mysticism has since striven to conform' (Underhill, op. cit. p. 205). Finally, as Moberly has impressively said, 'the real truth of Christian Mysticism is, in fact, the doctrine, or rather the experience, of the Holy Ghost.' Mysticism is 'the realization of the Spirit of Holiness, the Spirit of the Creator of Heaven and Earth, in, and as, the climax of human personality' (Atonement and Personality, London, 1901, p. 312). In this doctrine the key to St. Paul's mysticism is found, for if Christ is to dwell in our hearts through faith we need to pray that we may be 'strengthened with power through his Spirit in the inward man' (Eph 3¹⁶).

2. Johannine mysticism.—'The greatest monument of most genuine appreciation of St. Paul's mysticism . . . is the Gospel and the Epistles of St. John' (Deissmann, St. Paul, Eng. tr., London, 1912, p. 133). The two apostles agree in giving prominence to the mystic idea of the believer's oneness with Christ, to the pre-eminence of Love, and to the Holy Spirit as the Source of knowledge of the things of God, the Giver and Sustainer of spiritual life, and the witness to the Divine sonship of believers. St. John's chief contributions to the mystical element in religion are (1) that by his insistence on a historical revelation in time 'he counterpoises the strong mystical tendency in succeeding ages to regard the Gospel story as a kind of drama,' as though the birth, death, and resurrection of Christ took place within the soul; 'Yet he views what he holds as historical under so mystical an aspect, that it would be right to say that for him all life is sacramental; above all, the Life of lives' (Fleming, op. cit. p. 38); (2) that, by his use of symbols in the expression of mystical thought, he so treats the words and works of Christ as to ensure that 'all things in the world may remind us of Him who made them, and who is their sustaining life' (Inge, op. cit. p. 59).

3. Mysticism of other NT writers.—The mystical element in the remaining NT Epistles is of minor importance. In the Epistle to the Hebrews visible things are regarded as symbols of invisible realities of the spiritual world; the mystic conception of life as an exile and a pilgrimage also has a place (He 11¹³⁻¹⁴; cf. 1 P 1⁷ 2¹¹). 'St. Peter, who shares the Johannine conception as to the "incorruptible seed," echoes the thought of both St. John and St. Paul as to the timelessness of the redemptive process' (Fleming, op. cit. p. 44).

As regards the mystical element in the writings of apostolic men before the close of the 1st cent. it is sufficient to say that the judgment of Rufus Jones as to the Church Fathers in general applies especially to this early period: 'The Fathers were not "mystics" in the ordinary sense of the word. Their type of religion was mainly objective and historical, rather than subjective and inward' (op. cit. p. 80).

4. Christ 'the true mystic.'—When Moberly asserts that 'it is Christ who is the true mystic,' he is referring to the disproportionate emphasis which mystics of various schools (ascetic, contemplative, symbolic, etc.) have laid upon their own aspect of truth, and he claims that 'one and all the exaggerations find their full correction in the Person of the Incarnate, our Lord Jesus Christ; for all the exaggerations are partial lights from the full splendour of the presence of His Spirit, which is the ideal meaning of Christian personality.' To those who hesitate to speak of Christ as the true mystic, Moberly says: 'If the mode of expression be preferred, it is He who alone has realized all that mysticism and mystics have aimed at. . . . In Him this perfect realization evidently means a harmony, a sanity, a fitly proportioned completeness. . . . In being the ideal of mysticism, it is also the ideal of general, and of practical, and of all, Christian experience' (op. cit. p. 314). When the Synoptic narratives are read in this light, the main elements of mysticism are found therein. Miss Underhill is more ambitious, and strives to show that the characteristic experiences of great mystics, as, e.g., Suso and Teresa, 'are found in a heightened form in the life of their Master' (op. cit. p. 77). This involves some straining of the records and the anachronistic application to our Lord's experiences of mediæval phraseology. But it remains true that although 'the first three Gospels are not written in the religious dialect of Mysticism,' yet in the earliest accounts of the teaching of Christ 'the vision of God is promised . . . only to those who are pure in heart,' the inwardness of the blessings of His Kingdom is emphasized, and He identifies Himself with the least of His brethren. In the Synoptists is also found 'the law of gain through loss, of life through death,—which is the corner-stone of mystical (and, many have said, of Christian) ethics' (Inge, op. cit. p. 44).

Of mysticism which is impatient of the historical facts which are the foundation of the Christian religion and has no need of Christ as Mediator, the apostolic writers know nothing. P. T. Forsyth, who has no sympathy with mysticism of this type (cf. ExpT v. [1893-94] 401 ff.), has, nevertheless, said: 'We need more mystic souls and mystic hours. But the true mysticism is not raptly dwelling in the mystery of God, it is really living on His miracle. . . . And the only mysticism with a lease of life is that which surrounds the moral miracle which makes Christianity in the end evangelical or nothing. It is the mysticism of the cross' (The Principle of Authority, London, 1912, p. 463). Christian mysticism, as understood by the apostles, is also the mysticism of the Spirit. 'The Christianity which is content to remain "non-mystical" is impoverished at the very centre of its being. All Christians profess belief in the Holy Ghost. Had only all Christians understood, and lived up to, their belief, they would all have been mystics' (Moberly, op. cit. p. 316).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works mentioned in the art., see H. Hering, Die Mystik Luthers im Zusammenhang seiner Theologie, Leipzig, 1879; M. Reischle, Ein Wort zur Controverse über die Mystik, Freiburg i. B., 1886; G. Klepl, Zur Umbildung des religiösen Denkens, Leipzig, 1908; P. Mehlhorn, 'Christliche Mystik,' in RGG iv. [Tübingen, 1912-13] 600 ff.; G. Lasch, 'Mystik und Protestantismus,' in Religion und Geisteskultur, v. (Göttingen, 1911) 34 ff.; N. Söderblom, Religionsproblemet inom katolicism och protestantism, Stockholm, 1910; W. Herrmann, The Communion of the Christian with God, Eng. tr., London, 1900; W. Major Scott, Aspects of Christian Mysticism, do., 1907; J. M. Campbell, Paul the Mystic, do., 1907; E. C. Gregory, An Introduction to Christian Mysticism, do., 1908; H. B. Workman, Christian Thought to the Reformation, do., 1911; W. T. Davison, The Indwelling Spirit, do., 1911; F. von Hügel, Eternal Life, Edinburgh, 1912; A. Seth Fringle-Pattison, 'Mysticism,' in EBR xix. 123 ff.; O. C. Quick, 'The Value of Mysticism in Religious Faith and Practice,' in JThSt xiii. [1911-12] 161 ff., and 'Mysticism: its Meaning and Danger,' in ib. xiv. [1912-13] 1 ff.; H. Kelly, The Meaning of Mysticism, in ib. xiii. 481.

J. G. TASKER.

N

NAME (ὄνομα).—'Naming,' says De Quincy,* 'is not a pre-historic, but a pre-mythical, not only a pre-mythical, but even a pre-fabulous and a pre-traditional thesis.' Indeed man must, at a very early period of his history, have been forced to give names to the things and beings around him, and even to those which existed only in his imagination. We may suppose, either that sensations and actions first received appellations, and then the objects which caused these were named after them; or, what is far more likely, that first of all objects and actions essential to life gradually acquired names. Such designations would not be given unthinkingly, but rather, as onomatopoeic terms indicate, on account of some peculiarity in that to which the name was given.

The derivations given as those of certain names in the OT, even if incorrect, indicate that names, like nicknames, were given for some reason.†

* A. H. Japp, Life of Thomas De Quincy, 1890, p. 363.

† A. Lang, 'The Origin of Totem Names and Beliefs,' in FL xiii. [1902] 332 ff.

1. Names of persons.*—Ethnologists picture the earliest men as living together in little herds, 'co-operative groups,' as Bagehot calls them.† Such a group would acquire a name from some object or animal with which it was closely associated. This would, most probably, be bestowed on it by a neighbouring group and then be used by the group to indicate itself to others. The animal or other thing by which it was thus designated became its totem. Worshipers of a totem marked themselves with it, and by the mark 'men of the same stock recognised one another';‡ hence the totem mark, which was connected with the habit of tattooing, became the tribal mark. The name of an individual seems originally to have been his stock-name. en is primarily a stock-name rather than that of an individual.§ Hence arose such totem-

* Names of countries, places, nations, natural objects, and animals, civic names, and those of persons mentioned in the OT and in the Gospels, do not fall within the scope of this article.

† W. Bagehot, Physics and Politics, new ed., n.d., p. 213.

‡ W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 1903,

p. 251.

§ ib. p. 248.

istic names as those of animals, etc.* In course of time these and all other names tended to lose their primitive significance and became mere hereditary designations. Such are Ἀκυλας (Aquila),† the Gracized form of the Latin aquila, 'eagle'; Ἀγαβος (Agabus),‡ very probably a Gr. form of אָגַב, 'locust'; Δάμαρις (Damaris),§ probably a corruption of δάμαλις, 'heifer,' 'Damalis,' indeed, being the reading of one Latin MS. The Heb. דַּבָּתָה has in Aram. the form תַּבִּיטָה (Tabitha). In the LXX this is translated Δορκάς,|| 'gazelle'; while Ρόδη (Rhoda)¶ is simply the word for a rose.

As the totemistic tribes amalgamated, the wider life demanded more exact, more personal, designations. Hence some peculiarity, bodily, intellectual, or moral, which was, or which it was hoped would be, exhibited by the individual, was assigned to him as a name. Thus from ἀλέκω, 'defend,' and ἀνὴρ we have Ἀλέξανδρος (Alexander), 'a defender of men'; from the Latin amplius, 'great or noble,' we have the Gr. name Ἀμπλίας (Amplias),†† or in a longer form Ἀμπλιανός (Amplianus). Something striking in the appearance is indicated by the name Ἐπαφρόδιτος (Epaphroditus),‡‡ the Gr. word for 'handsome'; from ἀνδρείος, 'manly,' comes Ἀνδρέας (Andrew),§§ as 'Ρούφος' is just the Greek form of Rufus,||| 'red.' Some peculiar circumstance attending a child's birth may suggest a name, as Ἀγρίππα (Agrippa),¶¶ 'one born feet first.' What names could be more appropriate for a trusted slave than Ὀνήσιμος (Onesimus), the Greek adjective for 'helpful,' or Ὀνησίφορος (Onesiphorus),††† 'the profit-bringer?' A Hebrew king bore the name מַנְחֵם, 'comforter,' which in the LXX is Μανᾶν (Manan).‡‡‡

In the development of religion man, having come to believe in spirits and raised some of these, partly by giving them names, into divinities, began to incorporate in a personal name that of a deity; and thus we have theomorphous names. Such a practice was almost inevitable when men began to give names to the lower divinities as angels, whose names Μιχαήλ (Michael),§§§ and Γαβριήλ (Gabriel),||| like Raphael and Uriel, are both compounds of הַ. As it was believed that a divinity was of necessity closely connected with a person if the name of the former was introduced into that of the latter, the custom was extended to human beings.

The names of exalted personages, like kings, were often compounded of divine names. Most of the names of the Egyptian kings have incorporated in them the names of Ra, Amon, etc.††† The great majority of Mesopotamian names contain the name of a god, the greater number containing two, some three, such elements, as Sin-kalama-idi, meaning 'Sin knows everything.'* Among the South Arabians, as among the Minæans and Sabæans, a great many of the personal names are compounds of ʾilū, the generic name for 'God.'†††† A Minæan inscription of the Ptolemaic period gives us the name זַאִיד־עֵל (Zaid-El); in 1 Mac 11:7 we have the name Ζαβδιηλ as that of an Arabian chief, while Nabatæan inscriptions of the age of Jesus have many such names.††††† 'In pre-Islamic inscriptions of Arabia,' we have such names as 'Ili-kariba, "My God hath blessed";' which 'served as spells for the protection of the child' who bore them.§§§§ A great number of personal names in the OT are compounded of Jahweh, El, or Baal. This custom, a survival from animism, was not intended to serve as a protection to the Divine name, which might not be uttered; the entwining of the name of the deity in the human name meant the enlisting of the power of the god on behalf of the man.* In such theomorphous names, the predicate is sometimes a verb and sometimes a noun; the subject may be at the beginning as יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, or at the end as Ναθαναήλ.† This custom is closely akin to the Hebrew one of 'calling the name over' solemnly invoking the name of a person, Divine or human, over a person or place, and thus linking them in the closest possible connexion.‡

The records of the Apostolic Church furnish us with several such names, as Ἀνανίας (Ananias),§ the Gr. form of the Heb. אֲנָנְיָה ('Jahweh hath been gracious'); Ματθαῖος (Matthias),|| an abbreviation of Ματθαῖος, the Gr. form of מַתְתָּי ('gift of Jahweh'); Γαμαλιήλ (Gamaliel),¶ the Heb. form of which, גַּמְלִי'אל, means 'reward of God.' Βαρνάβας (Barnabas), formerly taken as the Greek form of Βαρναβη, is in reality a form of a recently discovered Semitic name, Βαρνεβους, and is בְּרִנְיָה ('son of Nebo'). Demetrius is another instance of the same thing.†† It was not uncommon to brand or tatu the name of the deity on the person by whose name he was called. It is possible that St. Paul was alluding to some such mark on himself when he speaks of bearing 'branded on my body the marks of Jesus,'‡‡ and the custom is clearly alluded to in the Apocalypse in the marking of the adherents of the Beast with his name or the number of his name,§§ and the marking of his opponents with the seal of the living God.||| In Greece we have clear traces, in such names as Apollodorus, Zeno, and Diogenes, of the incorporation of a divine name in a human one.

As the members of communities increased and nations grew larger, necessity demanded that individuals bearing the same name should be differentiated one from another. This was done as a rule by making an addition to the original name. This addition might be the name of the father, the name of some place with which the individual was specially connected, or another name in some cases in a different language. All these cases are dealt with in the art. SURNAME.

Names, like other words, were, in course of general use, subject to slight alterations, the most important of which may be classed under—

(a) Abbreviations and diminutives.—A number of these occur in the apostolic writings; thus Apollonius is shortened into Apollos (Ac 18:24); Ampliatius into Amplias (Ro 16:8); Demetrius into Demas (Ac 19:24, 3 Jn 12, 2 Ti 4:10, etc.); Epaphroditus into Epaphras (Ph 2:25, etc., Col 4:12, etc.); Hermogenes (like Hermagoras and Hermodorus) into Hermas (Ro 16:14, 2 Ti 1:15, and the author of the Pastor); Lucanus into Lucas (Philem 24, etc.); Lucius into Lucullus (Ac 13:1, Ro 16:21); Silvanus into Silas (Ac 15:2, etc., 2 Co 1:19, etc.); Olympiodorus into Olympas (Ro 16:15); Prisca into Priscilla (Ac 18:2, Ro 16:3, etc.); Parmenides into Parmenas (Ac 6:9); Tertius into Tertullus (Ac 24:2, Ro 16:22); Theodorus into Theudas (Ac 5:36); and, if Nymphas be the correct reading of Col 4:15, it is probably a contraction of Nymphodorus.

Nicknames.—Just as names were originally given on account of some peculiarity in or about a person, so in later times any such peculiarity was apt through ridicule or contempt to result in a nickname.

An inscription, indicating the holders of seats in the theatre of Miletus, reads 'Place of the Jews who are called Θεοσεβίται.' The designation is evidently a nickname given to the Jews on account of their religion. In the times of the Dispersion,

* Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, 2 vols., 1903, i. 266; R. R. Marett, The Threshold of Religion, 1914, p. 62.

† EBi iii. 3279. ‡ Jb. iii. 3266. § Ac 5:19. || Ac 1. ¶ Ac 5:34.  Gal 6:17. †† Rev 7:9-14. ‡‡ Gal 6:17. §§ Rev 13:17-14:1. ||| Gal 6:17. * Gal 6:17. ††† Rev 13:17-14:1. †††† Rev 13:17-14:1. ††††† Rev 13:17-14:1.

* ERE i. 497. † Ac 18:2. ‡ Ezr 2:46, Ac 11:28; ExpT ix. [1897-98] 567. § Ac 17:34; HDB i. 545. || Ac 9:36; G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, 1901, p. 189. ¶ Ac 12:13.  Ac 4:6, etc. †† Ro 16:8. ‡‡ Ph 2:25. §§ Ac 11:3. || Ro 16:13. ¶¶ Ac 25:13.  Philem 10. ††† 2 Ti 1:15-4:19. †††† Ac 13:1; Deissmann, op. cit. p. 310. ††††† Rev 12:7; T. K. Cheyne speaks of Michael as 'a degraded (but an honourably degraded) deity,' 'a reflexion, not only of Mithra, but of Marduk,' as the repository of the Name of God—'one might say that he is the Name of God' (Exp, 7th ser., i. [1906] 299; ExpT xvi. [1904-05] 147, 193, 237). ||| Lk 1:19. ¶¶ E. Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 1894, p. 56.  F. Hommel, Ancient Hebrew Tradition, 1897, pp. 60-72; L. R. Farnell, Greece and Babylon, 1911, p. 195. †††† Hommel, p. 80. ††††† Critical Review, vii. [1897] 413. §§§§ Farnell, op. cit. p. 195.

many Gentiles were attracted by the monotheism and imageless worship of the Jews, and yet refused to be circumcised or observe all the commands of the Law. Such individuals, loosely attached to the Jews, were nicknamed φοβούμενοι or σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν. Similarly the followers of Jesus were nicknamed 'Christianoí, "Christ's people," a base-Latin improvisation by the people of Antioch, who were notorious in antiquity for impudent wit.*

2. Names of sects and parties.—Somewhat akin to nicknames are such names as Herodian,† evidently that of a freedman of one of the Herods. These again lead on to names of sects or parties which are derived from (a) persons, e.g. 'Epicureans,' ‡ from Epicurus the founder of the school; 'Nicolaitans,' most probably from a certain Nicolas,§ the originator of the heresy; 'Sadducees,' from Zadok.||

(b) Others again are derived from places, e.g. 'Nazarenes' ¶—a term applied to the followers of Jesus from a name given to Him from the town in which He had been brought up; 'Stoics,' from the στώδ, the painted porch in which Zeno the founder taught.

(c) Other such appellations are derived from some peculiarity; thus 'Hellenists' †† is a name given to certain Jews who spoke Greek; 'Libertines' †‡ to the descendants or Jews who had been slaves; 'Pharisees' §§ from the Hebrew פְּרִישִׁים (Aram. פְּרִישִׁין, stat. emphat. פְּרִישִׁין), meaning 'the separated,' those who had separated themselves from all uncleanness and illegality, and from all unclean persons.

3. Names and titles.—It does not fall within the scope of this article to consider how an ordinary word such as εὐλογητός,||| 'blessed,' almost becomes, if not a name, a title; nor how such a word as 'apostle' acquired a restricted meaning, and became a title; or again how such a title as 'high priest' ¶¶ was bestowed on a single individual, as our Lord; nor yet how the name of an individual, as 'Adam,'  was applied to Him to bring out some particular function; but we can see the word Χριστός passing from a title 'Jesus the Christ' into a personal name 'Jesus Christ.' ††† A religion in its attempts to gain men from another faith finds the task easier if it can appropriate and employ names which custom has made familiar to them.††. The religion of Jesus, when it entered the Roman world, could not apply to Him the names of the pagan deities—these indeed it degraded into demons—but familiar appellations could be used to convey kindred but higher truths. Κυριος is an Oriental term expressing absolute dominion and absolute submission. The LXX used it to translate the exalted name Jahweh. §§§ In Oriental cults it expressed such an abject relation between a worshipper and his deity. 'The Lord Serapis' occurs in papyri of the 2nd cent. A.D. |||| The title came to be given to the Roman Emperors. On an ostrakon dated A.D. 63 Nero is called 'Lord,' and Festus referring to him speaks of writing τω κυρίῳ. ¶¶¶ An inscription at Philæ dated 62 B.C. calls Ptolemy XIII. 'the lord king god.'* We can appreciate at once the necessity and the advantage of the Christians applying this word to Jesus, making

* Jos. Ant. xiv. vii. 2; Ac 102--1316.26.43.50 1614 174 17 187; E. Schürer, IJP ii. ii. (1885) 808, 814; Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 1911, p. 446; II DB I. 384; Ac 1126; T. R. Glover, The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire, 1909, p. 151.

† Ro 1611. † Ac 1718. § Rev 25.15, Ac 65. || Ac 41, etc.; Exp, 8th ser., vi. [1913] 158. ¶ Ac 245, Mt 22p.  Ac 1718. † Ac 61 (920 1120 7). †† Ac 69. §§ Ac 155, etc.; Schürer, IJP ii. ii. 19. ††† 2 Co 1131, Ro 126 95. ¶¶ Ac 11e 31, etc.  1 Co 1543. ††† DCG ii. 171, 219; Exp, 8th ser., vii. [1914] 205. ††† L. R. Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, 1905, p. 32. §§§ Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 353. |||| Jb. pp. 168, 176. ¶¶¶ Jb. p. 353; Ac 2526. * Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 350.

Him at once the equal of Jahweh, and making His position intelligible to the whole pagan world.* Hence they proclaimed Jesus to be 'both Lord and Christ,' 'Lord of all,' 'Lord both of the dead and of the living,' 'the Lord from heaven,' 'our only liege and Lord.'† Hence, as the Egyptians of the 2nd cent. A.D. spoke of 'the table of the lord Serapis,' St. Paul spoke of 'the table of the Lord,'‡ just as 'Sebaste day,' meaning 'Emperor's day,' is paralleled by 'the Lord's day.'§ It is this consciousness of the spiritual proprietorship of Jesus that makes plain the meaning of St. Paul when he says: 'No one can say Jesus is Lord except in the Holy Spirit,' and 'Confess with your mouth that Jesus is Lord, believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, and you will be saved.'|| βασιλεύς was a popular title for princes in the Hellenistic East, and was bestowed on the Emperor. The still higher title βασιλεὺς βασιλέων was the lofty designation of great monarchs and was given to the gods. At the beginning of the Christian epoch it was borne by the monarchs of Armenia, the Bosporan kingdom, and Palmyra. It was applied to Jahweh. This exalted name the Christians ascribed to Jesus.¶ The designation σωτήρ ('saviour') was from an early period attached to Zeus, and in feminine form to Kore, in her case connoting salvation after death. The Alexandrian Greeks used it 'to sanctify the divine man, God's representative on earth, the living image of God,' as the monarch was called. When Demetrius Poliorcetes restored the Athenian democracy in 307 B.C., the Athenians decreed divine honours to him under the title 'Saviour God,' and altars and priests were appointed to him.†† Philip of Macedon was called σωτήρ, Ptolemy viii. (113 B.C.) called himself σωτήρ.‡‡ Inscriptions show that on Julius Caesar and many other Emperors there had been bestowed the title 'Saviour of the world.' The word was used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew מָשִׁיחַ. This title became a designation of Jesus; He is exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour,§§ and the still more universal title 'Saviour of the World,' very common in inscriptions for Hadrian, is also ascribed to Him.||| The title θεοῦ υἱός was a technical term familiar in the Empire in the 1st cent. A.D. We have it on an inscription of Olympia, not later than 27 B.C., and in a Fayyum inscription dated A.D. 7. This too the followers of Jesus applied to Him.¶¶ It is an all-important fact that the chief names given to Jesus 'were precisely those accorded to the Emperors dead and living, his titles the highest which adorned the Imperial ruler.' Other names like Σεβαστος really come under the designation of titles, and so too Ἀρεοπαγίτης, 'the Areopagite,' applied to Dionysius.†††

4. Names of divinities.—In the evolution of religion one of the earliest and lowest stages is that in which the spirits, not having attained sufficient individuality to be possessed of personal names, are addressed, as among the Phœnicians, by such common terms as 'Lord,' or 'Chentamentet,' as among the Egyptians.††† This stage

* Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 354. † Ac 236 1036, Ro 149, 1 Th 416, 2 Th 17 Jude 4 (1 Co 1547); Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 359.

‡ Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 355. § Jb. p. 361; Rev 110. || 1 Co 123, Ro 109; Exp, 7th ser., vii. [1909] 292, 297; ERE ii. 378.

¶ Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 367; Exp, 7th ser., vii. 206; 2 Mac 134 3 Mac 536, 1 Ti 618, Rev 1714 1916.

 Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 33. †† J. G. Frazer, GB, pt. i., The Magic Art, 1911, i. 390.

‡‡ Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, pp. 373, 374. §§ Ac 631, Ph 320; Exp, 7th ser., vii. 293, 298.

|| Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 369; 1 Jn 414; DCG ii. 673.

¶¶ Exp, 7th ser., vii. 203, 301; Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 166, Light from the Anc. East, p. 350; Ac 837, etc.

 Exp, 7th ser., vii. 294, 301. ††† Ac 2521. 25 1734. F. B. Jevons, Comparative Religion, 1913, p. 129.

is exhibited in the religion of the primitive Aryans, and even in the later cults of the Hindus, Persians, Thracians, Teutons, Greeks, Romans, and Amerinds.* Some deities remain in this state, some become departmental deities, others functional deities (Sondergotter), while others, who manifest themselves in a plant, animal, planet, or tree, are named after it.† In course of time this designation, the meaning having been forgotten, becomes a proper name representing an individual deity. Gods with names become, in this way, a distinct class of divinities.‡ To a divinity with a distinct name the path of advancement is open. The name would be either masculine or feminine, and that itself would gradually determine status, functions, and ritual.§ Epithets applied to such a deity, as 'Adon' or 'Melech,' became cult titles (though sometimes they developed into distinct deities). Further, such a divinity might come to exercise functions besides those to which he owed his origin and name, and these outside the locality in which he had been primarily worshipped, thus attaining higher status and greater dignity.¶ Again, his name and functions might make him so real to his worshippers that they represented him by a human or semi-human figure,‡ expressing the physical characteristics, and even the moral qualities, of the deity. Such a deity had the chance of becoming a tribal god. On the other hand, a tribal hero or medicine man, having the initial advantage of a name, might be deified and become in time the tribal god in accordance with the Euhemeristic theory.†† When a tribe with such a deity developed into or was merged in a nation the qualities and functions of the tribal deity might be taken over by another deity (syncretism), or the deity might become one of the members of a pantheon, or even, like Zeus, the supreme national god.‡‡ In all this we see a trend towards monotheism and the final conception of the unity of the Godhead.§§ Through some such stages as these Jahweh had advanced till the Hebrews in their conception of Him had become monotheists.¶¶ In the age of Jesus that name in Greek, Κυριος or simply Θεος, had come to denote the supreme and only God.‡‡ It was one of the great achievements of Jesus to fill these names with richer, finer meaning by revealing new and higher attributes of the Godhead.¶ The transference of the name Κυριος to Jesus marks the awakening of the Church to a true appreciation of His Divinity (Ac 1¹. 11. 14. 16 in contrast with v. 21). While the Jews and Christians were thus monotheists, they still continued to believe in a variety of subordinate spirits, some of whom were but nameless, departmental, or functional deities, while others had attained to distinct names, as Satan, Michael (Jude⁹, Rev 12⁷), Gabriel (Lk 1¹⁹ 26), Raphael (To 12¹⁵), Uriel (2 Es 5²⁰). In the Gentile world the development had not reached but only tended towards monotheism, Zeus (Ac 14¹². 13) being recognized only as the king of a countless crowd of deities. Among them there stood out local deities who had got distinct names, as Artemis of Ephesus (19²³), Mars (17¹⁹), and Hermes, the messenger and speaker for the gods (14¹²), or the Dioscuri, the twin gods Castor and Pollux (28¹¹).

5. Name and personality.—At a very early period men came to feel that there was a material and mysterious but essential connexion between the person or thing and its name. To them names were not, as with us, mere meaningless designations, symbols without significance which could be changed without affecting the thing or person; nomina were numina, not even essential attributes, but possessed of a certain independent existence, yet part and parcel of the personality, and therefore supremely important as affecting and affected by a person's good or evil fortune.* The name was a kind of 'alter ego,' a vital portion of the man himself, and to be taken care of accordingly.†

Such a belief is found among the Amerind tribes, the Australians, the proto-Aryans, and almost all other races.‡ The ancient Britons held that the soul and the name were the same.§ Among the Annamese when a child continues ill, the parents sell it to someone who gives it a new name and it is then, being a completely different person, re-sold to its parents.¶ A young Caffre thief can be reformed by shouting his name into a kettle of boiling medicated water, clapping on the lid, and allowing the name (i.e. him) to steep there for several days.‡ The Mesopotamians so identified the name and the person that the name was the personality. In their religion, as in the Mandæan, Persian, and other cults, the name of the deity is itself a part of the divine essence.

'The Aryan-speaking peoples "believed at one time not only that the name was a part of the man, but that it was that part of him which is termed the soul, the breath of life."†† Among the Egyptians the name was "an imperishable component of the Ego, on a footing of equality with soul, form, heart, etc., for they held "that an inward and indissoluble connexion subsists between an object and its name."‡‡ Hence it was necessary that the name should be kept fresh, for so close was the connexion that the continued existence of the name was essential to the immortality of the person.§§ A man prayed for his name to be mentioned, or libations poured out in his name, and monuments were raised with the name on them so that it might live. The Pharaoh sacrificed captives to perpetuate his name, and all vassals took the oath by the royal name. In the Papyri, especially in indictments, there occurs the phrase εὐτεύεις εἰς τὸ τοῦ βασιλέως ὄνομα, a memorial to the king's majesty, the name of the king being the essence of what he is as ruler. Inscriptions mention the fact of purchasing εἰς τὸ τοῦ θεοῦ ὄνομα, the nominal purchaser purchasing for the god.¶¶ Sometimes the name became almost a separate personality. 'In the Tabulae Iguvine; . . . the god Grabovius is implored to be propitious to the "Arx Fisia" and to "the name of the Arx Fisia," as if the name of the city was a living and independent entity.'‡‡

This practical identification of the person and the name gave rise to a number of practices. The name was honoured equally with the person.

The Egyptian kings made offerings to the names of their predecessors; honour was paid to the name of Pharaoh, while the

* Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 32; E. Clodd, Tom Tit Tot, 1893, p. 53.

† H. J. D. Astley, in Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religion, I. 266; Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 134; HDB v. 640; A. C. Haddon, Magic and Fetishism, 1906, p. 22. The close connexion between a name and the thing is echoed in the words of Milton where Adam says of the naming of the animals:

'I named them as they passed, and understood
Their nature' (Paradise Lost, viii. 353).

‡ Frazer, GE3, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, 1911, pp. 318-320.

§ C. Squire, The Mythology of the British Islands, new ed., 1910, p. 236.

¶ ERE i. 543.

‡‡ Frazer, GE3, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 331.

 A. H. Sayce, Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion (HL, 1887), 1891, p. 302; cf. ExpT xxiii. [1911-12] 9.

†† J. Rhys, quoted by Haddon, p. 23.

‡‡ HDB v. 151a.

§§ Id.; Exp, 7th ser., x. [1910] 122.

¶ Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 146, 147.

‡‡ Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 186.

* ERE i. 462, ii. 285; Jevons, Comparative Religion, pp. 125, 129, The Idea of God in Early Religions, 1910, p. 65; J. H. Moulton, Early Religious Poetry of Persia, 1911, pp. 32, 55.

† Jevons, Comparative Religion, pp. 91, 92, 117; ERE i. 352, ii. 35; see also the classification of Rose quoted in PEFSt xlvi. [1914] 206.

‡ Jevons, Comparative Religion, p. 129.

§ Id. pp. 126-128. ¶ Id.

¶ ERE ii. 38, 39.

 Id. ii. 50; Jevons, The Idea of God in Early Religions, p. 261.

†† W. G. Aston, Shinto, 1907, p. 8.

‡‡ Id. p. 10; 2 K 17²⁸⁻²⁹.

§§ Jevons, The Idea of God in Early Religions, p. 23.

¶ Jevons, Comparative Religion, pp. 125-129.

 S. R. Driver, 'Recent Theories on the Origin and Nature of the Tetragrammaton,' Studia Biblica, 1885, p. 1 ff.; T. G. Pinches, PSBA xiv. [1892] 13, 'The Religious Ideas of the Babylonians,' Transactions of the Victorian Institute, xxviii. [1896] 11; Thomas Tyler, 'The Origin of the Tetragrammaton,' JQR xiii. [1901] 581 ff.

secret names of the gods of Egypt were specially honoured.* Passages in the OT, too numerous to quote, indicate the great place this conception had in the minds of the Hebrews. There is a glory due to Jahweh's name; men are to sing forth the glory of His name, to exalt His name, to sing praises to His name, to bless His name, to fear His glorious and fearful name, and even to love His name.†

Our Lord carried forward to deeper meaning the ancient usage when He prayed, 'Father, glorify thy name,' and when He taught His disciples to pray 'May thy name be revered.' Through a process of thought to be explained immediately the name of Jesus came to be similarly honoured. Through certain occurrences at Ephesus the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified, the Thessalonians were entreated to live so that the name of the Lord Jesus might be glorified in them; while the saints are described as those who reverence, fear, and glorify the name.‡ Here it is necessary strongly to emphasize the fact that similarity of expression does not necessarily imply identity of meaning. In the realm of ideas a word or expression may have its content essentially changed. But the change is ever gradual, hence the exact meaning at any one moment is reached only when the evolution which preceded and which followed becomes clear. This is especially true of the Apostolic Age when through the welter of religions many expressions were in a constant state of flux. The practical identity of the name and the personality implied further that the continuance of the personality depended on the continuance of the name.

In Egypt 'one could do nothing better for any one than by inscriptions and representations to "cause his name to live," and nothing worse than to allow it to perish.§ The god Amon assures Ramses III. that 'as long as heaven endures thy name shall endure, and shall grow eternally.¶ The Egyptians of all classes erased the names and figures of their enemies from tombs and memorials.¶ Amenhotep IV. went even further, and through the whole country erased the name of the god Amen whose worship he had forsaken. In Mesopotamia the preservation of names was of unique importance. 'Terrible curses are denounced [by the kings] against those who should destroy or injure "the writing of their names."†† This belief in connexion with the worship of ancestors deeply influenced the mind of the Jew. Jahweh is represented as saying of His enemies, 'Let me alone, that I may destroy them, and blot out their name from under heaven.' The Levirate marriage was enforced that the firstborn son of a woman by her deceased husband's brother should 'succeed in the name of his brother who is dead, that his name be not blotted out of Israel.' The writer of Ecclesiastes describes the sad case of a man 'who begets an hundred children, and lives many years, so that the days of his years are many, but his soul is not filled with good, and moreover he has no burial, i.e. has no tomb with his name on it, because 'an untimely birth is better than he, for it comes in vanity, and departeth in darkness, and the name thereof is covered with darkness.' The fiercest hatred is that of those who say 'when will he die, and his name perish,' while the glory of the Messianic King is that 'his name shall endure for ever, his name shall have issue as long as the sun.'‡‡

In the Apostolic Age we find this conception linked with another widely spread idea that in heaven there is a register of life, the insertion in which of a person's name ensures to him the certainty of a blessed immortality, and identification in the other world, as with us the insertion of a person's name in a voter's roll entitles the person to exercise his vote, or his enrolment in a society opens to him the privilege of that society. Our Lord calls upon His disciples to rejoice because their 'names are enrolled in heaven.' St. Paul describes his fellow-workers as those 'whose names are in the book of life.' In the same way the omission, or non-insertion, or erasure of the name indicates the exclusion from all such privileges.

* ERE i. 440b; G. Ebers, Joshua, Eng. tr., 2 vols., 1890, i. 79; Sayce, p. 802.

† Ps 29 34³ 66² 69³ 90² 100⁴ 135³, Dt 25³⁸. For the honour given to the name of God, of Moses, and of a king see ERE, 8th ser., viii. 807.

‡ Jn 12²⁷, Mt 6⁹, Lk 11², Ac 19¹⁷, 2 Th 1¹², Rev 11¹⁸ 15⁴.

§ Erman, p. 162. ¶ Ib. p. 283.

¶ Ib. p. 162; ERE, 7th ser., x. 122.

 W. M. F. Petrie, A History of Egypt, ii. [1896] 212.

†† Sayce, p. 304.

‡‡ Dt 9¹⁴ 25⁶ 29²⁰, Ec 6³ 4, Ps 41⁷ 72¹⁷.

The friends of the Beast are those 'whose names have not been written from the foundation of the world in the book of life'; while of the victors of Sardis it is said: 'The conqueror shall be clad in white raiment; I will never erase his name from the book of life.'*

6. Name and 'mana.'—In the earlier culture man is conscious of two kinds of causation. The first is mechanical, effected by the body itself, or by it through tools or weapons. The second may be named spiritual. Man at this stage of his development is keenly conscious of the unusual, the abnormal, the awful, the uncanny. Objects which in any way exhibit such a peculiarity are to him endowed with a mysterious power, technically called mana.† A savage suddenly comes on a stone shaped like a yam. 'Ah,' he exclaims, 'you have mana.' He buries it beside the yams he has planted, and feels certain of a bountiful crop. Knowing that a lion is strong, i.e. has mana, he eats its heart, and its mana passes into him: for there is in primitive man a strong tendency to imagine that the cause of every phenomenon is a personal one.‡ In the lower culture, as we have seen, the personality was thought of as something not concentrated, say, in the will, but rather as diffused, hence the mana of any living being—whatever its potency might be—was thought of as residing not merely in him, but also in different parts of him, and in things separable from, yet closely connected with, his person, as clothes, shadow, hair, nail-pairings, and spittle. The shadow of St. Peter, the towels or aprons used by St. Paul, the spittle of our Lord were each charged with the mana of the person himself.§ But the personality and therefore the mana was specially concentrated in and discharged from the name. In the lower culture any person divine or human has more or less mana, and in consequence is anxious to possess, and so be able to use, that of others. Hence arises the absorbing desire to know names, for to know a name is to have power over the person, even to the extent of compelling him, by the proper use of his name, to use his mana. 'He who has the name can dispose of the power of its bearer';|| for barbaric man believes that his name is a vital part of himself, and 'to know the name is to put its owner, whether he be deity, ghost, or mortal, in the power of another.'¶ This knowledge could be employed in a variety of ways. The presence and power of a spirit could be ensured by naming it. 'Speak of the devil and he will appear.'

The pontiffs of Rome possessed among their books the Indigitamenta, a list of the names of the spirits who guarded every action with which a man was concerned. By invoking any name they could call its power into action against any person and consequently have him at their mercy. Odin

* Lk 10²⁰, Ph 4³, Rev 3⁵ 13⁸ 17⁸.

† R. H. Codrington's definition is quoted with approval by Frazer, GB, pt. i., The Magic Art, i. 227; R. R. Marett, 'The Conception of Mana,' in Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, i. 48, and practically all the leading anthropologists. δυναμις is possibly the nearest Greek equivalent. In the magical literature of the age of Paul ἐξουσία is not exactly 'power,' but rather 'the supernatural power which depends on a supernatural knowledge' (H. A. A. Kennedy, Exp, 8th ser., lv. [1912] 308).

‡ For the same reason hero warriors were eaten: Clodd, p. 69; ERE i. 521, 530, 574; Gilbert Murray, Four Stages of Greek Religion, 1912, p. 87; W. R. Halliday, Greek Divination, 1913, p. 17.

§ E. S. Hartland, Report of the British Association, 1906, 1907, p. 677; Ac 6¹⁵ 19¹², Jn 9⁹, Mk 7³³ 8²³; ERE i. 542; Clodd, p. 57. After death the mana might continue to reside in these and in the bones. The doctrine of relics is based on this idea. Newman says, 'each particle of each relic has in it at least a dormant, perhaps an energetic, virtue of supernatural operation' (Present Position of Catholics, 1851, p. 296).

¶ IUDB v. 131; T. K. Chene, Traditions and Beliefs of Ancient Israel, 1907, p. 401 n.

¶ Clodd, p. 53 f.

 F. Granger, The Worship of the Romans, 1895, pp. 157, 277; Clodd, p. 177; W. Smith, DGRA, 1875, p. 941.

made the brute creation and brought them to him to see what he would name them.*

In the writings of the Apostolic Age this conception has passed into that of creation by word. 'The world was fashioned by the word of God'; 'the earth by the word of God was formed of water and by water'; for 'God calls into being what does not exist.'†

7. Name and tabu.—As primitive man regarded his name as a vital portion of himself he took extraordinary care of it; he kept it secret. This was necessary, for if it was known and properly used in a correct formula by an enemy, the wish of his enemy immediately took effect.‡

The Amerinds believed in a personal soul which was neither the bodily life nor yet mental power, but a kind of third soul, or spiritual body. This had a very intimate connexion with the name. It was believed by many of the tribes to come into existence with the name; hence the personal name was sacred and rarely uttered, for it was part of the individuality, and through it the soul could be injured.§ Savages have strong objections to uttering their own names. This is true of the Australians, the Tasmanians, the Amerinds, and the primitive Scots and Irish. In Abyssinia the real, i.e. the baptismal, name is kept secret, and is only used in church services, such as prayers for the dead. The people of Torres Straits, like those of the west of Ireland, refuse to tell their names; for their doing so would put them in the power of the person to whom they were told, who could thus work his will upon them.¶ A person's name must not be uttered by one related to him by blood and especially by marriage. This prevails among the South African tribes, those of Borneo, and North America. Among the Ainu a woman must not pronounce her husband's name; to do so would be to bring harm on him.¶ An Abipone will not commit the sin of uttering his own name, for that would be literally 'to give himself away,' though he does not object to mention that of other people. Cases are known where a man had completely forgotten his own name, and was thus saved from the possible mistake of inadvertently letting it become known.†† Among the Battaks . . . a man, on becoming the father of a boy, N.N., is henceforth known only as 'father of N.N.'‡‡ An Amazulu woman must not name her husband, but calls him 'the father of N.' meaning the child.§§ So the Hindu wife speaks of her husband as 'he,' the English wife of hers as 'my man' or 'my master,' while the Scotch woman uses 'oor ain.' The expressions 'the mother of Sisera,' 'Peter's wife's mother,' 'the mother of Zebedee's children,' are familiar instances of the same practice.¶¶

In the Apostolic Age we meet with the same thing. Nothing so preserved a man from evil as keeping his name strictly sacred. The Christian of Pergamum who, fighting his moral battle in the place 'where Satan sits enthroned,' has not renounced his faith but adhered to God's name, is assured of his ultimate triumph, for to him is given 'a new name, unknown to any except him who receives it.' He who is known to men as the 'Logos of God,' or the 'King of kings and Lord of lords,' is assured of victory as He rides forth on His white horse, for 'he bears a written name which none knows but himself.'¶¶

The fact that the Flamen Dialis was forbidden not only to touch but even to name certain animals and things carries the tabu on names forward into other regions.

The names of the dead were kept secret, for if a dead man heard his name, he would at once return.†††

Among the Greeks, therefore, it was customary to pass graves,

* Gn 13 218-25. Cf. Ahuna-Vairya (ERE i. 238).

† He 113, 2 P 35, Ro 417; C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, 1912, p. 82.

‡ Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 318; HDB v. 181.

§ Haddon, p. 23; Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 319; Anthropological Essays, ed. W. H. R. Rivers, R. R. Marett, N. W. Thomas, 1907, p. 91.

¶ Exp. 8th ser., v. [1913] 311; Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 327; Clodd, pp. 81, 82, 83, 84, 92, 94; Haddon, p. 22.

¶¶ Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 335; Clodd, p. 115; ERE i. 251.

 Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 328. †† HDB v. 181.

‡‡ Quoted by Robertson, p. 49 n.

§§ Clodd, p. 117. ¶¶ Jg 5, Mt 8. 20.

¶¶ Rev 217, 1912. 13. 16.  Granger, p. 142 f.

††† Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, pp. 349, 353.

especially those of heroes, in silence.* Among the Abipones all mention of the dead was avoided, and the relatives of the dead changed their names.† This custom prevailed among the Amerinds, Australians, Albanians, Tasmanians, Shetlanders,‡ etc. Our Lord in calling Lazarus from the dead expressly named him.§ The Amerinds and others, by solemnly conferring the name of a dead person on a living one, thereby caused the latter to become an Incarnation of the dead.¶ Certain ceremonies of naming and a certain type of name may have sprung from this custom.

Secrecy in regard to the name was also observed in the case of exalted personages. Instances of this in the case of kings have been collected from many parts of the world.¶

The British sovereign is rarely spoken of by his name, 'His Majesty' or 'the King' being generally employed. In the British House of Commons a member is not addressed by his name, but as 'the member for N.' and the first step in punishing a member is 'to name him,' thus bringing the offender out of his impersonal sacredness.

The tabu on the name was still more important in the case of those connected with divinities and in that of the divinities themselves, as the nearer to the divine, or the more divine a person was, the greater the potency dwelling in his name.

A priest of Eleusis on taking office assumed a holy and hidden name which was written on a tablet and cast into the sea, and when he died that name became the one by which he was known. The real name of Confucius is so sacred that it is a punishable offence to utter it.†† The Oyampis never name a waterfall till they have passed it, lest the sacred snake in it might on hearing the name attack them.‡‡ The Egyptians relate that the name of the god Ra was uttered by his parents and then concealed in him by them in such a way that it was impossible for any spell to bewitch him. But Isis managed to worm it out of him and thus became his superior in power.§§ We do not know how the real name of Ra or Amon was pronounced. In a Leiden papyrus a magician says, 'I am he to whom . . . thou didst grant the γνῶσις of thy mighty name, which I shall keep secret, sharing it with no one.'¶¶ Examples from various parts of the world have been collected showing that the true names of the gods were kept secret.¶¶ Heroes, giants, and fairies all kept their names secret. The Algonquins venerated a woman who came down from the skies, and whose name was too sacred to be spoken.††† Allah is but an epithet in place of the Most Great Name; for the secret of the latter is committed to prophets and apostles alone.††† In the vocabulary of the original Aryan language, the real names of the gods cannot be proved.§§§ This holds true in all the religions of the Mediterranean race, for the divine name was felt to be part of the divine essence and itself of supernatural potency.¶¶¶ The Romans called their chief goddess the Dea Dia, but this was a mere adjectival description employed because of the fear of mentioning the real name.¶¶¶ The Roman pontiffs concealed the true names of their gods, and especially of the guardian deity of Rome, lest they should be wrongly used by unauthorized persons or an enemy.* 'It was improper to mention the personal name of the δαδούχος at Athens on account of his sacred character.'†††† Many divinities were invoked as πολυώνυμοι ('thou god of many names'), all possible titles of power being summed up in one word.†††† Aeschylus speaks of 'Zeus, whoever the god is,' and Euripides refers to the enlightened man 'who knows the silent names of the gods.'§§§§ Pausanias, speaking of Pallantion, says 'There is a temple of Θεοί still standing on the top of the ridge: they are called Καθαροί, and oaths on matters of the greatest import are taken before them. The people do not know their names, or knowing them are unwilling to pronounce them.'¶¶¶¶ On

* Anthropological Essays, p. 92.

† ERE i. 29.

‡ Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, pp. 349, 354; Clodd, pp. 166, 168, 171.

§ Jn 1143.

¶ Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 365.

¶¶ Id. pp. 374-382; Clodd, p. 157.

¶¶¶ Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 332; Clodd, p. 162 ff.

¶¶¶ Clodd, p. 190.

¶¶¶ Frazer, GB, pt. i., The Magic Art, ii. 156.

¶¶¶ Maspero, p. 162; Erman, p. 265 ff.; Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 337; HDB v. 181; Clodd, p. 180 ff.

¶¶¶ Exp. 8th ser., iv. [1912] 309.

¶¶¶ Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 337.

¶¶¶ Clodd, pp. 27, 49, 50.

††† ERE i. 322b.

††† Haddon, p. 24; ERE i. 326; Clodd, p. 189.

§§§ ERE ii. 35.

¶¶ Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 32.

¶¶¶ ERE ii. 11.

¶¶¶ Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 185; Clodd, p. 174; Frazer, GB, pt. ii., Taboo and the Perils of the Soul, p. 391.

††† Anthropological Essays, p. 91.

††† Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, pp. 185, 187, and the reference there to Agni.

§§§ Quoted by Farnell, Id.

¶¶¶ Anthropological Essays, p. 83.

a tablet of lead found at Hadrumetum occurs the phrase ὁρκίζω σε το ἀνὸν ὄνομα ὃ οὐ λέγεται ('I adjure thee by the sacred name which is not uttered'). On a papyrus a demon is adjured κατὰ τὴν φύσιν τοῦ ὀνόματός.^{*} When Herodotus says that the Pelasgian deities were nameless, he means that the names were kept secret, for a god is not nameless because he is not named or addressed only by a simple appellation.[†] The writer of a Babylonian penitential psalm invokes a deity 'whom he knew not' because probably he is thus deprecating the wrath of some offended deity with whose name he was unacquainted.[‡]

Among the inhabitants of Palestine the name of Jahweh was invoked at the different shrines.[§] But gradually the rites of the cult were concentrated at the Jerusalem Temple. There Jahweh caused His name to dwell.[¶] It thus became the only place in which that name could be pronounced, another being used in ordinary places and at ordinary times.[‡] Tradition says it was uttered even in the Temple only once in the year when the high priest entered the Holy of Holies.^{} But the name did not, as in some other cults, develop into a separate deity. Among the Palestinian Jews the name speedily became an ὄνομα ἀρρήτων.^{††} It was not to be blasphemed,^{‡‡} nor profaned as by using it in swearing falsely,^{§§} nor 'taken in vain,'^{||} for Jahweh would only be further and more fiercely enraged by any attempt to conjure with His name.^{¶¶} 'Rabbinic mysticism was deeply concerned with the history of the hidden divine name.' In the Ethiopic Enoch one of the evil angels asks Michael 'to show him the hidden name.' 'The mystical name of God is Ani we-hu, "I and he," a combination signifying the most intimate relation conceivable between God and His people.'^{} The opposite of this respectful reverence for the name of a deity is blasphemy, which may be the claim in either word or deed to do what can be done only by a god, or done in his name—a crime the Jews preferred against our Lord,^{†††} or the actual heaping of abuse on the name. When the fourth angel of the plagues poured out his bowl upon the sun, and men were scorched by its fierce heat, they 'blasphemed the name of the God who had control over the plagues.' The Beast revealed his true character in that he uttered 'blasphemies against God, to blaspheme his name.'^{††††} The conduct of the Jews who prided themselves in God, relying on the Law, and teaching it, while violating it in daily life, caused the Gentiles to 'blaspheme the name of God'; similarly Christian slaves who failed in their duty to their masters caused the name of God to be blasphemed.^{§§§} It is noticeable that immediately after our Lord's death His followers considered His name as sacred as that of Jahweh. St. Paul looking back on his pre-conversion attitude to Jesus calls himself a blasphemer, a designation the meaning of which becomes clear when we learn that the cruelty of his persecution of the Christians consisted in his compelling them to blaspheme, to pour abuse on the name of Jesus. St. James points out that the powerful plutocrats not only abused the Christians to whom he wrote but openly blasphemed the noble name they bore.

8. Exorcism in the name.—A divinity exercised power over another divinity if he possessed stronger mana than the other. When men believed that all disasters and diseases of the body and mind were caused by demons they also believed that these fell workers were controllable by powers still more mighty. 'The devils also believe [in one God], and shudder' when they think of Him.*

Disease-demons among the Malays could be cast out by invoking the spirit of some powerful beast, as an elephant or tiger.[†]

The mana of a superior divinity lay in his name, especially his secret name.[‡]

Among the Australians the name of Daramulun (a high god) was so potent, that 'Tundun' was used in place of it.[§] There is peculiar virtue in the three-fold repetition of the name of Ukko in the Kalevala.^{||}

A person, by getting to know the name and using it properly, practically identified himself with, and for the time being exercised control over, the particular divinity.[¶]

By pronouncing the Most Great Name a person could be transported from place to place, could kill the living, raise the dead, and work other miracles.^{} On a tablet from Hadrumetum a magician threatens, in order to win over a demon to obey him, that he will pronounce the unutterable name of God, the very sound of which fills the demons with shuddering dread.^{††} Lilit, Adam's first wife (says Jewish tradition), refused to obey him, pronounced the ineffable Name, and then flew away. Neither Jahweh nor the three great angels could therefore force her to return. But she was persuaded to swear by the Living God that she would not injure infants who had on them something with the names of the angels written on it; hence the infants had slips bearing their names on them. This custom is still observed among some of the Jews of London. To obtain complete power over a demon it is also necessary to learn his name; hence the question of Jesus.^{‡‡} In the magical papyri mystic names are used for expelling demons and compelling incantations.^{§§} Among the Jews the most powerful of all names was that of Jahweh. From a right use of it amulets could be obtained, anathemas launched, the sick healed, and demons put to flight;^{||} indeed the overwhelming effect of the Divine name upon the demons was a very familiar idea in post-biblical Judaism.^{¶¶} Josephus speaks of φρικτὸν ὄνομα τοῦ θεοῦ.^{} In the Book of Enoch an evil angel asks Michael 'to show him the hidden name.'^{†††} The Jews became noted throughout the Roman Empire as magicians, mathematici, etc.^{‡‡‡} Jewish ideas as to the name became connected with similar conceptions in pagan cults. 'Strong arguments' have been advanced 'for the Egyptian origin of this belief.'^{§§§} We need not therefore be astonished to find that casting out ordinary disease-demons by the princely demon Beelzebub was not an uncommon practice among the Jews in the time of our Lord.^{||} Herod^{¶¶¶} was not astonished at the miracles of Jesus because he imagined that He was John the Baptist risen from the dead and therefore possessed of very powerful mana.^{*} Jesus Himself was keenly conscious that there was within Him δυναμὶς which could pass out from Him, as well as be exercised by Him.^{††††}

In accordance with the opinion of His time, Jesus looked on some diseases as caused by the intrusion of demons, though in the great majority of His works of healing there is no reference to them. Some who were so afflicted He cured by casting out the demons.^{‡‡‡‡} It is noticeable, however, that He did this not by invoking any name, not even the Tetragrammaton; He did it 'with a word.'^{§§§§} These deeds aroused immense curiosity among the populace, and it was felt that, in some way, the mana displayed in them must be accounted for. The theory of the scribes and Pharisees was that Jesus was able to act thus through His exercise of the mana of Beelzebub.^{¶¶¶¶} Another theory was that Jesus, like John the Baptist, was possessed

* Ja 219; Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 238.

† Marett, The Threshold of Religion, p. 62, quoting Skeat.

‡ Erman, p. 354; Saxe, p. 302.

§ Marett, The Threshold of Religion, p. 167.

¶ Quoted by Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 184.

‡ Erman, p. 353.

 Haddon, p. 24.

†† Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 273.

‡‡ Mk 5, Lk 8; Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 257; Clemens, p. 236.

§§ Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 255; Exp, 8th ser., iii. 435.

|| A. Hausrath, History of NT Times, 2 vols., 1878-80, i. 125.

¶¶ Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 255.

‡‡ Exp, 8th ser., iii. 439.

§§ Ac 1913 and Roman authorities.

¶¶ Exp, 8th ser., iii. 439.

 Mk 614, or, according to BD and the Old Lat. Version, 'the people.'

* Mt 141.2.

†††† Mk 17.39; Heitmüller, p. 241; Clemens, p. 234.

‡‡‡‡ Mt 816; F. C. Conybeare, 'The Demonology of the NT,' in JQR viii. [1895-96] 536.

§§§§ Mk 520.42; Mt 879.9; Jn 520.72; Lk 436.

¶¶¶¶ Mt 1224.26; Mk 322, Lk 1113.18 (Mt 94 is probably a later insertion).

* Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 273 ff., 288, and the reference there to Josephus.

† Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 155; Anthropological Essays, p. 91.

‡ Saxe, pp. 304, 351, 353.

§ Dt 125.26; HDB iii. 479, v. 641.

¶ Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 257.

 HDB iv. 604, v. 280.

†† Lv 2416; HDB v. 280.

‡‡ Lv 1521 1912 216 222.32.

§§ Ex 207; HDB v. 640b, n.; Gesenius, Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon, 1859, p. 807.

¶¶ Am 610; HDB v. 640b, n.

 Exp, 8th ser., iii. [1912] 435.

††† Mt 93.26; Lk 521, Jn 1032.36.

‡‡ Rev 136.

§§ Rev 169; cf. vv. 11-21 131.6 173, Ro 224, 1 Ti 61.

¶¶ 1 Ti 113, Ac 2611, Ja 2.

by a demon.* Jesus Himself, in explaining how He effected the cures, uses three expressions. He did them 'by the Spirit of God,' or 'by the finger of God,' or 'in the name' of His Father.† All these expressions indicate that Jesus was conscious that He had power to master and control the demons, and that He had this given Him by God; that, far from being dependent on any demon, He had entered their house to spoil it.‡

In accordance with the ideas of the time, this extraordinarily powerful mana exhibited by our Lord was supposed to be lodged in His name, and immediately magicians began actually to effect cures by the invoking of His name.§ Jesus refused to interfere with those who did so, though they were not His professed followers,|| and even intimated that some did such miracles 'whom he knew not.'¶ The Twelve after being chosen were ordained to be with Jesus, in order that they might go forth (a) to preach, (b) to have power to heal diseases, and (c) ἐκβάλλειν τὰ δαιμόνια. When Jesus did send them forth He gave them power to cast out all unclean spirits.†† The Twelve were able to cast out the demons, though they sometimes failed in their efforts because they had so little faith.‡‡ Jesus also sent out the Seventy to heal, giving them power 'of trampling down all the power of the enemy,' and when they returned they reported that the spirits were subject to them in His name.§§ Finally, Jesus bequeathed to those who should believe power to cast out demons in His name.¶¶

After the death of Jesus the apostles continued to cure those annoyed (or roused, ὀχλουμένους) with unclean spirits and to do other wonderful works in His name.¶¶

As the Church spread through the Roman Empire it came more and more into contact with Oriental and Greek magic, and under this stimulus formulæ of exorcism in His name rapidly became popular. The origin of the Jewish belief in the efficacy of the name has been sought in Babylon and Egypt,††† but it possibly goes back to older Semitic ideas. Among the pagans the disciples effected cures through the Name, and a similar power was exercised by other Christians over spirits which came out 'shouting with a loud cry.'†††. Heitmüller argues: 'Not only the name, the outspoken, invoked name of Jesus, but also the name itself, as formula, was, according to the representation of these passages, the instrument of the miracles of the apostles. The idea underlying the passages is . . . belief in the magical potency of the name of Jesus.'§§§ Clemen is forced to admit that a magical effect is attributed to the Name in Ac 4¹⁰, and practically in Ac 36.¹⁶ 47.¹⁰ 16¹⁸, and escapes from admitting the same thing in regard to Mt 7²², Mk 16¹⁷, Lk 10¹⁷ 13²⁸ only by declaring them unhistorical.|||| He produces not an iota of evidence for the unhistoricity of these passages, and the history of the use of the Name gives their true meaning.¶¶¶ The πρεσβύτεροι in the churches of the Diaspora are instructed by St. James in cases of illness to pray over the patient, 'anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.'* Certain Jewish exorcists in Ephesus took upon themselves to effect cures, using the formula, 'I adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth.'†††† The standpoint of the post-Apostolic Church is put thus: 'Before we believed in God the habitation of our heart was corrupt and weak . . . for it was full of idolatry, and was a habitation of demons. . . . Having received the forgiveness of sins and placed our trust in the name of the Lord, we became new creatures.'††††† Hermas implies a similar use of the Name when he says, 'You can be saved from the great beast by no other than by His great and glorious name. A man cannot otherwise enter into the kingdom of God than by the name of His beloved son,' for 'whosoever does not receive His name shall not enter into the kingdom of God.* Justin is still more explicit. Jesus was conceived 'for the sake of believing men, and for the destruction of the demons.' The evidence for this is 'that numberless demoniacs throughout the whole world, and in your city many of our Christian men exorcize them in the name of Jesus Christ . . . rendering helpless and driving out of men the possessing devils.'† The power of Jesus' name, even the demons do fear, and at this day, when they are exorcized in His name, they are overcome. 'His Father has given Him so great power by virtue of which the demons are subdued by His name.'‡ 'God made it manifest that through Jesus . . . the demons would be destroyed and would dread His name.'§ 'And now we, who believe on our Lord Jesus, . . . when we exorcize all demons and evil spirits, have them subjected to us.'|| 'Every demon, when exorcized in the name of this very Son of God, . . . is overcome and subdued.'¶ Origen again writes thus: 'The names Sabaoth, Adonai, and other names . . . when pronounced with that attendant turn of circumstances which is appropriate to their nature, are possessed of great power; and other names again, current in the Egyptian tongue, are efficacious against certain demons.' 'It is not by incantations that Christians seem to prevail [over evil spirits] but by the name of Jesus, accompanied by the announcement of the narrative which relates to Him, for the repetition of these has frequently been the means of driving demons out of men, especially when those who repeated them did so in a sound and genuinely believing spirit.'†† 'Christians employ no spells or incantations, but the simple name of Jesus, and certain other words in which they repose faith.'‡‡ The name of Jesus 'has expelled myriads of evil spirits from the souls and bodies of men.'§§ Tertullian observes 'that though names be empty and feigned, yet when they are drawn down into superstition, demons and every unclean spirit seize them for themselves.'||| The name of Jesus, with other biblical names, was used as an amulet in the 3rd or 4th century.¶¶ The Maronites still cure the insane by exorcizing the evil spirit, adjuring him in the name of God, and beating the patient on the head. 'In Christian rituals, from about the year 300 on, an altar, shrine, and any other sort of building, and also "the natures" of oil, water, salt, candles, even of hassocks, have been consecrated by repeating over them the formula "in the name of Jesus Christ," or "in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."††† 'In Abyssinia, Biblical sacred names, together with a large number of fanciful appellations, . . . were magically pronounced for the purpose of warding off the power of demons and all kinds of diseases.'†††† In the Directorium Anglicanum a form is given for the exorcism of water, salt, and flowers for decoration, in the Triune Name.§§§ The practice, if we may so term it, has not yet ceased. Baroness de Bertouch tells us that Ignatius is said on one occasion, over a girl who had died of typhoid fever, to have pronounced the words, 'In the name of Jesus Christ, I say unto thee, Arise,' and the dead girl came back to life; on another, using the same formula, to have raised to life a man who had been

* Mt 11¹⁸, Jn 7²⁰ §48, §2 10²⁰.

† Mt 12²⁸, Lk 11²⁰ (cf. Jn 3², Ac 2²² 10³⁸), Jn 10²⁵.

‡ Mt 12²⁹.

§ Lk 9³⁸ 49.

|| Mk 9³⁸, Lk 9⁵⁰.

¶ Mt 7²² (cf. Lk 13²⁸; Heitmüller, p. 241).

 Mk 314.15, Mt 10¹.

†† Mt 10¹⁸, Mk 6⁷, Lk 9¹.

‡‡ Mk 6¹³, Lk 9⁸, Mt 17¹⁶ 18.20.

§§ Lk 10¹⁷ 19.

|||| Mk 16¹⁷.

¶¶ Ac 16¹⁸.

 Heitmüller, p. 185.

††† Jb. p. 218; Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 189.

†††† Ac 8⁷ 16¹⁸ 19¹¹⁻¹³.

§§§ P. 236.

¶¶¶ Clemen, pp. 234-236.

¶¶¶¶ F. C. Conybeare, Myth Magic and Morals, 1910, ch. xiii.

¶¶¶¶¶ Ja 5¹⁴.

††††† Ac 19¹³.

†††††† The Epistle of Barnabas, xvi. 7, 8.

* Hermas, Vis. iv. ii. 4; Sim. ix. xii. 5, 4.

† Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. 6.

‡ Jb. 131.

§ Jb. 55.

|| Jb. i. 6.

¶ Jb. i. 25, v. 45.

¶¶ Deissmann, Light from the Anc. East, p. 415.

¶¶¶ PEFSt, 1892, p. 144.

¶¶¶¶ Conybeare, Myth Magic and Morals, p. 243.

¶¶¶¶† Expt xxi. [1909-10] 403.

¶¶¶¶†† Directorium Anglicanum 3, ed. F. G. Lee, 1866, p. 327.

‡ Dial. 30.

|| Jb. 76.

 c. Cels. i. 25.

†† Jb.

‡‡ Idol. 15.

crushed by a crate of stone 'to a mass of pulp.'* And the ancient expression, if not the old magic meaning, still lingers in popular religious phrases, and in such hymns as 'All hail the power of Jesus' name.'

9. Baptism in the Name.—At a very early period man discovered that water removed physical impurities. Evil was primarily thought of as physical, hence water cleansed from it. When evil came to be regarded as something spiritual, washing with water developed into a ceremonial rite.† As such it removed tabus, purified from evil and acted 'as a kind of magic armour which turns aside the attacks of a visible or invisible foe.'‡ Such ceremonial or religious washing was a common practice among the nations of antiquity and remains so among the peoples of the lower culture to-day. It was a well-known rite among the Jews.§ Among the Essenes a candidate for admission to the Order, after one year's trial, entered on a second year's probation and was then allowed to share their bath of purification.|| Proselytes were admitted to the fold of Judaism by baptism, which was at once a purification from heathenism and an initiation or consecration of the convert. At this baptism there was a 'solemn invocation of the Lord as Protector.'¶

When John began his ministry he also practised baptism, explaining that it symbolized such a repentance and confession as resulted in a remission of sins. To the Pharisees this baptism appeared illegitimate and impotent, because John was destitute of mana, as was evidenced by the fact that he did not perform any sign, and that he admitted he was not the Messiah, nor Elijah, nor the Prophet.†† John's explanation was that he was merely baptizing with water, but that his successor's baptism would be baptism with the Holy Spirit and fire.‡‡

In strict conformity with this Jesus did not use water-baptism. So far as we know, He baptized none of His disciples, though His disciples (some of whom had been baptized by John) continued John's practice. This was during the early Judæan ministry.§§ After that baptism is never mentioned. There is no indication that it was practised, and of those who are said to have believed on, or followed, Jesus, there is no hint that any were baptized, though it can scarcely be doubted that the followers of Jesus, like the Jews and the Essenes, continued the ceremonial washings.

When therefore at Pentecost flames resting on the heads of those present and the descent of the Spirit fulfilled the prediction of John and of Jesus, and seemed to herald the catastrophe predicted by Joel when he only would be saved 'who invoked the name of the Lord,' St. Peter instinctively summoned his hearers to repentance, signified and symbolized by a baptism in which the name of Jesus Christ was solemnly invoked. We may well conclude that subsequent Jewish converts were baptized into the name of Jesus.¶¶ When Philip preached to the Samaritans 'good tidings concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ' the converts were 'baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.'‡‡ When St. Paul was converted he was baptized 'invoking the name' of Jesus. When the Holy Spirit descended on the Gentiles at Cæsarea, Peter 'ordered them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ.'††† When the disciples of John at Ephesus believed, 'they had themselves baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.'* That baptism into the name of Jesus was the regular practice is clear from such expressions as 'baptized into Christ Jesus,' 'was it in Paul's name that you were baptized?,' 'no one can say you were baptized in my name,' 'baptized into Moses,' 'baptized into Christ';† while other passages in the Epistles tend to confirm this.‡ In the case of the eunuch, Lydia, the jailor, Crispus and the other Corinthians, their baptism is recorded, but it is not said that the name of Jesus was invoked; but a study of the case of the eunuch makes such invocation almost certain, and in the other cases there is no reason to doubt that the usual practice was followed.§ Of Apollos and others it is not said that they were baptized.|| The references to a name in connexion with baptism in the Apostolic Fathers tend to confirm this view. Hermas portrays the Church as a 'tower built upon the waters . . . founded on the word of the almighty and glorious name.' Referring to the state of a man before his baptism, it is said, 'before a man bears the name of the son of God he is dead.'¶ The Didache speaks of 'those baptized into the name of the Lord.' The practice of baptizing into the name of Jesus continued into the 3rd cent., when Pope Stephen, in opposition to Cyprian and the Apostolic Canons, declared such baptism to be invalid.††

In Mt 28¹⁹ there is recorded a command of Jesus to baptize 'in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit.' The earliest mention we have of this is in the Didache, where a similar direction is given.‡‡ Justin Martyr says that baptism was administered in the Triune Name.§§ Irenæus, who mentions baptism in the Triune Name, bases this not on the command in Matthew but on the traditional faith handed down to him "by the elders, the disciples of the apostles."¶¶ That baptism in the Triune Name was universally current about A.D. 150 is scarcely in accordance with the evidence. The discrepancy between the command of Jesus and the practice of the Apostolic Church has been accounted for in various ways, some of which are worthy of consideration. (1) Its historicity as part of Matthew's Gospel and its authority as a command of the Lord have been maintained,‡‡ the argument adduced being that the words did not constitute a formula to be used, and that baptism into the name of Jesus was virtually the same as baptism into the Triune Name—an explanation that does not account for the fact that the words of Jesus were not in one single case obeyed. (2) The historicity of the words as those of Jesus, questioned, by Neander, who declares it undeniable that the account 'does not bear so distinct a historical stamp as other narratives of Christ's reappearance' is denied by Strauss, Weinell, Clemen, Harnack, Robinson, Sabatier.†††

* Ac 19³ 4 5. † Ro 6³, 1 Co 11³ 14 10², Gal 3²⁷.

‡ 1 Co 6¹¹ 12¹³, Eph 4⁵, Col 2¹², 1 P 3²¹. In none of these cases would the 'ceremonial formula have been out of place' (Exp, 6th ser., iii. [1901] 411).

§ Ac 8²⁵⁻⁴⁰ 16¹⁴⁻¹⁵. ¶ Ac 18.

¶¶ 1 Ts. iii. 3; Sima. ix. 16 (cf. ix. 13); the Athos MS reads 'name of God.'

 Ch. ix.

†† Cyprian, Ep. lxxiii. 17-18; F. C. Conybeare, EBR ii. 365.

‡‡ Ch. vii.; but see J. H. Bernard, Exp, 6th ser., v. [1902] 51.

§§ Apol. i. 61.

¶¶ Exp, 7th ser., iv. [1907] 42; A. Harnack, History of Dogma, ii. [1896] 22.

‡‡ Resch, ExpT vi. 247; J. T. Marshall, ib. p. 395; Critical Review, v. [1895] 42; F. H. Chase, JThSt vi. [1904-05] 431 ff., viii. [1906-07] 161 ff.; W. C. Allen, ICC, 'Matthew' 3, 1912, p. 305 ff.; J. V. Bartlett, ERE ii. 376; A. Plummer, HDB i. 242; J. H. Bernard, Exp, 6th ser., v. [1902] 51.

 Life of Jesus Christ, 1880, pp. 131, 454 n.

††† D. F. Strauss, Life of Jesus, 1892, p. 745 f., says: 'The formula in Matthew sounds so exactly as if it had been borrowed from the ecclesiastical ritual, that there is no slight probability in the supposition that it was transferred from thence into the mouth of Jesus.' H. Weinell, in Jesus

* Baroness de Bertonch, Life of Father Ignatius, 1904, pp. 67, 117, 373, 493.

† ERE ii. 367. ‡ ib. ii. 363.

§ ib. ii. 408; Mk 7²⁻⁶, Lk 11³⁸. ¶ Jos. BJ ii. viii. 7.

* ERE ii. 376.  Mt 3⁶, Mk 14, Lk 3², Ac 13²⁴.

†† Jn 10⁴¹, Mt 21²⁵, Jn 1²⁵.

‡‡ Jn 1²⁶ 31-33, Mk 1⁵, Mt 3¹¹, Lk 3¹⁵ 16, Ac 1⁵ 11¹⁶ 19³ 4 5.

§§ Jn 4² 33-40; cf. Lk 7²⁹ Jn 3²² 4².

¶¶ Ac 22. 38. 41. ¶¶ Ac 31² 16.

 Ac 9¹⁸ 22¹⁶. ††† Ac 10⁴⁷ 48.

(3) The historicity of the words as part of the First Gospel, questioned by Sanday,* who says 'they belong to a comparatively late and suspected part of the Gospel,' is assailed by Conybeare,† who holds that the command to baptize in the 'Triune Name was interpolated for dogmatic reasons in some copies of the Gospel, and that its place in the text was not fully assured till after the Council of Nicæa, instancing the fact that Eusebius of Cæsarea (A.D. 313-339), when quoting or referring to it, continually omits or stops short of the words which refer to baptism. This practically is the opinion of such scholars as Moffatt and Kirsopp Lake.‡ Of singular interest are the opinions of Bruce. At first maintaining that this and other post-Resurrection sayings 'bear internal evidence of being late words from their fitness to the situation,'§ he comes to favour an idea of Keim that Mt 28¹⁹, an authentic logion spoken by Jesus before His death, was transferred by Matthew to what he deemed a specially suitable place—the final leave-taking, the trinitarian formula simply summing up 'in brief compass the teaching of Jesus';|| then he accepts the idea that the apostles knew the formula but 'did not consider themselves under bondage to a form of words, but felt free to use an equivalent form,'¶ and comes at last to think that the words 'are not so much' a report of 'what the risen Jesus said . . . as a summary of what the Apostolic Church understood to be the will of the exalted Lord.' But even if the passage be a genuine logion of Jesus, the knowledge of which may have been confined to only a few, preserved only in one Gospel which is dated c. A.D. 80,†† it cannot be used as evidence against what, so far as one knows, was an actual and universal custom. The slight variety in the words which record the baptism in the name of Jesus—clearly of no significance—shows that there was indeed no stereotyped formula which must not be departed from, but raises no doubt as to the fact that baptism was in the name not of three persons, but of one.

The meaning of such baptism is clear. When we remember the use of the name in the exorcism of demons, when we remember that the world into which the religion of Jesus came was 'a world without natural science, steeped in belief in every kind of magic and enchantment, and full of public and private religious societies, every one of which had its mysteries and miracles and its blood-bond with its peculiar deity,' that 'it was from such a world and such societies that most of the converts came and brought with them the thoughts and instincts of countless generations, who had never conceived of a religion without rites and mysteries,'* when we remember the magical use of the Name in the Jewish and Gentile worlds, the words of Robinson state the true position: 'The Name of God among the Jews was . . . an instrument of awful power. That such divine power could be brought into play by the use of the Name of the Lord Jesus was clearly the belief of the early Christians. . . . Those who were authorized to use "the Name" were regarded as having at their disposal the supernatural power of the Being whom they so named.'† The exact effect of baptism 'into the name' is not easily determined. If the words in Mt 28¹⁹ are not a genuine logion of Jesus, the meaning which He might have attached to them need not be discussed, and hence we are concerned with the view not of Jesus but of His followers. 'No trace remains of the baptism of the initiated "into the name" of any of the mystery-deities,'‡ and so they afford us no help. It has been suggested that the baptism into the Name merely 'indicates to whom the baptized person will thenceforward adhere,' and therefore that 'the theory of a magical virtue in baptism cannot be proved';§ such baptism 'constitutes the belonging to God or to the Son of God.'|| Such a view does not do justice to the facts; much nearer the truth is the conception that such baptism 'reveals the name as a religious potency into which as into a spiritual atmosphere the adult catechumen or the initiated infant is brought.'¶ This was clearly St. Paul's view. He indicates that baptism in the name of Jesus constituted a mystical union between the baptized and Jesus through which the baptized received (a) a share in His death and specially in His resurrection, (b) the gift of the Spirit,†† and (c) a cleansing from sin which involved their consecration and justification;‡‡ and 'baptism can produce these effects because it works "in the name," and so links up baptism with the view, prevalent at the time in almost every circle, that the pronunciation of the name of any one could, if properly used, enable the user to enjoy the benefit of the attributes attached to the original owner of the name. . . . This it accomplishes by the power of the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the sacramental effect of the water, according to the well-known idea that results could be reached in the unseen spiritual world by the performance of analogous acts in the visible material world.'§§ It is this efficacy of the water given it by the Name that enables us to understand the meaning of the words of Barnabas: 'We descend into the water full of sins and defilement, but come up bearing fruit in our hearts, having the fear (of God) and trust in Jesus in our spirits.'|| For a similar reason Justin Martyr connects the life with the name.¶¶

10. Prayer in the Name.—As we have seen, primitive man gradually came to realize that in him, in other beings and things, lay the extraordinary, the supernormal—what Hartland calls 'theoplasm,' god-stuff; and that this, whether in himself or others, was a power able to be exercised by him and them—mana. When, for example, such a man met an enemy, and wished to kill him, it was his mana that enabled him to do so. His will,

* Glover, p. 158 f.; ERE ii. 381.

† J. A. Robinson, JThSt vii. [1905-06] 196, 197.

‡ H. A. A. Kennedy, Exp, 8th ser., iv. 539.

§ Clemens, pp. 238, 370.

|| Delssmann, Bible Studies, p. 147.

¶ Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 189 f.

 Ro 6:4, Gal 3:27, Col 2:12.

†† 1 Co 12:13.

‡‡ 1 Co 6:11.

§§ ERE ii. 382; Heitmüller, pp. 320, 321.

|| Ch. xl.

¶¶ Apol. i. 61.

or Christ (IJ Suppl.), 1909, p. 30, says: 'It is most assuredly post-Pauline.' Clemens, p. 214, says: 'It "cannot be historical, at all events in its present form. . . . Jesus cannot, I think, have instituted a form of baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." Harnack, History of Dogma, i. [1894] 79, says: "Matt. xxviii. 19 is not a saying of the Lord." Robinson, EBi i. 474, practically accepts the view that "Matthew does not here report the ipsissima verba of Jesus, but transfers to him the familiar language of the Church of the evangelist's own time and locality"; cf. A. Sabatier, The Religion of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit, 1904, p. 51 ff.

* W. Sanday in HDB ii. 213b.

† IJ i. [1902-03] 102. See also M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma³, 1876, p. 292.

‡ J. Moffatt, The Historical NT, 1901, p. 647, The Theology of the Gospels, 1912, p. 32; K. Lake, ERE ii. 380^a, says the cumulative evidence of the textual, literary, and historical criticism 'is thus distinctly against the view that Mt 28¹⁹ represents the ipsissima verba of Christ'; see also M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma³, p. 292, and Exp¹ xv. [1903-04] 294.

§ A. B. Bruce, The Training of the Twelve², 1877, p. 519.

|| The Kingdom of God⁴, 1891, p. 257 f.

¶ Ib. p. 260.

 Apologetics, 1892, p. 463.

†† In Mt 28¹⁵ 'down to the present day' implies a considerable lapse of time.

‡‡ Though B. F. Westcott (Exp, 3rd ser., v. [1887] 257) says: 'Certainly I would gladly have given the ten years of my life spent on the Revision to bring only these two phrases of the New Testament ["into the name" in Mt 28¹⁹ and "In Christ" in Ro 6:23] to the heart of Englishmen.'

moving 'on a supernormal plane,'* projected itself against the foe; his mana went forth as an act of will. Such a 'will to power' was almost inevitably accompanied by, and expressed itself in, two things: (1) an act, as the flinging of a spear; and (2) a hurling forth of words, such words being 'the very type of a spiritual projectile.'† When the enemy is not present, and there arises the wish to kill, then, when there speeds forth the mana that destroys, the more emotional side of the man's nature asserts itself and expresses itself in the throwing of the spear and the hurling of the words in the direction in which the enemy is supposed to be. A man does this when what is to be influenced is not, to us, a person.

A British Columbian Indian, wishing to stop the rain, holds a stick in the fire, describes a circle with it, then holds the stick towards the east and addresses the rain in these words: 'Now then, you must stop raining.'‡

Reflexion causes two changes. Man realizes that many of such acts are more or less symbolical, and this, especially under priestly influence, leads to detailed and dramatic symbolism, such as sacrifice and ritual. Again—and this is important in the present connexion—he comes to realize that for some of the harder tasks he must use not only the mana which is his own, but mana superior to his own. He therefore turns to beings superior to himself, to the divinities. There is thus gradually developed a body of doctrine as to the divinities, more or less esoteric, both intricate and complicated, which influenced and still continues to influence religion. This influence is seen in its simplest form when a human being exercises power over a divinity.

The king of the Matabele, in order to get rain, offers sacrifices and says, 'O great spirits of my father and grandfather, . . . make us to be the best-fed and the strongest people in the world!'

When it becomes clearly understood that such divinities do possess power, they are naturally invoked during the performance of the symbolic acts, and then we have the spell.

The ancient Peruvians on the eve of war starved some sheep, killed them, saying as they did so: 'As the hearts of these beasts are weakened, so let our enemies be weakened.'§ Here from the beasts, the symbols, to the enemy, the reality, the mana is transferred. But the words 'so let' indicate the consciousness that it is the deities who 'are putting the thing through.'¶ Westermarck quotes with approval Renan's dictum that with the Romans 'prayer is a magic formula, producing its effect by its own inherent quality,' and adds: 'They wanted to compel the gods rather than to be compelled by them'; but Warde Fowler asserts that the prayers of the guild of brethren at Iguvium to Jupiter Grabovius 'retain some of the outward characteristics of spell, but internally, i.e. in the spirit in which they were intended, they have the real characteristics of prayer.'††

When a god attains such a degree of personality as to have a name, this enables the human suppliant to influence him personally, by using his name.

This is seen in its simplest form when a human being exercises power over a divine being by the proper use of his name. The Torres Straits islanders summon a local bogey or a spirit by mentioning his name.‡‡ A Malay prays at the grave of a murdered man: 'Hearken, So-and-So, and assist me. . . I desire to ask for a little magic.'§§ When the Augoni desire rain, they go to the rain-temple and in connexion with certain ceremonies pray: 'Master Chauta, . . . give your children the rains.'||

The mana of a deity who has attained to a name becomes specially lodged in his name, and can be commanded by the proper use of it.

In Gn 4²⁶ it is said of Enoch, 'He was the first to call by (means of) the name Jahweh.' This expression 'denotes the essential act in worship, the invocation (or rather evocation) of the Deity by the solemn utterance of His name. It rests on the wide-spread primitive idea that a real bond exists between the person and his name, such that the pronunciation of the latter exerts a mystic influence on the former.'* In Elijah's time the question was whether Jahweh or Baal was the proper name for the Divine Being, and 'the test proposed by Elijah is which name—Baal or Yahwe—will evoke a manifestation of divine energy.'†

From the conception of the mana of the deities specially lodged in their names there was developed the doctrine that the proper use of the name set in motion and brought into real operation all the powers of the deity.

The Kei women when their men are fighting pray: 'O Lord sun and moon let the bullets rebound from our husbands.'‡

Thus the name which had been added to the spell to cause it to work gradually supersedes all other methods of entreaty in the prayer, and becomes that by which the effective appeal is made to the deity. The liturgies of all the more advanced peoples show that 'prayer gains potency from the solemn utterance of the true divine name.'§

Throughout the OT we have many instances of men calling on the name of Jahweh. Jesus dropping that name taught His disciples to pray to the Father.

The account of St. Paul's prayers|| indicates that this was his custom, and neither in these cases, nor in the account which he himself gives of his prayers,¶ nor yet in those actually recorded, is this custom departed from. But in the Fourth Gospel, Jesus, reminding His disciples that previously they had asked nothing in His name,†† instructs them so to ask and they shall receive,‡‡ indicating that the Father will grant whatever they ask in His name,§§ and promising that the day was coming when He would let them know plainly about the Father, and on that day they would ask in His name,|| for He Himself was going to the Father and would do whatsoever they asked in His name.¶¶ It cannot be inferred from these passages that Jesus taught His disciples to pray not to Him, but to the Father in His name. Whether these words were actually spoken by our Lord before His death, or represent the views of the Christians of the 2nd cent. matters little for our immediate purpose. They indicate clearly that the addition of the name 'is not a mere devotional form, but a new ground on which the worshipper stands, a new plea for the success of his petitions.'††† Further, they indicate that 'when His disciples have entered into complete union with Him they will lose the sense that He is intermediary between them and the Father. They will be so identified with Him that all prayer of theirs will be the prayer of Christ Himself, offered immediately to God.'‡‡‡ We have in the case of Stephen prayer addressed to Jesus,§§§ and there are indications that the invoking of His name was common.¶¶¶ This invoking of the Name would seem to have been associated not so much with petitions, as we might have expected, as with thanksgiving.¶¶¶¶ When

* Marett, *The Threshold of Religion*², p. 51.

† Id. p. 54.

‡ Frazer, *GB*³, pt. i., The Magic Art, i. 253; J. E. Carpenter, Comparative Religion, 1913, p. 148, 'The Prayer of the Todas.'

§ Frazer, *GB*³, pt. i., The Magic Art, i. 352; see also Carpenter, pp. 35, 151.

¶ Marett, *The Threshold of Religion*², p. 55.

‡ Id. p. 30.

 W. Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, 1911, pp. 185, 186.

†† Id. p. 189.

‡‡ Haddon, p. 24.

§§ Marett, *The Threshold of Religion*², p. 62.

|| Frazer, *GB*³, pt. i., The Magic Art, i. 250.

* J. Skinner, ICC, 'Genesis', p. 127.

† Id.

‡ Marett, *The Threshold of Religion*², p. 67.

§ Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 154.

¶ See, e.g., Eph 1⁷ 2¹⁹ 3¹⁴ 5²⁰, Col 1² 1¹² 3¹⁷; also Ja 3², 1 P 1¹⁷, 1 Jn 2¹.

‡ 1 Co 1⁴, 1 Th 1².  Ph 1³.

§ 16²³ 2⁴. §§ 15¹⁶.

¶ 16²⁶.

‡‡ H. P. Liddon, *The Divinity of our Lord*², 1873, note F; also G. A. Chadwick, Exp, 3rd ser., vi. [1837] 191.

††† HDB iv. 44.

‡‡‡ E. F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, 1906, p. 316.

§§§ Ac 7⁵⁹.

¶¶¶ Ac 2¹⁶ 2²¹ 9¹⁴, 1 Co 1².

¶¶¶¶ Ac 4¹⁰, Eph 5²⁰, Col 3¹⁷, Ro 1³.

we think of the use of the Name in preaching, in exorcism, in the persecutions of the primitive Christians, we can understand how fervour led them to add to their prayers, and to pray in what they had come to think of as the name above every name, the one which was with the Father the all-prevailing name.* In this way we see that 'the name-formulae, which close most of the prayers of the Christian Church, were originally 'words of power to speed the prayer home.'† 'In the apocryphal acts of St John we find a long list of mystical names and titles attached to Christ giving to the prayer much of the tone of an enchantment.‡ Hence we see that the conception of mana 'yields the chief clue to the original use of names of power in connection with the spell, from "in the devil's name" to "Im Namen Jesu."§

LITERATURE.—This has been indicated in the art.

P. A. GORDON CLARK.

NAPHTALI.—See TRIBES.

NAPKIN.—See HANDKERCHIEF, NAPKIN.

NARCISSUS (Ναρκισσός, a common Latin name).—In Ro 16¹¹ St. Paul salutes 'them of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord' (τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ναρκισσοῦ τοῦ θυτὰς ἐν κυρίῳ), i.e. the Christians in his familia or establishment of freedmen and slaves (perhaps known as Narcissiani, for which the Greek phrase would be equivalent). J. B. Lightfoot (*Philippians*⁴, 1878, p. 175) thinks that the Narcissus referred to was the powerful freedman of that name, whose wealth was proverbial (Juv. Sat. xiv. 329), whose influence was very great in the intrigues of the reign of Claudius, and who had been put to death by Agrippina shortly after the accession of Nero (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1; Dio Cass. lx. 34), in A.D. 54. It was customary in such cases for the household to become the property of the Emperor while it retained the name of its old master (cf. probably 'the household of Aristobulus' [q.v.], whose Christian members are saluted in v.¹⁰). If Ro 16 be an integral part of Romans, and therefore directed to Rome, this may indeed be the household referred to; for although there may have been other establishments whose master's name was Narcissus, this must have been the most famous. If so, some three years had elapsed since it had passed into the hands of Nero. For the occurrence of the name Narcissus on inscriptions see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'⁴, 1900, p. 425 f. The Christians in the household would naturally form one of the distinct communities of which the Church at Rome was apparently made up (cf. v.¹⁰ and the phrases in vv.^{5, 15}). 'The master was not a Christian, and therefore it was not his whole household, but in each case an indefinite number of his servants who had been converted. Plainly therefore the conversion of one of them had at once created a centre for the diffusion of the gospel. We have here at any rate a proof, not only that the closer social connections in general contributed to the spread of the truth, but that the servile class were especially susceptible' (C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i.² [1897] 397). As the salutation to these Christians is preceded by a greeting to 'Herodion my kinsman,' it is conjectured that Herodion was a member of the household of Narcissus and the nucleus of the community or church. Some scholars think that the mention of this household is conclusive in favour of the Roman destination of Ro 16, but to others, in view of the strong probability that the chapter belongs to a letter to the Church at Ephesus, it seems quite reasonable to suppose that there was a 'household of Narcissus' known to St. Paul in that city. T. B. ALLWORTHY.

NATION.—In Mk 7²⁶, Gal 1^{14m} the RV rightly changes 'nation' to 'race' (γένει); cf. Ac 4³⁶ 18^{2, 24}, 'a Cyprian by race,' 'an Alexandrian,' 'a Pontican.' In the NT ἔθνος generally designates a non-Jewish nation; but it is also used of the Jewish nation when spoken of officially (Lk 7⁵ 23², Jn 11⁴⁹. 18³⁸ Ac 10²⁻²⁴ 10. 17 26^{18, 19}), and even of the Christian society (Mt 21⁴³, Ro 10¹⁹). In 1 P 2⁹ Christians are called both 'an elect γένος' and 'a holy ἔθνος.'

Jesus spoke to the Jewish nation as a collective personality, a community bearing a common responsibility. As 'they that were his own' they 'received him not' (Jn 1¹¹), and the national crime of His crucifixion was the precursor of their downfall, although it did not result in their being 'cast off' (Ro 11¹). His passionate love for His own nation was evidenced by the fatigues, the privations, the 'contradictions' that He endured, by the tears of woe that gushed from His eyes (Lk 19⁴¹; cf. Ro 9³). He seldom referred to other nations till near the close of His earthly course; yet He spoke of the Ninevites as having acted in their corporate capacity when they repented (Mt 12⁴¹; cf. Jon 3⁷). He recognized the right of the common law of the Empire of which He was a subject (Mt 22²¹). 'All the nations,' He said, should finally appear before Him as their Judge, and He would reward the works of love done by those whom He set on His right hand as having been done to Himself (Mt 25^{31, 42}). When He appeared to His disciples on the mountain in Galilee, He said, 'All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth: Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations'; and it is significant that He did not say 'of all men' but 'of all the nations'—thus pointing out that the object to be aimed at was national religion, the national confession of His authority (cf. Martensen, Ethics, 'General,' p. 443 f.). Further, if in Ac 29¹¹ the words 'Ἰουδαίαν, Κρήτες καὶ Ἀπαβες' be omitted as being probably ancient glosses on the text, we are left, as Harnack says (Acts, p. 65 f.), with a list of twelve nations, whom St. Luke may have specified as 'heralding the great theme of his book'—how Jesus was brought to all the nations of the known world, the new Israel (cf. Ac 19⁷).

The great missionary successes of the Apostolic Age prepared the way for the reception of the Christian faith on a grand national scale. St. Paul, before his death, 'had planted more churches than Plato had gained disciples' (Bossuet, Panegyrique de Saint Paul, 1659)—ἐπὶ τὸ τέρας τῆς δύσεως ἐλάδων, as Clement says (ad Cor. i. 5). Besides the Dispersion (q.v.), there were other two co-operating factors that assisted the progress of the gospel—the political unity of the Empire, and the influence of the Stoic creed. In the ancient heathen world, national life had been particular and exclusive: the nations were isolated from and ignorant of each other. But when they all looked to Rome as mistress and mother, they were on their way to the belief in the spiritual unity of mankind proclaimed by Christianity (cf. Flint, History of the Philosophy of History, pp. 26, 61). The influence of the Stoic doctrine of 'world-citizenship' is well attested by the fragment from Cicero (de Rep. iii. 22) quoted by J. Adam, Vitality of Platonism: 'Hymn of Cleanthes,' p. 146:

'And there will not be one law at Rome and another at Athens, one law to-day and another law to-morrow; but the same law everlasting and unchangeable will bind all nations at all times; and there will be one common Master and Ruler of all, even God, the framer, the arbitrator, and the proposer of this law.'

This noble utterance justifies the remark of S. Dill

* Ph 29. 10.

† Farnell, The Evolution of Religion, p. 190.

‡ Id. § Martet, *The Threshold of Religion*², p. 62.

(Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, London, 1904, p. 323): 'The Stoic school has the glory of anticipating the diviner dream, yet far from realised, of a human brotherhood under the light from the Cross.' This 'diviner dream' will be realized when all nations, now united by bonds far surpassing those of blood-relationship, or common speech, customs, or history—the bonds of a common love and obedience to Christ—shall form together one august Kingdom of God (Rev 11¹³).

LITERATURE.—J. Adam, The Vitality of Platonism and other Essays, Edinburgh, 1911, pp. 113 n., 142, 146-147; R. Flint, History of the Philosophy of History, do., 1893, pp. 26, 43, 61, 63, 449; T. von Haering, The Ethics of the Christian Life, London, 1909, p. 403 f.; A. Harnack, Acts of the Apostles (NT Studies, iii.), Eng. tr., do., 1909, pp. 49, 64, 65 f.; H. Martensen, Christian Ethics, 'General,' Edinburgh, 1873, pp. 214, 442 f., 'Social,' do., 1882, p. 33 f.; G. Unhorn, Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, Eng. tr., do., 1883, pp. 40-42.

JAMES DONALD.

NATURAL 1. In Ro 1²⁶ 11^{21, 24} (cf. Jude¹⁰ 'naturally') 'natural' is the rendering of φυσικός. In Ro 1 St. Paul denounces certain forms of sexual vice as 'against nature.' To indulge in them is to pervert and degrade human nature. Its constitution is violated when the lower impulses refuse to be controlled. History confirms the Apostle's judgment that 'natural' instincts and passions unbridled by reason and conscience lead to unnatural crimes which are dishonouring alike to man and to God. To Renan's outburst, 'Nature cares nothing about chastity,' the true reply is, 'Instead of saying that Nature cares nothing about chastity, let us say that human nature, our nature, cares about it a great deal' (Matthew Arnold, Discourses in America, London, 1896, p. 60). In Ro 11 St. Paul, using figurative language, describes the Jews as 'natural branches' in contrast with the Gentiles, who are represented as artificially grafted into the tree of God's people. The process described is 'one that in horticulture is never performed. The cultivated branch is always engrafted upon the wild stock, and not vice versa. This Paul knew quite well (see παρά φύσιν, v. 24), and the force of his reproof to the presuming Gentile turns on the fact that the process was an unnatural one' (J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' 1900, p. 680).

2. In 1 Co 2¹⁴ 15^{44, 46}, 'natural' is the rendering of φυσικός. It is also used twice in RVm as an alternative to another translation of the same word. In 2 P 2¹ 'mere animals' is in the RV text, but in Jude¹⁹ 'sensual' is found, 'animal' being a second marginal rendering. In all these passages φυσικός 'has a disparaging sense, being opposed to πνευματικός (as ψυχή is not to πνεῦμα), and almost synonymous with σάρκινος or σαρκικός (1 Co 3¹⁴). . . . This epithet describes to the Corinthians the unregenerate nature at its best, the man commended in philosophy, actuated by the higher thoughts and aims of the natural life—not the sensual man (the animalis of the Vulg.) who is ruled by bodily impulses. Yet the φυσικός, μη ἔχων πνεῦμα (Jude¹⁹) may be lower than the σαρκικός, where the latter, as in 1 Co 3³ and Gal 5^{17, 22}, is already touched but not fully assimilated by the life-giving πνεῦμα' (G. G. Findlay, EGT, '1 Cor.,' 1900, p. 783, note on 1 Co 2¹⁴). To this helpful discrimination may be added a brief quotation from T. C. Edwards' Commentary on First Ep. to Corinthians, London, 1885: 'the word φυσικός was coined by Aristotle (Eth. Nic. III. x. 2), to distinguish the pleasures of the soul, such as ambition and desire of knowledge, from those of the body.' As used by St. Paul, 'the φυσικός, contrasted with the ἀκαρπής, is the noblest of men. But to the πνευματικός he is related as the natural to the supernatural. . . . The indwelling spirit is the Holy Spirit; and he in whom that Spirit dwells is at once supernatural and holy' (p. 65 f., note on 1 Co 2¹⁴).

ψυχικός is sometimes rendered 'psychic,' and sometimes 'soulish' in 1 Co 15⁴⁴, with the intention of emphasizing the contrast between the 'natural' and the 'spiritual' body. But 'though inadequate, "natural" is the best available rendering of this adjective; it indicates the moulding of man's body by its environment, and its adaptation to existing functions; the same body is χοϊκόν in respect of its material (v. 47).' In this context, however, 'ψυχικόν is only relatively a term of disparagement; the "psychic" body has in it the making of the "spiritual"' (G. G. Findlay, op. cit. p. 937). The body which, in our present state, is adapted for the service of the soul, is contrasted by St. Paul with the body which, in the future state, will be adapted for the higher service of the spirit. 'An organism fitted to be the seat of mind, to express emotion, to carry out the behests of will is already in process of being adapted for a still nobler ministry.' Hence in v. 46 the history of man is said to be 'a progress from Adam to Christ, from soulish to spiritual, from the present life to the future' (T. C. Edwards, op. cit. pp. 441, 445).

3. (a) In two passages (Ro 1³¹, 2 Ti 3³) the phrase 'without natural affection' is the rendering of ἀστοργος. By this word St. Paul describes those who are so regardless of the claims of nature as to be lacking in love for their own kindred. He assumes that love of kindred (στοργή) should naturally arise from such human relationships as parent and child, husband and wife, brother and sister. Here, as in those passages in which 'natural' is the rendering of φυσικός, the word denotes not what is in harmony with our environment, but what is in accord with our own true nature or constitution.

(b) In Ja 1²³ 'his natural face' is the rendering of the phrase πρόσωπον τῆς γενέσεως, lit. 'the face of his birth,' (RVm). The meaning is the face which is 'native' to man. The contrast is between 'the face which belongs to this transitory life,' of which a reflexion may be seen in a mirror, and 'the character which is being here moulded for eternity,' of which a reflexion may be seen in the Word (J. B. Mayor, Epistle of St. James, London, 1910, p. 71, note on 1²³).

LITERATURE.—J. Laidlaw, Bible Doctrine of Man, new ed., Edinburgh, 1895; H. Wheeler Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man, do., 1911.

J. G. TASKER.

NATURE.—1. The revelation of God in Nature.—The basis of St. Paul's appeal to the men of Lystra (Ac 14^{15a}) is that 'the living God' manifests Himself in creation. In Ro 1^{19a} the Apostle elaborates the same argument, drawing out its sterner implications and showing that the Gentiles were under condemnation because they had repressed the knowledge of God imparted to them in the works of His hands. No countenance is given to either of the two modern extremes of thought: there is no disparagement of Nature's teachings; and, on the other hand, they are never set forth as sufficient for man's spiritual needs. St. Paul's purpose is answered when he has asserted 'the fact that the Gentiles possessed lofty conceptions of God which nevertheless had not proved to them the way of salvation. This true knowledge had been attained very largely through a right apprehension of the natural world which in all ages has been the "living garment" men have seen God by' (R. D. Shaw, The Pauline Epistles, Edinburgh, 1903, p. 210). Naturalism and Nature-worship which substitute Nature for God are alike remote from apostolic thought. God's invisible attributes have been revealed in the universe which proclaims His wisdom and His power. He is, therefore, to be worshipped with adoration and thanksgiving. In Ro 8¹⁹ St. Paul poetically personifies Nature and represents it as sympathizing with humanity's hopes. 'He conceives of all creation as involved in the fortunes of humanity. . . . Creation is not inert, utterly unspiritual, alien to our life and its hopes. . . . With the revelation of the sons of God humanity would attain its end, and nature too' (J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' 1900, in loc.).

2. The light of Nature.—The revelation of God in Nature implies a corresponding responsibility on the part of those to whom it is given; it affects man's moral condition according as he is or is not guided by its light. In Ro 2¹⁴ St. Paul grants that Gentiles may do 'by nature' the things of the law. There is, therefore, a standard by which they may be judged although they do not possess the written Law which is the Jews' glory. 'For whenever any of them instinctively put in practice the precepts of the law, their own moral sense supplies them with the law they need' (Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans,' 1902, p. 54). To appreciate the force of the Apostle's argument, it is important to remember that although he regards the light of Nature as insufficient, he recognizes that the knowledge of God derived from Nature is true and good. 'The hinge on which everything turns is the forsaking of the knowledge. . . . The Theism of the Gentiles failed not because its light was delusive, but because its light was not used.' St. Paul is not, therefore, 'to be understood to mean that the Gentile world of which he wrote was lying in universal wickedness, unredeemed by even a single ray of human goodness' (R. D. Shaw, op. cit. p. 216 f.). St. Paul taught that in the visible creation men may discern the workings of a supreme Mind and Will; he also taught that the revelation of God in His Son is the climax, not the contradiction, of His revelation in Nature. He knew that from the depths of man's spiritual being questions arise to which Nature can give no clear and unambiguous answer. Unless men pass from the light of Nature into the presence of Him who is the Light of life, theirs will be the disappointment of all who seek in converse with Nature what can be attained only in communion with God through Christ. In the NT 'nature' is never used in what may be called its prevailing meaning in modern thought; the early Christians had no conception of 'nature' such as is implied in definitions which make it 'co-extensive with science, which deals with sequences only, reserving all beyond for philosophy, which deals with causes also. Thus nature will not be the sum of things, except for one who maintains that phenomena have no true causes at all' (H. M. Gwatkin, *The Knowledge of God*², Edinburgh, 1908, i. 47).

3. Nature and grace.—The Pauline antithesis between 'natural' and 'spiritual' has been dwelt upon above (see NATURAL). Most frequently, however, man's natural condition, moral and spiritual, is, in the NT, contrasted with his experience in a state of grace. 'St. Paul had an altogether persuasive and beautiful word for the supernatural, which he was never weary of using, and which the Church should count one of her chief treasures—the Grace of God' (J. Watson, The Doctrines of Grace, London, 1900, p. 6). St. Paul described Barnabas and himself as 'of like nature' with the men of Lystra (Ac 14¹⁵ RVm). He was disclaiming the ascription to men of divine honours, and acknowledging that he was not exempt from human feelings and infirmities (cf. Ja 5¹⁷). But when St. Paul says to the Ephesians: 'we were by nature children of wrath, even as the rest' (2³), he associates himself with those who before they were quickened and became partakers of grace were 'dead in trespasses and sins.' He regards sin as 'a constitutional malady. There exists a bad element in our human nature.' 'Our trespasses and sins are, after all, not forced on us by our environment. Those offences by which we provoke God, lie in our nature; they are no mere casual acts, they belong to our bias and disposition' (G. G. Findlay, Expositor's Bible, 'The Epistle to the Ephesians,' London, 1892, p. 104). In the context of this passage St. Paul explains what it is to be 'saved by grace.' His teaching agrees with the statement in 2 P 1⁴ that the promises of grace are given in order that men who inherit a sinful nature may 'become partakers of a divine nature.'

LITERATURE. — J. Ward, Naturalism and Agnosticism, London, 1890; P. N. Waggett, Is there a Religion of Nature?, do., 1902; W. L. Walker, Christian Theism and a Spiritual Monism, Edinburgh, 1906; J. O. Dykes, The Divine Worker in Creation and Providence, do., 1909; C. F. D'Arcy, Christianity and the Supernatural, London, 1909; R. Eucken, Naturalism or Idealism?, Cambridge, 1912. J. G. TASKER.

NAVIGATION.—See SHIP.

NAZARENE.—In 18 passages of the Gospels and Acts Jesus is called 'the Nazarene' (the reading fluctuating between Ναζαρενός and Ναζωραῖος). The use of this designation agrees with the fact that Nazareth was His home until He entered on His public ministry. The incident of the census was the occasion of His birth taking place at Bethlehem according to prophetic intimation. After the Egyptian episode, the family returned to Nazareth. After the Temptation, Jesus returned and remained there until the violence of the people drove Him to Capernaum, which henceforth was known as 'his own city' (Mt 9¹). The behaviour of the people (Lk 4²⁹) illustrates what is suggested respecting the repute of Nazareth in Jn 1⁴⁶. In Ac 24⁵ 'the sect of the Nazarenes' refers to Christians as a body, and is no doubt meant in a disparaging sense.

As indicated above, the name 'Jesus of Nazareth,' in the Eng. version, is universally used to translate without distinction two Greek names, Ἰησοῦς Ναζαρενός and Ἰησοῦς Ναζωραῖος. A recent essay by E. A. Abbott makes it necessary to ask if both terms 'Nazarene' and 'Nazorean' connote simply 'belonging to Nazareth.' He holds and argues very successfully that the name Nazoraïos is significant of more than mere place-origin. His thesis is that Nazarene, meaning a man of Nazareth, and Nazorean, meaning the Nēser or Rod of Jesse mentioned by Isaiah, were probably interchanged by a play on the two words; so that the populace, acclaiming Jesus as the Lifegiver and Healer, altered 'Jesus the Nazarene' into 'Jesus the Nazorean.' To state the theory more exactly, we should say that they called Him Jesus the Nēser, or the Na(t)zorean, partly because there was a pre-existing belief that the Messiah would be the Nēser, and partly because they vaguely felt what Matthew ventured definitely to express, that His residence from childhood onward in Nazareth had been ordained to fulfil the prophecy, 'He shall be called Nazorean (i.e. Nēser).'

This theory involves the conclusion that the use of 'Nazarene' by Mark and Luke was an error, except in special contexts which may prove that the place-name, not the Messianic title, was meant.

There can be no doubt that the Nēser (the Branch) of Is 11¹ was interpreted of the Messiah, the Targum on the passage making that quite definite; and it is quite probable that among the many names in popular use for the Messiah in the 1st cent. Nēser had a place.

The evidence from hostile sources is confirmatory. Christians were contemptuously called 'Nazarenes' by the Jews. But the actual word used was Nōsrī. This does not closely resemble Nazareth, but it does resemble Nōser as used in Ben Sira xl. 15, referring to 'the branch of violence which is not to be unpunished.' That the enemies of Jesus should call Him Nôsrî, 'Branch of violence,' is intelligible if His friends called Him Neser, 'the true Branch.'

The question, as Abbott admits, is a difficult one, but it must be acknowledged that he has made out a strong case for regarding the name Nazorean as more than a mere variant of Nazarene (see Edwin A. Abbott, Miscellanea Evangelica, II. i., Cambridge, 1913).

We find 'Nazarenes' used at a later period as the name of a Jewish Christian sect having some affinity with the Ebionites (see EBIONISM). The greatest obscurity envelops these Jewish Christian parties. The information coming down to us is meagre, and there is little likelihood of additions being made to it. The Jewish side of Christianity, which gave so much trouble to St. Paul, declined rapidly, especially after the fall of the Jewish State, and eventually disappeared. Our best course will be to summarize the views of two authorities of our day.

R. Seeberg (Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, i. [1895] 50) endorses the ordinary opinion that there were two sects, the Nazarenes and the Ebionites, agreeing with one another in some things, differing in others. Justin Martyr refers to the former when he speaks of some Jewish Christians who keep the Jewish Law strictly themselves, but do not impose it on all Christians. Jerome also says that they believe in Christ as the Son of God, who was born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, and rose again. They recognized St. Paul and his work, and used a Hebrew Gospel. Eusebius distinguishes them sharply from Ebionites, but says that they did not accept the pre-existence of the Logos. Seeberg thinks that Eusebius was mistaken in the last statement, confusing the Nazarenes with the Ebionites, who did deny Christ's Deity. The Nazarenes, Seeberg thinks, simply put aside Logos speculations. The Ebionites, on the other hand, required all Christians to conform to the Jewish Law of rites and ceremonies, rejected St. Paul as an apostate, and regarded Christ as the son of Joseph and Mary. Origen seems to know a second Ebionite party, who, while holding these Ebionite tenets, said that Christ at His baptism received the fullness of the Holy Spirit, constituting Him a Prophet and Son of God in a high degree. They also held millenarian views. If the Nazarenes had so much in common with the Church, it is strange that Jerome should say that, 'while they claim to be both Jews and Christians, they are neither.' Seeberg says that the Nazarenes were Jewish Christians, the Ebionites Christian Jews.

F. Loofs (Leitfaden zum Studium der Dogmengeschichte, 1906, p. 83) agrees in the main with the above account, but thinks that too sharp a distinction is drawn between the Nazarenes and the Ebionites. He holds that the recognition by the latter of the Holy Spirit who fell on Christ at the Baptism, and who is pre-existent and Divine, comes near to the acknowledgment of Deity in Christ. But this implies that Christ was not Divine before and became Divine through the descent of the Spirit. Does the same effect follow in us? Both writers agree that the sects ran to seed in the syncretism of the day and in mythological speculations. To Irenæus the Ebionites were heretics. The Elkesaites were an offshoot from the same trunk, and appealed to the book Elkesai as a new revelation, bringing new forgiveness of sins, even the grossest, and new remedies of disease. Alcibiades of Apamea about A.D. 220 appeared in Rome as the apostle of this gospel, and met with temporary success. The Clementine romances were still later products of the same movement.

(The Nazirites had no connexion, linguistic or other, with Nazareth and the Nazarenes. See HDB and EBi, s.v. 'Nazirite'; also following article.)

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Ebionism' in ERE and DAC; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig, 1884, pp. 426f., 433, 443; H. L. Mansel, Gnostic Heresies, London, 1875, p. 125; J. A. W. Neander, History of the Christian Religion and Church, Eng. tr., 1831-41, II. 18; E. B. Nicholson, The Gospel according to the Hebrews, London, 1879.

J. S. BANKS.

NAZARETH.—The 'city called Nazareth' (Mt 2²³), in which Jesus lived from childhood to manhood, lay in a beautiful valley of Southern Galilee, due west of the southern end of the Lake of Galilee, and about midway between that Lake and the Mediterranean. After the Gospels, it is expressly mentioned only in the phrase Ἰησοῦς τὸν ἀπὸ Ναζαρέθ, 'Jesus of Nazareth' (Ac 10³⁸), but an equivalent of this expression, Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος, also translated 'Jesus of Nazareth,' but lit. 'the Nazarean,' or 'Nazarene,' is found six times in Acts; while the followers of Jesus are once called 'the Nazarenes' (ol Ναζωραῖοι, 24⁹). The name 'Jesus of Nazareth' has various shades of meaning, according to the spirit in which it is uttered. On the Day of Pentecost St. Peter uses it with an amazed sense of the identity of the lowly Nazarene, who met a felon's death, with the glorious Being who, Risen and Exalted, has been made Lord and Christ (2²²; cf. 3⁶ 4¹⁰). The accusers of Stephen refer with contemptuous anger to 'this Jesus the Nazarene' (6¹⁴), whom the heretic would fain set above Moses. St. Paul recalls the time when his unlightened conscience drove him to take active measures against 'Jesus the Nazarene,' a name which he used at that time with fierce scorn (26⁹). But on the road to Damascus he learned its true meaning, when his question 'Who art thou, Lord?' was answered, 'I am Jesus the Nazarene' (22⁸). The Galilaean town, valley, and hills were for ever graven on the Saviour's heart, and His own use of the familiar title made it doubly sacred. His followers could never object to be named 'the Nazarenes,' as they were, e.g., by Tertullus (24⁹), just as they could not but glory in being called 'the Christians' (11²⁶). While the former name was of Jewish origin, and came to be their standing designation among the unbelieving Jews, the latter was a Gentile coinage. 'The Nazarene' and 'the Nazarenes' correspond to the terms which are used in the Talmud—נָזָרִי (Sanh. 43a, 107b; Sot. 47a) and נָזָרִיָּם (Ta'an. 27b); and to the present day the word Nôsrî is habitually applied in Jewish literature to Jesus' followers, whom a strict orthodoxy can no more name 'Christians' than it can call their leader 'Christ.' The name 'Nazarenes' still designates the Christians in all Muslim lands.

It is a significant fact that Nazareth, which is so dear to Christendom, is never named in the OT, Josephus, or the Talmud. Though it was a city (πόλις, Mt 2²³), not a village (κώμη), it was a place without a history, and Nathanael of Cana—who may not have been quite free from the jealousy of neighbourhood—had great difficulty in imagining that it might produce the Messiah (Jn 1⁴⁶). But many things have been said, and uncritically repeated, about Nazareth, which are not well grounded on fact; e.g., that Jesus lived for thirty years 'in the deep obscurity of a provincial village . . . not only in a despised province, but in its most disregarded valley' (F. W. Farrar, The Life of Christ, new ed., 1894, p. 41), and that 'probably public opinion looked upon the little town as morally degenerate' (Meyer on Jn 1⁴⁷). There is no reason to believe that the Nazarenes were less brave, less devoted to their country's cause, less zealous for the law, less inspired by Messianic hopes than the other Galilaëans. And one of the hills that 'girdle quiet Nazareth' was a perfect watch-tower, set in the midst of the Holy Land and the mighty Roman Empire, for the young Prophet who was to give the city so great a place in history. His feet climbed its summit easily and—as His love of hills would indicate—probably often; and while His eyes ranged over one of the fairest prospects on earth, He had 'ears to hear' the murmur of the world. If His youth was inwardly, it could scarcely be outwardly, peaceful. He loved solitude, and the words 'in secret' (ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, Mt 6⁴⁻⁶) were dear to Him; yet He was destined for society, and His early years were passed in no backwater, but in the full current of the events of His time. He was never far from the crowds, often (such were Roman oppression and Jewish sedition) the maddening crowds of Galilee, and 'all the rumour of the Empire entered Palestine close to Nazareth' (G. A. Smith, HGHL, 1897, p. 434; cf. Selah Merrill, Galilee in the Time of Christ, 1885, p. 123 f.). All the time that His talent (if the word may here be used) was growing in stillness, His character was being formed in the stream of the world. Nazareth was in truth the best of all places for the education of the Messiah (cf. W. M. Ramsay, The Education of Christ, 1902).

Various etymologies of 'Nazareth' have been proposed. The idea that it means 'consecrated,' 'devoted to God' (from נָזַר, whence Nazirite), or that it denotes 'my Saviour' (נִצְרָה), may be dismissed at once. Equally improbable is the notion that it embodies a Messianic name, 'the Shoot,' or 'the Sprout' (נֶחֱמֶה), which is found in Is 11¹. The most likely suggestion is that it signifies 'Watch-tower' (from נָזַר, Aram. נִזְרָה, נִזְרָה, a name which would be given first to the hill, and then to the town built on its flank).

Acting on a hint of Wellhausen's (Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte, 1894, p. 222, footnote 3), T. K. Cheyne has tried to conjure 'the city of Nazareth' out of existence, leaving the sacred name as a mere synonym of 'Galilee' (EBi iii. 3358 f.), but his reasoning, as G. A. Barton remarks in JE, is 'in the highest degree precarious.'

LITERATURE.—A. P. Stanley, *Sinai and Palestine*²³, 1912; V. Guérin, Description géog. de la Palestine, pt. iii.: 'Galilée', 1880; F. Buhl, GAP, 1896; W. Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 1903; K. Baedeker, Palestine and Syria, 1912, p. 246.

JAMES STRAHAN.

NAZIRITE.—A Nazirite (AV incorrectly 'Nazarete') was one dedicated to God and bound by a vow, the nature of which is explained below.

1. The name.—The primary significance of the Hebrew נָזַר nazar (not used in Qal) is 'to separate.' Hence the נָזַר nazir is 'the separated, consecrated, or devoted one.' The same word in the form נִזְרָה is found in Syriac, where it is used, e.g., of maidens consecrated to the service of Belthi (see W. R. Smith, RS², p. 483). In Gn 49²⁶ nazir is applied to Joseph, 'him who was separate from his brethren.' In La 4⁷ 'her Nazarites' (AV) probably means 'her nobles' (RV). Usually, however, the name nāzīr is to be understood in the technical sense of one separated by the taking, or imposition, of a peculiar vow. One of the marks of the Nazirite was his unshorn locks. Hence the word nāzīr was sometimes used in the general sense of 'untrimmed' or 'unshorn.' In Lv 25¹¹ it is used of an undressed vine, and in Jer 7²⁹ it refers probably to unshorn hair, without implying the Nazirite vow.

2. The vow.—In Nu 6¹⁻²¹ we have the law of the Nazirite. He was bound (1) to abstain from the use of wine, strong drink, and all products of the vine 'from the kernels even to the husk' (vv. 3-4); (2) to 'let the locks of the hair of his head grow' unshorn (v. 5); (3) to avoid contact with any dead body (vv. 6-7). From the instructions given to the mother of Samson (Jg 13⁴) some add, as a fourth mark of the Nazirite, abstinence from unclean food. But this was a precept for all Jews, and cannot be regarded as in any way a peculiar mark of the Nazirite. No doubt it may be said to follow from the third point above, that the Nazirite would be careful to guard against all ceremonial defilement.

If by mishap the Nazirite were defiled by contact with the dead, he had to go through a process of ceremonial cleansing, shaving his head and bringing a sin-offering, a burnt-offering, and a trespass-offering, and then begin the original period of his Naziriteship de novo (Nu 6⁹⁻¹²). From the same passage it is clear that both men and women might take the vow (v. 2).

3. Development of Naziritism.—It does not lie within the scope of this article to set forth completely the probable rise and evolution of Naziritism, or to argue fully the various problems involved. The reader must consult HDB or JE. Here we simply indicate the most likely way along which Naziritism advanced till it became the complicated phenomenon it presents in the period with which we deal.

It is quite clear, and may be said to be generally admitted, that the legislation of Nu 6 does not create Naziritism, but regulates it. It is already in existence, with probably a long history behind it. Premising that its earliest history is quite unknown to us, we may say that it makes its first recorded appearance with Samson (Jg 13). He was a 'Nazirite unto God from the womb.' Now the only part of the regulations of Nu 6 that we can affirm with certainty to have been observed by Samson is that prohibiting the cutting of the hair. Quite certainly all the stress is laid on that in his history. His mother, indeed, is commanded to abstain from wine till he be born, but there is no evidence in the stories that there was anything of the ascetic about Samson himself. It is clear that the prohibition against contact with the dead could not have held for him (Jg 14⁹).

When we come to the time of Amos, we find that abstinence from wine is most emphasized. 'Ye gave the Nazirites wine to drink' (21¹). It is quite clear that by this time abstinence from wine is essential to the Nazirite. Nu 6 gives equal emphasis to both points, and adds the requirement of ceremonial purity with reference to the dead.

Probably, then, we have three stages in the historical development of Naziritism, but we may take it that the mark of the Nazirite par excellence all through was the unshorn locks, as the use of nāzīr in Lv 25¹¹ seems to prove. The root idea of Naziritism is 'separated unto God,' and in the three prohibitions we have a triple expression of that separation. The first and second came to be merely conventional signs of Naziritism, but it is not difficult to conjecture what significance they had originally. During the period of his vow the Nazirite left his hair unshorn; at the close he burned it at the sanctuary as an offering. The custom of sacrificing the hair was widespread among many nations, the view doubtless being that part of the body may be sacrificed as representing the whole. The hair was unshorn during the vow because, being designed for sacrifice to God, it must be kept inviolate till the set time. Among the ancient Arabians there were several groups bearing a strong resemblance to the Hebrew Nazirites, and it was for purposes of war or blood-feud that they consecrated themselves. Quite probably the earliest type of Naziritism was of similar import. To be a hero against his people's enemies is the end of Samson's consecration.

In the ascetic abstinence from wine and the abhorrence of everything connected with the vine, we find probably the remnant of a protest on the part of those who regarded themselves as true Jews against the adoption by Israel of Canaanitish culture. In this the Rechabites were closely allied to the Nazirites. Though this protest had been long forgotten, the ascetic principle would persist in its own strength. The Nazirite, being specially consecrated to God, had a certain affinity with the priests, who were also specially consecrated. Hence it was natural that regulations against defilement, similar to those which applied to priests, should be imposed on Nazirites likewise. (For full discussion of all those points the reader is referred to HDB iii., art. 'Nazirite'.)

4. Naziritism in the 1st cent. A.D.—By this time the law of the Nazirite had been minutely developed and expanded into a whole treatise in the Mishna. From the number and variety of the regulations we may infer that the taking of the vow was a very common occurrence. Men and women, both high and low in rank, became Nazirites. Berenice (Ac 25¹³) took a vow (Josephus, BJ II. xv. 1). Queen Helena of Adiabene was a Nazirite for many years (Nāzîr, iii. 6), as was also Miriam of Palmyra. Women and slaves could take the vow, but only with the consent of their husbands or owners (ib. iv. 1-5). Fathers might dedicate minors, mothers were forbidden to do so (ib. iv. 29). If one saw a woman convicted of sin by the process of Nu 5¹¹⁻³¹, he was admonished to become a Nazirite, on the ground that the law of the Nazirite follows immediately in Nu 6.

The vow was taken for a variety of reasons, such as deliverance from or prevention of sickness (Josephus, BJ II. xv. 1), the fulfilment of a wish (Nāzîr, i. 7), or as a penance (Nedārim, 9b). We may suppose that the same variety of reason as might induce a Catholic to undertake a pilgrimage—penance, discipline, thanksgiving, or the acquisition of merit—would lead the Jew to take a Nazirite vow.

The vow might be for a lifetime or any shorter period that the devotee might choose. In practice the shortest period was 30 days, and this was also the period in an indefinite vow (Nāzîr, i. 3). The vow might be taken outside Palestine, but, so long as the Temple stood, had to be ended in Palestine. The followers of Hillel maintained that though a vow might be observed outside the Holy Land, the whole period must be observed over again in Palestine. The school of Shammai held that it was necessary to observe only 30 days in Palestine.

A man became a Nazirite simply by declaring his intention or wish to become one (ib. i. 1), but there were many formulæ connected with the taking of the vow, some of which are not intelligible. It was not a valid vow to say 'Let my hand be nāzîr,' it was valid to say 'Let my liver be nāzîr,' but what was the meaning of saying either we cannot tell. The three restrictions of Nu 6 remained in force. If one said, however, 'Let me be a Nazirite on the day that Messiah appears,' one might drink wine on Sabbaths and feast days, since it was held Messiah would not appear on any of them (Erubin, 43a). A life-long Nazirite might cut his hair once a year, unless he were a Samson-Nazirite (Nāzîr, i. 4a). This permission followed from the recognition of Absalom as a Nazirite (2 S 14²⁶). The Nazirite was denied the use of a comb, but might dress his hair by other means (Nāzîr, i. 6). On the expiry of his vow the Nazirite had to offer sacrifices (Nu 6^{13a}) at the Temple while it stood, and 'take the hair of the head of his separation, and put it on the fire which is under the sacrifice of peace offerings.' The necessary expenses were heavy, and it was considered a meritorious thing for the wealthy to defray the expenses of poor Nazirites. The technical term for this charity was 'having so many Nazirites shorn' (Nāzîr, ii.

5, 6). King Agrippa, 'coming to Jerusalem in much greater prosperity than he had before, . . . ordered that many of the Nazirites should have their heads shorn' (Josephus, Ant. XIX. vi. 1).

The destruction of the Temple was no doubt a fatal blow to Naziritism. It gradually disappeared in asceticism, and there is no trace of its survival beyond the early Christian centuries. (For a fuller account of Naziritism in Rabbinical literature see JE ix. 195 ff.)

5. Naziritism in the NT.—Nazirites are not definitely mentioned in the NT, and there is difference of opinion as to the number of indirect references.

(a) Jesus.—Jesus had no connexion with Naziritism technically considered. Yet the names Nazarene and Nazoræan applied to Him bear some resemblance to Nazirite. Late ecclesiastical writers like Eusebius, Tertullian, and Jerome show a tendency to confuse the three terms. And if Nazîr were taken, not in its technical sense, but as meaning 'holy one' (it is actually so rendered twice in LXX, Jg 13⁷ 16¹⁷), we can see how Jesus might popularly be called Nazîr. By a play on words the people might say, 'Jesus—not Nazarene but Nazîr.' (For a full discussion of this point see E. A. Abbott, 'Nazarene and Nazoræan,' in Miscellanea Evangelica I., Cambridge, 1913.)

(b) John the Baptist.—Some hold that the Baptist was a Nazirite, but there is not evidence sufficient to justify this. It cannot be accepted that he 'is described as a Nazirite for life (Lk 1¹⁵)' (HDB iii. 500). The only point in which it is predicted or enjoined that John shall resemble the Nazirites is his abstinence from wine, but there is no ground for believing that all who practised that self-denial were Nazirites. This verse describes him no more as a Nazirite than as an Essene, which some, as groundlessly, have held him to be.

(c) James the Just.—With full confidence we might recognize a life-long Nazirite in James 'the brother of the Lord,' if we could trust the description of him quoted from the Commentaries of Hegesippus, bk. v., in Eusebius, HE II. xxiii.: 'This Apostle was consecrated from his mother's womb. He drank neither wine nor strong drink, nor ate animal food. A razor never came upon his head.' But the succeeding incredible statement, 'he alone was allowed to enter the Holy of Holies,' and the improbable account of his martyrdom which follows, and contrasts unfavourably with the account given by Josephus (Ant. XX. ix. 1), cast doubt on the trustworthiness of the historian, who probably took his information in part from the Ebionitic Ascents of James (see HDB ii. 542).

(d) Ac 18¹⁸.—This verse presents various difficulties. We may decide the grammatical difficulty by saying that, though the construction is ambiguous, it is St. Paul whose head was shorn at Cenchreæ, 'for he had a vow.' Was it a Nazirite vow? There is no inherent improbability in the thought that St. Paul should take a Nazirite vow, rather the reverse. As we have seen, the vow was a common thing among Jews, and we could easily conjecture plausible grounds for St. Paul's taking it, e.g. deliverance from danger at Corinth (Ac 18¹⁻¹⁷) or recovery from sickness, the 'thorn in the flesh' to which he was subject. But the supreme difficulty in holding that this was a Nazirite vow is that his head was shorn at Cenchreæ, not at Jerusalem, where alone a Nazirite vow could be completed. None of the various explanations that have been offered seems to be adequate. We have noted above that the Nazirite was permitted to cut his hair once a year, if his vow were for a lifetime. But this will hardly suit St. Paul's case. Again, he is on his way to keep a feast in Jerusalem (v. 21). Why he should have his head shorn in Cenchreæ when in a few weeks he would be in Jerusalem is a mystery, if his was a Nazirite vow. Nor does it meet the case to suggest that this shearing was to purify himself on account of his sojourn among the heathen. For, once again, why should he perform that in a heathen land and not wait till he was in Palestine? Some say that it was customary to shear one's locks at the beginning of a vow, and that St. Paul is not completing but beginning the period of his vow at Cenchreæ. Those who say so quote no authorities for their view, and for a good reason. There is not a particle of evidence anywhere that shearing the hair was a token that a vow was beginning. 'To shear the head' was a technical phrase meaning to complete a vow. Hence we must conclude that in all likelihood it was a private, not a Nazirite, vow that St. Paul completed at Cenchreæ (see EGT, in loc.; cf. A. C. McGiffert, Hist. of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 274, n. 4).

(c) Ac 21²³⁻²⁶.—In this passage it is quite clear that it was a Nazirite vow that the four men had on them, and we have explained above what is meant by St. Paul being at charges for them, that they might shave their heads, viz. that he should defray the rather high cost of the necessary offerings. What is meant by St. Paul's purifying himself with them (vv. 24, 26)? The shortest period allowed for the duration of a Nazirite vow was 30 days (see above). An explanation like the following is very attractive: 'The law permitted a man to share the vow if he could find companions who had gone through the prescribed ceremonies and who permitted him to join their company. This permission was commonly granted if the new-comer paid all the fees required from the whole company . . . and finished the vow along with the others' (T. M. Lindsay, Acts of the Apostles, Edinburgh, 1884, ii. 113; cf. J. I. Still, The Early Gentile Christian Church, Edinburgh, 1913, p. 125). Unfortunately, no authority is quoted in support of this view, nor have we been able to find any. (For a better suggestion, see HDB iii. 500.) No view is free from difficulty, but on the whole the suggestion of F. J. A. Hort is most satisfying, that St. Paul himself may have been about to offer sacrifices in connexion with a vow made previously, not necessarily a Nazirite vow (see Judaistic Christianity, Cambridge, 1894, p. 109 f.).

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB, DCG, EB, JE, PRE³, s.v.; S. R. Driver, Cambridge Bible, 'Joel and Amos,' Cambridge, 1897, p. 152 f.; R. J. Knowling, in EGT, 'Acts,' London, 1900, pp. 392 f., 449 f.; J. Grill, in JPT, 1880, p. 645 ff.; G. B. Gray, in JThSt i. [1900] 201 f.; W. R. Smith, RS², London, 1894, pp. 323 ff., 481 ff.; H. Ewald, The Antiquities of Israel, Eng. tr., London, 1876, pp. 84-88, 162, 231. W. D. NIVEN.

NEAPOLIS (Νέα Πόλις).—Neapolis, 'the Naples of Macedonia' (Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, i. 339), was the port to which St. Paul, sailing from Troas in answer to the call of the man of Macedonia, directed his course, and he reached it after a quick passage—a straight run (εὐθὺςδρομήσαμεν, Ac 16¹¹) before a southerly breeze. Here he first set foot on European soil. Neapolis originally belonged to Thrace (Pliny, HN vi. 18), but it was now in the province of Macedonia (Strabo, vii. fr. 33; Ptolemy, iii. 13). Its name, 'New Town,' probably implies that it was an old town re-founded and supplied with a fresh colony. Strabo (vii. fr. 36) appears to identify it with Daton, which had 'fruitful plains, a port, streams, dockyards, and valuable gold mines, whence the proverb "A Daton of good things," like "Piles of Plenty."'

The growing importance of Neapolis kept pace with that of Philippi, ten miles inland, which it served as a seaport. During the last stand of the Republicans at Philippi, their galleys were moored off Neapolis (Appian, de Bell. Civ. iv. 106; Dio Cass. xivii. 35). The ancient city is generally identified with the small Turkish village of Kavallo, which stands on a promontory overlooking a bay of the same name, opposite the island of Thasos. Here many Latin inscriptions have been found, and there are the remains of a great aqueduct.

LITERATURE.—See W. Smith, DGKG ii. [1868] 411; W. M. Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, 1838, iii. 180; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 205 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

NEIGHBOUR.—In the Hebrew of the OT the words rendered 'neighbour' have less reference to locality than the English word. In נָחֵב, it is true, the etymological root is 'near,' but it occurs very rarely; in the slightly commoner נָקִיב, with the much more usual נָר, the thought is rather that of one's 'fellows' or 'friends.' The fairly frequent נָרָא means 'inhabitant' (sc. of the same or some adjacent district), and is thus akin to נָחֵב, but on the whole, in the words translated 'neighbour,' the idea of fellowship is much stronger than that of proximity, and in a number of passages, as a rendering of נָר, 'fellow' or 'fellows' should perhaps be substituted. At the same time, 'fellow-man' would be an exaggeration, for it would imply not only humanitarianism, which many of these passages contain, but universalism, which is too much to postulate. This is especially clear in the one passage (Lv 19¹⁸) which is of crucial importance as being the source of the main current of NT teaching on the subject. There the injunction 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour (נָר) as thyself' is parallel with 'Thou shalt not bear any grudge against the children of thy people.' If this racial limitation is kept in view, its abrogation in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10^{27ff.}) becomes far more piquant, for it is precisely the interpretation of Lv 19¹⁸ which is there the point at issue. True, נָר is rendered by the Greek πλησίον ('near'), which, if etymology were everything, would once more emphasize local limitations; but the whole trend of the passage clearly shows that πλησίον, in the mouth of Jesus, means any human being within reach of one's help, while for the lawyer it is still a racial term. The same verse from Leviticus is also quoted in Mt 19¹⁹ 22³⁹, Mk 12³¹, Ro 13⁹, Gal 5¹⁴, Ja 2⁸. In the first three of these, the quotation being made by Jesus, 'neighbour' is probably universalistic in accordance with Lk 10^{27ff.}. In Mt 5⁴³ it is laid down that 'enemies' may not be hated in contrast with 'neighbours.' Further, the attitude here enjoined implies, like Lk 10^{27ff.} and the Golden Rule (Mt 7¹², Lk 6³¹), an enthusiastic and active, as well as universal, benevolence, as far removed from neglect as from hatred.

In the Gospels occur also γείτων and περίοικος, both of which mean 'neighbour' in the local sense. πλησίον is never literal, i.e. local, but always ethicized; it varies, however, in the width of its application. In Ro 15² and Eph 4²⁵ the context probably favours the interpretation 'fellow-Christian,' in Ro 13⁹, 10 'fellow-man'; Gal 5¹⁴ and Ja 2⁸ are doubtful. Whether wider or less wide, it is always closely related to the thought of love.

The kind of conduct which a man is said to owe to his neighbour out of love comprises mainly the following: consideration for his scruples, tenderness for his weaknesses, the sacrifice of one's own pleasure to his, but with the object of building up his character (Ro 15); abstinence from gratification of lust or of quarrelsomeness at his expense (Gal 5); abstinence from 'respect of persons'—because of the disrespect inflicted by it on other persons (Ja 2)—and from censoriousness (4¹¹⁻¹²); the speaking and doing of the simple truth (Eph 4¹² 23); and generally, the rendering to every man of his due (Ro 13).

LITERATURE.—J. R. Seeley, *Ecce Homō*¹¹, 1873, chs. xvii.-xxiv. (cf. especially ch. xviii. with Ro 15² and parallels). For the reconciliation of Christian love to one's neighbour with righteous and reasonable self-regard, see A. Plummer, St. Matthew, 1909, pp. 84-89, ICC, 'St. Luke', 1893, p. 135f.

C. H. WATKINS.

NEREUS (Νηρεΐς, a Greek name, fairly common among slaves and freedmen, and found in inscriptions of the Imperial household).—Nereus is the third of a group of Christians, his sister (probably Nereis or Nerias by name) being the fourth, who with 'all the saints that are with them' are saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁵. The first two names, Philologus and Julia (qq.v.) may be those of husband and wife. If so, Nereus and his sister and Olympas may have been their family, which formed the nucleus of a church which met under their leadership at their house in Rome or Ephesus. Cf. possibly the 'household of Stephanas' in Corinth, who were 'the firstfruits of Achaia' and who 'set themselves to minister unto the saints' (1 Co 16¹⁵). The relationship is, however, purely conjectural, as nothing further is known of any of these persons. That they formed with the other unnamed persons a household or district (ἐκκλησία), of which they had been the nucleus and therefore became the leaders, is extremely probable, or the men may have been the heads of separate small communities. The name Nereus was that of a minor sea-god, father of the Nereids, and it is significant that a Christian should have had no scruple in retaining it. (Other names of heathen deities borne by Christians mentioned in Ro 16 are Hermes [v.¹⁴], Phœbe, [v.¹].) The name is connected with legends of the early Roman Church (see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans', Edinburgh, 1902, p. 428).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

NERO.—The future Emperor Nero received at birth, 16th December, 37, the names Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus. His father was Gneus Domitius Ahenobarbus (consul, A.D. 32), on the mother's side grandnephew of the Emperor Augustus, and his mother was Julia Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus (died A.D. 59) and great-granddaughter of Augustus. Both were persons of ungovernable temper and immoral character, and from the first their son had little chance of leading a noble life. Gneus died in the year 40 when his son was barely three years old, and Agrippina, possessed by limitless ambition, schemed soon after for a second marriage, with no less a person than the reigning Claudius himself (Emperor A.D. 41-54; see under CLAUDIUS), in spite of the fact that he was her uncle. Agrippina became the fourth wife of Claudius in A.D. 49, such marriages having been legalized by the Senate (Tac. Ann. xii. 5-6). She procured the recall of the philosopher Lucius Annaeus Seneca and made him instructor of her son. At the same time he was betrothed to Claudius' daughter Octavia. In the year 50 Claudius adopted Domitius, who thus became Tiberius Claudius Drusus Germanicus Cæsar (according to another view, Lucius Claudius Nero). Next year the young man assumed the dress of manhood and was given the consulship. At the same time Afranius Burrus, his military instructor, was made prefect of the praetorian guards. In A.D. 53 the marriage with Octavia took place. Claudius' own son Britannicus (born 12th Feb. 41), who had been steadily pushed further and further into the background, happened to have to leave Rome through illness in the year 54. This gave Agrippina her opportunity, and with the help of two professional poisoners Claudius was put to death on 13th October. Nero Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, or, as he is later called, Impera-

tor Nero Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, was saluted Emperor by the soldiers, and their acclamation was ratified by the Senate. Among his private relationships during his reign may be mentioned his passion for his Greek mistress Acte, his marriage in A.D. 62 with Poppæa Sabina, wife of M. Saluius Otho (one of his successors in the Empire), and the banishment and murder of his first wife Octavia at her instance. In A.D. 63 a daughter was born to Nero and Poppæa, but the child died shortly afterwards. His marriage with the male Pythagoras took place in A.D. 64, and in 65 the death of Poppæa. In 55 Nero had Britannicus poisoned and in 59 his mother was put to death by his order. She had committed every sin for his advancement, but had become intolerable. Nero died by his own hand or that of a slave on 9th June, 68, leaving no descendant behind him. With him the Cæsarian race, weakened by inter-marriage, debauchery, and madness, came to an end.

A brief summary of the chief events of Nero's reign may now be given. It has become customary to repeat that his first five years were a model period of government. There was some difficulty in holding this view, considering what the historians have to tell us. But J. G. C. Anderson and F. Haverfield have recently pointed out (see under Literature) that this opinion, put into the mouth of the Emperor Trajan by the late compiler Aurelius Victor (Liber de Cæsaribus, ch. 5), does not refer to the first five years, does not perhaps refer to any specific five years, but if it does, refers rather to the last five years, and in any case touches only Nero's building operations. His reign is best divided into two periods—the first from 54 to 62, when the State was under the joint administration of Seneca and Burrus, and the second from 62 to 68, when it was under the Emperor's sole rule. Neither period was undistinguished for good, and indeed the machinery of government was so perfected by Augustus that the mad behaviour of an Emperor scandalized only the inhabitants of Rome, and had no effect on the provinces, in which the real life of the Roman Empire lay. The administration of Seneca and Burrus led to the strengthening of the power of the Senate. It also led to the overthrow of Agrippina's influence, which had been most powerful at the first. Nero's policy seems at first to have been one of laissez faire. He was very young and fond of pleasure, and gratified his tastes to the full. The historians are occupied with details of his doings, and tell us little about Italian or Roman affairs.

In the year 58 the Emperor proposed to establish 'free trade.' The object of this proposal was to relieve the people and to get rid of a method of taxation attended with much injustice. The producers and capitalists, on whom extra burdens would thus have been imposed, were able to strangle the scheme at birth. The Imperial purse, depleted through extravagance, was replenished by confiscation. About 61 or 62 began the depreciation of the gold and silver coinage, from which Rome never completely recovered. Nero also deprived the Senate of the right to issue copper coinage. This was a serious blow, as the exchange value of the copper always exceeded the value of the metal, and the Senate could thus coin credit-money to any amount. On 19th July, A.D. 64, the great fire in Rome broke out; it lasted for a week, and destroyed an immense area of property. The occasion was used to build broader streets and finer buildings. The reign of Nero is conspicuous for the lives of prominent Stoics, particularly Pætus Thrasea, men of courage and virtue among the noblest the world has ever seen. They stood for the old republican regime, and were particularly in evidence in the Senate. These, as well as rich men in no way connected with them, were victims of a policy of wholesale murder associated with the last six years or so of Nero's reign. It was not surprising that, while the generality of the Senate were paralyzed with terror, a powerful conspiracy should have arisen against the maniac on the throne. The leader chosen was C. Calpurnius Piso, and the plot had been brewing since 62. In 65 all the arrangements were complete, but at the eleventh hour the Emperor was informed, and Piso, Seneca the philosopher, Lucan, the author of the rhetorical epic De Bello Civili (often, but wrongly, called Pharsalia), and others, met their death. Nero's own fall was the result of the revolt of C. Julius Vindex, governor of Gallia Lugdunensis, with whom Galba, the governor of Hispania Tarraconensis, allied himself. Vindex was defeated by Verginius Rufus, governor of Southern Germany, but Galba became Emperor.

External affairs during Nero's reign bulk more largely than internal. Two provinces were added to the Roman Empire—Pontus Polemoniacus in Northern Asia Minor, by the gift of Polemo, and the Alpes Cottiae, on the death of Cottius (Suet. Nero, 18). But it was in the extreme east on the one hand, and the extreme west on the other, that the most important events took place—in Armenia and in Britain. Britain had been made a province in 43, but pacification was impossible without hard and exhausting warfare. Real progress was made under the governorship of Suetonius Paulinus, who in 61 captured Mona (Anglesey). There followed a great rising of the Iceni (under Boudicca) and the Trinovantes. Camalodunum (Colchester), the Roman colonia, was burnt, and Londinium and Verulamium (St. Albans) were captured by the insurgents. A great slaughter of the Romans and their allies was followed by the victory of Paulinus and the suicide of Boudicca.

The Eastern campaigns of Nero's reign are imperishably connected with Gnaeus Domitius Corbulo, one of the greatest generals of the Roman Empire. There had been for some time a struggle between the Romans and the Parthians, their hereditary enemies, for the possession of Armenia. Rival pretenders to the throne of that country were supported, one by Rome, the other by Parthia. When Nero came to the throne, a Parthian prince, Tiridates, was ruling over Armenia. Corbulo's troops at first were insufficient and many of them were unfit for service. Much time was lost in training them and in parleying with Tiridates. Artaxata was captured in 58. The surrender of Tigranocerta resulted in the defeat of Tiridates and the establishment of a new king in 60, but circumstances led to an arrangement with Parthia by which Tiridates was permitted to return in the next year. This arrangement was not ratified by the home government, and Armenia had to be conquered again. The new governor of Cappadocia, Lucius Cæsennius Pætus, proved incompetent, and his army had to capitulate. Corbulo declined to interfere. Pætus was recalled, and Corbulo undertook the government of Cappadocia. The result was that Tiridates had to go to Rome and receive his crown from Nero as a suppliant (A.D. 66). Corbulo's success throughout seems to have been due in part to his skilful subordinate, Vettius Bolanus (Statius, Silvæ, v. ii. 31–47), but it did not prevent his suicide by Nero's command in Greece (A.D. 67). The severe discipline and hardship of these Oriental campaigns provide a contrast to the Imperial excesses at Rome. The spread of Christianity to Western Europe presents another.

The latter part of St. Paul's missionary activity coincides with Nero's reign. It was to Nero's tribunal that St. Paul appealed (Ac 25¹¹); it was also among the slaves and freedmen of his household that he found many of his fellow-Christians in Rome (Ph 4²²; cf. Ro 16). It was on a capital charge that St. Paul had been arraigned, and in such cases a Roman citizen could appeal from the court of a procurator to the Emperor himself. There are inconsistencies in the Acts narrative (cf. Mommsen's article mentioned below, pp. 92, 93 = p. 443) of the preliminaries, but we need have no doubt that St. Paul did as a matter of fact appear before the Emperor in Rome. Whether acquittal or condemnation was the result, and whether in the former case St. Paul had to stand a second trial, which resulted in condemnation, are questions which lie outside the scope of the present article. Whatever be the truth in this matter, there is a consensus of opinion that Nero was the first Emperor to persecute the Christians. The Church always believed this (cf. Ambrosiaster, writing in Rome about 375, in 2 Thess. 27: 'mysterium iniquitatis a Nerone coeptum est, qui zelo idolorum et apostolos interfecit,' etc.), and, according to a very early interpretation of the number of the Beast in the Apocalypse (13¹⁸), Neron Kesar is there referred to (confirmed by a Western variant, 616, which means the Latin form Nero, as against the Greek form Neron, 666–616 being = 50, represented in Greek by Ϟ[50]). The narrative of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) connects the evil treatment of the Christians with the great fire of the year 64. The Emperor's behaviour on that occasion was in many ways to be commended, but the story that he sat on the roof of his palace playing the harp during the conflagration (add Augustine, Sermons, cccxvi. 7, to the authorities usually quoted) makes the narrative of the horrible death of the Christians, condemned for incendiarism, quite credible. The first Christians met their death in Rome as scapegoats, not because it was illegal to be a Christian. That stage is later; how much later is debated.

Some summing up of Nero's character may be attempted, though it seems hardly fair to judge a man who was only thirty-one at his death, and was undoubtedly afflicted with madness. There is perhaps less good that can be said of him than of any other Roman Emperor. That he was prodigal and licentious to an astounding degree cannot be denied. All the savings of the Emperor Claudius were dispersed by his wastefulness, as were those of Tiberius by his successor Gaius (Caligula). It may also be truly said that he had no conception of the Imperial dignity. He had much of the mountebank about him, and his musical and other performances on the public stage made him ridiculous. He was childish enough to enter into poetic rivalry with his subject Lucan. Though lazy by contrast with his class in governmental duty, he might have attained some eminence in the arts, and in these only, under other circumstances.

LITERATURE.—The chief ancient authorities are Tacitus, Ab Excessu Divi Augusti, bks. xiii.–xvi.; Suetonius, Life of Nero. The best modern book is B. W. Henderson, The Life and Principate of the Emperor Nero, London, 1903 (particularly good on Corbulo's campaigns); J. B. Bury, A History of the Roman Empire, do., 1893, chs. xvi., xvii., xviii. On the quinquennium Neronis, see the epoch-making art. 'Trajan on the Quinquennium Neronis,' by J. G. C. Anderson (with note by F. Haverfield), in JRS i. [1911] 173–179. On the Neronian household, see J. B. Lightfoot's excursus in the Epistle to the Philippians, London, 1878; on St. Paul's legal position under Nero, see Mommsen's art. 'Die Rechtsverhältnisse des Apostels Paulus,' in ZNTW ii. [1901] 81–96 = Gesammelte Schriften, iii. (Berlin, 1907) 431–446; on Nero as persecutor of Christians, cf. C. F. Arnold, Die Neronische Christenverfolgung, Leipzig, 1888; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1894, ch. xi.; E. G. Hardy, Studies in Roman History, do., 1906, ch. iv.; on Nero and Lucan, W. B. Anderson, in Queen's Quarterly, xiv. [1906–07] 198–214. A. SOUTER.

NERVA.—M. Cocceius Nerva, who on being chosen Emperor was henceforth known as Emperor Nerva Cæsar (sometimes Cæsar Nerva)

Augustus, son of M. Cocceius Nerva, a juriscult, and Sergia Plautilla, was born at Narnia on the Via Flaminia in Southern Umbria on 8th November, probably in A.D. 35. He was elected prætor for the year 66. He gained favour with the Emperor Nero by his interest in poetry and his help in the detection of the Pisonian conspiracy. After election to various priesthoods he attained the consulship (with the Emperor Vespasian) in the year 71 (for the second time in 90 with the Emperor Domitian). Under the Emperor Domitian he was falsely charged by astrologers with being in possession of the Emperor's horoscope, and was banished, it is said, to Tarentum.

On the murder of Domitian on 18th September, 96, he was, at the instance of Petronius Secundus, prefect of the prætorian guard, and Parthenius, the murderer of Domitian, elected Emperor, though over sixty years of age. He held the consulship for the third time in 97, for the fourth in 98. In the autumn of 97 he adopted M. Ulpius Traianus. He died in his sixty-third year (25th [or 27th] Jan. 98), having ruled for sixteen months and ten days.

His reign was auspicious, though short. Any one would have been welcome after the reign of terror under Domitian, and the Senate gave him a hearty reception. Some of the informers of Domitian's reign were put to death, but in general a policy of clemency was followed, and some of the leading partisans of Domitian continued to enjoy places of honour. Many who had been unjustly banished under the Domitianic regime were recalled, amongst them the well-known rhetorician, Dio Cocceianus of Prusa, best known to us as Dio Chrysostom. It is highly probable also that the apostle John was automatically released from confinement in Patmos, as the death of Domitian of necessity constituted his acta null and void (Eus. HE III. xx. 8; cf. W. M. Ramsay, The First Christian Century, London, 1911, p. 45). Nerva also recalled to public service worthy men who had been driven into retirement by the policy of Domitian. His task at home was nevertheless one of very great difficulty, and he was wisely guided in adopting Trajan (q.v.). There was also external trouble—a war with Germany. Our reports are difficult to reconcile and to understand, but at any rate both Nerva and Trajan received the honorary title Germanicus about the end of the year 97.

Nerva depended for support upon the Senate, and took an oath to put no senator to death. He had to replenish the exchequer, which had been much depleted by the folly of Domitian, and he proved a master of finance, not shrinking from great personal sacrifices in his efforts to right the situation. He appointed a commission of five men, minuendis publicis sumptibus, and was able to remit a good deal of taxation. Most remarkable of all his achievements from the modern point of view was his alimentary foundation, which there is reason to believe was the perpetuation of a scheme inaugurated by Domitian. In most of the Italian towns he provided contributions from the privy purse for the education of the children of freeborn parents of slender means. The money for this special purpose seems to have been derived from land. The Emperor's plan was followed not only by his successors, but also by private persons like the younger Pliny. Nerva also had an agrarian law passed to relieve agriculture, and carried out a land-purchase scheme which enabled the poor to obtain small-holdings. Further, he established coloniæ in various parts of the Empire, and conferred advantages, both material and political, on a number of towns, particularly in the Greek East (e.g. Beroæa). Like all the Emperors, he had the food problem of Rome to cope with, and in this he was successful. Other wise and beneficent legal provisions are attributed to him.

Though careful of expenditure, he did not neglect building, and the Forum Nervæ (or Forum Transitorium) in Rome attests his activity in this direction. Part of the Temple of Minerva in it still stands in situ. Considerable improvement and development of roads and aqueducts both in Italy and in the provinces are also associated with this principate. Nerva died a natural death at Rome, the result of old age and illness. The burial in the Mausoleum of Augustus was superintended by Trajan, and Nerva was deified by the Senate. His reign began a new era of liberty and good government, which lasted for about eighty years.

LITERATURE.—Xiphilinus (Epitome of Dio Cassius, lxvii. 15–lxviii. 3), Aurelius Victor (Epitome de Caesaribus), Pliny the Younger (Letters and Panegyric of Trajan), Philostratus (Apollonius of Tyana), Dio Chrysostom (Orations), Frontinus (De Aquis Urbis Romæ) are the chief ancient authorities. Of modern authorities, the Histories of the Roman Empire should be consulted, also E. Klebs, Prosopographia Imperii Romani, sæc. I, ii, iii, pars i. [Berlin, 1897], no. 974, p. 429 f., and Stein in Pauly-Wissowa, iv. 133–154. A. SOUTER.

NEW JERUSALEM.—1. References.—(a) In canonical writings.—In the NT the name 'New Jerusalem' occurs only twice, and these references are both in the Apocalypse of John, viz. Rev 3¹²: 'He that overcometh . . . I will write upon him . . . the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God'; 21²: 'And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God' (cf. v. 10). But other phrases with the same reference occur elsewhere in the NT, as Gal 4²⁶: 'But the Jerusalem that is above is free'; and He 12²: 'But ye are come . . . unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.' It is a city of heavenly origin and full of fresh life, the metropolis of the new earth (cf. Rev 21¹). This hope of a new order of things (cf. Mt 19²⁸, 2 P 3¹³), with Jerusalem as the centre, is not confined to the NT; it occurs also in the OT, e.g. in Is 65¹⁷: 'For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind,' and in Is 66²²: 'For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain.' But the metropolis that appears in Isaiah is not the New Jerusalem; it is the old city as before, only purified and blessed by God in a special manner. The basis of the new conception within the OT is found in such passages as Ezk 40²: 'In the visions of God brought he me into the land of Israel, and set me down upon a very high mountain, whereon was as it were the frame of a city on the south,' with the whole description of the city in the following chapters (40–48); Is 54¹¹: 'O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will set thy stones in fair colours and lay thy foundations with sapphires'; 60¹⁰: 'And strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee: for in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favour have I had mercy on thee'; Hag 2⁹: 'I will fill this house with glory. . . . The latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former, saith the Lord of hosts'; Zec 2⁴ (EV): 'Jerusalem shall be inhabited as villages without walls. . . . For I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her.'

(b) In non-canonical writings.—Jewish writings, mainly apocalyptic, fill up the gulf between the Old and New Testaments with regard to the new city and the conception underlying it. The new order of things appears in 1 En. xlv. 4, 5: 'And I will transform the heaven and make it an eternal blessing and light: and I will transform the earth and make it a blessing'; lxvii. 1: 'till the new creation is accomplished which dureth till eternity'; xci. 16: 'And the first heaven shall depart and pass away, and a new heaven shall appear, and all the powers of the heavens shall give sevenfold light.' In the Book of Jubilees the new creation is mentioned; cf. i. 29: 'And the angel of the presence who went before the camp of Israel took the tables of the divisions of the years . . . from the day of the [new] creation when the heavens and the earth shall be renewed and all their creation according to the powers of the heaven, . . . until the sanctuary of the Lord shall be made in Jerusalem on Mount Zion.' There is the same implication in 2 En. (Slavonic Enoch) lxv. 6 ff.: 'When all creation visible and invisible, as the Lord created it, shall end, then every man goes to the great judgement, and then all time shall perish, . . . they (i.e. the righteous) will live eternally. . . . And they shall have a great indestructible wall, and a paradise bright and incorruptible, for all corruptible things shall pass away, and there will be eternal life.' Again the renewal of creation appears in 2 Bar. (Apoc. Bar.) xxxii. 6: 'For there will be a greater trial than these two tribulations when the Mighty One will renew His creation'; and in 4 Ezzr. vii. 75: 'Thou shalt renew the creation.' The hope of an ideal city, too, finds frequent mention in Jewish literature, e.g. in Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Dan, v. 12): 'And, in the New Jerusalem shall the righteous rejoice, and it shall be unto the glory of God for ever'; this is the earliest occurrence of the expression 'New Jerusalem,' but here it simply implies the rebuilding of the old city. The idea emerges fully for the first time in 1 En. xc. 28, 29, where the pre-existence of the New Jerusalem is implied though not specifically assigned to the new house brought and set up by God Himself: 'They folded up that old house. . . . And I saw till the Lord of the sheep brought a new house greater and loftier than that first, and set it up in the place of the first which had been folded up: all its pillars were new, and its ornaments were new and larger than those of the first, the old one which He had taken away, and all the sheen were within it' (cf. liii. 6). The heavenly Jerusalem in 4 Ezra is described as 'the city that now is invisible' (vii. 26), 'a City builded' (viii. 52, x. 27), 'the [heavenly] pattern of her [the earthly city]' (x. 49); its descent from heaven is mentioned in xiii. 36: 'And Sion shall come and shall be made manifest to all men, prepared and builded, even as thou didst see the mountain cut out without hands,' while its preservation in heaven is referred to in 2 Bar. iv. 2-7: 'This building now built in your midst is not that which is revealed with Me, that which was prepared beforehand here from the time when I took counsel to make Paradise, and showed it to Adam before he sinned, but when he transgressed the commandment it was removed from him, as also Paradise. And after these things I showed it to My servant Abraham by night among the portions of the victims. And again also I showed it to Moses on Mount Sinai when I showed to him the likeness of the tabernacle and all its vessels. And now, behold, it is preserved with Me, as also Paradise.' The idea of the new city as simply a purification of the old appears in 1 En. x. 16-19: 'Destroy all wrong from the face of the earth. . . . And then shall all the righteous escape, and shall live till they beget thousands of children, and all the days of their youth and their old age shall they complete in peace. And then shall the whole earth be tilled in righteousness, and shall all be planted with trees and be full of blessing'; also in xxv. 1-6:

'This high mountain which thou hast seen, whose summit is like the throne of God, is His throne, where the Holy Great One, the Lord of Glory, the Eternal King, will sit, when He shall come down to visit the earth with goodness. And as for this fragrant tree . . . it shall be transplanted to the holy place, to the temple of the Lord, the Eternal King. Then shall they rejoice with joy and be glad, and into the holy place shall they enter; and its fragrance shall be in their bones, and they shall live a long life on earth, such as thy fathers lived'; and again in Pss.-Sol. xvii. 25, 33: 'And that he may purge Jerusalem from nations that trample (her) down to destruction'; 'and he shall purge Jerusalem, making it holy as of old.' Tobit mentions the ideal city in 13^{16, 17}: 'For Jerusalem shall be builded with sapphires and emeralds and precious stones; thy walls and towers and battlements with pure gold. And the streets of Jerusalem shall be paved with beryl and carbuncle and stones of Ophir.'

2. Rise and development of the conception.—

The Jews at first had no thought of any change in the present order of things: 'One generation goeth, and another generation cometh; and the earth abideth for ever' (Ec 1⁴); 'Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be moved for ever' (Ps 104⁵); 'The world also is established, that it cannot be moved' (93¹ 96¹⁰); 'He hath also established them [the heavens] for ever and ever' (148⁶). The heavens and the earth formed an established order of things that would be eternal in duration. According to the prophetic teaching, the scene of the Messianic Kingdom was to be the present earth, and that Kingdom was to last for ever; cf. Is 1^{25f}: 'And I will . . . thoroughly purge away thy dross, and will take away all thy tin: and I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called The city of righteousness, the faithful city'; Zeph 3¹⁴: 'But I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord. The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies . . . for they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid'; Jer 23^{5f}: 'Behold . . . I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and he shall reign as king and deal wisely. . . . In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; 12¹⁵: 'After that I have plucked them [the hostile nations] up, I will return and have compassion on them; and I will bring them again, every man to his heritage, and every man to his land'; Ezk 37^{26f}: 'I will place them [Israel], and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.' Is 2⁴ (= Mic 4^{1f}): 'The mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it . . . for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.' The advent of the Kingdom at first was to synchronize with the return from exile, but with that event the hopes of the people were not fulfilled. Haggai and Zechariah expected, however, that whenever the Temple was rebuilt, the Messianic Kingdom would be ushered in (cf. Hag 2⁷⁻⁹, Zec 2¹⁻⁵). With Joel, who introduces us into the apocalyptic atmosphere, we find the same conception, as in the Prophets, of the eternity of the Messianic Kingdom with Jerusalem as its centre: 'So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Zion my holy mountain: then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more. . . . But Judah shall abide for ever, and Jerusalem from generation to generation' (37^{18, 20}). But this conception gradually underwent a change that can already be traced in two late passages of the OT, viz. Is 65¹⁷ 66²², where the scene of the Messianic Kingdom is no longer this present world but a new heaven and a new earth. Jerusalem will be transformed as the metropolis of the new earth, but not yet created anew as the New Jerusalem: 'For, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more thence an infant of days, nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old, and the sinner being an hundred years old shall be accursed. And they shall build houses, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. . . . The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox: and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord' (65¹⁸⁻²⁵). The two late passages above imply a gradual transformation of the world—moral and physical—an idea which probably betrays Persian influence (cf. T. K. Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter [BL, 1889], London, 1891, p. 405). The same idea is perhaps present also in Is 51¹⁶: 'And I have put my words in thy mouth, and have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand, that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Thou art my people,' but if so, it is a foreign element adopted in eclectic fashion from Zoroastrianism (cf. B. Duhm, Das Buch Jesaia [= Nowack's Handkommentar zum AT, iii.], Göttingen, 1892, p. 359). Nowhere else in the OT is the Messianic Kingdom conceived of otherwise than as eternal on this present earth. The change is, however, prepared for in certain post-Exilic passages, e.g. poetically in Is 51⁶: 'Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished'; also in 34³²: 'Their slain also shall be cast out, and the mountains shall be melted with their blood. And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fade away, as the leaf fadeth from off the vine, and as a fading leaf from the fig tree'; and finally in Ps 102²⁶, which, however, may simply be a reflexion of the new conception from the Maccabean age (cf. C. A. Briggs, ICC, 'Psalms,' Edinburgh, 1907, ad loc.): 'Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed.'

Outside the OT in the apocalyptic literature we have to look for the further progress of this conception. The gradual moral and physical transformation of the world that we have noticed as an adopted feature in Isaiah appears again, during the 2nd cent. B.C., in Jub. i. 29 (above); also in iv. 26: 'and Mount Zion (which) will be sanctified in the new creation for a sanctification of the earth; through it will the earth be sanctified from all (its) guilt and its uncleanness throughout the generations of the world'; 'And the days shall begin to grow many and increase amongst those children of men till their days draw nigh to one thousand years, and to a greater number of years than (before) was the number of the days' (xxiii. 27); and once more in Test. Levi, xviii. 9: 'In his [the Messiah's] priesthood shall sin come to an end, and the lawless shall cease to do evil.' It was during the stern days of the Maccabees that the change began to make itself felt with regard to the inappropriateness of the present world as the scene of the future Kingdom. The first trace of it meets us in 1 En. lxxxiii.-xc., which Charles dates before 161 B.C. (cf. R. H. Charles, The Book of Enoch, Oxford, 1912, Introd., p. lii). Here the centre of the Kingdom is no longer the earthly Jerusalem, but the New Jerusalem brought down from heaven (cf. 1 En. xc. 23, 29, supra). A purified city is not enough; a new and heavenly city must take the place of the old and earthly city as the metropolis of the world-wide Messianic Kingdom. It is to be noted that this portion of the Book of Enoch is dated very shortly after the Book of Daniel and not long after 1 Enoch vi.-xxxvi., in neither of which does the New Jerusalem yet appear. The implication in the new idea, however, was not logically carried out until during the 1st cent. B.C. There is mention in 1 En. xci. 16 of a new heaven but not of a new earth, but it is in 1 En. xxxvii.-lxxi. (94-64 B.C.) that we have for the first time the conception of a new heaven and a new earth consistently set forth. In 1 En. xlv. 4, 5 the idea is accepted in its entire significance implying the immortal blessedness of man: 'And I will cause Mine elect ones to dwell upon it: but the sinners and evil-doers shall not set foot thereon' (cf. Is 65²⁰, where rather illogically the wicked still live on the new earth). The author of the Parables (i.e. 1 En. xxxvii.-lxxi.) stands apart from his contemporaries in this new conception of the scene of the Messianic Kingdom and also apart from the writers of the 1st cent. A.D., with regard to the duration of the Kingdom; for while most other writers left behind the OT idea of an everlasting Kingdom and expected only a temporary one on the present earth, he holds to the eternal duration of the Kingdom, contributing the new and fruitful conception of a new heaven and a new earth as the scene of it. It is here, therefore, in the apocalyptic literature that we find the immediate source of the Christian hope of a new heaven and a new earth which meets us in the NT. During the first seven decades of the 1st cent. A.D., i.e. up to the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, the prevalent thought was that of a temporary Messianic Kingdom with the earth as its scene, described sometimes in a very materialistic fashion, as in 2 Bar. xxix. 5: 'The earth also shall yield its fruit ten thousandfold and on each vine there shall be a thousand branches, and each branch will produce a thousand clusters, and each cluster will produce a thousand grapes, and each grape will produce a cor of wine.' The spiritual change too in the members of the Kingdom seems to be wrought in a mechanical fashion, for sin disappears suddenly rather by Divine fiat than by any gradual process, in striking contrast to what we saw in Jubilees, Isaiah, and The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. The duration of the temporary Kingdom appears in 4 Ezer. vii. 28, 29 as 400 years, but in 2 En. xxxii., xxxiii. as 1,000 years, to which the Christian view of the Millennium owes its origin. Even the thought of a temporary Messianic Kingdom is at times given up, especially after the destruction of Jerusalem, for the present earth is wholly unfit for the advent of the Messiah; a renewal of the world is felt to be necessary—a renewal that will be everlasting and incorruptible (cf. 4 Ezer. vii. 75). It is in these last decades of the 1st cent. A.D., after the earthly Jerusalem has gone, that the thought of the New Jerusalem reappears as the centre of the renewed world to which all hopes are turned, and here we encounter the writings of the NT, which contain that sublimest of descriptions of the New Jerusalem in the Christian Apocalypse. The conception of the Millennium, or the reign of Christ for a thousand years on the present earth, with Jerusalem as the metropolis of this temporary Kingdom, occurs only in the Apocalypse (cf. Rev 20⁴⁻⁶), no place being found for it elsewhere in the NT. It is a conception with an exclusively Jewish basis, but one that opens the way for the idea of a new era of blessedness, not on the present earth but in a renewed world; at the close of the Millennium the present order of things passes away—'And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat upon it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them' (Rev 20¹¹); 'And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth are passed away' (21¹). This is the scene of the final consummation, and the centre of it is no more the earthly Jerusalem or a purified Jerusalem, but the New Jerusalem that comes down from heaven—from God Himself (v.). It is the same city that the author of Hebrews, writing some time before the author of the Apocalypse, has in mind when he refers to Abraham, who 'looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God' (He 11¹⁰); it is 'the heavenly Jerusalem' (12²²), the centre of that Kingdom 'that cannot be shaken,' for 'yet once more will I make to tremble not the earth only, but also the heaven. And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that have been made, that those things which are not shaken may remain' (12²⁸⁻²⁹). Even earlier in the century St. Paul has the same thought, not yet, however, developed, of the new city, 'the Jerusalem that is above' (Gal 4²⁶), and the same idea is present when he says, 'Our citizenship is in heaven' (1st 3-9).

3. The description of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21²⁻²²).—The details of this sublime description are typically Jewish, but the thought is pre-eminently Christian. The earthly Jerusalem had been in ruins for a quarter of a century, Hadrian's new city was not yet in existence, and the Christian Seer had no thought of the possibility of rebuilding the old. The new city must come down from heaven to be a fitting abode for Christ and the saints. The Seer represents himself as being shown 'the holy city' from a high mountain by one of the seven angels (21¹⁰). 'Her light was like unto a jasper stone, clear as crystal: having a wall great and high; having twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels; and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel: on the east were three gates; and on the north three gates; and on the south three gates; and on the west three gates. And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and on them twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb' (vv. 11-14). As in Ezekiel's city, the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem bear the names of the twelve tribes—three names on each side of its foursquare order (cf. Ezk 48³⁰⁻³⁵). But besides these, there appear twelve other names on the city wall; between each pair of gateways above the surface of the rock is a foundation stone, and each stone bears the name of an apostle. The same connexion of the twelve tribes and the twelve apostles appears in Mt 19²⁸, where Jesus says of His disciples: 'in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.' St. Paul has a similar thought when speaking of the Ephesians: 'Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God, being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone' (Eph 2¹⁹⁻²⁰). The heavenly city is measured by the angel with a golden measuring rod (Rev 21¹⁵). 'And the city lieth foursquare, and the length thereof is as great as the breadth: and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs: the length and the breadth and the height thereof are equal. And he measured the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of an angel' (v. 16²). Moffatt translates: 'he measured fifteen hundred miles with his rod for the City, for its breadth and length and height alike; he made the measure of the wall seventy-two yards, by human, that is, by angelic reckoning' (The New Testament: A New Translation, London, 1913). It is a huge cube, as high as it is broad and long, like the Holy of Holies in Solomon's Temple (cf. 1 K 6²⁰), only the measurements are hyperbolic. The wall is out of all proportion to the height of the city, but both heights, it ought to be noted, are multiples of twelve, the number of the tribes and of the apostles.

Rev 21¹⁸⁻²¹. 'And the building of the wall thereof was jasper: and the city was pure gold, like unto pure glass. The foundations of the wall of the city were adorned with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, chalcedony; the fourth, emerald; the fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, topaz; the tenth, chrysoprase; the eleventh, jacinth; the twelfth, amethyst. And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; each one of the several gates was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass (cf. also Is 54¹¹ and To 13¹⁶). Similar lists occur in Ezk 28¹³ of the precious stones with which the king of Tyre was covered, and in Ex 28¹⁷⁻²⁰ 39¹⁰⁻¹³ of the gems set in the breastplate of the high priest; the latter are reproduced in the Apocalypse evidently from memory, as the lists do not completely coincide. What was exclusively for the high priest's breastplate is now for the whole city of the New Jerusalem—the foundation stones with the names of the apostles are brilliant with all manner of sparkling gems, and each gate consists of a single monster pearl.'

Rev 21²². 'And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God the Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple thereof. And the city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine upon it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the lamp thereof is the Lamb.' The actual presence of God and the Christ in the City forms the sanctuary; similarly in 2 Co 6¹⁶ St. Paul says: 'we are a temple of the living God; even as God said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people'; only what St. Paul says of individuals the Seer says of the ideal city as a whole. No need in such a place for any created light, since the Divine presence is there illuminating all; its sun is the glory of the Father, and its lamp the glorified Son. There is here a fulfilment of the ideal in Is 60¹⁹: 'The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. . . .'

Rev 21²⁴⁻²⁷. 'And the nations shall walk amidst the light thereof; and the kings of the earth do bring their glory into it. And the gates thereof shall in no wise be shut by day (for there shall be no night there): and they shall bring the glory and the honour of the nations into it: and there shall in no wise enter into it anything unclean, or he that maketh an abomination and a lie: but only they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.' The traits are all found in Isaiah: 'And nations shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising' (60³); 'Thy gates also shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night; that men may bring unto thee the wealth of the nations, and their kings led with them' (v.¹¹); 'henceforth there shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean' (52¹).

The description closes in Rev 22¹⁻⁵: v. 1⁴: 'And he shewed me a river of water of life, bright as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, in the midst of the street thereof. And on this side of the river and on that was the tree of life, bearing twelve manner of fruits, yielding its fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.' The old Jerusalem had been in a waterless region, but already Ezekiel saw 'waters' issuing out 'from under the threshold of the house eastward,' and falling into the Kedron valley, and finally making their way to the Dead Sea (cf. Ezk 47¹⁻¹²); and in Zec 14⁵ there is the expectation that, when the day of the Lord cometh, 'living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the eastern sea, and half of them toward the western sea: in summer and in winter shall it be.' In the New Jerusalem the source of the river is in the throne of God and the Lamb, and on its banks is the tree of life, the generic singular here going back to Gn 2⁹, though the representation has its origin in Ezk 47¹: 'And by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow every tree for meat, whose leaf shall not wither, neither shall the fruit thereof fail: it shall bring forth new fruit every month, because the waters thereof issue out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for healing.' A fragrant tree is mentioned in Enoch, xxv. 4 f., which 'no mortal is permitted to touch till the great judgement, when he shall take vengeance on all and bring (everything) to its consummation for ever. It shall then be given to the righteous and holy. Its fruit shall be for food to the elect: it shall be transplanted to the holy place, to the temple of the Lord, the Eternal King.' For the Christian Seer, the river flows through the heavenly city and the leaves of the trees on its banks serve to heal the nations.

Vr 3⁵. 'And there shall be no curse any more: and the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be therein: and his servants shall do him service; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be on their foreheads. And there shall be night no more; and they need no light of lamp, neither light of sun; for the Lord God shall give them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever.' The throne of God and of the Lamb takes the place of the Temple; there is nothing needed to symbolize the Divine Presence in the Heavenly City, for that Presence itself is visible. Nowhere else do we find it stated that there will be no temple in the New City. It is the climax of the Christian hope. The faithful shall see His face and abide with the Christ for ever.

The whole description is in some respects still a material one, like the Jewish descriptions we have cited, but it soars above its Jewish basis and presents us with the ancient hope of the people of God glorified and transformed by the Christian Seer.

LITERATURE.—R. H. Charles, The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT in English, 2 vols., Oxford, 1913, Eschatology, Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian, London, 1913; W. Bousset, Die Offenbarung Johannis (Geyer's Kommentar zum NT, xvi), Göttingen, 1906; H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, London, 1907; J. Moffatt, EGT, 'Revelation', do., 1910.

J. ROBERTSON BUCHANAN.

NEW MOON.—The term neomenia or νομηνία ('new moon') as the name of a festal season occurs only once in the NT—Col 2¹⁶. It is not used as a purely chronological term.

The Vulg., it may be observed, uses a simple transliteration (neomenia) in the passage named, as also in some other places (e.g. Is 1¹³, Jth 8⁹), whilst elsewhere it uses calendæ as 'new moon' (e.g. in 1 S 20). The usage is not altogether consistent, but a rough distinction is perhaps intended between 'new moon' as denoting a festival and as simply a note of time. In ancient times the beginning of the month was proclaimed amongst the Jews by the high priest or president of the Sanhedrin when two witnesses had satisfactorily testified to the appearance of the new moon. The Romans had a parallel custom in the proclamation of the month by the Pontifex Maximus. Hence in this respect calendæ, the Roman name for the first day of the month (the day of proclamation), was a good Lat. equivalent for the Hebrew rosh-ha-hodesh, or 'new moon.' Note also Tertullian's use of neomenia when referring to the new moon as a festival (de Idol. 14). 'In later usage νομηνία signifies generally the first day of the month, even when, according to the calendar employed, the months did not begin with the new moon' (Schürer, HJP ii. i. 377).

The NT stands in great contrast to the OT in its paucity of reference to the 'new moon.' 'New moon' figures in the OT as a familiar and important season in the time-scheme of Hebrew life (see 1 S 20, 2 K 4²³) with some holiday relaxations and customs associated with it. So was it with other peoples from earliest times.

It would be to go beyond our limits to venture on a general treatment of the subject here. For this see, inter alia, the art. 'New Moon' by I. Abrahams in HDB. Still it may be said that a reference to the moon and its changes naturally and inevitably entered into the first attempts of primitive man to mark periods of time. After the immediate and primary distinction between day and night, arising from the regular appearance and disappearance of the sun, the recognition of the month as the period covered by the surprising and ever-fascinating phenomena of the moon's phases marked an important step in advance. And when due study of the procession of the seasons and the attendant solar phenomena led to the measuring of a year, the moon-period lost none of its importance. The ancients, however, soon found themselves confronted with puzzling problems in the effort to relate the months to the years. The fixed idea that every month must begin with the appearance of the new moon brought endless difficulties in its train. It took centuries to substitute the calendar month for the lunar month and secure as nearly as possible that the year should comprise twelve monthly periods preserving the same order of succession and a fixed correspondence with the seasons.

We can understand, too, how primitive man must instinctively have made the reappearance of the moon after obscuration an occasion for festal rejoicing. Even now we feel the charm of the first sight of the delicate pale crescent in the sky. And how natural it was that the celebration of the new moon should enter into the religion of nature-worshipping men, to whom the sun and moon were veritable gods and the terms 'King of Day' and 'Queen of the Night' more than poetic expressions! (As to the latter, we must not forget that the moon was regarded amongst some people as a masculine deity, as the German der Mond bears witness. Grimm [Teutonic Mythology, ed. Stallybrass, London, 1882-88, ii. 704] quotes an old Norse incantation, calling upon 'New Moon, gracious Lord' [cf. art. 'Moon' in Chambers's Encyc. vol. vii. (1891)].) Traces of such deification are sufficiently present in the OT: see Job 31²⁶, 2 K 23³, etc.; whilst the phrasing of Gn 1¹⁶ in the creation-story surely echoes such conceptions of more ancient days.

The incorporation of the New Moon as a festival—both a holy day and a holiday—among Jewish feasts is best explained as the effort of monotheism to take up institutions already long existing, free them from objectionable features, and make them subservient to a worthier faith. Cf. the action taken by the Christian Church in relation to pagan festivals (e.g. Yule—Christmas), overlaying them with new religious associations.

When we consider how conspicuously the Sabbath figures in the NT, and what traces we have of such great annual feasts as Passover and Pentecost, it is singular that, save for a passing reference in Col 2¹⁶ and Gal 4¹⁰, we have no hint that a monthly festival was still observed in apostolic times. We might have concluded but for these passages that the New Moon, so prominent in the OT, had fallen into desuetude. But in St. Paul's phrasing in these two passages (especially Col 2¹⁶) there reappears the three-fold classification of Jewish feasts which had become fixed in post-Exilic times (see Ezk 45¹⁷, 'in the feasts and in the new moons and in the sabbaths'; cf. Ezr 3⁵). The classification plainly rests on the fundamental time-scheme: year, month, week (see also the particularly interesting grouping in Jth 8⁸: 'the eves of the sabbaths, and the sabbaths, and the eves of the new moons, and the new moons, and the feasts and joyful days of the house of Israel'). St. Paul would not have spoken of 'new moon' and 'months' were it not that, as we know, the proclamation of new moon and the attendant celebrations were still regular features of Jewish life. But it is a noticeable fact that whilst the Christian Church developed a system of festivals closely parallel to that of the Jews in some of its outstanding features (Sabbath, Passover, Pentecost), it provided no counterpart to the festival of the New Moon.

In the 4th cent., it is true, we find St. Chrysostom vigorously denouncing Christians for observing the neomenia (Hom. 23: 'in Kalendas' or 'in eos qui novilunia observant'—quoted by Joseph Bingham, Antiquities, XVI. iv. 17 [Works, new ed., vi. (Oxford, 1855) 226 n.]). He complains of their giving way to intemperance and excess and practising divination in the hope of good luck. The things he condemns, however, were pagan, not Jewish. There is no reason to suppose that St. Paul in deprecating the observance of seasons in this way had the thought of such disorderly practices in his mind. So far as divination, e.g., is concerned, its connexion with the new moon must be of very ancient origin. Babylon had her 'monthly prognosticators' (Is 47¹³). Some quaint innocuous superstitions still lingering in folk-lore and connected with the first sight of the new moon, notions of good and bad luck attending thereon, no doubt have descended from some such ancient, far-off source. But Judaism has no trace of such features in the history of its New Moon celebration.

The Apostle is thinking of nothing but the observance of a system of times and seasons (the religious observance even) such as the Jews had, and its introduction into the life of the new community. He is apprehensive ('I am afraid' [Gal 4¹¹]) lest harmful results should follow, imperilling their Christian liberty and bringing them under a 'yoke of bondage.' The Epistle to Diognetus, iv. (early 2nd cent.?) speaks disparagingly, if not contemptuously, of Jewish 'superstitions relating to the Sabbaths . . . and their fancies about fasting and the new moon,' and shows that St. Paul's warning was not lost upon Christians of the following generations. Still the Apostle's own doctrine of liberty as touching the observance or non-observance of such seasons (see Ro 14) must not be overlooked; and in Col 2¹⁶, as Hort points out (Judaistic Christianity, Cambridge, 1894, p. 123), 'the ceremonial distinctions do not appear to be condemned in themselves: the Colossians are simply warned in a strain hardly different from that of Rom. xiv. not to allow anyone to "judge" them in such.'

As to the mode of observing the day of the new moon in NT times, we know that (as in the case of other festivals) substantial changes had taken place as compared with what the OT reveals concerning earlier days. There was a time when, like the Sabbath, New Moon was observed by cessation of business (Am 8³) and labour, although no Pentateuchal legislation provides for this. In the post-Exilic period this disappears except in the case of women. A faint and curious trace survives to this day in the fact that the Jewish house-wife, whilst freely discharging such domestic duties as cooking, makes a point of refraining from needlework and employments related to her personal convenience on the day of the new moon. Again, with the fall of the Temple, the appointed sacrificial rites (Nu 28¹¹⁻¹⁷) disappeared. At the same time the silver trumpets (Nu 10¹⁰, Ps 81³) ceased to sound. The only trumpet-blast that has since been heard in the synagogues of Jewry is that of the shôphâr, which is still sounded on the great New Moon, 'the first day of the seventh month,' i.e. the New Year's Day of the civil year. It is pre-eminently a call to repentance.

No doubt St. Paul knew the sound of the shôphâr well; but there does not seem enough ground for suggesting, as Eldersheim does, that Eph 5¹⁴ ('Awake!') was inspired by the thought of that call, or that in Eph 5⁸ we have an underlying reference to the appearance of the new moon (The Temple: its Ministry and Services, London, 1908, ch. xv. p. 300 f.).

The synagogue prayers now used for New Moon reflect in some portions, notwithstanding changes introduced in later periods, the usage of the synagogue whilst yet the Temple was standing. The constant petition that God will 'establish a new altar on Zion' so that 'the burnt-offering of the New Moon' may again be offered, is arrestive and may even seem pathetic to a Christian mind. But all can feel the beauty of the prayer: 'Renew this month unto us for good and for blessing, for joy and gladness, for salvation and consolation, for support and peace, for pardon of sin and forgiveness of iniquity.'

LITERATURE.—Besides the works alluded to in the article, see artt. 'New Moon' and 'Time' in HDB; 'New Moon' and 'Month' in EBI; 'Festivals and Fasts (Hebrew)' in ERE; 'New Moon' in JE; J. Meinhold, Sabbat und Woche im Alten Testament, Göttingen, 1905; E. Schürer, IJSP i. ii. (Edinburgh, 1890) App. III.; K. Wieseler, A Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels, Eng. tr., Cambridge, 1864, p. 401 ff.

J. S. CLEMENS.

NICANOR.—The name is Greek, but was probably prevalent in Syria, as we find one of the generals of Antiochus Epiphanes called by it (2 Mac 8⁹). It is more than likely, therefore, that he was a Hellenist Jew of Syria. He is mentioned as one of the Seven in Ac 6⁵, a man of repute among the brethren, but we hear and know no more of him.

W. A. SPOONER.

NICOLAITANS.—The name signifies 'followers of Nicolas,' as Nicolas = 'conqueror of the people.' They are mentioned twice in the NT (Rev 2¹⁵) as a party at Ephesus and also at Pergamum, whose tenets were similar, it seems, in the judgment of the writer, to those of Balaam (g.v.) in that they enjoined or permitted laxity in ceremonial (the eating of food offered to idols) and in social morals. There is no reason to suppose that the Nicolaitans would have accepted this judgment as anything but an illegitimate inference from their principles. In the Apostolic Church, as ever since, two schools of thought were opposed to each other—that which was more Jewish in character and that which was more Greek. The former speaks in the Apocalypse of John and the latter in the Gospel of John, and the apocalyptic writer in condemning the other party, the Nicolaitans, states not what they held but what he thought their teaching must logically end in. The word is probably a nickname, as are Balaam and Nicodemus.

The party mentioned in the Apocalypse left behind them no historical trace, for there is no good reason for identifying with them the sect mentioned by Irenæus, Hippolytus, Eusebius, pseudo-Tertullian, and Jerome. The last four of these writers merely repeat Irenæus, who in his turn seems to have been elaborating on his own unsupported authority the references in the Apocalypse (I. xxvi. 3); indeed, in one passage (III. xi. 1) he asserts that the Nicolaitans had disseminated their heresy long before Cerinthus, and he makes their founder Nicolas, one of the Seven. Hippolytus (vii. 24) repeats Irenæus and adds nothing of his own, except that he emphasizes the Greek character of Nicolaitan teaching. Tertullian (de Præscr. 33) speaks of there being now 'another sort of Nicolaitans,' and he seems to identify them with the Cainites. By the 4th cent. the legend had grown, and pseudo-Tertullian (adv. Omnes Hæc. 1) bluntly assigns certain Gnostic speculations to the Nicolaitans. The Apost. Const. (vi. 8) originated the description of the Nicolaitans as being 'falsely so called,' and it is followed by the interpolator of the Ignatian epistles (Trall. 11 and Philad. 6). Epiphanius (adv. Hæc. 25), Georgius Hamartolus (Chronicon, iii. 135), and Jerome (adv. Lucif. 24) carry on the tradition without adding to it. Clement of Alexandria, however (Strom. iii. 4; cf. Eus. H.E. iii. 29), has an independent tradition about Nicolas which vindicates his character. On the whole, all that the evidence justifies us in concluding is that the Nicolaitans of the ecclesiastical writers were among the Gnostics, that their paternity and distinctive doctrines are unknown, and that their identity with the party named in the Apocalypse is doubtful.

W. F. COBB.

NICOLAS.—Nicolas, one of the Seven appointed to look after the ministrations of alms to the Hellenist widows, is described in the Acts as a proselyte of Antioch (Ac 6⁵). He comes last in the list. This description of him is inserted because his admission to office in the Christian Church marks a step taken towards the extension of the Church to the Gentiles. As far as we know, no proselyte, i.e. convert to Judaism from the heathen world, had been given office in the Church, up to this point. A. Harnack (The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1909, p. 172) quotes the description of him as a proselyte of Antioch as a proof that this section of the Acts was probably derived from an Antiochene source—surely a very uncertain inference. On his supposed connexion with the Nicolaitans of Rev 2⁵, 15 see art. NICOLAITANS.

W. A. SPOONER.

NICOPOLIS (Νικόπολις, 'City of victory').—In days of almost constant warfare, when many triumphs had to be commemorated, this was a favourite name for newly founded cities. T. Zahn enumerates no fewer than nine Nicopoleis (Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., 1909, ii. 53 f.), of which one in Cappadocia, a second in Egypt, and a third in Thrace had some importance. Chrysostom and Theodoret took the last of these to be the place referred to in Tit 3¹. But by far the most famous Nicopolis was the city in Epirus which Augustus founded after the battle of Actium. He intended it to be 'at once a permanent memorial of the great naval victory and the centre of a newly flourishing Hellenic life' (T. Mommsen, Provinces of Rom. Empire, new ed., 1908, i. 295). It was laid out where the victor's headquarters had been stationed just before the battle, at the narrowest part of the promontory which separates the Ambracian Gulf from the Ionian Sea. Augustus peopled it, after the fashion set by Alexander's successors, by uniting the inhabitants of a large number of minor townships in one great urban domain. He made it a free city like Athens or Sparta, and instituted so-called Actian Games, which he put on the same level as the four ancient Hellenic festivals. Nicopolis became the foremost city of Western Greece, and (at some uncertain date) the capital of the new province of Epirus. Tacitus calls it urbem Achaiae (Ann. ii. 53, for the year A.D. 18), but Epictetus, its most famous citizen (born c. A.D. 60), speaks of an ἐπίτροπος Ἠπειρῶν residing in Nicopolis and governing the land (Diss. III. iv. 1).

It was natural that St. Paul should sooner or later think of this splendid Græco-Roman city and its neighbourhood as a field for evangelistic work. In an epistolary fragment which has been preserved, he bids Titus, who has been labouring in Crete, give diligence to join him at Nicopolis, as he has decided to winter there (Tit 3¹). Some MSS of the epistle (A and P) have the subscription, 'It was written from Nicopolis,' and these are followed by the Greek commentators (Chrys. Theod. et al.); but the Apostle would have said ὅδε, not ἐκεῖ, if he had been actually writing in the city. It has been generally assumed that St. Paul, after being acquitted by his Roman judges, resumed his labours in the East, and that his letter summoning Titus to Nicopolis belongs to this period. It has further been conjectured that the Apostle made his way, as he intended, to Nicopolis, and that his second arrest took place there (Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, new ed., 1877, ii. 571 f.). But the evidence for a release is far from convincing, and the question arises whether the Nicopolis episode can be fitted into his biography without this doubtful 'final phase.' In reference to Tit 3¹, H. von Soden says: 'This is all intelligible in itself and as a part of the life of St. Paul, and the fulness of particulars gives an impression of authenticity' (The History of Early Christian Literature, Eng. tr., 1906, p. 316). It seems certain that Titus' work in Crete (Tit 1⁵) cannot have begun till after the writing of 2 Cor., for he was occupied with the settlement of difficulties in the Corinthian Church. But St. Paul may have visited the island with his fellow-worker, and left him to labour there, shortly before his final visit to Corinth. As regards Ac 20², it has been suggested that the writer knew very little about the details of St. Paul's life at the time to which this passage refers (A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 411 n.), and a short campaign in Crete may well have been one of his activities during that period. On this hypothesis, the letter to Titus, in its original, comparatively brief form, must have been written before St. Paul's stay of three winter months in Corinth (20³). Titus probably hastened, as directed, to Nicopolis, but some new turn of events prevented St. Paul from carrying out his purpose of wintering in that city, though he may have paid it a brief visit. Nothing is known about its actual evangelization, either at that time or later. After falling into decay, the city was restored by Julian; and Justinian repaired the havoc wrought by the Goths; but in the Middle Ages it was supplanted by Prevesa, three miles to the south. Its ruins are extensive.

JAMES STRAHAN.

NIGER. See SYMEON (SIMEON) CALLED NIGER.

NIGHT.—See DAY AND NIGHT, TIME.

NOAH (Νῶε).—A number of didactic references to Noah are found in the Epistles. (1) He appears in the roll of 'the elders,' or men of OT times, who had witness borne to them on account of their faith

(He 11²). 'By faith Noah, being divinely instructed (χρηματισθείς) concerning things not yet seen, with reverential care (ευλαβηθείς) prepared an ark to save his household' (v.⁷). By his faith (δι' ἧς, which cannot refer to 'ark') he virtually condemned (κατέκρινεν) the careless world, for his belief in the Divine warning threw other men's lack of faith into strong relief, and his godly life demonstrated what theirs ought to have been and failed to be. He thus became 'heir of the righteousness which is according to, or in consequence of, faith' (τῆς κατὰ πίστιν δικαιοσύνης, a phrase which is thoroughly Pauline in significance though not quite in diction). Philo (cited by H. Alford, *The Greek Testament*⁵, iv. [1875] 213) notes that Noah is 'the first in the holy scriptures who is expressly called righteous' (δικαίος); but, while the patriarch is so designated at the very beginning of his history (Gn 6⁹; cf. Wis 10⁴), the idea of the writer of Hebrews is rather that he became (εγένετο) righteous by giving due heed to the Divine warning and building the ark in faith.

(2) 1 Peter (3²⁰) allegorizes, in the Alexandrian manner, the story of 'the days of Noah, in which the ark was being prepared, wherein eight souls were saved through water' (δiesōthēsan di' ūdatos). Here 'through' may conceivably be instrumental, suggesting merely that the water bore up the ark and so saved its inmates; but this exegesis gives the imagination no striking symbol, or type, of that deliverance by baptism (immersion) to which allusion is made in the following verse. 'Through' is therefore rather to be taken as local, Noah and his family being conceived as escaping, when the flood has already begun, through the water into the safety of the ark. Though this conception is not based upon the narrative in Genesis, it is attested in the Rabbinical literature (F. Spitta, Christi Predigt an die Geister, 1890, p. 51).

(3) 2 Peter (2⁹) says that God spared not the ancient world, but preserved Noah with seven others, a preacher of righteousness (δικαιοσύνης κήρυκα). This designation suggests another addition to the sacred narrative, a haggādā to which there are many Rabbinical allusions, e.g. Beresith Rabba, xxx. 6. Josephus (Ant. i. iii. 1) refers to this tradition: 'But Noah was very uneasy at what they [his contemporaries] did; and, being displeased at their conduct, persuaded them to change their disposition and their actions for the better'; and Clement (ad Cor. vii. 6, ix. 4), 'Noah preached repentance, and as many as hearkened unto him were saved'; 'Noah, having been found faithful, preached, by his ministry, regeneration unto the world.' Cf. Theoph. Antioch. ad Autolyum, iii. 19, 129; Visio Pauli, l. 1, and other passages collected in Spitta's Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas, 1885, p. 146. The Christian Sibyllines give a complete Sermon of Noah's (Sib. Orac. i. 128 ff.).

JAMES STRAHAN.

NOBLE.—Two Greek words are thus translated in the AV. (1) εὐγενής, 'well-born,' 'of noble birth,' and secondarily, as the natural outcome of that privileged condition, 'of noble mind or spirit,' is used in its primary sense in 1 Co 12³, 'not many noble.' The negative phrase is not to be taken as if it meant 'none' (see J. Orr, Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity, 1899, p. 99 ff.). In its secondary sense, it is applied to the Jews of Beroëa, who were 'nobler,' i.e. of a better and more generous spirit, than those of Thessalonica 'in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, examining the scriptures daily whether these things were so' (Ac 17¹¹). The use of the comparative does not imply that the Jews of Thessalonica had any nobility of spirit. (2) κράτιστος, 'most mighty,' or, as a title of honour,

'most noble or excellent,' is used by Claudius Lysias in his letter to Felix (23²⁹); by Tertullus in addressing Felix (24³); and by St. Paul in addressing Festus (26²⁹). The RV in all three instances translates it 'most excellent.' It was a title usually given to magistrates, and was regarded as a high compliment. An appellation of Achilles was κρατίστος Ἑλλήνων (Soph. Phil. 3).

JOHN REID.

NOON.—See TIME.

NOVICE.—The word occurs in the NT only in 1 Ti 3⁶ as a translation of νεόφυτος. A bishop is to be 'not a novice, lest being puffed up he fall into the condemnation of the devil.' The word literally means 'newly planted,' and describes one recently converted to Christianity. It accords with the Pauline metaphor of 'planted' (σπυρμιται, Ro 6⁵) as indicating the Christian relation to Christ. The earlier Greek interpreters explained 'neophyte' or 'novice' as 'newly baptized' (CE, art. 'Neophyte'), as it was the custom to baptize converts immediately after conversion. In later times, when converts were subjected to a period of instruction and probation, the term was still applied to them, though the more common designation was 'catechumens.' Still later, the word was restricted to those who were on probation for entrance into some monastic or Church Order. The term of novitiate was usually not less than a year, and no one could be received on probation under the age of puberty. The word was used in connexion with the Eleusinian mysteries (M'Clintock-Strong, Cyclopædia, art. 'Neophyte'), and among the Romans for 'a newly acquired slave' (CE, art. 'Novice'; see also Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 220 f.).

JOHN REID.

NUMBER OF THE BEAST.—See APOCALYPSE.

NUMBERS.—Introduction.—Even a casual reader of the Bible is struck with the fact that in many cases—not altogether exclusive of those in which the desire to state facts accurately may be presumed—a preference is given to certain numbers. He will observe particularly the frequency of the numbers 3, 7, 10, and 12, together with their multiples and even their fractions. In regard to 7, the ritual arrangements found in the Pentateuch would alone warrant the conclusion that this number was regarded as in some sense sacred. If we read that 'God blessed the 7th day and sanctified it' (Gn 2³), and find that peculiar religious observances or customs with a religious basis attach, not only to the 7th day, but to the 7th month, the 7th year, and the 7×7th year,* we seem warranted in saying that, among the people of the Bible, 7 represents a mystic cycle of work and rest, within which God both accomplishes His purpose in the universe and co-operates with sanctified men. From the starting-point of such a preliminary observation, however, many questions arise, of which the principal are the following. (1) How far is the sanctity of particular numbers peculiar to the people of the Bible? Is its basis, so far as it may be traceable, to be found in nature or in religious theory or custom? If the latter, is the theory or custom borrowed from, or maintained in common with, other peoples (Babylonians, Egyptians, Persians) with whom the Jews came into contact? (2) For what other numbers besides those named may a more or less similar prominence be claimed? (3) How far is the usage as to numbers, which is found in the OT or kindred Jewish literature, found also in the NT? The present article must be concerned with (1) and (2) only in so far as the answer to them is involved in the answer to (3). There can hardly be, even in connexion with the Apocalypse of John, any idea of the NT writers borrowing directly from Babylonians, Egyptians, Persians, or, even in this reference, from Greeks or Romans. If such foreign influences are found in the NT, they have come through the medium of the OT or kindred Jewish writings. The Apostolic Age is cosmopolitan in spirit, yet the ancestry which it owns is strictly Jewish. Among its writers are masters of Greek style like St. Luke and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, yet all the writers are men whose Bible was the OT.

* Lv 23²⁴ 25³¹ &c.

It is, however, the cosmopolitanism of the first Christian age and not its Jewish origin that lends interest to its practice as regards the symbolism of numbers. The degree in which this symbolism has passed into the age that begins with our Lord and His apostles offers an obvious standard for measuring its worth.

Before proceeding to particulars, a general statement may be offered of the position of matters which they seem to indicate: the NT practice stands to that of the OT as the latter does to its basis in Babylon, Egypt, or Persia, except for what disturbance of the proportion may arise from the fact that a degree of affinity, both racial and religious, exists between the people of the OT and that of the NT such as does not obtain between the Jews and the heathen neighbours or masters who most influenced them. The practice of employing a particular number, where it is, by presumption, at least approximately correct, or of choosing it, where the question of accuracy as to matter of fact does not arise, is taken over; but, except—and even here the exception is partial—in a book like the Apocalypse of John, the practice is unconscious. It may be true, e.g., that when a thoughtful mystic of the Apostolic Age used the number 3, he involuntarily thought of the Divine Being or Trinity; it may be probable that when he used the number 4, he thought of the 4 directions and, therefore, of the world. But to say that 3 was to the average Christian the number for God, or 4 the number for the world, or that even one in a hundred Christians thought, in connexion with 3, of Babylonian or Egyptian triad-divinities* or of the alleged fact that every Babylonian divinity had its appropriate number, is to say what cannot be proved and is highly improbable.

I. THE NUMBERS EMPLOYED IN THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN.—1. Three.—The natural importance of this number is obvious. It is the lowest number to express several, or to denote something that has a beginning, middle, and end. It is the common number of a small deputation. It is the number of the possible dimensions of space, of the natural divisions of the physical cosmos (heaven, earth, and sea), of the day (morning, noon, and evening), of time generally (past, present, and future), and of the human person (body, soul, and spirit).

It is a usual number to express the frequency that makes an action effective, and is a common number of members in a rhythmical sentence, or in a list of adjectives. Such uses are abundantly illustrated in the Bible as in other literature. The number is, moreover, of undoubted frequency in religious connexions: 3-fold invocation (Jer 22²⁹, Is 6³), blessing (Nu 6^{24ff.}); 3 great Feasts (Ex 23^{14ff.}); 3 days, months, or years of waiting and preparation for an important event or action (Gn 40¹, Ex 2², Gal 1¹⁵); 3 times of prayer or repetitions of the same prayer (Dn 6^{10, 13}, Mt 26⁴⁴, 2 Co 12⁹). This prominence of 3 in other parts of the Bible makes its comparative infrequency in the Apocalypse the more remarkable. Even where there is a clear indication of the Divine Trinity (Rev 1⁴) or of the 3-fold time-manifestation of the Creator-God (1³) the numeral is not named. The fraction of the numeral, and 3 as a fraction of 12, are of more frequent occurrence than the numeral itself.* Comparing this state of the case with the frequency of 7 and even of 12 (see below) in the Apocalypse, we seem warranted in doubting whether any kind of sacred significance necessarily attached to the number 3 even in the mind of the symbolists of the Bible.

2. Seven.—Examples: 7 churches, spirits (1^{4, 11} 3¹), stars (1^{16, 20}), candlesticks (1¹³), lamps (4⁵), seals (5¹ 8¹), horns and eyes (5⁶), trumpets (8²), angels (8²), thunders (10^{3ff.}), heads (12³ 17³), angels with plagues (15¹), vials full of the wrath of God (15⁷), kings (17¹⁰). In view of this pervasiveness of the 7 one need hardly refer to the 7 'spirits of God' which invest Christ (3¹) or to the 7 'heads of blasphemy' on the Beast that is Antichrist (13¹) in proof of the fact that 7 is pre-eminently the number of perfection or completeness whether on the side of good or evil. The cogency of proof is augmented by the significance undoubtedly attached to the numeral next mentioned.

3. Three and a half.—The actual numeral occurs only twice—'3 lays (11^{18, 11}). But in 12¹⁴ we have the 'time and times and half a time' as in Dn 12^{7, 11} and in 11² 12⁶ 13⁵ the same period—3½ years—appears as 42 months, or (multiplying by 30) 1,260 days. The use of the number both in Daniel (see footnote) and the Apocalypse proves that by a convention, certainly older, probably much older, than the Book of Daniel, and one in all likelihood not peculiar to the Jews, the number indicated a period of stress and tribulation that would be balanced by a period, of at least equal duration, of comfort and prosperity. If 7 represents the perfect work of God in mercy and judgment in relation to men (as well as the total work of creation) and, on the human side, the life of godliness with its twin ingredients of joy and sorrow, the fraction 3½ fitly stands for the factor of the total that signifies God's broken covenant and man's broken hope (see Ps 90¹³, and, for its equivalent in the nobler apostolic faith, Ro 8¹⁸, 2 Co 4¹²).

4. Twelve and its multiples.—However natural it may seem to think of the 12 signs of the Zodiac as the basis of the usage which gives prominence to this number in the Bible, it may fairly be doubted whether even such symbolists as the authors of Daniel and the Apocalypse ever had such a reference in their minds. Yet an indication of something of the kind has been found by Gunkel and others in the 24 elders of 4⁴, whose origin

* Rev 5⁷⁻¹² 9¹³, where the fraction occurs eight times. Take these passages along with 16¹⁹ and 21¹³ where 3 as a fraction of 12 occurs five times, and compare with 6⁸ 8¹³ 9¹⁵ 16¹³, showing four instances of the independent use of the number.

† How entirely an apocalyptic symbolist might be governed by the idea of 3½ or the number appropriate to a period of disciplinary tribulation appears particularly in 'Daniel's' manipulation of the 70 years of servitude in Babylon prophesied by Jeremiah (25¹¹) in Dn 9^{2ff.}. The 70 years=70 weeks of years, and the 70 is divided into 7+62+1, in order that the one week of years may be halved so as to give 3½ years as the period of the tribulation under Antiochus.

‡ In his very instructive article 'Siebenzahl,' in PRE³ xviii. 310 ff., Zöckler quotes the passage (BJ v. 5) in which Josephus asserts that the 7 lamps of the sacred candlestick indicate the 7 planets, and the 12 loaves of shewbread the circle of the Zodiac. He argues conclusively that the use of 7 by the Babylonians is older than their astrology of the planets and rests on the division of the lunar month into 4 periods of 7 corresponding to the 4 phases of the moon. Josephus' casual theories he characterizes as 'shallow interpretations,' which are to be repudiated as 'idle Phantasteprodukte, without historical foundation.' Yet these stray remarks of the Jewish historian are interesting as an indication that the questions of modern anthropology in relation to religion could arise even in a mind of the first Christian century.

* E. Kantzsch denies the affinity in the case of the Babylonian and Greek trinities on the ground that these trinities arise from a division of territory among 3 originally independent divinities (PRE³ xxi. [1905] 593 ff.).

might be a primitive astronomical conception, presumably Babylonian, according to which the sun was surrounded by a circle of light each half of which contained 12 luminaries. Apart from the likelihood that any such association would have seemed to the prophet of the Apocalypse so much sanction given to idolatry, we have surely a hint of the true origin of the 21, so far as he is concerned, in 15³, where the victors over the Beast and his image sing 'the song of Moses the servant of God and the song of the Lamb.' These victors and redeemed ones are those who are true to the religion of both the covenants. A symbolist would naturally reckon their representatives in the immediate presence of God as 12+12, i.e., the 12 patriarchs or heads of the 12 tribes of Israel, and the 12 apostles or heads of the Church. He expresses the same idea when he writes of 12 gates with the names of the '12 tribes of the children of Israel,' and of 12 foundations of the wall in which were 'the names of the 12 apostles of the Lamb' (21^{12, 14}).

Further examples: 144,000 (or 12,000 for each tribe) are sealed as the 'servants of our God' (7^{4ff}, 14¹). The number 12, with multiples and fractions, is used exclusively in the delineation of the Celestial City: 12 gates, angels; a cube of 12,000 furlongs; 12 foundations, precious stones, pearls (21^{12ff}).

5. Ten.—A natural importance attaches to this number. It is the number of fingers (5+5) on the two hands—the natural means of reckoning between two traders who speak different languages. It closes the series of units and is the dominating number of the most natural system of reckoning. It is the number naturally chosen to designate a considerable number of persons or a short but not inconsiderable period of time: e.g., 10 days' tribulation for the faithful Church of Smyrna (2¹⁰); 10,000 × 10,000 and 1,000 × 1,000 are the number of the angels round about the throne (5¹¹). Men without the seal of God are tormented by locusts for 5 months (9⁵). The dragon has 10 horns, the Beast rising out of the sea has 10 horns and 10 crowns (12³ 13¹). Similarly the woman on the scarlet Beast has '10 horns' (17^{3, 7}), which are explained to be '10 kings' (17¹). The devil is bound for 1,000 years, while the martyrs of Jesus reign on the earth (20^{2, 4}). On the 1,000 years see art. APOCALYPSE, p. 78, note. The fraction $\frac{1}{10}$ occurs only in 11¹³. Its use in this passage suggests the negative side of the significance of the tithe-offering—viz. the part representing the whole. The 10th part of the city—7 out of 70 thousand inhabitants—perish, but the remnant 'were affrighted and gave glory to God.'*

6. Six.—Apart from the notorious three 6's of the Beast in 13¹⁸, 6 occurs only once in the Apocalypse. In 4⁸ the 4 Beasts, copied doubtless from Ezk 1^{8ff}, have 6 wings like the seraphim in Is 6², and not 4 only as in Ezekiel. In connexion with 13¹⁸, the suggestion has been made (see art. APOCALYPSE) that to a Jewish symbolist 6, as = 7-1, might very well have the significance of that which resembles the Divine perfection but fails just when it seemed likely to succeed. The Beast, to which the Dragon gives its throne (13-), and which therefore represents the rival of the Supreme God, has 7 heads like the 7 spirits of God, which belong to the unity of Christ (3¹), but on the heads are 'names of blasphemy.' The Beast has the trappings of divinity; only the reality fails.

7. The number of the Beast.—The passage, Rev 13¹⁷, is a Scripture instance of what is known in later Rabbinism as Gematria, or the mystic art of attaching values to names according to the numbers represented by the letters composing them. As both in Hebrew and Greek the letters of the alphabet were used to indicate numbers, the art could be pursued both by Hellenic and Palestinian or Babylonian Jews. For the various views regarding the name (Greek or Hebrew) corresponding to 666, see art. APOCALYPSE. For a fuller account see G. A. Barton's art. 'Number' in EBi iii. 3434 ff.

The calculation which gives the name 'Nero Caesar.' נרון קסר (Neron Kesar), is as follows: נ=50; ר=200 100; ס=60; ק=200—total, 666. In regard to it may be mentioned that the letters א to ט = the units; י to ז = the tens; פ to ט = the first four hundreds. ה compounded = other hundreds. Thus ק"ה=500; ר"ה=600; ש"ה=700; ט"ה=800; פ"ה=900. The thousands are expressed by the letters for the units with two points placed above: א̇=1,000; ב̇=2,000; ג̇=3,000, &c.

8. Four.—This number is naturally associated with the 4 directions of space. The 4 living creatures (ζῶα) 'round about the throne' in 4⁶ are adopted from Ezk 1^{5ff}. The principal difference is that the 4 faces (man, lion, calf, eagle) are distributed among the 4 ζῶα, instead of, as in Ezekiel, belonging to each. The reason seems to be that to the apocalypticist the main attribute of these ministers of the Divine presence is not, as with Ezekiel, their ubiquitousness, but rather their omniscience. Their place is round about a stationary throne, but they are 'full of eyes before and behind.'

It may fairly be doubted whether the apocalypticist attached any significance to the number 4 in this reference or to the variety of faces. Perhaps as in other places (see art. APOCALYPSE) he borrowed more than he used. The other instances of 4 in the Apocalypse are: 4 angels standing at the 4 corners of the earth holding 4 winds (7¹; cf. 29⁵); '4 horns of the golden altar which is before God' (9¹³), 4 'angels bound on the river Euphrates,' corresponding to 4 terms of destructive operation (hour, day, month, year) (9^{14ff}), 'the city lieth τετραγώνος' (21¹⁶). It is perhaps only in the last instance that we are warranted in supposing that the apocalypticist attached any significance of faith to the numeral 4. It seems to be associated in his mind, if it does not actually express it, with the inconceivable magnitude, yet perfect symmetry, of the City of the Redeemed.

9. Eight.—The significance of this number in the Apocalypse does not arise from its being a multiple of 4. It occurs twice in the ordinal form (17¹¹ 21²⁰). The former passage—'the 8th' that is 'of the 7'—is interesting. Adopting the view that the person intended is Domitian, we see that the author or the final editor is governed by the idea that 7—the number of the 'heads' of the woman on the scarlet Beast (17³)—ought to represent the number of genuine Roman Emperors,‡ who are allowed to maintain for a time a blasphemous rivalry to the King of kings. The 8th is a difficulty. The apocalypticist gets over the difficulty by thinking of him as Nero Redivivus. He is the 8th, yet still of the appointed 7, and he 'goeth to destruction.' This elongation of 7 so as to absorb 8 is not unnatural in a Jewish writer. One may compare the

* On this and the very similar system of Greek notation see especially art. 'Zahlen' and kindred articles in E. C. A. Riehm's Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums, 1884.

† Ezk 1¹⁰ LXX gives μύσχος as in Rev 1⁷. The translators use μύσχος for no fewer than four Hebrew words: מִשְׁכָּה = 'a bull,' קָדָר = 'cattle,' שֶׁדִּי = 'an ox or cow' (the word in Ezk 1¹⁰), צִלְזִל = 'a calf' (see Grimm Thayer, s.v.).

‡ Galba, Otho, and Vitellius are excluded, and the 10 horns are not Emperors but kings, or kinglets, who receive power for one hour along with the Beast (17¹²).

* It is curious that the multiple 40, so common in the number-schematism of Scripture to denote a period of disciplinary affliction or penitential exercise (e.g. Ps 95¹⁰, Ezk 4⁶ 20¹¹ 13, 1 S 17¹⁶, Jon 3⁴, Ex 24¹⁸), does not occur independently in the Apocalypse. The nearest approach to a reference is the '42 months' (instead of 3½ years) of 11² and 13⁵.

Sth day of the Feast of Tabernacles, which had come in practice to be the most important day, and is recognized even in the rubrics which make it clear that the legal Feast ended on the 7th day (Lv 23^{34, 35}).

10. Two and one.—Apart from association with other numbers (as in 9¹² and 11²) and from the '2 woes more' (9¹²), 2 occurs only in 11^{2, 4, 10}, each time in connexion with the '2 witnesses,' the unnamed Moses and Elijah (11²) of chapter 11. The witnesses are, therefore, Law and Prophecy. The author seems to use the numeral to convey the idea that, though God's witnesses may be the least possible number (Nu 35²⁰), their testimony will yet prevail to secure the destruction of blasphemers and murderers of the servants of God.

The numeral 1 occurs in a significant sense chiefly in the '1 hour,' signifying a very short time, which occurs five times (17¹² 18^{2, 10, 17, 19}).

Result.—Our survey of the Apocalypse would seem to show that, except in the cases of 7, 3½, and 12, no consciousness of their being specially sacred underlies the usage of the writers in regard to numbers. The usage in reference to these numbers is, however, sufficient to show that the men of the Apostolic Age found nothing alien to their new faith in the mystic symbolism of numbers which they inherited from their Jewish ancestors and especially from the apocalyptic writers. From the fact, however, that this symbolism appears with definite intent only in one book of the NT, and even there but sparingly, we may fairly infer that no great currency was given to it in the Apostolic Church, and the apocalyptic books, other than the Apocalypse of John, which contain it, while undoubtedly much read (see art. APOCALYPSE), were not considered of supreme worth or authority. The authoritative writers might take over the symbolism to a certain extent, but they did so almost unconsciously. Those who went further and made much of it might be then, as in subsequent ages of the Church down to our own day, interesting and edifying writers, but they did not rank with the authorities.

This state of the case may best be illustrated by a survey of the practice, in this reference, of the other NT writers.

II. NUMBERS IN THE OTHER NT BOOKS.—The examples given below are intended to represent cases in which the selection of the particular number or the mention of the particular number, presumably in accordance with fact, may reasonably be supposed to rest on ancient symbolical usage.

1. THE GOSPELS.—1. Seven.—The genealogies in Mt 1¹², Lk 3²³, are a clear instance of symmetrical arrangement on the basis of the number 7. To St. Matthew it seems important that the genealogy of Jesus from Abraham includes 3×14 generations (11⁷). In the part of St. Luke's genealogy which is comparable with St. Matthew's neither names nor numbers agree; but the list from Adam to Abraham gives, inclusive of Abraham, 21 names. The total, inclusive of the termini (God and Jesus) is 77. The phrases '7 other spirits worse than himself' (Mt 12⁴⁵), the '7 demons' that 'came out' of Mary Magdalene (Lk 8² ¶), the '7 times' and '70×7 times' of Mt 18¹², show that the use of 7 to express a totality of good or evil (even though it might be, as in Mt 18²¹, immeasurable) was not confined to the symbolists of the first Christian age.* There is no likelihood that either our Lord or the Evangelists thought of the planet-divinities of Babylon, or of the 7 Amshaspands of good spirits of Persia, opposed to 7 spirits of evil, yet the number comes to lip and pen involuntarily through a usage that may have its basis or confirmation there.* Again, in considering the accounts of the two miraculous feedings in Mark, chs. 6 and 7, it is difficult to exclude the idea that the numbers employed, especially 7, 5+2, and 12,† may have to the writers a certain sacred and sacramental significance. The sacramental association—apart from the numbers—is obvious in the narrative of the Fourth Evangelist (Jn 6), but is it not suggested even in the Synoptic account? The Divine supply is perfect (5+2 or 7). What is left of it may be as great as or even greater than what is taken (7 to 7, or 12 to 7). And where the company is largest most may be left. See especially the commentary on the double incident in Mk 7¹⁴⁻²¹ (cf. Mt 16⁷⁻¹²). Ac 1²², (filling of the vacancy in the apostolate), and 1 Co 15²,‡ where 'the 12' is used of the company that was only 11, seem to imply that to the mind both of our Lord and the apostles the number 12 signified His intention and ability to recover completely what was lost (Lk 19¹⁰; cf. with Mt 15²⁴. See also Jn 10²², 17¹², Ac 26⁷ ['our 12 tribes']).

2. Three.—The chief instance of this numeral in a suggestion of sense other than strictly literal is that of the resurrection of our Lord on the 3rd day (Mk 10³⁴, etc.; cf. Ac 10⁴⁰, 1 Co 15⁴). There is no reason to doubt either the definite prophecy or the definite fulfilment. It is not so easy to state precisely the reason of the choice of the number. It has been customary to refer, for a proximate reason, to the influence of Hos 6^{2, 3} and, for one more remote, to the ancient idea that the spirit hovered beside the body it had inhabited for 3 days, departing on the 3rd day because in the decaying flesh it no longer recognized its own likeness. Perhaps only the former of these associations is worth more than mention. It may fairly be argued that St. Luke, St. John, and St. Paul thought of Hos 6² when they referred to the Resurrection on the 3rd day as taking place according to the Scriptures (Lk 24⁴⁶, Ac 10⁴⁰, Jn 2²², 1 Co 15⁴), as this is the only passage discoverable where the collocation of 'revival from the dead' and 'the 3rd day' occurs.‖ It is another thing, however, to ascribe such definiteness of emphasis upon the 3rd day to our Lord. Even if He thought of the passage in Hosea, He may have regarded the numbers 2 and 3 simply as the natural equivalent for a very short time that was yet a real interval. If one reckons in days, there can hardly be a shorter interval than one day. It is not surprising that after the event of the Resurrection the more definite emphasis upon the numeral 3 or 3rd became common.¶ Other instances in the

* Proof that the sacredness of 7 was a subject of speculation among Jews of the 1st cent. may be found in Star. En. xxx. 3. See also Josephus, Ant. iii. vi. 7, along with the parallel passage in BJ v. v. 5, cited above under I. 4, note.

† Other instances of 12, worth mentioning, are 'the 12 legions of angels' (Mt 26⁵³), and the age of the child Jesus when He was found in the Temple (Lk 2⁴²). In regard to the latter, Josephus (Ant. v. x. 4) gives Samuel the same age when the Lord called him (1 S 3²), and pseudo-Ignatius (ad Magn. 3) makes Solomon 12 when he delivered the famous judgment (1 K 3¹⁶).

‡ W. Taylor Smith notices that 'the 12' occurs twenty-two times in the Gospels (art. 'Numbers' in DCCG).

§ Taken as an expression of real faith, not of delusive hope (see the Commentaries). The prophet's faith for the holy nation, the Servant of God, decided, it might be supposed, the terms of our Lord's faith for Himself as One 'torn' and 'smitten' for their sins.

¶ See E. A. Abbot's Message of the Son of Man, London, 1909, ch. ix. There is also a reference in his The Son of Man, Cambridge, 1910, p. 200 (Addendum on 'The Third Day').

‖ The strongest argument, perhaps, in favour of distinguishing, in reference to the '3rd day,' between Jesus and His reporters, is that supplied by Mt 12⁴⁰. This verse is an obvious gloss on the part of the Evangelist, who thinks that the 'sign' referred to is the death and resurrection of Jesus, and naturally finds the point of comparison between Him and Jonah in the '3 days.' He is not disturbed by the fact that in Jonah's case there are '3 nights' as well (Jon 1¹⁷). The sign intended by our Lord is that explained in v. 41.

* Instances in which, apart from mention of the numeral, a preference for it may be fairly considered implicit are the 7 petitions in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6⁹), the 7 parables of Mt 13, the 7+1 woes of Mt 23³³.

Gospels in which some kind of symbolical meaning may lurk in the fact or mention of the number 3 are: '3 measures of meal' (Mt 13³³), 'these 3' (Lk 10³⁶), 'these 3 years' (13⁷), '3 temptations' (Mt 4¹⁴), 3 agonized prayers (26^{37ff.} 42. 44^{ff.}; cf. 2 Co 12⁹), 3 denials and charges of Simon Peter (Mt 26^{69ff.} || Jn 21^{15ff.}). Of these perhaps the most relevant are the 3 temptations of Jesus and the 3 years of patience with the barren fig-tree. In both instances the number may be suggested by 3½ as the common apocalyptic number for a period of trial or probation. In regard to the 153 of Jn 21¹² Calvin has perhaps said the last word: 'Quantum ad piscium numerum spectat non est sublimis aliquid in eo querendum mysterium' (Com. ad loc.). 'Peter never landed a haul of fish without counting them' (M. Dods, in EGT, London, 1897, ad loc.).

3. Three and a half appears instructively in Lk 4²⁵ (cf. Ja 5¹⁷). The addition of the ½ to the 3 of 1 K 18¹ is evidently due to apocalyptic tradition.

ii. THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.—Apart from the instances already referred to, the most relevant seem to be: 7 deacons (6³), 7 'sons of one Sceva a Jew,' using the name of Jesus (19¹⁴), the 3 forties in the history of Moses and the Israelites (7^{23. 30. 36}), 3 days without sight and food (9⁹), '4 corners of the earth' (10¹¹).

iii. THE PAULINE EPISTLES.—1. Oratorical rhythm.—It occurred to the present writer* to study the rhetorical sentences of St. Paul with the view of discovering whether any sort of preference was given to particular numbers in lists of words, phrases, or sentences. The investigation seems to show that if a preference, instinctive or conscious, is given to any number above another, it is rather to 5, 3, or even 6, than to 7. Thus in Ro 8^{29ff.} there are 5 steps (including the terminus a quo) from 'foreknowledge' to 'glory,' in Ro 10¹²⁻¹⁵ the number from 'call' to 'sent' is 5. St. Paul would rather speak '5 words with understanding than 10,000 in a tongue' (1 Co 14¹⁹). The grace in which the Corinthians abound and the things they are to put up with are 5 (2 Co 8⁷ 11²⁰). There are 5 things to be mortified (Col 3⁵), 5 things to be put off, and 5 to be put on (with love as 6th) (Col 3^{8. 12}), 5 good works of a widow (1 Ti 5¹⁰).

Instances of 3, single or multiple, are 'faith, hope, love, these 3' (1 Co 13¹³), the 9 fruits of the spirit in Gal 5^{22ff.}. The rhetorical questions at 6^{15ff.} are 3. In the remarkable passage 2 Co 6^{4ff.} the phrases beginning with εἰ are 18, those beginning with καὶ are 3, while the adversative phrases beginning with ὡς are 7.

In the passage in Romans already alluded to (8^{28ff.}) the number from 'tribulation' to 'sword' (v. 3⁶) is 7, and at 2 Co 7¹¹ there are 7 exhibitions of sorrow. But, on the other hand, the number is absent where we might most expect it. Thus the weapons of the spiritual warfare in Eph 6^{13ff.} are 6, and the things to be thought on in Ph 4⁸ are also 6 (cf. 1 Ti 4¹² 6¹¹).

Rhetorical examples of 4 are: Eph 6¹² (4 powers to be resisted), Ph 3¹⁹ (4-fold description of the enemies of the Cross), 2 Ti 3¹⁶ (the profit of Scripture in 4 particulars), 2¹¹⁻¹³ (a faithful saying in 4 conditional clauses), 2-3 (4 things to follow after).

2. Symbolical suggestion.—Apart from rhetorical connexions it would appear that the numbers 3 and 4 occur most frequently, if also in part unconsciously, in a sacred connexion. In 2 Co 13¹⁴ we have the trinitarian benediction, and in the descriptions of God and the company in heaven a preference seems to be given to the number 3 (1 Ti 1¹⁷ 5²¹). Along with the 3 graces (1 Co 13¹³) may be placed the 3 gifts (2 Ti 1⁷). On the other hand, in the usual form of greeting there is no reference to the Holy Spirit, but only to 'God our Father' and the 'Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 1⁷ and all the Epistles to Churches except Galatians). In all but the three Pastoral Epistles the ingredients of the blessing are 2 (grace and peace), in the Pastorals they are 3 (grace, mercy, and peace). The better text, however, in Tit 1⁴ omits εὐεος. The apocalyptic suggestions in the '3rd heaven' of 2 Co 12², and in the 4 dimensions of the immeasurable in Eph 3¹⁸, should be noticed.

iv. THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.—The oratorical style of this book, where the clauses and phrases are more carefully balanced than in St. Paul's writings, would lead us to expect a preference for the perfect number 7. But here, as in the Pauline Epistles, other numbers (e.g. 5 and 6) are just as frequent. Thus in 11³² there are 7 from 'Gideon' to 'the prophets'; in 12¹⁸, 7 things to which 'ye have not come.' But, on the other hand, in 7⁵ we have a 5-fold description of the King of Peace; in 7²⁶, 5 adjectives describe the High Priest, Christ; in 6¹⁴ we have the 'foundations' of Christian faith in 6 particulars; in 12², there are 8 or, reckoning 'Mount Zion' and the 'city of the living God' separately, 9 things to which 'ye have come.' This is the more remarkable that the author seems, pretty clearly, to associate a mystical significance with the number 7 (4⁴).

v. THE EPISTLE OF JAMES.—In 3¹⁷ there are 7 attributes of the wisdom that is from above; in 5¹⁷ we have, as in Lk 4²⁵, 3½ for the 3 of 1 K 17¹.

vi. THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER.—In 1^{5ff.}, 7 virtues are evolved from faith; in 2⁵, we have 'Noah the 8th person' (AV). According to Gn 5, however, Noah is the 9th or, according to the reckoning followed in Jude¹⁴, the 10th from Adam. The supposition may be hazarded that 7 generations had come to be regarded as the measure of the world before the Flood. The '8th person' begins the new world. In 3³, 1 day is mentioned as the shortest period and 1,000 years as the longest (cf. Ps 90⁴).

vii. THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN.—In the Johannine style the sentence of 3 clauses prevails; e.g. 1^{6. 8} et passim. For examples of words and short phrases cf. 2¹⁰ 3¹⁸, and especially 5³ (the '3 that bear witness on earth').

viii. THE EPISTLE OF JUDE.—In v. 1¹⁴ we have 'the 7th from Adam.' The number is obtained by reckoning Adam one of the 7 (cf. Gn 5³⁻¹⁸).

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB, DCG, and EBI. Of similar work in German, E. C. A. Riehm's art. 'Zahlen' in Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums, 1884, and O. Zöckler's art. 'Siebenzahl, heilige,' in PRE³ xviii. [1908] 310ff., will be found specially helpful. See the latter especially on the bibliography of the subject. Of monographs may be mentioned H. Gunkel, Zum relig.-geschichtl. Verständnis des NT, Göttingen, 1903 (e.g. on the number 4, p. 43f., and p. 81); T. K. Cheyne, Bible Problems and the New Material for their Solution, London, 1904; but especially A. Jeremias, Babylonisches im NT, Leipzig, 1905 (a sequel to Das AT im Lichte des alten Orients, do., 1904). Regarding this work Zöckler remarks that it is a good antidote to the extravagant Babylonism of Gunkel and Cheyne. Note, in Zöckler's bibliography, especially the references to the works of F. von Andrian ('Die Siebenzahl im Geistesleben der Völker,' in Mitteil. der Anthropol. Gesellschaft in Wien, vol. xxxi. [1901] pp. 225-274) and W. H. Roscher ('Die Bedeutung der Siebenzahl im Kultus und Mythos der Griechen,' in Philologus, 1900, pp. 260-373). On the development of number-symbolism in the Church in connexion with its ethical teaching see Zöckler, Die Tugendlehre des Christentums geschichtlich dargestellt mit besonderer Rücksicht auf die Zahlensymbolische Einkleidung ihrer Lehrformen, Gütersloh, 1904.

L. A. MUIRHEAD.

NURTURE.—See CHASTISEMENT.

NYMPHA, NYMPHAS.—In Col 4¹⁵ (AV) we read, 'Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea and Nymphas and the church in his house.' The proper name is found in the accusative case Νυμφᾶν, and may be masculine (Νυμφᾶν) or feminine * Unaware at the time that Zöckler had carried out the same idea in his art. 'Siebenzahl' in PRE³ xviii. 310ff.

(Νύμφαν). The feminine form Νύμφαν is Doric for Νύμφην, and Lightfoot (Colossians, p. 242) thinks it 'in the highest degree improbable' that such a Doric form should occur here; but similar forms occur in Jn 11⁵ and Ac 9³⁸, while the contracted masc. accus. Νύμφαν for Νύμφαδα is very rare. The question is complicated by a variety of readings in the following clause. There is strong evidence for the reading 'her' house (αυτης), which is adopted by WH, RVm, Tr mg., and Ln; while T, Tr, L, and RV read 'their' house (αυτων). If the correct form be 'her house', then the name is Nympha, and the bearer a woman of Laodicea in whose house a number of Christians met for worship. If this be the true solution, then Nympha was a woman of the same type as Prisca at Rome (Ro 16³), or Lydia at Philippi (Ac 16¹⁴). The reading 'his house' (αυτου) is found in several good MSS—DFGKL; and if this be accepted, the name is Nymphas, which would probably be a contracted form of Nymphodorus, as Artemas for Artemidorus, Zenas for Zenodorus, and Theudas for Theodorus. The form Nymphodorus is found by no means infrequently, while Nymphas on the other hand occurs seldom. Other names of which Nymphas might be a contraction are suggested by Lightfoot, viz. Nymphius, Nymphicus, Nymphidius, Nymphodotus, the first and last being most common. The reading 'their house' leaves the form of the name uncertain and is probably due to a change made by a scribe who included 'brethren' in the reference, while a scribe might alter the fem. αυτης to αυτου under the assumption that a woman could not be referred to in this way. The more difficult reading (αυτης) is probably the correct one in this case, and if so, a woman, Nympha, is meant by the Apostle.

LITERATURE.—J. B. Lightfoot, *Colossians and Philemon*², London, 1876, p. 242; A. S. Peake, in EGT, 'Colossians,' do., 1903, p. 547. Artt. in HDB and EB4, s.v. W. F. BOYD.

O

OATH.—An oath may be defined as an assertion that a statement is true (Germ. assertorischer Eid) or shall be true (promissorischer Eid), or a promise of loyalty and fidelity, made binding by invocation of the Deity, or of some person or thing revered or dreaded. The motive for telling the truth may be regard for what is thus invoked (e.g. the honour of God) or the fear of avenging punishment. It is generally held that the latter thought is dominant and determinative, even when only implicit. In an adjuration one person states the terms of the oath and another accepts it, thus owning the solemn sanction invoked by the first party as the ground and guardian of the truth he vows to tell. The other use of the ambiguous words 'oath,' 'swear,' viz. for meaningless profanity of speech, does not immediately concern us, in spite of Mk 14⁷¹ (EV) (see EBi iii., art. 'Oath'). An oath in the primary sense guarantees truth-telling under necessity, and, like the 'necessary' lie (Notlüge), belongs at best to the higher, and too frequently to the lower, casuistry. A NT example of the latter, which Jesus vigorously denounced, occurs in Mt 23⁶⁻²². On such casuistry, irreverence is a close attendant. To the present writer it appears that the customary views on this subject need considerable revision if they are to be harmonized with the Gospels, with justice to certain 'sects' (Quakers, Mennonites, etc.), with practical experience of the law-courts, and with the possibility that even of a thing which is 'woven into the common law' it may be necessary to say, in Milton's words (Of Reformation touching Church Discipline, 1641, p. 78): 'Let it weave out again.'

The chief NT passages concerned are Mt 5³³⁻³⁷, where Jesus gives the command, 'Swear not at all,' and the parallels in 23¹⁶⁻²² and Ja 5¹². It is maintained by Zahn and others, with much probability, that St. James has here preserved the original words of Jesus in a purer form than St. Matthew (T. Zahn, 'Matt.,' in Kommentar zum NT, 1903 ff., p. 244). The chief grounds for this view are:—(1) that certain ancient writers quote the first part of Mt 5³³⁻³⁷ as it now stands, but substitute Ja 5¹² for St. Matthew's ending; (2) that some of these writers appear not to have known this Epistle, and therefore they and St. James will have derived these words from a common source, older and better than Mt 5³⁷; (3) that Ja 5¹² is free from an apparent inconsistency which attaches to Mt 5³⁷, for Jesus has been urging that His followers should keep to the simplest possible form of affirmation, and 'yea, yea' is not strictly that; the second 'yea' seems almost a vain repetition. On the other hand, Ja 5¹² may possibly be secondary; for instead of 'Let your "yea" be (a reliable and unadorned) "yea" and your "nay," "nay,"' it may be rendered: 'Let yours be the "yea, yea," "nay, nay" (enjoined in Mt.).' Further, while St. Matthew's double 'yea' can scarcely be defended (but see H. H. Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus, Eng. tr., 1892, i. 269) as securing clearness—for what illumination does the repetition convey?—yet the emphasis added by the second word is by no means extreme, and Jesus may therefore have used it; it falls short of the 'verily' which He used so often. However this may be, the two passages yield the common and unmistakable general principle of a characteristic Christian simplicity and moderation of speech. This is further enforced by the words, 'Swear not at all' (μη ολωσι). Any exceptions to this strongly exclusive phrase must bear the burden of proof, and to apply it strictly in the meantime is the only natural course, and the precise reverse of 'hair-splitting' (T. Keim, Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr., iii. [1877] 314). This strictness is made still more binding by the parallel in St. James: 'nor by any other oath.' The forbidden oaths specified in Mt 5³⁴⁻³⁶ are illustrations only—selected, not exhaustive. The ground of the prohibition is the link with God which in the thoughts of our Lord's hearers (ch. 5) and also in the teaching of the Pharisees (ch. 23) had been snapped; this He replaces with reiterated emphasis. These evasive or frivolous oaths are condemned expressly because, in principle, the name of God is involved in them. The main appeal in both chapters is, as J. Kostlin (in PRE³ v. 239 f.) has already maintained, an appeal to reverence, though this is indissociably combined with the demand for veracity. All false swearing amounts indirectly to profane swearing. For it must be irreverent either because God's presence is invoked in order to make a lie more credible, or else because men adopt a formula (as in Mt 5 and 23) which seeks to exclude Him while the lie is told. The 'evil' which is the source of 'whatsoever is more than' a simple affirmation consists of casuistry and irreverence alike.

That Jesus is not attacking untruthfulness alone is further shown by this, that He offers His teaching as a conscious correction of that which had been given to the ancients, viz. that vows or oaths by God must be kept (cf. W. C. Allen, ICC, 'St. Matthew,'² 1912, p. 53). If Jesus meant that the oath by God should be left standing (so Keim, op. cit. p. 311 f.) in the interests of veracity, He only confirmed the OT. Moreover, if that were His only object, then instead of 'Swear not at all' (for one cannot evade the reference to God), He would have needed to say, 'Never let any matter of importance be settled without an oath, and that directly by the name of God.'

Wendt (op. cit. p. 269 f.) and others hold that the oath is 'of the evil' because it implies that the truth need not be told on other occasions. But that seems to imply that the oath itself is not 'of the evil,' but a highly commendable act of exceptional virtue. It is true that oaths on special occasions encourage a double standard of truthfulness. This is, indeed, denied in a vigorous article by W. C. Magee (CR xlix. [1886] 1 ff.), in which it is maintained that oaths are only a forcible reminder of a duty which applies equally at other times; but the oath actually uttered by witnesses always concerns itself quite specially with the particular case under trial. Yet this limitation of the veracity due outside the oath cannot be the chief evil in the oath. That chief evil, so far as it is lying at all, must be lying which is committed in and under the oath; and this is not merely nor chiefly untruthfulness; by it a despite is done to God which seems to have been, in the judgment of Jesus, an additional and greater sin. Now the admissions of writers of all views show that a very large proportion of those who have strong motives for untruth will not be deterred by any oath that can be devised (cf. Magee, op. cit. p. 3). In any case, their testimony will be false, and thus a certain irreverence will be implied in it, but only remotely; the requirement of an oath will simply make it far more pointed and direct; for it is known beforehand that a large number, if they take an oath at all, will commit perjury; moreover, few of these perjuries will be investigated, and the number punished will be negligible. At the other end of the scale are those who would tell the truth under any circumstances—the earnest Christians whom the oath only forces into a certain lowering of tone, and the high-minded unbelievers who, when the case is over, will have been truthful in everything except in the oath by which their truthfulness is 'ensured.' And with both of these undesirable results the name of God will be concerned in a way which is at least indelicate.

The ideal of Jesus is clear. A man is to be so truthful that his possible untruthfulness need not be reckoned with, and therefore he will take no oath, nor be asked to take one. But if men will not always trust him, owing to the general lack of trustworthiness, is he or is he not to submit to this indignity (cf. Clem. Alex. Stromata, vii. 8, and Kant's epithet 'State blackmail' or 'civil extortion' [bürgerliches Erpressungsmittel] in Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft, 1793, p. 226; Eng. tr., 1838), in which he will feel that God is implicated? It may be said that this surrounding 'evil' of the world would make only the demanding of the oath to be wrong, not the taking of it. But any submission to or compromise with the 'evil' can be regarded as an unworthy surrender, and as itself evil. Another vital point is the shrinking attitude towards God which is taken in the oath by the explicit or implicit invocation of His powers of punishment. The question arises whether that is a Christian or a sub-Christian conception of Him; whether the Christian does not tell the truth, in the ordinary course, from far higher motives; and whether, by suddenly accepting an official injunction to 'believe and shudder' before Him whom he is usually permitted to love, he does not do an injustice to God and to himself. Magee admits that the oath has lost its power increasingly with the decline of superstitious dread (op. cit. p. 13 f.), and Köstlin admits that the non-swearing sects have been influenced largely by a reverence and delicacy which lie upon the unspoiled Christian spirit like bloom.

In face of all this, can the oath be re-instated by the actual practice of Jesus or of St. Paul? In the case of the latter, 'the disciple is not above his master' (see Barclay, quoted by A. Tholuck, Sermon on the Mount, Eng. tr., 1860, p. 261); and apart from that, the actual examples of asseveration in his Epistles are not very convincing (see H. Weinel, St. Paul, Eng. tr., 1906, p. 358, and C. H. Watkins, St. Paul's Fight for Galatia, 1914, pp. 108, 159 f.). This is especially evident at 1 Co 1¹⁴⁻¹⁶, which, in view of the 'I thank God,' reveals a strange lack of clarity; and, where the witness is himself uncertain, strong expressions of affirmation and invocation can but add to the difficulties.

As to Jesus, it is curious that Mt 26⁶³⁻⁶⁵ should be thought so conclusive. There are two important variations in the Synoptic accounts, thus:

Mt 26 ⁶³ .	Mk 14 ⁶¹ .	Lk 22 ⁶⁷ .
I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ.	Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?	Art thou the Christ? Tell us.
Thou hast said.	I am.	If I tell you, ye will not believe.

For the adjuration, we have the authority of St. Matthew alone; and an adjuration would not in any case be an ordinary oath. If one who is 'adjured' does not, by one explicit word, say that he makes the adjuration his own, it remains the utterance of the other party only, and no one can prove that he answers, or answers truly, because of it (see HDB, art. 'Adjure'). The Jewish use of 'Amen' in acceptance of an adjuration is often appealed to as if it occurred here (see Tholuck, op. cit. p. 254), but Jesus said no such word. He makes reference only to the question asked Him, not to the adjuration in itself. And is that reply explicit? According to St. Mark, He answers, 'I am (the Messiah)'; but probably St. Mark is secondary here, for Messianic utterances are usually the more confident the later they are.* Moreover, 'I am' can be understood as St. Mark's interpretation of 'Thou hast said,' but not vice versa. J. Weiss has argued with much force that Jesus could not, to any purpose, answer either 'yes' or 'no' (*Schriften des NT*², i. [1906] 393 f., 516 f.; cf. W. C. Allen on Mt 26⁶³ [op. cit. p. 283 f.] and Swete on Mk 14⁶¹ [St. Mark, 1902]). In St. Luke this evasiveness, or indefiniteness, is patent, but in St. Matthew also the emphatic pronoun ('Thou hast said'—not I; cf. Lk 22⁷⁰) suggests that a definite answer was refused. That the high priest treated the answer (or perhaps the following prophecy) as a plain self-condemnation proves nothing except that he wished to do so (cf. Swete on Mk 14⁶¹ and art. CONSPIRACY). The tone of Jesus' reply is at any rate lofty, and not in the least submissive. Essentially the same reply is given by Jesus to Pilate (who has no interest in making it more definite than it is), and it is not regarded as closing the case (Mk 15², Mt 27¹¹, Lk 23³).

* St. Mark's confidence and emphasis show how far he is from the thought of an unwilling confession extorted solely by an adjuration. He mentions no adjuration, and on his showing the question might have been answered earlier if it had been asked.

On this evidence it cannot be held, with any confidence, that Jesus accepted the adjuration, and His example does not, therefore, justify oaths in law, as distinguished from private conversation. In Mt 5 He is not dealing directly with law-courts, but we do not know that He would have exempted them from His prohibition, if questioned.

The expression ἐὶ δόθηται σημεῖον (literally 'if a sign shall be given') in Mk 8¹², if an abbreviated oath-formula, goes far to decide the practice of Jesus. In opposition, however, to Piscator's Strafmüch-Gott-Bibel (Herborn, 1606), and to various commentaries, it must be questioned whether the invocation of God's punishment, undoubtedly absent from His words, was present to His mind. Nothing could be more foreign to His usual attitude to the Father. Much more prominence has been assigned to His habitual expression 'Verily' (= 'Amen'), which He used in an unprecedented way (G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., 1902, pp. 226-229). It lends some support to the double and thus emphatic 'yea' and 'nay' in Mt 5³⁷, though the view can scarcely be accepted (see, e.g., E. Klostermann, and cf. H. J. Holtzmann, in loc.) that this doubling constituted not only an emphasis but an oath, for then the whole context makes v. 37 impossible, and Ja 5¹² must be substituted. Dalman speaks as if Jesus, feeling the need of asseveration, and embarrassed by the recollection that He had said 'Swear not at all,' fixed upon 'Amen' as an evasive but virtual oath (cf. Achelis on early 'Christian' oaths [Christentum, 1912, Excursus 62]). But it is only fair to suppose that Jesus regarded 'verily' as differing from the oath in principle; for by it a man neither cringes before God's punishments, nor presumptuously offers to suffer them on certain conditions of his own.

Regarding He 6¹², 7³⁰, and Rev 10⁵, from which the conclusion is often drawn that Jesus cannot have forbidden all oaths, since oath-taking is here ascribed to God and His angels, and commended when practised by men, it may be said: (1) that not all the genuine teachings of Jesus were everywhere known, understood, and practised in the churches of the 1st cent.; (2) that the Divine example, especially in the handling of something dangerous, is not always enjoined upon man. The lex talionis is forbidden to men that it may be left entirely to God (Mt 5⁴⁴⁻⁴⁵, Ro 12¹⁹, 2 Ti 4¹⁴). There are also the objections that the ascription of oath-taking to God may be simply anthropomorphic—which is the very opposite of following a Divine example; and that His swearing 'by Himself' is irreconcilable with the ordinary definition of an oath (see above), for it avowedly does not include an appeal to a higher power (He 6¹³), still less the invocation of a penalty.

Exegetically, the best conclusion is perhaps Augustine's: that to swear falsely is perdition, to swear truly is perilous, and that the only safe course is to leave the oath alone. Practical experience tends in the same direction. Defender after defender admits that perjury is committed constantly, increasingly, and with impunity. This has the most deadening effect on morality and religion alike, and there is a very general desire to limit oaths to a few matters on which truthfulness is specially vital, or to abolish preparatory oaths altogether and accept sworn testimony only to evidence already given. The latter suggestion, however, would have positively bad effects unless witnesses were solemnly reminded beforehand that they would have to take an oath afterwards; otherwise, if they had once uttered falsehood, they would almost certainly not go back on it. On the Continent there is a strong movement within the legal profession to substitute declarations for oaths (cf. F. Paulsen, *System der Ethik*⁷⁻⁸, 1906, ii. 208-209); in certain Swiss cantons, where the experiment has been tried, false evidence has not increased. In any case, the best deterrent would be more frequent prosecutions and severer sentences for untrue witness. It would probably be best to lay upon the magistrate the duty of impressing on witnesses the seriousness of their position, but to leave him free to do this when and how he thought best. A set form becomes almost inevitably a formality. Finally, it is necessary to realize that much of the argumentation on this whole subject is double-edged. If, for instance, as the advocates of the oath say, the word 'verily' is practically the equivalent of an oath, could they not be satisfied with this equivalent? They could then, perhaps, settle the controversy by accepting as adequate some such words as these: 'Recognizing the solemn duty of truthfulness, I verily promise that the evidence which I shall give in this case shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.'

LITERATURE.—Besides the works mentioned in the art., see art. 'Oath' in HDB (G. Ferries), 'Oaths' in DCG (G. Wauchope Stewart), and 'Eid (Ethisch)' in RGG (O. Scheel), with the recent literature there quoted. Reference may also be made to the Commentaries on Matthew, by B. Weiss¹⁰ (in Meyer's Kommentar, 1910), T. Zahn³ (Kommentar zum NT, 1910), E. Klostermann and H. Gressmann (in Lietzmann's Handbuch zum NT, 1909), H. J. Holtzmann³ (Handkommentar zum NT, 1901), W. C. Allen² (ICC, 1912), A. B. Bruce (EGT, 1897), A. Plummer (1909); on Mark, by B. Weiss³ (in Meyer, 1892), G. Wohlenberg^{1,2} (in Zahn, 1910), E. Klostermann and H. Gressmann (in Lietzmann, 1907), H. J. Holtzmann³ (Handkom., 1901), E. P. Gould (ICC, 1896), A. B. Bruce (EGT, 1897), H. B. Swete (1902); on Hebrews, by B. Weiss⁶ (in Meyer, 1897), E. Riggenbach (in Zahn, 1913), H. Windisch (in Lietzmann, 1913), M. Dods (EGT, 1910); on James, by W. Beyschlag (in Meyer, 1897), W. O. E. Oesterley (EGT, 1910), R. J. Knowling (1904), J. B. Mayor (1910). See also the text-books on Ethics by I. A. Dorner (Eng. tr., 1837), C. E. Luthardt (Eng. tr., 1839), H. Martensen (Eng. tr., 1831-33), G. C. A. v. Harless (Eng. tr., 1868), R. Rothe (1867-71), F. H. R. Frank (1834-37), K. Köstlin (1887), L. Lemme (1905). Nearly all the German work is marked by a strong emphasis on loyal citizenship; see especially Lemme and Frank.

C. H. WATKINS.

OBEDIENCE.—The principal word which calls for notice under this head in the apostolic writings is the noun ὑπακοή, with the corresponding verb, ὑπακούω, and adjective, ὑπήκοος. ὑπακοή is unknown in classical Greek. It occurs once in the LXX—2 S 22³⁶; in the NT it is common. Its general meaning is 'obedience' (Ro 6¹⁶; cf. the verb in Eph 6^{1,3}, Col 3²—, 1 P 3⁶, and Ro 6^{12,16}); but it has also the special sense of submission to the Divine will, and is thus found of the obedience of Christ (Ro 5¹⁹, He 5⁸; cf. Ph 2⁸, ὑπήκοος). In regard to Christians it comes to have the still more special sense of subjection to the saving will of God, as revealed in Christ, and is thus brought into close connexion with the idea of faith (cf. 1 P 1², ὑπακοή τῆς ἀληθείας; Ro 1⁵ 16²⁶, ὑπακοή πίστεως; 2 Co 10⁵, ὑπακοή τοῦ Χριστοῦ). Cf., in the same sense, the usage of ὑπακούω in Ac 6⁷, 2 Th 1³ 3¹⁴. Finally we find ὑπακοή standing alone, as a mode of manifestation of Christian faith (Ro 15¹⁸ 16¹⁹, 2 Co 7¹⁵ 10⁶, Philem 2¹, 1 P 1² 14¹⁴; cf. the verb, Ph 2¹², 2 Co 7¹⁵, and the adjective, 2 Co 2⁹).

The other words signifying 'obedience' in the NT are the noun ὑποταγή, properly 'subjection,' and the verb ὑποτάσσεσθαι. These are sometimes used as synonyms for ὑπακοή, etc. (cf., for the noun, 2 Co 9¹³, Gal 2⁵, 1 Ti 2¹¹ 3⁴; and for the verb, Ro 10³, Ja 4⁷, 1 P 2¹³ 5⁵, He 12⁹).

In the sub-apostolic writings both series of words are found in much the same senses as in the NT. The particular circumstances of 1 Clem., an Epistle written to deal with a state of disorder in Corinth occasioned by the insurrection of some of the younger men of the Church against the elders, bring it about that the virtue of obedience and subjection is particularly commended in this Epistle (cf. ix. 3, x. 2, 7, xix. 1, lxxiii. 1, etc.). The keynote of the whole Epistle is struck in xiv. 1, when it is said: 'It is just and right, brethren, that we should rather become obedient unto God than follow those who in vainglory and sedition have become the leaders of a detestable emulation' (cf. also Ign. Eph. ii. 2, where subjection [ὑποταγή] to Christ is the same thing as subjection to the bishop and the presbytery).

In conclusion, reference may be made to a passage in which Thomas Aquinas endeavours to define the special virtue of obedience (Summa Theologiae, II. ii. quæst. 104, art. 2).

'To all good works, which have a special ground of praiseworthiness, a special virtue is assigned. For this is what properly belongs to a virtue, that it renders a good work. But to obey one's superior is a debt we owe in accordance with the Divine order immanent in things; and as a consequence is good. . . . The act we are considering has, however, a special ground of praiseworthiness on account of its special object. For while inferiors have many duties towards their superiors, amongst the rest there is one duty in particular, that they are required to obey their commandments. Wherefore obedience is a special virtue, and its special object is the commandment, whether implicit or explicit. For the will of the superior however made known is in a way an implicit command: and obedience appears so much the more ready, in proportion as it anticipates an explicit command by obeying, when the will of the superior is perceived.'

It is this obedience not merely to the express commands of God, but to whatever is understood to be His will, which constitutes true Christian obedience, which is an obedience from the heart (Ro 6¹⁷), an obedience even of the thoughts (2 Co 10⁵).

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, 1880; H. E. Manning, Sermons, 1844, pp. 117, 129, 287; R. Whately, The Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Matters of Religion, 1859, pp. 167, 196; J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, 1868, i. 228, viii. 201; F. W. Robertson, Sermons, 2nd ser., 1875, p. 94; J. Martineau, Hours of Thought, 1879, ii. 79; P. Brooks, The Light of the World, 1891, p. 340; W. R. Inge, All Saints' Sermons, 1907, p. 172; B. P. Browne, The Essence of Religion, 1911, p. 209; A. B. D. Alexander, Christianity and Ethics, 1914, p. 164.

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

OCCUPATION.—See LABOUR, WORK.

ODES OF SOLOMON.—It was in 1909 that Rendel Harris, whose researches in the domain of Christian antiquities have been so fruitful, enriched the learned world by the discovery of a collection of forty-two old Syriac hymns known as 'The Odes of Solomon.' Since their publication many useful essays by eminent scholars have been written to elucidate the difficult questions attaching to a composition which reflects the state of mind of communities belonging to so early a period as the first centuries of the Christian era. The result of these discussions has unfortunately not been such as to lead to unanimity of judgment. We shall try to analyze the principal theories, and examine which of them seems to be most in accordance with the original text and with the general course of ecclesiastical history.

1. Manuscripts and principal editions of the Odes.—The MS* from which Rendel Harris published his first and second editions is not very ancient. It cannot be older than the 15th cent.; but apart from occasional passages which point to a corruption of some words by careless copyists, it exhibits generally a text which can be relied upon for critical purposes. It is written in Syro-Occidental letters, and its editor tells us that it came from the valley of the Tigris, in Northern Mesopotamia. It is truncated at the beginning and at the end. Odes i. and ii. and some lines of Ode iii. are missing; these stood, with the title of the book, on the three leaves which are lost at the beginning.

In 1911 Harris published a second edition, revised and enlarged, of the text, with a facsimile of Odes xxvi. 13-14, xxvii. 1-4. In the same year H. Grimme edited the Syriac text at Heidelberg, and translated it into Hebrew, with the intention of showing that the Syriac version was dependent on a Hebrew original. In 1914 Kittel published, at the close of a discussion of the Odes, a glossary of the words used in the text.*

At the moment of writing we are informed that a third edition is being published at Oxford for the Rylands Library, with a complete reproduction in facsimile of all the pages of the MS. We expect that this publication will answer a legitimate desideratum felt everywhere for a critical editio princeps, which, so far as the text and its literal translation are concerned, will be a safe guide to all students of Christian antiquities and a solid basis for subsequent researches.

Besides the Syriac text, five Odes are preserved in Coptic in a fantastic book entitled Pistis Sophia. These are Odes i., v., vi., xxii., and xxv., which are not only quoted and given a Gnostic interpretation in that book, but cited as Solomon's and commented on in extenso as if they were canonical portions of the Bible. The sentence which introduces them is προεφῆνευσε per Salomonem, the subject being vis luminis.

In April, 1912, F. C. Burkitt published in the JThSt some variants, from a MS of the Nitrian collection in the British Museum, previously described by the skilled hand of W. Wright (Cod. Mus. Brit. Add. 14, 538). This new MS, dating probably from the 10th to the 13th cent., is very important, but it frequently exhibits a truncated text, as many words are quite illegible, and it begins only at Ode xvii. 7. Being more ancient than Cod. H, it occasionally exhibits readings which, for critical reasons, have commended themselves to scholars.

As to the modern versions made upon these texts, besides the works that we have mentioned concomitantly with the editions of the original, the following publications appear to be the most important. (1) 'Ein jüdisch-christlich Psalmbuch aus dem ersten Jahrhundert,' in TU, new ser., v. 4 [1910]. The translation is by J. Flemming, and the critical study by A. Harnack. (2) G. Dietrich, 'Eine jüdisch-christliche Liedersammlung aus dem apostolischen Zeitalter,' in Die Reformation, ix. [1910]. (3) Les odes de Salomon: separate edition of articles printed in RB vii. [1910] 483 ff., viii. [1911] 5 ff., 161 ff. The translation is due to J. Labourt, and the critical study to P. Batiffol. (4) F. Schulthess, 'Textkritische Bemerkungen zu den syrischen Oden Salomos,' in ZNTW xi. [1910]. This study contains some valuable remarks, its author being a good Semitic scholar. (5) A. Ungnad and W. Stärk, 'Die Oden Salomos,' in Kleine Texte für theolog. und phil. Vorlesungen und Übungen, lxi. [1910]. (6) J. H. Bernard, 'The Odes of Solomon,' in TS viii. 3 [1912].

In addition, hundreds of useful articles are to be found in theological magazines of Germany, Great Britain, and France; and all of them testify to the importance of these beautiful Odes for Christian dogma. No book, not even the Teaching of the Apostles, has excited so keen an interest among Christian students; and its discovery is to be placed, from a theological point of view, among the events of which the 20th cent. may justly be proud. So far as the text is concerned, few amendments worth noticing have been suggested, and the very few linguistic difficulties that the original offers will remain for a long time insoluble, owing to the scarcity of MSS and the lack of exact Patristic quotations.

* This MS has been recently acquired by the Governors of the John Rylands Library of Manchester, and is at present found there as Cod. Syriac, 9.

* G. Kittel, Die Oden Salomos, Leipzig, 1914.

2. Character of the Odes.—Three principal theories as to the nature of the Odes have been launched by scholars since their publication. (a) The first theory, put forward by Harnack, and fully endorsed by Grimme, considers them a Jewish composition, interpolated towards the end of the 1st cent. by a Christian hand. (b) The second theory regards them as entirely Christian hymns, and Bernard, a well-known holder of this view, goes so far as to believe them to be hymns recited by new proselytes, for baptismal purposes.

'The conclusion which seems to the present writer to emerge most clearly from an examination of the Odes is, . . . that they are baptismal hymns intended for use in public worship, either for catechumens or for those who have recently been baptized. . . . A few parallelisms here and there might be set down to chance, but when we find that this scheme of interpretation, applied to every Ode, provides a consistent explanation of their phraseology in every case, and in some cases illuminates obscure phrases for which no other explanation has been suggested, we are entitled to claim for it serious consideration' (op. cit. p. 42). 'The Odes do not differ in this respect from Ephraim's baptismal hymns' (ib. p. vi).

(c) The third theory, upheld by Harris, who put it forward at the very beginning, considers the Odes (or most of them) to be the work of a Jewish-Christian, but rejects entirely the idea of an Ebionite source.

Before we try to form a judgment as to which of these three principal theories is likely to receive most support, it is useful to know how the Odist introduces his subject, what person he uses in speaking, and what kind of man he believes himself to be.

In Ode xx. the author speaks as a priest of the Most High: 'I am a priest of the Lord, and to Him I do priestly service: and to Him I offer the sacrifice of His thought.' In the following Ode the writer believes himself to be a bondman that God has released by His grace: 'My arms I lifted up on high, even to the grace of the Lord: because He had cast off my bonds from me.' In Ode xlii. we read the following lines: 'I stretched out my hands and approached my Lord: for the stretching of my hands is His sign: my expansion is the outspread wood which was set up on the way of the Righteous One. And I became of no account to those who know me, for I shall not reveal myself to those who did not take hold of me; and I shall be with those who love me. All my persecutors are dead; and they have sought me who announced me,* because I live, and I rose and am with them; and I will speak by their mouths. . . . And I was not rejected, though I was reckoned to be so. . . . Death cast me up, and many along with me. I was gall and bitterness to him.' Few will read these passages without immediately thinking of Christ as the speaker.

In many other passages the Christ is spoken of in the third person. Ode xxiv.: 'The Dove fluttered over the Christ, because He was her head; and she sang over Him, and her voice was heard.'

In some passages the tone of the Odist is homiletic and didactic, referring, as in some prophetic books, neither directly nor indirectly to Christ. Ode xxiii.: 'Joy is of the saints! and who shall put it on, but they alone? Grace is of the elect! and who shall receive it, except those who trust in it from the beginning? Love is of the elect! and who shall put it on, except those who have possessed it from the beginning? Walk ye in the knowledge of the Most High, and you shall know the grace of the Lord without grudging.' This change of tone may have been one of the reasons which gave birth to the theory of interpolation referred to above. But, as Syriac hymnology constantly exhibits this characteristic of an interchange of speakers, no serious conclusion can be drawn from it in favour either of diversity of authorship or of the theory of interpolation. On the contrary, the main idea which may be gathered from a group of three or four Odes remains the same throughout, and the author lays stress continually on the same theme. The features which principally strike a reader of the Odes, besides some general counsels of piety, may be summarized as follows.

(1) Love.—iii. 2-4: 'And my members are with him. And on them do I hang, and He loves me: for I should not have known how to love the Lord, if He had not loved me. For who is able to distinguish love, except the one that is loved?' vi. 2: 'So speaks in my members the Spirit of the Lord, and I speak by His love.' See, further, viii. 2, 14, 23; xi. 2; xii. 11; xvi. 4; xviii. 1; xxiii. 3; x. 7.

(2) Knowledge.—vi. 5: 'The Lord has multiplied the knowledge of Himself, and is zealous that these things should be known, which by His grace have been given to us.' vii. 24: 'For ignorance hath been destroyed, because the knowledge of the Lord hath arrived.' See, further, vii. 4; viii. 13; xi. 4; xii. 3; xv. 5; xxiii. 4.

(3) Faith.—viii. 11: 'Keep my secret, ye who are kept by it.' iv. 5: 'Thou hast given thy heart, O Lord, to thy believers: never wilt thou fail, nor be without fruits: for one hour of thy Faith is more precious than all days and years.' See, further, xvi. 5; xxviii. 4; xxix. 6; xxxix. 11; xli. 1; xlii. 12.

(4) Truth.—viii. 9: 'Hear the word of truth, and receive the knowledge of the Most High.' xxxviii. 1-7: 'I went up to the light of truth as if into a chariot: and the Truth took me and led me. . . . And it went with me and made me rest, and suffered me not to wander, because it was the Truth. . . . And I did not make an error in anything because I obeyed the Truth; for Error flees away from it, and meets it not: but the Truth proceeds in the right path.' See, further, ix. 8; xi. 3, 4; xii. 1, 11, 12; xvii. 5, 7; xxv. 10; xxxii. 2; xxxiii. 8.

(5) Rest.—iii. 6: 'And where His rest is, there also am I.' xi. 10: 'And the Lord renewed me in His raiment, and possessed me by His light, and from above He gave me rest in incorruption.' See, further, xx. 8; xxvi. 13; xxviii. 4; xxx. 2; xxxvi. 1; xxxvii. 4; xxxviii. 4.

(6) Grace.—v. 2-3: 'O most High, thou wilt not forsake me, for thou art my hope: freely I have received thy grace, I shall live thereby.' iv. 7: 'For who is there that shall put on thy grace, and be hurt?' See, further, vii. 12, 25; ix. 5; xi. 1; xv. 8; xx. 7; xxi. 1; xxiii. 2; xxv. 4; xxxiii. 1; xxxiv. 6.

Many allusions are made to crowns or garlands (see i. 1; v. 10; ix. 8; xvii. 1; xx. 7); several passages are found also in which the Christian is compared to a harp on which the Spirit seeks to play (see vi. 1; xiv. 8; xxvi. 3). The idea of God being a helper of man is also expressed in many verses (see vii. 3; viii. 7; xxi. 1; xxv. 2). For the transfiguration of the face of the believer, see xvii.; xxi.; xl.; xli. For the offering to God of the fruit of the lips (He 13¹⁵) see viii.; xii.; xiv.; xvi. For the figure of milk from the breasts of God, see viii.; xiv.; xix.; xxxv.; iv. For the joy felt by good people, see xxxii.; vii.; xxxiii. On the rescue from bonds effected by Christ, see below. For the peace in which true believers shall live, see viii.; ix.; xxxv. 2; x. 2. On the good fruits to be offered to the Lord, see xiv.; xi.; viii. 3; xxxviii. 18. On the light of the Lord, see vii.; viii.; xii. 3; xxv. 7; xl. 6; x. 7. For the putting on of Christ, see vii.; xii.; xi. 10; xxxiii. 10. On the hope of the believer, see xxix.; v. 2. etc.

These are the ordinary themes that the Odist emphasizes chiefly, and it is difficult to find an Ode in which the above scheme is not explicitly developed. They constitute a kind of spiritual mysticism, of which the Johannine writings and some Pauline doctrines convey a vague but true idea. We cannot find in them any clear implication of sacramentalism, or any special interest in legal observances, either Judaic or Christian; but, as the reader has already surmised, all the forty-two Odes are closely joined together in a series whose keynote is the Johannine theology and experience.

* Or 'set their hope on me.'

The ideal of holiness, of which the Odist is the champion, is so marked in all the Odes that it appears very difficult not to ascribe the whole collection to a single man. It seems, therefore, that the theory of interpolation launched by Harnack has little to commend it. On the contrary, a study of the Syriac text makes it highly probable that all the verses which have been bracketed as Christian interpolations of a Jewish composition are in spirit, thought, and vocabulary so intimately related to the genuine passages that nothing short of identity of authorship can satisfactorily account for them (cf. R. H. Connolly in JThSt xiii. [1912] 298 ff.).

Harnack's hypothesis postulates many things that even a priori are not to be easily admitted. We have seen that the thread of the narrative is unmistakably one throughout the book; to suppose that a second writer changed some verses that savoured of Judaism and gave them a Christian tone, or to believe that he interpolated existing passages with sentences altogether opposed in spirit to those he wished to modify, would imply that this second writer was a consummate artist. He had to conform his thoughts and his phraseology, and sometimes to assimilate even his personality, to that of the Jewish Odist; both writers must have been deeply influenced by the same Johannine atmosphere; and the Christian interpolator must have lived in a milieu not far removed from that of the original Jewish writer. All these are suppositions for which stronger evidence is demanded.

The passages which Harnack considers as Christian interpolations are the following: iii. 9; vii. 4-8, 14, 15, 18; viii. 23-26; ix. 2; x. 4-6, 8; xvii. 10-14, 15; xix.; xxiii. 16, 19; xxiv. 1; xxvii.; xxix. 6-7, 8; xxxi. 3-11; xxxvi. 3; xxxix. 10; xli. 1-7, 11-17; xlii. 1-3, 17-25. We shall examine the last passage (xlii. 17-25), which, according to Harnack, exhibits the most distinct traces of interpolation:

'Sheol saw me and was made miserable: Death cast me up and many along with me; I was gall and bitterness to him, and I went down with him to the utmost of his depths: and the feet and the head he let go, for they were not able to endure my face: and I made a congregation of living men amongst his dead men, and I spake with them by living lips: in order that my word might not be void: and those who had died ran towards me: and they cried and said, Son of God, have pity on us and do with us according to thy kindness, and bring us out from the bonds of darkness: and open to us the door by which we shall come out to thee. For we see that our death has not touched thee. Let us also be redeemed with thee: for thou art our Redeemer.'

Before we compare this passage with other verses of the Odes which exhibit the same idea, it is useful to notice that the Descensus ad inferos which is so clearly represented in these verses is one of the commonest themes of the Syrian writers when speaking of the death of Christ. The breviaries of the two branches of the Syrian Church are full of such ideas, and the Syrian Fathers deal with them in more than one homily. Two citations will suffice for our purpose: 'He bought us and saved us by His precious blood, and He went down to Sheol, and loosed the bonds of death' (Missale juxta Ritum Ecclesiae Syrorum Orientalium, Mosul, 1901, p. 76); 'O Living One who went down to the dwelling of the dead, and who proclaimed good hope to the souls which were bound in Sheol . . . and who by His death rent asunder the tombs and quickened the dead' (Breviarium Chaldaicum, Paris, 1887, vol. ii. p. 370). Then follows on the same page a long hymn in which all the good men of the OT are summoned to rise and look at their Saviour. See, further, the following passages of Syrian authors which would be too long to quote here: Acts of Judas Thomas, ed. W. Wright, London, 1871, pp. 155, 288; S. Ephraemi Syri Hymni et Sermones, ed. T. J. Lam, Malines, 1882-1902, vol. i. p. 145, etc. For Aphrahat, see Patrologia Syriaca, ed. R. Graffin, Paris, 1894, vol. i. col. 524, etc.

Many other verses of the Odes contain indubitable allusions to the idea of Christ loosing bonds and descending into Hades, and, if we try to detach these from their context, the whole structure of the passage breaks down. For instance, Ode xvii.: 'And from thence He gave me the way of His footsteps and I opened the doors that were closed, and brake in pieces the bars of iron; but my iron melted and dissolved before me; nothing appeared closed to me: because I was the door of everything. And I went over all my bondmen to loose them; that I might not leave any man bound or binding: . . . and they were gathered to me and were saved; because they were to me as my own members and I was their Head.' Ode xxii.: 'He who scattered my enemies and my adversaries: He who gave me authority over bonds that I might loose them . . . and thy hand has levelled the way for those who believe in thee: and thou didst choose them from the graves and didst separate them from the dead. Thou didst take dead bones and didst cover them with bodies; they were motionless, and thou didst give (them) energy for life.' See, further, Odes xv., xxv., xxi., x.

The numerous verses of the Odes which contain allusions to the remaining eighteen topics mentioned above exhibit the whole collection as so coherent in its unity that any critic who should seriously try to break it up into different pieces would find himself face to face with strong and sometimes unanswerable objections.

On the other hand, Bernard's theory, while recognizing the perfect unity of the Odes and their Christian character, assigns to them too narrow a scope in restricting them to exclusively baptismal purposes. The nineteen features already mentioned, which, generally speaking, form the essence of the Odes, are cast into a baptismal mould, by means of some coincidences of speech found in the style of Christian Fathers or in the phraseology of baptismal rituals. An example will show the nature of this process. In the first verses of the first Syriac Ode (iii.) we find the following passage: 'I love the Beloved, and my soul loves Him.' To prove that this verse alludes to baptism, a sentence is cited from the book entitled Exposition of Baptism by the Syrian writer Moses Bar Kéfa (9th cent.): 'The betrothals of Rebecca, Rachel, and Zipporah were beside water. So also are the betrothals of the Holy Church beside the waters of Baptism.' Several other alleged coincidences are much nearer the point. For instance, as parallels to the following sentence of the same Ode, 'for he that is joined to Him that is immortal, will also himself become immortal,' a quotation from Clement and another from Ephrem are cited which run thus: 'Being baptized, we are illuminated: illuminated, we become sons; being made sons, we are made perfect; being made perfect, we are made immortal' (Pæd. i. 6); 'Go down to the fountain of Christ, and receive life in your members, as armour against death' (Epiphany Hymns, vii. 17). For many other verses there are even stronger Patristic quotations, but in the opinion of the present writer none of them can be regarded as decisive. On theoretical grounds this hypothesis has to face the following objections.

(1) It is scientifically inexplicable that a book written for baptismal purposes should not so much as name baptism, or even allude with any clearness to immersion, aspersion, or affusion, essential ceremonies of this sacrament. Bernard answers this objection by falling back on the so-called disciplina arcani. But such an argument is a dernier ressort. Why should we extend the 'secret discipline' to the simple practice of washing with water represented in Israelite circles by various ablutions with which the commonest pagan was familiar? How then could Tertullian have written his treatise de Baptismo? The field that this theory gives to the disciplina arcani is probably too extensive to be taken seriously into consideration.

'There is no trace of this "reserve" or disciplina arcani in the writers of the New Testament, who never shun to declare unto us the whole counsel of God. We do not find it either in the subapostolic Fathers; and Justin has no hesitation in fully describing the observance of the Lord's Supper in writing to the heathen emperor. Yet he tells us that Baptism was already called ἁγιασμός (illumination)—the technical term for initiation in the mysteries. Clement speaks of Christianity as a mystery, and uses freely the language of the mysteries in the invitation to the heathen which is the peroration of his Protrepticus' (H. M. Gwatkin, Early Church History, 2 vols., London, 1909, I. 272f.).

(2) We are also unable to subscribe to the possibility of a constant relation between the Odes and the Baptismal Hymns of St. Ephrem. The hymns of this Father, written exclusively for baptism, contain always in their tone allusions which unmistakably refer to this sacrament, while the Odes are devoid of anything that would turn the thought of a reader in this direction.

There are two verses which might seem to point to baptismal practices. Ode xxiv. 1: 'The Dove fluttered over the Christ, because He was her head; and she sang over Him, and her voice was heard.' Ode vi. 17: 'And in water they lived an eternal life.' But it is obvious that the first quotation refers to the baptism of Christ in the same manner as other Odes refer to the mysteries of the Incarnation or of redemption; and we are not entitled to infer from it that either this Ode or the whole collection has any special interest in the ritual of baptism. As to the second quotation, it is possible that it alludes to the grace of God, and by extension, to Christian doctrine, the word 'water' being frequently used in Syriac literature to express this idea. St. Ephrem, speaking of Judas, says: 'He drank living water' (Breviarium Chaldaicum, II. 350). At all events, even if the word 'water' be taken in its material sense, it affords no support for the notion that the forty-two Odes as a whole were written for baptismal purposes.

With regard to the third theory, the only passage that might suggest the work of a Jewish, or, more probably, a Jewish-Christian writer, is the following (Ode iv.): 'No man, O my God, changeth thy holy place; and it is not [possible] that he should change it and put it in another place: because he hath no power over it: for thy sanctuary Thou hast designed before Thou didst make places: that which is the elder shall not be altered by those that are younger than itself.' These sentences seem to allude to the Temple of Solomon, the principal place of worship for Judaism. No other verse points with any clearness to a Judaizing writer; but the above statement is precise, and we cannot wholly ignore it. On the other hand, allusions to Christian mysteries and Christian doctrine in general are, as we shall see, numerous and undoubted, and compel us not to exclude from our mind a Christian author. Our Odes are separate hymns, extolling sometimes special articles of faith, but exhibiting always a high ideal of mysticism. By their outward form they are not linked closely together, and we could invert the order in the MS without doing the slightest injury to the sense. In this respect they resemble their prototype, the canonical Psalms of the prophet king, and there is no internal evidence to prevent us from holding that they are simply an attempt to imitate, in Christian circles, the Davidic Psalms.

3. The original language of the Odes.—The question of the original language of the Odes is very important, because it may furnish a good starting-point for the solution of many problems dealing with the country, the age, and the aim of the whole collection. Critics here again have adopted three different views. The majority (but we ought to say at once that some of them are not good Semitic scholars) hold to a Greek original. A second opinion, represented by Grimme, favours Hebrew, this theory being essential to the establishing of a Jewish authorship. The present writer has ventured to suggest that Aramaic may have been the language in which they were originally written.*

Before we discuss this tangled question, a preliminary remark will not be out of place. After the invasion of Palestine, Syria, and neighbouring countries by the Hellenic troops, under the leadership of Alexander, the Greek language acquired a firm footing in these countries, and from the time of the Seleucids onwards it began to supersede, in great centres, the Canaanitish and Aramaic dialects which were doomed to disappear. Thousands of Greek words were introduced into Aramaic, which had come to be the vernacular of all the Semitic tribes, inclusive of the remnants of the once prosperous people of Jahweh. The ordinary population spoke Aramaic, and the sacred national documents were written also in Aramaic, but the official decrees and the general regulations of the State were worded, at least at the beginning of the Christian era, in Greek. This fact is not surprising; Hellenic culture had, with the glorious arms of the Macedonian hegemony, conquered the old civilized world, and in Rome itself it was considered an honour to speak the language of Homer. The Aramæans were far more influenced by this current than any other Semitic people, and distinct traces of Hellenism are frequent in books originally written in Aramaic, or directly translated from the Hebrew. The OT Peshitta is an irrefragable testimony to this assertion, and the literary compositions of Aphrahat and Ephrem, in which Greek words and Greek expressions are counted by hundreds, would not tend to weaken it. The instance of these two writers, who could not even understand Greek, may easily be extended to scores of poems and historical lucubrations, of which Edessa and the neighbouring countries are justly proud. But in this matter there is a difference between the style of a writer who knew Greek and that of one who did not. How deep, for instance, is the gap between the stylistic method adopted by Ephrem in his hymns, and that used by Narsai in his homilies. As concerns the style of the Odes, we may assume that it is not moulded on that of Ephrem, but it would be precarious to assert that it is completely foreign to that of Narsai, or of Bardesanes. The only conclusion that we can safely draw from the arguments of some critics for a Greek original of the Odes, is that their problematic author was a man of good Hellenic culture; and, as a matter of fact, in Syria and in Palestine, from the 1st to the 8th cent., the writers were few who were without any Hellenic culture.

We may open our discussion with an examination of Grimme's theory of a Hebrew original. In spite of the excellence of his Hebrew translation of the Syriac text, we are unable to discern any strong philological foundations for his view. His argument is two-fold. He tries, first of all, to find in the Odes an acrostic arrangement of their reconstructed text, which should suggest a dependence of the Syriac upon the supposed Hebrew.

* 'Quelques mots sur les odes de Salomon,' in ZNTW xiv. [1914] 234 ff.

Here is the order of this complicated acrostic system: Ode i. begins with \aleph ; Ode ii. and the beginning of Ode iii. are missing. Odes iv. and v. have again \aleph ; Odes vi. and vii. have a β ; Odes viii., ix. 1; Odes x., xi., xii., xliii., xiv. a γ ; Odes xv., xvi., xvii. a δ ; Ode xviii. a η ; Odes xix., xx., xxi. a ζ ; Odes xxii., xxiii. a θ ; Odes xxiv., xxv., xxvi. a ι ; Ode xxvii. a σ ; Ode xxviii. a κ ; Ode xxix. a λ ; Odes xxx., xxxi., xxxii., xxxiii. a μ ; Ode xxxiv. an \aleph ; Ode xxxv. a γ ; Ode xxxvi. a β ; Ode xxxvii. a δ ; Ode xxxviii. a ν ; Ode xxxix. a β ; Ode xl. a κ ; Ode xli. a ν ; Ode xlii. a δ .

The reader will readily observe that, despite the good will of the editor, this alphabetical arrangement is very defective, and we cannot rely upon it for critical purposes. If in the future other scholars should undertake, with better success, a Hebrew translation which would exhibit this acrostic system in a more constant manner, then the same method might be applied to the Aramaic language generally. Moreover, this acrostic arrangement is much in use in Syriac literature; several hymns of Ephrem, all the poems called soghiathas, and innumerable other literary compositions, exhibit such an acrostic system (cf. Brev. Chald. vols. i., ii., iii. pp. 35, 185, 195 f.; A. Mingana, Narsai Homilies et Carmina, Mosul, 1905, vol. ii. ad fin.); the idea might have been suggested to Aramaean writers from some poems of the OT which exhibit this strophic arrangement, but the work of these Aramaeans is independent of a Hebrew text, and does not involve a Hebrew original.

Grimme's second argument is more scientific. He brings forward a number of morphological and syntactical features which, according to him, point to an original Hebrew text. It would take too long to examine in detail every word that he quotes to corroborate his opinion, but we may be allowed to say that none of the 35 instances that he gives carries conviction. He emphasizes, and very justly, the fact of the double meanings of some Hebrew words, in order to deduce from them the explanation of some grammatical and lexicological difficulties of the Syriac text, but we shall wait until more convincing proofs are given to Syriac scholars. But, although Grimme's theory is certainly not in all points invulnerable, it has opened the way for further investigation in the domain of the general Semitic stock.

Those in favour of a Syriac original support their view by the following proofs.

(1) There is a constant relation between the style of the Odes and Syriac hymnology in general. Syrian and Arab writers are fond of repeating the same word several times in one sentence, to make it and the principal idea expressed by it more emphatic. Confining ourselves to Syriac literature, we may see, for instance, how the word meaning 'star' is repeated seven times by Ephrem in two lines of a hymn which is preserved in Brev. Chald. (vol. i. p. 338); the word meaning 'man' and the verb meaning 'to eat' are repeated four and three times respectively in one line of a homily of Narsai (the present writer's edition, vol. i. p. 21). When we examine the Odes, we find that this characteristic note occurs more than once in the text. Ode xxxviii. repeats the word meaning 'to corrupt' five times in one short verse; the verb meaning 'to impede' is repeated three times in another verse of Ode vi., etc.

(2) There is a constant use by the writer of the mimmed infinitive, or of the noun of action derived from the verb immediately following this verb, to give energy to the sentence, e.g., 'the error erred' (Ode xxxi.), 'the truth flowed as a flow of water' (Ode xii.). There are in all 24 verses in which this linguistic phenomenon is represented, and if some of them may be explained by the too pronounced freedom of the translator, as is sometimes the case in books translated from the Greek, it is highly uncritical to suppose that all of them are a play of words invented by the translator.

(3) There are some words which seem to point in an indubitable manner to an Aramaeo-Syriac original. Ode xix. contains the following remarkable passage: 'She did not require a midwife, because Himself facilitated her pains.' The word 'midwife' (in Syriac, 'the living,' the 'giver of life') is derived from the verb which comes just after it: 'He facilitated her pains' (in Syriac, 'He gave life'). This curious derivation would have been impossible in any other language than Aramaic. This sentence, in the absence of any adequate objection, is decisive.

The supporters of a Greek original point to certain incidences of speech of which the following are the most striking.

(1) There are some Syriac words which, in their present context, do not explain or amplify the idea that the Odist had in mind. Three principal instances are given in proof of this assertion. In Ode vii. the expression 'by His simplicity' would be used to translate the phrase $\epsilon\nu\ \tau\eta\ \alpha\pi\lambda\omicron\tau\eta\tau\iota\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon$. In Ode xxxiv. the sentence 'No way is hard where there is a simple heart, nor is there any wound in right thoughts' would contain the Greek words $\alpha\pi\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ for 'simple' and $\epsilon\kappa\pi\lambda\eta\zeta\iota\varsigma$ for 'wound'; the expression 'in the midst' in Ode xxx., 'and until it (the spring of water) was given in the midst, (they did not recognize it),' would be also a translation of a Greek $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\delta\ \mu\acute{\epsilon}\sigma\sigma\omicron\nu\ \tau\iota\theta\epsilon\iota\tau\alpha\iota$, because such an expression, it is said, is not Semitic.

(2) Great stress is laid on the use of the privative alpha. It is suggested that almost all the words beginning in Syriac with the negative particle are a translation from the Greek. The Syriac expression meaning 'without grudging,' 'abundantly,' which is employed several times in the Odes (cf. Ode xi.), would be the Greek $\alpha\phi\theta\acute{\omicron}\nu\omega\varsigma$; the word 'indescribable' in the sentence 'the swiftness of the Word is indescribable' would be a translation of $\alpha\iota\epsilon\kappa\delta\iota\eta\gamma\eta\tau\omicron\varsigma$. We must remark, however, that the first expression is found twice in the Book of the Laws of Countries of Bardesanes, which is surely a genuine Syriac composition.

We do not wish to dwell on some other Hellenic features discovered in the book of the Odes, such as the concept of 'taking refuge,' which is the real meaning in the first verse of Ode xxv., while the Syriac verb suggests only the idea of 'fleeing'; likewise the argument taken from the employment of the possessive particle, which is used eight times only in all the Odes, does not seem to be convincing. Cf. on this question the article of Connolly in JThSt xiv. [1913] 530, and that of D. Willey, ib. p. 293 ff.; and cf. it with our study referred to above.

Finally, on account of the remarkable variants which sometimes differentiate the Syriac and the Coptic versions from one another, the supporters of a Greek original need also to resort to the hypothesis of two different Greek texts, one underlying the Coptic version preserved in Pistis Sophia, and another underlying the Syriac version of our MSS. This is a fact worthy of study; and, so far as we are aware, no sufficient explanation of it has been given. On the other hand, as Harris has rightly pointed out, a sacred book entitled $\Psi\alpha\lambda\mu\omicron\iota\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \Omega\delta\alpha\iota\ \Sigma\omicron\lambda\omicron\mu\acute{\omega}\nu\tau\omicron\varsigma$ is mentioned by pseudo-Athanasius, and in the Stichometry of Nicephorus (9th cent.). On the hypothesis that this title refers to our Syriac Odes, it is almost certain that a Greek version was in circulation several centuries before the time of these ecclesiastical writers.

4. Their relation to the Bible.—Though the main ideas that the Odists express are drawn from figures used in the Old and New Testaments, no direct quotation from a sacred book can be clearly pointed out; it would almost seem that the author had made up his mind not to use quotations. A list of the principal semi-quotations, or, as Wellhausen calls them, 'Biblisms,' will be found below.

The title itself, 'Odes of Solomon,' brings the whole collection, at least in the mind of the copyists and of some ecclesiastical writers, such as Lactantius, into relation with the Bible. The last-named writer seems to have believed the Odes to be as canonical and authoritative for Christian doctrine as the Davidic Psalter. No sufficient explanation has yet been given of their attribution to Solomon, in preference to all other sacred writers. The question is not in itself very important; but, if it were cleared up, the problem might prove not to be devoid of interest with regard to many obscure points arising from this precious discovery.

Critics have generally fallen back, in this matter, on the statement of 1 K 4³², in which we are informed that Solomon wrote 1005 odes. Solomon was known to have written odes, and our actual Odes, by a natural course of events, readily assumed his name. This assumed Solomonic authorship would account, as F. C. Burkitt (JThSt xiii.) has pointed out, for the obstinate silence that the anonymous writer maintains with regard to some elementary Christian practices and his avoidance of any clear prophetic or evangelical quotations.

All this is pure speculation; the important point is that no proper biblical name and no direct biblical quotations are to be noticed in the Odes, though their nucleus mainly consists of biblical elements. On this subject the most striking semi-quotations are the following:

Ode v. 8: 'For they have devised a counsel, and it did not succeed' (cf. Ps 21¹¹).

Ode xxvi. 11: 'Who is able to interpret the wonders of the Lord?' (cf. Ps 106²).

Ode xxix. 10: 'Like the stubble which the wind carries away' (cf. Ps 14¹).

Ode xxix. 1: 'The Lord is my hope: in Him I shall not be confounded' (cf. Ps 71¹).

Ode xiv. 1: 'As the eyes of a son to his father, so are my eyes, O Lord, at all times towards thee' (cf. Ps 123²).

Ode xvii. 8: 'I opened the doors that were closed, and brake in pieces the bars of iron' (cf. Is 45², Ps 107¹⁶).

Ode xxii. 9: 'Thou didst take dead bones and didst cover them with bodies; they were motionless, and thou didst give them (energy) for life' (cf. Ezk 37¹⁻¹¹).

Ode xxii. 12: 'That the foundation for everything might be thy Rock: and on it thou didst build thy Kingdom' (cf. Mt 16¹⁸).

Ode xxix. 8: 'That I might subdue the imaginations of the peoples; and the power of the men of might to bring them low' (cf. Lk 15^{1, 32}).

Ode iii. 3: 'I should not have known how to love the Lord, if He had not loved me' (cf. 1 Jn 4¹⁹).

Ode xvi. 20: 'The worlds were made by His word' (cf. Jn 1³).

See, further, Ode xli. 16, and cf. 1 P 1²⁰; Ode xii. 5, and cf. He 4¹²; Ode xxiii. 17, and cf. He 12¹; Ode iv. 12, and cf. Ro 11²⁹; Ode xxxi. 4, 5, and cf. Jn 17¹¹; Ode xxi. 1, and cf. Lk 16⁷⁻⁸; Ode vi. 7, and cf. Ezk 47¹; Ode xxviii. 11, and cf. Ps 22¹⁶; Ode xlii. 10, and Mt 11²⁹, etc.

5. Probable date of their composition.—It is very difficult to fix a precise date for the composition of the Odes. The absence from them of definite historical data gives critics some 130 years within which to exercise their historical and geographical skill. The Odes are merely devotional hymns, and safe criteria found in hymns of this kind for the fixing and delimitation of a definite period of time are naturally scanty, and those that are available do not generally justify a categorical conclusion. If we exclude Harnack's theory of interpolation, and assume that the Odes are either wholly Christian or else Judæo-Christian, they would fall within the period A.D. 80-210. The point of divergence amongst critics is how near to the earlier or to the later date they seem likely to belong.

Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 12) has the following clear quotation from Ode xix.: 'Salomon [in ode undevicesima] ita dicit: Infirmatus est uterus virginis et accepit fetum et gravata est, et facta est in multa miseratione mater virgo.' This important quotation, noted by Harris, shows that before 310 (see H. J. Laylor, 'Notes on Lactantius,' in Hermathena, xxix. [1903] 459) not only was the existence of the Odes known to Lactantius, but at his time, at least in the district of Nicomedia, they even had the same order as that exhibited by our MSS. The citation does not appear to be due to hearsay, but to be drawn from a book before the writer. From it we cannot positively prove that a Latin version of the Odes was current in Western Churches, but we are not at liberty to assume the contrary.

Between 250 and 295 larger quotations from the Odes are found in the Gnostic book called Pistis Sophia, which contains five complete Odes of the collection, as we have stated above. It is, on the whole, difficult to ascertain the inter-connexion between the Coptic and the Syriac texts; but the present writer thinks that, apart from a short verse that seems to be lost in Syriac, there is a certain literary ascendancy which establishes the superiority of this last version over the Coptic. The words which have disappeared from the Syriac text come in the middle of v. 8 of Ode v.: 'And they are overcome, although they are powerful.' The lack of some words due to the carelessness of copyists cannot a priori point to the dependence of one composition upon another. On the contrary, the Coptic is generally inferior to the Syriac, and seems to be a translation of it; e.g. Ode vi. 9 says: 'And the restraints of men could not restrain it, nor the arts of those who restrain water.' The repetition of the verb is, as we have seen, in accordance with the usage of Syriac and Arabic poetry; the Coptic substituted 'loca ædificata' for the word 'restraints.' This curious variant could not have occurred if the Coptic translator was not translating from a language in which these words resemble each other in writing; and this language is Syriac.

The existence of these five Odes in the Gnostic book involves their priority to it by several years; and consequently it becomes almost certain that they cannot be ascribed to a period later than the first quarter of the 3rd century. We may, therefore, assume as highly probable that the extreme limits of our whole collection are, as stated above, A.D. 80-210. Of these 130 years, it is historically impossible, in the present state of our knowledge, to fix upon a definite date, and no probable hypothesis has so far been put forward. We shall set forth briefly the reasons which suggest a date nearer to 80, and those which appear to postulate one not far from the end of the 2nd or the beginning of the 3rd century.

We have already quoted the sentence of Ode iv. which declares that the sanctuary of God cannot be changed. If this sentence is to be taken literally, it may perhaps suggest by its vividness that the author wrote at a time not far removed from the destruction of the Temple.

We have elsewhere (in our study referred to above) pointed to two incidents which would perhaps require a date earlier than the end of the 2nd century. There are, we have said, nine semi-quotations from the canonical Psalter, whose wording differs from that used in the Odes. The author, or, in the case of a Greek original, the translator, ought reasonably to have employed the same words as those found in a previous sacred book known, read, and generally learnt by heart by every Eastern Christian. If this argument may claim a certain plausibility, it can also be used in favour of an Aramaic original of the Odes. We cannot, indeed, discover any good reason why this Syrian writer or translator did not employ the words used in the OT Peshitta, if he knew them, and we cannot reasonably suppose that he did not know them if he was writing long after the end of the 2nd century.

We have also noticed that the Johannine concept of the 'word' is rendered five times by the term petghâma, which means 'word' in concreto, instead of melltha, which is used in all the Syriac versions of the NT, and which means 'word' in abstracto. A good acquaintance on the part of the Odist with Johannine Syriac writings would have prevented his using frequently such an inadequate word.

Mrs. M. D. Gibson has called our attention (Athenæum, April, 1914, p. 530) to the fact that several Church historians, notably Theodore of Mopsuestia, report that in the Apostolic Age there were people who wrote 'Odes' and 'Psalms' like the 'blessed David.'

Some supporters of the hypothesis of the later date (i.e. A.D. 210) would attribute the whole collection of the Odes to the famous Bardesanes of Edessa (154-222), who played so important a rôle in the history of the Church. The grounds of this hypothesis may be summarized as follows. On the one hand, it is historically established that Bardesanes wrote 150 psalms in imitation of those contained in the canonical Psalter; on the other hand, the presence of these odes in the Pistis Sophia would suggest that their author was, at least in the mind of the Gnostic writer of this last book, imbued with Gnostic ideas, otherwise he would not have had sufficient reason to quote them; and, since Bardesanes is represented by some Fathers of the Church as inclining towards Gnosticism, he might very easily have been their first writer. The existence of a Greek savour in the style of the Odes would easily be explained by the good Hellenic culture that this Mesopotamian writer had received.

There are some linguistic features which tend to corroborate Bardesanes' authorship. The expression which means 'without grudging,' very seldom used by other Aramaean writers but found twice in the Book of the Laws of Countries, would lend a certain amount of plausibility to this hypothesis; and the frequent occurrence in the Odes of the Semitic phenomenon of a noun of action or a mimmed infinitive placed immediately before or after its respective verb, is also a favourite stylistic method of the semi-Gnostic Christian writer, whose orthodoxy is very doubtful.

Finally, if, as Bernard remarks (op. cit. p. 42), the allusions which abound in the Odes are always to beliefs and practices current in the East, and if they have little affinity with Western doctrine or Western ceremonial, their attribution to an Eastern writer would indeed account for many difficulties otherwise insoluble. So the present writer has tried elsewhere (op. cit. supra) to show that the puzzling Ode xxiii., which deals with a mysterious letter descending from heaven, contains in its phrasology a clear reference to the mystery of the Incarnation, which, according to the ecclesiastical books of the Syrian Church, was accomplished by means of a letter confided to the archangel Gabriel.

6. Their Christian doctrine and orthodoxy.—The doctrine of the Trinity is clearly expressed in the Odes. Ode xix. 2: 'The Son is the cup, and He who was milked is the Father; and the Holy Spirit milked Him' (see also Ode xxiii. 20).

The belief in God the Father as Creator is also emphasized. Ode iv. 14: 'Thou, O God, hast made all things'; vii. 28: 'He hath given a mouth to His creation'; ix. 4: 'Be enriched in God the Father.'

The Odist's doctrine of the Son is as follows. xli. 14, 29: 'The Son of the Most High appeared in the perfection of His Father; and light dawned from the Word that was beforetime in Him; the Christ is truly one; and He was known before the foundation of the world.' He is 'the Lord Messiah' (xvii. 14), 'our Lord Christ' (xxxix. 10), 'the Lord's Christ' (xxix. 6). 'We live in the Lord' (xli. 3). He was born of a virgin (xix. 6). 'He became like me, in order that I might receive Him' (vii. 5). The Crucifixion is perhaps alluded to in xlii. 3: 'The outspread wood which was set up on the way of the Righteous One' (see also xxvii. 3). The gall and vinegar of the Passion are mentioned in xlii. 17: 'I was gall and bitterness to him.' The purpose of the humiliation of the Son was 'that I might redeem my people' (xxxi. 11).

The Holy Spirit frequently underlies the thoughts of the writer (xi. 2): 'for the Most High circumcised me by His Holy Spirit and revealed my reins towards Him' (see also xiv. 8, xxviii. 2, xxxvi. 1).

The believer has immortality in his soul (iii. 10): 'for he that is joined to Him that is immortal, will also himself become immortal' (see also ix. 3).

On the other hand, there are many Christian topics about which the Odist maintains a deep and astonishing silence. There is no mention of sin, repentance, forgiveness, or the resurrection of the body. Sacramentalism is generally absent; it is only by forcing the context that one verse may be referred to the Eucharist; but the notion of priesthood and sacrifices is expressed in some verses already quoted.

Strictly speaking, Gnosticism has no strong support in the Odes. Ode xii., singled out as containing some Gnostic technicalities, savours probably but little of such aberrations. On the other hand, there are sentences which seem to betray slight tendencies towards Docetism. Ode xxviii. 14f.: 'And I did not perish, for I was not their brother nor was my birth like theirs, and they sought for my death and did not find it'; vii. 6: 'He was reckoned like myself in order that I might put Him on'; xix. 8: 'She brought forth, as it were a man, by the will [of God].'

LITERATURE.—This is indicated in the course of the article.

A. MINGANA.

OFFENCE.—The English word 'offence' is derived from the Lat. offendere, 'to strike against' or 'to injure' (O.Fr. offens, Fr. offense), and is employed to translate various Heb. and Gr. nouns, in the sense of an injury, a trespass or a fall, or as an occasion of unbelief, doubt, or apostasy. The chief Heb. words in the OT are the verb עָוָה, which has the meaning of 'to trespass' or 'to be guilty,' and the noun עָוֹן, in the well-known passages Is 8¹⁴ and 57¹⁴, translated as 'a stone of stumbling,' 'a stumbling-block.' The other terms are generally synonyms of error and sin.

The most important NT words are παράπτωμα and σκανδαλον. The former is used with respect to a moral fall, 'a falling beside,' and thus completes the conception of sin (ἀμαρτία, 'missing the mark') by that of falling short or falling aside. The one is a loss of aim, the other the perversion of aim or culpable error. As transgression, it is found in Ro 4²⁵ 5¹⁵ b16. 16. 17. 18. 20, where 'offence' in the AV is rendered 'trespass' in the RV. πρόσκομμα is found only in Ro 14²⁰, signifying 'something to strike against': a man runs, as it were, against an obstacle, and does wrong when he eats contrary to the dictates of his conscience. In 2 Co 6³ προσκοπή is that which causes stumbling, and the Christians are enjoined to place no stumbling-block in the way of others. As an adjective, ἀπροσκοπος is used in Ac 24¹⁶ with respect to the conscience, also in 1 Co 10³² and in Ph 1¹⁰ as giving no occasion of stumbling.

The word σκάδαλον (verb, σκανδαλίζω) is frequently brought into use especially in Matthew. It signifies a bait or stick in a trap and generally anything which causes a person to be entrapped or to fall. It is a modified form of the classic σκανδαλίζω. Sometimes it is used in reference to persons, who may become stumbling-blocks to others. When Christ called St. Peter a stumbling-block, He evidently recognized in His disciple's remonstrance the agency of the arch-enemy (Σατανά) who was tempting Him to do what was contrary to the will of God (Mt 16²³). Isaiah's description of 'the stone of stumbling' and 'the rock of offence' (Is 8¹⁴) is applied by St. Paul to Christ (Ro 9³³) because the lowliness of His origin and of His earthly surroundings as well as the deeply spiritual character of His ministry offended the religious leaders of His day (Mt 13⁵⁷). The rejection of His claims by the Pharisees was attended by some irritation and the spirit of opposition (15¹²): thus they were offended or caused to stumble. This was later accentuated by the 'scandal of the Cross,' which, when not accepted in faith as the symbol of the Divine redemption, became a stumbling-block. Its disgrace and ignominy made it difficult for the Jews to accept Christ as their Messiah, and it also roused their animosity to the preachers of the gospel (Gal 5¹⁴). They expected a Messiah who should restore their political freedom and re-establish the kingdom in material success and splendour, and our Lord's ministry being essentially spiritual made Him to be a stumbling-block to them. The fault was in their lack of faith and spiritual insight; but, on the other hand, Christ's followers are to be on their guard against giving occasion to others to stumble through their own selfishness or folly. Thus the term σκάδαλον is employed in reference to actions or habits which might prove to be a stumbling-block to those who are weak or inexperienced. To cause Christ's little ones to stumble or to fall is severely condemned (Mt 18⁶). The casuistry concerning meats offered to idols should involve the consideration of the hyper-sensitive consciences of the weaker brethren, who are not to be offended or made to stumble by those who are less scrupulous (Ro 14. 15¹⁻²). In all such cases the exhilarating and newly-found consciousness of liberty is to be controlled by love.

Clement of Rome uses the word παράπτωσις in combination with danger, in the sense of a fault incurred through disobedience to the counsels of the Fathers (Cor. 59). Ignatius, whilst not employing the word 'offence,' warns the believers against the snares of the devil and against giving occasion to the heathen to triumph, and thus bringing discredit upon the whole body of believers through the folly of the few (Ep. ad Trall. 8). If love be the ruling principle of Christian morals, there is no σκάδαλον, for love removes rather than creates difficulties.

LITERATURE.—Artt. 'Offence' in HDB and in DCG; Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans,' 1902, p. 390; F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter, I. 1-II. 17, 1893, p. 121; F. W. Robertson, Sermons, new ed., 1876, 3rd ser., xvi.; J. Moffatt, 'Jesus upon "Stumbling-blocks,"' in Expt xxvi. (1914-15) 407 ff.

J. G. JAMES.

OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

OFFICER.—In the only passages in which this word occurs in the apostolic writings (Ac 5²²⁻²⁸), it stands for the Gr. υπηρέτης, and denotes an official of the Sanhedrin sent to bring the apostles before the Court. These officials appear to have been under the command of the captain of the Temple (v. 26).
G. WAUCHOPE STEWART.

OIL (ἔλαιον, from ἐλαία, 'olive-tree').—As the Greek name implies, the common oil of Scripture is olive oil. It is obtained from the ripe olive berries by crushing and pressure, aided sometimes by the use of hot water, and is used for food, light, soap-making, and for anointing the hair and the skin. In Rev 6⁶ 'the oil and the wine' refer to the growing crops of olives and grapes. In 18¹³ oil appears in the list of the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon.

The remaining references to oil in the apostolic writings illustrate two special purposes for which it was employed.

1. Ceremonial.—The olive oil used in the consecration of priests and kings by anointing was compounded with various perfumed ingredients (Ex 30²³⁻²⁵). In this use of oil we have the basis of a number of figurative passages.

(a) In He 1⁹ (= Ps 45⁷) 'the oil of gladness' suggests the honour that has been bestowed on the Exalted Christ. Elsewhere there is more distinct reference to His royal position as the Messiah or Anointed One, and to the Holy Spirit as the means of His consecration to this office (Ac 10³⁸; cf. 4²⁷).

(b) The Holy Spirit given to Christians is represented as an anointing oil. The context shows that this is the meaning of 2 Co 1²¹. The same is true of the 'anointing' of 1 Jn 2²⁰ (AV 'unction')²⁷.

2. Medicinal.—With this must be connected in some sense the much-discussed passage (Ja 5¹⁴) where the elders of the Church are directed to pray over the sick brother, 'anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.' The general use of oil in ancient times as a remedy for disease and injury is illustrated in Is 1⁶, Lk 10³⁴. The treatment applied to Herod the Great during his last illness (Jos. Ant. xvii. vi. 5, BJ i. xxxiii. 5) is a well-known case in point. That the practice was associated from early times with a belief in magic is shown by S. Daiches (Babylonian Oil Magic in the Talmud and in the later Jewish Literature, 1913). The exact bearing of such facts on Ja 5¹⁴ must remain obscure, but it is interesting to observe that the procedure here enjoined was anticipated by the Twelve (Mk 6¹³), though without any express injunction from Jesus. One thing is clear, viz. that in James the healing of the sick is ascribed directly to 'the prayer of faith' (v. 15) and not to the anointing. The latter must be regarded as quite subsidiary, originating probably in compliance with custom, yet dissociated from superstition, since it is done 'in the name of the Lord,' and serving perhaps as a kind of sacramental help to faith. 'It is easier to believe when visible means are used than when nothing is visible, and it is still easier to believe when the visible means appear to be likely to contribute to the desired effect' (Plummer, St. James and St. Jude, p. 327).

There are few traces of observance of such a rite in the early Church, though the Emperor Septimius Severus believed himself to have been cured by oil administered by a Christian (Tertullian, ad Scap. 4). But from the 6th cent. onwards the practice was regularly established, and had different developments in the East and in the West. In the latter it was finally transformed into the sacrament of Extreme Unction, of which it need only be said that it is administered when recovery is supposed to be hopeless, whereas in James the anointing is expected to be followed by a cure. After the Reformation we find that the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. (1549) provides for the NT ceremony, 'if the sicke person desyre to be annoynted.' In the Prayer Book of 1552 this provision disappears. There has been a revival of the practice in certain Anglican circles in recent times (see F. W. Puller, The Anointing of the Sick in Scripture and Tradition, 1904).

LITERATURE.—On the medicinal use see the Commentaries on James of A. Plummer (Expositor's Bible, 1891), R. J. Knowling (Westminster Comm., 1904), and J. B. Mayor (1910).

JAMES PATRICK.

OINTMENT (μύρον). — Perfumes for the toilet were extensively used in ancient as well as in modern times. The modern methods of extraction and preparation, however, were unknown, and the principal form of these luxuries was that of perfumed oils and pomades. The basis of the former was olive oil or some similar vegetable oil (e.g. oil of nuts or almonds), to which were added the fragrant volatile oils obtained from various flowers and plants. Of the scented ingredients the finest and most expensive came from the East, and the oleum nardinum, made from the flowers of Indian or Arabian nard-grass, was especially prized among the Romans. Unguents of this type were liquid or semi-liquid, rather than of the consistency suggested by the modern use of the word 'ointment,' and were kept in bottles of precious metal or stone. The alabastron was of the latter material, and was a small cylindrical vessel narrowing at the neck in order that the contents might drip out gradually. The pomades, on the other hand, had fine fat for their basis. These various ointments were used for anointing the body, especially after bathing, for dressing the hair and beard, for perfuming the dress, and even for scenting the water of the bath. In the public baths at Rome there were special apartments (unctoria) where the unguents were applied. Pliny (HN xiii. 1ff.) comments on the prevalence of this form of luxury in the society of his time. Cicero (in Cat. ii. 3) says that the elleminate companions of Catiline 'shine with ointments' ('nitent unguentis').

In Rev 18³ 'ointment' (so RV; AV 'ointments') appears in the list of the luxurious merchandise of 'Babylon' (i.e. Rome), and the foregoing particulars illustrate the aptness of the reference.

The 'eyesalve' of 3¹⁸, though used in conjunction with the verb ἐχχπειν ('anoint') does not belong to the class of ordinary unguents. The Gr. word is κολλούριον or κολλύριον (dim. from κολλύρα). The collyra was a sort of elongated bun, and the collyrium was a medicated preparation of similar shape, used for rubbing on tender eyelids or other affected parts (Celsus, v. xxviii. 12; Horace, Sat. i. v. 30; Pliny, HN xxxv. 53).

LITERATURE.—W. A. Becker, *Gallus*⁹, 1888, p. 378; E. Guhl-W. Koner, *Das Leben der Griechen und Römer*⁹, 1873, Eng. tr., 1889, pp. 150, 398, 492, 508.

JAMES PATRICK.

OLD TESTAMENT.—1. The Old Testament in the primitive Church.—By the opening of the Christian era the limits of the OT Canon had been practically fixed, and a high doctrine of its inspiration developed within the Jewish Church. The real Author of the books embraced within the Canon was God Himself; and, charged as they were with His Spirit, they were holy as He was, and 'defiled the hands' of those who touched them. The OT Scriptures were thus the final norm of faith and conduct, and an appeal to their authority was decisive (see art. SCRIPTURE). The early generation of Christians inherited this tradition. As children of the household of Israel, they grew up in the atmosphere of the OT revelation; and, even when they passed to the fuller life in Christ, they carried with them their reverence for the ancient Scriptures. No need for a distinctively Christian literature was yet felt. The books of the OT were the 'oracles of God,' which enshrined the Divine rule of life, not for the Fathers only, but for those also who had been called and redeemed in Christ. Being read mainly in the Greek or Aramaic versions, and interpreted, with the freedom characteristic of the age, as a collection of independent 'prophecies' or 'predictions' of things to come, they were easily made to cover the great facts associated with Christ's teaching, personality, and work. In this light they were regarded also as a sufficient guide to Christian conduct.

The clearest reflexion of this simple attitude towards the OT is found in the apostolic preaching in Acts. The theme of all the utterances found there is the salvation won through Christ's death and resurrection. But the burden of proof rests on the authority of the Scriptures, as represented by the LXX. Christ Himself is the Prophet whose coming was heralded by Moses (3²² 7⁷), and His death is the 'fulfilling' of 'the things which God foreshewed by the mouth of all the prophets' (3¹⁸). To Him the mysterious prophecy of the Suffering Servant of Is 53 is directly applied (8³²). His resurrection, likewise, is that which was 'foreseen' by David in his protest against God's 'Holy One' seeing corruption (2²⁶), and points forward to the final restoration of all things 'whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began' (3²¹). The outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost is equally the fulfilment of Joel's glorious vision of the latter days (2¹⁶), while the persecution that followed the first triumphs of the gospel marks the rage of kings and nations against the Lord and His Anointed, as foretold 'by the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of our father David thy servant' (4²⁵). Even the tragedy of Judas' end is the immediate working out of the curse denounced in Ps 69³ against the enemies of the righteous (1²⁰).

2. The Old Testament and the conflict for spiritual freedom.—So long as the preaching of the gospel was confined to Jews, the new wine was easily kept within the old bottles. But a conflict was inevitable when the wine began to ferment, and the freedom of the faith to assert itself against Jewish limitations. This conflict is already foreshadowed in St. Stephen's preaching; but it became acute only with the conversion and world-wide ministry of St. Paul.

The Apostle to the Gentiles was a Pharisee 'of the strictest sect,' brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and thus imbued not merely with a deep reverence and love for the Scriptures, but also with the Rabbinic method of expounding them, in entire independence of their historical setting and significance, as a store-house of separate 'oracles,' the manifold sense of which (literal, allegorical, rational, and mystical) was to be deduced by the interpreter's own insight, logical acumen, or fancy, according to the rules laid down by representative Rabbis. His love for the 'sacred writings' St. Paul naturally brought with him into the service of Christ. His sermons and Epistles are steeped in the language of the OT, and proof-texts are abundantly used to point the edge of an argument, or to emphasize his counsels for Christian life (see art. QUOTATIONS). Like his Jewish teachers, the Apostle continued to read the Scriptures as a body of independent 'words,' each charged with a life and force of its own. He is usually indifferent to the exact exegesis of his texts, following the LXX even when its rendering is faulty, though occasionally he does appear to cite from the original Hebrew. In other directions he claims a wide freedom in his reproduction and application of texts. Nor has he shaken himself quite clear of Rabbinic subtleties. Thus the narrowing of Abraham's 'seed' to Christ (Gal 3¹⁶) is a thoroughly characteristic example of the verbal exegesis of the Rabbis. The allegory of Sarah and Hagar, the freewoman and the handmaid (Gal 4¹⁻¹²), and the extracting of a hidden personal principle from the humane law of the unmuzzled ox (1 Co 9⁹, 1 Ti 5¹³), illustrate the 'manifold sense' read into the letter of Scripture; while the bold way in which he transfers to Gentile Christians the promises made to Israel (Ro 9⁸), and finds in the Deuteronomist's great thought of the nearness of the Law suggestions of Christ's descent to earth and His rising from the dead (Ro 10⁶), or in the 'strange tongues' of Is 28¹¹ a forecast of Christian 'tongues' (1 Co 14²¹), betrays the unrestrained liberty of interpretation exercised by the Jewish exegete. It is remarkable, however, that the Apostle is so little influenced by Rabbinic methods. Apart from these few survivals from a dead past, which touch only the periphery of his thought, there is nothing in his Epistles that reminds us of the arbitrary and highly extravagant exegetical results of his Jewish contemporaries. So deeply has he entered into the spirit of his Master that his whole treatment of the OT is marked by a sanity and sobriety of mind, enriched with a breadth, sympathy, and penetrating insight surpassed only by Christ.

In his preaching to the Jews St. Paul follows the practice of the earlier apostles, though with a new fullness and range. 'He reasoned with them from the scriptures, opening and alleging, that it behoved the Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead' (Ac 17²; cf. 23²⁸). Thus in his speech at Antioch he sets forth Jesus as the Saviour of David's seed brought unto Israel 'according to the promise,' whose condemnation and death at the hands of the people and rulers of Jerusalem were the fulfilment of the words of the prophets 'which are read every sabbath,' and His resurrection the bringing to pass of 'the holy and sure blessings of David,' as promised in Psalms 2 and 8 (Ac 13²⁷). In his Epistles, too, he cites OT texts as direct predictions of the gospel. The new faith of which he was called to be an Apostle is 'the gospel of God, which he promised afore by his prophets in the holy scriptures' (Ro 1¹; cf. 3²¹). Christ both died and rose again 'according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15³), while proof-texts are adduced for the promise of the Spirit (Gal 3¹⁴), the destruction of human wisdom through the foolishness of preaching (1 Co 1¹⁹), the universal range of the preaching of salvation (Ro 10¹⁵), the vital principle of righteousness by faith (11⁷ 3-1, Gal 3¹¹), the fatal unbelief of the Jews (Ro 10¹⁶) and the calling of the Gentiles (9²⁴, 10¹⁹, 15⁹), the final salvation of Israel (11²⁶), Christ's victory over all His enemies (1 Co 15⁴⁷), and the swallowing up of death and sin in the immortality won through Him (v. 54¹).

So far, then, the OT is treated as a Jewish book, pointing to the fulfilment of the 'promise' in Christ. But the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles, which was an essential part of this promise (cf. above), of necessity involved a change in the Apostle's attitude to the Scriptures. As a Jewish book, the OT made no direct appeal to other nations. They had their own modes of thought and expression, and the most cultivated of them possessed a literature of surpassing beauty and power. On occasion the Apostle might approach their conscience by this path (cf. especially his speech to the Athenians); but his mind was so saturated with OT ideas, and the book itself was so manifestly the Word of God which made men 'wise unto salvation' (2 Ti 3¹⁵), that he could not withhold it from any nation. Irrespective, then, of the Jewish origin and cast of the whole, he deliberately transformed it into a Christian book, in which Christ was openly identified with the God of the Jews (cf. Ro 10¹³, 11²⁶, Eph 4³ 5¹⁴, etc.), and the history of Israel was read typically (τυπικῶς, 'by way of pattern' or 'figure'), as a series of illustrative moral examples, 'written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come' (1 Co 10¹¹). Thus the promise to Abraham is extended to all who walk in the steps of his faith, whether in circumcision or in uncircumcision (Ro 4¹), while 'it was not written for his sake alone, that it (his faith) was reckoned unto him (for righteousness), but for our sake also, unto whom it shall be reckoned, who believe on him that raised Jesus our Lord from the dead, who was delivered up for our trespasses, and was raised for our justification' (Ro 4²⁴). The true Israel unto whom the Word was given is no more Abraham's seed according to the flesh, but 'the children of the promise,' whether Jew or Gentile (Ro 9⁶, Gal 3²⁹). Thus 'whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that through patience and through comfort of the scriptures we might have hope' (Ro 15⁴).

This transformation of the OT into a distinctively Christian book was the more easily effected as the conflict for freedom turned decisively around the Law. For orthodox Judaism the Law was the heart of the Scriptures, the very 'holy of holies.' Like the other apostles, St. Paul was a child of the Law, who excelled them all in his zeal for its honour. Even as a Christian he remained under its influence, and was ready in the interests of the gospel, if need were, to circumcise and to carry through the statutory vows for himself and his converts (cf. his procedure in Ac 16³ 18¹⁸ 21²³). But to impose the Law on Gentile Christians as a necessary condition of their salvation would inevitably reduce Christianity to a mere Jewish sect. The Apostle knew, moreover, from personal experience, as well as from observation of life, that there was no saving power in the Law. As coming from the holy God, the Law was holy, and its commandment 'righteous and good.' But so weak and sinful was human flesh that the very constraint of the Law not only awoke the consciousness of sin, but roused an inward opposition, and thus actually provoked sin. Hence the paradox of moral life, that the 'law of sin' in man's members 'worked death through that which is itself good—that through the commandment sin might become exceedingly sinful.' And the only real virtue of the Law was to drive men in despair to Christ (Ro 7⁵).

On this profound psychological analysis the Apostle based his new reading of OT history. For him the Law was no longer the heart and spirit of the older revelation, but a mere parenthesis or side-issue. Sin was a great fact which directly entered the world (εἰσῆλθεν) in Adam. To circumvent its fatal effects, grace likewise entered (Ro 5¹²). The Law came in sideways (παρεισῆλθεν), and therefore in a subordinate and non-essential capacity (Ro 5²⁰). Its purpose was not to save men, but to hold them in ward or prison until the true faith should be revealed (Gal 3²³). At best, it was but the slave-boy (παιδαγωγός), who kept them under a certain moral restraint until Christ came (εἰς Χριστόν, i.e. 'up to the time of Christ'), when they might be 'justified by faith' (Gal 3²⁴). Thus the gospel had its spiritual affinities, not with the Law, but with that faith of Abraham which was the beginning of the promise (Gal 3¹⁵). In a real sense, indeed, the gospel was already inherent in the covenant between God and Abraham, confirmed 430 years before the giving of the Law, and remaining valid in spite of its interposition. If it be rightly read, therefore, the OT is a revelation of the same grace as is made manifest in Christ. Only the Jews have obscured its true character by the fatal emphasis they have placed on the Law. The veil with which Moses covered his face when he spoke to the people is a symbol of that still darker veil lying heavily upon the heart of Israel 'at the reading of the old covenant,' which will never be removed until they turn to Christ. In Him the veil has been 'done away.' And all who have found liberty through Him, 'with unveiled face beholding as in a mirror [RVm] the glory of the Lord,' are able to trace that glory shining through the ancient Scriptures, and are likewise 'transformed into the same image from glory to glory' (2 Co 3¹²).

3. The Old Testament as the foreshadowing of the gospel.—In the Epistle to the Hebrews the problem is attacked from a different point of view. The underlying assumptions are, no doubt, the same. The OT is treated throughout as the very Word of God, and quotations are introduced with the formula, 'he saith' (λέγει), used of God Himself (He 1⁵ 5⁵), or the Holy Spirit (3⁷ 10¹⁵), or God speaking through the Spirit (4³ 8⁹), or even the Messiah (2¹⁻² 10³), irrespective of their human authorship. But the widest freedom of interpretation is claimed. The author cites invariably from the LXX, being evidently ignorant of the original Hebrew. He is quite unfettered, too, by the historical application of texts. Thus not merely are Messianic Psalms like Ps 2 and Ps 110 referred directly to Christ (He 1⁵ 13¹), but the highly dubious אֱלֹהִים, 'O God,' of Ps 45(46) and the 'son of man' in Ps 8⁴ are both identified with Him (He 1⁸ 2⁹), while even Isaiah's description of himself and his children as 'signs and portents in Israel' (Is 8¹⁸) is cited as a proof of Jesus' oneness with His people and His participation in the same flesh and blood as theirs, 'that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage' (He 2¹⁴). But, as a Jew of the school of Alexandria, he is much more influenced by the allegorical spirit than St. Paul. To him, indeed, the OT is a system of signs and symbols, foreshadowings and anticipations of something better, which is to be found only in Christ and the 'new covenant' of grace.

The opening paragraph lays down the famous contrast between the multiform and fragmentary character of the older revelation and the fullness of the light that came through Christ. 'God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers through the prophets in many parts and in many modes, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in a Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, through whom also he made the worlds, who being the effulgence (ἀπαύλασμα) of his glory, and the very impress of his essence (χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ), and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had made purification of sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high' (1³). The history of revelation is here set forth under the categories of Platonic idealism. As this world is but a dim and flickering shadow of the eternal realities, thrown upon the screen of the passing present, the OT is a broken and changing expression of God's mind, given through many different media, and sharing the imperfection bound up in all of them, while the revelation in Christ is the full 'shining forth' of the Divine glory through the perfect image or embodiment of the eternal Majesty. The real value of the OT Scriptures, therefore, is to point forward to the Light, and then to pass away as the shadow before the sunshine.

The author applies the same categories to the Law, by which, however, he means not the moral command that pressed so hard on the conscience of St. Paul, but the system of Levitical ordinances, as carried through in the service of the Temple. This also was a 'copy and shadow' (υπόδειγμα καὶ σκιά) of the heavenly things, 'an earthly adumbration of the worship carried through in the eternal temple above' (8⁵). As such, every part of the ritual had its significance (cf. esp. 9¹¹). But the Law itself was quite powerless to save. 'It is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins' (10⁴). It was equally impossible that high priests subject to the infirmities and mortality of human nature should by their daily and yearly sacrifices, offered continually and without change, 'make perfect them that draw near' (7²³ 9⁹ 10¹¹). In these sacrifices remembrance was made of sins, and the worshipper's thoughts were thereby directed towards the perfect Sacrifice yet to be offered (10³). The 'very image' (αὐτὴ ἡ εἰκὼν), the clear, full expression of the 'good things' of which the Law was but a dim, uncertain 'shadow,' was found only in Christ, by the offering of whose body sin was expiated once for all, and a 'new and living way' opened through the veil, 'that is to say, his flesh, into the holy place where God is' (10²⁰). The Aaronic priesthood was thus as imperfect a channel of the mediation of grace as the prophets had been of the revelation of God's mind. Both were but foreshadowings of the 'new covenant' (8⁷), 'a parable for the time now present' (9⁹). The truest OT type of Christ was Melchizedek, coming, as He did, from the heavenly sphere, 'without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days nor end of life,' to bear immediate witness to the Divine (7¹³).

4. Practical use of the Old Testament.—Christian interest in the OT is by no means exhausted by such discussions as to its relation to the gospel. The main test of its 'inspiration' is rather the practical one of helpfulness 'for teaching, for judgment, for correction, for discipline in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work' (2 Ti 3¹⁶). Thus St. Paul not merely checks his own fiery outburst against the high priest by calling to mind the injunction not to speak evil of a ruler (Ac 23⁵), but cites the Decalogue and other moral precepts of the OT as still binding upon his readers (cf. Ro 12¹⁹, 1 Co 9⁹, 2 Co 6¹⁻⁴ 9⁹, Eph 6-1 Ti 5¹⁸, 2 Ti 2¹⁹), and with equal freedom adduces OT heroes as examples or warnings (e.g. Adam in Ro 5¹²; Eve in 2 Co 11³, 1 Ti 2¹⁴; Abraham in Ro 4¹², Gal 3⁶; Moses and the children of Israel in 1 Co 10¹⁻¹¹). The fate of the rebellious Israelites is likewise held forth as a warning to Christian believers in He 3¹²; but the noblest instance of this practical use of the OT in the Epistle is found in the great roll-call of faith (ch. 11). In the remaining books the speculative interest has almost vanished, and the OT is cited mainly for its ethical value. Of the six quotations in James, five are unmistakably ethical; and even the text from Gn 15⁶, which St. Paul made the basis of his doctrine of justification by faith, is adduced as a proof of justification by works (as the necessary fruit of faith). In the same way the Apostle refers to Rahab, Job, and Elijah as notable examples of works, patience, and prayer respectively (2²⁵ 11¹⁷). Even in 1 Peter, where the primitive conception of the OT as a body of predictions fulfilled in Christ finds clear expression (1¹⁰ 2⁶), the actual use of the Scriptures is predominantly practical (cf. 1st 3rd 10th 5th). The few suggestions of the OT traceable in 2 Peter (e.g. 2nd 15th --) and 1 John (3rd) are of the same character; while the numerous reminiscences in Revelation, if not distinctively ethical, are yet concrete and imaginative, the clothing of the writer's own dreams in the majestic symbolism of the OT poets and prophets (see art. QUOTATIONS).

LITERATURE.—A. Tholnck, Das AT im NT, Gotha, 1868; L. Diestel, Gesch. des AT in der christl. Kirche, Jena, 1863, p. 6 ff.; B. Jowett, St. Paul's Epp. to Thess., Gal. and Rom., vol. I: 'Essays and Dissertations,' London, 1894; C. Clemen, Der Gebrauch des AT in den neuest. Schriften, Gutersloh, 1895; G. H. Gilbert, Interpretation of the Bible, New York, 1908; A. Harnack, Deutungsgeschichte, Freiburg, 1893, i. 41 ff.; H. St. J. Thackeray, The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, London, 1900; the New Testament Theologies of B. Weiss (Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1882-83), W. Beyschlag (Eng. tr., do., 1893), H. J. Holtzmann (Tubingen, 1911), etc.; Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans,'⁵ Edinburgh, 1902; B. F. Westcott, Hebrews, London, 1889, p. 469 ff.; A. B. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, Edinburgh, 1899.

A. R. GORDON.

OLIVE (ἐλαία, ἀργεῖλαιος, καλλιέλαιος).—The only passages in which the olive is referred to in the NT are Ro 11¹⁷⁻²⁴, Ja 3¹, Rev 11⁴. (For Ro 11¹⁷⁻²⁴ see art. GRAFTING.) For the proverb in Ja 3¹²—'Can the fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive berries?'—cf. Seneca, Ep. 87, 'non nascitur ex malo bonum non magis quam ficus ex olea'; see also Epict. Diss. ii. 20 and Plut. Mor. p. 472. A like simile is found in Mt 7¹⁶⁻²³. The reference to the two olive-trees in Rev 11⁴ is after Zec 4². In the latter passage the λυχνία is Israel, and the two olive-trees which feed it are probably the monarchy and the priesthood as represented by Zerubbabel and Joshua. The writer of Rev 11⁴ has adapted the imagery of Zec 4². In Rev 11²⁻²⁰ he has likened the seven churches to seven golden λυχνία. These λυχνία are kept burning by the oil of the Spirit with which the true members of the Church are imbued (cf. Mt 25¹, Ro 11¹⁷). These stand before the God of the earth (Rev 11⁴). In Ja 5¹⁴ reference is made to the early Christian custom of anointing the sick with oil (ἐλαίον).

Of recent years olive-trees have been largely destroyed, chiefly with a view to avoiding taxation, but also in part for the supply of fire-wood. The extent to which the olive was cultivated in Palestine in ancient times may be gauged by the large number of olive-presses that are to be seen all over the country. Many of these presses were cut in the rock before houses were built upon it. They are often found in immediate association with Troglodyte caves, while a press was actually found inside one cave. In the earliest times the presses were of a simple character and generally consisted of a single circular or rectangular vat with one or two cup-holes in the floor. These appear both on the hill-sides and also on the rock-surface. The olive-presses of a later time show greater elaboration, and in Roman times or after, the receiving-vats were sometimes lined with Mosaic tesserae. The fruit was apparently crushed on the surface of the press with stones, rollers, or pestles, the juice being subsequently expressed by boards placed over the fruit and weighed down with weights. The juice thus extracted was collected in a receiving-vat of greater depth than the press itself. The receiving-vat was sometimes sunk in the press, while sometimes it lay outside, and communicated with it by a channel. The pressing-surface is nearly always square or rectangular, and never more than from 1 to 1½ ft. deep; the receiving-vat is generally square but occasionally circular. There were often several receiving-vats to a single press. In the larger presses, the fruit was not crushed by the aid of movable hand-stones, but by a large, massive stone wheel rotated round a central staple by an ox or horse. One of these wheels that has been recovered has a diameter of 4 ft. 8 in. The rock in the press-surface was usually left bare, but the receiving-vat was often cemented.

But olive-presses of an entirely different character were also in use in all the Semitic periods. They consisted of movable slabs or boulders of stone. They are generally circular in shape and have a diameter of from 4 ft. 9 in. to 6 ft. 6 in. The rim within which the fruit was crushed is raised, the juice being collected in a cup hollowed out within the rim. Apart from the natural use of the olive as a fruit, it supplies the place of butter and is used for cooking. The oil is used for lamps as well as for anointing the body, while the soap of the country is made exclusively from it. The wood is used for cabinet-work. See also art. GRAFTING.

LITERATURE.—J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 1913, pp. 125, 170 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans,'⁵ 1902, p. 326 ff.; H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John,² 1907, p. 135; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 3 vols., ed. 1881-86, passim; ed. 1910, pp. 31-36; J. C. Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, 1903, pp. 50-52, 74; H. B. Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible, 1911, pp. 373, 377; SDB, p. 667; EBi iii. 3495-3496; HDB iii. 616; and especially R. A. S. Macalister, The Excavation of Gezer, 1912, ii. 43-67.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

OLIVET (ὁ ελαιών, Ac 1²; found only here and in Jos. Ant. vii. ix. 2, διὰ τοῦ ελαιωνος ὄρους; το ελαιων in Mk 11¹ is confined to B; Lat. oliveturum).—Olivet, called in the Gospels 'the Mount of Olives,' is the range of hills facing Jerusalem on the E., beyond the ravine of the Kidron valley. It has three summits, which are now commonly known as 'Scopus' (a misnomer, however, the real Scopus being further west), which is about a mile N.E. of the Temple site, 'the Ascension,' three-quarters of a mile E. of the same, and 'the Mount of Offence,' three-quarters of one mile S.E. of Ophel. The Risen Lord led His disciples not 'as far as to Bethany' (AV), but 'until they were over against Bethany' (RV), ἕως πρὸς (better supported than εἰς) Βηθανίαν, and there, a Sabbath day's journey—about six furlongs—from the Holy City, His ascension is recorded to have taken place. Bethany itself was fifteen furlongs—more than twice a Sabbath day's journey—from Jerusalem (Jn 11¹⁸), and it is unlikely that He wished the solemn parting to take place in the village. Not far from the scene of His agony and betrayal, 'he was taken up' (Ac 1⁹). It was not from Bethany, therefore, but 'from the mount called Olivet,' that the disciples returned to Jerusalem (v. 12). From early times the traditional spot from which the Lord ascended has been the central summit of the range, on which now stands the Church of the Ascension, built on the ruins of a crusading church of the 12th cent., which itself took the place of a basilica of the time of Constantine. More important than the identification of sites and scenes is the fact that '... faith has still its Olivet,

And love its Galilee'

(Whittier, Our Master, l. 51 f.)

LITERATURE.—See Josephus, Ant. ix. viii. 6, BJ v. ii. 3; E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine,² 1856, vol. i. pp. 274 f., 604 f.; A. P. Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, new ed., 1877, pp. 185-195; PEFSt, 1889, pp. 174-184; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, new ed., 1910, pp. 709-711; artt. in HDB and EBi.

JAMES STRAHAN.

OLYMPAS (Ὀλυμπᾶς, a Greek name, contracted from Olympiodorus).—Olympas is the fifth of a group of five persons, 'and all the saints that are with them,' saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹⁵, probably as forming an ἐκκλησία or household or district church in Rome or Ephesus. If the first two persons in the group, Philologus and Julia (qq.v.), were husband and wife, it is possible that 'Nereus and his sister and Olympas' were their family. But there is nothing further known of any one of them.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

OMEGA.—See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

ONESIMUS (Ὀνησίμος).—Onesimus was a Colossian (Col 4⁹), the slave of Philemon (Philem 16). The name, signifying 'useful,' 'profitable,' 'helpful,' was frequently and appropriately borne by slaves (see J. B. Lightfoot, *Colossians and Philemon*³, 1879, p. 310, who quotes numerous examples, chiefly from Muratori's Collection of Inscriptions). C. v. Weizsacker (Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., 1894-1895, ii. 245) regards the Epistle to Philemon as allegorical owing to the play on the name Onesimus in v. 11; but on similar grounds much well-authenticated history might be rejected. Onesimus, for a time, belied his name; he absconded from his master's house, after either robbing him or otherwise doing him 'injury.' In order, probably, to avoid detection and at the same time to seek his fortune, Onesimus came to Rome. (For the argument against Cæsarea as his place of refuge, see PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.) There he came into relation with the apostle Paul, the spiritual father of Philemon. At this time St. Paul had not yet visited Colossæ (Col 2¹); but Onesimus may have seen and heard the Apostle at Ephesus during the latter's three years abode in that city, which was only 100 miles distant from Colossæ. In any case, he must have heard much of St. Paul in Philemon's house; and he may thus have been drawn to the Apostle's Roman lodging by the desire to obtain help in need or to listen to teaching from one who had taken a special interest in slaves (1 Co 7^{21, 22}, Eph 6^{7, 9}, Ac 16¹³). Epanhras of Colossæ, the Apostle's fellow-worker in Rome (Col 4¹²), may have been the medium of introduction. Under St. Paul's instruction and influence Onesimus became a Christian (Philem 10, 'whom I have begotten in my bonds'). There must have been something very lovable about the fugitive slave, notwithstanding his blemished record; for the Apostle not only testifies to his faithfulness and helpfulness, but calls him a 'beloved brother' (Col 4⁹), his other self (Philem 17), 'my very heart' (lit. 'my own bowels,' τὰ ἑμα σπλάγχνα, Philem 12). As a Christian, Onesimus would realize more keenly his misdemeanour in absconding and perhaps stealing from Philemon; hence he appears to have readily acquiesced in St. Paul's determination not to retain him, however 'profitable,' but to restore him to his lawful master. Onesimus, accordingly, returns to Colossæ along with St. Paul's colleague in the ministry, Tychicus (Col 4^{9, 10}), who, as a native of the province of Asia, would probably be known to Philemon, and would be an appropriate personal intercessor for Onesimus with Philemon on the Apostle's behalf. To render certain, however, the friendly reception of Onesimus, St. Paul sends with the slave a letter to Philemon commending him as one to be received and permanently possessed (αἰώνιον ἀπέρχης) 'no longer as a slave, but above a slave, a brother beloved.'

We have no reliable account of Onesimus' subsequent history; but we may accept as in itself highly credible the tradition (Apost. Canons, 82) that Philemon not only forgave but emancipated his slave. More doubtful and also discordant are the records which represent Onesimus as attaining to the position of 'bishop' or presiding presbyter, in Berea, according to the Apost. Const. (vii. 46); in Ephesus, according to another tradition which identifies him with Onesimus, 'bishop' of Ephesus in the time of Ignatius (Ign. Eph. 1; AS, under 16th Feb.). A tradition (also embodied in the AS) represents him as journeying to Spain; and the apocryphal Acts of the Spanish Xantippe and Polyxena are written in his name (see TS ii. 3 [1893]). Nicephorus (9th cent.) transmits (HE iii.

11) a tradition that he was martyred at Rome; while another authority (Galesinius) describes that martyrdom as taking place at Puteoli (AS, loc. cit.). The commonness of the name deprives these accounts of any historical reliability. F. W. Farrar, in Darkness and Dawn, ed. 1892, p. 79 ff., and the author of Philochristos (E. A. Abbott) in his Onesimus, 1882, give interesting fictitious accounts of what might have been the life-story of this slave.

LITERATURE.—See under PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.

HENRY COWAN.

ONESIPHORUS (Ὀνησίφορος, 'profit-bringer').—This is the name of a Christian convert belonging to Ephesus who had visited Rome during the apostle Paul's imprisonment and had sought out the prisoner and ministered to his wants: 'He oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain' (2 Ti 1¹⁶). He had also performed outstanding services for the Church at Ephesus, to which the Apostle refers, mentioning that Timothy, to whom he writes, knew better (βέλτιον) about them than he did himself (v. 18). The word used here and translated 'ministered' (Gr. διακονέω) has been supposed to indicate that Onesiphorus acted as a deacon of the Church in Ephesus, but this is by no means certain. When in Rome during his second imprisonment the Apostle sends greetings to the household of Onesiphorus (4¹⁰); and in 1¹⁶ he expresses the desire that the Lord may give mercy to the 'house of Onesiphorus.' St. Paul mentions that Onesiphorus had treated him very kindly when in Rome, and contrasts his action with that of other members of the Church of Asia, who had turned away from him and refused to help him in his need, particularly referring to Phygellus and Hermogenes.

Several questions arise here. Why does St. Paul speak of the household of Onesiphorus? Why does he not send greetings to Onesiphorus himself, as he does, e.g., in 4¹⁰ to Prisca and Aquila? Was Onesiphorus dead when the Epistle was written? Most students conclude that Onesiphorus had already died. If this view be correct, an interesting point arises with regard to the prayer in 1¹⁸—'the Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day.' Is this a prayer for one who was already dead? Several who advocate the practice of prayer for the departed have quoted this passage in support of their position (e.g., Archibald Campbell, The Intermediate or Middle State of Departed Souls, London, 1713, p. 72; E. H. Plumptre, The Spirits in Prison, do., 1884, pp. 128, 266; H. M. Luckock, *After Death*³, do., 1881, p. 77, *The Intermediate State*², do., 1896, p. 211). N. J. D. White, in EGT, '1 and 2 Timothy and Titus,' London, 1910, p. 159, refers to 2 Mac 12⁴⁴ in support of the contention that an orthodox Jew of the time of Christ could have prayed for the dead. It seems, however, to be an undue pressing of the text to regard the sentence in 1¹⁸ as more than a pious wish on the part of the Apostle for one of whom he had very kindly memories (cf. G. S. Barrett, The Intermediate State, London, 1896, p. 113). In any case, we have no foundation whatever for the Roman Catholic system of prayers for the deliverance of souls from the pains of purgatory.

See, further, artt. in HDB and EBi.

W. F. BOYD.

ONLY-BEGOTTEN (μονογενής, ἥτης).—1. Use of the phrase.—It occurs in a literal sense four times in the NT: in Lk 7¹² (the widow's son at Nain), 8⁴² (Jairus' daughter), 9³⁸ (the child in the scene after the Transfiguration), He 11¹⁷ (Isaac); not at all in the other Synoptists. As referring to our Lord, it is Johannine only; and outside the Fourth Gospel it is found once only—in 1 Jn 4⁹. It is used of Christ absolutely, 'the Only-begotten,' in Jn 1¹⁴; and with 'Son of God' or 'his Son' in Jn 3^{16, 18}, 1 Jn 4⁹. The reading in Jn 1¹⁸ is disputed; the best-attested reading is μονογενὴς θεός (without the article), 'God only begotten' (N²BC²L Pesh. Boh. Æth., etc.); but AX with Old Lat., Vulg., Syr-cu, Arm., secondary uncials and almost all cursives, have ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός, 'the only begotten Son.' The Diatessaron seems to have got out of the difficulty by reading 'the Only-begotten' simply; Syr-sin is wanting here, but Burkitt (Evang. da-Meph., 1904, ii. 307 f.) thinks that it had μονογενὴς θεός, and that the unrevised Syr-cu had 'the Only-begotten' as the Diatessaron. This is to some extent confirmed by the Ignatian interpolator (Philipp. 2 [late 4th cent.]), who also reads 'the Only-begotten' (Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers: 'Ignatius', iii. [1889] 190; see also i. 254). The Fathers are divided; the old Roman Creed (as given by Swete, Apostles' Creed, p. 16) has 'unicum filium,' which evidently presupposes the second reading (the derived 'Apostles' Creed' has 'filium eius unicum dominum nostrum'; see below).

Another Greek rendering of υἱός is ἀγαπητός, and this is found in the LXX of Gn 22², whence the same word has found its way into 2 P 1⁷ and into Mt 17⁸, Mk 9⁷ ('my beloved Son'); in Lk 9³⁵ the best MSS have ἐκλεγμένος, 'chosen.' But the LXX has μονογενὴς in Jg 11³⁴ (Jephthah's daughter) and To 3¹⁵ (Sarah, daughter of Raguel), and Aquila seems to have used it in Gn 22² (Hort, Two Dissertations, p. 49). The Latin renderings are unicus and unigenitus; the former seems to be the older of the two (DCG ii. 281).

2. Meaning as applied to our Lord.—It appears to the present writer to be clear that in Jn. μονογενὴς refers to the pre-existent Sonship of our Lord: 'God hath sent his only begotten Son into the world' (1 Jn 4⁹). Our Lord is Son in a unique sense; we by adoption, He by nature (see ADOPTION). 'The Divine essence was so peculiarly communicated to the Word that there never was any other person naturally begotten of the Father, and in that respect Christ is the only begotten Son of God' (Pearson; cf. Cyril of Jerusalem, Cat. x. 4: 'He is called Son, not as advanced by adoption, but as naturally begotten'). The emphasis on the first part of the word is the same as that on αὐτοῦ and ἰδίου in Ro 8^{3, 32} ('God sending his own Son . . . spared not his own Son'); in these phrases St. Paul has an equivalent to μονογενὴς.

The above is the universal interpretation of the title by the Fathers from at least the time of Nicæa onwards, though other views were held in certain heretical circles. But was it the earliest interpretation? It is certainly the fact that μονογενὴς was not much used by the writers of the first three quarters of the 2nd cent., as far as we can judge by their very scanty remains; but Justin uses it occasionally (e.g. Dial. 105: 'He was the only-begotten of the Father of all things, being begotten in a peculiar manner Word and Power by Him, and having afterwards become man through the Virgin'), and it is found in the Martyrdom of Polycarp (§20). The Valentinians in the 2nd cent. used it for their æon Nous; they certainly treated the Only-begotten of Jn. as a pre-existent Being, but they took the particle 'as' (ὡς) in Jn 1¹⁴ as excluding the complete identification with Jesus (see Swete, op. cit. p. 26). The title took its place (probably c. A.D. 150) in the old Roman Creed—in the Greek form of the Creed as μονογενὴς, in the Latin form as unicus—perhaps as a protest against the misuse of it by the Valentinians. In some Western forms of the Creed, however, it is absent. F. Kattenbusch (Das apost. Symbol, 1894–1900, and DCG ii. 281) holds that 'unicum' was originally meant to go with 'Dominum,' but in view of the Johannine use this seems improbable. Later in the 2nd cent. μονογενὴς is constantly used by Irenæus.

Harnack asserts (Das apostol. Glaubensbekenntnis, ed. 1892) that in the Roman Creed the title refers only to the Incarnate Life, not to the Pre-existent Sonship. This is certainly not the case with Justin (see above); and Aristides affirms the pre-existence of the Son of God ('He is named the Son of God most High; and it is said that God came down from heaven, and . . . clad Himself with flesh, and in a daughter of man there dwelt the Son of God,' Apol. § 2, ed. Harris [TS i. 1 (1891) 36]). The earlier Fathers taught that before the Incarnation our Lord was Son of God (e.g. Ignatius, Magn. 6, 7; Smyrn. 1), and did not, like some contemporary heretics, limit the Sonship to the human life. But they did not at first adopt the technical word 'generation' for the communication of the Divine essence to the Son. Here we have an excellent example of the change in the use of technical theological words, of which hypostasis furnishes another and a later example. Ignatius says (Eph. 7) that our Lord was 'generate and ingenerate' (γεννητός καὶ ἀγεννητός)—generate, that is, in His humanity, and ingenerate in His Divinity; 'generation' as used by Ignatius has an earthly sense, whereas by the time of Justin and Tatian it had acquired a heavenly one (cf. Swete, p. 28). What Ignatius means is that our Lord's humanity is created, His Divinity is uncreated; and, as Lightfoot shows (excursus in Apostolic Fathers: 'Ignatius', ii. [1889] 90 ff.), he substantially held the same views as the Nicene Fathers as to the Person of Christ. In the later writers Christ is said to be ἀγεννητός in His Godhead—there never was a time before He came into existence; but He was not ἀγεννητός. In His Godhead he was γεννητός, 'begotten'; the Father alone was ἀγεννητός, 'unbegotten.' But this distinction was unknown to Ignatius. It is also an example of the fluid state of theological terminology that some 2nd cent. writers speak of the pre-existent Christ as Spirit (pseudo-Clement, 2 Cor. § 9: 'Christ . . . being first Spirit, then became flesh'; cf. Hermas, Sim. v. 6, ix. 1, and Lightfoot's note in Apostolic Fathers: 'Clement', ii. [1890] 230); and that even in the 3rd cent. Hippolytus speaks of the Incarnation being necessary for the perfect Sonship of our Lord, although, when unincarnate, being perfect Word, he was Only-begotten (c. Noët. 15).

Other interpretations of 'Only-begotten' make it equivalent to 'begotten by one alone,' as Eusebius asserted (Basil, c. Eunom. ii. 20: μόνος παρὰ μόνου . . . γεννηθείς), or to ἀγαπητός, 'beloved,' as is affirmed by the Racovian Catechism (Socinian).

The word μονογενὴς is found in the Nicene and 'Constantinopolitan' Creeds, in the early Creed of Jerusalem (gathered out of Cyril's Catechetical Lectures), in the Creed of Marcellus (Epiphanius, Hær. lxxii. 3), in Apost. Const. vii. 41, and apparently in all Greek forms of the Apostles' Creed.

See also art. FIRST-BORN, FIRST-BEGOTTEN.

LITERATURE.—B. F. Westcott, The Gospel acc. to St. John, 1908, The Epistles of St. John, 1883; J. Pearson, On the Creed, new ed., 1899, art. ii., esp. notes 52, 53; H. B. Swete, The Apostles' Creed, 1899; F. J. A. Hort, Two Dissertations, 1876; F. Kattenbusch, art. 'Only-begotten' in DCG ii. (takes a different view from that of this article); W. Sanday, art. 'Son of God' in HDB iv.

A. J. MACLEAN.

ORACLE.—In the literature of the Apostolic Church the word 'oracle' has lost its technical pagan meaning. λογιον occurs four times in the NT (Ac 7³⁸, Ro 3⁻, He 5¹², 1 P 4¹¹). In the first three of these passages it means the Canonical Scriptures of the OT. That is probably also its meaning in 1 Peter: 'If any man speaketh, speaking as it were oracles of God,' i.e. treating his words as seriously as if they were inspired Scripture. Clement of Rome uses the word three times (ad Cor. xix., liii., lxii.), always in the sense of authoritative Scripture, i.e. the OT. Eusebius (HE iii. xxxix. 16) quotes Papias as saying that 'Matthew composed the oracles (sc. of the Lord) in Hebrew, and each one interpreted them as he could.' E. C. Selwyn holds that these were the Messianic prophecies of the OT which Matthew collected (The Oracles in the New Testament, London, 1912, p. 396 ff.). The adjective λόγιος (RV 'learned') is applied to Apollos (Ac 18²⁴).

R. H. MALDEN.

ORATION.—The word occurs in the NT only in connexion with Herod Agrippa, who, at Cæsarea, 'made an oration' (δημηγορέω) from the throne (or judgment-seat [RVm]) to the embassy from Tyre and Sidon (Ac 12²¹). It refers to set speeches made in public assemblies, but sometimes it is employed in a derogatory sense for speeches of the demagogic order. There is a curious use of the word in the LXX, Pr 30³¹ (24⁸⁶)—βασιλεὺς δημηγορῶν ἐν ἔθνει. It was not an unusual thing for kings and princes to make orations in public assembly.

JOHN REID.

ORATOR.—See TERTULLUS.

ORDINANCE.—The word 'ordinance' is used in the RV to translate four different Greek substantives: (1) δικαίωμα (Ro 13² 2⁸ 8⁴, He 9¹ 10¹); (2) διαταγή (Ac 7⁵³, Ro 13³); (3) δόγμα (Eph 2¹⁵, Col 2¹⁴); (4) κτίσις (1 P 2¹³). The Latin Vulgate in these passages renders δόγμα by decretum, κτίσις by creatura, δικαίωμα by iustificatio or iustitia, διαταγή by dispositio and ordinatio. δικαίωμα is also used to signify a righteous act (Ro 5¹⁶ 18, Rev 15⁴ 19⁸), δόγμα is translated 'decree' in Ac 16⁴ 17⁷ and 'commandment' in He 11²³. The only Evangelist who uses either word is St. Luke (1⁶ 2¹). The verb δογματίζεσθε ('submit yourselves to ordinances' [RV], discernitis [Vulg.]) is found in Col 2²⁰. Clement uses δικαίωμα three times (ad Cor. ii., xxxv., lviii.). In the first and third of these passages it is coupled with πρόσταγμα; in the second he is quoting the Greek (LXX) version of Ps 50¹⁶. He has three other words which might be translated 'ordinance': (1) νόμιμα (ad Cor. i.); (2) διδάξεις (ib. xxxiii.); (3) δεδογματισμένα (ib. xx.; cf. Col 2²⁰). The verb διέταξε, 'he ordained,' occurs once (ib. xx.). 'The δόγμα of the Gospel' as a practical rule of conduct occurs in the Didache, xi. Ignatius speaks of being 'established in the δόγματα of the Lord' (Magn. xiii.) and has the verb διατάσσομαι, 'I ordain,' three times (Eph. iii., Trall. iii., Rom. iv.). The substantive derived from it (διάταγμα) occurs in Trall. vii.

The conception of an ordinance seems to be primarily something which is recognized as obtaining in practice. The authority upon which it rests may be Divine, as when it is applied by Clement to the laws of nature, which earth, sea, sky, and all living creatures must obey; or it may be primarily human, albeit ultimately Divine, as in 1 P 2¹³. The usage is not absolutely uniform, but as a rule the Divine sanction of an ordinance seems to be less direct than the immediate command of God Himself. Thus the Law is spoken of as being the ordinance of angels (Ac 7⁵³). An ordinance is generally a human deduction from a Divinely-revealed premise rather than the actual premise itself. When Ignatius says 'I ordain,' it is with reference to his personal authority, which is not irrefragable (cf. the distinction drawn by St. Paul in 1 Co 7²⁵).

R. H. MALDEN.

ORDINATION.—1. Scope of the inquiry. It is proposed to examine the somewhat scanty evidence of the 1st cent. as to the manner in which Christian ministers were admitted to office. In the investigation the following passages, which have, or may be thought to have, a bearing on the subject, will be specially considered: Ac 1²⁴ (appointment of Matthias) 6⁶ (appointment of the Seven) 13³ (mission of Barnabas and Saul) 14²³ (appointment of presbyters); 1 Ti 4¹⁴, 2 Ti 1⁶ (Timothy's ordination); 1 Ti 5²² (?), Tit 1⁵ (ordinations by Timothy and Titus). But, before examining these passages, we may make two preliminary remarks. (a) There is no technical word used in the NT to express admission to ministerial office, for though χειροτονεῖν is found (Ac 14²³), there is no indication that it is there used in a technical sense (see below, 3). This is the case also in the Didache (§15, c. A.D. 130?), where we read: 'Appoint (χειροτονήσατε) therefore for yourselves bishops and deacons.' At a later date this word and χειροθετεῖν and others (for which see EKE, art. 'Ordination') acquired a technical sense; but this is not the case in the NT. (b) As we have for this subject to depend largely on the narrative in Acts, it will be well to bear in mind a characteristic of St. Luke. With the wealth of material at his disposal, it was impossible for him to repeat the same or similar details over and over again; he therefore omits a detailed description in cases where a like account has already been given. We notice this both in the Third Gospel and in Acts. St. Luke gives the salient facts, especially of the events that happened at critical periods of the history; but, having once given them, he does not repeat the details next time he has to narrate a similar event. This will be borne in mind when we are considering narratives about admission to the ministry. We shall not expect that on each occasion the whole procedure will be described; but from the analogy of one such ordination, e.g. that of the Seven in Ac 6, we shall conclude, unless anything is said to the contrary, that the same procedure was followed on other occasions.

2. Choice of ordinands.—The normal method of choosing men for the Christian ministry in the Apostolic Age, as certainly in those which succeeded it, was election by those to whom the ordained was to minister. This was undoubtedly the case with the Seven in Ac 6. Whatever their exact office was—and it is not likely, in view of the solemn procedure adopted, to have been only an office of serving tables, a supposition which seems also to be contrary to the evidence of evangelistic activity by Stephen, Philip, and the rest—the people ('the whole multitude') elected (ἐξελέξαντο, 'chose for themselves,' 6⁶) the Seven and presented them to the apostles (v. 6), who after election 'appointed' them (v. 3, καταστήσαντες) and prayed and laid their hands on them (v. 6). The difference between the 'appointing' and the 'electing' would seem to be that while the people had a free choice, the apostles reserved the right of veto if they thought the choice in a particular case unsuitable. And the same veto apparently rested with 'apostolic men' like Timothy and Titus. Thus Titus appoints (Tit 1⁵, καταστήσας, the same word as in Ac 6⁶) presbyters in every city. This must involve at least the same power of veto as in Ac 6.

We do not read of election in some cases; notably it is not mentioned when the presbyters are appointed in Ac 14²³, and some have taken the pronoun in the phrase 'appointed for them' as indicating that Paul and Barnabas acted without consulting the people. Yet, as has been said above (1), we ought probably to presume election to have taken place unless there is evidence to the contrary. The details are given in ch. 6; they are not repeated in ch. 14. It is also probable that election existed at Ephesus and in Crete, though we nowhere read of it in the Pastoral Epistles. This method (not without a certain veto attached) continued for many centuries, and to a large extent, with geographical and local variations, exists to this day (see art. 'Laity,' ERE vii. 768 f.).

An exception to this method of choosing men for the ministry would be when the Divine will was directly intimated. The Twelve were chosen by our Lord Himself (note especially Jn 15¹⁶), without ecclesiastical intervention. So also was St. Paul (Gal 1¹; see below, 8). In the appointment of Matthias to the apostolate, the people did indeed choose two (Joseph Barsabbas, surnamed Justus, and Matthias) from among the personal witnesses of our Lord's life and resurrection, but took the lot which (after prayer had been offered) was cast between these two as an indication of the purpose of God (Ac 1¹⁵⁻²⁶). The prayer is noteworthy both as being the first recorded act of public worship of the disciples after the Ascension, and as containing words which are characteristic of later ordinations: 'thou which knowest the hearts of all men' (καρδιόγνῶστα πάντων, v. 24; cf. 15²), though it is uncertain whether the prayer in Acts is addressed to the Father or to the Son. In the later ordinations it is addressed to the Father. In the case of St. Matthias there was apparently no further 'ordination' to the apostolate. The Divine choice is announced by the lot, and so he 'was numbered with the eleven apostles' (v. 26).

Other cases of Divine intervention are mentioned, and in such cases it would seem that there was no election. Whatever was the significance of the ceremony in Ac 13¹⁻³ (see below, 8), the choice of Barnabas and Saul was made by the Holy Ghost—no doubt through the utterance of a Christian prophet. And Timothy, as St. Paul tells us (1 Ti 4¹⁴), was ordained through (οὐά) prophecy. This is taken by Liddon (Com. in loc.) as indicating an apostolic utterance or prayer—i.e. the ordination prayer. But this interpretation does not suit 1¹⁸: 'the prophecies which went before on thee' (or better, as RVm, 'which led the way to thee'); and a much more likely view is that the 'prophecy' is the indication of the Divine purpose by a Christian prophet, showing that Timothy was a suitable person. Here a regular ordination did follow. It is possible, though perhaps not probable, that the words in Ac 20²⁸ (see below, 6) mean that the Holy Ghost had by a prophet pointed out the presbyters at Ephesus as being worthy of ordination.

3. The outward sign of ordination.—We are not told that our Lord gave directions to the apostles as to the method by which they were to appoint officials for the Church. Indeed, it is not a little remarkable that what Western theologians of a later day called the 'matter' and 'form' of ordination could neither of them have been taken from the incidents recorded in the gospel narratives which have come down to us. For in Jn 20²² (we need not stop to inquire whether these words were addressed to the Ten or to a larger number of disciples) our Lord is said to have 'breathed' on those present, whereas the apostles and those who came after them used, without any known exception, laying on of hands as an outward sign, and to have pronounced a declaratory and imperative formula, whereas the disciples always (till the Middle Ages) used by way of 'form' a prayer only.

The use of an outward sign for the admission of men to the ministry follows many analogies. Our Lord had made use of outward signs in instituting the two great sacraments of the gospel, baptism and the Eucharist. In the OT an outward sign was used in setting apart for office, and it was to be expected that a similar custom should be found in the Christian Church. As a matter of fact, the only outward sign found for many centuries in the case of Christian ordination is imposition of hands. This symbol was used in the OT in acts of blessing, of appointment to office, and of dedication to God. Moses laid his hands on Joshua when he set him apart as his successor (Nu 27², Dt 34⁹). Jacob blessed his grandchildren by laying his hands on their heads (Gn 48¹⁴⁻¹⁷). Imposition of hands was used in dedicating sacrifices (Lv 1⁴), and in setting apart Levites (Nu 8¹⁰). Similarly our Lord blessed by laying on of hands (Mk 10¹³⁻¹⁶ and 1 Mt. Lk.), and used the same symbolic act in healing (Mk 5²²—which shows that it was a well-known practice, as Jesus is asked to lay on hands, Lk 4⁴⁰ 13¹³ etc.). The disciples also used laying on of hands in healing ('Mk' 16¹⁸; Ac 9²⁻¹¹, referring probably to the restoration of Saul's sight: see below, 8; Ac 28³). We see, then, that the symbol had more than one signification. The apostles used it when praying for the gift of the Holy Ghost for the baptized (Ac 8¹⁷ 19⁶), and also when setting men apart for the ministry. The 'laying on of hands' in He 6² perhaps refers to all the occasions when the symbol was used; or else to 'confirmation' only, as F. H. Chase maintains (Confirmation in the Apostolic Age, London, 1909, p. 45).

Laying on of hands is explicitly mentioned in Ac 6⁶ (the Seven) 13³ (mission of Barnabas and Saul; see 8), 1 Ti 4¹⁴ and 2 Ti 1⁶ (ordination of Timothy), and in 1 Ti 5—, if that refers to ordination (see below). No other outward sign is mentioned in the first three centuries. None at all is mentioned in the appointment of presbyters in Ac 14²³. Here the verb χειροτονεῖν is used, which in later days often meant 'to ordain.' But it does not necessarily imply laying on of hands; it may mean election, properly through a show of hands, or at any rate by an assembly, as in 2 Co 8¹⁹; or it may even mean an appointment by God (Ac 10⁴¹) or by man (14²³). Thus we cannot affirm from the last-named passage that Paul and Barnabas laid on hands* when they appointed presbyters in every church† which they visited on their first missionary journey. Yet it is exceedingly unlikely that they used any other outward sign, or that they refrained from using any outward sign. Here the characteristic of St. Luke already mentioned should be borne in mind. Laying on of hands was the sign universally used in the early Church for ordination; a supposed exception in the case of the ordination of a bishop in the Apostolic Constitutions (c. A.D. 375) is conclusively shown by the newly-discovered Church Orders to be only apparent.

In the 4th cent. another outward sign was introduced, apparently in cases where it was not at first deemed suitable to use imposition of hands—namely, at the admission of men (and women) to minor orders. In this case the 'porrectio instrumentorum' was substituted; a reader, for example, was given a book. In the Middle Ages, in the West, this kind of outward sign almost overshadowed the imposition of hands, especially in the case of the chalice and paten given to one ordained to the presbyterate. See on this subject ERE, art. 'Ordination.'

Laying on of hands is mentioned in 1 Ti 5². Timothy is to 'lay hands hastily on no man.' But does this refer to ordination? If so, it gives us confirmation of the fact, which in any case we can scarcely doubt, that the local ministry were ordained with imposition of hands. It is taken in this sense by Chrysostom and the Greek commentators, and in modern times by Alford, Liddon, and (apparently with a slight hesitation) by H. B. Swete (HDB iii. 85). On the other hand, this passage is interpreted by several moderns (Hort,

* The word χειροθεσία ('laying on of hands') is not found in the NT (as it is so often found later on), but ἐπιθεῖς χεῖρας. In some works, e.g. the Apost. Const., χειροτομία is used ordinarily for 'ordination,' but χειροθεσία when 'laying on of hands' is emphasized; the latter is used in Apost. Const. for other impositions of hands (A. J. Maclean, Ancient Church Orders, Cambridge, 1910, p. 154 f.).

† This word might have been translated 'in church': cf. Ac 24⁶, 'at home'; but Tit 1⁵ is conclusive for the other translation.

Hammond, Ellicott, Chase, etc.), as referring to the reception of penitents with laying on of hands. This interpretation suits the context perhaps better than the other; both before and after this verse St. Paul is speaking of sinners, and the words, 'Neither be partaker of other men's sins, keep thyself pure,' are held to be less suitable to ordination. The custom of receiving penitents or persons who had been in schism or heresy, with laying on of hands, is attested in the 3rd cent. by Cyprian (Ep. lxxiv. [lxxiii.], 'ad Pompeium,' 1, de Laps. 16), in the 4th cent. by the Council of Nicea (can. 8), Eusebius (HE vii. 2, an 'ancient custom'), the Apost. Const. (ii. 41), and at the end of the 5th cent. by the 'Gallican Statutes' (Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua), formerly in error ascribed to the 'Fourth Council of Carthage' (§ 80; see C. J. Hefele, A History of the Councils of the Church, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1896, ii. 411). But this custom is not referred to elsewhere in the NT, and one has a suspicion that the interpretation in question antedates it considerably. On the whole, the question must be left open.

The laying on of hands is no magical sign, effecting a change independently of all spiritual considerations. But the same thing is true of the water in baptism and the bread and wine in the Eucharist. The utility of an outward and visible sign is undoubtedly very great, but it is only a minor part of an ordinance, and does not enable those who receive it to neglect the spiritual disposition which is necessary. The outward sign is the help to faith. The vitally important factor in the ordinance is the Holy Spirit who works in it. See Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, p. 384.

4. The ordination prayer.—All the passages in Acts mentioned above (1st 6th 13th 14th) tell us of prayer being used, but, except in the case of the choosing of Matthias (where the words are no guide to us for the general case), we have no indication as to the nature of the prayer. The prayer preceded the laying on of hands (6th). The earliest ordination prayer that we can even provisionally arrive at dates from perhaps the beginning of the 3rd century. By a careful comparison of the ordination prayers in the parallel Church Orders of the 4th cent., which are derived from a common original that is perhaps of the time of Hippolytus, we can conjecturally determine the ordination prayer of the lost original. But even this gives us only one out of what was doubtless a very large number of such prayers in use throughout the Church; and, further, those used at ordinations, like those used at the Eucharist, were probably at the first in a very fluid condition, if not extemporaneous. The great characteristic of all ordinations for many centuries after the Ascension was their extreme simplicity, no matter to what office a person was ordained; a prayer and laying on of hands were practically all, except that the kiss of peace, and, in the case of a bishop, enthronization, were added. But it is very noteworthy that while our Lord in Jn 20th said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost,' and 'Whosoever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them,' etc., the Christian ordinations invariably took the form of a prayer. The introduction in the West, in the Middle Ages, of the declaratory form, in addition to (not instead of) the ordination prayer, was very probably due to a desire to follow our Lord's example exactly. But the earlier Christians would seem to have regarded such a procedure as irreverent. Their Master had used a declaratory form, had by His Divine power declared that their commission was given to them. They themselves believed that their own proper course was to pray that God would give the commission to the ordinands by their instrumentality. The same feeling comes out in the fact that in the early ages the eucharistic consecration by the Church was always conceived as effected by a prayer, and not by a declaratory form of words. See ERE, artt. 'Invocation (Liturgical)' and 'Ordination.'

5. Fasting.—In Ac 13th we read that fasting preceded the solemn mission of Barnabas and Saul. In 14th 'fastings,' as well as prayer, accompany the appointment of presbyters 'in every church' by Paul and Barnabas. The plural 'fastings' seems to mean that these apostles at each town held a solemn service of ordination with fasting; they did not ordain a large number for the whole district at one convenient centre.

Fasting was frequently in early ages associated with solemn prayer (Ps 35th, Dn 9th, Mk 9th [some MSS], Lk 23th); and so with baptism and the Eucharist. The pre-baptismal fast is mentioned in the Didache (7 f.), by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 61), Tertullian (de Bapt. 20), Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. iii. 7, xviii. 17), in the Church Orders (see ERE v. 768^a), and elsewhere. The fast before Communion is mentioned in Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii. 5) and in the Church Orders (EKE v. 768^b). In the Testament of our Lord (i. 22) and the Arabic Didascalia (23, 38) there is a fast for bishops after their ordination. But we do not find in early post-apostolic literature much emphasis laid on fasting in connexion with ordination.

6. God working through His ministers in ordaining.—It was not only when there was a special Divine intervention, as in the case of Matthias, Paul, and (probably) Timothy, that the first disciples believed that God was the real ordainer. He always worked through His human instruments. Even in the case of Matthias the special intervention extended only to God's selection (so they regarded the lot) of one out of two men; the choice of the two was made by the people. Yet no one would doubt that Matthias was really appointed an apostle by God. And this, as seems most probable, is the meaning of Ac 20th. St. Paul tells the presbyters of Ephesus that the Holy Ghost has made them 'bishops.' Yet he doubtless had ordained them himself, though probably (as in 6th) the people had elected them. It is perhaps due to this significant passage about the Ephesian presbyters that, as Swete remarks (The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, London, 1912, p. 290 f.), all the forms of ordination in the Church Orders recognize the Holy Spirit as the source of ministerial power, though the invocation of the Third Person in the Eucharist was not quite so universal.

7. The charisma in ordination.—St. Paul says to Timothy, 'Neglect not the charisma that is in thee, which was given thee through prophecy with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery' (1 Ti 4th); and 'kindle (stir into flame, RVm) the charisma of God which is in thee through the laying on of my hands' (2 Ti 1st; on these two verses see further below, 9). That this 'charisma' (gift) is not the office to which Timothy was appointed—whatever that was—but the inward grace which enabled him to discharge it, is seen from the words ἐν σοὶ which occur in both passages (so Alford, Ellicott, Liddon, Comm. in loc.; Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, p. 246; see also R. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity, bk. v. ch. lxxvii.). The nature of the charisma is referred to in 2 Ti 1st, which immediately follows the second passage; it is a spirit of power and love and discipline (σωφροσυναί, i.e., possibly, 'self-control,' or better, 'the capacity of exercising discipline without abandoning love' [so Swete]). That the 'charismata' or gifts of the Spirit are not all of them what we call 'extraordinary,' but include those faculties which enable the regular ministry to carry out their work, may be seen also from St. Paul's description of the gifts in 1 Co 12. The gifts are indeed various, but they include 'apostles,' 'teachers,' 'helps,' 'governments,' as well as 'powers,' 'gifts of healing,' 'kinds of tongues' (v. 28; cf. the preceding verses). The same thing is seen from Ro 12⁶⁻⁸.

The belief that in ordination a charisma of the Spirit is given does not (it need hardly be said) mean that those who thus receive it have not before received the Holy Spirit. The Seven, for example, were to be full of [Holy] Spirit and wisdom before they were elected by the people and appointed and ordained by the apostles (Ac 6³). Stephen was already 'a man full of faith and Holy Spirit' (v. 5). But the gifts of the Spirit are many and various; and the charisma which Timothy was not to neglect but to kindle was that special gift which would enable him to be a good Christian minister.

8. The mission of Barnabas and Saul from Antioch.—In considering the present subject we must necessarily touch on the meaning of the ceremony in Ac 13¹⁻³, when these two great missionaries were sent out on their first evangelistic journey. Was it an ordination, or a 'dismissal service'? Was it the appointment of Barnabas and Saul to the apostolate? We read that certain 'prophets and teachers' were at Antioch—Barnabas, Symeon, Lucius, Manaen, Saul. 'As they ministered (ἡγουρεύοντων) to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. Then, when they had fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them, they sent them away.' The 'sending forth' is expressly said to be the act of the Holy Ghost (v. 4). This was after the return of Barnabas and Saul from Jerusalem, whither they had gone to take the alms of the Church at Antioch (11³⁰ 12²⁵). St. Luke's pronouns are somewhat ambiguous. But his phrase in 13³ must mean that Symeon, Lucius, and Manaen (and possibly other prophets and teachers, if any unnamed ones were present)* prayed and laid hands on Barnabas and Saul, and sent them away. It was clearly an important occasion. It was a solemn service or liturgy before God, during which the Holy Spirit indicated His Divine purpose—doubtless by the mouth of one of the prophets present. They then fasted and—apparently on a second occasion—prayed, laid on hands, and sent the two missionaries away. It is the view of some that this was an 'ordination' of Barnabas and Saul to the apostleship (so, e.g., Rackham, Com. in loc.). It is said that hereafter, but not before, they are described as 'apostles' (14⁴), and that though St. Paul was made an apostle by our Lord directly, yet that Divine appointment did not make it unnecessary for the Church at large by a formal act to recognize it. But (however that may be) the view that these two men were on this occasion made apostles appears to the present writer to be more than doubtful. In the first place, nothing whatever is said in the passage in question about the apostleship, or indeed about an appointment to any office whatever. Secondly, in Gal 1¹ St. Paul explicitly claims that he is an 'apostle not from (ἀπό) men, neither through (διὰ) man, but through Jesus Christ and God the Father.' His apostleship is of Divine, not of human, origin; the same is true of the apostleship of the Twelve also. Further, his apostleship is not through man—no man is the instrument by which this Divinely appointed apostleship came to him.

Indeed, the whole argument of the first two chapters of this Epistle is based on the supposition that St. Paul did not derive authority through the Twelve—and a fortiori not through any Christian 'prophets and teachers.' And in the third place the suggestion about Church recognition, if it be pressed to mean (as it is pressed by Rackham) that Symeon, Lucius, and Manaen conferred the apostleship on Barnabas and Saul, means that those who were not themselves apostles could make others apostles. Rackham says that as the Divine will was indicated, this was possible, just as Ananias, a 'layman,' laid hands on Saul (Ac 9¹⁴). The latter statement involves more than one unproved assumption; but at any rate this argument about Ananias runs counter to the proposition that 'the Church should by a formal act recognize the Divine operation.' 'The Church' does not mean any individual layman in the Church. More cautiously Gore remarks (*The Church and the Ministry*³, London, 1902, p. 236 n.):

'It was essential to St. Paul's apostolate that he should not have received his spiritual gifts through other apostles. Again the prophets and teachers at Antioch lay hands on Barnabas and Saul. But here also we have a special divine authorization; and it is to set apart two already of their own "order" to a special work.'

For the reasons stated it seems impossible to view the incident at Antioch as a conferring of the apostleship on Barnabas and Saul. But it was a solemn assignment to them, under the direction of the Holy Ghost, of an extended work among the Gentiles, and all the accompaniments befitted this new departure. When Barnabas received the apostleship there is no record. But as he was constantly in touch with the Twelve, and was, so to speak, the connecting link between them and St. Paul, and as there is no claim that he received the apostleship direct from our Lord, it is probable that he received it from the Twelve on some occasion which is not recorded.

9. The action of the presbyters in Timothy's ordination.—We have hitherto refrained from asking to what office Timothy was ordained. And it is perhaps unnecessary for our present purpose to do so. But, at any rate, Timothy was one of those 'apostolic men' who shared in the itinerant ministry of the apostles, though they were not themselves apostles; he was not one of the local ministry, though for a time he was resident at Ephesus. There is no reason to suppose that he passed from one office to another, as the ordained of later ages have done; and we may in all probability take his ordination referred to in the Pastoral Epistles as being his only ordination, and as his ordination to the office which he held when St. Paul addressed his two letters to him.

Now in 1 Ti 4¹⁴ the charisma (see above, 7) is said to have been given to Timothy through (διὰ) prophecy (see above, 1), with (μετὰ) the laying on of the hands of the presbytery (πρεσβυτερίου). And in 2 Ti 1⁶ the 'charisma of God' is said to be in Timothy 'through (διὰ) the laying on of [St. Paul's] hands.' It seems hardly possible to interpret these words otherwise than of Timothy's ordination.* And it is difficult to interpret the presbytery otherwise than as the body of presbyters referred to in 1 Ti 5¹⁴, etc. The usual interpretation seems to be the right one, that in the above passages we have the prototype of an arrangement which was once probably universal, or certainly widespread, in both East and West, and which still survives in the West. We may think of St.

* Chase (Confirmation in the Apostolic Age, p. 35) takes 2 Ti 1⁶ (not 1 Ti 4¹⁴) as referring to Timothy's confirmation, though he stands almost alone in doing so. He interprets 1 Ti 4¹⁴ as is done by the present writer, and understands it to mean that St. Paul and the presbyters together laid hands on Timothy at his ordination.

* The times of the TR is badly attested, and can hardly be original. D* and Vulg. have 'among whom [were] Barnabas,' etc., suggesting that there were others. But probably the list given is exclusive.

Paul laying his hands on Timothy, with the active concurrence of the local presbyters, who lay on hands together with the Apostle. But the difference of preposition is significant; in the case of St. Paul ἔδωκεν, in the case of the presbyters μετέδωκεν, is used. The latter word would seem to indicate that the act was one of St. Paul's in which the presbyters by their deed concurred. There is, indeed, a slight difficulty in this interpretation. The arrangement, formerly in the East and still in the West, to which reference has been made, is that at the ordination of a presbyter the presbyters lay hands on his head together with the ordaining bishop, though the latter alone says the words. But this custom is not mentioned till the 4th century. We find it in the Egyptian and Ethiopic Church Orders, the Testament of Our Lord, and the Verona Latin Fragments of the Didascalia, etc.; also c. A.D. 500 in the 'Gallican Statutes' (above, 3); see ERE, art. 'Ministry,' 8. The custom may probably be traced to the lost original of the parallel Church Orders—that is, to the 3rd century. Of the intervening period between the Pastoral Epistles and that date we know nothing in respect to this matter. It is therefore possible that the arrangement in question was not continuously in use, but was adopted in the 3rd cent. because of the interpretation then given to the passage in 1 Timothy. And it was confined to the ordination of a presbyter, for when a bishop was ordained the other bishops laid on hands, but no presbyters, unless possibly—this is very uncertain—in the Canons of Hippolytus; while in the NT there is no indication that the local presbyters laid on hands with Paul and Barnabas when they 'appointed' presbyters for each church: indeed, probably there were no presbyters present other than the newly-ordained. Nevertheless, though the arrangement may possibly not have been continued in the sub-Apostolic Age, and though the latter procedure was not altogether on all-fours with the apostolic arrangement, seeing that the whole local organization of the ministry had developed by the 3rd cent., it appears highly probable that St. Paul's meaning is that both he and the local presbyters laid hands on Timothy when the latter was ordained. Where this took place St. Paul does not say. It could hardly have been at Lystra, where Timothy was converted. A novice in the faith, such as he was when St. Paul took him into his company, would not have been ordained to the ministry (cf. 1 Ti 3⁶). Alford (Com. on 1 Ti 4¹⁴) suggests Ephesus, where Timothy was to exercise his ministry for a considerable time. And this would be in accordance with the idea that St. Paul refers to the concurrence of the presbytery because the Ephesian presbyters were likely to read his Epistle. But the point is of no great importance.

For the manner in which ordinations to the ministry have been conducted in subsequent ages, reference may be made to the present writer's article 'Ordination' in ERE.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, London, 1909, art. 'Laying on of Hands' in HDB; F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, London, 1897 (posthumous); the various Commentaries on Acts and the Pastoral Epistles, especially R. B. Rackham, The Acts of the Apostles, London, 1904; C. J. Ellicott, The Pastoral Epistles of St. Paul, do., 1856; H. Alford, The Greek Testament, do., 1874; H. P. Liddon, St. Paul's First Epistle to Timothy, do., 1897.

A. J. MACLEAN.

ORGANIZATION.—See CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

ORIGINAL SIN.—See SIN.

OTHO.—Otho is the name most often given to Marcus Saluius Otho, who, on becoming Emperor, was styled Emperor Marcus Otho Cæsar Augustus. He was the younger son of Lucius Saluius Otho and Albia Terentia, and was born on 28th April, A.D. 32. From his earliest youth he was distinguished for effeminacy and profligacy, and became a boon-companion of the Emperor Nero. He married Poppæa Sabina, already the wife of Rufius Crispinus, and mistress of Nero, in order, it is said, that Nero might find her easier of access. Under suspicion of continuing marital relations with her, Otho, who had already held the quaestorship, was given a legate's post in Lusitania, where he remained from 59 to 68. The historians are unanimous that he was an excellent governor. When Galba in 68 revolted against Nero, Otho joined him and attended him to Rome, hoping, vainly as it transpired, that Galba would adopt him. Encouraged by an astrologer, who held out to him hopes of Empire, he plotted against Galba and brought about his murder (see under GALBA). Both the army and the Senate hailed Otho as Emperor on 15th January, 69. In spite of the treatment Nero had meted out to him, he liked to be called Nero, and it may be that he was the more welcome to the populace by contrast with the severity of his predecessor Galba. He was elected one of the consuls for 69. But his reign was short. A new claimant to the Empire arose in the person of Vitellius (q.v.). Otho marched from Rome to meet him, and was defeated at Betriacum between Mantua and Cremona (near modern Calvatone). He thereupon committed suicide at Brixellum (modern Brescello, on the right bank of the Po) after having ruled three months (17th April, 69).

LITERATURE.—Ancient authorities are Suetonius (Otho), Plutarch (Otho [ed. London, 1890]), Tacitus (Histories, ii.), Dio Cassius (lxiv.), etc. Modern works are Prosopographia Imperii Romani, sec. i., ii., iii., pars iii., ed. P. de Rohden and H. Dessau, Berlin, 1893, no. 109, p. 183 f.; and the Histories of the Roman Empire by Duruy, Bury, Schiller, etc.; A. von Domaszewski, Gesch. der rom. Kaiser, Leipzig, 1909, ii. 86-96; E. G. Hardy, Studies in Roman History, London, 1906, pp. 295-334; there is also a valuable comparison of the leading ancient authorities in the same work, 2nd ser., do., 1909, pp. 158-202.

A. SOUTER.

OVERSEER.—See BISHOP.

P

PAGAN.—See HEATHEN.

PALACE (πραιτώριον, from Lat. prætorium).—St. Paul assured the Philippians (1¹³) that the fact of his imprisonment had become known, and its cause understood, 'in all the palace' (AV), or 'throughout the whole prætorian guard' (RV). The interpretation of the phrase ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραι- τωρίῳ has long been a vexed question, and no consensus of opinion has yet been reached.

The term 'prætorium' had an interesting history. In the early Roman republic, when the prætor (præ-itor, 'leader') was the general in the field, the prætorium was his part of the camp—the headquarters—with the secondary meaning of a council of war, because this was held in his tent. One of the gates of the camp was called the porta prætoris, and the general's bodyguard the cohors prætoris or cohortes prætoris.

In later times of peace, the praetors were the highest Roman magistrates, who, after administering justice for a year in the capital, were sent as propraetors to govern the provinces; and the praetorium was the official provincial residence, which might chance to be the palace of a former king (as in Mt. 27²⁷, Mk 15¹⁶, Jn 18²³⁻³³ 199; cf. Cic. Verr. ii. v. 12 [30]). Under the Empire the cohortes praetoriae were the Imperial bodyguard. As constituted by Augustus, they were nine in number, each with 1000 men, and one or more of them always attended the emperor, whether in Rome or elsewhere. Tiberius made an important and permanent change 'by gathering into one camp all the praetorian cohorts then dispersed over the city; that, thus united, they might receive his orders simultaneously, and by continually beholding their own numbers and strength, and by familiar intercourse, conceive a confidence in themselves, and strike terror into others' (Tac. Ann. iv. 2). The barracks formed a rectangle of 39 acres, and some parts of the ramparts, embedded in the later walls of Aurelian, can still be seen near the Porta Pia. The praetorians were recruited voluntarily, in Italy or in Italianized districts. They had better pay and shorter service than the regular army. On retiring each soldier received a bounty amounting to about £200. In the 2nd cent. the praetorian cohorts became ten in number, and in the time of Septimius Severus they consisted practically of barbarian soldiers, who were constantly in conflict with the people of Rome. The Praetorian Guard was suppressed by Constantine in 312.

On the supposition that the praetorium to which St. Paul alluded is a place, two interpretations have been offered. (1) The AV had the authority of the Greek commentators—e.g. Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret—for assuming that he had in view the Imperial residence on the Palatine. It is certain, however, that the term could not properly bear such a meaning. The Roman citizens would have keenly resented the use of a nomenclature suggestive of a military despotism, and the early Caesars, too wise to wound their susceptibilities, were careful to maintain the appearance of republican liberty even after the reality was gone. If the Emperor was absent from Rome, he was indeed technically in imperio; and in the post-Augustan Age any spacious country villa could be called a praetorium; but no classical writer ever applies the word to the palace in the city. The utmost that can be said in favour of the exegesis in question is that St. Paul, as a provincial writing to provincials, may have been guilty of a 'terminological inexactitude.' But one of St. Paul's merits is his singular accuracy in the use of technical terms, and the colonia of Philippi to which he was writing was itself a miniature Rome, where fine shades of Imperial language were sure to be appreciated and mistakes at once detected. (2) The praetorium is often taken to denote 'the praetorian barracks at the Porta Viminalis on the east side of the city, in which Paul lay a prisoner at Rome' (Lipsius, Hand-Com. zum NT, in loc.). But this use of the word would be equally incorrect; for while the barracks were called castra praetoria (Pliny, HN iii. 9; Suet. Tib. 37) and castra praetorianorum (Tac. Hist. i. 31), they were never designated praetorium.

On the theory that the term is not local but personal, two meanings are again possible. (1) The word may collectively denote the Imperial Guards. J. B. Lightfoot (*Philippians*¹², 1894, pp. 99-104) argues strongly for this interpretation, which has been adopted in the RV. There is abundant evidence (e.g. Livy, xxvi. 15, xxx. 5; Tac. Hist. i. 20, iv. 46; Suet. Nero, 9; Pliny, HN xxv. 6; Jos. Ant. XIX. iii. 1; together with a number of inscriptions) that the word bore this meaning, which harmonizes with the καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς ῥᾶσι that follows in Ph 1¹³, whereas 'the others' is extremely awkward if it is conjoined with the name of a locality. If St. Paul, while abiding 'two whole years in his own hired dwelling' (Ac 28³⁰), was under praetorian custody, he would be able, owing to the frequent change of guards, to arouse an interest in his message throughout this famous body of soldiers.

(2) W. M. Ramsay, following Mommsen, holds that the praetorium 'is the whole body of persons connected with the sitting in judgment, the supreme Imperial Court, . . . representing the Emperor in his capacity as the fountain of justice, together with the assessors and high officers of the court' (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 357). There does not, however, appear to be any first or second century evidence for this use of the term. It is more probable that, on reaching Rome, St. Paul was handed over to the praefectus praetorii (called by St. Luke the σπαροειδάρχης), who gave him for two years a large measure of liberty (always, of course, under the surveillance of a praetorian), and ultimately tried him, either in the castra praetoria at the Porta Viminalis, or more probably (see Ph 4²²) in the guard-room of the Imperial palace. Certainly from the 3rd cent. onward, and apparently much earlier, the praefecti praetorio (usually two, sometimes three, rarely one) exercised jurisdiction for the Emperor. In a letter to Pliny (Ep. Plin. 65) Trajan decides regarding a prisoner who had appealed from the governor's sentence: 'vinculus mitti ad praefectos praetorii mei debet.' It seems probable that St. Paul was handed over to the same tribunal. Before writing Philippians he had been tried once, and made a favourable impression upon the minds of his judges. Ever since his arrival in Rome it had been recognized that he was no ordinary criminal and no political agitator. He was seen to be a prisoner for his faith in Christ (Ph 1¹³), and his bearing as well as his words commended him, and to a greater or less extent his message, to the praefectus praetorio (or -ii), to the whole praetorium (Imperial Lifeguards), and to 'all the others' with whom he was brought into contact. And some (especially αἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας) were not only impressed but converted.

LITERATURE.—T. Zahn, Introd. to the NT, 1909, vol. i. pp. 541 f., 551 f.; M. R. Vincent, ICC, 'Philippians and Philemon', 1897, p. 16 f.; H. A. A. Kennedy, in EGT, 'Philippians', 1903, p. 423 f.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PALM (φολίς).—The only passages in the NT containing references to the palm are Jn 12¹³ and Rev 7⁹. It flourishes in hot dry climates and is known to have been cultivated in Egypt and Babylon at an early date. In the deserts of Arabia it is essential to existence, hence the Arabic saying that the palm has as many uses as there are days in a year. The palm referred to in the OT and NT is the Phoenix dactylifera, L.: in Palestine it still flourishes in the maritime plain but seldom ripens in the hill-country. Its cultivation in Palestine has been neglected for a long time past, and there can be little doubt that in ancient times it was much more common than it is to-day.

The trunk of the palm does not increase in thickness from year to year like other trees but only rises higher, putting forth new leaves each year. The lower circle of leaves, sometimes as much as seven years old, gradually withers away, and as the stumps of the old leaves wear off the trunk becomes more slender as it increases in height. The leaves, which are pinnate and are often 12 ft. long, form a kind of dome at the summit of the tall bare stem. The male and female blossoms are on different trees, and it is consequently necessary to impregnate the female blossoms if the seed is not to be barren. This is effected either by tying a bunch of male blossom on to the female trees or else by shaking out the pollen over the female flowers. The flowers grow on a single or branched tuft, covered by a spathe or sheath, some of which contain many thousands of flowers. The core of the trunk is soft and pithy, and palm wood is therefore of little use as timber, though it is of value for rafters and gate-posts.

The fruit is a staple article of food among the modern Bedouins. It is gathered by a man who climbs the trunk, severs the clusters of dates, places them in a basket, and lowers them to the ground. The date is utilized in many ways. A kind of brandy is made from its juice, and also dibs, a syrup resembling honey, which forms a useful substitute for sugar. Baskets, mats, and all sorts of utensils are manufactured from its leaves; the crown of barren trees is boiled as a vegetable; camels are fed on the pounded stones, horses on the fruit-stalks; and the fibres of the leaf-stalk and fruit-stalk are used for ropes.

Branches of palms were regarded as appropriate emblems of triumph and jubilation, and they were carried at the Feast of Tabernacles, while they were also used in constructing the booths on the house-tops on the occasion of this festival (Lv 23⁴²). In Rev 7⁹ the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Jn 12¹³) may be in view.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, Natural History of the Bible, 1911, p. 378 f.; J. C. Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, ed. 1887, i. 207 f., ed. 1903, p. 76; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 3 vols., ed. 1881-1886, passim, ed. 1910, p. 30; H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John, 1907, p. 100; P. S. P. Handcock, Mesopotamian Archaeology, 1912, p. 12 f.; UDB iii. 636 f.; SDB, p. 675; EBI iii. 3551 f.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

PALSY.—The more common word is 'paralysis.' Only two instances are reported in the Acts—8⁷ (many) and 9³³ (Æneas). The condition referred to is marked by loss of muscular control, caused by cerebral or spinal lesion, or by local disease or disorder of nerves and muscles. Whether the paralytics who were healed by Philip in Samaria were brought to him on beds, were visited by him, or were able to come to him with others who were suffering from bodily disturbance, we are not told. Æneas was for eight years bed-ridden, and thus appears to have been in a desperate plight. In the absence of competent and explicit medical testimony, it would be idle to conjecture whether any of these cases was organic rather than functional, or how large a part suggestion played in their cure. The healings by Philip brought to an end the practice of sorcery by Simon and led to his conversion; the healing of Æneas showed anew the power which resided in 'the name of Jesus' (cf. 3⁶ 4¹⁰). The recovery of all these paralytics followed the customary order of NT cases: no sooner was the word spoken than the cures took place.

C. A. BECKWITH.

PAMPHYLIA (Παμφυλία).—Pamphylia was the ancient name of a flat and low-lying country in the south of Asia Minor, 80 miles long from E. to W., and 20 miles broad in its widest part, skirted by the Bay of Adalia, and enclosed by a rough semicircle of lofty and precipitous mountains of the Taurus range. As no pass corresponding to the Cilician Gates afforded freedom of access to the interior, Pamphylia was always isolated. Its chief maritime cities—Attalia, Perga and Side—had to deal only with a limited traffic, and never rose to any great importance. Its climate, too, greatly interfered with its progress. The hot, moist, enervating plain, rarely swept by bracing northern winds, was unsuitable for a race of hardy colonists, and though many Greeks and some Jews (1 Mac 15²³, Ac 2¹⁰) settled in its towns, the native Anatolian elements were too strong for an exotic Hellenism, so that Pamphylia as a whole remained one of the least civilized parts of Asia Minor. It was therefore late in attaining the dignity of Roman provincial government. Dio Cassius (lx. 17) indicates that Claudius instituted the province of Lycia-Pamphylia in A.D. 43, but Mommsen has proved by means of a recently discovered inscription 'that Pamphylia was a distinct procuratorial province for some time later, then was connected with Galatia for a short time, and at last was united to Lycia by Vespasian' (W. M. Ramsay, Pauline and other Studies, 1906, p. 265).

Paul and Barnabas crossed Pamphylia in both the outward and the homeward part of their first missionary tour. Landing at the river-harbour of Perga, they merely 'passed through from' the city (Ac 13¹⁴), hastening northward over the Taurus to Antioch in Pisidia. Combining St. Luke's narrative with Gal 4¹³, Ramsay infers that, while the original intention of the apostles was to carry on a prolonged mission in Pamphylia, which seemed, after Cilicia, to have the next claim to the gospel, a sudden illness—probably malarial fever—prostrated St. Paul and compelled them to change their plan and seek the cooler and more invigorating uplands of central Asia Minor (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 93, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 61 ff.). A. C. McGiffert agrees that malarial fever was probably the 'infirmity of the flesh' which led St. Paul to preach to the Galatians, but regards it as more likely that the illness, though contracted in the Pamphylian plain, did not show itself until St. Paul was labouring in Antioch (Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 177). About two years later the return journey was made by Perga and Attalia (Ac 14²³), and on this occasion the gospel was preached in the former city, but apparently little impression was made. Christianity, which always had the best chance of success where Hellenism and Judaism had already prepared the soil, was late in taking root in backward and uncivilized Pamphylia. The provinces named in 1 P 1¹ as having Christian converts within their borders sum up the whole of Asia Minor north of the Taurus, but Pamphylia and Lycia are conspicuous by their absence. Had these lands contained any considerable body of 'the elect,' the fact that they were regarded as 'without (i.e. to the south of) the Taurus' would not have prevented them from being enumerated with the other provinces.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, London, 1895, p. 89 f.; K. Lanckoronski, Städte Pamphyliens und Pisidiens, vol. i.: 'Pamphylien,' Vienna, 1890.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PAPER.—See WRITING.

PAPHOS (Πάφος, the modern Baffo).—Paphos was a seaport near the western extremity of Cyprus, the last place visited by Paul and Barnabas in their missionary progress through the island (διελθόντες ὅλην τὴν νῆσον, Ac 13⁹). There they were near one of the most famous shrines of paganism, the home of Aphrodite, the foam-born 'Paphian Queen,' Old Paphos being the centre of her worship for the whole earth. The city in which the apostles stayed, however, was New Paphos, the seat of the proconsul (δυνάστης), the administrative centre of the island since its annexation by the Romans in 58 B.C. Originally no more than the port of Old Paphos, it possessed a good harbour, from which the apostles sailed for Pamphylia (Ac 13¹³). Like the more ancient and famous city, it was devoted to the cult of Aphrodite, to whom it had erected 'fine buildings' (Strabo, xiv. vi. 3). It was about 10 miles N.E. of Old Paphos (Παλαια Πάφος or Παλαιάπαφος, the modern Kuklia), which stood on an eminence over a mile from the sea—the 'celsa Paphos' of Vergil (Æn. x. 51). 'Along the road' between the two cities, says Strabo (loc. cit.), 'the annual processions are conducted, when a great concourse both of men and women resort thither,' not only from New Paphos, but 'from other cities.' In describing a pilgrimage which Titus made to this shrine on his way to the siege of Jerusalem, Tacitus expresses surprise at 'the form under which the image is adored, a form found in no other place' (Hist. ii. 2). What Titus saw was not the graceful, smiling Aphrodite of Greece, but the rude cultus-image of Phœnicia.

Cyprus was the meeting-place of two ancient faiths and civilizations—Hellenic and Syrian—each of which deeply influenced the other. Herodotus was not ill-informed when he heard 'on inquiry' that the temple at Paphos was built in imitation of a Syrian temple in Ascalon (i. 105). Excavations have proved that the Paphian shrine had the character of a Phœnician temple, with large open courts and several small chambers, and the same type of building is represented on many coins. Fragments of marble cones and of an altar have also been found, and the idea that the conical stone was anointed in the Semitic fashion is confirmed by an inscription which mentions a festival of the temple called ελαοχριστιον.

Had St. Paul remained longer at Paphos, he would inevitably have come into conflict with this worship—which Athanasius branded as the deification of lust (την επιθυμιαν θεοποιουσαντες προσκυνουν [Contra Gentes, 9])—as he did later with that of Artemis at Ephesus. How long the Paphian cult maintained itself against Christianity can only be conjectured. St. Paul's dispute with Elymas (q.v.) was purely personal.

LITERATURE.—D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, 1889; D. G. Hogarth and M. R. James, in JHS ix. [1888] 153 f.; art. 'Aphrodite' in Roscher's Lexicon. JAMES STRAHAN.

PARACLETE.—1. The term.—One result of the authoritative place held by the Law among the Jews was that figures of speech borrowed from the sphere of judicial procedure came to play an important part in religious life. This cycle of figurative speech included the term 'paraclete.' In Greek usage a paraclete was one who accompanied an accused person to the judge's tribunal, and supported him by testifying and interceding on his behalf. The frequent use of the term 'paraclete' in the religious phraseology of the Jews is confirmed by the fact that when the term, as a Greek loan-word, at length found a place in the Hebrew writings of the Synagogue, it was employed not in a literal but in a figurative sense, as, e.g., for the sacrifice by which the Divine forgiveness was secured for Israel.

2. Jesus Himself as the Paraclete (of Christians who fall into sin).—The idea that man requires a paraclete was associated first of all with the thought of the Divine decree by which the status and destiny of human beings are fixed, and it is in this reference that St. John, in his First Epistle (2^d), applies the term to Jesus Christ. As the vocation to a divine life puts an end to walking in darkness, believers separate themselves from sin by sincere and penitent confession. Still, this does not do away with the possibility of their choosing falsely and again doing evil; hence there arises the need of a fresh judicial act on God's part to decide what portion such a sinner retains in Him. Even when the Christian sins, however, Christ maintains fellowship with him, and brings him within the scope of the Divine grace. In that passage, accordingly, Christ is called a Paraclete because He obtains Divine pardon for those who have trespassed. His ability to shield the sinning one is based upon the fact of His own righteousness, for only the righteous, whose mind is at one with the will of God, can ask God to forgive others. This power, moreover, rests also upon the fact that Jesus has by His Cross purchased the world's forgiveness from God.

3. The Holy Spirit as the Paraclete (of the apostles in their work).—In the last discourse of Jesus, as found in the Fourth Gospel, the name 'Paraclete' is given to the power that secures for the disciples the presence of the Holy Spirit (Jn 14¹⁶ & 15²⁶ 16⁷). Abstractly, it is not impossible that the Spirit Himself is here called the Paraclete because He too keeps the disciples within the Divine grace through which they are forgiven; here, in point of fact, the term applies to Jesus no less than to the Spirit, for the latter is called 'another Paraclete'; and thus the intercessory function of the Spirit on behalf of the disciples is conjoined with that exercised by Jesus until His departure. The leading thought underlying the passages in question, however, is in conflict with this interpretation, as Jesus is there speaking of how His disciples shall be enabled to complete their task and, as His messengers, to gather His community together. His words serve here to define the authority of the apostolic office, and therefore also of the Church. The relation of the disciples to God is regulated and assured by their union with Jesus, and no account is taken of the possibility that they may rupture that relation by fresh transgression. The parting utterances of Jesus speak of His fellowship with His disciples as indestructible; as perfected, not impeded by His death. He remains in them, and they remain in Him, and they are thus encompassed by the Divine love. This relationship, however, lays upon them their special task—that of living and witnessing for Him, of pleading His claims, and of calling upon men to have faith in Him. As branches in the true Vine they have now the power, as they have also the duty, of bringing forth fruit. This brings them, however, to take part in a dire struggle, and the last discourse of Jesus affirms in words of deep impressiveness that He has made every provision for their warfare with the world and their victory over it. Even now, indeed, their standing is being contested—not, certainly, their standing before God, sinners though they are, for that matter is settled by their fellowship with Jesus, but the sanction of that profession of faith in Him by virtue of which they glorify Him as the Christ.

Now the question whether, and how, the apostles are able to fulfil their mission, and how they may convince the world that their message is true, is solved for them by the fact that the Spirit is with them. The Spirit is their Paraclete because He is the evidence of their standing, the efficacy of their words, the source of their authority, and the guarantee of their success. The reason why they now require another Advocate—a new Paraclete, distinct from Jesus Himself—is that while hitherto Jesus, by His word and His works, vindicated the rights of their faith, and by His presence protected them against all assailants, He can no longer, now that He has passed into the unseen, be their Advocate in His own Person. They require an evidential force which will still be recognizable, a power that will constantly be with them, and become manifest to all to whom they proclaim the word. The historical ground of their authority—the fact, namely, that they had companied with Jesus—is not thereby invalidated (15²⁷), but it is not in itself sufficient. Their utterances regarding Jesus are free from every limitation. Thus they describe Him as the Eternal Son, through whom the whole work of God is effected; as the ever-present One, who is in perfect unity with His people; as the One who now worketh, bestowing light and life upon the world. To the historical foundation of the apostolate and the Church, therefore, there must necessarily be added the pneumatic foundation; and the deep significance that attaches to the term 'Paraclete' lies in the distinct expression which it gives to the fact that the historical sanction of the apostles and the community finds its requisite supplement and confirmation in their inward experience and the spiritual possessions they now enjoy.

4. The Deity of the Spirit.—One result of this process of thought was the fresh emphasis laid upon the idea that the Spirit shares fully in the nature of God. It is true that even in the earliest stages of Christianity, as elsewhere, the Spirit was spoken of as possessing the quality of Deity; in knowledge, in will, in work, He has part in the creative glory of the Divine power. But the fact that the Spirit now came to be conceived as the Paraclete of the disciples provided a peculiarly cogent reason why He should be thought of, not as a mere property of man's inner life, or as a force that enters into man, but as fully possessed of the Divine power which, coming from above, encompasses man, and so animates all things from within. For the prerogative of Jesus and His disciples was made manifest only when it was proved to be Divine. The disciples cannot demonstrate the Divine status of Jesus by appealing to what they are in themselves. Such demonstration could be given only if it were made manifest that the cause of Jesus was the cause of God. The Spirit is the Advocate of Christians simply because in His work it becomes clear to all that He comes from above and is no merely human possession. Nevertheless He could not be the Advocate of the disciples unless His presence and action were unmistakably related to Jesus; and this relation is made manifest by the fact that the Spirit is possessed by the disciples only, and not by the world (14¹⁷ 16⁷), and that He speaks as the witness of Jesus, and creates faith in His mission (15²⁶ 16¹⁴). He causes the word of Jesus to become effective in the disciples, so that it becomes the basis of the teaching which reveals to them the will of God in their present situation (14²⁶). Hence the granting of the Spirit causes no separation between the disciples and Jesus, nor does it cut the Church apart from its historical roots; on the contrary, that which had been perfectly wrought by Jesus is brought to its full realization by being renewed in the inner life of the disciples, in their knowledge and in their work. In this connexion, too, we note the emergence of trinitarian formulæ, as, e.g., 'the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name' (14²⁶). Since Christ and the Spirit both carry out the one purpose of God, and combine their operations in a perfect unity, the work accomplished by Jesus remains permanently effective, and is in reality completed, not superseded, by the work of His disciples.

5. The truth as the medium of the Spirit's manifestation.—A thesis that at this point acquired immense importance was that which defines the conditions and phenomena in which the Spirit manifests Himself, and the means by which His self-revelation is secured. The thesis is simply that He becomes manifest by the truth—by the truth alone, though with triumphant power. It is the truth alone which can demonstrate the Divine right of Jesus, of His disciples, and of His Church. Special operations of the Spirit are in themselves insufficient to supply this confirmation, although reference is made likewise to the Spirit as the source of prophecy (16¹³). The latter statement involves the endowing of the apostles with the teaching office, so that in the amplitude of their knowledge and the clearness of their intuition they find the weapons with which they overcome the world; for in the Johannine writings the truth is set in opposition to both falsehood and error, and with constant thanksgiving John declares that Jesus has redeemed His disciples from lies and made them truthful, and that He has freed them from the dominion of error and brought them to the certainty that comprehends God. Similarly, they have received moral succour, for in John falsehood and hatred, darkness and sin, are closely allied, and the one dies away with the other. That nevertheless John speaks of the truth alone as the distinguishing feature of Jesus and His disciples is intimately connected with the fact that the Evangelist's whole characterization of Jesus is directed to the one end of establishing faith. Only in the truth can a genuine faith have its birth.

6. The source of this thesis.—In view of the momentous results that flowed from the doctrine of the Paraclete—a doctrine that supplied the norms and motives of the whole subsequent development of the Church—the question regarding the origin of this thesis becomes peculiarly important.

(a) Its connexion with Jesus.—The powerful links which connect the statements regarding the Spirit with Jesus Himself are clearly recognizable. Jesus had earnestly considered the gravity of the struggle in which the disciples would have to engage after His death (Mt 10¹⁶⁻²³), and had given them the assurance that in that struggle the Spirit would guide them. In Mt 10²⁰, etc., the peculiar situation arising out of persecution unto death is met by a reference, not indeed to the name, but doubtless to the thought, of the Paraclete. Similarly, that confidence in the truth which makes absolute devotion to it the distinctive characteristic of the Christian community has its source in Jesus; it is an outcome of the warfare which Jesus waged against all untruthfulness; and the like holds good also of that purely religious conception of the apostolic vocation which proscribes all self-interested ends and lays upon the apostles the obligation of making the power of God manifest to the world.

(b) Its relation to the Johannine theology.—At the same time the statements regarding the Paraclete are connected at all points with the peculiar content of the Johannine theology: with its absolute rejection of the world, as being the realm of darkness, its bringing the gospel under the single aim of evoking faith in Jesus, its subordination of all external results to the spiritual process of generating the knowledge of God, its synthesis of historical recollection with the mystic vision that looks within and there becomes assured of communion with God. What had come down from Jesus Himself, and what had emerged in the historical development in which the writer had shared, are inextricably combined in these statements; nor is it possible for us to dissociate them any more than John himself would do.

LITERATURE.—Besides the Commentaries (esp. Meyer on Jn 14¹⁶ and Disterdieck on 1 Jn 2¹), J. Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. Talmud. et Rabbin., ed. B. Fischer, Leipzig, 1866-74, s.v.; Grimm-Thayer, Gr.-Eng. Lexicon of the NT, Edinburgh, 1890, s.v.; H. Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, do., 1880, s.v.; G. C. Knapp, Scripta Varii Argumenti, 2 vols., Halle, 1805; J. Pearson, An Exposition of the Creed, new ed., London, 1872, p. 499 ff.; J. C. Hare, The Mission of the Comforter, do., 1878; R. C. Trench, On the Authorized Version of the NT, do., 1859; J. B. Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision of the English NT, do., 1891, p. 55 ff.; E. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, Oxford, 1889, p. 82; J. Robson, The Holy Spirit the Paraclete, Edinburgh and London, 1894, p. 3 ff., Expt v. [1893-94] 320 ff.; G. G. Findlay, Expt xii. [1900-01] 445; M. Jastrow, Dictionary of the Targumim, etc., 2 vols., London and New York, 1903, s.v. פָּרֹכֶטֶת; J. Worthington-Atkin, The Paraklete, London, 1906; T. D. Bernard, The Central Teaching of Jesus Christ, do., 1892, p. 157 ff.; H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament, London, 1909, The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, do., 1912.

A. SCHLATTER.

PARADISE.—1. Etymology.—The word is most probably of Persian origin, and passed into Greek through Xenophon, and into Hebrew during the period of Persian influence. The LXX translators adopted the word as the translation of the Hebrew name for the Garden of Eden. Hence the term 'Paradise' is associated with the various lines of development connected with the conception of the primal Golden Age and the Garden of Delights. For a fuller discussion of the etymology see the art. 'Paradise' in HDB, and EBi, also Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. פָּרַדִּיז.

2. History of the conception.—A full discussion of the growth of the conception does not fall within the scope of this article. For thus the reader is referred to the artt. mentioned above, and to the list of literature there appended. It is necessary here to notice the main lines of development, in order to understand the place which the conception of Paradise has in the Apostolic Age.

(a) Primitive conceptions.—Paradise, or the Garden of Eden, belongs to one important group of motifs which comparative religion shows to be present in nearly all primitive religions, the group of ideas associated with a Golden Age, a time of supernatural fertility and prosperity, lost in the past and to be restored in the future. This with other groups of fundamental motifs existed in primitive Hebrew religion, possibly in a form derived from Babylonian religion, but was taken up and used by the prophets as the form into which their visions of the coming Kingdom of God were cast.

(b) Later spiritualization.—In the development of later Judaism, the conceptions of Paradise and the Tree of Life became spiritualized, and they were used as symbols of spiritual felicity and moral excellence, especially in Alexandrian Judaism.

(c) Mystic realism.—In Palestinian Judaism, Rabbinical theology developed these symbols along the line of a naïve realism. The term 'paradise,' apart from a few passages in which it means 'garden' or 'park,' as in late Hebrew, always has the technical sense of mystic theology or speculation, including trance and other ecstatic experiences. On the other hand, the Hebrew phrase 'Garden of Eden' is kept to describe the earthly or the heavenly place of bliss commonly denoted by the name 'Paradise.' The Rabbis developed a transcendental doctrine of Paradise, holding that it was one of the seven things (sometimes six), created before the world (Ber. Rabba, 20). There was also some doubt as to whether the earthly and the heavenly Paradise were to be identified or not.

(d) Special apocalyptic development.—In the Jewish apocalyptic literature Paradise, by a combination of elements from (a) and (c), came to be conceived of as one of the abodes of the righteous after death. It was in the third heaven (see art. HEAVEN), where God's throne was situated. The references are not always consistent, as there was no clear-cut consistent scheme of the future life in Jewish eschatology. The principal references for our period occur in the Apocalypse of Moses, more correctly known as the Books of Adam and Eve, in 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch; there is also one reference in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs ('Levi,' xviii. 10).

The most important passages in the Books of Adam and Eve and the parallel Apocalypse of Moses are: Ad. et Ev. xxv. 3: 'the Paradise of righteousness,' where God is seen sitting encompassed by angels; xxviii. 4: 'the paradise of "vision" and of God's command'; xlii. 5: 'Christ, descending on earth shall lead thy father Adam to Paradise to the tree of mercy' (this passage is an interpolation from the Christian apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus); Apoc. Mos. xxxvii. 5: 'Lift him up into Paradise unto the third Heaven, and leave him there until that fearful day of my reckoning,' etc.; here Paradise in the third heaven is contrasted with Paradise on earth where Adam's body is lying (xxxviii. 5; so also xl. 2). While there is apparently some confusion of thought, the central idea is that, in the Resurrection, Adam will be restored to Paradise, and that meanwhile his spirit (apparently) is in the heavenly Paradise, in the third heaven. Hence the conception of Paradise as an intermediate abode appears here.

There are several important passages in 4 Ezra, especially iii. 6, Paradise created before the world; iv. 8, Paradise in heaven; vii. 36, the Paradise of delight manifested in the last day over against Gehenna (so also vii. 123). In viii. 52, 'for you is opened Paradise, planted the Tree of life, the future Age prepared,' the conception of Paradise is parallel with that of Rev 2¹ 22⁷. The reader may be referred to G. H. Box, The Ezra Apocalypse, London, 1912, p. 195 f.

There are several important passages in 2 Enoch: viii. and ix., where Paradise is described as in the third heaven, the place where God rests, with all kinds of sensuous delights, and reserved for the eternal abode of the righteous; lxxv. 8, 10, at the completion of the Age, the righteous are collected and Paradise becomes their eternal dwelling-place; cf. also xlii. 3 and 2 Bar. li. 11, lix. 8.

(e) NT.—Thus we find the background of the conceptions which appear in the three passages in which the word occurs in the NT—

(1) In Lk 23⁴³, as in the Books of Adam and Eve, Paradise is conceived of as a place of intermediate abode, though whether in heaven or in Sheol is not clear.

(2) In 2 Co 12⁴ we have a combination of the Rabbinical conception of Paradise as denoting mystic contemplation and the trance-state, with the conception of Paradise as in the third heaven and the abode of God.

(3) In Rev 2⁷ as in 4 Ezra Paradise is presented as a reward in the future age for the righteous.

The probable reason for the scanty reference to Paradise in the NT has been pointed out in the art. HEAVEN. The movement of thought was clearly away from the sensuous and material side of Jewish eschatological expectation, even though in the later development of thought in the Church there was a return to this element, and a corresponding loss of the vitality and freshness characteristic of Pauline and Johannine eschatology. This return, however, lies beyond our period, and begins to be seen in the references of Irenæus and Tertullian.

LITERATURE.—See under art. HEAVEN. S. H. HOOKE.

PARCHMENT.—See WRITING.

PARDON.—See FORGIVENESS.

PARENTS.—See FAMILY.

PARMENAS.—Parmenas bore a Greek name, a shortened form of Parmenides. He is one of the 'Hellenist' Seven ordained to minister to the Hellenist widows (Ac 6³). W. A. SPOONER.

PAROUSIA.—1. General considerations.—In earlier literature on this subject the relation between the conceptions of the Parousia in Jewish apocalyptic and those in the NT is treated as an open question. Further study and research have made this attitude impossible. It is certain that the whole of the eschatological and apocalyptic background of primitive Christianity is due to its Jewish source. The question for modern scholarship has assumed a different form. It is necessary to attempt a systematic reconstruction, if this be possible, of the eschatological scheme underlying primitive Christianity in general, and each of the apostolic writers in particular. It is also necessary to discover, if possible, the direction in which those elements peculiar to Christianity have modified the original lines of the Jewish apocalyptic. Thirdly, it is necessary to form some estimate of the place of the eschatology, and especially of its central conception, the Parousia of Christ, in the essential nature of Christianity. In his Paul and his Interpreters (p. 240 f.) Schweitzer has the following pertinent remarks :

'Not until Pauline eschatology gives an answer to all the "idle" questions of this kind which can be asked will it be really understood and explained. And it must be somehow possible, by the discovery of its inner logic, to reconstruct it from the scattered statements in the documents. We have no right to assume that for Paul there existed in his expectation manifest obscurities, much less that he had overlooked contradictions in it.'

The attitude here indicated towards Pauline eschatology is necessary towards the whole of primitive apostolic eschatology. At the same time, it must be recognized that the various apocalypses of the 1st cent. before and after the birth of Christ do not by any means present a coherent scheme of eschatology, and it is possible that the same vagueness and inconsistency in detail will be found to characterize the early Christian apocalyptic, including the Pauline.

For supplementary discussion of various points connected with the subject of the Parousia the reader is referred to the articles in this Dictionary on IMMORTALITY, RESURRECTION, HEAVEN, etc. For fuller discussion of the stage of eschatological belief represented by the Synoptic Gospels see the relevant articles in the DCG.

2. The Parousia in the literature of the Apostolic Age.—i. THE ACTS.—In Acts we come closest perhaps to the practical working of the eschatological beliefs in the early Church, and find the most direct expression of them in the early apostolic preaching. Whatever may be the opinion as to the literary tradition at work in the speeches of Acts, and the accuracy with which the words of the various speakers have been reported, there can be no doubt that they are a faithful representation of the kind of preaching that marked the early stages of the growth of the Church. These speeches are almost wholly eschatological.

In the first two addresses attributed to St. Peter, the Parousia is regarded as imminent, and baptism is the only way of escape for those who desire to flee from the coming woes and participate in the 'times of refreshing.' The rapid growth of the Church is represented as the filling up of the number of those destined to be saved (2⁴⁷). Salvation is not merely from sin and its consequences, though that is never out of sight, but from coming wrath and for the enjoyment of future blessings. In Acts salvation has always an eschatological colouring.

In the Pauline speeches it appears in the same way. In the speech at Athens the final appeal is emphasized by the announcement of an appointed day in which God will judge the world by Christ, and the resurrection of Christ is assigned as the pledge of the truth of this announcement. In the Miletus address the apostasy before the end is referred to. In the address before Agrippa the hope of the Resurrection is represented as the hope of the Jewish nation. Moreover, the practical effect of this immediate expectation of the Parousia upon the life of the Church is clearly seen in its abandonment of property and in its communistic organization. It was the particular form of their Messianic expectation that marked out the Christians among their own countrymen as a sect (αἱρεσις, 24¹⁴). But it is not easy to find any trace of the special line of development which we shall follow out in St. Paul's correspondence. In St. Luke's representation of St. Paul's eschatology we see only the orthodox Pharisee, believing in the resurrection of just and unjust. The nature of the Book of Acts, and its object, make it unfair to expect more than a reflexion of the external current of feeling and action in the early years of the Church. This the book gives us with fidelity, and we cannot expect an insight into the deeper streams of thought that manifest themselves in St. Paul's correspondence, and in the later developments of the Johannine literature.

ii. ST. PAUL.—The general tendency of modern scholarship is to find a development in the eschatology of St. Paul from the 'cruder' eschatology of the earlier Epistles, e.g. 1 and 2 Thessalonians, through the central group of Epistles, Romans and Corinthians, to the Epistles of the Captivity such as Philippians,* and possibly Ephesians, which, if not by St. Paul, is generally recognized as Pauline.

R. H. Charles finds a stage of development between 1 and 2 Corinthians, but for convenience we may take the three main groups and examine their view of the Parousia separately.

(a) 1 and 2 Thessalonians.—In both these Epistles the Parousia occupies a foremost place. It is not necessary to discuss here the Pauline authorship of 2 Thess. For the best and most recent statement of the whole position the reader is referred to Kirsopp Lake's The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul. It is also a tenable position that 2 Thess. is the earlier of the two. But the two are in any case so close together in time that they may be taken together as they stand to represent St. Paul's views on the Parousia about A.D. 51 (see art. THESSALONIANS, EPISTLES TO THE).

The passages in 1 and 2 Thess. are important as much for what they imply as for what they explicitly state. They show how largely the eschatological element bulked in the primitive apostolic preaching. The most important passage in 1 Thess. is 4¹³⁻⁵¹. The following are the principal points arising from it.

It implies that St. Paul had taught his converts the near approach of the Parousia of Christ and the consequent blessing, apparently on earth, of the living believers. But it also implies that he had not told them what place the believers who died in the interval of expectation would have. The implication is that the Thessalonians supposed the dead would lose their part in the Messianic Kingdom, and were sorrowing accordingly.

It also seems that St. Paul does not supply his solution to the question ready-made from Jewish apocalyptic material, but bases it on two grounds: (1) his own deduction from the death and resurrection of Jesus (v.¹⁴), and (2) a word of the Lord (v.¹⁶). Of course, this may be disputed, but to the present writer the passage is important evidence for the working of St. Paul's mind on the questions of the eschatological scheme, and for the method which he applied to their solution.

Hence St. Paul infers from the death and resurrection of Jesus, probably by way of his own fundamental view of the vital union between Christ and the believer, that as death is not a bar to Christ's entering on His Messianic Kingdom, neither will it prevent believers who die from sharing that Kingdom. The Resurrection is the key to both difficulties. God raised Christ and will raise believers in Christ for the Kingdom. That is the fundamental position and the principle upon which it is based. Then the details are apparently supplied from the primitive oral tradition of our Lord's teaching as known to St. Paul, although not preserved in the Synoptists (ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου). (For the interpretation of ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου as referring to the oral tradition rather than to a special revelation cf. 1 Co 7¹⁰ 9¹⁴ 11²³ 15³.) Accordingly, the order of events as presented in this passage is: (1) the resurrection of Christ takes place; (2) during the present generation ('we which are alive and remain') Christ will descend into the air with a word of command, the archangel's voice, and the trumpet of God; (3) thereupon the dead in Christ rise first; (4) after a very brief interval of time, the living will be 'caught up,' with the raised dead, to meet the Lord in the air; (5) both living and dead will then be 'for ever with the Lord.' The Apostle does not say where, on earth or in heaven, nor does he speak here of any change in the living who are caught up. (6) He goes on to distinguish this event from the 'day of the Lord' (5²). He implies that they know accurately the details about the 'times and seasons,' including the coming of the day of the Lord, whereas he had previously implied that they were not acquainted with the event described in 4¹³⁻¹⁵, 'I would not have you ignorant.' The 'day of the Lord' comes as a thief in the night; it brings judgment upon the sinners, those who are 'of the night.' Believers will not be overtaken by it. God has not appointed them to wrath but to obtain salvation 'through our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep we should live together with him.'

* It may be remarked that Kirsopp Lake now argues for an earlier date for Philippians, during the Apostle's stay at Ephesus. This will bring it into the Romans and Corinthians group (Exp, 8th ser., vii. [1914] 481 ff.).

This passage seems to distinguish the Parousia proper, the coming of Christ for the saints, from the 'day of the Lord' with its judgments. It is not easy to reconcile 2 Thess. with 1 Thess. except on the hypothesis that 2 Thess. is prior to 1 Thess., and that, in endeavouring to meet difficulties raised in reply to 2 Thess., the Apostle had worked out the form of Parousia doctrine which appears in 1 Thess. Otherwise, if the usual order be retained, the opening verses of 2 Thess. suggest that St. Paul had not realized the incompatibility of the new outline given in 1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁵ with the older traditional view represented by 2 Th 1.

In this passage St. Paul represents the believers who are suffering persecution as about to be delivered from it by the revelation of Christ with flaming fire from heaven. Christ's appearance brings cessation of persecution (ἀπαύρι) for the persecuted saints, and tribulation for the persecutors—the traditional view of current Jewish apocalyptic (cf. Ass. Mos. x. 10, 2 Bar. li. 1-6, lxxxii. 1-2). There is no mention of any resurrection of the dead or catching up of dead and living into the air, and it is rather a straining of the text to read all this into the one word ἀπαύρι. The only natural alternatives are either that St. Paul has drawn his account of the Parousia here from the older traditional view, unconscious of the inconsistency with his new view in 1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁵, or that the apocalyptic parts of 2 Thess. are not Pauline but interpolated, a view which has not been without support.

The 2nd chapter of 2 Thess. gives further important details as to the order of events, and also implies that all the details were already known to the readers and should have preserved them from the panic into which they had been thrown, apparently by a forged letter or false prediction (2²). The cause of the panic was that they had been persuaded to interpret their persecutions as a sign that the 'day of the Lord' was already present (ἐνέρηκεν, 2²). St. Paul points out that before the 'day of the Lord' and before the Parousia two events had to occur, as they knew already. 'The apostasy,' not 'a falling away,' but the well-known apostasy of current apocalyptic which we find in Daniel and in the apocalyptic portions of the Synoptics, had to take place. It was already working secretly, but had not yet reached its climax. Then, the 'man of lawlessness,' the Antichrist of the apocalyptic, was to be revealed, who would bring to a climax the rebellion against God and Christ, and bring about the Divine intervention of the Parousia which would destroy him and his followers.

The curious cryptic passage (2⁶⁻⁷) concerning the presence of a restraining force has given much trouble to commentators, but does not touch our question of the Parousia. It is evidently perfectly intelligible to the readers (καὶ νῦν τὸ κατέχον ὀδῶν), and seems to belong to the period when it was necessary to use cryptic references to Rome and Imperial things (cf. Exp. 7th ser., x. [1910] 374 f.). For a fuller discussion see Bousset, Der Antichrist, p. 77 ff.

A comparison of the two Epistles shows the following order of events:

1 Thess.	2 Thess.
(a) Resurrection of Christ.	(a) No mention of Resurrection as basis of teaching.
(b) Interval of waiting, some believers fall asleep.	(b) Saints persecuted.
(c) Descent of Christ into the air, with shout, trumpet, etc.	(c) Apostasy sets in.
(d) Resurrection of dead.	(d) The cryptic restraining influence is removed.
(e) Rapture of living who remain and dead who have been raised.	(e) The Antichrist is revealed and manifests his power by miracles.
(f) All are for ever with the Lord.	(f) The Parousia takes place accompanied by angels and flaming fire.
(g) Coming of the 'day of the Lord' and judgment for sinners.	(g) It causes deliverance to the saints, destruction to Antichrist, and judgment to the followers of Antichrist.

The point of view is so different that it certainly makes it extremely difficult to maintain, at the same time, the Pauline authorship of both passages and the theory of a rigidly consistent Pauline scheme of eschatology.

(b) The second group of Epistles, Romans and Corinthians, offers a number of important passages, but very few with such details of the order of the apocalyptic scheme as Thessalonians.

(1) In Rom. the whole outlook upon the Christian position is coloured by the thought of the future, the Parousia and its attendant results. But the Parousia itself is hardly mentioned directly. The picture of the future presented in Rom. is as follows: the general statement of a coming time of wrath and judgment when God will judge the secrets of men through Jesus Christ, according to St. Paul's gospel (2⁵⁻⁶, 16); those who are justified look forward to the glory of God; they will be saved from wrath through Christ (5¹⁰; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰), they will reign in life (5¹⁷); the justified have been predestined for this purpose and will finally be conformed to the image of Christ (8²⁹, 30); their bodies will be quickened through the power of the Spirit of Christ already dwelling in them (8¹¹); when they are manifested the whole creation also will be delivered from the bondage of corruption (8¹⁹⁻²¹); when the fullness of the Gentiles is come in (i.e. the full number of those predestined from the Gentiles for salvation), the elect of Israel, all Israel, will be saved (11²⁵, 26); 'salvation is nearer than when we believed' (13¹¹); all must stand before the tribunal of God (14¹⁰); Satan will shortly be bruised under the saints' feet (16²⁰).

It is evidently difficult to draw clear conclusions from these passages. They suggest rather a fluid than a rigid eschatology. They present the appearance of the gradual, half-conscious modification of the older lines of eschatology by the working of the new principle of the consequences of the Resurrection, an element which is of course wholly foreign to the Jewish schemes of apocalyptic, and peculiar to the Christian scheme. The universalism of 3²², 28, 11²⁵ is in apparent contrast with the older eschatological conception of a fixed number to be saved as reflected in 8²⁹, 11¹⁷ (cf. Lk 14²², Ac 3²¹). The chief point as to the Parousia is the concentration of interest upon the working of the principle of 'life,' which embraces both moral character and physical change, the two forming one correlated process of transformation, consummated at the Parousia.

(2) In Cor. we have a number of important and explicit passages requiring careful examination. The most important passage in 1 Corinthians is the 15th chapter. But there are a few shorter passages that must be noted in passing—1 Co 17⁸: the Corinthians are awaiting the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, who will establish them blameless in His day, 'the day of our Lord Jesus Christ'; 3¹³⁻¹⁵: 'the day' will try every man's work with fire. There will be rewards for those whose work abides, and those whose work is consumed will themselves be saved, but as through fire; 4⁵: when the Lord comes, in contrast with man's day (ανθρωπινῆς ἡμέρας) the secrets will be revealed, and praise will be from God; 5⁵: the incestuous man is delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in 'the day of the Lord Jesus'; 6^{2, 3}: a time is coming when the saints will judge the world, and even the angels; 7²⁹: 'the time is short' (ὁ καιρὸς συνεσταλμένος ἐστὶ), probably meaning that the interval of waiting for the Parousia has been shortened; cf. Mt 24¹, but the phrase is obscure; 11^{25, 26}: the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is directly connected with the Parousia, as it is in the Synoptic account of the Institution.

These passages all point to the same background of expectation, but offer very little basis for the reconstruction of a definite Pauline scheme of eschatology. In ch. 15, however, we have more detail, and once more the whole conception is dominated by the Resurrection. The first passage is 15²⁰⁻²⁸. The order is—first, the resurrection of Christ, who is the ἀπαρχή, the firstfruits of the working of the new principle of life, in contrast with the results of the principle of death introduced by Adam (cf. Ro 5¹²⁻¹⁴). Then those who are Christ's rise at His Parousia if they are dead, or are changed if they remain alive (cf. v. 5¹). This leads up to the consummation (τὸ τέλος) when Christ hands over the Kingdom to God the Father. The duration of the three stages is left undefined. The interval between the resurrection of Christ and that of believers is indirectly limited to one generation ('we shall not all sleep'), but the duration of the interval between this event, evidently the Parousia of 1 Th 4¹³⁻²⁰, and the complete subjugation of every enemy, including death itself, is left quite undetermined. This interval may be filled in by the events implied in previous passages, the coming of the day of the Lord, testing of every man's work, assigning of rewards, judgment of the world and of angels, destruction of Antichrist. But so far the distinction between the Parousia proper and the day of the Lord, suggested in 1 Thess., seems to be maintained. The description of the Parousia is more fully developed in vv. 50-58, with a fairly clear indication of the logical connexion between the account of the event and St. Paul's view of Christ's post-Resurrection state. Christ's present state is spirit, incorruptible, not flesh and blood. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God. Hence the point left undefined in 1 Thess. must be worked out here—the question of the form of existence of the living and the dead at the Parousia. The authority for the transference of οὐ in v. 5¹ to the second clause is strong, but not so strong as that for the generally received text; and it is more than probable that the change was due to the difficulty that arose out of the non-fulfilment of the expectation. But the sense of the passage, and the supporting parallel in 1 Th 4, require the reading 'we shall not all sleep.' The solution of the problem is that all are changed, both dead and living. 'The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living) shall be changed.' The change is instantaneous (ἐν ὁρώμῳ) and takes place at the last trump. But no mention is made here of a rapture into the air, as in 1 Th 4. Hence it would seem that St. Paul's interest was turning to the manner of the Parousia, to the application of the principle displayed in Christ's resurrection, as he had apprehended it. It is a spiritualization, arising not from the difficulty of squaring eschatological predictions with their non-fulfilment, but from the inner logic of a view of the Resurrection which compelled St. Paul to cast his eschatological conceptions into that mould.

In the Second Epistle Charles sees an advance on the First. The interval is very short, but it is possible that between the two letters the Apostle had grasped more clearly the consequences of his own reasoning in ch. 15 of the First Epistle. The probable order and date of the three Epistles is: 1 Cor., spring of A.D. 56; 2 Cor., autumn of the same year; and Rom., early in A.D. 57. Of course the point cannot be debated here. The reader must refer to the abundant literature on the subject, especially Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul; Sanday-Headlam, Commentary on Romans; and Robertson-Plummer on 1 Corinthians. But the main point is that the three Epistles are all very close together in time, making the view of development somewhat difficult, though it is not impossible. In Charles's view the Apostle in 2 Cor. arrives at the conclusion that the resurrection of the believer, his assumption of the glorified spiritual state, takes place immediately after death, and not at the Parousia. There are difficulties in this view which will be noticed as we examine the passages in 2 Corinthians. The crucial passage is in the 5th chapter, which forms the conclusion and climax of a long argument starting in ch. 3 and developing the conception of life, 'the ministration of the Spirit.' In 4¹³⁻¹⁴ the Apostle argues that God who raised Christ must on the same principle raise believers and 'present' them together on some unspecified occasion, apparently the Parousia. Meanwhile the spiritual process is at work, the inner man is being created anew day by day (4¹⁶). Hence 'the taking down' (κατάλυσις, 5¹) of the earthly tent-dwelling, the outer man of 4¹⁶, need not occasion alarm or grief, because the believer is aware that he possesses an eternal abode with God in the heavens, i.e. the glorified mode of existence already described in 1 Co 15, and implied in 2 Co 4¹⁶⁻¹⁸. Charles interprets this verse, 5¹, to mean that upon death the believer immediately possesses this glorious dwelling. But the contrast between 'unclothed,' ἐκδύσασθαι, and 'clothed upon,' ἐπενδύσασθαι, is a serious difficulty. The passage as it stands seems to imply a contrast between two states in the future, one of which is desired, and the other distasteful. The Apostle is not longing for death, since death involves the 'unclothed' state, being 'found' naked at the Parousia, but he longs rather to be clothed upon, to be changed while still living, that what is mortal in him may be, not put off, but swallowed up by the life which is already at work. This view, of course, preserves the importance of the Parousia as an object of hope. If the attainment of the exceeding and eternal weight of glory follows immediately upon death, then death rather than the Parousia is to be desired as the consummation of the Kingdom. The consummation takes on an individualistic form instead of the corporate hope of the Parousia. The principal difficulty in the way of accepting Charles's interpretation is the phrase 'not be found naked,' which seems to imply the possibility of such a circumstance, and would seem to refer to the unclothed condition of the spirit in the interval between death and the Parousia. This unclothed condition would not ultimately prove a bar to entrance upon the blessings of the Kingdom, since the triumph of life was assured by the resurrection of Christ, but it was not a desirable condition in itself, although to be at home with the Lord was a counterbalancing consideration. Hence the πάντοτε: whatever state may be the immediate lot of the believer, there is ground for full confidence. If Charles's view be accepted, the form of hope connected with the Parousia will be the hope of a manifestation of a state already attained in the case of believers who die, and of a transformation for those who survive. The Apostle, however, continues to the end to lay stress upon the latter aspect of the Parousia, as will be seen, and to the present writer it appears difficult to accept the view that in 2 Cor. St. Paul advances to the view that believers enter the glorious state immediately upon death.

(c) The third group of Pauline Epistles, Ephesians, Philippians (but for Philippians see note above), and Colossians, certainly represents the last stage in the development of the Pauline eschatology. We perceive at once the predominance of the larger thought of consummation expressed in the word ἀνακεφαλαιώσις, the recapitulation of all things in Christ. But it is necessary to examine the place assigned to the Parousia in this great and comprehensive conception of a progressive summing-up of all things in Christ. It might seem that the progressive conception of the Kingdom implied in Eph 1¹⁰ excludes a catastrophic conception of its coming such as the Parousia implies. But there are passages which cannot be overlooked in this connexion—Eph 1¹³⁻¹⁴: the Spirit is the earnest of the inheritance until the redemption of the possession, where the redemption seems to imply the Parousia, although it is possible to interpret the sentence as the entrance of believers upon the inheritance of glory by death or any other means; 4³⁰: 'the day of redemption' also suggests the Parousia in the most natural interpretation of the words; 5²⁷: 'that he might present it to himself' (cf. 2 Co 4¹⁴) suggests the Parousia.

In Col 1²³ the same sense of 'present' appears. 3⁴ describes the Parousia as the time of manifestation both for Christ and for believers.

In Phil., probably the latest of the three Epistles, we have the phrase 'the day of Jesus Christ' (1⁶), 'the day of Christ' (1¹⁰ 2¹⁶); but the principal passage is in 3²⁰⁻¹, where the Apostle says that the citizenship of the saints is in heaven, whence they are awaiting as Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ, who will transform their bodies of humiliation into the likeness of His own body of glory. This passage seems fairly explicit evidence that the Parousia still remained in the mind of the Apostle as the central hope, not merely as a moment of manifestation of glory already attained, but as a crisis of sudden transformation, the 'catastrophic' climax of a process already long at work. He can also still speak of believers as written in 'the book of life' (4³).

Thus, in spite of the obvious development of thought in this group, the Parousia still remains to the Apostle what it had become in 1 Th 4 and 1 Co 15, the central point of hope. The principal difficulty, however, as to whether the dead receive their 'body of glory' after death or at the Parousia must be left undecided. The present writer inclines to the latter view, but the weighty authority of Charles in favour of the former shows that it has strong grounds of support.

The general conclusion to which an examination of St. Paul's teaching on the Parousia brings us may be given as follows.

The Pauline view of the Parousia is taken over from current Jewish-Palestinian apocalyptic, but is progressively modified by his view of the resurrection of Christ.

The process of modification leaves traces of unreconciled positions. The demand for a logical and self-consistent scheme of eschatology fails. The direction in which the view of the Parousia undergoes development appears in the increasing importance attached to the working out of the 'law of life,' first in Christ and then in believers, resulting finally in a complete moral and physical transformation expressed by the word 'glory.' Along with this stress on the transformation we find a gradual disappearance of the outlines of the traditional scheme of apocalyptic. The Parousia remains central all through the Pauline correspondence, but it becomes increasingly the consummation of the victory of life, rather than an act among a series in the passage of the great eschatological drama. With this change in the view of the Parousia comes a change in the conception of the drama; it becomes the working out of a great moral purpose of world-wide extent, embracing heavenly, earthly, and infernal existence, and summing up all life and all activities in Christ. But it would not be true to say that the catastrophic element, the idea of a final act of Divine intervention, is entirely eliminated in the closing Epistles.

Space forbids a fuller discussion of many important points in the summing up of Pauline doctrine, and we must pass to the Catholic Epistles, which do not add much to the development of the subject, and then to the most important of all—the Fourth Gospel.

iii. CATHOLIC EPISTLES AND PASTORALS.—The Catholic Epistles, with the possible exception of Hebrews, do not show development. They rather exhibit the tendency which appears more markedly at the beginning of the 2nd cent. to lay stress on the Jewish and material side of the Parousia, and to emphasize its literal fulfilment as the expectation grew fainter in the Church.

(a) Hebrews presents a double tendency at work. There is the evident insistence on the nearness of the Parousia as a stimulus to those who were losing heart (cf. 9²⁸ 10³⁷). But on the other hand there is the view, characteristic of Alexandrian Judaism and of St. Paul's later eschatology according to Charles, that the spirits of the righteous are already perfected, if we may so interpret 12²³, the same expression being used of the present state of Christ (cf. 5⁹ 7²³). Hence the Epistle to the Hebrews seems to offer the same perplexing appearance of the existence of contradictory positions side by side, the fact being probably, as with St. Paul, that the catastrophic view of the Parousia was not felt to conflict with the view that the believers entered upon their glorious and perfected state immediately after death. The Parousia was still needed as a theodicy, a manifestation of the triumph of the Kingdom.

(b) James has the phrase 'the coming of the Lord' twice—5⁷⁻⁸—as the hope of those who suffer oppression. The coming of the Lord is the time of judgment and vindication. The point of view is that of 2 Th 1, but there is no indication of the special place of the Parousia in the eschatological scheme. It is regarded as near.

(c) 1 Peter has the Parousia far more prominent. The general outline is the same as that of 2 Thess. Those to whom the Epistle is addressed are suffering severe persecution, but 'the revelation of Jesus Christ'—the writer's phrase for the Parousia—is at hand, expected in the lifetime of the writer (5¹⁻⁴). It will bring salvation, glory, and reward to the righteous, and judgment to the sinner (4¹⁸). The general judgment seems to be associated with the Parousia. It is the end of all things (4⁷). The Parousia and the day of the Lord are identified, and there is no such separation suggested as that in 1 Th 4. The sufferings of believers are a sign that the day of the Lord is setting in; it is the last time; judgment must begin at the house of God. The principal interest in the Parousia is wholly different from that of St. Paul, and there is no sign of any independent development, or of the influence of St. Paul's thinking, as far as eschatology is concerned. The Parousia is the crisis of the coming of the Kingdom of God.

(d) 2 Peter and Jude.—The author of 2 Peter connects the Transfiguration and the words addressed to Christ at that time with the Parousia. Prophecy relating to the Parousia there received its confirmation (1¹⁹). The Parousia is identified with the 'day of God.' At the Parousia all things will be destroyed by fire, and the righteous will receive new heavens and a new earth (3¹²); it will come as a thief (v. 10); the apparent delay is due to the long-suffering of God. The author of Jude quotes the description of the Parousia from 1 En. i. 9, and agrees with 2 Peter in his description of the apostasy of the 'last days.'

(e) The Pastoral Epistles may be touched on here, as they cannot well be included in a discussion of the Pauline correspondence without assuming an authenticity which criticism does not concede.

In 1 Tim. there is very little eschatological reference. The 'last times' are come (4¹), and there is a vague general mention of the appearing of Christ (6^{14, 15}), as the time of judgment and reward. In 2 Tim.—the Epistle whose authenticity is, in part, most generally admitted—the eschatological colouring is much more evident. In 1¹⁸ 'that day' is the day of the Lord and of judgment; 2¹² speaks of the future reign of saints with Christ, of His denial of those who deny Him (cf. Mt 10³³, Lk 9²⁶). In 3¹³ the apostasy of the last days is spoken of; in 4¹ Christ, identified with God, is about to judge living and dead, at (if κατά be read) His appearing and Kingdom (but κατά is doubtful, and possibly τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν is the object of διαμαρτύρομαι). In 4⁸ the writer speaks of 'that day' as that of the appearing of Christ, when he and all those who have loved Christ's appearing will receive the crown of righteousness. It is tempting to take the crown of righteousness as the consummation of that process of which St. Paul speaks in Ro 5—the complete transformation of the righteous into the likeness of Christ. But it is difficult to maintain that the Epistle, which if Pauline must be the last of St. Paul's letters, shows much trace of the eschatology which is characteristic of the last group of Epistles described above.

In Tit. there is the same vagueness of reference as in 1 Tim. The passages are 1² 2^{13, 14, 17}. It is a characteristic of the Pastoral Epistles that in speaking of the Parousia they use the term ἐπιφάνεια, and identify Christ with God, as the Saviour whose appearance is awaited.

iv. THE JOHANNINE LITERATURE.—(a) The Apocalypse.—For a detailed account of the apocalyptic scheme presented in this book the reader must refer to Commentaries on the Apocalypse. Here we can only point out the place of the Parousia in the general plan, and discuss the nature of the writer's conception. In this book the Parousia takes place at the close of a series of judgments, the 'woes of the Messianic Age.' The apostasy has fully developed itself, the 'earth-dwellers' have been deceived by the False Prophet, Antichrist, into rendering obedience to the mystic dragon, the Beast with the seven heads. The appointed number of martyrs has been slain. Then the Lamb rides forth out of heaven followed by the armies of the saints, to make war on the Beast and his armies. The defeat of the Beast and False Prophet, and the destruction of their followers by the sword that goes out of Christ's mouth, take place. This is the Parousia as the writer of the Apocalypse conceives of it. It is immediately followed by the binding of Satan in the abyss, and the resurrection of those who were slain during the tribulation of the apostasy period. Then comes the millennial reign, closed by the attack of Gog and Magog, their defeat, the passing away of the heavens and earth, the final judgment of the dead, and the coming in of the new heavens and earth. The book closes with the Church's prayer that the long-delayed Advent may take place. The nature of the imagery makes it difficult to define precisely the writer's attitude to various questions connected with the Parousia.

Several important points remain doubtful:

(a) It is not clear who are the different classes of 'saved' persons, and what part they have in the Parousia and the subsequent Kingdom. We have the 'elders,' seen in heaven from the first (4¹), the souls of the martyrs under the altar in heaven (6⁹), the mystic number of sealed persons from the twelve tribes (7^{4, 14}), a great multitude from every nation and tribe (7^{9, 14}), the company of those who had gained the victory over the Beast (15²), the bride of the Lamb (19^{7, 8}), the armies in heaven (19¹⁴), the risen martyrs (20⁴), the holy city, identified with the bride of the Lamb (21^{2, 10}), and finally the nations of the saved who walk in the light of the city (21²⁴; but probably τῶν σωζομένων should be omitted). It is impossible to say how far these represent the same class under different aspects, and how far they represent really different classes of persons who play a part in the great final drama. If the writer conceives of those who are in heaven as having been brought there by a previous 'rapture' and change, such as is described in 1 Th 4¹³⁻²⁰, he is silent about it. The Parousia for him occurs in ch. 19. The most obvious conclusion is that those in heaven are the believers who have died. Yet the only persons represented as raised at the Parousia are the martyrs (20⁴).

(b) The nature of the change at the close of the Millennium is not clear. It is plain that the writer does not agree with the author of 2 Peter in identifying the 'day of God,' the destruction of heaven and earth by fire, with the Parousia. There is also no explanation of the transference of the saved from the old earth to the new.

(c) The writer's view of the Church, and the Church's part in the Parousia, are also not clear. Apparently he identifies the Church with the Bride and the Holy City. The marriage of the Lamb seems to coincide with the victory over the Beast, i.e. the Parousia. But whether the dead and living believers are raised and changed in order to appear at the Parousia, and whether they are the armies in heaven, are not clear.

In general, we can only say that the writer does not show any signs of the influence of the creative work of St. Paul or of the Fourth Gospel in his treatment of the questions raised above. His greatness lies in another direction from that of the independent thinking of St. Paul. He makes full use of all the existing apocalyptic imagery and machinery to depict the final triumph of God and Christ over all the forces of evil at work in his day that seemed so invincible.

(d) The Fourth Gospel.—The outward change in passing from the Apocalypse to the Fourth Gospel is immense, although one note is fundamental and common to the eschatology of both—'I have overcome the world.' In the Fourth Gospel we are back in the atmosphere of creative thought, the re-interpretation of the old data in the light of the fuller meaning of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ. The important passages fall into two groups.

(a) Chs. 5-6.—In these chapters we have a group of important eschatological sayings. It is possible that the original order of the chapters is 6-5, and the sequence of eschatological thought is improved if the chapters are taken in this order. In ch. 6 the discourse arises out of the miracle of the loaves. The manner of participation in eternal life is developed. It is necessary to eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of Man in order to have life. Those who eat of this bread will live for ever; Christ will raise them up 'at the last day.' The last phrase is repeated four times (vv. 39, 40, 44, 54).^{*} Although the possession of eternal life by faith (6⁴⁸) is unaffected by death, yet the 'last day' seems to be regarded as the consummation, the display of the victory of life, occupying the place that the Parousia does in St. Paul's later thought.

In ch. 5 a discussion arising out of the healing of the impotent man leads to a statement of the relation between the Son and the Father, and of the activities committed by the Father to the Son. The Son does all that the Father does (5¹⁹)—raises and quickens the dead, gives life to those who believe, and executes all judgment in His character of Son of Man. In connexion with the last statement we have the important passage 5²⁸⁻²⁹, which Charles considers an interpolation, and alien to the eschatology of the Gospel. It arises, however, naturally from the statement about the judgment executed by the Son, although it is logically unconnected with the view of resurrection in ch. 6, as the result of possessing eternal life. Both St. Paul and the author of the Fourth Gospel practically regard resurrection as the working out of the principle of life in Christ. Hence St. Paul, if he held the doctrine of a general resurrection from his traditional Pharisaic eschatology, does not speak of it in his Epistles,† and its mention here, if the passage be retained, can be regarded only as the reflexion of the current belief in a general resurrection.

But the references to the future—'the last day,' 'the hour is coming'—are vague and not distinctly connected with a Parousia. For a fuller discussion of their bearing see art. RESURRECTION.

(β) The Supper discourses (chs. 13-17)—corresponding to the eschatological discourses of the Synoptists—contain the central statements of the Gospel concerning the Parousia. In 14-3 we have the promise of the return: 'if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also'; 14¹⁸, 'I will not leave you orphans: I come to you.' In 16¹⁶ the disciples are told that after a little while they will see Him, and are represented as puzzled by the 'little while.' He explains that the present is the time of sorrow, but that He will see them again, and no man shall take their joy from them (16-). In 17²⁴ He prays that those whom the Father has given Him may be with Him where He is. In 21- the possibility is implied that the disciple whom Jesus loved may abide on earth until He comes, although this is explained as purely hypothetical by the writer of the Gospel.

It is difficult, in view of these passages, to accept unreservedly E. F. Scott's view that the author of the Gospel is abandoning entirely the view of a future Parousia, and that he has identified the Parousia entirely with our Lord's assumption of a spiritual state after His resurrection. The coming of the Spirit is always distinguished from the Parousia, and spoken of as the consequence of Christ's departure and absence. Hence Scott has to argue that the account of the coming of the Spirit is not logically connected with the writer's view of a present Parousia of Christ in His spiritual condition. It appears rather that the eschatology of the Fourth Gospel does not fit the mould into which Scott seeks to press it. The fact is that while the Parousia is retained as part of the belief of the Church, and is even felt by the author of the Gospel to have a definite place in our Lord's attitude towards the future and to be necessary as the consummation of the Church's hope, yet, like St. Paul, his interest is not in the purely eschatological aspect of the subject but in the working out of the consequences of life. Indeed, St. Paul is more occupied with the Parousia as the supreme display of the working out of this risen life in the bodies and spirits of believers. But St. John has hardly the same sense of the vital relation of the Parousia to the life, since his conception of eternal life in the believer is timeless. The difference in his attitude towards the Resurrection corresponds to his attitude towards the Parousia. The Resurrection is the central point of St. Paul's working out of his new lines. For St. John the central thing is that the Eternal Life, the Father's Logos, the Word of Life, has touched and entered into human life, and thus made it capable of a Divine transformation which takes place now. The believer cannot come into judgment, and has already passed from death to life. God dwells in him and he in God. Hence while the Parousia may be retained as a future hope and stimulus to holiness of life, yet it is not in any way such a crisis of attainment as it appears to be in St. Paul's thought. St. Paul desires to attain to the resurrection from among the dead. For St. John death is past already, and the believer in Christ will never die. Hence Charles seems to sum up the Johannine view of the Parousia more truly than Scott, when he distinguishes between the view of the Parousia as a future event and the conception of it as a spiritual experience. It is the fuller expression of the latter that constitutes the great advance of the Fourth Gospel.

(c) The Epistles.—The Epistles present the same two-fold view. On the one hand, the Antichrist belief is explained as the working of opposition to the Christian revelation of the Father in the Son; the Son of God has come, and believers already dwell in God and have no fear of a day of judgment. On the other hand, there is the expectation of Christ's appearing, the desire not to be ashamed before Him at His coming, the expectation of being like Christ when He is manifested, and of seeing Him as He is.

The Johannine view of the Parousia does not seem to be occupied with the problem that occupied St. Paul as to the place of the body in the scheme of redemption. Apparently the author of the Fourth Gospel has either transcended the conception of the material expression of life altogether or has not felt the pressure of the problem. Probably the truth is that he is so much occupied with the moral expression of the life, the life of the spirit, that the mode of expression of personal identity did not greatly trouble him. The post-Resurrection appearances of Christ cannot safely be taken as an indication of the writer's view of the resurrection state of the believer. When he speaks at all of such a state it is always in spiritual terms; even the word 'glory' has a more exclusively spiritual and moral sense than ^{*} Wendt's excision of the words 'in the last day' in each of these passages is wholly unjustifiable.

† The author of Acts, in his report of St. Paul's speech before Felix, attributes to him a belief in the resurrection of just and unjust (Ac 24¹⁵).

with St. Paul. The consummation desired by Christ is that believers may be 'with him,' may be one as the Father and the Son are. He has given them already the glory which the Father gave Him; when He appears they shall be like Him. Hence what is characteristic in St. John is the liberation of the thought of the Parousia from conceptions of time and space, while he still retains, like St. Paul, something of the older point of view. Space forbids a discussion of Schweitzer's ingenious but unconvincing theory of a sacramental quasi-material eschatology, where matter through the incarnation and glorifying of Christ becomes the vehicle of the Spirit's operation, and so, working by the sacraments in the believer, transforms the purely material elements of his body into what is eternal. But this view suggests that an exhaustive inquiry into both the Pauline and the Johannine attitude towards the relation between matter and spirit is greatly needed in the interests of eschatology.

v. THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS.—The place of the Parousia in the Apostolic Fathers must be dealt with briefly.

The Parousia is connected by 1 Clement with a future resurrection of the just (xxiv. 1, xxvi. 1); gifts of immortality and righteousness accompany it (xxxv. 4); the righteous who have fallen asleep from all generations will be manifested at the visitation (ἐπισκοπή) of the Kingdom of Christ; the combination of Is 26²⁰ and Ezk 37¹², possibly from a catena, is interesting in this connexion as illustrating the methods of proof from the OT (l. 3, 4).

2 Clement has a very explicit doctrine of bodily resurrection and judgment at the Parousia (ix. 1-5). The day of the appearing of God is not known (xii. 1); the day of judgment is at hand; it is conceived of, as in 2 Peter, as the destruction of heaven (possibly 'some' of the heavens, if τῶς be accepted) and earth by fire (xvi. 3). The day of Christ's appearing is the day of judgment according to men's works (xvii. 4, 5).

Ignatius is too absorbed by his own desire to attain to God to be much occupied with the Parousia. For him resurrection and the perfect state follow immediately after death (see art. IMMORTALITY). But he recognizes 'the last times' as present, and warns his readers of coming judgment (Eph. xi. 1). He speaks repeatedly of 'Jesus Christ our hope.' The resurrection is both of flesh and spirit (Smyrn. xii. 2); ad Polyc. vii. 1 is not clear, but may imply a future resurrection at the Parousia, when every man's work will be manifest.

Polycarp in his Epistle to the Philippians sets forth what probably represents the general orthodox view: Christ is coming as Judge of living and dead (ii. 1); God will raise up believers at the Parousia (ii. 2, v. 2); the saints will judge the world (xi. 2).

The Didache in its last chapter gives a brief resumé of primitive Christian eschatology: first the apostasy, then Antichrist, then the tribulation and final woes, then the three-fold sign of the end: the sign spread out in heaven (a reference to Mt 24³⁰), the sign of the trumpet, and the sign of the resurrection of the righteous; finally there is the Parousia. Of subsequent eschatological developments there is no mention. It is to be noted that the author does not support his doctrine of the pre-millennial resurrection of the righteous by any reference to 1 Thess. or Rev., but by an OT reference—Zec 14⁵. Note also the mystic allusion 16⁵, 'saved by the Curse itself.'

Barnabas refers to the approaching tribulation (iv. 3 [τὸ τέλειον σκάνδαλον] and xvi. 5 [a direct quotation from En. lxxxix. 56]). In v. 7 he refers to the coming of Christ to raise the dead and judge the risen, so also xxi. 1-3.

Hence in general, with the possible exception of Ignatius, the attitude of the Apostolic Fathers towards the Parousia represents arrested development, the tendency to stereotype the phrases of the Gospels and Epistles into set statements. There is the general acceptance of an outline of final events in which the Parousia forms the crisis, and is identified with the day of resurrection and general judgment. There is a wavering on the question of whether all are raised or only the righteous, but the doctrine of a bodily resurrection is generally accepted without question, even by Ignatius. Ignatius approaches more to the Johannine type of eschatology, but the nature of his Epistles makes it impossible to draw large generalizations from them.

3. Conclusion.—The general survey of the period gives us the impression of two tendencies at work—the progressive and the reactionary. Starting from the acceptance of a Jewish conception of the Parousia, we find the primitive Church modifying it by fitting into the Jewish apocalyptic mould the historical conceptions of the death and resurrection of Jesus the Messiah. While the general consciousness of the Church, after the first intensity of expectation of hope had died down, tended to stereotype the eschatology in set phrases as a vague future of blessing and judgment centring round Christ, the master minds first of St. Paul and then of St. John (if we may for convenience so speak of the author of the Fourth Gospel) seized on the implications of the historical facts of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, and worked them out in all their bearings on Christian life and thought. But this working out, especially in St. Paul's case, was not a merely intellectual effort of systematization, but arose partly from the practical needs of his missionary work and partly from his own inward experience of the life in Christ. Hence his thinking bears the marks of fragmentariness and incoherence. Wonderful and far-reaching intuitions exist side by side with remains of the older framework of eschatology, which only gradually breaks down and never entirely disappears. In investigating the eschatology of the period, or any part of it, we labour under certain limitations which must not be forgotten, even in the demand, as quoted above from Schweitzer, for a coherent system of eschatology.

These limitations are: (1) the fragmentary nature of our sources: we have to imply and infer from scattered hints and phrases, and there is always a danger of implying too much, and attempting an artificial construction, assuming a common eschatology which may never have existed; (2) the conditions under which the primitive eschatology was gradually modified, the motive impulse being more the practical needs of the growing communities than the desire to systematize: hence the conditions were not such as to produce a coherent scheme, even if we assume a coherent scheme to start with, which is wholly improbable; (3) the disintegrating effect upon any scheme of eschatology of the change of perspective as the immediate hope was not fulfilled; (4) the obvious fact that the work of the greatest and most original minds of the Apostolic Age in this direction did not produce an effect on the thought of the Church in any way proportionate to its value. These considerations may serve to keep us from expecting a coherent eschatological system in which the place of the Parousia is always fixed and its precise nature always defined. The hope of the Parousia to the early Church was like the dawn in the east, taking on strange colours and varying forms, but bearing witness to the great fundamental fact that the day had come at last, the day-star had risen in the heart of the believer.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Parousia,' 'Resurrection,' 'Eschatology,' in DCG, HDB, and other Dictionaries and Encyclopaedias; R. H. Charles, *Eschatology: Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian*², London, 1913; W. O. E. Oesterley, The Doctrine of the Last Things, do., 1908; Evolution of the Messianic Idea, do., 1908; S. D. F. Salmond, *The Christian Doctrine of Immortality*¹, Edinburgh, 1901; E. F. Scott, The Kingdom and the Messiah, do., 1911, The Fourth Gospel, do., 1906; Evelyn Underhill, The Mystic Way, London, 1913; P. Gardner, The Religious Experiences of St. Paul, do., 1911; A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., do., 1891; A. Schweitzer, Paul and his Interpreters, Eng. tr., do., 1912; J. A. Beet, The Last Things, new ed., do., 1905; P. Volz, Jüdische Eschatologie, Tübingen, 1903; M. J. Lagrange, Le Messianisme chez les Juifs, Paris, 1909; W. Bonsett, Der Antichrist, Göttingen, 1895; G. Dalman, Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1902; W. M. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches, London, 1904, The Church in the Roman Empire, do., 1893; A. Harnack, History of Dogma, Eng. tr., do., 1894-99, Mission and Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr., do., 1908; Kirsopp Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, do., 1911; H. J. Holtzmann, Neueste Theologie, Tübingen, 1911; G. B. Stevens, NT Theology, Edinburgh, 1899. Commentaries: Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans', Edinburgh, 1902; Robertson-Plummer, ICC, '1 Corinthians', do., 1911; J. Armitage-Robinson, Ephesians, London, 1903; T. K. Abbott, ICC, 'Ephesians and Colossians', Edinburgh, 1897; G. Milligan, The Ephesians, London, 1908; B. F. Westcott, Gospel of St. John, do., 1908, and Epistles of St. John, do., 1883; F. J. A. Hort, 1 Peter 1-11, do., 1898; H. B. Swete, *The Apocalypse of St. John*², do., 1907; R. H. Charles, Studies in the Apocalypse, Edinburgh, 1913. S. H. HOOKE.

PARTHIANS.—Parthians are mentioned in Ac²⁹ among the sojourners in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost. They were probably Jews who had become naturalized in Parthia, 'Jews of the Dispersion,' with possibly a few Parthian proselytes. Their ruler at this time was Arsaces XIX. (Artabanus III.), and their kingdom extended from Mesopotamia eastwards to the borders of India. The Parthians at first inhabited the mountainous country south of the Caspian Sea, between Media and Bactriana. Strabo (xi. 9. 2), Arrian (frag. 1), and Justin (xli. 1-4) agree in describing them as Scythians brought into this region by Sesostris. However this may be, they came under Persian rule in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and remained loyal to the Persian kings till Alexander the Great overthrew Darius Codomannus (333 B.C.) and conquered all his territory. Thereafter the Parthians acknowledged the suzerainty of the Selencidae till 256 B.C., when they revolted under Arsaces I., who became founder of a dynasty which lasted till c. A.D. 226.

Rome found the Parthians a difficult people to subdue, and the conflicts between the two nations were many and long-continued. Sometimes Rome prevailed; sometimes Parthia held its own. The Parthian soldiers were skilled horsemen and archers. They could move quickly on military campaigns, and shoot arrows with great precision while riding at full speed. Hence they were able to harass even the highly disciplined armies of Rome. The Parthians were not a literary people, and fell below the Persians, and very much below the Greeks, both in civilization and in art.

A. W. COOKE.

PASSION, PASSIONS The word 'passion' is used in the NT, both in the singular and in the plural, in senses which are now current only in biblical English.

1. 'Passion' in the singular is used of the suffering or death of our Lord in Ac 1², representing το πάθειν, which here denotes the Crucifixion ('after his passion'), and is exactly parallel with He 2⁹, where πάθημα του θανάτου is rendered 'the suffering of death.' On the other hand, παθηματα in He 2¹⁰ means Christ's sufferings in a more general sense, as in 2 Co 1², Ph 3¹⁰, 1 P 4¹³ 5¹. In his speech before Agrippa St. Paul says that Christ was 'subject to suffering' (παθητός, Ac 26²³)—that is to say, in His humanity. That in His Godhead He was impassible but in His humanity passible was insisted on by Ignatius against Docetic error (Eph. vii.: πρῶτον παθητός καὶ τότε ἀπαθής, so Polyc. iii.), and by other Fathers; cf. Apost. Const. II. xxiv. 3, viii. xii. 33 (ed. Funk). We may compare the nickname 'Patripassians' for the Sabellians, the logical outcome of whose doctrine was that the Father suffered. In the Thirty-nine Articles God is said to be 'without passions,' or, in the (equally authoritative) Latin, impassibilis (Art. i.).

2. In another sense, 'passion' in the NT is a neutral word unless qualified by the context; in Gal 5²⁴ 'passions' (παθήματα, AV 'affections') is qualified by 'lusts,' and so the singular πάθος in 1 Th 4⁵ (RV 'passion of lust,' AV 'lust of concupiscence'); in Ro 7⁵ 'passions' (παθήματα) is qualified by 'of sins,' and the phrase means 'sinful passions' (AV 'motions of sins'). Properly, then, 'passion' is any feeling, not necessarily strong feeling, just as ἐπιθυμία, 'lust,' is originally a neutral word. The adjective ὁμοπαθής, 'of like passions,' is entirely neutral; it is used in Ac 14¹⁵ of Paul and Barnabas, and in Ja 5¹⁷ of Elijah; in 4 Mac 12¹¹ of men; and rather curiously in Wis 7³ of the earth (AV 'which is of like nature' [with men], RV 'kindred,' RVM 'of like qualities'); the meaning seems to be that the earth is mother of all (cf. Sir 40¹). A. J. MACLEAN.

PASSOVER.—In the NT we meet with two alternative names for the great Jewish festal season of the Passover—το πάσχα and τὰ δῆγμα. These are the LXX equivalents for the corresponding Heb. terms in the OT, πάσχα being a rough transliteration of Heb. pesah (probably through the Aramaic form pasha), and τὰ δῆγμα a translation of Heb. hammaz-zôth ('the unleavened bread,' Ex 12¹⁷), a brief form of reference to hag hammazzôth ('the feast of the unleavened bread,' Ex 23¹⁵). We have also one instance of the full phrase ἡ εὐρη τῶν ἀζύμων in Lk 22¹. Similarly τὸ πάσχα is an abbreviation for ἡ εὐρη τοῦ πάσχα (Lk 22¹); and this is parallel with the OT use of happesah (e.g. Jos 5¹⁰) for the full hag happesah (e.g. Ex 34²⁵). In both cases the name of an essential feature of the feast (the lamb, the cakes) is used to denote the feast itself. The analogy of the use of the mazzôth ('cakes') as a short name for the festival suggests that pesah was originally the special name for the lamb and that it is not the name of the feast transferred to the lamb. 'Killing' and 'eating' τὸ πάσχα are just as often spoken of as 'keeping' τὸ πάσχα.

It would be impossible for readers of the LXX, who were familiar only with Greek, to realize such word-play between 'passover' and 'pass over' as is found in Ex 12—word-play which is obvious alike in EVV and in Heb.; e.g. Ex 12²⁷: zebhah-pesah . . . dsher pásah, 'passover-sacrifice (to the Lord) who passed over.' The LXX, which uses πάσχα invariably for pesah, reads in the same passage, 'A sacrifice to the Lord is this pasch (τὸ πάσχα), for He screened (ἐκκράσε) the houses of the people of Israel.'

The Vulg. handling of the term is very curious. At its first appearance in Ex 12¹¹ it is a sort of transliteration yielding the odd form Phase followed by an explanatory parenthesis, ('id est, transitus) Domini.' So throughout the OT, except in Ezra and Ezekiel, Phase as an indeclinable substantive continues to be used, but some caprice is shown in using sometimes Phase and sometimes phase. In Ezr 6^{18.20} and Ezk 45²¹ the form Pascha appears; and in the NT this term is invariably used. It appears to be generally intended to mark the distinction between the name as applied to the feast and as applied to the lamb by using Pascha in the former case ('facere, celebrare Pascha') and pascha in the latter ('immolare, comedere, manducare pascha'). Uncertainty, too, is shown as to the declension of the word, it being treated both as feminine and as neuter (e.g. Lk 24, 'in die solemnī Paschæ'; 22^s, 'parate nobis pascha'). Similarly we have in Mk 14 'Erat autem Pascha et Azyma,' and in Lk 22 'appropinquabat autem dies festus Azymorum, qui dicitur Pascha.' In Ac 12^s 20⁶ is found 'dies Azymorum.'

Whether we have not here traces of two ancient Spring festivals, one pastoral (pesah) and one agricultural (mazzôth), now merged into one and invested with a new significance as a historical commemoration which almost wholly obliterates the primitive origins, is a question that lies beyond the scope of this article. This much, however, may be said. The real origin of the term pesah (and so πάσχα) is, to say the least, obscure. The explanation given in Ex 12 quite possibly indicates the well-known tendency to supply a derivation for a term from itself, especially when it is to be adapted to new uses. For πάσχα, we know, a connexion with πάσχω ('suffer'), was found as early as Irenæus (2nd cent. A.D.), who says: 'A Moyse ostenditur Filius Dei, cuius et diem passionis non ignoravit, sed figuratim pronuntiavit, eum pascha nominans' (Hær. iv. 10). Tertullian and Chrysostom repeated the error of connecting πάσχα with our Lord's Passion. There must have been very many, familiar only with Greek, to whom the term itself was meaningless.

1. The feast.—The Passover was a hag, i.e. a pilgrim feast characterized by joyousness; it was necessarily observed at the central sanctuary at Jerusalem. Josephus mentions more than once the large numbers that came up to the feast, and speaks of it as a particularly turbulent time when sedition was liable to break out on the slightest provocation (see Ant. XVII. ix. 3, XX. v. 3). He calculates that there were 2,700,200 capable of celebrating the Passover at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem (BJ VI. ix. 3; see also [for A.D. 65] BJ II. xiv. 3). Whatever exaggeration there may be in these numbers, it is clear that the concourse of people at the feast must have been great. According to the same authority, more than once in the unquiet years which preceded the fall of Jerusalem the Passover was made the occasion of massacre and bloodshed in which many perished.

With the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple, the Passover necessarily ceased to be a hag. It became simply a domestic festival, though of peculiar preciousness. Their downfall as a nation, their being scattered abroad throughout the world, could not blot out for the Jews the memory of their redemption from Egyptian bondage, which the festival commemorated, whilst it also kept alive hopes for the days to come. The scene of the celebration was the home, and those who kept the feast were the family circle or household. But we are largely in the dark as to how the Jews observed the feast, say in A.D. 71, when it was no longer possible to go up to Jerusalem, and how exactly the celebration of the Passover (as well as other matters) was adjusted to the new order of things. All we know is that out of a period of uncertainty and dimness the Passover feast emerges as one of the most distinctive features of Judaism, one that has been made the subject of a special tractate of the Mishna (Pesahim), and one that has continued to this day as a specially valued festival.

2. The Passover as a note of time.—Twice in the Acts (12^s 20⁶) we have 'the days of unleavened bread' referred to as a note of time. No absolute certainty is attainable with reference to NT chronology; everything, therefore, that can shed light on it is to be welcomed. In 12^s we have the fact explicitly mentioned that it was the Passover time when the occurrences there recorded took place; but unfortunately that does not give us information as to the year. The uncertainties, however, are narrowed down to the limits of a very few years, and careful calculation has shown that Herod Agrippa I. most probably died in A.D. 44. St. Peter mysteriously disappears from view, leaving us henceforth dependent on uncertain tradition for all further knowledge of his career. The unfortunate translation of μετὰ τὸ πάσχα in AV as 'after Easter' is an obvious anachronism, unless, indeed, 'Easter' was in the 16th cent. used indiscriminately for the Jewish and the Christian Pasch. Ac 20⁶ also probably indicates the Passover of A.D. 56 or 57 as marking the close of the missionary activity of St. Paul, who was arrested soon after (see art. 'Chronology of the NT' in HDB i. 416, 420).

Nothing could show better than these scanty notes of time how deep-rooted the custom was, how the feast was observed as regularly as the year came round. Men spoke naturally of 'the days of the unleavened bread' as a significant point in the calendar, just as we speak of 'after Christmas' or 'at Christmas.' Ordinary dates dwindle into insignificance beside these fixed, outstanding seasons. Similarly we find the other primary Jewish festivals (Tabernacles and Pentecost) used in the same way—Jn 7² (Tabernacles), Ac 2¹ 20¹⁶, 1 Co 16⁸ (Pentecost).

3. How Passover was kept in apostolic times.—Even among the Jews the Paschal observance had undergone considerable changes in the course of time. Whilst a due reference was preserved to the all-important fact of the deliverance from Egypt, the emergence of the Jews as more or less a people, yet time and historical catastrophes had left their mark. What mention, e.g., is there in the Pentateuchal legislation of the four cups of wine? When were they introduced? We cannot tell; yet they were a settled feature of the feast in our Lord's day. The cup which He took in the institution of the Lord's Supper was no new thing. It is generally admitted that this was the third cup or cup of blessing which is still drunk at the conclusion of the meal ('after supper,' Lk 22²⁰, 1 Co 11²⁶). The greatest difference, however, was made by the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Up to that time the paschal lambs had been slain in their thousands year by year. Then it all ceased. A roasted shank-bone of a lamb is all that remains of the most notable element of the feast as originally ordained. On the other hand, the unleavened cakes and the bitter herbs (now taking the form of horse-radish) go back to primitive times.

But 'the present Passover liturgy contains comparatively very few relics from New Testament times' (A. Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services as they were at the Time of Jesus Christ, London, n.d., p. 231). Perhaps it is more correct to say that the present Passover liturgy contains large expansions of and additions to the ritual observed in the 1st cent. A.D. What that form was exactly it is impossible to tell. It was pre-eminently a time of revolution: the break-up and passing away of the old order to give place to a new. The transformation of Passover from a hag to a purely domestic festival was not so sudden as might at first appear. Even before the destruction of Jerusalem the domestic festivities were of growing importance, although that stupendous event made an end of the whole sacrificial system and yearly festal gatherings. We may be sure, however, that the kernel of the commemoration was jealously maintained, that the essential framework of the ritual to-day was there from the first. That ritual briefly is as follows. The search for leaven on the eve of Passover with quaint formulae ushers in the feast. The festival commences with a sanctification; then comes the first cup of wine; the aphikomen (half a mazzah, which is reserved to be eaten at the close) is set aside; the question is asked, 'Why is this night distinguished from all other nights?' to which a long response is given; this is followed by the first part or Hallel (Pss 113, 114), the second cup of wine, washing of the hands; the unleavened bread (mazzoth) is eaten with bitter herbs (horse-radish); next comes Hillel's ceremony (eating a piece of horse-radish placed between two pieces of unleavened bread); the aphikomen is eaten, grace after meals is said with considerable additions; then there is the third cup of wine and the opening of the door; Hallel is resumed (Pss 115-118); Ps 136 is recited with large expansions, followed by the fourth cup of wine and prayer for the Divine acceptance of the service; Adir hu, an impassioned song praying for the rebuilding of the Temple, brings all to a close.

Such a curious feature as the opening of the door is of uncertain date, but, though most likely later than the 1st cent. A.D., is yet of considerable age. The expansions are mostly seen in the Haggadic matter—the long narrative sections which are so conspicuous a feature of the observance. The compositions, 'How many are the benefits which God has conferred upon us?' 'And it came to pass at midnight,' 'Ye shall say, "It is the sacrifice of Passover,"' 'To Him praise has ever been and ever will be due,' and others, must be dated long after apostolic times. On the other hand, the Hallel and other portions of the Psalms are most probably amongst the oldest features.

One feature of the celebration on the second night of the Passover carries us back uninterruptedly to the primitive times when the Jews were settled in Canaan and were an agricultural people. It is the counting of the omer, and it most particularly reminds us that here we have originally a celebration of the recurring seasons of the year and the yearly ingathering of the earth's fruits. The first-fruits of barley harvest were offered on the second day of Passover, and from then seven weeks were counted by primitive methods of calculation; this brought them to Pentecost and the beginning of wheat harvest. 'Though one ephah, or ten omers, of barley was cut down, only one omer of flour, or about 5.1 pints of our measure, was offered in the Temple on the second Paschal' (Edersheim, op. cit. p. 259). Ages have passed, the Jews are scattered throughout the world, there is no longer flour to be offered, there is no omer; still at the evening service in the synagogue and on the second night of the festival in the home, as regularly as the Passover comes round, the words are said: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with Thy precepts and commanded us concerning the counting of the Omer. This is the first day of the Omer. May it be Thy will, O Lord our God and the God of our fathers, to rebuild thy Temple speedily, in our days, and to make Thy law our portion.' And at evening service in the synagogue daily the counting goes on until the night before Pentecost (see art. PENTECOST).

Whenever the custom may have originated, it is curious to think that still in every Jewish home, just after the third cup, or cup of blessing, has been drunk, the door is opened to admit the prophet Elijah, for whom a spare cup of wine is always set, as the forerunner of the Messiah. 'May the All-merciful send us Elijah the prophet . . . who shall give us good tidings, salvation, and consolation.' We think of the question: 'Why then say the scribes that Elijah must first come?' (Mt 17¹⁰), and of the answer: 'Elijah is come already.' That which differentiates between Jew and Christian is mainly the recognition of Jesus as the Christ. How can we fail to feel the pathos in the impassioned prayers with which the Paschal service closes? 'O mighty God, rebuild Thy house speedily, speedily even in our days, rebuild it. O God, rebuild Thy Temple speedily!' and in the aspiration repeated more than once, but especially before the fourth cup: 'Next year in Jerusalem!' We wonder how far these words really express the yearning of the Jewish heart. Words and formulae often live on and survive the original desire, very intense and sincere, which prompted them.

The question arises, as in the matter of keeping Sabbath on the seventh day, whether the early Christians continued to observe these festivals just the same as the Jews. They did not at once break away from the practices in which they had been brought up (see, e.g., Ac 3¹). 'The Christian Churches in Judaea existed as Jewish sects' (C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, i. [London, 1897] 175), and it is with Jewish Christians that we are first of all concerned. In all probability they went on for years observing the festivals with their old Jewish significance as they also complied with other traditional usages. J. Bingham, indeed, on very slender grounds holds that the 'first Christians of Jerusalem . . . did not keep Easter with the Jews on what day of the week soever it fell, but on the Sunday following in honour of our Saviour's resurrection' (Ant. XX. v. 4 [in Works, Oxford, 1855, vol. vii.]). Apart even from the loose wording here, when we come to look into matters we see that he has little, if any, authority for the belief. The 'first day of the week,' the Lord's Day, was the regular, weekly commemoration of our Lord's resurrection. It is more than doubtful if there was an annual commemoration ('Easter') in apostolic times.

But the old runs into the new. Even though still marking events by 'the days of unleavened bread' (Ac 12³), they might well invest the season with a new significance as time went on, and associate it with a new commemoration. 'When the apostles came to write of the bondage of sin and the new liberty and life in Christ, their teaching would be all the more easily understood and more lovingly accepted, because to many of their readers it recalled the Passover table of the family and the sound of silent voices' (G. M. Mackie, 'The Jewish Passover in the Christian Church,' ExpT xiii. [1901-02] 392).

St. Paul, however, who divined most accurately the true genius of Christianity as a religion with universal aims, evidently disapproved of the continuance of Judaism as a system crippling the spiritual energies of the Church, the new liberty in Christ. He explicitly deprecated the observance of Jewish feasts (Gal 4¹⁰⁻¹¹) on the part of purely Gentile converts. Col 2¹⁶ is equally decided. Though he was, as he himself proudly claimed, 'a Hebrew of Hebrews,' it is more than questionable if he kept the Passover after his conversion and after he had grasped the meaning of Christianity for the Gentile world. And when he makes an allusion to the feast in writing to the Corinthians (1 Co 5⁶⁻⁸), it shows only that the feast per se has no longer any interest for him. It may, indeed, show incidentally that it was somewhere about the time of its celebration that he was writing his Epistle; but his allusions are purely symbolic. He gives to the Paschal lamb and to the unleavened bread a meaning of which his forefathers never dreamed. To St. Paul more than to any other it is due that Christianity broke away from the swaddling-clothes of Judaism and became a faith with a far more glorious redemption than the Exodus to commemorate.

As L. Duchesne remarks, 'There was no reason why Christians should observe the feasts and fasts of the Jewish calendar. They were allowed to drop out of use. Nevertheless, each year one of these holy days, the Paschal Feast or the Feast of the Azyms, recalled the memory of the Passion of the Saviour. The memories which Israel had connected, and still connected, with this anniversary might no longer be of interest; but it was impossible to forget that Our Lord had died . . . on one of those days. The Pasch was therefore retained, though the ritual details of the Jewish observance were omitted' (Early History of the Christian Church, Eng. tr. of 4th ed., i. [London, 1909] 207 f.).

4. 'Christ our Passover.'—We have already referred in passing to 1 Co 5⁶⁻⁸, but both here and in 15²⁰⁻²³ there are allusions to Passover ('the firstfruits,' ἀπαρχή) which call for a rather more extended notice. For they show us better than anything else how the transition from the Jewish to the Christian Pasch was made, how the new interest and commemoration swallowed up and superseded the old. Once again Passover was in all probability being celebrated in the Jewish community. But St. Paul, perhaps for the very first time, was quick to see an illustration of Christ and His redeeming work in the sacrifice of the lamb, and in the complete removal of leaven which preceded the feast (Ex 12¹⁵) an illustration of the moral purification which Christianity calls for. He sees, again, in the first-fruits offered at the Passover an illustration of what Christ is in His resurrection to the harvest field of the dead.

(a) τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν: 'our Paschal lamb,' i.e. of Christians as distinct from Jews. It is altogether unnecessary to see in the lamb of the original institution an actual prototype of our Lord. To see in the Paschal lamb 'the prefiguration of Jesus Christ whose death is the sacrifice which averts the wrath of God from His community' (C. von Orelli, art. 'Passover' in Schaff-Herzog, viii. 370) is to go beyond what is warranted. The reference is too casual for so much to be built upon it. The Apostle never again speaks of Christ as a lamb. The lamb of the Passover, moreover, was partaken of in a festal meal, and St. Paul was probably thinking specially of this. For he immediately follows with 'Therefore let us keep festival' (εορτάζωμεν); not with a reference to any feast in particular, but to the new life of joyousness Christians are to live, in which 'sincerity and truth' are essential (so Chrysostom, Hom. in 1 Cor. xv. 3. 8). Again we have Christ compared to a 'lamb without blemish and without spot' (1 P 1¹⁹), absolute purity, however, being a general requirement in any sacrifice offered to God (Dt 17¹). Allegory soon became busy with these representations of the Lord. He was 'the Lamb of God' (Jn 1²⁹) rather in antithesis to the whole sacrificial system of the Jews. The majestic apocalyptic figure of the Lamb which is all-prominent in Rev. is the outgrowth of this conception, and is mainly responsible for the Agnus Dei of Christian art.

(b) ἀπαρχή, LXX for Heb. re'shith (Lv 23¹⁰), 'firstfruits.' It is almost impossible that St. Paul should use this particular term without having in mind a reference to the offering of firstfruits at Passover, especially when we take it in connexion with 5⁶. R. F. Weymouth (*The NT in Modern Speech*³, London, 1909, p. 469) translates (no doubt advisedly) 1 Co 15²⁰, 'being the first to do so of those who are asleep'; and again v. 23, 'Christ having been the first to rise': but this entirely obscures the beautiful figure of the harvest field. As used by St. Paul, the gathering of firstfruits and the presenting of them to God is a pledge that the whole harvest shall be reaped.

5. Passover and the Eucharist.—Is there any connexion between the Passover of the Jews and the Lord's Supper of the Christian Church? Our limitations forbid any treatment in detail of what is still a very vexed question. It must be admitted that the materials are scanty and not free from obscurity. The difference, e.g., between the Synoptists and the Fourth Gospel as to the actual time when the Lord held His Last Supper, whether the meal was an 'anticipated Passover' or Passover itself, is well known. Referring to the repeated attempts to harmonize them, Duchesne sensibly remarks: 'It is wiser to acknowledge that, on this point, we are not in a position to reconcile the evangelists' (op. cit. p. 209, n. 4). And why trouble, when even the fact that the Lord instituted some memorial observance for His disciples is itself open to question? Wilder extremists see in the Supper, not a simple memorial instituted naturally by Jesus and suggested by the circumstances of the time, but the influence of mystery-religions and strange cults with their eating and drinking of a god.

One thing is pretty certain. There was a meal in some form or another associated with Christianity from the very beginning. In Ac 2⁴² the κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου, 'the breaking of the bread,' suggests a distinctive custom of the first disciples. Still more in 20⁷ is it apparent that this custom was observed 'on the first day of the week,' and it becomes a more definitely religious ordinance. More than all we have fortunately St. Paul's treatment of a crying scandal in the Church at Corinth which incidentally gives us some light on the practice of the times (1 Co 10¹⁶, 11¹⁷). From the first, apparently, the commemoration (Eucharist) was observed in connexion with a common meal to symbolize and to foster fraternity (Agape). The Apostle's action here was to set a hedge round the commemoration and rescue it from the disgraceful abuses which attended the common meal. It distinctly contributed to the ultimate separation of the Eucharist as a purely religious and symbolic feast, although at the time of the Didache (c. A.D. 100) the Agape appears still to have been associated with it (§ 10), at any rate in certain localities.

But St. Paul's mention of the 'cup of blessing' (1 Co 10¹⁶), coupled with the fact that he had already seen in the Paschal lamb an illustration of Christ, makes it clear that he at any rate viewed this ordinance as the Christian counterpart of the Jewish Passover. Edersheim (*LT*⁴, London, 1887, ii. 511) is very decided as to this relation, and even goes so far as to venture the opinion that the broken bread was none other than the aphikomen or unleavened cake eaten at the close of the meal. A. C. McGiffert (A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 70) seems hardly consistent in saying there is no indication in our sources that the Lord's Supper was viewed as thus related to the Jewish Passover, as he remarks, 'It can hardly be doubted, in other words, that it was believed, at any rate at an early day, if not from the beginning, in the church of Jerusalem, that Jesus had commanded them to do as they actually were doing.' If Jesus gave the command He gave it at the Paschal meal, or at least in close association with it. 'Whether in the words and acts of Jesus there is an implied reference to the Passover or not, the association of the Eucharist with the Passover was a natural one, though we may have to admit that the Paschal features in the language of St. Paul represent the later reflexion of a period when the idea of Christ as the true Passover (1 Co 5⁷, Jn 19³⁶) had influenced the conception of the institution' (art. 'Eucharist' in ERE v. 543⁴). We may notice that really St. Paul's language is separated from the Crucifixion only by a score of years or so, no great interval after all. It is the more natural to think, considering the relation of Christianity to Judaism, that we have here a close point of connexion between the old and the new.

6. Passover and Easter.—The true celebration of Easter, the festival of our Lord's resurrection, was, as we have seen above, a thing of weekly occurrence. 'The first day of the week' became established even in the Apostolic Church as the special day of joyful commemoration on the part of Christians. In that they were most sharply in contrast with the Jews. But whatever obscurity may hang round the original connexion between the Paschal feast and the Eucharist, there can be no question that when Easter came to be observed, as it was observed at the same season of the year, —in spring—it was regarded as the counterpart of the Jewish Passover. Speaking of the movable feasts, Duchesne says: 'Dans ces fêtes, comme en tant d'autres choses, l'Eglise est, à un certain degré, héritière de la Synagogue. L'année ecclésiastique n'est autre chose que la combinaison de deux calendriers, l'un juif et l'autre chrétien. Au calendrier juif correspondent les fêtes mobiles, au calendrier chrétien les fêtes fixes' (*Origines du culte chrétien*⁴, Paris, 1909, p. 225). After observing that this symmetry must not be pressed too far, he remarks: 'Les chrétiens ne conserveront point toutes les fêtes juives; et quant à celles qu'ils retiennent, ils y attachèrent de bonne heure une signification appropriée à leurs croyances. . . . On ne conserva que celles de Paques et de la Pentecôte' (ib.).

This correspondence is made abundantly clear by the fact that the name for the festival of the resurrection of our Lord is in most countries simply the name 'Pascha' reproduced in various forms. Thus Lat. festā paschalia, which has passed into Fr. as Paques (a plur. form), Ital. Pasqua, etc. (see OED, s.v. 'Pasch'). The name 'Easter' is, quite differently, from A.S. plur. eastron, a relic of heathenism with dim suggestions of the worship of nature powers awakening in spring. But even where 'Easter' became the settled name, some form of Pascha such as 'Pasch' existed side by side with it.

It was only to be expected that with the weekly celebration there should gradually grow up a special yearly commemoration of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. That is so tremendous and vital a fact that as each Paschal season came round the tendency would be more and more to give importance to the annual celebration at the very season when our Lord died and rose again. But this was after the Apostolic Age.

So there is no need to enter with any minuteness upon a controversy which, springing up in the 2nd cent., continued for long to agitate the Christian Church and was the occasion of great and widespread bitterness of feeling. Pity that such things should be! But it was a controversy that grew up out of this very relation of the Christian to the Jewish feast; and it had reference to the time when the festival should be kept. A large section of the Church, believing that on the 14th Nisan, the day of the Paschal sacrifice, Jesus also died, were firm in their resolve to keep their Pasch on the same day as did the Jews. (The term Pascha, it may be said, originally included a reference to the death as well as the resurrection of Christ. A distinction was made between τὸ πάσχα σταυρώσεων, the Pascha crucifixionis, and τὸ πάσχα ἀναστάσεων, the Pascha resurrectionis.) On the other hand, seeing that the 14th Nisan could fall on any day of the week, and therefore the celebration of Easter also, the Roman Church, and those who were influenced by it, kept the festival on Sunday as a fixed day, arriving at the date by more or less intricate calculation. It was not, however, by any means the same Sunday that Christians observed even where this principle obtained. The former, mainly Asians, were called Quartodecimans or 'Fourteenthers.' At first they agreed to differ. 'Polycarp [c. A.D. 150], during his stay in Rome, tried to convince Pope Anicetus that the quartodeciman use was the only one permissible. He did not succeed. Neither could Anicetus succeed in persuading the old master to adopt the Roman method. They parted, nevertheless, on the best of terms' (Duchesne, Early Hist. of the Christian Church, i. 210). A very different state of things followed when a later pope, Victor, interfered to secure one uniform way. It is a sorry story of schism and strife. But where now are the Tessarescædecatistæ, Andiani, Sabbatiani, Protopaschitæ and other curious sects, who 'would not hold any communion with . . . any that did not keep the Pasch at the same time that the Jews did'? (Bingham, op. cit. xx. v. 3).

The two festivals still exist side by side. It is true that, quite apart from the Jewish feast, Christians would still have celebrated the resurrection of the Lord. But, be that as it may, the historical connexion of Christianity and Judaism is indubitably signified as year by year at the same time the Christian keeps Easter and the Jew Passover —though with what radical difference of meaning!

LITERATURE. — In addition to works and articles quoted throughout, see artt. 'Passover' in HDB (W. J. Moulton), in EBI (I. Benzinger), in JE (E. G. Hirsch); art. 'Pasch or Passover' in CE (C. Aherne); in ERE, artt. 'Festivals and Fasts (Christian)' (J. G. Carleton), 'Festivals and Fasts (Hebrew)' (F. H. Woods); A. Hilgenfeld, Der Paschastreit der alten Kirche nach seiner Bedeutung für die Kirchengeschichte, Halle, 1860; Eighteen Treatises from the Mishna (including Pesachim), tr. D. A. de Sola and M. J. Raphall, London, 1843; F. Delitzsch, 'Der Passahritus zur Zeit des zweiten Tempels,' Zeitschr. für die ges. luther. Theologie und Kirche, xvi. (1855) 257 ff.; P. Gardner, The Origin of the Lord's Supper, London, 1893; A. A. Green, The Revised Hagada, do., 1897; H. C. Trumbull, The Blood Covenant, do., 1887.

J. S. CLEMENS.

PASTOR.—Eph 4¹¹ is the only passage in the NT in which 'pastor' occurs, although its Greek equivalent, ποιμήν, is frequent; everywhere else ποιμήν is rendered 'shepherd.' This exceptional translation is justified, because here only is ποιμήν used of some kind of Christian minister. It is used of Christ as 'the great shepherd of the sheep' (He 13²⁰ from LXX of Is 63¹¹), as 'the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls' (1 P 2²⁵), and as 'the chief Shepherd' (1 P 5⁴)—expressions suggested by Himself (Jn 10^{11, 14}). But the metaphor is obvious, and is frequent from Homer onwards. The cognate verb ποιμαίνειν is used of tending Christian flocks; in Christ's charge to St. Peter (Jn 21¹⁶), in St. Peter's charge to his 'fellow-elders' (1 P 5²), and in St. Paul's charge at Miletus to the elders of the Church at Ephesus (Ac 20²⁸). In Eph 4¹¹, while 'apostles' and 'prophets' and 'evangelists' have each a separate article, 'pastors and teachers' are coupled by a common article, and probably form only one group, distinguished by being attached to particular congregations, whereas 'apostles,' 'prophets,' and 'evangelists' were itinerant preachers and missionaries. But 'pastors' and 'teachers' are not convertible terms; almost all 'pastors' would be 'teachers,' but not all 'teachers' were 'pastors.'

LITERATURE.—See Commentaries on Eph 4¹¹, esp. J. A. Robinson (1903) and B. F. Westcott (1906); A. Harnack, *The Mission and Expansion of Christianity*², Eng. tr., 1908, i. 336-346. A. PLUMMER.

PASTORAL EPISTLES.—See TIMOTHY AND TITUS, EPISTLES TO.

PATARA (Πάτρα, nent. pl.).—Patara was a maritime city in the S.W. of Lycia, about 6 miles

S.E. of the mouth of the Xanthus. For classical writers it had a romantic interest as a home of Apollo (Herodotus, i. 182), whose temple and oracle there were only less famous than those at Delphi: 'Patarean Apollo who haunts the thickets of Lycia' (Hör. Od. iii. iv. 64). Its more practical importance was two-fold; it served as a seaport for the fertile Xanthus valley, including the splendid city of that name; and it lay on the highway of ships trading between the Aegean and the Levant or Egypt. St. Paul did an ordinary thing when he changed ships at Patara (Ac 21²). The coaster in which he had sailed from Troas had either reached her destination or else was about to continue her course along the south coast, whereas larger vessels bound from Lycia for Syria struck right across the high sea, passing Cyprus on the left (v.³). Ships coming in the opposite direction usually found the straight course too difficult on account of the prevailing westerly wind, and had to keep closer to shore, passing Cyprus on the left, and making not for Patara but for Myra, about 30 miles to eastward (27⁵). Patara derived an ample revenue from the vast traffic between the Aegean coast and Alexandria. Ptolemy Philadelphus enlarged and improved the city, calling it 'the Lycian Arsinoe' in honour of his wife, 'but the old name prevailed' (Strabo, xiv. iii. 6). Patara was the reputed birthplace of St. Nicholas. The harbour is now 'an inland marsh generating poisonous malaria' (T. A. B. Spratt and E. Forbes, Travels in Lycia, Milyas, and the Cibyratis, 2 vols., 1847, i. 32). There are extensive and well-preserved ruins, including a triumphal arch with the inscription, 'Patara, the metropolis of the Lycian nation.'

LITERATURE.—F. Beaufort, Karamania, 1817; C. Fellows, Account of Discoveries in Lycia, 1841; O. Benndorf and G. Niemann, Reisen in südwestlichen Kleinasien, vol. i.: 'Reisen in Lykien und Karien', 1884; Murray's Handbook of Asia Minor, 1895.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PATIENCE.—The virtue of patience occupied a great place in the apostolic writings. We have two Greek words to consider, which are thus translated: (1) υπομονή (vb. υπομένω), (2) μακροθυμία (vb. μακροθυμέω).

1. υπομονή is the more important word. It is found only in later Greek, and answers to the classical καρτερία, καρτέρησις, with the meaning of holding out, enduring. The word, however, principally belongs to biblical and Patristic Greek, into which it was introduced by the LXX, where it translates various Hebrew words signifying 'hope,' a virtue very closely connected with endurance, as being its basis or ground. Ciemer says (*Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek*³, Eng. tr., 1880, p. 420) of υπομονή: 'It denotes the peculiar psychological clearness and definiteness which hope attains in the economy of grace, by virtue, on the one hand, of its distinctive character excluding all wavering, doubt, and uncertainty; and, on the other, in conformity with its self-assertion amid the contradictions of this present world.'

The connexion of patience (υπομονή) with hope is brought out in such passages as Ro 8²⁵, 2 P 3¹², Col 1¹¹⁻¹². Its connexion with the contradictions of life appears in Ro 5³⁻⁴, Ja 1³⁻⁴; cf. also 2 Th 1⁴, He 10³⁶ 1²¹, Rev 2² 3. 19, 2 P 1⁶.

The Book of Revelation in particular emphasizes the need of endurance, written as it is in view of the persecution of the Church by the Roman State (cf., further, Rev 1⁹ 13¹⁰ 14¹²). Particular expressions which call for note are 2 Th 3⁵, υπομονή Χριστοῦ, 'the patience which waits for Christ,' i.e. for the Messianic salvation; Rev 3¹⁰, ὁ λόγος τῆς υπομονῆς μου, 'the word which treats of patient waiting for me,' i.e. the word of prophecy.

Interesting also is Ro 15⁵, where God is called 'the God of patience' (ὁ θεὸς τῆς υπομονῆς), i.e. the God who inspires patience through the prophetic words of Scripture (cf. v.⁴); see, further, for υπομονή, 2 Co 1⁶ 12¹², 1 Ti 6¹¹, Tit 2².

The similarity of atmosphere between the NT and the Apostolic Fathers makes it natural that we should find similar reference to patience (υπομονή) in them. 1 Clem. v. 5-7 is particularly interesting, where, after St. Peter and the other apostles, St. Paul is set forth as an example of patience: 'By reason of jealousy and strife Paul by his example pointed out the prize of patience. After that he had been seven times in bonds, had been driven into exile, had been stoned, had preached in the East and in the West, he won the noble renown which was the reward of his faith, having taught righteousness unto the whole world and having reached the farthest bounds of the West; and when he had borne his testimony before the rulers, so he departed from the world and went into the holy place, having been found a notable pattern of patience.' Cf. also 1 Clem. lxiii. 2, lxiv.; Hermas, Mand. viii. 9; Ep. Barn. xxi. 5; finally Polyc. Philippians, viii. 1. 2. 'Christ Jesus . . . patiently endured (υπέμεινεν) all things for our sakes, that we may live in Him. Wherefore let us become imitators of His patience (υπομονῆς);' xi. 1, 'I exhort you all therefore to obey the word of righteousness and to practise all patience, which you saw before your eyes not only in the blessed Ignatius and Zosimus and Rufus, but also in others of you and in Paul himself and the rest of the Apostles.'

2. μακροθυμία also is a word rare in profane Greek. It appears in the apostolic writings as a synonym of υπομονή (Col 1¹¹, He 6¹² 10³⁶, Ja 5¹⁰, 2 Ti 3¹⁰). On the other hand, it has the special meaning of longsuffering (q.v.) and stands opposed to ὀργή, θυμὸς, and is synonymous with πραότης (cf. Gal 5²², Eph 4², Col 3¹², 2 Ti 4²). In these passages the word is used of the patience of men one towards another. But it is also used of the patience or longsuffering of God, who delays the punishment of sinners in order to give them time to repent (cf. Ro 2⁴, 1 P 3²⁰, 2 P 3¹⁵). In Ro 9²² the idea of giving time for repentance is absent, and the word refers simply to God's delaying punishment.

In the sub-apostolic writings μακροθυμία stands side by side with υπομονή as in the NT; cf. 1 Clem. lxiv. A noteworthy passage dealing with this virtue is Hermas, Mand. v. 1, which is all in praise of patience (μακροθυμία): 'In patience the Lord dwells, but in hot wrath the devil' (v.³).

In conclusion, reference may be made to the fine development, on the basis of the apostolic teaching, of the idea of Christian patience (υπομονή), which A. Ritschl has given in The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr. of vol. iii., 1900, p. 627 f.

Patience is that feeling which views the evils of life in the light of Divine providence. It is quite different from the Stoic idea of apathy, which aims at the suppression of the pain due to the evil from which we suffer. 'Patience in suffering implies that the pain continues' (p. 627).

This is true not only of ordinary patience, but of the Christian form of this virtue. 'The elevation of the general human exercise of patience into its special Christian form depends on the fact that man's feeling of self and of personal worth, by being combined with the thought of the supremely mundane God Who is our Father, and guarantees to us salvation through dominion over the world and participation in the Kingdom of God, is raised above all natural and particular motives, even when they are the occasion of troubles. This still admits of evils being felt with pain even by the Christian' (p. 628). Ritschl refers in a note to Calvin, Inst. iii. 8. 8: 'Neither is there required from us a cheerfulness, such as may take away all sense of bitterness and grief; there would be no patience of the saints in the cross, except also they were tormented with grief and pressed with trouble.' The NT, indeed, speaks of rejoicing in suffering, of glorying in afflictions and persecutions for Christ's sake. But we can quote against the idea that this joy is to exterminate the sense of pain not only the explicit confession in He 12¹¹, but also the example of Jesus and St. Paul. The actual position of things is, in fact, as follows:

'The consciousness of reconciliation with God places the assurance of personal worth firm above all the special motives which arise from the world; and therefore the pain which springs from their oppressive action can be subordinated to the joy which, in our feeling of self, denotes the incomparable worth of Divine sonship. But in the case in question, joy would not last; rather, it would veer round into indifference, unless underneath the joy the pain still continued. Moreover, the truth of the Fatherly care of God for His children suggests to us not only the inference that no evils arising from the world can overbalance the blessing of fellowship with God, but also this further application, that these evils, as tests of our fidelity to God, are elevated into relative blessings. And this comes about just through the exercise of patience as the peculiar and proper manifestation of Christian freedom' (p. 629).

LITERATURE.—H. Bnshnell, The New Life, 1860; M. Creighton, The Mind of St. Peter, 1904, p. 22; H. Black, Christ's Service of Love, 1907, p. 130; H. M. Gwatkin, The Eye for Spiritual Things, 1907, p. 61; H. E. Manning, Sermons on Ecclesiastical Subjects, i. [1870] 173; J. H. Jowett, The Transfigured Church, 1910, p. 149; W. H. Hutton, A Disciple's Religion, 1911, p. 12; W. B. Ullathorne, Christian Patience, 1886; G. Hanson, A Chain of Graces, 1906, p. 57.

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

PATMOS (Πατμος).—Patmos, one of the group of islands named the Sporades, lies in that part of the Ægean Sea which the Greeks called the Icarian, and is visible on the right as one sails from Samos to Cos. It is a volcanic island, bare and rocky, 10 miles long from N. to S., and 6 miles wide at the northern end. Its hills command a magnificent view of the surrounding sea and islands. At its centre, where it narrows to an isthmus, between the bay of Scala on the E. and that of Merika on the W., are found the remains of an ancient Hellenic town, which prove that the island was once populous; and the name of 'Palmosa,' which it bore in the Middle Ages, points to another time of prosperity; but Turkish rule has had its usual blighting effect. To-day 'the isle' has 4,000 Greek inhabitants, who are mostly sponge-fishers. The modern town stands on a hill-top, 800 ft. above sea-level, in the southern half of the island. It clusters about the Monastery of St. John—founded by St. Christodulus in A.D. 1088, on the site of an old temple—which has lost most of the treasures of its once valuable library, including the 9th cent. edition of Plato, now in the Bodleian. Monastic piety shows the place where the Revelation was written by St. John, and halfway down the hill is a grotto (το σπηλαιον της Αποκαλύψεως) the rocks of which are said to have been cleft by the Divine voice.

More important are the internal indications that the book was written amid the sights and sounds of the infinite sea. It has the word θάλασσα 25 times, and it is full of the clashing of waves. No fitter scene could be found for the composition of the Apocalypse than the traditional one, and, if there were any reason to question the story of the author's banishment to the island, one would have to say, 'si non è vero, è ben trovato.' Nowhere is 'the voice of many waters' more musical than in Patmos; nowhere does the rising and setting sun make a more splendid 'sea of glass mingled with fire'; yet nowhere is the longing more natural that the separating sea—the oceanus dissociabilis of Horace (Od. i. iii. 22)—should be no more.

Small and inhospitable islands were often used as places of banishment (relegatio) in the 1st cent. (Pliny, HN iv. xii. 23; Tac. Ann. iii. 68, iv. 30, xv. 71). According to Eusebius (HE iii. 18), Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 9), and others, St. John was exiled to Patmos under Domitian in A.D. 95, and released about 18 months afterwards under Nerva. W. M. Ramsay thinks that, as St. John was not a first-class prisoner, he must have been condemned not only to banishment but to hard labour for life (The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, 1904, p. 82 ff.). At any rate, St. John was in Patmos 'for (διά) the word of God' (Rev 1⁹). The meaning of the phrase is much disputed, some holding that it expresses the human cause, others the over-ruling Divine purpose, of his exile. He was banished either because of his loyalty to truth already revealed, or for the reception of truth about to be revealed. The former interpretation probably gives the writer's real meaning, but the latter (preferred by B. Weiss and others) contains a thought well worth expressing. While the authorities of Ephesus, moved perhaps by some mysterious impulse to spare the saint's life, transported him to the lonely island in order that the city might be freed from his too insistent word and testimony, he was providentially taken into a retreat where he was beside 'the deep sea and the mighty things.' The story of his exile is outlined in two phrases: 'I was in the isle . . . I was in the Spirit' (Rev 1⁹, 10¹). The realism was transfigured, and in that Ægean where Æschylus heard ποντίων κυμάτων ἀνήριθμον γέλασμα (Prom. 89 f.), St. John listened to 'the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters' (Rev 19⁶).

LITERATURE.—L. Ross, Reisen auf den griechischen Inseln des ägäischen Meeres, Halle, 1840-1845; V. Guérin, Description de l'île de Patmos et de l'île de Samos, Paris, 1856; H. F. Tozer, Islands of the Ægean, London, 1890, pp. 178-185.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PATRIARCH (πατριάρχης, from πατρίς, 'clan,' and ἀρχή, 'rule').—A patriarch is the father or head of a πατρίς or clan. As applied to Bible characters, the term usually denotes either the forefathers of the human race or the progenitors of Israel—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and his twelve sons. In the LXX of 1 Ch 24³¹ 27²², 2 Ch 19⁸ 26¹ πατριάρχαι renders various Hebrew terms, which appear in our EV as 'principal fathers,' 'heads of fathers' houses,' and 'captains.' In 4 Mac 7¹⁹ reference is made to 'our patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob' (cf. 4 Mac 16²⁹). In the NT the term is applied to Abraham (He 7⁴), to the sons of Jacob (Ac 7²⁴), and also to David, in a text (2²⁹) where it has greater dignity than the ordinary 'king' would have had. It was of David that St. Peter, speaking μετὰ παρηγορίας, 'had to say something not altogether favourable, in order that thereby the glory of Christ might be the more enhanced. There is therefore in this passage a προθεραπεία, or previous mitigation of what he is about to say' (Bengel, in loco).

JAMES STRAHAN.

PATROBAS (Πατρόβας, a Greek name, contracted from Patrobias).—Patrobias is the fourth of a group of five names (all Greek) of persons 'and the brethren with them' saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹⁴. Nothing is known of any member of this group. It is suggested that together they formed an ἐκκλησία or household church, the locality of which we shall suppose to have been Rome or Ephesus, according to our view of the destination of these salutations. This is more probable than that they were slaves belonging to some great establishment, or members of a civic gild. Cf. the salutation to another group of five persons 'and all the saints that are with them' in the verse following. In each case the names mentioned probably represent 'the first nucleus, the leading individuals, of the congregation (see C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i. [1894] 398f.), and perhaps the first mentioned (Asyncritus, v.¹⁴, Philologus, v.¹⁵) was the recognized leader. All, however, may have been heads of separate Christian households. For the occurrence of the name Patrobas on inscriptions of the Imperial household see J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, 1878, p. 176. T. B. ALLWORTHY.

PATTERN.—In the EV of the NT 'pattern' occurs seven times, representing four different words in the original—τύπος, υποτυπωσις, υπόδειγμα, and ἀντίτυπον.

1. τύπος (from τυπτειν, 'to strike') denotes primarily a mark or impression left by a blow (cf. Jn 20²⁵ 'the print [τυπον] of the nails'). In classical Greek it is used of the impress of a seal or the stamp struck by a die, and so comes to mean the figure or copy of something else. But as the impression on the wax reproduces the engraving on the seal, and the coin or medal the device on the die, the word comes to be transferred, by a familiar process in the history of language, from the effect to the cause, and so is used not only of the copy but of the example or pattern from which the copy is made. In Ro 6¹⁷ the RVm offers 'pattern' as an alternative for 'form' of doctrine or teaching. In Tit 2⁷ the AV has 'pattern (RV 'ensample') of good works.' In He 8⁵ the AV and the RV both employ 'pattern' to render the τυπος shown to Moses in the Mount.

2. υποτυπωσις (from υποτυπων, 'to sketch out,' Lat. adumbrare) is strictly a 'sketch' or 'outline' (αἱ ὑποτυπώσεις is the name given by Sextus Empiricus to his outlines of the Pyrrhonic philosophy). In 1 Ti 1¹⁶ ('a pattern [RV 'ensample'] to them which should hereafter believe') St. Paul may have used the word in its original meaning to suggest that his experiences as a saved sinner were an 'adumbration' of those of subsequent believers. But the secondary meaning 'pattern' is more probable, in view of the fact that the word is evidently used in this sense in 2 Ti 1¹³, 'hold fast the form (RV 'pattern') of sound words.'

3. υπόδειγμα (from υποδεικνυμαι, 'to show,' with the suggestion of placing what is shown under the very eyes) is properly a thing exhibited as an example or pattern. In this sense the word is used several times in the NT (e.g. Jn 13¹⁵, 'I have given you an example'; Ja 5¹⁰, 'an example of suffering affliction'). The AV takes it in this sense in He 9²³ and renders 'patterns.' But υπόδειγμα, like τυπος, may denote a copy as well as a pattern; and in rendering 'copies' here the RV clearly conveys the correct idea, since the things referred to are 'the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry' (v.²¹), which were only copies of 'the heavenly things themselves.' Cf. 8⁵, where the RV rightly changes 'the example (υπόδειγματι) and shadow of heavenly things' into 'a copy and shadow of the heavenly things.'

4. ἀντίτυπα (He 9²⁴) is probably to be taken as an adjective rather than a substantive (ἀντίτυπος = 'answering to the type,' 'corresponding to the pattern,' no doubt with reference to the τύπος of 8⁵; see above). The RV, 'like in pattern to the true,' is therefore to be preferred to the AV, 'the figures of the true.'

PAUL.—1. Sources.—The documents of the life of St. Paul are the Book of Acts, of which his biography occupies nearly two-thirds, and his own Epistles. To these, however, the student has to add all he can of the history of the Jews and their sacred books, as well as of the state of the world in the time of St. Paul. New sources of information are constantly being opened up, as, e.g., by travel and exploration in the countries and cities in which St. Paul laboured, or by fresh knowledge of Roman law, either in general or in special application to the Jews.

i. THE BOOK OF ACTS.—A first glance into the Book of Acts reveals that it is a continuation of a previous treatise, which is without difficulty identified as the Gospel according to St. Luke. From several passages in the book where the author writes in the first person plural (16¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 20⁵ 21¹⁻¹⁸ 27¹⁻²⁸—frequently referred to as the 'we' passages), it is manifest that he must, at certain stages, have been a companion of St. Paul on his missionary journeys; and a comparison of these with the references to St. Luke as a companion in the Epistles points to the conclusion that he was the man. This is also the testimony of tradition, and it is generally, though not universally, accepted.

(a) Purpose.—The Tübingen School conceived Acts to be a work written for a purpose—that of reconciling the rivalry between the Petrine and the Pauline elements in the primitive Church, and criticism has discovered in it, as in nearly every other biblical book, various separable documents, which were reduced by various editors and revisers to the form we now possess. But of late the current has been flowing strongly in an opposite direction. W. M. Ramsay, who began himself with the Tübingen views, found that the book answered better to the realities he was bringing to light with the spade in Asia Minor when it was assumed to be the work of one author, who was doing his best to tell the truth; and he has vindicated the claim of St. Luke to be one of the great historians of the world, possessed of the true historical insight, grasp, and accuracy; and Harnack, starting from prejudices equally pronounced, has arrived at practically the same conclusions. The latter, indeed, in summing up his investigations into the writings of St. Luke (Die Apostelgeschichte [= Beiträge zur Einleitung in das NT, iii.], 1908, p. 224 f.), charges conservative scholars, who have reached the same conclusions before him, with causing the truth to be suspected through their prejudices; and there is no doubt that interest attaches to the fact that he has reached the goal from so distant a starting-point. There are not wanting, indeed, scholars to support less conservative opinions. Even English-writing ones are found in J. Moffatt (LNT, 1911) and B. W. Bacon (The Story of St. Paul, 1905), though the former at least has humour enough to laugh at certain critical views not very unlike his own. C. Clemen, the author of the latest important German book on the subject (Paulus. Sein Leben und Wirken, 1904), has no humour at all, but ploughs his way stolidly through the Book of Acts, accepting as fact whatever is natural and rejecting whatever is supernatural. Anyone may realize for himself what such a procedure will make of the book by reading on this principle the account of what happened on St. Paul's first visit to Philippi, though, one would suppose, St. Luke must have had his eyes and ears specially on the alert there, as it was the first time he had seen his new master at work.

It is not so much a religious or a theological as a literary instinct that makes the present writer distrust the critical method of handling this book.

He does not believe that books worth preserving were ever made in this way. Nor does he believe that they were so easily altered. There is a reverence which a completed book inspires; and the idea that there was no conscience about this in ancient times or in the land of Judæa is one with nothing to justify it; on the contrary, as regards the Jews, cf. Josephus, c. Apion. i. 8. Besides, the Acts must very soon have begun to be read in the assemblies of the Christians, and this would be a protection. It may, indeed, be said that this book is an unfortunate one about which to make such a stand, seeing that it has undoubtedly experienced considerable alteration in the Bezan text. But the explanation of this phenomenon may be the simple one that the author had made two copies of his own book, and permitted himself a natural liberty in writing the second of them.

(b) Plan.—The plan of Acts is indicated in 1⁸: 'But ye shall receive power, when the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa and Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth'; and the book divides itself as follows:—1¹–6⁸, in Jerusalem; 6⁸–9³⁰, in Palestine (including Samaria); 9³²–12²⁵, from Judæa to Antioch; 12²⁵–16¹, in Asia Minor; 16¹–19¹⁹, in Europe; 19²¹–28³⁰, from Achaia to Rome. The author is fond of summarizing a period, before setting out on a new stage, and such resting-places will be found at the end of the above divisions, viz. in 6⁹ 9³¹ 12²⁴ 16⁵ 19²⁰ 28³¹. St. Paul first makes his appearance in 7³⁶, but it is not till 13¹ that he becomes the hero of the book, the story thenceforward being merely an account of his missionary travels and other fortunes. The author narrates with extraordinary conciseness, a striking instance being where the name 'Saul' is exchanged for 'Paul' without a word of explanation (13¹³); and, when the traveller duplicates a journey, the second notice is of the briefest possible description. Yet the style is marked by ease and freedom, scene following scene with the variety and lifelikeness of painting. Indeed, there is a tradition that the author was a painter as well as a physician, this being at least a tribute to the picturesqueness of his narrative. The speeches attributed to St. Paul are often said to be free compositions of St. Luke; because ancient historians, especially Thucydides, took this liberty. But why should St. Luke have done so, when he had the speaker himself to consult, not to mention his own recollection or the conversations of those about St. Paul, which must often have turned on the great sermons of their hero? Ramsay is of opinion that the first verse of the book implies that the writer intended to pen a third volume, similar in bulk to the Gospel and the Acts; and this would account for the narrative breaking off where it does, with a brief notice of the two years of imprisonment which followed the arrival at Rome. This would, however, be still more naturally accounted for if the book was written about the date to which it brings the history down; and the present writer knows nothing which renders this impossible. The chief objection to this early date for Acts is that it must have been written before the Gospel of St. Luke, which, it is assumed, was not written till after the destruction of Jerusalem. The reasons, however, for assuming this date for the Gospel are less cogent than those for believing the Acts to have been penned before the trial at Rome; so that the alternative is between allowing a highly argumentative dating of the Gospel to fix a late date for the Acts and making a clearly indicated date of the Acts determine for the Gospel an earlier date than it has been usual to assign to it. Cf. A. Harnack, The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels, Eng. tr., 1911, Luke the Physician, Eng. tr., 1911, and The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1909.

Moffatt's explanation of the sudden breaking off of the narrative in the Acts is that the purpose of the book was to relate the progress of Christianity from Jerusalem to Rome; J. Weiss, in Das Urchristenthum, 1914, makes the suggestion that Acts was written for Roman Christians, who did not require to be informed of what had become of the hero; and Clemen actually brings in as an explanation Horace's rule, in Ars Poetica, 185 f., about not slaughtering the characters of a tragedy in the sight of the audience, forgetting that, in the beginning of this book, an immortal scene is constructed out of the martyrdom of St. Stephen. If, as many now assume, St. Paul's trial ended in condemnation and execution, it is easy to understand with what effect St. Luke could have used this as the winding-up of his story; and it is incredible that, knowing so pathetic and significant an event to have immediately followed the point to which he had brought his narrative down, he could have omitted to mention it. (On a supposed dependence on Josephus, throwing the composition of Acts late, see the remarks of J. Vernon Bartlet in Century Bible, 'Acts,' 1901, pp. 19, 181, 251, 340; also R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 30 f.)

The narrative, from the point of St. Paul's arrest onwards, abandons its conciseness and gives an extraordinary amount of space to the incidents of his appearance before different tribunals. Bacon notes this in a tone of disapproval; but he falls too easily a victim to the temptation besetting critics who ascribe the form of biblical books to more or less incompetent editors, of attributing difficulties to these lay-figures, instead of exerting himself to find out the true explanation. Ramsay ascribes this amplitude to a deliberate plan, kept in view all through the book, by which St. Paul, the representative of Christianity, is made to appear a personage of consideration to Roman officials, who are nearly always favourable to him, not infrequently defending him not only from the violence of the mob but from officials who are not Roman; and from this he infers that the book was written at a date when persecution had been going on for a considerable time. It would be, however, a simpler explanation if the composition of the book had had in some way to do with St. Paul's trial; for, in that case, it would have been important to dwell on the events since the date when he fell into the custody of Roman officials; J. Weiss (op. cit. p. 106 f.) leaves room for this possibility, assuming that the principal source stopped here, though insisting on later editorial operations.

(c) Chronology.—The chronology is an extremely difficult question, because the fixed points that seem to be obtained by the sacred history touching on profane history (Aretas, 2 Co 11³²; Herod, Ac 12²⁰⁻²³; Claudius, 11²⁷⁻³⁰ 12²⁵; Felix and Festus, 24²⁷) fail, when closely scrutinized, to remain fixed. The nearest to an absolutely certain date seems at present to be the consulship of Gallio (Ac 18²⁵), which is fixed by an inscription found at Delphi, of which A. Deissmann has given a detailed account in St. Paul, 1912, App. I., p. 244 ff. From this it would seem that St. Paul must have been at Corinth, during his second missionary journey, in A.D. 50; and from this point the chronology can be traced both backwards and forwards. St. Paul cannot have been born very long after Jesus; and it is wonderful to think of any race having the fecundity to produce, within a few years or perhaps months, three such figures as John the Baptist, Jesus, and St. Paul. It is generally supposed that Jesus was three-and-thirty years of age at the time of His death; and we cannot be far wrong in thinking of St. Paul as about five-and-thirty at the time of his conversion. Few perhaps realize that between his conversion and the commencement of his missionary journeys there was an interval of not less than fourteen or fifteen years. To the three great missionary journeys may be assigned some ten years; whence it follows that, when he reached Rome, he must have been about sixty. In the last Epistle which proceeded from his pen he called himself 'Paul the aged'; and, although this is a phrase elastic enough to have different meanings in the mouths of different men, the probability is that he was not far from the threescore years and ten at which the Psalmist placed the term of human life.

The dates of three recent chronologists (Lightfoot, Ramsay, Harnack, quoted in A. E. Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, 1910, p. 181) do not vary much—for the conversion, 34, 33, 30; for the first missionary journey, 48, 47, 45; for the second missionary journey, 51, 50, 47; for the third missionary journey, 54, 53, 50; for the arrival at Rome, 61, 60, 57.

ii. THE EPISTLES.—Whereas an ordinary letter among us begins with a title of courtesy, addressed to the receiver, and ends with the signature of the writer, preceded by some phrase of courtesy or affection, while place and date stand either above or beneath the whole, an ancient letter commenced with the name of the sender, followed by the name of the recipient, together with a word of greeting, and it ended with the date and the place of writing. St. Paul developed the greeting into an elaborate form of his own, in which he described both himself and his correspondents in their relations to God and Christ, and wished them, instead of the goodwill of an ordinary letter, the primary blessings of the gospel. Sometimes he went on to express his thankfulness to God for their steadfastness in the faith and their progress in grace, and to pray for their further development. In one or two cases all this was not completed within fewer than a score of verses. If, at the end, he added date and place, these have been lost, with the exception perhaps of fragments; and the loss is to us a serious one, as it implies much research to fill up the blanks, and the results are more or less conjectural. As a rule the writer dictated to an amanuensis, who might be named in the superscription, as well as other comrades present when the Epistle was sent away. In one case (Ro 16²⁷) the amanuensis sent a greeting on his own account. The greetings at the close form a striking feature of the Apostle's epistolary style, betraying as they do the width of his sympathies and the warmth of his heart. Sometimes he would take the pen from the amanuensis at the close and add a few weighty words in autograph, to which, we need not doubt, extraordinary interest would be attached by the first readers. From the close of Galatians we gather that his own penmanship was large and sprawling: read, in 6¹¹, 'See with how large letters I have written unto you with mine own hand.'

It is frequently repeated that the Epistles of St. Paul were just ordinary letters, Deissmann going furthest of late in this direction. But this is not the case. Ordinary letters are addressed to individuals, and much of their charm consists in the intimacies which they disclose. But the majority of St. Paul's Epistles were composed for churches. Inevitably, therefore, they had edification in view; and some of them are little different from sermons. Indeed, some of them obviously reproduce the essence of his preaching, while the rhythmic and periodic flow of the more eloquent passages may be ascribed with confidence to the frequent repetitions of the wandering evangelist. As at all periods of his life their author was not only the propagandist of a definite faith but an opponent of contrary doctrines, a doctrinal or dogmatic character could not help appearing in what he wrote. The one bearing most resemblance to an ordinary letter is the brief Epistle to Philemon; but Philemon was not a very intimate friend, and this letter, though confidential, keeps a certain distance, as of one addressing a social superior. With Timothy and Titus St. Paul was on terms of much closer intimacy; but, in writing to them as youthful pastors, he could not help thinking of the churches over which they presided, and much of what he wrote was obviously intended for the general benefit. Still it remains true that St. Paul's Epistles are neither sermons nor theological treatises, but are written with the freedom and realism of actual correspondence. They afford occasion for displaying the height and the variety of their author's personality; for in them he is always himself—affectionate, irascible, passionate, radiant, and optimistic as long as his converts are faithful and his churches expanding, but ready to perish with vexation and foreboding should they be the reverse. His style adapts itself without constraint to the mood he is in and the situation to which he is addressing himself. It can be abrupt, headlong, abounding with interrogations and anacolutha, or it can follow closely the windings of an intricate argument and break out into a rapture of doxology at the close. It is always copious, filling the channel from bank to bank, yet only at rare intervals strikingly sublime or beautiful. Evidently the author is not straining after effect or aiming at excellency; yet here and there, through the sheer quality of the matter, his speech becomes a cascade, breaking in foam over the rocks, or it widens into a lake where plants of every hue dip into the water and birds of every note sing among the branches.

Much attention has of late been devoted to the language of St. Paul. It had long been known that it differed materially from the Greek of the classical age, and that it had been modified largely by the ideas of the Hebrew Scriptures and the language of the LXX. But through the unearthing of the remains of the literature and correspondence of the time, in the rubbish-heaps of ancient cities or in the recesses of Egyptian tombs, it has been demonstrated that there prevailed over all the Greek-speaking world a development of Greek speech, common to all peoples and therefore now known as Koine, and that to this the language of the NT in general, and of St. Paul in particular, is so closely related that a knowledge of the one is the key to the other; and St. Paul takes his place as a master of this language. 'He thinks in Greek, and it is the vernacular of a brilliant and well-educated man in touch with the Greek culture of his time, though remaining thoroughly Jewish in his mental fibre' (A. T. Robertson, A Grammar of NT Greek in the Light of Historical Research, 1914, p. 2). See, in addition, Weiss, op. cit. ch. 13; also T. Nügel, Der Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus, 1905.

(a) Galatians.—The Epistle to the Galatians, both in subject and treatment, bears so strong a resemblance to the Epistle to the Romans that it used to be assumed that the composition of both must be assigned to about the same time; and, as the latter indubitably belongs to the residence in Corinth at the close of the third missionary journey, it was taken for granted that Galatians must be placed there too. But, if its recipients were the churches of Antioch-in-Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, evangelized during the first missionary journey, and if the visit to Jerusalem mentioned in Gal 2 be identified with a visit to Jerusalem preceding the Council held there—these two being the conclusions of what is called the South Galatian theory (see below)—it seems a natural inference that the Epistle was written before the commencement of the second missionary journey and before the Council of Jerusalem. This inference was not, indeed, drawn by Ramsay himself, when he was developing the South Galatian theory; he still held to the old view that Galatians must be placed side by side with Romans. But it was perceived to be inevitable by others who had accepted the South Galatian theory (J. V. Bartlet, The Apostolic Age, 1900, p. 84 f., and Garvie, Studies of Paul and his Gospel, p. 23); and Ramsay, in his latest publications, has come round to it (e.g. The Teaching of Paul, 1913, p. 372 ff.), holding Galatians to be the earliest of all the Epistles. The brevity of the introduction and the absence therein of the courtesies which abound in the later Epistles used to be attributed to the excitement in which the Epistle was written; but, if this was the earliest of the Epistles, it may be that the complimentary style of address had not yet been developed. Certainly the author was writing in haste and in indignation; and there is more of what may be called the natural man, as well as of the Rabbi, in this than in any other of his writings. This was the commencement of the most heated and painful of all his controversies, and he enters the fray without the gloves. The Judaists had captured his churches, denied his apostolic authority, and overturned his gospel; and it is with the passion of a mother bereaved of her young that he throws himself at the feet of his converts, entreating them not to render his labour vain or allow themselves to be robbed of salvation; while he turns on the enemy to defy and to blast. The theme is the contrast between law and gospel. In the strongest language he can find, he repeats, in every variety of expression, that the former is abortive and abolished, but that the latter is the glorious revelation which is the end of all the ways of God with men. It is not difficult 'to find in 1⁶⁻²² 3¹⁻⁴ 4¹⁻⁶ three successive arguments upon (a) the divine origin of Paul's gospel, (b) the complete right of Gentile Christians to the messianic inheritance, and (c) the vital connection between the Christian Spirit and the moral life' (Moffatt, LNT, p. 83, quoting Holsten, etc.).

(b) 1 and 2 Thessalonians.—At the time when Galatians was, on account of similarity in temper and ideas, kept beside Romans, 1 and 2 Thess. used to be treated as the first-fruits of the Apostle's epistolary activity; and these two Epistles seemed to fit this position very well, being marked by extraordinary freshness and simplicity. They were written soon after the missionary left Thessalonica after his first visit. Their style is more like that of a lover to the object of his affection, from whom he has been unavoidably separated but to whom he longs to return. Indeed, he compares his own affection for his converts to that of a mother for her children; he declares that the newly made Christians are his glory and joy; and he tells them that he lives if they stand fast in the faith. He recalls his first meeting with them and their subsequent intercourse together; again and again has he tried to return to see them, and he still cherishes the same ardent desire. There are not a few indications of the amplitude of the gospel preached by him amongst them—as, for instance, in the very first lines of the Epistle, a reference to the trinity of Christian graces, faith, love, and hope. But he does not enlarge on doctrinal matters. Taking it for granted that the substance of his recent preaching amongst them must still be well remembered, he contents himself with the plainest exhortations to a life in harmony with the gospel of Christ—as, for instance, to abstain from the peculiarly pagan sin of fornication and to love one another. Special stress is laid on the duty of those who called themselves by the name of Christ to perform their ordinary daily work in such a way as to commend the gospel to those that are without; and this duty was not to be set aside by the fact that the time was short, and that Christ would soon return to judgment. He drew a vivid picture of the Second Advent, as he conceived it; but this appears to have acted on the minds of his correspondents in a way different from his intention. And this became the occasion for the Second Epistle, which succeeded the First after a brief interval and is occupied with the same themes, except that it gives a forecast of the history of the world, intended to calm the minds of those who had allowed themselves to become so excited about the Lord's coming that they were neglecting their business and bringing scandal thereby on the new religion. This passage is among the most difficult in the whole compass of St. Paul's writings, and has tested the competency of exegetes; but the drift of it is plain: the return of the Lord was not to take place as soon as had been expected; and, therefore, Christians, while always ready to meet Him, whensoever He might appear, must be prepared also for the other alternative—to perform the duties of their earthly callings with fidelity, if the coming was postponed. The Christians at Thessalonica were exposed to severe persecution, and the accounts in the Acts of St. Paul's own experience in that city and at Berea make it easy to surmise from what quarter this came. Not only, therefore, does their spiritual father make use of every consideration fitted to comfort them, but he breaks out against the race to which he himself belonged in a style which reminds us of the manner in which even the loving St. John in his Gospel speaks of 'the Jews.'

(c) 1 and 2 Corinthians.—1 Cor. was written from Ephesus during the author's prolonged sojourn in that city in the third missionary journey. It would, however, appear that it was not the first letter sent by the Apostle to the same church. He had sent one which has not come down to us (see 1 Co 5⁹); and this raises the question whether he may not have written other Epistles which have shared the same fate. The sacredness now attaching to his writings might a priori be thought to render it impossible that anything as precious as a letter written by him to a church should perish; but it may be no more astonishing that writings of his should have been lost than that words of Jesus should have been carried irrecoverably down the wind. After receiving the Epistle now lost, the Corinthians had written to the founder of their church, describing their own condition and asking his opinion and advice about a number of problems and difficulties that had arisen among them. And this was not the only case in which a Pauline Epistle was evoked by a communication from those to whom it was addressed. Besides, St. Paul had heard of the condition of the Corinthians from 'them of the household of Chloe' (1 Co 1¹⁴), and he was far from being satisfied that all was well with his spiritual children. There is a tone of strain and anxiety in the Epistle from first to last; at the same time, the impression is conveyed that the author feels himself to be dealing with a church holding a great place in the world and destined for a great future. The intimate nature of the questions propounded in the letter received from the Corinthians leads him to enter into minute details; accordingly, this Epistle exhibits by far the fullest picture in existence of the interior of an apostolic church. We learn the different ranks and conditions of which the membership is composed; we see the gifts of the Spirit in full operation; we are made aware of the flaws and inconsistencies which, had we not been informed on such good authority, could hardly be believed to have disfigured the period of the Church's first love; the rival parties and their wrangles, the backsliders and the sowers of tares among the wheat, all pass before our eyes. Yet it is this church and its affairs that draw forth from the Apostle the panegyric on love in ch. 13, the praise of unity in ch. 14, and the demonstration of the resurrection of the body in ch. 15. Such was the letter-writer's power of illustrating great principles in small duties. Several passages (e.g. 6¹⁻¹³ 8¹⁻⁴ 10³³ 15¹²⁻³⁵) become more intelligible if it be assumed that St. Paul is quoting the sentiments of the Corinthians, before replying to their queries.

Between 1 and 2 Cor., it is thought by some scholars, St. Paul paid a visit to Corinth not mentioned in Acts, and, returning to Ephesus after a stormy interview, wrote a tempestuous letter, part of which is preserved in 2 Co 10¹⁻¹³. The bearer of this missive was Titus, who, on his way back to Ephesus, was met by St. Paul in Macedonia, and was able to give so cheering an account of the effect produced at Corinth that at once he was sent back with another letter, conceived in a totally different tone, which has come down to us under the title of 2 Corinthians. This new Epistle has all the appearance of having been written in a recoil from painful excitement and in the exultation caused by the receipt of good news. In it the author lays bare his innermost feelings more fully than in any other production of his pen. If anyone wishes to know the real St. Paul, this is the opportunity. It has been called the Ich-epistel, also St. Paul's Apologia pro Vita Sua. A portion of it (2¹²⁻⁶) has been taken by A. T. Robertson as a text for a treatise entitled The Glory of the Ministry: Paul's Exultation in Preaching, n.d.; and certainly it can hardly be fully understood except by those who have devoted their life to the salvation of others, and have felt what St. Paul calls the pangs of labour in bringing souls to the birth through the gospel. The mood throughout is one of triumph, but at the beginning of ch. 10 there is a sudden change to a tone of intense sharpness and even bitterness. By some this is accounted for by the supposition mentioned above; but others are satisfied with supposing an alteration in the mood of the writer, accompanied perhaps by some delay between the composition of the earlier and the latter halves of the Epistle. Happily, though the tone is changed, the autobiographical revelations still continue, and St. Paul completes the portrait of himself.

(d) Romans.—The Epistle to the Romans is, in not a few respects, the greatest of all the productions of St. Paul's pen. It lacks, indeed, the personal and affectionate note so characteristic of his writings; for it is the only Epistle of his sent to a church not founded or as yet visited by himself. To this fact, however, is due in some degree its greatness; because, while in writing to churches already visited he could take it for granted that his correspondents knew his gospel so well that he did not require to repeat it, he was compelled, when writing to those who had never seen his face in the flesh, to state his gospel at full length. Of this opportunity advantage is taken to the full in the present case; and there is no question that in Rom. we have the essence of what he preached in every city which he evangelized. As at Miletus he declared to the elders from Ephesus that for three years he had preached in the capital of Asia 'repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 20²¹), so in Romans the need which all men, whether Gentiles or Jews, have of repentance is first fully unfolded, and this is followed by an equally ample and convincing exhibition of the happy effects due to faith in the Saviour. Here we have illustrations from Hebrew history, and especially from the Father of the Faithful, such as would be welcome in every synagogue, as well as a philosophy of the history of mankind such as would be more likely to captivate Gentile hearers. Although, as has been mentioned, the personal note is absent, yet, after his demonstration is complete, at the close of ch. 8, he turns to discuss the tragic fact that the Jewish race had missed its destiny and allowed the gospel intended for them to pass over to the Gentiles. How was this to be reconciled with the election of God, in which St. Paul was a firm believer? The answer occupies no less than three chapters, and it permits us to see into the very heart of the writer, who, though with the indignation of a Christian he could speak as he had done in Thess. of the chosen people, yet was a Jew to the marrow of his bones, and was ready, he declares, to be himself 'accursed from Christ, if by so being he could save his brethren according to the flesh. The same noble unselfishness pervades the discussion of 'meats' in the chapters that follow, though his ethical genius would be considered by many to rise to its culminating point in ch. 12. In the book as it now stands there is, at the close, an unusually long list of greetings to friends; and the question arises how he could have known so many in a city which he had never visited. It may be replied that Rome was, in that age, such a centre that visitors might be present in it from many of the cities and towns visited by him in other lands. But this will hardly suffice, and a different explanation seems to be at least possible. An Epistle like this, so impersonal and didactic, was well fitted to be sent to various churches, and several copies might be executed and dispatched to different communities. The greetings, then, which now stand in Rom. may have been intended for one of these. It may have been Ephesus, and a close scrutiny of the names is said to point to Ephesus rather than to Rome.

(e) Epistles of the Imprisonment.—The Epistles written up to this point belong to the years during which the Apostle was engaged in his missionary travels. There follow four to which has been given the common title of the Epistles of the Imprisonment, because they were written during the years, subsequent to his arrest at Jerusalem, when he was in the custody of the Roman authorities. In those years he was moved from prison to prison, but at two places—Cæsarea and Rome—he experienced periods of imprisonment, lasting in each case about two years. Some of these letters may have been composed at the one place, some at the other; but the usual opinion has been that they were all written at Rome.

In one of his prisons St. Paul was visited by Epaphras, a minister from Colossæ, a town in the Lycus Valley not far from Ephesus, who had come to consult him about the condition of the church over which he presided and to solicit from him a letter to the members, in order that these might be persuaded by the authority of an apostle to abandon errors into which they were falling and return to the simplicity of the truth as it is in Jesus. The new heresy was not that already so thoroughly confuted by St. Paul in Gal. and Rom., but a kind of speculation such as he had already encountered in some degree among the Corinthians, and which was destined to spread through the churches till it came to be known in history, after the Apostolic Age, under the sinister name of Gnosticism. It had its principal hold in the Gentile, as the earlier heresy had had in the Jewish, section of the Church. As yet, indeed, it was only incipient; but Epaphras was afraid of it, and he had little difficulty in communicating his fears to the Apostle; so that he secured and carried back to his flock what is now known as the Epistle to the Colossians.

The anxieties awakened in the mind of the prisoner by what he had heard from Colossæ may easily have extended to other churches in the same quarter, and impelled him to write in the same strain to them also. Indeed, in the Epistle to the Colossians itself reference is made (4¹⁶) to a letter he had written to the Laodiceans, the significant request being added that the Colossian Epistle be read also at Laodicea, and the Laodicean one at Colossæ. This may have suggested the idea of a circular letter to all the churches in that portion of Asia Minor; and the opinion has been held by not a few that what is now known as the Epistle to the Ephesians was originally a document of this description. This would account for the absence from it of the usual greetings at the end, which might have been expected to be more than usually profuse when he was writing to a church in the founding of which he had spent three years of his life. It might account also for an abstract and impersonal tone which undoubtedly clings to this Epistle. It is written at a great height above the common earth, and it may easily embody the ruminations of one who had long been in the solitude of a prison. It comes down, indeed, before it ends, to practical things, giving a more complete sketch of what may be called the ethics of Christianity than any other of the Epistles; but even in this portion of it there is something of the same abstract and distant tone, the author being less concerned with the duties themselves than with the motives out of which the discharge of these is to spring. To him the whole cosmical history of Christ is a source of motives, which he is constantly seeking to evoke in those whose spiritual welfare is his care. There is not much to commend the procedure of Moffatt (LNT, p. 375) when he accepts Colossians as from St. Paul but rejects Ephesians; Bacon, though also prone to negative criticism, is here led by a truer instinct, feeling the spiritual power of the text with which he is dealing (op. cit. p. 298 ff.). It is obvious that both the thought and the phraseology of Colossians and Ephesians are largely alike; but every writer of letters is aware that he sometimes puts the same facts, thoughts, and even words into letters written about the same time; and this was specially liable to happen when one of the letters had the general character belonging to Ephesians. The estimate of this Epistle by S. T. Coleridge as 'one of the divinest compositions of man' (Table Talk, 25th May 1830) has commended itself to multitudes not unworthy to hold an opinion on such matters; and this raises the question, by whom the Epistle could have been written, if it be not to St. Paul we owe it. Coleridge considered the Epistle to the Colossians to be the overflowing of St. Paul's mind upon the subjects already treated in Ephesians; but the present writer inclines to conceive the relation between them as the reverse. It is impossible, however, to do more than guess.

In Colossians there is a reference to one Onesimus (4⁹), who is described as a faithful and beloved brother and a member of the Colossian Church; and the same is the name of an escaped slave who is the subject of the Epistle to Philemon. It would appear that he had defrauded his master and run away to the capital of the world, where, through some providence to us unknown, he was thrown into the company of St. Paul, through whom he was converted. St. Paul would willingly have retained him, since he appeared to be a handy man such as the prisoner was at the time in need of; but he considered it his duty to send him back to his owner; and the Epistle to Philemon is the letter of introduction and excuse sent with him. In spite of its brevity, it is a perfect gem of tact and courtesy; and it is fitted to awaken many reflexions on the relations of employers and employed.

The last Epistle of this group is that to the Philippians; and, if in Colossians and Ephesians there be a lack of the personal element, this is amply made up for in this new Epistle, which assures us that imprisonment had in no way soured or damped the spirit of the writer, who was still as emotional and as optimistic as he had always been. In tone it bears a close resemblance to 1 Thess., and it is worthy of note that it was directed to the same quarter of the world, Philippi and Thessalonica being neighbouring cities. Though penned in a prison, it has joy for its keynote; and, though addressed to a persecuted church, it expects its recipients to be glorying in the Cross. It is of special value as a document of St. Paul's prison-life. We can see with the mind's eye the Roman soldier to whom he is chained, with the various articles of the panoply mentioned in the last chapter of Ephesians. As his guard would be changed every few hours, numbers of soldiers would be brought in contact with him; and among these there had broken out a work of grace, which had become a theme amongst the prætorian guards and had spread from them to the household of the Emperor, from the members of which the author is able to send greetings to his correspondents. (Cf. separate notes on 'prætorium' and 'Cæsar's household' in Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, 1878, pp. 99 ff., 171 ff.) Besides, his trial, certain stages of which were already past, was turning out favourably, and he was able to believe that he would soon be at large again, when he would use his freedom to revisit his beloved Macedonians. Because the Epistle seems about to end at the close of ch. 2, Bacon fancies there may be two letters united into one (op. cit. p. 368).

(f) Pastoral Epistles.—There remains another group, known by the name of the Pastoral Epistles and consisting of 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus. They owe this title to the fact that they are addressed to youthful pastors by the aged pastor St. Paul, who, out of his own rich and prolonged experience, instructs them how it is necessary to comport themselves in the house of God. From their internal structure and contents it can be easily seen that all the members of this group are of one piece and originated at the same time; but it is so difficult to find a place for them in the portion of St. Paul's life covered by Acts that they have been assigned to a portion of it subsequent to this, when, it is supposed, being released from prison, he resumed his apostolic wanderings, till he was re-arrested. In 2 Tim. he is seen in prison at Rome, not, as when he wrote Philippians, expecting release, but looking forward to immediate martyrdom. But in 1 Tim. and Tit. he is at large and in motion, having, when he wrote the one, just left Timothy in Ephesus, and, when he wrote the other, left Titus in Crete, an island which he visited on his way to Rome but could not have evangelized whilst he was a prisoner. About no other portion of St. Paul's writings, however, has there been so much doubt as to whether he was really the author. In certain quarters it is at present taken for granted that these Epistles did not come from his pen. Thus, the latest book published in Germany on the subject (H. H. Mayer, Ueber die Pastoral-briefe, 1913) assumes this without discussion. But on such a subject votes require to be weighed as well as counted; and the completest and ablest discussion, by Zalm, the Nestor of NT criticism, takes the opposite view (Introduction to the NT, 3 vols., 1909, ii. 1-133), which is the prevalent one in England and America, though some recent scholars, like Moffatt (LNT, p. 395 ff.), Bacon (op. cit., p. 375), and Garvie (Studies of Paul and his Gospel, p. 30 n.), have gone over to the other side. It cannot be denied that anyone passing from Col. and Eph. into these Epistles would feel himself in a different intellectual atmosphere, though he would feel this much less if he made the transition from 1 and 2 Cor., the subjects handled in which are more akin to those taken up here. The question is, whether the change can be sufficiently accounted for by the fact that the author is writing to individuals instead of churches, his correspondents being disciples intimately acquainted with his doctrine, so that he does not require to repeat what they already know. Much is made by opponents of the Pauline authorship of the number of words in these Epistles used by St. Paul only once, the number of these being stated by Moffatt at 180. This sounds fatal; but on reflexion the discerning reader will perceive that such a figure has no value unless we know what is the writer's habit in this respect. Whatever may be the reason for it, St. Paul employs more of these ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, as they are called, the longer he writes, the proportion to the chapter being, roughly speaking, 5 in Thess., 7 in Rom., 8 in Eph. and Col., 10 in Phil., and 13 in the Pastoral Epistles; so that actually a convincing argument against the Pauline authorship could have been fashioned out of the number had it been small. There are frequent coincidences of thought such as would not easily have occurred to an imitator; note, e.g., the lists of sins in 1 Ti 1⁹⁻¹⁰ and 2 Ti 3¹⁻⁵, and cf. Ro 1²⁴, 1 Co 6⁹⁻¹⁰, Gal 5¹⁹⁻²⁰; and there are passages which may be said to contain the very essence of Paulinism, such as 1 Ti 2⁴⁻⁶, 2 Ti 1⁹⁻¹⁰, Tit 2¹²⁻¹⁴ 3¹⁻⁷. Against the Pauline authorship it is contended that ecclesiastical development is more advanced than in the Epistles which are certainly St. Paul's. But, with the exception of what is said about female officials—and what is said about them is the reverse of distinct—the office-bearers are the same as are found in Acts and Phil., and it is highly significant of an early date that not the slightest hint is given of any distinction between bishops and elders, Tit 1⁵⁻⁷ clearly proving these to be identical; whereas in the Ignatian Epistles, at no great distance in time, the distinction has become very marked, if indeed the passages are genuine, as they are held to be by both Lightfoot (The Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii., 'Ignatius', i. 2 [1889]) and Zalm (Ignatius von Antiochien, 1873). The principal consideration is, however, the moral one. Let anyone read the references to St. Paul himself in these Epistles (1 Ti 1¹¹⁻²⁰ 2⁷ 3^{14, 15}, 2 Ti 1¹³⁻¹⁸ 2^{9, 10} 3^{10, 11} 4⁶⁻²¹, Tit 1¹⁻⁵ 3¹²⁻¹⁵), and say whether anyone but St. Paul could have written these words without knowing himself to be guilty of misrepresentation and falsehood. It is obvious that the author is a good man, and that he writes for a holy purpose. Could such a person be guilty of such deceit? It is said that the ideas of literary property which we now recognize did not then prevail. But what proof of this is there? The nearest approach that Moffatt can think of to this pseudonymous authorship is the composition of the romance entitled Paul and Thecla; but the author of that foolish and lying production was deposed for his pains. Gnostics, it is true, composed abundance of pseudonymous literature, and weak adherents of orthodoxy sometimes imitated them; but in the Pastoral Epistles we have to do with a personage and an enterprise of a totally different character. As Ramsay has remarked, there are not a few traits of St. Paul's genius which we should miss were it not for these unique writings.

The Epistle to the Hebrews has sometimes been attributed to St. Paul. But there is no superscription making this claim, and the language and ideas are so different from St. Paul's that scholarship has long since, with practical unanimity, decided against the Pauline authorship.

2. Life.—(a) Early influences.—St. Paul was a Jew; he was born at Tarsus, in Cilicia; and he inherited the Roman citizenship. In these three clauses is indicated his connexion with the three great influences of the ancient world—the religion of Palestine, the language and culture of Greece, and the government of Rome.

In his case the first of these was the oldest and the deepest influence. We hear little or nothing of his parents; a sister's son intervened at one point with good effect in his earthly fortunes; but all the indications suggest that he was reared in a religious home. He speaks of himself as 'circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee' (Ph 3⁵); and these terms betoken an intensely Jewish atmosphere. Still, he was born not in the land of the Jews, but in the territory of the heathen. Cilicia was not very far from Palestine; but any heathen country was 'far off' in a sense other than local. This distance St. Paul was sure to feel; yet he could boast of his birthplace as being 'no mean city' (Ac 21³⁹). It was beautifully situated at the foot of the Cilician hills and at the mouth of the Catarrhactes; it was a place of cosmopolitan trade; and it was a university city—the very place in which the man should be born whose destiny it was to be to break down 'the middle wall of partition' (Eph 2¹⁴) and become the Apostle of the Gentiles. A freer air blew round his head from the first than if he had been born at Jerusalem. There were several ways in which the Roman citizenship could be acquired, and it is not known through which of these it came into St. Paul's family; but he was 'freeborn' (Ac 22²⁸). Even to a Jewish boy of sensitive nature this would impart a certain self-consciousness; but it was to become of enormous consequence in his subsequent career, probably even saving his life.

In youth St. Paul learned the trade of tent-making, this being, it would appear, the characteristic industry of Cilicia, where a coarse haircloth was manufactured on a large scale, to be used for tents and other purposes. This circumstance might be supposed to indicate that he belonged to the lower class of the population. But it is said that among the Jews it was the custom at that time for even the sons of the wealthy to acquire skill in some manual art, as a resource against the possible caprices of fortune; and, in the sequel, the possession of this handicraft proved of eminent service to St. Paul, enabling him to earn his bread by the labour of his hands, when it was not expedient to accept support from those to whom he preached the gospel. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 311 ff.) has accumulated evidence to prove that St. Paul's relatives were persons of substance and social standing, and he considers himself able to show that, in later life, he came into possession of an inheritance, by which he was enabled to defray the heavy expenses of his trials before the Roman courts. Evidence more convincing of social standing is supplied by the fact that St. Paul was a member of the Sanhedrin, if this can be inferred with certainty from the statement in Ac 26¹⁰ that, when the followers of Jesus were put to death, he gave his 'vote' against them. It is frequently stated that members of the Sanhedrin had to be married men, and from this the inference has been drawn that he was married in youth. If so, his wife must have died early, as there is no hint of a wife in the records of his life, the fancy that he married Lydia and addressed her in the Epistle to the Philippians as 'true yokefellow' being ridiculous, though it goes back as far as Eusebius (HE iii. 30) and has been revived in recent times by E. Renan (Saint Paul, 1869, p. 115).

So comparatively near to Jerusalem was Tarsus that, as a boy, St. Paul may have been taken by his parents to one of the annual feasts, as Jesus was at the age of twelve; and from the experience of the boy from Nazareth we may infer what were the feelings of this other Jewish boy at the first sight of the Holy City. It cannot have been very long afterwards that he was sent thither, to reside in the place, learning to be a Rabbi. Along with other aspirants to the same office he sat 'at the feet of Gamaliel' (Ac 22³), whose intervention in the Book of Acts on the side of clemency and common sense is probably intended to be looked upon as a characteristic act. But, whatever else the disciple may have learned from this master in Israel, he did not copy this trait of his character; for the first thing we hear of him after the termination of his education is his persecution of the Christians.

There seems little doubt that Jesus and St. Paul were treading the soil of Palestine at the same time; and it is an old question whether they ever crossed each other's path. Though Weiss (Paulus und Jesus, 1910) and Ramsay (The Teaching of Paul, p. 21 ff.) have recently attempted to make it probable that they did, there is little to be said for this view of the case. It is argued, indeed, that on the way to Damascus St. Paul could not have recognized Jesus, if he had not been already familiar with His appearance. But he did not recognize Him by sight: he had to ask, 'Who art thou, Lord?', and it was only through the hearing of the ear that he ascertained who was speaking. It is true that, in one place, St. Paul demands, 'Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?' (1 Co 9¹), but the sight referred to was that on the way to Damascus.

(b) Persecution.—The whole situation creates the impression that St. Paul's first collision was not with Christ in the flesh, but with Christianity in the hands of its first representatives and apostles, and it is not difficult to understand the violence with which he opposed it. As a man of logic, he considered the case against Christianity complete. Jesus had died the cursed death of the Cross. This the Messiah could not have done. It was the destiny of the Messiah to live and to reign. A Messiah who dies and is buried must have been a pretender; and an exposed pretender is no very respectable figure. As a Pharisee and a patriot, Saul cherished Messianic hopes; indeed, these formed the most sacred part of his religion; but they had been turned to shame by One who died upon a tree. No doubt it was this resentment at the despite done to that which to him was so sacred that led to his taking up the rôle of grand inquisitor; and he fulfilled in his own person the prediction, made by Jesus to His disciples, that a day was coming when whosoever killed them would think he was doing God service (Jn 16⁷). His zeal was winning for him golden opinions in the minds of the authorities of the nation, and he was confident that it was, at the same time, accumulating merit in the hands of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

It may be presumed that, in the course of the persecution, he became well acquainted with the state of mind of those whom he was subjecting to every kind of examination. Did it ever occur to him to think what would be the result if he ever came to have as clear proof as they believed they had that He for whose sake they were suffering was not dead but alive? St. Stephen was a singularly clear and forcible reasoner, who went far on the very pathway of revolution which St. Paul was afterwards to travel himself. Did Saul perceive the cogency of the logic, if it were not for one great assumption? But to him this assumption was not only an impossibility but a blasphemy; and so he emerges for the first time into history as the keeper of the clothes of the men who stoned Stephen.

(c) Conversion.—For a time, which was not very brief, the persecutor raged like a wolf in the fold of the followers of the Nazarene; and it was because there were no more victims left, as he supposed, in Jerusalem and Judæa that he begged for instructions from the authorities to go in quest of fresh victims as far as Damascus. Of what took place on the way thither the author of the Acts has given a most graphic account, and, as St. Paul turned out subsequently to be one of those religious persons who are not indisposed to narrate their most intimate experiences, there are in Acts no fewer than three accounts of the conversion, the other two being from the mouth of the subject himself (9¹⁻¹⁹ 22¹⁻²¹ 26¹⁻²³). These accounts are not painfully alike. On the contrary, they might almost be said to be so constructed as to give the caviller a chance. Indeed, the event itself is exposed to obvious objections, for the persecutor was posting forward in the heat of midday, when he ought to have been taking a siesta, and what he saw might all have been the effect on an overstrained brain of the unnatural experiences through which he had been passing. Full advantage has, of course, been taken of these circumstances; but both St. Luke and St. Paul go forward with the utmost freedom, and there can be no question what they believed the event to be. St. Paul classes the vision vouchsafed to himself with the appearances of the Risen Saviour to the disciples after His resurrection, and those who regard the latter experiences as only subjective infer that his was only subjective also. But it is certain that he himself reasoned the opposite way: he believed the appearances to the Twelve and to the other disciples to be not visionary but actual, and he was convinced, at the time and ever afterwards, that he had himself seen the living Lord. This was the datum on which his entire subsequent life was based.

Accordingly, he appeared immediately after his conversion in the synagogue at Damascus, bearing the testimony of the Apostolic Church, that Jesus is the Messiah (Ac 9²⁰). Happily for us, however, he was not content with this simple statement, but, under the overpowering impression of what had happened to him, went away to Arabia, in order to think out all that it implied, and he did not consider the theme exhausted till he had pondered on it for three years (Gal 1¹⁷). Where was this retreat? No exact information is supplied, but the probability is that he betook himself to the scenes of the earlier revelations made to his forefathers. As Elijah the prophet, in a period of mental crisis, wandered southwards to Mount Sinai, feeling it congenial to be where the thunders and lightnings had girdled the mountain and, in the centre, Moses had stood before the Lord, so St. Paul courted the same associations, and, aided by the memories of Moses and Elias, attempted to understand Him in whom Law and prophecy were fulfilled. This incident is passed over in Acts; but it is probable that in 9²³ we are informed how his testimony recommenced at Damascus with such power that the Jews took counsel to kill him, and he had to flee from the city.

Naturally, Jerusalem was the place to which he now directed his steps. But his long absence, after his conversion, had one serious result: it barred the way for his cordial reception by the Christians, who could not believe that he was really one of themselves, but supposed his pretended conversion to be a ruse of the persecutor. Then it was that Barnabas showed himself a friend in need, by introducing him to the company of the disciples and persuading them to accept him as a brother. He seemed on the point of linking his forces with those of the original witnesses for the resurrection of Christ; but so much opposition did his opening testimony arouse among the Jews that he had, for safety, to be sent away to his native Tarsus.

(d) Evangelistic activity.—Here, for a long time, he was almost entirely lost to sight; but there can be little doubt that, during these years, he evangelized his native province of Cilicia; and it is an interesting question whether the church in this province founded by him was Jewish or Gentile. It has been almost universally taken for granted that it was Jewish, even St. Paul not being able to anticipate the development of Providence. But both he himself and St. Luke render it indubitable that he was already acquainted with the purpose of God to make him the missionary of the Gentiles; and it is generally recognized that in Arabia he had thought out the substance of his subsequent teaching. There is one word in the narrative of the Acts which seems sufficient to prove that he was already, both in theory and in practice, the evangelist of Gentiles as well as of Jews: this is the mention of Cilicia (15⁴¹) among the churches to which, after the Council of Jerusalem, the apostles' message was sent, to relieve them from the obligation of being circumcised. If this was required in Cilicia, and if it gave satisfaction there, as it did elsewhere, then the church founded during the unrecorded years of St. Paul's sojourn in his native province must have contained Gentiles.

Meantime the great truth, already learnt by St. Paul, was being revealed to others. Its official revelation to the Church was made through St. Peter, in the affair of Cornelius; and it is easy to perceive how appropriate it was that St. Peter, and not St. Paul, should have been the organ of revelation in this case. Other incidents involving the principle took place here and there, but it was at Antioch that the conversion of Gentiles on a large scale first occurred (in Ac 11²⁰ 'Greeks,' meaning heathens, is correctly substituted in the RV for 'Grecians' in the AV, who are Greek-speaking Jews). From the headquarters in Jerusalem Barnabas was sent down to Antioch, to take cognizance of this new development; and he not only approved of it but, in co-operation with others, extended the movement with such success that the work increased beyond their powers. Then it was that the happy inspiration occurred to him that St. Paul was the man required for the emergency. Away, therefore, he went to Tarsus in search of him—not a long journey—and, when he had found him and brought him to Antioch, the work at once responded to the energy of the newcomer to such a degree that 'the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch' (v.²⁶). Thus for the second time did Barnabas intervene, with the happiest effect, in the course of St. Paul's fortunes, and all that the great Apostle subsequently contributed to the spread of Christianity may, in a sense, be attributed to this 'good man.'

(e) First missionary journey.—In Ac 13² the inception of St. Paul's missionary journeys is ascribed to a communication from the Holy Spirit, made through certain men of prophetic gifts in the Church at Antioch; but it is not inconsistent with this to believe that it was also due to the genius of St. Paul, or that it sprang out of the work which Barnabas and he had been doing in that city; and, if the course of the first missionary journey be glanced at on the map, it will be seen that it passed, nearly in a circle, round the region of which he had already taken possession as the evangelist of Cilicia. Its primary direction, towards Cyprus, was doubtless due to his companion, Barnabas, who was a native of this island. At the outset this gracious figure was the head of the enterprise, the combination being indicated by the phrase, 'Barnabas and Saul.' But, when they quit the island, the phrase is 'Paul and Barnabas,' this change indicating that the inferior had become the superior. The change of name, which took place at the same point, must have been connected somehow with this alteration in the leadership; and it is difficult to believe that it was not also connected in some way with the name of the governor, Sergius Paulus, with whom they had been brought into remarkable contact on the island.

There is no reason to think that Barnabas, the generous, in any way resented his own displacement, but the same magnanimity may not have been vouchsafed to his nephew, John Mark; and this may have been one of the reasons why the latter, who had been 'useful . . . for ministering' (2 Ti 4¹¹), broke away when they reached the mainland, and returned to Jerusalem. Another of his reasons may have been fear of the perils attending a journey into the interior; for it was a wild and inhospitable region through which the travellers had to pass in order to reach the next halting-place, Antioch-in-Pisidia. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 94 ff.) is of opinion that St. Paul was driven into the interior, which was highland, by a severe attack of malaria fever experienced on the coast; but, if the course of this journey was intended to go in a circle round Cilicia, the upper regions must have been included in the original design. Besides, in the interior there were Roman roads and cities of importance, such as always exercised an attraction on the mind of St. Paul.

On this virgin journey we observe the characteristics of all St. Paul's missionary tours—e.g., at Paphos the conflict with magic, in the person of Simon Magus, as well as the favourable relations with the Roman governor; at Antioch-in-Pisidia, the commencement of the work in the synagogue of the Jews with an address exactly suited to Jewish predilections, but the subsequent turning to the Gentiles, when it had been made manifest that the Jews had not known the day of their visitation; at Lystra, a thoroughly pagan spectacle, when the cure of an impotent man caused the two evangelists to be taken for a couple of Greek deities, and to be offered divine honours—though the temper of the fickle populace quickly changed when the missionaries did not fall in with their fancies, so that St. Paul was stoned and left for dead.

From Derbe, the last point in their itinerary, it would have been easy, by descending through the Cilician Gates, to reach Tarsus and thence sail to Antioch, from which they had set out; but the pastor's passion for his converts had been aroused by the successful labours in the various cities, and, in spite of all they had suffered and the danger of facing again the excited mobs, the evangelists went back the way they had come, in order to encourage those who had embraced the new faith; and it is specially worthy of note that, as they went, they 'appointed for them elders in every church' (Ac 14²³). To scholars who have had no personal acquaintance with the practical working of Christianity this may seem an unimportant trait or even a throwing back into a too early period of an arrangement which prevailed at a later time; but those who have had experience in such matters will see it in a different light. St. Paul was not only a preacher and a thinker, but an organizer. It is true of him, as it is of Jesus Himself, that his efforts would soon have been swallowed up by the sands of the desert had there not been provided for them, through the organization of the Church, channels for conveying their results to subsequent ages. Though it is not stated in every case, it is to be understood that he thus organized the Christian community in every place which he visited and in which he found any rooting. From the interior the evangelists descended to the coast, whence they speedily made their way to Antioch; and the news they brought back of the conversion of the Gentiles filled with great joy those who had sent them forth.

This sentiment was not, however, universal. The influx of so many Gentiles into the Church threatened to swamp the Jews; and many of these, at this juncture, began to demand that all Gentile converts should be circumcised and compelled to live as Jews; and they cherished anything but kindly feelings towards the man through whose labours their own exclusive position in the Church was imperilled. They made light of his authority and proceeded by degrees to deny it altogether. At Antioch they were able to establish such a reign of terror on behalf of Jewish strictness that St. Peter, who had been the first to admit Gentiles to the Church, happening to visit the city, refrained from sitting at food with Gentiles; and even the companion of the recent missionary journey, Barnabas, was carried away by these fanatics. At length they went so far as to send agents to visit the churches which St. Paul had just founded, in order to undermine his authority and to represent his gospel as being not genuine Christianity but a novelty of his own invention. It is easy to understand how such opposition would act on the Apostle's fiery temperament. He publicly challenged St. Peter and Barnabas, and exposed their inconsistency; and he dispatched to his converts the letter of indignant reproof which we know as the Epistle to the Galatians.

At length it was decided to refer the whole question to the authorities at Jerusalem, where, accordingly, a Council was held—the first of the kind in the history of Christianity. Here both St. Peter and St. James, to whom the Judaizers had appealed, decided the question of principle, through their speeches and votes, in favour of the full and free admission of the Gentiles; and St. Paul, on the other hand, for the sake of peace, consented to certain restrictions on the walk and conversation of the Gentile converts. So at least is the issue represented in Acts. But there are those in our day who deny that it can have been so; by consenting to any compromise, St. Paul would, in their opinion, have betrayed the Christian liberty of which he was the champion; and, in short, the representation is a fiction invented for a purpose. This, however, is too cheap a way of dealing with the problems of history. St. Paul was the champion but not the fanatic of liberty, and this was not the only time when he listened to suggestions of compromise from the same quarter. As long as he secured the freedom implied in the non-circumcising of his Gentile converts, he was not the man to offend against the prejudices of those whose experience had not been exactly the same as his own. The prohibition of fornication occasions no difficulty, except that it is wonderful to see it associated with things which to us seem so trivial. 'Blood' and 'things strangled' awoke in a Jew a horror naturalis, and Gentiles had to be reminded that by the use of such things they were excluding Jews from the very communion to which they were seeking admission themselves; and it was never the teaching of St. Paul that born Jews should live as did the Gentiles. 'Meats' involved two questions—the frequenting of sacrificial feasts in idol temples (1 Co 8¹⁰), and the purchase in the shambles, for domestic use, of meat which was cheap because it had been offered in sacrifice (1 Co 10²⁵); and it was possible utterly to condemn the one whilst making the other an open question. These remarks may help to clear up the difficulties found in the decision of the Council (Ac 15²³⁻²⁹). There may, however, be a simpler solution. If, in accordance with certain textual authorities, 'things strangled' be deleted from the decree, and if 'meats offered to idols,' 'blood' and 'fornication' be understood as idolatry, violence, and sensuality—the sins to which converts from paganism were peculiarly exposed (cf. Rev 22¹⁶)—then there was no compromise, and the biggest stone of stumbling in the criticism of Acts is removed. (So Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, 1909, pp. 248-263.)

St. Paul may have seen that the compromise—if there was compromise—could be only temporary, and this may account for the silence about it in his writings. But the decree, when delivered to the Gentile communities, created great joy, and there is no reason to doubt that it was satisfactory to St. Paul also. Yet the insinuations and machinations of his enemies were not brought to an end. On the contrary, these continued for years, making St. Paul's life a burden to him. This, indeed, was the greatest controversy of his life, from which comes much of the fire still smouldering beneath the surface in such Epistles as Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Romans.

(f) Second missionary journey.—The immediate impulse to the second missionary journey is represented as having come from St. Paul, who said to his companion, Barnabas, 'Let us return now and visit the brethren in every city wherein we proclaimed the word of the Lord, and see how they fare' (Ac 15³⁶). But he lost his comrade through a dispute about Mark, who, as has been mentioned, had deserted the mission on the preceding journey; and one wishes one could be certain that at this juncture St. Paul was sufficiently conscious of how much he owed to this friend. In his place he obtained Silas, who had come to Antioch as one of the bearers of the decree of the Council at Jerusalem; and, before going far, he found at Lystra, in the youthful Timothy, one to take the place of Mark.

They are said to have gone first through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches; and it is to be observed that these churches were the fruit not of the first missionary journey, but of earlier labour. It was at Derbe that they first came upon the fruits of the foregoing journey, and it is probable that they followed them up further by visiting Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch-in-Pisidia. Then, it used to be supposed, they struck away to the north-east and evangelized Galatia. But it was against this supposition that St. Luke gives no account of this new conquest, though it is his habit to give ample information whenever new ground is opened up, whilst observing great brevity in mentioning visits to parts that had been visited already. Accordingly, Ramsay has championed the view that by the phrase 'the region of Phrygia and Galatia' is meant no more than the scenes of the first missionary journey, this contention, which is most fully explained by Ramsay, artt. 'Galatia,' 'Galatia, Region of,' 'Galatians,' in HDB ii., being what is known as the South Galatian theory. The basis of this theory is that 'Galatia,' while designating the country occupied by the Galatians, was also the name of a political province, which was of varying extent at different times, and at the time of St. Paul's visit included Phrygia, or at least the part of it in which the towns in question lay. This theory has been widely accepted by English-speaking scholars, but has encountered strong opposition in Germany.

The course of the missionaries' movements was under some constraint, the nature of which is not clearly indicated, but which prevented them, apparently against their will, from evangelizing the province of Asia, in the west of Asia Minor, as well as Mysia and Bithynia, in the north-west of the peninsula, and brought them down to the coast at Troas, the ancient Troy, near the southern entrance to the Hellespont. It may have been illness which was thus forcing St. Paul forward against his will, for at Troas he is seen in the company of a physician, St. Luke, who, if he rendered medical assistance to the Apostle, was rewarded by the gift of the gospel, of which he ultimately became a servant. The reason, however, for the haste and the direction of this journey hinted at in the narrative itself is that it was in order to see and to obey the vision of the night which, at Troas, called him to proceed to Macedonia, thereby determining the direction taken by the gospel to be westwards to Athens and Rome, the centres of the ancient civilization. It is difficult, however, to get rid of the impression that at this point, so critical not only for his own fortunes but for the future of Christianity and the history of the world, there were, besides the providential causes hinted at, reasons in St. Paul's own mind and genius similar to the passionate desire, to which he gave expression at a later stage, to preach the gospel 'also . . . in Rome' (Ro 1¹⁵). He was the Apostle of the Gentiles, and this was a call to the great seats of Gentile influence.

Landed in Macedonia, he proceeded from city to city along the Roman highway—Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea—in each of which there took place some peculiar development of Providence, the adhesion of 'honourable women' to the new religion being a conspicuous feature of Macedonian Christianity. But it is as we approach Athens, 'the eye of Greece,' that the excitement of the reader is aroused; and St. Luke rises to the occasion, too, dipping his brush liberally in the colours of classical association. Indeed, the scenes are so lifelike and dramatic that he has been accused of exaggeration. E. Norden, in a work entitled Agnostos Theos, 1913, accusing him of putting into the mouth of St. Paul a speech which was delivered later at Athens by another religious figure of the age, Apollonius of Tyana, and which exhibits the qualities of the artificial prose practised in the circles to which Apollonius belonged. But Harnack has come to the vindication of St. Luke, demonstrating in his pamphlet 'Ist die Rede des Paulus in Athen ein ursprünglicher Bestandteil der Apostelgeschichte?' in TU, 3rd ser., ix. 1 [1913], by a close examination of the facts, that it is extremely doubtful whether Apollonius ever delivered at Athens any such speech, and showing that the speech attributed to St. Paul enters into the very structure of the Book of Acts as a whole, while the rhetorical form is due to the lofty style of the thoughts demanding expression.

While, however, the visit to Athens enchaind the interest of St. Luke, and enchains ours still, it was far from giving unqualified satisfaction to St. Paul himself. His apostolate was never so nearly a failure as in this city of wisdom and renown; and, when he quitted it and went on to the next stage, Corinth, he was, we know from his own words, in a state of 'weakness and fear and much trembling' (1 Co 2³). In Corinth, however, he was encouraged by one of those dreams or visions in which the Lord visited him at critical moments; and he was further restored to himself by finding, at this stage, in Aquila and Priscilla, tent-makers like himself, with whom he lodged and laboured, the nearest approach to an earthly home it was ever his fortune to enjoy. He remained longer in Corinth than he had done in any other city up to this point, and founded a large church, which, though it tried him not a little, laid a strong hold upon his heart.

This journey had been the most remarkable adventure ever attempted by any missionary; it had been powerfully under Divine direction; it had abounded with thrilling incidents; it had carried Christianity from the continent of its birth to the continent in which at that time resided the power of the world; and it was rich in beginnings full of possibility and promise. It was as one who returns rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him, that he appeared again in Syria and Palestine at the headquarters of the mission.

(g) Third missionary journey.—The narrative in Acts hardly takes time enough, however, to report the termination of this journey before it starts him out on the third missionary journey, on which he repeated his previous visits to the churches lying between Antioch-in-Syria and Antioch-in-Pisidia to the one extremity and to those lying between Troas and Corinth at the other. But the great object of this third journey was to evangelize the province of Asia, which he had had to pass by on the preceding journey, and especially to capture for the gospel the city of Ephesus, one of the great centres of population, as well as of worship, art, and commerce, in the ancient world. Here he made the longest stay with which any city evangelized by him was favoured—a space of three years. During this interval he may have visited some of the cities in the neighbourhood, which were afterwards under the pastoral charge of the apostle John, who addresses letters to them in Rev 2. 3. Some think that he paid a visit to Corinth, not mentioned in Acts, and room has been sought here for a visit to the island of Crete, mentioned in the Epistle to Titus. In such suggestions there is no impossibility, for in the account given by himself (2 Co 11) of his journeyings, labours, and sufferings, mention is made of not a few remarkable adventures of which there is no account in Acts, and it is certain that his life was far fuller of vicissitude than even the comprehensive narrative of the Acts suggests. On the whole, however, Ephesus was large enough to account for all his time, especially when, as he says (1 Co 16⁹), 'a great door and effectual' was opened to him there. There were, however, as he adds, many adversaries, and the narrative of the Acts exhibits him in conflict with several of these. His travail culminated in a conflict with the worship of the great goddess Diana, whose annual festival brought hundreds of thousands of pilgrims from far and near to her temple, enriching the inhabitants with the money they squandered. So adversely affected had the attendance become through the spread of the gospel that the silversmiths, who vended shrines of the goddess to the visitors, felt their vested interests to be in peril. A riot was the result, St. Luke's account of which is, for vividness and humour, the best record of such an incident in literature. But the determination of the disturbers of the peace was invincible, and St. Paul had to flee, not, however, without leaving a church which flourished for centuries to such an extent as to make Ephesus one of the foremost names in early Christianity.

On the third missionary journey St. Paul did not really advance farther to the west—the direction of progress—than in the second, and his ambition for the extension of Christianity was far from satisfied, as may be ascertained from what he says at the close of the Epistle to the Romans, written while he was at Corinth, about his desire to see Rome. But the days of his free and unimpeded activity were nearing an end. As he was about to sail for headquarters, perhaps in a pilgrim-ship carrying many Jews to an approaching feast at Jerusalem, he became aware of a plot to take his life during the voyage. So he had to resort to a land-journey instead, being accompanied by a number of deputies from his various churches, who were the bearers of a collection he had for some time been amassing for the poor at Jerusalem. But in the various places at which he touched the prophets in the churches began to forbode some calamity about to befall him at Jerusalem. This imparted to the speeches he delivered on the way, especially the one to the elders of Ephesus, who came down to the port at Miletus to greet him as he passed, a peculiar pathos. Yet he did not feel himself debarred from going forward by these providential intimations. He appears, in fact, to have made up his mind that his hour had come; and he was ready to die at Jerusalem.

(h) Imprisonment.—At the feast there were multitudes of his fellow-countrymen who had come into collision with him in the cities of the Dispersion, where they dwelt, but had been prevented by the Roman authority under which they lived from proceeding to extremes. When these became aware of his presence in the Holy City, they felt that they could now indulge the feelings of revenge which they had had to restrain elsewhere. An opportunity was afforded through St. Paul yielding to the advice of St. James and the other apostles, who advised him to perform in the Temple a rite which would prove that he still lived as a Jew. In the sacred edifice he was laid hold upon and would have been torn in pieces had he not been rescued by the Roman guard in the castle of Antonia, which overlooked the Temple area. For days the Jews made the wildest efforts to get him into their clutches, not scrupling to enter into a plot for his assassination. But the Roman authorities kept firm hold of their prisoner, and it was not long before he was in safety within the fortress of Cæsarea. His safety, indeed, was only that of a prisoner; nor was he perfectly safe, because the governor, Felix, was a man who might have yielded to a bribe to deliver him up. Indeed, when, after two years, a new governor, Festus, came to take the place of Felix, the prisoner was so afraid of some such treachery befalling him that, making use of his right as a Roman citizen, he appealed unto Cæsar. It was the law that, when a prisoner had done so, he must be sent to Rome at once; and so, in a manner very different from any of which he had dreamed in his evangelistic projects, he found himself on the way to the Eternal City. His biographer, St. Luke, was in the company, which consisted of no fewer than 276 souls; and the narrative of the voyage which he has put together from the experiences of the weeks they were on their way is said to be the most remarkable record of travel which has come down from ancient times. Many perils were encountered; and, before all was done, St. Paul had become virtually both captain of the ship and general of the troops, all on board owing their lives to him. After being shipwrecked on the island of Malta, they obtained another ship, which carried them to Puteoli, on the south-west coast of Italy, and from this place they marched along the famous Appian Way to their destination. News of his approach having reached the Church at Rome, some of the brethren came out to meet him on the way, at which 'he thanked God, and took courage' (Ac 28¹⁵). In the AV it is stated that on their arrival at Rome, 'the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard' (v. 16); but in the RV the statement has been transferred to the margin, and now reads, 'The centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the pretorian guard'; and it so happens that the officer who held this position at the time is known from profane history to have been one Burrus by name, a person of justice and humanity. But scholarship inclines at present to the opinion that the officer into whose charge he passed was the princeps peregrinorum, the head of the Roman frumentarii, who acted as agents between the Emperor and the armies in the provinces.

The trial ought to have come on at once. But the delays of the law are proverbial, and they were not likely to be less prolonged than usual when the reigning Emperor was a man who would postpone any call of duty for a call of pleasure. Imprisonment was, however, for Roman citizens confinement of a very mild description; and St. Paul was permitted to live in his own 'hired dwelling' (v. 30), guarded only by a soldier, to whom he was chained. Here he was allowed to receive visitors; and he made ample use of the privilege. The local Jewish community came to interview him; so, no doubt, did the members of the Christian community. Visitors and delegates from his churches, far and near, came to relieve his bodily wants or to consult him on the state of their own affairs; young men, who had laboured with him elsewhere, flocked round him and carried his messages wherever he desired. In short, though humble to the bodily eye, his prison-room became a pharos, shedding the beams of the gospel and the light of this missionary's genius towards all quarters of the known world.

(i) Last years.—From what has been said above about the Pastoral Epistles, it will have been gathered that the present writer accepts the evidence for a second imprisonment and for an interval between the first and the second imprisonments, during which St. Paul resumed his missionary wanderings. For this the evidence is strong. Eusebius writes: 'After he had made his defence, it is said, the Apostle was sent again upon the ministry of preaching, and, upon coming to the same city a second time, he suffered martyrdom' (HE ii. 22); and, much earlier, Clement said of him that 'having taught the whole world righteousness, and for that end travelled even to the utmost bounds of the West, he at last suffered martyrdom, by the command of the governors, and departed out of the world, and went unto his holy place, being become a most eminent pattern of patience unto all ages' (ad Cor. i. 5. 7). As this was written at Rome, it is hardly likely that by 'the utmost bounds of the West' Rome itself can be intended. What further is meant is to be learnt from St. Paul's own words in the Epistle to the Romans (15²²⁻²⁸): 'I was hindered these many times from coming to you: but now, having no more any place in these regions, and having these many years a longing to come unto you, whensoever I go unto Spain (for I hope to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first in some measure I shall have been satisfied with your company)—but now, I say, I go unto Jerusalem, ministering unto the saints. . . . When therefore I have accomplished this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will go on by you unto Spain.' There is a persistent tradition, though it is late, that he visited Spain. But the strongest evidence is in the Pastoral Epistles themselves, in which we see him evangelizing Crete, which he cannot have done when he touched at that island on his way to Rome as a prisoner, though he may have been so interested in it at that time as to desire to return, if ever he should have the opportunity. We find him, also, back at Ephesus, though he had said to the Ephesian elders that they should see his face no more, this being his conviction at the time. It is often said that St. Luke would not have admitted this statement into Ac 20 had he known that the anticipation was to be belied by the goodness of Providence; but if he wrote his book at the time the present writer supposes, he did not know himself that St. Paul was to be released. From Ephesus it would be easy to get to Spain, if St. Paul actually went there, there being constant communication by sea between Ephesus and Marseilles.

Under what circumstances he was arrested the second time we have no information; but, when Nero was persecuting the Christians, the most conspicuous Christian in the world was not likely to escape. It is very interesting to approach Rome, as St. Paul did the first time, along the Appian Way, and see not only the features of nature on which his eyes must have rested, but even some of the works of man, such as the tombs of the Roman nobility on the sides of the road and the remains of the aqueducts, which supplied the city with water, still standing in the fields. After passing through the city-gate, it is uncertain whether he turned to the left towards the Palatine Hill or towards a camp lying in the neighbourhood where now stands the British Consulate. Two sites are exhibited as his 'hired house,' one of them being on the borders of the Jewish Quarter. The second imprisonment would be one without mercy, and no more suitable place for it could have been found than the Mamertine Prison, just outside the bounds of the Forum, at the Capitol end, in which, tradition strongly asserts, both St. Peter and St. Paul were confined before martyrdom. It is an unholy place, a symbol of Roman ferocity and cruelty, with numbers of cells and a hole to let down prisoners into a dungeon, out of which they did not pass till their corpses were thrust into a sewer passing by. But it was not thus that St. Paul ended his life. It is said that he was beheaded a mile or two out of the city, beside the Via Ostiensis, and a monastery, enclosed in a wood of fragrant balsam trees, now marks the spot. A Christian lady, taking possession of the precious dust, buried it on her own property near by; and over the remains has been erected one of the noblest architectural structures in the world, the Church of St.-Paul's-outside-the-Walls.

3. Beliefs.—B. Weiss, in Biblical Theology of the NT, divides the teaching of St. Paul into four sections: (1) his gospel before his great controversies began, this being found in 1 and 2 Thessalonians; (2) his gospel during the principal controversy of his life, this being embodied in the four great Epistles, Galatians, Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians; (3) his gospel during his later conflict with incipient Gnosticism, as found in what are called the Epistles of the Imprisonment, viz. Colossians, Ephesians, Philemon, and Philippians; (4) his gospel in the period following his first imprisonment, this being found in the Pastoral Epistles. It has sometimes been hinted that, while Weiss has collected the materials with diligence and grouped them with neatness round these four centres, he has, in so doing, crushed the life out of them. But this is an ungenerous judgment. Weiss's exegesis is so searching and his exposition so comprehensive, adapting itself unconstrainedly to the varying phases of the experience and the fortunes of the Apostle, that it may still perhaps be pronounced the most instructive study of the whole subject, in spite of the recent multiplication of books on NT Theology (Feine, Schlatter, Weinel). The attraction of Weiss's partition lies in the process of development which it exhibits in St. Paul's ideas. Garvie, in Studies of Paul and his Gospel, goes to the opposite extreme, denying altogether that there was a development in St. Paul's mind. He is of opinion that the Apostle had only one gospel, and that it was revealed to him suddenly and catastrophically. He does not deny that the events of his life may have determined the order in which different portions of his doctrine came to full expression, but the whole of his gospel was implicit in his conversion. In this there is a great deal of truth; yet to sacrifice the idea of development is to lose an element of interest, which not only falls in with the intellectual habits of the present day but is inherent in the subject. St. Paul was a living and growing thinker all his days; and, on the face of the documents, there is a marked contrast in the point of view and in the topics absorbing his attention at different stages of his career. If Galatians was the first of all the Epistles, as scholarship at present inclines to suppose, the four-fold division of Weiss falls to the ground; and, at the opposite end of Weiss's scheme, the investigations of W. Lütgert (Die Irrlehrer der Pastoralbriefe, 1909) tend to identify the false teachers of the Pastoral Epistles with those of Colossians and Ephesians so closely that the teaching in which they are confuted must be conceived as a unit. But, at all events, a two-fold division, into the gospel of his earlier and that of his later writings, is generally acknowledged—the earlier comprising Galatians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Romans, and the later Colossians and Ephesians, Philemon, Philippians, 1 and 2 Timothy, and Titus. Though the later Epistles number seven and the earlier only six, the former are nearly twice as bulky as the latter. Of these two divisions of St. Paul's thinking many designations have been attempted, of which that of Wernle, viz. Apologetic and Gnosis, has attracted a good deal of attention. The most obvious and perhaps most useful designation would be from the controversialists he was opposing at the different periods, or perhaps from his own leading doctrine in each period. We shall, however, content ourselves with speaking of the earlier and the later Paulinism.

(a) Earlier Paulinism.—Among the influences from the pre-Christian stage of St. Paul's life which bore upon the shaping of his theology by far the most important was his experience as a Jew, and to this it would, in the present writer's opinion, be hardly possible to ascribe too much. He was profoundly conscious of belonging to that race to which pertained 'the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises' (Ro 9⁴), and to which were entrusted the oracles of God. With these oracles he was so familiar that, as he spoke or wrote, quotations from every part of them flowed unbidden to his tongue or pen. He often goes on arguing at great length in the very words of the OT. All his thinking is steeped in the spirit of the prophets, and all his own experiences appear to him the continuation and fulfilment of those of the fathers of his race.

He studied the OT not only with the devoutness of a Jew but with the learning of a Rabbi; and, unless we are to suppose that inspiration obliterated altogether his own personality, it must be recognized that he made use of Rabbinical modes of thinking and arguing when he came to expound Christian ideas. Of this consideration use has been made, in recent times, to relieve Christianity of responsibility for certain of the Pauline notions, these being set down to his pre-Christian habits of thought and, consequently, deducted from the revelation through St. Paul attributed to the Spirit of God. This is a convenient way of getting rid of a number of difficulties which have long puzzled orthodox interpreters, especially in the Apostle's use of quotations from the OT. But the idea requires delicate handling. There are those who would apply it even to the teaching of our Lord Himself; and, when it is applied to St. Paul to the extent of treating as a fragment of negligible Rabbinism such a saying of his as 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf; that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²), the proceeding is on a level with that of a Roman Catholic who places so much confidence in the modern theory of the development of doctrine that he is able to regard a practice of his Church, which is the very reverse of that found in the NT, as a legitimate outcome from apostolic teaching.

Whether St. Paul's language and ideas were due, in any considerable degree, to the classical culture which he may have picked up in his youth at Tarsus or in his subsequent wanderings through the world, is a question about which scholars have differed widely; but recent opinion tends rather towards an affirmative reply. In his imagery a prominent place is held by references to the stadium and the training of athletes. Does this imply that he frequented the games, and expected his converts to do so? or may these references be due to some stolen pleasures of his boyhood? It is certain that his most recurrent conception of heathenism was as a concrete embodiment of sin; and when, as he frequently does, he breaks out into lengthy enumerations of sins, this is to be traced to the pressure on his spirit of the pagan atmosphere by which he felt himself oppressed wherever he moved.

The bearing of the teaching of Jesus on the teaching of St. Paul is one of the most important questions of modern theology. Can Christ's doctrine of the Kingdom of God in the Synoptists and of eternal life in St. John be identified with St. Paul's doctrines of the righteousness of God and union with Christ? It is quite certain that St. Paul must have claimed this, had the question been submitted to him in this form. But the form in which he was challenged was rather that of the conformity of his doctrine with the views of the original apostles, it being assumed that these could prove the identity of their own teaching with that of their Master. Feine (NT Theologie, 1910, p. 200 ff.) has dwelt with emphasis on the influence exerted on St. Paul by the testimony of the Church, as it existed before he came on the scene. Especially on the two cardinal points of the Deity of Christ and His atoning death does this scholar hold St. Paul's convictions to have been identical with those held unanimously by believers in general before him. But, however true and however important it may be that the beliefs of the primitive Church on these two great truths coincided with those of St. Paul, yet the manner in which he arrived at these convictions was too original and personal to allow us to speak of them as derived from any mundane source.

The supreme influence was undoubtedly the conversion itself; and not a few of the best interpreters of St. Paul's thinking have treated his entire system as a deduction from this single event. The opportunity for leisure and reflexion, during the three years in Arabia, to think out the implications of this experience, must, however, be taken into account in estimating the result; and then the provocation of the controversy with the Judaizers came in, to give point and sharpness to all his ideas.

However revolutionary the conversion of anyone may be, it has always antecedents; and the basal element in St. Paul's religious experience was the awakened conscience he inherited from his Jewish ancestry. He grew up with the conviction so ingrained in his mind as to be a portion of his very being that the only real blessedness which a human being can enjoy, in time or eternity, lies in the approval of God, pronouncing him righteous. This belief is wrought into the minds of children in pious homes, and the absence of it in many of those who occupy the pews at the present day is that which makes preaching difficult; because the offer of the gospel to those who have never hungered after righteousness is like offering water to those who are not athirst. In heathen lands missionaries have to create a conscience, they tell us, before they appeal to it; and it is this which makes their work so laborious. But from his fathers St. Paul had inherited this invaluable sensibility; and so it comes to pass that he sometimes speaks of his Christian life as continuous with his Jewish experience, though at other times he speaks of the two as separated by a great gulf.

The way of satisfying this passion for the Divine favour taught to him by his ancestors and teachers was the fulfilment of the Law, to which he devoted himself with the concentration of a nature which did nothing by halves. It was probably his failure to satisfy himself with these efforts that drove him to the persecution of the Christians; because he was in need of some extra service, to make up for the lack by which his performances were beset. From the time when the Tenth Commandment taught him the spiritual and interior nature of the Law (Ro 7⁷), he never could appease his conscience, and there went on in his breast continually a struggle between the law in the Book and the law in the members, described in Ro 7. This was the goad against which he was kicking in his unconverted state, and it is not unlikely that the pain may have been aggravated by observing the heroism and spiritual exaltation of the martyrs, whom he could not but suspect to be better men than himself.

In the early chapters of Rom. St. Paul gives universality to these experiences of his own, concluding that Gentile and Jew are under sin, and proving that all alike have come short of the glory of God. It might have been thought that, according to his own principles, the Gentiles could not be guilty of sin, because they had no Law. But they had a law, written not on stones but on the tables of the heart; for in every human being, as he comes into the world, there is a conscience, informing him of the existence of God and of the elementary demands of the Divine will, so that he is without excuse if he sins against this natural light. In this sense the Gentiles had without exception been sinners, and even great sinners, descending from one degree of wickedness to another; because, when they forsook God, He gave them over to themselves ever more and more, punishing sin with sin. From such depths of heathen corruption the Jews might expect to have been saved by the restraining force of their Law; but he charges his fellow-countrymen with practising the very same sins as were committed by the Gentiles, and that to such a degree that by the scandal of their wickedness the name of Jahweh had been made a by-word among the heathen. The greater the light the more aggravated is the sin; and so the Law, which in itself is holy and just and good, had become an instrument not of justification but of condemnation. Not infrequently has St. Paul been accused of exaggeration in thus making all men out to be sinners, with no difference among them; but he has the saints as well as the sinners on his side in making the accusation universal. It cannot, however, be denied that St. Paul is entering into a region of speculation where it may not be so easy in our time to follow him, when he traces this universal liability to sin and punishment to the fall of Adam and the imputation of the guilt of Adam's first sin to his posterity. It is, indeed, debatable whether the latter is really one of his beliefs, or whether his idea was not rather that all human beings, having fallen into sin on account of their connexion with the first man, are held guilty not of Adam's sin but of their own. In either case we recognize the energy with which a logical mind pursues back to their ultimate source the facts of which it is conscious in its own experience or which it has observed in the conduct of others. St. Paul's theology sprang directly out of experience, and the religious experiences of his boyhood and youth culminated in an overpowering sense of guilt and sinfulness.

Corresponding with this anterior exercise of conscience there was, at the heart of the conversion itself, an element of terror, which is apt to be overlooked. When St. Paul heard himself accused of persecution by the Interlocutor addressing him from above, and was told, in answer to his question, that He whom he was persecuting was Jesus, and when thereupon there flashed into his soul an overwhelming sense of guilt, because the transactions of the foregoing months of his life were suddenly revealed as odious crimes, he anticipated that the next step must be the pouring out on his devoted head of the Divine wrath in some indescribable form. But, when, instead of being so treated, he found himself caught up, as it were, in the Divine arms and pressed to the Divine heart, he knew in an instant that God was a Being totally different from his conceptions of Him hitherto, and that all for which he had been in vain striving with so much labour and sorrow was given to him in a moment without money and without price. This is what he calls the grace of God, and he is never tired of celebrating it.

The grace of God came to him in the vision of Christ; and God and Christ are always associated in his writings as the joint source of salvation, as when in 1 Th 1st he says: 'Paul, and Silvanus, and Timothy, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace to you and peace.' The vision of Christ did for St. Paul what had been done for the older apostles by the Resurrection and the Ascension: it convinced him that, in the controversy with the rulers and the teachers of the nation in which Jesus had been engaged, He had from first to last been in the right and they in the wrong; that, therefore, all His claims were justified; that, though He had missed the throne of the Jews, He had thereby been exalted to the throne of the universe; and that now He belonged to a supernal world of light, the rays of which, seen by himself, had smitten him to the ground and blinded him for days. Formerly the death of Jesus on the Cross had been to St. Paul conclusive evidence that He had been an impostor, whose pretensions were put to shame; but now it was manifest to him that the Cross must enclose a Divine mystery, compatible with all the life of Christ both before and after; and this mystery was explained by the belief that He had died not for any sins of His own, but for the sin of the world, and that His sacrifice of Himself had been accepted as a propitiation for the guilt of mankind. This was certainly a bold speculation; but it was in harmony with all that he knew about Jesus, as it was in harmony with the conceptions of sin and sacrifice of which the OT is full. St. Paul had always been a man of conscience; he believed in a God of righteousness as well as of love; and the wonder and glory of the gospel for him consisted in this, that God could be at once a just God and a Saviour.

This is the 'righteousness of God' which, in the verse (1⁷) which forms the keynote of the Epistle to the Romans, 'is revealed by faith unto faith: as it is written, But the righteous shall live by faith.' So grand and perfect is the work achieved by the grace of God and the sacrifice of Christ that, on the part of man, there is room for nothing more than faith; and faith is no more than receptivity: it is man ceasing from his own works, in order that God may work in and for him. Anything additional to this attempted on man's part is a return to the error, from which St. Paul had been so marvellously redeemed, of seeking salvation through works. Such a simple means of salvation is, however, purely human, there being nothing in it for which any human being is not competent. It has nothing to do with such distinctions as Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free. It is universal; and the mere knowledge of it, when it came to his understanding, contained within itself the call to be the missionary of the Gentiles; for he could not know a gospel so glorifying to God and so charged with blessing for mankind without feeling an irresistible impulse to make it known to the ends of the earth.

The above is the sum and substance of his apologetic or missionary testimony; though it must be confessed that in any such condensed statement injury is done to St. Paul's thought, the natural tendency of which is to break out on every hand into additions and excursions; so that the student is like a traveller in a mountainous country who, while keeping to the central road, so as to take in the outline of the whole, is continually being tempted by sunny valleys stretching away into the distance, and perceives that what he took for the mountaintops have mountains behind them still.

It has recently been contended by A. Schweitzer (Geschichte der paulinischen Forschung, 1911) and H. Windisch ('Die neuesten Bearbeitungen der NT Theologie und die zwei Leitmotive des Urchristenthums,' in ZWT xix. [1912]) that all the Pauline message must be framed in eschatology, and that, indeed, this is the most essential feature of the whole. When the same rule is applied to Jesus, as it has often been of late, it goes perilously near to converting Him into the apocalyptic dreamer that the Jews believed Him to be, and to justifying them for taking His life. The eschatology of the Gospels was, in reality, the body of humiliation which His position in history caused to cling to the teaching of Jesus. But this was a body destined to vanish away; and in St. Paul we see it in the very process of disappearing. While the eschatological point of view clings to certain of his least important utterances, such as those on the relation of the sexes, it has little to do with his thought in general, which would have been very nearly what it is if his eschatology had been quite different.

A similar attempt has been made to give to the sacraments a preponderant place in his thinking and to connect these with similar rites practised in pagan days by those who subsequently came over to Christianity. But such a notion has still less to justify it. St. Paul said (1 Co 1⁷): 'Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel'; and, had occasion arisen, he would have added, with the same downrightness: 'Jesus sent me not to administer the other sacrament, but to preach the gospel.' He was not a dispenser of sacraments, but a preacher of the gospel. His own conversion was complete, and the gospel involved in it had been revealed to his understanding, before he was himself baptized. He was, indeed, baptized thereupon; but the rite was only a means of emphasizing that which had already taken place. He did not believe in sacraments as effecting anything apart from faith in the mind of the recipient. His careful account of the Lord's Supper proves how highly he honoured that sacrament and how firmly he believed in its efficacy. But to him there was nothing magical in the administration. No kind of virtue was communicated through it which is incommunicable through other means. It was only the seal or signature affixed to the testimony of the preached Word. Not the faintest glimpse of the genius of the man has been vouchsafed to any who can believe him an apostle of salvation through forms and ceremonies; and little credit is done to his thinking capacity by those who believe him capable of preaching sometimes a salvation of this sort and at other times a salvation through grace and faith.

(b) Later Paulinism. — The title proposed by Wernle for the later Paulinism is Gnosis; but the present writer would prefer Wisdom; because, in English at least, Gnosis has a derogatory sound. To account for the rise of this phase in St. Paul's thinking there cannot be cited any crisis equal in distinction to the conversion in the earlier part of his life. In fact, the peculiarity of his later experience to which his later teaching is traceable is rather the absence of crisis. The crisis was long past, with its exciting experiences and startling effects; and there had supervened the monotony of middle life. What was there now to make up for the glow and energy of the earlier period? Perhaps, indeed, this hardly required to be asked in regard to St. Paul himself, whose enthusiasm never cooled; but it was certainly a critical question for the generality of his converts. Of these St. Paul had probably at one time thought as being all like himself—not less prompt in decision or less enduring in conviction. They had, as well as he, gone through a crisis of conversion; and he expected this to supply them with motives potent enough to last the rest of their lives. But in ordinary souls first love is apt to cool, and human nature to recur to its normal proclivities; and, in course of time, he became well aware that in none of his churches were there wanting gross abuses or glaring sins. What was there in Christianity to provide for a chronic necessity such as this? This is the Christian problem of middle life.

In the first period there had been vouchsafed to him, immediately after his conversion, the residence in Arabia, during which, it is believed, he worked out in his own mind the fundamental principles of his gospel. And something of the same kind may be recognized, also, at the commencement of the later stage of his life; because he spent, in imprisonment at Cæsarea, a period hardly less prolonged than that passed in Arabia. This enforced leisure was a providential opportunity for revising his beliefs and combining with them any new experiences afforded by the external course of his history. Nor was this spur to meditation lacking; because, from more quarters than one, he heard of the rise among his converts of what is now known as incipient Gnosticism; and this furnished him with food for thought.

As interpreted by Lightfoot, in his well-known dissertation on the Colossian Heresy (Colossians and Philemon, new ed., 1879, p. 73 ff.), this incipient Gnosticism had for its root-idea an aversion to matter, which it looked upon as a principle opposed to God and as the cause of sin in human beings. It was, therefore, to be avoided and overcome; but, in the endeavour to do so, different Gnostics chose different paths. On the one hand, some practised asceticism in regard to food, marriage, and other bodily enjoyments, thinking that the best way to overcome matter was to have as little to do with it as possible. Others, on the contrary, adopted a bolder course. Sensual desires, it seemed to them, were natural and inevitable, and the only way to overcome them was by glutting them with that for which they craved. Desire would be extinguished by exhaustion; and then they would be able to cease thinking about the objects with which fancy had been obsessed.

These opposite tendencies occupy a prominent place in St. Paul's later writings; and it is easy to imagine with how much pain and annoyance it was that he became aware of their prevalence among his churches. He may, however, have been conscious that both parties were able to appeal to doctrines of his own, which occupy a prominent place in his earlier writings. In discussing the question of meats offered in sacrifice to idols, he had counselled the strong to adopt the magnanimous attitude of abstinence for the sake of the weak, though not conceding that the scruples of the weak had any justification. The weak, however, have a strength of their own, and they sometimes turn concessions thus made to them into tyrannical rules binding upon all. At all events, the exhortations to defer to the weak do not recur in the later Epistles; but asceticism is strongly repudiated, and the principle enforced that 'every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be rejected, if it be received with thanksgiving: for it is sanctified through the word of God and prayer' (1 Ti 4⁵).

There is good reason for believing that St. Paul became sensible in later life that even his own doctrine of the righteousness of God was capable of being construed in a sense totally different from that intended by him, and with pernicious results. In the Epistle to the Galatians he had attacked the Law with ferocity, and he had drawn no distinction between ceremonial and moral law. But experience was to teach him that freedom from law can be adopted as a watchword by unsteady spirits, who convert it into licence. In Germany, a generation after the death of Luther, justification by faith alone had been converted into such an idol that in many quarters there was no longer any dread of certain forms of moral corruption; and the wiser of Luther's followers had to recognize that there is a use of the Law even for the regenerate, to instruct them as to what the will of God is, when once they have, through grace, been made willing to do it. St. Paul had never been unaware of this; but he states it with more clearness and urgency in his later Epistles, where the standard set up for all who call themselves by the name of Christ is that they be 'furnished completely unto every good work' (2 Ti 3¹⁷).

If the Lutheran Church had to learn by experience that its favourite doctrine could be turned into lasciviousness, the Reformed or Calvinistic Church had no less to learn, in the century after the Reformation, that its favourite doctrine was capable of misuse. Now, election is one of St. Paul's doctrines also; and he sometimes gives to it very strong expression indeed, as, e.g., in the paragraph about Jacob and Esau in the latter half of the Epistle to the Romans. Nor does he abandon it in his later writings; but he states it more cautiously, laying emphasis on the choice of God on the part of man which is necessary to salvation as well as the choice of man on the part of God. In the Pastoral Epistles there is a universalism of the Divine love and of the death of Christ (1 Ti 2⁴⁻⁶ 4¹⁰, 2 Ti 1³, Tit 2⁻); but it is carefully balanced by the ethical requirements addressed to those who hear the gospel.

It may be that the prominent place given in the later Pauline letters to the doctrine of the Church is traceable to the same considerations and anxieties. This new development is in two directions: on the one hand, there is a very exalted conception of the Church, culminating in the image, in Ephesians, of the bride of Christ, who is to be presented to the Bridegroom without spot or wrinkle or any such thing; and, on the other hand, there is the organization of offices, elaborated in the Pastoral Epistles. Why was St. Paul so anxious that such a lofty view of its own constitution should possess the mind of the Church? And why did he provide that it should be so thoroughly organized? Is not the explanation to be sought in his growing sense of the perils to which his converts were exposed through contact with surrounding paganism, and especially the orgies connected with the idol-festivals? Refuge from these temptations of a corrupt society could be found only in a pure society; and he desired the Church to be a place so attractive that those who had left the world for it might feel that they had made a good exchange.

There was another aspect of incipient Gnosticism which gave a direction to the Apostle's thinking of which note must be taken. In its dread of matter it instinctively separated the Deity from it as much as possible. Hence fully developed Gnosticism attributed the creation of the material universe to an inferior deity, whom it termed the Demiurge; and even incipient Gnosticism interposed between the Deity and matter a multitude of fantastic creations of the fancy, sometimes conceived of as abstractions but at other times impersonated as angels of different ranks. This causes St. Paul, in his later writings, to speak of Jesus Christ as both the author and the end of the universe—'Of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things' (Ro 11³⁶)—and it is probably this also which leads him to celebrate the Son of God as the Lord of angels and of all the denizens of the spiritual world. Out of such references to supernatural beings there was constructed by Dionysius Areopagiticus an elaborate system of angelology, which was adopted by the theologians of the Middle Ages and deeply affected the cosmical conceptions of both Dante and Milton. But it is open to question whether St. Paul intended these references to be taken so seriously. All he intended may have been to say that, whatever principalities and powers there may exist anywhere, they are all under the dominion of the Son of God. It is, however, in one of the least polemical of his writings that we come upon the ripest expression of such meditations on the transcendence of Christ, viz. Ph 2⁹, where we read of one 'who, being in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and, being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross. Wherefore also God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things on earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father'—a passage which, though it presents to scholarship not a few difficulties, has done, and ever will do, much to steady the faith of the Church, in the glory of her Lord.

Not only, however, is Christ thus transcendent in the universe: He is also immanent in believers and in the Church. This is the teaching of all the Epistles from first to last, but it is most prominent in the later ones; and this emphasis and reiteration fall in with the thought which has been shown to be characteristic of the later Epistles. Even in the earliest Epistles, in which freedom from the law is vindicated as the negative pole of Christian experience, possession by the Spirit appears as the positive pole, and in Galatians all the features of Christian experience are described as 'the fruit of the Spirit' (5²²). That the Spirit is the Third Person of the Godhead is proved by the Apostolic Benediction, which forms the closing verse of 2 Corinthians. Now it seems to be a rule of Scripture, that whatever is done by one Person of the Godhead may be spoken of as done by the others; and, accordingly, not only is the Spirit said to dwell in believers, but the Father is also said to be in them, and they are said to be in the Father. It is, however, about the Son of God that such statements are most frequently made; and the phrase 'in Christ' or 'Christ in you' is the most common expression for this Divine indwelling, which is the guarantee of Christian progress and perfection. In Eph 1 and 2 the phrase 'in Christ' occurs more than a score of times; and it is significant of the warmth generated by this idea in the mind of St. Paul that he has invented a whole series of metaphors to set it forth, the union between Christ and believers being compared to that between a temple and the stones of which it is composed, to that between trunk and branches in a tree, to that of head and members in the human body, and to that of husband and wife. The whole of Deissmann's St. Paul is illuminated by the thorough exposition of this idea and by the proof of how it ruled the Apostle's consciousness in every direction.

Union with Christ is usually represented as connecting us with the living Christ in the same way as faith does with the Christ who died; the one is related to sanctification in the same way as the other is to justification; and with this agrees the saying of St. Paul himself (Ro 5¹⁰): 'If, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.' But the conception for which 'in Christ' is the symbol is much more comprehensive than this would suggest. The connexion with Christ was formed in a past eternity in the mind of God, and it will continue to all eternity; because 'neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Ro 8³⁸). It is not only vital, bringing into the soul the virtue resident in Him who is now seated at the right hand of power, but legal also, making our debt His and His merit ours. In short, Christ to St. Paul's mind fills the entire universe, from horizon to horizon; and faith saves because it is the receptivity of the soul which appropriates all the virtue of every kind derivable from this transcendent Being.

4. Personality.—St. Paul was, in the fullest sense of the word, a personality. There is about him the same modernness as about St. Augustine in his Confessions. While many figures of the past are unintelligible and incomprehensible, he is as human as if he had walked in upon us out of the street. This may be partly due to the details of his life being so well known and his words read so frequently in our hearing; but it is traceable still more directly to the largeness of his humanity and the realism of his thinking. There are, no doubt, however, things about him, due to his circumstances and training, which affect us less favourably; and, on the other hand, the expansion of our own experience may train us gradually to a complete comprehension of him. Scholars like Ramsay and Deissmann have written with enthusiasm of the new power of appreciation derived from witnessing with their own eyes the scenes of his labours; and anyone privileged to live through a revival of religion would ever afterwards have a new comprehension of every page in the Book of Acts, while the experience of an evangelist or a pastor, in hungering and thirsting for the salvation of those under his charge, or in watching over the development of young converts, with a sensitive consciousness of the perils to which these are exposed, would supply the best of all qualifications for feeling the innermost throb of the Epistles.

(a) The man.—Without question Nature had expended on the making of St. Paul a fine bit of the material with which she works in her secret laboratory, and had cast his personality in one of her largest moulds. He was specially strong in intellectual endowment. This can be appreciated by reading any exposition of his thinking such as is supplied in works on NT theology, for there the topics are not only numerous but full of weight and substance; and, besides, they are so closely articulated as to form an orderly and connected system of ideas. The question whether St. Paul was the author of a dogmatic system has, indeed, been disputed, some holding that it is in the sphere of religion rather than dogma that he lives and moves; but, at all events, he was one of those who need to know the why and the wherefore of whatever they are experiencing or doing, and whose views and convictions all piece themselves together into a connected view of the world. He has been one of the most influential teachers of mankind, multitudes in every century adopting from him their way of conceiving all the greatest objects of human concern.

While, however, it is this side of his greatness which first attracts the eye, closer intimacy reveals him as not less distinctively a man of heart. He could love, and he had the power of compelling love. So numerous were his companions and fellow-labourers, that the study of these is a subject which has more than once been treated by itself (J. S. Howson, The Companions of St. Paul, 1871; E. B. Redlich, St. Paul and his Companions, 1913). It is astonishing how often he is seen in tears; and it is certain that the Ephesians at Miletus were not the only converts of his who, at parting, fell on his neck and kissed him, sorrowing because they were to see his face no more. By no author has this side of his character been so perfectly seized as by Adolphe Monod, whose little book, entitled St. Paul (1851), far outweighs in value many ponderous tomes. Yet this writer does not fail to point out that the feminine traits in St. Paul acquired their significance from the strength of the masculine ones. When a woman weeps, it occasions no surprise; but there is something profoundly moving in the tears of a strong man.

Still, St. Paul had not all the gifts. His bodily presence was weak and his speech contemptible. Whether his 'thorn in the flesh' was connected with this natural defect, it is impossible to say; but the way in which it is introduced, as if it were something sent to keep him humble, after he had received extraordinary visions and revelations, would rather suggest that it was additional to his congenital weakness; and that it was sufficiently painful and annoying is obvious without the exaggeration of Farrar, who characteristically speaks of it as his 'stake' in the flesh (The Life and Work of St. Paul, 2 vols., 1879, i. 214). It has been supposed to have been epilepsy, because the sufferer says that the Galatians did not 'spit' (τὴν οὐδὲν ἐξερριπᾶν) at him, and in the ancient world it was common to spit at the sight or mention of epilepsy, as among ourselves some people 'touch wood' in certain circumstances by way of deprecation. Similarly, the theory that it was a disease of the eyes can be supported by his statement that the Galatians would have plucked out their own eyes and given them to him (v. 13). Ramsay's notion, that it was malarial fever, has the recommendation that he himself suffered from this in the same region of the world, and is of opinion that the symptoms correspond (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 94). What it really was will probably never be ascertained. It is enough to know that the astonishing work done by this man was accomplished not in the robustness of a healthy body or in the self-consciousness of one able at all times to have absolute confidence in himself, but amid weariness and painfulness, shyness and self-distrust. To a sensitive mind any bodily weakness or deformity must be a kind of torture, especially in the presence of strangers; and St. Paul loved the gospel so entirely that he would have liked to give it the advantage of all the graces of voice and bodily presence which he lacked. Yet, in more ways than one, his very defects turned out to the furtherance of the gospel; and with genial intuition Adolphe Monod, himself somewhat of an invalid, has divined how this could happen. A weak servant of Christ sometimes appeals to the sympathies of an audience more by his weakness than anyone could by strength; the women, especially, in a congregation will do far more for an invalid pastor than for one in health; and so it comes to pass that such a one can say, 'When I am weak, then am I strong' (2 Co 12¹⁰).

The idea, not infrequently encountered in recent works on St. Paul, that his liability to see visions and dream dreams was connected with his bodily weakness or some psychical derangement, seems a strange perversion of the facts. His own estimate of it at least was very different. To him it appeared a mark of superiority so distinguished that he had to beware of being puffed up through possessing it; and there can be no question that it rendered to him extraordinary assistance and encouragement at critical moments of his experience. It was akin to the official endowment of the OT prophets, and, if it is to be traced to any natural peculiarity, this must be sought in the psychology of prophecy.

(b) The Hebrew and the Hellenist.—To St. Paul, the Jew, very ample justice has been done, as the OT, from every portion of which he drew ideas and impulses, has always been known to his interpreters. But the same justice has not been done to the Gentile in him. He may almost without impropriety be called a Gentile; to the Greeks, he says himself, he became a Greek; and it is possible that he may have done so more than he was himself aware.

This at least is being asserted by scholarship at the present time; and the very latest speculations on Paulinism are in this direction. By the school which takes its name from the History of Religion, and whose leading aim it is to trace out every kind of connexion that can be discovered between Christianity and other contemporary religions, it is contended that, in the world of St. Paul's time and in the countries where his missionary labours were carried on, there was taking place an extraordinary religious ferment, the West acting on the East, and the East still more powerfully on the West. The atmosphere was full of notions and aspirations, these being connected not with the hereditary classical religion, with which scholarship has long been familiar, but with imported and illegitimate cults, with which scholarship is only now becoming acquainted. As a person of religious sensitiveness and as a Semite, St. Paul could not escape; and not a few ideas of the later Paulinism are derived from this source. Indeed, if the form in which Christianity first presented itself to his mind was due to Judaism, the last was due to Hellenism.

There may be more in these suggestions than conservative scholars are yet disposed to allow. The scene of St. Paul's activity was the synagogue; and in the synagogues, wherever he went, he encountered two elements—a Jewish and a Gentile. To us the former is easily intelligible: we are aware both of the difficulty felt by Jews in accepting the Christian message and of the arguments by which they could be led to believe that Jesus was the Christ. But it was among the Gentiles that the missionary obtained his most numerous successes, and not infrequently he turned away from the Jews altogether and devoted himself exclusively to the Gentiles. It has not been sufficiently considered how there happened to be so many of such proselytes or how they were so open to the influences brought by St. Paul. Some of them had accepted the Jewish religion in its entirety, but probably the majority had only contracted a habit of attendance at the synagogue. Even this, however, betokens that they were persons in whom the religious instinct was strong, and the religious cravings of many may have sought satisfaction elsewhere before coming to the synagogue. If the story could be fully told, it is not unlikely that to many of them some other religion had rendered the same service as the Law did to Jews, being a 'schoolmaster' to bring them to Christ.

Now, what is alleged is that in these Oriental cults there were elements bearing a striking resemblance to certain features of Paulinism. The worshippers sought escape from the world through absorption in the deity in a manner bearing some likeness to union with Christ in the Pauline theology; and mystical rites were practised having a certain analogy with the Christian sacraments.

All this may amount to no more than the fact that in all religions, the Christian included, there are certain common aspirations as well as certain forms of ritual. There is no clear statement anywhere in St. Paul's writings implying that he looked upon heathens as having been led to Christ through their own religions in the same way as Jews had been led to Him through theirs. His tone is, on the contrary, one of disparagement and condemnation, and he speaks of their previous religious condition as something from which they needed to be delivered. The nearest approach to a more sympathetic view of heathenism is in the speech on Mars' Hill, in which there is an indication of an education of the human race, as well as of the Jews, for Christianity. It is contended, indeed, that, in the Epistles of the Imprisonment, he has paid to the cults in question the compliment of adopting their phraseology on a large scale ('fullness,' 'mystery,' 'perfect,' 'gnosis,' 'revelation,' 'new man,' 'God-saviour,' etc.) without referring to them by name. But Kennedy, in St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions, has proved (especially in chs. iv. and v.) that both the words and ideas to which a heathen origin is attributed go back to the OT and the LXX; and, when they can be found there, it is useless to go further afield. The evidence that the notions attributed to the worshippers of Mithra, Osiris, and Dionysus were actually held by them is frequently very slender; and there is great need for the publication of a corpus of the texts relied on as a whole, in order that it may be seen how far we are dealing with serious facts. Too often the writers of this school create, though unintentionally, the impression, not that these cults were providential preparations for Christ, but that Christianity is no better than one of them, as fantastic and as futile.

It is certain, at all events, that both the sacraments were practised in the Church before St. Paul became a Christian; and both can vindicate their institution by the Founder of Christianity Himself, who, besides, imitated them from parallel rites in the older dispensation; and St. Paul's doctrine of union with Christ can claim the same authoritative derivation. The mysticism of St. Paul is almost identical with that of St. John; and in St. John it is put into the mouth of Jesus Himself. Everyone remembers the parable of the Vine and the Branches. Because St. John wrote later than St. Paul, the Johannine theology is usually treated as a development from the Pauline. But the dependence was the opposite way. Whatever may have been the origin of the Gospel of St. John, the tradition contained in it is much older than the composition of the book; and, if it has in any considerable degree preserved the deeds and the words of our Lord, the knowledge of these must have been in possession of the Church at the period when St. Paul was first ascertaining the contents of the Evangel. He may have obtained the report from the lips of St. John himself, with whom he was at that time in contact; but what St. John knew was the common property of the Church long before it was committed to writing. This is the true origin of the most distinctive part of St. Paul's theology, which never in him reaches the same elevation as in the writings of St. John. Though, for instance, as has been mentioned above, St. Paul invented a whole series of images to set forth the intimacy and vitality of the connexion with Christ, he never rose to the height of sublimity reached by Jesus, when, in the intercessory prayer of Jn 17, He compared the union between Himself and His disciples to that of Father and Son in the Holy Trinity.

The weakness of the school which is attempting at present to interpret Christianity as if it had consisted originally of scraps picked up here, there, and everywhere, is that it conceives Christianity as an amalgam of ideas and fancies, fortuitously collected and ingeniously pieced together, instead of perceiving it to be a series of experiences derived from a single centre and capable of repetition throughout all the generations of mankind. This centre was Christ. Whatever fullness of personality there may have been in St. Paul in his natural state, he became completely himself only when Christ took possession of his being. 'If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new' (2 Co 5¹⁷). From the moment of his conversion it was his continual aspiration to be able to say: 'I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me: and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me' (Gal 2²⁰). Christ had for him a supreme objective value, because He had redeemed him from the curse and bondage of sin. At the moment when Christ first revealed Himself to him, his ethical life had come to an impasse, and he was convicted on the spot of being in absolute antagonism to God. But Christ reconciled him; and, although he was never afterwards without the consciousness of being a sinful man, lost if left to himself, he knew that his ransom had been paid on the Cross. But Christ had for him an equally important subjective value. He was in him 'the hope of glory.' He was the atmosphere which he breathed; He was to him what the sunshine is to the bird. The world might be unkind and fortune fickle, but in Christ he had an unfailing source of exhilaration and a resource in all emergencies. This relationship to Christ determined his relationship to God, as well as to his fellow-Christians and his fellow-men. These experiences have been reproduced in countless instances from century to century; and, the deeper anyone's experience of them is, the more facile and joyous will be the appreciation of the thinker in whose mind they first took their full and natural shape. Should they ever cease to be known as the actual experiences of men, the question about their origin will hardly be worth discussing.

There has of late been much writing on the relation between St. Paul and Jesus. Was the gospel of Jesus faithfully and fruitfully continued in the teaching of the Apostle? or did St. Paul distort the original gospel, replacing it with a system of his own? It has even been contended that St. Paul was the true founder of Christianity; only this was something quite different from that intended by Jesus. Now, if Jesus and St. Paul were simply Jews of genius, whose specialty lay in religion, speculations of this kind would not be out of place. Indeed, the wonder would be that St. Paul, with his assertive and towering personality, did not consciously enter into competition with his rival. But nothing can be more certain than that to St. Paul himself the question whether he or Jesus was the originator of the new religion would have appeared both blasphemous and ludicrous. His favourite designation for himself was the 'slave' of Jesus Christ. He was only a 'vessel,' to carry the name of Christ from nation to nation; and the vessel was an 'earthen' one, in order that the excellency of the power might be Another's and not his own. It cannot be denied that there was a vast difference between Jesus' mode of both conceiving and stating the truth and St. Paul's; but the latter's modes of expression can generally be translated back, without difficulty, into those of Jesus, and the two views of the world do not exhibit serious discrepancies, when it is taken into account that the one speaker is conscious of being the Saviour and the other of having been saved.

(c) The apostle.—The sense of having received from on high a vocation or mission was strong in the leading men of the race to which St. Paul belonged. Thus, Jeremiah records his own call in these words, spoken to him by Jahweh: 'Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee, and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee; I have appointed thee a prophet unto the nations' (Jer 1⁵). Anyone thus addressed naturally felt all his powers consecrated to a task, and this so steeled his whole nature that Jahweh could add, as we read in the same chapter: 'I have made thee this day a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brasen walls, against the whole land, . . . against the princes thereof, against the priests thereof, and against the people of the land. And they shall fight against thee; but they shall not prevail against thee: for I am with thee, saith the Lord, to deliver thee' (v. 1²⁵). In Jesus this sense was particularly strong: He knew Himself to be the Messiah; hence the name 'Son of man,' by which He called Himself, as well as the other Messianic titles He accepted from others. In St. Paul there was the same sense of being chosen by God; and from this was derived not a little of his strength. He even reverts to that old conception of Jeremiah, intimating that God had separated him from his mother's womb, to be a preacher of the gospel of His Son (Gal 1¹⁵). To himself it seemed that he had been born at a juncture in the world's history at which there was a special work to be done for God and man, and that he had been endowed with the gifts required for the purpose; consequently, all his faculties and opportunities must be devoted to this object. This made him feel himself to be a debtor to all unacquainted with the gospel (Ro 1¹⁴). His peculiar responsibility was, however, to the Gentiles, to whose evangelization he had been specially appointed. To this consciousness he gives very frequent expression (e.g. Ac 9¹⁵ 13⁴⁷ 15⁷ 22²¹, Ro 11¹³ 15¹⁶, Eph 3³, 1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹). Even with the older apostles he appears to have made an arrangement by which it was agreed that he should go to the uncircumcision, while they went to the circumcision (Gal 2⁷⁻⁹); and this acknowledgment by the Church doubtless deepened his sense of obligation, though it was only the recognition of an anterior conviction of his own and of a call from a higher quarter, in the same way as ordination by an ecclesiastical authority to a particular charge may rekindle the sense of duty, though the call to lay the whole life on the altar has come from a higher source.

In this consciousness of a mission to his age, and of a special mission to the Gentile world, we must recognize one of the driving forces of St. Paul's life. He frequently speaks of the task as a stewardship: 'and it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful' (1 Co 4²). This was what kept alive in him the spirit of missionary enterprise, it being his constant ambition to penetrate into new provinces and not to build on another man's foundation (Ro 15²⁰); this was what made him able to face novel audiences, to stand before courts or kings, and to encounter raging mobs; this was what made all afflictions 'light,' though among these were perils of rivers, perils of robbers, perils in the city, perils in the wilderness, perils in the sea, besides labour and travail, hunger and thirst, cold and nakedness (2 Co 11²⁶⁻²⁷); this was what made him equal to the most difficult achievement of all in a man of his temperament—to rejoice that the gospel was preached by his enemies, for strife and contention, to those who might not otherwise have heard it at all (Ph 1¹⁸).

This loyalty to his calling evoked, however, tenderer things from the deep recesses of his nature. There is a passage in the beginning of 2 Cor. where he blesses 'the Father of all mercies and God of all comforts' for the comfort he has himself received, because this will enable him to comfort those who are in any sorrow; and he goes on to express his willingness to endure any afflictions as long as these give him a deeper sympathy with the suffering children of men. All experiences were to him subordinate to the overmastering purpose of his life, and he could welcome anything whatever out of which new efficiency could be extracted. In short, he loved his work, doing it not only from a sense of duty, but because he loved his Saviour and loved his fellow-men; and so he could speak of himself not only as a 'steward' but as a 'nurse' and a 'father' (1 Th 2⁷, 1 Co 4¹⁵).

(d) The Christian.—All this must have had an influence on character. Every power was exercised to the full, and his own development went on amidst manifold relations with his fellow-creatures. Holiness has been sought behind the walls of the cloister through macerations and prayer; but it comes unsought to those who go out of themselves, to seek and to save the lost children of Adam. This is a secret which has been recaptured in our own time, when many of the holiest men and women are those who are going about continually doing good, finding the romance of existence in the reclamation and the welfare of others. Though such efforts involve sacrifice and self-denial, there is a rich reward in the gratitude of those benefited; and selfishness, the worst of all evils, is eradicated from the soul.

Such universal benevolence is, it must be confessed, not infrequently accompanied by shallowness, the spirit of Martha being so much indulged that there is no time for cultivating the attitude of Mary. From this danger, however, St. Paul was secured by his intense preoccupation with the truth of the gospel, of which he was not only the custodian and propagandist, but the apologist, defending it against all comers. One part of his vocation, to which he gives frequent expression, was to be a revealer of truth which had been hidden in the Divine mind from eternity, and not made known to even the greatest prophets of the OT, because it was reserved for the epoch of the Son of God. This is what St. Paul calls the 'mystery'—the word being used not in the sense of something hidden or obscured, but something once hidden but now revealed—and, as he contemplates it in its novelty and greatness, he bursts out into the exclamation, 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgements, and his ways past tracing out!' (Ro 11³⁵). Thus with the restless activity of the evangelist he combined the habits of the seer and sage.

The sage's labour has its dangers too, the thinker being apt to be lost in the clouds of his own speculation. But from this peril St. Paul was saved by his intense desire to see moral results in those for whom he was labouring. Nearly every Epistle of his is composed half of theological and half of ethical matter. And the one is closely connected with the other. However mystical he becomes, when showing how the Christian has died with Christ, risen with Him, and sat down with Him in the heavenly places, each of these has its moral equivalent in the daily life of the Christian, and the smallest of duties is enforced by the sublimest of principles. This union of ideal and actual is the heart of St. Paul's thinking—'If we live by the Spirit, by the Spirit let us also walk' (Gal 5²⁵).

We know too well that it is possible for a religious teacher to give utterance to the noblest of sentiments and yet not rise in practice above the levels of selfishness; but it is difficult to read the innumerable passages in which St. Paul entreats and encourages his converts to follow after holiness without believing that he was for ever following after it himself; and, although he did not claim to have already attained or to be already perfect, he could, when occasion required, challenge his converts to bear witness to his walk and conversation in their midst—'Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and righteously and unblameably we behaved ourselves toward you' (1 Th 2¹⁰)—and he could call upon them to be imitators of him, as he also was of Christ (1 Co 11¹). As the years increased, and the effects of abuse and imprisonment began to tell on his bodily frame, his heart began to solicit the peace and perfection of a better world—'Our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ph 3²⁰)—or at least to be divided between such yearnings and the attraction of his work—'I am in a strait betwixt the two, having the desire to depart and be with Christ; for it is very far better: yet to abide in the flesh is more needful for your sake' (1²³). At last, in a passage of his final Epistle, which even the most negative of critics have been fain to vindicate in some way for him, we see the spirit poised in the very attitude of flight: 'I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day: and not only to me, but also to all them that have loved his appearing' (2 Ti 4⁶⁻⁸).

LITERATURE.—In English theology no department has been cultivated more creditably than the Life of St. Paul. The great work of Conybeare-Howson, which appeared in 1853, was epoch-making, and is still far from superseded. T. Lewin's, which appeared about the same time, is built on similar lines and is rich in illustrations from antiquities. F. W. Farrar's (1879) embodied the results of these predecessors with a fuller exposition of the thinking. From the pen of W. M. Ramsay has come a whole library of works on St. Paul—The Historical Geography of Asia Minor, 1890, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 1899, Pauline and other Studies in Early Christian History, 1903, The Cities of St. Paul, 1907, Luke the Physician, 1908, The Teaching of Paul in Terms of the Present Day, 1913, The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the NT, 1915, by which a deep impression has been made, in favour of positive views, not only in the English-speaking countries but on the continent of Europe. Of smaller books may be mentioned J. Iverach's in the Men of the Bible series, and A. E. Garvie's in the Century Bible Handbooks (1910); several valuable American works may also be named, such as those by G. H. Gilbert (1899), O. Cone (1898), A. T. Robertson (1909), and B. W. Bacon (1905). Of the German works a history has been written by A. Schweitzer (Geschichte der paulin. Forschung von der Reformation bis auf die Gegenwart, 1911; books in English are omitted, because the author does not know the language); but it cannot be claimed that these are of the same calibre as those in English, except on the side of criticism. F. C. Baur's great work, Paulus der Apostel, 1845, raised profound critical questions, which have been agitating the scholarship of Germany ever since, but it was no gift to the German people, bringing a great religious character home to their intelligence and affection, as Conybeare and Howson's Life was to the English-speaking world. That of A. Hausrath (1865) exhibited fine qualities of style. The two volumes of C. Clemen (Paulus. Sein Leben und Wirken, 1904) have been sufficiently characterized above. Smaller books of note have recently appeared by H. Weinel (Eng. tr., 1906), W. Wrede (Eng. tr., 1906), E. Vischer (1910), but that of A. Deissmann (Eng. tr., 1912) stands out by itself on account of the breath of the open air felt everywhere in its pages and the author's enthusiasm for the subject. The Germans themselves seem to find most satisfaction in the life of St. Paul contained in The Apostolic Age of C. v. Weizsäcker (Eng. tr., 1894-95) (see the remarks in P. Wernle's Einführung in das theologische Studium, 1908), who was a fine spirit but too subject to the critical tendencies of the time in which he lived. Of the works in French, that of Adolphe Monod has already been characterized; that of E. Renan (Eng. tr., 1869) has qualities of its own which cannot be neglected; and that of C. Fouard (Eng. tr., 1894) is highly spoken of.

A few more notes may be added under each of the divisions of the whole subject adopted above.

(1) SOURCES.—Here commentaries on the Acts and on the Epistles, severally or collectively, might be mentioned, but these will be found elsewhere in this Dictionary. A few works, however, on special points may be mentioned:—F. H. Chase, The Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, 1902; G. Hönigke, Die Chronologie des Lebens des Apostels Paulus, 1903; D. Round, The Date of St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 1906; J. D. James, The Genuineness and Authorship of the Pastoral Epistles, 1906 (on the same subject as an Essay by G. G. Findlay in Appendix to A. Sabatier's The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., 1891); Dykes Shaw, The Pauline Epistles, 1903. It will be found useful to read over both Acts and Epistles in unconventional translations—The Twentieth Century New Testament (1904), J. Moffatt, The New Testament: A New Translation (1914), and especially R. F. Weymouth, The New Testament in Modern Speech, 1903 (1912).

(2) LIFE.—On the world into which St. Paul was born the works on NT Times are important, such as those of A. Hausrath (Eng. tr., 1895), E. Schürer (IJJP, 1885-90), and O. Holtzmann (Eng. tr., 1904), as well as the handbooks by R. Waddy Moss (1903), L. A. Muirhead (1905), and W. Fairweather (1895). See also The Background of the Gospels, 1908, of the last mentioned. On St. Paul's conversion: G. L. Lyttelton, Observations on the Conversion, etc. of Paul, 1768, new ed., 1879; E. Moske, Die Bekehrung des heiligen Paulus, 1907. On St. Paul in Athens: works by W. Lindsay Alexander (1865), C. Shakespeare (1878), E. Curtius, 'Paulus in Athen,' in SBAW, 1893. See also J. Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1880; R. Steinmetz, Die zweite römische Gefangenschaft des Apostels Paulus, 1897.

(3) BELIEFS.—O. Pfleiderer's Paulinism (Eng. tr., 1877) long did good service, but it may be said now to have been superseded by such works as A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894; G. B. Stevens, The Pauline Theology, 1892; G. H. Gilbert, The First Interpreters of Jesus, 1901; and W. P. DuBoise, The Gospel according to St. Paul, 1907. It has, however, been hinted above that the best expositions of Paulinism are to be found in the works on NT Theology, which are numerous and excellent, such as those of B. Weiss (Eng. tr., 1882-83), W. Bousset (Eng. tr., 1895), H. J. Holtzmann (1911), P. Feine (1911), A. Schlatter (1909-10), H. Weinel (1913), E. W. E. Reuss (Eng. tr., 1872-74), J. Bovon (1902-05), G. B. Stevens (1899), to which add A. Titius, Die neueste Lehre von der Seligkeit, 1895-1900. There are many monographs on special points such as the following:—On St. Paul's views of Sin, works by E. Ménégot (1882) and P. Wernle (1897); on his Psychology, works by W. P. Dickson (St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit, 1883) and T. Simon (1897); on his Christology, works by M. Brückner (1903), H. Schmidt (1867), D. Somerville (St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 1897); on his Ethics, works by H. L. Ernesti (1875), A. Juncker (1904), A. B. D. Alexander (1910); on his Pastoral Teaching, works by W. E. Chadwick (1907) (who has also a volume on his Social Teaching, 1906) and G. Pahnke (1906); on his Eschatology, works by R. Kabisch (1893), E. Teichmann (1896), H. A. Kennedy (1904). W. M. Macgregor's Christian Freedom, 1914, is a treatise on the theology of the Epistle to the Galatians. On the Style of St. Paul see, besides the works referred to in the text, J. S. Howson, The Metaphors of St. Paul, new ed., 1883; R. R. Resker, St. Paul's Illustrations, 1908; J. Weiss, Beiträge zur paulinischen Rhetorik, 1897.

(4) PERSONALITY.—There is a good chapter on the personality of St. Paul in A. E. Garvie's Studies of Paul and his Gospel, 1911. The question of the relation of St. Paul to contemporary religions and religious movements was brought into prominence by E. Hatch, The Organization of the Early Christian Churches (BL), 1881 (Germ. tr. A. Harnack, 1883), and later by F. Cumont, Les Religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, 1906, but especially by R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 1910. A very sympathetic statement of the results will be found in B. W. Bacon, The Story of St. Paul, 1905, and a criticism, not sympathetic but searching, in H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions, 1913. See also S. J. Case, The Evolution of Early Christianity, 1914. On the question formulated by W. H. Johnston, art. 'Was Paul the Founder of Christianity?' in Princeton Theological Review, v. [1907] 398 ff., see A. Meyer, Wer hat das Christentum begründet, Jesus oder Paulus?, 1907; P. Feine, Jesus Christus und Paulus, 1902; M. Goguel, L'Apôtre Paul et Jésus Christ, 1904; J. Kaftan, Jesus und Paulus, 1906; A. Julicher, Paulus und Jesus, 1907; W. Walther, Pauli Christentum Jesu Evangelium, 1908; J. Weiss, Paulus und Jesus, 1909. On the relation of the teaching of St. Paul to that of Jesus there is an important work by A. Resch, 'Der Paulinismus und die Logia Jesu' in TU, new ser. xii. [1904]; see also R. J. Drummond, The Relation of the Apostolic Teaching to the Teaching of Christ, 1901. JAMES STALKER.

PAULUS.—See SERGIUS PAULUS.

PEACE.—The etymology of the Greek word εἰρήνη is variously given as from εἶπειν (=Lat. serere), 'to fasten together,' or from εἶπειν (cf. Lat. sermo), 'to speak.' Besides the noun the following forms of the root occur in the writings of the Apostolic Age: εἰρηνεύειν, 'to keep the peace' (never transitive, 'to reconcile') (Mk 9⁵⁰, Ro 12¹⁸, 2 Co 13¹¹, 1 Th 5¹³); εἰρηνοποιός, 'peacemaker' (Mt 5⁹), on which see below; εἰρηνοποιεῖν, 'to make peace' (Col 1²⁰), εἰρηνικός, 'peaceable' (Ja 3¹⁷); for the meaning in He 12¹¹ see below.

The noun εἰρήνη occurs in all the NT writings except John, but the preponderant and most characteristic use is in the Pauline Epistles. It derives its peculiar significance from the OT שָׁלוֹם and cognate forms. In extra-biblical Greek εἰρήνη is strictly limited to its ordinary political and military significance, meaning simply the cessation or absence of war. It does not even cover the idea of 'treaty,' 'truce,' for which σπονδαί is used. The LXX puts εἰρήνη for six other words besides שָׁלוֹם (cf. עָלָם in 1 Ch 4⁴⁰). It is of prime importance to notice that in Hebrew and the cognate languages שָׁלוֹם is not a word formed for or originally associated with the cessation of hostilities. The root שָׁלַם covers a wide range of ideas, many of which have nothing to do with war and peace. The use of the word with a political or military reference is a later development. From this it must be explained that 'peace' in the OT has frequently a positive content, and that it is applied in many connexions to which it could scarcely have been transferred from its military use. Thus the idea of 'health' is not a metaphor transferring the notion of political soundness to the bodily organism. Nor is the meaning of 'prosperity' the product of the experience that political peace is indispensable to economic welfare. The root שָׁלַם denotes originally 'wholeness,' 'integrity.' This is applied to inorganic things, e.g. unhewn stones (Dt 27⁶), also metaphorically to such things as labour (1 K 7³¹), wages (Ru 2¹²) and spiritually to disposition (Is 38³) and sin (Gn 15¹⁶). Further, it is used of artificially produced objects in the sense of being unbroken, uninjured (Dt 25¹⁵, Pr 11¹). In relation to organic processes it stands for health (Gn 29⁶), and this, in part at least, gives rise to the employment of the word in the formula of salutation, although the wider sense of security of one's actions and interests in general enters likewise into this usage (Gn 41¹⁶). The Piel species of the verb has two main significations—the religious one of performing a ritual obligation (Dt 23²¹), and the forensic one of recompensing, sensu malo of punishment (Jer 23¹⁴) or of trade-exchange (Ps 37¹). In both respects the transaction is viewed as an integrating process, the payment rounding off, rendering complete the votive state or the compensatory relationship. In dependence on the ritual usage the name שָׁלוֹם for one class of sacrifice will probably have to be explained, for these offerings were either votive offerings or sacrifices for thanksgiving in general. The Hiphil and Hophal forms of the verb are largely denominatives from the noun in its specialized meaning 'peace,' but they also signify 'to give execution to a plan or purpose'—again the idea of integration (Dt 20¹², Job 5²³, 23¹⁴, Is 44²⁶, 28). The political notion of peace itself goes back to the same idea, inasmuch as two parties become a unit in their relations towards outsiders or in mutual intercourse. Peace is not always the sequel of war; it may be in the form of alliance, the preventative of war (1 S 7¹⁴).

From the foregoing it appears that there was a wide, only partly political or military, basis in the secular usage for the positive religious application of the word. The peace which God gives or maintains for His people is 'integrity,' 'soundness,' 'prosperity' in the widest sense (Is 45⁷, Jer 29⁷). Even when 'peace' occurs in antithesis to war the associations are not purely negative. The positive blessings consequent upon the cessation of war are included (Jer 4¹⁰, Zec 8^{10a}). Peace as a religious bonum applies to the sphere of nature as well as of politics, and the former as well as the latter plays an important part in eschatological prophecy (Hos 2^{20a}, Is 2¹⁻⁴ [=Mic 4¹⁻⁵] 9⁸, 6, Mic 5⁵, 10-15, Zec 9⁹⁻¹⁰). The idea of peace in relation to God Himself, in distinction from peace in other relations, given or guaranteed by God, seems to occur in the OT only in Ps 85⁹ (but cf. Is 48-57²¹).

In the NT εἰρήνη has a two-fold religious application. On the one hand the military-political usage is transferred to the religious sphere. This is done in two directions: firstly, with reference to God; and secondly, as between believers mutually. Peace is the antithesis to the warfare that exists between God and the sinner. As this warfare ('enmity') is an objective state and not a mere figure for hostile disposition towards God on man's part, so the peace is an objectively established and maintained footing, on which God and the believer associate together. St. Paul has with doctrinal precision correlated the ideas of 'enmity' (Ro 5¹⁰, 11²⁸, Col 1²¹), 'reconciliation' (Ro 5¹⁰, 11²⁵, 2 Co 5¹⁸, 19, 20, Col 1²¹), and 'peace' (Ro 5¹, 6¹⁴). Although the subjective, emotional experience of an inner state of peace is inseparable from this εἰρήνη πρὸς θεόν, yet the word itself does not in these contexts express it, but stands simply for the state of justification. This remains true, even if the correct reading in Ro 5¹ is the subjunctive εἰρήνην ἔχωμεν, 'let us have peace,' for this cannot, any more than the καταλλάγητε τῷ θεῷ of 2 Co 5¹⁹, relate to the cultivation of a peaceful disposition towards God; it must refer in both cases to the subjective appropriation through faith of the objective peace which God establishes in Christ. It is doubtful whether any Pauline passage has εἰρήνη in the purely subjective sense either of disposition or of experience (cf. Ro 15¹³ with 14¹⁷). In Ph 4⁷, Col 3¹⁵ peace is represented as guarding the hearts and thoughts and ruling in the hearts. This must be understood of objective peace personified, and the result ascribed to this influence exercised by peace covers far more than a feeling of tranquillity. As applied to the fellowship between believers mutually, peace is a social conception, including the elements of harmony and organic co-operation (Ro 14¹⁹, 1 Co 7¹⁵ 14³³, Gal 5²², Eph 4³ ['the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace'], He 12¹⁴, Ja 3¹⁸, 1 P 3¹¹, 2 P 3¹⁴). In regard to Eph 2¹⁴⁻²² there is a difference of opinion among exegetes as to whether the reference of the peace embodied in Christ is to Jewish and Gentile believers mutually considered, or fundamentally to God, so as to include only as a corollary peace between the two component parts of the body of the Church. E. Haupt (Die Gefangenschaftsbrieft), in Meyer's Kommentar über das NT, 1897, pp. 78-99) has advocated the former view, but the other interpretation seems more in keeping with the trend of the passage and the expressions used. By being reconciled to God, each for their own part, Gentiles and Jews have now become reconciled together. In vv. 14-15 peace denotes the fellowship between Jews and Gentiles, but in v. 17 (Is 57¹⁹) the peace proclaimed by the gospel is the peace with God, and the same idea is implied in v. 6.

The other branch of the NT idea of religious peace ramifies from the main OT stem. It denotes the spiritualized, Christian form of 'prosperity,' 'security,' 'soundness,' 'salvation,' associated with the word from its very earliest use. No doubt this was coloured, to the mind of St. Paul at least, by the consciousness of the peace of reconciliation existing with God, but its content is too rich and too positive to be exhausted by it. In this sense we find the word in the salutations at the beginning or close of the Epistles, usually associated with χάρις (Ro 1⁷, 1 Co 1³, 2 Co 1² 13¹¹, Gal 1³ 6¹⁶, Eph 1-6²³ ['peace and love with faith'], Ph 1², Col 1², 1 Th 1², 2 Th 1² 3¹⁶, 1 Ti 1², 2 Ti 1², Tit 1⁴, Philem 3, 1 P 1² 5¹⁴, 2 P 1², 2 Jn 3, 3 Jn 1⁴, Rev 1⁴). This goes back in the last analysis to the use of the word in ordinary social salutation, which in the OT already refers not exclusively to friendly intercourse, but also to positive well-being, including health and general security. In a profound spiritualization of this conception the formula had already been addressed by Christ to the disciples after the Resurrection (Lk 24³⁸, Jn 20¹⁹. 21. 28; cf. also Mt 10¹³, Lk 22⁹ 75⁸ 84⁵ 105⁶, Ac 15³³ 16³⁶, 1 Co 16¹¹). The rich, positive content becomes apparent in such passages as the following: Lk 17⁹ (opposite 'darkness' and 'shadow of death') 21⁴ (=the complete Messianic salvation, because 'peace on earth' is parallel to 'glory in the highest,' which has Messianic significance, and because the men who receive the peace are characterized as objects of the Divine εὐδοκία; cf. also 19⁴²), Jn 14²⁷ 16³³, Ac 9³¹ 10³⁶ (=the object of the gospel proclamation), Ro 2¹⁰ (associated with δόξα and τιμή as the eschatological reward for working good) 14¹⁷ 15¹³. 33 16²⁰ (the result of the conquest of Satan), Gal 6¹⁶ ('mercy and peace'), Eph 2¹⁷ (content of the gospel-message) 6¹⁵ ('the gospel of peace'), Ph 4⁷, Col 3¹⁵, 1 Th 5³ (the opposite of eschatological peril=ἀσφάλεια), He 7² (Christ, like Melchizedek, King of Peace) 12¹¹ (the fruit of righteousness consisting in peace; cf. Is 32¹⁷ and Ja 3¹⁸). The general soteriological reference is also favoured by the fact that God is called 'the God of peace' (Ro 15³³ 16²⁰, 1 Co 14³³, 2 Co 13¹¹, Ph 4⁹, He 13²⁰), as conversely the peace is also called 'the peace of God' (Ph 4⁷). In the light of this wider, positive conception it becomes probable that the ειρηνοποι of Mt 5⁹ are not merely promoters of peace in the sense of reconcilers between man and man, but those who actively procure and produce peace (=salvation) for others.

It will be noticed that the prophetic picture of political peace among the nations is not reproduced in the NT. No doubt this is largely due to the elevation of its eschatology to a higher, transcendental plane. Pre-Christian Judaism, while making considerable use of the idea of peace, remains at bottom particularistic, whilst Christianity is thoroughly universalistic, although the programme of political peace is not explicitly enunciated in its writings.

The NT conception of peace offers no real point of contact with the Stoic ἀρεθία and the Epicurean ἀραξία (cf. 1 Co 7¹⁵, Ph 4⁷, Col 3¹⁵). It is not psychologically conceived as in these systems, but soteriologically. The peace of the NT is not independence of outside conditions in the citadel of man's subjectivity, but the fruit of an objective real salvation with God.

LITERATURE.—Cremers-Kogel, *Bibl.-theol. Wörterbuch der neutest. Gräzität*¹⁰, 1912 ff., pp. 414-418; W. Caspari, 'Vorstellung und Wort "Friede" im AT' in Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie, xiv. 4 [1910]; A. Titius, Die neutest. Lehre von der Seligkeit, pt. II.: 'Der Paulinismus,' 1900, pp. 90, 91; J. H. Thom, Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ, 2nd ser., 1901, pp. 9, 159, 172; R. C. Moberly, Christ our Life, 1902, p. 1; R. W. Church, The Message of Peace, 1895, p. 7; C. G. Montefiore, Truth in Religion, 1906, p. 147; W. M. Macgregor, Jesus Christ the Son of God, 1907, pp. 77, 165; H. W. Clark, *Meanings and Methods of the Spiritual Life*², 1906, p. 82. GEERHARDUS VOS.

PEARL (μαργαρίτης, Lat. margarita or -um).—In ancient as in modern times women adorned themselves with pearls (1 Ti 2⁹); the 'woman arrayed in scarlet and purple' was decked with them (Rev 17⁴ 18¹⁶); and they are included in the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon—Imperial Rome (18¹). The pearl itself is a lulus naturæ.

'The cause of pearl-formation is in most cases, perhaps in all, the dead body of a minute parasite within the tissues of a mollusc, around which nacreous deposit is secreted . . . so that, as a French writer has said, the ornament associated in all ages with beauty and riches is nothing but the brilliant sarcophagus of a worm' (*EB*¹¹ xxi. 26, 27).

The ancient world obtained its pearls chiefly from the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. For fine specimens fabulous prices were paid. The single pearl which Cleopatra is said to have dissolved and swallowed was valued at £80,000. The twelve gates of the New Jerusalem are figured as twelve pearls, each gate one pearl (Rev 21²¹).

JAMES STRAHAN.

PEN.—See WRITING.

PENNY.—'Penny' (δηνάριον) is mentioned twice in Rev 6⁶. The RV gives marginal reference to Mt 18²³, where a note states that the coin (which was of silver) was worth about 8½d. The American Revisers' note renders δηνάριον by 'shilling,' which more nearly represents the actual value. During the reign of Nero the denarius suffered depreciation, and its value was as above stated. In the time of Christ it was worth 9½ pence, or roughly 9½d. (see DCG, art. 'Money'). For its purchasing power, with special reference to Rev 6⁶, see HDB, art. 'Money,' § 11. The denarius, or the denarius-drachm, probably underlies the 'pieces of silver' mentioned in Ac 19¹⁹ (see EB, art. 'Stater,' with reference to Vulg.). At the higher value the total price of the books burned is about £2000. W. CRICKSHANK.

PENTECOST.—So far as canonical Scripture is concerned, it is only in the NT that we meet with this name, and that in three places—Ac 2¹ 20¹⁶, 1 Co 16⁸. We also find it in To 2¹: 'in the feast of Pentecost, which is the holy feast of the seven weeks'; and in 2 Mac 12³¹: 'the feast of weeks being close at hand. But after the feast called Pentecost . . .' In the last two instances the explanatory language reminds us that the term was comparatively new and came into use among the Greek-speaking Jews. Among Christian writers, Tertullian (c. A.D. 200) apparently is the first to use it as the name of a Christian festival (de Idol.

14). He simply took it over from the Greek as already used in the LXX and NT.

1. The name 'Pentecost' (ἡ πεντηκοστή).—It is hardly necessary to add sc. εορτή or ἡμέρα, as the word had already hardened into a proper name. It was so used by St. Paul in 1 Co 16³ (ἑως τῆς πεντηκοστής). It is therefore an unnecessary refinement to translate it in the NT, with R. F. Weymouth, 'the Harvest Festival' (*The NT in Modern Speech*³, London, 1909, ad loc.), or, still more cumbrously, with *The 20th Century NT*², London, 1904, 'the Festival at the close of the Harvest.' Pentecost was the feast of the fiftieth day. It is a colourless name, and, unlike 'Passover or Unleavened Bread' and 'Tabernacles or Booths,' it reveals nothing as to the nature of the festival itself. This is the case also with the Hebrew name, 'feast of weeks (hag shābū'oth),' generally given to this festival (Ex 34²², Dt 16¹⁰). It is true, the feast is also termed 'the feast of harvest' (Ex 23¹⁶), and, further, Ex 34²² adds 'of the firstfruits of wheat harvest'; whilst, again, Nu 28²⁶ calls it 'the day of firstfruits.' At a very much later date the Jews gave to this festival the name of hag ha'azerceth or azarta (Aram.), a term which in earlier times was applied to the concluding festivities of Passover and Tabernacles (Lv 23³⁶, Nu 29³⁵, etc.; in EVV 'a solemn assembly'). Apparently it applied to Pentecost as the feast which marked the conclusion of the harvest. The Gr. ἀραρόθ (a transliteration) betrayed Josephus into the error of supposing that this term itself meant Pentecost (Ant. III. x. 6). But the far more common name was the Feast of Weeks, and later still, the Feast of Pentecost. Under the latter name it still denotes both the Jewish and the Christian festival.

2. Origin.—The name 'Pentecost' takes its origin from the very ancient custom of carefully counting the days from the second day of the Feast of Mazzoth according to the specific injunction of Lv 23¹⁵, where the fifty days also are expressly mentioned. Although there has been much dispute as to the exact meaning of 'the morrow after the sabbath,' it is generally agreed to treat the 16th Nisan as the day when the wave-sheaf of early barley was offered and as the day when they began to 'count the omer.' So Jos. Ant. III. x. 5: 'on the second day of unleavened bread, which is the sixteenth day of the month.' The term 'omer' = (a) sheaf, and (b) a measure of about $\frac{1}{2}$ pints (dry), though the identity of the term in the two senses is uncertain. This, in turn, has given rise to the question whether 'counting the omer' refers to the sheaf or the measure. In the time of the Second Temple, it would seem that the meal rather than the corn-sheaf was the offering. Josephus (Ant. III. x. 5) is explicit on this point. Yet Lv 23 seems equally clear in intending a sheaf.

Be that as it may, in the Dispersion of Israel both the sheaf and the measure have long since ceased to have any significance; but the counting of the omer goes on still from Passover to Pentecost to the very eve of the feast ('This is the forty-ninth day, making seven weeks of the Omer'), and secures the regular observance of the feast. Every evening at prayers in the synagogue the counting duly takes place, with the addition of the formula: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us by Thy commandments, and hast given us command concerning the counting of the Omer.' The brief ceremony closes with Ps 67 and a prayer that 'the temple may be speedily rebuilt in our days,' and, with still the backward look, 'there we will serve Thee with awe, as in the days of old, and as in ancient years.'

Thus is retained a relic of a long-past day. When the Jews were a people settled in their own land, an agricultural people, it was a comparatively simple matter to keep the festival as the procession of the seasons went on year by year. The Feast of Mazzoth marked the opening of harvest with the early barley crop; the Feast of Weeks marked its close with the ingathering of the wheat; the Feast of Booths crowned the cycle with the gathering of the vintage and the 'fruits of the land' (Lv 23³⁹) in general. The climatic conditions of Palestine made those seasons timely and appropriate. The counting of the omer was a quaint expedient for enabling the farmers to appear at the central sanctuary at the appointed time for the Feast of Weeks. The primitive proclamation of new moon, which the authorities announced by messengers, who went through the land as soon as the faint sickle was seen in the sky, could not be relied upon in this instance. Those who dwelt in the borders of the little land would be belated. But all could count from 'the morrow after the sabbath' from the second day of Mazzoth, when the ceremony of waving the omer (of barley) took place. And all could arrange to appear on the appointed day at the end of seven weeks. But all this has long since become antiquated. The counting of the omer is entirely useless. Still the feast is celebrated in the synagogue for one day or two, but all that links it to the festival of the Pentateuch is the counting of the omer (though no omer has been 'waved'), and such dim recollections of a harvest festival in Palestine as can be secured by dressing the synagogue with flowers.

Because the tokens of the actual observance of this feast are few and far between, some have argued a late origin for it. But the argumentum e silentio is always risky. What is settled and customary may go on for generations without remark. The Law at any rate was very explicit: 'Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles' (Dt 16¹⁶). As an intermediary festival, however, and one lasting originally only for one day, there was an inevitable tendency to make the Feast of Weeks less conspicuous than the other two. Passover marked the beginning of harvest; Tabernacles celebrated the very crown and consummation of the year, when all the fruits of the earth had at length been gathered in; but Pentecost was a brief pause of joy and thankfulness for the close of harvest proper and the gathered store of 'bread that strengtheneth man's heart.'

This is seen especially in the dearth of commemorative matter associated with Pentecost. In connexion with Passover, e.g., in the course of time there gathered a considerable number of historical associations, not only with the Exodus, but with all sorts of other great happenings in Jewish history, with or without foundation. Afterwards, however, and at a late date, Pentecost was supplied with one notable historical association, and it became the festival at which the giving of the Law on Sinai was commemorated. The special lessons of the synagogue for Pentecost are all designed to glorify the Law. Once the connexion was made, Talmudic authorities had, by the use of ingenious methods of calculation, no difficulty in proving that this indeed was the very time when this august event took place (Ex 19, 20). This association persists after Pentecost becomes a Christian festival, and provokes the contrast which Keble makes the basis of his hymn for Whitsunday in the Christian Year (London, 1904, p. 120). But see also long before this Jerome (Ep. lxxviii., 'ad Fabiolam' [PL xxii.]).

In the few instances wherein we have historical reference to the Feast of Pentecost there is one noticeable thing: stress is laid on its being a time when crowds were gathered together at Jerusalem. Apparently in the 1st cent. A.D. the festival was well kept as a hag in accord with the ancient legislation. Josephus refers to it more than once (BJ II. iii. 1, VI. v. 3; Ant. III. x. 6, XIII. viii. 4, XIV. xiii. 4). In those days of growing distress and oncoming doom, indeed, he says that the adversaries of the Jews deliberately chose such times when crowds were gathered at Jerusalem to work them some mischief. 'The enemy waited for the coming of the multitude out of the country to Pentecost, a feast of ours so called: and when the day was come, many ten thousands of the people were gathered together,' etc. (Ant. XIV. xiii. 4).

3. The reference in Ac 2.—Time notes are few and far between in Acts, so that all the more precious is this clear note of the day when so momentous and auspicious an event took place. At any rate, there is complete agreement with the repeated testimony of Josephus as to the crowds of people who were at Jerusalem for the festival. With naïve hyperbole the author records the fact that there were at Jerusalem 'devout men from every nation under heaven' (v.⁹). Not that all these were necessarily visitors who had come up expressly for the feast. It reflects for one thing the cosmopolitan character of the resident population of the city. Not a few devout Jews who were of the Diaspora found their way at last to Jerusalem to spend the remainder of their days in the vicinity of the Temple with all its privileges, and at length be buried in the land of their fathers. Perhaps also some were not without vistful hopes that the Messiah would appear. At all events, κατοικούντες (v.⁹) suggests a more permanent residence than a mere sojourn. It is equally clear, however (v.⁹, οι κατοικούντες τὴν Μεσοποταμίαν, and v.¹⁰, οι ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι) that there was also a crowd of genuine visitors who had come to keep the festival.

The author even ventures upon an enumeration of the several provinces and regions whence they had come (vv. 9-11). It does not seem clear that he had any principle to go on in this enumeration, save that roughly he begins in what must have been to him the Far East ('Parthians and Medes') and ends with the West ('sojourners from Rome'), and then adds, a little inconsequently, 'Cretans and Arabians.' It seems a little odd that 'Judæa' should be named between 'Mesopotamia' and 'Cappadocia,' and gives rise to a question as to whether there has not been some misplacement or error in the name itself. If 'Jews and proselytes' (v.¹⁰) is 'a summarizing touch' and the two types are mentioned as being 'found in all the regions just enumerated' (J. V. Bartlet, The Century Bible, 'Acts,' Edinburgh, 1901, ad loc.), it would be superfluous to mention that there were Jews in 'Judæa.' J. A. Bengel (Gnomon Novi Test., ad loc.) says that (for Judæa) 'Armeniam legit Augustinus: eaque inter Mesopotamiam Cappadociamque jacet,' and rather inconclusively adds: 'sed vetustam sane Armeniorum linguam sub alia quadam gente hic nominata innui existimare licet.' It does not appear what authority Augustine had for this, but it witnesses to early uncertainty.

It does not follow that St. Luke is to be understood as giving a careful specification of the regions represented, and it is of little moment whether we consider the list as 'an enumeration, not of languages but of provinces' (Speaker's Commentary, 'St. John and the Acts,' London, 1880, p. 363), or with Bartlet (loc. cit.) say with equal assurance, 'the list is one of languages rather than geographical areas.' For a comparison with Talmudic parallels see E. von Dobschütz, 'Zu der Volkerliste Ac 2⁹⁻¹¹,' in ZWT x. [1902] 407-410.

Much has been said at one time and another as to the particular day of the week on which the Feast of Pentecost sensu eminenti fell. Did it really so happen that that day was 'the first day of the week'? This depends on what day the 16th Nisan fell that year: and it is mixed up with the obscurity attending the day of our Lord's death (see art. PASSOVER). It is after all a matter of inconsiderable importance. But we have the strong tradition that Jesus rose again on the first day of the week: and more than that, we have the undeniable fact that Sunday became the Christian weekly holy day on that very ground. That of itself makes Pentecost to fall on Sunday seven weeks later. We know as a matter of fact that the Christian Church in the course of time established this commemoration on the Lord's Day as most fitting, whatever the actual day may have been, and we need not ask for more. In older Judaism Pentecost fell, like Passover, on all the days of the week as the case might be. A later usage has so far modified this as to avoid the observance of Pentecost on the third, fifth, or seventh days.

4. Nature of the event.—Much more important is the question as to what was the nature of the event which makes this day for ever memorable to the Christian. We must carefully discriminate between the wonder-element of the story, the strange and symbolic accompaniments, and the extraordinary change which most certainly marked the behaviour of the apostles as well as that of the first believers in general. It is, indeed, not impossible that so memorable an event should have been signalized actually by such phenomena as 'a sound as of the rushing of a mighty wind' and 'tongues parting asunder, like as of fire,' and that all should have begun 'to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance' (Ac 2²⁻⁴). At the same time, it is impossible not to see a close parallel to the circumstances which had heralded the giving of the Law from Sinai, which, as we have seen, was commemorated at Pentecost. In the course of time Jewish midrash and legend had considerably heightened these conditions (Ex 19^{16ff.}; cf. He 12^{18ff.}) and had added such particulars as that at Sinai all nations had heard God's voice in their own language and that that voice could be heard as well by those farthest away as by those nearest the mount (see Midrash on Ps 68¹¹, and Philo, de Decalogo). The resemblance is close and could not well have been accidental. But whatever may be said as to the manner of the narrative, however much the writer may have drawn upon legendary matter in the setting of his story, the main thing is to remember that the underlying and undeniable experience is that which is of supreme importance. As C. von Weizsäcker says (Apostolic Age, Eng. tr. i.² [London, 1897] 50 f.), the gift of prophecy 'finds expression, though in a peculiar form, in the narrative of the Pentecost miracle, which he has placed in the forefront of his history. The import of this event is revealed in the speech of Peter (ii. 14 ff.). It was the fulfilment of Joel's prophecy of the universal outpouring of the Spirit of God. . . . Now this is certainly the historical part of the narrative. The members of the Church felt the presence of the new spirit so strongly, . . . that they were confident of the fulfilment of Joel's words in their own time.' (On this and the whole subject of the glossolalia see art. TONGUES, GIFT OF.)

5. Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit.—Altogether too narrow and parochial a view has often been taken as to the Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit. A literalism which proceeds on the assumption that we have exhaustive information as to these events, and that all things actually occurred as they are described, has found itself again and again in sore straits when it has come to explaining precisely what happened. Thus, on the strength of an editorial note in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7³⁹)—οὕτω γὰρ ἦν πνεῦμα—coupled with some of our Lord's utterances reported in the same Gospel (e.g. 16⁷), it has yielded but a grudging acknowledgment of the Spirit's presence and power in the world prior to this event. But we should gladly see in every gracious movement of thought and every outflowing of beauty, virtue, and goodness whensoever and wheresoever displayed, whether before the Incarnation or subsequent thereto, the working and manifestation of the same Spirit of love and light and power. That is quite compatible with giving full weight to Pentecost as ushering in a special manifestation of God's Spirit and an era which was to be peculiarly characterized by the activities and energies of that Spirit in revealing and deepening what is Christ's (ἐκ τοῦ ἐμοῦ λήμψεται κτλ., Jn 16¹⁴).

Among the Fathers, when they proceeded to explain the coming of the Holy Spirit as a new thing and in special connexion with Pentecost, there was a strong disposition to lay stress on the miraculous gifts and give them the chief place, an exegesis which later found too wide a vogue. 'Visibilia illa dona, quæ initio nascentis ecclesiæ excellenter vignerunt'—so runs even Beza's note. Moreover, they too often limited the Spirit's dower to the apostles and their successors, a line of interpretation which at once went in flat opposition to the plain sense of Scripture and helped the development of a sacerdotal and sacramental view of 'Orders.' We meet with similar limitations still: 'The Holy Ghost came upon the Apostles on the Day of Pentecost' (T. B. Strong, *A Manual of Theology*², London, 1903, p. 325). But the whole assembly of believers, if anything is clear, shared in the endowment of power which Pentecost witnessed, as they waited 'all together in one place.' (For ample quotations in support, see J. C. Hare, *Mission of the Comforter*⁴, London, 1877, Note H.)

Too much, indeed, may be made of such expressions as 'coming,' or 'descent,' of the Holy Spirit, as characterizing this day. It helps the perilous parcelling out of time and distinction of 'dispensations'—the dispensations of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—which has found favour with many. This has little to commend it, is artificial, and can only be taken as generally signifying the progressive development of religion among men. Nor was Pentecost 'the birthday of the Christian Church,' as it is often called. 'Birth-day' is an awkward term to use in such a connexion, and can be accepted only as a rough mode of indicating the beginning of the Christian community. But there was a church of a sort already existing (see Ac 1). The movement, in truth, did not lend itself easily to dates, and refused to be subjected to the precision and exactitude which mark the inauguration of merely human societies and institutions. This holy gift was bestowed on a church already in existence. 'Pentecost was a day of power, a day on which the Spirit of God manifested himself through the disciples as a power for the conversion of others' (A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 50).

6. Significance of Pentecost to the primitive Church.—The after course of events makes it clear that Pentecost was a turning-point of great significance in the career of the little community. The chief sign was power to give clear and bold testimony to the truth about Jesus Christ—a rich gift of prophetic grace. 'As they waited and prayed, and pondered the sayings of the Master, and searched the OT Scriptures, the Truth flashed upon them—the Truth that was the Spirit's teaching therein, blending with the words and memory of the Master. Suddenly the darkness of their souls was illumined by the inshining of this light from heaven, their hearts were filled with joy, and in the new exultant confidence that came to them, they were "clothed with power from on high"' (W. L. Walker, The Spirit and the Incarnation, Edinburgh, 1899, p. 67). Looking back from his then standpoint, the historian could not adequately account for the actually existing and widespread Church, save through some Divine enthusiasm kindled in men's hearts by God indwelling and working in them with power and love. What could symbolize that 'Breath of God' more fittingly than the wind? What could more appropriately suggest the penetrative purifying power and grace than tongues 'like as of fire' (ὡσεὶ πυρὸς)? The miracle of Pentecost was that the little community should be transformed by the endowment of energy, illumination, and power, which is simply spoken of in the words: 'And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit.' That was a work of grace which was repeatedly experienced in the Apostolic Church (Ac 4³¹), and has been witnessed since again and again. It is the mysterious outburst of a Power which never wholly leaves the world, however lifeless it may at times appear. As A. B. Bruce remarks, the Christian 'believes in the Holy Ghost, and in His incessant struggle for the birth of a better world. He sees in the great crises of history His action as a mighty wind; in quiet times he traces His blessed presence and influence as a still, noiseless, yet vital air, the breath of human souls' (Apologetics, Edinburgh, 1892, p. 69).

7. Pentecost as a Christian festival.—There is no sign whatever in the NT that the Church observed this season as a festival, or, as in the case of Passover, superimposed Christian associations on an ancient Hebrew feast. Epiphanius (4th cent.) interprets Ac 20¹⁶ as showing that St. Paul observed the feast, and either deliberately or loosely read into the text the verb ποιῆση ('Ἐσπεύδεν, ὅπως ποιῆση τὴν Πεντηκοστὴν εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, quoted in J. Bingham, Antiquities, XX. vi. 6). (Truly it is a substantially different thing to hasten to Jerusalem to keep Pentecost from hurrying to be at Jerusalem at Pentecost.) St. Paul had little enough to do with keeping festivals. Pentecost here appears as a mere note of time. Bengel's note ad loc. is to the point: 'in festo, magni conventus: magna lucificandi occasio.'

The 2nd cent. passes (a period fraught with all sorts of problems for the Church historians), and in Tertullian we find Pentecost definitely referred to as a Christian feast, familiar and established (de Idol. 14): 'Non Dominicum diem, non Pentecosten, etiam si nossent, nobiscum communicassent; timerent enim ne Christiani viderentur.' A few sentences later he speaks again of Pentecost not as one day but as a period—'excerpe singulas solennitates nationum, et in ordinem exere Pentecosten implere non poterunt' (cf. also de Corona, 3). And from the time when the scheme of distinctive Christian festivals came to be developed it would appear that the whole fifty days elapsing between Easter and Pentecost were called by the latter name (Lat. Quinquagesima) and were regarded as a time of joy and happy commemoration (see R. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity, IV. xiii. 7—'which fifty days were called Pentecost, though most commonly the last day of them which is Whitsunday be so called').

So anciently among the Jews the 'days of the Omer,' as the period between Passover and Weeks was called, being a time of harvest operations, was a time of joy. It is food for thought, indeed, that the principal feasts of the Christian Church should be moulded on a system so parallel with that of the Jews. How strange, if indeed we have here a primitive reference to nature and the great yearly crises of springtime and harvest, in such climatic conditions as those of Palestine, that these should gather new associations sacred for the Jew, and again in turn gather very different associations rendering them sacred in Christian eyes!

Ultimately Pentecost was limited to the fiftieth day from Easter Day, though, still later, festivities tended to prolong themselves over the week following; hence 'Whitsuntide,' suggesting an extended festivity rather than one day. As connected especially with that effusion of the Holy Spirit which marked the beginnings of the Church's history, the festival was pre-eminently from the first a favourite time for baptisms (Tertullian, de Bapt. 19).

As in Passover, the Christian Church for the most part took over the name of the festival from the Jews. It was Pentecost for both. But just as Easter replaced Pascha in English and kindred languages, so Whitsunday replaced Pentecost in England through Norse influence. Before the Norman Conquest the season was always known in England as 'Pentecoste.' The meaning of Whitsunday has been the subject of much controversy, but has been generally explained by a reference to the white garments of the newly-baptized. W. W. Skeat gives it decidedly as White Sunday, with this explanation (see An Etymological Dictionary of the English Language, Oxford, 1910, s.v.).

LITERATURE.—Besides the works quoted in the course of the article there may be mentioned G. T. Purves, art. 'Pentecost' in HDB; I. Benzinger, art. 'Pentecost' in EBi; art. 'Festivals and Fasts (Christian), [Hebrew], [Jewish], in ERE; O. Zockler, art. 'Pfingsten' in PRE3; J. L. Magnus, art. 'Pentecost' in JE; A. Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services as they were at the Time of Jesus Christ, London, n.d.; E. von Dobschütz, Ostern und Pfingsten, Leipzig, 1903; M. Friedländer, The Jewish Religion, London, 1891.

J. S. CLEMENS.

PEOPLE (λαός and ὁ λαός).—λαός (without art.) designates 'Israel' in Jude⁶ (cf. Sir 46⁷, Wis 13¹⁸), 'Gentile believers' in St. James's speech at the Council (Ac 15¹⁴); the fact that St. Luke himself does not use λαός of Christians is justly regarded as a proof of the early date of Acts (Harnack, Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., London, 1909, p. 51). λαοὶ Ἰσραὴλ in the prayer of the Church (Ac 4²⁷) is an interesting addition to those 'gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ' (Ps 2²). In Ro 9^{25, 26} St. Paul applies the promises of Israel's restoration in Hos 11^{10, 23} to the calling of the Gentiles ('God, in reversing His sentence on Israel, embraces in the arms of His mercy all who were not His people, and says of them all, that they should be My people and beloved' [E. B. Pusey, Minor Prophets, London, 1886, p. 22]; cf. Ro 11^{25, 26, 32}). In 1 P 2¹⁰ Hosea's prophecy is applied to the Gentile Christians of Asia Minor: they, before receiving the gospel, belonged to the most diverse races, and were not a people at all; now they are become 'a people of God,' even a λαός εἰς περιποίησιν (v.⁹; cf. Is 43²¹, Mal 3¹⁷ LXX). In Tit 2¹⁴, Christians are called a λαός περιούσιος—the LXX rendering of אֱלֹהִים in Ex 19⁵, Dt 7⁸ (see S. R. Driver's notes, Cambridge Bible for Schools, 'Exod.', Cambridge, 1911, p. 171, ICC, 'Deut.', Edinburgh, 1896, p. 100). The occurrence of λαός (without art.) in Lk 11⁷, Ac 18¹⁰ also deserves attention. ὁ λαός is the usual designation for the Jewish people in the religious or political sense (Mt 2^{4, 23}, Jn 11⁵⁰ 18¹⁴, Ac 3²³ 21²⁸ 26^{17, 23}, He 7¹¹, 2 P 2¹). In Mt 12¹ (τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ=τὸν Ἰσραὴλ in Ps 129⁸ LXX) the apologetic purpose of this Gospel reveals itself as in 1—'Jesus the Messiah, who fulfils the promises to the house of David and the seed of Abraham.' ο λαὸς αὐτοῦ also designates Israel in Lk 1⁶⁸ 7¹⁶, Ro 11¹ 15¹⁰, St. Paul having in mind in Ro 11¹ a phrase that appears in 1 S 12²², Ps 93¹⁴ 94⁴ LXX. Israel's title, ὁ λαός τοῦ θεοῦ, is extended in He 4⁹ 11²⁵ to the NT Church: 'it was a point with the Author to identify Christian Hebrews with "the people of God"' (A. B. Davidson, Epistle to the Hebrews, Edinburgh, n.d., p. 95).*

In the foregoing survey we see the designation passing over from the OT to the NT Church. The process was gradual. The idea would not occur to the members of the Christian community at Jerusalem, who continued to attend the Temple and the synagogues, that their kinsmen according to the flesh had lost their right to be called the λαός θεοῦ. On the contrary, they were willing to admit that the people and their rulers had acted κατὰ ἀγνοίαν in putting Jesus to death, and they looked for their repentance and conversion, which should bring in the promised καιροὶ ἀναψύξεως and χρόνοι ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων at the speedy return of their Lord (Ac 3¹⁷⁻²⁰). But as time went on, and Jewish hardness and unbelief remained unchanged, they must have recalled such sayings of Jesus as those about the vineyard of the wicked husbandmen being given to others, and the supper that should not be tasted by the first-bidden guests (Mk 12⁹, Lk 14²⁴). It is remarkable that while Jesus Himself occasionally referred to the Jews as ὁ λαός οὗτος, He never once spoke of them as the λαός θεοῦ (cf. DCG ii. 334). Jn 8³⁹ reports His having denied that His opponents were true 'children of Abraham,' which reminds us of St. Paul's demonstration in Ro 3-4, Gal 3-4 that they who have the right to call Abraham their father are those only who believe God's promise of salvation as he did (cf. Ro 9⁷). Another correspondence between this Gospel and St. Paul appears in our Lord's greeting Nathanael as ἀληθῶς Ἰσραηλῆτης (Jn 1⁴⁷), and the Apostle's distinguishing an Israel κατὰ σάρκα (1 Co 10¹⁸) from an Israel τοῦ θεοῦ (Gal 6¹⁶); which may refer to the Jewish believers of St. Paul's circle, but more probably designates all Christians). In discriminating between circumcision as an external rite and the circumcision of the heart (Ro 2²⁹; cf. Ph 3³) St. Paul follows the OT (e.g. Dt 10¹⁶, Jer 9²⁵). It is true that in Ro 11¹⁷ the Jews still remain the λαός, and the Gentiles are 'ingrafted' into the people to whom the promises belong, as the wild olive branch into the good olive tree—a comparison which Harnack thinks 'must have been very unpleasant to Gentile Christians' (Date of Acts, p. 48, note 2). But in 1 Co 12¹³ (cf. Gal 3²⁸, Ro 10¹) Jews and Gentiles are 'one body,' having received the same Spirit; and this fundamental idea is fully developed in St. Paul's later Epistles (Col 3¹¹, Eph 2¹⁴ 3⁶, Ph 3³).† St. Peter, without explicitly designating his readers ὁ λαός, applies to them all Israel's characteristics (1 P 2^{5, 9}), and says that it has now devolved upon them to rise to the high ideal set forth in the Law (1¹⁶); with this we may compare St. Paul's warning to the Jewish and other Christians of Corinth (1 Co 10¹⁴) not to dally with idolatry, lest they should 'perish in the way' as their fathers did before reaching the promised land, notwithstanding their having had means of grace which corresponded with the two sacraments instituted by Christ.

Although we Gentile Christians are fully warranted in believing that the title of 'the people of God' is included in the 'all things' that are 'ours' (1 Co 3²¹), yet we are forbidden by St. Paul's words in Ro 11^{1, 2} 'to limit God's "people whom he fore-knew" to a spiritual Israel, foreknown and predestined to be saved through their reception of the gospel' (E. H. Gifford, Speaker's Commentary, 'Romans,' London, 1881, p. 191). We believe that God accepts the הִנֵּנִי 'Here am I' of those who are called to rule over Jewish congregations (see 'New Chief Rabbi's Message,' Scotsman, Feb. 21, 1913).

* In Acts δῆμος denotes 'the people of a heathen city and more particularly when gathered together in the popular assembly (e.g. at Caesarea, Ac 12²²; at Thessalonica, Ac 17⁵; at Ephesus, Ac 19^{30, 33})' (J. B. Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision of the English NT, London, 1871, p. 80).

† Cf. P. Gardner, The Ephesian Gospel, London, 1915, p. 36.

LITERATURE.—Much valuable information may be found in the works of Zahn and Harnack, both of whom have given special attention to the subject of this article. See T. Zahn, Introduction to the NT, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1909, i. 81, note 9, ii. 142 f., 253 f., 545; A. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr., do., 1904-05, i. 60, 67, note 1, 80, note 2, 300, 315, 343 f., The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels, Eng. tr., London and N.Y., 1911, pp. 42, 45, 48, 56, 58, 63, 112. Of great interest is the statement of Harnack (Expansion, p. 344 ff.) that the designation of Christians as 'the third race' was 'perfectly common on the lips of the heathen in Carthage about the year A.D. 200.' He quotes Tertullian (ad Nat. i. 8), who says, 'Plane, tertium genus dicimur.' The Greeks, Romans, and all other nations were 'the first race,' the Jews 'the second,' the Christians (with their spiritual God, their lack of images and sacrifices, and their contempt for the heathen deities) 'the third' (cf. p. 352). JAMES DONALD.

PERDITION.—The word ἀπώλεια is rendered both 'destruction' and 'perdition' in the NT (AV and RV). It is not always easy to say with positiveness which translation is preferable. Jesus came 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (τὸ ἀπολωλός, Lk 19¹⁰), those who were still alive, not destroyed. Judas is called ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπώλειας (Jn 17¹²), 'son of perdition,' and the same phrase is used of ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀνομίας, 'the man of sin,' in 2 Th 2³, which is variously interpreted of the Roman Emperor, the Roman Empire, or a false Messiah (cf. Rev 13). The notion here is not the ruin wrought by 'the son of perdition' so much as that coming to him. In Ph 3¹⁹ the RV translates ὡς τὸ τέλος ἀπώλεια, 'whose end is perdition,' not 'destruction' as the AV, because τέλος is a future and final punishment. And yet in 2 P 3⁷ the RV has displaced 'perdition' of the AV by 'destruction.' So the RV has 'destruction' in the other passages in 2 Pet. (2^{1bis} 3¹⁶). In 1 Ti 6⁹ εἰς δαίμονα καὶ ἀπώλεια the RV distinguishes between the two and gives 'destruction and perdition,' but no consistent principle of distinction exists in the translation of ἀπώλεια in the NT. The advocates of annihilation and conditional immortality appeal to the etymology of the word ἀπώλεια. The advocates of probation after death likewise argue that there is nothing in ἀπώλεια to mean interminable punishment. The contrast, however, is sharply drawn in Ph 1²³ and He 10³⁹ between those who are saved and those who fall into perdition; cf. also Rev 17^{8, 11}, where it describes the state of eternal misery, the lot of those excluded from the Kingdom of God. The word is common in the LXX and appears in Aristotle, Nic. Eth. iv. i. 5, Polybius, vi. lix. 5, etc. Even when translated 'destruction' in the RV the word may still have the notion of eternal misery and not mere annihilation (see DESTRUCTION). But it must be admitted that the term ἀπώλεια does not decide the question whether 'perdition' is interminable or limited (see FIRE, vol. i. p. 409 f.). We may well leave the problem of a second probation to God, after remarking that it has very slender support in the NT outside of the possible interpretation of 1 P 3¹⁹. The Christian preacher is on safe ground when he warns the sinner not to risk the vague chance of that alternative. The problem of eternal life or death is settled by the issues of this life. See, further, DESTRUCTION, ESCHATOLOGY, and FIRE. A. T. ROBERTSON.

PERFECT, PERFECTION.—In the apostolic writings 'perfect' is the EV rendering of three different Greek words, namely, ἀκριβής, ἄριστος, and τέλειος (the only exception is Rev 3² [AV], where the RV rightly renders πληρώω: 'I have found no works of thine fulfilled before my God').

1. 1 Th 5² is the only passage in which the RV retains 'perfectly' as the rendering of ἀκριβώς. When St. Paul says 'ye know perfectly' he uses an oxymoron, for he is insisting on the accuracy of the information given to the Thessalonian Church as regards the uncertainty of the day and the hour of Christ's coming. The true meaning of ἀκριβής and cognate words is well brought out in the RV by such translations as 'accurate,' 'careful,' and 'exact' (cf. Mt 2²², Lk 1², Ac 18²⁵, 23¹⁵, 29²⁴, 26⁵, Eph 5¹⁵).

2. In 2 Ti 3¹ the RV substitutes 'complete' for the AV 'perfect' as the rendering of ἄριστος. The repetition of the same word brings out the connexion between ἄριστος and ἐξηρτισμένος: 'that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work.' In early Christian writings ἄριστος is found opposed to 'lame' and to 'mutilated'; it is explained by Calvin 'in quo nihil est mutilum.' When perfection, in this sense, is predicated of the natural man, it is implied that no essential element of human nature is lacking. Similarly, St. Paul's ideal of the man of God includes his possession of every gift of grace necessary for the discharge of the duties of the Christian calling. 'If we ask ourselves under what special aspects completeness is contemplated in ἄριστος, it would be safe to answer that it is not as the presence only of all the parts which are necessary for that completeness, but involves further the adaptation and aptitude of these parts for the ends which they were designed to serve' (R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, London, 1890, p. 78). From the same root (ἀριστος) is derived, with a strengthening prefix, the causative verb καταρτίζειν, which in the RV is rendered (a) 'restore' in Gal 6¹, 1 P 5¹⁰ RVm; (b) 'make perfect' in 1 Th 3¹⁰, He 13²¹; (c) 'perfect' in 1 Co 1¹⁰, 2 Co 13¹¹, 1 P 5¹⁰. The cognate nouns are translated 'perfecting' in 2 Co 13⁹, Eph 4¹².

(a) When there has been deterioration or fracture, wear or tear, the idea of 'perfecting' includes that of repairing. Hence in Mt 4²¹ καταρτίζειν is used of mending nets, and in Gal 6¹ it has the ethical significance of restoration to the right way. It denotes 're-adjustment,' and 'indicates the correction of an offender with a view to his restoration' (F. Rendall, in EGT, 'Galatians,' London, 1903, p. 183 f.). The word has probably the same significance in 1 Co 1¹⁰. St. Paul deplores the existence of splits or schisms in the Church at Corinth; he therefore desires that its members may be 'well and surely adjusted' (coagmentati, Bengel); cf. G. G. Findlay (in EGT, '1 Corinthians,' London, 1900, p. 763), who quotes, with approval, Alford's note: 'the exact word for the healing or repairing of the breaches caused by the σχίσματα.' According to this interpretation, the Apostle is anxious for the restoration of the Church to complete harmony. T. C. Edwards (1 Corinthians, London, 1885, p. 17) blends this meaning with that of the perfecting of individual Christians: 'Their dissensions were beginning to tell injuriously on their spiritual condition. There were not only σχίσματα in the Church, but personal ὑστερήματα. "Let them, therefore, be fully equipped in grace, that so they may be reconciled to one another."' But even if the two meanings are not mutually exclusive, the primary appeal is for reconciliation, in order that the personal perfecting in grace of the members of the Church may not be hindered.

(b) and (c). The idea of 'completeness,' understood as implying the complete equipment of the individual believer and the harmonious co-operation of the members of the community, is dominant in the passages enumerated above. For the Thessalonians' 'faith to God-ward' (1 Th 1st) St. Paul gives thanks, yet he is solicitous for the perfecting of that which is lacking in their faith (3¹⁰). In the same spirit the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews prays (13²¹): 'Now the God of peace . . . make you perfect in every good thing to do his will.' Westcott's note (Hebrews, London, 1889, p. 449) on this verse applies to all the NT passages in which this aspect of perfection is described: 'The word . . . includes the thoughts of the harmonious combination of different powers and of the supply of that which is defective.'

3. In the NT 'perfect' is most frequently the rendering of τέλειος. Much misunderstanding would be prevented if due weight were always given to the root-meaning of this Greek adjective. It is derived from the substantive τέλος, which 'does not, as is commonly supposed, primarily denote the end, termination, with reference to time, but the goal reached, the completion or conclusion at which anything arrives, either as issue or ending, and thus including the termination of what went before; or as result, acme, consummation. . . . "It never" (according to Passow) "denotes merely an end as to time, a termination in and for itself; for this, τελευτή is always used"' (H. Cremer, Bibl.-Thcol. Lex. of NT Greek, Edinburgh, 1880, p. 541).

In three important passages the RV renders τέλειος 'full-grown,' twice in the text (Eph 4¹³, He 5¹⁴), and once in the margin (1 Co 2⁹). Mature Christians are contrasted with babes in Christ, as in 1 Co 14²⁰, where, however, τέλειοι is translated 'men': 'howbeit in malice be ye babes, but in mind be men.' The significance of this antithesis is clearly stated by Westcott in his note on He 5¹⁴: 'A man is said to be τέλειος who has reached the full maturity of his powers, the full possession of his rights, his τέλος, his "end." This maturity, completeness, perfection, may be regarded generally or in some particular aspect. As compared with the child, the full-grown man is τέλειος physically, intellectually, socially (cf. 1 Co 13¹⁰, Gal 4³); as compared with the fresh uninstructed convert, the disciplined and experienced Christian is τέλειος (1 Co 2⁶ 14²⁰, Eph 4¹³, Ph 3¹⁵, Col 1²⁸ 4¹², Ja 1⁴).'

The maturity of the Christian character is evidenced by the complete and harmonious development of moral virtues and spiritual graces; each must have its full fruition. The faith of Abraham attained its end in his actions, which were at once the proof of its energy and the means of its perfecting (Ja 2²²). In order that faith may abide the test, the Christian has need of patience; so long as he fails in endurance he lacks what is essential to his perfecting (Ja 1³). Moreover, as often as he stumbles in word he makes it manifest that he has not yet reached the goal; self-control is a sign of maturity and of the putting away of childish things (Ja 3²). In He 6¹ (cf. 5¹⁴) the forward movement towards perfection is conceived as advance in the knowledge of Christ.

Much more than the maturity of a single grace is implied in St. John's teaching concerning the perfecting of love. Perfect love is the best definition of Christian perfection; and how love is perfected is plainly taught in the First Epistle of St. John (2⁵ 4¹² 17. 18). 'In the phraseology of this Epistle, "perfected" love signifies, not love in a superlative degree, but love that is consummated in action. Bearing fruit in actual obedience, Love has been perfected: it has fulfilled its mission, has reached its goal. . . . The conception common to "keeping His word" and "loving one another" is the embodiment of Love in actual conduct. . . . The idea is that, not of qualitative, but of effective perfection; and τετελείωται might be translated more unambiguously by "fulfilled" or "accomplished" than by "perfected." That is τετελείωμενον which has reached its τέλος, has achieved its end, has run its full course. And the end of God's Love to us is attained in our loving one another' (R. Law, The Tests of Life, Edinburgh, 1909, pp. 212 f., 286 f.).

In Ph 3¹⁵ St. Paul includes himself among the τέλειοι: 'Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded'; but in v. 12 he says: 'not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect' (τετελείωμαι). It is improbable that τέλειοι is a reminiscence of the technical term used in the mysteries to denote the initiated (cf. H. A. A. Kennedy in EGT, 'Philippians,' London, 1903, p. 457). The difference between the two words, notwithstanding their derivation from the same root, must be taken into account. 'In v. 12 the Apostle is speaking of absolute perfection, such as would relieve him of the necessity of further striving. In v. 15 he is speaking of relative perfection' (M. R. Vincent, ICC, 'Philippians and Philemon,' Edinburgh, 1897, p. 112). Here, as elsewhere, the apostolic teaching in regard to Christian perfection unfolds the implications of our Lord's great saying: 'Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). The context shows that the perfection which Christ exhorts His disciples to strive after is not the absolute perfection of God, but the perfected sonship which manifests itself in love for enemies and prayer for persecutors, and generally in such actions as are becoming in those who are sons of the Father in heaven, who 'maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust' (Mt 5⁴⁵).

The high tone of the apostolic teaching is sustained by Clement of Rome, who says (Ep. ad Cor. 49 f.): 'In love were all the elect of God made perfect. . . . How great and marvellous a thing is love, and there is no declaring its perfection. . . . They that by God's grace were perfected in love dwell in the abode of the pious.'

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works referred to in the art. see W. B. Pope, *A Compendium of Christian Theology*², iii. [London, 1880] 56 ff.; O. A. Curtis, The Christian Faith, do., 1905, p. 373 ff.; W. A. Brown, Christian Theology in Outline, Edinburgh, 1907, p. 411 ff.; L. Lemme, 'Vollkommenheit' in PRE³ xx. [Leipzig, 1908] 733 ff.; J. A. Beet, 'Christian Perfection,' in Exp. 5th ser., v. [1897] 30 ff., 134 ff., 211 ff.

J. G. TASKER.

PERGA (Πέργα).—Perga was an ancient important city of Pamphylia, on the plateau between the rivers Catarrhactes and Cestrus. Reckoned by Ptolemy among the inland cities of the country (Παμφυλία μεσόγειοι [v. 7]), it had a river-harbour 5 miles eastward on the navigable Cestrus, about 8 miles from the sea (Strabo, XIV. iv. 2). It differed essentially from its rival Attalia, 12 miles to the S.W., in being a centre not of Hellenic culture, but of native Anatolian feeling. It was celebrated for the worship of the Queen of Perga, who came to be identified with the Greek Artemis, but who was really, like the Artemis of the Ephesians, a nature-goddess. On coins she is figured sometimes as a fair Diana of the chase, sometimes as a rude cultus-image. Her temple, the Artemisium, stood on the Acropolis, overlooking the city and expressing its faith. Perga was occupied by Alexander on his march eastward. A much-frequented northward route led over the Taurus into Phrygia and the Menander Valley.

Paul and Barnabas were twice at Perga in their first missionary tour. In their outward journey they landed at the river-harbour and went up to the city (Ac 13¹³). Ramsay thinks that they intended to begin a missionary campaign there, but altered their plans on account of a serious illness—perhaps malarial fever—which compelled St. Paul to leave the enervating atmosphere of Pamphylia and seek health in the Phrygian uplands (St. Paul, p. 89 ff.). Conybeare and Howson suggest that, in any case, 'if St. Paul was at Perga in May, he would find the inhabitants deserting its hot and silent streets,' moving to their summer quarters 'in the direction of his own intended journey. He would be under no temptation to stay' (St. Paul, i. 199 f.). Before the apostles left Perga, a painful incident occurred. 'John departed from them and returned to Jerusalem' (13¹³), either because he was displeased (as Ramsay surmises) at the sudden change in the plan of campaign, or simply because the snows of Taurus sent a chill to his heart and made him long for his Judæan home. At any rate 'he withdrew from them from Pamphylia,' without good cause, St. Paul then and afterwards maintained, 'and went not with them to the work' (15³⁸; see MARK [JOHN]). On the return journey Paul and Barnabas attempted some missionary work in Perga (14²⁵), but apparently it was brief and without marked results. Long the 'metropolis' of Western Pamphylia, Perga was overshadowed in the Byzantine period by Attalia. Under the name of Murtana it has extensive ruins, but the site of the ancient temple has not yet been discovered.

LITERATURE.—Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, i. 193 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 89 ff.; Hist. Geography of Asia Minor, 1890, p. 415 f.; C. Lanckoronski, Villes de la Pamphylie et de la Pisidie, i. [1890]; Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, 1895. JAMES STRAHAN.

PERGAMUS, PERGAMUM (ἡ Πέργαμος or τὸ Πέργαμον; Rev 1¹¹ and 2¹² leave the gender uncertain; Dio Cassius, Pausanias, and Ptolemy have the fem. form, most authors and inscriptions the neut.; the AV chose the former, the RV the latter).—Pergamus was for over a century (241–133 B.C.) a royal city, and for two more centuries the official capital of a great and wealthy Roman province. Built on a huge conical hill, which dominated the broad and fertile valley of the river Caicus and afforded an extensive view of the Ægean Sea (15 miles distant), it was an ideal citadel in days of ancient Mysian warfare. Its historical importance began when the adventurer Phileterus, the agent of Lysimachus, made it the capital of an independent State (283 B.C.), which was raised into a kingdom by Attalus I., the conqueror of the Asiatic Gauls (241–197). For assisting the Romans in their struggle with Antiochus the Great, Attalus' son Eumenes II. was rewarded with the magnificent gift of all the Seleucid dominions north of the Taurus. The Attalids made their capital one of the most beautiful of Greek cities, adorning the Acropolis with stately public buildings, which they filled with treasures of art. The library contained 200,000 volumes, and 'parchment' is derived from Pergamus. When Attalus III. (138–133 B.C.) bequeathed his realm to the Romans, the greater part of it was formed into the province of Asia, of which Pergamus was the capital. The city could never be a centre of international commerce like Ephesus or Smyrna, for it was traversed only by inland byways of traffic, but its brilliant history gave it an indisputable claim to the primacy among Asian cities, and it was not till the time of Hadrian (A.D. 117–138) that Ephesus became officially what it had long been in reality—the administrative centre of the province.

It was probably towards the end of the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81–96) that Pergamus was described as the place 'where Satan's throne is,' 'where Satan dwelleth' (Rev 2¹³). The words express a prophetic horror of some malignant enemy of Christ and His Church. Who is thus regarded as sitting in visible might and majesty on Satan's throne, by merit raised to that bad eminence? Christianity in Pergamus was confronted by three distinct types of pagan religion—the popular Asiatic, the cultured Greek, and the official Roman. The first was the worship of Dionysus and Asclepius, which may be traced back to the primitive Anatolian cult of the bull and the serpent. Asclepius 'the Saviour' had a great vogue at Pergamus under the Empire; his priests were supposed to be in possession of precious medical secrets, and his temple and curative establishment were thronged with invalids who came from far and near with expectations of miraculous healing. His symbol, the serpent, which may be seen beautifully engraved on many Pergamenian coins, was naturally a repulsive object to Jews and Christians, who associated it with the legend of Eden, and some interpreters have imagined that his temple outside the city was viewed by St. John as Satan's throne. But the sight of a multitude of sick folk—reproducing Bethesda and anticipating Lourdes—was more likely to excite feelings of pity than of wrath. The second type was the Hellenic worship of Zeus and Athene, assiduously fostered by all the Pergamenian kings, who wished to have their kingdom regarded as the bulwark of civilization against the hordes of barbarians. On a broad ledge of the city-hill, 800 ft. above the plain, in front of the temple of Athene, stood the great altar of Zeus, 40 ft. high, on a base adorned with reliefs of the gods in conflict with the giants; and some have supposed that as the Christians gazed at the smoke of sacrifice ascending from this altar, they exclaimed in horror, 'This is Satan's seat.' But the worship of the Olympic gods had, for all intelligent minds, long been a bankrupt concern, on which the prophet would not waste his invective. At any rate, neither of these types of paganism would arouse his σέρα indignatio like the third. This was the worship of Rome and the Emperor, of which Pergamus, as the capital of the province, was the recognized centre. As early as 29 B.C. (Tac. Ann. iv. 37), Pergamus possessed a temple dedicated to Divus Augustus by the Provincial Synod known as the Commune of Asia (κοινὸν Ἀσίας). The city thus became the first Neokoros or Temple-Warden of the Emperor in the province. It was not till A.D. 26 (Ann. iv. 56) that Smyrna also gained the coveted honour of the Neokorate. In the reign of Trajan Pergamus became 'twice Neokoros,' and Caracalla (A.D. 193–217) made her 'thrice Neokoros,' which meant that she had now three temples consecrated to the worship of the Emperor, each with its numerous priesthood and pompous ritual. Now this cultus, which was the proud distinction of the city, became, by a refinement of ingenuity which might well be characterized as Satanic, an insidious temptation and a cruel dilemma to the Church. Emperor-worship, so hateful to every monotheist, was in the time of Domitian made a test of loyalty to the State. The refusal to utter the formula κύριος καὶ σάβας, or to offer a pinch of incense to the Emperor's image, rendered the most peaceful and law-abiding citizen liable to be regarded as a traitor or rebel worthy of death. But to the Christian, the apotheosis and worship of Cæsar meant disloyalty to Christ and forfeiture of His eternal Kingdom. The issue was too clear to be evaded, and the Christians of Pergamus came through the ordeal in triumph. Antipas, Christ's faithful 'witness' (Rev 2¹³)—already the word μάρτυς begins to have the deeper tragic meaning—is probably named not as the only victim (as A. C. McGiffert suggests [Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 635]), but rather as the first of many brave confessors, both in the city and in other parts of the province, who proved the strength and genuineness of their faith by preferring death to dishonour.

There were, however, so-called Christians in Pergamus, as in Ephesus, who thought that a reasonable compromise might be effected. Their line of argument, though nowhere clearly stated, is not difficult to imagine. Nobody needed to take the idea of a divine Emperor too seriously. 'For myself,' said Tiberius, when it was proposed to erect a temple to him and his mother, 'I solemnly assure you that I am a mortal man, and that I am confined to the functions of human nature, and I would have posterity remember it' (Tac. Ann. iv. 38). May not loyal citizens, then, feel themselves absolved—even in the reign of Domitian, who takes his deity very seriously—from too great literalism in the interpretation of Cæsar-worship? It is a political far more than a religious affair, being indeed a mere glorification of Imperialism. One may offer the grain of incense, or utter the prescribed 'Cæsar is Lord,' with a degree of mental reserve; and if the Church, avoiding a stiff nonconformity, will liberalize herself so far as to demonstrate her loyalty, she will advance under the protection, instead of being thwarted by the hostility, of the powers that be, which are ordained of God.

But to the prophet of the Revelation—a passionate hater (2^o) as well as lover—this doctrine is detestable, and against its time-serving exponents he declares open war (v. 16). He calls them Nicolaitans, i.e. Balaamites (νικο-λαος being the rough Greek equivalent to the Heb. נִזְלִיט), for their compromise is a new and more subtly dangerous form of the notorious teaching and practice of Balaam. If the Church comes to terms with idolatry, if she yields to demands of a blasphemous Cæsarism, she will be unfaithful to her Lord, dishonoured and defiled. In the Imperial temple of Pergamus no Christian must ever bow down and worship. Conformity is here deadly sin. The Imperial power, as wielded by Domitian and inextricably bound up with his worship, is so far from being 'ordained by God' (a phrase used by St. Paul a generation before [Ro 13¹]), that it is without hesitation denounced as Satanic, and thereafter branded, all through the Revelation, as the power of the Beast. The Church of Pergamus must learn to say with her Lord, 'Get thee behind me, Satan!' Let her realize that the weapons of His warfare are other and mightier than those of Cæsar. With the sword (πομφάλα) of His mouth He comes to make war not only against persecuting foes without but against treacherous friends within His Church (v. 16). Pergamus must, at all costs, hold fast His name, and not deny His faith. Only thus can she keep her soul alive.

The site of the ancient city has been thoroughly excavated, and the sculptures found, especially the reliefs in the frieze or the Gigantomachia (now in the Berlin Museum), are among the treasures of Hellenistic art. The other remains—palaces, temples, theatres, thermæ, etc.—all tell of a vanished gloria mundi. The modern Bergama has little interest.

LITERATURE.—Strabo, XIII. iv. 1-3; M. Fränkel, Die Inschriften von Pergamon (Alterthümer von Pergamon, viii.), 1890; W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, 1904; Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, 1895.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PERSECUTION.—1. Introduction.—'For so persecuted they the prophets which were before you' (Mt 5¹²). 'If they persecuted me, they will also persecute you' (Jn 15²⁰). Jesus Christ traced the red trail of the martyr's blood throughout the history of Israel, which He sums up in the words—'from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zachariah' (Gn 4⁸, 2 Ch 24^{20, 21}, Lk 11⁵¹). He Himself was in the succession of martyrs, for the trail is deeply marked in connexion with His life. But the trail does not cease at the tragedy of the Cross. It is obvious that our Lord often warned His disciples in regard to the attitude of Jerusalem and Rome to those who would remain faithful to Him and His teaching. He could see the blood-stained track in connexion with the history of the Church. We must consider our subject in the light of this three-fold reference, so that we may see to what degree, and in what sense, the term 'persecution' is applicable to the attitude of the nation through its rulers (1) to her religious teachers, (2) to Christ, and (3) to His followers. When we deal with Jesus Christ and His followers we shall find Jerusalem allying herself with Rome in her effort to crush the New Teacher and His teaching, and finally Rome taking matters into her own hands, and devoting her whole energy to the extermination of what one of her historians described as a pestilent superstition.*

If we define 'persecution' provisionally as the infliction of suffering, whether it be temporary discomfort or death, upon individuals for holding or advocating religious views, and adopting or propagating religious practices, which are obnoxious to the community, or to those in authority, we shall have a definition sufficiently broad and comprehensive to cover the cases in connexion with which the term has been used. It may not be necessary for the persecuted persons to be active in the propagation of their tenets, although the strong conviction, which has generally inspired men to endure persecution rather than abandon their views, produces the missionary spirit. Those who inflict punishment on religious offenders may not admit the charge of persecution, as, according to them, the whole life of the individual is subject to the control of the State, and any and every activity comes under the law of the land. In the strict sense of the term, the infliction of suffering on account of religious opinions is persecution, if the adoption of such views on the part of individuals is not incompatible with loyalty to the throne or the secular power, and with the due discharge of their duties as citizens of the realm. From the point of view of the State, such punishment deserves to be described as persecution if the secular authorities admit the contention that there is a sphere within which the secular authority has no jurisdiction, and if nevertheless it punish those who use their freedom within this sphere. But the advocates of punishment in the case of religious recusancy deny the existence of such a sphere in the life of the individual, and therefore they do not plead guilty to the charge of persecution. In short, the whole problem is concerned with the assertion on the part of the individual, and the denial on the part of the State, that there is a sphere within which the subject is free, and must be permitted to follow the promptings of his conscience. When we consider, in its historical aspects, the relationship between the individual and the State, and when we trace the struggle on the part of the former to secure that measure of freedom which individuality presupposes, it becomes clear that there is a region which the individual claims as his own peculiar territory. For the annexation of this territory, and afterwards for the defence of it, Hebrew prophet and Christian martyr have laid down their lives, and the struggle has been continued throughout the centuries in many lands. It is being increasingly recognized that the individual has demonstrated the justice of his claim to the sole possession of this territory. Within this limited sphere he is free. To change the figure, whilst the individual admits the right of the State to enter the Outer Court and even the Holy Place, there is a Holy of Holies which is reserved for himself. There he deals not with the State, or with his fellow-citizens, but with God. As we follow the struggle for religious freedom, whether the struggle be with the secular authority or with a Church which has taken the place of the State, and exercises its functions, it is plain that the conflict is waged around this territory—the freedom of the religious man. Whether they are Hebrew prophets or Christian martyrs—Albigenses, Pilgrim Fathers, or Huguenots—the struggle is at bottom of the same nature, and for the same ideal. It will not be denied that various motives have been operative, both in the case of those who persecute, and of those who submit to persecution; for it is seldom that human motives are unmixed. Nevertheless the passion for religious freedom has been a genuine and powerful factor in all the truculent conflicts between the State or the Church on the one hand, and individuals or communities on the other who have refused to conform. It may be said that no other motive would have been potent enough to create that ‘sheer obstinacy’ of which Marcus Aurelius had occasion to complain in the case of the Christians of his time. But kings have been loath to acknowledge the right of subjects to decide for themselves how they are to worship, or what they are to believe. States have persecuted because they have refused to recognize the existence of a sphere in which men are free, and men have endured persecution because they have grasped, more or less clearly, the truth that freedom belongs to the very essence of the religious attitude, and determines its moral worth. They have endured great affliction, and taken joyfully the spoiling of their possessions, seeing they had themselves for a better possession. This better spiritual possession was conditioned by their retaining their religious freedom (He 10^{32, 34}).

* Tacitus, Ann. xv. 44.

2. Persecution in the OT.—In Mt 5¹—Jesus Christ warns His disciples of the troublous times which await them at the hands of the representatives of Judaism, and reminds them that their experience will be a repetition of the bitter experience of the nation’s religious teachers whom God had raised up from time to time, and whose writings indicate their growing insight into the nature of God and religion. To Jerusalem our Lord gave the hard but not unjust name of ‘prophet-killer’ (Mt 23³⁵, Lk 13³⁴). Stephen re-echoed his Master’s interpretation of the nation’s attitude when he asked ‘which of the prophets did not your fathers persecute?’ (Ac 7⁵). Jesus charged His contemporaries with raising sepulchres to the prophets whom their ancestors had put to death (Lk 11⁴). He did not mean that they erected expiatory monuments to the nation’s martyrs. The sepulchres they built indicated their approval of the misdeeds of their forefathers. In the parable of the Vineyard He gave a similar account of the nation’s attitude to her God-sent teachers (Mk 12³⁴).

But it is obvious that the prophets were not simply men who suffered for their religious opinions. They were aggressive religious and social reformers. In their teaching they came into collision with the existing order of things in social life and religious custom. In the period which succeeded the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan the people adopted the gods and the religious observances of the original inhabitants of the land. The prophets of this early age advocated the sole worship of Jahweh. Moses impressed upon Israel the two-fold truth—Jahweh is Israel’s God, and Israel is Jahweh’s people. The burden of early prophecy was ‘Israel for Jahweh’ and ‘Jahweh for Israel. They were patriots rather than religious teachers. Patriotism and religion were identical. They opposed the popular tendency to worship the gods, and imitate the religion, of Canaan, as it indicated disloyalty to Jahweh. They were not fully aware of any profound difference between Jahweh and other gods, except that Jahweh was the God of Israel, and, as such, interested in the welfare of Israel and entitled to their undivided homage.

When we come to Elijah, we find ourselves on the confines of a new age. Henceforth the prophets denounced the existing order of things—religious and social. They ethicized theology and religion, and in their capacity as religious teachers they became inevitably social reformers, for the whole basis and structure of society were religious. The message they delivered became increasingly unpalatable, especially to those who were responsible for the existing State. The true prophets parted company with the false prophets because they would not ‘fall in’ and preach what was popular. In the time of Elijah the antagonism between the prophet and the throne—or between religious conviction and the secular authority—issues in open conflict. Elijah is more than a passive resister; he carries the conflict into the enemy’s territory, and fights the throne with its own weapons. We have seen that Elijah, like his predecessors, advocated the sole worship of Jahweh. Ahab had married the daughter of the king of Tyre, and proceeded to strengthen the alliance between Israel and Tyre by introducing the worship of Melkarth, the presiding deity of Tyre. The example of the throne was a potent influence in the life of Israel. It was easy to persuade the people that the alliance with Tyre was not complete unless the Tyrian Baal shared with Jahweh the homage of Israel. The people were halting between two opinions. They were not conscious of any inconsistency or duplicity. If gods could help, the more gods they worshipped the better. There was safety in numbers. Elijah stemmed the tide and a strong party refused to follow the example of the throne. The conflict between Elijah and Ahab was not simply whether one god or another should be worshipped—Jahweh of Israel or Melkarth of Tyre. It was a clashing of two incompatible theologies. It is probable that Ahab would have recommended the worship of both deities. The tendency of the age was in the direction of religious syncretism. But from Elijah’s standpoint it was a matter of impossibility to practise this religious dualism. We can trace in Elijah’s attitude the germ of that exclusiveness which is inevitable when the terms ‘right’ and ‘wrong’ or ‘true’ and ‘false’ are introduced into religion. The line of cleavage is sharply drawn in the story of the prophet’s life. Right is exclusive; truth is intolerant. It was absolutely necessary that the stand should be made and the protest raised. To Elijah ‘Baal and Yahweh represented, so to speak, a contrast of principles, of profound and ultimate practical convictions; both could not be right, nor could they exist side by side. For him there existed no plurality of Divine Powers, operating with equal authority in different spheres, but everywhere One Holy and Mighty Being, who revealed Himself, not in the life of nature, but in those laws by which alone human society is held together, in the ethical demands of the spirit’ (J. Wellhausen, *Isr. und jüd. Gesch.*³, Berlin, 1897, p. 74, quoted in Century Bible, ‘1 and 2 Kings,’ Edinburgh, n.d., p. 222). We must not be surprised or disappointed that Elijah believed in the use of force. Centuries must pass before the idea is fully understood that religion is voluntary, and that coercion is alien to its very nature. Elijah delighted in violent measures. He was at home in an environment of earthquake, storm, and fire. He met the king on his own ground, and prosecuted the struggle with his own weapons. Moral suasion would have made no appeal to the mind of the age, and it was only poetic justice that the prophet was able to turn the tables on his adversaries. It is not always easy to decide whether Elijah or Ahab is the persecutor, for both believed in violence as the only means to the end which they had in view. But we find in the story of the life and work of Elijah a religious conviction that is daring enough to stand up to the secular authority and defy its directions. Ahab's policy may seem to suggest breadth of mind, whilst Elijah's attitude betokens theological narrowness; but in this case the narrow way was the way of life, whilst the broad way was also the way of death.

But Elijah came into still closer grips with Ahab. He denounced the throne on moral grounds. He spoke in the name of Jahweh, and therefore in the name of righteousness. The prophet's predecessors identified the cult of Jahweh with patriotism. Elijah identified the worship of Jahweh with social morality. This was the new note which prophecy struck, and it occurs as a refrain in the teaching of all his successors. Elijah had the courage to denounce Ahab for his treatment of Naboth, and the prophet did so, not as a statesman or economist, but as a theologian. The religion of Jahweh issues in social righteousness. Ahab might worship Baal and steal his subject's private property. As a worshipper of Jahweh he could only 'do justly.' Jahweh's will was everlasting right. The problem raised by the king's seizure of Naboth's estate was not social or economical, but religious, for it fell within the scope of the religion of Jahweh. Ahab's conduct was not larceny, but sacrilege. It was not the violation of a social law as such that roused the anger of the prophet, but his defiance of the will of God. For Jahweh requires of His worshippers that they do justly (Mic 6⁸). When the prophet condemned the king's effort to legitimize the worship of the Tyrian Baal, or his unsocial conduct, he spoke in the name of God, and in the interest of religion. He was prepared to employ force himself, as he was ready to endure persecution rather than cease from condemning what he believed to be wrong or false, i.e. contrary to the Divine will, or from advocating what he believed to be right and true. We shall search in vain for a parallel fact in the whole Semitic world. In other lands the prophets were obliging courtiers and fell in with the royal wishes. We should traverse the Semitic world in vain for an attitude like that of Micaiah-ben-Imlah—'what the Lord saith unto me, that will I speak' (1 K 22¹⁴)—when the king had given peremptory orders that he should fall in with his fellow-prophets. The latter received their reward in royal bounties, but Micaiah's message secured for him the bread-and-water diet of the jail (22²⁷).

Elijah was the Wycliffe of Hebrew prophetism; the principles which emerge in connexion with the story of his life were clearly grasped by Amos and his successors, and fearlessly applied to the criticism of the religious and social situation of Israel and Judah. The prophets loved their nation and their country. There never were truer patriots than Hosea and Jeremiah. But they were not patriots of the common type. They would not preach smooth things. That was the privilege of the court-prophets whose message was inspired from the throne. The false prophet was concerned with the question 'What does the king want?' The true prophet was concerned with the question 'What does Jahweh your God require?' The latter was sure of his ground and of the Divine approval as the former was of his reward and of the royal favour. The prophets thus came into collision with current theology, for they declared that Jahweh was not simply the God of Israel, but the God of righteousness, and they came up against popular religion, for they identified religion with the practice of social justice. Their patriotism was sincere and unmistakable, but they placed social righteousness above the mere continuity or safety of the realm or the mere practice of ceremonial religion. Their theology played havoc with the current belief that Jahweh was simply the God of Israel, as well as with the prevalent view that religion was ritual. If Jahweh was a moral governor, and if, further, the national life was totally at variance with the requirements of ethical religion, the expected 'day of Jahweh' would be darkness and not light—disaster, not deliverance (Am 5¹⁸). The power that worked for righteousness in national and international affairs would wreck any society which ignored or violated the fundamental principle of moral government, for the will of Jahweh must prevail. Their theology made the prophets preachers of judgment and destruction. The doom which they announced might be staved off by national repentance and reform, but Jeremiah, who had witnessed a religious reformation carried out by the throne, was forced to the conclusion that repentance of the true kind was beyond the reach of Judah. The nation's illness was incurable (Jer 30¹²⁻¹⁵). It was inevitable that the prophet should come into collision with the State. The prophet would not be cajoled, threatened, or silenced; his consciousness of the urgency of his message was such that silence, or even any modification of the truth as he perceived it, would be moral treachery. The prophet is necessarily insistent, uncompromising, intolerant, exclusive. To him the line of demarcation between the true and false—the right and wrong—is clear, and it must be recognized and enforced. The retort of the nation's official leaders to this fearless exposition of the demands of true religion was persecution.

3. Persecution of the Jews by the Seleucid kings.—It is universally admitted that the Exile introduced a new epoch in the history of the Jew. But it is easy to exaggerate the nature of the cleavage. There are no absolute beginnings in the history of nations. The student has no difficulty in discovering ample evidence of continuity in social organization and religious praxis. Nevertheless the post-Exilic period was a new age in the history of the nation. The religious leaders of the new age believed that the Exile was the judgment announced by their pre-Exilic predecessors. The nation had completed her period of servitude and made ample compensation for all her sins. Her iniquity was pardoned (Is 40²). According to the teaching of the prophets the Israel of God would be a nation which organized its whole life—social and religious—in accordance with the Divine will. Such a people would constitute a kingdom of God. It was the belief of the post-Exilic community that its national life was organized on the lines laid down in the Book of the Law. Judah had become once more the people of Jahweh; in possession of a Bible which embodied the will of God, and controlled her whole life, she stood over against the Gentile world, with its idols and superstitions. God was known and worshipped only in Judah. Pure religion was the sole possession of the Jew.

The rest of the world was without God and without religion, for the gods of the nations were idols, and their religions were superstitions. The post-Exilic Jew was conscious of his superiority among the nations of the Semitic world, and his tendency was to stand aloof in contemptuous isolation. In post-Exilic literature we can trace the universalism of Deutero-Isaiah and the particularism of Ezekiel and Ezra. The Jew owed no less to the universalism of the former than to the particularism of the latter his sense of superiority to the rest of the world. In both Judah occupied a central and unique position. According to Deutero-Isaiah it was the mission of Israel to convert the nations of the world and make the religion of Judah the religion of the nations. According to Ezekiel the Jew would come to his inheritance through the annihilation of the heathen. The one believed in the incorporation, and the other in the destruction, of the nations. The Jew found a solid foundation for his religious exclusivism in Deutero-Isaiah as well as in Ezekiel. To the former Jahweh alone was God, and Israel was His servant and His missionary to the ends of the earth. No God but Jahweh—no religion but the religion of Judah: a people that held that view dwelt alone in the ancient world with its easy-going polytheism and its indolent syncretism.

The result was that every conqueror found in Judah an attitude which he discovered nowhere else throughout the Semitic world, and he could no more understand the significance of it than the Roman Emperor at a later date could understand the attitude of the Christian believer. Other nations were prepared to fall in with the wishes of the conqueror. They were willing conformists, but Judah was an implacable nonconformist. 'You are the only people,' said Agrippa, in his effort to dissuade the Jews from rebelling against Rome, 'who think it a disgrace to be servants of those to whom all the world hath submitted.' Judah would not submit, and the reasons for her recusancy were not so much political as religious. Judah's nationalism was rooted in her religion. The cause of Judah was the cause of Jahweh. The Kingdom of God was identified with the kingdom of Judah. It is interesting to note that the nation's religious teachers in the past arraigned Israel on the ground of her eagerness to imitate neighbouring nations by adopting their gods and religious customs. It was during the exile in Babylon that the Jew thoroughly mastered the prophetic doctrine of the uniqueness of Jahweh and of His religion. Conscious of the nature of the possession which he had in his religion, he cultivated national self-confidence and self-reliance, which ultimately degenerated into national pride and exclusiveness. In exile the Jew learnt how to resist the pressure of a hostile environment, and the lesson stood him in good stead throughout the post-Exilic period, for the position of Judah in the Semitic world was precisely the position of the exiles in Babylon. The Book of Daniel, which purports to describe the situation of the Jew in exile, could not be otherwise than a powerful appeal to Judah in the 2nd cent. B.C. to imitate the heroes of the Exile and remain loyal to her ancestral faith and religion. But a nation like this was a disturbing element and a standing menace to the unity of the Empire to which it belonged. Most nations are conquered when their army is defeated, their territory annexed, and their independence taken from them. Nation after nation in the Semitic world succumbed to the domination of the Macedonian conqueror. But neither Assyria nor Babylon, nor Persia, nor Macedon nor Rome conquered Judah, for a nation is conquered only when her soul is subjugated. Judah retained her unconquerable soul. Antiochus Epiphanes, the most powerful representative of the Seleucid dynasty, made an effort to complete the subjugation of Judah by conquering her soul, but in his campaign he came across a stronghold in the nation's conscience—or her religious self-consciousness—which defied all his assaults. The invader possessed no arms to carry the campaign to a successful issue. Antiochus was an extremely able ruler. It was his programme to unify his Empire by universalizing Hellenism. Greek civilization was to be the tie that would bind together the different parts of his heterogeneous Empire. It was a magnificent scheme, well conceived and vigorously carried out, and the Emperor met with little or no opposition until he reached Judah. He did not persecute on religious grounds. The Emperor had no deep-rooted objection to the religion of Judah—except its exclusiveness. He approached the problem as a ruler, and his policy was the unification of his Empire by exterminating national religions. But Judah's resistance was religious and not political. Mattathias of Modin raised the standard of revolt, and the rising, in its initial stages, was inspired by loyalty to the ancestral religion. It ultimately resolved itself into an attempt to secure the political independence of Judah, for the simple reason that full religious liberty is a precarious possession without political independence. But it was the desecration of the Temple, and the attempt to force loyal Jews to sacrifice to heathen deities that roused the ire of the nation, and moved the Maccabæan family to defend the national religion. It is extremely probable that many Psalms date from this period, and the fierce nature of the struggle carried on by the Maccabees in defence of their 'nation, religion, and laws' is reflected in those passionate hymns which still throb with the intense feeling which the conflict roused in the breasts of the Hasidim, or 'loyalists,' who supported Judas Maccabæus in his campaign.

In regard to persecution on the part of the Church of Rome, Lecky writes: 'If men believe with an intense and realising faith that their own view of a disputed question is true beyond all possibility of mistake . . . these men will, sooner or later, persecute to the full extent of their power.'* This 'intense faith,' which accounts for the will to persecute on the part of the Church, also explains the willingness on the part of religious persons to be persecuted rather than abandon their faith. Antiochus Epiphanes was not actuated by any such intense faith in Greek culture. He was concerned solely with his dream of a homogeneous Empire, but Judaism was inspired by this 'intense faith,' with the result that the Jew, as afterwards the Christian believer, constituted a problem to the rulers of the ancient world. Seleucid rulers found in Judaism, as Roman procurators and proconsuls found in Christianity, an obstinacy which baffled all their efforts to secure universal uniformity. It was not an inheritance in the case of the Christian Church from the Jewish synagogue, but the outcome of the 'intense faith' which inspired Jew and Christian to endure torture, not accepting deliverance (He 11³⁵).

4. Persecution of Jesus by the Jews.—Irenæus called Jesus Christ the 'Master of Martyrdom.' The martyrs followed in His footsteps. In each martyr Origen saw the Lord Himself condemned. The true imitatio Christi was martyrdom. John calls Jesus Christ 'the faithful witness' (Rev 1⁵), and Paul adds that He 'witnessed the good confession' (1 Ti 6¹³). Our Lord warned His disciples that the persecution which He endured would also be their lot (Jn 15¹⁸). It becomes, therefore, necessary to examine the opposition which culminated in the tragedy of the Cross, and the reasons which actuated Jerusalem and Rome in their combined resolve to compass His death. According to the Gospels, Jesus Christ was conscious of a growing premonition as to the issue of the conflict between Himself on the one hand and the Pharisees and Sadducees on the other, the representatives of the democracy and the aristocracy of Judæa. The Pharisees were the nationalist party, and carried on the traditions of the Hasidim, or 'loyalists,' who supported Judas

* Lecky, Rationalism in Europe, vol. ii. p. 1.

Maccabæus in his struggle for religious liberty in the 2nd cent., whilst the Sadducees were the priestly caste, and were willing to put up with Roman domination as long as they were left in undisturbed possession of priestly prerogatives, and especially of the revenues of the Temple. Jesus Christ could not miss their growing hostility to Him and His teaching, and the ominous closing of the ranks on the part of these prominent parties which otherwise had very little in common. The Pharisees were profoundly religious. Their religion consisted in rigid observance of the 'Law,' and of the 'traditions of the fathers.' To the religious zeal of the Puritan they added intense patriotism. But their religion was soulless formalism. They were not lacking in religious self-confidence. The Pharisaic Paul contended that in the light of the Pharisaic ideal he was blameless (Ph 3). They made a fetish of the Law. It had come from God, and contained a complete and final system of religious praxis. They were rigorously and exclusively Jewish in their outlook. There was nothing good outside Judaism. They were immovably opposed to anything and everything foreign. Among them the Messianic hope flourished. From their midst emanated the apocalyptic literature of the nation, with its dream of a glorious triumph for Judah. The dream of a world-wide kingdom troubled the long sleep of Jewish oppression, and occasionally the sleep was disturbed by a violent effort to realize the national ambition and shake off the yoke which weighed like an incubus upon the nation's soul. But the Pharisees did not fall in with the policy of the 'zealots' or 'Canaanæans' or the followers of Judas of Galilee (Ac 5³⁷). They shared the zealots' hatred of everything alien or non-Jewish, but they recognized the futility of rebellion. They were too well aware of the irresistible might of Rome. It was their mission to keep the national life Jewish, and religion 'pure and undefiled,' and God would appear on their behalf in the fullness of time and bring in the 'Messianic age.' It is evident that the Pharisees were keenly interested in Jesus Christ and in the claim which was being made that He was the Messiah. They would welcome any reliable evidence that the Kingdom of Heaven was at hand, and that the hope of the nation was nearing fulfilment. The Pharisees generally mingled with the crowd which followed Jesus, and they were not always present as captious critics. Their astonishment that Jesus ate with 'publicans and sinners' proves that they expected different conduct from one who was going to realize the Messianic ideal, and bring in the Messianic age (Mk 2¹⁵). They were on the same quest when they asked for a sign—some unmistakable evidence that He was the Divinely-appointed Saviour of the nation. Nicodemus was a Pharisee, and displays the Pharisee's interest in Jesus Christ and His claim to be the Messiah (Jn 3). But it was soon obvious to the Pharisees that Jesus could not be the Messiah whom they expected. He displayed no respect for the Pharisaic ideal, in either its political or its religious aspects. He contradicted the Messianic expectation as it was held among the Pharisees—viz. a great national hero who could and would bring in the Messianic age as it was understood by them. He also opposed Pharisaism as a religious system. He undermined their whole philosophy of religion. He was especially severe on their emphasis on trivial rules, and their neglect of the weightier matters of the law (Mt 23²³). It was evident to the Pharisees that, if this teaching prevailed, the national hope was doomed, for the teaching of Jesus implied that the outstanding institutions of Judaism were not essential. They could all be scrapped as obsolete and useless. Towards the end of His life Jesus Christ makes no effort to conceal His contempt for Pharisaism. He condemns the Pharisee on religious, not on political, grounds. It was as obvious to the Pharisee as to Jesus that their respective teaching was mutually antagonistic. There was no hope for Pharisaic religion if the teaching of Jesus prevailed. Paul discovered in his own way at a later stage that Pharisaism and Christianity were incompatible.

It was only towards the end of His life that the Sadducees became prominent in controversy with Jesus. They possessed neither the piety nor the patriotism of the Pharisees. They were interested in the continuance of the Temple and its worship, as the Pharisees were concerned with the continuance of the Synagogue and its service. They were interested in religion only in so far as it involved the continued existence of the Temple where they found their living. They were immovably conservative, for they were anxious that the existing order of things should remain undisturbed. They were supreme in the Sanhedrin, and they were favourable to Rome as long as they were secure in the enjoyment of the Temple revenue. As friends of Rome, they were naturally afraid of the growing popularity of Jesus. They knew the Jewish temperament, and they knew the disposition of Rome. They were anxious that the religious and political situation should remain undisturbed, that they might continue to enjoy the privileges which Roman rule extended to them. After the raising of Lazarus and the impression which it made upon the people, the high priests and Pharisees were thrown into consternation, for they feared that the disturbance would attract the notice of the Roman representative, who would take away their place and their nation (Jn 11⁴⁸). Jesus' clearing of the Temple roused the anger of the Sadducees, for it interfered with vested interests. It was this act that moved them to compass His death (Mk 11^{15, 18}). The only restraint was their fear of the people.

The charge of blasphemy was often on the lips of His Pharisaic adversaries, and from the Jewish point of view the indictment was perfectly intelligible. To the Pharisees, who rejected the Messianic claims of Jesus, His utterances and His deeds were often blasphemous (Mk 27, Jn 5^{16, 18}), just as to His disciples who acknowledged Him to be the Messiah the attitude of the Jews was equally blasphemous (Mk 15², Ac 13⁶⁵ 18²⁷). Any disparaging speech in reference to Jahweh was blasphemy, or any act which was disparaging to His dignity, e.g. Sennacherib's sneer that Jahweh was no better than the numerous gods of the nations which the Assyrian army had conquered (2 K 19¹⁶). The worship of Jahweh with the rites of the Baalim was blasphemy, for it degraded Jahweh to the level of Baal (Ezk 20⁷). Any irreverent allusion to any institution connected with Jahweh came under the same condemnation, e.g. Jesus' alleged reference to the Temple (Mk 14⁵⁸, Ac 6¹³). His violation of the sacredness of the Sabbath was of the same nature (Nu 15³², Jn 10^{33, 36}). When Jesus arrogated to Himself the right to forgive sins, He encroached upon the prerogatives of Deity, and He was guilty of blasphemy (Mk 27, Mt 9³). John adds that His assumption of Divinity was provocative of violent opposition. The high priest, at the trial of Jesus, put to Him the question, 'Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed,' or 'the Son of God?' (Mk 14⁶¹, Mt 26⁶³). It was a definite challenge whether He was the Messiah or not. The answer was equally clear and emphatic, and the charge of blasphemy was at once raised. The alternatives were clear—Jesus was the Messiah, or else He was a blasphemer, and as such worthy of death (Lv 24¹⁶). This was the technical charge against Jesus, but it is obvious that His whole teaching was antagonistic to and subversive of the religious formalism and narrow nationalism of the Pharisee no less than the scepticism and worldliness of the Sadducee. But the Sanhedrin could not inflict capital punishment without the confirmation of the Roman governor. It was therefore necessary to put in an indictment of a different character in order to make sure of the verdict. The prosecutors held that according to Jewish law (Lv 24¹⁶) Jesus was guilty of death, for He made Himself 'Son of God' (Jn 19). It would not be difficult to make out that His claims to be the 'Messiah' or 'King of the Jews' constituted not only blasphemy but high treason, and the Roman Emperor was exceedingly sensitive on the question of læsa majestas or high treason. The main object of the prosecution was to bring home the charge of high treason as the only indictment that would move Pilate to confirm the verdict of the Sanhedrin. Luke sums up the three points in the indictment. (1) Perverting the nation. This was a charge of seditious agitation. His adversaries knew what they were about when they suggested that He was trying to work up a revolt in Palestine. (2) Forbidding the payment of tribute to Cæsar. Jesus Christ had recently discriminated between duty to God and obligations to Cæsar, and His words suggested the existence of a sphere to which the authority of Cæsar did not extend. (3) Making Himself to be Messiah, king. The Jewish leaders raised the cry of blasphemy over the claim. It was the political aspect of the claim which they emphasized before Pilate. The insinuation of the mob, that Pilate would not uphold the authority of Cæsar if he released Jesus, stung the Roman governor to the quick and materially helped to get his confirmation of the findings of the Sanhedrin. It is obvious that, as far as Pilate was concerned, everything depended upon the significance of the Messianic claim made by Jesus, and accepted by His accusers for their own purpose, at His trial. In their desperate efforts to secure an adverse verdict the Jews were prepared to trample underfoot the national expectation of a Messiah—'We have no king but Cæsar.' They knew what charge would carry weight before the proconsul. It is obvious that Pilate was moved by the charge. The Jewish world at the time was full of unrest, and insurrections were not uncommon. The Jews repeated the charge, in their opposition to Paul at Thessalonica. They knew that would get a hearing from the representative of Cæsar (Ac 17). It is obvious that the Jews were actuated in their opposition to Jesus Christ by motives which were partly nationalistic and partly religious, whilst Pilate, the Imperial representative, was concerned mainly with the political aspects of the situation.

5. Persecution of the Christians by the Jews.—We have already referred to the fact that Jesus Christ prepared His disciples for persecution. He seemed to have a clear premonition as to the issue of His own life. He was equally certain that fidelity to His teaching would evoke the deep and implacable hostility of Judaism and of the Roman Empire. Their contention that the Crucified Jesus was the Messiah and a Saviour for all nations would offend Jewish nationalism, and the ethical ideal of the gospel would evoke the scorn and the hatred of the Græco-Roman world. Jerusalem and Rome would work together in opposition to His disciples, as they had done in opposition to Him, and for the same reasons. The unexpected manner in which references to persecution as the inevitable lot of His faithful followers occur in His speeches proves that it was ever on His mind. He met every situation that arose in the history of the early Church. Fidelity to Him and His teaching would be supremely difficult, but it would not miss its reward. He pronounced a beatitude on those who would suffer persecution for righteousness' sake—i.e. upon those who would bring upon their own heads the hostility of the world on account of their adherence to His teaching. Their endurance of persecution for this reason entitled them to membership in the Kingdom of God. Through their endurance of the hostility of the world without finching or denying their faith, they would win their souls, and thereby prove their claim to be citizens of the kingdom of heaven (Lk 21¹⁹). The vivid and constant sense of their belonging to another kingdom—real and abiding—would alone enable them to endure the hatred of the world; no other motive would be sufficiently strong. Persecution was the crucible which tested the faith of the disciple—its genuineness and its strength. Persecution would be the form in which the antagonism of the world—Jewish and pagan—would manifest itself. It would be a tribute to the reality of their faith. The believers would be sheep in the midst of wolves. But theirs was a life which wolves could not harm. 'Let not the lambs fear the wolves when they are dead' are words which are ascribed to Christ in an ancient homily (J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, pt. i., London, 1890, vol. ii. p. 219). Sanhedrins and synagogues—the political and religious institutions—of Judah would be arrayed against the disciples. They would be dragged before kings like Herod Agrippa (Ac 26) or Emperors like Nero (2 Ti 4⁶) and Roman governors like Felix and Festus (Ac 24-25⁵). Peter reminds his readers that they must be careful that persecution is due to their Christian faith and Christian conduct (1 P 4⁶). Among the rewards of fidelity to Jesus Christ are 'houses . . . with persecutions' (Mk 10³⁰). We are not surprised when we read of the persecutions that many lapsed from the faith—the good seed was choked (Mt 13²¹). But the true believer will face all the trials and sufferings of life (Ro 8, 1 Co 4¹², 2 Co 4¹²).

Jesus' forecast of the future was fulfilled to the letter, and His disciples had not long to wait. The representatives of Rome did not appear on the scene for some time; the opposition came from the Jews. The earliest Christians were Jews, and the earliest form of apostolic Christianity was essentially Jewish. Its early exponents were only dimly aware of the full content of the claim which they made when they contended that Jesus was the Christ. It required many minds to bring out the full meaning of the teaching of the Master. The author of 'Acts' rendered a service in this connexion which comes next only to the Gospels and Paul's Epistles. It is clear that the burden of the apostolic preaching was the fulfilment of the Messianic hope in Jesus. Jesus is the Christ. The disciples never abandoned their belief that Jesus was the Messiah—viz. the Messiah of Jewish belief. 'We hoped that it was he which should redeem Israel' are the pathetic words in which two disciples express their poignant disappointment (Lk 24²¹). 'Dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?' is the question put to Jesus Christ after His resurrection (Ac 1⁶). The Crucifixion laid their Jewish hope in ruins. The Resurrection, however, brought about a renewal of their faith, but it had changed its content. The apostolic gospel was simply the claim that Jesus, who had been crucified and buried, but who had risen and ascended to heaven, was the Messiah. It is noteworthy that the Sadducees, and not the Pharisees, began the opposition to Peter and his fellow-disciples. It was the claim that 'Jesus was the Messiah' that evoked their antagonism. As the movement seemed to spread at an alarming rate, the Sadducees feared a popular rising. They were satisfied with things as they were, and they were exceedingly anxious not to give any offence to Rome. They opposed the apostolic preaching, as they had opposed the claim of Jesus to be the Messiah, for they knew how similar movements had ended. The Pharisees took no part, at first, in the opposition to the new movement. This seeming indifference is quite intelligible. We have already pointed out that the Pharisees were greatly interested in Jesus and in the claim which was made by His followers that He was the Messiah. They were equally interested in the apostolic contention that the Resurrection demonstrated the truth of His Messiahship. The 'rising from the dead' had put the whole matter in a new light. The disciples themselves had temporarily relinquished their view that Jesus was the expected deliverer, but the Resurrection enabled them to recover their faith in a transfigured form. We are not surprised that many Pharisees were among the early disciples (Ac 15). Gamaliel, a prominent Pharisee, counselled caution in dealing with the new movement. He suggested that they should wait developments and accept the verdict of Providence. It was a Pharisaic belief that history judged all movements. Gamaliel was willing to keep an open mind, and in this attitude he represented the more enlightened Pharisaism of the day. When they considered the question in the light of the Resurrection, there seemed nothing in the doctrine that Jesus was the Messiah which was inconsistent with the Messianic hope as it prevailed among the Pharisees. But they had not long to wait before they saw the significance of the new movement, and their interest was converted into determined and relentless opposition when they understood its true inwardness. The historian of Acts puts into the mouth of Stephen one of the most epoch-making utterances in the New Testament. Stephen was a Hellenistic Jew, and his early training had fitted him to grasp the universality of the gospel. Christianity was the true completion of the religion of Israel, and, therefore, the supersession of Judaism. It was the fulfilment of the hope of Israel. The religious teachers of the nation had tried to bring out the true nature of religion, but the nation, in the person of its official leaders, had offered continued resistance to the Holy Ghost, with the result that the religion of the prophets had degenerated into Judaism. In the light of Stephen's conception of the gospel, Jewish institutions were temporary; they had no abiding significance. They were not essential to the spiritual and universal gospel of Christianity. This speech contradicted Pharisaism at every point. Stephen was charged with speaking 'words against this holy place, and the law' (6¹³). He spoke 'blasphemous words against Moses and against God' (v. 11). These accusations were inevitable from the Pharisaic point of view, for to the orthodox Pharisee the Law was a complete and final system. The charge of blasphemy had been brought against Jesus Christ, and the repetition of the indictment in the case of Stephen shows that the disciple had understood the mind of the Master. Henceforth the opposition of Judaism to the Christian Church is uncompromising and unbroken, and the martyrdom of Stephen was followed by the death of other prominent members of the Church. But the scattering of the Church meant the spreading of the gospel. There seems little doubt that refugees played no small part in the earliest missionary activities of the Church. It is hardly possible to exaggerate the opposition which Judaism was able to offer to the young churches which came into existence in different towns and villages in Asia Minor and in Europe, for throughout the Roman Empire there were large Jewish settlements. In connexion with the repeated outbreaks of persecution in various centres, the unbelieving Jew was the dark figure that stood in the background. There is truth in Tertullian's statement* that Jewish synagogues were the chief sources of persecution. The historian of Acts saw in Judaism the real opponent of Christianity. To him there was no other rival religion, for the heathen world was irreligious. Its numerous religions were not worthy of the name. To the strict Pharisee it was also equally clear that the real opponent of Judaism was Christianity. Judaism could hold its own against heathen religions, but Christianity was a powerful rival, for it deprived Judaism of everything except its nationalism. The Jew repeated, in the case of the Christian missionary, the charge which had been brought against Jesus. He knew that it carried weight with the representative of Rome. In Thessalonica they urged 'certain vile fellows of the rabble' to lead the opposition. The charge of high treason was insinuated in the words 'These all act contrary to the decrees of Caesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus' (Ac 17). It was this charge that finally decided Pilate to speak the fateful word and hand over Jesus to His persecutors. Generally throughout the Acts, Rome, in the person of its proconsuls, is represented as taking on the whole a favourable view of Christianity. The brunt of the opposition came from the representatives of Judaism. But much depended on the temperament and character of the Roman governor as well as on the manner in which the prosecutors conducted the charge. The Jews in Corinth were not quite so alive to the possibilities of the situation as their compatriots at Thessalonica. The Corinthian Jews indicted Paul for urging men to worship contrary to the Law. Gallio replied that he was not concerned about their religious controversies. He would interfere only in case of crime or political misdemeanour (Ac 18^{14, 15}). It is possible that the historian lays stress on the favourable attitude of Rome to the early Christians in order to impress on his Roman readers that there was no real incompatibility between the Christian religion and the interests of the Empire. The Christian Church felt the force of Jewish persecution in a peculiarly violent manner in the first half of the 2nd cent. when they refused to join in the revolt of Bar Cochba—the 'Son of the Star' (Nu 24¹⁷), who headed a Messianic movement. The Christians refused to admit his claim, and were exposed to the vengeance of both Rome and the would-be Messiah. To the Romans they were Jews, whilst to the insurrectionists they were renegades.

The Church of Pentecost consisted entirely of Jews who accepted the apostolic doctrine that Jesus—Crucified and Risen—was the Messiah. Apart from that confession, they remained Jews and retained their Judaism in its entirety; and we must not read too much into that elementary creed. Even Peter and John, not to mention their converts, had not fully understood the teaching of Jesus. But it is an astonishing fact that within half a century the leading minds of the Church had set forth the content of the Christian religion, in Gospel and Epistle. When the Jew perceived the universal character of the gospel, he became its relentless opponent. He was too much of a nationalist to accept a gospel that placed all nations on an equality, whilst his reverence for the Law would not permit him to believe that it could be superseded. His nationalism and conservatism made him a bitter persecutor of 'the Way.' There were two alternatives for the Jew—conversion or persecution.

* Scorp. 10.

He had a profound reverence for the Torah. It was complete and final. The orthodox Jew believed that the world would be saved by being Judaized, as the Christian preacher believed it would be saved by being evangelized. Judaism was not one religion among many—it was the religion. The Jew claimed for Judaism what the Christian apologist claimed for Christianity—finality and absoluteness. The Jew had to embrace Christianity or oppose it by every means at his disposal. Both Judaism and Christianity were exclusive religions. The Jew who refused to be converted must have possessed that 'intense faith' in which Lecky has discovered the origin of persecution. The Christian religion also produced a faith which counted it all joy to suffer for righteousness' sake. It was this exclusiveness and sense of superiority which made Judah the best hated nation in the ancient world; but for the same reason the Christian Church won the bitter hatred of the Græco-Roman world with its indolent syncretism and low ethical ideals. It has been maintained that persecution in the strict sense of the term originated within Judaism, and in this doctrine of exclusiveness, inasmuch as the Jew persecuted Christians solely for their religious views—i.e. for heresy, and for no other reason. But there was a close intermingling of religious and political motives, and in Judah especially nationalism and religion were closely associated.

6. The attitude of Rome to Christianity.—The representatives of Rome paid little or no attention to the 'new and magical superstition' which had sprung up in Judah. To them Christianity was simply a Jewish movement. But they were alive to the possibilities of the movement and were always on the look-out for political developments in connexion with any religious agitation. Rome was familiar with 'Messianic' risings in Palestine, and the Jew never missed an opportunity of laying before the Emperor a charge of disloyalty against Christians. It was the only way to overcome the apparent apathy of Rome. Throughout Acts, Rome is represented, in the person of her proconsuls, as indifferent to the quarrels between Christian missionaries and their Jewish adversaries (Ac 18¹⁴⁻¹⁵ 25¹⁹). The attitude of Pilate to Jesus was typical of the attitude of Roman governors to His followers. They were interested in religious doctrines in the light of their influence on individuals as subjects of the Empire. They were often guilty of gross indifference. The Jews relied on the apathy of Roman governors and frequently took matters into their own hands. It is admitted that the Empire possessed a magnificent system of law. But it is easy to indulge in exaggerated language in regard to the administration of law, especially in remote parts of the Empire. Roman governors frequently turned their blind eye to the sufferings inflicted on Christians by their Jewish or pagan persecutors.

It is obvious that for some time Rome looked upon the followers of Christ as a Jewish sect. In so far as the representative of Rome had condemned Jesus on political grounds, it would follow that His disciples would experience similar treatment at the hands of Imperial governors. It is interesting in this connexion to consider the account which the Roman historian gives of the movement. According to Tacitus, the founder of the sect, Chrestus by name, had been condemned by Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius. His followers were vulgarly called 'Christians.' They were universally hated on account of the abominable deeds of which they were guilty, and their hatred of the human race. The execution of their leader gave a temporary check to the pestilent superstition. But it broke out afresh, and extended to Rome, where everything that is vile and scandalous accumulated.*

* Tacitus, Ann. xv. 44.

The historian gives the ordinary Roman view. Christians were simply Christ's faction. The attitude of Pilate to the Founder of the sect should also be the attitude of Rome to His followers—an attitude of contempt mixed with hatred. In view of this fact the question arises how it came about that Rome ultimately became such an implacable enemy of the 'pestilent superstition,' which at first seemed to be beneath contempt.

In religion Rome practised ample tolerance. This does not mean that Roman Emperors favoured religious liberty or freedom of conscience. Centuries must elapse before governments will be found to admit the rights of individuals in religion, or even of States which form parts of a larger Empire, although Jesus Christ did suggest a sphere within which Cæsar could exercise no jurisdiction. But Roman Emperors would not admit that view, for the power of the State, in the person of the ruler, was absolute, and it covered all the activities of life. Nevertheless it was the policy of Rome to allow conquered States to retain their gods and their religious customs, in so far as the free exercise of their ancestral religion or their worship of their national deities did not interfere with loyalty to the Empire, and especially with their willingness to pay homage to the Emperor by sacrificing in his name. Rome's interest in religion was entirely political. It was the continuance and stability of the Empire that concerned Rome and her rulers. Religions were tolerated and encouraged in so far as they promoted tranquillity and good order. 'The various modes of worship which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as equally true; by the philosopher as equally false; and by the magistrate as equally useful.'* The toleration of local or national religions was part of Rome's method of governing her extensive dominions. 'The Jews,' wrote Celsus, 'are not to be blamed, because each man ought to live according to the custom of his country; but the Christians have forsaken their national rites for the doctrine of Christ.'†

Rome permitted the worship of national gods and the continuance of national cults. But there was no religious liberty in this apparent tolerance. The gods worshipped and the cults practised in different parts of the Empire had to receive the Imperial sanction. Cicero* remarks that the worship of gods which had not been recognized by law was a punishable offence. No religion had any standing until it received the Imperial imprimatur. No gods could be worshipped unless they were 'publicæ adsciti.' The State's approval was necessary. Christianity was not a national faith, and for a time it did not secure the Imperial sanction. In the former sense it was a unique phenomenon within the Empire. It seems that for a time Christianity enjoyed the privileges which had been extended to Judaism as a national religion. Judaism had been treated with exceptional favour, for the Jew was exempted from the worship of the Emperor. It was a concession to Jewish monotheism. But the open rupture between Judaism and Christianity which was manifest to the world by the middle of the century, and the persistent persecution of Christians by Jews, compelled Rome to inquire into the meaning of the new movement. The Empire tolerated old and national religions, but Christianity was a thing of yesterday, and belonged to no nation, but embraced all peoples. As such Christianity stood outside the law of the Empire. It created divisions in every nation, and town, and family. Judaism was the religion of the Jews, but Christianity gathered or created its own clientele. John saw 'a great multitude, which no man could number, out of every nation, and of all tribes and peoples and tongues' (Rev 7⁹). That was the condemnation of the Christian religion in the opinion of Imperial Rome. The first edict of toleration (A.D. 311) cast in the face of the Christian religion that it had 'collected a various society from the different provinces of the Empire.' Christianity, because of its non-national or international character, was divisive and anarchical, although, when rightly understood, the gospel supplied the universal religion and formed the bond of union which made of all nations a world-wide brotherhood.

* E. Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ed. J. B. Bury, 7 vols., London, 1901-1906, i. 423.

† Origen, c. Celsum, v. 25.

‡ De Legibus, ii. 8.

What Judaism was in the pre-Christian world, Christianity was in the Roman Empire—an exclusive religion. From the very start Christianity was proclaimed as the religion of fulfilment. It was final and absolute—'and in none other is there salvation; for neither is there any other name under heaven that is given among men, wherein we must be saved' (Ac 4¹²). Peter stated in the name of Christianity what every orthodox Jew would have claimed for Judaism. Christianity was essentially exclusive and intolerant. The apostles proclaimed one God—the Father of their Lord Jesus Christ. They preached one Saviour—the Crucified Christ. There was only one religion—and that was Christianity. When Jesus stated that He was 'the way, the truth, and the life' (Jn 14⁶), it became impossible for His disciples to be tolerant of any other religion, for tolerance would be treachery. We have already traced the germ of this antagonism between the true and the false in the teaching of Elijah, who maintained that Jahweh and Baal were mutually exclusive, and it developed into the religion of post-Exilic Judah. Paul had stated the Christian attitude—'Though there be that are called gods, . . . to us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him' (1 Co 8^{5f}). The Christian who worshipped the 'God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ' could not fall in with the prevalent syncretism which implied that every god was as good as another, and every religion a matter of nationality. The Empire had experienced the same exclusiveness in the case of Judah, and had, in the interest of tranquillity, made allowance for it by extending to the Jew privileges which were denied to every other dependent people. But Judaism could advance the plea that it was a national religion. Roman Emperors had found it necessary to legislate against aggressive missionary activity whether on the part of Jews or Christians. The Pharisees compassed sea and land to make one proselyte, whilst the Christian Church from the beginning displayed unparalleled missionary zeal, and for a considerable period there was no abatement in its enthusiasm. Marcus Aurelius published an edict against those who caused tumults by introducing new worship, whilst a succeeding Emperor prohibited Christians and Jews from making converts.

When we bear in mind the missionary zeal of the early Church, and the tremendous religious conviction which it presupposes, it seems an extraordinary thing that the charge of atheism was brought against the Christians. But it is quite intelligible from the point of view of the prevalent polytheism. The Christians refused to worship any of the gods of the Græco-Roman world. Whereas the literature of the age suggests that religion was a diminishing force in the life of the Empire, it is universally admitted that the gods were very real beings to the masses. Even among the upper classes there was more affectation than conviction in the scepticism which they aired. Despite the contemptuous references to the superstitions which prevailed in different parts of the Empire, the genuine Roman was steeped in superstition. Paul might justly have said of the Empire what he said of Athens—'I perceive that ye are somewhat religious' (Ac 17²²). The whole Roman world was 'unusually addicted to the worship of divinities.'* It was inevitable that heathen worshippers should call Christians 'atheists,' for they refused to recognize their gods, and their refusal implied disbelief in their existence, or at any rate in their power. Not only did Christians refuse to take part, on the occasion of great public festivals, in the cult of the gods, but their religion seemed to lack all the visible symbols of religion. The spiritual religion of the Christian was no religion to the masses in Roman towns. How could religion without temples, altars, sacrifices, possess any value? It also happened that imprudent enthusiasts showed little respect for the altars and the temples of the gods. Their conduct was sacrilege, and sacrilege and atheism were synonymous terms. Polytheism prevailed throughout the Empire, and in such a world the uncompromising monotheism of Christians was atheism, for it denied the existence of the numerous gods which were worshipped in different parts of the Empire. Paul had already said that 'the things which the Gentiles sacrifice they sacrifice to devils and not to God' (1 Co 10²⁰). The representative of paganism in the Apology of Minucius Felix states in regard to Christians: 'They despise the temples as dead houses; they scorn the gods; they mock sacred things.'† Their Christianity required that attitude, but it gave point to the charge of atheism, for the masses believed in gods, but not in God.

But the patriotic Roman accused Christians of atheism for another reason, and here atheism implied treason to the Empire, or lèse-majesté. Rome tolerated the worship of various gods, but this tolerance was simply political expediency. The result was a vast heterogeneous Empire consisting of various races, with various religions held together as much by the universal dread of the Roman army as by the widespread respect for Roman justice. Another bond of union, religious in character, was necessary to secure the unity of the Empire. The 'genius of the Roman people' was an object of worship as far back as the 3rd cent. in the history of Rome. It combined religion and patriotism. When the Roman Empire was established, and the powers of the State were centred in the Emperor, the cult of 'the genius of the Roman people' became the worship of Cæsar. Cæsar-worship became the Imperial religion; '“it was the spiritual symbol of the political union,”'‡ and as such it formed a test of loyalty. Antiochus Epiphanes ruled over a similar, but smaller Empire. He endeavoured to solve the problem by stamping out national customs and universalizing Greek culture. Rome allowed national cults to remain, but demanded on the part of each conquered people the cult of the Emperor. The eastern part of the Empire welcomed this Imperial religion; towns vied with each other in erecting temples to Cæsar, and in holding religious festivals in honour of the Imperial divinity. But the Jew was exempted; the proposal of Caligula to place his statue in the Temple roused fierce opposition, and the Emperor was forced to abandon his plan. It was in connexion with these religious celebrations that outbreaks of popular persecution occurred. It may be assumed that the authorities looked on with acquiescence, for the martyrs had refused to join in the worship of the Beast (Rev 21⁵ 13^{8, 15}). Rome required an act of idolatry as evidence of loyalty to the Empire. To that Imperial rule Christians would not conform. 'For the Christian there was but one Lord and Master, to whom he owed supreme allegiance; this he was prepared to prove by the renunciation of all things, even life itself. For the Christian the unity of the race was symbolized not by a Tiberius or a Marcus Aurelius, but by the incarnation of Jesus Christ.* To the Roman representative it seemed a simple matter, but to the Christian acquiescence would have been equivalent to the renunciation of his faith. The watchword of the Zealots, 'no king but Jehovah,' was equivalent to 'no alien ruler in Judah.' It was a direct challenge—and it was intended to be such—to Roman domination. Our Lord had stated in the presence of Pilate that His Kingship and His Kingdom were not 'of this world.' Yet the ideals and therefore the interests of the two kingdoms—the kingdom of Cæsar and the Kingdom of Christ—often clashed, with the result that it was impossible to be a loyal subject of Cæsar and a faithful follower of Christ, and Rome had ingeniously devised a way of compelling Christians to submit to their Emperor or to deny their Lord. To them 'Christ was Lord,' and they would not allow any mortal man to claim the 'Lordship' which their faith attributed to Christ.

* Century Bible, 'Acts,' Edinburgh, 1901, p. 301.

† Octavius, 8.

‡ Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, p. 89.

Gatherings of Christians for prayer and worship were looked upon as secret societies, and popular imagination ran riot in surmising what transpired. It is possible that Paul's counsel, 'greet one another with an holy kiss,' had been too literally and too lavishly interpreted. In any case the practice of the 'kiss of peace' suggested diverse abominations to the vivid and impure mind of the masses. The celebration of the Lord's Supper and the holding of love-feasts were capable of various interpretations. The coarse mind of the age looked upon them as 'Thyestean feasts and Oedipodean incest.' But whilst popular imagination busied itself with the practices carried on at these gatherings of Christians, it was their secrecy that roused the suspicion of the authorities. Mutual benefit societies or clubs abounded in different parts of the Empire. But they were subject to rigid supervision, and they were permitted in accordance with laws which were rigidly enforced. They might easily degenerate into secret societies of a dangerous character. Cæcilius, who speaks in the name of paganism in the Apology of Minucius Felix, describes Christians as 'a people who skulk and shun the light of day.'† It was a common charge against them that they separated themselves and broke away from the rest of mankind.* The Imperial authorities were suspicious of such clandestine gatherings, for they might be held with the sole object of fomenting political disaffection.

Whilst Christianity gradually roused the suspicion of the Emperors and their representatives, it evoked the contempt and the hatred of the people at large. The educated classes looked with contempt upon what Tacitus described as a 'pestilent superstition,' and this was the attitude of Rome even to many national cults which, for political reasons, it allowed conquered nations to continue, but especially to the Christian religion. The upper classes, with all their scepticism, would hold in respect the traditional religion of Rome, for everything that was characteristically Roman appealed to their patriotism, but there were many things connected with the Christian religion for which the typical Roman would entertain no feeling except contempt. The Christian ideal would not make any appeal to the Roman temperament.

The stoical ideal was more to the taste of the typical Roman. The symbol of Christianity is the Cross, which stands for self-sacrifice and self-renunciation. That would make little impression in Rome, where self-assertion and self-aggrandizement were the dominant virtues. The Roman was a born ruler. He was the superman of the ancient world. The gospel of the Cross would not be likely to make a deep impression on the average Roman. His contempt for it would be greatly increased when the constitution of the churches was observed. For some time they consisted entirely of the lower classes. 'Not many mighty, not many noble,' were enrolled among the followers of the Nazarene (1 Co 1²⁶⁻²⁸). It was not simply rhetorical exaggeration on the part of Celsus (c. A.D. 178) when he wrote: 'If a man be educated let him keep clear of us Christians; we want no men of wisdom, no men of sense; we account all such as evil. No; but if there be one who is inexperienced, or stupid, or untaught, let him come with good heart'; 'they are weavers, shoemakers, fullers, illiterate clowns.*' 'Men collected from the lowest dregs of the people; ignorant, credulous women,' is the description given in the Apology of Minucius Felix by the spokesman of paganism.† The upper classes would despise a superstition which seemed to attract only their slaves.

Many so-called persecutions, as we shall see, were popular outbreaks, and reveal the deep hatred which the populace felt towards Christians; and the reasons for this unpopularity are not far to seek. We can see from Acts that the preaching of the gospel interfered with 'vested interests' and provoked violent opposition. The fortune-tellers in Philippi (Ac 16¹⁹) and the silversmiths in Ephesus (19²⁴) had no difficulty in creating a riot, but they were careful to conceal their true motive. In Philippi the ringleaders appealed to the patriotism of the city, whilst in Ephesus they took advantage of the superstitious propensities of the masses.

We have already suggested that Christianity involved a new principle of division. To the Roman who believed in a united Empire, Christianity was a divisive force, and as such fraught with danger to the Empire. In the case of families this was peculiarly distressful. Jesus Christ had already warned His disciples that the preaching of the gospel would produce family quarrels. Christianity would set a man at variance with his father, and the daughter with her mother (Mt 10³⁵). It was in this connexion that our Lord used the words, 'I came not to send peace, but a sword.' His forecast was literally fulfilled, and this introduction of strife into family life was undoubtedly a fruitful cause of many violent outbreaks; and the representatives of Roman law and order were not always disposed to quell such disorder, as they shared in this widespread contempt and hatred.

But what roused the hatred of all classes more than anything else was the seemingly supercilious aloofness of Christians from the life of society. Jesus Christ had said before Pilate that the Kingdom He represented was spiritual, and therefore not a rival kingdom to the Empire which the proconsul represented (Jn 18³⁶). Paul and Peter maintained that it was possible to be citizens of the Roman Empire and members of the Kingdom of Heaven. Nevertheless the two kingdoms sometimes clashed, and their ideals came into violent conflict. The consistent Christian found that it was not possible to be a citizen of the Kingdom of which Jesus was the Founder, and

* Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, p. 100.

† Octavius, 8.

‡ Tert. Apol. 31, 42; Ep. ad Diogn. 5-7.

VOL. 11.—12

* Origen, c. Celsus, iii. 44, 55.

† J. H. Newman, Grammar of Assent, London, 1870, p. 462, quoted by W. E. Addis, Christianity and the Roman Empire, p. 57.

participate in all the activities and frivolities which were enjoined by the representatives of the Empire of Caesar. Not many years had elapsed when the followers of Jesus perceived the full force of His words—'because ye are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you' (Jn 15¹⁹). The Christian witnessed every day many things which were opposed to the gospel which he had embraced. He was in duty bound to stand aloof. He was exhorted to live at peace with all men—'as much as in you lieth' (Ro 12¹⁸). The words involved a significant reminder. The modification arose, not from the weakness of human nature, but from the uncompromising nature of the gospel. There were limits beyond which compliance with the requirements of the Empire implied disloyalty to the Christian ideal. The Christian believer was permitted—and urged—to submit to all the laws of the Empire provided such submission did not involve any violation of the principles of the Kingdom. When the ideals and interests of the two Empires clashed, to doubt on the part of the Christian would be disloyalty, and to falter would be sin. The Edict of Toleration extended freedom of belief and worship, provided respect for the established laws of the Empire was preserved. The gospel permitted to the Christian community the right to discharge their duties freely as subjects of Rome provided due respect to the principles and ideals of the Kingdom was preserved. The Christian believer was primarily a citizen of the Kingdom, and only secondarily a subject of the Empire. His first concern was to seek the Kingdom of God. When the Empire transcended these limits which his gospel defined for the Christian, there was no alternative for him but that attitude which Marcus Aurelius described as 'sheer obstinacy.' The Empire of Cæsar did not understand religious conviction, or else it would not recognize its right to exist. But conscience has reasons of which political expediency knows nothing. During this dark and tragic period the Christian Church defended 'the liberty wherewith Christ had made men free.' Christianity had brought within men's reach another Kingdom than that of Rome. The Christian believer could see the 'new Jerusalem coming down from above'—near enough to earth for him to enrol himself as a member of it. It was a Kingdom of superb ideals, and it was a Kingdom that would not perish. Nineveh and Babylon had been buried in the dust of the desert. Jerusalem was in ruins. The same fate would overtake Rome. But the Christian 'looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God' (He 11¹⁰). Inspired by this hope the Christian stood aloof from the life of the town in which he lived. He abstained from many of the ordinary duties of citizenship. He was hated for his 'hatred of the human race,' in other words, for his rejection of the aims and ideals of Rome as embodied in society and religion.

It was only in the slow course of time that the intrinsic incompatibility of the principles of Christianity and of the ideals of the Empire became obvious. (a) Christian theology came into collision with the confused polytheism of the Empire; (b) Christianity as a personal religion conflicted with the collective or national religions of the Empire. (c) The lofty ethical ideal of Christianity, on its two sides of holiness and love, was antagonistic to paganism, on its two sides of worldliness and selfishness. The conflict between the two ideals grew in intensity as the truth of Christianity was unfolded in credal statement and moral character, for the ideals of the Empire were visible in the customs and practices of society. Christianity could not be itself without giving offence to the Empire. In view of this intrinsic incompatibility, it was inevitable that the Empire should attempt to put down Christianity, or that Christianity should replace the ideals of the Empire by its own; but such a substitution of ideals is impossible on a national scale, for Christianity works upon society through the individual. There was a third alternative. The Empire and Christianity might come to an understanding by effecting a compromise of ideals. It is obvious that the Christianity which was adopted by the Empire was not the pure religion and undefiled of the Gospels and Epistles. The Roman Empire did not adopt a policy of persecution from the commencement. The attitude of Rome towards Christianity was foreshadowed in the attitude of Gallio to the arraignment of the Christian evangelists by their Jewish adversaries. Rome cared for none of these things. Christianity was simply a religious controversy within Judaism, and for a considerable period no danger to the Empire was suspected. It was not of sufficient importance for historians like Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) and Suetonius (Claudius, 25) to pay any serious attention to it. They dismissed it in a few contemptuous words as a 'pestilent' or 'magical' superstition. The desperate efforts which the Jews made to involve Christians in a charge of high treason prove that Rome would consider only the political possibilities of the new religion. But it soon became clear that Christianity was distinct from Judaism and even antagonistic to it. The violent opposition which the Jews offered to the new movement was sufficient evidence that Christianity was not an offshoot of Judaism. It was also equally evident that Christianity inherited many of the outstanding characteristics of Judaism, especially its exclusiveness and intolerance—in other words, its claim to be the religion. Rome had recognized this peculiar feature of Judaism, and had made allowance for it, in the interest of peace and order, and also on the ground of its being an old national religion. Rome paid great deference to ancestral faiths; in one sense the Imperial religion—apart from the worship of the Emperor—was a congeries of national cults.

Even when Christianity was seen to be an independent movement, Gentile as much as Jewish, it was for a time beneath Imperial notice. Persecutions of a kind there were from the time of Nero (A.D. 54–68), but they were not decreed by the Imperial authorities. They were isolated occurrences, and generally the outcome of popular indignation aroused by local causes; and as Roman officials generally shared the popular hatred of Christians, they were not too careful to quell outbreaks of violence on the part of enraged mobs in various towns. The words of Suetonius—'Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit' [viz. Claudius]—do not refer to the expulsion of Christians from Rome on account of their Christianity. The historian makes a blundering reference to unseemly controversies among the Jews of the city with regard to the claim made by Christians that Jesus was the Messiah. They were banished not because they had embraced the gospel, but as disturbers of the peace.

7. Persecution of Christians by the Roman Empire.—The persecution of Christians in the time of Nero (A.D. 54–68) is a noteworthy example of the cruel treatment meted out to them in different parts of the Empire, with this difference, that the outbreak in Rome was due to the instigation of the Emperor, whereas similar violence elsewhere were possible through the connivance of the Imperial officials. The general hatred of Christians accounts for the readiness with which the populace accepted Nero's diabolical insinuation that the Christians were the originators of the disastrous fire which demolished portions of the city. We have already referred to the superstitious fears of the masses. Calamities were evidence of the wrath of the gods, and it was a common belief that the atheism of the Christians was one of the chief causes of misfortunes. Tertullian has summed up the popular attitude in the well-known words, 'They think the Christians to blame for every public calamity, for every loss that afflicts the people. If the Tiber rises to the walls, if the Nile does not rise over the fields, if the sky gives no rain, if the earth quakes, if there is famine or plague, immediately the shout is raised, "To the lions with the Christians!"'*. The words were written at a much later period, but they were true of the popular feeling from the beginning. When it was necessary to assuage the anger of the gods, victims were selected whose death gave as much satisfaction to the persons who offered them as to the deities. It is evident that Nero when he realized the state of things turned popular attention from himself by fixing it on the Christian community. It was an astute move, for it was currently rumoured that Christians looked forward to the dissolution of the present order of things. Peter gave expression to the current belief when he wrote: 'The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat, and the earth and the works that are therein will be burned up' (2 P 3⁹). Such instances of mob law are a lurid reflexion on the administration of justice, even in the heart of the Empire. But it may be urged that Nero is too exceptional a case to use for purposes of generalization. It is this outbreak of ferocity at the instigation of the Emperor that accounts for the marked difference of tone between some of the Epistles, e.g. Ro 13¹, 2 Th 2⁶, 1 P 2¹⁴, and the Apocalypse, where Rome is 'the woman drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus' (Rev 17⁶).

By the time of Domitian (81-96) it was becoming evident that the Christian religion was fraught with danger to the unity and solidarity of the Empire. We have already remarked on the inevitable tendency of the gospel to produce dissension even within the small circle of the family. Christianity seemed to make for disruption, not for unity. Rome believed in national religions. This was one of the pillars on which the Empire rested. It was clear that Christianity undermined one of the main pillars of the Imperial fabric. It was an act of disloyalty for a citizen of the Empire to embrace a religion that ran counter to every other religion. Domitian took steps to prevent the spread of this disruptive religion by an edict which forbade aggressive missionary activity among Roman citizens.

During the 2nd cent. the Empire was governed by a succession of rulers as famous for their broad statesmanship as for their lofty character—e.g., Trajan (A.D. 98-117), Hadrian (A.D. 117-138), Antoninus Pius (A.D. 138-161) and Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 161-180). They assumed their Imperial duties with a due sense of the responsibility of their position. They shared the view that the Christian religion was inimical to the interests of the Empire. They were agreed that its adherents must be coerced into acceptance of the official religion—especially the cult of the Emperor. They were truly Roman in their assumption that the safety of the Empire was the supreme consideration. The individual must sink his personal interests or idiosyncrasies and devote himself to the service of the State; that was the highest virtue. 'Civis Romanus sum' was less an assertion of rights than a recognition of duties. The individual possessed no rights except such as the State granted. 'Conscience' had no existence, and 'conscientious objection' had no meaning in the Roman Empire.

By the end of the century the Imperial authorities came to the conclusion that the time had arrived when the policy of the Empire in reference to Christianity must be defined. The new religion was gathering strength, and it was sufficiently powerful to merit the serious attention of the throne. In connexion with the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98-117) reference must be made to the significant correspondence between the Emperor and one of his provincial governors, viz. Pliny the Younger, who was proprator of the province of Bithynia Pontus (A.D. 110). In his communication to Trajan, Pliny refers to the numerical strength of Christians in his province. The heathen temples were deserted. It does not follow that this was the situation in other parts of the Empire. He acquitted Christians who were prepared to renounce Christ and sacrifice to the gods of the Empire. He condemned others, not on the ground of their Christianity, but of their refusal to recant and fall in with the official religion of the Empire, i.e. on the ground of their obstinacy. Such an attitude was impossible in a subject of the Roman Empire. It violated the fundamental idea of citizenship. Pliny commends Christians for their morality. They were under a pledge to abstain from every crime. Trajan in his reply approves of the proprator's action, but lays down two conditions, viz. that Christians must not be sought out, and that anonymous accusations must be prohibited. Whereas Christians were entitled to a fair trial, yet in the light of this correspondence they were outlaws, for the condition of retaining their civic rights as subjects of the Empire, or even of their personal safety, was the denial of their religion. Their life depended on their ceasing to be Christians. Trajan made it plain that it was possible to take action against the adherents of Christianity without any special legislation, inasmuch as there were aspects of Christianity which contravened the existing laws. Popular outbreaks were still frequent, and their frequency arose from the fact that the authorities were not likely to interfere. Nevertheless Hadrian issued an edict in which he demanded for Christians the right of a fair and judicial investigation.

Antoninus Pius (138-161) and Marcus Aurelius (161-180) were men of outstanding virtues; they admired and embodied the old Roman spirit, and they endeavoured to bring the Empire back to the old paths; but they attempted the impossible, and Christianity was the most formidable obstacle to the carrying out of their policy of a united Empire. Christianity was anarchical in its emphasis on the individual. It encouraged individualism; Marcus Aurelius looked upon it as 'sheer obstinacy.' The Empire was a vast machine, and any tendency to freedom of action or independence threw the whole machine out of gear. Roman subjects were simply parts of one stupendous whole, and the efficient working of the whole would be secured through the complete subordination of the individual parts. In their official capacity these Emperors would look with complete disfavour upon a religion which set the individual even above the State. Apart from this, the gospel would make no great impression on the typical Roman temperament; it lacked the strength and robustness of Stoicism. Its adherents displayed excessive zeal and enthusiasm, and nothing was more obnoxious to the Roman who had learnt complete self-mastery.

In the 3rd cent. the situation changed, and Christianity advanced by leaps and bounds. The stigma of being the religion of the lower classes had been removed, for it was no longer true that 'not many mighty, not many noble are called.' Christianity had very largely captured the intelligence and the wealth of the Empire. The attitude of the Emperors had changed. Many of them—e.g. Elagabalus (A.D. 218–222), Alexander Severus (A.D. 222–235), and Philip the Arabian (A.D. 244–249)—were foreigners who had worked their way to the head of the army, and thence to the Imperial purple. They were able soldiers, but they were not statesmen, and they were not interested in the retention of Roman customs and institutions. Elagabalus and Alexander Severus were of Syrian origin on their mother's side, and they were naturally disposed to favour Oriental gods and customs. The syncretism of the age found a vivid illustration in the strange assortment of gods which Alexander Severus brought together in the Imperial palace—viz. images of Jesus Christ, Abraham, and Orpheus. During this period Christianity made rapid and astonishing progress. It was to all intents and purposes a religio licita. The statesmanship of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius made them into stern opponents of the Christian religion, whilst the laxity of their successors was equivalent to tolerance—but it was the tolerance of indifference.

* Apol. 40.

Decius (249–251) introduced a new period as regards the relationship between the Church and the Empire. The Emperor was face to face with a formidable foe. The Empire was threatened on its northern and western frontiers by Franks and Goths. It was a matter of pressing urgency to consolidate the Empire in view of this formidable danger. The view prevailed that the nation could not offer a united front to an external foe unless it was of one way of thinking on all subjects. Rome had not yet discovered that religious freedom does not issue in political dissension. Decius was an able ruler, and he saw that the old doctrine of the absoluteness of the State must be restored. Recusancy must be for ever suppressed. Decius inaugurated the first general persecution of Christianity on the part of the Empire. This was a deliberate effort to stamp out Christianity, and the repressive measures were those which have been generally adopted by governments in all lands when they have attempted to suppress religious liberty and establish a state of ecclesiastical uniformity. We are not surprised to read that many failed to stand the test, inasmuch as the personnel of the Church had considerably changed during the first half of the century. Many had embraced the gospel who were complete strangers to the meaning and demand of Christian faith. But it is a marvellous fact that there were in various parts of the Empire men and women in large numbers who triumphantly stood the test and endured 'torture, not accepting deliverance.' Valerian (253–260) continued the repressive measures of Decius—but with added violence. Attendance at meetings for Christian worship became a capital offence. The meeting-places of Christians were confiscated, and all subjects of the Empire were required to conform to the Imperial demands. But Christianity had become an integral part of the life of the Empire, and the successors of Valerian came to the conclusion that they had undertaken an impossible task. The Church enjoyed peace for a considerable period, and during this period it fortified its position to such an extent that the organizers of the next general persecution undertook a still more hopeless task.

For nineteen years after his accession Diocletian (284–305) carried on the policy of his immediate predecessors. He was one of the most statesmanlike Emperors that ever occupied the Imperial throne. He was in a sense the successor of the Emperors of the 2nd cent., and attempted to carry out their policy of consolidating the Empire. In the government of the Empire he secured the services of a colleague, and in addition he appointed two assistant Emperors. In the West Maximian ruled as Augustus, and had Constantius Chlorus as his Cæsar, whilst Diocletian associated with himself Galerius as his Cæsar. Galerius was an extremely able soldier, and it was his influence that weighed with Diocletian in his decision to resume the policy of Decius. In the West there was peace, for Constantius was favourably disposed towards the Christian religion. It was the festival of the Roman god Terminus in Nicomedia, the new capital of the Empire, that marked the commencement of the persecution under Diocletian. On an occasion like this men would vie with each other in words and deeds expressive of their patriotism, and the absence of the Christian section of the population would be marked. Whilst the people were assembled together to celebrate the cult of the Emperor, the Christians would be gathered together in their own church. We are not surprised that the destruction of this church was the beginning of hostilities.

Four edicts were published, and each one possessed its distinctive features. The first edict required the instant demolition of all churches and the burning of all Bibles. Christians who refused to conform were deprived of all civil rights, and they were placed beyond the pale of the laws of the Empire. The second edict was especially directed against the officials of the Church, whilst the third offered release to the imprisoned clergy who were prepared to recant, and further torture in case of refusal. The fourth edict held out to all Christians, laymen and clergy, the choice between death and sacrifice. Although persecution was not continuous and not universal throughout the Empire, Galerius continued his policy; but on the eve of his death he attached his name, along with those of Constantine (the son of Constantius) and Licinius, to the first Edict of Toleration, published in Nicomedia in A.D. 311. The edict, in Gibbon's translation, is as follows: 'We were particularly desirous of reclaiming, into the way of reason and nature, the deluded Christians, who had renounced the religion and ceremonies instituted by their fathers, and, presumptuously despising the practice of antiquity, had invented extravagant laws and opinions, according to the dictates of their fancy, and had collected a various society from the different provinces of our empire. The edicts which we have published to enforce the worship of the gods, having exposed many of the Christians to danger and distress, many having suffered death, and many more, who still persist in their impious folly, being left destitute of any public exercise of religion, we are disposed to extend to those unhappy men the effects of our wonted clemency. We permit them, therefore, freely to profess their private opinions, and to assemble in their conventicles without fear or molestation, provided always that they preserve a due respect to the established laws and government.'

It is evident that the organizers of this attempt to stamp out Christianity expected a different issue to their campaign of persecution. They were not aware of the strength of conviction which the faith of the Christians had developed. The edict hints at the Roman belief in ancestral religions. The Imperial objection to Christianity is given in the words 'a various society from the different provinces,' whilst the closing sentence about 'respect to the established laws' is a reminder of the view which States have only reluctantly abandoned—viz. that religious freedom is fraught with danger to the State. In 313 Constantine became sole Emperor of the West and issued the Edict of Milan—the Magna Carta of religious liberty. All subjects of the Empire were granted complete freedom of worship. But this universal toleration was not of long duration. The traditional doctrine in regard to the presuppositions of a united Empire reasserted itself, and Constantius adopted Christianity as the Imperial religion and at the same time reduced paganism to a religio illicita. The adoption of Christianity as the religion of the Empire was a great triumph for the gospel, but there are victories which are as disastrous as defeats. The Church had to pay a heavy price for promotion. The Emperor demanded and obtained from the Christian Church the homage and submission which his predecessors enjoyed in the case of paganism. The friendship of Rome was fraught with greater danger than its enmity. The Church lost its freedom and its power. The subsequent persecution of paganism was not due to the intolerance of the Church. One of the outstanding motives which actuated the Empire in its attempt to stamp out Christianity led to its efforts to suppress paganism. Imperial unity demanded ecclesiastical uniformity. During the reign of Theodosius the Great, paganism was finally abolished by a series of enactments similar to those adopted by previous Emperors in their efforts to suppress Christianity. But the abolition of paganism by Theodosius was as unreal as the establishment of Christianity by Constantius. Religious reforms which emanate from the throne are futile; they are genuine only as they originate in the heart of a people. The spirit of paganism lived on when the forms and institutions of the Christian religion had been universally adopted. Yet all ancient governments—and some modern—have acted on the assumption that ecclesiastical uniformity alone produces and guarantees national unity. In the most progressive European countries it is accepted that political unity is compatible with full religious freedom.

We have emphasized the fact that Rome persecuted for political reasons. It was the safety and stability of the Empire that weighed with her Emperors. But it is necessary to guard against a common misconception. The Empire was not an irreligious organization that opposed the spread of religion. It possessed its official religion; and it was necessary for those in authority, in spite of the prevalent scepticism, more affected than real, to provide for the belief which prevailed, that the gods existed and that they possessed unlimited power for good and evil. It was the Imperial view, strengthened by the innate conservatism of human nature in religious matters, that the existing religious situation was better adapted and even essential to the social and political needs of the Empire. Rome did not classify religions as true or false, but as conducive or inimical to the interests of the Empire.

8. Persecution of heretics by the Roman Church. —For several centuries after the adoption of Christianity as the Imperial religion the 'Holy Roman Empire' was united in its religious life. Western Europe was governed by a 'theocracy'; the Church was supreme. Uniformity of thought and worship prevailed throughout the civilized world. But it was the uniformity of death; there was as little living intellectuality as there was vital religion. 'Catholicism was then,' writes Lecky, 'perfectly in accordance with the intellectual wants of Europe. It was not a tyranny, for the intellectual latitude it permitted was fully commensurate with the wants of the people. . . . As long as a church is so powerful as to form the intellectual condition of the age, to supply the standing-point from which every question is viewed, its authority will never be disputed.*' Lecky thinks only of the intellectual situation in Europe. But the same explanation applies to the religious State; Catholicism was in accordance with the religious needs of the period. The Renaissance was the intellectual awakening of Europe, and the Reformation was the awakening of the conscience of Europe, and the former was due to the discovery of the literature of Greece and Rome as the latter resulted from a study of the Gospels and Epistles. For centuries Western Europe had embraced the intellectual system, and, of course, the religious customs which the Church permitted. Rome dictated to the understanding no less than to the conscience of the West. Towards the end of the 11th cent. there were signs of awakening dissatisfaction with both the religion and the creed of the Church. But the way of the innovator was hard. By the end of the century the Church had attained the zenith of its influence, and before the middle of the 13th cent. Rome had manufactured her machine for the repression of heresy in the form of the Inquisition (A.D. 1233), and the period of persecution had been already inaugurated by Innocent III. in the persecution of the Albigenses in the south of France (1220). All rulers were required to take an oath that they would exterminate from their dominions all those who were branded as heretics by the Church, and the universal dread of the papal Interdict reduced to abject submission the princes and sovereigns of Western Europe, e.g. King John of England. Statutes against heresy formed integral parts of the legal system of all Western States, e.g. 'De hæretico comburendo' in England (1400-1676). We have observed that the persecution of Christianity by the Roman Empire was mainly motivated by political considerations. In ancient Empires the central authority was absolute, and there was no sphere or activity which lay outside or beyond the law of the realm. It was suspected that the enjoyment of religious freedom would bring about a desire for civil liberty and thus the solidarity of the Empire would be disturbed, and its unity imperilled. The heaven of liberty once introduced into the life of a people would gradually spread and ultimately affect the whole mass. Rome persecuted the Church because religious uniformity was essential to the unity of the Empire, and paganism was favourable, whilst Christianity was inimical to its stability and safety. When Christianity became a religio licita measures were adopted to keep in check, through Imperial supervision, its individualistic and anarchical tendencies. After the establishment of Christianity Rome crushed paganism as it had attempted to suppress Christianity, in order to safeguard the unity of the Empire, and according to the political creed of the age there was no reliable unity without uniformity. Rome's policy was the suppression of political insubordination. The Church, on the other hand, persecuted on religious grounds. Her policy was the repression of heresy. The Church had formulated her theological creed and had elaborated her religious cult, and neither theology nor cult was subject to revision or innovation. Lecky thus accounts for the adoption of persecution by the Church: 'If men believe with an intense and realising faith that their own view of a disputed question is true beyond all possibility of mistake, if they further believe that those who adopt other views will be doomed by the Almighty to an eternity of misery which, with the same moral disposition but with a different belief, they would have escaped, these men will, sooner or later, persecute to the full extent of their power.'* Persecutions on purely religious grounds originate in the doctrine of exclusive salvation, but it is not true that the Church of Rome persecuted solely on religious grounds—whether in the interest of the heretic, or to stamp out heresy. The doctrine embodied in the words ‘extra ecclesiam nulla salus’ does not fully account for the attitude of Rome. It must be remembered that the ‘Holy Roman Empire’ inherited the traditions of its pagan predecessor. It also inherited the Imperial passion for universal dominion. But the Imperialism of the Church was partly, if not chiefly, religious. In the background of the papal mind was the belief in the universality of the gospel. It was a superb scheme—one great Empire, uniform in belief and worship—and for a time the idea was practically realized. The Roman Church repressed heresy no less in the interest of Imperial solidarity than in the interest of truth. Persecutions on purely religious grounds, i.e. for heresy, are found in connexion with religious denominations which possess rigidly defined confessions of belief and which are independent of the secular authority.

* Lecky, Rationalism in Europe, vol. ii. p. 31.

* Lecky, Rationalism in Europe, vol. ii. p. 1.

9. Persecution in Protestant countries.—The doctrine that the State was supreme, as well in religious as in secular affairs, was universally accepted in Western Europe at the time of the Reformation, with the result that repressive measures with a view to securing religious uniformity were general. The supremacy of the State was the only adequate safeguard against papal interference, and in most lands the Reformation was exploited by princes or kings as a means to an end. It was currently accepted that the prince or sovereign possessed the right to determine the religion—creed and cult—of the State or province over which he ruled. The principle adopted by the various Germanic States was tersely expressed in the words ‘cujus regio, ejus religio.’ Each State, in the person of the central authority, determined its own religion, but there was no religious freedom for the individual. His alternatives were submission or emigration. This doctrine of the absoluteness of the State was an inheritance from the past, and it was inevitable under the circumstances which then obtained in Western Europe that it should be emphasized. From about A.D. 1200 until the middle of the 16th cent. the Pope exercised complete dominion among the nations of Western Europe. But the rise of distinct nationalities, with different interests and ideals, produced a desire for national liberty. National sentiment became a powerful force in the life of nations. The longing for political liberty on the part of nations was no less genuine than the desire on the part of individuals to enjoy intellectual and religious freedom, and civil rulers took advantage of this powerful sentiment to secure their own freedom from papal interference. The history of the Reformation in England is a case in point. In its initiation it was neither more nor less than the rejection by the monarch of the supremacy of the Pope or of his right of interference in English—and, in fact, in the king’s—affairs. Henry VIII. appointed himself as sole and supreme head of the Church of England. The terrors of the Interdict were things of the past. But whereas the nation was free from papal supremacy, the individual had no freedom in his religious beliefs or exercises. When Dissent appeared, as it inevitably did in all lands where the right of private judgment and liberty of conscience had been affirmed, the secular authority met such dissidence with persecution.

It may be pointed out in passing that there are three ways in which the problem of the relationship between the Church and the State may be solved. (a) The State may dominate the Church, or (b) the Church may govern the State, or (c) their respective spheres and functions may be delimited and mapped out, and the two estates may be separate and independent of each other. Under the second and third regime we find persecutions for purely religious reasons.

The State may be supreme, and determine the conduct of the citizens in religious no less than in civil matters. There is no liberty of belief or worship. The religious life of the individual, as far as external acts are concerned, must follow the lines laid down by the central authority. He must fall in with the official religion, and his submission applies to creed as well as to cult. The State exercises the right to formulate its theology and to draw up its mode of worship, and to impose them on all subjects of the realm. If there are different religious bodies within the State, as in many Western countries after the Reformation, the State may recognize or establish one form of religion, with the result that we have not a State religion but a State Church, whilst other religious bodies are subject to various political disabilities until religious equality is secured. The State may grant complete religious freedom to all denominations, and religious communities may formulate their own creed and elaborate their own mode of worship in complete independence of the secular authority. This is separatism, and obtains, for instance, in the United States, and is being generally accepted, as the solution of the problem, in Great Britain.

The history of religion in Great Britain especially illustrates the gradual abandonment of the doctrine of the absoluteness of the State and of its right to decide the religion of its subjects, and of the gradual adoption of the doctrine of separatism.

After Henry VIII. established himself as head of the Church there followed a prolonged and fierce struggle between Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism for supremacy. During the reign of Edward VI. Protestantism was the State religion and Romanism was suppressed, whilst during Mary’s reign Roman Catholicism enjoyed a short spell of power and the fires of Smithfield were lit. Under Elizabeth, Protestantism once more regained the upper hand and Roman Catholicism was proscribed. But throughout the protracted conflict between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism religious and political motives were strangely intermixed. The ultimate triumph of Protestantism was largely due to the fact that it was identical with patriotism, whilst Catholicism was associated with a continental Power’s attempt to conquer England. During the Stuart period the conflict became a ‘three-cornered fight’—for Protestantism was divided into two hostile camps, viz. Episcopalianism and Presbyterianism; but when the struggle was at its height, Roman Catholicism was out or it.

Protestantism in its struggle with Roman Catholicism allied itself with the patriotic sentiment of the nation. Episcopalianism in its conflict with Presbyterianism advocated the absoluteness of the throne, and its right to control the life of its subjects, civil and religious, whilst Presbyterianism, which had embraced the Genevan ideal of a theocratic State (see below), allied itself with a democratic movement in favour of parliamentary or constitutional government. It was not a struggle for religious freedom or for liberty of conscience, for there was nothing to choose in the matter of tolerance between Presbyterianism and Episcopalianism, and both parties would willingly, and perhaps conscientiously, have resorted to the use of force, in the form of legislation, to secure the prevalence of their own creed and mode of worship. It was Cromwell alone who prevented the establishment of Presbyterianism as the State Church.

The restoration of the monarchy carried with it the restitution of Episcopalianism, and there ensued a series of laws, perhaps without a parallel in any land in point of severity, with a view to the extirpation of religious dissidence; but towards the close of the century the Act of Toleration granted freedom of worship to the different Dissenting bodies, although many of the civil disabilities which were imposed upon Dissent by the repressive legislation of Charles II. remained and still remain. It was during this period—the second half of the 17th cent.—that many able advocates of toleration mapped out the respective spheres and functions of the State and the Church, as, e.g., Milton and Locke. From the close of the Stuart period the trend of opinion has been towards separatism, the germ of which is seen in Locke's doctrine that the function of the State is to protect the material interests of the citizens, whilst the Church is charged with the cure of souls. This doctrine struck the death-knell of persecution by the State on politico-religious grounds.

It is worthy of mention that the old idea of the absoluteness of the State, and therefore of the right of coercion in religious matters, advocated by pagan Rome, and by Episcopalianism during the reign of Charles II., has been maintained by many rationalist writers, e.g. Hobbes. Plato had found room for religion in his ideal State, and contended that all citizens should believe in the State gods on pain of imprisonment and death. Hobbes in his Leviathan developed the doctrine of the absolute power of the sovereign in all departments, civil and religious. Whether religion was true or false was a matter of no great concern; the main consideration was its utility for purposes of government.

We have observed above that the Church may be supreme and the State be controlled and governed by the Church. This is the theocratic ideal of government, and it resulted quite logically from the Reformers' emphasis on the supremacy of conscience or the absoluteness of religion. Separatism was not the first choice of the Reformers; that was only the second best.

From the 12th cent. the Pope was the dominant figure in European politics. In the Interdict he possessed a weapon which brought princes and kings to the dust before his Holiness. He possessed the keys of heaven and hell. He opened and shut to whomsoever he would. But it was among the Reformers—an important section of them—that the idea of a theocratic State prevailed. Their central creed was not the freedom, but the supremacy, of conscience. Savonarola attempted to establish a theocracy in Florence—a State built on the teaching of the Bible. His ideal was a Christocratic kingdom, but according to his teaching such a kingdom presupposed a redeemed democracy.

Calvin's ideal was a theocratic State. He tried in Geneva the experiment which cost Savonarola his life in Florence. It is impossible to over-estimate the service he rendered to the Reformation. He was the theologian as well as the statesman of Protestantism, for he gave systematic expression to its theology and he organized its ecclesiastical polity. In both cases, he maintained, he was building on the Word of God. His theology was based on biblical exposition, as his form of Church government was founded on apostolic practice. But the greatest service, perhaps, which Calvin rendered to Protestantism was the new moral direction which he gave to religion. 'The Protestant movement was saved from being sunk in the quicksands of doctrinal dispute chiefly by the new moral direction given to it at Geneva. The religious instinct of Calvin discerned the crying need of human nature for social discipline. . . . The Christianity of the Middle Ages had preached the base and demoralising surrender of the individual—the surrender of his understanding to the Church, of his conscience to the priest, of his will to the prince. . . . The policy of Calvin was a vigorous effort to supply what the revolutionary movement wanted—a positive education of the individual soul. The power thus generated was too expansive to be confined to Geneva. It went forth into all countries. From every part of Protestant Europe eager hearts flocked hither to catch something of the inspiration. . . . Calvinism saved Europe.'* Among the eager spirits who flocked to Geneva and came under the spell of Calvin's teaching were men from our own land, and they returned with their souls aglow with the inspiration of this new moral direction which Calvin gave to religion. The Puritans were disciples of Calvin in their theology, in their Church polity, and in their insistence on vital religion; and in this moral and social interpretation of Christianity lies, perhaps, their greatest service to their country.

As in the case of Savonarola, Calvin was much more concerned with the right of the religious element to dominate the secular or political than with the right of conscience to be free from the sway of the secular authority. The leading spirits of the Reformation started with something more stable and positive than the right of private judgment or even liberty of conscience. The Reformation was a revolt from the religion of the 10th cent. in favour of the religion of the Gospels and Epistles. It was a repudiation of the authority of Lateran Councils and the affirmation of the authority of the Bible. It was a shifting of the seat of authority. There was no inconsistency between Calvin's Protestantism and his intolerance of views which did not coincide with his own. He had constructed his system of theology and his conception of the nature and function of the Church by means of careful biblical exegesis. He believed he had understood the mind of the Master. It was to him a matter of supreme urgency that the will of God as declared in His Word should prevail.

A grave wrong is committed when it is thrown in the face of Calvin and other Reformers that they preached the right of private judgment and liberty of conscience, while as a matter of fact they were guilty of brutal intolerance. The Reformation was not due to the prevalence of the right of private judgment or of liberty of conscience. The Reformers would not have gathered together a single church if they had had nothing more stable and reliable than private judgment to oppose to the authority of Rome in the person of the Pope. They appealed from Synods to the Scriptures, and their belief in the Scriptures was absolute. To the Reformers the authority of conscience was the authority of the Word of God. Many of them would have listened with disdain to the contention that conscience was free; to them conscience was master. Their creed was not so much the liberty, as the supremacy, of conscience. To them the language of conscience was not simply, 'I will not submit,' but rather, 'I must enforce.' We have observed above that the religious conviction that makes the martyr tends also to make the persecutor, unless along with this conviction there is a clear recognition of the fact that coercion is opposed to the very nature of religion. 'Intense and realising faith' finds it extremely difficult to be tolerant. The leading spirits of the Reformation possessed the prophets' conviction of the truth of their message. The prophetic attitude presupposes something more than the assent of the understanding to a proposition or dogma. It implies that some truth has seized the soul of the prophet. The conviction is more moral than intellectual; it has more to do with conscience than with reason. The prophet's creed is not a proposition which the theoretical understanding accepts, but a truth which has captured the practical understanding. The Reformers were akin to the prophets in their overpowering conviction of the truth of their message, but instead of the prophets' 'Thus saith the Lord,' the Reformers said 'Thus saith the Scripture.' What the Reformers meant by a matter of conscience was precisely this—what was taught in God's Word. Conscience is proverbially intolerant. 'Had it,' wrote Joseph Butler, 'strength, as it has right; had it power, as it has manifest authority, it would absolutely govern the world.'* Calvin was anxious to invest conscience, i.e. the Word of God, with strength equal to its right, power equal to its authority, so that it might govern. The Reformers were intolerant in the name of conscience; they were intractable in the name of God's Word. It may be impossible to justify the martyrdom of Servetus, but we must not look upon it as if it were a solitary occurrence in those troublous days.

* Mark Pattison, quoted by J. Heron, in A Short History of Puritanism, Edinburgh, 1903, p. 5 f.

Reformers who had come under the influence of Calvin accepted his ideal of a theocratic State or a kingdom of saints. The Pilgrim Fathers did not cross the Atlantic in order to enjoy the right of private judgment or religious liberty. They wanted freedom to believe what they deemed to be true, and to worship God in the way which they deemed right. They wanted freedom to make the Bible their sole guide and law book. They were not prepared to grant liberty of worship and liberty of thought in their own province. Their aim was the establishment of a State where their own Christianity would be the State religion. They did not believe in the separation of the Church from the State; they were anxious to found a community in which their Puritanism would be supreme. The Bible was to be the nation's law book, and to its teaching every member of the community must subscribe. The Pilgrim Fathers believed too much in their own view of Christianity to tolerate any other and conflicting views. Nothing is more flagrantly unjust than the indictment that the men of the mayflower preached tolerance when they left the shores of Great Britain, and practised intolerance when they landed on Plymouth Rock. Tolerance did not come from Geneva, or from those who had come under the influence of Geneva, but from the Socinians of Italy and the Anabaptists of Holland. The founder of the first State where toleration was practised was Roger Williams, who emigrated to America in 1631 and welcomed to Providence all who were prepared to extend to all the religious liberty which they claimed for themselves.

Presbyterianism in England and Scotland was equally intolerant. The leaders of Presbyterianism were disciples of Calvin, and they had his profound belief in the authority of the Word of God. They carefully formulated their creed; they elaborated their conception of the nature of the Church; they had very clear and definite notions in regard to the place and function of religion in the national life. They accepted the Calvinistic doctrine of a theocratic State. They wanted something more than a Church that was independent of the State. Their ideal was a Church which dominated the State, and they were prepared to use every possible means—Army and Parliament—to secure the establishment of their conception of Christianity. The Presbyterianism of the 17th cent. possessed that 'intense and realising faith,' issuing in coercion and persecution, as a legitimate, because alone effectual, means of establishing the true and exterminating the false.

* Upon Human Nature, serm. ii., in Works, ed. J. H. Bernard, London, 1900, vol. i. p. 43.

10. Conclusion.—We have indicated the gradual abandonment of coercion on the part of the State because the view became general that (1) religious liberty, enjoyed to the fullest extent, does not lead to disloyalty to the State, and that (2) coercion is incompatible with religious faith. The gradual disappearance of intolerance from among religious bodies has been due to the prevalence of the view that absolute certainty is difficult of attainment, and that no system or creed embodies the whole truth of Christianity. There have been cases of persecution for heresy within comparatively recent times, but the present trend is strongly and decisively towards tolerance.

It was in the 17th cent. that the cause of tolerance was advocated in many lands and by many extremely able writers, but reference may be made to Milton, the master mind of England in this period, who to a greater degree than other thinkers of his age impressed the thought of England and helped by his writings to reconcile intense religious conviction with tolerance and to create that tolerant spirit which prevails in the modern world. Truth, according to Milton, is many-sided. It is widely diffused among men. Every system contains a small part of it, mixed with error, but no system has it in its entirety. No religious body has a monopoly of the truth. It is interesting to compare this exposition of religious liberty with the defence of tolerance advanced by Themistius, the famous orator of the time of the Emperor Valens: 'Toleration is a divine law which can never be violated, as God Himself has clearly demonstrated His desire for a diversity of religions. . . . God delights in the variety of the homage which is rendered to Him; He likes the Syrians to use certain rites, the Greeks others, and the Egyptians others again. . . .'* It is to be feared that the tolerance of the 20th cent. has more affinity with that of Themistius than with that of Milton. The modern attitude suggests that every religion is as good as any other. The tolerance of the modern world springs from its feeble, anæmic faith, as the intolerance of the Reformers sprang from their 'intense and realising' faith. The words of Fox are not without a considerable element of truth: 'The only foundation for toleration is a degree of scepticism, and without it there can be none.'† But there is another 'foundation for toleration,' and to that Milton has directed attention in his Areopagitica.

'Liberty of conscience entire, or in the whole, is where a man, according to the dictates of his own conscience, may have the free exercise of his religion, without impediment to his preferment or employment in the State.'‡ Persecution is the denial of this 'free exercise of religion,' and in its widest sense it includes any and every impediment to the subject's preferment or employment in the State. Persecution is generally defined as the infliction of pain or death upon others unjustly for adhering to a religious creed or mode of worship either by way of penalty or in order to force them to renounce their principles. The insertion of the word 'unjustly' presupposes a sphere of activity in connexion with the life of the individual over which the State has no right to exercise any jurisdiction. The existence of such a sphere was hinted at in our Lord's words, 'Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's.' There is within man an inviolable adytum which the secular authority may not enter. Micaiah-ben-Imlah was clearly aware of such a sphere when he preferred obedience to the will of Jahweh to acquiescence in the caprice of the king. The author of the Book of Daniel appealed to his contemporaries, and to all generations, to take their stand on this holy ground. The apostles dealt with the same fact when they said that circumstances might arise when it was their duty 'to obey God rather than men.' In such cases conscience could not hesitate without being guilty of moral treachery. Persecution is the denial of this free exercise of religion; but we have already seen that ancient States did not recognize the existence of a sphere in the life of the individual in which the State had no jurisdiction. In the ancient world conscience had no 'rights.' The whole life of the individual was subject to the control of the State. Under these circumstances persecution in the case of religious recalcitrance was simply another name for the punishment of political offenders. Refusal to worship the gods or to observe the official religion was a crime of the deepest dye, as the provocation of the gods imperilled the safety of the State. The Jewish Law was severe on blasphemy, for the wrath of Jahweh would mean disaster to the nation. It was a political crime of a very grave character. Tacitus might scornfully write, * 'deorum injuriæ dis curæ'—it was the business of the gods to avenge any insults they might receive. But if the anger of the gods issued in national calamities, as the masses believed, it was the State's urgent business that there should be no religious shirkers or slackers within the Empire, to provoke the gods to anger, and thus bring down misfortune on the nation. Persecution or the application of force to ensure submission in religious matters was inevitable when the State claimed the right to control the whole life of its subjects, secular and religious. 'Persecution' is applicable to this attitude of the State if the individuals who claim religious freedom admit in every other respect their responsibility to the State and acknowledge their obligation to submit to all the laws of the realm. But ancient States were reluctant to admit that this 'free exercise of religion' was compatible with loyalty to the State, and there was no general recognition of the voluntary nature of religion. It is the increasing recognition of the fact that the religious attitude must be deliberate, spontaneous, uncoerced, that has accounted for the corresponding growth of the spirit of tolerance which prevails in the modern world. Until comparatively recent times it was currently accepted that coercion was a legitimate and effectual means of securing religious acquiescence. Coercion may bring about external submission, but it cannot result in living acceptance of the truth which is being pressed. In the words of the author of the earliest English book which defends liberty of conscience, 'as king and bishop cannot command the wind, so they cannot command faith.'†

* Ruffini, Religious Liberty, p. 291.

† Quoted in Lecky, Rationalism in Europe, vol. ii. p. 11 n.

‡ J. Harrington, A System of Politics, ch. vi., quoted in Ruffini, p. 175 f.

We see the germ of the doctrine in some of the Fathers, many of whom denounced coercion in matters of faith and pointed out that force is inimical to conviction, which is the very life of religion. Tertullian writes: 'However, it is a fundamental human right, a privilege of nature, that every man should worship according to his own convictions: one man's religion neither harms nor helps another man. It is assuredly no part of religion to compel religion—to which free-will and not force should lead us—the sacrificial victims even being required of a willing mind. You will render no real service to your gods by compelling us to sacrifice. For they can have no desire of offerings from the unwilling, unless they are animated by a spirit of contention, which is a thing altogether undivine.'* Lactantius followed in a similar strain: 'But it is religion alone in which freedom has placed its dwelling. For it is a matter which is voluntary above all others, nor can necessity be imposed upon any, so as to worship that which he does not wish to worship. Someone may perhaps pretend, he cannot wish it.'† Many of the leading Fathers, such as Hilary of Poitiers and Chrysostom, emphasized the same truth. But Augustine overshadowed all his predecessors, and he gave his view in favour of the persecution of paganism and heresy. He developed his theory of persecution from the words 'Compelle intrare.'‡ He has been charged with flagrant inconsistency because whilst paganism was the Imperial religion he advocated toleration, whereas, after the establishment of the Christian religion, he urged coercion. It may be urged, on the other hand, that Augustine's experience during the Donatist controversy led him to change his mind in regard to the persecution of heresy. But apart from that possibility, the charge of inconsistency is not so obvious as is sometimes supposed. To Augustine Christianity was the religion. Paganism, in every form of it, was false. He advocated the extirpation of paganism and heresy for the same reason as he had advocated toleration for Christianity. He was superficially inconsistent, but there was deep inner consistency in his attitude. To him Christianity and paganism stood to each other as the true and false or right and wrong or good and evil, and evil must be opposed in every possible way, and good must be promoted by all possible means. Whether he advocated tolerance or coercion, his main contention was that the good should prevail, and that the evil should be repressed; inner consistency made it imperative that he should advocate toleration in favour of Christianity when paganism was in power, and coercion against paganism when Christianity had secured a footing. It is evident that Augustine had solid grounds for thinking that coercion in the early stages of the religious life was effectual. The preaching of the gospel has not always appealed to the highest ethical motives. The terrors of hell have played a prominent part in the making of saints. If Martineau's view is correct that 'the administration of any uneasiness to body or mind, in consequence of a man's belief, or with a view to change it,' is persecution, the preaching even of the 20th cent. is very largely 'persecution.' There can be no successful preaching which does not produce uneasiness of mind, for the experiences of the penitent soul must issue in great uneasiness of mind. Various motives are at work in the initial stages of the religious life. Augustine had evidence of the advantages of compulsion, and it was the universal belief of mediæval Christendom, and certainly of mediæval States, that coercion was compatible with the nature of Christianity. The few voices which had been raised on behalf of the spontaneity of religious faith were forgotten for many weary centuries until in writings of the advocates of religious liberty in the 17th and 18th centuries the truth was once more set forth with greater clearness and force. It was the prevalent view of monarchs no less than of ecclesiastical leaders that refusal to comply with the demands of the throne or the curia was 'obstinacy.' There are not wanting persons in the 20th cent. to whom passive resistance is only a form of 'pig-headedness.' Whilst the struggle for religious freedom was being waged on the Continent and in Great Britain, many exceedingly able writers published books and pamphlets on the spontaneous

* Ann. i. 73.

† L. Basher, Religious Peace, London, 1614, quoted in Ruffini, p. 158.

* Ad Scapulam, 2.

† Div. Inst. 54.

‡ De Correctione Donistarum, 6. 24.

nature of religious faith. Persecution, wrote Milton,* is wholly unnecessary, 'for who knows not that Truth is strong next to the Almighty,' and even mischievous and harmful, for each individual must 'discover' the truth for himself, or else be for ever a stranger to it.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the general works on Ecclesiastical History the following works may be mentioned: Lactantius, de Mortibus Persecutorum (A.D. 314); A. J. Mason, The Persecution of Diocletian, Cambridge, 1876; B. Aubé, Histoire des persécutions de l'Eglise jusqu'à la fin des Antonins, Paris, 1875; F. Pollock, 'The Theory of Persecution,' in Essays in Jurisprudence and Ethics, London, 1882; P. Allard, Histoire des persécutions pendant les deux premiers siècles, Paris, 1892, Histoire des persécutions pendant la première moitié du III^e siècle, do., 1894, Les dernières persécutions du III^e siècle, do., 1898; W. E. H. Lecky, History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe, 2 vols., London, 1865; E. G. Hardy, Christianity and the Roman Government, do., 1894; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, do., 1894; W. E. Addis, Christianity and the Roman Empire, do., 1893; J. A. F. Gregg, The Decian Persecution, Edinburgh, 1897; P. J. Healy, The Valerian Persecution, London, 1905; H. B. Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, do., 1906; J. Herkless, The Early Christian Martyrs and their Persecutions, do., n.d.; F. Ruffini, Religious Liberty, tr. J. P. Heyes, do., 1912; J. B. Bury, History of Freedom of Thought, do., 1913.

T. LEWIS.

PERSEVERANCE.—The apostolic doctrine of perseverance is (a) conceived in a purely practical experiential sense, and (b) comprises three parts: a religious persuasion, a moral endeavour, and the entire dependence of the latter on the former.

The former consideration distinguishes it at once from subsequent theological formulæ whether of mediæval or reformed Christendom; the latter exhibits its characteristic contents. There was little special interest directed to the subject, and no controversy, till the time of St. Augustine, who, impelled by his predestinarian idea, explicitly affirmed a 'donum perseverantiæ' to the justified, a supernatural gift of grace to the elect by which they are kept indefectible.† The gift was solely of the Divine mercy, unconditional; it followed as a necessary sequence from personal election. All who are predestinated receive the Divine grace, are born again of the Spirit, shall certainly persevere to the end, and can never fall away either totally or finally from the state of grace. Their possession of the gift is further the source of assurance of final salvation. The 'final perseverance of the saints' is gratuitous, irresistible, inamissible, and certain.

The Augustinian positions continued throughout the Middle Ages to agitate, in the way of action and reaction, the thought of theologians. The Council of Orange‡ dealt with current perplexity, but in a superficial manner. The constructive genius of St. Thomas Aquinas systematized the general idea of St. Augustine in consistency with numerous points of doctrine that had emerged between St. Augustine's day and his.§ Of the Reforming divines both Luther and Calvin held to its strict statement: Calvin, like St. Augustine, treats of it particularly.¶ The Council of Trent, ostensibly opposing the Reformed heresies, departed widely from genuine Augustinianism. While condemning Pelagianism in asserting that the justified cannot persevere without a special help of God, but with it can, it yet makes the power of perseverance to reside in the human will co-operative with Divine grace. The Divine gift, while wholly of God's grace, is neither irresistible nor indefectible: it may be lost not only partially and temporarily but totally and finally. Lost grace may be restored. Of final perseverance there never can be full assurance. The one certainty open to the saint is the obligation to the steadfast use of the whole ensemble of spiritual means whereby the human will is enabled to persevere unto the end and so be preserved in the state of 'grace. Of such means the chief are the impetrative power of prayer and the sacraments. The 'final perseverance of the saints,' while of Divine gratuity, is not irresistible nor inamissible, nor certain.*

Within Protestantism strict Calvinism suffered various mitigations at the hands of Calvinists themselves;† and direct attack from the Arminians (later, Wesleyans), who opposed the doctrine on its unconditional side,‡ arguing that those who were once regenerated may by grieving the Spirit of God fall away and perish everlastingly. The Synod of Dort condemned Arminianism and reaffirmed 'high' Calvinism.§

The controversy has in modern theology lost its force. Its vitality is seen to depend on a facile confusion of the two factors entering into the experience it seeks to explain: viz. the religious and the moral. It is part of the religious consciousness to ascribe sovereignty to God and to trace the causation of everything to the eternal purpose. This is a definite experience which can be seen in every prophet. He knows that there is nothing haphazard in his life; that everything in it is caused not casual; that the cause came as a call to which his soul responds; that this, true in the smaller things of life, is equally true of the great things of the soul, in which, as it seems, the spirit of man is more a passive recipient than an active agent, for all the higher reserves of the religious life are mystical. This religious conviction is distinctive of all the supreme spiritual personalities. In their view there is no hint of a dual causality of the soul's life of grace. The religious consciousness is constituted by the sense of dependence upon God. The moral life is as truly constituted by the invincible exercise of independent force of character, and the more dependent the spiritual sense the more intense the moral independence. For grace and faith are 'lively'—vital: they have moral energy impelling to action, not repose. Thus in the actual experience of the Christian life a firm belief in the doctrine of perseverance excludes all carnal security and laxity: it is ever accompanied by a deep sense of the possibility of failure and of the absolute necessity of using the utmost effort in order to win final success. There is no perseverance without conscious determined persevering. These two constituent features are not to be separated, since they have neither independent origin nor independent exercise.¶ It is not that the one is of God's gift, the other of man's effort and initiative. It is that the Divine grace besetting man's heart, when turned to Him, engirds and subdues every interior faculty and quality (Ph 3²¹), implanting in each the dynamic of Divine affection unto constant, increasing ethical issue, 'working mightily unto every good word and work.' The Christian faith and ethics co-exist in inseparable unity. The steady tendency of religion is towards holiness; the grace of God in Christ is wholly regulated by the inner purpose

* Cf. Council of Trent, sess. vi. ch. xiii. can. 16, 22 (cf. P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, New York, 1877, li. 103, 113 l., 115); CE, art. 'Grace,' 'Perseverance'; J. H. Newman, 'Perseverance in Grace' (Discourses to Mixed Congregations, London, 1891, p. 124).

† In the forms of 'Sublapsarianism' and 'Subterlapsarianism' (Amyraldism).

‡ Cf. Remonstrants' Confession, A.D. 1610 (Schaff, iii. 545 ff.); Wesley's Notes on the NT, and certain Sermons.

§ Cf. the Canons of Dort, adopted at the 136th session, A.D. 1618-19 (Acta Synodi Nationalis Dordrechtii habitæ ann. 1618 et 1619, Dort, 1620; Schaff, iii. 550 ff.).

¶ Cf. art. GRACE.

* Areopagitica, ed. Oxford, 1894, p. 52.

† Cf. his de Dono perseverantiæ et de Correptione et gratia.
‡ Second Council, A.D. 529. It affirmed merely the general necessity of grace to good works. Cf. C. J. Hefele, Councils of the Church, Eng. tr. iv. [Edinburgh, 1895] 152-167.

§ Cf. Summa Theolog., II. I. 109-114 (ed. Migne, Paris, 1896).

¶ Cf. Institutes, ch. iii. §§ 11-14.

to make good men. It is not just, therefore, to minds of the predestinarian type to charge them with 'austerity of logic' * or 'false supernaturalism,' † as if their doctrine were a simple immediate deduction from an absolute idea having no living reference to inner emotion. The great predestinarianists were 'the most Christian men of their generation'; ‡ their theology was the expression of its dominant conception in interpreting the relation of man to God. They are not ignorant of the sphere of man's effort: they insist upon it with impressive 'austerity.' § But to them it is a sphere, concentric with, but smaller than, that of reliance upon God, in which true religion consists, and in which it does truly consist as an energy, spiritual, eternal, persistent, inspiring indefinite advance in righteousness, and delivering the growing soul from all trembling uncertainties as to resources and equipment, prospects, final goal. This is the absolute datum (not idea) set forth in the predestinarian definitions of election and perseverance: it is a datum of soul perception and persuasion induced by the soul's experience of the Power that holds it and guides and guards it, the only adequate equivalent of the profound apostolic intuition: 'in God we live, and move, and have our being' (Ac 17²⁸).||

1. The religious persuasion.—The religious persuasion has deep roots; the only attainments of which it is the inspiration are so high that nothing short of the recesses of richest truth suffice for the soil of their growth—the heavenliest forces known to the apostles. These are: (1) the will of God, (2) the pattern of Christ, (3) the life of the Spirit, (4) the fellowship of faith, (5) the heavenly inheritance.

(1) The will of God is the strongest, as it is the most comprehensive, support of the assurance of salvation: there can be none more secure or ample. The will of God holds the primacy in 'all creation' (Ro 11³⁶, etc.). In the natural world it is central; all the forces of nature are but manifestations or outgoings of the force of will, and of one will—that of the Creator. His will is also central in the realm of spiritual life, wherever that is true and progressive; the higher life of humanity is simply the will of God realizing itself according to its own purpose, not only in spite of the resistance of the countless hostile wills of men, but by means of that resistance, as the will of a perfect righteousness. Because of its primacy, there is no reasonable relation to it but that of obedience: there is no hope of successful life except in conformity to it, since it must in the end be done, God having of necessity by His own being to work always towards His own end. There is no other purpose of God for men (Eph 1⁴⁻¹¹) but that which is embraced within His all-wise, all-righteous designs (Ro 12¹⁻², Gal 1⁴, Eph 2¹⁰, Col 1⁹⁻¹⁰, He 10¹⁰, 1 P 2¹⁵, 1 Ti 2⁴). Moreover, a resolute renunciation of man's will in self-surrender to God's has for result the new nature like His, increase in strength, triumph in effort after holiness. It is the mightiest forge of personality (Ro 5¹⁻⁶ 8²⁻¹³, Gal 5²²⁻²³, Eph 3¹⁶⁻¹⁹ 5⁹⁻¹⁰ 17, etc.), thereby evidencing that it is of God (Ph 2¹³, 2 Ti 2¹⁹) and His will (1 Ti 2⁴, He 2⁴, etc.). We are thus assured that His will is our sanctification (1 Th 4³), a fact of indubitable certitude warranted by the Divine promises, which are of life (2 Ti 1¹, 1 Jn 2²⁵) to all men (Ac 2³⁹, 2 P 1⁴ 3¹³) from a faithful God (He 6¹⁷, 1 Th 5²⁴, 1 Co 1⁹, 2 Th 3³, He 10²³, 1 P 4¹⁹, Tit 1²) and fulfilled in Christ (Ac 13³²⁻³³, 2 Co 1²⁰, Ro 15³, Rev 5⁹), who as the Word liveth in the saved (Ro 1¹⁶, 1 Th 2¹³, Ja 1¹⁸, 1 P 1²³) by the Divine power, appearing in Christ (Ac 3¹²⁻¹⁶, Ro 16²⁵, 1 Co 2⁵ 3⁹, 2 Co 4⁷), producing in believers in Him the selfsame richness of character as is in Him (Eph 1¹⁹⁻²³ 3²⁰, Col 1¹¹⁻²⁹, 2 Co 5¹⁷⁻¹⁹ 9⁸, 2 P 1³); and by the Divine love (Ro 8²³⁻²⁵ 30), which is invincible. God's promises are the expression of spiritual laws, the controlling forces of His power. Herein rests their reliable character. Their content furnishes everything requisite for the fullness of the sanctified life. He who has founded and begun all has also provided all for its complete advance to perfection and accomplishment. In His arrangements there can be no possible room for defect or caprice: there need be no dubiety in the expectation that what is needed for the ripening of the redeemed character is present. As a matter of fact it is present in the Son, communion with whom is the indispensable condition, as He is the sole ground, of growing personality. Accepting that condition, saints need have no fear; they are kept by the power of God through that same goodness that made the beginning. The Spirit who redeems will also sanctify (1 Co 1³, 2 Co 1²⁰⁻¹ 5⁵, Ph 1⁶ 3²¹ 4¹, 1 Th 3¹⁻¹³ 5²³, 2 Th 1¹¹⁻¹² 2¹⁷, 2 Ti 1¹², 1 P 5¹⁰, 1 Jn 2²⁰).

(2) The pattern of Christ is a second principle of perseverance. The resources and exemplar of the new life are in Him. He is the Prince of Saints * and their Sanctifier (Eph 5²⁶). He is made of God unto them sanctification (1 Co 1³⁰). His glory is their standard, contemplation of which is the influence of transformation and renewal (2 Co 3¹⁸). The graces of His character, mental and emotional, are reproduced in them by His might (Col 1⁹⁻¹¹), and confirmed in them by communion with Him (2⁶ 3¹³ 16 17). His fidelity they imitate (He 3² 6 12 14). His love constrains them (2 Co 5¹⁴), bringing them to all the fullness of God (Eph 3¹⁹). In His might they fight the devil (6¹⁰⁻¹⁸) and stand. In His patience they run the race set before them (He 12¹⁻²). As their Forerunner He has attained the hope of the heavenly inheritance and entered within the veil (6¹⁹ 20). By the Divine power and symmetry of His godly life they partake of the Divine nature itself (2 P 1²⁻⁴) in all moral and spiritual excellence (vv. 5-8). All this is accomplished by faith in Him.

The important features here are, firstly, the perfection of Christ's Person, His completeness of character, its self-consistency. It is a living whole, in which the facts form, as it were, a co-operative brotherhood, interpersive each of the others, each lending energy and colour to the whole, and combining in the highest cultivation of the moral and spiritual senses. As character it was made possible by His perfect love of the Father and consequent perfect union with Him. The second feature is the steadfastness of His striving, the devotion of Himself to the will of God to the uttermost, the absolute dependence of His heart on the Divine intimations of duty—a devotion and dependence that rendered Him always acceptable to the Father. It was a constancy never for a moment shadowed by even a thought of disaffection, fainting, or failure. It was a standing that was also a withstanding, a race that was also a continuous unceasing progress. Thirdly, we have the justification of His confidence. Having committed Himself to the Father, He was by the Father raised again, and exalted to His right hand in power and

* Macaulay's phrase; cf. Hist. of England, ed. London, 1889, ch. i. p. 40.

† Cf. C.E. art. 'Justification.'

‡ E. Renan's description of Calvin, Studies of Religious History, Eng. tr., London, 1893, p. 340.

§ True to their feeling is the familiar saying of St. Ignatius: 'Pray as if all depended on God's doing; act as if all depended on your doing'; cf. Wordsworth:

'Tis the most difficult of tasks to keep

Heights which the soul is competent to gain'

(Excursion, iv. 138 f.).

|| Cf. Morley's striking reflexions in Oliver Cromwell, London, 1904, ch. iii. p. 47 ff.

* 'Principium sanctorum' (ancient Catholic collect).

glory. Having given Himself to obedience, He was purified; to suffering, He was perfected. He had entered into the inheritance of life eternal. The prize was won, the goal was reached. The saint, persistent after the same manner, will achieve the same success. As Christ rested on God, the Christian rests on Christ, reposing on His Person, trusting in His companionship, relying on His Spirit, and so attains the end of his faith.

(3) The life of the Spirit is a third immediate evidence of perseverance; for the life of perseverance is just the Spirit in the soul, the life of God, and that brings with it its own self-witness. It is a life of freedom from sin (Ro 8¹⁻¹⁷, 2 Co 3¹⁷), strength (Ro 8²⁸), sanctification (Ro 15¹⁶, 1 P 1²), new walk (Gal 5¹⁶), spiritual gifts (1 Co 12⁸⁻¹¹), spiritual discernment (1 Jn 2²⁰), spiritual blessings inconceivable to the natural understanding (1 Co 2¹⁰⁻¹⁴), faith and the moral virtues (1 Co 12³, Gal 5²²⁻²⁶, 1 P 1²), and the love of God (Ro 5⁵), as well as that repentance which must daily testify to its existence in the Christian life (Ac 5³¹⁻³²) as necessary, not simply as being preparatory to regeneration but as belonging to daily renewal. By the Spirit saints are sealed as God's (Ro 8¹⁶, Eph 1¹³). He further is the earnest of the ultimate inheritance (Eph 1¹⁴) in the hope of which He keeps the saved life in actual obedience and growth in grace. By the Spirit believers know for certain (οὐδ' αὖν, 1 Jn 3²⁴) that God abideth in them. The life of the Spirit is thus one under the compulsion of (a) a lofty ideal, (b) ever-growing spiritual apprehension, (c) moral discrimination, (d) deepening gravity and fecundity of emotional force, (e) larger and more spontaneous obedience. But what are these, if not the essential unmistakable notes of the holy soul?

(4) The fellowship of faith is a fourth conviction of perseverance. 'By this shall all men know,' said Christ, 'that ye are my disciples, that ye love one another' (Jn 13³⁵). That vindication of their standing in grace is never absent from the apostolic assurance. 'Love the brotherhood,' enjoins St. Peter (1 P 2¹⁷). 'Beloved, let us love one another,' urges St. John (1 Jn 4⁷). 'Brethren, speak not evil one of another,' pleads St. James (Ja 4¹¹); 'Have not the faith with respect of persons' (2¹); 'Make perfect your faith in works to the brethren' (2¹⁴⁻²²). 'Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together,' teaches Hebrews (He 10²⁴⁻²⁵; cf. 13¹). St. Paul asserts that sin against brethren is sin against Christ (1 Co 8¹²; cf. Ro 12¹⁰), that disregard of one another is division of the Body and the Spirit (1 Co 12^{7, 12-25}), that the household of God must in unity keep itself fitly framed together (Eph 2^{19, 22}; cf. Ac 2⁴). Sainthood experience is not all in one mould, but all differences, however great, may serve to manifest the power and the plenitude of the sanctifying Spirit of grace, the innumerable varieties corroborating one another, and in their cumulative effect enhancing the impression made by each. 'The glorious company of the Apostles, the goodly fellowship of the prophets, the noble army of the martyrs, the milder bands of the mystics' perfect each other (cf. He 11⁴⁰), as each proves 'his conversation to be in heaven' (Ph 3⁹).^{*} and the fellowship of believers to be truly 'the fellowship with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1³).

(5) The heavenly inheritance provides a fifth support. It occupies a remarkable space on the apostolic horizon. It gives definite body to thought, purpose, and desire as the great hope (Ro 5², Eph 1^{18, 19, 44}, Col 1^{5, 27}, 1 Th 4^{13, 58}, 2 Th 2¹³⁻¹⁷, Tit 1²

2^{13, 14}, He 6^{18, 19, 72}, 1 P 1^{3, 4, 13, 31}, 1 Jn 3²⁻³) in which the disciple rejoices, since it is life eternal (Ro 6²³, Eph 1^{18, 19}, 2 Ti 4⁸, Tit 3⁷, He 6³), the long-striven-for and appropriate culmination and consummation of this present life, according to God's will (1 Co 9²⁵, 2 Ti 4⁸, Ja 1¹², 1 P 5⁴, Rev 2^{10, 31}, 'crown of life'), life eternal which stands de facto realized in Christ, 'which is our hope' (1 Ti 1¹), who is crowned with glory and honour (He 2⁹⁻¹⁰), with many crowns (Rev 19¹²). Through the ascension of Christ Christian hope has a limitless reach.^{*} It reaches outwardly into eternity, inwardly into the sanctuary on high. It looks to a hidden Kingdom of Glory—'a salvation yet to be revealed'—into which it casts its anchor, keeping the soul firm and tranquil. It contemplates Him who wears its crown and sees in Him its own surety. His being there and thus renders the hope of entrance a certainty. It is a living hope (1 P 1³), yielding vital stimulus to the whole nature it inhabits—sentiment, thought, will. The purpose of God, the character of Christ, the soul's growth in goodness, the varieties of saintly experience, the hope of heaven—these are the dynamics of the redeemed and regenerated life, the pledges of holy attainment. Can we wonder if those who most felt their attraction and learned their strength claimed to possess in them a five-fold cord that could not be broken, a basis of spiritual existence irremovable and unshakable, whose sufficiency was wholly of God and filled life itself with an unquenchable joy (cf. Ro 5², Ph 4⁴, 1 Th 5¹⁶, 1 P 1³, He 3⁶, Rev 12¹⁴) or that any attempt to claim for man ability or sufficiency should not appear other than religious illiteracy?

2. The moral endeavour.—The principles of perseverance, in virtue of their very nature as active impulse in union with fixed conviction, are pregnant with moral life. They are the reservoirs of the highest moral life and inspiration; they reveal to the persevering soul its exalted moral ideal and the rigorous method of realizing it; the acceptance of which is the probation of faith in steadfastness; its rejection, apostasy.

(1) The moral ideal regulating the virtue of perseverance is not vague; it is definite. The life of perseverance is a specific culture of the positive contents of the will of God, and that throughout their whole extent. To this the saints are 'called'; it is the 'heavenly calling' of which they are partakers (1 Co 1², 1 Th 4⁷, Gal 5¹³, 2 P 1³, 2 Th 2¹⁴, He 3¹). Their κλήσις is into a Kingdom of the Divine design, of positive order, ruled in righteousness by and according to His will, a sovereignty in fact as well as in idea, not a domain but a dominion, through its citizens growing in righteousness (Ro 5^{17, 816}, Eph 5^{9, 614}, 1 Ti 6¹¹, 1 Jn 2²⁹, 1 P 1¹⁵, Rev 19⁸). Its content is Christ, and the righteousness is His actual life (1 Co 1³⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁻¹, Ph 3⁹). Its end is 'to be found in him' (Ph 3⁹) and 'by him to be presented blameless, unapproached, without spot' in the end (1 Co 1⁸, 2 P 3¹⁴, Col 1²⁸). There is then a Divine order of life in which the Divine aim is fulfilled, its cardinal power being God's holiness. That holiness, manifested in Christ's Person, presents man's nature in Him as it is in that order. Consequently, all moral effort of believers must be directed towards realizing His mind, imitating His example. His relation to God expresses the whole fullness of the human spirit's energy of which it is competent. Out of His strength of belief in God's holy sovereignty was born His dauntless perseverance. His path His saints pursue. They contemplate the holiness of God in Him, and 'perfect themselves in holiness in the fear of God' (2 Co 7¹); they 'obey the truth' (1 P 1²²), they 'abide in the light' (1 Jn 1⁶ 7) and in the love (4¹⁶).

^{*} Cf. Edwin Hatch's well-known hymn, 'All Saints,' in his Towards Fields of Light: Sacred Poems, London, 1890.

^{*} One indispensable test of Christian perfection which some modern theories, e.g. Wesley's, ignore.

These terms of themselves point to further features of the ideal law: it is not only righteous; it is personal, spiritual, progressive. Its excellency is that it is righteousness primarily and wholly: its highest excellency, that that righteousness is spirit not form, quality not a quantum, and of illimitable outlook—illimitable as God Himself. Its realization partakes of the process of a deepening friendship; the Divine Spirit donates itself to the responsive spirit of man, quickening its growing exercise of faculty, gradually and throughout the whole circumference of the spirit's possible activity. The stronger personality does not override but inspires. As it succeeds increasingly in transferring its own powers to man's, man is conscious of both revelation and regeneration, fresh knowledge and new character. Is it a process of conscious effort, a careful fulfilment of already known arrangements?—Scarcely. An acquaintance is not the product of certain rules, but the unconscious result of much association. The Divine life in man's heart is largely an unconscious growth.* The main factor is association with God in self-surrender. At least His best gifts so come, by 'waiting upon Him.' The deliberate seeking of great experiences for their own sake is unwise, and likely to be unavailing. It follows further that religious duty is a given task, a 'burden' laid on the heart,† which is straitened‡ till it be accomplished. It does not come by subjective calculations but is put upon man as the objective task of doing God's will in that lot and at that moment, even as the thinker devoted to the spirit of truth learns truths, or the artist in love with beauty paints pictures.

A second consequence is that the ideal life is to be found in the moral and spiritual realm. God is a Spirit, and they that seek His life in perseverance must seek Him in the spirit. There is a constant tendency to 'seek Him' by 'searching the Almighty unto perfection' in the grandiose constructions of the speculative intellect. It is imperative to have all speculative intimidations§ removed from the path of perseverance; like Bunyan's lions, they only frighten the pilgrim.

A third consequence is that the ideal life works itself in the orderly, not in the abnormal. The will of God is essentially law. The life of God is not above law, whether in Himself or in His manifestation. His life in the soul of man is not inconsistent with Himself. When He works in us, He works according to law; for which reason His working calls for all our effort. It is His own order of life that He transfers to man; this can be done only through the laws of man's nature of which He is Himself the author. Spiritual blessing is therefore not conferred in any scenic fashion but by power moving along the lines of normal life, and manifesting itself in its products. This is the best of all exaggerated psychological and mystical states: they have no value apart from their moral content and moral effect, they are subject to the law of righteousness.

A fourth consequence is that the ideal life is a principle for all living, not apart from living interests. Religion that is true is not a technicality; it is the Divine presence and agency in life as a whole. It is not a speciality; it is the loyal, loving effort to make the will of God triumphant in all fields of human interest and activity—the soul, the family, society, art, letters. The difference between the elect and non-elect lies not in their sphere of work: they differ in their spirit. The worldling loses himself in the life of sense-things; the believer relates his life to God's order of life and glorifies it by filling it with heroic devotion. To sum up, the life of perseverance is the life of conscience: a life of communion with God through the conscience and its steady enlightenment by His law. All exaltations of inner feeling, raptures, anomalous experiences must pale before the orderly interaction of religious thought, feeling, moral will which this education of conscience entails. Man's predestinarian days are days of conscience,* and aim not at 'religious experiences' but at righteousness.† They lay unchallengeable insistence on the truth that the changed life, the clean heart, the strengthened will, the deeper moral insight, the spirit of uprightness, are alone acceptable to God, the noblest fruits of faith, the prime factors of holiness. This ideal is laid upon men by God, not to impose a harder law, but from His consuming passion to bring them to the fullest life.

(2) Corresponding to the exalted character of the ideal itself is the method of its fulfilment. Its rigour is uncompromising. Its exhortation is incessant. The earnestness with which it is urged and the importance attached to it by each apostle are conspicuous in every Epistle. Remarkable are the energy of the metaphors and the extent and solemnity of the terms employed to characterize it. It is fundamentally the holding fast of a position. Its most notable description is given in Eph 6¹⁰⁻¹⁸, an analysis of which will disclose all the parts that here follow, gathered from the other NT writings. Saints are saints—they occupy the position; they are in the state of grace; their whole attention, devotion, labour, is to keep it, and to stand (Ro 14¹, 1 Co 16¹³, 2 Co 1⁴, Eph 6¹³, Ph 1²⁷ 4¹, 1 Th 3⁸, 1 P 5¹³). St. John's word is 'abide in' (1 Jn 2⁴ 3⁶ 4¹²⁻¹⁶, 2 Jn²); in Hebrews there are various words (2¹ 3⁶ 12¹ 14⁴ 6¹¹ 10² 22²⁸). St James' word is 'unstable', 'wavering' (1⁶ 2⁸); in Revelation it is 'hold fast' (2² 3¹¹; cf. He 4¹⁴ 10²³).

This holding fast involves a two-fold strenuousness: (a) in fighting evil; (b) in reaching out to the goal (the good fight of the faith, the racing in the arena, 1 Ti 6¹², He 12¹; cf. 1 Co 9²⁶, 2 Ti 4⁷, 2 Co 7⁵ 6¹⁴, Eph 6¹², 1 Co 9²⁶, Ph 2¹⁶, 1 P 5³, etc.). The effort is an appeal to every power of the soul: to sobriety (1 Th 5⁸, Tit 2² 4⁸, 1 P 1¹² 4⁷ 5⁸, 1 Ti 2⁹ 15), to watchfulness (Col 4¹, 1 Co 16¹³, 1 Th 5⁸, 1 P 4⁷ 5⁸, 2 Ti 4⁵, Rev 3¹⁶ 16¹⁵, 2 Co 6³, Eph 6¹³), to diligence (He 12¹⁵, 2 P 1¹⁰, 1 Co 15³⁸, Gal 6⁹, Ph 3¹⁴, 2 Th 3¹³, He 6¹², 2 P 3¹⁴), and to progress (He 6¹, etc.); above all to patience and steadfastness (1 Th 1³ 5¹⁴, 2 Th 1⁴, 1 Ti 6¹¹, 2 Ti 3¹⁰, Tit 2², He 10³⁶, 2 P 1⁶, Rev 1⁹ 2² 19, 1 Co 15³⁸, He 3¹⁴ 6¹⁹, 1 P 5⁹, Col 2⁵, 2 P 3¹⁷). It is a steadfastness in faith, truth, hope, love, in the gospel, in all duty, but particularly under trial (Ro 5⁴ 12¹, Ja 1²⁻⁴ 5⁷⁻¹⁰, 1 P 1³ 2²⁰, Rev 13¹⁰ 14¹²). Of so much patience and steadfastness there is need, because the life and the truth in the disciple will be, as in Christ, hated of the world, with a hatred enhanced both by the circumstances of life itself and by the potency of 'the flesh' in themselves. Their loyalty to truth will be confronted by persecution; their loyalty to faith will be confronted by the powers of the world; their loyalty to righteousness will be confronted by the malice of the devil. In

* Cf. Gal 1¹⁶, Ph 3¹⁵.

† The prophetic term.

‡ Lk 12⁵⁰.

§ Apostolic thought is not speculative; in this it is true to its Hebraic ancestry.

¶ The apostles connect their exhortations to practical duties with their previously detailed principles (cf. Rom., 1 Cor., Eph., Col., 1 Peter).

* St. Paul is the author of 'the Christian conscience'; his doctrine, equivalent to 'the πνεῦμα in man,' is his largest contribution to Christian thought. St. Augustine and Luther made notable additions. National life and laws have been enriched most under statesmen influenced by minds like Calvin, Knox, the Pilgrim Fathers.

† Jonathan Edwards, Religious Affections (Works, New York, 1869, iii. 1 ff.).

meeting these, patience, firmness, persistency, exertion of mind, of heart, of will are absolute requisites. Let them maintain themselves in them; as appointed of God for the 'trial of faith.'

Here two points should be specially noted—first, the large sense in which all these terms are used; secondly, the inwardness of trial. What is sobriety?—It applies to the whole nature—every part of which is to be awake; it really means wakefulness.* What is watchfulness?—Again it applies to the whole nature; it is perceptiveness. What is patience?—It is that great-spiritedness which combines eagerness in striving with endurance in suffering. And suffering, what is it?—It at once reveals, confirms, develops faith. The spirit of the true Christian agonistes is slack in no element of its manifold nature; it hesitates at no sacrifice, is ready for all self-denial; it eagerly stretches and strains itself in self-discipline, above all in keeping itself disentangled, to follow after the prize of its high calling in Christ, which the persevering saint knows is within his grasp (2 Ti 4⁸), for God can keep him to it (Ro 14¹).† Slackness in wrestling, on the other hand, involves a loosening of all the parts of the nature which by the grace of perseverance have been girded up, and, according as it is indulged, leads by a variety of stages of lapsing to final apostasy, the total abandonment of the position.‡

3. The maintenance of perseverance by God.—

(1) The life of perseverance construed as above implies the sole maintenance of its actual activity by God Himself. It is a life whose beginning, medium, and consummation proceed from Him, as its ground, motive, and goal. It is the life for man that alone provides the proper meaning to the lower worlds of nature and history—the life for which these are propædæutic and preparatory. It is the life for humanity which alone is adequate to its natural capacities, satisfactory to its native aspirations, and provocative of its noblest heroisms. The modern mind may have moved away from the theological formulation of this persuasion: but not from the persuasion itself. It is learning eagerly the truth of the Divine Immanence in human nature as the key to the interpretation of God's relation to man. How does that idea aid us intellectually in understanding the grace of perseverance?—It unquestionably contains suggestions of real cogency in its conceptions of God and man that render the relation between them more vital than ever and acceptable to modern thought. God is self-impartation; § man is receptivity. Man therefore cannot be himself except in entire dependence on God. The dependence, too, is irresistible and inalienable: even the evil in man's rejection of it is dependent.

(2) The religious persuasion of 'being in perseverance' is the firm assurance that we 'have tasted of the heavenly gift and the powers of the world to come' (He 6⁴⁻⁵). The assurance of eternity in us and for all future life is not an easy assurance when we seek to present the intellectual grounds of it. It is comparatively simple when we turn to the instincts of immortality which spring from the conquest of evil in us. Nothing can rob a man of his sense of individuality, which comes upon him as he passes from a moral victory and his conscience grows. Now that growth is steadfastly maintained in the probation of faith. Every moral conquest brings fresh impulses of moral vigour and hope. Every moral conquest brings fresh revolt against the old forces. Every moral conquest brings fresh certainty of ultimate success. Such results point infallibly to the besetting power being righteous. It is an inescapable environment: even in the instance when not receptivity on man's part, but hostility, is offered, there follows hurt and loss. It is the same power which, obeyed, blesses; disobeyed, blasts.

(3) Let the idea be abandoned that the Divine indwelling is something sensuously presentable or emotionally definable, and it follows that the assurance of God's operation in us is just the inner sense of reality that comes to us in moral living. Nature and grace are not so antithetic as to be incapable of mutual penetration: the step is easy to discover the need of grace to the best nature—that at least is the predestinarian's plea. Holy love or righteousness, he argues, is the root of all life. For it all Nature is foreordained, prepared. For human life it is the one true formative force. In communion with God the springs of true life are unsealed. But holy love is of a higher nature than emotion: it denotes that quality in the nature of God that impels Him irresistibly to give Himself to His creatures. Hence in every spiritual fact attending on communion with Him, there is a momentum to moral duty. Thus here we stand. God, besetting all, moves all. His movement invites response from every single will; He waits on the start of our effort. That is not to take away from Him the initiative in salvation. Our effort is the beginning of His gift, the first stirring of 'the grace that is in us' from Him, and which can be ours in no other way. And so, after the start, throughout the whole of our moral growth, every new stirring in us is of our effort and of His gift and increase (Ph 2¹³). We are never from first to last simple quietistic receivers of something infused. So indissolubly has God made us for Himself that we are the bearers (θεοφόροι), because incorporators, of a growing life which God quickens, as light awakes Nature and love the heart. Can such a condition be conceived of as intermittent?

LITERATURE.—Besides the works referred to in the body of the article, the reader should consult theological text-books in connexion with Grace. There are articles in Schaff-Herzog (C. A. Beckwith), CE (J. F. Sollier), HDB (G. Ferries). On modern views consult R. Eucken, Christianity and the New Idealism, Eng. tr., London and New York, 1909; J. R. Illingworth, Christian Character, London, 1904.

A. S. MARTIN.

PERSIS (Περσίς, a Greek name).—Persis is a woman saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹². She is described as 'the beloved' (τῇ ἀγαπητῇ), by which may be meant a personal convert and disciple of the Apostle (see C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i.² [1897] 394) or one closely associated with him in his work. If so, it may be with intentional delicacy that St. Paul has so described her and not as 'my beloved,' the term which he applies to three men whom he salutes (Epænetus [v.⁵], Ampliatus [v.⁸], Stachys [v.⁹]). On the other hand, 'the beloved' may indicate not personal relationship to the Apostle but the affection in which Persis was held by the whole Church to which she belonged and in which she 'laboured much in the Lord' (ἦν πολλὰ ἐκοπίασεν ἐν κυρίῳ). This further description completes our information with regard to Persis. It is noteworthy that the verb κοπίαν, which suggests painstaking effort, is used in Ro 16 only of women—of Mary (v.⁶), of Tryphæna and Tryphosa (v.¹²), and that the description of Persis includes the terms used of these, viz. πολλὰ ἐκοπίασεν (Mary), κοπιῶσας ἐν κυρίῳ (Tryphæna and Tryphosa). Elsewhere κοπίαν is employed to describe the Apostle's missionary labours (1 Co 15¹⁰, Gal 4¹¹, Ph 2¹⁶, Col 1²⁹), as well as the manual toil involved (1 Co 4¹², Eph 4²⁸);

* See an admirable sermon of F. W. Farrar in Sermons and Addresses in America, London, 1892, p. 15.

† Cf. Calvin's saying, 'The Christian may know thirst but not drought.'

‡ Apostasy = ἀπόστασις.

§ Jonathan Edwards' profound idea of the Divine nature: Dissertation on the End for which God created the World (Works, 4 vols., New York, 1869, vol. II. p. 193 ff.).

also the work of the leaders of the Church at Thessalonica (1 Th 5¹³), of Christians like those who formed 'the household of Stephanas' (1 Co 16¹⁶), and of certain elders in 1 Ti 5¹⁷ 'who labour in the word and in teaching.' It is therefore impossible to regard the work of Persis and of the other women as limited to practical benevolence, such as the showing of hospitality. The aorist, in contrast to the present used in the same verse of the labours of Tryphæna and Tryphosa, may point to some definite occasion of special importance in the past; or we may suppose that Persis was an aged woman whose active work was over. The sphere in which we shall picture her activities will be determined by our acceptance of the Roman or Ephesian destination of these salutations. The name Persis does not appear in inscriptions of the Imperial household.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

PERSON OF CHRIST.—See CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY.

PETER.—1. Names.—Peter is known by four different names in the NT. By far the most common designation is simply 'Peter' (20 times in Mt., 18 times in Mk., 15 times in Lk., 16 times in Jn., 52 times in Ac., twice in Gal. [2²⁴], and once in 1 Pet. [1¹]). 'Simon,' standing alone, occurs less frequently (twice in Mt., 5 times in Mk., 10 times in Lk., once in Jn.), and 'Symeon' but once (Ac 15¹⁴).^{*} With two exceptions (Gal 2¹⁴), 'Cephas' is the term uniformly employed by St. Paul (1 Co 1¹² 3²² 9¹⁵, Gal 1¹⁸ 2⁹, 11. 13); and John once speaks of 'Cephas' (which is by interpretation, Peter') (1⁴²). 'Simon' and 'Peter' sometimes stand in conjunction with one another (3 times in Mt., once in Mk., twice in Lk., 18 times in Jn., 4 times in Acts, and once in 2 Pet. (1¹), where 'Symeon' rather than 'Simon' is, however, the better attested reading [NAKLP et al.]). Of the various names, 'Symeon' ('Simeon') and 'Cephas' are Semitic in origin, while 'Simon' and 'Peter' are Greek. 'Symeon' (Συμεων) appears frequently in the LXX as the rendering of the Heb. שִׁמְעוֹן (Shim'on = Simeon); but, since it is applied to Peter at most only twice in the NT (Ac 15¹⁴, 2 P 1¹), it can hardly have been his real name. In these two instances the usage, if not accidental, may have been designed to add solemnity and force to the narrative, and was made all the easier because the Greek 'Simon' (Σίμων), the name by which Peter probably had been known from childhood, was so like the Hebrew in sound. But among the Jews in Hellenistic times the Hebrew name had been largely supplanted by the Greek, and the latter was even written in Semitic characters (פֶּטְרוֹס). Some examples of Jews with the Greek name are Simon the Maccabæan, although his great-grandfather was called 'Symeon' (1 Mac 2³); Simon the son of Onias (Sir 50¹); a certain Benjamite (2 Mac 3⁴); and Simon Chosameus (1 Es 9³²). In Josephus' writings Jewish persons are very frequently called 'Simon,' less often 'Symeon.' Both names seem to have been employed, and usually with discrimination, by Jews in the Hellenistic period; but 'Simon' was the more common, and this in all probability was the Apostle's original name. In the Apostolic Age, however, he was known chiefly by his surname, 'Peter.' That this usage had been established already within the primitive Aramaic-speaking community is amply attested by St. Paul's frequent 'Cephas' (Κηφᾶς), a Græcized transliteration of the Aramaic כֶּפְּאָ (Kephā'), which when translated into Greek becomes 'Peter' (Πέτρος, 'stone').

There is some uncertainty as to the exact circumstances under which the Apostle first received this appellation. According to Mk 3¹⁶, Lk 6¹⁴, early in his Galilæan ministry Jesus set apart the Twelve to be His helpers and gave Simon the surname Peter (καὶ ἐπέθηκεν ὄνομα τῷ Σίμωνι Πέτρον). In referring to the same incident, Matthew (10²) speaks of 'the so-called Peter' (ὁ λεγόμενος Πέτρος), but seemingly intends to make the Apostle's famous confession at Cæsarea Philippi the occasion for the Messiah to bestow upon him the name 'Peter' and to designate him formal head of the Church (Mt 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹). In the Gospel of John, when Simon was first brought to Jesus, the latter exclaimed, 'Thou art to be called Cephas' (σου κληθήσῃ Κηφᾶς [1⁴²]), probably meaning from this time forth, since John does not recur to this subject and henceforth always (except in 21) uses 'Peter' either alone (16 times) or in conjunction with 'Simon' (18 times). Finally, there are intimations, though these are very vague, that the special recognition of Simon's supremacy may at one time have rested upon his early belief in Jesus' resurrection. He was generally thought to have been the first disciple to see—if not to believe in (Jn 20⁸)—the Risen Lord (1 Co 15⁵, Mk 16⁷, Lk 24³⁴), and, as St. Paul had attained apostleship through a similar vision, so Peter had been 'energized' for his work as an apostle (Gal 2⁸). There is here no statement that Simon received his surname on this occasion—indeed, he is already known as 'Peter' (or 'Cephas') in this connexion—but it is possible that his initial vision, which made him the corner-stone of the new community, established, if not for the first time, at least more completely, the custom of referring to him as 'Peter.' The infrequency of the word as a proper name at that time, and the fact that 'Simon' would readily have served all ordinary needs either in Jewish or in Christian circles, make it still more evident that the designation 'Cephas' (Peter) was called forth by special circumstances, uncertain though some of the details may be at present. The usage undoubtedly originated early, probably in the lifetime of Jesus; and the significance of the appellation was at the outset, or soon became, intimately associated with Peter's prominent position within the company of early disciples.

2. Peter in the NT writings.—The earliest literature preserved from apostolic times, the letters of St. Paul, contains explicit and important information about Peter. These documents do not, to be sure, purport to give any detailed account of his career, and the data which they do preserve are usually incidental to other interests, but this very fact makes the information all the more significant. St. Paul's statements clearly represent items of general knowledge current at that early date regarding 'Cephas.' While St. Paul's references are relatively few in number, they contain implications of much importance. Peter is seen to have been the first to obtain a vision of the Risen Lord (1 Co 15⁵); and thus from the outset he occupied a position of primacy in the community and was also first among the apostles, while St. Paul reckons himself last (1 Co 15⁹). St. Paul vigorously resented the insinuation of his enemies, to the effect that Peter's chronological priority carried with it a superior authority, particularly for Gentile Christians; but, on the other hand, St. Paul did not think his apostleship or mission at all different in kind or superior in authority as compared with that of Peter. The seducers in Galatia were not really preaching Peter's gospel—they were perverting it (Gal 1⁷); it was as truly founded upon faith in Jesus the Messiah as was St. Paul's (Gal 2¹⁶); and both apostles had been equipped in the same authoritative way for the performance of their respective apostolic duties (Gal 2⁹). Peter had been commissioned to preach the gospel to the Jews, and this work must have seemed to St. Paul quite as important as—perhaps in some respects more important than—his own specific task of Gentile evangelization. He never doubted that God's primary concern was for the welfare of the Jews, and that He had even designed them to be the ultimate heirs of the Kingdom, notwithstanding their temporary rejection of the gospel (Ro 11). In the meantime, the Gentiles were reaping the profits to be derived from the Jews' rejection, St. Paul being especially commissioned to carry on this temporary enterprise of evangelizing the Gentiles, but the original and fundamental task was still Peter's.

^{*} Peter is not to be confused with other 'Simons' mentioned in the NT, e.g. the 'Cananean' (Mt 10⁴, Mk 3¹³), who is also called 'the Zealot' (Lk 6¹⁵, Ac 1¹³), the brother of Jesus (Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³), the Pharisee (Lk 7⁴⁰ 43²), the man of Cyrene (Mt 27³², Mk 15²¹, Lk 23²⁶), the father of Judas (Jn 6⁷¹ 12¹³ 13²⁶), the 'Great' (Ac 8⁹, 13. 13. 24), the 'tanner' (Ac 9⁴³ 10⁶ 17. 37); or with other 'Symeons,' e.g. of Jerusalem (Lk 22³⁴), one of Jesus' ancestors (Lk 3³⁰), 'Niger' (Ac 13⁴), the patriarch (Rev 7⁷).

The importance of this phase of St. Paul's thinking—an item sometimes obscured by a too one-sided emphasis upon the legalistic controversy—is further attested by the high estimate he continues to place upon Judaism, and the value he attaches to Christianity's Jewish connexions. The Jew has had the advantage in every way (Ro 3¹ 9¹⁶), and St. Paul's ancestry entitles him to a full share in that advantage (Ro 11¹, 2 Co 11²², Ph 3⁵). True, his ancestral heritage must now be brought to its proper consummation in the new faith, toward which all the Divine purposes down through the ages had been tending. From St. Paul's point of view it was altogether essential, however, that Christianity should have had this Jewish origin; and so it was especially fitting, he thought, that those olive branches which had been temporarily severed from the Jewish trunk—as was the case with all Jews who rejected Christianity—should one day be restored to their rightful place along with the few wild olive branches that had in the meantime been grafted upon the native stock (Ro 11¹⁷). It fell to Peter's lot to engage in the work of preserving, or restoring, the original branches, a work with which St. Paul was in full sympathy and to which he would gladly have given himself at all costs had circumstances permitted (Ro 9³). Hence it is not strange that he should cite the Jewish churches as models (1 Th 2¹⁴), that he should refer with manifest satisfaction to their approval of his initial missionary activities (Gal 1²⁴), that he should reckon his own evangelizing activity as formally beginning at Jerusalem (Ro 15¹⁹), that he should take occasion to pay Peter a two weeks' visit in Jerusalem (Gal 1¹⁸), or that he should in all sincerity seek the approval of the Jerusalem Church upon his Gentile work (Gal 2¹⁵). Furthermore, his high estimate of the Jewish community's significance found very tangible expression in the collection, which was no mere perfunctory keeping of a past agreement, but an expression of genuine appreciation of the Jewish Christians' willingness to share their special prerogatives with the Gentiles who fulfilled the condition of faith (Gal 2¹⁰, Ro 15²⁶⁻²⁸). These facts must be borne in mind when attempting to evaluate St. Paul's testimony to the significance of Peter's position in the early history of Christianity. It is quite erroneous to conclude, as some interpreters have done, that St. Paul's controversy with the legalists really meant any conscious effort on his part to oppose or to supplant Peter, whose unique position in the early community and whose leadership in the work of evangelizing the Jews are clearly attested and highly esteemed by St. Paul.

Unfortunately, St. Paul did not have occasion to mention Peter as often as we could wish; consequently, the latter's career cannot be restored with any degree of fullness from the Pauline letters.

Whether he was among the apostles in Jerusalem, whom St. Paul, had he so chosen, might have visited immediately after his conversion (Gal 1¹⁷), is not clear; but three years later he was there and entertained St. Paul for two weeks (Gal 1¹⁸). He was also in Jerusalem fourteen years later, when the legalistic controversy was going on (Gal 2¹⁻¹⁰). Soon afterwards, perhaps accompanying St. Paul and Barnabas on their return, he came to Antioch in Syria, where his reactionary attitude upon the question of table-fellowship with Gentiles evoked St. Paul's vigorous censure. An incidental reference to Peter as a travelling missionary accompanied by his wife and deriving support from those to whom he ministered (1 Co 9⁵), and mention of a Cephas-party in Corinth (1 Co 1¹² 3²²), complete the list of Pauline data. These scanty particulars do not permit of any very extended interpretation, yet they do make it clear that Peter was prominent in the counsels of the mother Church, that he continued to prosecute his work as an evangelist, and that his fame had reached even to Asia Minor and Greece early in the fifties.

Of the remaining Christian literature produced in apostolic times, the Gospels and Acts are the most important for our present purpose. In the first part of Acts, Peter is the leader of the apostolic company, and in the Gospels he occupies a position of prominence, commensurate with the dominant part he subsequently played in the life of the early Christian community. Remembering the ample attestation of Peter's prominence given by his contemporary St. Paul, it is not at all surprising that the evangelists, in selecting gospel tradition and giving it written form, should mention Peter frequently and assign him a position second only to that of Jesus. His name does not appear in any of the non-Marcian sections common to Matthew and Luke (i.e. in the Logia [Q]), but in Mark he is a conspicuous figure from first to last. He, with his brother Andrew, is the first to answer Jesus' call to discipleship (1¹⁶); they entertain Him at their home in Capernaum, where He heals Simon's mother-in-law (1²⁹); and the company of the disciples is now known as 'Simon and those with him' (1³⁶). He heads the list of the Twelve (3¹⁶), he is named first among the favoured few to witness the raising of Jairus' daughter (5³⁷), he is granted similar favours at the time of the Transfiguration (9-), and in Gethsemane on the night of the betrayal (14²⁹), and it is to him in particular that the women are instructed to announce the resurrection of Jesus (16⁷). On several occasions he is chief spokesman for the disciples, and is mentioned first among those receiving private instructions or explanations (8²⁹ 9⁵ 10²³ 11²¹ 13³). Notices which reflect somewhat unfavourably upon him are also preserved. Although he is the first of the Twelve to affirm belief in Jesus' Messiahship, his failure to understand the true Messianic programme calls forth a sharp rebuke from Jesus (8³¹); he is found asleep when left on duty in Gethsemane (14³⁷); and during the course of Jesus' trial Peter persistently denies his Master (14⁶⁸⁻⁷²).

With the exception of a few alterations and supplements, Matthew and Luke take over most of the Marcan statements regarding Peter. Matthew omits the paragraph in which 'Simon and those with him' seek Jesus to tell Him that the people of Capernaum desire His return to the city (Mk 1³⁶), nothing is said of Peter's accompanying Jesus when the latter raised the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5³⁷), and Peter's name is expunged from the instructions given to the women by the angel at the tomb of Jesus (Mk 16⁷). These omissions are relatively insignificant when compared with the main body of Marcan material which Matthew has preserved. The additional data of Matthew are more important, especially the paragraph supplementing Mark's account of Peter's confession (Mt 16¹¹⁻¹⁹). In comparison with this incident, the other chief Petrine additions of Matthew — Peter's walking on the water (14^{28,29}), and the story of the coin found in the fish's mouth (17²⁴⁻²⁷) — are of only secondary interest. Into Mark's narrative of Peter's confession, otherwise copied rather closely, Matthew interjects three verses, ascribing Peter's exceptional perceptive powers to revelation, designating him the corner-stone of the Church, and committing to his keeping the keys of the Kingdom. These statements are manifestly Matthaean insertions, for they do not stand in Mark, which Matthew is copying in both the preceding and the following contexts, nor do they appear in Luke, where the Marcan narrative at this point is also followed. But from what source the First Evangelist derived his information, and whether the words were actually spoken by Jesus, are much-debated problems. The balance of critical opinion at present inclines to the view that this tradition arose subsequently to the death of Jesus and at a time when the first vivid expectations of an imminent catastrophic end of the present world were being displaced by a growing interest in ecclesiasticism. However this may be, it is perfectly clear from Matthew's language that Peter had lost none of the prestige which was his in St. Paul's day, while his exact position with reference to all other Christians and to the Christian organization itself has been more specifically defined.

Luke furnishes scarcely any additional data to shed light upon the apostolic estimate of Peter. The Marcan account of the disciples' call is omitted in favour of another tradition somewhat richer in descriptive details (Lk 5¹⁻¹¹; cf. Mk 1¹⁶⁻²⁰); and in the account of Peter's denial Luke seems to be following a slightly different source, yet the variations are formal rather than essential so far as the portrayal of Peter is concerned (Lk 22³¹⁻⁶; cf. Mk 14²⁸⁻⁷²). In copying Mark's account of the Caesarea-Philippi incident, Luke omits the closing verses which tell of Jesus' upbraiding Peter for his presumption in attempting to regulate the Messiah's conduct (Mk 8^{32ff.}). Similarly, in Luke's version of the Gethsemane incident Peter is not singled out for rebuke as in Mark (Lk 22²⁶; cf. Mk 14²⁷). Nor does Luke report the special message of the angel to Peter, telling him that he will see the Risen Lord in Galilee (Lk 24⁷; cf. Mk 16⁷), because Luke records only Judæan appearances; but he does note that the first appearance was made to Peter (Lk 24³⁴).

It is in the early chapters of Acts that Peter's portrait is drawn most distinctly. He heads the list of the Eleven, and takes the initiative in the election of a successor to Judas (1^{13, 15}). He is also the chief speaker on the Day of Pentecost (2^{14ff.}), the immediate agent in healing the lame beggar at the Temple gate (3¹⁻¹⁰), and the principal defender of the new faith during the subsequent period of persecution (e.g. 3^{12ff.}, 4^{ff.}, 5^{29ff.}). His miraculous activity is especially noticeable. Ananias and Sapphira fall dead at his word (5³⁻¹⁰), and he stands out so prominently among the apostolic wonder-workers that apparently his very shadow possesses therapeutic power (5¹⁻¹⁶). He is next seen in Samaria, where he represents the Jerusalem Church in supervising and bringing to completion the evangelistic work of Philip (8¹⁴⁻²⁵). Then we are told of missionary enterprises conducted by Peter himself 'throughout all parts' (9³²), and particularly of his wonderful miracles performed at Joppa (9³³⁻⁴¹). Here he experienced his remarkable vision, in which God showed him that he 'should not call any man common or unclean,' with the result that he went freely to the house of the Gentile Cornelius, preaching that God is no respecter of persons. Accordingly, Peter baptized Cornelius and his friends, thus establishing the first company of Gentile Christians (10). On returning to Jerusalem, Peter is criticized for having eaten with the uncircumcised, but he presents so adequate a defence of his conduct that the Jerusalem Church ultimately glorifies God for the establishment of Gentile missions through his work (11¹⁻¹⁸). Later we learn of his arrest and imprisonment by Herod Agrippa I., and his miraculous release, after which 'he departed and went to another place' (12¹⁻¹⁹). He is in Jerusalem again at the time of the Council, where he affirms, and James reiterates, that 'a good while ago God made choice among you, that by my mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of the gospel, and believe' (15⁷⁻¹⁴). At this point Peter disappears completely from the history of the Apostolic Age as recorded in Acts.

In the Fourth Gospel, likewise, Peter is a conspicuous figure, though he does not always occupy so unquestionably pre-eminent a position as in the Synoptists and early chapters of Acts. In the assembling of the first group of believers his brother Andrew takes precedence over him (1⁴⁰⁻⁴⁴), and is also spokesman for the disciples on the occasion of the miraculous feeding (6⁵). But Andrew is each time identified as the 'brother of Simon Peter,' thus implying that the latter was really the better known. He is also foremost in John's account of the disciples' confession of belief in Jesus (6⁶⁸); and, as in the Synoptists, it is Peter who objects on a certain occasion to Jesus' procedure—this time the act of foot-washing (13⁶⁻⁹). Peter's denial is also recorded by John (13³⁶, 18¹⁷⁻²⁷), and his impetuosity is displayed in cutting off the ear of the high priest's servant (18^{10ff.}). But Peter's prominence is rivalled by that of the unnamed disciple 'whom Jesus loved.' He, together with Andrew, was the first to follow Jesus (1³⁵); he had the position of honour at the Last Supper (13²⁴); he was acquainted with the high priest, and so procured Peter's admission to the court (18¹⁵); and he seems to have anticipated Peter in believing that Jesus had risen from the dead (20²⁻⁸). In the so-called appendix to John (21) Simon Peter is the chief actor, but the beloved disciple standing in the background is certainly a formidable rival for the honour of first place.

Except in the salutations of the two Epistles commonly ascribed to Peter, there is no further mention of his name in the NT. For one who evidently occupied so prominent a place in the life and thinking of the Apostolic Age, the amount of information about him preserved in the literature of the period is relatively meagre. St. Paul's statements are exceedingly fragmentary; the Gospels do not, of course, pretend to give information about apostolic history, yet indirectly they furnish some indications of how Peter was regarded at the time the documents were being produced; and Acts, while tolerably full in its description of Peter's earlier activities, consigns him to absolute oblivion after the Jerusalem Council. It is not at all probable that so important an individual would thus suddenly drop completely out of sight in the actual history of the Christian movement, nor can we assume that the information supplied by our extant NT sources is at all exhaustive—to say nothing of the difficulty of harmonizing what sometimes appear to be striking discrepancies.

3. Peter's earlier activities.—A resume of such facts as are apparently beyond dispute yields a very definite picture of Peter's earlier activities, notwithstanding some uncertainty in details. He was a Galilean fisherman living in Capernaum when Jesus began His public ministry. Soon after coming into contact with Jesus he abandoned his business as a fisherman in order to accompany the new Teacher on His preaching tours. How Jesus, who had left His carpenter's bench, and Peter and others, who had similarly forsaken their ordinary daily pursuits to engage in this new enterprise, now supported themselves and their families is not clear from our present sources of information; but this uncertainty can hardly reflect any serious doubt upon the fact of their procedure. Peter was one of the most prominent members in the company of disciples, and so strongly did Jesus and His work appeal to him that he saw in the new movement foreshadowings of the long-looked-for Messianic Kingdom, and ultimately he identified Jesus with the Messiah. But Peter's conception of the Messiah's programme underwent some radical readjustments in the course of time. At first his view seems to have been largely of the political nationalistic type—the earthly Jesus would some day don Messianic robes and set up the new Kingdom. In this schema there was no place for Jesus' death, hence that event proved a stunning blow to Peter's faith. According to one tradition, regarded by many scholars as the more reliable, he returned disappointed to Galilee, where he probably intended to resume his work of fishing. Doubtless he had still kept his home in Capernaum, and thither he would naturally go after his great disillusionment. Then came the experience which constituted the real turning-point in his life: he saw his Master alive again—no longer an earthly but now a heavenly Being. This vision gave him a solution of his difficulties, since it enabled him to resume his belief in Jesus' Messiahship and look forward to the establishment of the new Kingdom. It necessitated, however, considerable readjustment in his thinking, for the Messiah in whom he now believed was not an earthly figure who would demonstrate the validity of His claims by leading a revolt against the Romans; He was a heavenly apocalyptic Being who would come on the clouds in glory when the day arrived for the final establishment of God's rule upon earth.

This new way of thinking gave Peter a new conception of his mission. Now he, and the other disciples, must make haste in gathering members for the new Kingdom. Actuated by the genuinely altruistic motive of mediating this new knowledge to their Jewish kinsmen, and desiring to fulfil as quickly as possible the conditions preliminary to the Kingdom's coming, they began a vigorous preaching activity to propagate the new faith. Whatever doubts may be entertained regarding the verbal accuracy of the speeches of Peter recorded in Acts, the accuracy of the main content is hardly to be disputed, so far at least as the interpretation of Jesus' Messiahship is concerned. Here we have a primitive stage of thinking, when the expectation of the Coming is vivid, and when Christians have not yet come to see—as they did in later times—that Jesus had made an adequate display of His Messiahship while He was still upon earth. In these early discourses of Peter attention is fixed upon the future: the real manifestation of the Messiah is an affair of the future, and the Jews are exhorted to repent so that God may send Jesus to discharge His full Messianic functions (Ac 3^{19c}). While upon earth He had been a 'Servant'—a highly honoured messenger of God—who conducted a propaganda of preparatory prophetic preaching (Ac 3^{1s, 22-26}); He had been a 'man approved of God by mighty works and wonders and signs, which God did by him' (Ac 2²²), the great and ultimate sign of Divine approval being the elevation of Jesus to a position of heavenly Messianic dignity and lordship through the Resurrection (2³⁴). Since the Messiah's coming awaited the restoration of all things (3²¹), Peter threw himself energetically into the task of preaching the restorative message. Henceforth this constituted, both for him and for his companions, their great mission, and in this propaganda Peter was undoubtedly the leader. The general situation described in Acts is corroborated by St. Paul when he affirms that Peter had been especially equipped for carrying on the work of Jewish missions (Gal 2⁸).

Peter's equipment consisted not merely in some new command received from the Risen Lord, or in a new stock of Messianic beliefs; he now possessed a new power, an endowment by the Holy Spirit, as the first believers called it. This phase of the new community's life, as described in the Pentecostal experience of Ac 2, has doubtless been somewhat formalized; but that the early disciples, in the glow of their new faith in the Risen Lord, did experience an elation of feeling which sometimes expressed itself in ecstasy and the performance of miracles, seems beyond question.* In Jewish thinking the work of the Holy Spirit had already come to be very closely associated with the Messiah and His Kingdom. Isaiah had pictured the ideal ruler as one who would be richly endowed by the Spirit (11² 41¹ 61^{1a}), and Joel (2^{28a}) predicted, among the displays to precede the advent of the Messianic Age, an outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh, equipping the sons and daughters of Israel with power to prophesy and inspiring dreams and visions in the old and young. Later Jewish Messianic literature retained and heightened this emphasis upon the functions of the Spirit. Enoch represented the Messiah as a spiritually endowed being (49⁴ 62³), and according to the Testament of Judah this pneumatic Messiah would similarly equip his subjects (Judah, 24; cf. Levi, 18). It was perfectly natural that the disciples, who had now come to believe in Jesus as the Messiah elevated upon His throne in heaven, should become conscious of the new power which was theirs by right of membership in the new Kingdom about to be more fully revealed. Their inherited Jewish thinking, together with their visions of the Risen Jesus, supplied a very fitting background for the Pentecostal phenomenon. In view of Peter's pre-eminence in the early community, we may safely assume that he was one of the first to attain this type of experience.

This unique spiritual endowment normally expressed itself in miraculous activities. On this subject it may be well to supplement the generous testimony of Acts with the somewhat less extravagant, but quite specific, corroborative evidence from St. Paul. Christianity as a historical phenomenon is defined by him largely in terms of spiritual endowment, with its resultant activities. While all Christians share the one Spirit in common, its power is manifested variously in different persons, and among these manifestations 'miracles' and 'gifts of healings' occupy a prominent place (1 Co 12²⁸). In controverting his opponents St. Paul appeals especially to miracles as the unique differentia of the new religion and the final evidence of his own right to be reckoned among the genuine apostles. In denouncing the Judaizers' gospel of the flesh St. Paul (Gal 3⁵) asks the Galatians a test question designed to prove beyond doubt the genuineness of his gospel of the Spirit: 'He therefore that supplieth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?' Nor was this miraculous power peculiar to the Christianity of St. Paul, for he replies to his opponents in Corinth:

* See S. J. Case, Evolution of Early Christianity, Chicago, 1914, p. 127 ff.

'In nothing was I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I am nothing. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, by signs and wonders and mighty works' (2 Co 12¹⁴). Thus the power to work 'miracles' (δυνάμεις) was an inherent characteristic of the new religion, and the exercise of this function belonged particularly to its leaders, among whom Peter had pre-eminence.

Miracles were performed in the name of Jesus, who had been exalted to a position of peculiar authority in the angelic realm. All sickness, especially demon possession, and death itself were believed to be the result of Satanic activity within the present evil age; but now that Jesus had been elevated to a position of heavenly Lordship, His spiritually endowed followers were equipped with a new authority. When they spoke in Jesus' name they could heal the sick, cast out demons, and even raise the dead. This unique efficacy of the 'Name' (q.v.), as a characteristic of the new religion, is clearly evident in St. Paul. Christians are those who call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Co 1²); sinning members of the community are delivered over to Satan in the name, and so through the authority, of our Lord Jesus (5⁴); and God has exalted Jesus to a position of authority so supreme that every knee is to bend 'in the name of Jesus' (Ph 2⁹). Peter not only shared this belief in the exaltation of Jesus, but was commonly credited with having been the first to receive convincing proof of this fact; and there can be no reasonable doubt that he performed miracles in the name of Jesus. The words put into Peter's mouth by Acts, to the effect that the lame man had been cured through the efficacy of Jesus' powerful name (Ac 3¹⁶), are wholly consonant with the primitive situation when Peter was prominent in the activities of the new spiritual community.

This procedure soon caused him and his associates serious trouble. Belief in dynamic personalities, the use of whose name enabled one to effect wonders, was already a familiar phenomenon to the Jews,* and was viewed with some suspicion by the authorities. Since Jews who adopted magical practices of any sort were strongly tempted to employ names of heathen deities in their formulæ of exorcism and the like, it had been decreed in the Law that 'whosoever doeth these things is an abomination to Jahweh': Israel's God is alone worthy of recognition (Dt 18⁹; cf. Ex 20⁷, Lv 19²⁶, 21²⁰, Is 26, Jer 27², Ezk 20²⁶, Mal 3⁵, Philo, de Spec. leg. i.). When Christians, believing in Jesus' Lordship, proceeded to use His powerful name, the Jewish authorities naturally suspected them of violating the Deuteronomic Law, and questioned them to learn by what authority, by what 'name,' they performed their wonders (Ac 3¹², 16 47-10). Peter replied that the Christians were not breaking the Law, but were bringing it to fulfilment, because Jesus was that Prophet to whom Moses had referred in the Deuteronomic context as the One to whom Israel should listen. His elevation to heaven was said to justify this affirmation, hence it was quite proper to work miracles in His 'name' (Ac 3²²; cf. Dt 18¹⁸). But the Jews were unwilling to accept Peter's interpretation of Moses, and consequently they tried to restrain the Christians' dynamic activities.

Doubtless also the content of Peter's preaching aroused opposition at a relatively early date. This would be particularly true of his insistence upon Jesus' elevation to a position of Lordship in the angelic sphere. Acts intimates that the Christians' preaching about the Resurrection caused offence to the Sadducees (4-), but the reverence with which early believers regarded the Risen Jesus might easily seem to many Jews to endanger the supremacy of Jahweh. Apparently this was one of the most important items inciting St. Paul's persecution, judging from those phases of the new religion which he sets in the foreground after his conversion. That which he most vigorously antagonized as a persecutor was very probably the thing which he later set forth as the characteristic feature of his new faith. This was confession of Jesus' Lordship, based upon belief in His resurrection. This was the distinctive mark of the new movement, the fundamental condition for the attainment of salvation (Ro 1⁴ 10⁹, 1 Co 15⁵⁴, Gal 1¹ 12²). St. Paul adopted so thoroughly this phase of his predecessors' thinking that he even taught his Gentile converts the characteristic prayer of the Aramaic-speaking Christians, Marana tha ('Our Lord, come!') (1 Co 16²²). This prayer was especially appropriate on the lips of Peter and his companions in those early days of persecution when Jesus was expected to appear suddenly as Messiah and vindicate the faith of His loyal disciples.

4. Peter's later activities, as reported in the NT.—Such in general are some of the more evident items in Peter's career during the earlier years of apostolic history. Of his later activities we are less well informed, and the information which has been preserved is sometimes difficult to interpret. To begin with, what were the relative positions of Peter and James in the Jerusalem Church? While Peter is manifestly the most prominent person in the early chapters of Acts, the name of John is sometimes mentioned as one of the leaders of the new cause (e.g. 1³ 3¹², 4¹³ 8¹⁴), but James is never once singled out for notice. Not until Peter goes to 'another place' does Acts hint that James takes precedence in the Jerusalem community (12¹⁷), and henceforth he appears to be the generally acknowledged leader (15¹⁴, 21¹⁸). Yet his presence among the believers at a much earlier date is attested by St. Paul, who remarks that James—in all probability meaning the Lord's brother—was the one to witness Jesus' fourth appearance (1 Co 15⁷). He was also a member of the new brotherhood when St. Paul, three years after his conversion, paid a visit to Peter in Jerusalem (Gal 1¹⁸). At the time of the Jerusalem Council he was not only the head of the Church (Gal 2⁹), but was so influential that his objections caused both Peter and Barnabas to withdraw from their former liberal position (Gal 2¹¹⁻¹³). Thus from St. Paul's statements it becomes clear that Peter and James were both present in the early company of believers, that the former was the leader in the earliest period of the history, and that James by the middle of the century had become the actual head of the mother church.

But neither St. Paul nor Acts gives the particulars of the process which issued in this result. For an answer to this problem we must rely upon inference, supplemented by later tradition. Eusebius (HE II. i. 3) states, on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, that Peter, James (the brother of John), and John, not coveting honour for themselves, chose James to be bishop of Jerusalem soon after Jesus' ascension; but so formal an appointment at this early date is hardly probable. It is far more likely that a gradual development of circumstances produced the later situation in which James supplanted Peter. Peter's work as an evangelist and the opposition which his public preaching aroused among the Jews probably resulted in his leaving the city for longer and longer periods, so that the task of local leadership devolved increasingly upon James. The Jewish opposition which broke out afresh under Herod Agrippa I., and from which Peter barely escaped with his life, was the occasion of his going to 'another place' after he had sent James a message regarding the situation (Ac 12¹⁷). It has been conjectured with some degree of plausibility that James became actual head of the Jerusalem Church about this time. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. v. 43) reports a tradition to the effect that Jesus had instructed the apostles to preach to Israel for twelve years before going forth to the world—which may signify that the original apostles' departure from Jerusalem, thus leaving James in charge, was virtually coincident with Herod's persecution. But aside from the question of the historicity of Clement's tradition, James probably supplanted Peter in Jerusalem about this time. This seems to be the most satisfactory explanation of the NT data. James's blood relationship to Jesus would give him a unique position among Christians, and his vision of the Risen Lord would add to his prestige, while his conservative attitude toward Judaism would be a valuable asset to the community in those days of persecution (cf. Eusebius, HE ii. xxiii. 1 ff.). The impetuous Peter sought other fields of activity. Yet we must not assume that there was any rivalry between these two individuals, notwithstanding the contrasts in their personalities. Between the extremes of Pauline liberalism and Jacobean conservatism Peter (and Barnabas) sometimes vacillated, but on the whole they seem to have inclined toward the position of James.

* See W. Heitmüller, Im Namen Jesu, Göttingen, 1903, p. 132 ff.

A second problem left unsolved by our NT information is the question of Peter's real attitude toward the Gentile missionary enterprise. According to Ac 10 f., he had been instructed by God in a vision not to call any man common or unclean, and as a result he went to the house of Cornelius, where he ate with Gentiles and established a Gentile church. On returning to Jerusalem he was arraigned for his conduct, but presented so strong a defence that the mother Church glorified God for the conversion of the Gentiles accomplished through Peter's action. St. Paul, on the other hand, in writing to the Galatians, represents that this problem had been fought out—manifestly for the first time, as St. Paul describes it—over the missionary activities of himself and Barnabas. Even then it was merely the question of admission, and not the question of table-fellowship, that had been discussed at Jerusalem. Not until later, when Peter came to Antioch, did the latter question become acute, and then Peter took the conservative position in line with the wishes of the Jerusalem Church (Gal 2¹⁴⁻²¹). If St. Paul's representation is correct, it becomes difficult to believe, as the narrative of Acts would seem to demand, that Peter and the Church at Jerusalem had taken exactly the opposite stand a few years earlier.

Different attempts have been made to obviate the difficulty. Appeal is sometimes made to the proverbial fickleness of Peter, but in order to meet the situation we should have to predicate a similar characteristic for the leaders in Jerusalem. Or, again, it is urged that Cornelius was already a 'God-fearer,' that he prayed to Jahweh, gave alms, and wrought 'righteousness' in good Jewish fashion (Ac 10^{30, 33}), and so his case was quite different from that of ordinary Gentiles. Yet it must be remembered that the specific thing for which Peter was called to account was 'eating with the uncircumcised' (Ac 11³). He affirmed that the Spirit had instructed him to make no distinction in respect to table-companionship between circumcised and uncircumcised believers, and this was the very point in debate at Antioch. We are quite ignorant of any extenuating circumstances which made the Antiochian situation different in principle from that of Caesarea, and so the difficulty of squaring the narrative of Acts with the representation of St. Paul remains unsolved.

Still another method proposed for relieving the difficulty is to appeal to the alleged apologetic purpose of the author of Acts, who, it is said, desired to bridge the chasm separating Peter from St. Paul, and tried to accomplish this result by 'Paulinizing' Peter in the early part of the book and by 'Petrinizing' St. Paul in the latter part. Thus Peter is credited with inaugurating the Gentile mission, and the Jerusalem Church is made to put the stamp of its approval upon his undertaking. In Acts' account of St. Paul, on the other hand, the Antiochian incident is absolutely ignored. St. Paul voluntarily circumcises Timothy (Ac 16¹), he also accepts and imposes upon his churches the decrees issued from Jerusalem (Ac 16⁴), and in still other respects his loyalty to Judaism is made evident (e.g. Ac 21¹⁷⁻²⁶). Thus 'Theophilus' has been assured—and this is assumed to be the author's chief aim—that the new religion is firmly established through a line of unbroken descent from antiquity, Gentiles having been designed from the first to be its legitimate heirs. Gentile Christianity is not an offshoot from the main movement—the ingrafting of a wild olive branch, as St. Paul says—but an integral part of the whole, having full ecclesiastical supervision and approval from the first. In favour of this interpretation it is possible to cite the manifest interest of Acts in the formal organization of the early community and in Jerusalem as the official centre from which the new religion expands. The appearances of Jesus, both in Luke and Acts, are located in or near Jerusalem; the disciples are instructed to wait in Jerusalem until Pentecost, when the adherents of the new movement are to be formally equipped with the Spirit; in the meantime, the waiting company fills the vacancy in the apostolate, so that the new church may be properly and fully officered from the start; and throughout the entire history of the early period the matter of official apostolic supervision is constantly in evidence. It certainly was not the intention of the writer of Acts to dwell upon differences of opinion among early Christians; and, further, it was quite natural that he should so select or interpret his source materials as to indicate that the certainty and stability attaching to his thought of this movement in his own day were but a continuation of an earlier state of affairs. Consequently it is not improbable that there was a disposition on his part to believe that the proper officers of the church had formally approved the Gentile mission from its very inception, and this feeling quite probably influenced his account of the Cornelius incident. But this fact does not warrant us in concluding that Peter did not come into contact with Gentiles at an early date, although he is not likely to have settled formally the ultimate problem of the whole dispute before it was pushed into the foreground by the work of the Judaizers in Pauline territory.

The foregoing discussion suggests another of the main difficulties in the present study, viz. the exact nature of the relationship between Peter and St. Paul. The so-called Tübingen School has placed great stress upon the supposed cleft between these two apostles, the former representing Jewish and the latter Gentile Christianity.* But this way of interpreting early Christian history is open to some serious objections. We have already noted the vital and important place which St. Paul's Jewish heritage continued to hold in his thinking as a Christian, even to the end of his career. It is a natural, but none the less serious, mistake to assume that the legalistic controversy which bulks so largely in St. Paul's letters to Galatia and Rome furnishes the proper perspective in which to set the whole of the Apostle's activity and thinking. In fact, all his extant writings are designed chiefly to meet some occasional or exceptional problem rather than to set forth comprehensively the character and content of his religion. Common possessions and generally accepted items are mentioned only incidentally, if at all, while debated points are treated at length. It is no doubt true that St. Paul strongly insisted upon the Gentiles' freedom from the ceremonial Law, but still he had much in common with his Jewish predecessors, particularly with Peter. Nor is it correct to think that St. Paul was alone responsible for the whole propagation of the gospel in Gentile lands. The missionary activities of 'the rest of the apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas,' as well as of Barnabas, are mentioned in 1 Co 9⁵; yet it may be that only their fame, and not their actual work, extended to Corinth. But it is plain from Romans that an important church had been established in the capital of the Empire without the aid of St. Paul (cf. Ro 1⁸⁻¹⁵). Even in the East he and his immediate companions were not the only workers in the field, and with some of these his relations were altogether friendly (e.g. Ac 18²⁻²⁴, 19¹). It is quite inconceivable that Peter, Barnabas, Mark, and others less well known, ceased proclaiming the new faith in different parts of the Mediterranean world at the moment their names disappear from the pages of Acts. Nor is it likely that they confined their efforts exclusively to Jewish territory. But even if they did work only with Jewish audiences in the Diaspora, they would inevitably be brought into contact with Gentiles attending the services of the synagogue as interested outsiders. There were certainly Gentile Christians in the Church at Rome before St. Paul visited the city (e.g. Ro 1⁵⁻¹³, 11²); and probably these were uncircumcised Gentiles, else the Judaizers would have had no occasion to raise the agitation which St. Paul's letter is evidently designed to counteract. We must conclude that the Antiochian incident is not a safe criterion by which to judge the entire history of the relationship between Peter and St. Paul, and their respective conceptions of the character of the new movement as a whole.

* See F. C. Baur, 'Die Christuspartei in der corinthischen Gemeinde,' in Tübinger Zeitschrift für Theologie, 1831, iv. 61-206, and Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi, Stuttgart, 1866. Among the better known followers of Baur are A. Hilgenfeld, C. Hofsten, O. Pfleiderer, P. W. Schmiedel.

Still we must ask what relation Peter bore to the various disturbers who from time to time caused St. Paul so much trouble. The Judaizers of Galatia were not, even on St. Paul's own showing, representatives of Peter, although they may have used his less radical but still evident conservatism for the purposes of their self-authentication. It would have been more nearly correct for them to have laid claim to the authority of James, as perhaps they did, but St. Paul does not even identify their position with that of James. They maintained the absolute necessity of circumcision for all Gentiles, while both Peter and James yielded to St. Paul's demands for the Gentiles' freedom. Apparently this was the principle upon which Barnabas had also been working before the Judaizers caused trouble, and there is no reason to suppose that Peter had observed any different practice, in so far as his missionary activities had brought him into contact with Gentiles. It was the work of the reactionary Judaizers that made the problem acute, but in the nascent period of the missionary enterprise the liberal attitude probably prevailed, not by design, but because it was a natural feature in the spontaneous growth of the new movement. Even while the new gospel was being preached to Jews the fundamental condition of membership in the new society was acknowledgment of Jesus' Lordship; consequently, when Gentiles heard this preaching—at first probably in connexion with the Jewish synagogue—and responded by confessing their belief in the Messiahship of the Risen Jesus, they were straightway reckoned among the chosen company to receive the Lord at His coming. This was the prevalent situation until the Judaizers appeared upon the scene. They represented the ultra-conservative position of certain Jewish converts, but whether or not their propaganda emanated in the first instance from Jerusalem is not perfectly clear. In Pauline territory they seem to have claimed the authority of Jerusalem, but St. Paul put their claim to the test by a personal visit to the mother Church, the result of which demonstrated that the Judaizers were not backed either by James or by Peter. On the secondary question of free intercourse between Jewish and Gentile believers in the same community, particularly at table, James and Peter—the latter at least temporarily—and even Barnabas were less ready to follow St. Paul to the logical conclusion of their common position; but their action in this respect does not at all mean their desertion to the ranks of the Judaizers.

So far as the Judaizing movement is concerned, the situation reflected in Romans is in the main similar to that in Galatians; but in the Corinthian correspondence the opposition to St. Paul seems to have developed new features. This is not the place to discuss at length the perplexing problem of the Corinthian parties; we are here concerned only with the question of Peter's relation to these factions. The presence of a group of persons in the Corinthian Church who said they were 'of Peter,' side by side with groups which affirmed allegiance to Apollos and St. Paul respectively, might imply that Peter, like St. Paul and Apollos, had preached in Corinth. This inference—probably it was only an inference—was drawn by Dionysius of Corinth (c. A.D. 170), who spoke of this church as 'the planting of Peter and Paul' (Eusebius, HE II. xxv. 8). Some modern scholars regard this conclusion as historically correct (e.g. K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911, p. 112ff.), but most interpreters are of the opinion that St. Paul's language does not justify it. He says so little about the Cephas-party, mentioning it only once, or possibly twice (1 Co 1² 3²), and then without adequate description, that there is no means of knowing positively whether these sectaries were personally acquainted with Peter or whether they knew him only by reputation. That the Corinthians were aware of his prominence in the history of Christianity is clear from St. Paul's other references to him (1 Co 9⁵ 15⁵), and, as this knowledge need not necessarily have been derived from personal contact, a company of Christians in Corinth may have professed loyalty to Peter simply on the strength of his reputation. It would not follow that these persons were Judaizers of the Galatian type, but only that they took a conservative position on the question of table-fellowship between Jewish and Gentile converts. Perhaps St. Paul has reference to some such condition of affairs when he intimates that the validity of his apostleship has been called in question by the 'weak' brethren, who have been offended by the liberty of the 'strong,' the latter doubtless citing St. Paul as their example. It is true that the question under discussion in the context concerns the eating of meat offered to idols, and so is not a repetition of the Antiochian problem, but the conservative party in Corinth may have appealed to Peter's caution at Antioch in justification of their own conservatism in the present situation. And egged on by the opposition of the 'Paulinists,' they may readily have sought to disparage St. Paul by remarking upon the doubtfulness of his apostolic credentials and his failure to follow the apostolic custom of asking support from the churches. If this was the position of those who said 'I am of Cephas,' it is interesting to note how kindly they are dealt with by St. Paul. He does not retract from his position of absolute liberty in principle, but he does strongly counsel restraint of personal liberty as a concession to the 'weak,' and he fully justifies the conduct of Cephas and others in drawing support from the churches, although he resents the insinuation that he and Barnabas are any less authoritative because they choose to forego their rights in this respect. In view of this lenient attitude of St. Paul, we cannot identify the Cephas-party with the Judaizers; nor is there any intimation that the Galatian problems—circumcision, justification by faith, and the like—had been in dispute at Corinth. On the whole, there is nothing in the situation to indicate that the relation between Peter and St. Paul, even if there was a vigorous Cephas-party in Corinth, was essentially less cordial than that between Apollos and St. Paul (1 Co 3⁴⁻⁹ 16¹²). Moreover, in comparing this with the Antiochian incident, it may be noted as further evidence of the softening effect which time had upon an earlier controversy, that Barnabas was now ranged distinctly on St. Paul's side (1 Co 9⁹). This fact does not wholly lose its point even if, as is sometimes imagined (e.g. W. Bousset, J. Weiss), though without apparent justification, St. Paul is referring specifically to the first missionary tour when he and Barnabas worked together in Asia Minor.

The Christ-party offers still greater difficulties, so far as the question of Peter's relation to St. Paul is concerned. Whether St. Paul intended 'I am of Christ' to designate a separate faction has been several times questioned,* though this certainly is the natural meaning of the language. But nowhere in the First Epistle is this party defined with sufficient clearness to disclose its actual character. On the other hand, in 2 Co 10 ff., St. Paul criticizes very sharply and at some length opponents who, on the strength of 2 Co 10¹⁰, are often identified with the Christ-party of 1 Co 1¹². If this identification is rejected, as has often been the case (e.g., most recently, Allan Menzies, The Second Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Corinthians, London, 1912), then the Christ-party is too obscure to have any bearing upon our present discussion. But we should still have to consider Peter's relation to the opposition mentioned in 2 Cor., of which St. Paul speaks at some length. The leaders of this faction affirmed that St. Paul walked 'according to the flesh,' while they were 'Christ's'; they were giving themselves exclusively to the service of Christ, while St. Paul was supporting himself by secular labour. Being thus professionally devoted to Christ, they were apostles par excellence, though St. Paul styled them self-made apostles, to be compared to Satan masquerading as an angel of light; and they claimed to have the proper qualifications for their office, since they were Hebrews, Israelites, of the seed of Abraham, as was Christ Himself. In comparison with these sleek 'professionalists,' St. Paul admitted that he might be 'rude of speech' and that he did work independently for his living; but in knowledge, efficiency, and power he would not admit any inferiority. He too was a Jew, he had also shown heroic devotion, proving himself a unique minister of Christ; and although his bodily presence was inferior, he was superior in respect of visions and revelations—in fact, God had allowed him to be afflicted with this bodily infirmity in order that his superiority in other respects might not cause him to be 'exalted over-much.' But in the ultimate and crucial test of the new religion's power—ability to perform signs and wonders and miracles—he had fully displayed the qualifications of the true apostle. Whether he means to imply that all these credentials of his are set over against similar claims put forward by his opponents, or whether he is emphasizing his own superior qualifications ('are they ministers of Christ? . . . I more!'), he does not definitely state; but quite apart from this uncertainty, the characteristics of his opponents are clearly portrayed. Their criticism of St. Paul for failure to take support from the Corinthian Church would seem at first sight to identify them with those sectaries mentioned in 1 Co 9¹⁴, and so they would be a continuation of the Cephas-party. This view has been generally adopted by Tübingen scholars, who also identify these factionists with the Christ-party and make them all a continuation of the ultra-Jewish 'Petrine' movement which is assumed to be everywhere opposed to St. Paul. But such a conclusion seems wholly untenable. Even identification with the Cephas-party is very questionable. Those features of 1 Co 9, which there suggested a connexion with Peter, viz. reference to the 'weak' and St. Paul's conciliatory attitude, are entirely lacking in 2 Co 10 ff. Furthermore, St. Paul's wholesale criticism of these later opponents is quite different both in spirit and content from that which he metes out to Peter on any previous occasion, not excepting even the aggravating situation at Antioch. If the troublers of 2 Cor. are a continuation of the Cephas-party, they have departed so far from the position of Peter that the bond of attachment between him and them consists in little more than a name. If, on the other hand, they are the lineal descendants of the Judaizers, who have already caused St. Paul so much trouble in Galatia, it becomes still more improbable that Peter is to be connected in any essential way with their propaganda. Several of their characteristics favour identification with the Judaizers.* They were Jews, they claimed full apostolic authentication, and they were 'Christ's'; but the astonishing thing is that the question of circumcision is not mentioned, and there is no hint of any discussion about faith versus works of the Law—questions which were central in St. Paul's controversy with the Judaizers. It is commonly said that for policy's sake the disturbers had suppressed these features of their propaganda in the strongly Gentile atmosphere of Corinth; but whether that neglect would not have left them without any real mission is a serious question. If still another explanation, to the effect that we have here to do with a Jewish theosophical or antinomian tendency,† is accepted, Peter must be still further removed from any connexion with this faction.

Although we have found the NT record of Peter's later activities very meagre and obscure at many points, we are not to imagine that he played no important rôle in the history of Christianity during this period. His greatest significance probably lay in his missionary labours, carried on not only in Palestine but also among the Jews of the Dispersion, although in regions quite unknown to us at present. In this work he must have had some contact with Gentiles, particularly with those known as 'God-fearers.' Later tradition

* This view, which has had various adherents, has perhaps been argued most fully by W. Beyschlag in SK xxxviii. 2 (1865) 217-276 and xlv. 4 (1871) 635-676. Cf. the more recent statement by B. W. Bacon in Exp. 8th ser., viii. [1914] 390-415.

† Most recently advocated by W. Lütgert, 'Freiheitspredigt und Schwärmgeister in Korinth,' in Beiträge zur Förderung christl. Theol. xii. [Gütersloh, 1908]; K. Lake, op. cit. p. 222 ff.

* E.g. J. Weiss, Der erste Korintherbrief, Göttingen, 1910, p. 151.; K. Lake, op. cit. p. 1271.; not to mention earlier authorities.

made Mark and Glaukias his interpreters, but we are not sure that he did not know, or ultimately learn, sufficient Greek for conversation with Gentiles when occasion required. His sympathies doubtless were on the side of a Jewish interpretation of Christianity's mission, but he certainly was not a vigorous 'Judaizer,' and there was no such wide breach between him and St. Paul as has sometimes been imagined. While the Judaizers, or other opponents of St. Paul, may often have claimed the authority of the Jerusalem leaders, this claim was sometimes quite factitious and largely a misrepresentation of Peter's real position.

5. Peter in tradition outside the NT.—It is not surprising that a person of Peter's prominence, whose career had been so incompletely described in the NT, should have been made the subject of a vast amount of later tradition. This material has often been collected and interpreted, but, since much of it has little or no historical value, only the more important items will be treated in the present connexion. These sources, roughly classified, are (1) data from the Church Fathers or from catalogues of bishops and martyrs, (2) stories bearing the general title of apocryphal Acts, and (3) the so-called 'Clementine' literature—the Homilies, the Recognitions, and the Epitome (an abridgment of the Homilies). The materials in the first division are so varied, fragmentary, and widely scattered, that they cannot easily be subjected to specific description; but the Acts and the Clementines are distinct bodies of literature whose chief characteristics may be briefly noted.*

The Acts fall into two groups, commonly distinguished as 'Gnostic'† and 'Catholic.' Neither of these groups as they now stand constitutes a perfect unit, yet each has its own distinctive traits. The Gnostic Acts is unique in removing St. Paul from Rome before Peter arrives. St. Paul is directed in a vision to leave the city and go to Spain. Thereupon Simon Magus appears at Rome, calling himself 'the great power of God,' and winning to himself many Christians through his magical practices. At this point Peter, having completed his assigned task of working for twelve years among Jews only, is Divinely instructed to visit Rome. On his arrival he immediately attacks Simon and wins back the Christians who had been seduced. Peter and Simon vie with each other in the performance of miracles, but Peter is the more successful, and Simon, in attempting to fly to heaven, is brought down by Peter's prayer and dies from the effects of the fall. Nero and his friend Albinus become offended with Peter, who is informed of their evil designs and prepares to leave the city; but outside the gate he meets Jesus, who, when asked whither He is going ('Domine, quo vadis?'), replies that He is on His way to Rome to be crucified. At this Peter returns and gladly submits to crucifixion, requesting that he be nailed to the cross head downwards. Marcellus, formerly a disciple of St. Paul and then of Simon, having been won back to Christianity by Peter, takes care of the Apostle's body; but Peter appears to him in a vision and says, 'Let the dead be buried by their own dead'—an intimation that Marcellus is to await the return of St. Paul to Rome. The Catholic Acts has a similar content, yet with some remarkable differences. St. Paul arrives at Rome while Peter is still there, and is besought by the Christians to resist Peter, who is teaching believers to do away with the Law of Moses. The two apostles greet one another with joy, and the disputes between Jewish and Gentile Christians are settled by St. Paul, both apostles working together in harmony. Then the two—though Peter is the chief spokesman—encounter Simon Magus, who, as in the Gnostic Acts, dies from a fall while attempting to fly to heaven. Nero imprisons them for the harm they have done his friend Simon, and finally Peter is crucified, while St. Paul is beheaded on the same day (29th June).

The *Clementines contain two different versions of the same original romance, the chief point of which is the persistent conflict between Peter and Simon Magus. The scene of the conflict is Syria, and it is not certain that the original form of the legend made any reference whatsoever to Rome. But in their present form both versions vaguely intimate that the final scene of the conflict is Rome. The Homilies are distinctly anti-Pauline, Simon being in fact merely a mask for St. Paul, who is thus brought into complete subjection to Peter. In the Recognitions, on the other hand, the conflict is not so sharp, criticism being directed more particularly against the pre-Christian activities of St. Paul. See art. SIMON MAGUS.

These legendary materials have not been summarized because of their intrinsic historical value, for in this particular they are now admitted by scholars to be in the main quite unreliable. Their importance consists in the use which has been made of their tendency as a key to the reconstruction of the history of the Apostolic Age, and particularly to the solution of the much-debated problem of Peter's Roman residence, which is the next question to claim our attention.

According to traditional Roman Catholic opinion, when Jesus commissioned Peter to be the cornerstone of the Church and the guardian of the keys (Mt 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹), He virtually designated him bishop of Rome, the first Pope.† Several Protestant scholars also, while not estimating so highly Peter's ecclesiastical significance, are of the opinion that he finally visited Rome and suffered martyrdom there under Nero. This opinion is thought to be supported by a number of early witnesses. The earliest notice is in Clement of Rome, who admonishes the Corinthians to follow the examples of the good apostles: 'There was Peter, who by reason of unrighteous jealousy endured not one nor two but many labours, and thus having borne his testimony went to his appointed place of glory' (Ep. ad Cor. i. 5). In the next chapter St. Paul's martyrdom is also mentioned along with 'a vast multitude of the elect, who through many indignities and tortures, being the victims of jealousy, set a brave example among us.' Clement is commonly supposed to have written his epistle about the year 95, and one may easily infer that he was thinking of Peter and St. Paul as having suffered martyrdom at Rome during Nero's persecution. Ignatius, early in the 2nd cent., says the Romans had been enjoined by Peter and St. Paul (Rom. 4), which would seem to presuppose Peter's presence in Rome at one time, since nothing is known of any epistle addressed to the Romans by Peter.

* For a more exhaustive discussion of this whole mass of later tradition see B. A. Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten und Apostellegenden, vol. ii. pt. I. [Brunswick, 1857] 1-423; F. H. Chase, art. 'Peter (Simon)' in HDB, vol. iii. pp. 767-779; P. W. Schmiedel, art. 'Simon Peter' in EBI iv. 4589-4627.

† That they are really Gnostic is maintained by Lipsius (op. cit. p. 258 ff.) and T. Zahn (Geschichte des neutest. Kanons, ii. [Leipzig, 1890] 832 ff.); while A. Harnack (Chronologie der altchristlichen Literatur, Leipzig, 1897, i. 549 ff.), C. Erbes (in ZKG xxii. [1901] 163 ff.), and C. Schmidt (in TU xxiv. 1 [1903]) believe them to be actually Catholic.

* See F. J. A. Hort, Notes Introductory to the Study of the Clementine Recognitions, London, 1901.

† For a typical statement see Janvier, Histoire de Saint Pierre prince des apôtres et premier pape, Tours, 1902. J. Schnitzer, Hat Jesus das Papsttum gestiftet? 13, Augsburg, 1910, is more critical. Cf. also P. Styger, 'Neue Untersuchungen über die altchristlichen Petrusdarstellungen,' in Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte, xxvii. [1913] 17-74.

Dionysius of Corinth (c. A.D. 170) also states that Peter worked in Italy, doubtless meaning Rome (Eusebius, HE II. xxv. 8). Toward the close of the 2nd cent. Irenæus (III. i. 1, iii. 1), and at the end of the cent. Clement of Alexandria (Eusebius, HE VI. xiv. 6) and Tertullian (e.g. de Bapt. 4; de Præscript. adv. hæres. 32), all bear witness to a sojourn of Peter in Rome. In the course of time tradition fixes more specifically the date of his arrival, the details of his work, and the circumstances of his death. He was said to have laboured there for twenty-five years (Jerome, de Vir. ill. 1), having first completed his twelve required years of residence among the Jews. If we assume that Jesus died in the year 30, this reckoning would bring Peter to Rome in the year 42 and place his martyrdom in 67; yet Nero's persecution, as a matter of fact, occurred in 64. But this fact was easily overlooked, since the ideal numbers (12 and 25) had to be preserved. After sifting the historical kernel from these legends, several modern interpreters conclude that Peter perished at Rome during the Neronian persecution in the summer of 64, but that his stay there had been of comparatively short duration.*

Another school of interpretation rejects altogether any notion of Peter's presence in Rome, making all the affirmative tradition merely a product of the early polemic against St. Paul as exhibited, in its later forms, in the 'Clementine' writings and the apocryphal Acts. The first stage in this evolution is seen in the Homilies, which portrays the sharp antagonism between Simon Magus and Peter in Syria. Simon impersonates St. Paul, and so becomes the arch-heretic of early tradition; and, since St. Paul's Roman residence was too well attested to be ignored, his antagonists were compelled to take Peter to Rome in order to refute Simon (i.e. St. Paul) in the centre of the Christian world. Similarly in the 'Gnostic' Acts St. Paul vanishes and Simon takes his place in Rome in the encounter with Peter. But in the 'Catholic' Acts, representing a later stage of historical development, there is a disposition to synthesize the factions, and so St. Paul is kept in Rome to join Peter in resisting Simon. While this entire Simonian literature, in its present form, belongs to the 3rd or subsequent centuries, the main tradition is thought to have been current at a much earlier date, signs of it already appearing in Ac 8^{18ff.}. On this hypothesis the Patristic testimony to Peter's Roman residence is easily set aside. Since the statements of Clement of Rome and Ignatius are not explicit, they are given another interpretation. Thus Dionysius of Corinth becomes the earliest witness, and he is said to be under the influence of the Simonian legend, or even to be deliberately aiming at giving it currency. This interpretation, needless to say, is the result of a rigid application of Tübingen principles to this period of apostolic history;† but the fundamental premise of the argument—namely, the supposition of a wide breach between Peter and St. Paul in the earlier period—we have already found to be quite untenable. It is true that adequately attested information about Peter's Roman connexions is still exceedingly scanty, but the Simonian hypothesis surely does not furnish the key to the problem.

There remain to be mentioned a few Patristic notices regarding Peter's activities in other regions.

The salutation of 1 Pet. prompted Origen to remark that Peter 'seems' to have preached to the Jews of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia (Eusebius, HE III. i. 2). This opinion became quite common, but probably 1 Pet. was its only ultimate source. Peter's name was also connected closely with Antioch, where, according to the Chronicle of Eusebius (Lipsius, op. cit. p. 25 ff.), he founded the church in the second year of Claudius (i.e. 42)—certainly an impossible tradition. The mention of 'Babylon' in 1 P¹ 5¹³ also suggested that general territory as a field of the Apostle's labours—a view which Lipsius and Schmiedel, for example, are inclined to adopt in preference to the tradition of his Roman residence. It is improbable that any of these legends has independent historical value, though undoubtedly Peter's missionary travels extended much more widely than the NT data might, at first sight, seem to imply.

To note, finally, traditions regarding Peter's literary activity, apart from the two canonical works to be considered in another connexion, there are extant fragments of a Gospel of Peter, an Apocalypse of Peter, a Preaching of Peter, and an Epistle of Peter to James prefixed to the Clementine Homilies. Jerome (de Vir. ill. i. 1) refers to a work of Peter's called Judicium, but nothing is known of its contents. It may be noted also that tradition connected Peter's name indirectly with the Gospel of Mark (Eusebius, HE III. xxxix. 15). Of the Gospel of Peter we know only a few paragraphs near the end, which speak of the trial of Jesus, the mockery, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection. The final words are: 'And I, Simon Peter, and Andrew my brother, took our nets and departed to the sea, and Levi the son of Alphaeus was with us, whom the Lord . . .'.* Serapion, bishop of Antioch (c. 190), at first permitted this Gospel to circulate at Rhossus, but later condemned it as heretical because it was alleged to be of Docetic origin (Eusebius, HE VI. xii. 2-6). The document probably came into existence about, or not long after, the year 150. The extant remains of the Apocalypse of Peter are in quantity about equal to those of the Gospel, less than a half-dozen ordinary pages. Jesus is represented as granting the apostles, in response to their request, a vision of their righteous brethren who have passed over to the future world. The abode of the blessed is disclosed, and also the place of torment, where the wicked are suffering punishments corresponding to their respective types of sinful conduct while upon earth. Clement of Alexandria, who has preserved a number of fragments from this work, sometimes cites it as Scripture (Eclog. prophet. 41), as does the unknown author of the Muratorian Canon. It probably arose in the 2nd century. The remains of the Preaching are more brief and scattered, but apparently it was known and used more widely in antiquity than either of the other works. Clement of Alexandria is our best witness to the content of the document (cf. Strom. I. xxix. 182, VI. v. 39-41, 43, vi. 48, xv. 128). The treatise, which he possessed entire, purported to be the work of Peter, and emphasized monotheism in contrast with inferior ideas of Greeks and Jews. Apparently it was designed for use in the missionary propaganda. Its early and wide currency has led scholars to place its composition in the first half of the 2nd cent. (cf. Harnack, op. cit. p. 472 ff.).

LITERATURE.—Treatises on the Apostolic Age and on early Christian literature usually deal in a general way with our subject. Discussions devoted exclusively to Peter are mainly artt. in the various Dictionaries, the more important being F. H. Chase, 'Peter (Simon),' in HDB iii. 756-779; P. W. Schmiedel, 'Simon Peter,' in EB iv. 4459-4627; F. Sieffert, 'Petrus der Apostel,' in PRE xv. 186-203; K. Lake, 'Peter, St.,' in EB xxi. 285-288. Important treatments of special topics have been cited in the course of the discussion. To these should be added the valuable critical work of C. Guignebert, La Primauté de Pierre et la venue de Pierre à Rome, Paris, 1909, which has an exhaustive bibliography. S. J. CASE.

* For detailed defence of this general position see J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, pt. I. [London, 1890] vol. i. pp. 201-345 and vol. ii. pp. 481-502; A. Harnack, op. cit. pp. 240 ff., 703 ff.; F. H. Chase, op. cit.; C. Schmidt, op. cit.

† The view has been supported vigorously by Schmiedel in his above-mentioned article in the EBI, where he follows in the main Lipsius, op. cit. See also C. Erbes, 'Die Teststage der Apostel Paulus und Petrus,' in TU xix. 1 [Leipzig, 1899].

* The fragment has often been edited since its discovery at Akhmim in 1886. It may be found in convenient form, together with other Petrine fragments, in H. Lietzmann's Kleine Texte für theologische Vorlesungen und Übungen, 'Apocrypha,' i., ed. E. Klostermann, Bonn, 1903.

PETER, EPISTLES OF.—The NT contains two writings bearing the name of Peter. Since the problems connected with these Epistles depend for their solution mainly upon the internal indicia of the documents themselves, a résumé of their content is first in order. It will also be convenient to treat the two letters separately.

A. FIRST PETER.—1. Content.—The content of this Epistle may be outlined as follows:

(a) Salutation (1¹⁴).—The apostle Peter greets Christians of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. These believers are reminded of the fact that they are merely temporary residents on earth, their real citizenship being in heaven. God the Father, knowing in advance their ultimate destiny, has given them a spiritual sanctification to the end that they may be obedient children and may receive the saving benefits accruing to those who have been sprinkled with the blood of Jesus Christ.

(b) Praise to God for the surety of ultimate salvation (1⁷⁻¹²).—Since Christ has been raised from the dead those who are united to Him by faith are sure of obtaining the Divine salvation to be revealed in the near future when the present world-order shall be brought to an end. On the basis of this certainty believers rejoice exceedingly, notwithstanding temporary afflictions, which only serve to prove the genuineness of their faith. Their salvation has been prophesied by the ancients, it was preached by the spiritually equipped evangelists, and even angels desired to peer into these matters.

(c) The type of personal life befitting individuals who are to inherit so great salvation (1^{13-3¹²}).—(1) In view of believers' blessed condition as heirs of the heavenly inheritance about to be disclosed, they should be pure in their personal life. Since God who has chosen them is holy, as is also Christ who redeemed them, they too should live righteously. They have been re-born to a new and incorruptible condition of being, and, like newborn infants, their nourishment is to be derived from the sphere of the new life into which they have come. They are a new race, a peculiar people, set apart to live the heavenly life while yet on earth (1^{13-2¹⁰}).

(2) But as such they must also live fittingly in relation to their heathen environment. They are to shun all wickedness, and thereby give the lie to the popular charge that they are evil-doers. They are, however, to avoid giving any offence to the authorities. If they are servants in a heathen household, they are to discharge their duties faithfully, bearing buffetings and revilings with Christ-like fortitude. When believers find themselves married to unbelievers, they must exemplify the Christian virtues also in this relationship. In short, they should be living witnesses to the ideal type of conduct in all their relations with outsiders (2^{11-3¹²}).

(d) Encouragement to bear persecution with fortitude, in view of the Christians' certainty of ultimate salvation (3^{13-5¹¹}).—(1) If zeal for righteousness brings them suffering, they are but following in the footsteps of Christ. Through His suffering they have been made heirs of a sure salvation; consequently they should continue loyally to confess His Lordship. When their opponents revile and persecute them for their peculiar faith, they may reassure themselves by recalling (i.) Christ's saving mission, which extended even to the spirits in Hades; (ii.) the ordinance of baptism, which formally ensured their spiritual union with the Risen Jesus; and (iii.) the heavenly exaltation of Christ, whereby all authority has been committed to Him (3¹³⁻²²).

(2) Hence Christians have a ready answer to give their heathen critics who charge them with unsocial conduct. They are no longer men of the flesh, for, having been united in baptism with the heavenly spiritual Christ, they now enjoy a new state of existence; they are citizens of heaven (4¹⁻⁶).

(3) As their stay upon earth, along with all earthly things, draws to a close, their chief endeavour is to cultivate the true fruits of the Spirit in daily living—sobriety, prayerfulness, mutual love, hospitality, ministrations, and constant glorification of God (4⁷⁻¹¹).

(4) Christians ought not to be shocked by the outbreak of severe persecution. In the first place, they should rejoice at the opportunity of becoming actual imitators of Christ. And, secondly, since they do not suffer justly, being guilty of no sins for which God should bring this affliction upon them, their trials are a sign of the approaching end when they are to receive the salvation now being guarded for them in heaven. If the initial stages of the Final Judgment bring such afflictions upon the innocent, how infinitely more terrible will the ultimate fate of the wicked be! Therefore believers should not be ashamed to suffer innocently as Christians, since this is in accordance with the will of God, who always has in mind the ultimate salvation of their souls (4¹¹⁻¹⁹).

(5) Under these circumstances both the leaders of the community and the members of the congregation should order their lives according to the strictest ideals of perfection, knowing that they will ultimately receive their respective rewards. Their temporary affliction will, through the favour of God, issue in the perfect salvation about to be revealed from heaven (5¹⁻¹¹).

(e) Conclusion (5¹²⁻¹⁴).—The readers are informed of Silvanus' connexion with the letter, they are exhorted to remain steadfast, greetings are conveyed to them, and they receive the apostolic benediction.

2. Purpose.—The main purpose of the Epistle is to comfort and encourage certain communities embarrassed by heathen opposition—an opposition which had broken out into a conflagration of persecution. The writer seeks to strengthen the Christians' faith by turning their attention to the near future, when God will bring all their troubles to an end by sending Jesus Christ to conduct the Final Judgment and perfect the salvation of believers (1⁵.. 2. 12. 20 2¹² 4⁵. 12. 17. 51. 4. 6. 10). Christians are strongly exhorted to refrain from doing anything for which they might be justly punished. Possibly some among them were disposed to take too literally the doctrine of soul-freedom and so to forget that the earthly order under which they were now living was really an appointment of God (2¹³⁻¹⁷ 4¹³). St. Paul had to give the Romans a similar warning (Ro 13¹⁻⁷; cf. Tit 3¹⁻³; Clement of Rome, ad Cor. 61). Not improbably the Christians' sense of superiority to the world tended to engender an unconventional type of conduct which sometimes antagonized the authorities and readily suggested to outsiders that these seemingly recalcitrant people were accustomed within their own private assemblies to cast off all moral restraints. The readers of this Epistle are especially exhorted to make their manner of life such that they can by no possible means be justly reckoned among evil-doers. In all their political, social, and personal relationships they are to exercise the utmost caution not to give offence. But they are not to compromise their ideals by resorting to the heathen mode of living, nor are they to hesitate in confessing Christ's Lordship (3¹⁰). They should always be prepared to give reasons for their unshaken faith in Christ and the coming deliverance, and their type of life should be so noble as to put to shame their accusers. Then, in all the attacks which are made upon them they will suffer unjustly, and such suffering will bring them a rich reward. Having seen to it that they themselves do not merit punishment, the trials through which they are passing must be merely premonitory signs of the approaching end when all sinners are to be condemned, while the righteous are to inherit eternal peace. Thus the author endeavours to cheer and strengthen his readers, and this is manifestly the chief aim of his letter.

3. Historical situation.—What, more exactly, were the conditions under which the readers were living? They are addressed as 'sojourners of the Dispersion' (παρεπιδημοὶ διασποράς). This expression has sometimes been taken to mean that they were converts from the Jewish Diaspora.* But more probably the language is figurative, used of Christians in general, who are temporarily exiled from their heavenly home and scattered abroad upon the earth,† just as the Jews were exiled from their holy city and dispersed in strange lands. In this sense these Christians may have been converts from both Judaism and paganism, but certain incidental references in the Epistle suggest that they belonged mainly to the latter class. Before conversion they had been in a state of 'ignorance' (1⁴); cf. Eph 4¹⁸) and had followed their passions as their Gentile contemporaries continued to do (1⁴ 4²²); in time past they were in 'darkness,' they were 'no people,' and they had not obtained mercy, but now their situation is completely reversed (2⁹); at the outset they had been furthest from God, and now they are nearest to Him—all of which seems to point to Gentile antecedents. They are dwelling in different parts of Asia Minor—Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Probably the geographical designations are used in the official sense of the territorial rearrangement into provinces under the Romans. The bearer of the Epistle is thought of as starting his journey from the eastern portion of the province of Bithynia-Pontus, and swinging in a circle back to the western end of it. But the readers will have lived in much the same territory, whether the geographical terms are taken in the technical or in the popular sense. The letter is so uniform in its emphasis upon suffering, and it makes so much of the hope that Christ will soon appear to remedy the present evil, that the writer evidently thought Christians generally throughout this territory were actually enduring, or were soon to experience, very severe persecution. For some of them at least it was already a stunning reality (4¹²), but they are exhorted not to shrink from this affliction. They should, however, make sure that they are not guilty of any of the evil deeds which their enemies allege against them (2¹² 15 3¹⁸ 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶). They are admonished to refrain from needlessly provoking the authorities, recognizing in the latter Divinely appointed guardians of the civil order (2¹³⁻¹⁷), and they are to suffer willingly for righteousness' sake; that is, they are to stand loyal to their confession of Christ and to affirm unhesitatingly their hope of salvation, and thus they may congratulate themselves on suffering for the name of Christ, although formally they are being punished for crimes with which their opponents are—falsely, the author hopes—charging them (3¹³⁻¹⁷ 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶). Moreover, their situation is not unique, but is characteristic of the brotherhood throughout the world (5⁹).

4. Date.—There is much difference of opinion as to the date of composition (see J. Moffatt, LNT, pp. 338-342). A most important question in this connexion is, When were the Christians of northern Asia Minor suffering this type of affliction? Of the various answers which have been given in the past, only three demand detailed consideration.* According to one hypothesis, these events took place in the latter part of the reign of Nero (54-68), a second view locates them under Domitian (81-96), while still another refers them to the time of Trajan (98-117). Notwithstanding numerous discussions of the subject, there is still much uncertainty regarding the exact extent and character of the persecutions which are commonly supposed to have occurred under these three Emperors.† Our first explicit information outside the NT about the persecution of Christians in Asia Minor is found in the extant correspondence which Pliny the Younger and Trajan carried on about the year 112 (Ep. xvi. f.). When Pliny became governor of Bithynia he soon found himself in conflict with the Christians, of whom he put a number to death, or, if Roman citizens, held them for transportation to Rome. Pliny had not started out with any well-defined anti-Christian policy, and so he was much perplexed by the situation which early developed. When he found that the Christians were not guilty of the crimes usually charged against them, he was in doubt as to whether it was proper to punish them merely for their loyalty to the name of Christ, and he did not know what disposition ought to be made of those who were willing to recant. Further, he wanted to know to what extent Christians were to be deliberately sought out for punishment. To Pliny's inquiries the Emperor replied that (1) flagrant cases were to be punished, but (2) no active search for Christians was to be made, nor (3) were anonymous accusations to be entertained, and (4) all who recanted, proving their sincerity by denying the name of Christian and observing the rites of the State religion, were to be pardoned regardless of any former suspicions against them. This, so far as our extant information is concerned, is the first time in history when the mere confession of the name 'Christian' itself constituted a punishable offence in the eyes of the law, but henceforth persecution for the 'Name' was the ordinary form of procedure.‡ In earlier times the name 'Chris-

* B. Weiss in various writings, and more recently in Der erste Petrusbrief und die neuere Kritik, has advocated a date early in the fifties, and he is followed by Kühl, op. cit. pp. 49-80. But this opinion has not found any general acceptance. A similar neglect has attended the hypothesis of a post-Trajanic date, as advocated, for example, by G. Volkmar, 'Ueber die katholischen Briefe und Henoch,' in ZWTH iv. [1861] 427-436, v. [1862] 46-75; and by E. Zeller, 'Zur Petrusfrage,' ib. xix. [1878] 35-56.

† The extensive literature has recently been summarized by L. H. Canfield, The Early Persecutions of the Christians, New York, 1913. The more important recent works of a general character are W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170, London, 1893; E. G. Hardy, Studies in Roman History, 1st ser., do., 1906; H. B. Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, do., 1906; P. Allard, Histoire des persécutions pendant les deux premiers siècles, Paris, 1903; A. Linsenmayer, Die Bekämpfung des Christentums durch den römischen Staat bis zum Tode des Kaisers Julian, Munich, 1905. For treatises on special topics see Canfield, op. cit. pp. 211-215.

‡ So Canfield, op. cit. p. 96 f. Other authorities believe this to have been the situation even in Nero's day, e.g. Moffatt, op. cit. p. 324 f.

* So E. Kühl, Die Briefe Petri und Judæ, p. 21 ff. The same opinion has been affirmed more recently by O. F. G. Heinrici, Der literarische Charakter der neutestamentlichen Schriften, Leipzig, 1908, p. 75 f.

† Cf. 1 P 1¹⁷ 2¹¹, He 11¹³ 13¹⁴, Eph 2⁹; also the salutations of Clement of Rome, ad Cor., Polycarp, ad Phil., and Martyrdom of Polycarp. This is the view held by the majority of modern scholars, e.g. R. Knopf, Die Briefe Petri und Judæ, p. 3 ff.

tian' might have aroused suspicion, but apparently suspected persons had to be convicted of some particular crime—or at least the crime was assumed by the authorities to be capable of proof—before punishment was inflicted. This, indeed, seems to have been the principle upon which Pliny himself had acted at first, for he was at a loss to know what to do when he found that the Christians were innocent of the usual charges brought against them, and that they had even obeyed the edict forbidding private assemblies. In the case of those who refused to recant, he justified his own severity on the ground of their criminal obstinacy, but Trajan's rescript removed all necessity for any such special justification. Henceforth, if one persistently confessed Christianity, that in itself was sufficient basis for legal action. Christianity was now, in the eyes of the law, a religio illicita.

Is this the situation of the Christians to whom 1 Peter is addressed? Scholars who answer this question in the affirmative do so mainly because of the reference in 1 P 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶ to suffering for the Name.* But were the readers as yet technically suffering for the Name? Apparently not, in the formal sense. Their opponents are certainly bringing specific charges against them (2^{12, 15, 19f.}, 3^{9, 16f.}, 4⁴), reviling their manner of life in order to persuade the authorities to act. Believers are not being arraigned because it is a crime per se to be a Christian, nor are they condemned on this charge; it is only from the point of view of their own clear conscience that they can glory in being reproached for the name of Christ. The stress which the writer places on false accusations, and his earnest admonitions to avoid all criminal conduct, show that the letter was written to persons who were being charged—though falsely, the author hoped—with specific crimes. Moreover, by a correct and cautious mode of conduct they may hope to gain the favour of the governor who is thought capable of giving praise to them that do well (2¹⁴), while even their accusers may be silenced and put to shame by the Christians' good manner of life in Christ (2¹⁵ 3¹⁶).† This encouragement would have been quite pointless if the mere acknowledgment of the 'Name' already constituted a capital offence in the eyes of the law. The Christians might console themselves with the thought that they were in reality being reproached simply for the name of Christ, but apparently their enemies were still obliged to make specific criminal charges against believers in order to effect legal action.

1 Peter can hardly have been designed to meet the new condition of affairs following the rescript of Trajan, if, as seems probable, the mere confession of Christianity was henceforth the only point needing to be established in law ('si deferantur et arguantur [i.e. if they are proven to be Christians], puniendi sunt'). But a date shortly before Trajan's rescript, during Pliny's preliminary activity, would suit admirably certain details in the situation. Under the immediately preceding governors little attention had been paid to the internal affairs of the province, which was in a wretched state generally. Pliny was a more efficient executive, and his efforts to establish better conditions must almost immediately have brought the Christians to his attention. They were held largely responsible for the general decline, because they had interfered with traditional religion and with that part of civic life which depended upon religion for prosperity. Even in the villages and country districts the temples had been forsaken and the trade in fodder for the victims had been almost ruined. So Pliny, in order to restore the commercial prosperity of the province, took action against the Christians. He put to death a few who had refused to recant and induced others to resume their former manner of life. This action encouraged the enemies of the new religion to bring still others to his attention, and even anonymous charges were entertained. This procedure must have seemed to the Christians like the sudden outburst of a devastating conflagration, a veritable activity of their adversary the devil (4¹² 5⁸). But still there was a hopeful side to the situation. The governor had shown a disposition to investigate the charges, and if Christians would only take care always to be found innocent they might hope for favours from the courts and at the same time put their accusers to confusion. According to Pliny's testimony, this was the course which the Christians of his province were actually pursuing. In obedience to his edict they had ceased holding meetings, and the criminal charges preferred against them proved on investigation to be wholly false.

Thus we might easily suppose, on the basis of conditions described by Pliny, that 1 Peter had shortly before been received by the Christian community and had borne good fruit. Furthermore, the problems which it treats have several points of correspondence with the situation presupposed in Pliny's letter to the Emperor. He had called upon believers to revile Christ and worship Cæsar, and they are especially admonished in 1 Peter to sanctify in their hearts Christ as Lord (3^{15ff.}), to remain loyal to His name (4^{14ff.}), and to refuse to return to their former mode of living (4^{2ff.}). The last item was the thing which Pliny was especially desirous of bringing about, and he says that his efforts in this direction had been measurably successful. This fact may have furnished one of the incentives for the writing of 1 Peter, exhorting believers to maintain a firm defence of their faith in Christ, yet a defence to be made with meekness and fear, while they thus retain a good conscience and hope for the best (3^{16f.}). Many items in the letter are admirably suited to the early days of Pliny's governorship, previous to his appeal to Trajan and the issuance of the Emperor's rescript.

On the other hand, several interpreters prefer a Domitianic date, believing that it furnishes a more appropriate setting for the conditions described in 1 Peter. The situation under Trajan is thought to exhibit a too advanced type of persecution.* Even in comparison with Revelation, which is supposed to have been written in the last years of Domitian's reign, 1 Peter is believed to reflect a slightly earlier situation. The persecution seems to have broken out only recently (4¹²), and resentment toward the authorities has not yet had time to develop (2¹³⁻¹⁷); while in Revelation the persecutors are hated bitterly and Christians have been enduring affliction.

* For statements of this opinion, in more recent times, see S. Davidson, An Introduction to the Study of the NT, i. 522 ff.; J. M. S. Baljon, Commentaar op de katholieke brieven; P. Schmidt, 'Zwei Fragen zum ersten Petrusbrief,' in ZWTh xlix. [1907] 25-52. A. Jülicher, Einführung in das NT, p. 182, would make the date about A.D. 100, because Polycarp, Papias, and the author of James are thought to have known and used 1 Peter.

† Perhaps the author even contemplated the possibility of some counter legal action against the false accusers when they failed to make good their charges. According to Suetonius (Aug. xxxii.), Augustus had enacted a law by which malicious informers made themselves liable for the very punishment which they sought to bring upon their innocent victim.

* Detailed arguments against a Trajanic date are given by J. M. Usteri, Wissenschaftlicher und praktischer Kommentar über den ersten Petrusbrief, pp. 243-248; but he is equally opposed to a Domitianic date (p. 248 ff.). The latter view, however, is held by a number of scholars—e.g., in more recent times, H. von Soden in H. J. Holtzmann's Hand-Kommentar zum NT, iii. 117 (making Silvanus the real author); A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, p. 596 f. (ascribing the letter to Barnabas); R. Knopf, op. cit. p. 24 f. The same date is assumed for the original form of the letter as reconstructed by A. Harnack, Die Chronologie der altchristlichen Litteratur, i. 451-465, and by W. Soltan, 'Die Einheitlichkeit des ersten Petrusbriefes,' in SK lxxviii. [1905] 302-315, lxxix. [1906] 456-460.

tions for some time (2¹³ 6¹⁰ 18²⁴). It is also said that in 1 Peter Christians are not being called upon to pay homage to the Emperor's image (but see 1 P 3¹⁴), while this demand has become very offensive by the time Revelation was written (13¹⁸ 20⁴). Therefore 1 Peter is placed in the earlier part of Domitian's reign (e.g. von Soden, c. 90; McGiffert, before 90; Knopf, 81-90; Harnack, 83-93).

This line of argument assumes that conditions north of the Taurus were practically identical with those of eastern Asia Minor, and that Revelation is a reliable witness to the Domitianic persecution. The former assumption might easily be disputed, and perhaps the latter is open to some question. Certainly the popular belief that Domitian instituted a vigorous persecution in the East is not substantiated by the earliest authorities.* Perhaps the Christians' troubles described in Revelation may have been brought on by certain local authorities acting on their own initiative and being zealous for the cult of the Emperor which had been prominent in Asia since the time of Augustus, its chief seat being at Pergamum (Dio Cassius, li. 20; Tacitus, Annals, iv. 37; cf. Rev 2¹³). But there is manifestly little similarity between the situation reflected in 1 Peter and that of the Christians in Revelation, nor is it certain that the two situations stand to one another in the relation of antecedent to consequent.

Those who adopt a Neronian date—a view which has been widely accepted†—have even greater difficulties in obtaining substantial evidence for a persecution of the desired type in northern Asia Minor in the sixties. There is, however, very explicit evidence for a severe persecution in Rome during Nero's reign. Tacitus (Annals, xv. 44), writing about A.D. 115, says that Nero, in order to free himself from the charge of incendiarism, alleged that the Christians were responsible for the great fire of the year 64. While Tacitus does not think they were guilty, he does regard them as malefactors deserving the severest of the punishments which they received at Nero's hands. Likewise Suetonius (Nero, 16), writing about five years later, says that Nero severely punished the new and mischievous superstition, though he does not make the great fire the occasion for this action. Clement of Rome (ad Cor. 5-7), about the year 95, speaks less explicitly, but in the light of the statements of Tacitus and Suetonius it seems altogether probable that Clement has in mind the Neronian persecution. Whether Tacitus is right in connecting the fire with Nero's action against the Christians is sometimes disputed,‡ but the evidence for a Neronian persecution some time after the conflagration of the year 64 is overwhelming. The ground of the persecution was crimes of one sort or another commonly charged against these people who were 'hated for their enmities' (so Tacitus). Clement says that 'envy' was the cause of the trouble, and his language doubtless reflects the same popular animosity of which Tacitus speaks. The new religionists probably were hated 'as Christians,' and from their point of view they might regard themselves as suffering for the name of Christ, but legally they were being punished for crimes of which they were accused by their enemies.

This situation might be said to correspond fairly well with that of 1 Peter, but we have no certain knowledge that the Neronian persecution reached to the East, and particularly to the peoples addressed in 1 P 1¹. Advocates of the Neronian date quite plausibly remark that members of the new cult, because of their hostility to contemporary customs, would everywhere become objects of hatred, a hatred which might break out in fiery persecution at any time when the magistrates could be induced to act. Some such hypothetical situation may have existed in northern Asia Minor during the reign of Nero, but this is only a possibility and not a certainty.

From the standpoint of the persecutions, the advantage would seem to be with a date shortly before the rescript of Trajan and during the early days of Pliny's governorship. But if the letter was written at this time, or even under Domitian, it must have been pseudonymous (or anonymous). Peter cannot possibly have been alive in the second decade of the 2nd cent., nor is he likely to have lived until the time of Domitian.* Pseudonymity of itself is not inconceivable. The use of some ancient worthy's name to lend authority to a message, especially in crises, was a literary phenomenon familiar to that age.† But for many interpreters other considerations weigh heavily in favour of Petrine, or near-Petrine, authorship, and this conviction necessitates the choice of a Neronian date. Thus the question of date shades into that of authenticity.

5. Authenticity.—Outside the NT the earliest specific testimony to Petrine authorship is by Irenaeus (IV. ix. 2, xvi. 5; v. vii. 2), and, from this time on, similar statements are common (e.g. Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyprian, Eusebius).‡ But the book was not mentioned in the Muratorian Canon, and it seems to have been less well known at Rome than in the East and in Africa. Echoes of its language have been suspected in certain passages of Clement of Rome, but the resemblances are not sufficiently strong and distinctive to establish literary interdependence.* The same thing is true in the case of Hermas§ and Ignatius.|| But Polycarp and Papias seem beyond doubt to have been acquainted with the letter, although we have no information from them on the question of authorship. Of Papias, Eusebius (IIE III. xxxix. 16) says: 'he used testimonies from the First Epistle of John and likewise from that of Peter'; and in Polycarp's letter to the Philippians there are several passages so closely akin to the language of 1 Peter that Polycarp's acquaintance with the document is commonly thought to be beyond question.¶ This opinion was expressed as early as the time of Eusebius (HE IV. xiv. 9). It is remarkable that Polycarp never mentions the name of Peter, and on the strength of this fact Harnack (op. cit. p. 457 ff.) believes that the document was anonymous in Polycarp's day and that the opening and closing verses (1¹ 5¹⁻¹⁴) were added later, probably by the author of 2 Peter, in the interests of canonization. This view is adopted, in a somewhat modified form, by McGiffert (op. cit. p. 598 ff.), who makes Barnabas the original author. Thus the external evidence leaves the question of authorship in some doubt, although it establishes the fact that

* Ramsay, op. cit. p. 279 ff., thinks Peter was still alive in the year 80, so that the letter may have been written under Vespasian. But there is little, if any, positive evidence for a persecution of Christians at this time, and there are very strong reasons for believing that Peter's death occurred in the sixties.

† See the pertinent note of J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter, p. cxxv.

‡ Cf. Clement, ad Cor. xxx. 1 with 1 P 5⁵; xxxviii. 1 with 2⁹ 410 5⁵; xlix. 5 with 4⁸; lvii. 1 with 2¹ 5³; lix. 2 with 2⁹; lxi. 1 with 2¹³.

§ Cf. Hermas, Via III. xi. 3 with 1 P 5⁷; Via IV. iii. 4 with 17; Mand. II. 1 with 2⁴; Sim. ix. xxi. 3 with 4¹⁶; Sim. ix. xxviii. 5 f. with 4¹³ 16; Sim. ix. xxix. 1 with 2².

|| Cf. Ignatius, ad Magn. xlii. 2 with 1 P 5³; ad Polyc. iv. 3 with 2⁸.

¶ E.g. Polycarp, ad Phil. i. 3 = 1 P 1⁸ 12; ii. 1 = 1 P 13 21; v. 3 = 2 P 1; viii. 1 = 2 P 22 24 414 16; x. 2 = 2 P 2. Cf. also ii. 2, vii. 2, x. 1 with 4⁵ 4⁷ 217 respectively.

* See Canfield, op. cit. pp. 70-85, 161-175.

† Lately defended by Moffatt, op. cit. p. 323 ff., who also lists the names of its chief adherents.

‡ See especially A. Profumo, Le fonti ed i tempi dell' incendio Neroniano, Rome, 1903.

the letter was known in the East as early as the second decade of the 2nd cent., when Polycarp wrote to the Philippians (c. 115). But even this conclusion would admit the possibility of a Neronian, or a Domitianic, or a Trajanic date. Julicher, it is true, would date the letter about the year 100 in order to allow time for Polycarp to become familiar with the document; but so early a date is not necessary, since Polycarp was in a position to become acquainted with the letter almost immediately after it was dispatched. Moreover, the habit of diligently exchanging letters during these trying days is brought out clearly in Polycarp's own epistle (iii. 1, xiii. 1 f.; also Ignatius, ad Polyc. viii. 1).

Further data on the problem of authenticity have to be drawn from internal indications. Petrine authorship is explicitly affirmed in the salutation, and this, apparently, is corroborated by 2 P 3¹. Yet several traits in the letter have often been thought to count seriously against its authenticity. Much stress has been placed upon its alleged 'Paulinism.' Possible parallels to the earlier Pauline letters have been pointed out (e.g. 1 P 5⁸=1 Th 5⁶; 1 P 1⁴=2¹⁶ 3⁶=Gal 3²³ 4⁷ 5¹³ 4²⁴; 1 P 2¹²=1 Co 3² 16¹), but the closest affinities in both language and thought are with Romans; and, with few exceptions (e.g. B. Weiss, Kühl), scholars generally admit the priority of Romans. A comparison, e.g., of 1 P 2¹²⁻¹⁷ with Ro 13¹⁻⁷ shows close similarity not only in language and subject-matter but also in the very arrangement of the ideas. In various other places there is a striking parallelism between the two documents.* The points of agreement between 1 Peter and Ephesians are so close that even identity of authorship has sometimes been assumed.† This is an extreme conclusion, yet literary interdependence can hardly be doubted, and priority is generally allowed to rest with Ephesians. This distinctly Pauline, or deuteropauline, character of 1 Peter is thought by many interpreters to make Petrine authorship impossible. Still other data are also brought forward in favour of this scepticism. The close affinities of 1 Peter with certain late NT writings, such as the Pastorals and James, is said to show that it belongs to the same period as, even if it is not dependent upon, those books.* Nor would Peter, it is said, write to Christians belonging to Paul's territory without so much as mentioning the latter's name; and a writer who had been a personal companion of Jesus would surely have made more frequent reference to that relationship. Even stronger is the objection that Peter, originally a Jewish Galilean fisherman, cannot, for purely linguistic reasons, have been the author of a letter the Greek of which is not only thoroughly idiomatic but shows a richness of vocabulary and an appreciation of style thought to be quite beyond his ability.

Although this is a formidable array of objections, the force of which has led several well-known scholars to doubt the authenticity of the letter, others prefer an explanation of the difficulty which will admit the possibility of some form of Petrine authorship. Among more recent writers, the arguments in favour of full authenticity have been stated most elaborately by F. H. Chase (op. cit. p. 785 ff.). He would account for the 'Paulinism' of the letter by supposing that Peter had been summoned to Rome by Paul 'with the supreme object of showing to the Christians at Rome and to the brotherhood in the world the unity of the Body and of the Spirit.' The time spent by Peter in missionary work outside Palestine is believed to have been sufficient to give him the necessary linguistic equipment for writing in Greek; and failure to mention Paul, or absence of other personal data, is to be explained by the fact that Silvanus, who carried the letter himself, supplied such information.

Other scholars would defend only a secondary form of Petrine authorship. Peter wrote 'through Silvanus' [δια Σιλβανου]; that is, the Apostle was responsible for the general content of the letter, but the diction and even to some extent the thought were due to Silvanus. Since the latter, who is identified with the Silas of Acts (15²² 27. 22. 40 16¹⁹ 25. 29 17⁴ 10. 14. 18⁵), had been a personal companion of Paul (e.g. 1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1¹, 2 Co 1¹⁹), it was quite natural that 1 Peter should show a Pauline colouring and should be written in a more excellent style than Peter himself could command. This supposition also allows room for the recognition of the stylistic resemblances between this Epistle and the early chapters of Acts as well as certain portions of the Synoptic Gospels.* They all contain, so it is said, a more or less strong Petrine cast, due ultimately to the influence of the Apostle. On this hypothesis 1 Peter will have been written from Rome in the time of Nero.† Failure to mention Paul may be taken to imply that he was already dead. Others would not attach any special significance to this silence, and would assume that the letter was sent from Rome before the death of either of the two leading apostles.

A few minor problems remain to be considered briefly.

6. Place of writing.—The only hint which the author gives as to the place of writing is contained in 5¹³, 'the co-elect [fem. sing.] in Babylon salutes you.' The 'co-elect' (ἡ συνεκλεκτή) probably refers to the church with which he is associated at the time, although it has been supposed that he might be referring to some individual, and more particularly to his wife (cf. 1 Co 9⁵). This is the view of several older commentators and, more recently, of Bigg. As for the location of this church, there are three possibilities, viz. (1) Babylon on the Euphrates, (2) Babylon in Egypt, or (3) Rome. The first of these possibilities has several advocates, both among the defenders of the letter's authenticity (e.g. B. Weiss, Kühl) and among those who make it post-apostolic (e.g. R. A. Lipsius, H. J. Holtzmann, P. W. Schmiedel). The former opinion is based upon the assumption that 1 Peter is too early to allow time for the Apostle to have reached Rome, and the latter view presupposes that the (fictitious) tradition about his Roman residence had not yet grown up when the letter was written—or, at least, that this tradition was not approved by the author. Both positions are open to serious doubt, as is also the supposition that the author was residing in the Egyptian Babylon. This town, located on the site of the present Cairo, is mentioned by Strabo (xvii. i. 30), and apparently it was at that time mainly a military station and is not likely to have been the home of a Christian community in the 1st century. Furthermore, ecclesiastical tradition does not connect Peter's

* E.g. 1 P 1¹⁴=Ro 12⁷; 1 P 2⁴⁸=Ro 9³²; 1 P 4¹=Ro 6⁷; 1 P 4¹⁰=Ro 12¹⁶; 1 P 3⁹=Ro 12¹⁷.

† So W. Seufert, 'Das Verwandtschaftsverhältniss des ersten Petrusbriefs und Epheserbriefs,' in ZWT xxiv. [1831] 178-197, 332-380. The following parallels may be noted: 1 P 1³⁻⁵=Eph 1¹⁻⁴; 1 P 1¹²=Eph 3¹⁰; 1 P 1¹⁴⁻¹⁸ 4²⁵=Eph 4¹⁷ 5⁸; 1 P 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶=Eph 2¹³⁻²²; 1 P 2¹³=Eph 6⁵; 1 P 3¹⁻⁷=Eph 5²²⁻³³; 1 P 3¹²=Eph 13²²; 1 P 5¹²=Eph 6¹¹⁻¹³.

‡ Cf. 1 P 1³⁻⁵ with Tit 3⁴; 1 P 1¹² with 1 Ti 3¹⁶; 1 P 2¹ with Tit 3²¹; 1 P 1¹¹ 12²² 23⁵⁵ with Ja 1¹ 2¹⁵ 23⁴⁶ 10. For lists of parallels between 1 Peter and other NT writings see J. Monnier, La première épître de l'apôtre Pierre, Paris, 1900, pp. 259-274; C. Bigg, ICC, 'St. Peter and St. Jude,' New York, 1901, pp. 15-24; F. H. Chase, 'Peter, First Epistle,' HDB iii. 788; R. Knopf, op. cit. pp. 7-10.

* See E. Scharie, Die petrinische Strömung der neutestamentlichen Literatur.

† Some of the better known names attaching to this view are J. M. Usteri, T. Zahn, J. Monnier, B. W. Bacon, J. Moffatt.

name with Egypt in any such way as we should expect if he had actually worked there or if tradition regarding his alleged activities in that territory had been sufficiently general to make the reference to 'Babylon' intelligible in a pseudonymous epistle. Hence the probabilities favour the view that Babylon is used metaphorically for Rome, as is the case in Revelation (14⁸ 16¹⁹ 17⁵ 18² 10. 21; cf. Sib. Orac. v. 143, 158; Eusebius, HE II. xv. 2). Mark, who is included in the greeting, was also closely associated with Rome in early tradition (Col 4¹⁰, Philm²⁴, 2 Ti 4¹¹; cf. Irenæus, III. i. 1; Eusebius, HE II. xv. 1 f., vi. xiv. 6 f.).

Does the assumption that Rome was the place of composition meet the implied conditions regarding the delivery of the letter? The phrase 'through Silvanus' probably means that he was the bearer, yet he may also have been the amanuensis. Similar expressions in the writings of this period commonly refer, however, more particularly to the bearer.* Apparently he is supposed to take a route bringing him first to Pontus, whence he swings in a circle through Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, completing his journey in Bitynia. To accomplish this he would follow one of the main lines of travel by water from Italy to the Black Sea, landing perhaps at Amastris or Sinope, and after completing his mission he may have returned to Herakleia, where he would take ship again for Italy (see F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter I. 1-II. 17, London, 1898, pp. 157-184).

7. Literary structure and integrity.—Is this document a 'homily,' an 'epistle,' or a 'letter' in the proper sense of the term? That is, was it originally simply a hortatory discourse intended for general edification, or was it such a discourse thrown into epistolary form mainly for literary effect; or was it a specific message from a writer whose heart went out in sympathy to particular persons in the hour of their great affliction?† The first of these views is held by Harnack, who, as previously observed, thinks the epistolary introduction and conclusion are later additions. The second view, which is essentially the same so far as literary considerations are concerned, is more generally adopted. In its favour one may note that the document is addressed to a wide circle of readers with whom the writer does not appear to be in immediate personal contact, items of personal intimacy are conspicuously lacking, and the moral and religious exhortations of the document are capable of very general application. On the other hand, there is much to suggest that the writer has a very strong personal interest in the welfare of his readers. He knows the specific trials and temptations which beset them, and he is strongly moved with compassion for them in their affliction. In this respect we have a real 'letter,' notwithstanding the wide circle of readers addressed—if one allows that a circular letter can be a real 'letter,' as would seem unquestionably true of Galatians, for example. The writer of 1 Peter, whether the Apostle or not, had much the same personal interest in the problem which the persecution had raised among his readers as Paul had in the problems which the legalistic controversy had aroused in the churches of Galatia.

As for literary analyses of the letter, there have been a few proposals which are more thoroughgoing than Harnack's. D. Völter (Der erste Petrusbrief, seine Entstehung und Stellung in der Geschichte des Urchristentums, Strassburg, 1906) works out in detail an original document, written by Peter or one of his pupils, which is wholly free from Pauline colouring—so free, in fact, that the mention of the name 'Jesus Christ' was studiously avoided. This original document, composed some time before the persecution of Domitian, was freely interpolated by a Paulinist in the time of Trajan. Still another hypothesis is advanced by W. Soltan, 'Die Einheitlichkeit des ersten Petrusbriefes,' in SK lxxviii. [1905] 302-315, lxxix. [1906] 456-460. By excising a series of supposed interpolations he recovers the original document which contained 1³⁻²² 2⁶⁻¹¹ 21³ 21³ 31³ 41³ 7-19 5⁸⁻¹¹. This was a hortatory homily written during the reign of Domitian. More recently a third theory has been proposed by R. Perdelwitz, Die Mysterienreligion und das Problem des ersten Petrusbriefes: Ein literarischer und religionsgeschichtlicher Versuch, Giessen, 1911. He distinguishes two originally independent and self-consistent parts, (1) 1³⁻⁴¹ and (2) 11¹ 41²-51⁴. The former was a discourse to candidates on the occasion of their baptism, and the latter was a letter written later by the same person and probably addressed to the same community. It aimed at encouraging and admonishing the readers. The two documents, after lying for some time in the archives of the community, were either intentionally or accidentally copied together and henceforth circulated as one letter.

None of these several partition hypotheses has proved at all convincing.

8. Text and interpretation.—For a full discussion of textual and interpretative questions recourse must be had to the standard commentaries cited below. The text presents comparatively few difficulties, and only one or two points of interpretation, which have been the subject of more recent or more especial discussion, interest us at present.

Perhaps the most difficult passage in the letter is 31⁸⁻²⁰, relating to the preaching to 'the spirits in prison.' Four main questions have to be answered, viz. (1) Who did the preaching? (2) To whom was it addressed? (3) When was this mission performed? (4) What was its purpose? Each of these queries has been answered in different ways, and the answers have been blended variously in the final interpretation of the passage.* As for the first question, the usual text makes Jesus Himself the preacher to these imprisoned spirits. But this reading is rejected by a few interpreters, who think the present Greek is corrupt. The clause which reads: 'In which he [Jesus] went and preached also to the spirits in prison,' has been treated as a marginal gloss which originally referred to Enoch, reading 'Ἐν ᾧ' for 'Ἐν ᾧ καὶ'. Others would make this substitution in the text itself, or else add the word 'Enoch' to the present text, on the assumption that the four letters ENQX might easily have dropped out after the similar ENQKAI. In that case we should read: 'In which [spirit] Enoch also went and preached to the spirits in prison.* But it is very doubtful whether there are really substantial grounds for questioning the integrity of the text. Probably we ought to concede that, in the author's opinion, Jesus was the preacher.

* E.g. Ignatius, ad Rom. x. 1, ad Phil. xi. 2, ad Smyrn. xii. 1, ad Polyc. viii. 1 (ὁ δὲ τὸν υἱὸν πεποιθέντων); Polycarp, ad Phil. 14 ('per'). See also δὲ similarly used in a papyrus letter of the year A.D. 41 in G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1910, p. 39.

† On these formal distinctions as applied to NT writings, see A. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895, pp. 189-251 (Eng. tr., Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, pp. 1-59), Licht vom Osten, Tübingen, 1903, p. 157 ff. (Eng. tr., Light from the Ancient East, New York, 1910, p. 217 ff.); Heinrici, op. cit. p. 56 ff.; J. Moffatt, op. cit. pp. 47-50.

* For modern discussion of this much-debated topic see F. Spitta, Christi Predigt an die Geister, Göttingen, 1890, who cites earlier literature; C. Bruston, La Descente aux enfers, Paris, 1890; W. Kelly, Preaching to the Spirits in Prison, London, 1900; C. Clemen, Niedergefahren zu den Toten, Giessen, 1900, Religionsgeschichtliche Erklärung des NT, do., 1909, p. 153 ff. (Eng. tr., Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Edinburgh, 1912, p. 193 ff.); J. Turmel, La Descente du Christ aux enfers, Paris, 1905; W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, Göttingen, 1907, p. 255 ff.; H. J. Holtzmann, 'Höllenfahrt im NT,' in ARW xi. [1908] 285 ff.; F. Loofs, 'Christ's Descent into Hell,' in Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, Oxford, 1909, ii. 290-301; J. C. Granberry, 'Christological Peculiarities in the First Epistle of Peter,' in AJTh xiv. [1910] 69 ff.; K. Gschwind, Die Niederfahrt Christi in die Unterwelt [= Neuenteamentliche Abhandlungen, vol. ii. bks. iii.-v.], Münster i. W., 1911; D. Plooy, 'De descensus in 1 Petrus 31⁸ en 4⁶,' in Theologisch Tijdschrift, xlvii. [1913] 145-162; art. DESCENT INTO HADES.

To whom, then, was the message addressed? It may have been directed (1) either toward Noah's contemporaries generally, who are now dead (cf. 1 P 4⁶), or (2) toward those 'giants' of Noah's time whose wickedness brought down Divine wrath in the Flood (cf. Gn 6¹², 2 P 2⁴). The latter view is to be preferred, since it is in line with the beliefs of that age regarding the angelic powers which were being held in temporary bondage in the lower world. In view of the fact that Christ's mission extends not only to ordinary men but even to the notorious sinners of antiquity, the readers are exhorted to be confident in the power and surety of the new salvation which has been mediated through Him.

When did Christ preach to these 'spirits'? Some have said that it was while these giants were still upon earth, the pre-existent Christ being present in Noah and using him as a means of expression. This was Augustine's suggestion (Ep. 164, 'ad Euodium,' 15 ff.), and he has had many followers, who have held this opinion much more confidently than Augustine did. It is a very unnatural interpretation, and has in recent years given way to the idea that Jesus, in the interim between His death and resurrection, visited the nether regions, where He preached to the giant spirits there imprisoned.

What, finally, was the content of His message? It may have been either a proclamation of judgment or an offer of salvation. The context strongly supports the latter supposition, which is probably the correct one; although the former has been defended, particularly by interpreters who desired to emphasize the hopeless condition of all who die in sin.

According to 1 Peter, the fallen angels are not the only persons in the nether world to be included within the range of the new salvation. A similar opportunity of hearing the gospel has been extended to human beings who have passed on to the lower regions (1 P 4^{5c}). All humanity falls into two classes, the living and the dead. Both groups are to be brought into judgment, but not without first having had an opportunity to hear the gospel. The author would strengthen the confidence of those who are suffering the agonies of present persecution and would give them new courage by reminding them that the Christian salvation is so comprehensive and powerful that it can bring deliverance to the condemned angels and to all mortals even in the under world, if the dead will exercise faith as the living Christians have done. The pertinence and force of this appeal become more evident when we note current belief about the nature of a full salvation. In the Book of Enoch there are indications that the expected Messianic salvation will be efficacious even for the fallen angels (50²⁻⁵ 59²⁵), while Justin Martyr (Dial. lxxii. 4) and Irenaeus (III. xx. 4, IV. xxii. 1) affirm that the Jewish Scriptures (Isaiah or Jeremiah) had originally contained a promise of salvation for the dead. These Fathers are probably assigning to Isaiah or Jeremiah words which really belonged to some other Jewish writing. (For similar ideas in Bereshith Rabba, see F. Weber, Jüdische Theologie, Leipzig, 1897, pp. 342 f., 363.) But for the readers of 1 Peter there was still another realm of religious imagery, even more immediately accessible than the Jewish, which could be used in interpreting the supreme significance of the Christian salvation. In the Hellenistic religious syncretism with which the peoples of Asia Minor had long been familiar, the notion of redemption had been pictured in terms of the activity of a Divine or semi-Divine deliverer mediating blessings not only to people of the earth but even to the inhabitants of the under world; and it was very fortunate for the progress of Christianity in Hellenistic circles that the Christian preachers and teachers were able to affirm the adequacy and supremacy of Jesus Christ in these respects.* A number of other items in 1 Peter, such as the efficacy of blood-sprinkling (1²), the new birth (v. ³), and the saving significance of baptism (3²¹), will doubtless have been interpreted through association with current religious imagery.†

B. SECOND PETER.—As compared with 1 Peter, the problems of 2 Peter are less perplexing and will be treated much more briefly.

1. Content.—The Epistle may be outlined as follows:

(a) Salutation (1¹²).—The author, styling himself 'Symeon Peter, slave and apostle of Jesus Christ,' addresses fellow-Christians in general.

(b) The surety of the Christian salvation (1²⁻²¹).—Certainty is guaranteed (1) by the present experience of believers who share in the Divine nature (1^{2c}), and who should therefore be diligent in cultivating the Christian virtues (vv. 5-11). Further assurance is given (2) through the personal testimony of the apostle Peter (vv. 12-18) and (3) through ancient prophecy, which is a true expression of God's own will (vv. 19-21).

(c) Condemnation and refutation of false teachers (2¹⁻³¹⁰).—(1) The errorists are successors of the false prophets of former times, and a sure judgment, like that which befell the sinners of old, awaits them (2¹⁻⁹). (2) Their depravity is displayed (i.) in a disposition to throw off all Divine restraints (vv. 10-12), and (ii.) in the licentious life which they themselves live, and persuade others to live, in the name of liberty (vv. 13-18). As a result (iii.) they have become slaves of licentiousness and are worse than before they associated themselves with the Christian community (vv. 19-22). (3) Consequently, impending judgment threatens them, notwithstanding their scepticism regarding the Parousia. They should remember that (i.) a catastrophic end has been predicted by apostles and prophets (3¹⁻⁴), and that (ii.) the order of nature is first a destruction of the world by water and then a destruction by fire (vv. 5-7). Furthermore, (iii.) the delay is easily explicable, since God reckons time in larger units than do men, and by temporarily holding off the Judgment He is giving men opportunity to repent (v. 8²); but (iv.) of the certainty of impending judgment there can be no reasonable doubt (v. 10).

(d) Duty of Christians in the present situation (3^{11-13a}).—(1) They will live a pure life, thus making ready for the new life of righteousness in which they are to participate after the earth has been purified (3¹¹⁻¹⁴). (2) They will not misinterpret the delay, nor will they pervert the Christian doctrine

* See W. Bousset, op. cit. p. 233 ff.; A. Dieterich, Nekyia, Leipzig, 1893, p. 123 ff.; M. Brückner, Der sterbende und auferstehende Gottheitland in den orientalischen Religionen und ihr Verhältnis zum Christentum, Tübingen, 1908; S. J. Case, Evolution of Early Christianity, Chicago, 1914, pp. 219-238, 233 ff. For evidence that NT writers other than the author of 1 Peter took advantage of these notions about the under world, see Mt 27⁵², Ro 10⁶, 14⁹, 1 Co 15², Eph 4⁹, Ph 2¹⁰, Col 2¹⁵, He 12²³, Rev 18 513 69-11.

† See A. Dieterich, Eine Mithrasliturgie, Leipzig, 1910, pp. 92-179; R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, do., 1904, pp. 226 ff., 368 ff.; S. J. Case, op. cit. p. 350, n. 1.

* The suggestion that the whole clause originally stood on the margin is made by J. Cramer, Exegetica et Critica II: Het glossenatisch Karakter van I. Ptr 5: 19-21 en 4: 6 [= Nieuwe bijdragen op het gebied van godgeleerdheid en wijsbegeerte, vii.], Utrecht, 1891. For the notion that the word 'Enoch' has dropped out of the text, see J. Rendel Harris and others, in Exp. 6th ser., iv. [1901] 194-199, 346-349, v. [1902] 317-320, vi. [1903] 70-72, 316-320, 377 ff.

of liberty, particularly as stated by St. Paul (3^{15t}). (3) They will steadfastly resist the false teachers and will derive their spiritual instruction and nourishment from the Lord only (3^{17, 18a}).

(e) Benediction (3^{18b}).

2. Historical situation.—The chief purpose of the Epistle undoubtedly is to combat false teachers who, in the opinion of the author, are making the Christian teaching of liberty identical with licence and are ridiculing the notion of an impending punitive catastrophe as preached by an earlier generation of Christians. Thus the main purpose of the writing is clear, but more exact information about the actual historical situation in which it arose is hard to obtain. Although the writer calls himself 'Symeon Peter,' the document is notably devoid of specific temporal and local indicia. There is no clear statement as to its destination, and, unlike most of the other NT letters, the conclusion does not contain any personal items which might help to identify the circumstances more exactly. In fact, the writing is epistolary only in a very liberal sense of the term, for in reality it is a homily addressed to Christians at large (1⁴). And the errors which the author would correct seem not to have been confined to one particular congregation, but to have been somewhat widespread.

In order to ascertain more accurately the historical situation, we must examine more closely the character of the heresy. The false teachers are distinguished by two distinct, though not unrelated, traits: they are antinomians and anti-eschatologists. They are not open antagonists of the Christian movement, but are actually within the community, where they propagate their pernicious doctrines among their unwary brethren (2^{1-3, 13t, 18t}). They lay stress upon freedom, claiming St. Paul as their authority (3¹⁶), and apply their doctrine so literally in daily conduct that their character is severely impugned by the writer, who accuses them of gross immorality. Their sin is classed with that of the fallen angels mentioned in Gn 6, and their fate is to be like that which overtook the wicked people of Sodom and Gomorrah. They are bestial debauchees, given over to adultery and insatiable wickedness, and they persist in drawing others down to their own base level. Furthermore, they have cast off that restraint which belief in an impending judgment would naturally impose, and they even scoff at the teaching of the early Christian worthies who made so much of this belief (v. 3¹⁴). Thus, in addition to being grossly immoral, they are disrespectful toward authorities (2^{1, 10}), and are greedy for worldly things in a way ill becoming those whose gaze should be fixed chiefly upon the future, and especially upon that moment when the present world-order is to pass away (2^{3, 13-15, 31-13}).

Is it possible to locate with any degree of probability a period and a territory answering to this historical situation?

3. Date and provenance.—2 Peter is not the only NT book to concern itself with heretical teachers. It is true, the Judaizers who troubled St. Paul have essentially nothing in common with the disturbers of 2 Peter, and the latter have only a faint likeness to the heretics of Colossæ (Col 2⁴⁻⁸, Eph 5^{2t}), or to the antinomians of Ph 3^{18t}. In the Pastoral Epistles there are closer analogies to 2 Peter (e.g. 2 Ti 3^{1t}, Tit 1^{10t, 16}), as also perhaps in the Johannine Epistles (e.g. 1 Jn 2^{18, 22, 26, 41, 2 Jn 7, 3 Jn 9^{7t}}). But it is in Revelation (e.g. 2^{2, 6, 9, 13t, 15, 18, 34, 8}), and particularly in Jude, that the closest parallels are to be found. In fact, Jude is taken over almost bodily into 2 Peter—that is, assuming that Jude is the earlier document.* Yet this fact does not positively fix the date of composition, since the date of Jude is not certain. But it is commonly placed comparatively late in the list of NT letters.

Further evidence for the date of 2 Peter is furnished by a number of incidental notices in the Epistle itself. In 3^{15t} we learn that the Epistles of St. Paul had already been assembled into a collection which has canonical authority like 'other scriptures'—probably meaning the OT. The first generation of Christians had died (3⁴), and even Jn 21^{18t} seems to be known to the author (1⁴). Acquaintance with the tradition of Papias, to the effect that Peter was ultimately responsible for the record of Jesus' career contained in Mark, has been suspected in 2 P 1¹⁵, while 1^{17t} may reflect familiarity with Mark's account of the Transfiguration, and 2²⁰ may be coloured by the language of Mt 12⁴⁵ or Lk 11²⁸. Literary affinities with Josephus and with Philo have also been discovered, but there are especially strong resemblances between 2 Peter and the Apocalypse of Peter (see for particulars J. B. Mayor, op. cit. pp. cxxv-cxxxiv). On the other hand, there are very few references to 2 Peter in the writings of the early Fathers. The earliest certain allusion to the Epistle is by Origen (ap. Eusebius, HE VI. xxv. 8), but possibly it was known to Clement of Alexandria (Eusebius, HE VI. xiv. 1). In earlier times there is no certain trace of its existence and it was very late in obtaining a place in the canon. It is not mentioned in the Muratorian fragment, nor is it included in the Peshitta or in the Old Latin (see J. B. Mayor, op. cit. p. cxviff.). Eusebius (HE III. xxv. 3) doubted its canonicity, although he attested the esteem with which it was regarded by Christians.

From the foregoing considerations we may draw some inferences regarding the time and place of writing. It may not be possible to identify with certainty the false teachers, but they clearly represent a more advanced type of antinomianism than that of the Pastorals or of the Johannine Epistles. This fact points to a 2nd cent. date and possibly to Asiatic territory as the home of the heresy. The latter supposition agrees with the statement of 2 P 3¹ (cf. 1¹⁸), which probably is a reference to 1 P 1^{15t}; nor is it out of harmony with 2 P 3¹⁵, for St. Paul had addressed letters to various communities in Asia Minor. (But see J. B. Mayor, op. cit. p. cxxxvii, who thinks that the destination was Rome.) Reference to a Pauline canon already perverted in the process of interpretation is not probable before the 2nd cent.; and the late date at which 2 Peter appears in ecclesiastical tradition also marks it as one of the very last NT books to be written. These data would seem to bring the time of its composition down not only to the 2nd cent. but even past the first quarter of that century. Yet the Epistle was known to Origen, and perhaps to Clement of Alexandria, so it must have been in circulation some time before their day. The most probable supposition is that it formed a part of that body of literature which grew up around the name of Peter (Gospel, Preaching, Apocalypse) about the middle of the 2nd century. This hypothesis is confirmed by the strong resemblances between 2 Peter and the Apocalypse of Peter, which have led some interpreters to suggest identity of authorship (W. Sanday, Inspiration [BL, 1893], London, 1893, p. 347 f.; cf. also Kuhl, op. cit. p. 376). While this may not be probable, the two works undoubtedly belong to the same general period and territory.

* This opinion is fairly well established; see, e.g., F. H. Chase, art. 'Jude, Epistle of,' in HDB II. 802f.; J. B. Mayor, op. cit.

pp. i-xxv. This is the prevailing view at present, yet the priority of 2 Peter has found recent defenders in F. Spitta, Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas; T. Zahn, Einführung in das NT, II. 43ff. (Eng. tr., Introduction to the NT, II. 194ff.); C. Bigg, op. cit. p. 216ff.

Since Egypt has been regarded as the home of the Apocalypse, that too has been made the place of 2 Peter's origin (so A. Harnack, op. cit. p. 469; Jülicher, op. cit. p. 206 [Palestine or Egypt]; F. H. Chase, 'Peter, Second Epistle,' HDB iii. 816 f.). But the possibility of a Palestinian or an Asiatic (Asia Minor) origin must be admitted, and the type of heresy refuted—which the author presumably knew at first-hand—would seem to count strongly in favour of the latter territory.

4. Authenticity.—The foregoing considerations would appear to render the authenticity of 2 Peter quite indefensible. But since Petrine authorship is still advocated by a few scholars, we shall now state their position, selecting, as representative, Spitta, op. cit.; Zahn, op. cit. ii. 42–110 (Eng. tr., ii. 194–293); and Bigg, op. cit. pp. 199–247. Spitta defends the priority of 2 Peter over Jude, finding in the latter (e.g. vv. 4¹², 12¹⁷) clear evidences of direct dependence upon the former.* In fact, Jude was written in order to fulfil the wish of Peter expressed in 2 P 1¹⁵. A detailed comparison of the thought and vocabulary of the two Epistles leads Spitta (pp. 405–470) to affirm the secondary character of Jude. 2 Peter was actually written by the Apostle toward the close of his life; it was addressed to some Jewish Christian community unknown to us, and the same community had previously received letters from both Peter and Paul (3¹, 15). These letters have now been lost. The difficulty of believing that 1 and 2 Peter can have come from the same pen is met by ascribing to Silvanus an important rôle in the composition of the former. The tardiness with which 2 Peter gained a place in ecclesiastical tradition is explained by supposing that its Jewish connexions militated against its admission to an epistolary canon in which Pauline writings predominated (p. 535 ff.).

Zahn holds very similar views, but is more specific on certain points of detail. He agrees with Spitta in making 2 Peter earlier than Jude, and regards the former as the work of Peter, who wrote from Antioch to Jewish Christians in or near Palestine, shortly before his departure for Rome in the year 63. Although the Apostle was addressing Jewish communities, he aimed at anticipating the activity of heretical teachers whose work he had already noted in Gentile communities such as Corinth. Since the language of 1 Peter is due to Silvanus, the stylistic distinctiveness of 2 Peter is thought, as by Spitta, to be truly Petrine; and reasons similar to those of Spitta are given to account for the obscurity surrounding 2 Peter in the 1st and 2nd centuries.

Bigg follows the same general lines, but is more ready to believe that both letters are the literary work of the Apostle himself, the differences being due merely to different amanuenses. Even though 2 Peter is placed earlier than Jude, Bigg finds in 2 P 3¹ a distinct reference to 1 Peter rather than to some hypothetical lost letter; and he thinks 2 Peter was addressed to some Gentile community in Asia Minor to which the disturbances originally arising in Corinth had spread.

Other writers save a portion of the Epistle to Peter by removing later interpolations. Kühl, op. cit. pp. 346–363, will serve as an illustration.† He would restore the original by removing 2³¹, which he thinks was taken from Jude and inserted in 2 Peter probably by the author of the Apocalypse of Peter. The primary document antedates Jude; it is the work of the apostle Peter about the year 65, and it is addressed to some Gentile Christian community. Stylistic difficulties are solved by resorting when necessary to the redactional activity of the interpolator.

5. Text and interpretation.—2 Peter furnishes many textual perplexities, and the meaning of the author's language is not always clear. But since these problems have been treated fully in good recent commentaries (e.g. J. B. Mayor, R. Knopf, et al.), they do not call for detailed discussion in the present connexion.

LITERATURE.—The standard NT Introductions discuss the principal problems connected with 1 and 2 Peter. Among the more recent and important are A. Hilgenfeld, Hist.-krit. Einleitung in das NT, Leipzig, 1875, pp. 618–641; S. Davidson, Introduction to the Study of the NT, 2 vols., London, 1882, i. 501–532, ii. 433–473; B. Weiss, Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das NT, Berlin, 1897, pp. 407–433 (Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1887–88, ii. 123–174); G. Salmon, A Historical Introduction to the Books of the NT, London, 1892, pp. 433–447, 481–508; H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der historisch-krit. Einleitung in das NT, Freiburg i. B., 1892, pp. 309–327; W. H. Bennett and W. F. Adeney, Biblical Introduction, New York, 1899, pp. 440–450; B. W. Bacon, Introduction to the NT, do., 1900, pp. 150–153, 170–173; T. Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, Leipzig, 1900, ii. 1–111 (Eng. tr., New York, 1900, ii. 134–293); A. Jülicher, Einleitung in das NT, Tübingen, 1906, pp. 175–185, 200–208 (Eng. tr., New York, 1904, pp. 204–215, 232–241); A. S. Peake, A Critical Introduction to the NT, London, 1909, pp. 90–100; J. Moffatt, LNT, Edinburgh, 1911, pp. 318–344, 358–372.

Among general works one might also mention treatises on the Apostolic Age: J. V. Bartlet, The Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1900; G. V. Lechler, Das apostol. und nachapostol. Zeitalter, Karlsruhe, 1885 (Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1886); A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, New York, 1899; O. Pfeiderer, Das Urchristentum, seine Schriften und Lehren, 2 vols., Berlin, 1902 (Eng. tr., Primitive Christianity, 4 vols., London, 1906–11); G. T. Purves, Christianity in the Apostolic Age, London, 1900; J. H. Ropes, The Apostolic Age in the Light of Modern Criticism, do., 1906; C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., 2 vols., do., 1897–99; and works on NT Theology: W. Beyschlag, Neutestamentliche Theologie (Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1895); J. Bovon, Theologie du NT, 2 vols., Paris, 1902–05; P. Feine, Theologie des NT, Leipzig, 1910; E. P. Gould, The Biblical Theology of the NT, New York, 1900; H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der neutestamentlichen Theologie, 2 vols., Tübingen, 1911; E. Renss, History of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age, 2 vols., London, 1872–74; G. B. Stevens, The Theology of the NT, Edinburgh, 1899; H. Weinel, Biblische Theologie des NT, Tübingen, 1911; B. Weiss, Lehrbuch der bibl. Theologie des NT, Berlin, 1880 (Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1882–83).

Special discussion of the Petrine literature will be found in P. J. Gloag, Introduction to the Catholic Epistles, Edinburgh, 1887, pp. 109–255; E. Scharfe, Die petrinische Stromung der neutestamentlichen Literatur, Berlin, 1893; F. H. Chase, art. 'Peter, First Epistle' and 'Peter, Second Epistle,' in HDB iii. 779–818; O. Cone, art. 'Peter, the Epistles of,' in EB iii. 3677–3685; F. Sieffert, 'Petrus der Apostel,' in PRE xv. 203–212; A. Harnack, Die Chronologie der altchristlichen Literatur, 2 vols., Leipzig, 1897, i. 450–475; K. Henkel, Der zweite Brief des Apostels Petrus geprüft auf seine Echtheit, Freiburg i. B., 1904; B. Weiss, Der erste Petrusbrief und die neuere Kritik, Grossschelfelde, 1906; H. Grosch, Die Echtheit des zweiten Briefes Petri, Berlin, 1911.

The chief modern commentaries, many of which contain full bibliographies, are C. F. Keil, Commentar über die Briefe des Petrus und Judas, Leipzig, 1833; F. Spitta, Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas, Halle, 1885; J. M. Usteri, Wissenschaftlicher und praktischer Commentar über den ersten Petrusbrief, Zürich, 1887; R. Johnstone, The First Epistle of Peter, Edinburgh, 1888; H. von Soden, 'Briefe des Petrus,' in H. J. Holtzmann's Hand-Kommentar zum NT, Freiburg i. B., 1892, iii. 109–153, 192–211; A. H. de Hartog, Korte aantekeningen op de brieven van den apostel Petrus, Amsterdam, 1894; J. T. Beck, Erklärung der Briefe Petri, Gütersloh, 1896; E. Kühl, Die Briefe Petri und Judas, Göttingen, 1897; F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter I. 1–11. 17, London, 1898; J. Monnier, La Première épître de l'apôtre Pierre, Paris, 1900; C. Bigg, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude, New York, 1901; O. Cone, International Handbooks to the NT, New York, 1901, iii. 297–342; J. M. S. Baljon, Commentaar op de katholieke brieven, Utrecht, 1904; J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1907; H. Gunkel, on 1 Peter, in J. Weiss, Die Schriften des NT, Göttingen, 1908, ii. 529–571; G. Hollmann, on 2 Peter, ib. ii. 582–596; J. H. Hart, EGT, 'The First Epistle General of Peter,' London, 1910, pp. 1–80; R. D. Strachan, EGT, 'The Second Epistle General of Peter,' do., 1910, pp. 83–149; H. Windisch, 'Die katholischen Briefe erklärt,' in H. Lietzmann's Handbuch zum NT, Tübingen, 1911, iv. 2; R. Knopf, Die Briefe Petri und Judas, Göttingen, 1912; G. Wohlenberg, Der erste und zweite Petrusbrief und der Judasbrief, Leipzig, 1915.

S. J. CASE.

* This is the view generally held by those who think 2 Peter authentic.

† For advocacy of a displacement hypothesis, as a means of relieving certain incongruities in the letter, see P. Ladeuze, 'Transposition accidentelle dans la II^e Petri,' in RB, new ser. ii. [1905] 543–552.

PHARAOH, PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER.—The term 'Pharaoh' was an honorary title of the kings of Egypt. In biblical history several Pharaohs are met with, especially in connexion with Abraham, Joseph, and Moses. In the NT there are some interesting references. Thus in his speech (Ac 7) St. Stephen proves God's care for Joseph and Moses by the confidence Pharaoh placed in the former, and the protection given to the latter by the daughter of the reigning king. The writer of Hebrews (11²⁴) finds in the story of Moses who 'refused to become the son of Pharaoh's daughter' an outstanding instance of faith refusing this world's glory for the better part. St. Paul in his great argument for election in Romans (ch. 9) gives the Pharaoh of the Exodus as an illustration of God's absoluteness in dealing with men. 'Just as the career of Moses exhibits the Divine mercy, so the career of Pharaoh exhibits the Divine severity, and in both cases the absolute sovereignty of God is vindicated' (Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans' 8, Edinburgh, 1902, on 9¹⁷). J. W. DUNCAN.

PHARISEES.—The Pharisees (פָּרִישִׁי, פָּרִישָׁאִים) were a religious sect among the Jews, probably originating in Maccabæan times.

1. The name.—Prāshīm has generally been interpreted to mean 'separatists.' In a recent work, however, Oesterley suggests another view. He points out that the Pharisees were the popular party; that one of their precepts was, 'Separate not thyself from the congregation,' and that they reproached the Sadducees as the separatists. He finds it more probable that the name means 'expounders.' In support he quotes Josephus, who says of the Pharisees that 'they are those who seem to explain the laws with accuracy' (BJ II. viii. 14), and asserts that in Rabbinical literature the root p-r-sh is constantly found used in the sense of 'explain,' 'expound,' or 'interpret,' in reference to Scripture which is explained in the interests of the Oral Law (Oesterley, Books of the Apocrypha, p. 131 f.). The view is certainly interesting and worth consideration. But it seems to the present writer that all the arguments by which it is supported admit of an easy answer, and that the balance of probability inclines towards the familiar view that 'Pharisee' means 'separatist.'

2. General position of Pharisees in the 1st cent. A.D.—In this article we confine ourselves to the period from the times of Christ to the close of the 1st century. For the previous history of Pharisaism and the development and character of its tenets and practices, the reader must consult HDB and DCG. At the opening of our period we find the Pharisees noted for piety, learning, and strict observance of the Law. They were held in high esteem among the people (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 5, 6, XVII. ii. 4). Almost up to this point, indeed, they might be regarded as a people's party, the champions of popular rights against the aristocratic Sadducees. They were the party of progress. Against the Sadducees they represented a living faith, and their theology was simply orthodox Jewish doctrine. They preached a religion for the people and conducted a missionary propaganda (Mt 23¹⁵). At this time they had little direct political power, though they held some seats in the Sanhedrin (Ac 5³⁴ 23⁶). But such was their influence with the people that the ruling Sadducees were largely amenable to their advice (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 4). Passionately devoted to the Law as they were, they interpreted and applied it in a more tolerant, generous sense than the Sadducees (Ant. XIII. x. 6, XX. ix. 1). No doubt it was among the Pharisees that the best type of Jewish character and piety was found. But in the Gospels it is clear that the Pharisees, the popular party, were drawing themselves apart into a new aristocracy, and that the party of progress had become rigidly conservative. Every one of their own interpretations of the Law was stereotyped. Their traditions were regarded with greater veneration than the original Law. In the accumulated mass of precepts all sense of proportion was lost. All true spirituality was in danger of suffocation under the complex of ritual and ceremonial.

3. Pharisees and foreign domination.—Pharisaism attained its fullest development while there was a mere semblance of national independence, and nearly all civil power had passed from the Jews. No doubt this circumstance was of considerable importance in enabling pious Jews to distinguish between a Church and a nation (see Bousset, Religion des Judentums, p. 62 f.). How the Pharisees regarded the rule of Herod and the Romans it is difficult to judge. On their attitude to Herod two different views will be found in HDB iii. 827 and Bousset (op. cit. p. 62 f.) respectively. The statement in the former that they abhorred Herod is too dogmatic (see Jos. Ant. xv. i. 1). Probably we should say that, while they were not enamoured of the rule of Herod, they submitted to it as a necessary evil. As to their attitude to Rome, matters are even less clear. We know that they discussed whether tribute should be paid (Mt 22¹⁵). Further, the party of the Zealots who agitated for the overthrow of Roman power were an off-shoot from the Pharisees. Though Josephus is desirous of representing them as a distinct party, he is compelled to admit this (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, 6; BJ II. viii. 1). We may take it that certain of the Pharisees favoured political action, others deprecated it. The former were the Zealots, who were responsible for stirring up the great revolt which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem, and involved the disappearance of the last shreds of Jewish national independence.

4. Effects of the Fall of Jerusalem.—This catastrophe, so calamitous in itself, came to the Pharisees, as to Jewish Christians, really as an emancipation. If the Church was henceforth free from serious Jewish persecution, and the distraction of Judaizing propaganda, the Pharisees were free of their conflict with the Sadducees, who disappeared with Temple and priesthood. The Jews ceased to be politically a nation, but in reality they had ceased to be that long before. Judaism as a Church, a religious system, was not seriously affected by the loss of the Temple. For long the priests as a class had been declining in favour. For long the real centre of religious life had been not the Temple but the Synagogue. Many influences had conspired to produce this result, but we cannot discuss them here (see Bousset, op. cit. p. 97 ff.). It was the great service of Pharisaism to Judaism that it had so developed Jewish piety that the loss of the Temple was more of a relief than a disaster. The Pharisees set themselves more diligently than ever to the development of the Law. In two particulars the fall of the city seemed to harden Pharisaic tendencies.

(a) Their attitude to the common people.—We noted how even in the time of Christ the Pharisee looked down upon the 'am haarets. Piety to the Pharisee was associated with culture. The people who knew not the Law were accursed (Jn 7⁴⁹). This tendency towards an exclusiveness of culture increased, and the breach widened between the Pharisee and the 'am haarets. The dealings of the Pharisee with the 'am haarets were as strictly limited and carefully regulated as his dealings with the Gentiles. Bousset (op. cit. p. 167) quotes a dictum of a certain Rabbi Eleazar, which forbids all transactions with the 'am haarets, makes the murder of an 'am haarets under certain circumstances permissible, and declares that the hatred of the 'am haarets is greater than that of the Gentiles against Israel.

(b) Their attitude to the Gentiles.—As we have noted above, at one time a missionary propaganda was carried on among Gentiles. Manifestly this was in opposition to the Pharisaic tendency towards exclusiveness, and it was the latter that conquered. The increasing restiveness under the Roman domination which culminated in the great war was a decisive factor in this struggle of principles. Probably a short time before the fall of the city eighteen points of difference between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, all dealing with relations with Gentiles, were decided in favour of the Shammaists, the more rigid school. One of the decisions forbade the learning of Greek (Mishna, Shabb. xiii. 6; see H. Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, Berlin, 1856, Eng. tr., ii. [London, 1891] 131 ff.). We may take it that this ended all missionary enterprise, and that after the fall of the city the exclusive tendency reigned supreme.

5. Pharisaism and Christianity.—In saying what was the attitude of Pharisees to Christianity, we are in danger of arguing from isolated and therefore perhaps exceptional cases. In the Gospels we find that while Jesus carries on a sharp polemic against the class, He has friendly relations with individuals (e.g. Simon the Pharisee), and that, on the other hand, certain of the Pharisees (e.g. Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea) were friendly towards Him. Arguing from the known tendency of the Pharisees to be moderate in judgment, and from the definite illustrations of it which we have (Ac 5^{34f.} 23⁹), we may hold that as far as the persecutions in Jerusalem are concerned, the main responsibility at least does not lie on the Pharisees. On the other hand, in the case of Stephen we know that Saul the Pharisee 'was consenting unto his death' (8). Saul also on his own confession was specially strong in urging persecution (26⁹⁻¹¹; cf. 8³). And outside Palestine it cannot be doubted that the Pharisee scribes were instigators of popular tumults against Christians.

When we remember that the Pharisees with all their faults were the leaders of Jewish piety, and the orthodox theologians, it is clear that it is difficult to overestimate the part they played in preparing the way for Christianity. St. Paul was a Pharisee of the Pharisees, and what would Christianity have been but for him? It was the Pharisees who settled the OT canon, and the Christian Church accepted it. Pharisees developed the Messianic hope, distinguished the Church from the State, taught a religion that was independent of priests and Temple, developed doctrines of immortality, resurrection, and judgment to come, that with only little modification passed into Christian theology. The best of the Pharisees understood the inwardness of the Law as Jesus taught it, and some of His most characteristic sayings are to be found in almost identical form in the sayings of the Rabbis. The missionary propaganda did incalculable service in preparing for that of the Church. The Pharisaism of the best period, when it was a progressive, democratic, missionary movement, became the inheritance of Christianity.

Pharisaism, or something very like it in its degenerate form, was imported into the Church by Jewish Christians (see EBIONISM). St. Paul is meritorious not more as the Apostle of the Gentiles than by the fact that he, a former Pharisee, saw so clearly the danger of this incipient neo-Pharisaism with its exclusiveness and 'desire to be under the law,' and combated it so successfully. While the statement in the JE (ix. 665) that in the Gospels the word 'Pharisee' has been substituted for an original 'Sadducee' in the denunciations of Jesus is to be mentioned only as a curiosity, according to the evidence we possess, it has to be said that the Church paid back with interest the persecutions and calumnies she suffered from the Jews. How soon this anti-Judaism began, and to what extent if any it is present in the NT writings, are problems that require investigation.

LITERATURE.—The only authorities are the Gospels, Acts, and Josephus (passages referred to above). From a mass of Rabbinical writings, a few details may be gathered which add little to our knowledge. Works on the Pharisees and Sadducees are numerous. We need refer the reader only to E. Schürer, HJP ii. ii. (Edinburgh, 1885) 1 f.; W. O. E. Oesterley, The Books of the Apocrypha, their Origin, Teaching, and Contents, London, 1914; W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums im neutest. Zeitalter, Berlin, 1903; also to articles in HDB, DCG, EB, JE, *EB*¹¹.

W. D. NIVEN.

PHENICE See PHOENICIA, PHOENIX.

PHILADELPHIA (Φιλαδέλφεια, T WH -la).—Philadelphia was called after its founder, King Attalus II. Philadelphus of Pergamos (159–138 B.C.), whose surname marked his affection for his brother and predecessor, Eumenes II. Philadelphia occupied a strong and commanding position in the valley of the Cogamus, an affluent of the Hermus, at the N.E. base of Mt. Tmolus (Boz Dag), where Lydia, Phrygia, and Mysia met. Northward and eastward from the city stretched a great volcanic plateau, the Katakakaumene or 'Burnt Region'—called also the Decapolis—whose famous vintages were one of Philadelphia's chief sources of revenue. The important trade-route from Smyrna (83 miles west) branched at Philadelphia, one branch going N.E. through Phrygia and the other S.E. to the cities of the Lycus Valley. The city was founded for the spread of the Greek language and culture in Lydia and Phrygia, but it made little impression upon the old deep-rooted Anatolian nature-religion.

Christianity became strong where Hellenism had been weak. The Church of Philadelphia, founded probably at the time of St. Paul's residence in Ephesus (Ac 19¹⁰), had firmly established itself by the time of Domitian, and is praised by St. John almost as warmly as that of Smyrna (Rev 3¹²). Before her is set 'a door opened, which none can shut' (v. 8), a metaphor usually interpreted as implying a special opportunity for successful evangelistic work, such as Philadelphia certainly had as the centre of a large and populous district. Ramsay accordingly calls her 'the Missionary City' (The Letters to the Seven Churches, p. 391). But the whole character of the letter, the ideas of which are closely articulated with each other, points to a different exegesis. The Jews of Philadelphia, enraged apparently at the conversion, which they regarded as the perversion, of some of their number, displayed a more than ordinary malignity in their efforts to crush the infant Church, making free use of their most formidable weapon, the herem or sentence of excommunication, by which they thought to shut not only the door of the synagogue but the gate of the Kingdom of Heaven against the apostates. The prophet's answer, given in Christ's name, meets them on this ground. Alike as a rebuke to the persecutors and a sursum corda to the persecuted his message is perfect. He denies to the Jews of Philadelphia every sacred title and privilege which had ever belonged to their race. They have disinherited themselves. Hating instead of loving, they are a synagogue not of God, but of Satan. Having forfeited their great and good name, they merely lie when they call themselves Jews. The spiritual succession, and with it the historical title, consecrated and endeared by countless memories, have passed from them to the Christian Church, the true Israel of God. And their boast of opening and shutting the door of God's house, of admitting and excluding whom they please, of blessing some and cursing others, is foolish and futile. They have indeed the key of their splendid earthly synagogue, but Another has the key of David (Is 22-), the symbol of regal authority, and He, as supreme in the spiritual realm, has set before the Church of Philadelphia an open door which no man can shut. Great minds run parallel, and the words of the prophet of Ephesus are in spirit identical with those uttered long afterwards by the prophet of Florence. 'I separate thee,' said the bishop of Vasona to Savonarola, 'from the Church militant and triumphant.' 'Militant,' was the reply, 'not triumphant, for this is not in thy power.' The power belongs to Him who 'having overcome the sharpness of death,' has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

Philadelphia had so many festivals and temples that it was often called 'Little Athens.' The hope of a memorial—a name, a statue, or a pillar—in one of its great temples often proved a powerful incentive to good citizenship. But the volcanic region of Philadelphia was frequently visited by seismic shocks, in which the most massive buildings and all their memorials perished. In A.D. 17, e.g., 'twelve populous cities of Asia fell in ruins from an earthquake which happened by night, and therefore the more sudden and destructive was the calamity. . . . It is related that mountains sank down, that level places were seen to be elevated into hills, and that fires flashed forth during the catastrophe' (Tacitus, Ann. ii. 47). Philadelphia was one of the twelve shattered cities. But she is promised, in Christ's name, the things that cannot be shaken. Every victor in the spiritual conflict will be as a pillar, not in a crumbling earthly shrine, but in the enduring temple of God, and have graven on the tablets of his own memory—monumentum ære perennius—the mystic names of God and His new Jerusalem.

Christian Philadelphia made a long and brave stand against the Turks, but was conquered by Bayezid in A.D. 1390. It has now a population of 17,000 Muslims and 5,000 Christians. About two dozen ancient churches, lying in ruins, tell their own tale.

LITERATURE.—R. Chandler, *Travels in Asia Minor and Greece*³, 1817; W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, 1904; Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, 1895.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PHILEMON (Φιλήμων).—Philemon was a citizen of Colossæ (cf. Col 4⁹ with Philem¹¹) and a convert of St. Paul (Philem¹⁹). His conversion took place not at Colossæ (Col 2¹), but presumably during the Apostle's three years' abode at Ephesus, between which town and the cities of the Lycus (of which Colossæ was one) the relations were intimate (see Lightfoot, *Colossians*³, 1879, p. 31). There is no reliable evidence of Philemon's holding any office in the Church either at Colossæ or elsewhere, although the Apost. Const. (vii. 46) represent him as 'bishop' of Colossæ, and pseudo-Dorotheus (6th cent.) as bishop of Gaza: but manifestly he was an influential member of the Colossian Christian community. St. Paul calls him a fellow-labourer (συνεργός), who had an Ecclesia, or gathering of Christians, in his home (Philem¹⁻²). He must have been a well-to-do citizen, possessing a house large enough for this purpose, along with means sufficient to enable him liberally to 'distribute to the necessity of saints.' The Apostle testifies that 'the hearts of the saints were refreshed' by Philemon's loving fellowship and helpful bounty (vv. 6, 7). St. Paul's past experience of Philemon's 'love and faith,' generosity to fellow-believers, and loyalty to himself, gave the Apostle 'confidence' in interceding with his friend on behalf of that friend's runaway but now converted slave, Onesimus, and in beseeching Philemon not only to forgive the slave's misdemeanours, but to receive him as now a brother in Christ. According to a probably well-founded tradition, the Apostle's confidence was not misplaced (see ONESIMUS). The Greek Μένωα (under Nov. 22) represent Philemon as having suffered martyrdom during Nero's reign (see Tillemont, i. 290, 574, quoted by Lightfoot, *Colossians*³, p. 306).

Philemon, like Onesimus, is quite a common Greek name and is specially notable in the Phrygian legend of Philemon and Baucis (Ovid, Metam. vii. 626), the two peasants who hospitably entertained gods unawares, and whose story may have suggested to the Lystrans in adjacent Lycaonia their procedure as related in Ac 13.

LITERATURE.—See under following article.

HENRY COWAN.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.—1. Authenticity.—The Pauline authorship of this Epistle is beyond reasonable doubt. The repeated use by Ignatius, c. A.D. 109 (Eph. 2, Magn. 12, Polyc. 6), of the words ὁυαλὺν σοῦ, 'let me have joy of thee,' used in Philem²⁰, may be a coincidence, the phrase being fairly common; but before the middle of the 2nd cent., Marcion, who rejected a large portion of the NT, including several Pauline Epistles, retained this letter, without mutilation, ascribing it to St. Paul (Tertullian, c. Marc. v. 21). It is also included in the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 170) among St. Paul's Epistles. Early in the 3rd cent., Origen repeatedly quotes the letter as Pauline (Com. in Matt. Tract. 33, 34; and Eusebius (HE iii. 25) includes all St. Paul's Epistles among 'acknowledged Scriptures.' In the 4th cent. it was rejected by some as either not Pauline or, if Pauline, uninspired; but for no other reason, apparently, than its supposed non-edifying character (see Jerome and Chrysostom, Comm. in Philem.). In modern times Baur (Paul, Eng. tr.², 1873-75, ii. 80) has stood almost alone among eminent critics in rejecting (with hesitation, however) the Pauline authorship, owing chiefly to his more emphatic rejection of Colossians, with the authenticity of which that of Philemon stands or falls (see COLLOSSIANS, EP. TO THE). For the view that the letter is allegorical (grounded on the name Onesimus and on the play thereon in v.¹¹) there is no semblance of ancient authority; and historical reality is stamped on every sentence of the Epistle (see ONESIMUS).

2. Place and date of composition.—As St. Paul was in captivity at the time (Philem⁹), the letter must have been sent either from Rome or from Cæsarea; and although the subscription 'written from Rome to Philemon' cannot be traced further back than the 5th cent. (it is ascribed then to Bishop Euthalius), it appears to be correct. Some critics, indeed (including Meyer, Weiss, Holtzmann, etc.), prefer Cæsarea, chiefly because (1) a runaway slave would choose a near city as refuge; (2) St. Paul hoped soon to visit Colossæ (v.²²), and (3) he had more reason to expect early release from Cæsarean than from Roman imprisonment. But (1) Rome would be preferable for Onesimus, with a view to avoiding detection: and v.¹⁸ suggests, without actually indicating, that the slave, like many runaways, had pilloined enough to defray expenses; (2) at Cæsarea, the Apostle must have always looked forward to Rome (Ac 23¹¹ 25¹¹) and therefore would not be contemplating an early visit to Phrygia; (3) Ph 2²⁴ (certainly written from Rome) shows that St. Paul had then some hope of release.

The place of composition so far fixes the date; for St. Paul's 'two years' of Roman confinement (Ac 28³⁰) are usually ascribed to the period between A.D. 59 and 63 (see COLOSSIANS, EP. TO THE, with which the letter to Philemon was simultaneously dispatched, the salutations being similar).

3. Occasion and object.—See ONESIMUS and PHILEMON.

4. Contents.—After salutations to Philemon, Apphia, and Archippus (qq.v.) in which Timothy (who had been with St. Paul at Ephesus, Ac 19²³) is appropriately associated with the Apostle, the letter begins with a cordial recognition of Philemon's faith and love towards Christ and towards brethren whose hearts he had refreshed by Christian fellowship and generous charity. He then indicates that something which he might have boldly enjoined he prefers to plead for as a favour; 'old man* as he now is,' and 'a prisoner of Jesus Christ,' he is to be indulged. He solicits a friendly reception for Philemon's slave Onesimus, in spite of past delinquency through which he had belied his name, and become 'unprofitable.' Onesimus was St. Paul's spiritual son, and had become most helpful to the Apostle in ministry, and much beloved. St. Paul calls him his 'very heart.' He would have liked to retain him at Rome as the representative of Philemon, knowing the latter's anxiety to serve him (Paul). But the Apostle will do nothing without his friend's consent, so that Philemon's favour to himself might be quite voluntary and not constrained. 'Perhaps, however,' continues the Apostle (who assumes with delicate tact the deep regard which Philemon would now have for his penitent and converted slave), 'perhaps he was parted from thee for a season' (note how the idea of an over-ruling Providence is adroitly introduced) 'in order that thou mightest receive him back for altogether, not now as a slave, but as a beloved brother in the Lord.' There is a possible barrier, however, which St. Paul seeks to remove. Onesimus had in some way wronged Philemon, apart from desertion. 'Let me discharge his debt,' writes St. Paul euphemistically; 'put it to my account: here is my signature—I, Paul, will repay.' 'For,' he adds, recalling Philemon's conversion by himself, 'I will not plead that thou owest to me thy very self.' 'Yea, brother,' he continues, adducing what would be the strongest motive in Philemon's eyes, viz. his love of St. Paul, 'let me have joy of thee; refresh my heart in the Lord.' Finally, as if apologizing, with winning courtesy and confidence, for the injustice he has been doing to Philemon through superabundant intercession, 'I well know,' he declares, 'that thou wilt perform even beyond what I ask.' After an expression of hope that, through the prayers of Philemon and others, he may soon be set free, and so be able to visit his Colossian brethren, he sends salutations from mutual friends (including Luke and Demas, the faithful and the faithless at a later time, 2 Ti 4¹⁰⁻¹¹), and concludes with the Apostolic Benediction: 'The Grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit.'

5. Testimony to the Epistle.—Against depreciators, in the 4th cent., of the Epistle as trifling and unedifying, Jerome, the most learned, and Chrysostom, the most eloquent, of the Fathers, vindicate, as we have seen, its apostolic worthiness and religious helpfulness. In the Reformation epoch, Luther (in his German Bible) eulogizes it as showing a 'right noble and lovely example of

* πρεσβυτης. Lightfoot (*Colossians and Philemon*³, p. 338) translates 'ambassador,' and gives some philological authority for this translation; but the usual meaning of the word, 'old man,' suits the appeal better. St. Paul might very well have been about sixty at this time, and prematurely aged through prolonged hardship.

Christian love'; and Calvin (Com. in loc.) discerned in it a 'life-like portrayal of the gentleness' of the apostolic spirit. Among modern writers, Sabatier (The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., 1891, p. 226) describes it as 'full of grace and wit, of earnest, trustful affection,' gleaming 'among the rich treasures of the NT as a pearl of exquisite fineness.' 'Nowhere,' writes Ewald (Com. in loc.), 'shall we find the sensibility and warmth of delicate friendship more beautifully blended with the higher feeling of a superior intellect, of a teacher and an Apostle.' Lightfoot compares it with the younger Pliny's similar letter (Ep. ix. 21) to a friend on behalf of an offending but penitent freedman, and awards the palm to the Apostle's Epistle, which 'stands unrivalled as an expression of simple dignity, of refined courtesy, of large sympathy, and of warm personal affection' (op. cit. p. 319). 'A veritable little masterpiece of the art of letter-writing,' exclaims Renan (L'Antéchrist, 1873, p. 96). 'Those sweet utterances of an author deeply imbued with the Christian spirit,' writes Banr, even while rejecting the authenticity of the Epistle (Paul, ii. 83). Hackett (in Lange's Com. on Holy Scriptures, 'Philemon,' p. 7) notes the Apostle's delicacy and skill in 'harmonizing contraries.' 'He must conciliate a man who supposed that he had good reason to be offended. He must commend the offender, and yet neither deny nor aggravate the imputed fault. He must assert the new ideas of Christian equality in the face of a system which hardly recognized the humanity of the enslaved. . . . His success must be a triumph of love, and nothing be demanded for the sake of the justice which could have claimed everything. He limits his request to a forgiveness of the alleged wrong, and a restoration to favor and the enjoyment of future sympathy and affection, and yet would so guard his words as to leave scope for all the generosity which benevolence might prompt' (including emancipation).

6. Incidental instruction.—(1) Christianity and slavery.—We have in this letter an illustration of the two-fold relation of primitive Christianity to slavery. On the one hand, slaves are instructed to recognize the obligation of faithful and obedient service, along with careful avoidance of any teaching which might seem to identify the Church with the social revolution, rapine, and murder by which slave-insurrections were then characterized. On the other hand, there is fearless proclamation of the grand truth of universal Christian brotherhood, through which eventually slavery was to be expelled from Christendom; along with emphatic encouragement of Christian masters, like Philemon, to treat their slaves with humane consideration, and their Christian slaves as brethren in the Lord. The outcome of this policy was the immediate betterment of the condition of slaves, their more frequent liberation, and their ultimate emancipation by all Christian nations. Christianity, moreover, has delivered from moral as well as from material bondage: from the bondage of spiritual ignorance and from subjection to sinful tastes and habits. 'Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free' (Gal 5¹).

(2) This Epistle illustrates the refining influence of Christianity. St. Paul, while honest from the outset even amid anti-Christian prejudice, had yet a rough element in his original nature. He not only persecuted but 'outraged' (ἐλυμάλιστο) the Church, dragging (συρω) even women to prison, and breathing out slaughter (Ac 8⁹). Christian faith not only reformed but refined him, made him (as this Epistle emphatically indicates) a true gentleman, through the development in him of a fine spirit of Christian courtesy and consideration.

(3) The Epistle, while manifestly describing a real incident, is none the less incidentally, what Weizsäcker regards it as essentially, an allegory. 'We are all by nature Onesimi,' as Luther said; we have revolted from the service of our rightful Master and Lord; we have sought again and again to be fugitives from His presence, and to live in a 'far country,' 'without God in the world.' In Christ, whom the Apostle here represents, we have at once a Friend in need, a Redeemer from sin and misery more effective than St. Paul, an Intercessor at the throne of grace, more sympathetic and more persevering even than him who mediated with Philemon for the runaway Onesimus.

LITERATURE.—Commentaries (among others) of Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia; of Calvin, Bengel, and Rollock; of H. Ewald (1857), H. Alford (Gr. Test. 3 iii. (1871)), H. A. W. Meyer (Eng. tr., 1880), C. J. Ellicott (1865), J. B. Lightfoot (1879), H. B. Hackett (in Lange's Com. on Holy Scriptures, 'Philemon,' Eng. tr., 1869), A. H. Drysdale, Philem., 1906, H. von Soden (in Holtzmann's Handkom. zum NT, 1893), M. R. Vincent (ICC, 1897), A. Maclaren (Expositor's Bible, 1887), F. W. Farrar, The Messages of the Books, 1884; A. L. Williams, Col. and Philem., 1907; A. Schumann, Philem., 1908. For Christianity and slavery, see W. A. Becker, Gallus, tr. F. Metcalfe, 1849, and W. E. H. Lecky, History of European Morals 8, 1888, chs. ii. and iv.

HENRY COWAN.

PHILETUS.—See HYMENÆUS.

PHILIP THE EVANGELIST. — 'Philip the Evangelist,' or 'Philip one of the Seven,' or 'Philip the Deacon'—these are the three names by which Philip is called, each of them intended to distinguish him from Philip the Apostle, with whom in both ancient and modern times he has often been confounded. As in Stephen's case, so in Philip's—we have no previous mention of him till he was elected to be one of the Seven (Ac 6⁵). In the list of the Seven he comes second, next to Stephen. The same emphatic praise is not accorded to him by the author of the Acts as to Stephen, and probably while Stephen lived Philip was overshadowed by his more striking personality. It seems, however, probable that the account we have of the appointment of the Seven, of the trial of Stephen (though not his speech, which was more probably derived from the reminiscences of St. Paul), and of Philip's own subsequent doings, was derived from Philip himself, who may well have communicated it to St. Luke during one of his two visits to Cæsarea (21⁸⁻¹⁴ 27¹). As with respect to Stephen so with respect to Philip we should infer that he was a Hellenist, and therefore a suitable agent for extending the gospel to those who were not strictly Jews; but the inference is not certain in either case. Philip belonged to a band who were scattered from Jerusalem in consequence of the persecution which followed on the death of Stephen (8¹). He began his preaching among the Samaritans apparently in the principal city of the district, in Sebaste or Samaria itself. Here he encountered a famous magician resident in the city, named Simon. This Simon subsequently became the founder of one of those religio-philosophical sects, resulting partly from the break-up of the old religions, partly from the contact of the older religious faiths or philosophies with Judaism, which are known by the general name of Gnosticism. The object of all these systems was to suggest some intelligible scheme through which the God of philosophy might be brought into relations with the God of the OT and the God who was active in creation. This they generally effected by imagining some arbitrary hierarchy of emanations, among which, and by the help of which, a place might be found for the God of the OT, the Giver of the Mosaic Law, and for the Creator of the universe, and generally also for our Lord Jesus Christ. In his system he assigned to himself and the prophetess Helena, whom he associated with himself, a high position; he described himself as the power or emanation from God which is called 'Great.' But at the moment he seems to have been completely over-awed by the spiritual energy of Philip, received baptism at his hands, and joined the band of his disciples and associates.

The conversions of Simon and his fellow Samaritans represented a great step in advance in the widening of the Christian Church. True, our Lord had made converts among the Samaritans partly through the testimony of the Samaritan woman, partly by His own teaching and influence (Jn 4³⁹⁻⁴²), but it is not clear that they were actually admitted to baptism, and they were directly excluded from those to whom during the continuance of His ministry the disciples were to address themselves (Mt 10⁶). Though partially akin to the Jews in blood and in religious faith, the Jews would have no dealings with them (Jn 4⁹) and used the name 'Samaritan' as a term of the deepest reproach (8⁴⁵), so that to proclaim that they too were to be included within the Kingdom of God was an innovation of the most startling kind. How startling the innovation was we may gather from the fact that St. Peter and St. John were dispatched by the Church of Jerusalem to inquire into the matter, and it was only when, in answer to the apostles' prayers and the laying on of their hands, the Holy Ghost had descended on them, that Philip's action was regarded as fully ratified (Ac 8¹⁷⁻²³).

The next step was taken under the direct prompting of the Spirit. Philip was moved by the Spirit to take the southern route to Jerusalem, which led to Gaza, then, in consequence of its overthrow by the Maccabees, 'deserted' (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, 1897, p. 186 f.). In this neighbourhood he fell in with an Ethiopian eunuch of Queen Candace, whom he converted by explaining to him part of Is 53, and received at once to baptism (perhaps also to confirmation). From Gaza Philip was snatched away by the Spirit and carried off to Ashdod, from which he passed through the various coast towns and villages till he reached Cæsarea, where he settled down, and is found still living some twenty years later.

It is on the occasion of St. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem that Philip is brought before us once more in the Acts. At his house, St. Paul, and apparently St. Luke also, stayed on their way from Ptolemais to the capital (Ac 21⁸). Philip had now 'four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy,' and they, along with Agabus, the prophet who came down from Jerusalem, attempted to divert St. Paul from continuing his journey thitherward, but unavailingly (vv. 10-14). St. Luke collected, probably partly during this visit, and partly at a later date, the details of Philip's earlier life contained in the passage in Acts already considered. At this point Philip disappears from the Acts. What little more we know about him is derived from ecclesiastical tradition; but this tradition is rendered uncertain from a tendency there is among ecclesiastical writers to identify Philip the Apostle with Philip the Evangelist. This was due to their having the same name, to both having daughters, and to both having settled in later years in Asia Minor, possibly both at Hierapolis. Yet there can be no doubt that the author of the Acts distinguishes the two, and the tradition does not really confound them, but distinguishes the three daughters of Philip the Apostle (one of whom was married and settled at Ephesus) from the four daughters of Philip the Evangelist, who were all virgins (see Polycrates, quoted in Eusebius, HE iii. 31). And then tradition makes Philip the Evangelist settle not at Hierapolis but at Tralles (AS, June 6).

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895; R. B. Rackham, Acts of the Apostles, 1901; J. B. Lightfoot, *Colossians and Philemon*², 1879; A. Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1909. W. A. SPOONER.

PHILIPPI (Φίλιπποι).—Philippi was a city in the E. of Macedonia, re-founded in the middle of the 4th cent. B.C. by Philip of Macedon, who made it one of his frontier strongholds. Built on an outlying spur of the Pangæan range ('Pangæa nivosis cana jugis' [Lucan, Phar. i. 630]), and separated by that range from its seaport Neapolis, it looked westward and northward over a vast green plain watered by many springs, from which it derived its original name of Crenides (Strabo, vii. p. 331). In 168 B.C. Macedonia was subdued by the Romans, who broke up her national unity by dividing the country into four districts, the inhabitants of which were forbidden to marry or hold property outside their respective boundaries (Livy, xlv. 29). Philippi was included in the first region, of which Amphipolis was the capital. In 42 B.C. the Roman Republic made its last stand on the plains of Philippi, and to commemorate the victory of Imperialism the city was re-founded by Octavian under the name of Colonia Julia Augusta Victrix Philippensium. Receiving the Jus Italicum, it became a miniature Rome, enjoying equal privileges with the mother-city. After the battle of Actium it provided a home for the defeated veterans of Mark Antony. Even the Greek natives (incolæ), who still probably outnumbered the coloni, caught the now prevailing spirit and gloried in being Roman (Ac 16²²). Latin was the official language of the colonia, whose magistrates, chosen by a senate of the citizens, were attended by lictors ('sergeants', 16³³) bearing fasces. The Via Egnatia, the second part of the great overland route between Rome and Asia, passed through the city.

Christianity first came to Philippi in the autumn of A.D. 50 (so Turner; Harnack, 48; Ramsay, 51 [see HDB i. 424]). In response to the appeal of 'the man of Macedonia,' whom Ramsay wishes to identify with St. Luke, St. Paul crossed the Ægean to Neapolis, took the Egnatian Way over Mt. Symbolum, and reached the colonia. The change from 'they' to 'we' in the narrative after the departure from Troas (Ac 16¹⁰) indicates that the historian accompanied the Apostle on this journey into Europe.

Philippi is described as 'a city of Macedonia, the first of the district, a Roman colony' (16¹² RV). The words πρωτῇ τῆς μερίδος form an exegetical crux. (1) Conybeare and Howson hold that they 'must certainly mean the first city in its geographical relation to St. Paul's journey' (The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 341), i.e. the first he came to in the district; but this seems a feeble observation for a first-rate historian to make, and moreover one not strictly accurate, as Neapolis, which had just been left behind, belonged to the same μερίς as Philippi. (2) F. Blass (Philology of the Gospels, 1893, p. 68) and others emend the text (though it is found in SAC) into πρώτης μερίδος, so that Philippi would be described as 'a city of the first region of Macedonia'; but it is unlikely that St. Luke wished to refer to the old and now almost forgotten division of the country into tetrarchies. (3) Van Manen (EBi iii. 3702) thinks that Philippi was a 'first' city in the same sense in which Ephesus, Pergamus, and Smyrna bore that distinction—a 'first-class' city; but it does not appear that this phraseology was used outside the Commune of Asia. (4) WH's ingenious proposal (Appendix, p. 97) to read Περιόδος for μερίδος—a city of Pierian Macedonia—has not commended itself. (5) It is best to take the phrase as an obiter dictum of St. Luke, who unofficially confirms the great Roman colony's estimate of itself as the most important city of the district. 'Of old Amphipolis had been the chief city of the division, to which both belonged. Afterwards Philippi quite outstripped its rival; but it was at that time in such a position that Amphipolis was ranked first by general consent, Philippi first by its own consent' (Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 206 f.).

Had there been a synagogue in Philippi, St. Paul would, according to his invariable practice, have visited it without delay. But a military colony did not offer the same attractions as a commercial city to the Jews of the Diaspora, and apparently the sojourners in Philippi were few. There was, however, a προσευχή, or place of prayer, outside the gate by the side of the river—the Ganges or Gangites, a tributary of the Strymon—where some women were in the habit of meeting on the Sabbath (Ac 16^{12, 15}). προσευχή evidently denotes something simpler than a fully organized συναγωγή with all the proper officials and appointments. It is true that Philo and Josephus employ the two terms as synonymous (Schürer, HJP ii. ii. [1835] 68–73). The latter, e.g., describes the προσευχή of Tiberias as μέγιστον ὄκημα καὶ πολὺν ὄχλον ἐπιδεδεσθαι δυνάμενον (Vita, 54). But the fact that St. Luke everywhere else uses the word 'synagogue' indicates a distinction in his own mind. Only women attended the Philippian προσευχή, whereas the presence of at least ten adult male persons was required for the conduct of the regular worship of the synagogue. The Philippian worshippers had doubtless some enclosure which marked off their meeting-place as sacred, but no roofed building like a synagogue. The river side gave them the means of Levitical washings, as well as a refuge from the interior of a city tainted with idolatry. Philo (in Flaccum, 14) mentions the instinctive desire of Jews residing in a foreign city to pray ἐν καθαρῶν τόπων, in the purest place they could find. It was in green pastures and beside still waters that St. Paul won his first European convert, the proselyte (σεβομένη τον θεον, Ac 16¹⁴) Lydia.

Another Philippian woman, who was attracted by the Apostle and his message, was well known in the city as a soothsayer (16¹⁶). She was in the hands of a syndicate of masters who exploited her strange powers, advertising her as the possessor of a Python. According to Plutarch (de Defec. Orac. 9), Python was a name assumed by ἐγγαστριμύθια (ventriloquists), persons whom the LXX identifies with diviners. Popularly regarded as inspired by the Pythian Apollo, the girl was evidently no mere impostor, but a person of abnormal gifts and temperament, perhaps with symptoms of epilepsy, who believed herself to be the mouthpiece of a divine power, and gave free expression to her intuitions, often astonishing those who consulted her by the justice and truth of her oracular words. She was irresistibly drawn to the evangelists, rightly divining that they had brought to Philippi another and greater power than that of Apollo. She calls them servants of 'God the Most High'—an expression widespread in paganism, as Ramsay notes (St. Paul, p. 215). St. Paul's mode of saving her is an example of the mighty workings (δυνάμεις) of which he speaks (1 Co 12²⁸). An authoritative word in the name of Christ broke the spell of her unhappy possession, and liberated her to serve a new Master.

Her conversion was the signal for an outburst of pagan hatred, to which St. Paul alludes years afterwards (προκαθήμενοι καὶ υβρισθέντες . . . ἐν Φίλιπποις [1 Th 2²; cf. Ph 1³⁰]). Enraged at the loss of their income (τῆς ἐργασίας, 'business,' 'gain'), the girl's owners avenged themselves by contriving to get the apostles charged with disturbing the peace and teaching a religio illicita. St. Paul and Silas were dragged before the magistrates, scourged without a hearing, and flung into the innermost prison. Weizsäcker (p. 285) thinks that 'the story is rendered impossible by the conduct of Paul; he lets himself be chastised illegally, in order afterwards to secure greater satisfaction. Paul could not have acted so.' But in the tumult he may well have made a protest which was drowned by a babel of hostile voices. Or who will blame him if he sometimes chose to suffer in silence—τῆς ἐπαθλοσύνης (2 Co 11²⁵)—like ordinary Christians, who could not shelter themselves under the ægis of the Roman citizenship?

The magistrates of Philippi are first called ἀρχοντες (16¹⁹) and then στρατηγολ (vv. 20, 22, 25, 26, 28). Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 217) thinks that the two clauses, 'dragged them into the agora before the rulers,' and 'brought them before the magistrates' (vv. 19, 20), mean the same thing, and holds that if St. Luke had revised his narrative he would have struck out the one or the other. Blass says, 'non licet distinguere inter ἀρχοντες et στρατηγολ' (Acta Apostolorum, 1895, p. 180). The former is the ordinary term for the supreme board of magistrates in a Greek town, the latter the popular equivalent of prætores. St. Luke knew no doubt that in a colonia like Philippi the highest governing power was in the hands of duumviri (see inscriptions in J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 51), the exact translation of which would have been δύο ἄνδρες, but he preferred good Greek to slavishly technical accuracy on such a point. His use of στρατηγολ, therefore, does not prove either that the magistrates of Philippi had duly received the dignity of the prætorship, or that they had assumed it without leave, as provincial duumviri were said sometimes to do (Cicero, de Leg. Agr. ii. 34).

St. Luke is characteristically careful to make it clear that the majesty of Roman law might have been invoked against the Philippian authorities and on behalf of the apostles. By illegally punishing Roman citizens—Silas was apparently one as well as St. Paul (16³⁷)—the magistrates had rendered themselves liable to be degraded and counted unfit ever to hold office again (Cicero, in Verr. ii. v. 66). The scourging and imprisoning were acts of high-handed violence. The accused were subjected to these indignities 'without a trial'; that is the meaning of the word ἀκατακρίτους, which is translated 'uncondemned' (16³⁷). In the end the magistrates saved themselves by begging the prisoners to leave the town quietly, and the historian's point is that in acceding to this request the apostles forfeited the unquestionable right to appeal against a gross maladministration of justice.

Many writers regard the story of the earthquake and the conversion of the jailer as legendary. H. J. Holtzmann asserts that this is the view of the whole critical school ('Apostelgeschichte' in Hand-Kom. zum NT i. [1889] 389). The interpretation of such a passage is naturally affected by one's whole attitude to the miraculous. The older view is defended by Ramsay, whose acquaintance with Turkish prisons helps him to remove some of the difficulties of the narrative (St. Paul, pp. 220–222).

Five years later, probably in the autumn of A.D. 55, St. Paul re-visited Macedonia, giving the believers 'much exhortation' (20²); and in the spring of the following year, having unexpectedly to begin his journey from Greece to Palestine by land instead of by sea, he had the happiness of keeping the Passover with the brethren of Philippi (v. 6). None of his converts gave him the same unalloyed satisfaction as the Philippians, his 'beloved and longed for,' his 'joy and crown' (Ph 4¹). He repeatedly showed his confidence in them by accepting at their hands favours which he refused from every other church. To Thessalonica, and again to Corinth, their messengers followed him with the tokens of their love (Ph 4¹⁶, 2 Co 11⁹); and when he was a prisoner in Rome, Epaphroditus of Philippi made a journey of 700 miles over land and sea to bring him yet another gift, which was acknowledged in the most affectionate letter St. Paul ever wrote (see PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE).

The prestige of women in the Church of Philippi, as in the other Macedonian churches (Ac 17⁴, 12) is a striking fact, 'only to be compared with their prominence at an earlier date in the personal ministry of our Lord' (Lightfoot, op. cit. p. 57). St. Paul's first Philippian audience consisted entirely of women (16¹³); his first convert was a woman of influence, whose familia was baptized with her, and who became his hostess (vv. 14, 15); and the only element in the Philippian Church which called for reproof in his letter was the variance of two prominent Christian ladies, both of whom he remembered gratefully as his fellow-workers in the gospel (Ph 4^{2, 3}). Lightfoot (op. cit. p. 56) quotes a number of Macedonian inscriptions which 'seem to assign to the sex a higher social influence than is common among the civilised nations of antiquity.'

In the time of Trajan—i.e., before A.D. 117—Philippi became a stage in the triumphal progress of St. Ignatius from Antioch to Rome, where he was to die in the arena. His visit made so deep an impression on the Philippian Church that they soon after requested the martyr's young friend Polycarp to write them and send them copies of St. Ignatius' own letters. Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians was the response, and it is still extant. The writer congratulates the Church of Philippi on 'the sturdy root of their faith, famous from the earliest days' (1), warns them against certain doctrinal and practical errors, and sets before them the example of apostles and saints who have gone to their rest. The later history of this remarkable church is almost a blank.

The village of Filibedjik (Little Philippi) is all that remains of the once famous city.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, 1835, iii. 215–223; J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians, 1873, p. 47f.; Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, i. 341f.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 213f., The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 158f.; C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age of the Christian Church, Eng. tr., i. [1897] 279 ff.; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 239f. JAMES STRAHAN.

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Author.

—This document purports (1) to be a letter sent from St. Paul and Timothy to the Christian community in Philippi. Although Timothy is mentioned in the address as joint author, the letter throughout is St. Paul's own. He commences at once in the 1st person singular—εὐχαριστῶ τῷ θεῷ μοῦ (1³)—and continues so throughout. When he does use the plural (1st person), it is not at all clear that he simply means Timothy and himself. Thus in 3²—ἡμεῖς γὰρ ἐσμεν ἡ περιτομή—the meaning seems to be that Christians are the real people of God. Zahn (Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., i. 538) opposes this view, maintaining that St. Paul and Timothy alone are meant, because they were circumcised; but his argument is forced and inconclusive. What St. Paul says is that 'we who worship in the spirit of God and put no confidence in the flesh' are the true circumcision, and this would apply to Pauline Christians generally, not simply to St. Paul and Timothy. Again, in 3¹⁷, 'Brethren, unitedly imitate me, and mark (approvingly) those so walking even as you have us as an example' (καθὼς ἔχετε τύπον ἡμῶν), other leaders are probably included as well as Timothy. And in 3¹² and 4²³, and in those passages of inferior MS authority where the 1st plur. occurs, e.g. 1²—ἐγὼ μὲν εὐχαριστῶ τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν (a reading approved by Zahn, op. cit. i. 535, and by Haupt in Meyer's Kommentar über das NT, in loco, for different reasons)—1² (ἡμῶν for ἐμῶν), the reference is general. Not even in 4²³, the final salutation, where one might naturally expect it, is Timothy mentioned. Moreover, he is spoken of in the 3rd person, and his character and intentions are described quite objectively (2¹²⁻²³): 'But I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy speedily to you, that I may be encouraged, when I come to know your affairs. For I have none like-minded with him, who will genuinely concern himself about your affairs. For all seek their own, not the things of Christ Jesus. But ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with a father, he served with me in spreading the gospel. Him then I hope to send at once, whenever I come to know how my affairs turn out.'

The letter, then, on its face value is St. Paul's own, nor is there any reason for exercising false subtlety to account for the presence of Timothy's name in the address. His presence with St. Paul at the time of writing, and especially his intimate relations with the Philippians in the past, and his coming visit are a sufficient explanation. (Timothy was with St. Paul at the founding of the Church [Ac 16¹²]. When St. Paul left, he seems to have stayed behind. He was sent to Corinth through Macedonia [Ac 19²², 1 Co 16⁹]. When 2 Cor. was written, he was again with St. Paul in Macedonia.) Nor is there any reason to doubt the genuineness of the letter because of St. Paul's use of the 1st person singular throughout in spite of Timothy's name at the beginning (as W. C. van Manen, EBi iii. 3705). In Col 1², 1 Th 1², 2 Th 1², and 2 Co 1² the joint authorship is indeed remembered, but we have a parallel in 1 Co 1⁴, where it is at once forgotten, as here.

Besides Timothy, St. Paul associates with himself in the closing salutation the brethren, οἱ ἐν ἐμοὶ ἀδελφοί (4²²). Who these were we are not told, but they can have had no part in the composing of the letter, as they are evidently those referred to in 2² and accused of selfishness. Their own interests came before the interests of the Philippian Church, to which St. Paul probably asked them to convey authoritative tidings of himself. Nor would the saints as a whole (i.e. the Christians generally, but especially those of Caesar's household) know anything of the letter save that it was being sent. The saints of Caesar's household were not members of the ruling family but freedmen and slaves connected with the Imperial court (cf. Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 171 f.; Zahn, op. cit. i. 550).

It is possible that the letter was written by Epaphroditus (that Epaphroditus is mentioned in the 3rd person is no absolute objection to this) if the phrase 'true yokefellow' (ἑταῖρος σὺνζυγός, 4²³) is to be taken as an appellative. The meaning is, however, very doubtful, and the most varied suggestions have been made—Christ, Lydia, Paul's wife, Timothy, Peter, Paul's brother, an allegorical personage, etc. Lightfoot (in loc.) and Zahn (op. cit. i. 537) are of the opinion that Epaphroditus, who was either beside St. Paul as he wrote or who actually wrote the letter, was directly addressed in this way. This Epaphroditus was a messenger (ἀπόστολος) sent by the Philippian Church to St. Paul with a monetary gift (4¹⁵), and his experience is described in the letter: 'I think it needful to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother, fellow-worker and fellow-soldier, your messenger and minister of my need. For he was home-sick for you all, and distressed because you heard he was ill. And indeed he was nigh to death; but God had pity on him, and not on him alone but also on me, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow. I am sending him then all the more eagerly, that you may rejoice again when you see him, and that I may sorrow the less. Receive him then in the Lord with all joy; and have such in honour, because on account of the work of Christ he came near to death, hazarding (καρπολογώμενος)* his life to make up what was wanting in your ministry to me'

But it is perhaps better to regard Synzygus as a proper name—possibly the person to whom the letter would directly come before it was read in the church assembly. The author, in a passage full of earnest passion, runs hurriedly over certain autobiographical details. He was of true Hebrew descent—circumcised on the eighth day, of the race of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, as regards the Law a Pharisee, as regards zeal persecuting the Church, with a clean record as far as Law-righteousness went. But all these privileges he considered loss and still so considers them for Christ's sake. To know Christ (perhaps γινῶσκis is here used as being admitted to His intimate friendship; cf. σεβαστήριον; Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 288, Eng. tr., p. 333), to gain Him, to be found in Him, that is worth all, and the rest is worth nothing in comparison with it. Earthly fortune, future, and fame are but stable-sweepings compared with this (Ramsay says Paul gave up literally his patrimony and was disowned, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 34 ff.). For by faith in Christ the writer has been pardoned and empowered to live a new righteous life—the very thing the Law could not do. Thus the power which animated Christ in His resurrection, in His life and Passion, in His death is working in St. Paul, and St. Paul is energizing to live in the absolute newness of life that this implies. Absolute attainment is not yet his, but it is his single aim. Whatever his past progress may have been, he is not contented with that. Past attainment is not perfection, but it brings nearer the realization of what is implied in the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (3⁴⁻¹⁴).

Here then is a letter purporting to be from one with such a history who specially associates Timothy with himself, who sends greetings from brethren, especially those of Caesar's household with whom was Epaphroditus, to a Christian community in Philippi. Does a careful study of the letter itself substantiate such a view? Is there anything in the letter itself (as Baur and others think) inconsistent with its own account of its origin and authorship?

Before we can answer we must ask who were the recipients and what were their relations with the writer.

2. The recipients of the letter.—The letter is written to all the saints in Philippi, with the bishops and deacons (1¹). Throughout the letter, however, there is no further mention of officials; and there is a remarkable impartiality as well as cordiality towards the members of the community as a whole (cf. the use of τας, 1⁴ 2² 3² 21² 26² 4²). We have an account by an eye-witness in Ac 16¹²⁻⁴⁰ of the founding of the Philippian Church—a Church interesting to us as being the first Christian community on European soil. It is, however, to be remembered that the distinction between Europe and Asia was not anything like so real to men in ancient times as it is now. Dubiety is at once raised by the mention of 'bishops and deacons,' but this is largely due to modern associations. We think of these words in their modern sense or in their 3rd cent. sense. That they are not so used here is evident from the fact that what we have is 'bishops,' not 'bishop.' That the author of the letter is not advocating any special ecclesiastical organization is evident from the casualness of the reference, and from the absence of any further allusion to these officials. It may be taken for granted that every church would have an organization of some sort. It was not easy—perhaps not possible—for the individual Christian to maintain his position without the social strength of his brethren behind him. Is it possible, then, to think of two orders in a church like that of Philippi, in the lifetime of St. Paul? There were officers in the Thessalonian Church called οἱ κοινῶτες, οἱ προϊστάμενοι, οἱ νοουητοῦρες (1 Th 5¹), but it is clear that their authority was a moral one, and their position due to their spiritual influence. The terms used evidently describe the same persons from different points of view. Haupt regards both terms in our letter as applied to the same persons, but it is probable that two orders are in view.

* See G. A. Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, Tübingen, 1909, p. 57, Eng. tr., Light from the Ancient East, London, 1911, p. 84.

Elsewhere (Ac 20¹⁷) we understand that the essential constituted officials were πρεσβυτεροι, and that these were also known as 'bishops.' They formed the essence of church government.

From the Pastorals also it is clear that πρεσβυτεροι and ἐπισκοποι are interchangeable terms (Tit 1⁵, 1 Ti 3¹⁻⁴). With the alterations in later times in the usage of these terms we are not concerned; only with this, that there seems no ground for suspicion as regards their occurrence here. It is certainly preferable to regard them as interpolations than to reject the whole letter as spurious, but it is not necessary to do this if the terms are dissociated from later associations. As we shall see, one main cause of writing the letter was to thank the Philippians for monetary help, and it is not inappropriate to regard these persons as being instrumental in the collecting and dispatching of this money.

Certain individuals are mentioned by name, especially two women—Euodia and Syntyche (4²⁻³). 'Euodia I beseech, and Syntyche I beseech that they show practical agreement in the Lord.' It is surely the reductio ad ridiculum of criticism to find here, under assumed names, subtle references to church parties. Zahn gives an account of the subtle hidden meanings found in these names (now proved to be so common, although not yet attested for Philippi) by Schwegler, Baur, Hitzig, and Holsten, and calls them 'fantastic conceits' (op. cit. i. 561 f.). This is now the unanimous opinion, so that one need not further dwell on it. What we have to do with is a quarrel between two women, the origin or extent of which we know not (although it cannot have been serious). A certain person (Synzygus) is asked to help in their reconciliation: 'I would request you (ἐρωτῶ), genuine Synzygus (or yoke-fellow), help those women, inasmuch as they laboured with me in the gospel and with Clement and other fellow-labourers of mine whose names are in the book of life' (4²⁻⁴). There is some doubt as to the interpretation of the passage. Some take the writer to mean that Clement and his fellows should help in settling this difference (Lightfoot, Zahn); others—and this seems the only feasible view—that the women laboured with the apostles and with Clement. Indeed, from the tone of the passage one would naturally conclude that Clement was already dead. To identify this Clement with Clement of Rome on the ground that no other of that name is known to us from either history or legend (Baur, Paul, Eng. tr.⁴, 2 vols., London, 1873-75, pp. 63, 77), is foolish, as the name Clement seems to have been common (cf. Zahn, op. cit. i. 534). Moreover, this Clement is a Philippian, not a Roman. That women should have a conspicuous place in the Philippian Church agrees with Ac 16, and, indeed, as Lightfoot points out (Philippians, p. 56), with the conditions in Macedonia generally. Various attempts have been made to identify one or other of these women with Lydia, on the ground that Lydia is not a proper name but simply means 'the Lydian lady'; but there is no certainty in the results. It is certainly curious that neither Lydia nor the jailer is mentioned, but the omission of their names is no ground for identifying the one with Euodia or Syntyche or the other with Clement. It seems a strong proof of authenticity rather than the reverse.

The only other person mentioned in the letter as belonging to Philippi is Epaphroditus (see above). He is, however, with the writer at the time of writing, preparing to go back after having delivered their gift to St. Paul: 'I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the things that come from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God' (4¹⁸).

That St. Paul should have written to Philippi is a priori very probable. Is there any reason to reject our present letter, then, as an authentic communication by the Apostle to this church? It is extremely difficult to see anything in this artless affectionate letter which raises any suspicion, and the onus probandi lying on him who would reject it owing to difficulties which may reasonably be explained otherwise is very great.

3. Purpose of the letter.—As Edith Bellenden's letter revealed its purpose in a postscript (see Scott, Old Mortality), so this letter also. The Philippians had sent monetary help by Epaphroditus, and St. Paul hereby acknowledges receipt of it (ἀπέχω [πάρτα], a terminus technicus, as is now abundantly proved) (Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1897, p. 56, Eng. tr., Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, p. 229, Licht vom Osten, p. 77 f., Eng. tr., p. 110 f.; see also Exp, 7th ser., vi. [1908] 91). The language of the whole passage is full of half-humorous allusions to a financial transaction. He tells them how he is filled with Christian joy because of the proof it furnished him of the revival of their interest in him. They had, indeed, always thought about him (that he knew), but they lacked opportunity (very probably owing to poverty; cf. 1²⁻¹¹, where possibly he expects that by a more enlightened ἀγάπη on their part this may be avoided in the future). His joy is not that of one whose material necessities have for the moment been relieved. The fact is that he has learned the true secret of contentment (αὐτάρκεια), and is able to endure any material situation. He can do this not in his own strength but in the strength of Him in whom is his life (cf. ἐμοὶ γὰρ τὸ ζῆν Χριστός) and the source of his energy. Nevertheless, he feels keenly the transparent goodness of their succour when thus they shared in his affliction. It is, indeed, what was to be expected of them, in view of their past liberality. For he is glad to recall that at the very beginning of his European mission they opened, as it were, a bank account with him—even sending twice help to him while he was yet in Thessalonica, and, besides, when he had left Macedonia they regularly contributed to his support (cf. 2 Co 11⁸⁻⁹). It is not the present gift itself, οὐα gift, that pleases him, but the spiritual reality it represents. It shows him that they feel their indebtedness to him. As he gave them spiritual riches, so they give him material help. His God is thus become their banker, and He pays large interest, now and especially hereafter, when Christ through whom His riches are mediated appears in glory. Their gift then—as an exhibition of their spiritual gratitude for His unspeakable gift (cf. 2 Co 9¹⁵)—is a sweet-smelling savour and an acceptable and well-pleasing sacrifice to God (4¹⁰⁻²⁰).

Now that Epaphroditus has sufficiently recovered and is about to return to them, St. Paul thus acknowledges their generosity. He takes advantage of his intended departure to dispatch this letter (cf. Cic. ad Atticum, i. ix. 1). It may seem strange thus to postpone mention of their gift if this be the main object of sending the letter, but there are references in the very beginning also when the Apostle thanks God for their κοινωνία in the furtherance of the gospel from the first day until now (cf. 4¹⁵, 'in the beginning of the gospel'); and for this very reason he feels convinced that God will carry on in them the good work till Christ's day and complete it. Their spiritual condition, as evidenced by their liberality, is a proof that the perseverance of the saints shall be effective in them.

He cannot otherwise regard them—his affections being witness—for, indeed, they are fellow-participants with him in grace because thus they have shown their identity with him both in his chains and in his defence and confirmation of the gospel. What more graceful reference could be made than this, and what more spiritual inferences drawn from Christian liberality?

Besides, there is the reference to their offering in 2²⁵ (ὑμῶν δὲ ἀπόστολον καὶ λειτουργὸν τῆς χρείας μου).

There are, however, other objects for the letter as well as this main one. For one thing, the Philippians had heard of the sickness of Epaphroditus and were anxious about him (2²⁶), and the Apostle tenderly refers to him and commends him to them, in view of his return, for his work's sake. Epaphroditus was evidently sent by the Philippians in order to stay with St. Paul and minister to him, and his return home so soon needed explanation, perhaps apology, and the Apostle does this in graceful and affectionate language. How he came to know of their feelings as regards Epaphroditus we are not told, but it is natural to infer that they had meanwhile written to him about this and other matters as well. Indeed, the letter becomes much more intelligible when we regard it as answering questions and meeting a situation unfolded in an actual correspondence of recent date from Philippi, which was before the Apostle as he wrote, and which may well have conditioned the order of his topics. (That such communications took place is self-evident. He would surely have acknowledged their previous gifts, and these would be accompanied by writing.) There is some ground, indeed, for explaining the difficult passage (3¹) as referring to a letter written shortly before this by the Apostle to them. At any rate, to explain the τὰ αὐτά from the contents of the letter itself is not easy, and the reference to other communications is a feasible one. Zahn has used this clue in the interpretation of the letter (cf. also W. Lock, Exp. 5th ser., vi. [1897] 65 ff.; and especially J. Rendel Harris, ib., 5th ser., viii. [1898] 161 ff.).

It is clear that the Philippians were inclined to take a pessimistic view of the effect of St. Paul's imprisonment and situation in general on the cause of the gospel. The statement in 1¹² is a correction of this, and we may well explain the repeated injunctions to joy as proof that they were apt to be dispirited owing to the seeming failure of the Apostle's missionary activity.

Perhaps also they needed to be told that their gifts were thoroughly appreciated by the Apostle, and that there was no feeling of disappointment in his mind in regard to the tardiness or smallness of their liberality. The Philippians must recently have expressed their dissatisfaction with what they had done to support Paul and his work, and their doubt as to whether Paul had been satisfied with the same. The tone in which Paul speaks of the matter throughout the letter (ii. 17, 25, 30, iv. 10-20) is natural only on the supposition that this feeling had been very strongly expressed, and the Church had lamented and apologised for the smallness and tardiness of their last remittance' (Zahn, op. cit. i. 527).

St. Paul also is anxious to tell of his intention to visit them (2²⁴, πεποιθα δὲ ἐν κυρίῳ ὅτι καὶ αὐτοὶ ταχέως ἐλεύσομαι) and to assure them that their prayers help to this end. It is possible that they spoke of him in their letter as their καυχῆμα (1²⁶; cf. Rendel Harris, Exp. 5th ser., viii. 178). The sharp change of tone in 3² may also be due to a fear expressed by the Philippians of a possible Judaistic propaganda among them. It may, however, be quite well explained out of St. Paul's own experience.

Besides all this, there are the differences of opinion in the Church itself and the consequent reiterated charges to present a united front to the enemy, and as in all his letters there are the Christian moral injunctions based on the great Christian verities. It is not difficult thus to get a pretty clear conception of the purposes and aims of the writer in this Epistle, nor can it be held that there is anything in this incompatible with the Pauline authorship. What one has to fear in interpretation is over-subtlety and the tendency to forget that the canons of criticism that apply to a modern theological treatise are not applicable to an informal letter which its author never intended as a κτῆμα ἐς αἶν.

4. Genuineness.—(a) External evidence.—So much attention is given by recent critics to internal evidence that the external is apt to be undervalued or overlooked, although it is as strong as one can reasonably expect. The first unmistakable reference of a direct kind to St. Paul's Epistle is found in Polycarp's letter to the same church (ad Phil. iii. 2):

'For neither I nor anyone else like me can attain to the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul, who while he was among you taught those then living the words of truth accurately and vigorously, who also in his absence wrote letters to you' (ὅς καὶ αὐτῶν ὑμῶν ἐγράψεν ἐπιστολάς).

That our letter is referred to here seems clear. Indeed, it is evident that Polycarp knew it well, as there are distinct echoes of it in his short epistle (cf. ad Phil. i. 1 = Ph 2¹⁷ 4¹⁰; ii. 1 = 2¹⁰ 3²; ix. 2 = 2¹⁶ [or Gal 2-3]; x. 1 = 2-5; xii. 3 = 3¹⁸). The difficulty is to account for the plural 'letters.' It is sometimes explained as if it were simply equivalent to the singular (cf. examples in Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 140 ff.). Others, however, point out that Polycarp appreciates the difference between the singular and the plural in this epistle (cf. xiii. 2), and that we must here understand a real plural. Zahn (op. cit. i. 536) and others accordingly explain it on the supposition that 1 and 2 Thess. and Philippians formed a Macedonian group, and Zahn shows that Tertullian so regarded them (Scorp. 13), and probably Polycarp himself (xi. 3); cf. also Harnack, TU, new ser., v. 3 [1900] 86 f. It may be said, however, that a later tradition supports the theory of more letters than one (cf. Georgius Syncellus, who quotes Ph 4³ as occurring in St. Paul's first letter [Chronographia, i. 651]; cf. also Studia Sinaitica, ed. A. S. Lewis, i. [Cambridge, 1894] 11 ff., for the mention of a Second Epistle in the Syrian Canon, c. A.D. 400). As we shall see later on, this is used freely to support modern theories of fusion in our extant Epistle, but it remains to be proved on its own merits that the present Epistle contains two or more letters joined together; for there is every likelihood that many letters written by St. Paul are now lost, and possibly among them one or more to Philippi. It is, however, problematical if lost letters are here referred to, as it is quite possible to explain the plural otherwise, and it is not likely that if more letters than one existed in Polycarp's time they would have been lost afterwards.

The statement in ad Phil. xi. 3—'qui estis in principio epistolæ eius'—is difficult. Some supply 'laudati' ('you who are praised') in the beginning of his letter. Others, however, say the text is meaningless (sinnlos) (cf. E. Hennecke, Handbuch zu den neutest. Apokryphen, Tübingen, 1904, p. 103), and translate 'in the beginning of his gospel [cf. Ph 4¹⁵] or his mission, ἀποστολῆς (E. Nestle acc. to Zahn, op. cit. i. 536). Others again, referring to 2 Co 3², make 'epistolæ' plural, 'You who are his epistles.' The latter is not likely. There can be no doubt, however, that Polycarp (c. 125-130) knew our letter, although it is doubtful if he knew of more than one. It is also quoted in his Martyrdom, i. 2 (= Ph 2⁴).

There is also cumulative evidence that both Ignatius and Clement of Rome were acquainted with our letter (see Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 75 f.). It is quoted by Eusebius (HE v. ii. 2) in the Epistle from Lyons and Vienne. According to Clem. Alex. and Hippolytus it was recognized by the heretical Valentians and Sethites who quoted 2⁶, the latter to prove their own doctrine. The Apologists recognize it (Epistle to Diognetus, v. 9 = Ph 3²⁰ and elsewhere), and it is found in all the 2nd cent. canons as well as in the Apostolicum of Marcion. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen also recognize it. The fact is, the genuineness of the letter was never questioned till within recent times, and that solely on internal grounds (see Vincent, ICC, 'Philippians and Philemon,' Introd.; C. R. Gregory, Canon and Text of the NT, Edinburgh, 1907, and, indeed, all books on the Canon of Scripture).

(b) Internal evidence.—It is impossible and fortunately unnecessary to review in detail the various arguments that have been brought against the authenticity of the Epistle to the Philippians since F. C. Baur (Paul, Eng. tr.², ii. 45-79). Perhaps the three most formidable opponents are Baur himself, Holsten, and van Manen. Baur laid special stress on Gnostic affinities, especially in 2^{9a}. According to him, the writer knew the theories concerning the æon Sophia, its bold actus rapiendi to gain an equality with the All-Father and its consequent degradation into the region of darkness and emptiness (ἐν σκιάς καὶ κενώματος τόποις). The occurrence of words like μόρφωσις and κένωμα (not ἀπαγγμός) lends colour to this view, and the Gnostic descent into hell was, it is held, well known to the writer. The whole passage is thus explicable only on the supposition 'that the writer's mind was filled with certain Gnostic ideas current at the time' (Eng. tr.², vol. ii. p. 46). The writer was not, of course, advocating these ideas, but they were employed by him with the necessary modifications for his own purpose. O. Pfleiderer still holds to this view (Das Urchristentum, Berlin, 1887, p. 320 f.), although he believes in the genuineness of the letter, and so is compelled to regard the passage as interpolated (ib. p. 153). It was, however, given up by Holsten, and van Manen (EBi, art. 'Philippians [Epistles]') does not refer to it.

More recently attempts have been made to trace the genesis of the conceptions used in the passage to primitive apocalyptic traditions (see W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, Göttingen, 1907) of an ἀρχάνθρωπος, or Urmensch, pre-existent in the highest heaven, who descended to the lowest, such a view for instance as is given in the Ascensio Isaie, x. 29 f. Isaiah hears God telling His Son to descend into the world, and the stages of this descent through the heavens are given. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs we have phrases which readily suggest affinity with Ph 2^{9a}.

(cf. Benj. x. 7: 'worshipping the king of the heavens who appeared on earth, ἐν μορφῇ ἀνθρώπου; Zeb. ix. 8: ἐν σχήματι ἀνθρώπου). These, however, are probably borrowed from Christian traditions. It is well known that Philo had the conception of an ideal man (de Conf. Ling., ed. Mangey, i. 411), and that there are vague indefinite references in Enoch (Simile), Psalms of Solomon, Apocalypse of Baruch, etc.

Moffatt quotes (LNT, p. 172) from Poimandres (after Reitzenstein) the description of this Original Man: ἀθάνατος ὢν καὶ παντῶν τῶν ἐξουσίαν ἔχων τὰ θνητοῦ πάσχει ὑποκείμενος τῇ εἰμαρμένῃ· ὑπεράνω γὰρ ὢν τῆς ἀρμολίας ἐναρμόνιος γέγονε δοῦλος.

Holsten was greatly concerned with the representation of Christ in Philippians because it contradicted the 'heavenly man' view of Ro 5¹²⁻²¹ and 1 Co 15. But it is clear, on a careful examination of these passages, that what St. Paul has in mind is the contrast between the glorified pneumatic body of the Redeemer and the earthly bodies of His people. Holsten is right, however, in maintaining that in Philippians what we have is not a Christ originally man—but a Divine Being, and a Divine Being showing His Divinity in becoming man and in the energy of His exalted power. It is extremely doubtful if St. Paul has in his writings at all the conception of a pre-existent man either ideal or actual (see H. A. A. Kennedy, Exp. 8th ser., vii. [1914] 97 ff.). The danger in these researches into origins is to conclude that vague hints in popular traditions suggest to St. Paul the facts. The facts were prior and creative, causes not effects. They were not suggested by his early acquaintance with a Rabbinic doctrine of a Heavenly Man.

Whatever the affinities or affiliations with vague traditions may be—whether he has Adam, Lucifer (Is 14¹²⁻¹⁵) or an ἀρχάνθρωπος in mind is very uncertain; what is certain is that Christ's life on earth and St. Paul's own experience of His exalted power necessarily suggest to him these transcendent views of His worth (cf. 2 Co 8², and especially Col.).

The attempts of Baur to find in the γνήσιος σύνφυγε (4²) a mediator of the two extreme parties in early Christianity and the identification of the Clement of our Epistle with Clemens Romanus and T. Flavius Clemens need not be further commented on (see above). Objections also to our Epistle on the ground of what Baur calls 'the questionableness of some of the historical data'—viz. the references to the Prætorium and the saints of Cæsar's household—are due to an inadequate exegesis, and Baur himself readily admits their credibility were it not for his theory of a conflict of parties in the early Church. Besides, the mention of bishops and deacons (1¹) lends no support to the theory of false historical references when one remembers that bishops are just the presbyters found in all churches, and the deacons servants of the Christian community under them. We are not to think of these officers as sacramentally mediating grace, but as spiritually guiding the community. One feels that the objections to such terms are to a large extent exhibitions of annoyance at our own ignorance of 1st cent. conditions, and are largely biased by modern associations.

The objections on the score of doctrinal divergences from the Hauptbriefe are forcibly set forth by Holsten (as also by Baur) and van Manen. It is said that the Epistle is vague and nebulous, that it lacks any leading idea, that it is characterized by monotonous repetition, by lack of profound connexion of ideas, and by poverty of thought, of which the author himself is conscious when he writes 3¹. St. Paul is said here also to show a desire for self-glorification (3⁴⁻¹⁷); his acknowledgment of the Philippians' gift is lacking in grace; his acceptance of it is contrary to his statement in 1 Co 9^{12a}; he shows uncertainty as to his future, even expressing doubt as to his participation in the resurrection (3¹¹). His views of justification, perfection, and the Parousia are not what we would expect from the genuine St. Paul. He imitates freely and skilfully, especially 2 Co. and Rom.; but, like all imitators, wrongly (cf. his use of ἐκχορηγία τοῦ Πνεύματος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Ph 1¹⁹). His attitude of rejoicing in the preaching of those who preach Christ in pretence is wholly unlike the real St. Paul. Holsten collects words used which are un-Pauline and anti-Pauline as well as non-Pauline. The autobiographical section is based on 2 Co 11^{13a}. In short, whatever agrees with the Hauptbriefe is imitated, and whatever does not is invented. This kind of criticism looks too much like the story of the wolf and the lamb to carry conviction save by opposition. Let any one read van Manen's column (EBi iii. 3709) as to the views of the writer of Philippians concerning Christ, arranged by the critic to convince us that they could not have been held by St. Paul, and one feels at once that if these were not St. Paul's views we simply know not what they were.

Van Manen feels it necessary to defend the writer from the charge of fraudulency, declaring that he wrote more from modesty than from arrogance. His very defence shows the uneasiness of his conscience. There are difficulties in the Epistle to the Philippians, but they are not difficulties like the above. One of these—perhaps the most serious—is the change of tone in 3^{1a}; and the unsatisfactoriness of the various attempts to explain the γράφειν τὰ αὐτὰ reveals the difficulty and has given rise to various theories as to the integrity of the letter itself—all more or less motivated by this so-called chasm. Many feel as if here two distinct strata appear; and, although it is not possible to say definitely where the second ends, it is, they say, clear that it begins here. This leads us to consider various theories regarding the integrity of the letter.

5. Integrity.—Various attempts since Heinrichs (1810) and Paulus (1799) have been made to find in our Epistle two or more letters fused together. The suggestion was first put forward in 1685 by S. le Moyne (Moine or Mayne), in Varia Sacra, ii. 332 ff., and it is the view (in varying forms) favoured still by many critics (cf. Bacon, The Story of St. Paul, London, 1905, p. 367 f.; and Kirsopp Lake, Exp. 8th ser., vii. [1914] 487 f.). There is, however, little unanimity as to what portions make up the different letters, or, indeed, how many letters are incorporated in the single canonical Epistle (J. E. Symes, Interpreter, x. 2 [1914] gives five). The view of Heinrichs is that 3¹⁻⁴ is an interpolated communication addressed to the leaders of the Philippian Church, and that 1¹⁻², 4¹⁻² was a letter to the church as a whole. It is difficult to reconcile this view with 4¹⁰ where the whole church is addressed and where the tone of rejoicing is again heard. Accordingly, Kirsopp Lake adopts the theory that the interpolated letter stops at 4³. Both are genuinely Pauline letters. A simpler view is that we have two letters, chs. 1 and 2 forming the first (but in time the second), and 3 and 4 forming the second—in point of time the first (Hausrath, Paulus, Heidelberg, 1865, p. 486 ff.; cf. also Bacon, op. cit.). It may be objected to this view that neither of these sections is a complete letter in itself, and also that we have no clear mention of their gift in the first one save the allusion in 2², for although the Apostle speaks of their 'fellowship' yet this is too indefinite in itself to be a thanksgiving for their contribution. Besides, it is doubtful if it really explains anything, although it creates fresh difficulties. It is meant to free us of 3^{1a}, as indeed all such theories are, but with little success. It is surely not necessary to see any contradiction in what is said in 2²¹ regarding the brethren with St. Paul and what is said in 1¹⁴, nor to equate those spoken of in ch. 3 with those referred to in 1¹⁸ (so also Moffatt, LNT, p. 175). The view elaborated by D. Volter (Theol. Tijdschrift, 1892, pp. 10-14, 117-146) and others as to various interpolations is also due to a large extent to the difficulty of explaining the τὰ αὐτὰ of ch. 3 and its different tone, as is also Ewald's view that St. Paul wrote first chs. 1 and 2, and then after an interruption the remainder, possibly in two postscripts. This is in itself quite conceivable and less violent than the other theories of a similar kind.

Is there any external ground for holding to the theory of a double letter? We have already discussed the evidence in Polycarp (see above), of which so much is made, and have come to the conclusion that nothing definite can be found there to substantiate a double letter. Nor is the comparison with 2 Co 10-13 wholly convincing. There is nothing a priori improbable in the idea that St. Paul wrote more letters than one to Philippi; indeed, there is every reason to suppose this to have been the case, yet it goes no way towards proving that we have these communications fused together in our extant Epistle. If this theory can be established, it must be established on other grounds, and it must satisfy the facts better than the one-letter theory. The chief difficulty is to explain the τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν. Does this refer to the contents of the letter itself, or to some special prominent thought in it? Some find this leading idea to be 'rejoicing.' This is Baur's idea: 'The τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν refers to nothing but the χαίρετε ἐν Κυρίῳ, that is, to the contents of the Epistle generally, for the key-note and the leading thought of it are expressed in this constantly recurring χαίρετε' (Paul, Eng. tr.², vol. ii. p. 70). But it cannot be said that this is convincing although it is the most natural thought that one would gather from the words. The idea occurs often in the letter (Ph 1¹⁸ 2¹⁷, 18, 23 3¹ 4⁴ 10; also 1⁴ 2² 2² 4¹), but why should there be special safety in repeating it?

Others say that the reference is to the dangers of dissensions already present in the Church at Philippi (1²⁷ 2²⁻⁴) (Lightfoot), and this agrees with the passage following, although the language (ἁγνότης, ἀσφάλεια) is very strong considering the vagueness of the allusions to these previous dissensions. Some critics find the idea referred to in δικαιοσύνη, or in ταπεινοφροσύνη (so Maurice Jones, Exp. 8th ser., viii. [1914] 471), but both these suggestions are far from self-evident. The idea that perhaps St. Paul was referring to previous written communications accordingly suggests itself, and perhaps satisfies the conditions better, or the similar idea that he was interrupted, and that in the meantime he had received disconcerting news of probable Jewish aggressiveness in Philippi. It may, however, be explained on subjective grounds. If St. Paul himself was at this point suddenly arrested by the experience of Jewish fanaticism towards himself, it might very well occasion this outburst, which is undoubtedly characteristic of the Apostle, although it is difficult to account for τὰ αὐτὰ on such a view.

At any rate there is not here sufficient ground either for eliminating 3¹ or, what is worse, discrediting the unity of the letter itself. This unity is apparent in spite of the admitted difficulty; and no one has recognized it more clearly than van Manen: 'The epistle as a whole does not present the appearance of patchwork. Rather does it show unity of form: we find a letter with a regular beginning and ending (1^{1a} 4²⁰⁻²³); a thanksgiving at the outset for the many excellences of the persons addressed (1³⁻¹¹; cf. Ro 1⁸⁻¹², 1 Co 14⁹), notwithstanding the sharp rebukes that are to be administered later; personalia; exhortations relating to the ethical and religious life; all mingled together yet not without regard to a certain order. Here and there some things may be admitted to interrupt the steady flow of the discourse; 3¹ or 3^{1b} raises the conjecture of a new beginning; the "things" spoken of here are not different from those which we meet with elsewhere in other Pauline Epistles—even in Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal. There also, just as here, we repeatedly hear a change of tone, and are conscious of what seems to be a change of spirit. Yet even apart from this, to lay too great stress upon the spiritual mood which expresses itself in 3⁵⁻⁶, as contrasted with that of 1³⁻¹¹, or, on the whole, of 1-2, would be to forget what we can read in 1¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 2²¹ and the calm composure shown in 3f. (EBi iii. 3708). What one has to remember is that in real letters we must expect such sudden changes. A recent editor (J. D. Duff) of Pliny's Letters (bk. vi., London, 1906, Introd. p. xix) says: '... these letters [i.e. Pliny's] are not genuine letters in the sense that they were not written merely for the information or pleasure of the person addressed but mainly with an eye to future publication. If they are compared with genuine letters such as Cicero's the difference is at once apparent. Pliny never repeats himself, never sends news which has to be corrected in a later letter, never betrays a sign of real excitement or depression. He never jumps from one subject to another, and then back again as everyone does in a natural letter to a friend. . . . Few people are so fortunate in their surroundings that their letters to intimate friends contain nothing but praise of the persons mentioned' (cf. Ph 2¹). If these be the criteria of a real letter, they are all present in this one—repetitions, excitement, depression, jumps from one subject to another, and possibly expectations that were not fulfilled.

The τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν is not explained by fusion, for it is even more probable that a redactor would see the break sooner than St. Paul himself would. We must either hold that the reference is to earlier communications which have been lost, or, to explain it of our present letter, admit that we cannot be sure what exactly in it is spoken of, recognizing, however, that the change of tone is quite in the manner of St. Paul. The double τὸ λοιπὸν (3¹ and 4³) might lend colour to the view of amalgamation, but it is possible that with St. Paul it is not very much stronger than οὖν (cf. Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians,' in locis, and G. Milligan, Thessalonians, London, 1903, on 1 Th 4¹). At any rate in a letter one is not astonished to find such usages. There is nothing in the style either to suggest spuriousness or fusion. It is simple and artless, rising at times to a rhythmic height. This is clearly seen in 2^{6ff.} and also in 4¹¹⁻¹³ (cf. J. Weiss, Beiträge zur paulin. Rhetorik, Göttingen, 1897, pp. 23, 29). One can naturally explain this as due to emotion such as even an ordinary preacher often feels and which produces a rhythmic poetic style. 3^{1b} is an iambic trimeter, ἐμοὶ μὲν οὐκ ὀκνηρόν, ὑμῖν δὲ ἀσφαλές—possibly a quotation, more probably due to accident and unconscious. Baur has noticed the repetition of the same word (1⁸. 18. 23 2¹⁷ 18. 27 3² 4² 17) and the use of synonyms (1²⁰ 2¹. 2. 16. 23).

Certain words occurring nowhere else in St. Paul are suggestive, as ἀρετή, 4⁸; προκοπή, 1¹; προσφιλή and σεμνὰ (only in Pastorals) as well as unusual combinations of common words, ε.γ. θλίψιν ἐγείρειν, ἐξομολογεῖσθαι ὅτι, τὰ ἐμπροσθεν (noun). The latter can be explained, however, by LXX usage; and possibly the former. There is nothing astonishing in St. Paul's acquaintance with such common words, which perhaps came to him through popular Stoic usage (see Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, 'St. Paul and Seneca,' p. 270f.), nor can any safe general inference be drawn from them as to a change in his style away from the LXX towards a more literary form.

A more thorough knowledge of inscriptions has revealed the fact that the Pauline vocabulary and style are largely the natural ones of his time. There is no importance to be attached to the recurrence of πλῆν, which in itself is a common word, occurring once in 1 Co 11¹¹. The quotations from the OT are mere echoes (2¹⁰. 15. 16 4³. 13), save 1¹⁹ from Job 13¹⁶, which is evidently quoted with the original context clearly in view. Nothing is more precarious than arguments from style, and in this case account has to be taken of the directness and lack of dogmatic content which were uncalled for by the circumstances. All things considered, the style and vocabulary are genuinely Pauline.

6. Date and place of origin.—The solution of the second question largely determines the first. There is no definite Abfassungsort mentioned in the letter itself, so that we are thrown back on internal evidence, and have to determine what period of St. Paul's life best suits the circumstances. He was a prisoner (1⁷). He had been a prisoner for some time, for the Philippians had sent Epaphroditus to him with a gift of money under the impression that he needed it. The messenger had arrived and fallen ill. The news of his illness had reached them (either orally or in writing), and they had again sent communications expressing their anxiety. Some change had taken place in St. Paul's circumstances since he became a prisoner, which they construed pessimistically. The Apostle informs them that already he had made his apologia with gratifying results (1⁷), evidently a preliminary defence before the judicial authorities. The result was that the brethren were thereby encouraged to resume their preaching of Christ with greater freedom and boldness. Wherever he was, there were many preachers, some of them opposed to his views of Christianity, others favourable. He rejoiced in the renewed energy of both as far as objective results went, though he could not but deplore the motives of those who disagreed with him. He is confident that the issue of his affairs at present will be final deliverance, and that he will soon see them again (2²³). If, however, it should otherwise happen, then before he is finally condemned—the case is not yet settled—he will speak with such clearness and boldness that Christ shall be magnified in his body either by life or death. By death he would see Christ face to face (σὺν Χριστῷ), their faith already established would be perfected (2¹⁷). The possibility of death is always a real one, imprisonment or no imprisonment, but it is no ground of despondency. At present he proposes to send Timothy to them, but let them be sure that his own coming will follow shortly thereafter, for he has every reason to regard hopefully his situation. In the whole Prætorium his imprisonment is viewed in the proper light. Misunderstandings regarding the nature of the charge against him have been removed owing to recent events, and this is the case generally. He is glad to tell them that, besides the brethren with him, the saints of Cæsar's household especially send their Christian greetings. He deplores that he had no one to send to them at present, as his associates at the time refused to go as envoys (2²⁰).

Of what place could these facts be spoken? The three main points are (1) his imprisonment, (2) Prætorium, (3) Cæsar's household.

(1) St. Paul was often in prison (2 Co 11²³): in Philippi itself (Ac 16²³), in Cæsarea (Ac 23), and in Rome (Ac 23). According to Clement (ad Rom. i.

56), he was no fewer than seven times in gaol: δὴ ἑξήλων καὶ ἑνὶ Παῦλος υπομονῆς βραβεῖον ἐνεδειξεν, ἐπτάκις δεσμία φορέσας. Jerusalem and Philippi are ruled out, but there still remain the possibilities of Rome, Caesarea, and Ephesus if we can be sure of an imprisonment there. The fact of imprisonment then is not decisive.

(2) Prætorium.—There is considerable divergence of opinion as to what this term means. Elsewhere it is used of the tower of Antonia (Mk 15¹⁹), and of Herod's palace (Ac 23³⁵). It occurs nowhere else in St. Paul's writings. If a locality is meant (and this is not ruled out by the phrase καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς παῶν; cf. CIG i. 1770), then the term indicates some princely building, the residence of a prince or procurator. There is no evidence, however, that the Palatium—the Roman Imperial residence—was so called, although it is possible that a provincial writing in Rome might loosely describe it by this term. Herod's residence where Felix stayed in Caesarea was a prætorium. Or the reference is to the camp of the prætorian guards, built by Tiberius and situated at the Porta Viminalis. This is doubtful; at any rate there seems no evidence to prove that this camp was called prætorium (see Zahn, op. cit. i. 551).

It is possible, however, that the term is used of persons, and even so two views have found supporters:—(a) There is no doubt, after Lightfoot's researches, that the term 'prætorium' may mean the prætorian guard, and it would admirably suit St. Paul's case in Rome as we learn that from Ac 28. (b) Mommsen, however, believes that the 'us-i prætorii-(o) and associates are referred to, in which case the term would mean the legal authorities. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 357) agrees with this (but he has latterly given his opinion in favour of the prætorian guard). The objection to it is that a large body is referred to—'in the whole prætorium'—and on the face of it this does not suit well the theory of the judicial authorities, nor is it clear that the term 'prætorium' simpliciter was so used. We are thus restricted either to the meaning, 'the soldiers of the prætorian guard' or else 'the provincial residence of a procurator,' so that this term does not definitely decide the origin of the letter, although the preponderance of evidence is in favour of Rome.

(3) The saints of Caesar's household.—The meaning of this phrase seems clearly to be 'servants of the Imperial house,' not blood-relations of the Emperor. This appears to militate against the argument of many who uphold the Cæsarean origin, who equate this term with the prætorium; on the other hand, it is possible that such slaves existed in provincial towns like Caesarea or Ephesus. It is, however, a strong evidence in favour of Rome.

We are thus largely thrown back on the evidence furnished by the Apostle's condition at the time of writing, or on the relation of this letter to other letters whose origin we know. On this ground many have defended the Cæsarean origin. St. Paul was undoubtedly in prison here for two years (Ac 23³⁵, and in a prætorium. He had been imprisoned through Jewish hostility, and in Philippians (3^{1st}) he writes with bitterness of the Judaizers. But this is surely no argument, because St. Paul's experience of this hatred was so uniform that such an outburst as Ph 3 is explicable at any period in his career. It is said that we have no proof that Timothy was ever in Rome with St. Paul (outside the imprisonment letters), but have we any direct proof that he was with him in Caesarea? The greed of Felix was aroused, it is maintained, by the gift St. Paul received from Philippi. This involves a circulus in probando. The impression given in Acts is that Felix thought St. Paul a man of standing and substance. H.

Böttger (Beiträge zur historisch-kritischen Einleitung in die paulinischen Briefe, Göttingen, 1837) urges strongly that we cannot conceive of such a delay in the judicial proceedings as is implied in the letter, taking place at Rome. It is sufficient to refer to what Lightfoot has said to the contrary (Philippians, p. 3 ff.; cf. also Neander, Planting and Training of the Christian Church, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1864–80, i. 312). The strongest argument against Rome is the stylistic and doctrinal—the difference in doctrine and style between Philippians and both Colossians and Ephesians, and the affinities with Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians. It was for this reason that Lightfoot, who gives an elaborate list of parallels between Philippians and Romans, placed our letter early in the Roman imprisonment in order to give time for doctrinal development, and Haupt also has felt the force of this argument so keenly as to say: 'wenn nur die Annahme einer römischen Abfassung möglich wäre, würde ich ohne weiteres die Echtheit der beiden Briefe preisgeben, obwohl die Annahme der römischen Abfassung bis in dies Jhdt. hinein die allgemeingültige gewesen und auch noch jetzt von einer grossen Anzahl von Gelehrten verteidigt ist.' He would give up unreservedly the genuineness of Colossians and Ephesians if he were compelled to regard them as written in Rome where Philippians was written, and that in spite of the fact that so many scholars still defend the Roman origin of all the three letters (Haupt in Meyer's *Kommentar*², p. 70).

But it is not clear that either of these views would in any way help us out of the difficulty, for on Lightfoot's view St. Paul changed his style within two years and his doctrine developed and deepened. Two years is too short a period for this. On Haupt's view St. Paul's profound style and doctrine in Colossians and Ephesians were due to his confinement in Caesarea when he had time to brood and ponder such as he had not before. This enforced inactivity deepened and widened his views of Christ. But the weakness of this explanation is that St. Paul again goes back in Philippians to the old simple style.

Recently, however, a theory has been advocated which seems to solve this difficulty. The theory is that Philippians was written from Ephesus, and the other imprisonment letters from Rome or Caesarea (so M. Albertz, in SK iv. [1910] 551 ff.). Thus the Philipian Epistle is ranged alongside Romans and the Corinthian Epistles; and the mission of Timothy (Ac 19²², 1 Co 16¹⁰) is explained. The initial difficulty, however, is to prove an Ephesian imprisonment. There is no mention of it by St. Luke, but does not St. Paul himself refer to it (1 Co 15³², 2 Co 4⁸⁻¹⁰ 6²⁻¹⁰)? The extra-canonical arguments used by Albertz are of little value—the seven imprisonments mentioned by Clem. Rom. (ad Cor. i. v. 6), the account in Nicephorus Kallisti of St. Paul's fight in the arena, the testimony of the Acts of Paul, and the tower still in Ephesus known as 'Paul's Prison' (see art. PHILIPPI for references). The real argument is, however, the 'fighting with beasts at Ephesus' (1 Co 15³²).

The theory as advocated by H. Lisso (Vincula Sanctorum, Berlin, 1900) is sharply criticized by Albertz himself (especially his view that Rome was a Hafengebiet in Ephesus, which is a curiosity of criticism), though Lisso seems to have first raised the possibility of an Ephesian imprisonment. Deissmann, who claims for himself the originating of the theory (Licht vom Osten, p. 171 n., Eng. tr., p. 229 n.), unfortunately is surer of the Ephesian origin of Colossians and Ephesians than he is of the Ephesian origin of Philippians. The stylistic argument he explains on psychological grounds (ib.). Albertz's article is worthy of serious attention, and Kirsopp Lake claims a hearing for it (Exp, 8th ser., vii. [1914] 492f.). On this view, it is held, it is easier to imagine St. Paul influencing the few prætorians in Ephesus than the 9000 in Rome. The house of Cæsar offers no difficulty, for slaves of the Imperial house were scattered all over the provinces, and there is epigraphic evidence for their existence in Ephesus (q.v.). St. Paul's intention of going to Philippi is explicable, whereas if the letter was written from Rome we would expect him to go farther west. His expression ἐν ἀπολογίᾳ εὐαγγελίου κείμεν (1¹⁶; cf. v. 7) refers to a real trial—an appearance before the court. Then, if the letter is written from Rome, the reference to the Philippians' gift is sarcastic (ἡδὴ ποτέ), as ten years had elapsed since they had helped him, and this is unthinkable. The difficulties about this theory are to prove St. Paul's Ephesian imprisonment, and especially his fighting with beasts, for he was a Roman citizen, and this indignity would accordingly not be suffered by him. Luke's silence is again a serious matter; and, indeed, his account militates against an imprisonment, nor is it likely that St. Paul would take for granted that the Philippians would understand the references to the prætorium and the household of Cæsar without further explanation. Above all, his situation as described in Philippians does not easily fit anything we know of his stay in Ephesus. The doctrinal and linguistic argument, which is really the motive of all these theories, can well be explained on psychological grounds, and the different conditions of the churches addressed (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 359; Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 171, Eng. tr., p. 229; Moffatt, LNT, p. 170).

We know so little of the procedure in cases of appeal that it is difficult to be sure of the situation St. Paul was in when Philippians was written, but the present writer concludes that the Apostle wrote Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon earlier than Philippians, that when he wrote Philippians most of his trusted associates (see Colossians and Philemon) had gone on missions to churches, and he had difficulty in finding any one to go to Philippi. It was thus either at the end of his two years confinement in his hired house (Ac 28³⁰), or at a later date when he was more immediately occupied with his appearing before the judicial authorities. We believe that he had already made a preliminary defence and that he was actually set free shortly after this, either because the Jews had no case and failed to appear, or else because their case broke down on examination. Whether we can interpret Philippians as meaning that St. Paul had now to undergo a stricter custody than that described in Acts is doubtful though not improbable; if it took place it was not due to a breaking down of his case but to judicial arrangements. Thus the dating of the letter depends on the view which we take of Pauline chronology generally. The two points to be fixed are Gallio's governorship of Achaia and Festus' stay in Cæsaræa (see C. H. Turner, HDB i. 415 ff., and Deissmann, St. Paul, Eng. tr., London, 1912, Appendix I.). The present writer is of the opinion that St. Paul came to Rome in 60 at the latest, and that he was liberated towards the end of 61. We must therefore place the authorship of Philippians in this year, and that of the other imprisonment letters earlier.

7. Contents of the letter.—(a) The fellowship of the gospel (1¹⁻¹¹ 4¹⁰⁻²³).—The teaching of the beginning and ending of the letter centres round the thought of fellowship (κοινωνία), and this central idea itself is suggested to the Apostle by the liberality of his Philippian converts. The foundation of this fellowship is the grace of Jesus Christ (4²³) or of God the Father (1²), God being regarded as the source of this grace, and Christ as the agent through whom it is mediated. Peace is the result of grace, or grace viewed in relation to the quality of life which grace produces. Grace is this new relationship viewed as to its origin. The fellowship of Christians follows from their being in Christ. St. Paul and Timothy are His δούλοι—a term expressing dignity as well as humility. Some of those addressed are overseers and deacons of His flock, all are consecrated in Him. They are thus united in an indissoluble union with one another, under the Lordship of Christ—a Lordship of grace. This free redeeming favour is at once the origin, the atmosphere, and the ideal of Christian life. It is a subject at once of benediction and of prayer (4²³). It is a common Christian possession (συνκοινωνός τῆς χάριτος), shown not only in trust in Christ, but also in suffering on His behalf (1²⁹; cf. v. 7). Grace as it comes with its lavish offer to men is the gospel, and the earnest endeavour to proclaim the good news, or the support of those entrusted with this proclamation, is the fellowship in the gospel (v. 3). The Philippians by sending monetary help to St. Paul have demonstrated their place in this fellowship. Their material gifts are effects of their spiritual communion-life, and the steady flow * of their liberality all along from their first acceptance of the gospel until now is a proof of their growing appreciation of this communion and a proof of its coming completed realization in them (vv. 3-6). Because they are in Christ, at the day of Christ they shall be perfect sharers of the rich life which He has in glory with God the Father, and which is mediated through Him to His people (4¹⁹). This revelation of their character—through their liberality—is to St. Paul a theme of thankful prayer and rejoicing (v. 3), of prayer which shall be answered because he knows that it is really God Himself who began this work in them and He will complete it, of rejoicing also because they appreciate what the fellowship of the gospel is, and are not severed from it by afflictions (4¹⁴). Their spiritual condition fills him with Christ-like yearning for them that their ἀγάπη—their spirit of Christian brotherhood—should develop along the Divinely appointed lines of practical wisdom and tactful discrimination, in a world where enthusiasm often fails in insight, and insight in kindly consideration of others (1¹⁰).

His thankfulness and his joy are not due to his appreciation of their personal kindness to himself, nor yet to the betterment of their own material circumstances. It is more deeply rooted and grounded on deeper insight. For himself he can meet plenty or poverty in the sustaining power of Christ, who enables him and has enabled him hitherto to cope with all situations. He had no need of any further gift to prove their attachment to him. The past can supply rich evidence of that. Nor is it this exhibition of their material prosperity that makes him rejoice. It is the fact rather that thus he has a fresh proof of the reality of their fellowship in the gospel. It is given thus to them (as to him) to defend and strengthen the gospel, to offer to God an acceptable and pleasing sacrifice—to reap already the fruit of that uprightness of life which is produced through Christ (v. 11), and to sow the seeds of yet richer harvests. For their spiritual prosperity is really their willingness to support the gospel. Spiritual expenditure is the accumulation of spiritual capital. Spiritual liberality is the plan of campaign for God's successful stewards, for the supply will be according to the demand both here and hereafter. Their riches are with the glorified Christ, and these riches are increased for them by appropriation and use. They will receive full possession of the inheritance on His day.

* Any interruption of their liberality was due to necessity, either poverty or impossibility of transmission (4¹⁰).

Never was Christian liberality so exalted and so spiritually interpreted, never were donors thanked in such a fashion save when the Master said: 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me' (Mt 25⁴⁰). On this is grounded his conviction as to their 'perseverance' and his assurance of their final salvation.

(b) The furtherance of the gospel (προκοπή τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) (1¹²⁻²⁶).—The Philippians were afraid that St. Paul's recent experiences boded ill for the success of the gospel. He dispels their pessimism (1) by an appeal to present facts. His present condition has not, as a matter of fact, hindered the progress of the gospel; it has extended it and enabled it—as far as he himself is concerned—to shine forth in its true light, sharply defined where it was apt to be mingled with other issues (1¹²⁻¹³). It has quickened it also into fresh activity and vigorous boldness in the case of others—and these include the majority of his brother preachers. His chains have not insulated the Word of God, but are a vehicle of its diffusion. The fact that some preachers (these are not included in the τοὺς πλείονας of v. 14) are motivated by partisanship and personal opposition to himself does not lessen his joy, because he rejoices in the preaching of Christ, and the gospel is relatively independent of the preacher's personal motives. The gospel then advances, and this advancement is due to his chains. Let them therefore rejoice with him. He dispels their pessimism in regard to the success of the gospel also (2) by a consideration of the future. A new reason is introduced in 1^{18b} (ἀλλὰ καὶ χαρίσονται). At present the gospel is furthered by his chains, but should his condition change, what cause have they to fear that thereby Christ's cause shall suffer? As far as he is concerned a prolongation of his life on earth means the preaching of Christ, which shall be fruitful also in furthering the gospel; it means, besides, a strengthening of their own faith and a vindication of their Christian exultation in him. So convinced is he of their need of him that he is sure their prayers will thus be answered, and the rich supply of Christ's Spirit to him will enable him in life yet to magnify Christ among them. But if his trial should issue in his death even then also Christ's Spirit will enable him to speak freely and boldly, so that Christ shall be magnified in his death as in his life. This is his earnest hope, and it is a hope that will not be disappointed, that in either case Christ shall have the glory; yea, even they themselves also would thus have their faith completed, for his death would be a crowning of its reality and utter devotion (2¹⁷). Besides, the present situation, whatever the issue, will bring nearer his own salvation either by his personal liberation or his reunion with Christ (σωτηρία possibly but not certainly = 'liberation'). The latter prospect is to him overpoweringly attractive, so much so that he cannot say what actually he would desire for himself. To depart and see Christ is far better than any earthly lot, but then he knows the will of God to be that he should yet continue here, because they need him.

(c) The faith of the gospel (ἡ πίστις τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) (1²⁷⁻²⁹ 3¹⁻⁴⁹).—The Philippians were anxious as to how St. Paul's state would affect the cause of Christ, and he also is anxious for them, not so much as to their condition viewed by itself, but as to its effect on the gospel as a whole. If his coming is to bring them Christian exultation, then it is on condition that they live worthily of the gospel whether he be with them or not.

The gospel is the charter of the commonwealth to which they belong, and fidelity to it is therefore imperative. By faith here we are to understand not individual trust in Christ, but a communal esprit de corps. The community to which they really belong is not simply their own church in Philippi, but the heavenly. This is the ideal, yet it is through participation in it that all existing Christian communities receive their value. Besides, their Lord, whom they expect, will give them full possession of this commonwealth and prepare them for it by giving them each an organism freed from all the weaknesses and debasing associations of the present body. His power to do this is unlimited (3²⁰⁻²¹).

Fidelity to the gospel then is imperative, and is to be exhibited negatively and positively. (1) Fidelity to the gospel is to be exhibited negatively by their presenting a strenuous united front to their enemies. They are to be as one single person. The elements of personality are spirit and soul, and both these in their communal life are to be unified in themselves and together in a determined stand against opponents. Their united determination will be a proof of their salvation—a Divine salvation—and will terrify their enemies into a hastening destruction. So then let them not be scared as horses are sometimes scared by shadows, for to suffer on Christ's behalf is a Divine favour—as they see in his own case—as surely as that Christ called them to rely on Him is a favour. Who these enemies were we are not told, but it is reasonable to believe that they are referred to in ch. 3, because there we have illustrations of their opponents, as in ch. 4 we have illustrations of the perils which threaten their inward unity. These passages are the illustrative exemplifications of the double warnings conveyed in 1²⁷⁻²⁹. They were Jews and libertines. Of the former they are to beware. They have nothing to gain from them. Let them learn from his own case. He had all the privileges that these Jews could give, but for the excellency of Christ's friendship he parted with them all, and he is as convinced now, as when he first did this, that he did right.

For Christ gave him the power to get into right relations with God on the ground of faith, while Judaism trusts in a legal righteousness which cannot save. It is true that even he has not yet reached perfection, but Christ is leading him on, and he strenuously and lovingly follows Him. The power of Christ's Resurrection-life is being gradually realized in him, inasmuch as he is able to follow Him into sufferings; and the spirit which enabled Jesus to suffer as He did suffer is in St. Paul also, and when it takes complete possession of him then he shall perfectly participate in the glorified exalted life of the Redeemer. The righteousness which is in Christ is not a modification of the present earthly status quo—as the Jews thought—but a complete transformation of it by the power of Christ, who already has perfection and who shall bring His people into it as He Himself came into it through sufferings and death. It is thus a call—but not therefore like the longing of Tantalus, or the labour of Sisyphus; it is attainable, but it needs all the energy of the soul; it demands perfect absorption of interest, because it is their Lord's own grasp that is uplifting them out of spiritual death into a life of glory. This he can personally testify. Let them beware also of those who live for earthly things, forgetting their high calling, and their great hope, men who claim spiritual perfection, but are really concerned with earthly gratification and spiritual liberty, meaning thereby sensual licence. 'I call them,' says the Apostle, 'enemies of the Cross of Christ, for they fail to understand to my sorrow and their own woe that the flesh has no function in the spiritual commonwealth over which Christ is King and from which He shall come to prepare His people by furnishing them with bodies like His own present glorified body' (Ph 3^{1st}).

(2) Positively they must show their fidelity to the gospel by inward union. In ch. 4 they are directly reminded of the variance between Euodia and Syntyche, and both these women are exhorted to practical unity in the Lord. Others are to help them to attain this end—recognizing their former diligence and associations with St. Paul and his fellow-labourers. This unity is enforced by their standing in Christ. From this vantage-point the Apostle can appeal to them with strong and tender persuasion. Are they not loving brethren and fellow-participants in the Spirit? He can also add his own personal appeal, for they are his beloved, his joy and his crown. Therefore let them abjure party-strife, and vainglory, and let them imitate their Lord in His self-denying humility for others. Let His example be their constant rule. Let them do all things without murmurings and disputings, for the word of life is theirs. Let their light shine before men, lest his labour among them end in shame instead of exultant joy, for he is ready even to be poured out as a libation to complete the self-denial of their faith, and he does this with joy; let them also with single and united effort imitate him; for none else but God Himself is energizing in them to effect the complete salvation they long for. Let them keep their eye on him and those who walk as he walks, maintaining their place in the way, waiting for God's light to shine on the path along which they now advance. 'Whatever they learned, and received, and heard from him, whatever they saw in him, let them do' (4⁹). Let them also think constantly of those moral virtues which are everywhere recognized. Let them remember the nearness of their Lord's approach, and let them wait upon Him in prayer. Then shall their life be freed from the paralysis of distraction and graced with the calm sweetness and orderliness of the forward full vision, with the joy of singlemindedness. For God gives peace—i.e. a life full of self-sufficiency and inward security—and this peace shall like a garrison safeguard them in Christ (4⁴⁻⁷). Let them then rejoice in the Lord. Let all men see the strength, the sweetness, and the sensibleness of their faith.

We have already dealt with St. Paul's references to Timothy and Epaphroditus (2¹⁹⁻³⁰). We must look a little more closely at their Great Example.

(4) The imitation of Christ (2⁵⁻¹¹).—This famous passage cannot be discussed with any fullness here. It is evident from the rhythmical structure that thought and language have been carefully arranged and elaborated, yet the whole statement is brought forward as a practical motive, not as an exhaustive theological statement.

Christ first comes into the Apostle's vision—as he considers Him in this passage in His pre-incarnate state—before His appearance on earth. In this state, the Apostle says, He was in the form of God. What does this mean? It must mean something that Christ could lay aside, of which He did empty Himself, something that forms a direct contrast to the 'form of a servant.' From the phrase ἐκένωσεν it is not too much to say that it is equi-pollent to 'Himself,' His personality. His personality then was essentially identical with that of God. Is it not absurd to say of any one, however, that he empties himself of his personality? Logically it is, but really it is not. We know what is meant by a denial of oneself, an effacement of oneself. The fact is that these ethical activities transcend the bare laws of logical consistency. The 'form of God' then seems to describe Christ's preincarnate personality in terms of the Divine nature. μορφή is, of course, not used here as an accurate terminus technicus of philosophy, but it does seem in St. Paul to express (cf. Ro 8²⁹, Gal 4¹⁹, 2 Co 3¹⁸, Ph 3¹⁰) a personality with adequate means for the expression of personal activities, and to St. Paul Christ in His pre-incarnate state was a Divine Personality, with a spiritual organism perfectly adequate for the manifestation of His Divine glory. This is implied in μορφή, which still retains traces of its original perceptual reference. St. Paul does not say that this μορφή was identical with our Lord's post-Resurrection spiritual body, far less that He had a quasi-material σῶμα, but he does seem to say that it was functionally as perfect for the expression of His Divinity then as the latter is for the expression of His redemptive Lordship now. In this pre-incarnate state He did not grasp at equality with God (οὐχ ἀπαγαγὼν ἑἑῷ αὐτὸ εἶναι τὰ θεῶν). It is difficult if not impossible to find here a reference to our Lord's earthly life. That has yet to come before the Apostle's mind. Psychologically, of course, the self-denying life of Jesus on earth was the temporal prius from which the Apostle developed his view of Christ's nature, but here it is the ordo eventuum in the pre-earthly life of Christ which he describes, not the psychological order of his own thinking. What, however, does it mean to say that He did not consider equality with God a thing to be snatched? How could He seize on equality with God if He was already in the form of God? If the two phrases are identical is there not here a manifest absurdity? Lightfoot and others get out of this difficulty by translating—'did not consider equality with God as a prize to be retained, to be clung to'; but the phrase indicates more than retaining—it indicates a positive grasping. Others again refer this grasping to His future Lordship which God gave Him (as a gift) in virtue of His obedience. 'He might have used the miraculous powers inherent in His Divine nature in such a way as to compel men, without further ado, to worship Him as God' (Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians,' p. 437^a).

But the insuperable objection to this opinion is that the phrase expresses a pre-incarnate activity and not an incarnate one. The truth in this view is that 'equality with God' is regarded as a relation—a recognition of Divine equality from others—spiritual beings. Christ did not think of claiming this in heaven before His appearance on earth. The redemption of men being in view He on the contrary voluntarily determined to undertake it, and thereby did not snatch at this Divine recognition. In one word the self-humiliation of our Lord was first transacted on the theatre of His own Divine mind above before it was concretely manifested here below, and it was not simply a renunciation touching Himself only, but a renunciation in spite of a positive essential nisus that heavenly beings might in virtue of His nature have expected Him to have exerted. The Apostle no doubt argued from Jesus' earthly activity, but he naturally projects this activity into the pre-incarnate state. As His action was on earth so it was formerly in heaven. The Apostle in the expression οὐχ ἀπαγαγὼν ἑῷ αὐτὸ εἶναι τὰ θεῶν is not concerned with defending Christ from blame, but with commending Him as the transcendent moral Example. He might—at any rate, all others would—have exercised self-assertion: it was, as it were, His right. But He did not do so. The difficulties here are not those of formal logic, but the ever-present difficulties of visualizing eternal infinite activities in finite temporal categories. Then the second vision which the Apostle has of His Master is on earth. 'He emptied Himself by taking the form of a servant, being or becoming in human likeness, and being found in human guise, He still humbled Himself unto death—yea the Cross-death.' Here we have the Apostle's description of our Lord's incarnate life. What is involved in His self-emptying we cannot say. The 'how' of it is beyond our understanding, but the fact of it and its absolute moral value are full of force. The Apostle does not mean by 'the likeness of men' or 'in fashion as a man' that Jesus was less than human, but that He was truly human, tried by all experimental tests—yet more. The ἐκένωσεν εαυτόν is not physical annihilation but moral effacement. To discuss theologically the possible theories that have been used to explain this is not called for here. They are neither useless, however, nor futile, but due to an essential thought-impulse in us. The difficulties of theory must not obscure the glory of the fact to be explained. Milton has this passage in mind when he says:

'That glorious Form, that Light unsufferable,
And that far-beaming blaze of Majesty,
Wherewith he went at Heav'n's high Council-Table,
To sit the midst of Trinal Unity,
He laid aside; and here with us to be,
Forsook the Courts of everlasting Day,
And chose with us a darksome House of mortal Clay'
(On the Morning of Christ's Nativity, 8-14).

Men saw Him here as they saw other men, subject to the limitations to which man as man is subject.

The third vision is the Exalted Christ—yet still the same Person, but now freed from earthly limitations, highly exalted, gifted with universal Lordship by God because of His obedience, possessing now the ineffable Name in recognizing which all are to worship to the glory of God the Father. The Apostle's view of the imitation of Christ is not a slavish copying of His earthly habits or actions but a possession of His Spirit as the spirit of humility and obedience to the will of God. This Lordship of Christ is central in St. Paul's teaching. It gives duty its obligation, for Christ is the law and light of the individual conscience. It supplies virtue with striving and sustaining power, guarantees it with the sure hope of ultimate success and reward in the day of Christ, the day when His Lordship shall be known and recognized. It supplies the good with its content, for the glory of the Lord—the riches of that glory—is the true inheritance and life of the saints. It gives moral judgment a norm and a finality, for the Lord is the ultimate Judge. It gives evangelism its programme of advance. It enforces sanctification because it sees in Christian men God Himself at work. It assures salvation. It gives life on earth a purpose and robs death of its terror and transforms suffering into a grace. The day of the full revelation of this Lordship is the day of Christ. Its date is not told, but it is near. The measurement used is the prophetic not the chronological. To the Apostle death means to be with the Lord—to see His face. There is no word here of a sleep of the saints (κοιμάσθαι). The coming of Christ means the transformation of the body of humiliation into the likeness of Christ's own body of glory, so that in contrast with that glorious life this life of striving, 'pent in the body,' is like death. Whether this happens immediately after death or after an interval is not said. St. Paul does not say that the Philippian community will be alive at Christ's coming, but he seems to regard it as a possibility (¹⁰).

For these reasons it is held by some that St. Paul changed his view of eschatology, that he gave up the idea of a κοιμάσθαι of the saints, and favoured the idea of immediate reunion with Christ after death (W. Beyschlag, NT Theology, Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1895, ii. 267 ff.). The influence under which this change took place, according to this view, is the sure prospect of his own death. But many others had died in Christ before him, and it is impossible to think that St. Paul had not considered that question seriously. He is working with the resurrection of Christ Himself as the norm of his thinking on this subject as far as the case of Christians is concerned. He believes in a general resurrection for all (Ro 2^o 14¹⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁰), but for the Christian the Resurrection means a glorified body like to Christ's own, which shall be given him at Christ's coming. How he is clothed in the interval is not said. That St. Paul regarded this Parousia of Christ as near at hand is evident, but it is equally evident that he did not claim to know the date and that he did not lay stress on it. What is of value for practice and for hope is that 'Jesus Christ is Lord' and that 'He shall come.'

LITERATURE.—There is no attempt to give an exhaustive bibliography. For exegesis the following commentaries are useful: J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*¹, London, 1878; M. R. Vincent, ICC, 'Philippians and Philemon,' Edinburgh, 189; (strong philologically); C. J. Ellicott, *Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon*², London, 1883; but especially E. Haupt, in Meyer's Kommentar über das NT, Göttingen, 1902, and H. A. A. Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians,' London, 1903. The history of the exegesis before 1859 is given in B. Weiss, Der Philippier-Brief, Berlin, 1859; M. R. Vincent, op. cit. supra, p. xiff., has a good select list. J. Moffatt (LNT, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 165a) gives a very full list of commentaries since Calvin.

Homiletics and Theology:—R. Rainy, Expositor's Bible, 'Philippians,' London, 1893; H. C. G. Moule, Cambridge Greek Testament, 'Philippians,' Cambridge, 1897, Philippian Studies, London, 1897 (full of sympathetic insight); C. J. Vaughan, *Lectures on Philippians*², Cambridge, 1864, Greek Text with Notes, London, 1885; J. Eadie, Commentary to the Ep. to the Philippians, do., 1857 (still very useful); H. von Soden, Der Brief des Apostels Paulus an die Philipper, Freiburg i. B., 1889 (Tübingen, 1906).

There is a whole library on 5¹¹; see Meyer's Kommentar for list of earlier books. Note esp. E. H. Gifford, The Incarnation, London, 1897 (very thorough but explains terms too rigidly); A. B. Bruce, The Humiliation of Christ, Edinburgh, 1881; D. Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, do., 1897, p. 188f.; J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*¹, pp. 127-137; W. Weiffenbach, Auslegung der Stelle Philipper, 25-11, Karlsruhe, 1884; and indeed all commentaries.

For criticism a good account is given in R. A. Lipsius, in Handkommentar zum NT, Freiburg i. B., 1891; T. Zahn, Introduction to the NT, Eng. tr., 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1909, vol. I. (excellent); and the problems are luminously set and answered in J. Moffatt, op. cit. supra, p. 165 ff., where the literature is also given. J. Weiss, Die Schriften des NT, Göttingen, 1906-07, ii. 372-390, gives a good popular exegesis; see also Exp. 6th ser., vii. [1914] 481 ff., viii. [1914] 143 ff., 457 ff., ix. [1915] 235 ff., 481 ff.

D. MACKENZIE.

PHILO.—Philo of Alexandria, the Jew, a contemporary of the apostles, was so highly esteemed by early Christian theologians as to be counted among the Christian authors (Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 11), and his significance for the Apostolic Age is no less clearly recognized by modern scholars.

1. Life.—About the life of Philo we have only very scanty information; apart from occasional remarks in his own writings (in particular in Flaccum and de Virtut. et Leg. ad Gaium) one has to refer to Josephus, Ant. XVIII. viii. 1 [259 f.], and, for the background, to the papyri dealing with persecutions of the Jews in Alexandria.* The Rabbinical literature does not mention this Hellenistic leader of Alexandria.

Philo belonged to one of the noblest and wealthiest Jewish families of Alexandria. His brother Alexander was alabarch (or arabarch, i.e. in control of the custom-houses on the Arabian frontier), and he presented the magnificent brazen doors for the inner court of the Temple in Jerusalem (Jos. BJ v. v. 3 [205]). His nephew Tiberius Alexander took service with the Romans, and, renouncing his Judaism, became a high official; he was governor of Judæa before A.D. 48, and afterwards governor of Egypt. In 69-70, at the siege of Jerusalem, he was chief commander in Titus' headquarters (Jos. Ant. XX. v. 2 [100]; BJ II. xv. 1 [309], xviii. 7 [492]; IV. x. 6 [616]; v. i. 6 [45], xii. 2 [510]; VI. iv. 3 [237]). Philo had had the usual training of a Greek boy of good family: he had studied grammar, mathematics, music, and rhetoric; he had acquired a good knowledge of Greek literature and obtained a fairly profound philosophical education. His style is near to Attic classicism; he imitates Plato so much that people said: ἡ Πλάτων φιλονίζει, ἡ Φίλων πλατωνίζει (Jerome, de Vir. Ill. 11): the one must have copied the other. But, in accordance with the prevailing literary taste, he uses any kind of style that may be appropriate to his purpose. He had also heard Jewish interpreters of the Torah, probably in the synagogue; and it seems as if, like other serious young men, e.g. Josephus and Seneca, he had entered into temporary retreat and held intercourse with ascetic circles in order to gain perfection in theosophy (de Spec. Leg. iii. 1 [ed. Mangey, ii. 299]). Incidentally he mentions a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (de Providentia [ap. Eus. Præp. Evang. viii. xiv. 64]). In his later life he came into publicity much against his own desire. In consequence of the anti-Semitic riots at Alexandria under Flaccus, Philo, as the leader of a Jewish embassy, went to Rome to see the Emperor Caligula. His mission, according to his own report, was not successful. His opponent was the same Alexandrian litterateur, Apion, against whom Josephus wrote his two books.

* E. von Dobschütz, 'Jews and Antisemites in Ancient Alexandria,' AJTh viii. 4 [1904] 723-755.

From Eus. HE II. xviii. 8 one might infer that Philo remained at Rome until the time of Claudius (Jerome thinks rather of a second voyage), and that under the new régime Philo was honoured by the Senate, while his works (in particular in Flaccum and de Legatione ad Gaium) found a place in the public library. That Philo, while at Rome, met the apostle Peter (ib. xvii. 1) is a legend of the same kind as the legends of an exchange of letters between St. Paul and Seneca, or of relations between St. Luke or Mary Magdalene and Galen the famous physician. The papyri report, in the time of Claudius, a hearing of the Alexandrian anti-Semites against King Agrippa, but do not mention Philo.

Philo's significance does not rest so much upon his personality as upon his numerous writings. He represents a mode of thought evidently widespread at the time.

2. Works.—Philo is (1) an interpreter of Holy Scripture, (2) an apologist for Judaism. The earlier editions of his works contain a large number of individual treatises of which Eusebius (HE ii. 18) and Jerome (de Vir. Ill. 11) * give a long list. But it has been shown by Schürer, Massebieau, and Cohn that they fall into two or three groups. The first and largest deals with the Pentateuch under three heads: a short interpretation, a long allegorical commentary, and an exposition in systematic order (the second and third of these may be called, with O. Holtzmann, a kind of Midrash and Mishna). The second consists of philosophical tractates in dialogue form, probably belonging to the earliest period of Philo's literary activity. The third contains apologetic works of a later period. They may be tabulated as follows:

I. EXEGETICAL WORKS ON THE PENTATEUCH:
1. Questions and Answers, 6 bks. on Gen., 5 bks. on Ex. (preserved partially in Armenian and in Latin): short verbal interpretations with allegorical additions.
2. Legum Allegoriae, 1-viii.: a scientific commentary on Gn 2-40.
1.-iii.	Gn 21-319
<iv.	320-223>
<v.> de Cherubim	324-41
<vi.> de Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini	42-4
<vii.	43-7>
<viii.	48-15
<ix.> Quod deterius potiori insidiari solet	46-26
<x.> de Posteritate Caini

* This later list has no value whatever; see C. A. Bernoulli, Der Schriftstellerkatalog des Hieronymus, Freiburg i. B., 1896, pp. 115 f., 132 ff. It was, however, translated into Greek, and thus came to be used by Suidas and Photius.

So far the commentary is continuous; the following are individual tracts:

de Gigantibus (2 bks.)	61-12
(ii. = Quod Deus sit immutabilis)
< de Fœderibus (2 bks.)	920>
de Agricultura (2 bks.)
(ii. = de Plantatione Noë)
de Ebrietate (2 bks.)	921
(ii. only fragments)
de Sobrietate	924-27
de Confusione Linguarum	111-9
de Migratione Abrahami	121-8
< de Præmio	151>
Quis rerum divinarum heres sit	152-18
de Congressu Eruditionis Gratia	161-6
de Fuga et Inventione (de Profugis)	165-14
de Mutatione Nominum	171-22
< de Deo	182>
de Somniis (5 bks.)
(extant only iv. and v. = i., ii.)	2810-17 3111-13 377-11 408-17 4117-24

Possibly some titles are wanting; some are tentatively put into the list in < >. Philo seems to have dealt only with selected passages from ch. 6 onwards.

3. Systematic delineation of the Law.
(a) de Officio Mundi.*
(b) The unwritten Law as represented by the lives of the Fathers.
- | | |
|---------|----------------------------------|
| Abraham | (virtue as acquired by learning) |
| <Isaac | (virtue as innate)> |
| <Jacob | (virtue as practised)> |
| Joseph | (political) |

- (c) The written Law.
de Decalogo
de Specialibus Legibus (1.-iv.)
i. de Circumcisione
de Monarchia i., ii.
de Præmiis Sacerdotum de Victimis
de Victimis Offerentibus
ii. de Septenario
de Cophini Festo
<de Colendis Parentibus>
iii. de Adulterio de Nee
iv. de Iudice
de Concupiscentia de Virtutibus
de Fortitudine <de Pietate> de Humanitate † de Pœnitentia † de Nobilitate
[de Vita Contemplativa]
de Præmiis et Pœnis
de Exsecrationibus
II. PHILOSOPHICAL TREATISES IN FORM OF DIALOGUES:
<Quod omnis nequam servus> <Quod omnis probus liber> de Providentia (2 bks.) (?)
Alexander vel quod rationem habeant bruta animalia.
III. APOLOGETICAL WORKS:
Vita Moïsis (3 or rather 2 bks.)
Hypothetica (i.e. moral advices) de Judæis (apologia) de Virtutibus (5 bks.)
<i. Introductio>
<ii. Sejanus, Pilatus>
iii. in Flaccum
iv. de Legatione ad Gaium
<v. Palinodia>
IV. WORKS OF DOUBTFUL ORIGIN:
de Vita Contemplativa
de Incorrumpibilitate Mundi de Mundo Interpretatio Nominum Hebraicorum.
V. SPURIOUS WORKS:
de Sampson
de Jonâ.

The text of Philo's works has come down to us in an extremely unsatisfactory condition, some tractates being specially unfortunate. As some treatises are known only from one MS, others may still await discovery; about some we know nothing but the title; of others we have only fragments; some are preserved only in Armenian or in Latin. It is entirely due to the Christian Church that Philo's works have been preserved. Cohn thinks he can prove that all our MSS go back to the famous library of Pamphilus at Caesarea, or rather to the work of the two presbyters Acacius and Euzoïus, who about A.D. 350 copied the papyrus rolls of this library into parchment books. This shows the importance of the indirect transmission by quotations in the works of early Church Fathers, as, e.g., Eusebius and Ambrosius, and by Catenæ and Florilegia.

* In MSS and early editions this stands with the group 1. a; but, since Gröcher, the above arrangement is generally adopted. † Some critics, as, e.g., Dahne, Gröcher, Massebieau, would transfer these two pieces to the Life of Moses (see III.); but Wendland and Schürer have adduced strong reasons for keeping them in their present place.

3. Religion.—‘Philo the Jew’—that is his main characteristic. He is a faithful, nay an enthusiastic, adherent of Judaism, both as a nation and as a religion. He is an apologist of Judaism, trying to convert the heathen or at least to destroy their prejudices. He is a Jew in his strict monotheism, his faith in God’s providence, and his high moral standard. As a Jew he is devoted to the Law and the Lawgiver. Most of his writings are given up to the glorification of the Law. Notwithstanding his allegorical interpretation, he firmly believes the biblical stories to be historically true; and he protests against the inference that the Law loses its claim to be observed in the letter once it is understood spiritually. Philo’s position does not differ much in this respect from that of the Palestinian Rabbis. He knows and uses their Halakha as well as their Haggada. One may prove from his writings a close affinity between the Hellenistic and Palestinian parts of Judaism.

On the other hand, Philo is a typical Jew of the Diaspora. He feels as a Greek. To him Greek is his mother tongue; his Bible is the Greek translation of the Pentateuch. We do not know whether he knew Hebrew, or, if so, how much. His Judaism is weakened and enlarged; it has lost its strictness and national narrowness. In the former respect it is notable how little attention Philo pays to the Temple at Jerusalem (he never mentions the temple at Leontopolis in Egypt); he is concerned with the cultus only in so far as it is prescribed in the Law; the true sacrifice is prayer. Still more surprising is his neglect of the national hope. The Messiah is mentioned only occasionally (de Præmiis et Pænis, xvi. 95 [ed. Mangey, ii. 423]; cf. de Exsecr. viii. 164 [ed. Mangey, ii. 435]). His religion has lost its national limitation: it has become a universal reasonable religion.

But Philo’s religion has borrowed new features from Hellenism, as, e.g., the notion of mystery (i.e. a hidden wisdom to be revealed only to the initiated [or, with Philo, the susceptible]), and the mystical ecstatic visions. True, there are examples of this in Palestinian Judaism (e.g., the Merkaba, God’s chariot in Ezekiel; for visions of Paradise cf. 2 Co 12⁴ and Baba Hagiga, xiv. 6), but these are exceptions; with Philo such things are the rule: all religion comes to perfection in the vision of God (Quis rer. div. her. sit, ed. Mangey, i. 508).

In de Vita Contemplativa Philo describes his own ideal; and it is of no consequence whether the ascetic circles there described really existed in Egypt or whether he is drawing an ideal picture. It is unnecessary and incorrect to think that Christian monks are in view, as the Fathers did, who praised Philo as the oldest authority for Christian monasticism; modern critics do the same even when they deny Philo’s authorship of the treatise. From the existence of Essenes in Eastern Palestine known to Philo himself (Quod omnis probus liber and Apologia pro Judæis [ap. Eus. Præp. Evang. viii. 11]) we may infer how many possibilities there were in Judaism at this period.

4. Philosophy.—Philo was no prophet; he is interested not so much in religion as in philosophy. Philo the Jew has a place among the Greek philosophers. To be sure, he is not an original thinker. He belongs to the eclectics, deriving his notions from all the different schools and combining them. Sometimes, indeed, he does not go direct to the primitive sources but to selections.* The way, however, in which he combines Platonic, Pythagorean, Stoic, Aristotelian, and Sceptic elements is very significant—significant also for contemporary philosophy. Some elements Philo probably found already combined by Posidonius of Apamea, the leader of later Stoicism, in whose philosophy the religious element is very prominent. The characteristic feature with Philo is the combination with Jewish religion: as this rests on revelation, a certain character of authority alien to ancient philosophy is impressed upon Philo’s speculations.

From Plato, whom he mentions next to Moses and with nearly equal reverence, Philo borrows the doctrine of the Ideas, combining them, however, with the Stoic doctrine of the Logos and the logoi, and clothing it in the form of the biblical doctrines of Wisdom and of angels (it is still disputed whether in this late Jewish theory, as well as in the Stoic theory, there is a reminiscence of polytheism, ancient gods being turned into divine attributes, or only a poetical mode of personification).† Platonic is the dualistic view of the world: spirit being strictly opposed to matter. With Philo, besides the one transcendental God, who rules over all without mixing in it, there stands a second Divine Being, the Logos, sometimes viewed as God’s plan of the world, but more frequently as a personal creative being: he calls it a second God, God’s firstborn son, or archangel, begotten, produced, created by God. This Logos is the maker of the world (Demiurge) and at the same time its preserver: He forms the cosmos by dividing, and sustains it by keeping it together. He is the mediator between God and man: revealing God to man, and protecting man against God through priestly intercession—a true paraclete. He guards and governs man, being the norm of his ethical behaviour. In this way the Logos is pre-eminent in all departments of philosophy and human life. From the Logos come the individual logoi, or Ideas or Angels. Entering the material world and forming it, they produce the visible cosmos. Matter is not created: it is eternal in the shape of an unformed substance (chaos). Creation means form-giving (cosmos).

From the Pythagoreans comes the symbolism of numbers, which finds ample support in the Pentateuch: God has ordered everything according to measure, number, and weight, as already in Wis 11²⁰. The monas (one) is the divine number, the dyas (two) the number of creature and of sin; the trias (three) is the number of the body; tetras (four) and dekas (ten) mean perfection, possible and real (10=1+2+3+4); five signifies senses, sensuality; there is no end of speculation on seven.

From the Sceptics Philo borrows the criticism of sense perception; their doubts at the same time are helpful for refuting Stoic fatalism, which is incompatible with the Jewish faith in God.

In ethics Philo accepts the doctrine of the four main virtues as proposed by Plato, and the Stoic principle of life according to nature; he discovers both in the Mosaic Law, which represents to him the true reasonable morality. But his religion inclines him towards asceticism: the ideal man is created sexless; sin arises when unity is split into male and female.

Complicated as this system may seem owing to its eclectic character, it appears to its author as a unity. And it is this unity which Philo finds represented in his Bible, i.e. in the Pentateuch, compared with which the books of the prophets, Psalms, and other books are of but secondary importance.

* P. Wendland, Eine doxographische Quelle Philo’s, Berlin, 1897, pp. 1074–78.

† R. Reitzenstein, Zwei religionsgeschichtliche Fragen, Strassburg, 1901.

5. Philo as interpreter.—The most important point to note in Philo is his method of reading the above system into the Law of Moses or the Pentateuch by means of allegorical interpretation. He did not invent this allegorical method: he borrowed it from the earlier Stoics; but he makes the most ingenious use of it. The Rabbis of Palestine were no less skilful in finding their own thoughts in the biblical text by means of their interpretations. But Philo's allegory is of a different type. They try to extract from every word all that is possible; he has a complete philosophical system ready for combination with whatever words he is explaining. With the Rabbis one never knows what fresh and surprising combination will spring from their unlimited imagination. With Philo one can tell beforehand what result he will reach, if only one is familiar enough with his writings. It is, in fact, one and the same system all through; it is his philosophy, his doctrine of the Logos, that he finds everywhere; but the method of combination varies, and thus there is scope for ingenuity. Philo pays attention to every point in the text, even the smallest feature, and by skilful combination he always discovers fresh light. Long before Astruc he remarked the interchange of the two Divine names in the Law—'God' (θεός=Elohim) and 'Lord' (κύριος=Jahweh); he explains them as indicating the two main powers in God—goodness and might, the former creating and saving, the latter judging and punishing. He sees that there are two accounts of creation in Gn 1.2: he understands the first of the ideal man. The use of the plural in Gn 1²⁶ proves that there is a Logos beside God; he is the likeness of God; and it is after this likeness that man is formed. It is the Logos along with the two main powers of God which together appear to Abraham as three angels. The Logos is represented by Melchizedek; the manna and the water from the rock both represent the Logos. The two powers of God are represented by the two cherubim. Paradise, ark, tabernacle are representations of the world. Man himself is microcosmos. It is by his identifications in connexion with the manifold significance of the Logos that Philo's interpretation gains further variety by application to physical cosmology, to anthropological psychology, and to human ethics. This variety is not, however, thereby reduced to a system. By this method the Law is spiritualized, on the presupposition that nothing could be contained in it which would not be in harmony with the supreme thought of God. It would be unfair, according to Philo, to understand the laws regarding food literally, whereas, in the case of other laws, he tries to prove that even the literal meaning witnesses to practical wisdom, while the allegorical interpretation brings out the true philosophy. Philo does not approve of the polygamy of the patriarchs—he would prefer celibacy!—so he declares the wives to represent something spiritual: Hagar general culture (ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία), Sarah true philosophy: the wise man must have intercourse with both. Etymology of names is of course indispensable for this method of interpretation: the beginnings of the Onomastica sacra may be found with Philo, who almost always gives 'seeing God' as the meaning of the name when he speaks of Israel, or 'confession' when he mentions Judah.

It is owing to this method of interpretation that Philo had such an astonishing vogue in later centuries: almost all Christian writers of the early and mediæval Church followed in his footsteps, in particular the interpreters of the Alexandrian School, from the author of the so-called Epistle of Barnabas down to Cyril. There is but one difference: Christianity, while maintaining the underlying allegory, nevertheless insists upon the historicity of the facts; for it rests upon historical revelation. So Origen systematizes the various ways of applied interpretation, by means of the anthropological trichotomy: historical, moral, and mystical interpretation are combined in the Scripture as body, soul, and spirit are combined in man. Historical feeling, a prerogative of the Semitic race as compared with the Greeks, is still more predominant with the Antiochene School of interpretation: here typological interpretation is favoured. The result is another combination: the theory of the four-fold meaning of Holy Scripture. It was through Augustine that this theory entered the Western Church.

6. Philo's significance for the Apostolic Age.—The Fathers esteemed Philo as a witness in favour of early Christian monasticism; besides, they used his doctrine of the Logos and his method of interpretation for their Christological constructions. His influence is undeniable, from the apologists of the 2nd cent. onwards. It is open to question, however, how far his influence extended in earlier Christianity, e.g. on St. Paul and St. John, and in particular on the author of Hebrews. Former generations of critics, e.g. Gfrörer and the Tübingen School, made the mistake of taking Philo as the one exponent of Hellenistic thought. They did not realize that he was neither the only nor the earliest representative of a Jewish philosophy of religion. They did not know, nor could they, that non-Jewish Hellenism had produced something similar, and that it also influenced early Christianity independently. As for St. Paul, it is not Philo but at best his forerunner, the Book of Wisdom, that accounts for certain Hellenistic thoughts; but even this has not been proved (see, against, E. Gräfe, 'Das Verhältniss der paulinischen Schriften zur Sapientia Salomonis,' in Theologische Abhandlungen, C. von Weizsäcker zu seinem 70ten Geburtstage gewidmet, Freiburg i. B., 1892, pp. 251-286; F. Focke, 'Die Entstehung der Weisheit Salomos,' in Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, new ser., v. [1913] 113-126). Apollon, a certain Jew born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, mighty in the Scriptures (Ac 18²⁴), was not necessarily a pupil of Philo; there were other interpreters of the Scriptures at Alexandria besides him, as Philo himself mentions occasionally.* Hebrews after all shows more traces of Palestinian than of Alexandrian interpretation. In recent discussion the Corpus Hermeticum (or the writings collected under the name of Hermes Trismegistos) and Posidonius of Apamea are often referred to where scholars in former times would have referred to Philo. The prologue of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1¹⁻¹⁸), treated for a long time by many scholars almost as a Philonian piece, is often interpreted now without any reference to Philo, by recurring immediately to the popular philosophy of the time. Thus Philo's importance is becoming less and less prominent, even with those scholars who are prepared to find foreign influence active in primitive Christianity. Nevertheless, Philo will always be a good witness to the amalgamation of OT religion with Hellenistic thought. He is not a source of but a parallel to the same mixture in early Christianity; and it is certain that he prepared the soil for its seed.

* In de Abrahamo, xx. 99 (ed. Mangey, ii. 15), he quotes φυσικοί ἄνδρες; in de Josepho, xxvi. 151 (ed. Mangey, ii. 63), προικωτερον ἀκριβοῦντες; in de Circumcisione, ii. 8 (ed. Mangey, ii. 211), θεσπείστοι ἄνδρες οἱ τὰ Μωυσέως οὐ παρρηγως διηρνεύσαν.

LITERATURE.—(1) Editions of Philo's works: T. Mangey, 2 vols., London, 1742; L. Cohn and P. Wendland, Berlin, 1896 (in course of issue, 6 vols.; 2 or 3 more to follow); C. E. Richter, 8 vols., Leipzig, 1823-30; Tauchnitz ed., 8 vols., do., 1851-53; J. R. Harris, Fragments of Philo Judæus, Cambridge, 1886; P. Wendland, Neuentdeckte Fragmente Philos, Berlin, 1891; F. C. Conybeare, Philo about the Contemplative Life, Oxford, 1895; Germ. tr. by L. Cohn and others, 2 vols., Breslau, 1909-10; Eng. tr. by C. D. Yonge, 4 vols., London, 1834-55.

(2) G. L. Grossmann, Quæstiones Philonæ, Leipzig, 1829; A. Gfrörer, *Philo und die alexandrinische Theosophie*², Stuttgart, 1831-35 (= Kritische Geschichte des Urchristentums, i.); C. Siegfried, Philo von Alexandria als Ausleger des Alten Testaments, Jena, 1875; H. Windisch, Die Frömmigkeit Philos und ihre Bedeutung für das Christentum, Leipzig, 1909; J. Réville, Le Logos d'après Philon d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1877, La doctrine du Logos dans le quatrième Évangile et dans les œuvres de Philon, do., 1881; M. Heinze, Die Lehre vom Logos, Leipzig, 1872; A. Aall, Der Logos, do., 1896-99; T. Simon, Der Logos, do., 1902; H. J. Flipse, de Vocis quæ est Λόγος significatio atque usu, Leiden, 1902; L. Cohn, 'Die Lehre vom Logos bei Philo', in Festschrift Cohen (Judæica, Berlin, 1912, pp. 303-331); E. Bréhier, Les idées philosophiques et religieuses de Philon d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1907; M. Freudenthal, Die Erkenntnislehre Philos von Alexandria, Berlin, 1891; L. Massebeu, Le classement des œuvres de Philon, Paris, 1889; L. Cohn, 'Einteilung und Chronologie der Schriften Philos' (Philologus, Suppl. vii.), Leipzig, 1899; H. von Arnim, Quellenstudien zu Philo von Alexandria, Berlin, 1883; B. Ritter, Philo und die Halacha, Leipzig, 1879; P. Krüger, Philo und Josephus als Apologeten des Judentums, do., 1906; P. Heinisch, 'Der Einfluss Philos auf die älteste christliche Exegese', Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen, Münster, 1908; E. Schürer, GVV iii.⁴ [Leipzig, 1909] 633-716; W. Bousset, *Die Religion des Judentums*², Berlin, 1906, pp. 503-524.

E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ.

PHILOLOGUS (Φιλόλογος, a Greek name, common among slaves and freedmen and frequently found in inscriptions of the Imperial household).—Philo-logus is the first of a group of five persons 'and all the saints that are with them' saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹⁵. Philologus is coupled with Julia (q.v.), and they may have been brother and sister or more probably husband and wife. If this be so, Philologus and Julia were perhaps the parents of 'Nereus and his sister and Olympos,' and this family were the nucleus of the Christian community which met under their leadership in their house (cf. the salutation to Prisca and Aquila, a married couple, 'and the church that is in their house' [vv. 3-5]; see, however, J. A. Robinson, Ephesians, 1909, p. 231). The relationship of Philologus to the persons mentioned also by name is, however, purely conjectural, as nothing further is known of any member of this group. Another group of five persons (none of whom are women) 'and the brethren that are with them' are saluted in the preceding verse, and it is reasonable to suppose that in each case the persons named were, by virtue of seniority as Christians, either leaders of a single ἐκκλησία, or heads (jointly if a married couple) of separate churches. The locality to which we shall suppose these churches belonged will depend upon whether we think the destination of these salutations was Rome or Ephesus.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

PHILOSOPHY.—This word (φιλοσοφία = 'the love and pursuit of wisdom') is found only once in the NT (Col 2⁸). But, as Christianity claims the whole realm of human thought and life as its sphere, it could not be indifferent to so important a subject. Nevertheless, the gospel is supremely a proclamation of salvation, and hence its relation to philosophy in apostolic days was incidental and dependent on special circumstances. Moreover, as Hatch points out, the majority of those to whom Christianity was preached were not concerned with philosophy, and the former appealed to a standard which the latter did not recognize (Influence of Greek Ideas, p. 124).

St. Paul's only recorded contact with philosophers occurred in Athens, where he met some Epicureans and Stoics (Ac 17¹⁸). Unfortunately, nothing certain is known of this interview, though many believe that in his subsequent speech he showed friendliness towards the Stoics. In his Epistles several references are found to certain forms of 'wisdom' or philosophy. In 1 Co 1¹⁷⁻²⁵ he asserts the superiority of the gospel to human wisdom, but the gospel wisdom was only for the mature. In the later Epistles to the Col., Tim., and Tit. he attacks false teaching of a philosophical nature. This insisted on some obsolete Jewish practices, inculcated 'a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels' (Col 2¹⁸⁻¹⁹), and was concerned with fables and genealogies, knowledge 'falsely so called,' and asceticism (1 Ti 1⁴ 4¹⁻⁴ 7⁶⁻²⁰ Tit 1¹⁴ 3⁹). Some suppose that we are here confronted with the Gnosticism of the 2nd cent., and that these writings belong to that period; but this is improbable. The ideas and practices condemned are partly Jewish, and the philosophy is in an undeveloped state. Nor does Essenism give us the clue, as it had not as yet extended so far. The errors are probably an amalgam of later Jewish speculations regarding an angelic hierarchy (cf. Book of Enoch) and the Oriental speculations which were at that time very prevalent in Asia Minor. The result was to endanger the purity and simplicity of faith in Christ, hence the Apostle's alarm.

The writer (or writers) of the Gospel of John and 1 John deals with the contention that Jesus Christ did not come 'in the flesh' (1 Jn 4¹⁻³)—a theory which is perhaps to be attributed to Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John.

The Epistles of Jude (vv. 4, 7, 10, 19) and 2 Peter (2², 10, 11, 12) denounce a specially obnoxious type of antinomianism. And from the description of the Nicolaitans in Rev 2⁶⁻¹⁵ it is easy to perceive Docetism again, and probably an early stage of Gnosticism.

From these passages it appears that the writers of this period alluded to philosophy only when it was opposed to their teaching concerning Christ and the purity of the Christian life, and that in such cases it met with their uncompromising condemnation. See, more fully, artt. EPICUREANS, Gnosticism, STOICS, etc.

LITERATURE.—Comm. on Epp., etc., mentioned above, also artt. on same in HDB, EBi, EBr¹¹; artt. on 'Philosophy,' in HDB, Smith's DB; on 'Gnosticism' in HDB, EBr¹¹; on 'Gnosis' in EBi; on 'Wisdom' in DCG; P. Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr., 1903-04; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., 1894-95; A. Harnack, History of Dogma, Eng. tr., 1894-99; E. Hatch, Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church, 1890; F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894; A. C. McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895.

J. W. LIGHTLEY.

PHLEGON (Φλέγων, a Greek name).—Phlegon is the second of a group of five names (all Greek) of persons 'and the brethren with them' saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹⁴, probably as forming a household church at Rome or Ephesus under the leadership of Asyncritus, the first mentioned (cf. the group saluted in v. 15, of which Philologus and Julia were perhaps the joint heads). Possibly all were greeted by the Apostle as leaders of the congregation by virtue of seniority as Christians. See artt. ASYNCRITUS, PATROBAS.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

PHOEBE (Φοίβη, a Greek name).—Phœbe is a woman introduced by St. Paul to his readers in Ro 16¹⁻², presumably as the bearer of the letter. She is not mentioned again in the NT, and nothing further is known of her than may be gathered from this reference. The name is that of the moon-goddess, the sister of Phœbus (Apollo). It is interesting to notice that a Christian woman in the Apostolic Age did not think it necessary to discard the name of a heathen deity. Two men among those saluted in Ro 16 also bore the name of a god (Hermes, v. 14; Nereus, v. 15). The martyrologies and inscriptions testify to a similar indifference at least in the first three centuries.

Phœbe is described (RV) as 'our sister, who is a servant of the church that is at Cenchreæ' (τὴν ἀδελφὴν ἡμῶν, οὗσαν [καὶ] δίδονον τῆς ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἐν Κενχρεαῖς) and as one who 'hath been a succourer of many and of mine own self' (αὐτὴ προστάτις πολλῶν ἐγενήθη καὶ ἐμοῦ αὐτοῦ).

Cenchreæ (q.v.), a small town on the Saronic Gulf, was the eastern port of Corinth, about seven miles from the city. It is natural to suppose that the local church was founded during St. Paul's first visit to Corinth. At the close of his stay of eighteen months he sailed from Cenchreæ on his way to Syria (Ac 18¹⁸) and (unless the latter part of the verse refers to Aquila) before setting out he shaved his head, 'for he had a vow.' It was during his second (recorded) visit to Corinth that he wrote the letter containing Phœbe's introduction. A Jewish plot prevented him from sailing again from Cenchreæ, and he returned to Syria via Macedonia (20³).

We shall suppose that Phœbe herself was sailing eastward from Cenchreæ or westward from Lechæum, the port on the Corinthian Gulf, according to the view we take of the probable destination of Ro 16 (or vv.¹⁻², detached by some scholars from the rest of the chapter). If these verses are an integral part of the Epistle to the Romans, the letter which Phœbe carried was this most important of the apostolic letters and her journey was to Rome. The Imperial post was not available for private correspondence, and such a letter could be sent only by special messenger or by a trusted friend who happened to be travelling. St. Paul bespeaks for Phœbe not only a welcome 'in the Lord' but assistance 'in whatsoever matter she may have need' (ἐν ᾧ ἂν ὑμῶν χρῆσθαι πράγματι). If πράγμα bears here its common forensic sense (1 Co 6¹ [G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 233]), business at the law-courts necessitated for her a visit to Rome (E. H. Gifford, 'Romans,' in Speaker's Commentary, iii. [1881] 231), and the Apostle, hearing of her projected journey, seized the opportunity of writing and dispatching his letter. The impossibility, however, of determining the object of Phœbe's journey from the use of πράγμα may be illustrated by Mt 18¹⁹. The 'matters' in which she would require assistance might well have been connected with the church, and indeed she may have been specially sent to Rome by St. Paul, charged with the duty of 'reinforcing and supplementing the Apostolic message' with which she was entrusted (G. Milligan, Thessalonians, 1908, p. 130). If, on the other hand, Ro 16¹⁻²¹ (or 1-23) was addressed to the Church at Ephesus, Phœbe's destination was that city. According to some scholars who hold this opinion, these verses are only a part of a letter the remainder of which has been lost. Others regard them as forming a complete letter of recommendation (2 Co 3¹), written expressly for the purpose of introducing Phœbe, whatever her errand may have been, to the persons greeted in it (C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i.-[1897] 381), among whom, it may be noted, were a number of Christian women. Such letters were a characteristic feature of the Apostolic Church, as were the frequent journeys which necessitated them and the generous hospitality which they called forth. They were a protection against impostors and false teachers. They formed one of the strongest bonds which held together the separate and scattered Christian communities. The verb used by St. Paul (συνιστάμι δὲ ὑμῖν Φοίβην) is the regular technical term in classical Greek and in the Greek of the papyri for introductions by letter. If we suppose that Phœbe was commissioned by the Apostle to visit the Ephesian Christians, we may perhaps find in the warning which he included in the letter (vv.¹⁷⁻²⁰) the reason for her mission.

That Phœbe was evidently preparing to travel alone suggests that she was a widow (Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, ii. 189 n.). The term προστάτις indicates that she was a woman of means. Προστάτις is the fem. of προστάτης, in its strictly legal sense the wealthy and influential citizen who acted as representative and guardian of the μέτοικοι ('resident aliens') and others who had no civic rights. It corresponds to the Latin patronus. The term is not found again in the NT nor does it occur in the LXX. It was, however, in use to denote the 'patrons' of the pagan religious societies, 'who were frequently ladies of rank and wealth' (T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, 1902, p. 124 n.). It is closely related to the terms προϊστάμενος and προεστώς, applied to leadership in the Church in 1 Th 5¹², Ro 12⁸, 1 Ti 5¹⁷. Descriptive of Phœbe's relation to 'many,' presumably at Cenchreæ (perhaps at Corinth also), προστάτις must mean at the least that, in a special degree made possible by her circumstances, she discharged the duties of 'communicating to the necessities of the saints' and of 'pursuing hospitality,' which belonged to all Christians alike (Ro 12¹³). Gifford (op. cit. p. 231) conjectures that the personal reference ('and of mine own self') may be to an illness in which Phœbe ministered to St. Paul at Cenchreæ, and that his recovery was the occasion of his vow. Certainly we may assume that she received him into her home when he visited or passed through Cenchreæ (cf. Lydia at Philippi, Ac 16^{15, 40}), and that she 'mothered' him as did the mother of Rufus (Ro 16¹³). The house in which the Apostle stayed naturally became a centre for the community, and if it was also used as the meeting-place of the church (cf. Gaius at Corinth, 'my host and of the whole church,' Ro 16²³), the owner must have been looked up to as a kind of 'president,' to whom the term 'patron' might suitably be applied. In some such way as this Phœbe devoted herself and her means to the service of the Church, and earned thereby the title of διάκονος, which no more means 'deaconess' in the later sense than it means 'deacon' when used to describe Apollos, Tychicus, Epaphras, Timothy, or the Apostle himself. The case of Phœbe may not be cited as evidence of the inclusion of women in the technical diaconate. With that of Prisca and others, it witnesses to the very important part played by women in the organization of the Church before informal ministries had given place to definite offices, and when rule and leadership were based only upon willingness to 'serve' (cf. the household of Stephanas at Corinth, 1 Co 16^{15, 16}). Parallel with the term διάκονος is the term ἀδελφή (F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 1897, p. 208, where the καὶ is said to be 'almost certainly genuine'). 'Brother' and 'sister' in the NT simply mean 'fellow-Christian.' St. Paul uses the term here and calls Phœbe 'our' sister, i.e., ours and yours, to remind those to whom he would introduce her that all Christians, whether personally acquainted or not, are already members of the same great spiritual family, of which God is Father and Jesus Christ the Elder Brother, and that they only need to be made known to one another to realize their close relationship in mutual love and helpfulness.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

PHOENICIA (AV 'Phenice,' Φοινίκη).—Phœnicia, the coast-land between Mt. Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea, was about 120 miles in length and rarely more than 12 in breadth. It presented to the eye a succession of hills and valleys, well-watered and fruitful; and it had the best harbours in the whole Syrian coast-line. It became the home of one of the great civilizations of the ancient world, achieving success chiefly owing to the skill of its people in the art of navigation, 'in which the Phœnicians in general have always excelled all nations' (Strabo, XVI. ii. 23). The OT (like Homer) styles them 'Sidonians,' from the name of their principal town (Jg 3³, Dt 3³, etc.). They established colonies and commercial agencies all along the Mediterranean, and exerted a great influence on Western culture. From the time of Alexander the Great onward, the country was one of the stakes in the chronic warfare between the Seleucids and the Ptolemys. In 65 B.C. Pompey made Syria-Phœnicia a Roman province under a proconsul or proprætor. He did not, however, deprive of autonomy the ancient cities of Tyre and Sidon, or the recently founded Tripolis. For centuries the people had been gradually adopting the language, manners, and customs of Greece. 'From the beginning of the imperial period the sole rule of Greek is here an established fact' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., 1909, ii. 122).

No detailed account is given in the NT of the introduction of Christianity into Phœnicia, but hints are not wanting. The dispersion which followed Stephen's death brought travellers thither, 'speaking the word to none save only to Jews' (Ac 11¹⁹). St. Paul and Barnabas at the end of their first missionary tour 'passed through Phœnicia and Samaria, telling the whole story (ἐκδιηγούμενοι) of the conversion of the Gentiles' (15²). At the end of the third journey St. Paul sailed for Phœnicia and spent a week among 'the disciples' of Tyre (21-6; see TYRE and SIDON). It should not be forgotten that many Phœnicians had come to Galilee to hear Christ Himself (Mk 3³), that He returned their visit by going into 'the borders of Tyre and Sidon' (1²⁴), and that He expressed the conviction that the people of this country could have been more easily moved to repentance than those of the most highly favoured cities of His native land (Mt 11²¹).

Phœnicia continued to flourish under the Romans, but ceased to have any political importance, and gradually lost its national identity. The conflict between the old and the new civilizations lasted long, and down to the 2nd cent. A.D. Greek and Phœnician characters sometimes appear together on coins, while Latin was the language of government and law. In the end, however, it was neither of the Western tongues, but Aramaic, that displaced Phœnician, which was still spoken in North Africa till the 4th or 5th century. The fragmentary writings of Philo of Byblos—of the time of Hadrian—contain an interesting attempt to trace the mythology of Greece to that of Phœnicia, which was itself largely Babylonian.

LITERATURE.—F. C. Movers, Die Phönizier, 1841-56; G. Rawlinson, Phœnicia, 1889; G. Maspero, Histoire ancienne des peuples de l'Orient, 1886; E. Meyer, Geschichte des Alterthums, 1884 ff.; W. von Landau, Die Bedeutung der Phönizier im Völkerleben, 1906; K. Baedeker, Palestine und Syria, 1906.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PHOENIX (Φοῖνιξ).—When the lateness of the season made it dangerous for an Alexandrian corn-ship, which had lain weather-bound for 'much time' in Fair Havens, to continue her voyage to Italy, the question of a wintering-place arose (Ac 27¹). Following the advice of the majority (οἱ πλείους), who had the experts—the captain and the ship-master ('owner' [RV] conveys a wrong idea)—on their side, and disregarding that of St. Paul, who thought it would be more prudent to remain where they were, the centurion, who was the senior officer in an Imperial corn-ship, decided to make a run for the haven of Phenix in order to winter there. Taking advantage of a soft south wind, they set sail, but had no sooner rounded Cape Matala, and entered the Gulf of Messara, than they were caught by a hurricane, which drove them far out of their course and ultimately wrecked them on the coast of Malta. The harbour which they thus failed to reach has to be identified from data supplied by ancient geographers and modern navigators.

Strabo says: 'Then there is an isthmus of about 100 stadia [the narrow part of Crete to the west of Mt. Ida], having the settlement of Amphimalia on the northern shore, and Phœnix of the Lampeans on the southern' (X. iv. 3). Ptolemy names a harbour, Phœnikous, and a town, Phœnix, on the S. coast (III. xvii. 3); and Hierocles (Synecdemus, 14) speaks of Phœnix as near Aradena, which still retains its name, while Stephanus Byzantinus makes Aradena synonymous with Anopolis ('Upper City'), a name which is now attached to ruins slightly farther north. As Aradena is a little over a mile, and Anopolis about 2 miles, from the harbour of Loutro, the latter is naturally identified with the haven of Phœnix. It is on the east side of the neck of land which ends in Cape Muros. Captain Spratt maintains that it is 'the only bay to the westward of Fair Havens in which a vessel of any size could find any shelter during the winter months' (J. Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1880, p. 92); and G. Brown, the discoverer of Lasea, also convinced himself that Phœnix 'is the only secure harbour in all winds on the south-coast of Crete' (ib. p. 261). Brown found at Loutro an inscription of the time of Trajan, containing a record of some work done by the crew of a ship which evidently wintered in the haven. The inscription contains the words gubernator and parasemum, corresponding to κυβερνήτης and παράσημον, which are used by St. Luke (Ac 27¹¹ 28²).

But there is a serious objection to the proposed identification. St. Luke describes the harbour of Phœnix as βλέποντα κατὰ λίβα καὶ κατὰ χώρον (Ac 27¹²). This is one of the most discussed phrases in Acts. If it is translated 'looking toward the south-west and north-west' (AV), it is quite inapplicable to Loutro, which opens eastward. It would verbally fit the Bay of Phenika, on the other side of the promontory, facing the west; but navigators deny that this affords any shelter worthy of the name of haven. The RV translates the phrase 'looking north-east and south-east,' i.e. in the direction to which the S.W. and N.W. winds blow—looking down these winds. No satisfactory parallel to such an idiom is found in any ancient writer, and it is difficult to imagine an educated Greek expressing his meaning in that manner; still it is possible that St. Luke is faithfully reproducing the peculiar language of men of the sea. Conybeare and Howson (The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, ii. 400) note that 'sailors speak of everything from their own point of view, and that such a harbour does "look"—from the water towards the land which encloses it—in the direction of "south-west and north-west." It is surmised by W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 326) that as St. Luke never saw the harbour in question, but merely described it from hearsay, he may have received the wrong impression that it looked N.W. and S.W.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PHRYGIA (Φρυγία).—Phrygia, the land of the Phryges, was the western part of the central plateau of Asia Minor. Its boundaries were vague and varying. At one time it extended from the Egean to the Halys, and from the mountains of Bithynia to the Taurus, but it was gradually contracted on every side. To the early Greeks Phrygia was the home of a heroic and conquering race, who have left in the country drained by the upper Sangarius many astonishing monuments of their greatness.

'In Phrygia once were gallant armies known
In ancient time, when Otneus filled the throne,
When godlike Mlgdon led his troops of horse'
(Hom. Il. iii. 1851.)

But to the later Greeks and the Romans Phrygia was politically unimportant, and the once illustrious names of Midas and Manes were given to Phrygian slaves. The Kimmerian inundation in the 7th cent. broke the spirit of the race, who sank into a state of peaceful indolence, disturbed only by fits of wild religious excitement. Their land became an easy prey to every spoiler, and in 278 B.C. the Gauls took possession of N.E. Phrygia, which was henceforth known as Galatia. Attalus I. of Pergamos (241-197 B.C.) seized the territory in which lay the towns of Kotiaion and Dorylaion, and which was thereafter called 'Acquired Phrygia' (Phrygia Epictetus). In the S.E. was Iconium (q.v.), which the natives continued to regard as Phrygian, while Roman writers assigned it to Lycaonia. In the S. was Pisidian Phrygia (Ptol. v. v. 4) or Phrygia towards Pisidia (πρὸς Πισιδίαν [Strabo, xii. pp. 557, 566]), the most important town of which was called Antioch towards Pisidia; but as Pisidia gradually extended northwards this Antioch ceased to be Phrygian and was called Pisidian Antioch (q.v.). Only in the S.W. did the Phrygians show any sign of expansion. Hierapolis was apparently once Lydian, and Laodicea Carian; but in the Roman period all the cities of the Lycus Valley were regarded as Phrygian. 'The Gate of Phrygia' was below the junction of the Lycus and Mæander; Polemon of Laodicea was known as 'the Phrygian'; and 'Phrygian powder' was a Laodicean preparation.

In the Roman provincial system of government Asia Minor was cut and carved with but little regard for old national and historical distinctions. While the eastern part of Phrygia (with Iconium) and the southern (with Pisidia) were attached to the province of Galatia, the western part, which was much the larger, was included in the province of Asia. The former was called Phrygia Galatica and the latter Phrygia Asiana.

Phrygia was traversed by the great route of traffic and intercourse which joined the Ægean with Syria and the Euphrates. Along this line the early Seleucids planted a series of Greek cities for the defence of their Empire and the diffusion of Hellenic culture. Here the Greek language gradually displaced the Phrygian, which was 'perhaps similar in character to the Armenian' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 328), but the latter continued to hold its ground in the rural districts down to the 3rd cent. of our era. A striking feature in the life of these cities was the presence of Jews in large numbers.

Their status is indicated by Josephus (Ant. xii. iii. 1). 'The Jews also obtained honours from the kings of Asia, when they became their auxiliaries; for Seleucus Nicator made them citizens of those cities which he built in Asia . . . and gave them privileges equal to those of the Macedonians and Greeks, who were the inhabitants, inasmuch that these privileges continue to this very day.' Antiochus the Great (223-187 B.C.) 'thought proper to remove 2000 families of Jews, with their effects, out of Mesopotamia and Babylon' to Lydia and Phrygia (xii. iii. 4).

In these Hellenistic cities the Jews relaxed their strictness so much that the orthodox counted them degenerate. There is a bitter saying in the Talmud to the effect that the baths and wines of Phrygia had separated the 'Ten Tribes' from the brethren (A. Neubauer, La Géogr. du Talmud, 1868, p. 315). This very liberalism, however, probably made the reaction of the Jews on their environment all the greater, and St. Paul found in the cities of Phrygia numerous proselytes, whose minds proved the best soil for the seed of the evangel. The case of Timothy of Lystra, the son of a Greek father and a Jewish mother, uncircumcised and yet acquainted from his childhood with the Scriptures, was probably typical.

Phrygia was one of the first parts of Asia Minor to be generally Christianized. Not a few Christian monuments of the 2nd cent., and very many of the 3rd, have been found in the country. Eusebius (HE viii. 11) says that in the time of Diocletian there was a Phrygian city in which every single soul was Christian. The enthusiasm with which the pagan Phrygians were in the habit of throwing themselves into the worship of Cybele re-appeared in the Phrygian type of Christianity, which gave birth to Montanism with its spiritual ecstasies and prophetic visions.

For the difficult phrases τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν (Ac 16⁸) and τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν (18²³) and the rival theories of the North and South Galatians see GALATIA, and GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, § 5.

LITERATURE.—C. Ritter, Die Erdkunde von Asien, 1822-59; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 74 t., St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 194 t., Hist. Com. on Galatians, 1899, The Cities of St. Paul, 1907; G. and A. K. Körte, Gordion, 1904; C. v. Weizsæcker, The Apostolic Age of the Christian Church, Eng. tr., 1894-95, i. 273 t.; A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 235; J. Moffatt, LNT, 1911, p. 93 t. JAMES STRAHAN.

PHYGELUS.—Phygelus is mentioned with Hermogenes in 2 Ti 1¹⁶ as among the disciples in proconsular Asia who had turned away from (i.e. repudiated) the writer, afraid or ashamed to recognize him (being a prisoner), and are thus contrasted with Onesiphorus (q.v.). The pseudo-Dorotheus of Tyre makes both Phygelus and Hermogenes to belong to the seventy disciples, and the former to be a follower of Simon Magus and afterwards bishop of Ephesus, and the latter bishop of Megara. In the Acts of Paul and Thecla, Demas and Hermogenes are named as Paul's fellow-travellers, full of hypocrisy, when he fled from Antioch to Iconium and enjoyed the hospitality of Onesiphorus.

W. F. COBB.

PHYSICIAN.—Our sources of knowledge of Greek medicine and physicians are (1) works of ancient physicians; (2) notices of early writers concerning Greek medicine and physicians, as Plato, Aristotle, Plutarch, Pausanias, and Galen; (3) various medical instruments in the great museums of Athens, Berlin, Paris, and London, such as knives, probes, needles, balsam cups; (4) inscriptions and papyri; (5) altars, temples, and caves; (6) images of gods and votive offerings.

Our earliest account of Greek medicine and physicians is in the Homeric poems. There were two sources of disease—supernatural, referred to the wrath of gods, as plague and melancholia; and natural, as from drugs or wounds. Already physicians were called demurgees and were recognized as public servants. The most famous were Asklepios and his two sons. According to Homer and Hesiod, Asklepios was a Thessalian prince who had learned from Cheiron about drugs. Later, Apollo was assigned as his father, and a snake became the symbol of his healing power. His two sons—'the cunning leeches'—were Machaon, to whom he taught surgery, and Podaleirios, to whom he taught medicine, which he himself preferred. Homer said, 'a physician outweighs many other men' (Il. xi. 514). Drugs were used for poison, charms, soothing pain, and healing wounds. Battles were occasion for many bodily injuries and became an incentive for medical and surgical tact. Anatomical knowledge was slight, and was gained from sacrificial victims and from those wounded in battle.

There was no connexion between priests and medical men; only as priest was Calchas summoned during the plague. Women, as Helen and Agamede, had medical knowledge.

The cult of Asklepios flourished widely in Greece and Asia Minor. In the traditions concerning him, that which associated him with Epidauros finally prevailed. Shrines were dedicated to him; one might even call these asklepieia hospitals, Heilstätte. Of these there were more than 300 at Athens, Cnidos, Cos (the ruins of which have been uncovered within the last few years), Delphi, Pergamos, Rhodes, and Troezen. They were usually situated in salubrious places, on mountain-sides, by pure fountains or streams, by mineral or hot springs. They were cared for with fastidious cleanliness. None could get the benefit of them without preliminary rites—shampooing, baths, friction, fasting, abstinence from food and wine; nor were religious rites of an impressive character, including music, overlooked. Those who were to be treated were shown votive offerings and inscriptions of those who had been healed. To the divinity there was the sacrifice of a goat or ram, a cock or hen, accompanied by fervent prayer for succour. In an attitude of intense expectancy the sufferer slept in the abaton near the statue of Asklepios on a bed, or in the neighbourhood of the temple on a skin of the sacrificial victim, where, as he fell into a deep slumber, the divinity awaited him. Whatever of surgery was applied, as of binding or anointing, was probably performed by temple attendants, whom the patient's dream identified with supernatural power. Theurgy was thus joined to natural means of cure. The death of a patient was attributed to his lack of confidence. In the asklepieia were case-books left by the patients which recorded symptoms, treatment, and result.

Gymnasia existed in Greece before the Asklepiadæ began to practise medicine. These provided three orders of service: the director-gymnasiarch; the subordinate who had charge of pharmacy with reference to the sick; those who gave massage, put up prescriptions, bled, dressed wounds and ulcers, and reduced dislocations. Gymnasts by reason of their experience were often called in to treat injuries, dislocations, or fractures before the arrival of the physician. Naturally the influence of these men increased. They were of special use where baths, dietaries, and physical manipulations were indicated.

In addition to the priests and the gymnasts, there were earlier Asklepiadæ—hereditary physicians whose medical art was handed down from father to son. Later, promising youths from outside were trained for this practice. Physicians were put in charge during epidemics, gave expert testimony in courts, accompanied armies and fleets, and practised at places provided at public expense. Anatomy was learned from oral and written tradition, from sacrifices and domestication of animals, injuries in the gymnasia, from bodies long exposed to the elements or to wild animals, and from dissection of wild animals. Many gatherers and distillers of roots and herbs set themselves up in business. Druggists also with various remedies claimed the curative worth of their prescriptions. There were survivals of folk-medicine. Women practised as midwives, when they were past the age of child-bearing. They treated diseases which it was not proper for men to know or for women to divulge to men. Some of these announced themselves as 'beauty' doctors.

The chief centres of medicine were Cyrene, Crotona, Cnidos, and Cos—the last the home of the dogmatists. Pythagoras (born c. 575 B.C.), founder of a gild at Crotona, appears to have studied the structure of the body and reproduction, but knew very little of surgery, advocated poultices and salves, inculcated dietetic and gymnastic practices, and advised a limited amount of meat but no fish or beans. The Pythagoreans were the first to visit their patients at home; they also went from city to city, and thus gained the name of ambulant physicians. Following Pythagoras, whose order was dissolved by law about 500 B.C., were Alkmaion of Crotona, who from his dissection of animals was reported to be the first Greek anatomist, and Demokles (c. 520 B.C.), the first physician of whom we have a reliable account. He migrated from Crotona to Ægina, where he was made medical officer with a salary of one talent (about £240) a year. Later, at Athens, he received £406; later still, at Samos under Polykrates, £480. Afterwards, taken captive and brought to the court of Dareios, he cured the king of a sprained ankle and treated his gum for mammary abscess.

Particular occasion for the rapid advance in Greek medicine is contact with Egypt and the East, knowledge of drugs, rivalry of centres of culture, and separation of the priestly class from medicine.

An account of the history of physicians in general would be incomplete without at least a cursory reference to the great philosophers of the 5th and 4th centuries B.C. They furnished the philosophy on which physicians often based their theories of disease. Aristotle (384–322 B.C.), descended from a long line of physicians, investigated anatomy, embryology, and physiology, and for the first time held that animal life is spontaneous movement. Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ (c. 555 B.C.) practised dissection of animals and even dissected the brain. Empedokles (490–430 B.C.) followed Pythagoras, and also professed magical powers of healing. He resolved all conditions into warm, cold, moist, and dry; held the doctrine of the four substances, fire, air, water, and earth, to which he assigned a soul—hylozoism. Love and hate rule development and dissolution. At Selinos and Agrigentum he put an end to two pestilences by seeking for and remedying the natural causes. He discovered the labyrinth of the ear.

The name, however, which stands out above all others in the history of Greek medicine is that of Hippokrates. Born at Cos about 460 or 459 B.C., son of Herakleides, his descent was traced on his father's side from Asklepios, on his mother's from Herakles. He was the second of seven of this name. He was a contemporary of Pheidias, Perikles, Sophokles and Euripides, Thukydides, Praxiteles and Zeuxis. Plato assigned him a place alongside of Pheidias and Polykleitos. Aristotle called him 'the Great,' Galen, 'the Divine'; and from that day to this he has been acclaimed 'the Father of Medicine.' Of the writings attributed to him in the Corpus Hippocraticum, it seems impossible to decide which portions are genuine, and which belong to an earlier or later period. They form, however, a tolerably compact body of writings, and for 2,000 years have turned attention away from speculation to observation, and thus have profoundly influenced the medical ideal. So far as his character can be made out from these treatises and from tradition, he was a man of great genius and noble character, with an unsullied regard for his art, his patients, and his pupils. The peculiarities of his system may be summarized. (1) He followed Empedokles in holding to the four elements and the four conditions, but added the four humours—black bile, yellow bile, blood, and phlegm. He recognized no supernatural cause of disease: 'none is more divine or human than another,' and 'none arises without a natural cause.' (2) He held a theory of crises or critical days. Diseases pass through three stages to a climax; the crude humours are 'cooked,' and finally resolved, either being excreted or causing death. Sometimes nature eliminates the disease by sweating or vomiting, sometimes the physician aided by bleeding, or administering purgatives and diuretics. (3) To physis and dynamis, which is really the vis medicatrix naturæ, in distinction from the power of the gods, all recovery is referred. 'Natural powers are the healers of disease.' The task of the physician is to observe the progress of the disease, to interfere, direct, divert. 'Nature suffices for everything under all conditions.' (4) Prognosis is recommended for securing and retaining the esteem of others, for freeing the physician from blame which might arise, and as an aid towards effecting a cure through its appeal to expectancy. By prognosis is meant a complete knowledge of the patient together with the tendency of the disease. 'The best physician is the one who is able to establish a prognosis, penetrating and exposing, first of all at the bedside, the present, past, and future of his patients, and adding what they omit.' An essential aspect of his practice was appeal to suggestion in the patient. One-eighth of the entire Corpus Hippocraticum is occupied with the subject of prognosis. (5) Hippocrates emancipates medicine from all but practical aims. In his hands it was freed from theurgy and speculation, and placed on a secure empirical basis, not that of casual observation, but of taking account of all facts which have bearing on the case. He left forty-two histories of clinical cases, twenty-five of which cases issued fatally—a practice almost wholly neglected for 2,000 years until the 17th century. His treatises on 'Fractures' and 'Dislocations' have been claimed as the ablest works ever written by a physician. A Hippocratic maxim runs, 'Life is short, art is long, opportunity fleeting, experiment fallacious, and judgment difficult.' He laboured under serious limitations. Naturally he had no knowledge of either elementary and physiological chemistry or of bacteriology; he took no account of pulse, temperature, respiration, or analysis of urine. Owing to customary reverence for bodies of the dead, autopsies were unknown, unless indeed a criminal or a traitor may have furnished material, and anatomical knowledge, apart from that concerning bones, had to be derived from dissecting animals, from sacrificial animals, and surgical cases. Two significant designations have survived: 'Hippocratic succession,' and Facies Hippocratica.

The Hippocratic Oath is herewith given:

'I swear by Apollo, the physician, by Asklepios, by Hygieia, by Panakeia, and by all gods and goddesses, that I will fulfil religiously, according to the best of my power and judgment, the solemn vow which I now make. I will honour as my father the master who taught me the art of medicine; his children I will consider as my brothers, and teach them my profession without fee or reward. I will admit to my lectures and discourses my own sons, my master's sons, and those pupils who have taken the medical oath; but no one else. I will prescribe such medicines as may be best suited to the cases of my patients, according to the best of my judgment; and no temptation shall ever induce me to administer poison. I will not give to a woman an instrument to procure abortion. I will religiously maintain the purity of my character and the honour of my art. I will not perform the operation of lithotomy, but leave it to those to whose calling it belongs. Into whatever house I enter, I will enter it with the sole view of relieving the sick, and conduct myself with propriety towards the women of the household. If during my attendance I happen to hear of anything that should not be revealed, I will keep it a profound secret. If I observe this oath, may I have success in this life, and may I obtain general esteem after it; if I break it, may the contrary be my lot.'

The other school of medicine in Greece, the Cnidian—empiric—were adepts in clinical examinations, auscultations of the chest, and gynaecology. They were, however, handicapped by lack of anatomical and physiological knowledge. They employed analogy of men with cosmic, vegetable, and animal existence. The two chief physicians were Euryphon and Ktesias. Euryphon described pleurisy as affection of the lungs, explained the cause of disease as insufficient elimination of waste products, and hemorrhage as from the arteries as well as from the veins, contrary to the general opinion. He was probably influential in compiling the Cnidian Sentences. Ktesias (after 398 B.C.), for seventeen years a prisoner at the Persian court of Artaxerxes Mnemon, showed a general interest in poisons, and wrote a book on hellebore.

In the Alexandrian era under the Ptolemys medicine was transplanted from Cos and Cnidos to Alexandria. As a literary and commercial centre it offered great attractions. Here was one of the largest libraries of the world, with 600,000 MSS, and here philosophers of all sects had established themselves. Commerce brought from all quarters a vast supply of new medicaments. Interest in botany, zoology, and mineralogy flourished. Physical discoveries were made which could be pressed into the service of medicine. At the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. the collection of books attributed to Hippocrates had been brought together and edited by scholars commissioned by the Ptolemys; other medical MSS also invited study. Patients from many quarters were attracted by the treatment offered by Greek, Jewish, and Egyptian practitioners. Fresh inquiry had opened up a deeper interest in diagnosis, pharmacology, and toxicology. Anatomy received an impulse hitherto unknown. Not only animals but cadavers were dissected; vivisection was reported as performed on criminals. The Ptolemys encouraged and even themselves engaged in dissections. Objects exhumed in Pergamos disclose the accuracy of anatomical knowledge. In Alexandria medicine was divided into surgery, dietetics, and rhizotomy or pharmacy.

Two names stand out in this period (c. 300 B.C.). Herophilus of Chalcedon in Bithynia, one of the most distinguished physicians of antiquity, followed closely the methods of Hippocrates. With him anatomical science may be said to have had its beginning; he investigated the brain, the nerves, the eye, the vascular system, the liver; he named the duodenum. He first regarded the nerves as the organs of sensation, and first operated for cataract by extracting the crystalline lens. He made use of the amazing number of new drugs available by commerce. He practised venesection freely. He taught obstetrics and wrote a book for midwives. 'The most perfect physician is he who distinguishes between the possible and the impossible.' Erasistratos of Julis, of the island of Cos, son of a physician, left the court of Selencus Nicator and went to Alexandria, where he wrote on fevers, paralysis, hygiene, and therapeutics. He was an anatomist, and described the brain as seat of the soul and centre of the nerves, distinguished the cerebrum from the cerebellum, and gave the trachea its name; disease was 'plethora'—an overfilling of the vessels of the body with alimentary matter, giving rise to fever. He opposed venesection.

By reason of the special conditions of the time, toxicology exerted a powerful fascination over very many experimenters in Asia Minor. Krateros at the court of Mithridates VI., Eupator, a rhizotomist, Mithridates himself, Nikandros of Colophon, dealing with animal and vegetable poisons, cultivated and experimented with various toxic agents.

Greek physicians and midwives made their appearance in Rome in the 3rd. cent. B.C. Pliny, writing in the 1st. cent., said that for 600 years Rome had been without physicians. The Romans were a sturdy race and had had little occasion for the physicians who flourished elsewhere; in this respect they were behind all other civilized peoples.

Sickness was referred to supernatural agencies. The cult of Asklepios was transferred to Rome in 291 B.C., and the worship was with 'superstitious rites and ceremonies.' Every function of life was presided over by a divinity; therapeutic agencies were magical, through sin-offering, invocations, omens, and the like. There was no scientific medicine. In his Natural History Pliny devotes many pages to a description of the ancient popular medicine, a crude empiricism mingled with fantastic and superstitious formulæ; but even he makes no distinction between scientific and purely traditional domestic methods. Medicine was partly in the hands of priests, and partly consisted of popular practice and rough surgery. Votive offerings of bronze and alabaster disclose the limitations in Etruscan anatomical knowledge. Gymnastic assistants in Greece came to Rome and set up in the practice of their profession. Other Greek arts had come to Rome, but owing to Roman prejudice medicine lagged behind. Archagathos was among the first, although not the first Greek physician, as Pliny states (HN xxix. 6), to come from the Peloponnesos; he arrived in 219 B.C. Extraordinarily successful, and at length emboldened by his fame, he undertook so many serious cases of cutting and burning that he was dubbed 'carnifex' and driven from the city. Later, Asklepiades of Prusa (Bithynia), born about 124 B.C., reconciled the Romans to Greek medicine. An adherent of atomism, he won the favour of the influential Epicureans at Rome. He rejected the Hippocratic axiom that nature is the healer of disease; often nature does not help but even hinders recovery. His principal significance lay in therapeutics; he relied mainly on diet, hygiene, and physical and medical treatment.

In 49 B.C. all Greeks, and therefore Greek physicians, were made freedmen by Julius Cæsar. This action led to two results: it increased the number of Greek physicians in Rome, and it gave them a prestige which they had not before enjoyed. In his Natural History (xxix. 8) Pliny wrote that those who adopt the Greek language in their prescriptions, no matter what their pretensions, nor how serious the peril, are fully believed. For a century and a half after 25 B.C. a galaxy of Greek physicians practised in Rome, all of whom were natives of Asia Minor. Themison of Laodicea (born c. 50 B.C.), founder of the methodic sect, sought for the symptoms of disease with a common sign, in distinction from Asklepiades, who inquired after the cause. He recognized only three forms of disease—rigidity or congestion, relaxation, and a combination of these two with one or other condition preponderating. The treatment was to relax for congestion, to constrict for relaxation. Prophylactic measures were also practised. He was the first to make use of leeches. The strict methodists conceded neither specific disease nor specific remedies, and disallowed such medicines as purgatives, emetics, diuretics, and emmenagogues. The school increased rapidly, since it was so easy to complete the preparation. Thessalos of Tralles in Lydia announced himself as able to train physicians in six months. Among his pupils were smiths, dyers, and cobblers. He dedicated to Nero his writings, in which he treated of diet, chronic disease, and surgery. He taught his pupils at the bedside of his patients. Scribonius Largus (c. A.D. 47) dedicated to Claudius, whom he had accompanied on an expedition to Great Britain, a collection of 271 formulæ for treatment of every portion of the body, from head to foot. These were in part from Greek sources, and in part from secret remedies got by bribery from physicians and quacks at health resorts; some were popular, others magical and fantastic.

He was the first to describe the method of abstracting opium and of applying electricity for severe headache. Dioskurides of Anazarba near Tarsus in Cilicia, perhaps a contemporary of Pliny, simplified pharmacology, relieving it of all superstitious remedies, and wrote the first book on this subject, Περὶ ὕλης ἰατρικῆς, in A.D. 77 or 78. This consisted of five books, and included the three kingdoms. He also wrote on poisons and antidotes, and on poisonous beasts. He was familiar with all the plants of Arabia and Asia Minor, and in a single book he describes these with such exactitude that they have been identified by modern botanists. To him we owe descriptions of ginger, pepper, gentian, aloes, and wormwood, and also metallic agents such as quicksilver, acetate of lead, and copper oxides. A. Cornelius Celsus, not indeed of Greek birth, drew all his inspiration from Greek sources. Probably not a practising physician, not perhaps even medically trained, he wrote in the first half of the century eight books on medicine, including diet and hygiene, general and special pathology, and surgery. Particularly famous are his descriptions of lithotomy, operation for cataract, and obstetrics.

In the middle of the 1st cent. there arose a new school, the Pneumatics, who would explain all diseases by reference to 'vital air'; pneuma takes the place of humours in disease and health. The school was founded by Athenaios of Attaleia in Pamphylia. He paid much attention to air, water, food-stuffs, influence of different climates on health, exercise, baths, mineral waters, dietetics rather than drugs. For the sake of its value in sexual development he advocated physical as well as mental training for youth. Women were to find in their domestic and social activity a means of health. Archigenes of Apamea in Syria completed the study of the pulse, wrote on drugs, especially hellebore. He was skilful as a surgeon and pharmacologist. In therapeutics he made use of amulets for their value in suggestion. He was not above preparing hair-dye for ladies of high rank. He operated for cancer and used the vaginal speculum. Aretaios (at the close of the 1st cent.) was equalled only by Hippokrates in the description of diseases and in the principles of therapy. For the most part he advocated mild remedies, and held that even if the patient were hopelessly and protractedly ill, the duty of the physician toward him was not relaxed. Rufus of Ephesus, who also practised medicine in the reign of Trajan, was educated at Alexandria. He derived his anatomical knowledge from the dissection of monkeys. Soranos of Ephesus, who received his medical and anatomical training in Alexandria, was the most famous obstetrician of antiquity. One learns from him what were the most approved methods of practice in this department of medicine. In him the methodic school culminated.

If Luke was a physician (Col 4¹⁴), as Harnack has adduced strong reasons for maintaining (Lukas der Arzt, Leipzig, 1906, p. 122 ff., Eng. tr., Luke the Physician, London and New York, 1907, Appendix, p. 175 ff.; cf. W. K. Hobart, The Medical Language of St. Paul, Dublin, 1882; T. Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, Erlangen, 1897–1900, ii. 435 ff., Eng. tr., Introduction to the NT, Edinburgh, 1909, iii. 160 ff.), and, further, if Luke was a Greek either of Antioch or of Antiochian descent, he may have had such training as was characteristic of Asia Minor at that time.

LITERATURE.—Hippokrates, Genuine Works, Eng. tr., London, 1849; Edward Meryon, The History of Medicine, do., 1861; H. E. Handerson, Outlines of the History of Medicine and the Medical Profession, New York, 1889; T. Puschmann, History of Medical Education, Eng. tr., London, 1891; A. Harnack, Medizinisches aus der ältesten Kirchengeschichte, Leipzig, 1892; Edward Berdoe, The Origin and Growth of the Healing Art, do., 1893; J. Pagel, Einführung in die Geschichte der Medizin, Berlin, 1893; Max Neuburger and J. Pagel, Handbuch der Geschichte der Medizin, Jena, 1901-05; Roswell Park, An Epitome of the History of Medicine, Philadelphia, 1906; Max Neuburger, Geschichte der Medizin, Stuttgart, 1906; J. S. Milne, Surgical Instruments in Greek and Roman Times, Oxford, 1907; W. M. Ramsay, Luke the Physician, London, 1908; David Allyn Gorton, The History of Medicine, New York, 1910; J. E. Sandys, A Companion to Latin Studies, Cambridge, 1910, p. 715 ff. C. A. BECKWITH.

PILATE, PONTIUS.—The name of the Roman procurator of Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa (A.D. 26-36), whose part in the crucifixion of Jesus is recounted in the Gospels, occurs four times elsewhere in the NT, and always in reflexions upon that event. Its first mention (Ac 3¹³) is in the speech of Peter after the healing of the lame man at the Temple gate. There the emphasis is laid upon the sin of the Jews in denying Jesus and delivering Him up to Pilate, of whom it is said, in exoneration, that he was determined to let Him go. Some extenuation of their guilt, however, is found in the fact that they sinned in ignorance; and, as God has glorified Jesus and made their wickedness to serve the fulfilment of His purpose in Him, the hope of pardon is presented to them. With this reference may be taken that (Ac 13²⁸) in Paul's address at Antioch in Pisidia, which somewhat resembles the earlier speech of Peter. Here, while the same view is taken of the Divine significance of Christ's death and its fulfilment of prophecy, the sin of the Jews is not so strongly insisted upon, and on the other hand a less favourable conception of Pilate's action seems to be implied. Or the Jews it is only asserted that, though they found no cause of death in Jesus, yet they desired Pilate that He should be slain; to Pilate no determination to release Him is ascribed, or even a disinclination to yield to their request. The Jews accused Christ wrongly through not understanding their own Scriptures; Pilate, so far as appears, callously put Him to death at their bidding. His guilt is accentuated in the remaining reference to him in Acts (4⁷). The context is a prayer of the early believers on the release of Peter and John from prison, which proceeds upon a Messianic interpretation of Ps 2 and its application to the death of Christ. Pilate is represented as a ruler of the earth who conspired with King Herod (Lk 23³⁵), the Gentiles, and the people of Israel against the Lord's Anointed. Again his action is conceived as overruled by God for His own purpose; but his guilt is neither extenuated nor left to be inferred. It is explicitly stated and regarded as consisting, not merely in the sacrifice of an innocent person, but in an act of rebellion against God. This view of Pilate's conduct, with regard to Christ, probably prevailed in the inner circles of the gospel, since it found expression so early in the intimacy of their religious fellowship. It would be strengthened by the appearance of Divine retribution in the disgrace that befell Pilate in A.D. 36, when he was recalled to Rome at the instigation of Vitellius, and in later years would help to mould the legends that gathered round his name. The last mention of him in the NT (1 Ti 6¹³) is unimportant, so far as he is concerned. It is an allusion to Christ's virtual confession of His Messiahship in Pilate's presence, when He claimed to be a king. D. FREW.

PILGRIM.—See STRANGER.

PILLAR.—The pillar (στυλος) is the symbol of stability and firmness, that which upholds and sustains. Its figurative use is confined to the NT, in the following passages.

1. Gal 2⁹.—Ἰάκωβος καὶ Κηφᾶς καὶ Ἰωάννης, οἱ δοκοῦντες στύλοι εἶναι, 'James and Cephas and John, they who were reputed to be pillars.' στύλοι, which was used quite commonly as a descriptive title for the great Rabbis, here refers to those already mentioned (Gal 2⁹) 'who were of repute'—the recognized leaders, and (v.⁹) 'those who were reputed to be somewhat'—considerable persons, 'those who are the great authorities with you Galatians now' (Ellicott, in loc.).

2. 1 Ti 3¹⁵.—ἡτις (sc. οἶκος) ἐστὶν ἐκκλησία θεοῦ ζῶντος, στύλος καὶ ἐδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας, 'which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground (stay) of the truth.' ἐδραίωμα is ἀπαξ λεγ. in both classical and NT Greek. 'House of God' in the OT denoted, in the first place, the Temple, and then, by metonymy, the covenant people—familia Dei. Here it stands for the congregation of believers among whom God dwells. Hort (The Christian Ecclesia, p. 172 ff.) renders, 'a household of God, which is an Ecclesia of a living God, a pillar and stay of the truth,' and contends that the absence of the article is not immaterial, and says, in opposition to the rendering in the RV: 'There is no clear evidence that the rare word ἐδραίωμα ever means "ground" = "foundation." It is rather, in accordance with the almost universal Latin rendering firmamentum, a "stay" or "bulwark." St. Paul's idea then is that each living society of Christian men is a pillar and stay of "the truth" as an object of belief and a guide of life for mankind, each such Christian society bearing its part in sustaining and supporting the one truth common to all' (cf. Expt viii. [1896-97] 471). The reference would then be to the local Church of Ephesus. But a large body of interpreters favour the rendering of the AV and the RV—the whole society of believers, the Church universal, is regarded as the ground and stay of the truth (cf. J. Strachan, Westminster NT, 'The Captivity and the Pastoral Epistles,' London, 1910, p. 218). The Church is first pictured as a house, inhabited by a living God, and then, by a quick change of metaphor, is described as στύλος καὶ ἐδραίωμα, holding up the truth, the saving truth of the gospel. Attempts have been made to avoid the mixture of metaphor by referring 'pillar' and 'stay' to Timothy himself. But, though there is no insuperable objection to this, it is not needful. 'There is no intolerable mixture of metaphors in speaking of Christians first as a house and then as a pillar, any more than in speaking of any one as both a pillar and a basis. In 1 Ti 6⁹ we have the covetous falling into a snare and hurtful lusts such as drown men' (A. Plummer, Expositor's Bible, 'The Pastoral Epistles,' London, 1888, p. 131 n.).

3. Rev 3¹².—ὁ νικῶν παύσω αὐτὸν στύλον ἐν τῷ ναῷ τοῦ θεοῦ μου, καὶ ἐξω οὐ μὴ ἐξέλθῃ ἐκ, 'He that overcometh, I will make him a pillar in the temple (sanctuary) of my God, and he shall go out thence no more.' The letter to the Church of Philadelphia 'gives the pledge of safety from the hour of trial, of steadiness like the pillar of a temple, of everlasting guarantee against disaster and eviction, of exaltation above the enemies who now condemn and insult. . . . It was always in dread of the last hour of trial, and was always kept from it. It stood like a pillar, the symbol of stability and strength' (Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, p. 411 f.). The history of Philadelphia does not belie the splendid promise made to its church. It stood like a pillar against the troubles of the times, and a bulwark of civilization. The town is still largely Christian (cf. EBi iii. 3692). 'Philadelphia alone has been saved by prophecy, or courage. . . . Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins: a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same' (E. Gibbon, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vii.² [1902] p. 27).

It has been said that among the few ruins of Philadelphia there are four strong marble pillars standing in one spot, and on the sides of these pillars inscriptions are found. W. M. Ramsay (op. cit.) traces in the promise to this church suggestive references, which, he thinks, a Philadelphian could not fail to discover, e.g. to the disasters and earthquakes common to the district: 'he that overcometh shall never again require to go out and take refuge in the open country. The city which had suffered so much and so long from instability was to be rewarded with the Divine firmness and steadfastness.'

Augustine (quoted by R. C. Trench, *Commentary on the Epistles to the Seven Churches in Asia*², London, 1867, p. 188) says: 'Quis non desideret illam civitatem, unde amicus non exit, quo inimicus non intrat?'

The majority of commentators, followed by the RV, take the name as written upon the victor and not on the pillar (the metaphor being dropped), but De Wette adopts the latter rendering, so that σπύλοι become also σπῆλαι. As to the inscription itself, Ramsay (op. cit.) contends that there are not three names, but one 'which has all three characters, and is at once the name of God, the name of the Church, and the new name of Christ.'

LITERATURE.—F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, London, 1897; W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, do., 1904; P. Brooks, The Candle of the Lord, do., 1881, p. 60 f.; C. J. Ellicott, NT Commentary, 1884, in loc.

W. M. GRANT.

PIPE, FLUTE (αὐλός, from αὐεῖν 'to blow').—The word and its cognate forms appear five times in the NT. Two of these have been noted under art. MINSTRELS, where it is pointed out that αυλητής in Mt 9²³ is translated 'minstrel' and in Rev 18²² 'piper,' though in each case the RV has the more correct 'flute-player.' αυλός and αυλουμενον occur in 1 Co 14: '... whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?' By this musical illustration St. Paul expounds his teaching regarding the apostolic gift of speaking with tongues. αὐλέω occurs in Mt 11¹⁷ and its parallel in Lk 7³²: 'we have piped unto you, and ye have not danced. ...'

The three traditional wind instruments of Hebrew music (which must guide us in a discussion of the instruments of the Apostolic Age) were the flute, horn, and trumpet; and of these the flute was most often used. From very early days the 'peaceful flute' had an important part in the observance of Jewish ritual. As we learn from Is 30²⁹, it was played during the procession to the Temple of the pilgrims who kept the Feast of Tabernacles, and its use at other national festivals can be proved. On the more domestic occasions of rejoicing, such as marriages and dances, the flute-player was also considered necessary for their proper celebration; and Mt 11¹⁷ shows that the musical accompaniment of festivity was continued in NT times. But the flute was also the characteristic instrument in the ritual of mourning. Evidence of this may be found in the literature of most ancient nations. Amongst the Romans the designator and his lictors made the tibicines and other musicians take the forefront of the funeral processions. As Ovid, in Fasti vi. 657 ff., wrote:

Temporibus veterum tibicinis usus avorum
Magnus, et in magno semper honore fuit.
Cantabat fanis, cantabat tibia ludis,
Cantabat maestis tibia funeribus.'

In Jer 48³⁶ there is allusion to funereal flute-playing, and there were minstrels, as we have seen, at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9²³). In the time of Christ even the poorest households provided flute-players at the funerals of their dead.

Perhaps the best instance of this use of the flute is given by J. Wellhausen in his Appendix to Psalms (Haupt's PB, 1898, p. 219), where he cites the Jewish lamentation at the fall of Jotapata as recorded in Josephus, BJ III. ix. 5.

When we attempt to describe these flutes, we must not think of the modern keyed flute introduced by Theodore Boehm, but of something much more primitive. Yet there were in the earliest times several distinct varieties of flute-like instruments which roughly correspond to the flûte à bec and the flute traversière. These were made of reed and wood, though in later times bone and ivory were used; and they varied in length as in the number of their finger-holes. Ancient monuments, Egyptian and Assyrian, have representations of the long flute blown at one end—a type that has developed into the flageolet—and of the kind that had a lateral hole near the end of the instrument. Double flutes are also depicted, i.e. a variety that consisted of two fairly long tubes united at the one mouthpiece, which probably made possible notes of considerable compass.

It cannot be said with certainty which types are represented by the נבל and the אֶפֶס of the Jews. According to tradition, the latter was in the form of a Pan's pipe.

ARCHIBALD MAIN.

PIDISIA (Πισιδία).—Pisidia was a rugged and mountainous country in the south of Asia Minor, bounded on the N. by Phrygia, on the S. by the coast-land of Pamphylia, on the W. by Lycia, and on the E. by Isauria. Its length from W. to E. was about 120 miles, and its breadth 50 miles. It was a land of beautiful lakes—Limnai, Caralis, Ascania, and others—and of torrents growing into rivers—the Cestrus, the Eurymedon, and the Melas—which discharged themselves into the Pamphylian Sea. The semi-savage Pisidians, wholly untouched by the Hellenizing influences which were gradually affecting the other Anatolian races, had their homes in the upper valleys and strong fastnesses of this secluded region. Strabo (XII. vii. 1-3) gives details which enable us to realize their life. 'Among the summits of Taurus is a very fertile tract capable of maintaining many thousand inhabitants. Many spots produce the olive and excellent vines, and afford abundant pasture for animals of all kinds. Above and all around are forests containing trees of various sorts.' The mountaineers were 'governed by hereditary chieftains,' and followed 'a predatory mode of life,' carrying on a continual warfare with the kings to the N. and the S. of their territories.

The task of subjugating them was at first entrusted by the Romans to Amyntas, a brave and capable Galatian officer whom Mark Antony made king of Galatia in 36 B.C. His work was advancing towards success, when he lost his life in an expedition against the Homonades, to the W. of Lycaonia (25 B.C.). The Romans themselves were then obliged to complete the task of reducing the refractory highlanders. About 6 B.C. Augustus established a series of garrison towns on the flanks of Pisidia and Isauria. Supplying Antioch with veterans and re-organizing it in Roman fashion, he built one military road to connect it with the colonia which he planted in Olbasa, Comama, and Crenna for the control of the western region, and another to join it with Parlais and Lystra, which were intended to hold the eastern tribes in check.

'The newly-founded towns remained indeed unimportant, but still notably restricted the field of the free inhabitants of the mountains, and general peace must at length have made its triumphal entrance also here' (T. Mommsen, *The Provinces of the Roman Empire*², Eng. tr., 1909, i. 337).

In St. Paul's time Pisidia formed part of the province of Galatia. In his first missionary journey he traversed this wildly picturesque region (Ac 13⁴), then comparatively settled, but still by no means free from 'perils of robbers' (sec 2 Co 11²⁶). His route through it can only be conjectured. Conybeare and Howson (The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, i. 204) think that he chose the steep pass leading from Attalia to Lake Ascania (Bulaur Göl). W. M. Ramsay (The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 19) holds that 'the natural, easy, and direct course is along one of the eastern tributaries of the Cestrus to Adada.' On the return journey St. Paul and Barnabas 'passed through Pisidia' (διελθόντες τὴν Πισιδίαν, Ac 14²⁴), a phrase which, according to Ramsay, implies that some missionary work was attempted on the way. But it must have been difficult to get into touch with mountain tribes who did not know the Greek language, and apparently no church was founded in this part of Roman Galatia till a much later date. Yet a trace of the journey seems to be found in the name of Kara Baulo—the modern equivalent of 'Paul'—which is borne by the ruins of Adada. It is impossible to decide whether the name is based upon a genuine tradition or is merely a conjecture hazarded after the town was Christianized, but the latter supposition is perhaps the more likely. In a forest about 1 mile S. of Adada stand the ruins of a church of early date. The modern town, 5 miles S. of the ancient site, is also called Bavlo.

In A.D. 74 Vespasian transferred a great part of Pisidia to the new double province of Lycia-Pamphylia. The name Pisidia was gradually extended northward till it included most of Southern Phrygia. Thus Antioch, which in St. Paul's time was not strictly 'Pisidian' (though St. Luke so describes it in Ac 13⁴) but only 'Antioch towards Pisidia' (Ἀντιόχεια, ἡ πρὸς Πισιδίαν [Strabo, XII. viii. 14]), was at a later time correctly designated 'Antioch of Pisidia' (τῆς Πισιδίας; so the TR of Ac 13⁴, following the Codex Bezae, which reflects the usage of the 2nd century).

The mountainous parts of the country are to-day inhabited by Karamanians who are as wild and rapacious as the Pisidians of two thousand years ago.

LITERATURE.—C. Lanckoronski, Les Villes de la Pamphylie et de la Pisidie, 1890; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1897, p. 18 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PIT.—See ABYSS.

PITY, COMPASSION.—The noun 'pity' occurs only once in the AV of the NT (Mt 18³³, RV 'mercy'), and once in RV (Ja 5¹¹). The adjective 'pitiful' occurs in AV (Ja 5¹¹ and 1 P 3⁸, RV 'tender-hearted'). The Greek equivalents for these words are ἐλεεῖν (éleav), εὐσπλαγχνος, πολυσπλαγχνος. The word 'compassion' is of much more frequent occurrence, being represented in the following 21 passages of the two versions: Mt 9³⁶ 14¹⁴ 15³ 18²⁷ 20³⁴, Mk 14¹ 5¹⁹ (RV 'mercy') 6³⁴ 8² 9²², Lk 7¹³ 10³³ 15²⁰, Ro 9¹⁵, Ph 2¹ (AV 'mercies'), Col 3¹² (AV 'mercies'), He 5² (RV 'bear gently') 10²³ (AV 'mercy') 10³⁴, 1 Jn 3¹⁷ (AV 'bowels'), Jude 22 (RV 'mercy'). The adjective form 'compassionate' occurs in 1 P 3⁸ (AV 'having compassion'). The Greek words corresponding to these are σπλάγχνα, σπλαγχνίζεσθαι, οἰκτεῖν, οἰκτιρῆναι, ἐλεεῖν (éleav), συμπαθῆς, μετριοπαθεῖν. It should be noted that the noun σπλάγχνα is found in the original with different translations in the following cases: Lk 1⁷⁸ ('tender mercy'), 2 Co 6¹² (AV 'bowels,' RV 'affections'), Ph 1⁸ (AV 'bowels,' RV 'tender mercies'), Philem 7. 12. 20 (AV 'bowels,' RV 'heart'). The noun οἰκτιρῆς occurs in Ro 12¹ ('mercies'), 2 Co 1⁸ ('mercies'), the adjective οἰκτιρῶν in Ja 5¹¹ (RV 'merciful,' AV 'of tender mercy'). ἐλεεῖν and ἐλεος occur numerous times with the standing translation 'to have mercy,' 'mercy.' συμπαθεῖν occurs in He 4¹⁵ ('to be touched with the feeling of').

Of these several Greek words μετριοπαθεῖν may be left out of account, since in the one passage where it occurs (He 5²) it has nothing to do with compassion. It signifies literally 'to have a medium-emotion.' While this may be in contrast to utter lack of sympathy, the context in our passage compels us to understand it in contrast to excess of indignation against sin. Hence RV has the correct rendering 'who can bear gently,' whereas AV, 'who can have compassion,' translates the word as if it were equivalent to συμπαθεῖν.

The other words are distinguished in their meaning as follows: σπλαγχνίζεσθαι is from σπλάγχνα—the viscera nobilia of the chest (heart, lungs, liver, spleen). This word denoted in classical Greek the seat of all violent passions, and the passions themselves, but the Hebrew צָרַף for which the LXX σπλάγχνα is the equivalent, stands only sensu bono for the seat of the tender affections and then for the affections themselves. Both in classical and in biblical Greek, therefore, σπλάγχνα covers more than 'compassion.' Tittmann (de Synonymis in Novo Testamento, p. 68) is quite correct in claiming this wider sense for Lk 1⁷⁸ and Col 3¹², where σπλάγχνα is the generic concept, which is more specifically determined by the genitives ἐλέους and οἰκτιρῶν. We may add Ph 2¹, where σπλάγχνα and οἰκτιρῆς are co-ordinated ('bowels and mercies'). σπλάγχνα is also used in a general sense in 2 Co 6¹² 7¹⁵, Philem 7. 12. 20. The verb σπλαγχνίζεσθαι seems to be a coinage of the later Greek. It does not even occur in the LXX except in the active form σπλαγχνίζω in 2 Mac 6⁸='to eat the inwards.' Its specific sense in the NT is that of a strong inward movement of sympathetic feeling aroused by the sight of misery. The notion of intentness upon affording relief remains in the background, much more so than in ἐλεεῖν. From this strong emotional colouring of the word is to be explained the fact that in the Gospels it does not occur in the appeals addressed by suffering persons or their friends to Jesus, except in Mk 9², where the critical nature of the case necessitates an appeal to the profoundest compassion of Jesus. In ordinary cases the appeal naturally employs the word in which the impulse to help is most clearly connoted, and this is ἐλεεῖν. To express the strength and inward character of the feeling the English versions often render 'to be moved with compassion,' but neither AV nor RV consistently (cf. the two versions in Mt 20³⁴ and Mk 6³⁴). The verb is predicated both of God (Jesus) and of man. Its object is not merely physical but also spiritual distress (cf. Mk 6³⁴, Mt 9³⁶ with 14¹⁴). Ἐλεεῖν and ἐλεος are distinguished from σπλαγχνίζεσθαι by the implication of the intent to help. The same difference exists between ἐλεεῖν and οἰκτεῖν, the latter being the word that in classical Greek comes closest to σπλαγχνίζεσθαι. So far as the element of feeling is concerned, both σπλαγχνίζεσθαι and οἰκτεῖν are stronger words than ἐλεεῖν. οἰκτεῖν is connected with οἶ and οἶκτος and denotes such sympathetic feeling as seeks expression in tears and lamentation. On the other hand, ἐλεεῖν, being connected with ἔλεος, ἰλάσκεσθαι, is the stronger word, so far as the impulse and readiness to afford relief require expression. A criminal begs ἐλεος of his judge, whereas hopeless suffering can be the object of οἰκτιρῆς (cf. Grimm-Thayer's, 1890, p. 203). This is, however, a valid distinction between ἐλεειν and οἰκτερεῖν for classical Greek only. In biblical Greek it scarcely holds true that οἰκτερεῖν carries no implication of the intent to help. In the LXX it is not seldom equivalent to ἐλεειν in this respect (cf. Ps 102^{13, 14}). For the NT οἰκτερεῖν is almost a negligible quantity, the verb occurring only in Ro 9¹⁵ (= Ex 33¹⁹). It is there predicated of God; the adjective occurs of men in Lk 6³⁶, of God in Ja 5¹¹.

That ἐλεος, notwithstanding its strong practical connotation, has none the less a rich ideal content appears from its frequent equivalence to ἀγαπή, 'lovingkindness.' It is not bare pity aroused by the sight of misery, but has a background of antecedent love and affection. In this respect it also differs from οἰκτερεῖν, which in the LXX stands usually for ἐλεειν. This feature is of importance soteriologically. Trench (Synonyms of the NT, pp. 166-171) represents the ἐλεος as preceding the χάρις in the movement of the Divine mind towards the sinner, whereas in the order of manifestation the χάρις would come first. This overlooks the association of ἐλεος with ἀγαπή. The word was not colourless but had acquired from ἀγαπή the sense of pity inspired by affection. Inasmuch as the same element of affection is present in χάρις likewise, the latter also can be said to underlie the ἐλεος (cf. Eph 2⁴: God is rich in ἐλεος διὰ τὴν πολλὴν ἀγαπήν). The order in the epistolary salutations (χάρις καὶ ἐλεος) is therefore not merely the order of manifestation, but also a reflex of the order in the Divine mind (1 Ti 1-2, 2 Ti 1-2, 2 Jn 3). As in the case of σπλαγχνίζεσθαι so with ἐλεειν, the exciting cause can be spiritual distress as well as physical. Heine (Synonymik des neutest. Griechisch, p. 82) observes that ἐλεος cannot have reference to sin. It would be more accurate to say that ἐλεος has no reference to sin as such, but can have reference to sin in its aspect of misery, as is proved by Mt 5⁷ (ἐλεηθῆσονται, eschatologically) 18³³ (with parabolic allusion to God's forgiveness), Ro 9^{15, 16, 18} 11^{30, 31, 32}, 2 Co 4¹, 1 Ti 1^{13, 16}, 1 P 2¹⁰. Particularly in the Epistle to the Hebrews the 'sympathy' of Christ has primary reference not to the suffering of believers in itself, but to the suffering in its moral aspect as exposing to temptation, whence also its first effect is the shielding from sin or the propitiation of sin: 2^{17, 18} ('a merciful . . . high priest to propitiate the sins of the people') 4^{15, 16} ('that we may obtain mercy and grace') 5^{8, 9} (sympathetic appreciation of the nature of obedience on Christ's part for the benefit of those who have to obey). Wherever ἐλεος is applied to spiritual salvation the aspect of sin as misery inevitably enters into the conception, and with this the further idea of the unworthiness of the recipient and the gracious character of the Divine mercy. It is perhaps different, as regards the latter element, in the miracles of the Gospels. Here the question may be raised, whether the regular translation by 'mercy' does not unduly suggest the moral unworthiness of those who were helped, and whether 'pity' would not more faithfully reproduce the associations of the original.

LITERATURE.—Cremers-Kögel, *Bibl.-theol. Wörterbuch der neutest. Gräzität*¹⁰, 1912 ff., pp. 420-423; J. A. H. Tittmann, De Synonymis in Novo Testamento, 1823-32, i. 63-72; R. C. Trench, *NT Synonyms*⁸, 1880, pp. 166-171, 393; J. H. H. Schmidt, Handbuch der lat. und griech. Synonymik, 1889, pp. 750-755; G. Heine, Synonymik des neutest. Griechisch, 1898, p. 82; B. B. Warfield, 'The Emotional Life of our Lord,' in Princeton Biblical and Theological Studies, 1912, pp. 40-45.

GEERHARDUS VOS.

PLACE (HIS OWN).—The expression occurs in the ordination prayer for Matthias (Ac 1²⁵) where St. Peter states that Judas, into whose place he was being appointed, 'fell away' (παρεβη, Vulg. prævaricatus est) from the ministry and apostleship, to 'go to his own place.' The phrase seems to remind us of the frequent OT phrase 'to go (or return) unto his place,' though no doubt with a special significance of its own here, to which the case of Balaam (ὁς μισθὸν ἀδικίας ἠγάπησεν, 2 P 2¹⁶) supplies the nearest but still inexact parallel (Nu 24²³); cf. also Job 2¹¹, where the three friends came each 'from his own place.' In both passages Rabbinic interpreters appear to have taken this to mean hell, though, of course, without any justification according to our modern methods (see J. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr., ed. Oxford, 1859, iv. 19). In the present passage, nevertheless, the proper place of the apostate is evidently conceived to be that spoken of by our Lord Himself (Mt 25⁴¹; cf. Lk 12⁹). A. Plummer has pointed out (HDB ii. 798) that some of the early Fathers, notably Origen (Com. in Matt. 35) with his characteristic ingenuity and large-heartedness, have suggested that Judas's motive for hurrying away from this world to the other was not remorse but contrition; having failed to obtain Christ's pardon here, he hastened to meet Him and obtain it in the place of the departed. At all events, if, as St. Matthew seems to indicate, the act of suicide took place before the Crucifixion, it is a striking thought to dwell upon, that the souls of the Saviour and His betrayer did meet for a brief space and perhaps held commune ἐν φυλακῇ (1 P 3¹⁹); and if so, with what merciful consequences to the latter, who shall say?

C. L. FELTOE.

PLAGUE.—The word πληγή, 'stroke,' occurs in the NT only in the Apocalypse (8³ 9¹⁸, 20 11⁶ 13³, 12 14 15^{1, 6, 8} 16^{9, 21} 18^{4, 8} 21⁹ 22¹⁸). It was used by the LXX for the 'plagues' of Egypt and the later visitations of God upon His people and their enemies, which made a profound impression upon the Hebrews (cf. Lv 26-28, Nu 25^{8, 9}, 2 S 24²¹). In the Apocalypse the plagues are unforeseen, sudden occurrences, greater and more terrible than those in Egypt, which will disclose God's purpose and providence concerning His own. However violent the opposition, or bitter the persecution, or extreme the danger to which God's people are exposed, they have nothing to fear. The Seer beholds successive Divine judgments fall upon the earth, the sea, the rivers, the sun, moon, and stars. Instruments of Divine punishment are insects, beasts, angels, hail-stones, death, mourning, want, and fire. In a word, all the forces and agencies of the world which are naturally friendly to man are turned into hostile and destructive action against those who dishonour God and would destroy His Kingdom. Even the people of God are secure against the same fate only by faith and obedience.

C. A. BECKWITH.

PLAITING.—See HAIR.

PLEROMA See FULNESS.

PLOT.—See CONSPIRACY.

POETS.—See QUOTATIONS.

POISON.—The poison referred to in Ro 3¹⁵, Ja 3⁶ is animal, not vegetable. From the first the Hebrews had been but little interested in the medicinal, military, or malicious use of poisons. Their experience of venomous reptiles had furnished them with a vivid symbol of sin (cf. Nu 21⁶⁻⁹, Dt 8¹⁵, Jn 3¹⁴, Ps 58⁴ 140³). The NT singles out for mention the part of the body which corresponds to the serpent's weapon of attack, the mouth, i.e. the lips and tongue. Here the poison is concentrated and active. Attention is directed to the stored-up venom which awaits its chance to inject itself into its victim, the insidiousness and sting of the attack, the fierce and uncontrollable pain, the violence and deadliness which mark its effects. C. A. BECKWITH.

POLITARCH.—See MAGISTRATE.

POLLUTION (ἀλσγνμα, only found as noun in Ac 15²⁰; as verb in Dn 1⁸, Mal 1⁷⁻¹², Sir 40²⁹ [LXX]).—ἀλσγνμα is probably from a root meaning 'smear with fat or blood' (cf. αλινεω, Lat. linere), and is therefore a natural word for Jews to use of idol offerings (Lv 3¹⁷). It is a real 'Jewish Greek' word, very rare, and is a translation of גָּאֵל (gā'al, root-meaning 'loathe,' afterwards 'pollute'). Possibly it is also a partial transliteration of גָּאֵל, combining this and the Greek root αλσ-. It would then be a similar formation to Eng.-Fr. 'crayfish,' 'Rotten Row' (for instances of this principle see F. J. A. Hort, 1 Peter I. 1-II. 17, 1898, p. 77, LXX translation of Jer 9⁵, A. Edersheim, LT i. 448, n. 3; cf. also ἀγαπή as a sound- as well as sense-translation of אָהַב). This would make St. James use a peculiarly biting word, 'a loathed smearing.' Its use in the LXX suggests also that it referred to the ordinary food of Gentiles (Dn 1⁸, Sir 40²⁹) as well as to idol offerings. The Council did not adopt it, and changed it to the more colourless εἰδωλόθυτον, 'idol offering,' wishing perhaps to avoid a racial word which might suggest a separation in the matter of ordinary food between Jew and Gentile, such as afterwards actually happened (Gal 2⁹) under the influence of those who 'came from James.'

LITERATURE.—R. J. Knowling, in EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 324; Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1889, ch. vii. esp. pp. 162, 172. SHERWIN SMITH.

POLLUX.—See DIOSCURI.

POLYCARP.—1. Life.—In a polemic treatise entitled Περὶ μοναρχίας and addressed to a Roman priest named Florinus, Irenæus (c. A.D. 190) speaks of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna (the part relating to Polycarp is given in Eus. HE v. xx. 4-8). Irenæus remonstrates against the doctrines professed by Florinus, which Florinus cannot boast of having received 'from the presbyters who were before us and who lived with the apostles.' Irenæus states that he knew Florinus formerly ἐν τῇ κάτω Ἀσίᾳ παρὰ Πολυκάρπῳ ('in Lower Asia in company with Polycarp'). Irenæus was quite young (παῖς ἐτι ὢν) when Florinus, while still a layman but older than Irenæus, endeavoured to ingratiate himself with Polycarp. Irenæus remembers Polycarp very clearly; he can describe the very place in which the blessed Polycarp used to sit when he discoursed, how he came in and went out, his personal appearance, the speeches that he addressed to the Christian community, how he would describe his intercourse with John and with the rest who had seen the Lord (τὴν μετὰ Ἰωάννου συναναστροφὴν . . . καὶ μετὰ τῶν ὁρακόντων τὸν κύριον), how he recalled their words and the things that he had heard them relate concerning the Lord, His miracles, and His teaching, how Polycarp had received all that from eye-witnesses of the Word of life. Irenæus affirms that he has neither lost nor given up any of the teaching of Polycarp, and that, if Polycarp were still alive and heard the things that Florinus teaches, he would stop his ears, as he did before, and say, as he often said: 'O good God, for what times hast thou kept me that I should bear all this?' Irenæus adds as confirmation that 'the letters which Polycarp sent to the neighbouring churches to strengthen them, and to certain brothers to warn them and arouse them, show it clearly.' Again, Irenæus (Haer. iii. iii. 4, reproduced by Eusebius, HE iv.

xiv. 3-8) knows that Polycarp, who was taught by the apostles and who lived with several persons who were eye-witnesses of the Lord, received his appointment in Asia from the apostles as bishop in the Church of Smyrna (ὡπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων κατασταθεὶς εἰς τὴν Ἀσίαν ἐν τῇ ἐν Σμύρνῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐπίσκοπος). It is hardly possible to take these words literally: Polycarp could not have been old enough to be made bishop by the apostles (in the plural); the apostle John at the most could have taken part. Nor was Polycarp made bishop for Asia, since Asia had other bishops in other cities besides Smyrna. These words of Irenæus therefore are not without verbal emphasis. The fact remains that Irenæus is the principal historical witness of Polycarp. He knew him at a time when he himself was a youth. As the birth of Irenæus cannot have been before 130, and must, to all appearances, be placed c. 140, it would therefore be about the year 150 that Irenæus as a child could have known Polycarp as an old man at Smyrna. If, as we shall see, Polycarp was eighty-six years old when he died in 155, his birth must be dated A.D. 69.

We may compare this information of Irenæus with that of Papias (Eus. HE iii. xxxix. 4) on the apostles and the presbyters whose evidence he has collected. Papias knew Polycarp; so, at least, Irenæus assures us (Haer. v. xxxiii. 4, quoted in Eus. HE iii. xxxix. 1): 'Papias,' he says, 'was a hearer of John and a companion (εταῖρος) of Polycarp.' When Irenæus quotes as evidence of the Catholic doctrine words of the presbyters who were disciples of the apostles, and especially of the apostle John, it may be taken for granted that he sometimes quotes the words of Polycarp (see the 'Presbyterorum reliquiæ ab Irenæo servatæ,' collected in F. X. Funk, *Patres apostolicæ*², Tübingen, 1901, i. 378-389). What is possible for Irenæus is equally possible for Papias, who among the presbyters that he mentions as hearers of John could name Polycarp (see the 'Papiæ fragmenta,' Funk, op. cit. pp. 346-379). But critics should give up identifying what may properly be from Polycarp in the various quotations (A. Harnack, Chronologie der altchr. Litt., Leipzig, 1897, i. 333-340).

In a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, Irenæus mentions the fact of the journey to Rome of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, in the time of Anicetus, i.e. at the very end of Polycarp's life and just at the beginning of the episcopate of Anicetus, as Polycarp must have died at the beginning of 155, and the promotion of Anicetus to the See of Rome must have been about 154-155 (see below). At that time the controversy about the date of Easter was in progress: Polycarp, who could only be a quartodeciman, came to confer with the Roman Church. The text of Irenæus, cited by Eusebius (HE v. xxiv. 16 f.), states that the blessed Polycarp himself also paid a visit to Rome in the time of Anicetus (ἐπὶ Ἀνικητοῦ). (On the use of the names of the Roman bishops as chronological marks in the time of Irenæus and Tertullian see L. Duchesne, Le Liber Pontificalis, i. [Paris, 1884] 2.) Anicetus and Polycarp had several other disagreements between them of very little importance, continues Irenæus; they immediately made peace with one another; but on the subject of the date of Easter they did not fall out. As a matter of fact, Anicetus could not persuade Polycarp not to observe what he had always observed in conformity with the apostle John and the other apostles with whom he had lived (μετὰ Ἰωάννου . . . καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν ἀποστόλων οἱ συνδιέτριψεν). Polycarp, on his side, did not convert Anicetus to an observance contrary to that of the presbyters who (at Rome) had preceded him (τῶν πρὸ αὐτοῦ πρεσβυτέρων). Matters remained thus. They communicated with each other, and in the Church (at Rome) Anicetus conceded to Polycarp as a mark of respect the honour of presiding at the Eucharist. They parted from each other in peace.

Irenæus (Haer. iii. iii. 4) says that Polycarp when in Rome attracted to the Church of God a number of heretics belonging to the sects of Valentinus and Marcion. He taught them, says Irenæus, that there was only one truth left by the apostles and transmitted by the Church. These words of Irenæus are quoted by Eusebius (HE iv. xiv. 5). Irenæus reports in the same passage that one day, when Polycarp met Marcion, the latter said to the bishop, 'Recognize us,' and the bishop answered, 'Ay, ay, I recognize the first-born of Satan' (ib. 7). Irenæus does not say that this meeting of Marcion and Polycarp took place at Rome. As Marcion flourished about 140-150, it is possible that Polycarp had quarrelled with him long before coming to Rome to visit Anicetus. As regards the reply given by Polycarp to Marcion, it is quite in the manner of Polycarp (cf. the following words in his letter to the Philippians [vii. 1]: 'Whosoever shall not confess the testimony of the Cross is of the devil; and whosoever shall pervert the oracles of the Lord to his own lusts and say that there is neither resurrection nor judgment, that man is the first-born of Satan').

The death of Polycarp is exceedingly well known through the letter written by the Church of Smyrna to the Church of Philomelium and 'to all the Churches of the holy and catholic Church in all places' (see Harnack, Ueberlieferung der altchr. Litt., Leipzig, 1893, pp. 74-75). Parts of the Martyrium Polycarpi are quoted at some length by Eusebius (HE iv. 15). At the end of the 4th cent. a hagiographer, who writes under the name of Pionius, a martyr at Smyrna at the time of the Decian persecution, composed a Vita Polycarpi, devoid of any historical value, in which he inserted the complete text of the Martyrium Polycarpi. This Greek Vita, mentioned as early as 1633 by Halloix, published in Latin by the Bollandists in 1734, was edited in Greek by L. Duchesne in 1881: the Greek text will be found in Funk, ii. 291-336, and in Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii.² vol. iii. pp. 433-465). The text of the Martyrium Polycarpi, complete and not connected with the Vita, is given besides in several Greek MSS, which have been utilized for critical editions of the Martyrium, that of Zahn in the Patrum apostolicorum opera, ii. (Leipzig, 1876) 132-168, that of Lightfoot, op. cit. ii. 947-986, that of Funk, op. cit. i. 314-345. It is reproduced in O. von Gebhardt, Acta martyrum selecta, Leipzig, 1902, pp. 1-12. This beautiful fragment forms the oldest known example of acts of martyrdom. As early as 177 the letter of the Christians of Lyons relating the martyrdom of Lyons and Vienne depends for several editorial details on the Martyrium Polycarpi. The authenticity of the Martyrium is no longer contested (Harnack, Chronologie, i. 341).

Among the minute details which the Martyrium Polycarpi gives on the arrest, the trial, and the execution of the bishop of Smyrna, there appears a valuable date: 'The martyrdom of the blessed Polycarp,' we read in 21, 'took place on the second day of the first part of the month Xanthicus, on the seventh day before the Kalends of March, on a great Sabbath, at the eighth hour. He was apprehended by Herodes, when Philip of Tralles was high-priest, in the proconsulship of Statius Quadratus, but in the reign of the Eternal King Jesus Christ.' The martyrdom took place, therefore, on a Saturday which fell on 23rd February. The proconsul Statius Quadratus is identified with the person of the same name who was consul in 142 and who, according to inscriptions, was proconsul of Asia between 151 and 157: the year 155 is the only one in which the 23rd of February falls on a Saturday (Harnack, Chronologie, i. 334-356, completed by Stählin, Christl. griech. Litteratur, Munich, 1914, p. 977).

The proconsul, interrogating Polycarp, said to him (ix. 3): 'Swear the oath, and I will release thee; revile the Christ'; to which Polycarp replied: 'Fourscore and six years have I been His servant (ὀδοῦντα καὶ ἐξ ἑτη δουλεύω αὐτῷ), and He hath done me no wrong. How then can I blaspheme my King who saved me?' We conclude from these words that Polycarp was eighty-six years old at the time of his martyrdom, not that he had been a Christian for eighty-six years (Harnack, Chronologie, i. 323, 342 ff.).

Other Christians suffered martyrdom at Smyrna at the same time as Polycarp; cf. the data supplied by Wright's Martyrologe: 'Und am xxiii. (Feb.) in Asia von den früheren Martyrern, Polycarpus der Bischof, und Azotos und Koskonios und Melanippos und Zenon' (H. Lietzmann, Die drei ältesten Martyrologien, Bonn, 1903, p. 10). The Martyrium Polycarpi (1-4) mentions the tortures that were inflicted on them, and gives the name of one of them, Germanicus, whose heroism went the length of attracting the wild beast to him and inciting it to devour him, whereupon the pagan multitude shouted with fury: 'Away with the atheists' (ἀπὸ τοῖς ἀθέοις). This is the cry by which popular hatred designated the Christians as enemies of the gods. The people loudly demanded Polycarp (ζητεῖσθω Πολυκαρπός); the people therefore knew Polycarp as the most notable of the Christians of Smyrna, as their chief (iii. 2). Polycarp remained at Smyrna, in spite of the advice that his friends gave him to flee secretly. He retired to a small farmhouse (ἀγρίδιον) near the town. There 'night and day he did nothing but pray for all men and for the churches of the inhabited world (τῶν κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην ἐκκλησιῶν), as he had been accustomed to do' (v. 1). Polycarp was arrested on the Friday towards evening in a house (ἐν τινὶ δωματίῳ) in which he had found shelter: the bystanders marvelled 'at his age and his constancy,' and wondered 'why there should be so much eagerness for the apprehension of an old man like him' (vii. 1-2). The bishop requested one hour to pray before following them; they consented. Then Polycarp 'stood up and prayed, being so full of the grace of God, that for two hours he could not hold his peace' (vii. 3), and in his prayer he mentioned 'all who at any time had come in his way, small and great, high and low, and all the universal Church throughout the world' (καὶ πάσης τῆς κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας). At last he was taken to Smyrna on the Saturday morning (viii. 1). Herod the irenarch (the chief of the municipal police) pressed him to do sacrifice: 'What harm is there in saying: κύριος καίσαρ ("Cæsar is lord")?' He evidently wanted to suggest an equivocation to Polycarp, to save him (cf. Tertullian, Apol. 34, 'Dicam plane imperatorem dominum, sed more communi, sed quando non cogor ut Dominum Dei vice dicam'). Polycarp was brought εἰς τὸ στάδιον, where the people were assembled and the proconsul was present (ix. 1). Let us remark in passing that this appearance of Polycarp before the proconsul in the open stadium is very unusual from the point of view of the forms of proconsular justice. This is not the only surprising detail, for, as P. Allard says: 'Tout dans cette procédure est irrégulier' (Histoire des persécutions, i. [Paris, 1885] 303). The proconsul called upon Polycarp to swear by the fortune of Cæsar (ομοσόν την καίσαρος τύχην) and to say: 'Away with the atheists' (ἀπὸ τοῖς ἀθέοις). Polycarp, casting his eyes on the multitude of pagans who filled the stadium, 'sighs, and, raising his eyes towards heaven, says, "Away with the atheists!"' But he refused to curse the Christ (ix. 2-3). The proconsul insisted in vain. 'I am a Christian,' replied the bishop; 'if thou wouldest learn the doctrine of Christianity, assign a day and give me a hearing.' 'Prevail upon the people,' answered the Roman magistrate sarcastically. 'As for myself,' said Polycarp, 'I should have held thee worthy of discourse; for we have been taught to render, as is meet, to princes and authorities appointed by God such honour as does us no harm; but as for these, I do not hold them worthy, that I should defend myself before them' (x. 2)—a reminiscence of St. Paul, Ro 13¹⁻⁷. The proconsul threatened to throw him to the wild beasts if he did not abjure. 'Call for them,' answered the bishop, 'for the repentance from better to worse is a change not permitted to us; but it is a noble thing to change from untowardness to righteousness' (xi. 1). The proconsul threatened him with the stake; Polycarp replied: 'Thou threatenest that fire which burneth for a season and after a little while is quenched: for thou art ignorant of the fire of the future judgment and eternal punishment, which is reserved for the ungodly. But why delayest thou? Come, do what thou wilt' (xi. 2). The proconsul ordered his herald to proclaim in the middle of the stadium: 'Polycarp hath confessed himself to be a Christian' (xii. 1). The whole multitude, composed of pagans and of Jews living in Smyrna (Ἰουδαίων τῶν τὴν Σμύρναν κατοικούντων) (on the hostility of the Jews towards the Christians see Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung, Leipzig, 1906, i. 400), began to shout: 'This is the teacher of Asia (οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ τῆς Ἀσίας διδάσκαλος), the father of the Christians, the puller down of our gods, who teacheth numbers not to sacrifice nor worship!' Notice the expression ὁ πατὴρ τῶν Χριστιανῶν to denote the bishop. The multitude begged that Polycarp should be burned at once (xii. 2-3). They brought fuel; the Jews were in the greatest haste. When the pile was ready, the bishop laid aside his clothes and was placed against the stake. They wanted to nail him to it; he refused: 'Leave me as I am,' he said, 'for He that hath granted me to endure the fire will grant me also to remain at the pile unmoved, even without the security which ye seek from the nails' (xiii. 3). Fixed to the stake, his hands behind his back, he was 'like a noble ram out of a great flock for an offering' (xiv. 1). The account goes on to say that the bishop then repeated in a loud voice a very remarkable prayer, for it is in the manner of a eucharistic prayer, and gives the impression of what we call a praefatio (xiv. 1-2). While dying, the bishop prayed in the ritual from which the liturgy is derived. Thus died 'the glorious martyr, Polycarp, who was found an apostolic and prophetic teacher (διδάσκαλος ἀποστολικὸς καὶ προφητικὸς), bishop of the holy Catholic Church which is in Smyrna (ἐπίσκοπος τῆς ἐν Σμύρνῃ καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας). For every word which he uttered from his mouth was accomplished and will be accomplished' (xvi. 2) (on the gift of prophecy attributed to the bishops see Harnack, Mission, i. 289).

The Martyrium Polycarpi adds that, at the instigation of the Jews, the Christians were refused permission to take away the body of Polycarp (xvii. 2), which was burned by the soldiers of the proconsul, according to the pagan custom (xviii. 1). The Christians therefore got nothing but the ashes, which they interred 'in a suitable place,' says the Martyrium in terms which do not reveal the locus depositionis: 'Where the Lord will permit us to gather ourselves together, as we are able, in gladness and joy, and to celebrate the birth-day of his martyrdom for the commemoration of those who have already fought in the contest' (xviii. 3). Here we have the most ancient evidence of the custom of celebrating the birthday of a martyr (τὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου αὐτοῦ ἡμέραν γενέθλιον). We have also the testimony that a similar anniversary would be celebrated for Polycarp when possible; that means that it had not been possible at the time when the Martyrium was edited—which proves that this redaction was made shortly after Polycarp's death.

The supplementary paragraphs of the Martyrium Polycarpi state that Polycarp was the twelfth to suffer martyrdom at Smyrna, counting the Christians of Philadelphia, but that the martyrdom of Polycarp was the most memorable, 'so that he is talked of even by the heathen in every place' (xix. 1). By his suffering, Polycarp glorifies God and 'our Lord Jesus Christ, saviour of our souls, pilot of our bodies, shepherd of the Catholic Church in the whole inhabited world' (ποιμένα τῆς κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας, xix. 2; cf. verses 3-5 of the epitaph of Abercius: Οὐνομ' Ἀβέρκιος ὦν, ὁ μαθητὴς ποιμένος ἀγνοῦ, ὃς βόσκει προβάτων ἀγέλας οὐρεσι πεδίοις τε, ὃ φθαλμοὺς δὲ ἔχει μεγάλους πάντη καθορώντας). The appendix (xxii. 1-3), which seems to be entirely a forgery by the hand of pseudo-Pionius, author of the Vita, has no historical interest.

Must we believe that the mention on several occasions of the Catholic Church is an indication of later touches? We might get rid of this difficulty if the phrase ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία had not already occurred in Ignatius, and moreover in his Epistle to the Smyrnaeans (viii. 2), with the meaning of 'universal Church,' geographically universal, in contrast to 'local Church.' This same geographical meaning is the one which the Martyrium Polycarpi retains in all the passages where the Church qualified by 'Catholic' is that which is over the whole inhabited world (καθολικὴ = κατὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην; Martyrium Polycarpi, inscriptio, viii. 1, xix. 2). Once only (xvi. 2) the Church seems to be qualified by 'Catholic' as a legitimate predicate: Polycarp is called ἐπίσκοπος τῆς ἐν Σμύρνῃ καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας. This is the earliest example of the use of καθολικός in contrast with αἰρετικός. This early occurrence may be surprising, but it is clear that every formula appears somewhere as the need for it arises. At the time of Polycarp the heretics were fairly numerous and so far separated from the great Church that the great Church distinguished itself from them by calling itself 'the Catholic.' There is therefore no reason for seeing signs of interpolation in the use of καθολικός with this new meaning.

We need not be surprised that the Martyrium Polycarpi takes up the task of comparing the Passion of Christ and the martyrdom of the bishop. It endeavours to show that the martyrdom is 'according to the Gospel' (i. 1, xix. 1). It is a model martyrdom, and the author explains this by saying that Polycarp 'waited to be given up, as the Lord also did' (περιέμενεν γὰρ ἵνα παραδοθῇ, ὡς καὶ ὁ κύριος), to teach the faithful not to think only of their individual safety, but to think of all the brethren (i. 2). He waited to be given up, i.e. he did not accuse himself and present himself before the magistrate of his own free will. The ardour of the faithful had to be restrained in times of persecution, and they had to be warned against presumption. The author of the Martyrium Polycarpi explains it (4): 'But one man, Quintus by name, a Phrygian newly arrived from Phrygia, when he saw the wild beasts, turned coward. He it was who had forced himself and some others to come forward of their own free will. . . . For this cause therefore, brethren, we praise not those who deliver themselves up, since the Gospel doth not so teach us.' It is impossible to establish a comparison between the death of Christ and the death of a martyr. The Christ 'suffered for the salvation of the whole world of those that are saved—suffered though faultless for sinners' (xvii. 2). We love the martyrs because they are 'the disciples and the imitators of the Lord, and they are worthy of our love for their 'unconquerable fidelity to their real king and their master. May we share their fate and be their co-disciples' (xvii. 3).

2. Writings and doctrine.—We noted above that Irenæus mentions several letters of Polycarp, either to churches or to individuals. It is not impossible that Irenæus really knew several letters of Polycarp. Only one has been preserved, however—the letter of Polycarp to the Philippians.

We know that Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, during the journey that led him a prisoner to Rome, stopped at Smyrna. We have a letter of Ignatius to the Smyrnæans, in which the prisoner, on arriving at Troas, thanks them for the kindness with which they received him: 'You have lavished all kinds of comforts on me: may Jesus Christ reward you for it! Both far and near you have shown me your kindness: I pray God to recompense you' (ad Smurn. ix. 2). Ignatius thanks them also for the welcome which they accorded to his three companions (x. 1). He requests them to send a messenger to Antioch with a letter congratulating the Christians of Antioch on having restored concord in their church (xi. 2). We may note in passing that a similar letter must have been written by the bishop of Smyrna. Further, Ignatius wrote: 'I salute the bishop worthy of God (ἀσπάζομαι τον ἀξιοθεον επισκοπον), who is your bishop.' He adds several other salutations to certain Christians of Smyrna whom he names—Tavia, Alke, Daphnos, Euteknos (13). In the Martyrium Polycarpi, xvii. 2, an Alce is mentioned, whose brother Niketes is an influential Smyrnæan pagan, and very hostile to the Christians. Before leaving Troas, Ignatius wrote his epistle to 'Polycarp, bishop of the church of the Smyrnæans.' The tone of this letter recalls the Pastoral Epistles: Ignatius gives Polycarp advice, as Paul did to Timothy, but in it the authority of Ignatius is tempered by a tender reverence for the bishop of Smyrna, who was evidently still a young man. 'I give exceeding glory,' says Ignatius to Polycarp, 'that it hath been vouchsafed me to see thy blameless face' (ad Polyc. i. 1). And again: 'In all things I am devoted to thee—I and my bonds which thou didst cherish' (ii. 3). We must be careful not to think that the virtues which Ignatius recommends to Polycarp are so many virtues wanting in the latter! Ignatius insists that the Christians of Smyrna should send a messenger to Antioch: 'It becometh thee, most blessed Polycarp, to call together a godly council and to elect some one among you who is very dear to you and zealous also, who shall be fit to bear the name of God's courier—to appoint him, I say, that he may go to Syria and glorify your zealous love unto the glory of God' (vii. 2). Ignatius apologizes for not being able to write to all the churches. 'Thou shalt write to the churches in front, as one possessing the mind of God, to the intent that they also may do this same thing' (viii. 1). The letter ended with salutations to some Smyrnæan Christians, the house of Epitropos, Attalos, and Alke once more. We shall see how the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians fits in with the story of Ignatius.

This epistle is attested by the mention of it and the extracts from it made by Eusebius (HE iii. xxxvi. 13-14), and better still by the description given of it by Irenæus (Haer. iii. 3, 4), cited by Eusebius (HE iv. xiv. 6): 'There is another letter of Polycarp to the Philippians, which is very important. Those who wish and who have any care for their salvation may learn from it the character of his faith and his κήρυγμα τῆς ἀληθείας.' Jerome mentions the Epistle to the Philippians and claims that 'usque hodie in Asia conventu legitur' (de Vir. Ill. 17)—which means that at the end of the 4th cent. the Epistle of Polycarp was read in the liturgical assemblies of the province of Asia; but the assertion remains unconfirmed, and everybody knows that Jerome often wrote very hurriedly. The written tradition of the Epistle of Polycarp is very deficient, for the Greek MSS of it which are extant all stop at ch. 9; chs. 10-14 (with the exception of 12, which is cited by Eusebius) have been preserved only in the old Latin version of the Epistle (Harnack, Ueberlieferung der altchr. Litt., pp. 69-72). The Latin text was edited for the first time in 1493 by Lefevre d'Étaples, the Greek text in 1633 by Halloix. The critical editions are those of Zahn, Funk, and Lightfoot. These editors have re-translated into Greek the parts which existed only in Latin. The authenticity of the Epistle of Polycarp, formerly contested by the same authors who contested the Epistles of Ignatius, has now been firmly established. The same may be said of the Epistles of Ignatius (Stahlin, Christl. griech. Litt., p. 977).

Polycarp addressed this letter to the Philippians a short time after hearing of the reception which the Church of Philippi had given Ignatius and his companions in captivity: 'I rejoiced with you greatly in our Lord Jesus Christ, for that ye received the followers of the true Love and escorted them on their way, as befitted you—those men encircled in saintly bonds which are the diadems of them that be truly chosen of God and our Lord' (i. 1). He exhorts the Philippians to show that enduring patience which they have seen 'in the blessed Ignatius and Zosimus and Rufus' (ix. 1)—apparently Ignatius' companions in captivity. The Philippians invited Polycarp to write to them (iii. 1); they wrote to him at the same time as Ignatius, and charged him with a letter to Antioch (xiii. 1). They asked him to send to them the letters that he had received from Ignatius: 'The letters of Ignatius which were sent to us by him, and others as many as we had by us, we send unto you, according as ye gave charge; the which are subjoined to this letter; from which ye will be able to gain great advantage. For they comprise faith and endurance and every kind of edification, which pertaineth unto our Lord' (xiii. 1-2). Polycarp adds: 'Concerning Ignatius himself and those that were with him, if ye have any sure tidings, certify us' (xiii. 2). These last words prove that Polycarp did not know the fate of Ignatius at the time when he wrote to the Philippians, and it has been concluded from this that Ignatius had quite recently left Philippi en route for Rome. The text (ix. 2) often alleged as a sign that Ignatius must have been already dead is not, in the present writer's opinion, convincing. Ignatius' journey from Antioch to Rome belongs to the last years of the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98-117); the Epistle of Polycarp is contemporaneous with this journey.

The historical interest of the Epistle of Polycarp is very great, inasmuch as it is a proof of the existence of letters of Ignatius. The literary interest of the epistle is mediocre, especially if it is compared with the exceptional value of the Ignatian epistles. The style of the bishop of Smyrna is without personal character. His epistle is in reality something like a cento. For that very reason, however, it is a witness, since the majority of the texts which it utilizes can be recognized—the three Synoptics, the Fourth Gospel, the Acts, the principal Pauline Epistles (Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil., Col., 2 Thess., 1 and 2 Tim.), the Epistle to James, 1 Peter, 1 and 2 John. From the fact that Polycarp says (iii. 2) that the apostle Paul wrote letters to the Philippians (ὁμὴν ἐγραφεν ἐπιστολάς), it would be unwise to conclude that Polycarp knew several letters of Paul to the Philippians. The OT, which Polycarp confesses he does not know well (xii. 1), is represented by only a few references (Is., Jer., Ps., Prov., Job, Tob.). Polycarp knew 1 Clem., and made numerous very evident borrowings from it (Harnack, Ueberlieferung, p. 40; Funk, i. pp. xli–xliii).

The address reads: 'Polycarp and the presbyters who are with him to the Church of God which is in Philippi.' The letter speaks (v. 3) of the subjection of the Philippians to their presbyters and their deacons, to whom they submit 'as to God and to Christ.' This is a very Ignatian thought, but Ignatius would have spoken of the bishop also, while Polycarp does not once mention the word 'bishop' in his letter. It has been concluded from this that the Church of Philippi did not at that time have a bishop distinct from the πρεσβύτεροι (A. Michiels, L'Origine de l'épiscopat, Louvain, 1900, p. 367 f.). This is a possibility which cannot be altogether ignored. The non-mention of a bishop at Philippi, however surprising it may be after the Ignatian language, may be a sign that in Thrace the distinction between the ἐπίσκοπος and the πρεσβύτεροι ἐπισκοποῦντες had not yet ended in the monarchical episcopate so clearly realized in Antioch, in Smyrna, in the churches made known to us in the Ignatian epistles (cf. P. Batiffol, *Études d'histoire et de théologie positive*⁶, 1st ser., Paris, 1907, pp. 258–266). C. Gore (*The Ministry of the Christian Church*², London, 1889, p. 329) says: 'The hypothesis of a superior order in the Church, such as Clement's letter has been seen to imply, of which no representation was yet localized in the Church at Philippi, seems to meet the conditions of the problem. . . . This would postulate a state of things at Philippi which Ignatius could at once have recognized as agreeable to his standard of apostolic requirements. . . . What we would suggest is not exactly that Philippi was in the diocese of Thessalonica or of some other see, but that we have still to do with a state of things which is transitional.' Harnack (Entstehung und Entwicklung der Kirchenverfassung, Leipzig, 1910, p. 59 f.) also thinks that Philippi has a collegial government, and that the bishop or bishops are included in the πρεσβύτεροι.

Among these πρεσβύτεροι Polycarp mentions one called Valens who greatly horrified his colleagues by his greed (xi. 1); the wife of Valens was as guilty as he (xi. 4). 'He who cannot govern himself in these things,' writes Polycarp, 'how doth he enjoin this upon another?' (xi. 2). Polycarp exhorts the presbyters to bring back Valens and his wife as members who were weak and had gone astray, for the good of the whole community (xi. 4). The sinner, though offensive, is not to be despaired of and abandoned by the community. The presbyters must be merciful to all, bring back the erring, visit the weak, neglect neither the widows, the orphans, nor the poor; avoid unjust judgments, not believe evil readily (vi. 1). The deacons must be beyond reproach, remembering that they are 'deacons of God and Christ and not of men,' avoid evil-speaking, duplicity, cupidity (v. 1). Married women must be faithful to the virtues of faith, charity, chastity, love their husbands, bring up their children in the fear of God (iv. 2). Widows are the altar of God, θυσιαστήριον θεοῦ (iv. 3), in the sense that there must be nothing in them that would not be worthy of being offered to God, and also in the sense that they live on the offerings of the charity of the faithful. H. Achelis (Das Christentum in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Leipzig, 1912, i. 192) shows that widows are always in the first rank of the people to whom alms are given. Virgins (i.e. young Christian girls in general, not virgins consecrated to God) must lead a perfectly pure life (v. 3). Young people must flee from all evil, all the sordid pagan vices branded by St. Paul in 1 Co 6th, and they must be under the subjection of the presbyter and the deacons (v. 3). The Epistle of Polycarp is above all a moral exhortation, which recalls the manner of 1 Clem. more than that of the Ignatian epistles. It undoubtedly gives a fairly accurate idea of what ought to be the preaching of a bishop (νοῦθεσία).

Its speculative and dogmatic contents are very poor, but there are some elementary features worthy of notice.

God is called 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' as Jesus Christ is said to be the 'Son of God,' and 'Eternal Pontiff' (sempiternus pontifex; [xii. 2]). Cf. the doxology with which in the Martyrium Polycarpi (xiv. 3) the prayer of Polycarp ends: 'For all things I praise Thee, I bless Thee, I glorify Thee, through the eternal and heavenly High-priest, Jesus Christ, Thy beloved Son, through whom with Him and the Holy Spirit be glory both now [and ever].' The idea of the Priesthood of Christ is also found in Ignatius, ad Phil. ix. 1, and in Clem. ad Cor. xxxvi. 1, lxi. 3, lxiv.; it is the fundamental idea of Hebrews. Jesus Christ deigned to descend even to death for our sins (i. 2). Give up vain speeches and the errors of the majority, i.e. paganism, to believe in the Risen One to whom God has given a throne at His right hand, and to whom all has been subjected in heaven and on earth: God will demand an account of His blood from those who do not believe in Him (ii. 1). God will also raise us from the dead if we observe the precepts of Christ (ii. 2). The error of Docetism is denounced by Polycarp as an imminent danger: 'Whosoever shall not confess the testimony of the Cross, is of the devil' (vii. 1); so also is the perversion of Christian morality by false teachers: 'Whosoever shall pervert the oracles of the Lord (τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου) to his own lusts and say that there is neither resurrection nor judgment, that man is the first-born of Satan' (vii. 1). Let us avoid 'the false brethren and them that bear the name of the Lord in hypocrisy, who lead foolish men astray' (vi. 3).

Faith is our mother in all things, 'while hope followeth after and love goeth before—love toward God and Christ and toward our neighbour' (iii. 3). Let us reject the folly of the majority (i.e. paganism) and false teaching (ψευδοδιδασκαλίας, the new doctrines of the heretics), and return to the teaching which has been given us from the beginning (ἐκ τῶν ἐξ ἀρχῆς ἡμῖν παραδοθέντα λόγων, the teaching of the apostles and of the gospel), tradition being the criterion of Christian truth (vii. 2). Let us have our eyes constantly fixed on our hope and the pledge of our justice, i.e. on Jesus Christ, who has 'endured all things, that we might live in Him' (viii. 1). Lastly, let us pray for all the saints, for the magistrates and princes, for our persecutors, and for the enemies of the Cross (xii. 3). The Church is not mentioned, but Polycarp says: 'May God give you a share in the inheritance of the saints, may He let us participate in it with you, we and all those who are under heaven, who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ and in His Father' (xii. 2). Prayer does not go without fasting (vii. 2). The prayer recommended is the Lord's Prayer (vi. 2, vii. 2).

The eschatology is confined to the resurrection of the dead (ii. 2, v. 2, vii. 1), to the judgment of the living and the dead by the Christ who comes, ὁ ἔρχεται (ii. 1; cf. vi. 2, vii. 1, xi. 2), to the reward of the just in heaven (v. 2, ix. 2).

The Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians closes with the mention of Crescens, whom Polycarp presents as the bearer of the letter; and whom he recommends, as well as his sister, to the hospitable reception of the faithful of Philippi.

In the editions of Zahn (p. 171 f.) and Lightfoot (pt. ii. vol. iii. p. 421 f.) will be found five Latin fragments attributed to Polycarp: they were first published by the editor of Irenæus, Feuardent (1639), who found them in a group now lost, which itself gave them as quoted in Victor of Capua († 554). Supposing that these five fragments of scholia on the Gospels are ancient (3rd cent. ?), they show no sign that Polycarp was the author of them (Harnack, Ueberlieferung, p. 73).

Suidas (Lexicon, s.v. Πολυκαρπος, ed. G. Bernhardt, Halle and Brunswick, 1834-1893, ii. 345) mentions a letter of Polycarp to Dionysius the Areopagite, of which there is no other trace. Maximus the confessor, in the prologue of his commentary on the Areopagitica, also mentions a letter of Polycarp to the Athenians in which he speaks of Dionysius (PG iv. 17). Lastly, the seventh of the ten letters of pseudo-Dionysius is addressed to Polycarp. We need not dwell here on the value of the Areopagitica and all that may be connected with it (Harnack, Ueberlieferung, p. 73).

LITERATURE.—The chief references are given in the course of the article. For general bibliography see O. Bardenheuer, Gesch. der altkirchl. Literatur, i.² [Freiburg i. B., 1913]. Critical editions: T. Zahn, 'Ignatii et Polycarpi Epistolæ', in Patrum apostolicorum opera, ii. [Leipzig, 1876]; F. X. Funk, Opera patrum apostolicorum, Tübingen, 1873 and 1901; J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii.², London, 1889. See also the elementary edition of A. Lelong, Ignace d'Antioche et Polycarpe de Smyrne, Paris, 1910 (Gr. text, Fr. tr., Introduction, and notes on Ep. ad Phil. and Martyrium Polycarpi).

P. BATIFFOL.

POLYGAMY.—See MARRIAGE.

PONTUS (Πόντος).—To early Greek writers, Pontus vaguely denoted any coastland of the 'Inhospitable Sea'—Πόντος ἄξερος, afterwards changed into Πόντος εὐξεινος—beyond the Bosphorus. To Herodotus (vii. 95) it meant the southern littoral of the Euxine, and to Xenophon (Anab. v. vi. 15) the south-eastern. It had not a definite geographical meaning till the founding of the kingdom of Pontus by Mithridates in the troubled period which followed the death of Alexander the Great.

* The Macedonians obtained possession of Cappadocia after it had been divided by the Persians into two satrapies, and permitted, partly with and partly without the consent of the people, the satrapies to be altered to two kingdoms, one of which they called Cappadocia proper, . . . the other they called Pontus, but according to other writers Cappadocia on Pontus' (ἡ πρὸς τῷ Πόντῳ Καππαδοκία) (Strabo, xii. i. 4). Polybius names the kingdom 'Cappadocia towards the Euxine' (Καππαδοκία ἡ ἐπὶ τὸν Εὐξείνιον) (v. xliii. 1). In popular usage the single word Pontus displaced the more cumbersome nomenclature.

This kingdom attained its greatest prosperity and power in the reign of Mithridates iv. Eupator (111-63 B.C.), who extended it to Heracleia on the border of Bithynia in the west and to Colchis and Lesser Armenia in the east (Strabo, xii. iii. 1); but his wars with the Romans ended in his overthrow. The western part of his kingdom was joined to Bithynia to form the double province Pontus-Bithynia, which existed for three centuries. The eastern part was broken up into possessions for a number of native dynasts, and one of the larger fragments passed in 36 B.C. from the family of Mithridates to Polemon of Laodicea, the founder of a new dynasty of Pontic kings, which lasted till A.D. 63. Other portions were added one by one to the province of Galatia, forming together

Pontus Galaticus, whose chief towns were Amasia and Comana. In A.D. 63 the Romans, thinking that Polemon's vassal kingdom had become civilized enough to be incorporated in the Empire, added part of it, including the cities of Trapezus and Neo-Cæsarea, to the province of Galatia as Pontus Polemoniacus, a name which it retained for centuries. Polemon II. was consoled for his loss by receiving the kingdom of Cilicia Tracheia, and he afterwards married Berenice (q.v.), the sister of Herod Agrippa. Still another fragment of the old kingdom of Pontus was added to the province of Cappadocia, and called Pontus Cappadocius. From A.D. 78-106 the provinces of Galatia and Cappadocia were united for administrative purposes. When they were separated again by Trajan, Pontus Galaticus and Pontus Polemoniacus were permanently joined to Cappadocia.

Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, 36) testifies that in his time the Jews had penetrated ἀπὸ Βιθυνίας καὶ τῶν τοῦ Πόντου μυχῶν. Pontus stands in the list of countries from which Jews and proselytes came to Jerusalem to attend the Feast of Pentecost (Ac 2⁹). As the geographical names in this list have their popular rather than their Imperial meaning, Pontus may either denote the province of Pontus alone, or may include Galatic and Polemonian Pontus; but Polemon's kingdom was scarcely settled enough to be likely to attract Jewish colonists. 'The elect who are strangers of the Dispersion in Pontus' are named as the readers of the First Epistle of St. Peter (1¹), and here the language is strictly Roman, for the three provinces Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, together with the dual province Pontus-Bithynia, are meant to sum up the whole of Asia Minor north of the Taurus. The severance in this passage of Pontus from Bithynia, as well as the order in which the provinces are named, requires an explanation, and the best has been suggested by G. H. A. Ewald (Sieben Sendschreiben des neuen Bundes, 1870, p. 2 f.). The order indicated is that of an actual journey, which the bearer of the Epistle—probably Silvanus, the amannensis (1 P 5¹²)—is about to undertake. Landing at one of the seaports of Pontus (Sinope or Amisus) he will make a circuit of Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, and work his way through Bithynia to another port of the Euxine (cf. F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter, I. 1-II. 17, 1898, p. 17).

The first cities of Pontus to receive Christianity were doubtless those of the seaboard, from which it must have rapidly spread inland. Pliny the Younger was sent to administer Pontus and Bithynia in A.D. 111, and his correspondence with Trajan gives a clear idea of the changes already being wrought by the new religion—in his view a 'superstitio prava immodica'—not only in the great towns but in remote country places (Ep. x. 97). His reference to renegades who professed to have renounced their Christian faith as much as twenty-five years previously indicates that some parts of the province had been evangelized some time before A.D. 87 or 88. The First Epistle of Peter, even if it was not written till A.D. 80, carries the date of the introduction of Christianity into Pontus a good deal further back.

Aquila, the fellow-worker of St. Paul, was a native of Pontus (Ac 18²). Another Aquila, the translator of the OT into Greek, who lived in the time of Hadrian, belonged to the same province. An inscription to an Aquila of Sinope (Sinub) has recently been found. Sinope was the birthplace of Marcion, whose father is said to have been a bishop.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, Hist. Geography of Asia Minor, 1890; J. G. Anderson, 'Exploration in Pontus', in Studia Pontica, 1903, and F. and E. Cumont, 'Voyage d'exploration archéol. dans le Pont et la petite Arménie', ib., 1906. JAMES STRAHAN.

POOR, POVERTY.—The terms used in the NT to describe the poor are πένης, πενυχρός, ἐνδεής (once each), and πτωχός. In the great majority of instances it is obvious that these words describe the man who has little material wealth, but there are certain passages which suggest a larger meaning.

In the Epistle of James and in the Gospel of Luke the word 'poor' (πτωχός) is used occasionally in a manner which suggests that, while it has in part its literal sense, it may also denote one who possesses certain virtues which may have been conceived of as usually associated with poverty. 'Did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him? But ye have dishonoured the poor man. Do not the rich oppress you, and themselves drag you before the judgement-seats?' (Ja 2⁵⁻⁶). Our Lord's words 'Blessed are ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God,' and 'Woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation' (Lk 6²⁰⁻²⁴) may be thought to convey the same suggestion. In Mt 5³ our Lord's words are repeated in a different form—'Blessed are the poor in spirit'; and while we may be inclined to think that Luke gives us the more original form of the words, the gloss, if it be such, of Matthew's Gospel is very possibly just in substance. When we examine the OT literature we find that it is possible that the word 'poor' is often used rather in a spiritual than in a literal sense, e.g. Ps 35¹⁰⁻⁴⁰.

It has been suggested that this points to some relation between the NT conception of the poor and some supposed body of Ebionites or pious men who are also called poor, but the material is too scanty to enable us to form any very positive judgment.

For the question of the position and treatment of the poor in the Apostolic Church see the artt. ALMS and COMMUNITY OF GOODS.

A. J. CARLYLE.

PORCH.—When 'porch' is a translation of σῶα, it denotes a portico (so Ac 3¹ RVm), covered colonnade, or cloister, where people could walk and talk, protected from sun or rain, and where liberty of public speaking and teaching was generally enjoyed. Round the entire area of Herod's Temple there ran a succession of magnificent porticoes built against the enclosing wall. Solomon's Porch, which adorned the eastern side—hence called also the σῶα ἀνατολική (Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 7)—and faced the entrance to the Women's Court, was a double portico, about 50 ft. wide, formed by three rows of white marble monolithic columns, each about 40 ft. high. It was roofed by cedar beams, richly carved, and its aisles were paved in mosaic fashion with stone (Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5, BJ v. v. 2). Josephus appears to have believed that it had survived from the time of Solomon (Ant. xx. ix. 7, BJ v. v. 1), but in all probability its name implied no more than that on the same foundations there had stood a previous structure which partly dated from Solomon's time. The porch in which Jesus walked on the Feast of Dedication (Jn 10²³), to which the people ran together after witnessing St. Peter's miracle at the Beautiful Gate (Ac 3¹¹), and which was a rendezvous of the early Church (5¹²), was certainly modern. It was in the style of contemporary Hellenistic architecture, and was only less magnificent than the triple colonnade known as the 'Royal Porch'—σῶα βασιλική—which ran along the south side of the Temple court.

LITERATURE.—A. Edersheim, *LT*⁴ i. 244f., II. 151; A. R. S. Kennedy, 'Some Problems of Herod's Temple,' in ExpT xx. (1908-09), art. 'Temple' in *EB*¹¹; B. Kleinschmidt, art. 'Temple' in JE.

JAMES STRAHAN.

POSSESSION.—In the earlier period of his career man did not realize, as we do, the difference between himself and the animals, plants, and objects around him. He thought, and in the lower culture still thinks, of these as in many respects like himself. When, therefore, through dreams and other experiences, he realized that his body was inhabited and animated by a spirit, he also thought that the falling rock, the running river, the waving tree, the sun moving through the sky, were each inhabited by a spirit or spirits like that within himself; every thing and every affair were animated by their own particular spirit. This animistic belief was, and is still, held by the men of the lower culture, by the primitive Semites and Aryans and the races springing from them, by the modern Chinese, and even by educated Europeans to-day.*

Some spirits, like vampires, were corporeal, but the majority, if not all, were free to move about, and able, nay anxious, to enter into some relationship with man. As a person's ordinary speech and action sprang from the action of his own spirit (minor differences arising because each had his own individual spirit), so extraordinary conduct of any kind was due to the impact of a spirit other than his own. The man was not himself, he was out of his mind, and consequently another was in.†

The contact of a spirit and a person might be at the instance of the person, through his eating laurel leaves, inhaling fumes or incense, drinking blood or an intoxicant, drumming, dancing, steady gazing.‡ It might, again, be on the initiative of the spirit. The contact might be either obsession, in which the spirit acts from without, or embodiment, in which it actually enters into the person.§ Such expressions, in regard, e.g., to the Holy Spirit, as 'come upon,' 'was upon,' 'fell upon,' 'poured out on,' 'baptized with,' pointing in the direction of obsession, others, as 'filled with,' 'God gave them,' 'they received the Holy Spirit,' pointing in the direction of embodiment, indicate that the spirit took the initiative.||

The conception of spirits underwent development along two distinct, though not quite independent, lines. Certain spirits, coming to be recognized as stronger than others, gradually attained a higher dignity, a more elaborate ritual, and a wider sway. They got names and became deities. Further, some of these becoming more important than others, came to be the chief deities of tribes and nations, and then, like Zeus, the head of a pantheon. A strong belief in such a deity in some cases almost attained to, and in the case of Jahweh actually reached, monotheism, or at least what Hogarth calls 'super-Monotheism.'¶ In some religions, as Zarathustrianism and the cults of Mesopotamia, the inferior spirits were grouped into grades as angels, archangels, principalities, and powers, at whose head there sometimes stood a supreme spirit as the Satan. Again, as primitive man, believing that all things which occurred to, or within, him arose from the action of a spirit—generally a minor spirit—distinguished between things pleasant, beneficial, or according to his standard, good, and the reverse, he came to distinguish between spirits benevolent and beneficent,

* See, e.g., C. H. Toy, Introduction to the History of Religions, Boston, 1913, p. 293; G. T. Bettany, Primitive Religions, London, 1891, pp. 107, 122, 133; J. H. King, The Supernatural, 2 vols., do., 1892, i. 177, 199; JE iv. 516 ('R. Johanan knew of 300 kinds of shedim living near the town of Shihin'); J. L. Nevius, Demon Possession and Allied Themes, London, 1897, p. 6; R. Howton, Divine Healing and Demon Possession, do., 1905, p. 1; the writings of E. Swedenborg; J. Duncan, Colloquia Peripatetica, Edinburgh, 1871, pp. 39, 40; DCG i. 438b.

† *EB*¹¹ xxii. 175.

‡ Id. xxii. 174.

§ HDB iv. 22b.

¶ Lk 13²⁵, Ac 1044 1115 1045 1116, Lk 14¹, Ac 24 431 158 192.

¶ C. H. Toy, Introduct. to the Hist. of Religions, p. 293; *EB*¹¹ viii. 7; D. G. Hogarth, The Ancient East, London, 1914, p. 23.

and others malevolent and maleficent.* When one is so fortunate as to be able to predict future events (Ac 21¹¹), or to indicate the will of God (13-15²³ 16⁹), then clearly one is filled with the Holy Spirit. This, rightly called 'inspiration,' is not found in the lower culture, except occasionally, when it is due to the spirits of the dead, though it has been maintained that the deliverances of the classic oracles were given by a divine being.† On the other hand, a person who becomes hot and burning, is twisted or tortured, slowly pines away as it being eaten up, is thrown helpless on the ground, into water or fire, writhing and jerking, exhibits the strength of a giant or the fury of a wild beast, strips off his clothes, raves in a voice not his own—such a one seems to be, and was by the men of the lower culture believed to be, possessed by a maleficent spirit.‡ This belief acted in two ways. When the seizures were intermittent the sufferer believed that at the period of seizure he became possessed by a malevolent spirit, and even gave it a name. Again, a person who imagined that a harmful spirit had entered into him acted in the way possessed people were conceived inevitably to act, and this became in its turn a proof positive of such possession.§ The entry of such a hurtful spirit is of course involuntary.||

The Greeks called a supernatural being intermediate between the gods and men δαίμων, 'demon.' This was used in the LXX and the Apocrypha, as in Tobit, to translate דִּמּוֹן and דִּמְיוֹן. The word thus came to get a bad meaning. The later Jews and Christians, in their hatred of the pagan cults, emphasized this view, and it has ever since been retained as in the English word 'demon.'¶ The Greek term δαιμονίεσθαι means 'to be possessed by a maleficent spirit.' Our word 'epilepsy' is the English form of ἐπιληψία, meaning 'seizure' by a superhuman agent, while epilepsy itself was called by the Greeks ἱερά νόσος, 'the divine illness.'

While, therefore, 'demonism' and 'demonist' indicate belief in and a believer in demons, 'demonology' is the science which treats of demons, 'demonolatry' is the worship of demons; 'demonopathy,' or, better, to use the term of the Sydenham Society Lexicon of 1883, 'demonomania' is the pathological condition in which the patient, a 'demoniac,' believes, and his conduct would induce others to believe, that he is possessed by a maleficent spirit.

Anthropological research shows that demonomania prevails or has prevailed among the Amerind tribes from the furthest North to Patagonia, throughout Polynesia, in New Zealand, the Australian and Tasmanian regions, in all parts of India and Africa, among the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and all the Semitic nations.††

But the facts as to demonism and demonomania will become clearer by a consideration of these as we find them present in the life of one nation. The primitive Semites believed in demons, and this racial faith was inherited and developed by the Arabians, and the nations which swarmed from the desert cradle-land—Mesopotamians, Phœnicians, Canaanites, and Hebrews.‡‡ The last, in their nomadic state and their sojourn in Egypt, by their settlement in Palestine and intercourse with neighbouring nations, and during the Exile, were subjected to influences which, while modifying, tended to intensify the ancestral belief.* They recognized not merely the existence of demons but their classification into the two great groups, beneficent and maleficent, the latter being our special concern.† The demons in the earliest culture had no names, but gradually, e.g. in Mesopotamia, they were divided into classes with distinct names. Among the Hebrews we have these classes.‡

(1) The עֲרִירִים, field spirits, like satyrs, so called because of their resemblance to hairy he-goats. To these sacrifices were offered in the open field, and for their worship Jeroboam appointed priests.§ A further reference to these may be found in 2 K 23⁵, where for עֲרִירִים there should be read עֲרִירִים. One of these spirits became prominent enough to receive a personal name זִיאוֹן, and to have a distinctive ritual of his own in which a goat was offered.¶

(2) In Mesopotamian mythology one of the most prominent of the groups of demons was the shēdim, storm-deities. They were represented in an ox-like shape, and from being used as the protective genii of palaces became, in Mesopotamia, propitious deities. From Chaldaea their worship passed to Palestine, and the name שִׁדִּים was applied by the Hebrews to the Canaanite demons whom they recognized and worshipped. If אֲבִי הַקִּדָּה (Job 5³) be a corruption for אֲבִי הַקִּדָּה, then 'the lords' were field-demons of this kind. A further reference to them is found in Gn 14^{3, 6, 10}, where עֲרִירִים should be printed עֲרִירִים;†† and in Hos 12¹ עֲרִירִים should be 'at Gilgal they sacrifice to the false gods (la-shēdīm).'‡‡ Three of these demons attained such eminence as to receive names. These were לִלִּית, Lilith (the night-hag, Is 34^{13, 14}), a female night-demon who sucked the blood of her sleeping victims;§§ אַסְמֵדַי, a demon servant of Jahweh warded off by a blood-talisman (Ex 12²);|| אַסְמֵדַי, the Asmodeus of To 3¹⁷, who is called in the Aramaic and Hebrew versions of To 3³ 'king of the Shēdim,' a demon borrowed from Zoroastrianism, who is identified with Ἀπολλων (Rev 9¹¹).¶¶ Indica-

ERE iv. 568, 570, 741; and, generally, R. C. Thompson, The Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia, London, 1903-04.

* ERE iv. 755; Marti, The Religion of the OT, p. 90.

† Jg 9²³, 1 S 16¹⁴; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 318; DCG i. 439.

‡ C. H. Toy, Introduct. to the Hist. of Religions, p. 293.

§ Lvi 177, 2 Ch 11¹⁵; see also Is 12¹ 34¹⁴; J. H. Kurtz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, Edinburgh, 1872, ii. 153; W. R. Smith, RS, London, 1894, p. 113; H. Schultz, OT Theology, Eng. tr., do., 1892, ii. 270; A. H. Japp, Some Heresies dealt with, do., 1899, p. 240; J. H. Philpot, The Sacred Tree, do., 1897, p. 54; JE iv. 515; A. H. Sayce, Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion (HL, 1887), London, 1891, p. 199; Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, p. 96; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 530, 532; Expt iii. 455; ERE iv. 598; HDB i. 591, v. 617b.

¶ Exp, 7th ser., iii. 322, 531, n. 3; HDB i. 207.

§ Lv 16; HDB i. 207; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 532; Expt xxiv. 9; ERE ii. 282, iv. 598; cf. Bar 4⁷.

 Exp, 7th ser., iii. 331; ERE iv. 570, 595; Dt 32¹⁷, Ps 106³⁷; Edersheim, *LT*⁴ ii. 760.

†† Exp, 7th ser., iii. 322; HDB i. 55b.

‡‡ Hitzig, quoted by A. Kuenen, The Religion of Israel, Eng. tr., i. [London, 1874] 94; see also JE iv. 515; Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, pp. 96, 103; J. J. Perowne, The Book of Psalms, 2 vols., London, 1853-58, ii. 266; Japp, Some Heresies dealt with, p. 25; H. G. Tomkins, Studies on the Times of Abraham, do., 1878, p. 149; Sayce, HL, pp. 441, 450, 463; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 322, iv. [1907] 135; HDB i. 96b, 591, v. 617; ERE iv. 593.

§§ ERE iv. 571, 598; HDB i. 590, iii. 122, v. 618, 553; A. Réville, The Devil, Eng. tr., London, 1887, p. 10; T. K. Cheyne, The Prophecies of Isaiah, do., 1886, i. 197; Sayce, HL, p. 145; G. Maspero, The Dawn of Civilization, London, 1896, p. 632; E. Schrader, The Cuneiform Inscriptions and the OT, Eng. tr., 2 vols., do., 1885-88, ii. 311; Exp, 7th ser., iv. 142, 3rd ser., vi. [1887] 460; Ps 91³.

|| Exp, 7th ser., iii. 323.

¶¶ To 613 3³ 17 6-8; HDB i. 125b, 172b, iv. 403b, 989a; Exp, 7th ser., iv. 135; DCG i. 439; Expt ii. [1890-91] 208, xi. [1899-1900] 253; J. H. Moulton, Early Religious Poetry of Persia, Cambridge, 1911, pp. 68, 77; Réville, The Devil, p. 13; H. Schultz, OT Theology, ii. 230; ERE iv. 600b.

* T. W. Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, London, 1898, p. 7.

† EBR¹¹ xxii. 174.

‡ A. Edersheim, *LT*⁴, London, 1887, ii. 762, 774; E. B. Tylor, *PC*⁴, do., 1903, ii. 124, 130; R. R. Marett, The Threshold of Religion, do., 1914, p. 241; Bettany, Primitive Religion, pp. 19, 57, 58, 69.

§ Tylor, *PC*⁴ ii. 132.

¶ EBR¹¹ xxii. 175.

 Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, p. 7; ERE iv. 565.

†† JE iv. 517; Edersheim, *LT*⁴ ii. 762; Tylor, *PC*⁴ ii. 137.

‡‡ See, e.g., Tylor, *PC*⁴ ii. 123, 137; DCG i. 438; ERE iv. 590, 619, 620, 723, etc.; cf. art. EXORCISM, 3.

§ K. Marti, The Religion of the OT, London, 1907, p. 50; Exp, 7th ser., iii. [1907] 325, 319; JE iv. 515; Edersheim, *LT*⁴ ii. 759, tions are not wanting that certain words which later came to signify calamities were originally the demons who caused the calamities. Such were קֶדֶר, 'the smiter,' the deadly hot wind of mid-day; קֶדֶר and קֶדֶר, the demon of destroying flame; * קֶדֶר, a vampire, a blood-sucking demon.† Such demons resemble and appear as either wild beasts or imaginary hybrid monsters.‡ Satan was identified with a serpent. 'The zoology of Islam,' as has been well said, 'is at once a demonology,' and the remark need not be confined to that religion.§ While originally the belief in such demons may have been caused, partially or wholly, by the sudden or mysterious appearance or action of animals, the spirits gradually came to be looked on as assuming the appearance of certain animals.|| Thus, when the Shunammite solemnly conjures the daughters of Jerusalem by the אֵילֹת and the זָכָוֹת (Ca 27 35) she was doubtless referring to the faun-like spirits of the wild.¶ The continuous and persistent efforts of the prophets to extricate Jahweh from the other gods and to exalt His power and importance inevitably diminished those of the demons; and, as His holiness and goodness became clearer, their malevolence became more marked. The continuous prevalence of and belief in demonomania becomes clearer still when we recall (a) the names given to the art of dealing with the demons, as קֶסֶם, 'divination,' †† קֶסֶם, 'divination,' †† קֶסֶם, 'enchantment,' §§ קֶסֶם, 'sorcery,' ||| קֶסֶם, 'incantations'; ¶¶ (b) the terms indicating the practice of such arts, as עֵזֶן, 'to use hidden or magical arts,'  such as those common among the Philistines; הָכֵר, 'to tie magical knots,' ††† הָכֵר, 'to twitter,' with its corresponding name for the practitioner, הָכֵרִים; †††† (c) the various kinds of practitioners whose business it was to deal with spirits, as אֱלֹהִים, 'necromancers'; קֶסֶם, 'knowing ones,' or wizards; §§§ קֶסֶם, 'those who mutter'; |||| קֶסֶם, 'whisperers'; ¶¶¶ קֶסֶם, those who maintain communion with the dead, cause them to return, and through intercourse with them deliver oracles, speaking low as if out of the ground. Con-

* Ps 91^b, ἀπὸ δαιμονίων μεσημβρινῶν; Dt 32²⁴, Is 28-, Hos 13¹⁴; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 332; F. W. Farrar, Life of Christ, London, n.d., p. 180; Exp, 7th ser., iv. 145; W. St. Chad Boscawen, British Museum Lectures, London, n.d., iii. 9; JE iv. 515.
† Dt 32²⁴, Job 57, Ps 76⁴ 78⁴⁸, Ca 8⁶, Hab 3⁵; Exp, 5th ser., v. [1897] 403; PEFS xxx. [1898] 259, xlv. [1914] 141; HDB i. 451, ii. 418, v. 618; ERE iv. 698.
‡ Pr 30¹⁵, ERE iv. 596; HDB ii. 418^a, iii. 210^b, v. 618^a; JE iv. 516; W. Robertson Smith, OTC, Edinburgh, 1881, p. 122, but cf. 2nd ed. (do., 1892), p. 111. For קֶדֶר, the demon of plague in Lv 26²⁵, see JE iv. 515; PEFS xlv. 141.
§ Exp, 7th ser., iii. 329 f. For other examples see p. 629.
|| ib. p. 535. ¶ ERE iv. 698.  Exp, 7th ser., iii. 322.
†† Ezk 13^c, etc. Its cognates are קֶסֶם, 'to divine' (Dt 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴ etc.), a rite practised by strangers and by Balaam (Is 62, Jos 13²²), and קֶסֶם (Dt 18¹⁴), the practitioner of such an art; see EB i. 1110.
‡‡ Ezk 12²⁴ is a kindred term.
§§ Nu 23²², etc., a word connected with divination by serpents, with its verb קֶסֶם, to practise such enchantments; Lv 19²⁶, etc.; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 540; and קֶסֶם, one who practises such divination, occurring only as a proper name in Ex 6²³.
||| Is 47¹¹: 'Evil will fall upon thee which thou canst not dispel with sorcery and which thou canst not remove with rituals of purgation.' ExpT xxii. [1910-11] 323; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 540.
¶¶ 2 K 9²². The art itself, according to Robertson Smith, is an expression used of shredded herbs of which was concocted a magic brew (Exp, 7th ser., iii. 539); cf. Is 65⁴, קֶסֶם, 2 Ch 33⁶, means to use incantations, while קֶסֶם (Jer 27⁹), קֶסֶם, and קֶסֶם indicate those who used incantations, as the Egyptians and Babylonians (Exp 7¹¹, Dn 9²).
 Dt 18¹⁰ etc., Is 28. The LXX translates by καλιδονισμοι. The practitioner was termed קֶסֶם (Dt 18¹⁰, Jg 9³⁷).
††† LXX translates by καταδω and the noun by καταδωσμος, קֶדֶר being the magical knot so tied—Dt 18¹¹, Ps 58⁶ (9), Is 47⁹⁻¹² (cf. Lk 13¹⁶, a daughter of Abraham bound by Satan); Exp, 7th ser., iii. 536, 539. See also the sixteen figures, 'captives,' found by Bliss at Sendahannah (PEFS xxvii. [1900] 832 and note by Clermont Ganneau, ib. xxxiii. [1901] 57).
†††† Is 81⁹ 10¹⁴ 38¹⁴.
§§§ Dt 18¹¹, Lv 19³¹ 20²⁷, 1 S 28³⁻⁹; ExpT ix. [1897-98] 157.
|||| Is 81⁹; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 537.
¶¶¶ Exp, 7th ser., iii. 537; Is 19¹.

demned by the Deuteronomic legislation, they were banished by Saul, patronized by Manassen, and much sought after by the Egyptians.* The entrance of these malevolent spirits into a person might be prevented by using proper precaution. Among the Orang Laut of the Malay Peninsula when the demon of small-pox is active in one locality the people of the adjacent districts prevent it coming to them by placing thorns in the paths between them and the infected locality. The Khonds of Orissa ward off the same intruder by presenting the demon with gifts.† Among the Hebrews the chief prophylactics were amulets,‡ charms,§ knotted cords,|| the repetition of the Shema' (Dt 6⁴) and other formulæ, fixing of the mizuzah, wearing the ephraim, eating salt; ¶ and, as we may infer from the practice of other races, the intervention of guardian angels. When the malevolent spirit had actually entered a person the usual remedies employed were sacrifice,†† prayer,‡‡ and, as the thing aimed at was the expulsion of the spirit, exorcism.§§

These notes will make clear what needs to be kept in mind, the very large place demonism occupied in the minds of the ordinary Hebrews.

As men came to think of the river running and the tree falling through natural causes, while still attributing the earthquake and the thunder to the action of a god, so they came to think of certain maladies as also due to natural causes, whereas others, peculiar, or peculiarly severe, were still considered as the work of demons. It is impossible to trace out this process in every religion, but the OT affords us helpful suggestions. Among the Hebrews it pursues something like the following line. When a disease in its advent and development followed, in different people, very much the same course, exhibiting nothing abnormal, its nature came, so far, to be understood, and to be considered as due to natural causes. The sickness of the son of the woman of Zarephath (1 K 17¹⁷), Hezekiah (2 K 20¹), Daniel (Dn 8²⁷), Jacob (Gn 48¹), Abijah (1 K 14¹), is not attributed to any extra-natural cause.||| This conception of natural diseases would result in, and go hand in hand with, some study of such diseases. By the time of Hammurabi, the doctor, the veterinary surgeon, and the brander were each distinct from one another.¶¶ The hygienic laws of Leviticus would encourage the study of the causes of disease. 'In the Mishna it is mentioned with approval "Hezekiah put away" a Book of Healings.' In the time of Jeremiah physicians were a distinct set of men.††† They were more or less connected with the priests and prophets, and were probably more akin to the 'leech' of the Middle Ages than to the scientific

* 1 S 28⁷, Is 81⁹ 29⁴, Dt 18⁴, 2 K 21⁶, 2 Ch 33⁶. They were a reality ἐγγαστρινοῦσθαι, ventriloquists in the original sense of that term; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 537; ExpT ix. 157.
† Tylor, PC, ii. 126, 127.
‡ E.g. the קֶסֶם, Is 32⁶; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 541; cf. 2 Mac 12⁴⁰; Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, pp. 99, 105; Edersheim, LT i. 432; Dt 22¹², Is 31⁸⁻²⁰; Japp, Some Heresies dealt with, p. 239.
§ Edersheim, LT ii. 776.
|| Exp, 7th ser., iii. 543, where see other similar charms; Dt 22¹².
¶ Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, p. 79; DCG i. 440.
 Ps 34⁷ 91¹¹, Mt 18¹³, Mk 13³, Ac 12¹⁶; Tylor, PC ii. 199; HJ xi. [1912-13] 164; DCG i. 440.
†† Tylor, PC, pp. 129, 131. ‡‡ Mt 17²¹, Mk 9²⁹, Ja 5¹⁵.
§§ Mesopotamian literature has preserved many magic formulæ; see Sayce, IL, App. iii.; R. C. Thompson, The Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nineveh and Babylon in the British Museum, London, 1900, The Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia: other authorities quoted in art. DIVINATION and EXORCISM; Tylor, PC, pp. 127, 133, 135; Exp, 7th ser., iii. 527, 530, iv. 136, 139.
||| See also Lv 15³³, 2 S 13², 2 K 12 87. 28 181⁴ 20¹, Sir 31², 2 Es 8³¹.
¶¶ Is 215-227.
 Quoted by J. B. Lightfoot, The Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, London, 1875, p. 140.
††† Gn 50² refers to professional embalmers.

ally trained physician of to-day. Still the rise of curative applications * shows the dawning of some idea of rational treatment. Such men would be viewed with prejudice by people of a conservatively pietistic type, as the Chronicler (2 Ch 16¹³) who censures Asa for resorting to physicians, and by disappointed patients with whose disease they had wrestled in vain (Wis 16¹, Job 13⁴). But the success which in many cases they achieved merited and won its meed of praise.†

But when a disease appeared as a sudden seizure, epidemical, or otherwise abnormal, men still believed that it was caused by a Divine being. Jahweh Himself smites with disease: diseases of the abnormal type are arrows shot from the hand of God.‡ Leprosy was clearly sent by Jahweh, and therefore His priests were the judges of the presence and of the cure of that disease, and the patient when cured had to offer sacrifice.§ At other times Jahweh employed a subsidiary spirit like the Satan (Job 2), or some other of his messengers.¶ Saul's case is instructive. First of all there came upon him a spirit called רִיחַ אֱמָנָה and רִיחַ אֱמָנָה. This spirit departed from him, and another spirit, called רִיחַ אֱמָנָה, and רִיחַ אֱמָנָה, a malevolent spirit of the gods, came upon him; and a pathological condition at once ensued, exhibiting itself in intermittent attacks of a strange and therefore demoniacal disorder.‡‡ For such abnormal diseases exorcism, in some form or another, would continue to be employed.§§ Thus the evolution of the function and character of spirits and the advance of medical science led to the differentiation of two types of disease, one normal, always tending to increase in number, and the other abnormal, always tending to decrease in number, the latter type being due to the action of superhuman beings.

In the Apostolic Age a belief in the active participation of spiritual beings in human affairs was universal.¶ Of these some were beneficent, as the Spirit of God, the Spirit of Jesus, the seven spirits before the throne of God, angels, archangels, principalities, powers, 'living creatures,' and probably the πνεύματα before the throne.¶¶ Others, which specially concern us, were malevolent. These were organized into a kingdom, the prince of the demons being Beelzebub, otherwise named Satan, and the devil,††† who is the 'prince of the air,' and has therein his residence.††† In fact, to some Christians the age appeared one of lawlessness and unbelief lying under the sway of the Satan. Satan is not merely a malevolent spirit; he delights in doing evil. As the Evil One, he is in a special sense the Tempter, sows evil in the world, and snatches away good. He has the power of death. He suggests to Judas to betray the Master, and the final surrender of the traitor to the Tempter is described in the words 'Satan entered into him.'* Subordinate to him are potentates of the dark present, the spirit-forces of evil in the heavenly sphere,† among all of whom there are degrees of malevolence.‡ The demons were numerous, they congregated in men,§ and in certain places where they might be found. These places, as can easily be understood, were uninhabited, and remote from human dwellings. Arabs and Jews thought of these malevolent beings as dwelling in deserts, waterless places, mountains, cemeteries, and places which had been deserted. The demons were able to enter into men and animals; they could go out of their own accord and they could be cast out by exorcists.‡ The entrance of a maleficent spirit made a human being a demoniac. But we get a clearer view of demonomania if we look at it from:

(a) The ethical standpoint.—People whose strangeness of life or action seemed abnormal were said to have a demon; this was said  of our Lord even by His own relatives, and of John the Baptist. In the Apostolic Age there were many people whom the writers of the NT looked upon as wicked. Amid that evil and disloyal generation †† were hypocrites, sinners, adulterers, harlots, thieves, brigands, and open enemies of our Lord and His servants. But none of these are thought of as demoniacs. The boy mentioned in Mk 9²¹ had been a demoniac from a child, hence the malady could not have arisen from moral causes. Further, the fact that demoniacs were not excluded from the synagogue †† indicates that demonomania was not looked upon as constituting them immoral characters. The demons were maleficent, some of them also malevolent, but their wickedness did not necessarily contaminate the patient morally. It is also to be observed that demoniacs were not constantly or permanently afflicted.

(b) The physical standpoint.—By the time of Jesus, the physician, separated off now from the prophet and the priest, had his distinctive name and practised his art on payment of fees. Indications are not wanting that matters of diet and the use of restoratives were studied, and as healing appliances the balm of Gilead, the waters of Siloam and Bethesda, the hot springs of Tiberias and Callirhoe were well known and widely used.††† Luke was a physician,††† and most probably it was to him that the inhabitants of Melita brought those who were diseased to receive medical treatment. These developments of medical science more and more differentiated demonomania from more normal diseases. The latter were well known and are often alluded to. Peter's mother-in-law, Æneas, Dorcas, the father of Publius, Epaphroditus, Trophimus, besides many others whom our Lord cured, all laboured under ordinary diseases and no hint is given that they were demoniacs.†††

* See the case of Hezekiah (2 K 20⁷).

† Sir 10¹⁰ 38¹⁻² 12; on 38¹⁵ see HDB iii. 321; ExpT x. [1893-99] 528; Jos. Ant. vi. viii. 2; cf. the reported hiding of a medical book of Hezekiah (HDB i. 113^a). A list of diseases will be found in HDB iii. 323.

‡ 2 Ch 21¹⁴ 18, Ex 9¹⁵, Nu 11³², Dt 28²² 27. 28 35. 60, 1 S 25³⁸ 26¹⁰, 2 S 12¹⁵ 24¹⁵, 2 K 6¹⁸, Is 37, Zec 14¹², 2 Es 15⁴, 2 Mac 9⁵; HDB iii. 323.

§ Lv 13. 14, 2 K 15⁵, Mk 14⁴⁵; Marti, The Religion of the OT, p. 113.

¶ 2 K 19³⁵, 2 S 24¹⁶, 1 Ch 21¹² 27, Dt 29²², 2 S 12¹⁵, Ex 12²⁹, Nu 11³², 1 S 25³⁸, 2 K 15⁵ 19³⁵.

¶¶ 1 S 10⁶ 11⁶ (25¹⁵) (18¹²) 16²³.

 1 S 16¹⁴.

††† Jos. Ant. vi. viii. 2, xi. 3.

§§ Id. viii. ii. 5; ExpT, 7th ser., iii. 323; JE iv. 516.

|| Mt 14²⁶, Mk 6⁴⁰, Lk 24³⁷⁻³⁹, Ac 12¹⁵.

¶¶ Mt 3¹⁶, Ro 9¹ etc., Ac 16⁷, Rev 14, Ac 10⁷; some angels had acquired names, Jude 9, 1 Th 4¹⁶, Ro 8³⁸ etc., Rev 4⁶.

 Mt 11¹⁸ 12²⁴, Lk 7²¹ 33 32 11²⁴⁻²⁶, Jn 6⁷⁰ 7³⁰ 8⁴⁸ 9¹⁰ 10²⁰ 21.

††† Rev 20², Mt 12²⁴ 30 = Mk 3²² 30 = Lk 11¹⁵ 19; DCG i. 439, 441.

§§ Eph 2², Lk 10¹³; HDB i. 55b.

§§§ Appendix to Mark in Codex W, the Freer Uncial.

* Mt 13¹⁹ 38, 1 Jn 2¹³ 31², Mt 4¹, Mk 1¹³, Lk 4¹, Jn 13²⁷, Lk 22³, Mt 13²⁵ 39, He 2¹⁴, Jn 13², Lk 22³, Jn 13²⁷.

† Eph 6¹².

‡ Mk 5⁹, Lk 8³⁰, Mt 12⁴⁵, Lk 5²⁷. Sometimes they were in parties of seven (Lk 8³¹ 11²⁶; cf. Rev 14); ERE iv. 570, 599; DCG ii. 249.

§ Mt 32¹⁰, Lk 8²⁹, Mt 12⁴⁵, Mk 5²⁻³ 5, Lk 8²⁷, Rev 18²; ExpT, 7th ser., iii. 323, 523, 529; ERE iv. 613; DCG i. 439, 441; G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, p. 281. In India the demons of disease live in damp places, latrines, ruined houses, the source of many diseases (Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, p. 104).

¶ Mk 5¹³ 13, Lk 11²⁴.

 Mk 3²², Mt 11¹⁸, Lk 7³³, Jn 7³⁰ 8⁴⁸ 5. 10²⁰.

†† Lk 11²⁹.

§§ Mt 9¹² = Mk 2¹⁷ = Lk 5³¹, Mk 5³¹, Lk 4³³ 8⁴³ omitted by BD, etc.

|| Lk 8³³ 10³⁴, 1 Ti 5²³, Mk 6¹³, Ja 5¹⁴, Jer 8²² 46¹¹ 51⁸, Ezk 27¹⁷, Jn 9¹⁶ 52¹; Jos. Ant. xviii. ii. 3; HDB ii. 103; Jos. Ant. xviii. vi. 5; PEPST xxxvii. [1906] 223.

¶¶ Col 4¹⁴.

 A. Harnack and W. Ramsay (ExpT, 7th ser., . [1906] 492), J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan (Id. vii. [1909] 472), C. T. P. Grierson (Id. viii. [1909] 514).

††† Mt 14⁴ = Mk 1³⁰, Ac 9³² 37 25⁸, Ph 2²⁶, 2 Ti 4²⁰.

In the NT the distinction is carefully observed; sicknesses and diseases are referred to as prevalent;* particular diseases are mentioned by name, as lunacy, lamorrhage, paralysis, dumbness, deafness, leprosy, fever, blindness, lameness, shrivelled limbs, drop-y, dysentery, maimedness;† disease is differentiated from demonomania.‡ These latter types of disease, differing from the other by suddenness of attack or other abnormal feature, were still, owing to ignorance of their real nature, attributed to the action of superhuman beings such as Jahweh,§ one of His messengers,|| the Satan,¶ one of his messengers, or a demon who was sometimes named from the disease with which he infected the sufferer, as a deaf and dumb spirit,†† an unclean spirit,‡‡ a spirit of infirmity,§§ etc. While doubtless the old preventives against the entrance of demons continued to be employed, the older forms of expulsion (besides the direct act of God [Col 1²]) and determined effort on the part of the sufferer [Eph 6¹⁻¹¹], such as prayer||| and exorcism,¶¶ were practised. We have no reason to suppose that our Lord and His followers thought of these diseases and remedies in any other way than the rest of their countrymen. Our Lord's method of delivering His message, like His mode of living, was to a large extent conditioned by the times in which He lived. As He condescended to become a man, He humbled Himself to become one of the itinerant healers who abounded throughout the country. This enables us to realize how Jesus commanded the attention of His countrymen not merely by curing diseases but by exorcizing demons. Further, it explains how these wonders, while attracting the crowd, did not impress the majority of the people with the fact that He was a Divine Being, any more than the miracles of Moses led the Egyptians to think of him as a messenger from Jahweh. It is very significant that, after recording the turning of water into wine (Jn 2⁴⁻⁶), the cure of the royal official's son (4⁴⁷), the healing of the invalid at the Pool of Bethesda (5¹), the feeding of the five thousand (6¹), and the walking on the sea (6¹⁹), the writer of the Fourth Gospel says that not only many of His disciples refused to associate with Him any longer (v. 66), but even His own brothers did not believe in Him (7⁵). Of the mass of the people it is said, 'But though he had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not on him' (12³⁷), but continued to demand a sign not on earth but from the heavens.

Jesus, then, cured not merely normal diseases, but cases of demonomania of which no particulars are given.††† But there are recorded four types of

* Mt 4²³ 617 935; Lk 4³⁵ 2536, 30. 4. 44, Mk 6⁵ 55. 56, Lk 4⁴⁰ 617 72. 10 92 109, Jn 5⁴ 446. 52 62 111-6, Ac 5¹⁵ 937 259, Ph 2²⁶ 27, 2 Ti 4²⁰, Jn 514 15.

† Mt 4²⁴ 105, Lk 7²²; Mt 9³⁰, Mk 5²⁵, Lk 8⁴³; Mt 4²⁴ 92, Mk 2⁸ Lk 5¹⁸, Ac 8⁷ 933; Mt 1²³ 31, Mk 7³⁷, Lk 1²⁰; Mt 11⁵, Mk 7³² 37 Lk 7²²; Mt 11⁵ 82 268, Mk 1⁴⁰ 148, Lk 4²⁷ 512 1712; Mt 8¹⁴, Mk 1³⁰, Lk 4³⁸, Jn 4⁵¹, Ac 28⁸; Mt 11⁵ 127 1514. 29-31 2030 2318, Mk 8-1046, Lk 4¹⁸ 639 72-113, Jn 6⁵³ 91 1071; Mt 11⁵ 1529. 31, Lk 7²² 1413, Jn 5², Ac 3² 87; Mt 12¹⁰, Mk 3¹, Lk 6⁶, Jn 5⁸, Lk 11-228; Mt 15³⁰, Lk 14¹⁰; minor troubles, as stomachic complaints, stammering, are also alluded to, 1 Co 12³ 13, 13-14.

‡ Mt 4²⁴ 91. 3, Ac 8⁷ 1912, Mk 13² 34 915 613 1617-18, Lk 4⁴⁰ 41 617. 18 1332 91. 3, Ac 8⁷ 1912.

§ Ac 12²³ 1311 233.

|| Lk 13¹⁶.

¶ Mt 9¹⁷ 25.

||| Mt 13¹¹.

¶¶ Cf. the Mesopotamian differentiation of functions of the spirits of disease (Maspero, The Dawn of Civilization, p. 631). The conception of disease produced by supernatural agents or causes is found in Rev 9¹, 1 Co 11³⁰; cf. Ps 103³, Jahweh 'who healeth all thy diseases.'

 Mt 17²¹, Mk 9²⁹.

††† Jos. BJ vii. vi. 3; Lk 10¹⁷; Davies, Magic, Divination, and Demonology, p. 20.

 DCG ii. 92, 93; P. Dearmer, Body and Soul, London, 1909, p. 146; T. J. Hudson, The Law of Psychic Phenomena, do., 1913, chs. xxiii. xxiv.; G. J. Romanes, Thoughts on Religion, do., 1896, p. 180, and C. Gore's note; Expt xxv. [1913-14] 483.

††† Mt 4¹ 516, Mk 13² 34. 15 67 1617, Lk 8² 441 721 1332.

demonomania which appeared, and might well appear, to those of that age to be caused by the intrusion of a demon: (1) where certain organs existed but seemed prevented from fulfilling their proper functions, as cases of dumbness (Mt 9³², Lk 11¹⁴), dumbness allied with blindness (Mt 12²²), and dumbness aggravated by deafness, sudden convulsions, causing suicidal tendencies, foaming at the mouth and grinding the teeth (Mt 17¹⁸, Mk 9¹⁷⁻²⁶, Lk 9³⁷⁻⁴³); (2) the case of the demoniac of Capernaum, where the demon made its presence felt in onteries, shrieks, and convulsions (Mk 1³⁻²⁶, Lk 4³³⁻³⁵); (3) the demoniac or demoniacs of Gadara present still stronger evidence of what would be deemed embodiment, such as abnormal physical strength, exhibiting itself in fierceness, violence, the breaking of chains and fetters, passion for seclusion among the tombs and mountains, frenzied shriekings, self-mutilation, nakedness, homicidal tendencies, loss of the sense of personality, and identification of the patient with the demon (Mt 8²⁸⁻³², Mk 5²⁻¹³, Lk 8²¹⁻²⁶); and (4) the case of the daughter of the Syrophenician woman, in which the cure was effected when the afflicted person was not present (Mt 15²²⁻²⁸, Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰).

The question of how Jesus accomplished these cures brings us face to face with problems which have not as yet been satisfactorily solved, but which the study of insanity and kindred diseases will doubtless one day clearly explain. As to the outward methods employed, it is noticeable that our Lord used no incantations or similar outward means. He seems to have been in the habit of laying His hands on the sufferers, and this became a means by which spiritual blessing was also conveyed.‡ His word alone seems to have been effective.§ Jesus Himself uses two expressions to indicate the power which lay behind and wrought through touch and word—'the Spirit of God' (Mt 12³) and 'the finger of God' (Lk 11¹⁹). These expressions do not help us much to understand the authority which the crowds recognized as accompanying His acts (Mk 1²⁷); nor, indeed, do the words of the Third Evangelist (Lk 5¹⁷): 'the power of the Lord was present for the work of healing.' The difficulty is not lessened when we remember that this power is said to have been conveyed by Jesus to the Twelve and to the Seventy (see EXORCISM). Indeed it is increased when we learn that, even during our Lord's ministry, unauthorized exorcists effected cures in His name (Mk 9³⁸, Lk 9⁴⁹, Mt 7²²), that such power was promised 'to all those that believe' (Mk 16¹⁷), and that Jewish exorcists used His name in a magical formula to cast out demons (Ac 19¹³).

The real solution would seem to lie in the direction of suggestion. Suggestion is defined as 'the communication of any proposition from one person (or persons) to another in such a way as to secure its acceptance with conviction, in the absence of adequate logical grounds for its acceptance.' The idea thus suggested 'is held to operate powerfully upon his bodily and mental processes,' with the result that owing to the conditions of mental dissociation 'the dominance of the suggested idea is complete and absolute.'|| Suggestion is most effective when the agent is a person with an intense personality wielding magnetic power, when he has gained a reputation for power to do what he is expected to do, and distinguished by

* W. M. Alexander, Demonic Possession in the NT, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 81.

† Ib. p. 89.

‡ Mt 9¹⁸, Mk 5²³ 62. 5 823. 25 927, Lk 1⁴⁰ 1313, Ac 5¹² 917 828; cf. Ac 8⁷; Dearmer, Body and Soul, p. 168; Mt 19¹³, Mk 1³¹, Ac 6⁸ 812 13. 19 133 196, 1 Ti 4¹⁴ 522.

§ Mt 8⁸ 82 1718, Mk 6⁶, Lk 4³³ 36.

|| EBrii xxvi. 49.

some outstanding quality like kingship or holiness, and if there has grown up a widespread popular belief in his power; also when the patient is inferior in knowledge or station to the agent. Suggestion becomes still more powerful if the attention of both is intensely concentrated on the purpose to be accomplished, if the impression has already been produced that the agent will accomplish his task, and if consciousness is practically, for the time being, concentrated on the one thing. Of course the more direct and powerful the suggestion and the more receptive the patient, the greater the success.* A careful reading of the cures of demonomania effected by our Lord will show how the factors making for success were not only present, but powerfully present. We are in this way led to the conclusion that there is 'no reason to suppose that the cases . . . recorded [in the NT] were due to anything but disease. . . . No facts are recorded which are not explicable either as the ordinary symptoms of mental disease or as the result of suggestion.'†

The Jewish doctrine as to demonomania will be found fully developed in the Talmud.‡

The article EXORCISM shows how belief in demonomania and its cure by exorcism prevailed in the Apostolic Church, and among the Fathers.§ In the post-Apostolic Church these beliefs were, if possible, even more strongly held. Justin Martyr says|| that some Christians had 'the spirit of healing,' and claims¶ that their exorcism in the name of Christ always succeeded, while success was probable only if the exorcism was in the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. 'The church sharply distinguished between exorcists who employed the name of Christ, and pagan sorcerers and magicians, etc.; but . . . several of her exorcists were just as dubious characters as her "prophets." From the time of Justin Martyr for about two centuries there is not a single Christian writer who does not solemnly and explicitly assert the reality and frequent employment of exorcism. The Christians fully recognized the supernatural power possessed by the Jewish and Gentile exorcists, but they claimed to be in many respects their superiors. By the simple sign of the Cross or by repeating the name of the Master they professed to be able to cast out devils which had resisted all the enchantments of the pagan exorcists. Tertullian, Origen, Lactantius, Athanasius, Augustine, and Minucius Felix all profess their faith in demonomania and exorcism.†† In the mediæval Church the εὐεργουμένοι, persons who are apt to become possessed, and to whom a special part of the church was exclusively assigned, were under the care of an εὐοκιστής.‡‡

The belief in demonomania lingered, and still lingers, in certain Christian circles. We have it in the Church. The rite of casting out demons from the bodies of the possessed is still retained in the rituals of the Roman and Greek Churches,§§ the exorcist in the former Communion occupying the third place among the four minor orders. It still holds a place in the belief and ritual of the Maronite Church.* In England, by the 72nd Canon of A.D. 1603, 'no minister or ministers shall, without licence and direction of the bishop . . . attempt . . . to cast out any devil or devils.'† Among individuals we find Burton‡ a firm believer in demonomania. Times of excitement, especially of religious excitement, rouse the belief in demons and demonomania. Certain disturbances which occurred in the Rectory at Epworth were ascribed by the Wesleys to the devil.§ Wesley (1703-28) himself believed that disease and other discomforts were caused by demons, and that epilepsy was often the result of possession.|| He gives several cases of such disease, where the afflicted person believed that he or she was possessed by an evil spirit, and who were partially or completely cured by exorcism.¶ Cotton Mather (1663-1728) was a fervent believer in demonomania. Lavater (1741-1801) was so convinced of the facts of possession that he was seriously concerned with the cessation of the gifts of healing and miracle-working power possessed by the early Church. The obsolete word 'demonagogue' was used as late as 1736 to indicate a medium 'useful in expelling preternatural substances from the body.'†† George Lukins, who was possessed of seven devils who threw him into fits, and talked, sang, and barked out of him, was cured by a solemn exorcism by seven clergymen at the Temple Church in Bristol in 1788.‡‡ In 1843 Pastor Blumhardt exorcized the devil out of the sisters Dittus.§§ As late as 1843 'demonifuge' was used to mean some substance, like salt, used to drive away demons. In countries still under the sway of animism the belief exists in all its pristine strength. In Ceylon the exorcist will demand the name of the demon possessing a person, and the person will give the demon's name.||| To the question 'Does Devil-possession, in the sense in which it is referred to in the New Testament, exist at this present time amongst the least civilized of the nations of the globe?' R. C. Caldwell gives an answer in the affirmative, and gives instances of such possession from Southern India.¶¶ Among all peoples of the lower culture demonomania and exorcism are mixed up with a good deal of trickery and ventriloquism. But even among the more highly educated races the belief ever and anon becomes more or less prominent. The diseases which were ascribed to demons still occur, and where a person of powerful will and outstanding religiosity, with a profound belief in himself and in demon-possession, attains to some eminence, then persons more or less demoniac are treated by exorcism. But modern exorcism—or Divine healing, as it is sometimes called—rests very much on the personality of Satan and on subordinate demons only as doing his work; ††† and so the patient should be treated only by those who are 'anointed by the Holy Spirit.' †††† Nevius, an American missionary, found that in China demonomania was not an uncommon disease, and that the Chinese ascribed it, as all people of

* W. MacDougall, Psychology, London, 1912, p. 196; EB ii xxvi. 49; Boris Sidis, The Psychology of Suggestion, do., 1898, pp. 56, 79; DCG i. 402; Boris Sidis and S. P. Goodhart, Multiple Personality, New York, 1905, which contains an account of the famous Hanna Case; Hudson, The Law of Psychic Phenomena, p. 351.

† EB ii xxii. 175.

‡ Jos. Ant. viii. ii. 5; DCG i. 439; Exp. 7th ser., iii. 320, 325. § HJ xi. 153.

¶ Dial. c. Tryph. 30, 39, 76; Apol. ii. 5, 6.

 Apol. ii. 6; Dial. 30, 85.

†† Harnack, *Mission and Expansion of Christianity*², tr. J. Moffatt, London, 1908, i. 132.

‡‡ W. E. H. Lecky, History of European Morals, London, 1911, i. 161; HDB iii. 39; art. EXORCISM; Exp. 7th ser., viii. 515; de Civitate Dei, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1871, ii. 490; Tylor, PC ii. 139.

§§ See art. EXORCISM and authorities quoted there; ERE, 'Demons and Spirits (Christian).'

¶¶ Tylor, PC ii. 142.

* PEFSt xxiv. [1892] 144.

† Dearmer, Body and Soul, p. 289.

‡ Robert Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, ed. London, 1866, pt. i. sect. i. mem. 1, subsect. 1; Tylor, *PC*⁴, p. 191.

§ R. Southey, Life of Wesley, new ed., London, 1864, pp. 16, 306.

¶ Ib. p. 365.

 The Journal of the Rev. J. Wesley (Everyman ed.), i. 190, 235, 237, 295, 363, 412, 557, ii. 100, 225, 259, 309, iii. 149.

†† HJ xiii. [1914] 191.

††† OED iii. 135.

‡‡ Tylor, *PC*⁴ ii. 140.

§§ Dearmer, Body and Soul, p. 373.

¶¶ Tylor, *PC*⁴ ii. 404.

¶¶ R. C. Caldwell, CR xxvii. [1876] 369 L.

 Tylor, *PC*⁴ ii. 152.

††† Howton, Divine Healing, p. 82.

††† Ib. p. 90.

the lower culture do and did, to the action of demons—a belief confirmed among the Chinese Christians by the narratives of the NT. Nevius did not attempt to cast out the demons by exorcism or the use of the name of Jesus. The most that he and the other missionaries did was to pray for the relief of the patient . . . 'and the demon, speaking apparently in a different personality and with a different voice, confessed the power of Jesus, and departed.'* Howton, who declares he has seen demons possessing human bodies, and producing exactly similar effects to those described in the Word of God,† gives many instances of cures effected by himself, of which the following is typical. A local preacher afflicted evidently by multiple personality had baffled Howton, but he says, 'early one morning the Spirit of God came upon me and I commanded the Demon in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to come out of him. The Evil Spirit threw him on the floor, made him writhe like a serpent, and foam at the mouth, and then left him. He was cured.'‡

It is somewhat difficult to draw the line between the milder forms of demonomania and certain forms of temptation, convictions of sin, and even theological scepticism. John Bunyan's prolonged periods of melancholia, Brainerd's deep convictions of evil, Carlyle's 'Stygian darkness' are all instances in point. In many cases these feelings are symptoms of an already existing pathological state. This feeling in its strongest form 'manifests itself in the idea of demoniacal possession. The foreign evil power by which the patient imagines he is governed, assumes different demoniacal shapes, according to the prevailing superstitions and beliefs of the epoch and country. The chief differentiating mark of demon possession is the automatic presentation and the persistent and consistent acting out of a new personality. With this are associated convulsions of the voluntary muscles, contraction of the larynx which alters the voice in a striking manner, anaesthesia of different important organs, hallucinations of sight and hearing. This delirium is at times accompanied by intermittent paroxysms of violent convulsions, evidently analogous to epileptic or, still more frequently, hysterical attacks, which are separated by intervals of perfect lucidity.'§ At Gheel in Belgium there was a shrine of St. Dymphna to which in former days lunatics were carried in large numbers to have the demons expelled. Many are still taken there, but to be treated by physicians.¶ That men have believed in certain things 'is ground for holding that such ideas were indeed produced in men's minds by efficient causes, but it is not ground for holding that the rites in question are profitable, the beliefs sound, and the history authentic.'¶ To seek, to-day, for the action of a demon in a case of demonomania would be just as sensible as to take a walk into a desert to have an interview with Lilith or Azazel. As Comte well said, 'no conception can be understood except through its history.'

P. A. GORDON CLARK.

POSSESSIONS.—See WEALTH and COMMUNITY OF GOODS.

POTENTATE.—The word occurs only in the designation of God in 1 Ti 6¹⁵, 'the blessed and only Potentate (δυναστης), the King of kings, and Lord of lords.' This is the only instance in the NT in which the word δυναστης is applied to God. It occurs with tolerable frequency in this sense in the apocryphal books, e.g. Sir 46⁴, 2 Mac 3²⁴ 12¹⁵, 3 Mac 2⁵. It is characteristic of the Pastoral Epistles to set God in the foreground as the author or salvation, and the heaping up of attributes in this passage to denote the Divine sovereignty may be merely an instance of this tendency. Some, however, find underlying it a protest against Gnostic misrepresentations, or against the growing practice of Emperor-worship.

G. WAUCHOPE STEWART.

POTTER (κεραμεύς).—The ceramic art is of great antiquity. Wherever the primitive races of mankind found clay, they became potters. Rude baked vessels are found with the remains of our remotest ancestors. In the story of the creation, God is represented as a Potter moulding the human body out of the dust of the ground (Gn 2⁷; cf. Job 10⁹ 33⁹), and thoughtful men in all ages have figured themselves, in their whole relation to God, as clay in the Potter's hands (Is 45⁹ 64⁸, Jer 18⁶, Ro 9²¹). In one aspect the metaphor is still readily accepted, for all devout men believe in the Divinity that shapes their ends. The classical modern expression of the doctrine is found in Browning's Rabbi Ben Ezra:

'Ay, note that Potter's wheel,
That metaphor! and feel
Why time spins fast, why passive lies our clay,—

But I need, now as then,
Thee, God, who mouldest men;

My times be in Thy hand!
Perfect the cup as planned!'

But God's 'vessels of wrath' (Ro 9²²) create a difficulty for the reason as well as the heart, a difficulty which becomes a σκανδαλον when the phrase is interpreted as meaning that 'the Lord has created those who, as He certainly foreknew, were to go to destruction, and He did so because He so willed' (J. Calvin, Institutes, Eng. tr., 1879, ii. 229). Such a doctrine has been a rock of offence to very many. The legitimate protest of the clay is heard in the quatrains of Omar Khayyam; and the last word of the Christian spirit is not uttered in the militant Messianic Psalm quoted in the Apocalypse: 'Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel' (Ps 2⁹ || Rev 2²⁷). See PREDESTINATION.

JAMES STRAHAN.

POVERTY.—See POOR, POVERTY.

POWER, POWERS.—Six Greek expressions are thus translated in the EV.

1. ἐξουσία is rendered thus frequently in the AV. It means, more exactly, 'authority, which the RV often substitutes, but sometimes, especially in Rev., it follows the AV. The Revisers prefer 'right' in Ro 9²¹, 1 Co 9⁴, 2 Th 3⁹. In Ac 26¹⁸ the expression 'the power (ἐξουσία) of Satan' is to be noted, with which compare Lk 22²⁸, Col 1¹³.

2. δυναμεις.—We find 'the power of God' in 1 Co 1¹⁸ 24²⁵, 2 Co 6⁷; 'the power of our Lord Jesus' in 1 Co 5⁴; 'the power of the Holy Ghost' in Ro 15¹³ 19; in Ac 8¹⁰ 'that power of God which is called Great' is a title given to Simon Magus. There is a strange variation in the RV of 2 Co 12⁹, where δυναμεις is twice used as an attribute of Christ; on the first occasion it renders 'my power is made perfect in weakness' (AV 'my strength'), but on the second (where the AV has 'power') it gives 'that the strength of Christ may rest upon me.' Elsewhere 'power' is uniformly used by the RV, replacing 'might' and 'strength' of the AV (cf. Eph 1²¹, Col 1¹¹, Rev 12¹⁰).

3. κράτος is rendered 'power' by the AV in Eph

* Nevius, Demon Possession, p. vii, etc.; A. Lang, The Making of Religion, London, 1898, p. 141.

† Howton, Divine Healing, p. 89.

‡ Ib. pp. 93, 103–106, 108; R. Brown, Demonology and Witchcraft, p. 90; Nevius, Demon Possession, pp. 13, 35.

§ W. Griesinger, Mental Pathology, New York, 1882, pp. 168, 186, 206; Exp. 7th ser., viii. 510.

¶ K. Baedeker, *Belgium and Holland*¹¹, London, 1894, p. 184.

¶ Tylor, PC i. 13.

 Quoted by Tylor, ib. p. 19.

1⁹ 6¹⁰, Col 1¹¹, Rev 5¹², 1 Ti 6¹⁶, He 2¹⁴; in the last two references the RV also translates in the same way.

4. δύναμις (2 Th 1⁹) is rendered AV 'power,' RV 'might.'

5. τὸ δυνατόν.—In Ro 9²² AV and RV have 'willing to make his power known,' i.e. 'what is possible to Him.'

6. τῷ δυναμένῳ is translated in Ro 16²⁵ 'to him that is of power'; RV 'to him that is able.'

Lastly, in Rev. the AV sometimes inserts the word 'power' from the sense, where there is no Greek to correspond, e.g. Rev 6⁴, 'power was given to him' (ἐδόθη αὐτῷ); cf. 11³ 13¹⁵ 16⁵, in all of which the word disappears from the RV.

The plural 'powers' represents δυνάμεις in He 6⁵, Ro 8⁸, 1 P 3²²; in the last two references angelic beings seem to be meant, as also in Eph 1²¹ and 1 Co 15⁴ (singular). 'Powers' is used by the AV and the RV for ἐξουσίαι (another class of angels) in Eph 3¹⁰ 6¹², Col 1¹⁸ 2¹⁵, and in Ro 13¹⁻³ in the sense of 'earthly rulers.' In Tit 3¹ the AV gives 'powers,' the RV 'authorities' (q.v.). See, further, art. PRINCIPALITY.

W. H. DUNDAS.

PRÆTOR.—In origin this word means 'the man who goes before (the army),' præ-itor, 'the general,' and was applied to the chief magistrates of Rome, when the kingdom gave place to the republic. On the appointment (367 B.C.) of two extra officials to look after the legal business of the Roman State, the name prætor was given to them, and a new name consul was given to the chief magistrates. The same Greek equivalent, στρατηγός ('general'), was used for prætor always, though the duties had changed. The prætors of Ac 16²⁰ are the chief magistrates of Philippi, a Roman colonia. It is not impossible that prætores was their official title, but it is generally believed that in their case it was merely honorary (see under MAGISTRATE). See W. M. Ramsay in JThSt i. [1899-1900] 114 ff.

A. SOUTER.

PRÆTORIAN GUARD.—See GUARD.

PRÆTORIUM (πραιτώριον).—Originally denoting the general's (i.e. the prætor's) tent in the camp (Liv. x. 33), this word came to signify the official residence of the governor of a province (Cic. in Verr. ii. iv. 28, v. 35), and in post-Augustan times a palace (Juv. x. 161) or any splendid country-seat (Suet. Aug. 72, Juv. Sat. i. 75). See, further, art. PALACE.

JAMES STRAHAN.

PRAISE.—1. Ideal of praise.—'He knows little of himself who is not much in prayer, and he knows little of God who is not much in praise.' These words express the habitual thought and practice of the Apostolic Church. We must distinguish between praise and thanksgiving. We praise God for what He is, we thank Him for what He has done. It is possible that a strain of selfishness may creep into our thanksgivings—the Pharisee spirit is not easy to eradicate. But a sincere heart is lifted by praise to the highest level of adoration. With angels and archangels we laud and magnify, saying 'Holy, Holy, Holy.' If we cannot trace the Sanctus of the Eucharist back to the 1st cent., we can affirm that it was based on the teaching of the Apocalypse, and may be said to perpetuate in the highest degree the doxologies so often heard on the lips of apostolic writers.

There are two points to be remembered: (1) the rich inheritance of the traditions of praise derived from the Temple services, and (2) the teaching of the Synagogue that, when one is cut off from participation in sacrifices, praise should take their place. The few scattered hints in the Acts support the paradox that least is said in the NT about that which is most familiar in thought and practice. The preparation of the apostles for Pentecost was to be continually in the Temple praising God (Lk 24⁵³). Afterwards we read that the apostles 'did take their food with gladness, . . . praising God' (Ac 2⁴⁶). Peter and John going to the Temple at the hour of prayer were certainly in accord with the Psalmist: 'Seven times a day will I praise thee' (Ps 119¹⁶⁴); and the lame man, whom Peter healed, instinctively praised God (Ac 3⁸). When Peter reported to the apostles and brethren the gift of the Holy Ghost to the Gentile Cornelius and his friends they glorified God (11¹⁸).

St. Paul goes very deeply into the thought of praise as an essential part of devotion when he speaks of the degradation of the heathen world as in a great measure due to their neglect of praise. 'Knowing God, they glorified him not as God' (Ro 1¹).^{*} His own practice may be illustrated by the fact that when he and Silas had been beaten with rods at Philippi they sang hymns to God (Ac 16²⁵). And in Ro 1²⁵ he turns from the loathsome subject of heathen immorality to give glory to God, as if to guard himself from contamination, just as he prepares himself for his impassioned argument on backsliding Israel by an ascription of praise to 'God blessed for ever' (9⁵), and passes into another doxology at the end of his argument (11³⁵⁻³⁶). As he pictures Abraham when he received God's promise of a son giving glory to God (4²¹), so he desires that Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy (10³, quoting Ps 135¹ 117¹ LXX).

The Epistle to the Ephesians opens (1¹⁻¹⁴) with a great ascription of praise to God for the blessing of the Church. We are chosen in Christ that we should be 'holy to the praise of the glory of his grace.' Again and again he repeats the cadence 'to the praise of his glory.'

This level is worthily sustained in He 2¹—'in the midst of the congregation will I sing praise unto thee,' when the writer quotes Ps 22². As the typical king David comes to his own despite Saul's persecution, so does Christ the true King in the hour of His victory over pain acknowledge His people as brethren, and the citizens of His Kingdom take the song of praise from the lips of their King.

Again in He 13¹⁵ it is suggested that our praises are only worthily offered through our great High Priest: 'Through him let us offer up a sacrifice of praise.' The phrase is quoted from Lv 7¹³, where it is used for the highest form of peace offering. B. F. Westcott (ad loc.) adds that the word 'sacrifice' in Mal 1¹¹ 'appears to have been understood in the early Church of the prayers and thanksgivings connected with the Eucharist.' From praise for 'the revelation of God in Christ (His Name)' the writer goes on naturally to speak (v. 16) of kindly service and almsgiving, for 'praise to God is service to men.'

St. Peter also has a characteristic passage on praise (1 P 2⁹): 'That ye may tell forth the excellencies of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light.' He is quoting 2 Is 43¹, and his word 'excellencies,' standing for Hebrew 'my praise,' means an eminent quality in any person or thing, and the idea is blended with that of the impression which it makes on others; 'the one sense involves the other, for all praises of God must be praises either of His excellencies or of His acts as manifestations of His excellencies' (F. J. A. Hort, ad loc.). St. Peter does not say how the Asiatic Christians are to tell them forth, but he implies that their lives must correspond to their worship.

There is a fine saying of Rabindranath Tagore to the effect that the future Saviour of India will be known not so much by the light which streams from Him as by the light which is reflected to Him from His people. 'This calling into God's light . . . is thus fitly chosen as the characteristic act of Him whose excellencies the Christians were to tell forth, because it was on their use of the realm of vision thus opened to them that their power of exhibiting Him to men in grateful praise would depend' (Hort, ad loc.).

^{*} Cf. Ac 12²³, 'Herod was punished because he gave not God the glory.'

The reference to 'marvellous light' suggests a reminiscence of the Transfiguration, and the idea is paraphrased in Clement of Rome (36): 'Through Him [Jesus Christ] let us gaze into the heights of the heavens; through Him we behold as in a mirror His spotless and supernal countenance; through Him the eyes of our heart were opened; through Him our dull and darkened mind burgeons anew into the light' (quoted by Hort, ib.; cf. 2 P 1¹⁶).

It may be of interest to classify (after Westcott) the various doxologies found in the Epistles and the Apocalypse.

- (1) Gal 1⁵. To whom [our God and Father] be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.
- (2) Ro 11³⁶. To him [the Lord] be the glory for ever. Amen.
- (3) Ro 16²⁷. To the only wise God through Jesus Christ [to whom] be the glory for ever. Amen.
- (4) Ph 4²⁰. Unto our God and Father be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.
- (5) Eph 3²¹. Unto him [that is able to do exceeding abundantly] be the glory, in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations for ever and ever. Amen.
- (6) 1 Ti 1¹⁷. Unto the King eternal . . . the only God be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.
- (7) 1 Ti 6¹⁶. To whom [the blessed and only Potentate . . .] be honour and power eternal. Amen.
- (8) 2 Ti 4¹⁸. To whom [the Lord] be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.
- (9) He 13²¹. To whom [the God of peace or possibly Jesus Christ] be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.
- (10) 1 P 4¹¹. To whom [God or, possibly, Jesus Christ] is the glory and the dominion for ever and ever. Amen.
- (11) 1 P 5¹¹. To him [God] be the dominion for ever and ever. Amen.
- (12) 2 P 3¹⁸. To him [our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ] be the glory both now and for ever. Amen.
- (13) Jude 25. To the only God our Saviour through Jesus Christ our Lord be glory, majesty, dominion and power before all time, and now, and for evermore. Amen.
- (14) Rev 1⁶. Unto him [that loveth us and loosed us from our sins] be the glory and the dominion for ever and ever. Amen.
- (15) Rev 5¹³. Unto him that sitteth on the throne and unto the Lamb be the blessing and the honour and the glory and the dominion for ever and ever. And the four living creatures said, Amen.
- (16) Rev 7¹². Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

Westcott notes that all except (12) and perhaps (16) are closed by Amen. They vary greatly in detail. We may consider first the address, which in most cases is made to the Father, in two—(3) and (13)—through Christ, and in three to Christ—(8) (12), and (14), possibly also (9) and (10). The richness and variety of the titles in St. Paul's doxologies contrast with the simplicity of his ascription of 'glory.' In one instance he adds 'honour,' in another substitutes 'honour and dominion.' Enlargement of the ascription is found in Jude, and above all in the central vision of the Apocalypse when the seven-fold theme marks the highest range of praise.

It seemed best to incorporate in the foregoing the formal doxologies of this type in the Apocalypse, but others claim mention. In 4⁸ the living creatures say: 'Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God, the Almighty, which was and which is and which is to come. In Swete's words (ad loc.): 'This ceaseless activity of Nature under the Hand of God is a ceaseless tribute of praise.' The elders also lay down their crowns of victory before the Throne with their tribute of praise (v. 11): 'Worthy art thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honour and the power: for thou didst create all things, and because of thy will they were, and were created.'

It is interesting to note how much fuller is the doxology which the angels in 5¹ offer to the Lamb, adding 'riches, wisdom, strength, and blessing,' and showing how 'they recognize both the grandeur of the Lord's sacrificial act, and its infinite merit' (Swete, ad loc.).

A four-fold doxology follows from all creation (no. (15) above), 'dominion' taking the place of the angels' word 'strength,' 'active power being here in view rather than a reserve of secret strength' (Swete, ad loc.).

The seven-fold doxology of the angels in 7¹² (no. (16) above) again follows a short doxology of the Church (v. 10): 'Salvation unto our God which sitteth on the throne and unto the Lamb.' But they do not include the Lamb as in 5¹¹.

2. Music.—Our study of the ideal of praise in the Apostolic Church would be incomplete without some reference to the music both vocal and instrumental in which pious hearts desired to express it. The earliest Christian hymns were sung, no doubt, like the psalms, but we know very little if anything about the vocal method of the Hebrews. A. Edersheim, however, thinks that some of the music still used in the Synagogue must date back to the time when the Temple was still standing, and traces 'in the so-called Gregorian tones . . . a close approximation to the ancient hymnody of the Temple' (The Temple, p. 81). References to musical instruments are few in number. St. Paul refers to pipes, harps, trumpets, and cymbals. The pipe was a cane pierced with holes for notes, or a bit of wood bored out and played like a flageolet.

The harp (κithara) was an instrument of seven strings akin to a lyre. St. Paul argues (1 Co 14⁷) that, unless pipe or harp gives a distinction in the sounds, no clear thought will be conveyed to the hearer, just as a trumpet must give no uncertain sound in a call to arms. He refers also to cymbals, half-globes generally of bronze, giving out a clanging sound which cannot be tuned to accord with other instruments. They are symbolic of a character which makes professions in words but is lacking in love, or, as Edersheim puts it, 'he compares the gift of "tongues" to the sign or signal by which the real music of the Temple was introduced' (op. cit. p. 78). Edersheim (ib. p. 75) also draws an 'analogy between the time when these "harps" are introduced' in the heavenly services (Rev 5³ 14²⁻³) 'and the period in the Temple-service when the music began—just as the joyous drink-offering was poured out.' And again in Rev 15² 'the "harps of God" are sounded "with pointed allusion . . . to the Sabbath services in the Temple," when special canticles (Dt 32, Ex 15) were sung, to which the Song of Moses and of the Lamb corresponds when sung by the Church at rest. There was a certain prejudice against the music of flutes, but they seem to have been used at Alexandria to accompany the hymns at the Agape until Clement of Alexandria substituted harps about A.D. 190.

The references to praise in the Apostolic Fathers bring out the same underlying ideas. We find in Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. i. 61: 'O Thou, who alone art able to do these things, and things far more exceeding good than these for us, we praise Thee through the High Priest and Guardian of our souls, Jesus Christ, through whom be the glory and the majesty unto Thee both now and for all generations and for ever and ever. Amen.'

The ancient homily known as 2 Clement exhorts to give God 'eternal praise not from our lips only but from our heart' (ii. 9).

The Epistle of Barnabas (7) bids 'the children of gladness understand that the good Lord manifested all things to us beforehand, that we might know to whom we ought in all things to render thanksgiving and praise.' The author of the Odes of Solomon (Ode 6) compares a soul at praise to a harp, as both Philo (i. 374) and Plato (Phædo, 86A) had done: 'As the hand moves over the harp and the strings speak, so speaks in my members the Spirit of the Lord, and I speak of His love.'

Ignatius also writes to the Philadelphians (ad Phil. 1) of their bishop as 'attuned in harmony with the commandments, as a lyre with its strings.'

Delight in self-surrender quickens adoration. In the beautiful words of J. F. D. Maurice: 'What we desire for ourselves and for our race, the greatest redemption we can dream of, is gathered up in the words, "Thine is the glory"' (The Lord's Prayer, London, 1848, p. 130).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the Commentaries referred to in the text, see A. J. Worledge, Prayer, London, 1902; W. Milligan, *The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord*², do., 1894, p. 2991; A. Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services as they were at the Time of Jesus Christ, do., n.d.; E. Leyrer, art. 'Musik bei den Hebræern' in PRE³; J. Stainer, The Music of the Bible, new ed., London, 1914.

A. E. BURN.

PRAYER.—1. General.—Prayer was to the Apostolic Church the very secret of a 'life hid with Christ in God' (Col 3³). It was to them the most natural thing in the world to pray for guidance in perplexity, for strength and blessing when the will of God was manifest. In a word, their intercourse with God passed through the whole scale of feeling from the low note of penitence to the highest notes of thanksgiving and praise. Petition for themselves invariably grew into intercession for others and was never the last word of prayer. Alike when the apostles were about to choose a successor to Judas (Ac 1-4) and when the Church of Antioch sent forth Barnabas and Paul on their first missionary journey (13³), prayer was offered. When Paul was kept in prison, he desired and expected such earnest prayer of the Church unto God for him as was offered by the Church of Jerusalem for Peter (12⁵).

At first the Temple was the centre for the Christians' devotions. They clung to it as 'the house of prayer,' and used 'the prayers' (3¹) of Jewish devotion at the customary hours. The third hour was marked by the gift of the Spirit (2¹⁸), the ninth by the miracle of the healing of a lame man by Peter and John on their way to prayer (3¹), the sixth by the vision which taught Peter to receive Gentile converts. The ill-will of priests and Sadducees only drove them to more earnest prayer for grace to speak God's word 'with all boldness' (Ac 4²⁴⁻³⁰). There is a deep thought in 1 Jn 3² where prayer is spoken of as the boldness with which a son appears before the Father to make requests. Every such prayer is answered 'not as a reward for meritorious action, but because the prayer itself rightly understood coincides with God's will' (Westcott, ad loc.).

The chief characteristic of Christian prayer is the new power which the fellowship of the Spirit brought to Christians, and the grace of perseverance (Eph 6¹⁸). It is the Spirit whose voice within each child of God cries 'Abba, Father' (Gal 4⁶).^{*} And, when we are weak and know not what to pray for, 'the Spirit itself entreats for us with groans which are not to be expressed in words,' 'bears His part in our present difficulties' and makes 'our inarticulate longings for a better life . . . audible to God . . . and acceptable to Him since they are the voice of His Spirit' (H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, London, 1909, pp. 220, 221). In this deepest teaching of Paul we are led to associate with the work of the Spirit within the intercession of the Son at the Right Hand (Ro 8³⁴). And we find the clue to the great prayers of Paul.

Beginning with 1 Th 1²⁻³, we find that the Apostle includes thanksgiving, intercession, and consciousness of the presence of God as of the needs of others. He lays stress on the need of intelligence if prayer is to edify (1 Co 14¹⁴). And along with intelligence he demands from the Christian soldier the resolute perseverance which characterizes his own prayers.

Eph 6¹⁸.—The universality of the duty as to mode, times, and persons is enforced by the words 'all prayer,' 'at all seasons,' 'in all perseverance,' 'for all the saints.'

Ro 1⁸⁻¹².—As elsewhere, Paul begins with thankfulness, offering all prayer through the one Mediator, to whom he commends all the service of the Roman Christians, remembering them, no doubt by name, and desiring to see them both to impart and to receive grace.

Eph 1¹⁵⁻¹⁹ 3¹⁴⁻¹⁹.—Again, beginning with thanksgiving, he asks that his friends may have the spirit of efficiency, growth in knowledge, enlightenment, issuing in power. Knowledge and power are the keynotes in the second prayer, in which there is remarkable social teaching. As each individual is strengthened, the life of the whole community will be uplifted by the Spirit of the Father from whom every fatherhood is named, and who has sent the Christ to teach love as 'the characteristic virtue both of the historic Person and of the ideal State' (Chadwick, Pastoral Teaching of St. Paul, p. 292).

In Col 1⁹ the same keynotes—knowledge, strength, thankfulness—recur. Knowledge of God's will affects conduct; under the guidance of the Spirit we are led to new forms of service, are enabled to bear with cheerfulness our difficulties and disappointments, assured that the lot of the saints is a privilege 'in the [Divine] light.'

In Ph 1⁹⁻¹¹ Paul prays that love may abound in knowledge and in all perception. All the faculties of reason and emotion will be cultivated in the well-balanced life, in which enthusiasm does not overpower intelligence and tact, but in the long series of moral choices, by which character is built up, the presence and power of Christ will determine the goal which is 'the fruit of righteousness' in a life lived in union with Him. 'Gloria Dei vivens homo.'

These prayers of Paul throw a bright light on the meaning of the different words for prayer which are often discussed from a philological rather than from a religious point of view. The most important are united in the explicit charge given to Timothy (1 Ti 2¹⁴): 'I exhort therefore, first of all, that supplications (δεσσεις), prayers (προσευχαι), intercessions (ἐντεύξεις), thanksgivings (εὐχαριστιαί), be made for all men; for kings and all that are in high place; that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and gravity.' Here προσευχή means prayer in general, always as addressed to God, whereas εὐχή means more often a vow than prayer; δεσσις is prayer for particular benefits; ἐντεύξις (lit. 'a pleading for or against others') includes the idea of approach (ἐντυγχάνω) which in Ro 8²⁶ emphasizes its meaning of the intercession of the Spirit, and in Ro 8³⁴, He 7²⁵ of the Son. Other words are αἰτήματα, a petition of man to God (Ph 4⁶, 1 Jn 5¹⁵); and ἱκετήρια, an adjective used at first with such a word as ράβδος or ελαία, picturing the symbol of supplication, an olive branch bound round with wool carried by the suppliant.

While all Christians are exhorted to pray without ceasing (1 Th 5¹⁷) it was regarded as a special privilege of those who had leisure, such as 'widows indeed' (1 Ti 5⁵), to continue in supplications and prayers night and day. Thus the apostles enlisted the help of the Seven in order to give themselves to prayer and to the ministry of the Word (Ac 6⁴).

* A reminiscence of the Lord's prayer in Gethsemane or a reflexion of the liturgical use of the Church of Jerusalem.

There is a deep meditation on the hearing of prayer in He 5⁷, with reference to our Lord's prayers. 'True prayer—the prayer which must be answered—is the personal recognition and acceptance of the divine will (John xiv. 7: comp. Mark xi. 24 ἐλθέτω). It follows that the hearing of prayer, which teaches obedience, is not so much the granting of a specific petition, which is assumed by the petitioner to be the way to the end desired, but the assurance that what is granted does most effectively lead to the end. Thus we are taught that Christ learned that every detail of His Life and Passion contributed to the accomplishment of the work which He came to fulfil, and so He was most perfectly "heard." In this sense He was "heard for His godly fear" (Westcott). These pregnant sentences go to the very root of the problem of prayer. We learn its meaning as the Apostolic Church learnt it only by following our Lord to Gethsemane and the Cross. The ordinary posture of prayer was standing with arms outstretched, like the Pharisee of our Lord's parable (Lk 18¹¹), and the earliest paintings of Orantes in the Roman Catacombs. The well-known words of Tertullian may be quoted (Apol. 30): 'Gazing up heavenward we Christians pray with hands extended because they are innocent, with the head uncovered because we are not ashamed; finally, without a guide because we pray from the heart.'

Following the example of our Lord, both kneeling and prostration were also adopted; Stephen (Ac 7⁴⁰), Peter (9⁴⁰), Paul (20³⁶ 21⁵), all knelt. Clement of Rome associated prostration with penitence (Ep. ad Cor. i. 48): 'Let us therefore root this out quickly, and let us fall down before the Master, and entreat Him with tears.' The value attached by Ignatius to the influence of prayer is expressed in the words (Eph. 5): 'For if the prayer of one and another hath so great force, how much more that of the bishop and of the whole Church.'

2. Prayers for the departed.—The possible references to prayers for the departed in the NT taken by themselves are ambiguous, nor is it easy to deal with this subject without reference to authors who wrote outside the limits of this Dictionary. But there is one reference, which may be fairly said to prove the existence of this practice during the first half of the 2nd century.

The epitaph of Abercius (Avircins Marcellus), who was bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia Salutaris c. A.D. 160, includes: 'Let every friend who observeth this pray for me.' This is confirmed by the evidence of Tertullian, de Corona, 3 (written c. A.D. 211): 'We offer oblations for the dead on the anniversary of their birth.' And again (c. A.D. 217), in de Monogamia, 10, Tertullian describes a Christian widow as one 'who prays for his [i.e. her husband's] soul, and requests refreshment for him in the meanwhile, and fellowship in the first resurrection, and she offers [sacrifice] on the anniversaries of his falling asleep.'

There are also many such references in the inscriptions of the Catacombs, some of which may be assigned to the 2nd century. And there is a continuous tradition of such prayers in the ancient Liturgies, in which prayers are offered for those who rest in Christ that they may have peace and light, rest and refreshment: that they may live in God (or in Christ): that they may be partakers of the joyful resurrection, and of the inheritance of the Kingdom of God.

It is clear that such intercessions date from the beginning of the 2nd cent., and that they represent quite faithfully the general tenor of the teaching of the Apostolic Church on the Future State. Without labouring the point we may say that they support the inference that Onesiphorus was dead when Paul prayed for him (2 Ti 1¹⁶⁻¹⁸): 'The Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day.' The Apostle mentions his household in 1¹⁶ and 4¹⁹, but says nothing of Onesiphorus himself.

The reference in 2 Mac 12⁴³⁻⁴⁵ to sacrifices offered for the dead by Judas Maccabaeus may be taken to prove that prayers for the dead were not unknown in our Lord's time. But the author speaks in an apologetic way, as if the act of Judas were not a common practice. And the Sadducees who controlled the Temple services did not believe in any resurrection, so we cannot suppose that they would have approved of such prayers.

The central thought of the Apostolic Church with regard to their relationship to the faithful departed is summed up in the Epistle to the Hebrews (12²²⁻²³) in the words: 'Ye are come . . . to the spirits of just men made perfect,' also described (12¹) as 'a great cloud of witnesses.' They are living and they are interested in both our faith and conduct, and the least response of our loyalty to them will naturally find expression in our prayers for their peace and progress.

LITERATURE.—W. E. Chadwick, The Pastoral Teaching of St. Paul, Edinburgh, 1907; F. E. Warren, The Liturgy and Ritual of the Ante-Nicene Church, London, 1897; A. J. Worledge, Prayer, do., 1902; G. Bull, Serm. iii. (= Works, 7 vols., Oxford, 1846, i. 77); H. M. Luckock, After Death: Testimony of Primitive Times, London, 1882; S. C. Gayford, Future State, do., 1903; J. Ussher, An Answer to a Challenge made by a Jesuite in Ireland, do., 1631; G. H. S. Walpole, The Gospel of Hope, do., 1914. A. E. BURN.

PRAYER FOR THE DEAD.—See PRAYER.

PREACHING.—The essential nature of apostolic preaching is expressed in the two main words used throughout the NT: κηρυσσειν, 'to proclaim as a herald' (κήρυξ), and εὐαγγελίζειν, 'to tell good tidings' (εὐαγγέλιον, 'the gospel'), both of which are translated 'to preach.' Sometimes the full expression κηρυσσειν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, 'to proclaim the gospel' (Gal 2², 1 Th 2⁹), occurs, while εὐαγγελίζειν frequently characterizes the content of the good tidings, specifically as 'the gospel' (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, 1 Co 15¹, 2 Co 11⁷, Gal 1¹¹), or more variously as 'Jesus Christ' (Ac 5⁴²), 'peace' (Eph 2¹⁷), or 'the word' (Ac 15³⁵). Other expressions, such as 'proclaim Christ' (καταγγέλλειν Χριστόν, Ph 1⁷¹) and 'testify the gospel' (διαμαρτυρεῖσθαι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον) of the grace of God' (Ac 20²⁴), help to make clear that preaching was primarily the proclamation of good tidings from God, the heralding of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of men.

To get back to the NT standpoint it is necessary to rid one's mind of the preconception that preaching was giving a sermon or delivering a discourse elaborated in accordance with certain recognized homiletical canons. Still less was it the detailed exegesis and exposition of a so-called text or isolated passage of Scripture, such as prevailed in the synagogue preaching. That the message was often supported by quotations from the OT is not doubted; but the apostolic preaching did not confine itself to appeals to Scripture. It was rather the spontaneous, authoritative announcement of a truth felt to be new to the experience of man, and explicable only in the light of the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ as Saviour of men.

1. Preaching and teaching.—The function of preaching, as above outlined, is to be distinguished from teaching (διδάχῃ), in which the truths and duties of Christianity were more deliberately unfolded and applied. The content of the preaching and of the more elaborated instruction was necessarily often the same (Ac 5⁴² 15³⁵, Col 1²⁸). The preacher (κῆρυξ) was sometimes also a teacher (διδάσκαλος), especially in the more settled state of the early Church (1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹). But, even so, a clearly marked distinction is made in the case of Paul 'preaching (κηρύσσων) the kingdom of God, and teaching (διδάσκων) the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 28³¹). The ability to preach or to teach was regarded as a gift of the Holy Spirit, but due regard was given to the 'diversities of gifts' and 'diversities of ministrations' even in these closely related activities. 'To one is given through the Spirit the word of wisdom, and to another the word of knowledge, . . . to another prophecy' (1 Co 12¹⁻¹¹; cf. Ro 12⁶⁻⁸). That a clearly marked differentiation of function was believed to be Divinely appointed appears from the two formal lists of spiritually gifted members, in which 'teachers' are mentioned after apostles and prophets (1 Co 12²⁸, Eph 4¹¹). Preaching was the function of the apostles (in the wider meaning of the word) and of the prophets. Both travelled about, the former continuously in their missionary activities, the latter frequently settling down in one locality where their preaching would tend to edification and exhortation.

2. Qualification.—The work of preaching in the 1st cent. was regarded not as an office but as a 'calling' due to the gift of the Spirit. Apostolic preaching began with the command of Christ to the Twelve (Mt 10⁷, Mk 16^{15, 20}); but it was after the bestowal of the Spirit at Pentecost as a 'tongue of fire' that this gift (χαρισμα) of inspired utterance became general in the early Church. Those who preached the gospel did so because they were under Divine compulsion (Ac 4³⁻²⁰ 6¹⁰ 8²⁶). The Holy Spirit qualified them for this special work, and authenticated their message. They felt that they were commissioned by no mere human authority. Subjectively their call to preach consisted in a feeling of 'necessity' (1 Co 9¹⁶), but an objective test was applied to them and their message by the spiritual communities to which they ministered (1 Th 5²¹, 1 Co 12³⁻¹⁰, 1 Jn 4¹⁴). The Didache shows that at a later stage the tests were practical, if not drastic. The prophet must 'have the ways of the Lord' (xi. 8); he must practise what he preaches, and not ask for money (xi. 9-12). But the preacher, when duly approved, had the right to expect support (1 Co 9⁴, 2 Co 11¹², Did. xiii. 1-3), and was to be treated with great honour (Did. iv. 1). 'The picture of these wandering preachers, men burdened by no cares of office, with no pastoral duties, coming suddenly into a Christian community, doing their work there and as suddenly departing, is a very vivid one in sub-apostolic literature' (T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, 1902, p. 73).

