The Smyrniote Church, for which St. John has not a single word of blame, is thus led to welcome Christian paradoxes. She is in poverty, but she is rich (v. 9); she is reviled by a powerful synagogue of Jews, but they are only 'a synagogue of Satan' (v. 9). Just because she is so faithful, she is chosen for the most difficult tasks; because she is so brave, she is exposed to the greatest dangers. She has to face suffering, imprisonment, trial; but it is only a ten days' tribulation. Death by violence comes within her horizon, but it is transfigured: the martyr is not to be pitied but emulated, for fidelity unto death wins the crown which is life (v. 10). When man has done his worst to the body, there is no more that he can do; no second death shall hurt the spirit that overcomes (v. 11).

'The crown of life' (ὁ στέφανος τῆς ζωῆς) may have been suggested by one of the most familiar elements in the life of Smyrna, the athletic contests and the presentation of the garlands of victory; or it may be an allusion to the fact that the lovely city itself, on its mountain slope, was commonly likened to a garland, as some of its coins prove (B. V. Head, Historia Nummorum, 1887, p. 509). It was not for intellectual errors that the name of 'Jews' was denied to the synagogue of Smyrna, while that of 'synagogue of Satan' was attached to it (Rev. 2⁹). An honest scepticism regarding the claims of the Nazarene to be the Messiah could have been understood and forgiven. It was because the Jews of Smyrna were morally wrong—hating instead of loving—that they forfeited their traditional titles and privileges (cf. Ro 2²⁸⁻²⁹). That they were often fanatically hostile to the Christians is shown by the narrative of the martyrdom of Polycarp. When he was sentenced to death 'the whole multitude both of the heathen and Jews, who dwelt in Smyrna, cried out with uncontrollable fury and in a loud voice,' and the sentence 'was carried into effect with greater speed than it was spoken, the multitudes immediately gathering together wood and faggots out of the shops and baths, the Jews especially, according to custom, eagerly assisting them in it' (προθυμῶς, ὡς ἦθος αὐτοῖς). It was 'at the suggestion and urgent persuasion of the Jews' that the body of the martyr was refused to the Christians, 'lest, forsaking Him that was crucified, they should begin to worship this one' (Mart. Polyc. xii. f., xvii.). Modern Smyrna, being predominantly Greek Christian, is called by the Turks Giaour Ismir.

LITERATURE.—C. Wilson, in Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, 1895, p. 70 t.; W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, 1904, p. 251 f.

JAMES STRAHAN.

SOBERNESS, SOBRIETY.—The object of this article is to determine the meanings of the two word-groups, νηφάλιος (νήφω) and σωφρων (and cognates), which are translated 'sober' in the NT. (The term ἐγκράτεια is discussed in the art. TEMPER-ANCE.) These two groups of words differ both in their original and in their secondary meanings and are accordingly treated separately here.

1. νηφάλιος (νήφω).—The AV translates the adjective twice and the verb four times by 'sober' (1 Ti 3¹¹, Tit 2-; 1 Th 5^{6, 8}, 1 P 1^{13 58}), the adjective once by 'vigilant,' and the verb twice by 'watch' (1 Ti 3², 2 Ti 4⁵, 1 P 4⁷). The reason for this variety of rendering on the part of the AV may be the natural desire to avoid dull uniformity, but probably also it is due to dubiety as to whether in the original the words are used in their primary or in their secondary sense. The RV adopts a uniform rendering—for the adjective always 'temperate' and for the verb 'sober.'

The primary meaning is clearly seen in a passage such as Xen. Cyr. vii. v. 20. The elder Cyrus encourages his soldiers to attack Babylon, and he reminds them that once before they overcame those enemies when they (i.e. the enemy) were awake (ἐγρηγοράτας), sober (νήφοντας), armed (ἐξοπλισμένους), and drawn up in battle array (συντεταγμένους). Therefore they should overcome them now when many of them are asleep (καθεύδουσι), many of them drunk (μεθύουσι), and all of them unprepared (ἀσύντακτοι). The word νήφω is thus the direct opposite of μεθύω, and it is excellently rendered 'sober' (Lat. sobrius = sine + ebrius). There is such a literary similarity between the above passage from Xenophon and 1 Th 5^{6a} that, if it were conceivable, one might say that St. Paul had it in his mind; and therefore it is especially instructive as a parallel. To be sober, then, is more intensive (1 Th 5^{6a}) than to be awake (γρηγορέω), for a man may not be asleep and yet not be sober. His wits may be wandering, the loins of his understanding may be loose. (In 1 P 5⁸, however, γρηγορέω seems to be the stronger word.) From the Latin equivalent of γρηγορέω we get 'vigils' and the proper name Vigilantius; and in the history of the Church the vigilantes did not always escape the vices of drunkenness and lust, as even Jerome, who with his usual coarseness of language defends them against Vigilantius (a curious irony in the name), has to admit (c. Vigilantium, 9). The primary meaning of νήφω in the NT thus excludes two ideas—on the one hand the slumber of the drunkard, and on the other the listless stupor which is characteristic of the half-awakened, or the weariness which creeps over those who watch long. The word is also used tropically in the NT, but the literal meaning is almost invariably in the background, and in some cases it is preponderant. This is probably largely due to the influence of our Lord's parable (Mk 13³⁴⁻³⁷), in which some are depicted as overtaken by their lord's coming, in a drunken state; and it is appalling to think how many even yet in Christian lands die in this sad condition.

To describe the transition from drunken sleep to sobriety ἐκνήφω is used in the LXX (νήφω and νηφάλιος do not occur), of Noah (Gn 9²⁴), of Nabal (1 S [LXX 1 Kings] 25³⁴), of the drunkards of Joel's time (Jl 1⁵). When Eli asks Hannah to put away her wine from her, his meaning is that she should sleep it off (1 S 1¹⁴; LXX περιελού). In Sir 34- (31) the word is used tropically and transitively. 'Wakeful anxiety will crave slumber, and a grievous sickness will banish sleep' (ἐκνήψει ὕπνον—the reading, however, may be ὕπνος). In the only passage where ἐκνήφω occurs in the NT (1 Co 15³⁴, 'Awake to a righteous life of sobriety and sin not') the tropical sense is evident but the original force of the word is not absent. The Corinthians must not forget the Resurrection, for 'evil communications corrupt good manners.' If they did, their motto would soon become, 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' Already at the love-feasts did not some of them get drunk, while their poorer brethren had neither food nor drink sufficient for their needs (1 Co 11²³)? It is thus clear that the danger of actual drunkenness is included in the warning, 'Do not err.' The ideas of sobriety, righteousness, and the Parousia are here associated, as in St. Paul's speech to Felix, where he spoke of righteousness, temperance, and the judgment to come (Ac 24²⁵). The word νήφω indeed is commonly used with a reference to the coming of the Lord (1 Th 5^{6c}, 1 P 1¹³). To be ignorant of this or to forget it in pleasure is foolish and dangerous. Included in the idea of sobriety or closely akin to it is the thought of vigilance, as of the sentinel, and of preparedness and armed security, as of the soldier. There is a military atmosphere about the word. It is the necessary equipment of prayer—the watchful longing of the Christian soldier for the coming of his Lord (1 P 4⁷). He is not to sleep on duty even if his Lord should tarry till the third watch. Nor should the Christian forget that he fights against a subtle, powerful enemy—the Great Adversary who is ever on the outlook to devour him (1 P 5⁸). This is also a favourite idea with St. Paul. The ignorance of the day and hour of Christ's coming is an additional motive to sobriety—cf. Rev 16¹⁵: 'Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.' But this ignorance has for its sphere a day of moral and spiritual life in which Christians are to live as children of the day. So in 1 Th 5^{6a} St. Paul contrasts the Christian with the heathen who sleeps and is drunken in the night. He means not simply the avoidance of intoxication; he means also spiritual sobriety.

As Anaxagoras appeared to Aristotle (Met. i. 3) like a sober (νήφων) man among a crowd of drunkards, so in a deeper sense must the Christian appear. Similarly in Ro 13¹¹⁻¹⁴ the night is the sphere of spiritual blindness resulting in all manner of riotous excess, but the day calls for wakefulness, sobriety, and spiritual readiness. St. Peter (1 P 1¹³) compares the Christians to the Israelites in Egypt ready to march out. His warning against a relapse into their former life of lusts indicates that he does not forget the possibility of actual drunkenness, but this is only one symptom of spiritual stupor—ignorance of God (1 Co 15³⁴). Just as pleasure and ease must not tempt to slumber and drunken stupor, so must not danger and suffering; rather should suffering warn them against this sin and make them cast their cares on God (1 P 5⁷⁻⁸, 2 Ti 4⁵). The unusual compound αναρήφω occurs in 2 Ti 2²⁵. Those who resist the Christian evangelist are taken captive by the devil to do his will. (It is forced to refer this to God's will or the will of the Evangelist.) They are in his snare, but perhaps by considerate dealings they may be aroused to sobriety (ἀνανήφω only here in the NT and not in the LXX).

We may thus say that νήφω on its positive side is the watchful, alert state of soul which knows that the day of Christ has already dawned, the earnest expectation (ἀποκατάδοκία) of the coming of the Master, the prayerful, hopeful, longing spirit of love for the coming of the full day of Christ. On its negative side it implies a knowledge of the power of evil, of the night in which the Great Adversary roams for prey, when sons of Belial floun with insolence and wine are active, the night of secret sinful conclaves. The Christian soldier is armed against this by a life of sobriety, of righteousness, of longing prayer. Thus he cannot be surprised by the force of the enemy, or by the suddenness of his Lord's returning, as the Babylonians were by Cyrus or the Egyptians by the angel of death. It is especially indispensable for the Christian evangelist to have this wakeful attentive attitude for himself and for those under his care, for whom he must give account (He 13¹⁷; cf. also Ac 20³¹, Mk 13³⁴). So St. Paul says to Timothy, 'Be sober in all things,' not like the dumb dogs, the blind watchmen of Isaiah's time (Is 56⁹⁻¹¹, an instructive contrast).

The adjective νηφάλιος is confined to the Pastorals. The bishop must be sober (1 Ti 3², Tit 2⁻), so also deaconesses (1 Ti 3¹¹). The question here is whether the word is used in its primary meaning of 'not given to much wine' (μη οὖν πολλὰ προσέχοντες, 1 Ti 3³; μη πάροινος, 1 Ti 3³) or in the more general sense of 'vigilantes animo' (Bengel, on 1 Ti 3²). The Greek interpreters favour the wider meaning, but much can be said for the more restricted one. Josephus says that Moses did not permit priests to drink wine so long as they wore their sacerdotal garments (Ant. III. xii. 2), and the word νηφάλιος seems to be a sacrosanct term for priestly sobriety or the prerequisite of a true worshipper. (Edipus considers it a favourable omen that he came untasting wine to the seat of the Erinyes, who loathe the wine cup in libations offered to them (Soph. Œd. Col. 100). This is similar to the usage in 1 P 4⁷, 'Be sober unto prayer,' and it is attested by inscriptions (see Ezp. 7th ser., ix. [1910] 234). Fielding's Parson Adams was never wholly unknown in the Christian Church. On the other hand, the warning to Timothy, 'Be sober in all things,' favours the wider reference, as does also the fact that there is no reason to suppose that Christian ministers or members were addicted to this special vice. The wider meaning includes the narrower without unduly submerging it.

2. σωφρονέω and cognates.—Cicero found difficulty in rendering the ideas included in these terms in Latin (Tusc. Disp. iii. 5), and he used three words—temperantia, moderatio, modestia (ib. iii. 8; de Off. i. 27). The same difficulty is felt in regard to our own language, and as these words were used in a technical sense in Greek philosophy there is a danger, in fixing their connotation, of being over-precise.

(a) The words in Greek often mean 'sanity' in its literal sense, and σωφρονέω is thus used in the Gospels (Mk 5¹⁵, Lk 8²⁵) of the Gadarene demoniac, after he was healed by Jesus. He was clothed and in his right mind—'rationis usu,' as Bengel has it (in loc.). The opposite is μαρία. Thus when Helen is told that Ajax fell on his own sword and destroyed himself she exclaims, 'Was he mad, for no sane person would do so?' (μαρὲν γάρ, εἰς τίς τις σωφρονῶν πλάη τὰδ' ἄν; Eur. Hel. 97). Xenophon also says that Socrates 'was always discussing about human affairs, asking what piety was, and what impiety, what beauty, what ugliness . . . what sanity (σωφροσύνη) and what insanity (μαρία)' (Mem. I. i. 16). Insanity is the supreme example of mental derangement, of lack of self-control, and so δαιμονιζεσθαι is the very opposite of σωφρονεῖν. Akin to this is St. Paul's usage of the word in Ac 26²⁵, 2 Co 5¹³. Festus, as he heard the Christian message, especially of the Resurrection, from St. Paul's perferid lips, exclaimed, 'Paul, thou art mad; thy much learning doth turn thee to madness' (εἰς μαρίαν). In the ancient world the enthusiastic utterance of an oracle-giver was attributed to a temporary suppression of the reason. 'No man, when in his wits, attains prophetic truth and inspiration; but when he receives the inspired word, either his intelligence is enthralled in sleep, or he is demented by some distemper or possession' (Plato, Timæus, 71 E, tr. B. Jowett³, Oxford, 1892, vol. iii. p. 493). St. Paul's courteous but firm reply reveals that he at once grasped Festus's attitude. He was not mad, but spoke the words of truth and sanity. It was natural for a man like Festus to imagine that St. Paul was living in a world of illusions and that his reason was for the moment obscured. St. Paul's message was utterly novel to him, and he consequently attributed his intense emotion to mental derangement, just as he regarded the content of his message as illusion and not reality (ἀληθεια). Similarly, Penelope when roused from her slumber by the old nurse who came with the message that her long-lost Ulysses is home looks on the nurse as one whom the gods had deprived of her sanity (Od. xxiii. 13).

In 2 Co 5¹⁸ the opposite of σωφροεῖν is ἐκστήναι. The phenomena of the Day of Pentecost were familiar in the early Christian Church. Men were carried out of themselves by a new experience of the Divine power. Excitement and enthusiasm such as men had never felt before led them on to action. Now the cautious onlooker was tempted to put this down to aberration, and unfortunately such might be the case. Rationalism is always tempted to explain enthusiasm as madness. 'Quench not the spirit' was a necessary warning even to a Christian people. Men naturally distrust emotion, and this was especially true of an emotional people like the Greeks.

'The Greeks, or some sections of the Greek race, were very liable to violent emotions; and hence it was that the Greek moral philosophers insisted on control of emotion as they did. The Greeks had a sort of natural want of self-respect and a tendency to forget themselves which particularly struck the Romans as unworthy' (Nettleship, Lectures on Plato's Republic, p. 96).

St. Paul undoubtedly exhibited the signs of deep emotion. He was an enthusiast, but to God. The criticism that he was actuated by σωφροσύνη (ironical) was the best answer to this (2 Co 5¹³). Here the word includes self-control—constraint which had reason on its side. It was due to the love of Christ that he was so enthusiastic, and that love prompted a sober judging of man's needs and of the means to meet those needs. The Spartan king Archidamus (Ξυερός δοκῶν εἶναι καὶ σωφρον) exhibits sanity in this sense when he warns his people to think σωφρόνως before going to war with Athens (Thuc. Hist. i. 79 ff.). They should see to it that their resources are sufficient. There is included in the word in this connexion a sober balancing of ways and means, a counting of the cost as our Lord enjoined—a distrust of a course of action simply because it appeals to the fancy or the feelings. It must also appeal to sober common sense. St. Paul had done this and so had reached a σωφροσύνη on a higher level than mere prudence, a true intellectual love of God and man, to use Spinoza's famous phrase.* Philosophers are divided as to whether will or intellect has the primacy in man's constitution, and emotion is distrusted; yet the true Christian σώφρων is one, like St. Paul, in whom the apprehended love of Christ rules the will and illumines the intellect. The emotional harmony is in the region of the spirit. Here is its source, and its sway is over the whole man from above.

In dealing with self-control Plato has always in view unworthy exhibitions of emotion. 'Is the picture of a hero rolling on the ground with grief a worthy example?' he asks. From this point of view he criticizes Greek religion, Greek poetry and music. He was thus correcting a national weakness. 'Throughout the treatment of these virtues we find the characteristic Greek idea that excess, whether in grief or in laughter or in appetite or in any passion or emotion, is intrinsically bad. We have to remember that dignity was not a strong point of Greek character' (Nettleship, op. cit., p. 96). St. Paul also had to face this question, especially in Corinth, but he solves it by the appeal to love (1 Co 13). He philosophizes on a plane so different from that of Plato that in trying to compare their ideas we have no common denominator.

(b) In Ro 12¹⁻⁸ σωφροεῖν is contrasted with ὑπερφροεῖν. The Apostle, as is clear from the context, includes in σωφροσύνη the absence of boasting, of vain-glory, undue emphasis on and opinion of oneself, et hoc genus omne. It implies the Christian grace of humility, the recognition that all we are and have we owe to God. Positively there is included the thoughtful yet humble recognition of the nature and place of the powers that we possess, and their exercise in the service of the Christian community of which we are members. The reference is not obtrusively to the control of bodily pleasures—'eating and drinking and sexual desires (περὶ σιτίων καὶ ποτῶν καὶ τῶν ἀφροδισίων), which is the specific meaning in Greek moral philosophy (see Green, *Prolegomena to Ethics*⁴, p. 327). This restricted usage is not unknown in the NT. It is found in 1 P 4⁷, where the meaning is determined by the opposition to ἐν ἀσελγείαις, ἐπιθυμίαις (1 P 4³), and it is prominent in Tit 2¹², where prudence (σωφρόνως) is opposed to worldly lusts and associated with justice and piety. This passage in Titus is valuable because it gives us the ground, the scope, and the hope of Christian morals. The ground is in the revealed grace of God; the scope includes self-control, justice towards others, and piety towards God; the hope is the appearing of the Saviour God. Green (bk. iii. ch. v.) shows how much wider the scope of Christian self-control is than Greek, and, though he attempts to prove that the principle is still the same, few Christians will agree with him. What St. Paul calls the grace of God which brings salvation for all men is not within the vision of Plato or Aristotle. In Romans (ch. 12) the word is used rather of the humble temper of mind which saves from overweening excess or self-depreciating defect. The former error is more noticeable in men in general, but the latter is not unknown. The talent may be hid in a napkin or buried in the earth, and in this case there is a lack of σωφροσύνη as truly as there is in self-aggrandizement. 'God does not require of us a false humility. We are not to think less highly of ourselves than we ought to think. We are to think soberly. We are to find out the truth about ourselves and think that. Then there will be no danger of our thinking too highly' (Rabbi Duncan, *Colloquia Peripatetica*⁵, Edinburgh, 1907, p. 169). The sphere of σωφροσύνη here is not so much the sensual pleasures as the Christian charismata in their social bearing. The social aspect of this grace is enforced just as it is enforced by Plato in his analysis of the same virtue (Rep. 430 D-432 B).

The whole passage Ro 12¹⁻¹³ has to be considered if one is to grasp the wide scope of σωφροσύνη in St. Paul's teaching. It moves in the sphere of a community redeemed by the mercies of God (Ro 12¹), renewed in mind (12²), endowed with varied graces by God's Spirit (12⁶), to which love is the fulfilling of the law (13¹⁰), and which is waiting for the day of Christ (13¹¹⁻¹⁴). On this plane light is thrown on the term by the wider Platonic usage, and we may go on to discuss (c) the third application of the term by St. Paul in Timothy and Titus.

* The meaning of σωφροσύνη is best understood by its opposite ὑβρις, which is the general spirit of setting oneself up against what is higher than oneself, whether by insubordination to constituted authority (cf. Ro 13¹) and divine law, or by the rebellion of the appetites against the law of reason (cf. Ro 13¹³). Thus this quality in some degree includes what we call humility. It is often said that the virtue of humility is not recognised in the Greek moral code, but the man who was σώφρων in regard to the gods would be a humble man, and the υβριστικός is the "proud man" in the language of the Bible' (Nettleship, p. 98).

It is in this wide sense that we are to understand these terms in 1 Ti 2⁹⁻³³ and Tit 2²⁻⁶ where St.

* Cf. *Ecce Homo*¹¹, London, 1873, p. 7: 'No heart is pure that is not passionate; no virtue is safe that is not enthusiastic. And such an enthusiastic virtue Christ was to introduce.'

Paul shows the universal application of this principle to conduct. It applies to all sections of the Christian community in all their relations, to men and women, to old and young, in the soul, in the family, in the Church, and in the State. In one passage it condescends even to the matter of dress. Married women should use decorous garb in adorning themselves with modesty and propriety. 'In "modesty" is involved an innate moral repugnance to the doing of the dishonourable act' (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, p. 65). Here it includes the feeling of disgust at unnecessary display, while propriety points rather to the sense of tact which leads a married woman to dress aright without erring either on the side of shabbiness or on that of show. But this saving grace extends much further and penetrates much deeper than the outward person. It implies the gentle, gracious sense of subordination and obedience to authority, the subordination of the younger women to their husbands; and the older women ought by their own conduct to teach * this virtue to the younger (Tit 2⁴⁻⁵). It implies the right attitude of the young to their elders and their superiors, and to their reason. It becomes the bishop and presbyter, for how else can they exercise authority without the excess of rigour or the laxity of weakness? There is an air of graciousness about the word which is not found in ἐγκρατεία, for ἐγκρατεία is forcible restraint, and even Plato and Aristotle insist that a man is not σώφρων 'unless his mastery of his passions and impulses is so easy and assured that there is no sense of constraint about it' (Nettleship, p. 97, footnote). Harmony as well as subordination is included—a harmony resulting from every thing and every person being in their appropriate place.

In 1 Ti 2¹⁵ there is doubt as to whether this virtue is to be understood of women or of children or of parents. 'She shall be saved through the child-bearing, if they continue in faith and love and sanctification with sobriety.' It is possible to understand this of the women themselves; it is possible to understand it of husband and wife alike in their home relations; but it is better to refer it to the children who in the atmosphere of this virtue have been brought up in faith and love and sanctification. Thus the mother will see the primal curse turned into a blessing in her children. This virtue also avoids the extremes of softness and sourness, of laxity and harshness. Hence Timothy is reminded that the Christian spirit is one, not of fear, but of fortitude, of love, and of σωφρονισμός. This is to be understood not simply of personal self-control, but of ability to control others as well. Fear is the vice which shrinks from duty through terror of pain. Its opposite is fortitude—a virtue always associated with self-control, which is doing one's duty when pleasure would say 'No.'

J. Moffatt aptly quotes Gilbert Murray (The Rise of the Greek Epic, Oxford, 1911, p. 48), that σωφροσύνη 'is something like Temperance, Gentleness, Mercy; sometimes Innocence, never mere Caution; a tempering of dominant emotions by gentler thought. . . . The man or woman who is sōphrōn walks amid the beauties and perils of the world, feeling the love, joy, anger, and the rest; and through all he has that in his mind which saves.—Whom does it save? Not him only, but, as we should say, the whole situation. It saves the imminent evil from coming to be' (Exp, 5th ser., ii. [1911] 564).

Σωφροσύνη indicates that 'each sex and situation has lines of conduct appropriate to itself, and that the individual must have tact and strength of will enough to pursue these lines instead of lapsing into excesses on one side or the other' (Moffatt, ib. p. 564 f.).

LITERATURE.—The Lexicons under both words are most instructive; R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, London, 1876, p. 66 ff.; T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, Oxford, 1899, bk. iii. ch. v.; R. L. Nettleship, Lectures on Plato's Republic, London, 1893, p. 96 ff.; Plato, Cratylus; Aristotle, Nic. Ethics, vi. 5. 6; John Caird, Essays for Sunday Reading, London, 1906, xi.; I. Taylor, Natural History of Enthusiasm, do., 1829, Fanaticism, do., 1833; Hugh Blair, Sermons, do., 1815, vol. i. no. xi., vol. iii. no. xii.; Augustine Birrell, Selected Essays, do., 1909, p. 253 f.; see also under 'Self-Control' and 'Self-Denial' in DCG.
DONALD MACKENZIE.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH.—Sodom and Gomorrah are mentioned in Mt 10¹⁵, Jude⁷, 2 P 2⁶, Rev 11⁸ as affording by their fate a warning against strange sins, whether moral or spiritual. The verb (ἐκπορεύω) used in Jude is also used in LXX of Ex 34^{15, 16}, Lv 17⁷, Hos 4¹², Ezk 16^{26, 28, 33}, of 'going after' other gods, and this seems to explain the use of Sodom in Rev 11⁸. Rome is Sodom because its gods are no true gods. Beyond references in The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Test. Naph. 3) and in 3 Mac 2⁴⁴ the symbolism of Sodom seems to have been dropped out of sight. It is not used in the Apostolic Fathers, or in any apocalyptic or heretical books of the Apostolic Age. The reason is possibly to be found in the belief (Enoch, lxvii. 4) that the angels who sinned are imprisoned in a subterranean burning valley (Ge-hinnom) which extended to the Dead Sea, so that Gehenna extruded Sodom by assimilating it.
W. F. COBB.

SOLDIER See ARMY.

SOLOMON (Σολομῶν).—Solomon is mentioned in St. Stephen's speech before the Sanhedrin as the builder of a house to God, such as his father David had asked (but failed to obtain) permission to erect as a habitation for the God of Jacob (Ac 7^{46, 47}). Stephen dares to put Solomon's Temple into the category of houses 'made with hands,' in which the Most High does not dwell, and contrasts it with the universe in which God has heaven for His throne and earth for His footstool (v. 49). The speaker's assumption that the Maker of all things could not have a man-built place of rest, with the implication that He was in reality no more present in the Temple than in other parts of His vast world, was just what roused the fanatical fury of the audience, bringing the speech to an abrupt and tragic conclusion. His fate is all the more remarkable because Solomon himself is represented as protesting, in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple, against the notion that God would dwell on earth, much less in the house which had been built for His worship (1 K 8²⁷). But careful students of history know that there was division of opinion, even among the prophets, on this question, and Ezekiel's conception of 'the glory of the Lord' filling the Temple (Ezk 43⁴⁻⁵, etc.), together with the later Rabbinic doctrine of the Shekinah ('that which dwells' or the 'dwelling'), which St. Paul calls the δόξα (Ro 9⁴), indicates how deep-rooted in the Jewish mind was the conviction that God did in some mysterious way inhabit the Temple of Solomon, of Zerubbabel, and even of Herod. Stephen's attempt to revive the spiritual conception ascribed to Solomon was therefore an assault upon the citadel of Jewish materialism, and cost him his life.
JAMES STRAHAN.

SOLOMON'S PORCH.—See PORCH, TEMPLE.

SON.—See FAMILY.

SON OF GOD.—See CHRIST.

SONS OF GOD.—See CHILDREN OF GOD.

* σωφρονίζειν, 'sophronize.' The word is sometimes used in English; cf. A. P. Stanley, Life of Arnold, London, 1858, vol. i. p. 30: 'I am confirmed in my resolution not to do so [i.e. raise the entrance fees] lest I should get the sons of very great people as my pupils whom it is almost impossible to sophronize.'

SON OF MAN.—The only instance in the NT outside the Gospel records of a direct reference to Jesus as ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου occurs in the speech of Stephen before the Jewish Sanhedrin (Ac 7⁵⁶). Assuming its genuineness, it is significant that the expression is used by a Hellenistic Jew recently converted to Christianity. Even on the assumption that the speech is largely the composition of the author of Acts, the same significance attaches to its employment here. Not only is it evidence that the gospel tradition was, in the main, correct as to its use by Jesus of Himself, but it shows how early the consciousness of the Church awoke to the claims which the designation involves. The strange hesitation of primitive Christianity in using this title proves the sturdiness of the growth and development of independent thought within the Church of the Apostolic Age. The rage of Stephen's audience, on hearing the words or the speaker, is accounted for only on the supposition that 'the Son of man' was recognized as the Jesus whom they had so recently done to death, and who now is described as occupying the transcendent position, and discharging the functions, of Messiah. The great and final synthesis—the Suffering Servant and the Eternal Judge—had received its justification in the alleged exaltation of the Crucified to the right hand of God. Now, no less than in the days of His humiliation, His sympathies were active for the despised and the suffering. It is, perhaps, too much to say that 'He is revealed to the eyes of His first martyr, that Christians may learn that that which is begun in weakness shall be completed in eternal majesty' (B. F. Westcott, The Speaker's Commentary, 'St. John and the Acts,' London, 1880, p. 35), but St. Luke's use of the term in this connexion shows how profoundly its implicates had affected the Christology of the primitive Church (note the word ἐστῶτα; cf. ἐκάθισεν, Mk 16¹⁹, and κάθου, Ps 110¹).

The absence of the phrase ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου from the general body of NT writings cannot, therefore, be explained as entirely due to a reverent or superstitious disinclination to use a title which Jesus had appropriated to Himself. If the details of the martyrdom of James the Just given by Hegesippus and quoted by Eusebius be accepted, we have the designation used of the glorified Jesus Messiah. On being asked concerning Jesus who was crucified, he answered in a loud voice, 'Why do ye ask me about Jesus the Son of Man? He is now sitting in the heavens, on the right hand of the great Power, and is about to come on the clouds of heaven' (HE ii. 23). According to Jerome, the Gospel according to the Hebrews stated that Jesus had revealed Himself to James after His resurrection as 'the Son of man' ('filius hominis' [Vir. III. 2]), and we may conjecture that the expression in Hegesippus is a reminiscence of that event. It may be readily accepted that the words of James the Just are 'of the nature of a quotation.' It is not, however, so easy to see why the same should be said of 'the use of the phrase by the martyr Stephen in the Acts and the martyr James the Just in Eusebius and by the angels in Luke after the Resurrection' (E. A. Abbott, The Son of Man, Cambridge, 1910 [3317]; cf. note on [3317a]). The vision of Stephen gives a wider and deeper significance to the Messianic activities of the ascended Jesus. 'The Son of man' stands on the right hand of God ready to express His feelings of love and sympathy with the sons of the race to which He belongs.

There are two passages in the NT where the words ἡμεῖς υἱὸν ἀνθρώπου are found (Rev 1¹³ 14¹⁴) both in descriptive accounts of the Seer's visions. Quite obviously the references are to Jesus as the glorified Messiah (see, on the other hand, H. Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn, Tübingen, 1896, p. 56), and evidently are allusions to the apocalyptic language of Daniel (⁷13). According to G. Dalman, the origin of the expression is to be discovered not in Dn 7¹³ but in 10⁵⁴ (The Words of Jesus, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 251). The peculiar phraseology of the NT apocalypticist shows that, although he may have known and even been thinking of Jesus' self-designation, his eschatological doctrine had its roots in the soil of Judaistic transcendentalism, moving in a plane higher than that of grammatical construction (cf. ἡμεῖς χαλκοὶ βάνω, 1¹⁵, etc.), and that we cannot equate his expression with the θεωρῶ . . . τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου of Stephen (see H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, London, 1907, p. 15). The use of ἡμεῖς as an adverb in both passages may have been due to the translation he was accustomed to use, but in any case the above conclusion is not affected (ομοῖος υἱὸς = ὡς υἱὸς).

There seems, indeed, no reason to doubt that this designation was well known to the writers and teachers of the apostolic period in spite of non-usage. We need not stay to inquire into the ultimate origin of the idea underlying the term or whether it is to be traced to the Persian doctrine of the Primal Man (see C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Edinburgh, 1912, p. 150 ff.). The expression has become native to Palestinian thought and was a terminus technicus of Jewish eschatological speculation. The use of the 8th Psalm by St. Paul in 1 Co 15²⁷ and his discussion as to the relative appearances in time of the 'earthly' (χοϊκός) and the 'heavenly' (ἐπουράνιος) man suggest his acquaintance with the term ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. The same may be said of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Jesus' superiority in rank to the angelic beings, notwithstanding the fact that He is υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου, is insisted on. The author of the Epistle to the Ephesians not only quotes this Psalm (πάντα ὑπέταξεν, Eph 1²²), but does so as if its highest application is discovered in the eternal exaltation of Jesus (ὑπεράνω πάσης ἀρχῆς, κτλ.) 'the Lord,' and in His session (καθίσας) at the right hand of God in the heavenly regions (ἐν δεξιᾷ αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις; see J. Moffatt's translation in *The Historical New Testament*², Edinburgh, 1901, p. 232; cf. the use of the Danielic visions in 2 Es 13³⁷).

Widely different reasons are given by scholars to explain the absence of the term 'the Son of man' in the writers of the apostolic period. All the Greek-speaking leaders of Christian thought from Ignatius and Justin Martyr to Chrysostom agree in teaching that the title has a special reference to the human nature of Jesus, the human side in His descent. So also do Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, and Ambrose. For them its importance and significance were mainly dogmatic and theological, less suitable for the exigencies of practical instruction and life. For whatever reason, it did not then, and it never has, become a popular designation of Jesus by the Church (see DCG ii. 664^a).

J. R. WILLIS.

SOOTHSAYING.—A comparison of the words used in different versions of the Scriptures to indicate the various practices and practisers of divination—using that word in its very widest sense—shows how indefinite was and is the significance attached to all these, and intensifies the desire that research may speedily classify them and determine the exact meaning of each. The English word 'soothsay' strictly means 'to tell authoritatively the truth.' The phrases 'sooth to say,' 'in good sooth' show the primary meaning. Men are especially anxious regarding the future; hence a soothsayer is a sayer of truth as regards the future.

'Soothsayer' is used in Jos 13²² (AV and RV; AVm 'diviner') to translate שֹׁפֵט, Qal pt. act. of שָׁפַט, which, with its kindred terms, is translated 'divine' in Nu 22⁷ 23²³, Dt 18¹⁰ 14, 1 S 28⁸, 9 K 17¹, Is 44²⁵, Ezk 12²⁴ 13⁶ 7 21-1 22 23, Mic 3⁶ 7, the LXX in all these cases employing μάντις and its cognates. But in 1 S 15²³ the same Hebrew word is translated 'witchcraft' (AV and RV; marg. 'divination'), the LXX using ουνισμα; in Pr 16¹⁰ the word is translated 'a divine sentence' (AV and RV; marg. in all three 'divination'), the LXX using in this case μαρτυροῦν. Finally, in Is 32 it is translated 'the prudent' in AV, but 'diviner' in RV, and the LXX translates by στοχαστήν. 'Soothsayers' is the translation in Is 29 of שֹׁפֵט, Qal pt. act. of שָׁפַט in AV and RV, the LXX employing κληροδομίαι, while in Is 57³ שֹׁפֵט is translated 'sorceress', possibly because 'soothsayeress' is an impossible word; but the LXX renders 'ye sons of the sorceress' by υἱοὶ ἀνομοῦ. 'Soothsayers' is the translation in Mic 5¹² of שֹׁפֵט (AV and RV), the LXX in this case rendering the word by ἀποφθεγγόμενοι. In Dn 2²⁷ 4 (4) 57-11 'soothsayers' is the translation of participles of the verb יָצַח, 'to cut', 'to decree', 'to decide', the LXX employing participles of a verb which is evidently a mere transliteration of the Hebrew.*

In Ac 16¹⁶ the word μαρτυροῦμαι is used to indicate the art of the pythoness of Philippi. The girl's work was to predict accurately, and hence the word is here used in its strict English sense. 'Soothsayer,' then, is used of one who professes to indicate the future truthfully by a writer who does not believe that the soothsayer possesses such a power. In Hermas (Mand. xi. 2) the man who has the Divine spirit is differentiated by his life from the ψευδοπροφήτης to whom doubters go as a μάντις. The latter exalts himself, is bold, impudent, talkative, luxurious, and without reward gives no predictions. The soothsayers would appear, at least at a later time, to have been superior to and more skilful than the augurs. Perhaps part of their success lay, as in the famous case of Pyrrhus, in the cleverness with which they gave deliverances so worded that whatever happened their reputation did not suffer.†

LITERATURE.—E. B. Tylor, PC, London, 1903, i. 145, 147; HDB v. 145, 615^a n., and the literature under DIVINATION and PYTHON.

P. A. GORDON CLARK.

SOPATER (Σωπάτρος, a common Greek name).—Sopater is mentioned in Ac 20⁴ as a companion of St. Paul, who accompanied him from Greece to Asia Minor on his return journey to Palestine, whither he was bearing the offering of the churches 'for the poor among the saints that are at Jerusalem' (Ro 15²⁶). It has been conjectured that all the persons referred to in Ac 20⁴ were delegates of their respective communities appointed 'in the matter of this grace' (2 Co 8¹⁹). If this was so, we shall suppose that they went all the way to Jerusalem. We know that one of them, Trophimus, did so (Ac 21²⁹), and evidently also Aristarchus (27²). Sopater was perhaps the delegate of the church at Berea. He is described as a native of that place (Βερεαίος), and was perhaps a Hellenistic Jew, one of those who contrasted so favourably with the Jews of Thessalonica, one of the 'many' who believed during the Apostle's visit (17¹⁰⁻¹⁴). If he was not a Jew he cannot be identified, as is sometimes suggested, with Sosipater (q.v.), whose salutation is sent by St. Paul in Ro 16²¹, and who is described as one of the Apostle's 'kinsmen,' i.e. fellow-Jews. Nothing further is known of Sopater than that he was 'the son of Pyrrhus' (Σωπάτρος Πύρρου), of whom, however, we are entirely ignorant. The patronymic is omitted by TR and AV but is found in SABDE, several ancient versions, and RV. See art. PYRRHUS.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

SORCERY.—The indefiniteness attaching to the meaning of words connected with divination, noticed in the art. SOOTHSAYING, is quite as applicable to sorcery. From sors, 'a lot,' come sortiri, 'to cast lots,' and sortarius, 'one who foretells fortunes by lots.' To enable the foreteller to do his work, assistance was gained from spiritism and the latter conception gradually banished the idea of lots, confined now to 'sortilege,' and sorcery came to mean accomplishing one's object by means of evil spirits. It is applied to making the wind blow in a certain direction, causing storms and disasters; bringing on darkness; manipulating the rain-clouds, etc.*

From the word שֹׁפֵט, not used in the Qal, but evidently meaning 'to pray,' we have the Piel שָׁפַט, which means 'to pray intensely and effectively.' This word, which has no connexion with lots, is used in an anti-religious sense, and in 2 Ch 33⁶ is translated 'used witchcraft' (AV), 'practised sorcery' (RV); and in the LXX εφάρμακευε.† The participle of this word שֹׁפֵט means one who by intense prayer, or spell, achieves supernormal results. It is translated in Ex 7¹¹, Dn 2², Mal 3⁵ 'sorcerers' (AV and RV), and in LXX φάρμακος, while the feminine שֹׁפֵטָה in Ex 22¹⁷ (13) is translated by 'witch' (AV), 'sorceress' (RV); in LXX φάρμακος. שֹׁפֵט itself in Dt 18¹⁰ is translated by 'witch' (AV); clearly it should at least be 'wizard,' unless 'witch' is here used as a word of common gender; by 'sorcerer' in RV, while in this case the LXX uses ουνισόμενος.‡

In Jer 27, שֹׁפֵט, the practisers of the art, is translated 'your sorcerers' in AV and RV, while the LXX uses φάρμακων (Jer 34⁹). The noun שֹׁפֵט in Is 47¹² is translated by 'sorceries' (AV and RV), and by φαρμακεία in the LXX; but in 2 K 9²², Mic 5¹², Nah 3⁴ it is translated by 'witchcrafts,' LXX φάρμακος, where clearly the right translation is 'magic arts.'§ But in Is 57³ the phrase שֹׁפֵט is rendered in AV and RV 'sons of the sorceress,' and in LXX by υἱοὶ ἀνομοῦ. In Dn 12⁹ 2-10 27 44⁷ 57-11 the word שֹׁפֵט, which is translated 'astrologers' in the AV, is rendered 'enchanters' in RV, and in the LXX by μάγοι. Herodotus (i. 101) uses this word to indicate the Magi, one of the six tribes of the Medes, who were probably a sacred priestly class, devoted to astrology, divination by dreams, and the practice of magic generally.¶ This word is applied by the writer of the First Gospel to the men from the East who visited the cradle of Jesus (Mt 21⁷ 16), but that incident throws no light either on their status, the rites which they practised, or the country from which they came.

In Ac 13⁸ the name μάγος is applied to the Jew Bar-Jesus of Paphos. It is translated 'sorcerer' by AV and Moffatt, and also by the RV, with 'Magus' in the margin. The further designation ψευδοπροφήτης would indicate that he was by profession a prognosticator, probably of fortunes or events, but this is the only hint given of his arts or pretensions. In Ac 8⁹ 11 Simon of Samaria is spoken of as μαγεύων, and the art which he practised is named μαγεία. These are translated in AV and RV 'used sorcery' and 'sorceries,' but Moffatt's translations, 'practised magic arts' and 'skill in magic,' are much truer to the Greek and to the facts so far as we can judge. The writer of the Apocalypse, to describe a sin or set of sins, falls back on the LXX, and uses words connected with φάρμακος. This word means a drug which can be given to a person, or used magically by one person on another to produce an effect hurtful or the reverse. φαρμακεία is the practice of this art, and φαρμακος is the practitioner. In the apostolic writings these are used in a bad sense. In Rev 9²¹ the unrepentant are grouped into those who have

* Exp, 8th ser., vii. [1914] 21; The Book of Ser Marco Polo, tr. by H. Yule, London, 1875, i. 99, 108, 175, 173, 292, 300, 339; ii. 399.

† Exp, 8th ser., vii. 24; EB iii. 2900.

‡ Exp, 8th ser., vii. 22, 23.

§ Exp, 8th ser., vii. 22; W. R. Smith, JPh xiii. [1884-85] 273 ff., xiv. [1885] 113.

¶ Exp, 8th ser., vii. 25; EB iii. 2960.

‡ HDB iii. 203; J. H. Moulton, Early Religious Poetry of Persia, Cambridge, 1911, p. 75; G. Maspero, The Passing of the Empires, London, 1900, pp. 452, 577, 595, 783. The Rabmag (Jer 39³ 15) was probably the (or a) chief of this tribe who may have been either the chief physician attached to the Court or, more probably, a high official charged with the care of the horse and chariotry (see A. H. Sayce, The Higher Criticism and the Verdict of the Monuments, London, 1894, p. 458; Records of the Past, 2nd ser., ii. [London, 1889] 182; C. H. W. Johns, Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters, Edinburgh, 1904, p. 375).

 W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 76.

* Augustine, de Civ. Dei, iii. 11. 17.

† For functions of the Semitic soothsayers see EB ii. xxii. 319^b. On Babylonian soothsaying see ERE ii. 316^b, 319^b.

not forsaken four vices, one of which is φάρμακela (the variant readings in this and the following cases do not affect the sense). The word is translated in AV and RV 'sorceries,' by Moffatt 'magic spell,' and by Weymouth 'practice of magic.' The place of the word and the well-known custom of the time suggest that the true meaning, in conformity with the original designation of the word, is 'poisoning.' In the condemnation of Babylon (Rev 18²³) it is said: 'all nations were seduced, ἐν τῇ φαρμακείᾳ.' This is translated in AV 'sorceries,' in RV 'sorcery,' by Moffatt 'magic spell,' by Weymouth 'magic thou didst practise'; the Twentieth Century New Testament has come nearest to the right translation in 'magical charms,' i.e. charms not natural, but produced by magic; but the true meaning seems to be 'magical love philtre.' One class of those who are to be cast into the lake of fire (Rev 21⁸) is that of the φάρμακεύς, which is translated 'sorcerers' by AV and RV and Moffatt, while Weymouth's version 'those who practise magic' might be improved by translating 'those who practise poisoning.' Outside the Holy City are the φάρμακοί (Rev 22¹⁵), concerning whom the remarks just made apply. In Gal 5²⁰, among the deeds of the flesh is φάρμακela, which is translated in AV 'witchcraft,' in RV 'sorcery,' and by Moffatt 'magic.' Among the clauses of the second commandment of the Didache are οὐ μαγεύσεις, οὐ φαρμακεύσεις, which H. D. M. Spence* translates, 'thou shalt not practise magic' and 'thou shalt not use enchantments.' But the other sins mentioned naturally suggest that the latter command is, 'thou shalt not practise poisoning.' Sorcery in one form or another is practised in all the religions of the lower culture.† It long survived among Western Christians, if it does not still survive. 'A prefect of Honorius (A.D. 395-423) proposed to employ the Tuscan sorcerers, who offered the aid of their arts against Alaric, and Litorius, fighting against a successor of Alaric in Gaul, consulted the pagan seers before the last battle, under the walls of Toulouse. In the last years of the Western Empire, the diviners of Africa were practising their arts among the nominal Christians of Aquitaine.'‡ In the Armenian Church there are still 'good sorcerers, who are quite disposed, with the aid of supernatural powers, to render service to human beings.'§

LITERATURE.—See under the articles DIVINATION and EXORCISM.
P. A. GORDON CLARK.

SORROW.—See REPENTANCE, GRIEF.

SOSIPATER (Σωσιπάρτος, a Greek name). — Sosipater is one of three men, Lucius and Jason being the others, who send salutations in Ro 16²¹ and are described by St. Paul as 'my kinsmen' (οἱ συγγενεῖς μου), i.e. fellow-Jews (cf. Andronicus and Junia(s), v.⁷, Herodion, v.¹¹). It is possible that Jason (q.v.) is identical with Jason of Ac 17^{6f}, who was the Apostle's host at Thessalonica. Sosipater may be the same as Sopater (q.v.)—another form of the name—of Ac 20⁴, who is said to have been a Berean. If these identifications are correct, we shall suppose that these men were visiting St. Paul at Corinth at the time of writing or had become missionary companions of the Apostle. We know that Sopater did accompany St. Paul afterwards on at least part of his return journey to Palestine. It is perhaps in favour of this theory that the salutations of Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater are sent with those of Timothy and not with those of the Corinthian Christians, Gaius, Erastus, Quartus (v.²³), the personal greeting of the amanuensis being interposed (v.²²). If we think the identification unlikely, we shall suppose Sosipater and the others to have been members of the church at Corinth. It is perhaps easier to believe that their salutations were meant for fellow-Christians at Ephesus than at Rome, but we must remember that in the Apostolic Church sympathy and even affection were possible between converts who were not personally acquainted. It is interesting but of little importance for our present purpose to know that the name Sosipater is found among the list of Thessalonian politarchs (CIG ii. 1967).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

SOSTHENES.—The name occurs twice in the NT. In Ac 18¹⁷ a Sosthenes is 'the ruler of the synagogue' in Corinth. Although in the Diaspora this title gained a more extended sense than in Palestine as an honorary title, there seems to have been only one ruler of the synagogue in Corinth. In that case Sosthenes must have been recently appointed when Crispus became a Christian; and probably he took a prominent part in the proceedings when 'the Jews with one accord rose up against Paul, and brought him before the judgment-seat' (Ac 18¹²). The charge having been dismissed, Sosthenes was laid hold of and beaten before the judgment seat, but Gallio (q.v.) 'cared for none of these things' (v.¹⁷). RV, dropping οἱ Ἕλληνες, favours the idea that it was the Jews who beat Sosthenes, venting on their own leader their rage over their disappointment. Another view has been that Gallio allowed the Jews to console themselves by beating Sosthenes, who was a Christian. Both these views are, however, rejected as historically inconceivable. Probably the reading οἱ Ἕλληνες has dropped out through a misapprehension of the scene due to the fact that a Sosthenes is mentioned with St. Paul in 1 Co 1¹. It cannot be decided whether these two men are the same person. The name was common; and nothing is said in the NT which identifies them. What happened when Gallio dismissed the charge against St. Paul was that 'the Greeks, who always hated the Jews, took advantage of the marked snub which the governor had inflicted on them, to seize and beat Sosthenes, who had been appointed to replace Crispus as Archisynagogos,'—a 'piece of "Lynch law," which probably seemed to him [Gallio] to be a rough sort of justice' (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 259). If Ac 18¹⁷ and 1 Co 1¹ refer to the same person, Sosthenes must have been converted subsequently and become a Christian leader. There is nothing impossible in this. If one ruler of the synagogue was converted, why not another? It is conceivable that his sufferings in a religious riot may have turned his mind again to St. Paul's teaching. As a former ruler of the synagogue, his presence with St. Paul in Ephesus is explicable on two grounds: (a) his presence in Corinth as a Christian might irritate the Jews and make Christian work harder; (b) his social position and ability would probably mark him out as a suitable fellow-worker with St. Paul, who would delight to make an ally of a persecutor. It is certainly in favour of this identification that St. Paul mentions Sosthenes not as an amanuensis but as a Christian of standing, whose name is well known in Corinth and will carry authority with the Church. It has been suggested also that his subsequent conversion would account for St. Luke's exceptionally preserving the name of St. Paul's assailant. Whilst these considerations favour the identification, it cannot be proved. But it would be an interesting coincidence that both Crispus and Sosthenes should be mentioned in 1 Co 1, if both were converted rulers of the synagogue.

* The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, London, 1885, ch. ii.

† See, e.g., G. T. Bettany, Primitive Religions, London, 1891, pp. 20, 36, 90, 118; ERE li. 362b.

‡ Samuel Dill, *Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire*², London, 1905, p. 5.

§ ERE i. 806.

Eusebius (HE i. 12) states that Sosthenes was one of the Seventy; but probably this is a worthless tradition. Tradition is responsible also for the statement that he became bishop of Colophon.

LITERATURE.—W. P. Dickson, art. 'Sosthenes' in HDB; W. M. Ramsay, art. 'Corinth,' ib. i. 482^a; C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i.² [London, 1897] 113, 306-310; A. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, i.² [London, 1908] 321; F. Godet, Commentary on 1st Corinthians (Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1886); EGT, 'Acts,' London, 1900, p. 391, and '1 Corinthians,' do., p. 753; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 257-259. J. E. ROBERTS.

SOUL (ψυχή).—1. While ψυχή primarily denotes the animal soul or vital principle (Lat. anima), and hence is equivalent to life, 'soul' is not used in the NT outside of the Gospels (the AV of Mt 16²⁶ Mk 8^{36L}; but cf. the RV) to render ψυχή in this meaning of the word, 'life' being always employed instead (Ac 20^{10, 24}, Ph 2³⁰, etc.). Occasionally, however, 'soul' is employed of the subject, whether man (1 Co 15⁴⁵, Rev 18¹⁵) or lower animal (Rev 16³; cf. 8⁹), in which the principle of life inheres. Cf. art. LIFE AND DEATH.

2. Frequently 'soul' denotes the subject in the distinctness or his existence as an individual, and so is only an emphatic designation of the man himself. 'Every soul' (Ac 2⁴³ 3²³, Ro 13¹) is equivalent to 'every one'; and the plural 'souls' is often used in cases of enumeration as a synonym for persons (e.g. 'three thousand souls,' Ac 2⁴¹; 'eight souls,' 1 P 3²⁰).

3. While in its original meaning 'soul' refers to the physical or animal life, in its ordinary use it denotes the inner and higher as distinguished from the bodily nature of man—that in him which is the seat of thought, feeling, and will, and especially that which is the subject of the Christian salvation (1 Th 5⁸, He 6¹⁹ 10³⁹ 13¹⁷, Ja 5²⁰ 1 P 1², 3 Jn 3²). In this meaning the word is frequently associated with 'spirit' (πνεῦμα), but usually in such a way as to show that there is no intention of so distinguishing between the two as to imply that man is possessed of a tripartite nature—body, soul, and spirit—or that the soul is concerned with earthly things while the spirit relates itself to God and heaven. When St. Paul writes, 'Stand fast in one spirit, with one soul striving for the faith of the gospel' (Ph 1²⁷ RV), it seems evident that he is using the terms in a manner analogous to the parallelism of Hebrew poetry (cf. Lk 1^{46L}). And when St. James (2²⁶) declares that 'the body without the spirit is dead' (cf. Mt 10²⁸, 'which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul'), he is certainly not making use of 'spirit' in a more exalted sense than that in which 'soul' is employed when he speaks of the word 'which is able to save your souls' (1²¹), or declares that he who converts a sinner from the error of his ways 'shall save a soul from death' (5²⁰).

4. In a few cases 'soul' denotes the inner and higher part of man's being as disembodied, but still living a life of its own after it has been separated from the physical part which is subject to corruption (Ac 2²⁷, Rev 6⁹ 20⁴).

5. There is another use of 'soul,' however, in which it appears to be definitely distinguished from 'spirit' (1 Th 5²³, He 4¹²). These passages might seem to lend some support to trichotomist views, if it were not that the use of the derived adjectives ψυχικός (lit. 'soulish'; AV 'natural,' 'sensual') and πνευματικός (AV 'spiritual') points not to any psychological distinction in the elements of human nature, but to a theological distinction between two stages of religious experience. This distinction of soulish and spiritual, which is especially characteristic of St. Paul (1 Co 2¹¹⁻¹⁶ 15⁴²⁻⁴⁴; cf. Ja 3¹⁵, Jude¹⁹), is evidently, as the contexts show, one between the natural or unregenerate man and the regenerate man who is living through grace under the power of the Divine Spirit. And so when St. Paul, in the passage above referred to, writes, 'And may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire (1 Th 5²³), he probably means by 'soul' the human individuality with all its natural powers, and by 'spirit' that individuality as charged with the new Divine potencies of the Christian life. And when the author of Hebrews (4¹²) describes the word of God as 'piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit,' this should perhaps be taken not as 'a mere rhetorical accumulation of terms' (A. B. Davidson, Hebrews, 1882, in loc.), much less as suggesting a psychological distinction between the sensuous soul and the rational spirit, but rather as pointing to a power possessed by the Divine word of discriminating between the natural and the regenerate heart and of bringing conviction to both alike. See, further, art. SPIRIT, SPIRITUAL.

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, *Bib.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek*³, 1880, p. 582; J. Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man, 1895, pp. 87 ff., 135 f.; W. P. Dickson, St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit, 1883, p. 193 ff.; ExpT x. [1893-99] 2.

J. C. LAMBERT.

SPAIN (Σπαρία).—Spain was St. Paul's objective during the later years of his missionary activity. It was characteristic of him that he was always thinking of 'the parts beyond' (τὰ ὑπερέκεινα, 2 Co 10¹⁶). Sensitive regardful of 'the province (καὶνὸν) which God apportioned' him, and determined not to intrude 'in another's province' (2 Co 10¹³ 15¹⁶), he felt drawn to the fresh fields of the distant West. It is in his letter to the Romans (15⁴ 23) that he first broaches the idea of evangelizing Spain. Eager as he was to 'see Rome' and to preach the gospel in it, he did not purpose to remain there long. The metropolis was not in his καὶνόν, for others had already laboured there, and he intimates that in his visit to the Roman Christians he would be en route (διαπορεύμενος) for his proper sphere. He would 'go on by' them (ἀπελευσόμεναι δι' ὑμῶν) as he journeyed westward. The Imperial width of his horizon and boldness of his policy were worthy of his Roman citizenship, and the fact that Spain was the most completely Romanized of all the provinces no doubt made it seem a very attractive and promising mission field. It is true that half a century after St. Paul's time Juvenal could still write, 'Horrida vitanda est Hispania' (Sat. viii. 116), but he was doubtless thinking of the barbarous tribes of the northern mountains. In the beginning of our era Strabo (III. ii. 15) says that the southern Spaniards, 'especially those who dwell about the Bætis (Guadalquivir), have been so entirely converted to the Roman mode of life as even to have forgotten their own language.' Carrying over the permanent benefits of an earlier Phœnician and Carthaginian civilization, Spain had become a Roman province at the end of the Second Punic War (201 B.C.), and by the days of Cicero and Cæsar the southern districts were almost wholly Italian. 'If preparation was anywhere made by the republic for the great all-significant work of the imperial period—the Romanising of the West—it was in Spain. . . . In all Spain under Augustus there were numbered fifty communities with full citizenship; nearly fifty others had up to this time received Latin rights, and stood as to inward organisation on a par with the burgess-communities. . . . Like the Roman dress, the Roman language was largely diffused even among those Spaniards who had not Italian burgess-rights, and the government favoured the de facto Romanising of the land' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, 1909, i. 67-70). Many of the writers of Rome's silver age, notably Lucan, the two Senecas, Martial, and Quintilian, were Spaniards. The Emperors Trajan and Hadrian were born in Spain.

If St. Paul ever reached this goal, he must have made Latin for a time his missionary language, for even when half the population of Rome was speaking Greek, Spain was never in any degree Hellenized. But the question whether the Apostle succeeded in carrying out his purpose cannot be confidently answered. There are only two authorities for a Spanish journey—the Muratorian Fragment on the Canon, and Clement of Rome. The writer of the former (about A.D. 200) may have had independent knowledge, but it is more likely that when he mentions the 'profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis,' he is merely drawing an inference that the purpose expressed in Ro 15^{24, 28} was fulfilled. The words of Clement (ad Cor. v.) are well known: 'Paul . . . having taught the whole world righteousness, and having come to the bound of the West (ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως ἐλθὼν), and having borne witness (μαρτυρήσας) before the rulers, so was released from the world and went to the Holy Place, having become the greatest example of patience.' Lightfoot interpreted 'the bound of the West' as Spain, but, since the next clauses certainly refer to St. Paul's testimony and martyrdom in Rome, it seems natural to take ἐλθὼν and μαρτυρήσας together, and difficult to interpolate a journey between them. Sanday-Headlam ('Romans' [ICC, 1902], 414) ask: 'Is it quite certain that a Jew, as Clement probably was, speaking of St. Paul, another Jew, would not look upon Rome relatively to Jerusalem as the τέρμα τῆς δύσεως, "the western limit"?' It is significant that the Pastoral Epistles contain no suggestion of a campaign, possible or actual, in the West.

LITERATURE.—J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, 1891, Biblical Essays, 1893, p. 423 f.; A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 415 f.; C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, ii. [1895] 137 f.

JAMES STRAHAN.

SPEARMAN.—See ARMY.

SPICE.—See AMOMUM.

SPIRIT, SPIRITUAL (πνεῦμα, πνευματικός).—1. In the Acts and the Epistles πνεῦμα very frequently refers to the Divine Spirit, conceived either as a power proceeding from God (Ac 2¹⁷, Ro 8¹¹) or as a definite personality (Ac 8²⁹, Eph 4³⁰). See, further, HOLY SPIRIT.

2. It is applied to created beings other than human, whether angels (He 1¹⁴) or evil spirits (Ac 5¹⁶ 19¹⁵, 1 Ti 4¹, Rev 16¹⁴; cf. Eph 6¹², 'the spiritual hosts [τὰ πνευματικά] of wickedness').

3. It is used of disembodied human spirits (Ac 23^{8c}), whether in a state of blessedness (He 12²³) or of condemnation (1 P 3¹⁹).

4. It personifies various kinds of influence, as in the phrases 'spirit of bondage' (Ro 8¹⁵), 'spirit of stupor' (11⁸), 'spirit of the world' (1 Co 2¹²), 'spirit of fear' (2 Ti 1⁷), 'spirit of truth' and 'spirit of error' (1 Jn 4⁶).

5. It is employed in contrast with 'the letter' (γράμμα) to denote inward reality as opposed to outward form (Ro 2²⁹ 7⁶, 2 Co 3⁶).

6. Psychologically it occurs in a sense not to be distinguished from 'soul,' to designate the whole of man's inner nature as something separate from, or contrasted with, his body (Ac 7⁵⁹, 1 Co 2¹¹ 5⁵ 7³⁴, Ja 2²⁶). See art. SOUL.

7. In St. Paul's theology 'spirit' receives a specific religious meaning that must be distinguished from the psychological one just noted. The Apostle's doctrine of salvation, with its antithesis between sin and grace, leads him to recognize an opposition between flesh and spirit which is much more than the natural contrast between spirit and body (Ro 8¹⁻¹³). 'Flesh' (q.v.) stands for fallen human nature, human nature as defiled and determined by sin (cf. Ro 8³, 'sinful flesh,' lit. 'flesh of sin'), in contrast with which 'spirit' stands for the Christian's new or regenerate nature, in which the Spirit of God dwells (v.⁹) in such a way as to bring deliverance from the law of sin and of death (v.²). And the Apostle had so keen a sense of the difference between the unregenerate and the regenerate condition, and of man's fallen and sinful estate as affecting his whole nature, that he found it necessary to express the contrast in a way which would make it plain that the soul as well as the body is subject to the dominance of sin. For this purpose he makes an antithesis between 'spirit' and 'soul'—though for ordinary psychological purposes he treats the words as synonyms—and therefore opposes (1 Co 2^{14c}, 15⁴⁴, 46) the spiritual (πνευματικός) to the psychical or soulish (ψυχικός, AV 'natural,' 'sensual'). The soulish man is the merely natural man, the spiritual man is one into whom the Divine Spirit has entered, transforming the natural πνεῦμα and raising it to a higher power by this indwelling. This distinction which the Apostle makes between 'soulish' and 'spiritual' is not an arbitrary one, however, though he has adopted it for theological purposes of his own, but rests upon a differential use in the OT of nephesh ('soul,' LXX ψυχή) and ruah ('spirit,' LXX πνεῦμα). 'Soul' in the OT stands for the natural life regarded from the point of view of its separate individuality (Gn 2⁷ 17¹⁴), while 'spirit' is the principle of life considered as flowing from God Himself (Job 27³, Ps 51¹⁰, Ec 12⁷), who is thus fitly called the God of the spirits of all flesh (Nu 16²² 27¹⁶). Even in the OT 'spirit' stood, as 'soul' did not, for both the Divine and the human essence, and thus lent itself more readily to the thought of a vital connexion between the two, in which life is imparted from the higher to the lower. Hence St. Paul was only carrying OT usage and suggestion into a region of clearer theological definition when he contrasted the soulish with the spiritual, applying the former to man as he is by nature apart from Divine grace, and the latter to the new man in whom the Spirit of God has taken up His abode (Ro 8⁹). This theological use of 'spiritual,' which is characteristic of St. Paul though not wholly confined to him, is extended from persons to things, so that we read of spiritual meat and drink (1 Co 10^{34c}), a spiritual body (15⁴⁴), spiritual songs (Col 3¹⁶), a spiritual house and spiritual sacrifices (1 P 2⁵). In all these cases 'spiritual' points to the presence of the Divine Spirit or to the activity of a human spirit that has been Divinely quickened and renewed.

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, 1880, p. 503 ff.; J. Laidlaw, Bible Doctrine of Man, 1895, pp. 131 ff., 269 ff.; W. P. Dickson, St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit, 1883, p. 168 ff.; B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, Eng. tr., i. [1882] 346 ff. J. C. LAMBERT.

SPIRIT, HOLY.—See HOLY SPIRIT.

SPIRITS IN PRISON.—This expression appears in 1 P 3¹⁹, and some of its implications have been already discussed under DESCENT INTO HADES. It remains to summarize the principal interpretations that the phrase has received.

1. Augustine argues (Ep. clxiv. 'ad Euod.' 13 ff.) that 1 P 3¹⁹ alludes to a preaching by the pre-incarnate Christ to the contemporaries of Noah, imprisoned in the darkness of ignorance, who were afterwards overwhelmed in the Flood for their sins. He is led to this conclusion by the difficulty which is presented by the apparent restriction of Christ's preaching, if it was in Hades, to one section only of the men who lived before

His advent, viz. the antediluvian patriarchs. Augustine's interpretation has had a wide influence, but it must be dismissed as inconsistent with the whole tenor of 1 P 3¹⁷. It was after Christ had been 'put to death in the flesh' that He was 'quickened in the spirit,' in which He 'went and preached unto the spirits in prison.' The words must refer to a ministry of Christ in Hades after His Passion. To whom was this ministry addressed?

2. πνεύματα in the NT generally means 'angels,' and it has been held that the fallen angels are indicated by τὰ πνεύματα ἐν φυλακῇ. This would agree with the language of Jude⁶ and 2 P 24, the latter passage (as in 1 P 3¹⁹) going on to speak of Noah and the Flood. So in Eth. Enoch, x. 12, the sons of God who had taken wives of the daughters of men (Gn 6-7) are represented as bound fast under the hills until the Day of Judgment; cf. also Eth. Enoch, xxi. 10, and Slav. Enoch, vii. 1, where the fallen angels in the second heaven are described as 'the prisoners suspended, reserved for the eternal judgement.' So also Apoc. Baruch, lvi. 12f.: 'Some of them descended, and mingled with women. And then those who did so were tormented in chains. . . . And those who dwelt on the earth perished . . . through the waters of the deluge.' But in this literature there is no trace of a preaching by Christ to the fallen angels; although in Eth. Enoch, xii. 4, xiii. 8, the 'watchers of the heaven' who have fallen from their high estate are reproved and condemned by Enoch. Again, the 'spirits in prison' of 1 P 3¹⁹ must be included among the νεκροί of 1 P 4⁶ to whom the gospel was preached, and these cannot be angels. Augustine, indeed, was forced by the exigencies of his theory to explain νεκροί of the spiritually dead, but the contrast between 'the quick and the dead' in the preceding verse (1 P 4⁶) proves that the physically dead are in view.

The objection of Loofs (ERE iv. 659) that σαρκί in 1 P 4⁶ proves that the νεκροί must be alive in the flesh is not convincing. When they were judged, they were in the flesh; but 'the difference in tense in κριθῶσι, ζώσι makes the former verb antecedent in time to the latter, and the sense is the same as if St. Peter had written ἵνα κριθέντες ζώσι' (Bigg, ICC, in loc.).

3. We have, then, to interpret πνεύματα of the disembodied spirits of men (as in He 12²³; cf. Lk 24^{37, 39}), and φυλακῇ of Sheol or Hades, in which after death they are imprisoned, according to Jewish belief. Thus in Apoc. Baruch, xxiii. 4, we read of 'a place prepared where the living might dwell and the dead might be guarded'; cf. 2 Es 7^{38, 39} and Is 42⁷ 49⁹ 61¹ for phrases out of which the idea of Sheol as a prison might have grown (see, further, DESCENT INTO HADES, § 3). The idea was taken over by the early Christian Church. E.g., Hippolytus (c. Græcos, ed. P. A. de Lagarde, Leipzig, 1858, p. 68) writes: τοῦτο το χωριον (sc. 'Ἄδης) ὡς φρουριον ἀπενεμήθη ψυχαῖς, and describes Hades as divided into two compartments, for the good and the evil, both guarded by angels, the unrighteous being haled to their own place as prisoners (ὡς δέσμοι ἐλκομενοί). And Tertullian (de Anima, c. 8) explains the φυλακῇ of Mt 5²⁵ as the Hades of discipline for the soul. Indeed, the Peshitta Syriac of τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν (1 P 3¹⁹) is equivalent to 'animabus illis quæ detinebantur in inferis,' which leaves no doubt as to the sense which the Syriac translators attached to the phrase under consideration.

4. The 'spirits in prison' of 1 P 3¹⁹ are, therefore, human souls in Hades or the abode of the departed, to whom Christ 'preached' after His Passion, a further allusion to the same mysterious ministry being found in 1 P 4⁶. This has already been discussed under DESCENT INTO HADES, where it has been shown that various opinions were held by the early Christian theologians as to the scope of Christ's mission to the under world, some confining it to Jews, some to Gentiles, and some admitting all the departed, righteous or unrighteous, to a share in its benediction. But in 1 P 3¹⁹, where alone in the NT the phrase 'spirits in prison' is found, it is immediately followed by the words 'which aforetime were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah,' etc.—an apparent restriction of its content which is not easy to understand.

An explanation which has much to recommend it is that the Noachian patriarchs are here particularly specified, because the Flood was the great typical judgment of the ancient world, and thus the 'disobedient in the days of Noah' are representative of the disobedient in every age (see an excellent discussion of this by F. H. Chase in HDB iii. 795). There is, however, no suggestion in 1 P 3²⁰ that the Noachians are mentioned as representative of all those who died in sin. The emphasis is on the fact of Christ preaching in Hades after His death, and not upon the persons to whom He preached. Great stress was laid in the next age upon this ministry as the direct issue of the Passion. Irenæus actually says (Hær. iv. 33) that the final cause of Christ's sufferings was that, having died, He might thus visit and deliver the dead. And Origen (in Ps 3⁹), arguing that Christ effected by the separation of His soul from His body much more for the salvation of mankind than would otherwise have been accomplished, quotes 1 P 3¹⁹ in proof. Thus the words θανατωθεῖς μὲν σαρκί, ζωοποιηθεῖς δὲ πνεύματι lead directly to the recital of the Descent into Hades. If any of those to whom Christ preached were to be specified, the argument would, indeed, require mention of ἄδικοι, as it is the suffering of the just for the unjust that is in question; but to proceed to specify any individuals at this point is a digression. It must be remembered, however, that the two topics—Hades and the Flood—were closely associated in Jewish thought, although to the modern mind they are quite distinct. For the Flood was caused primarily by the breaking forth of the fountains of the great deep (Gn 7¹¹), upon which the earth rested, and which was the mysterious abode of dread monsters and evil things (Gn 1-4, Is 51⁹). These abysmal waters were waters of destruction; and the 'abyss' (Lk 8³¹) was the home of devils, from which the Beast of the Apocalypse came forth (Rev 11⁷ 17⁸). Now Sheol or Hades, the place of departed souls, was conceived as beneath these abysmal waters under the solid earth. 'They that are deceased tremble beneath the waters and the inhabitants thereof' (Job 26⁶). And it was into this 'abyss' that Christ descended after His Passion (Ro 10⁷).

Hence the mention of the Descensus would at once suggest to a Jew the abyss, whence the waters of judgment burst forth at the Flood. Of the countless souls imprisoned there, the writer recalls, naturally and immediately, those who were carried to its depths in that overwhelming visitation of God's wrath. To these (but not to the exclusion of others) Christ preached, that, having been judged in the flesh as men are judged (κατὰ ἀνθρώπους), they might henceforth live in the spirit as God lives (κατὰ θεόν, 1 P 4⁶). And so was Christ's 'quickening in the spirit' manifest after His death.

LITERATURE.—To the books named under DESCENT INTO HADES may be added A. Schweizer, Hinabgefahren zur Hölle als Mythos ohne biblische Begründung, Zürich, 1868; E. H. Plumptre, The Spirits in Prison, London, 1887; R. H. Charles, Eschatology, Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian, London, 1899.

J. H. BERNARD.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS.—See GIFTS.

SPIRITUAL SONGS.—Spiritual songs (Eph 5¹⁹, Col 3¹⁶) cannot be distinguished as such from hymns and psalms (q.v.). But the meaning of the epithet 'spiritual' deserves attention. St. Paul contrasts truly religious thoughts and words inspired by the Holy Spirit with the effusions of drunkards or the odes of heathen poets composed in ecstasy.

A. E. BURN.

STACHYS (Στάχυς, a Greek name).—Stachys is saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁹ and described as 'my beloved' (τὸν ἀγαπητόν μου). The only other persons so described in these salutations are Epænetus (v.⁹) and Ampliatus (v.⁸). A woman, Persis (q.v.), is saluted, perhaps with intentional delicacy, as 'the beloved' (v.¹²). The term may indicate a personal convert of the Apostle or one closely associated with his work. Nothing further is known of Stachys. We shall suppose him to have been a Roman or Ephesian Christian, according to our view of the destination of Ro 16. The name is comparatively rare, but occurs in inscriptions of the Imperial household (J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*², 1878, p. 174).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

STAFF.—The word ῥάβδος is translated 'sceptre' in He 1⁸ and 'rod' in 9⁴, 1 Co 4²¹, Rev 2²⁷, etc. In He 11¹, 'Jacob . . . worshipped [leaning] upon the top of his staff.' The reference is to the act of the patriarch when he received the solemn oath of Joseph, that he would bury him with his fathers ('Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head,' Gn 47³¹). In Hebrews the words are an exact quotation from the LXX. The difference of translation has arisen from the different ways of vocalizing סֵבֶה. The LXX read it as סֵבֶה, 'staff,' and the Massoretes as סֵבֶה, 'bed.' The question is, Which is the more likely to be right? The date of the LXX is uncertain (see HDB, art. 'Septuagint'), and the rise of the Massoretic system of vocalization is even more obscure (see HDB iv. 730^a). It is not improbable that the LXX gives an earlier and more correct interpretation. The phrase 'bed's head' is both curious and difficult. It suggests ideas which are associated with an early Victorian 'four-poster,' and are quite out of place in relation to a bed in the East (see HDB, art. 'Bed'). Usually the bed was laid on the floor or on a low platform, but sometimes a slight portable frame was used (2 S 3³¹). There is a reference to the head of a bed in 1 S 19¹³. The bed's head may simply mean the place where the pillow was laid. Dillmann and Driver (Comm. on Genesis) accept the reading of the Massoretic text. To get over the difficulty, Cheyne (EBi, art. 'Staff') suggests that סֵבֶה, 'head,' should be read as סֵבֶה, 'couch.' There is no difficulty of interpretation if the LXX is followed: Jacob may have stood up to receive the oath of Joseph. Equally it may be said that there is no difficulty if the bed or couch had an end which might be called its 'head,' and that Jacob leaned upon it. It is impossible to decide whether 'staff' or 'bed' is right, but the fact that the LXX is the oldest commentary on the Hebrew Bible makes its reading the more probable.

LITERATURE.—Comm. on Genesis by A. Dillmann (1897), S. R. Driver (Westminster Com., 1904), and J. Skinner (ICC, 1910) in loc.; F. Rendall, Comm. on Hebrews, 1883; EBi, art. 'Staff'; HDB, artt. 'Bed,' 'Rod,' 'Sceptre'; Smith's DB, art. 'Staff'; C. Geikie, Hours with the Bible, new ed. vi. [1884] 28 n.

JOHN REID.

STAR.—There are only two passages in which the word 'star' occurs outside its frequent symbolical use in the book of Revelation. The first is in St. Stephen's defence, where he quotes a passage from the prophet Amos (Am 5²⁶⁻²⁷), speaking of the idolatry of the Israelites and mentioning 'the star of the god Rephan' (Ac 7⁴³). It is admittedly a difficult passage, but the probable reference is to the Assyrian star-god. The other is in St. Paul's well-known argument on the resurrection of the body: 'One star differeth from another star in glory' (1 Co 15⁴¹). As in nature we observe identity of substance with diversity of form, so will it be in the risen bodies of God's people.

Turning to the use of the word 'star' in the Book of Revelation, we find in the vision of the Son of Man that 'he had in his right hand seven stars' (Rev 1¹⁶) and that 'the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches' (v.²⁰). According to one view, the angels of the churches are their pastors or rulers; according to another, they are superhuman beings standing in some intimate relation to the churches. The latter is the ordinary use of ἄγγελος in the Apocalypse (see ANGELS; see also Rev 2¹ 3¹).

In the message to the church of Thyatira the promise to those who overcome is: 'I will give him the morning star' (Rev 2²⁸), i.e. the conqueror is to possess Christ. 'Christus est stella matutina qui nocte sæculi transacta lucem vitæ sanctis promittit et pandet æternam' (Bede). In Rev 22¹⁶ Christ says of Himself: 'I am . . . the bright, the morning star.' 'If the churches are λυχίαι and their angels δστέρες, the Head of the Church may fitly be the δστήρ ὁ πρωϊνός' (H. B. Swete, *Apocalypse*², London, 1907, p. 47). See art. MORNING STAR.

At the sounding of the third trumpet 'there fell from heaven a great star . . . and the name of the star is called Wormwood' (Rev 8^{10a}). This is a symbol of Divine visitation. Hence the name 'Wormwood,' which is associated with Divine chastisement. The waters are changed into wormwood, and many who drink of them die. This may represent the bitterness of the water with which men seek to quench their thirst, instead of partaking of the water of life. In Rev 9⁴ the Seer sees a star already fallen (πεπτωκότα) and lying on the ground, representing the fall of some person, perhaps Satan.

Lastly, the Woman in the vision (Rev 12¹) 'has a crown of twelve stars' (see art. SUN).

MORLEY STEVENSON.

STEALING.—The Apostolic Church could scarcely have increased in numbers without finding κλέπτai within her borders from time to time. The thieving slave had not gained his place in comedy without reason, and now when the slave turned Christian the temptation to cling to an easy and profitable habit must often have been specially strong. If his master also happened to be a Christian, then a perverted notion of the meaning of brotherhood could easily provide an excuse for pilfering. There was no compelling body of public sentiment on the matter in the Græco-Roman world, so that it was necessary to speak with some emphasis. Thus the exhortation to slaves in the letter to Titus insists that they should not be unworthy of any trust committed to them: 'Exhort servants to be subject to their masters . . . not purloining' (μη νοσφιζόμενους, Tit 2⁹). It is worthy of note that this word is used also in Ac 5—concerning the Ananias and Sapphira incident, where the pair 'set apart' some of the price obtained, and hoped to gain credit for the gift of the whole. The most natural explanation of St. Paul's words to Philemon (vv. 18, 19)—'if he hath wronged thee at all, or oweth thee ought, put that to mine account . . . I will repay it—seems to be that Onesimus had been guilty of some theft, and had fled to escape punishment.

That theft was not confined to the slave class is clear from the language of both St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Peter warns the Christian that he is not to suffer as a thief (1 P 4¹⁵). St. Paul, writing to the church at Corinth, mentions among those who cannot inherit the Kingdom of God fornicators and thieves, adding 'and such were some of you' (1 Co 6¹⁰). The most important passage in this connexion, however, is Eph 4²³, ὁ κλέπτων μὴ κλέπτειτω. This must obviously refer to stealing as a fact not of the past but of the present. The thief still existed, and that within the Church. Writing not in the spirit of a legislator, and still less in the manner of one formulating an 'interim' ethic, he insists that the habit is to be broken off. They are to cease from actual thefts, and are to learn the high principle which would make thieving impossible—so to work that they may be able to give. Obviously it was more lasting work to state this principle than to have merely advised restitution. On this high ground the atmosphere is such that the thieving desire cannot live. 'Stealing is the typical form of using the labour of another to supply our wishes, while it is our duty to make our own labour minister to the needs of others' (Westcott, Ephesians, p. 73).

LITERATURE.—B. F. Westcott, Ep. to Ephesians, London, 1906; S. D. F. Salmond, EGT, 'Ephesians,' do., 1903; E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., do., 1904. R. STRONG.

STEPHANAS.—In 1 Co 1¹⁶ St. Paul writes: 'I baptized also the household of Stephanas.' From 1 Co 16¹⁷ we learn that Stephanas was with St. Paul at the time. Perhaps he reminded the Apostle that his was one of the few cases of personal baptism at St. Paul's own hands. Usually he left the baptizing to his helpers. Two reasons for the less usual course are suggested in 1 Co 16¹⁵: 'Ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of Achaia.' It was natural for the Apostle to wish to baptize his first converts in Corinth; perhaps there was nobody else to baptize them. Moreover, the baptism of a household marked a real footing gained by Christianity in the city. These 'first-fruits' proved themselves valuable helpers: 'Ye know . . . that they have set themselves to minister unto the saints.' Stephanas himself was one of the deputation sent by the Corinthian Church to St. Paul, and was, therefore, a trusted leader. The Corinthian Christians are urged to 'be in subjection unto such,' and to 'acknowledge them that are such.' Here St. Paul holds up 'such' as Stephanas and his household as worthy of imitation and of deference. They seem to have been among the first assistants of the Apostle, outside the inner circle of his chosen companions, and they were specially valuable to the work in Corinth. No doubt their work was a voluntary consecration: there is nothing to indicate an ecclesiastical office. ἑταῖροι αὐτοῦ . . . implies a systematic laying out of themselves for service, such as is possible only to those free to dispose, as they choose, of their persons and their time' (EGT, '1 Corinthians,' London, 1900, in loc.). So the family must have been of independent means, and St. Paul is only asking the spontaneous submission and the respectful deference due to character and hard work. At the same time, there may have been in such voluntary service the germs out of which grew the Church's local ministry, as A. C. Headlam suggests (HDB iv. 613).

J. E. ROBERTS.

STEPHEN.—Of Stephen we know nothing beyond the short notice of him contained in the two chapters (6 and 7) of Acts. He is said by Epiphanius (Hær. xx. 4) to have been one of the Seventy; but such a statement has little weight. All we can say for certain is that, when elected to be one of the Seven, he was a man of position both within and without the Christian community (Ac 6³). The office to which he was appointed was that of administering alms to the widows of Hellenists (i.e. Greek-speaking Jews) who considered themselves overlooked in the daily distribution from the common fund of food or money. But to this work Stephen, like others of the Seven, notably Philip, by no means restricted himself. He was 'full of grace and power' (6³), and was impelled to engage in controversy with members of the Hellenistic synagogues established in Jerusalem, and 'they were not able to withstand the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake' (6¹⁰). It is generally supposed that, as he devoted himself to the members of these Hellenistic synagogues, he was himself a Hellenist. The inference, not unreasonable in itself, is confirmed by his name, and by the familiarity which he seems to show with the LXX version of the Scriptures, perhaps even by what seems to have been the tenor of his teaching. To the Hellenist Jews with whom he argued that tenor must have been unmistakable, even from the outset. He was at once accused of undermining the authority of the Law of Moses, denying the permanent sanctity even of the Temple (6¹⁴⁻¹⁵).

Those who brought these charges are called false witnesses. False witnesses they undoubtedly were, as they interpreted the words of warning and of insight which he uttered as threats thrown out against the Temple and the Law. In this it was with Stephen as it had been previously with our Lord. Our Lord Himself had said that He was to become the world's temple in the future, and was condemned for blasphemy for speaking ill words against the Temple in Jerusalem; Stephen proclaimed that Temple and Law had done their work and were to give place in time to a more spiritual temple, a more universal law, and was denounced for blasphemy. The speech which he delivers when summoned before the Sanhedrin makes it plain that this was his position; and the fullness with which the speech is given, as a sort of introduction to the section of the Acts which traces the gradual reception of the Gentiles into the Christian Church, makes it obvious that this is the right construction to be put upon his words.

The speech itself contains three lines of thought, sometimes kept separate, but oftener interlaced, all leading up to one and the same conclusion. The first line is this—that the original covenant made between God and Israel was concluded not with Moses but long before with Abraham and the patriarchs, and, since the Mosaic covenant had been thus preceded by an earlier and more spiritual one, it might also be followed by a later and more spiritual one ('A covenant confirmed beforehand by God, the law, which came four hundred and thirty years after, doth not disannul, so as to make the promise of noneffect' (Gal 3¹⁷). Secondly, there is the suggestion that since God was worshipped acceptably long before temple or even tabernacle (after which the Temple was modelled, the tabernacle itself being but a copy of the heavenly tabernacle seen on the mount) was built, and again since God was acceptably worshipped in spots far removed from the land of Canaan, and Solomon, at the very moment of building the Temple, declared that God dwells not in 'houses made with hands' (Ac 7⁴⁸), it is at least possible that God may be worshipped, and worshipped acceptably, elsewhere than in the Temple. Thirdly, the speech ends with the warning to which all the earlier part—the fate of Joseph, the fate of Moses—had led up: 'Ye stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye' (7⁵¹). It was this last lesson so emphatically driven home that immediately produced that outbreak of rage in the Sanhedrin which brought about Stephen's death. Its members condemned him to be guilty of blasphemy: he had justified, not denied or even softened down, his previous utterances; they rushed upon him, and, when he stated that he saw the heavens opened and Jesus standing to welcome him on the right hand of God, the vision did, in this view, but increase the blasphemy, so they dragged him out of the city and stoned him. Saul, then a young man, presided at the stoning and gave hearty assent and approval to his death (7⁶⁰ 8¹).

Two questions relating to this stoning have to be answered: (1) How did it take place at all, seeing that the Jews had not the power of life and death? (2) What was the date at which it occurred? As to the first point, the actual martyrdom of Stephen seems to have been something of the nature of a tumultuous outbreak. It was a sudden fit of rage that brought it about, similar to that through which St. Paul so nearly lost his life had he not been rescued by the Roman soldiers (22^{23a}). As to the second question, it has been suggested that this outbreak took place during a temporary vacancy in the provincial authority, which will not, however, fix the date, as the Roman governors were frequently changed during this period; or, as some have thought, it may have occurred during a vacancy in the Imperial throne. Tiberius died and Caius became Emperor early in A.D. 37, and Stephen's martyrdom has been put at this time. This is almost the latest date assigned, and there is more, perhaps, to be said for an earlier date such as Ramsay suggests—A.D. 32 or 33 (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 376). All that we can gather with fair certainty is that St. Paul's conversion followed soon after; but the date of this event is itself involved in much obscurity, depending, as it does, on whether we identify the visit to Jerusalem mentioned in Gal 11 with the visit of Paul and Barnabas described in Ac 11 and 12 or with that described in Ac 15. As Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, p. 29, concludes, it is impossible to settle this point with certainty, because St. Luke, probably having himself no exact date to rely upon, has left the chronology of this section of the Acts in intentional obscurity.

LITERATURE.—J. P. Norris, Key to Narrative of the Acts of the Apostles, London, 1885; R. B. Rackham, The Acts of the Apostles, do., 1901; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, do., 1895; A. Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., do., 1909, Luke the Physician, Eng. tr., do., 1907. W. A. SPOONER.

STEWARDS.—'Steward' in English may be taken to represent two Greek words, ἐπίτροπος and οἰκονόμος, the former being rather steward of an estate (as in Mt 20⁸ and Lk 8³; see W. A. Becker, Charicles, Eng. tr., London, 1895, p. 363), and the latter of a household. ἐπίτροπος, however, occurs only once in the NT outside the Gospels, and there it is joined with οἰκονόμος: ὁ κληρονόμος [while still νηπιος, 'an infant'] ὑπὸ ἐπιτρόπους ἐστὶ καὶ οἰκονόμος ('sub tutoribus et actoribus' [Vulg.] Gal 4²); this Lightfoot in his commentary translates 'under controllers of his person and property,' taking ἐπιτρόπους as the boy's legal representatives (so Vulg.) and οἰκονόμος as stewards or bailiffs to manage either his household or his property. No doubt οἰκονόμος was often used as a general term for one who acted in either capacity.

The first instance we adduce is that of a public official: ἀσπάζεται ὑμᾶς Ἐραστος ὁ οἰκονόμος τῆς πόλεως, Ro 16²³ ('arcarius civitatis' [Vulg.]). The city here is apparently Corinth, where St. Paul was at the time of writing (the Erastus mentioned in Ac 19² as a messenger of the Apostle from Asia to Macedonia can hardly be the same person; and even the one mentioned in 2 Ti 4²⁰ as still at Corinth is perhaps more likely to be the same as the latter than the former). The office held by Erastus was doubtless that of city-treasurer or something similar; cf. 1 Es 4⁴⁴⁻⁴⁹, where the same title occurs. All the other instances of οἰκονόμος and οἰκονομία are in the Epistles and occur by way of comparison or simile.

(1) General, with further description: ἐγὼ γὰρ ἐκὼν τοῦτο πράσσω (=εὐαγγελίζομαι), μισθὸν ἔχω· εἰ δὲ ἄκων, οἰκονομίαν πεπιστευμαι ('I have to bear in mind that I am charged with a stewardship and must carry it out') (1 Co 9¹⁷). In 1 Co 4², ζητεῖται ἐν τοῖς οἰκονόμοις ἵνα πιστὸς τις εὐρεθῇ, the faithfulness of stewards in general is spoken of; but the phrase follows directly upon a special kind of stewardship (οἰκονόμους μυστηρίων θεοῦ).

(2) Special: stewards of God, acting for Him: δεῖ γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεγκλητὸν εἶναι ὡς θεοῦ οἰκονόμον, Tit 1⁷; διάκονος κατὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν τοῦ θεοῦ τὴν δοθεῖσάν μοι εἰς ὑμᾶς, Col 1²⁵; ἐκζητήσεις . . . μάλλον ἢ οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ τὴν ἐν πίστει, 1 Ti 1⁴ (here the sphere in which, or rather the method by which, stewardship is rightly exercised is added [sc. by faith]).

(3) Stewards with the matter of stewardship described (sc. of grace, of mystery, or of mysteries): ἕκαστος καθὼς ἔλαβεν χάρισμα, εἰς ἑαυτοὺς αὐτὸ διακονοῦντες ὡς καλοὶ οἰκονόμοι ποικίλης χάριτος θεοῦ, 1 P 4¹⁰; εἰ γε ἠκούσατε τὴν οἰκονομίαν τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ τῆς δοθείσης μοι εἰς ὑμᾶς, Eph 3²; οὕτως ἡμᾶς λογιζέσθω ἄνθρωπος ὡς ὑπέρτατος Χριστοῦ καὶ οἰκονόμος μυστηρίων θεοῦ, 1 Co 4¹; τίς ἡ οἰκονομία (v.l., κοινωνία) τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦ ἀποκεκρυμμένου ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων ἐν τῷ θεῷ, Eph 3².

(4) One very curious extension of the use of the word occurs in Eph 1¹⁰, εἰς οἰκονομίαν τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν, which is well paraphrased and explained by W. Alexander (Speaker's Commentary, London, 1881, in loc.): 'The dispensation is the Divine arrangement of His household, or plan of government, which was to be carried out when the full time had come, which time had now arrived.' Here the idea of stewardship almost disappears, as it is the Master's own management that is referred to. C. L. FELTOE.

STIGMATA.—See MARKS.

STOCKS.—The Gr. term (τὸ ξύλον, lit. 'the wood') tr. 'stocks' in AV and RV is used to denote a wooden framework containing holes, in which the feet of criminals were confined. This ancient mode of punishment (cf. Job 13⁷ 33¹⁴) survived in lands further west till a comparatively recent period. Among both Greeks and Romans it was employed in the case of freeborn malefactors as well as slaves. When Paul and Silas were thrown into the inner dungeon of the prison at Philippi, the jailer, who was charged by the Roman magistrates (known as the Duumviri) to keep the prisoners safely, for greater security took the precaution of enclosing their feet in the stocks (Ac 16²⁴). This infliction was part of the shameful treatment endured at Philippi to which the Apostle afterwards referred in his First Epistle to the Thessalonians (2²).

W. S. MONTGOMERY.

STOICS (οἱ Στωικοὶ φιλόσοφοι).—The Stoics are mentioned by name only once in the NT (Ac 17¹⁸), when St. Paul met with them and the Epicureans at Athens. For the circumstances of this encounter see art. EPICUREANS. Though the Stoics are not again mentioned, St. Paul's speech on the Areopagus seems framed with them in mind, and one of his sentences, 'for we are also his offspring' (v.²⁸), a quotation from Aratus, is almost identical with the words of Cleanthes, one of the founders of the sect. Moreover, several other passages in the NT, e.g. 2 P 3⁷⁻¹⁰⁻¹³, He 4¹², suggest acquaintance with this system of philosophy. Among philosophies of this period Stoicism occupied an exalted position.

The teaching of Plato and Aristotle had waned in popularity, the Epicureans suffered from an evil reputation, while Stoicism claimed to enable men to endure the prevailing hardships of thought and life. Its cultivation of high ideals, the nobility of its foremost adherents, its repression of the coarser and insistence on the nobler elements in human nature, won esteem and admiration. Though its unrelenting severity prevented it from ever becoming the creed of the multitude and restricted it to the select few, Stoicism has always been a potent influence among serious men far beyond the limits of its actual disciples.

1. Circumstances which favoured its growth.—

(a) The disappearance of the city-States.—Earlier Greeks had rejoiced in their citizen-life, and gladly identified their individual lives with the life of the city. But evil days arrived, and internal quarrels led to the intervention of the Macedonian power and the consequent loss of self-government. Later still came the all-conquering Romans, sweeping them all into the Imperial net. Now, bereft of all interest in civil affairs, the more serious-minded turned for relief to those deeper human considerations in which they could think as they would, and adulation and sycophancy would not be required. It was in part, therefore, a movement of despair.

(b) Loss of faith in the traditional religion.—The old mythologies and pagan practices had now lost their power over the Greek mind.

(c) Influx of Oriental ideas.—This was due to that intermingling of peoples which followed the Alexandrian conquests. Comparison with the beliefs of others showed how abstract, improbable, and unpractical were their own philosophies in face of the new needs.

2. The founders of Stoicism were not pure Greeks, although the chief centre of instruction was Athens, nor was the system a product of the true Greek spirit. As its later history shows, it was much more congenial to the sterner Roman temperament, and it was at Rome that it achieved its greatest triumphs. The earliest teachers came from Cyprus, Cilicia, Babylon, Palestine, Syria, and Phrygia, and the universities of Tarsus, Rhodes, and Alexandria were its strongholds. The founders of Stoicism were Zeno, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus. Zeno (c. 342–270 B.C.) came to Athens from Citium in Cyprus. He seems to have visited all the existing schools of philosophy before settling down among the Cynics. And even they did not entirely satisfy him. The Cynics banned speculation absolutely, despised all human delights, and welcomed hardships with open arms. In the end Zeno forsook them, and became a teacher himself in the ‘painted porch’ (ἡ ποικίλη στοά, hence the name ‘Stoic’). Of his earnestness, poverty, and contentment there can be no doubt. Cleanthes (c. 300–220 B.C.), the master’s successor, is known best for his famous Hymn to Zeus, a remarkable production. Chrysippus (c. 280–206 B.C.) is usually regarded as the second creator of this system. ‘Had there been no Chrysippus, there had been no Porch’ (Diog. Laertius, vii. vii. 183). He collected and systematized the earlier doctrines, but, while contributing to its logic, psychology, etc., made no addition to its ethics. At Rome Stoicism came to its own, and Seneca, Epictetus, and M. Aurelius Antoninus stand pre-eminent among its adherents. Seneca (4 B.C.–A.D. 65), a contemporary of St. Paul, was the tutor and later the counsellor of Nero. Between his professed devotion to placid Stoic principles and his actual life a strange contradiction exists (see T. B. Macaulay, Lord Bacon, London, 1852). An advocate of poverty and self-abnegation, he became wealthy and maintained his position at Court by abject flattery and perhaps worse. In Epictetus (fl. c. A.D. 100), the poor lame slave of Epaphroditus afterwards freed, we meet a kindlier, humbler, and altogether more beautiful character. He taught the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man. Laughing at misfortunes or even denying their very existence, he bore all hardships cheerfully and regarded even death as a mere incident to be left complacently in the hands of God. M. Aurelius (A.D. 121–180), the Stoic Emperor, would have been happier as a private citizen. Confronted with distasteful duties both without and within his Empire, he proved no great success as a monarch. Meditation was more to his liking than activity, and his literary remains are a treasure-house of fine sayings. The persecution of the Christians, to which he lent himself, must have appeared to him a political necessity.

3. The teaching of the Stoics may be divided into the following branches: Logic, Physics, Ethics, and Religion. Individual differences will here be ignored, and indeed they are not always easy to determine. On the whole, Stoicism laid emphasis on the requirements of practical life, and everything was subordinated to this aim.

(a) Logic.—This term was employed somewhat vaguely and included Dialectic, Rhetoric, and Logic properly so called. Its comparative unimportance in the system may be gathered from two well-known illustrations which were employed. Ethics was likened to the yoke of an egg, physics to the white, and logic to the shell. Again, physics was said to resemble the trees in a field, ethics the fruit which the trees produced, and logic the fence around the field. It need only be said, therefore, that the Stoics’ chief aim was to reach a criterion of truth; and this they found in the feeling of certainty. The mind is at first a complete blank and depends on impressions received from the outside world. These impressions are either confirmed or rejected by the reaction of the mind’s own reasoning powers. Certainty is reached when the impressions become distinct and overwhelming.

(b) Physics.—In this branch of their system the Stoics derived much from Heraclitus, as did their contemporaries the Epicureans from Democritus. They declared the primary element to be a fiery ether which, after assuming grosser forms such as fire, as we see it, air, water, and earth, finally resumes its original character. They also held that the only reality is matter; and in this substance they expressly included air, sky, and stars, the mind of man, including even his thoughts, passions, and virtues, and finally God. The novelty of their teaching lay in the idea of tension which they believed permeated all things. It was according to the variations of this quality that one substance differed from another. Yet even this is material or corporeal, differing only in its varying degrees of fineness or subtlety in different objects. Notwithstanding this materialistic view of things, the Stoic maintained that the whole world of men and things is under the government of reason, which permeates and harmonizes all. In this reason man participates, and may partly understand its larger operations and in his own degree co-operate therewith. Man’s lower nature must be kept subordinate to these higher purposes, and in the end he will be re-absorbed into the Universal Reason.

(c) Ethics.—Here we reach that branch of Stoicism for which all the rest existed and to which it was only preliminary. It may be summed up in the well-known phrase, ‘live in conformity with Nature.’ But it is the Stoic interpretation of this formula that is significant. As against the Epicureans, who made pleasure the object of life, they insisted that virtue is the only Good. All those objects which are usually regarded as desirable they banned—position, honours, wealth, health, men’s favour, etc. In this they differed from the Cynics, their predecessors, only in being somewhat less harsh and severe. In opposition to the Epicureans, who held that pleasure was the motive power of animals and young children, they taught that these were guided rather by the instinct of self-preservation. And, though allowing that pleasure is often associated with virtue, they declared that it was too precarious a factor to be relied on and should be ignored altogether. The aim of this attitude was practical, viz. to set man free from all the varying chances and changes of fortune and to reach a condition of 'apathy.' Whether, therefore, civil and personal affairs were congenial or otherwise, a man must remain master of both his feelings and his actions.

'In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud.
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed'
(W. E. Henley, Invictus, 5-8).

Confronted with ordinary human affections and passions, whose disturbing influence is obvious to all, they declared them one and all to be wholly injurious. Even pity and compassion should be eschewed. No one suffers as much as we suppose. It is only just to note that in later times this general austerity was slightly modified. Some things might be preferred, others avoided, and the range of totally indifferent things was made narrower. But the underlying principle was never changed. Man must ignore or even laugh at circumstances and act quite independently of them. Emotion is only perverted reason. Further, Stoicism recognized no degrees or gradations of virtue or vice. A man was entirely virtuous or entirely vicious. The 'wise man' of the Stoics was perfect in every way. This extraordinary doctrine, modified later, was due in part to the emphasis laid on motive or intention. Right motives made an act virtuous, however unfortunate its effects. The tendency to suicide, so marked a feature among them, seems to contradict their theoretical indifference to pain. They explained this by saying that a man need live only as long as it was possible to do so with dignity and utility.

Cosmopolitanism was a striking element in the Stoic system. The only city to which they acknowledged fealty was the City of Zeus. All men being sons of God were brothers, and distinctions of race and country must be abolished. In theory friendships and the customary relations of home and State might not be prohibited, but in practice reasons for their neglect were invariably forthcoming.

(d) Religion.—This was materialistic pantheism. God, the ruler and upholder of all that exists, is identical with universal law, and like all else is material. Though believing in a First Cause and a Mind governing all, both are corporeal. The different parts of the universe may be finer or coarser, but they are only forms of the one primary force. Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus, which includes both adoration and supplication, seems in strange conflict with all this. Perhaps it may be taken as the revolt of the devout spirit against the arbitrary theories of the reason. In regard to the traditional and often debasing ceremonies of religion then in vogue, the Stoic attitude was one of compromise. Essentially they could not but be opposed to them. Prayer was generally an error and by implication showed distrust in Divine goodness. Earthly temples were unworthy of God. Yet they tolerated the popular forms of worship, and explained them as a picturesque way of setting forth poor human ideas of the Deity. The age-long problems of Evil and Freedom proved insoluble on Stoic assumptions.

(e) Relation to Christianity.—Many facts make this an interesting subject of study. Even the OT, and Apocalyptic books such as Sirach, 4 Maccabees, and Wisdom of Solomon had been affected by Stoicism. And, with so many points of contact in their ethical teaching, it is small wonder that Stoicism and Christianity have been suspected of influencing each other. Again, Tarsus, the home of St. Paul, was likewise a great centre of Stoic teaching, and it is supposed that the great Apostle shows traces in his writings of this early association. In regard to Seneca, too, a tradition arose that he became a disciple of St. Paul and a Christian. A full discussion of the value and bearing of these facts is given in Lightfoot (see Literature). On the acquaintance of St. Paul with Stoic literature and ideas as shown in his speech on the Areopagus we have already remarked. Striking coincidences occur between the language of the Gospels and the Pauline Epistles and the sayings of Seneca and Aurelius. It may certainly be acknowledged that in these two pagan writers we reach the high-water mark of non-Christian ethics. For various reasons it is not possible to say certainly whether indebtedness exists on the one side or on the other. But in relation to fundamental principles many vital differences separate them. Each system starts from different premisses and reaches different conclusions.

(1) The Stoic conception of God was materialistic and pantheistic. Fatherhood in any real sense was thereby excluded. Divine love and paternal care were impossible and fellowship with the Father of our spirits was out of the question.

(2) Self-repression, with the object of attaining complete 'apathy,' was the fundamental demand of Stoicism, but how the ordinary man was to effect this it did not show. In any case, his resources were restricted to himself: there was no place for a Saviour, and the weak were left to fail.

(3) In regard to a future life, the Stoics leave us with a feeling of great uncertainty. One wonders, indeed, that they should have desired it. At most they thought of it as a bare possibility. Such continuance could only be an endless rotation, resulting probably in experiences as unpleasant as in this life. In the presence of such contrasts we are therefore obliged to conclude that, however many or close the resemblances between Christianity and Stoicism, they were in vital matters fundamentally different. That St. Paul should show some acquaintance with Stoic teaching was inevitable, and that he did not openly expose its weakness was probably due to the fact that the system was never likely to trouble those to whom he preached. As for Seneca, he would doubtless encounter Christians at Rome, but probably in circumstances that would leave him indifferent to their principles and beliefs.

LITERATURE.—The leading sources are: Diogenes Laertius, de Vita Philosophorum, vii.; Cicero, de Finibus; Plutarch, de Stoicorum Repugnantia, and de Placitis Philosophorum; works of Seneca, Epictetus, and M. Aurelius. Of modern authorities we may refer to E. Zeller, Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics, Eng. tr., London, 1880; H. Ritter, History of Ancient Philosophy, Eng. tr., iii. (Oxford, 1839); A. Grant, The Ethics of Aristotle, 2 vols., London, 1866; W. W. Capes, Stoicism, London, 1880; W. L. Davidson, The Stoic Creed, Edinburgh, 1907; J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, London, 1878, 'St. Paul and Seneca,' p. 270 ff.; artt. 'Stoics' in *EB*¹¹, HDB, and EB.
J. W. ICHTIEY.

STONING.—The three Greek verbs in the NT tr. 'to stone' are λιθοβολέω, λιθάω, and καταλιθάω. The LXX almost invariably employs the first of these as the equivalent of the Heb. synonyms haz and ez, which mean (1) the pelting of stones by a mob at a person who has merited their ill-will (Ex 8²⁸ 17, 2 Ch 24²⁰; cf. He 11³¹, Ac 5²⁶); (2) the infliction of the death-penalty by stoning (Lv 20², Dt 13¹⁰).

The method which an enraged crowd took of executing vengeance with the weapons lying readiest to their hand came to be employed afterwards as a regular and legal method of inflicting the death-sentence on a criminal. Stoning is the only form of capital punishment recognized in the Mosaic Law. To stone an offender with stones means the same thing as to put him to death, the two expressions being sometimes used together as synonymous (Lv 20²). Wherever stoning is not explicitly stated to be the mode of execution, it is implied. The Pentateuch gives no details as to the manner in which the punishment was to be carried out. Certain restrictions, however, were specified, as that (1) the stoning should take place outside the city (Lv 24¹⁴, Dt 17⁵; cf. Ac 7⁵⁸), and that (2) the witnesses, of whom two or more were necessary to secure conviction, were to cast the first stone, and then all the people (Dt 13⁹ 17^{5a}; cf. Ac 7⁵⁸). Death by stoning is the penalty prescribed in the Pentateuch for various offences against religion and morality. Blasphemy occupied a prominent place among the former (Lv 24¹⁶; cf. 1 K 21¹³, Ac 6¹³).

For information as to the process of stoning in NT times, reference is necessary to the Rabbinic law, which lays down the rules and precautions to be observed in carrying it out (Mishna, Sanh. vi.). These were intended to secure (1) that the condemned person should have every opportunity of obtaining a reversal of his sentence on the way to execution, by the production by himself or others of fresh evidence in his favour; (2) that his sufferings should be shortened as much as was possible in the circumstances. After sentence was pronounced, the criminal, in the absence of further evidence sufficient to establish his innocence, was preceded by a herald or crier, whose function it was to announce, in terms of a prescribed formula, the name and parentage of the offender, and the nature of his offence, together with the names of the witnesses. The place of execution was outside the town. On his arrival there, he was divested of his clothing, apparently by the witnesses, a loin-cloth alone being left him. Failing a natural eminence somewhere in the vicinity, he was placed on a platform twice the height of a man. It was then the duty of one of the witnesses to precipitate him violently to the ground, in the hope that the force of the concussion would produce a fatal effect. In the event of this effect not being attained, the second witness was to cast a heavy stone on his chest. If he survived this treatment, the bystanders completed the dispatch of the unhappy victim by stoning him.

Two instances of stoning call for special consideration—that of the proto-martyr Stephen (Ac 7⁵⁸⁻⁶⁰), and that of St. Paul at Lystra (14^{19a}).

1. The stoning of Stephen.—In connexion with the stoning of the first Christian martyr, a much-debated question is whether it was (a) tumultuary, (b) legal, or (c) a blending of both.

(a) Baur maintains that the whole proceedings from first to last were tumultuary. Stephen was simply done to death by a fanatical mob without even the pretence of a hearing, and the idea of a trial before the Sanhedrin, followed by a regular Jewish stoning, must be summarily dismissed (Paul: his Life and Works, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1873-75, i. 56). Modern criticism, following suit, rules out the references to the Sanhedrin in Ac 6¹²⁻¹⁵, on the ground that they are editorial additions, or belong to an inferior source, and were introduced for the purpose of making out that a trial took place before that body. 'Stephen's arrest,' says Moffatt, 'was the result of a popular émeute, which restrained itself just long enough to allow him to defend himself before a suspicious and exasperated audience, which numbered — perhaps unofficially — several members of the Sanhedrin' (art. 'Stephen' in EBI iv. 4789). 'It is plain,' he adds, 'that Stephen died, not on the testimony of witnesses (6¹³ 7^{58b}), but on account of his own recent word and confession' (ib. 4794). But, if the occasion which led to Stephen's being put on his defence was the accusation of blasphemy brought against him by the witnesses (and the statement of 6¹³ can hardly be challenged), it is difficult to conceive of a self-constituted tribunal attempting to adjudicate upon a grave charge of the sort, involving the penalty of death, with which the supreme court of justice alone among the Jews had authority to deal. The presence of the witnesses from first to last (6¹³ 7⁵⁸; cf. 22²⁰) affords a strong presumption that the case was tried before the Sanhedrin, and that the martyrdom was not the result simply of foul play on the part of an excited mob who had lost all control of themselves.

(b) The view that the proceedings were quite regular and orderly throughout has also been advocated. 'Stephen was formally accused and brought to trial before the Sanhedrin; it is probable that he was formally condemned by that body, and that his death was not the result of a mere tumult, as the account of Luke might seem to imply. This probability is strengthened by the fact that his death was by the legal mode prescribed for the crime of blasphemy, and that the stoning was done not by the crowd in general, but by Stephen's accusers in the orderly Jewish way' (A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 90). There is no reason to suppose, however, that the historian of the Acts sought to aggravate the crime of Stephen's death by leaving the impression that it was the result of a popular tumult rather than of a fair trial conducted to an orderly conclusion. Some of the formalities, moreover, in connexion with legal stoning, were necessarily dispensed with. If the accused was condemned on his own confession, further evidence to attest his innocence would not be admissible.

(c) There is no reason to question the reality of the scene depicted in the narrative, in which, after the utterance that excited the fury of the hearers ('Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God'), the court was at once transformed into an infuriated mob, and hurried the alleged blasphemer, now judged out of his own mouth, without further ceremony to the place of execution (7⁵⁴). As regards the subsequent stoning, the narrative places it beyond doubt that the witnesses were present (7⁵⁸; cf. 22²⁰), and discharged the functions customary on such an occasion. F. C. Conybeare suggests (Exp. 8th ser., vi. [1913] 466) that 'it was Stephen's garments which were ceremonially laid at the feet of Paul' (by the witnesses [p. 469]), 'and that the true reading in ver. 53 is αὐτοῦ, and not αὐτῶν.' But the feelings of horror with which St. Paul recalled the scene in later years were due to the fact that he kept, not the raiment of Stephen (although his may also have been there), but 'the raiment of them that slew him' (22²⁰). It is probable that the Apostle was present, not as a mere inactive spectator, but in an official capacity, perhaps that of herald, as Conybeare suggests (op. cit., p. 463). If not the prime mover in bringing about the martyrdom, he was undoubtedly one of the active spirits participating in it, and it was not at haphazard that the witnesses laid down their clothes at his feet. Some special significance attaches to the circumstance, although it hardly justifies the assumption that he was a member of the Sanhedrin at the time.

2. The stoning of St. Paul at Lystra.—In the catalogue of hardships and sufferings endured by the Apostle in the course of his missionary labours and journeys, he mentions the fact that in one instance he was stoned (2 Co 11²⁵). This is probably identical with the stoning to which he was subjected at Lystra during his first visit to Galatia (Ac 14^{19f}). He had left Iconium not long before to avoid similar treatment, which some of the inhabitants of that city, both Jewish and Gentile, were planning to mete out to him and Barnabas (14⁹). The same good fortune did not attend him at Lystra. His Jewish opponents in Antioch and Iconium appeared upon the scene, and so wrought upon the passions of the superstitious townspeople that a riot was created, in which the Apostle was stoned. Although Jews were a party to the outbreak of violence, the stoning was simply the method by which the fanatical mob of a heathen city vented their rage upon an advocate of the Christian faith. The attempt on the Apostle's life proved unsuccessful. Stunned for a time by the blows of the missiles, he was dragged by his assailants outside the city, and left there for dead. But, as the disciples stood around his prostrate body, he recovered consciousness, and returned with them to the city. The injuries sustained were not sufficiently serious to prevent his leaving Lystra for Derbe next day.

Although the life of the Apostle was not seriously imperilled, he bore ever afterwards the scars left by the encounter. Writing at a later date to the members of the Galatian Church, he closes his Epistle with these solemn words: 'From henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus' (Gal 6¹⁷ RV). Ramsay conjectures that these marks were caused—some of them at least—by the stoning at Lystra. 'Obviously, it must appeal,' he says, 'to something that lay deep in the hearts and memories of the Galatians' (Historical Commentary on the Galatians, London, 1899, p. 473). Less probable is the conjecture of T. W. Crafer (Exp, 8th ser., vi. 375-384) that the σθένεια τῆς σαρκός, on account of which he first preached the gospel in Galatia, was caused by the stoning at Lystra. There is no reason to suppose that the maltreatment, however painful for a time, was attended by permanent, or even lengthened, physical disability. The 'infirmity of the flesh' in Gal 4¹³ and the 'thorn in the flesh' in 2 Co 12⁷, are identical, and are best explained as caused by periodical attacks of a painful sort to which the Apostle was subject.

LITERATURE.—T. H. Weir, art. 'Stoning,' in DCG ii. 679; McClintock and Strong, Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, New York, 1881; E. König, 'Stoning, Hebrew Use of,' in Schaff-Herzog, xi. 105; J. Poucher, 'Crimes and Punishments,' in IIDB i. 527*; S. Mendelsohn, 'Capital Punishment,' in JE iii. 557*; I. Benzinger, 'Law and Justice,' in EBI iii. 2722; F. W. Farrar, Life and Work of St. Paul, London, 1879, vol. i., Excursus vi.

W. S. MONTGOMERY.

STRANGER, ALIEN, FOREIGNER.—The word 'stranger' (from extraneus) has been so long in possession as the rendering of several distinct words in the Hebrew and Greek texts that it is difficult to introduce changes in translation that appear desirable in order to distinguish those words from each other, and doubtful in some instances whether an exact rendering would be tolerable to the ear of English readers.* Take an instance from the OT, and one from the NT. In Gn 23⁴ and Ps 39¹², 'I am a stranger and a sojourner' could not well be changed for 'I am a sojourner and a settler' (or 'dweller'). In Jn 10⁵, 'A stranger (ἀλλοτρίω) will they not follow . . . for they know not the voice of strangers (τῶν ἀλλοτρίων),' we should not welcome the substitution of 'alien' for 'stranger' in order to distinguish ἀλλότριος from ξένος. 'Aliens,' however, might fitly have been put in RVm in Mt 17²⁵, 'From their sons, or from strangers (ἀπὸ τῶν ἀλλοτρίων)?' Cf. Lk 17¹⁸, 'Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?' where the rendering of ἀλλογενής in RVm by 'alien' heightens the contrast to which our Lord draws attention.

* St. Augustine, in a well-known story, tells us that, when a bishop, reading the chapter about Jonah's gourd, ventured to substitute St. Jerome's "hedera" for the established "cucurbita," such a tumult was raised, that if the bishop had persevered he would have been left without a congregation' (Q. Salmon, *Introduction to NT*⁴, London, 1889, p. 126).

In the numerous NT passages in which changes of a more considerable kind were called for by fidelity to the true meaning of the text, those changes have been judiciously and consistently made by the RV. In Lk 24¹⁸ the question σὺ μόνος παροικεῖς Ἰερουσαλὴμ cannot mean 'Art thou only a stranger?' and is rightly changed for 'Dost thou alone sojourn?' (marg. 'Dost thou sojourn alone in Jerusalem?'), Cleopas implying that none but a solitary sojourner, who had not come in contact with other sojourners at the Passover season, could be ignorant of the death of Jesus. In Ac 2¹⁰ οἱ ἐπιδημούντες Ῥωμαῖοι are mentioned in the list of nations present at Pentecost. Here the inadequate rendering 'strangers of Rome' becomes 'sojourners from Rome,' those meant being 'Romans who had migrated to Jerusalem and had settled in that city' (Overbeck, quoted by A. Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles [NT Studies, iii.], Eng. tr., London, 1909, p. 67). In the speech of St. Stephen (Ac 7²⁹, ἐγένετο πάροικος), we should read 'became a sojourner,' and in that of St. Paul (13¹⁷, ἐν τῇ παροικίᾳ) 'when they sojourned.' Read also in 17²¹ (Ἀθηναῖοι δὲ πάντες καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημούντες ξένοι), 'Now all the Athenians and the strangers sojourning there': 'the large number of foreign residents . . . was always a distinguishing feature of Athens' (J. B. Lightfoot in Smith's *DB*², vol. i. pt. i. p. 36^a).

The Christian communities addressed in 1 P 1¹ are called ἐκλεκτοὶ παρεπίδημοι διασπορᾶς. AV loosely translates 'to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus,' and wrongly transfers ἐκλεκτοῖς to the verse following. Read with RV 'to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion,' or simply 'to the elect sojourners of the Dispersion.' It is now generally agreed that 'St. Peter had in his mind predominantly, though probably not exclusively, Gentile readers,' and that διασπορᾶς, like the preceding παρεπίδημοι, is used to describe their religious condition, both words being 'taken from the vocabulary created by Jewish history and afterwards transferred to the Christian Church' (F. H. Chase in HDB iii. 783*; T. Zahn, Introduction to NT, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1909, ii. 141, 153, n. 5). In 1 P 2¹¹ a strong moral appeal is made to Christians as πάροικοι καὶ παρεπίδημοι: here, πάροικοι having the first claim to 'sojourners,' it was necessary that παρεπίδημοι should be translated by a different word, and 'pilgrims,' which, in its Latin form peregrini, is used by the Vulgate in this verse, at once suggested itself. It is to be noticed that the rendering 'sojourners' for 'strangers' in 1 P 2¹¹ connects the appeal made with the exhortation given in 1¹⁷, ἐν φόβῳ τὸν τῆς παροικίας ὑμῶν χρόνον ἀναστρέφετε.*

'Alien' occurs twice in the NT (AV). In He 11³⁴ the fine rendering 'armies of the aliens' (ἀλλοτρίων) could not be improved upon. In Eph 2¹² RV rightly substitutes the verb for the noun, as required by the Greek text, ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι τῆς πολιτείας, 'alienated from the commonwealth of Israel' (cf. 4¹⁸, Col 1²¹).

'Foreigner' (from foraneus) was not a word in common use when the AV was made, and in the NT is found only in Eph 2¹⁹ (οὐκέτι ἐστὶ ξένοι καὶ πάροικοι). We regret the disappearance of the inspiring words 'no more strangers and foreigners,'

* Note on ἐπιδημεῖν, παρεπίδημος.—'In distinction from ἐπιδημεῖν, it [παρεπίδημος] emphasises more definitely the merely temporary character of the residence' (Zahn, ii. 139).

but must admit the consistency of RV in translating 'no more strangers and sojourners.'

In what follows, this study of words is supplemented by some reflexions of a devotional and practical nature.

1. Christ and the stranger.—Kindness to the stranger-guest has always been one of the most attractive features of Eastern life and manners. 'From the earliest times of Semitic life the lawlessness of the desert . . . has been tempered by the principle that the guest is inviolable' (W. L. Smith, RS², London, 1894, p. 76). The description in Gn 18²⁻⁵ of Abraham's entertainment of his three mysterious visitors 'presents a perfect picture of the manner in which a modern Bedawee sheykh receives travellers arriving at his encampment' (E. W. Lane, Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians², London, 1871, i. 364). The humanitarian laws enjoined on Israel included the following: 'A stranger shalt thou not wrong, neither shalt thou oppress him; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt' (Ex 22²¹; cf. 23³, Lv 19³³⁻³⁴, Dt 10¹⁸⁻¹⁹). The stranger, who is to be made welcome, and whose rights are to be respected, often comes into view, e.g. in Ru 2¹⁰, Ps 94⁶ 146⁹, Mal 3³. In Greece, Ζεὺς ἀγροαῖος, the Protector of the assembly of the people, was also Ζεὺς ξένιος, the Protector of strangers. The beautiful story of Philemon and Baucis, the aged Phrygian couple who received Zeus and Hermes into their hut when others had refused to take them in (cf. J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon, London, 1875, p. 370, who uses the legend to illustrate the scene at Lystra, Ac 14¹¹), must have had its origin in some mind which had conceived it possible that the gods might put men to the proof by visiting them in human form. The truth thus dimly shadowed forth was realized in Jesus Christ. He, when 'found in fashion as a man,' accepted the title of 'Prophet' as one which, 'so far as it went, . . . was a true description of His work' (H. B. Swete, The Ascended Christ, London, 1910, p. 53), and, in His preaching ministry, was dependent for food and lodging on those who 'received him' (Lk 10³⁸⁻³⁹; cf. 2 K 4³⁻¹⁰). In one of His last discourses He taught that the stranger was, along with others whom He named, one of His 'brethren' or next of kin, who had the right to the same ministering love which had been shown toward Himself, and solemnly said that men's final acceptance before Him as their Judge depended upon their recognizing and doing justice to that right. His authoritative and affecting words ξένος ἡμῶν καὶ συμπράγετε με (Mt 25³⁵) impressed it for ever on the heart of the Church that in receiving the stranger she fed and sheltered her Lord.* They made care for the stranger a standing rule of Christian life (cf. J. R. Seeley, Ecce Homo¹¹, London, 1873, p. 194). Their effects are seen in Ro 12¹³, 1 Ti 3² 5¹⁰, Tit 1⁸, 3 Jn⁵, Clem. Rom. i. 1, 2, Didache, xi. 2. It is somewhat remarkable that in He 13² our Lord's words are not referred to. The marked feature of apostolic Christianity presented to view in these passages pointed forward to the systematic provision which was made for the entertainment of strangers in the ξενοδοχία of post-apostolic times. 'A "saint," i.e. a Christian, provided with a letter of recommendation from his church, could travel from one end of the Roman Empire to the other without having any anxiety about a home. Wherever there was a Christian Church he was sure of receiving food and shelter, and attention in case of illness' (G. Bonet-Maury in ERE vi. 804^b; cf. Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'⁵, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 363; W. E. H. Lecky, History of European Morals², London, 1888, ii. 80). It is not necessary to do more than allude to the countless forms of helpful assistance and benevolence which Christ's compassion for the stranger has prompted in recent times (cf. T. von Haering, Ethics of the Christian Life, London, 1909, p. 402; H. L. Martensen, Christian Ethics [Social], Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1882, ii. 71, 72).

2. The sheep and strangers.—Neither AV nor RV gives the proper emphasis to δὲ οὐ μὴ in Jn 10⁵. These words enrich the comparison between the two voices. We should read 'But a stranger will they by no means follow,' or 'will they certainly not follow.' Christ speaks with confident expectation of how His sheep will act. They will assuredly not follow a stranger: 'on the contrary (ἀλλὰ) they will flee from him.' 'Fleeing' implies a feeling of danger and alarm. 'The voice of the stranger whom they know not scares the sheep' (cf. W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, London, 1864, p. 203; F. Godet, Com. on St. John's Gospel, Edinburgh, 1876-77, ii. 382). The words may be applied to the Church of the Apostolic Age in a variety of ways. They who 'knew that the Son of God was come' (1 Jn 5²⁰) were not led astray by false Messiahs. They were gifted with a quickness of apprehension and a sharpness of penetration that enabled them to see the tendency and temper of false teaching. They accounted as strangers those teachers who came 'to act as spies on the liberty which they had in Christ' (Gal 2⁴), as well as others, still more dangerous, who sought to lead them into the thicket of Gnostic speculation in which they would have lost sight altogether of the nature and work of their Redeemer (Col 2³). The same faculty of discrimination, created and guided by the Spirit of Christ, enabled them to take the first steps in sifting the writings of the Apostolic Age, and setting apart those which spoke to them with the voice and authority of the Chief Shepherd.

3. Christians not ξένοι but παροικοί.—It is worthy of attention that Christians are not called ξένοι in the NT. The Gentile believers addressed in Ephesians had once been ξένοι τῶν διαθηκῶν τῆς ἐπαγγελίας (2¹²), but are now συμπόλιται τῶν ἀγίων καὶ οἰκεία τοῦ θεοῦ (v. 19), fellow-citizens with full rights (cf. Ph 3²⁰), and in household fellowship with the family of God. When Christians are described as ξένοι in early Christian literature, the word is used in a typical or metaphorical sense—as in the Epistle to Diognetus, v. 5: πάνθ' ὑπομένουσιν ὡς ξένοι· πᾶσα ξένη πατρίς ἐστὶν αὐτῶν, καὶ πᾶσα πατρίς ξένη. St. Peter's impressive adaptation of Hos 2²³ to the Gentile Christians of Asia Minor, οἱ ποτὲ οὐ λαὸς νυν δὲ λαὸς θεοῦ (1 P 2¹⁰), is immediately followed by his appeal to them as παροικοὶ καὶ παρεπίδημοι. They are thus reminded that they are sojourners on earth, dependent on the protection of God, whose property the earth is, and to whom it belongs to determine the length of their sojourn and what mercies they shall receive. Such seems to be the force of the words 'with thee' in Ps 39¹ (cf. A. F. Kirkpatrick, Book of Psalms, Cambridge, 1902, p. 207). In the Church the Christian finds 'a home for the lonely' (J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, new ed., London, 1868, iv. 196): but 'so long as we are still at home (ἐνδημούντες) in the body, we are in a sort of exile from our home (ἐκδημούμεν) in the Lord' (2 Co 5⁶; cf. A. Plummer, ICC, '2 Corinthians,' Edinburgh, 1915, pp. 124, 151). 'Exilium vita est' was the inscription carved above the doorway in Victor Hugo's room at Hauteville, Guernsey.

* Cf. A. H. McNeile, The Gospel according to St. Matthew, London, 1915, p. 370^b: 'After the Resurrection, and helped by the influence of Greek thought, Christians were divinely led to the conception of the mystical oneness of an immanent Christ with humanity. εἶδες γὰρ, φησὶν, τὸν ἀδελφόν σου, εἶδες τὸν θεόν σου (Clem. Strom. i. xix. 94, ii. xv. 71). "Vidisti, inquit, fratrem, vidisti dominum tuum" (Tert. De Orat. xxvi.).'

LITERATURE.—To the works cited throughout the art. may be added: S. R. Driver, The Book of Exodus, Cambridge, 1911, p. 231, ICC, 'Deuteronomy', Edinburgh, 1896, p. 165; C. L. W. Grimm, Lexicon in Libros NT, Leipzig, 1868, s.v. ἕως, πάσις, παρρησίως; J. A. Selbie, artt. 'Foreigner,' 'Ger,' and 'Strange, Stranger' in HDB.

JAMES DONALD.

STRANGLER (Ac 15^{20, 29} 21²⁵).—The interpretation of this word has been a difficulty almost from the beginning. Western texts substitute for it: 'not to do unto others what you would not they should do unto you.' They thereby turn all the prohibitions into moral ones. 'Blood' means murder, 'fornication' adultery, and for 'things strangled' is substituted harmfulness. This of course misses the whole point of the Council, which had to decide not on moral (except indirectly) but on ceremonial distinctions. The Council wishes Gentile Christians of Syria and Cilicia to keep from heathendom, i.e. idolatry and its accompaniment, fornication; blood; things strangled. Now blood-offerings and strangled offerings are mentioned in the OT as found among idolatrous Jews (Ezk 33³, Is 65⁴ 66^{3, 17}). St. James fears these offerings among idolatrous Christians. To eat blood in any form is contrary to the teaching of the OT. But strangled things are specially mentioned because they have a peculiar efficacy in heathen eyes. They do not shed the blood, and it does not therefore call for vengeance from the ground. Thus they have a magical influence, and have been so used in N. America and Japan and are still used in India. The word may therefore stand here as a well-known allusion to magical rites in Syria, and the prohibition may become equivalent to 'Keep yourselves from magic.'

LITERATURE.—F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894, p. 73; W. R. Smith, RSZ, 1894, pp. 343, 417; J. G. Frazer, Golden Bough, 1900, ii. 319, 416; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon, new ed., 1879, pp. 88-90. For another view, W. J. Conybeare and J. S. Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1889, p. 172. SHERWIN SMITH.

STREET.—The only street referred to by name in the apostolic writings is the street in Damascus which is called 'Straight' (Ac 9¹¹). The word employed (ὁμῆ, 'lane' or 'alley') hardly applies to this instance, for it was a broad, straight street on the Greek model, flanked by colonnades, on the further side of which foot-paths extended. The modern equivalent, which still retains the name, and forms the principal thoroughfare of the city, is in reality only the northern foot-way of the ancient street. The proof of this is given by the East Gate, the central and southern archways of which are now closed up; also by fragments of columns, found in houses and courtyards contiguous to the present street.

The same word is found in 12¹⁰, applied to one of the streets or lanes of Jerusalem, probably in the heart of the city, to which it appears to be appropriate (cf. art. GATE). The use of πλατεία in 5¹⁸ is somewhat surprising; if taken in conjunction with κατὰ followed by acc. plur. it forcibly suggests alleys or lanes in which it was necessary to arrange the sick in lines. But it has to be noted that καὶ εἰς is now read, following NABD, which seems to correspond better with the likely situation. The sick were brought from narrow ways into the 'broad places.' A comparison with Mk 6³⁸ (ἐν ταῖς ἀγοραῖς; D reads πλατείαις) is instructive: applied to villages and country, no less than to cities, this would seem to denote no more than 'open spaces,' perhaps as opposed to courtyards. Such open spaces in cities came to be used as business centres, and were put to other uses (see especially Ac 17¹⁷).

If we keep in view the smallness and the extreme irregularity of ancient cities, as revealed by recent excavation in Palestine, it seems best to equate ὁμῆ to 'street,' and πλατεία to 'square,' in the modern city. The difference is greater than the similarity, however, for the average Hebrew city could boast of only one 'broad place,' and that was at the gate. An exception must be made for the Apostolic Age in favour of recent cities, built according to Græco-Roman designs (cf. Damascus above). Whether a city was ancient or modern would have an important bearing on its plan.

πλατεία alone is used in Rev., notably always in the singular (11⁸ 21²¹ 22¹). The Græco-Roman model seems to be before the writer's eye. Here πλατεία is not a broad place or square, but rather a broad street running from gate to gate. Had the symmetry been detailed there would have been found a corresponding πλατεία intersecting the first at right angles. Within the walls the city would thus be divided into four segments which were built over, whose streets and lanes would be dwarfed by the spaciousness of the two πλατεῖαι. This principle is carried further in the description of the Holy City, New Jerusalem, in correspondence with the number of gates (twelve).

H. B. Swete (The Apocalypse of St. John, London, 1907, p. 299) takes exception to the division of the verses in 22¹ RV, and follows AV and RVm. 'The picture presented is that of a river flowing through the broad street which intersects the city, a row of trees being on either bank.' In 11⁸ the corpses cast out into the principal street (now generally understood of the earthly Jerusalem), and left without burial, were a purposed insult to the martyred witnesses, which was speedily avenged (vv. 11-13). Such defilement stands in marked contrast to the later picture of purity and life (water and tree). W. CRUICKSHANK.

STRIFE.—It was not unnatural that strongly marked varieties of character and opinion should appear in the living Apostolic Church, for the proverb 'many men, many minds' had its application there as elsewhere.

1. Party-spirit (ἐρις, ἐριθεία), which was stimulated by the free institutions of the Hellenic city-States, soon invaded the equally democratic Christian communities. The result was a species of religious warfare which no doubt afforded a certain evidence of the vitality of the primitive faith; but the last thing which St. Paul, Apollos, and Cephas desired was that they should be constituted leaders of rival sects and acclaimed by eager partisans. In his First Letter to the Corinthian church St. Paul gravely rebukes a divisive, quarrelsome spirit, and endeavours to divert the strong currents of religious life into better channels (1 Co 1¹⁰⁻¹³).

2. But St. Paul himself was compelled, like Jeremiah (15¹⁰), to be a man of strife. Against Jews and Judaizers he had to fight the battle of spiritual freedom. His gospel inevitably created antagonisms wherever he preached it. 'Fightings (μαχαί) without' as well as 'fears within' were his appointed lot (2 Co 7⁵). In things indifferent he was the most yielding of men (1 Co 9¹²⁻¹⁴), but on matters of principle he would not give place to any one for an hour (Gal 2³). He withstood even St. Peter to the face (21¹). And, when he had largely succeeded in exorcizing the legal spirit from the Church, he was obliged, in his old age, to sharpen his weapons once more, and begin an entirely new battle with an incipient Gnosticism (see COLOSSIANS).

3. Whilst St. Paul was a keen controversialist, he never wrote a letter that did not contain the word 'peace.' He pleaded with his fellow-workers (e.g. Euodia and Syntyche, Ph 4²; cf. Ro 12¹⁶ 15³, 2 Co 13¹¹) to be of one mind; and he urged the Christians of Rome to be at peace, if possible, with all men (Ro 12¹⁸). His dispute with Barnabas is described as a παροξυσμός, a sharp contention (Ac 15³⁹). Human frailty mingled in both these apostles with what was very noble and honourable. Their quarrel was one of which only good men were capable. It was essentially a conflict of ideals, a strife between justice on the one hand and generosity on the other. ὁ Παῦλος ἐζητεῖ τὸ δίκαιον, ὁ Βαρνάβας τὸ φιλανθρωπον (Chrysostom, Hom. in Acta Apost. xxxiv.).

4. The infection of the sub-Apostolic Church by the subtleties of the full-blown Gnostic system led to a widespread, barren warfare of words (λογομαχία, 1 Ti 6⁴), far removed from the realities of the Christian conflict with sin. This condition of things is reflected in the Pastoral Letters, which charge all believers 'that they strive not about words, to no profit' (2 Ti 2¹⁴). Empty discussions merely engendered strifes (μάχας, v.²³), and the bond-servant of Christ must not strive (οὐ δεῖ μάχεσθαι, v.²⁴).

5. There is, however, an altogether different kind of strife, which at once commends itself to the Christian heart and conscience. St. Paul indicates its nature by two words of the arena—ἀγωνίζομαι and ἀθλῶ, with their compounds. To strive for the incorruptible crown (1 Co 9²⁵); to labour and strive as a servant of God, cheered by a sense of His own mighty working in us (Col 1²⁹); to invite others to strive with us in their prayers (Ro 15³⁰); and, again, to strive for Christ's sake in the spirit of a soldier or an athlete, and to do it lawfully (2 Ti 2⁵); to strive, in spiritual fellowship with others, for the faith of the gospel (Ph 1²⁷)—all this seems to the Apostle to be of the very essence of the Christian life. In that life, as the writer to the Hebrews indicates (12⁴), men may at last have to resist unto blood, striving against (antagonizing) sin.

JAMES STRAHAN.

STRIPEs.—See BEATING, SCOURGING.

SUBSTANCE (Gr. υπόστασις, Lat. substantia).—It is only in the Epistle to the Hebrews that the term 'substance' is used with anything approaching a philosophical connotation. The meaning of the word in this Epistle is of unusual interest owing to the crucial place which it came to occupy in the Trinitarian controversies of later times. The history of its use as a theological term is given by T. B. Strong in JThSt iii. [1901-02] 22 ff.

In AV the word 'substance' is used to translate both παρεῖς and υπόστασις. The former is better rendered 'possession' (RV), as in the passage, 'Ye have in heaven a better possession (παρεῖς) and an abiding' (He 10³⁴; cf. Ac 2⁴⁵). Interest centres then in the word υπόστασις, which occurs only five times in the NT. In two passages it means 'confidence' (2 Co 9¹¹ 17). But in the remaining three, all of which are in Hebrews, a philosophical conception is probably involved. (1) He 3¹⁴: 'We are become partakers of Christ, if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence (τῆς υποστάσεως) firm unto the end.' Both AV and RV render υπόστασις as 'confidence.' Most modern commentators concur in this subjective reference. The Vulgate renders it objectively (substantia ejus), and many Patristic commentators take this view—e.g. it is 'the faith,' τὴν πίστιν (Chrysostom, Theodoret) or fidem Christi (Primasius). This rendering is improbable. There is yet a third possible explanation in view of what is said under (2) and (3). If in He 11¹ υπόστασις is 'the giving substance' (RVm) to unseen realities, the beginning of our υπόστασις may well be the beginning of that progressive spiritual state of realizing, or 'giving substance to,' in actual Christian experience, those eternal verities which Judaism only dimly adumbrated. As Christ (He 1³) is the χαράκτηρ ('perfect expression') of the Divine υπόστασις (or 'essence'), Christians, as 'partakers of Christ,' may in some measure embody (hypostasize, substantiate) the Divine reality eternally existing in Christ. The word of exhortation in this verse is then to 'hold fast the beginning' of that process of actualizing in Christian experience eternal spiritual realities. That such experience should lead to 'confidence' is inevitable. (2) In He 11¹ faith is described as 'the substance (υπόστασις) of things hoped for.' In RV υπόστασις is rendered 'assurance' or 'confidence' (as in 2 Co 9¹¹ 17, He 3¹⁴). But in the margin RV suggests 'the giving substance to' (favoured by Westcott, Davidson, Peake, Wickham). Both meanings may well have been in the mind of the writer; for, if faith enables the believer to 'give substance' to spiritual experience and embody the objective realities of his religious hopes, it naturally affords him a ground of assured confidence in them. The use of the antithesis 'substance' and 'shadow' (see art. SHADOW) found in this Epistle (8⁵ 10¹) shows that the writer is familiar with the Platonic and Philonic conception that the things seen are but shadows cast in time and space by eternal archetypal realities. The latter are the truly 'substantial,' and he asserts that faith is that state of mind, or experience, which actualizes the things as yet unseen and which proves that they alone have 'substance' or reality. (3) In He 1³ there is contained the metaphysical embryo of later theological speculation. Christ is spoken of in relation to God as the 'very image of his substance' (χαράκτηρ τῆς υποστάσεως). In AV υπόστασις is translated 'person,' but the rendering is inappropriate and misleading. The philosophical conception of personality did not emerge until long after the Apostolic Age, and then largely through the contentions of the Greek and Latin Fathers over the question as to whether there was one hypostasis in the Godhead or whether there were three hypostaseis (or 'persons'). The writer of Hebrews does not say that Christ is the express image of the Person of God. The substance (υπόστασις) of the Godhead, of which Christ is the 'express image' (χαράκτηρ), is the Divine 'essence' or 'nature.' 'Substance' (Lat. substantia) etymologically is 'that which stands under' (as a foundation or pedestal). Then it came to mean that in a thing which makes it what it is (its 'essence'), the substratum beneath all its qualities. In its more modern philosophical meaning 'substance' is the reality which exists behind all phenomena. The theological and metaphysical associations of the word, as a technical term, cause most recent commentators to prefer the translation 'essence' or 'nature' in this passage as best interpreting the view of the writer as to Christ and His relation to the Godhead. He is the perfect expression in human life and history of the essential nature of God. In harmony with the teaching of the Fourth Gospel Christ is the Divine Logos, and He alone can assert, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (Jn 14⁹).

M. SCOTT FLETCHER.

SUFFERING.—'Suffering' is the usual translation of πάθημα (found in sing. only in He 2⁹) in AV and RV. In AV the Gr. word is also tr. 'afflictions' (3 times; RV 'sufferings'), 'affections' (Gal 5²⁴; RV 'passions'), and 'emotions' (Ro 7⁵; RV 'passions'). The cognate verb πάσχω is always tr. 'suffer' in AV and RV, with two exceptions (Ac 1³, 'passion,' AV and RV; 28⁵, AV 'feel,' RV 'took'). The same verb appears in compound forms in 'suffer before' (1 Th 2⁻, AV and RV) and 'suffer with' (Ro 8¹⁷, 1 Co 12²⁶, AV and RV). In RV κακοπάθεια is rendered 'suffering' (Ja 5¹⁰; AV 'suffering affliction'); κακοπάθω, 'suffer hardship' (2 Ti 4⁵, AV 'endure afflictions'; 2 Ti 2⁹, AV 'suffer trouble'), 'be suffering' (Ja 5¹³; AV 'be afflicted'); συγκακοπαθῶ, 'suffer hardship with' (2 Ti 1⁸, AV 'be partaker of the afflictions of'; and 2 Ti 2³, AV 'endure hardness'). In AV παθῆναι is rendered 'should suffer', in RV 'must suffer', in RVm 'subject to suffering', (Ac 26²³).

Other words rendered by 'suffer' are ἀτιμάζω (Ac 5⁴¹; AV 'suffer shame,' RV 'suffer dishonour'); ζημῶ (pass.), 'suffer loss' (1 Co 3¹⁵, Ph 3⁸ AV and RV; 2 Co 7⁹ RV; AV 'receive damage'); κακοχέομαι (He 13³; AV 'suffer adversity,' RV 'be evil entreated'); μακροθυμῶ (1 Co 13⁴, AV and RV, 'suffer long'; 2 P 3⁹, AV and RV, 1 Th 5¹⁴ RV, 'be longsuffering,' elsewhere 'be patient,' 1 Th 5¹⁴ AV, Ja 5⁷, AV, Ja 5⁷, RV, or 'patiently endure,' He 6¹⁵, AV and RV); ναυαγέω, 'suffer shipwreck' (2 Co 11²⁵, AV and RV); δυσδιχῶ (pass.), 'suffer reproach' (1 Ti 4¹⁰ AV; RV 'strive'); στέγω (1 Co 9¹²; AV 'suffer,' RV 'bear'; also tr. 'bear,' 1 Co 13⁷, AV and RV, and 'forbear,' 1 Th 3¹⁻⁵, AV and RV); συγκακοχέομαι (He 11²⁵; AV 'suffer affliction with,' RV 'be evil entreated with'); υπεχω (Jude⁷, 'suffer,' AV and RV); υπομένω (2 Ti 2¹²; AV 'suffer,' RV 'endure'; usually rendered 'endure' in AV and RV, but also 'be patient,' Ro 12¹², AV and RV, 'take patiently,' 1 P 2^{20b}, AV and RV).

1. The sufferings of Christ.—The sufferings of Christ were foretold (Ac 3¹⁸ 26²⁷, 1 P 1¹¹). 'It behoved the Christ to suffer' (Ac 17³; cf. He 9²⁶). Moses and the prophets showed how that must be (Ac 26²³; cf. 17³). He suffered throughout His earthly life, 'in the flesh' (1 P 4¹). He suffered, being tempted (He 2¹⁸). On the Cross His sufferings culminated. He suffered for sins once (1 P 3¹⁸), suffered without the gate (He 13¹²; cf. Ac 1³). His sufferings revealed His character, and had a reflex influence on His own nature. 'When he suffered, he threatened not' (1 P 2²³). 'He learned obedience by the things which he suffered' (He 5⁸). Of these sufferings St. Peter was one of the chief witnesses (1 P 5¹), and he points out Christ as the great example (2²¹). It was for His followers that He suffered (id.).

2. The sufferings of Christ shared by Christians.—Though Christ suffered, His disciples are not saved from suffering. Rather does their relationship to Him cause them to suffer also. If they are faithful to Him, the enmity and opposition He met with will also to some extent fall to their lot. Hence St. Paul, who endured so much on behalf of the gospel, could with reason speak of sharing the sufferings of Christ. 'The sufferings of Christ abound unto us,' he says (2 Co 1⁵). He longs to know 'the fellowship of his sufferings' (Ph 3¹⁰). Others who belong to Christ also suffer with Him; and those who thus suffer will share His glory (Ro 8¹⁷). 'Inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, rejoice' (1 P 4¹³). 'If we endure, we shall also reign with him' (2 Ti 2¹²).

3. Suffering on behalf of the faith.—The suffering of the NT is almost entirely suffering in the cause of Christ. St. Paul is told that he is to suffer for the Lord's name's sake (Ac 9¹⁶). He tells Timothy that he suffers because he is an apostle and a teacher (2 Ti 1¹²), suffers hardship even unto bonds (2⁹). He speaks of his sufferings in such a way as to show that they were chiefly persecutions (3¹¹). Accordingly, Timothy is exhorted to suffer hardship with him (2 Ti 2³). 'Be not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner; but suffer hardship with the gospel' (1⁸). 'Suffer hardship, do the work of an evangelist' (4⁵). St. Paul suffered, and was shamefully entreated at Philippi (1 Th 2-). There he endured stripes and imprisonment (Ac 16¹⁹, esp. v. 23). He also suffered because of the perverse ideas of his converts (1 Co 9¹², 2 Co 1⁴). His converts, too, frequently suffered on account of the faith. The Galatians suffered many things (cf. Ac 14²⁻⁵, 19²²). The Philippians suffered on behalf of Christ (1²⁹). The Thessalonians suffered for the Kingdom of God (2 Th 1⁵) at the hands of their fellow-countrymen, as the churches of Judaea did at the hands of the Jews (1 Th 2¹⁴). The readers of 1 Pet. were also subjected to suffering. They suffered wrongfully when well-doing (2¹⁶, 20), for righteousness' sake (3¹⁴; cf. v. 17), as Christians (4¹⁰). St. Peter told them that those who are called to God's eternal Kingdom in Christ may nevertheless suffer (5¹⁰), just as St. Paul had told Timothy that 'all that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution' (2 Ti 3¹²). Among the things which the Christians of Smyrna have to suffer is imprisonment (Rev 2¹⁰; cf. He 13³). The Hebrews are reminded that after they were enlightened they 'endured a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazestock both by reproaches and by afflictions; and partly, becoming partakers with them that were so used' (He 10³²). The heroes also suffered for their faithfulness. Moses preferred to suffer affliction with the people of God (He 11²⁵). The prophets gave an example of suffering (Ja 5¹⁰). The early Christians seem to have concerned themselves little about what we call the problem of suffering, except perhaps in so far as their sufferings were ascribed to the activity of the devil (1 P 5⁹). Their chief anxiety seems to have been that they should suffer according to the will of God (4¹⁹), i.e. for well-doing (3¹⁷ 4¹⁹).

4. The fruits of suffering.—Jesus because of the suffering of death was crowned with glory and honour (He 2⁹). Glories followed His sufferings (1 P 1¹¹). Through them He was made perfect (He 2¹⁰; cf. 5⁸). In the case of His followers suffering has a similar result. Those who suffer for righteousness' sake are blessed (1 P 3¹⁴). Those who are called to God's eternal glory in Christ and suffer a little while shall be perfected, established, and strengthened by God (5¹⁰). One who suffers as a Christian has reason to glorify God (4¹⁶). To do well and to suffer for it is acceptable with Him (2²⁰). 'Wherefore let them also that suffer according to the will of God commit their souls in well-doing unto a faithful Creator' (4¹⁹).

There is a great mass of modern literature on the problem of pain or suffering, but how little of it is concerned with sorrow at the slow progress of righteousness or of the Kingdom of God! It was otherwise in the Apostolic Age. There is very little in the NT about purely personal suffering (Ac 28⁵, 1 Co 12²⁶). In one case at least suffering is distinguished from sickness (Ja 5¹³).

LITERATURE.—R. Winterbotham, The Kingdom of Heaven Here and Hereafter, London, 1898, pp. 234-240; J. Weiss, Die Schriften des NT, Göttingen, 1907, s.v. 'Leiden' in index; Handkommentar zum NT, Freiburg, 1892, s.v. 'Leiden' in indexes; Grimm-Thayer, s.v.; DCG, s.v.; H. W. Beecher, Sermons, 2nd ser., London, 1870, pp. 271-297; A. B. Bruce, The Providential Order of the World, do., 1897, pp. 125 ff., 250 ff.; F. W. Robertson, Expository Lectures on the Corinthians, do., 1859, pp. 317 ff., 446 ff., Sermons, 5th ser., do., 1904, serms. i. and ii.

WILLIAM WATSON.

SUN.—Mention of the sun in the Apostolic Age is almost entirely confined to the book of Revelation. In the Heavenly Jerusalem the sun shall not light upon the blessed nor any heat (Rev 7¹⁶). There will no longer be any need of the sun (21²⁹). Dread judgments are symbolized by the obscuring of the sun, e.g. 'The sun became black as sackcloth' (6¹²); see also Rev 8¹² 9³ 16⁸ and Ac 2²⁰, Joel's prophecy quoted by St. Peter. It is twice used in similes, i.e. in the description of the Vision of the Christ, 'His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength' (1¹⁶), and in the description of an angel, 'His face was as the sun' (10¹).

In Rev 12¹ the woman in the vision is 'arrayed with the sun.' The idea may be taken from Ps 104², 'Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment.' The author may also have had in mind the description of the Bride in Ca 6¹⁰, 'clear as the sun.' If, as some think, the woman represents the Jewish Church, then she appears in all the glory of the patriarchs (see Ro 9³). But Semitic writers were apt to decorate representative persons with the heavenly bodies.

Lastly, in Rev 19¹⁷ the angel who is entrusted with the overthrow of the Beast and the false prophet is represented as 'standing in the sun'—probably that he may be able from his position in mid-heaven to summon the great birds of prey to feed on the flesh of the king's enemies lying on the battle-field.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

SUPERSTITIOUS (Ac 17²², δεδωδαμονεστέρους, RV 'somewhat superstitious,' marg. 'somewhat religious').—The Greek word, derived from deidō, 'to fear' and δαίμων, 'demon,' was originally used in a good sense (Xenophon, Cyrop. III. iii. 53; Aristotle, Pol. v. xi. 25; Polybius, VI. lvi. 7) but underwent a change of meaning. It is used in a bad sense, for instance, by later writers, as Josephus (Ant. xv. viii. 2; Plutarch, de Superstit. 10). The authorities are divided as to the sense in which St. Paul used it, the majority at the present day being in favour of the rendering 'religious'; so Knowling, Ramsay, Verrall, Farrar, T. K. Abbott, Page, Rackham, Trench, Blass, Renan, Weiss, Holtzmann, Weizsäcker, and many others.

In favour of this view it is stated that St. Paul was hardly likely to have offended the audience at the opening of his apology. The prevailing practice of commencing a speech in an ingratiating tone is followed by him at Cæsarea. 'It was not St. Paul's habit to affront and by affronting to alienate his hearers, least of all at the outset of a discourse intended to win them to the truth' (R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, London, 1876, p. 172). Further, the usual Greek word for 'piety' was εὐσεβεία, and he uses the cognate verb εὐσεβείρε in the next verse. Once more, δεδωδαμονία is used of the Jewish religion in Ac 25¹⁹, and must there have been intended in a good sense.

On the other hand, the philosophers, to whom St. Paul was addressing himself, at least in part, must have understood the word as meaning 'superstitious,' and they would have heartily concurred in such an epithet. A doubtful passage in the Characters of Theophrastus (xvi.) gives a picture of the δεδωδαμων as one who had frequent recourse to soothsayers and was a strong believer in omens; while the Stoic emperor Marcus Aurelius (Meditat. i. 3) expresses his thankfulness that he takes after his mother in the matter of devotion (θεοσεβής), and that his father escaped the fate of a δεδωδαμων (ib. i. 16). Nestle has pointed out (ExpT xi. [1899–1900] 378) that the ominous word 'demon' could never have conveyed anything but a bad sense to a Jew, which is borne out by Josephus' use of the word. The force of the comparative may be 'too,' 'very,' 'rather,' or 'somewhat.' We can certainly agree that St. Paul would never have commenced a speech with a studied insult, but he was a man who said what he thought, and the word was most applicable to the popular religion of the day. It is unlikely that he meant to convey the idea of reproof, but he certainly meant 'superstitious.' The philosophers would understand as much and would agree with him; while the populace would be merely interested and wait for an explanation, since for them the word did not contain the note of contempt that it held for the philosophers. Here are some of the renderings: Ramsay, 'more than others respectful of what is divine'; Renan, 'le plus religieux'; Holtzmann, 'Gottesfürchtige'; Zöckler and Weiss agree with the latter; Nestle and Moffatt, 'rather superstitious'; Chase, 'very superstitious.'

LITERATURE.—Besides the commentaries of those mentioned, see F. Field, Notes on the Translation of the NT, Cambridge, 1899; T. K. Abbott, in CQR xxix. [1890] 284; F. H. Chase, Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, London, 1902; ExpT xviii. [1906–07] 485 f. F. W. WORSLEY.

SUPPER (δείπνον, 1 Co 11^{20, 21}, Rev 19¹⁷; cf. Mk 6²¹, Lk 14^{12, 16, 17, 24}, Jn 12^{13, 21}).—Of the two principal daily meals common to the Jews in NT times, 'supper' was the more important. It was usually taken about sunset or shortly after (Lk 14¹² 17^{7, 8}). 'Dinner' (ἀριστον) was a lighter meal, being taken about noon or a little before. Prayer was offered before eating (Ac 27³⁵, Mt 14¹⁹ 15³⁶, Lk 9¹⁶ 20¹⁷, Jn 6¹¹), and the hands were scrupulously washed (Mt 15²), sometimes also the feet (Lk 7⁴).

There are really only two passages in apostolic history which fall within the scope of this article.

(1) 1 Co 11^{20, 21}, 'When therefore ye assemble yourselves together, it is not possible to eat the Lord's supper (κυριακὸν δείπνον): for in your eating each one taketh before other his own supper; and one is hungry, and another is drunken.' This is the only passage in the entire NT which gives us the name 'Lord's supper,' and even here the name is not to be restricted to the Eucharist (q.v.) alone, for at this time it was not dissociated from the love-feasts (q.v.) or Agapæ (ἀγάπαι, Jude 12; cf. 2 P 2¹³ RV) which preceded the ordinary evening services of the Church. Other passages of course refer to it, but not by name (cf. 1 Co 10^{16, 21}). The emphasis of the passage is on 'Lord's.' St. Paul is here rebuking the Corinthians concerning their manners and worship. In the first instance he reminds them of the unbecoming boldness of their women, who, taking advantage of the freedom allowed by the gospel, appear in public unveiled. Only harlots were accustomed to do so in Corinth; therefore let women take heed not to abuse their liberty in Christ. He next addresses himself to their selfish, greedy, haphazard, disgraceful, even scandalous conduct in eating their supper in the sanctuary. Originally it seems to have been their custom to come together on the first day of the week to break bread together (Ac 20⁷). The meal was what might be appropriately called a club or church supper, after which the religious service of worship took place. It was a kind of enlarged family meal (cf. 2⁴⁶), the object of which was primarily social. In keeping with Greek custom among certain gilds, each one brought with him his basket of provisions, and these were spread indiscriminately before, and partaken of by, the company present as a corporate body. But there had developed factions in the church at Corinth. A selfish spirit was manifesting itself. Instead of coming together as brethren in Christ, the worshippers came and hastily devoured that which they had brought themselves, not waiting to share it with the poor or others who had failed to supply themselves. The consequence was that social differences were accentuated, and the prayer of consecration was omitted. But, more shameful even than this, the indigent who had brought nothing had nothing wherewith to satisfy their hunger, while the rich ate and drank to satiety, becoming actually drunken. Such conduct was unbecoming in the Lord's house and unfitted the worshippers to celebrate in any sense worthily the 'Lord's Supper.' Against this manner of worship the Apostle vehemently protests. It was unbecoming for the followers of Christ; there was a want of love in the exercise; the corporate spirit was absent; the unity of the brotherhood was destroyed; and, consequently, the Corinthian Christians were rapidly becoming 'weak and sickly' in a spiritual sense (1 Co 11²⁰). Not many years subsequently to this the Eucharist and the Agape were celebrated separately for the sake of greater decorum, until, finally, the latter so degenerated that it became extinct.

(2) The second passage contains a double picture: (a) Rev 19, 'And he saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which are bidden to the marriage supper of the Lamb.' Here the bliss of the next world is depicted under the figure of a banquet. The Rabbis were accustomed to interpret Ex 24¹¹ to mean that the sight of God was like meat and drink to the beholders. Here it is the picture of a marriage-feast. The Lamb has come to claim His bride, who has long been betrothed and waiting for the bridegroom. It is a vision of the final consummation of the Kingdom, including the overthrow of the kings of the earth, the binding and loosing again of Satan, and general judgment. With this picture the climax is reached in the imagery of the book. But out of it grows another picture of very different hue: (b) Rev 19^{17, 18}, 'And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the birds that fly in mid heaven, Come and be gathered together unto the great supper of God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses and of them that sit thereon, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, and small and great.' This, then, is 'the great supper of God,' and the invitation is to the birds of prey. Most vividly the Apostle here sets forth the tragic contrast between the 'marriage supper' of the Lamb (v. 9) and the destruction of the slain, on whose carcasses the birdsshall feed. To be left unburied and devoured by birds of prey the Orientals considered the worst misfortune possible for the dead. For example, the most awful penalty that could possibly be inflicted on the opponents of Zoroastrianism is that their corpses should be given over to the ravens. The symbolism here, which seems to us crude and ghastly, is based on Ezk 39^{17, 18}, 'Speak unto the birds of every sort, and to every beast of the field, Assemble yourselves, and come; gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice . . . upon the mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh and drink blood,' etc. But, in this vision of the Messiah's final victory over His foes, it must be remembered that, though He is pictured as a silent and implacable conqueror, who has vanquished all His foes and disposed of them in huge masses, leaving them to their inexorable doom, yet He is not described as a merely human, vindictive conqueror. His garments are indeed sprinkled with blood, but it is His own blood, not that of others (v. 13); He smites the nations with a sword, but it is the sword of His Word which proceedeth out of His mouth; He has trodden the winepress of God's wrath, but He has trodden it alone (v. 15; cf. Is 63³); and He is not pictured as gloating over the torments of His enemies (cf. Is 66²⁴).

LITERATURE.—Percy Gardner, The Origin of the Lord's Supper, 1893; F. Schultzen, Das Abendmahl im NT, 1895; J. C. Lambert, The Sacraments in the NT, 1903; R. M. Adamson, The Christian Doctrine of the Lord's Supper, 1905. Cf. the articles 'Supper,' 'Eucharist,' 'Lord's Supper,' 'Meals' in the various Bible Dictionaries and Religious Encyclopedias, notably Hastings', Piercy's, Cheyne-Black's, Herzog's, the Standard, and the Temple. See, further, Literature under art. EUCHARIST.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

SURNAME.—It seems probable, as indicated in the art. NAME, that originally a name was the designation of a stock or tribe—like the Grants or Howards—applied by outsiders to a group and subsequently adopted by it. When the stock increased, personal names seem to have been introduced to distinguish the different members. When the number of persons still further increased and intercourse became easier and more common, certain designations derived from some peculiarity were used to distinguish or designate different individuals. All varieties of these may be classed under the general designation 'surnames.'

An indication of something similar to this in the naming of deities is to be found in the Roman religion.¹ Royal personages use only their baptismal name, or the first of these when there are more than one. In Europe surnames became common in the Middle Ages, first of all among the land-owning nobles.² Surnames are of rare occurrence in the OT. In the NT when a person is referred to by only one name, especially if that be a common one, identification is difficult if not impossible. Thus of John mentioned in Ac 4⁶ we know nothing. At least five persons are called Alexander; and of these the Alexanders referred to in Ac 4⁶ 19³³, 1 Ti 1²⁰ are names and nothing more.

1. Surnames are to be distinguished from—

(a) New names.—Apion, an Egyptian of the 2nd cent. A.D., on entering the Egyptian army, changed his name to Antonis Maximus.³ Similar changes are recorded of Abram, Joseph, Jacob, Solomon, Daniel, Pashhur, Tophet, and even of Jahweh Himself.⁴

(b) Explanatory descriptions to designate any one more clearly, derived from

(1) Trade.—In Nazareth Joseph was known as ὁ τέκτων,⁵ and Jesus by the same appellation.⁶ Alexander, as ὁ χαλκεύς,⁷ occupied a similar position in the town in which he lived, while Simon's designation, βυρρεὺς,⁸ indicates that he was one of many who followed the occupation of a tanner.

(2) Business.—Manaen is designated as Ἡρώδου σύντροφος,⁹ Matthew as ὁ τελώνης,¹⁰ Chuza as ἐπιτροπος Ἡρώδου.¹¹

(3) A physical peculiarity.—A certain Simon is differentiated as ὁ λεπρός,¹² another as ὁ καλούμενος Νίγερ,¹³ while a third the Church has named ὁ μάγος,¹⁴ though that surname is not given him either in the Acts or in Justin Martyr.

(4) Some outstanding feature in a man's life, as John ὁ βαπτιστής,¹⁵ Thomas ὁ λεγόμενος Δίδυμος,¹⁶ Simon who was, but is not surnamed, Φαρισαῖος.¹⁷

(5) Names of places.—Cases in which there is annexed to the name a phrase, compounded of ἀπό with the name of a place, forming a designation given to a person from another town or district to distinguish him from those of the same name in the town, much as we speak of 'Robertson of Brighton.' Examples of this are: Jesus ὁ ἀπὸ Ναζαρέθ,¹⁸ Joseph ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας,¹⁹ Philip ἀπὸ Βηθσαιδά,²⁰ Lazarus ἀπὸ Βηθανίας,²¹ Nathanael ἀπὸ Κανὰ τῆς Γαλιλαίας.²²

(6) Names of relatives.—Cases in which one with a common name has annexed the name of another person with whom he is closely connected, as Ἰάκω-

¹ FFE vii. 413.

² H. Hallam, View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, London, 1841, pp. 112, 138; Thomas Carlyle, Frederick the Great, 10 vols., do., 1872-73, i. 67.

³ G. A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr., London, 1911, pp. 169, 170.

⁴ On 17⁵ 18 41⁴⁵ 32²⁸, 2 S 12²⁵, Dn 1⁷, Jer 7³² 20³, Hos 21⁶.

⁵ Mt 13⁵⁵.

⁶ Mk 6³.

⁷ 2 Ti 414.

⁸ Ac 9⁴³ 106. 32.

⁹ Ac 13¹; for meaning see G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1901, p. 310, and Ramsay's criticism in Exp. 7th ser., vii. [1909] 364.

¹⁰ Mt 10³.

¹¹ Lk 8³; Exp. 5th ser., ix. [1899] 118.

¹² Mt 20⁹, Mk 14³.

¹³ Ac 13¹.

¹⁴ Ao 8⁹; Justin, Apol. i. 26, 56, ii. 15, Dial. 120.

¹⁵ Mt 31.

¹⁶ Lk 7⁴⁰ 43. 44.

¹⁷ Mt 27⁵⁷, Mk 15⁴³, Lk 23⁵¹, Jn 19³⁸.

¹⁸ Mt 21¹¹.

¹⁹ Mt 27⁵⁷, Mk 15⁴³, Lk 23⁵¹, Jn 19³⁸. May Arimathaea have been the name not of a town but of an estate or even a farm?

²⁰ Jn 14⁵ 12²¹.

²¹ Jn 11¹.

²² Jn 21².

βος ὁ τοῦ Ἀλφαίου,¹ Ἰάκωβος ὁ τοῦ Ζεβεδαίου,² Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου,³ Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ.⁴ This, however, may, in some cases, be a mere explanatory note, more akin to those in which a relationship is actually stated, as James the brother of Jonn,⁵ Mark ὁ ἀνεψιὸς Βαρνάβα,⁶ Mary the mother of James and Joseph,⁷ Mary the sister of Lazarus,⁸ Mary the mother of Mark,⁹ Mary the mother of Jesus.¹⁰

(c) Names compounded with ܐܢܝܢ.—Closely akin to the foregoing is a group of names whose first component is the Aramaic word ܐܢܝܢ, meaning 'son.' These are divisible into three classes:

(1) Those in which only one name is given, represented by Βαρτιμαῖος, that is, 'the son of Timæus'—a word whose meaning and derivation are both uncertain.¹¹

(2) Those in which the name may be a surname.—If Nathanael, mentioned only in the Fourth Gospel,¹² is the Bartholomew mentioned only by the Synoptists,¹³ then Nathanael bore the surname 'son of Talmal.' Matthias the successor of Judas¹⁴ is called by Aphraates ܡܬܝܬܝܐ, and in the Syriac translation of the Church History of Eusebius this is everywhere substituted for Matthias. Nestle therefore suggested that there were two Bartholomews, one known as Nathanael, and the other as Matthias.¹⁵ But Burkitt¹⁶ holds that the substitution of ܡܬܝܬܝܐ for Matthias 'is no mere palaeographical error, but that the Old Syriac Version of the Acts must have had ܡܬܝܬܝܐ also. This name occurs as ܡܬܠܡܝܐ in Josephus (Ant. xx. i.), and is, of course, the second part of the name Bartholomew. An obscure name ܡܬܝܬܝܐ does occur in Judges and Samuel, but ܡܬܝܬܝܐ is nothing more than Ptolemy in a Semitic disguise. . . . Why the Old Syriac of Acts should have represented Matthias by this name cannot now be ascertained.' Considerable interest attaches to the name Bar-Jesus, a name variously spelt in the Western texts. In the Peshitta there is given as an equivalent ܒܪܫܘܡܐ, Barshuma. This is an old family name in Edessa, but its meaning is quite unknown. The magician is also called Ἐλῡμας, 'for so is his name translated.'¹⁷ Elymas may be a Greek form of alimā, an Aramaic word meaning 'strong,' or of alim, an Arabic word meaning 'wise,'¹⁸ but it cannot be a translation of Bar-Jesus. Codex D reads, instead of Elymas, Ἐτοιμας, meaning 'son of the ready,' a reading adopted by Ramsay and Blass. Elymas is somewhat akin to Ἀρόμουν, the reading of the Ambrosian MS A in a well known passage of Josephus.¹⁹

(3) The third class carries us into—

2. Genuine surnames.—Among these are (a) patronymics, as those in which there is added to the name another name compounded with ܐܢܝܢ. Joseph the Cyprian Levite is ὁ ἐπικληθεὶς Βαρναβας by the apostles, that is, 'son of Nebo.'²⁰ It has been suggested that this surname was given to distinguish him from Joseph ὁ καλούμενος Βαρναβας, a name meaning most probably 'Saturday's child.' He had also, according to a common custom, adopted the Roman name of Justus.¹ He may have been a brother of Judas ὁ καλούμενος Βαρναβας.² In this connexion the name Barab-bas deserves notice. The Sinaitic (and Palestinian) Syriac version, some good minuscules, and MS^s known to Origen read: 'Whom will ye that I release unto you? Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ?'³

(b) Additional names.—From the want of surnames arises the difficulty of identifying different individuals having the same name, as the various Symeons and Simons mentioned in the NT. ܡܝܫܝܢ is translated in the LXX⁴ and the NT by Συμεων. There was a genuine Greek name closely resembling it, Σίμων, and this was often substituted for Συμεων.⁵ It was one of the commonest names among the Jews, twelve being mentioned in the NT. Of these, we know nothing of Symeon of Lk 3³⁰, of Simon the brother of our Lord,⁶ or, except one incident, of Symeon of Jerusalem,⁷ Simon the Cyrenian,⁸ or Simon the Pharisee.⁹ We have already noticed Simon the tanner, and Simon Magus, but by far the most outstanding bearer of the name was the Apostle. His father was called Ἰωάνης or Ἰωάννης.¹⁰ The former may have been a contraction of the latter, or he may have borne a double name, Ἰώνας-Ἰωάννης. The Apostle himself would seem originally to have borne the common Jewish name as transliterated into Greek Συμεων. This is the reading of Ac 15¹⁴; and 2 P 1¹ opens with the words Συμεων Πέτρος, which is the reading of NAKLP, Σίμων being found in B². 'The name of Simon Magus is spelt ܣܝܡܝܢ (Simōn) in Syriac, as distinguished from Simon Peter and Simon the Tanner, who are given the same name as Simeon (ܡܝܫܝܢ, Shimōn) the Patriarch,'¹¹ but owing to Greek influence there is little doubt that Σίμων would be frequently, if not commonly, used. He seems to have been distinguished from other Simons by the name Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωάννου,¹² or, more shortly, Σίμων Ἰωάννου.¹³ In Mt 16¹⁷ he is called Σίμων Βαριωνᾶ. This form may be either a contraction of the former or an instance of a double name, the Apostle's father, in accordance with the custom of the time, having added the Greek name Ἰωάνης, as being similar to his own proper name Ἰωάννης.¹⁴ According to the Fourth Gospel, Jesus on His first meeting with Simeon said to him: 'Your name is to be Κηφᾶς,' the Evangelist adding ὁ ἐμνηνεύεται Πέτρος.¹⁵ The Hebrew כִּפְיָא, Chald. ܟܦܝܐ, is in Greek Πέτρος, but neither of these names is borne by any other person in the NT save the Apostle. The Syriac ܟܦܝܐ is not a transliteration at all, but the Syriac for 'stone': the translator, or possibly Syriac Church custom, recognized that S. Peter's name was Simon Stone, and they called him, where necessary, by this appellation.¹⁶ The name Κηφᾶς is not used in the Gospels or the Acts. It is

¹ Mt 10³.

² Mt 10².

³ Lk 6¹⁶, Ac 1³ (Jn 14²², Jude 1).

⁴ Jn 19²⁵.

⁵ Ac 1²².

⁶ Col 4¹⁰.

⁷ Mt 27³⁶, Mk 15⁴⁰, 47, 16¹.

⁸ Jn 11¹.

⁹ Ac 12¹⁷.

¹⁰ Ac 14⁴. It is noticeable that neither as a title nor as a surname is the word παῖς ever applied to her. Another Mary is mentioned in Ro 16⁹.

¹¹ Mk 10⁴⁶; HDB i. 248.

¹² Jn 14²¹.

¹³ Mt 10³, Mk 3¹⁸, Lk 6¹⁴, Ac 1¹³.

¹⁴ Ac 1²².

¹⁵ ExpT ix. [1897-98] 566; see also Ramsay, Exp. 6th ser., vi. [1902] 291.

¹⁶ F. C. Burkitt, The Syriac Forms of NT Proper Names, London, 1912, p. 23.

¹⁷ Ac 13⁶.

¹⁸ See E. Renan, Saint Paul, Eng. tr., New York, 1869, p. 54.

¹⁹ Burkitt, p. 22; HDB i. 247; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 73; J. Rendel Harris, Exp. 6th ser., v. [1902] 192; Jos. Ant. xx. vii. 2.

²⁰ Ac 4³⁶; Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 187 ff., 307 ff.; ExpT x. [1898-99] 233.

¹ Ac 1²³; HDB i. 247; Exp. 6th ser., v. 414, n. 3; Burkitt, p. 6.

² Ac 15²²⁻³³; NABCDL read καλούμενον, but HP ἐπικαλούμενον.

³ Mt 27¹⁶⁻¹⁷; HDB i. 245. This reading, which is supported by v. 22, is adopted by R. C. Trench, Studies in the Gospels, London, 1878, p. 306; E. Renan, Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. do., 1873, p. 279 (who thinks that the correct reading is Bar-Abba, or Bar-Rabban); and J. Moffatt, The NT: A New Translation, do., 1914. Note the use made of this by J. M. Robertson, Christianity and Mythology, do., 1910, p. 367, and the reply of C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Edinburgh, 1912, p. 185, and J. G. Frazer, GE3, pt. vi, The Seapegoat, London, 1913, p. 419.

⁴ Gn 29³³.

⁵ Sir 50¹.

⁶ Mt 13⁵⁵, Mk 6³.

⁷ Lk 2²⁵.

⁸ Mt 27³², Mk 15²¹, Lk 23²⁶.

⁹ Lk 7³⁶, 40.

¹⁰ Mt 16¹⁷, Jn 14²¹.

¹¹ Burkitt, p. 6.

¹² Jn 14⁵.

¹³ Jn 21¹⁵⁻¹⁷.

¹⁴ HDB ii. 676.

¹⁵ Jn 14³⁴.

¹⁶ Burkitt, p. 5.

used alone by St. Paul in his First Epistle to the Corinthians,¹ and in Galatians.² Hort was of opinion that Κηφᾶς was a form of Καϊφᾶς, but that is not the case.³ In the list of the Twelve the Apostle is called Σίμων ὁ λεγόμενος Πέτρος,⁴ ἐπέθηκεν ὄνομα τῷ Σίμωνι Πέτρον,⁵ Σίμωνα δὲ καὶ ὠνόμασεν Πέτρον.⁶ We find, then, six distinct appellations—Simon,⁷ Simeon,⁸ Simon Barjona,⁹ Peter,¹⁰ Simon called Peter,¹¹ Simon Peter.¹²

(c) Adjectival names.—These may be still further divided into—

(1) Those derived from the name of a place.—In the NT seven persons bear the name of 'Ιουδας, the Greek equivalent of יהודה. Among these are an ancestor of Jesus,¹³ Judas of Damascus,¹⁴ Judas or Jude, a brother of Jesus,¹⁵ Judas distinguished as 'not Iscariot,'¹⁶ probably the same as Judas Ἰακώβου,¹⁷ and Judas Barsabbas, who has already been noticed. But of the seven the most notable is Judas the traitor. In regard to his surname, scholars are now practically agreed that the term translated 'Iscariot' is the Greek for ישראלי.¹⁸ The reading ἀπὸ Καριώτου¹⁹ clearly indicates a place. If a place be meant, what is its correct designation? The MSS oscillate between Σκαριώθ,²⁰ Ἰσκαριώθ,²¹ Σκαριώτης,²² and Ἰσκαριώτης,²³ but the reading Ἰσκαριώτης seems clearly preferable.²⁴ Kerioth can scarcely be יריה of Moab,²⁵ and is much more likely to be יריה of Judah,²⁶ meaning the twin cities or twin fortresses. It is identified with a place variously spelt Kur-yetein,²⁷ Kuryzein,²⁸ and Karjetein,²⁹ 4½ miles to the N.W. of Arad. Conder, indeed, founding upon the reading in D of Jn 12¹, etc., ἀπὸ Καριώτου, thinks that the place indicated is Ischar, which (according to the Samaritan Chronicle) was the old name of the present Askar, near Jacob's well, the Sychar of Jn 4⁵. In that case Judas most probably was a Samaritan.³⁰ The reference to the Traitor in the Fourth Gospel³¹ would indicate that his father bore the surname Ἰσκαριώτης, which he transmitted to his son.

Another of the disciples of Jesus is designated Σίμων ὁ Καναναῖος,³² or Κανανίτην,³³ and the same person is designated by Luke³⁴ Σίμωνα τὸν καλούμενον Ζηλωτὴν and Σίμων ὁ ζηλωτής. Καναναῖος is the transliteration of the Hebrew כנעני, 'the Cananean,' and is to be distinguished from, though it may be connected with, the geographical term 'Canaanite.' In Syriac this surname is rendered כנעני, and so is properly distinguished from the Canaanite woman (Χαναανα), who is

כנענית.³⁵ The Cananeans or Zealots were a well-known Jewish sect.³⁶

The name Mary, in Hebrew מרים, in Greek Μαρία or Μαριάμ, seems to be used in the NT of eight persons.³⁷ Of these Mary the mother of James, Mary of Clopas, 'the other Mary,' are generally admitted to be the same person indicated by different designations. Mary the sister of Lazarus, Mary the mother of Mark, Mary saluted by St. Paul, Mary the mother of Jesus, have been already referred to. There remains the eighth, Mary of Magdala, Μαρία ἡ Μαγδαληνή. This is the form found in Mt.,⁴ Mk.,⁵ and Jn.,⁶ while Lk. uses the form Μαρία ἡ καλουμένη Μαγδαληνή,⁷ and ἡ Μαγδαληνή Μαρία.⁸ Most probably she got this surname from being a native or resident in Magdala, or Magadan, now Mejdell, a short distance from Tiberias.⁹

Mention is made in Ac 5³⁷ of Ἰουδας ὁ Γαλιλαῖος, Judas the Galilean, a surname derived from the fact that he was a native of that province,¹⁰ though Josephus in one passage rather indicates that he came from Ganiata, which lies east of Galilee.¹¹

In Ac 13¹ among the teachers and prophets of Antioch mention is made of Λούκιος ὁ Κυρναῖος. He may or may not have been the same person as is mentioned in Ro 16¹, but at any rate he was a fellow-countryman of Σίμων Κυρναῖος.¹²

The purple-seller whom St. Paul met at Philippi was named Λυδία.¹³ That may have been the woman's proper name, but was most probably, as Ramsay hints, a designation from the district of Lydia, of which Thyatira was an important town. If this be so, it accounts for the fact that in his Epistle to the Philippians St. Paul does not mention her, though it is possible that she was Euodia or Syntyche.¹⁴

(2) Those derived from other sources.—Various explanations have been given of a surname Boanerges given by our Lord to James and John, and applied to them but once.¹⁵ None of these is very satisfactory, but by far the most likely is that the two were not merely brothers but twins, and that, since the superstitions attached to twins and the worship of the Dioscuri were well known, something in character, conduct, or appearance caused Jesus to give them the surname 'Sons of the Sky.'¹⁶ The strange ideas associated with twins remind us of another disciple whose name we do not know, though we know his surname. In three passages in the Fourth Gospel¹⁷ reference is made to an apostle Θωμᾶς ὁ λεγόμενος Διδυμος. Thomas is not, as it has become, a personal name; it is simply the Aramaic word for twin. Διδυμος is a Greek translation of the word. In the Acta Thomæ he is called Judas Thomas, and very early¹⁸ a legend arose that he was the twin brother of Jesus.

¹ Burkitt, p. 5.

² Schurer, HJP i. [Edinburgh, 1890] ii. 80, 177, 229; HDB i. 345; Jos. EJ iv. iii. 9, 13, 14, iv. 5, v. i, vii.; Expt xxvi. [1914-15] 341 f.

³ Expt, 7th ser., viii. [1909] 58, 307; HDB iii. 278.

⁴ Mt 27:56. 61 28¹.

⁵ Mk 15:40. 47 16¹-9.

⁶ Jn 19:25 20¹ 18.

⁷ Lk 8¹.

⁸ Lk 24¹⁰; there is a difference in the MSS, some reading Μαρία, others Μαρίαμ; some also read Μαγδαλίνη.

⁹ But see HDB iii. 202.

¹⁰ Jos. Ant. xviii. l. 1-6, xx. v. 2, EJ ii. viii. 1, xvii. 8, 9, vii. 1.

¹¹ Jos. Ant. xviii. l. 1; Schürer, HJP i. ii. 4, 80.

¹² Mt 27:32, Mk 15:21, Lk 23:36; some MSS have in the latter case Κυρναῖος; R. C. Trench, Studies in the Gospels, p. 144.

¹³ Ac 16:40.

¹⁴ HDB iii. 176 f.

¹⁵ Mk 3:17.

¹⁶ Expt, 7th ser., iii. [1907] 146; Expt xxv. [1913-14] 100 f., xxvi. 45 f., 236 f.

¹⁷ Jn 11:16 20:24 21:2.

¹⁸ In the Sinaitic Syriac Gospels, discovered by Mrs. Lewis, Judas, the brother of our Lord, and Thomas are identified in Jn 14:2; HDB iv. 763; Expt, 7th ser., iii. 381; Expt xiv. [1902-03] 397 ff., xvii. [1905-06] 335.

¹ 1 Co 112 322 95 155.

² Gal 118, but DEFGKLP read Πέτρον; ²⁹, but DEFG read Πέτρος; ²¹¹, but DEFGKL read Πέτρος; ²¹⁴, but DEFGKL read Πέτρον.

³ Expt x. 185.

⁴ Mt 102.

⁵ Mk 318.

⁶ Lk 614.

⁷ Mt 1725.

⁸ Ac 1514.

⁹ Mt 1617.

¹⁰ Mt 814.

¹¹ Mt 418.

¹² Mt 1616.

¹³ Lk 330.

¹⁴ Ac 911.

¹⁵ Mt 1335, Mk 63.

¹⁶ Jn 1422.

¹⁷ Lk 618, Ac 113.

¹⁸ But see W. B. Smith, in HJ ix. [1911] 531, 392.

¹⁹ Jn 671 *M 124 132. 36 1422, all of D.

²⁰ Mk 39, Lk 616, both in D, and Jn 671 in BCGL.

²¹ Mk 39 in BCL, Lk 616 in BL, Mt 104 in C.

²² Mt 104 in D.

²³ Mt 104, etc., also the readings in *M and D noted under 19.

²⁴ E. Nestle and F. H. Chase, Expt ix. 140, 189, 240, 285.

²⁵ Jer 48:41, Am 22.

²⁶ Jos 15:25; HJ ix. 531.

²⁷ E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine, 3 vols., London, 1841, ii. 472.

²⁸ E. H. Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus, 2 vols., Cambridge, 1871, map to vol. ii.

²⁹ HDB ii. 836.

³⁰ PEFSt, April 1905, p. 157; HDB iv. 635.

³¹ Jn 671 in MBCGL, 124 A(E)IKM, 132 M BLM.

³² Mt 104 BCDL, Mk 318 MBCDL.

³³ Mk 318 AGH.

³⁴ Lk 618, Ac 113.

In Mt 10² a disciple is named Θαδδαῖος according to NB, but C²EFGHKL^M have Δεββαῖος ὁ ἐπικληθεὶς Θαδδαῖος. Mk 3¹⁸ has Θαδδαῖον, D reading Δεββαῖον. Lk 6¹⁶, Ac 1¹³ have Ἰουδαν Ἰακωβου. There seems, from a collocation of these passages, to be only one person meant, but, the meaning of the two names being at present quite doubtful, the reason of the triple name is impossible to determine. He may be the 'Judas not Iscariot' of Jn 14²².¹

3. The surnames of our Lord.—These are of special interest and of special difficulty. (a) Those derived from some word like Nazar.—(1) One theory connects this word with the place-name variously spelt Ναζαρά, Ναζαράτ, Ναζαράθ, Ναζαρετ, Ναζαρέθ. Mt 4¹³ and Lk 4¹⁶, where Ναζαρά has the support of NB, are not in Mk., and therefore are most probably taken from Q. If that be so, Ναζαρά was most probably the spelling of Q. The note of universality in our Lord's teaching and His freedom from the restrictions of Jewish legalism have naturally raised questions as to His nationality and descent. Renan, in pointing out that the Galilæans were a mixed race, declares it impossible 'to ascertain what blood flowed in his veins,'² while Gwatkin cautiously says, 'The Gospel sprang up on Jewish soil, its Founder was a Jew, though only a Jew of Galilee.'³ It has been suggested that Nazareth, or, better, some name which underlies that corrupt form, is an old synonym of Γαλιλ, i.e. Galilee, but that supposition is contradicted by the fact that it is clearly stated that Nazareth was a town in Galilee, situated on a hill.⁴ The effort to find a more probable solution has led to a discussion of the connexion of Jesus with Nazareth, along two lines. One set of scholars, anxious to prove Jesus an Aryan, insist that He was born in Nazareth.⁵ That He was not a Jew was argued by Emile Burnouf.⁶ Ihering says, 'From the very commencement there is a touch of the Aryan in him. Some have tried to account for this link between him and the Aryans by accepting his descent from an Aryan father.'⁷ Cheyne quotes with approval the words of Percy Gardner, 'According to all historical probability, Jesus of Nazareth was born at Nazareth.'⁸ Very strong support has been given to this in various papers by Paul Haupt.⁹ Evidence in its favour is found in the fact that on one occasion, we are told, Jesus went and preached εἰς τὴν πατρίδα αὐτοῦ.¹⁰ This is rendered in AV and RV, English and American, 'into his own country'; in the 20th Century NT ('London, 1904), 'his own part of the country'; in R. F. Weymouth's translation (The NT in Modern Speech, London, 1903), 'His own country,' with this added note, 'literally, "fatherland"'; while J. Moffatt in his Historical NT (Edinburgh, 1901) translates accurately 'his own native place,' and in his translation of the NT 'his native place.' The words of Mk. are very significant, as in the Second Gospel no account is given of our Lord's birth, and no mention is made of Bethlehem; and this significance is intensified if the passage was taken by the writer of the First Gospel from Mark. If Jesus was born in Nazareth, His surname with ἀπό gains significance and force, as Ἰησοῦς ὁ ἀπὸ

Ναζαρέθ.¹ But this connexion of Jesus and Nazareth must not be held as settled, for another group of scholars take quite a different view and carry on the discussion along another line. (See W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, London, 1898.)

One set are doubtful if any such place as Nazareth existed. They point out that no town bearing that name is mentioned in the OT or Josephus, and that, although the Talmud mentions sixty-three towns in Galilee, it mentions none bearing that name till as late as A.D. 900.² If there be left 'out of consideration the narrative of the address at the opening of the Ministry in the Synagogue at "Nazara," a narrative peculiar to S. Luke, and apparently composed by him out of Mk 6¹⁻⁵ together with some very probably genuine sayings of our Lord which he took from another source, there is nothing whatever in the New Testament to individualize Nazareth at all beyond the mere letters of its name. . . . The fact is, that the identification of the Gospel Ναζαρέτ or Ναζαρά with a place spelt נָזָרֶת . . . is a piece of early Christian archaeology, rather than of primitive tradition.'³ Burkitt further points out in regard to the woe pronounced on Chorazin, Bethsaida, Tyre and Sidon, and Capharnahum, that, while Bethsaida and Capharnahum were the centres of our Lord's ministry, no mention is made of any work in Khorazin, while in Nazara Jesus had actually been rejected; and 'with some misgivings' he ventures 'to suggest' that the name "Nazareth" . . . may have arisen from a literary error, and that 'we ought to consider the possibility that the city of Joseph and Mary, the πατρίς of Jesus, was Chorazin.'

W. B. Smith, founding on the fact that the Tell el-Amarna tablets and the Annals of Tiglath-Pileser III. mention a town, Hinatuni, which means 'defence,' 'protection,' argues that to this ancient town a new name Nazareth, also meaning 'defence,' was given; and, as Nazareth did not, as we shall see, yield the requisite adjective, it was written Nazara.⁴ Cheyne (who identifies Hinatuni with Hannathon) denies that either name means 'defence,' and Conder identifies Hannathon with Keft Anân in Upper Galilee.⁵ But from a place Ναζαρέθ or Ναζαρά the adjectival surnames of Jesus—Ναζαρηνός and Ναζωπαῖος⁶—cannot be derived. Burkitt says,⁷ 'it is not easy to understand the form Ναζωπαῖος in any case, but the difficulty is greater if we have to make it an adjective denoting an inhabitant of Nazara or Nazareth.' The name of the place in the Syriac Texts is written נָזָרֶת, vocalized Nāsrath in the Peshitta, the adjectives Ναζαρηνός and Ναζωπαῖος being rendered by נָזָרֶת. Here it is to be noted that ζ stands for s, but in hardly any other instance is this the case; the equivalent of ζ is not s but i.⁸ If, then, the town was נָזָרֶת, the Greek should be Ναρερετ or Ναραρά.

(2) This fact has given rise to two theories.

(i.) The theory which connects the word with נָזַר (from נָזַר, 'to separate,' 'consecrate,' 'purify'), meaning 'the consecrated one.' The Nazirites

¹ HDB iv. 741.

² Quoted by David Smith in Religion and the Modern Mind, London, 1906, p. 171.

³ H. M. Gwatkin, The Knowledge of God, Edinburgh, 1908, ii. 55.

⁴ Mt 23, Mk 4²⁹; cf. Jn 14⁴⁶; HJ ix. 892; Burkitt, p. 17.

⁵ ExpT xxii. [1910-11] 4, xx. [1908-09] 531. This was the view of Joseph Priestley; see H. McLachlan, The NT in the Light of Modern Knowledge, London, 1914, p. 229.

⁶ Transactions of the Third International Congress for the History of Religions, Oxford, 1903, i. 304.

⁷ Rudolph von Ihering, The Evolution of the Aryan, London, 1897, p. 241.

⁸ EBi ii. 1631.

⁹ ExpT xx. 531, xxii. 4; Transactions, p. 303.

¹⁰ Mt 13⁵⁴, Mk 6¹.

¹ Mt 21¹¹ (cf. Jn 14⁴⁶), Ac 10³⁸; D omits ὁ, κBCDEHK read Ναζαρέθ, FGLM Ναζαρέτ, Δ Ναζαράθ.

² HJ ix. 867; EBi iii. 3360; ExpT xxii. 4.

³ Burkitt, p. 17.

⁴ Pp. 17-18; HJ ix. 892; Lk 10¹³⁻¹⁵, Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴.

⁵ HJ ix. 541, 865. ⁶ Ib., p. 892; HDB ii. 299.

⁷ Ναζαρηνός in Mk 13⁴ 10⁴⁷ (NAC read Ναζωπαῖος) 14⁶⁷ 16⁶ (Lk read Ναζωπαῖον), Lk 43⁴ 15⁵⁷ (with D) 24¹⁹ (ADIP read Ναζωπαῖον), Jn 15³ (with D); Ναζωπαῖος in Mt 23²⁶ 27¹, Lk 13³⁷ (D reads Ναζαρηνός), Jn 15² (D reads Ναζαρηνόν) 15⁷ 19¹⁹, Ac 22³⁶ 41⁶ 64⁴ 22⁵ 26⁹; cf. 95 (with ACE) 24³.

⁸ Burkitt, pp. 13, 21, 24.

⁹ Nestle says 'all examples for the transition of s into ζ=τ . . . are not to the mark' (ExpT xix. [1907-08] 524); E. A. Abbott (The Fourfold Gospel: the Beginning, Cambridge, 1914, p. 324) differs.

were a Jewish sect.¹ John the Baptist was a Nazirite; Jesus was not a full Nazirite.² Burkitt throws out the suggestion³ that "Nazorean" was a nickname, meaning possibly "this odd sort of Nazirite"—one who calls for repentance, and yet eats and drinks like other folk. . . . The true origin of nicknames is easily lost, and it may have been supposed that the name referred to some place in Galilee.⁴ Abbott, while unable to support Burkitt's idea that ν is made to represent the Semitic ν , heartily agrees with his dictum that 'the ordinary view of Nazareth' is 'wholly unproved and unsatisfactory.'⁴ He favours another solution—

(ii.) The theory which connects the word with a root, $\nu\alpha$, meaning 'flowering,' 'growing.' Mt 23 says that Joseph came and dwelt in a town called Nazareth that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet 'he shall be called Nazwari.' But Nazwari cannot be derived from Nazareth. Before the age of Jesus there was a belief that the Messiah would be $\nu\alpha$ or Rod of Jesse of Is 11¹. The Targum paraphrases $\nu\alpha$, 'branch,' as Messiah, so that 'it need not surprise us if among the Messianic names in the first century the Branch of the Tree of Jesse became familiar and popular so that the Messiah might be hailed as Netzer.'⁵ Hence when Jesus became famous as a healer the people began to play on the words Nazarene and Nazorean, and His disciples, who felt His residence from childhood in Nazareth had been ordained to fulfil a Messianic prophecy that He should be called a Nazorean, connected some form of Nazareth or Nazara with a form of Netzer, a word used in prophecy to indicate the Messiah. Thus Jesus the Nazarene, i.e. the man of Nazareth, became known as Jesus the Nazorean, i.e. the Netzer, the Lifegiver and Healer.⁶ Abbott supports this by several lines of evidence. Taking such passages as Mk 12⁴=Lk 4⁴, where the demoniac addresses our Lord as Ἰησοῦ Ναζαρηνέ, he contends that Nazorean in a Messianic sense is much more appropriate than Nazarene, a name referring to an obscure place Nazareth, and that this was used by the demoniac, but wrongly rendered by Mark.⁷ Mk 14⁶⁷ reads σὺ μετὰ τοῦ Ναζαρηνοῦ ἦσθα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ.⁸ Mt 26⁷¹ reads Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Ναζωραίου.⁹ Abbott argues: 'if "Nazorean," meaning Netzer, was regularly used about Jesus by His Galilean followers in Jerusalem, it would naturally be repeated by the Roman soldiers, and afterwards by Gentiles in general, as a mere place-name—"Nazorean" being regarded by Mark and other Greek writers as an inaccurate form of "Nazarene."¹⁰ Again, the Talmud calls Jesus or His followers Nōtzeri. This does not resemble Nazara. But it closely resembles a form of 'branch' (Notzer) extant in the text of Ben Sira—'the branch of violence shall not be unpunished.' And it is easy to believe that the Jews parodied a form of Netzer, to distinguish the Branch of the Christians from that true Netzer of Jesse which God might call 'the branch of my planting.' Thus the Talmud, as far as it goes, favours Netzer, not Nazara.¹¹ Again, while Jesse in Jewish mystical thought is typical of old age, the shoot growing up from the root of Jesse indicates life and vigour, and would suggest thoughts of strengthening, healing, vivification, resurrection; and it is most significant that the first proclamation of the gospel concerns Ἰησοῦν τὸν Ναζωραῖον, the first miracle is done ἐν τῷ ὄνοματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Ναζωραίου, and the title which our Lord used when He spoke to St. Paul on the Damascus road was Ἰησοῦς ὁ Ναζωραῖος.¹ 'Most readers—if they approach these stirring announcements with a desire to realize them as if hearing them for the first time—will feel (I think) that there would be something flat in the mention of "the Nazorean" if it only meant "born at Nazara,"—a name suggesting "Where is it?"—but that it would sound an inspiring and stirring note if it also alluded to "the ever-living Prince of Life, the Netzer, the Branch of the Lord's Planting."² Finally, Abbott argues that, when Nazara, Netzer, Nazir were transliterated into Greek in Mark's Gospel, they were inevitably confused. Eusebius did confuse them, Jerome actually indicates that 'Nazirite' was an early interpretation of Matthew's 'Nazorean,' while Tertullian takes Ναζαρηνέ as applied to Jesus in Lk 4⁴ to mean Nazirite and then applies that term, in this sense, to the Christians.³ In this connexion the words of the demoniac (Mk 12⁴, ὁ ἄγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ) are significant. The Holy One of God (Jg 13⁷ 16¹⁷) is rendered ἄγιος Θεοῦ. The words of the demoniac may 'indicate a tradition that called Jesus Nazir instead of Netzer and that took Nazir to mean "holy one of God,"' and in recording the words 'Mark might naturally add—in accordance with his frequent habit of combining two interpretations—"thou Nazirite of God" in the sense of "thou holy one of God."⁴

A consideration of the evidence for and against these two theories shows at least the need of a thorough philological and historical investigation of the terms and their use before an answer can be given to the question which Nestle propounded, 'Did not the whole tradition of Jesus living at Nazareth, and being called after that town, arise from a misunderstanding of this designation "Nazarene"?'⁵

(b) Χριστός.—Another surname of our Lord is that of Χριστός. Throughout His earthly life our Lord bore the simple name Ἰησοῦς. But in His time there was a general feeling of the approach of the Messiah: a Hebrew official title meaning one anointed for a special office, the Greek equivalent of which was Χριστός. Whether any person was Χριστός was a question the answer to which depended on evidence. It was disputed whether or not John the Baptist was Χριστός.⁶ Whether or not Jesus was Χριστός was also disputed. His disciples came to believe that He was;⁷ His enemies ridiculed the idea.⁸ But by the time the Gospels were written His followers had come to call Him Ἰησοῦς Χριστός,⁹ and to describe Him as Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός.¹⁰ In this way Χριστός became a surname, and finally passed into a distinct personal name.¹¹

Other two names applied to our Lord may be either surname or title—

(c) υἱὸς ὑψίστου.—The primitive Semitic conception of God was embodied in בן , and the different aspects of בן were expressed by additions, one of which was בן אלהים .¹² The assertion¹³ that 'there must have been a Western Semitic deity who was known by this name' lacks proof, but the incident in Gn 14 indicates the worship of a god bearing that title, to which further support is given by a

¹ HDB iii. 497 ff.; Nu 6¹²; Jos. EJ ii. xv. 1; W. R. Smith, RSZ, London, 1894, pp 332, 482; H. Schultz, OT Theology, Edinburgh, 1892, i. 161, 401; Abbott, p. 311.

² Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 7³⁴, a passage not in Mk.

³ P. 18.

⁴ Burkitt, p. 18; Abbott, p. 324.

⁵ Abbott, pp. 309, 315.

⁶ P. 310.

⁷ Mt 26⁶⁸ reads Ἰησοῦ τοῦ Γαλιλαίου.

⁸ Mk 14⁶⁹ reads οὗτος ἐξ αὐτῶν ἐστίν.

⁹ Abbott, p. 314.

¹⁰ Ib., p. 318.

¹ Abbott, pp. 315, 320; Ac 22³⁸ 410 22⁹.

² Ib., p. 311.

³ Ib., p. 313.

⁴ E. xp. T. xix. 524.

⁵ Lk 31¹⁶.

⁶ Mt 16¹⁶.

⁷ Mt 27¹⁷, Jn 9²².

⁸ Mt 11¹⁸, Mk 11, Jn 17¹⁷; in Mt 23¹⁰ the reference is impersonal.

⁹ Mt 12¹⁸; in Mk 13⁴ the reading of BCGLM is clearly an addition, and in Mt 23⁸ ὁ Χριστός is a gloss.

¹⁰ As in Mk 9⁴¹.

¹¹ ERE i. 664; HDB ii. 198; Schultz, OT Theology, ii. 123.

¹² F. Hommel, Ancient Hebrew Tradition as illustrated by the Monuments, Eng. tr., London, 1897, p. 157.

statement of Philo of Byblus.¹ The title would seem to have been assimilated by $\alpha\iota\tau$, and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews practically identifies this deity with $\alpha\iota\tau$. "God the Highest" was a widespread pagan expression.² In the NT God is named $\tau\psi\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$,³ John the Baptist was designated $\pi\rho\omicron\sigma\eta\gamma\eta\varsigma$ $\nu\psi\lambda\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$,⁴ the beneficent and helpful are called $\nu\iota\omicron\lambda$ $\nu\psi\lambda\sigma\tau\omicron\iota$,⁵ Stephen in his speech before the Sanhedrin emphasized the omnipresence of $\alpha\iota\tau$, His superiority to Jewish conceptions of Him, and His exaltation over the gods of paganism by naming Him δ $\theta\psi\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$.⁷ The slave girl of Philippi describes St. Paul and Silas as servants $\tau\omicron\upsilon$ $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ $\tau\omicron\upsilon$ $\nu\psi\lambda\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$.⁸ In the Annunciation the angel, while instructing Mary to name her child $\text{I}\eta\sigma\omega\varsigma$, announces that He will be called $\nu\iota\delta\varsigma$ $\nu\psi\lambda\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$.⁹ He is, however, never so called, the only approach to it being the words of the Gergesene demoniac, who salutes Him as $\text{I}\eta\sigma\omega\upsilon$ $\nu\iota\epsilon$ $\tau\omicron\upsilon$ $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$.¹⁰

(d) $\text{E}\mu\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\nu\eta\lambda$.—This name is mentioned in a passage in the First Gospel¹¹ where the writer quotes a prediction from Is 7¹⁴, and applies the words 'his name will be called $\text{E}\mu\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\nu\eta\lambda$,' as indicating that the name and what was said of the child there was true and would be fulfilled in Mary's son; but so far as the Gospels go this name was never given to Jesus.

4. Roman surnames.—The conquest of Palestine by the Romans and the dispersion of the Jews throughout the Empire caused a considerable number of them to adopt Gentile names. Thus a certain Jesus adopted the surname Justus.¹² If Levi¹³ be Matthew, then it would seem that the tax collector dropped his name of Levi and assumed that of Matthew on his becoming an apostle. A companion of St. Paul named John seems to have assumed the Roman name Marcus.¹⁴ At Corinth St. Paul lodged with one Titus or Titius Justus, about whose name there is very much variation in the MSS.¹⁵ The most distinguished personage who adopted a Roman name was the Apostle to the Gentiles. Deissmann has shown that the alteration in the name in Ac 13⁹ is due to the writer of the Acts, and that it had no reference to the proconsul but simply indicated that Saul, like many Jews and Egyptians of his time, had a double name chosen by him very probably because of resemblance in sound.¹⁶ LITERATURE.—This has been sufficiently indicated throughout the article.

P. A. GORDON CLARK.

SWEARING.—See OATH.

SWORD.—See ARMOUR.

SYCHEM.—See SHECHEM.

SYMEON.—See PETER.

SYMEON (SIMEON) called NIGER.—Symeon is mentioned second in the list of prophets and teachers at Antioch (Ac 13¹). His sobriquet of 'Niger' has led some to suppose that he was African by descent and, if so, may have been one of those men of Cyprus and Cyrene by whom the Gentile Church at Antioch was founded (11²⁰). The suggestion, however, is a doubtful one, resting on a doubtful foundation.

W. A. SPOONER.

¹ HDB iii. 450.

² He 14¹³.

³ Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 215.

⁴ Lk 1³.

⁵ Lk 1⁷⁶.

⁶ Lk 6³³.

⁷ Ac 7⁴³.

⁸ Ac 16¹⁷.

⁹ Lk 1³².

¹⁰ Mk 5⁷, Lk 8²³.

¹¹ Mt 1²³.

¹² Col 4¹¹.

¹³ Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷, 29.

¹⁴ Ac 12¹², 25 13⁵, 13 15³⁷, 39, etc.; ExpT xxvi. 372.

¹⁵ Ac 15⁷; HDB ii. 829; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 256.

¹⁶ Ac 13⁹; Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 313, with the references therein to 1 and 2 Mac. and Jos.; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 61; HDB ii. 697.

SYNAGOGUE.—1. The name.—The name 'synagogue' ($\sigma\iota\nu\alpha\gamma\omega\gamma\eta$, Aram. ܫܢܝܓܘܓܐ , Heb. סִנְיָגוֹגָה , 'assembly,' like ἐκκλησία , LXX for either ἐκ or ἐκ , 'congregation') denotes primarily the religious community of Jews (Sir 24²³, Lk 12¹¹, Ac 9² 26¹¹; also used by the Judæo-Christians [Epiphanius, Hæc. xxx. 18; Harnack, ad Hermas Mand. xi. 9]) but became afterwards the regular term for the Jewish place of worship. Aram. ܫܢܝܓܘܓܐ (see E. Levy, Neuhebr. und chald. Wörterbuch über die Talmudim und Midraschim, Leipzig, 1876-89, s.v.) = Heb. סִנְיָגוֹגָה , 'the house of the congregation' (Mishna throughout); so Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 458; Jos. Ant. XIX. vi. 3, BJ II. xiv. 4-5, VII. iii. 3; Cod. Theodos. xvi. 8. Often προσευχή is used for oikos προσευχῆς , 'house of prayer' (LXX to Is 56⁷ and 60⁷; Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 523, 535, 563, 596, 600; Jos. Vita, 54; Ac 16¹³), for προσευκτηριον (Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 168), and for σαββατειον = 'Sabbath place' in an edict of Augustus (Jos. Ant. XVI. vi. 2). Through the Pauline writings ἐκκλησία (Fr. église) became the exclusive name for the Christian Church in the double sense of congregation and house of worship (Schürer, GVV ii. 3 [Leipzig, 1898] 433, 443; but cf. F. Spitta, Zur Geschichte und Litteratur des Urchristentums, ii. [Göttingen, 1896] 343).

2. Origin.—Like the beginnings of all great movements in history, the origin of the institution is wrapped in obscurity. The ancients ascribed it to Moses (Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 168; Jos. c. Apion. ii. 17; Ac 15²¹, Targ. Ex 18²⁰; cf. Targ. Jg 5⁷, 1 Ch 16²⁰, Is 1¹³, Am 5¹³). But the Mosaic system of sacrifices had no provision made for regular prayers; and so the identification of 'the house of the people' (Jer 39⁸ [see Rashi and Kimhi]) with the synagogue is without foundation. The synagogue is a new creation for which the Exile alone offered the conditions (see Wellhausen, Isr. und jüd. Gesch., pp. 149, 194). As the prescribed sacrifices could not be offered on foreign soil, which was regarded as 'unclean' (Am 7¹, Ezk 4¹³), another organized form of worship became an imperative necessity. In place of the priesthood, whose exclusive domain was the Temple with its sacrificial cult, a new class of men in the Exile voiced the needs of the people, accentuating the significance of prayer and song as the more spiritual elements of the Divine service, and at the same time appealed to the people, like the prophets of old, by words of warning and consolation, offering public instruction through the Word of God, whether spoken or read. Such a class of men were the anāvim, 'the meek ones,' hasidim, 'the godly ones,' or k-dōshim, 'the holy ones,' of the Psalms; they had devotional assemblies of their own (Ps 1⁵ 26¹² 89⁷ 107²² 111¹ 149¹). To them, in fact, the Psalm literature owes in the main its origin, and they coined the language of prayer (see I. Loeb, La Littérature des pauvres dans la Bible, Paris, 1892); hence the abundance of prayers in the post-Exilic literature (1 Ch 17¹⁶⁻²⁷ 29¹⁰⁻¹⁹, 2 Ch 6¹⁴⁻⁴² 14¹¹ 20⁶⁻¹² Ezr 9⁵⁻¹⁵ Neh 9⁵⁻³⁸ Dn 2²⁰⁻²³ 9⁴⁻¹⁹, also Is 36¹⁵⁻²⁰), not to mention the apocryphal books such as the Maccabees, Enoch, Judith, etc. Music and song likewise occupy a prominent place in the Chronicles and the Psalms, while they are ignored in the Priestly Code. The very fact that the Exilic seer speaks of 'an house of prayer for all peoples' (Is 56⁷; cf. LXX to Is 60⁷) indicates the existence of places for devotional assemblies of the people in the Exile. King Solomon's dedication prayer, which was composed in the Exile (1 K 8⁴⁶⁻⁵³), also shows that the exiled Jews prayed 'in the land of the enemy' with their faces turned towards Jerusalem, exactly as did Daniel (Dn 6¹⁰). Such devotional assemblies were held on the banks of rivers (Ps 137¹; cf. Ezk 1³, Dn 8²), the Sabbath, which assumed a higher meaning in the Exile (see Wellhausen, loc. cit.), as well as the feast and fast days offering the incentives to the same (Is 58¹⁵, Zec 7⁵; cf. 2 K 4²⁰). To such assemblies the writings of Deutero-Isaiah were in all likelihood addressed (cf. L. Herzfeld, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Leipzig, 1871, i. 132); and the composition of the prophetic books in their present shape, with the message of comfort at the end of each portion or book, if not also that of the Pentateuch (cf., for instance, Lv 27³⁴ as the conclusion of the Holiness Code), seems to have been made with such devotional assemblies in view. Whether the new religious spirit which emanated from Persia under Cyrus exerted a re-awakening influence on Judaism, as E. Meyer (Geschichte des Alterthums, Stuttgart, 1884-1901, iii. 122-200) asserts, or not, it is certain that Parsiism had a large share in the shaping of the synagogal liturgy, as pointed out by Graetz (Geschichte der Juden, ii. [1876] 409-418, note 14) and J. H. Schorr (He-Halutz, vii. [1865], viii. [1869]).

3. History.—The words of Ezk 11¹⁶ (see Targ. Meg. 29a), 'To Israel scattered among the nations I shall be a little sanctuary,' were actually verified through the synagogue, as Bachier (see art. 'Synagogue' in HDB) states. It is noteworthy that the synagogue at Shaf Yathib near Nahardea in Babylonia was in the 2nd cent. taken to be the work of King Jehoinchin, who was said to have had the stones and the earth brought from Jerusalem; and it was claimed to be the seat of the Shekinah like the Temple of yore, the statue erected there (against the Jewish Law) being probably a Persian symbol of the Divine Presence (Meg. 29a; Rosh hash. 24b; Kohler, MGWJ xxxviii. [1893] 442). The claim of being the seat of the Shekinah was also raised for another old synagogue at Huzāl (Meg. 29a). Another one was ascribed to Daniel (Erub. 21a).

The earliest testimony for the existence of the synagogue in Palestine is found in Ps 74⁸: 'They have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land' (so Symmachus and Aquila for כְּסִידֵי יְהוָה). Most commentators refer the psalm to the Maccabean time, though it seems strange that the destruction of the synagogues should not have been mentioned in the Maccabean books. H. L. Strack (PRE³ xix. 224) refers the psalm to the war of Artaxerxes Ochus (359-333 B.C.). Wellhausen (loc. cit.) thinks that the synagogue took the place of the ancient bāmōth ('high places')—a view which seems to be confirmed by Targ. on 1 Ch 16³⁹ and 1 Mac 3⁴⁶; cf. Kimhi on Jg 20¹. Possibly the rule to have the synagogue in the heights of the city (Tos. Meg. iv. 23; cf. Tanh. Behukkothai, ed. S. Buber, Wilna, 1885, p. 4; Shabb. 11a; Epiphani. Hær. lxxx. 1) has some connexion with this ancient practice. On the other hand, the site of the synagogue was, on account of the necessary ablutions, preferably chosen near some flowing water or at the seaside, as is shown by the Halicarnassus decree (Jos. Ant. xiv. x. 23: 'They may make their prosecutions at the seaside, following the customs of their fathers'; cf. Ac 16¹³). Hence also the interpretation of 'the well in the field' (Gn 29²), that is the synagogue (Ber. R. lxx. 8). Owing to this, the synagogue was frequently outside the city (Kid. 73b, Shab. 24b, Rashi; Tanh. Haye Sarah, ed. Buber, p. 7; Tur. O. H. 236; cf. Mekilta Bō, 1; Shmōth R. on Ex 9²⁹; Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 298). There being no special provision made for a synagogue within the Temple, the Hall of the Hewn Stones was used for the daily prayer (Tamid iv.-v.), but Rabbi Joshua of the 1st cent. (Tōs Suk. iv. 5) speaks of a synagogue and a school-house on the Temple hill near by. The term סִנְגָּוָה (=481, being the numerical value of the letters) in Is 1²¹ causes the Haggadist to speak of 480 synagogues which Jerusalem had besides the Temple (Jer. Meg. 73d, Keth B. 35c, 'Ekaḥ R. Intro. 12; Babl. Keth. has erroneously 394). It is certain that the number was quite large, as may be seen from Ac 6⁹ (cf. 2⁵⁻¹¹), according to which each settlement of foreign Jews had a synagogue of its own—Alexandrians (cf. Tos. Meg. iii. 6, iv. 13), Cyrenians, Cilicians, and Asiatics. Epiphanius (de Mensuris, 14) speaks of seven on Zion. Josephus (Vita, 54) mentions the Great Synagogue at Tiberias, where during the Roman war political meetings took place (see also Erub. x. 10). In the 5th cent. Tiberias had thirteen synagogues (Ber. R. 8a), one in the village of Tiberias (Pesik. R. 196b). The synagogue at Caesarea, where the revolt against Rome was started (BJ ii. xiv. 4-5), continued its existence under the name of the synagogue of the revolution to the 4th cent. (Jer. Bik. iii. 65d), and was probably the one in which Rabbi Abbahu had his frequent disputes with the Church Fathers (H. Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, iv.³ [1893] 288). The Gospels mention the synagogues of Capernaum (Mk 1²¹ and ||) and Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁶ and ||) wherein Jesus taught. The former was built for the Jews by the Roman centurion, a proselyte (Lk 7⁵⁻⁶). About the interesting ruins discovered in recent times of many synagogues in Galilee from the 1st and 2nd centuries, possibly even that of Capernaum, see Schürer, GJV ii.⁴ [1901] 517, note 59. At Sepphoris, the seat of the academy of Rabbi Judah, the prince, of the 2nd cent., one synagogue was called 'the great Synagogue' (Pesik. 136b); another one, probably after an engraved symbol, 'the Synagogue of the Vine' (Jer. Nāzir, vii. 56a). The wealth spent on the synagogue at Lydda gave the Rabbis cause for complaint (Jer. Shekalim, v. 49b). As Philo (ed. Mangey, ii. 168) says, each city inhabited by Jews had its synagogue 'for instruction in virtue and piety' (cf. Tōs. B.M. xi. 23 and Sanh. 17b).

The oldest synagogue on record is that built in Alexandria under Ptolemy III. (247-221 B.C.) and dedicated to him and his sister Berenice according to the inscription discovered in 1902 (Schürer, GJV ii.⁴ 497, iii.⁴ [1909] 41). The large Jewish population had many synagogues in the different quarters of the city (Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 568), the largest and most famous of which was the one built in the shape of a basilica and described in glowing colours (Tōs. Suk. iv. 6, Jer. Suk. v. 55a, Babl. Suk. 51a); it was totally destroyed under Trajan (Graetz, Gesch. der Juden, iv.³ 117). The legendary narrative 3 Mac 7¹⁷⁻²⁰ tells of the founding of a synagogue at Ptolemais in Southern Egypt under Ptolemy IV. In Syria the most famous was the Great Synagogue at Antioch, to which the brazen vessels carried off from the Temple at Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes were presented by his successors (BJ vii. iii. 3). Damascus also had a number of synagogues; in these Paul the Apostle preached (Ac 9²⁻²⁰). Throughout Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece and its islands, in cities such as Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, Athens, and Corinth, the synagogues, being the gathering-places for Jews and 'God-fearing' half-proselytes (Ac 13¹⁶. 26. 43 17¹⁷), offered a sphere of activity to St. Paul and his fellow-workers (Ac 13³. 14 14¹⁶. 17¹. 10. 17 18⁴. 7). In Rome there were quite a number of synagogues at the time of Augustus (Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 569), and the inscriptions discovered in recent times mention nine different ones named either after persons, such as Augustus, Agrippa, and Volumnus, or after places, such as Campus (Martius) and the Subura, or after the language of the members, Hebraic or the vernacular, one after the trade 'lime burners,' and another after an engraved symbol 'the Synagogue of the Olive Tree.' A synagogue of Severus is mentioned in Ber. R. ix. 5 quoted by Kimhi on Gn 1³ (Schürer, GJV iii. 4 83g). On disputes held there by Palestinian masters with Romans and Christians under Domitian see H. Vogelstein and P. Rieger, Geschichte der Juden in Rom, i. [Berlin, 1896] 29.

4. Form and furniture of the synagogue.—Like the Alexandrian Great Synagogue and the Hall of Hewn Stones in the Temple (Yomā, 25a), the synagogue at Tiberias had the form of a basilica with a double row of pillars (Midr. Tehillim on Ps 93 [end]). As to the style of the synagogue, as shown by the ruins in Galilee see Schürer, GJV ii. 4 446; their orientation, however, does not conform to the rule that they should be directed towards the East, corresponding with the tabernacle (Nu 3³⁸). However, the same was also the rule for the Church (Apost. Const. ii. 57. 3. 14; cf. Tylor, PC³, London, 1891, ii. 426 ff.).

The chief furniture was the אָרָה, 'ark' (Meg. iii. 1, Ta'an. ii. 1), in which the scrolls were kept covered with cloth or put in a case, over which was spread a baldachin (kilah) or curtain (parókeith, Ex 26³¹; Jer. Meg. 73d, 73b). It was placed near the upper end of the synagogue, and in front of it stood the 'delegate of the congregation,' who offered the prayer (Ber. v. 3, 4 and elsewhere). In the centre was the bēmāh (= βήμα, 'platform') made of wood (Sōtā, vii. 8; Suk. 51b; cf. Neh 8⁴ AV, 'the pulpit of wood'), called in more modern times almemar, the Muhammadan al-minbar (JE, s.v. 'Almemar'); upon it stood or sat in a chair called 'the seat of Moses' (Mt 23-; cf. art. 'China' in JE iv. 37^a) those who read from the scroll of the Law or other sacred books, which were placed upon the lectern, called after the Greek ἀναλογιστήρ (see Levy, Wörterbuch, s.v. אָנאָלוגיסט), or the tablets. There were also chairs set for the elders and the scribes (Tos. Suk. iv. 6, Mt 23⁶ and h). For the candelabra (menorāh) see Tos. Meg. iii. 3, Jer. Meg. 74a.

5. Organization of the synagogue.—The members of a religious community having a synagogue for its centre—and there were, as shown above, often many in the larger cities—were called bene hak-kneseth, 'sons of the synagogue' (Meg. ii. 5, iii. 1). The number required for the formation of a synagogue community was ten (Bekōr. v. 5, Zābim, iii. 2, Tōs. Meg. iv. 3, Sanh. i. 6). At the head was a ruler, rush hak-kneseth (Yomā, vii. 1, Sōtā, vii. 7) = ἀρχισυναγωγός (Mkō²², Lk 13¹⁴, Ac 13¹⁵; cf. Lk 8⁴¹), whose function was to maintain order in the synagogue and to decide who should conduct the service. The subaltern officer, who had to carry out the orders of the former, assisting him in keeping order, hand the sacred scroll to the reader and return it to its place (Sōtā, vii. 7, Lk 4²⁰), take charge of the palm branches of the Sukkot feast (Suk. iv. 4), and give the signal for the service (Tōs. Suk. iv. 6, Sifre Nu 39) and for the suspension from work on Sabbath and Holy-day Eve (Tos. Suk. iv. 12), was called hazzan hak-kneseth = ὑμνηστής (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 11). He also assisted in the instruction of the school children by showing the passage that was to be read (Shab. 13) and acted as lictor of the synagogue court in scourging offenders (Mak. iii. 12, Tōs. Mak. v. 12). In the course of time, however, he rose in rank while officiating in smaller congregations as leader in prayer and as instructor (Jer. Yeb. xii. 13a, Jer. Ber. ix. 12, Babli Meg. 23b, Mas. Siferim x. 8, xiv. 1; Pirke d' R.E. xii. [end]). For the various functions of the service itself no permanent official existed in the ancient time, and he who was to lead in prayer was selected by the congregation—mostly through its ruler—as the representative, or 'the delegate of the community,' she'itah zibbur, and upon being invited in the usual formula—at least in the Talmudic period—'Come and bring for us the offering,' he stepped in front of the ark to offer the prayer (Ber. v. 3-5, Jer. Ber. iv. 8b). In Mishnaic times it seems that the functions of reciting the Sh'mā (the proclamation of the Unity of God, Dt 6⁴⁻⁹, and its corollaries Dt 11¹³⁻²¹ and Nu 15³⁷⁻⁴¹), with its accompanying benedictions, of reading from the Prophets, and of offering the Priestly Blessing at the close of the service were all preferably assigned to one person (Meg. iv. 5); but this was by no means the case originally (see below). For the reading from the Pentateuch different members of the congregation were called up, on Sabbath seven, on the Day of Atonement six, on festival days five, on New Moon and semi-festivals four, and on the second and fifth weekdays and Sabbath afternoons three (Meg. iv. 1-2), and as a rule Aaronites first and Levites afterwards (Gittin, v. 5). The one who was to translate the text into the vernacular (Aramaic), called meturgemān (Meg. iv. 4), was, however, permanently engaged. The more learned men of the congregation, and especially learned guests, were as a rule invited to read the last portion and some portion from the Prophets, which they afterwards expounded in a sermon. This prophetic portion was called in Aramaic aphtarata (Heb. haphthārāh—word of dismissal; whence the name of the last reader, maphtir [see Levy, Wörterbuch, s.v. מַפְתִּיר], Tanh. Terümāh, 1; Lk 4^{16a}).

It was principally on Sabbath and festival days, when the people were at leisure, that the service was well attended, and accordingly the weekly lesson from the Torah was read in full (cf. Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 252, 630, 458); wherefore the synagogue was called the 'Sabbath place' par excellence (Jos. Ant. xvi. vi. 2; cf. Bacher's quotation from Payne Smith, art. 'Synagogue,' in HDB iv. 636^b). On Monday and Thursday the villagers coming to the cities for the court or the market attended the synagogue in sufficient numbers to have a portion of the Torah read (Tōs. Ta'an. ii. 4). On week days only larger cities had the required 'ten men of leisure' (batlanim || Meg. i. 3, Sanh. 17b; see JE, art. 'Batlanim') for the daily service; later it became a fixed custom to engage 'ten men of leisure' for the holding of the daily service where the attendance was too small.

6. The service: its elements and its development.—The Divine service assumed at the very outset a two-fold character: it was to offer common devotion and public instruction. But the devotional part, again, consisted at the very beginning, as far as we can trace it, of two elements: (a) the confession of faith, (b) the real prayer (tefillāh).

(a) The confession of faith, termed in the Mishna 'the acceptance of the yoke of sovereignty of God,' Kabbālath 'öl Malkūt Shāmayim (Ber. ii. 2), by the recital of the Sh'mā (Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ 11¹³⁻²¹, Nu 15³⁷⁻⁴¹), was preceded by two benedictions, one containing the praise of the Lord as the Giver of light in view of the rising sun each morning, and of the Withdrawer of the light of day each evening, and another containing the praise of the Lord as Giver of the Law to Israel, His chosen people, and followed by one benediction beginning with a solemn attestation of the monotheistic truth proclaimed in the Sh'mā, and ending with the praise of God as the Redeemer of Israel with reference to the deliverance from Egypt mentioned in the closing verse of the Sh'mā chapters (Nu 15⁴¹). That this part is very old is shown, not merely by the discussion of the oldest Rabbinical schools concerning the details of observing the commandment found in Dt 6: 'When thou liest down, and when thou risest up,' but by Josephus' source (Ant. iv. viii. 13), which ascribes to Moses the recital of the Sh'mā and of the benediction for Israel's redemption. But what Philo tells of the Therapentes, that 'they prayed each morning and evening for the light of heaven' (ed. Mangey, ii. 475), and Josephus of the Essenes, that 'they offer prayers handed down from their fathers towards the rising sun as if supplicating for its rising,' that is to say, with hands outstretched towards the streaks of light coming forth (BJ II. viii. 5; cf. Enoch lxxxiii. 11, Wis 16³, Sib. Orac. iii. 591 f.), which corresponds with what the Talmud says (Ber. 9b, Jer. Ber. i. 3a) of the Vethikim, 'the enduring, conscientiously pious' (another name for the Essenes), that 'they recited the Shema at the time of the radiance of the morning sun,' points almost with certainty to Zoroastrian influence (see, besides Graetz, Schorr, and Kohler, also T. K. Cheyne, The Origin and Religious Contents of the Psalter [BL], London, 1891, pp. 283, 448), and thus indicates a time when these prayers were offered under the open sky.

(b) The real prayer (tefillah) consisted of either eighteen benedictions or seven benedictions on Sabbath and festival days. In both cases the three opening and three concluding benedictions were the same. On week days, however, twelve specific prayers are offered between these, six concerning human life in general and five concerning the national life of the Jewish people, the twelfth containing the supplication that all the prayers offered either collectively or individually be heard, whereas on Sabbaths and festivals only one specific prayer with reference to the day is offered.

The three opening benedictions are: (1) Birkath Abôth, 'the praise of the God of the fathers,' dwelling on the merits of the patriarchs and closing with the words 'Shield of Abraham'; (2) Geburôth, 'the praise of the Divine Omnipotence,' as manifested in cosmic life and in the future resurrection: it closes, 'Blessed be Thou who revivest the dead'; (3) Kedushâh, 'the sanctification of the Lord by the heavenly hosts': it closes with, 'Blessed be Thou, the holy God.' The three concluding benedictions are: (1) 'Abôlah, prayer for the favourable acceptance of the Divine service in the Temple, which, since the destruction of the Temple, has been changed into a prayer for the restoration of the sacrificial cult: it now closes, 'Blessed be Thou who restorest Thy Shekinah to Zion'; (2) Hôdaâh, thanksgiving for all the bounties of life and the wondrous doings of Providence; (3) Birkath Kôhanim, the benediction connected with the Priestly Blessing (Nu 6²⁴⁻²⁷), which formed the conclusion of the service.

The twelve week-day benedictions are: (1) prayer for knowledge and wisdom; (2) for spiritual regeneration; (3) for Divine forgiveness; (4) for the redemption of those in bondage; (5) for the healing of the sick; (6) for the produce of the year; (7) for the gathering of the dispersed of Israel; (8) for the restoration of a reign of righteousness; (9) originally for the destruction of the kingdom of arrogance (=the heathen powers): after the Bar Cochba war, however, it was changed into a curse of the heretics and (Christian) informers in the service of Rome; (10) prayer for the leading authorities, the Zaddikim, the Hasidim, the elders, the remnant of the Sôfrim, and the proselytes; (11) originally a prayer for the restoration of the Davidic dynasty in Jerusalem, afterwards divided into a prayer for Jerusalem's restoration as the city of God and another for the Branch of David—hence arose nineteen instead of eighteen week day prayers (cf. Tôs. Ber. ii. 25, Jer. Ber. ii. 4d-5d, iv. Sac. Rôsh hash. iv. 49c; Lekah Tob Waethhanan; Yalkut on 1 S 2; Ber. 28b f.); (12) prayer for the acceptance of all petitions (see Schürer, GJV ii. 4 540). As to the age of these prayers in their original form, the mention of the Sanhedrin, elders, and the remnant of the Sôfrim in the 10th (resp. 13th) prayer indicates the Maccabæan, if not the pre-Maccabæan, time (cf. also Sir 51¹² and Schürer, GJV ii. 4 542 n., 156). The three opening and three concluding benedictions have been preserved in a more elaborate and original form in the ancient Church liturgy that came down under the name of Clement (Apost. Const. vii. 33-35, 37-38, viii. 37), the opening and concluding formulas being almost identical (see art. 'Didascalia' in JE iv. 593 ff.). The Sabbath and Holy-day benediction (Apost. Const. vii. 36) has also the original Jewish character. All these prayers evidently originated in Hasidæan circles, and were only afterwards reduced in length to suit the people at large, as the synagogue became a common institution (see also L. Zunz, *Gottesdienstliche Vorträge der Juden*², Frankfurt a. M., 1892, pp. 379-383, and G. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, Leipzig, 1898, p. 299 ff.). As a matter of fact, the entire angelology of the first Shema benediction and of the third of the eighteen benedictions is, like those in the ancient Church liturgy, altogether Essene in character, intended only for the initiated into the 'higher wisdom,' and the popularization of these prayers was as much the work of the synagogue as was the propagation of religious knowledge among the people—a work begun by the Levites (Neh 8⁷ 9⁵, 2 Ch 19⁸ 31²² 35³; Test. Levi, viii. 7; Yôma, 26a; Tanh. Waera, 4; Num. R., i., iii., v.) and achieved in the course of centuries through the synagogue by the Pharisees (see R. T. Herford, Pharisaism, London, 1912, pp. 80-83).

The reading from the Law introduced by Ezra (Neh 8⁸) became soon afterwards a fixed custom for each Sabbath, and so the Pentateuch was completed at first in triennial (possibly originally septennial [cf. Dt 31¹⁰]) and later in annual cycles (Zunz, op. cit., p. 3 f.), it having been divided at first into 154 and afterwards into 54 sections accordingly. The seven men called up for public reading seem to have been originally identical with the seven leading men of each community (Meg. 26a; Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 14, BJ II. xx. 5), probably the Heber'Îr (Tôs. Bik. iii. 12, Ber. iv. 7, and elsewhere), but were afterwards chosen from among all the members of the synagogue. The reading from the Prophets which followed that from the Pentateuch (Ac 13¹⁵) is probably of an older origin than the latter; its selection was left to the preacher of the day (Lk 4¹⁷), but afterwards the selection for each Sabbath and Holy-day was fixed so as to correspond with the character of the day or the Pentateuch section.

7. Women in the synagogue.—Women could not be members of the synagogue, though they seem to have performed synagogal functions of their own, and so prominent women were elected as mothers of the synagogue ('Mater Synagogæ' [Schürer, GJV iii. 4 88]). They attended the service (Ac 16¹³, Ab. Zara 38b, Sotâ 22a), but could take no part in the common service (Tôs. Meg. iv. 11, Bab. Meg. 23a). They were without doubt at all times (Tôs. Suk. iv. 11, Bib. Suk. 51b; cf. Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 482; Kid. 81a; Chrysos. Hom. 74 in Matt., quoted by Loew) separated from the men by some sort of wall or barrier (against Loew, Gesammelte Schriften, iv. 62 f., and Bacher, loc. cit.). See also Schürer, GJV ii. 4 521, 527, where the emporium found in the ruins of the ancient synagogue is correctly assigned by him to the women.

8. Schoolhouse.—The synagogue was at the outset the place for public instruction (Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 168: 'Their houses of worship are nothing but schools of wisdom and virtue'; and Jos. c. Apion. ii. 17-18), and at an early time elementary schools for the young were established therein, or near by (Jer. Keth. xiii. 35c; M. K.

iii. 31d; Bab. Kid. 30a; Ber. 17a; Meg. 28b; B.B. 21; Gitt. 58a).

9. Other uses of the synagogue.—To eat, drink, or sleep in the synagogue was regarded as profanation, but it was used for funeral addresses (Tôs. Meg. iii. 7; Bab. Meg. 28b), for public announcement, especially of charity donations (Lev. R. xxxii. 6; Schürer's quotation of Mt 6 refers to the Temple [see artt. 'Alms' in JE i. and 'Didascalia,' ib. iv. 591^d-592^a]). The ancient Hasidim or Essenes seem to have had their meals in, or near, the synagogue, and the poor were housed and fed in rooms adjoining it (Pes. 101a; Kohler, MGWJ xxxvii. 494). Punishment by scourging was inflicted in the synagogue (Mt 10¹⁷ 23^a, Ac 26¹¹).

10. The synagogue discipline.—The maintenance of the synagogue community required certain disciplinary measures to keep obnoxious or hostile elements out. The following were the different forms of exclusion or excommunication used against unsubmissive members.

(1) Herem, anathema—a term used since 2 Es 10⁸ (see artt. 'Anathema' and 'Ban' in JE) in the sense of absolute exclusion from the congregation (M.K. 16a; 1 Co 16-; where the Greek ἀνάθεμα is followed by the Aramaic formula Maran atha ['thou art accursed'] Gal 1⁹), for which also the term ἀποσυνάγωγος is used (Jn 9²² 12⁴² 16²; Apost. Const. II. xliii. 1, III. viii. 3, IV. viii. 3; the Syrian Didascalia is less exact).

(2) Niddūy, conditional or temporary exclusion—a term used chiefly in Mishna (Taan. iii. 8, M.K. iii. 1-2; Edūy. v. c.; Midd. 112; Jer. M.K. 81a; Bab. Ber. 19a; M.K. 16-17; B.K. 112b ff.; Ned. 7b, and elsewhere). It corresponds with ἀφορίζω (Lk 6²²; Apost. Const. II. xvi. 3, 4; xxi. 3, 7; xxviii. 2, 4; xl. 2; xlvii. 3; xlviii. 1; III. viii. 2; VI. xliii. and VII. ii. 8; also in the later ecclesiastical rules [VIII. xxviii. 3, 7, 8; xxxii. 5; xlvii. 5, 8 ff.]; probably also with ἐκβάλλειν ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, 3 Jn 10).

(3) Nezīphāh, severe public reprimand implying a seven days' seclusion in accord with Nu 12¹⁴ (cf. Sifrē, ad loc.; M.K. 16a; Shab. 115a), found as early as the 1st cent. B.C. in Apost. Const. II. xvi. 3-4; cf. art. 'Didascalia' in JE iv. 589^d, against Hamburger, art. 'Bann,' p. 150.

(4) Shammātā, handing over to desolation (from shammāh=sh'māmāh=παράδοῦναι τῷ Σατανᾷ, 1 Co 5²; cf. Jos. BJ II. viii. 8 and JE i. 561-562; M.K. 17a).

(5) Lūt, execration—a milder form of shammātā resorted to by the Talmudic leader in Babylonia (see art. לוט in Levy, Wörterbuch; M.K. 16d; cf. Jg 5², Dt 27¹⁵⁻²⁸).

(6) Corporal punishments such as the thirty-nine stripes for transgression of Mosaic commandments (Dt 25³, 2 Co 11²⁴) or beating for rebelliousness against the Rabbinical authorities—Makkath Mar-duth (Nazir iv. 3, 2 Co 11²², Ac 16²²). The entire disciplinary system, which in the course of time became rather less severe in the same measure as heresy and antagonism ceased within the synagogue (M.K. 16ab), was no longer clearly understood in Talmudic times; it receives better light, however, from the Essene Church rules preserved in the Apost. Const. II. xl. 2-43 and 47, as shown above. It is from the ancient Hasidean synagogue that the Christian Church adopted her own disciplinary system.

LITERATURE.—E. Schürer, GJV ii.⁴ (Leipzig, 1907) 497-541, where the entire literature is given; W. Bacher, art. 'Synagogue,' in HDB. Especially to be mentioned are L. Loew, Der synagogale Ritus (= Gesammelte Schriften, Szegedin, 1889-1900, iv. 1-71, v. 21-33); K. Kohler, 'Ueber die Ursprünge und Grundformen der synagogalen Liturgie,' in MGWJ xxxvii [1893] 441-451, 489-497; W. O. E. Oesterley and G. H. Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue, London, 1907; W. Bousset, *Religion des Judentums*², Berlin, 1906, pp. 83, 197 f., 197 ff.; J. Wellhausen, *Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte*⁶, do., 1907, pp. 193 f., 199 f.; I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, Leipzig, 1913.

K. KOHLER.

SYNTYCHE (Συντύχη).—Syntyche was a Christian lady of Philippi who seems to have held a prominent place in the Church, and who, at the date of the Apostle's letter to the Philippians, had a difference of opinion with another lady called Euodia (g.v.). St. Paul exhorts them 'to be of the same mind in the Lord' (Ph 4²). It is impossible to form any certain conclusions regarding the nature of the controversy between the two women, who may have been deaconesses, but who were more likely prominent female members of the Church, of the type of Lydia of Ac 16¹⁴⁻¹⁵. In fact, the conjecture has been put forward that one of them may have been Lydia herself, as 'Lydia' may not be a personal but a racial or geographical designation signifying 'the Lydian' or the native of the province of Lydia, where the city of Thyatira, to which she belonged, was situated. This cannot of course be verified. Nor can we say whether the difference between the two partook of the nature of a religious controversy or of a personal quarrel. Before this date both had rendered signal service to the cause of the gospel in Philippi, and the Apostle adduces this as a reason why they should be helped towards a reconciliation. St. Paul expects that they will get help in their differences from one whom he describes as 'Synzygus' (AV 'true yokefellow,' but probably a proper name; cf. art. SYNZYGUS), probably a prominent official of the church of Philippi. The names of both Euodia and Syntyche are found frequently, and there is no reason for supposing them to be allegorical names for Jewish and Gentile Christianity, as is done so arbitrarily by the Tübingen school.

W. F. BOYD.

SYNZYGUS (Συνζυγος, erroneously in TR συζυγος, from συνζεύγνυμι, 'fasten or yoke together'—'yokefellow,' 'comrade,' 'consort,' 'partner,' 'colleague').—In the Epistle to the Philippians (4³) the apostle Paul refers to a dispute that had arisen between two female members of the Church, Euodia and Syntyche, and entreates one whom he describes as Synzygus (AV 'true yokefellow') to assist the women to come to a reconciliation. Either the name is the proper name of a person or a description applied by the Apostle to one of his companions. If the name is a proper name, the bearer was a leader in the Christian Church at Philippi when the Epistle was written. The difficulty with regard to this—the natural explanation—is that Synzygus is a very unusual name and, in fact, does not seem to occur at all in extant literature, though C. von Weizsäcker (Apostolic Age, i.² [London, 1897] 282) suggests that the name may have been assumed at baptism as a proper name. Meyer, who regards it as the name of a person, points out that many names occur only once, and that the adjective γνήσιος, 'real,' 'true,' 'genuine,' emphasizes the fact that the character of the man was well expressed by his name (cf. the use of Onesimus in Philem 11). The meaning would thus be: 'I beseech thee, Synzygus, truly so named, a fellow-helper in very deed.' We may also compare Abigail's use of her husband's name 'Nabal,' to describe his character: 'Nabal [fool] is his name, and folly is with him' (1 S 25²⁵). It is to be assumed that Synzygus had done much for the progress of the gospel in Philippi, and the Apostle applies to himself and his friend the common biblical comparison of the pair of oxen ploughing or threshing together under the same yoke, as this was naturally suggested by his name (cf. 1 Co 9⁹, 1 Ti 5¹⁸).

The other view, that the word means 'yoke-fellow,' as in classical Greek, is far less probable and at once raises the question as to which of the Apostle's companions is to be understood by the term. Lightfoot (Philippians, p. 158) thinks it most probable that Epaphroditus, the bearer of the letter, is intended, as in this case there would be no danger of making the reference unintelligible by the suppression of the name. Others have suggested that Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, or Luke is to be thought of as the 'true yokefellow.' Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 358) says definitely: 'Luke is either the "true yokefellow" addressed in Phil. iv. 3, or was actually the bearer of the letter to Philippi.' If the name is not a proper name, the person addressed was one present with the Apostle when he wrote to Philippi—either Epaphroditus or some other.

The suggestion of some early commentators that the Apostle was addressing his wife is impossible, both historically, in the light of 1 Co 7⁸, and grammatically, as the adjective is masculine. It is also improbable that the husband of one or other of the women is referred to, while the suggestion of Renan (St. Paul, Paris, 1869, p. 148) that the allusion is to Lydia, who, he assumes, had become the wife of the Apostle, is hardly to be taken seriously.

LITERATURE.—H. A. W. Meyer, Kom. über die Briefe an die Philipper . . . 3, Göttingen, 1865; J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, London, 1878; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, do., 1895; J. C. M. Laurent, 'Über Synzygus,' in Zeitschrift für die luther. Theol. und Kirche, xxvi. [Leipzig, 1895] 1 ff., Neutestamentliche Studien, Gotha, 1896; H. A. Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians,' London, 1903, p. 465; J. Gibb, art. 'Synzygus,' in HDB; W. C. v. Manen, art. 'Synzygus,' in EBi; Grimm-Thayer, s.v.

W. F. BOYD.

SYRACUSE (Συράκουσαι, now Siracusa).—Syracuse was situated on the east coast of Sicily, about midway between the modern Catania and Cape Passaro, and was the wealthiest and most powerful of the Greek cities in the island. 'So great riches,' says Strabo (vi. ii. 4), 'have accrued to the Syracusans that their name is embodied in the proverb applied to those who have too great wealth, viz. that they have not yet attained to a tithe of the wealth of the Syracusans.' In the 4th cent. B.C. Syracuse defied Athens, when the latter was at the height of her power, and came off victorious. And Syracuse coveted a higher fame than that of warlike prowess. At the Court of her kings were to be found such men of letters as Pindar and Æschylus, while the splendid site which Nature had given her was adorned with some of the finest buildings in the world. There was that in Syracuse which led her admirers to exaggerate. Cicero (in Verr. II. iv. 52) calls her 'the greatest of Greek cities and the most beautiful of all cities.' But in the year of Cicero's death (43 B.C.) Syracuse, and indeed the whole of Sicily, suffered terribly at the hands of Sextus Pompeius; and, though Strabo (loc. cit.) praises Augustus for sending thither a colony and to a great extent restoring the city to its former importance, the geographer's other words scarcely bear out this flattering statement.

In the Greater or the Lesser Port of this city, under the citadel of Ortygia and close to the fountain of Arethusa, the Alexandrian corn-ship in which St. Paul was sailing from Melita to Puteoli had to tarry three days for a favourable wind. How the Apostle spent those days can only be conjectured. Conybeare and Howson not only suggest that Julius was probably courteous enough to let him go ashore, but have no difficulty in giving credit to the local tradition which makes St. Paul the first founder of the Sicilian Church (The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1877, ii. 429 f.). W. M. Ramsay, on the other hand, holds that, as the ship was simply waiting a suitable wind, no prisoner was likely to be allowed leave of absence (HDB iv. 645^b). Between these theories of a fruitful activity and an enforced idleness there may be room for a via media. If St. Paul was permitted to go into the city, with a charge to note the wind and return the moment it veered to the right direction, he would probably find that there were many Jews and proselytes in that great centre of commerce, though no ancient writer seems to allude to a Jewish colony. And that he would redeem the time is certain. But as to the actual introduction of Christianity into Sicily, whether then or at a later date, history is silent, though the extensive catacombs in the Achradina quarter tell their own tale.

LITERATURE.—W. Smith, DGRG, 1868, art. 'Syracusæ'; J. Führer and V. Schultze, Die altchristlichen Grabstätten Siziliens, 1907; C. Baedeker, *Southern Italy and Sicily*¹⁵, 1903, pp. 406-420. JAMES STRAHAN.

SYRIA (Συρία).—This term is employed in the LXX as the equivalent of the Heb. Arām. It is probably the same word as the Babylonian Suri, which was applied to a N. Euphratean district. 'Syria' was distinct from 'Assyria,' though Herodotus (vii. 63) confounds Ἀσσυρίοι and Σύριοι as barbarian and Greek forms of a single ethnic term. As defined by Strabo (xvi. ii. 1), who is followed by Pliny and Ptolemy, Syria was bounded on the W. by the Mediterranean, on the N. by the Tauric range of mountains, on the E. by the middle Euphrates and the Hamad or desert steppe, and on the S. by the Sinaitic peninsula. Its component parts (ib. xvi. ii. 2) were Commagene, Seleucis, Coelesyria, Phœnicia, and Judæa. The whole country was about 400 miles from N. to S., with a mean breadth of 150 miles. But there was a special, and a still prevalent, usage, wherein Syria was restricted to that part of the wider area which lies N. of Palestine, exclusive of Phœnicia. Under the Ottoman system Syria denotes no more than the district of Damascus, for the vilayets of Aleppo and Beyrout, as well as the sanjaks of Lebanon and Jerusalem, form separate areas.

The most prominent physical features of Syria are two parallel mountain ranges trending N. and S. The western range, springing from Taurus, includes Mt. Casius and Lebanon, and broadens out into the table-land of Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. The eastern system, which rises into Anti-Libanus and culminates in Hermon, may be traced in Jebel Hauran and the mountains of Moab as far as Horeb. Between Lebanon and the sea is the plain of Phœnicia, which has only a few torrent-streams. From the high lacustrine district of Coelesyria, between Lebanon and Anti-Libanus, the Orontes flows northward, the Litāny and Jordan southward. To the east of Hermon, the Abana (or Barada), after creating the oasis of Damascus, loses itself in desert marshes. The district of Commagene has two river-basins, which belong respectively to the Cilician and the Euphratean river-systems.

Most of the nationalities which have settled in Syria have been of the Semitic stock. Separated from one another by great mountain barriers, they have never formed a political unity, but during the centuries in which their freedom was undisturbed by the military powers on the Nile and Euphrates valleys they developed types of civilization and culture which, through the commerce of Phœnicia and the religion of Judæa, have powerfully influenced mankind. The Arabs who founded the Nabatean kingdom, with Petra as its centre, were largely affected by the manners and customs of their Aramaean neighbours.

The foundation of Greek cities in Syria after the time of Alexander the Great was of primary importance for the country. Antioch was built as the seat of the Seleucid dynasty, and became the third, if not the second, city in the world. The Græco-Syrian civilization extended far down both sides of Jordan, and, but for the crazy policy of Antiochus Epiphanes and the consequent Maccabæan revolt, might have absorbed Judæa itself. Syria was conquered for the Romans by Pompey in 63 B.C. The province of that name which he constituted did not embrace the whole country of Syria in the wider sense. It extended from the Gulf of Issus in the N. to a little beyond Damascus in the S. The rest of ancient Syria was to be found partly in the territories of numerous free cities, and partly in petty principalities subject to Rome, while Commagene had become an independent kingdom before the time of Pompey's conquest. Syria was geographically related to Cilicia, with which it easily communicated by the Pylæ Syriae (Beilan Pass), and Augustus formed the great triple province of Syria-Cilicia-Phœnice, which subsisted throughout the 1st cent. A.D. Syria and Cilicia formed a single mission-field for the Apostolic Church, and are therefore several times named together in the NT (Ac 15²³⁻⁴¹, Gal 1²¹). Hadrian constituted the three provinces of Syria, Syria-Phœnice, and Syria-Palestina. Antioch remained the capital of Syria till the time of Septimius Severus, who gave the honour to Laodicea (now Latakia), making it a colonia. After the Muhammadan conquest (A.D. 636) the old Semitic capital, Damascus, regained its ascendancy. Syria suffered greatly at the hands of the Mongols (A.D. 1260), and never recovered its old prosperity.

LITERATURE.—J. L. Porter, Five Years in Damascus, 2 vols., 1855; G. A. Smith, HCHIA, 1897; H. C. Butler, Architecture and other Arts, 1903; G. L. Bell, The Desert and the Town, 1907. JAMES STRAHAN.

SYRTIS (AV 'quicksands,' Ac 27¹⁷).—The Great and the Little Syrtis (Σύρτις μεγάλη καὶ μικρά) were the eastern and western recesses of the great bay on the North African coast between Carthage and Cyrenaica. Drifting before an E.N.E. wind (see EURAQUILLO), the crew of St. Paul's ship knew that they were being carried in the direction of the Greater Syrtis (now the Gulf of Sidra), 'the Goodwin Sands of the Mediterranean' (F. W. Farrar, The Life and Work of St. Paul, 1897, p. 568). The best comment on Luke's words is supplied by Strabo (XVII. iii. 20):

'The difficulty of navigating both this and the Lesser Syrtis arises from the soundings in many parts being soft mud. It sometimes happens, on the ebbing and flowing of the tide, that vessels are carried upon the shallows, settle down, and are seldom recovered. Sailors therefore, in coasting, keep at a distance from the shore, and are on their guard, lest they should be caught by a wind unprepared, and driven into these gulfs.'

The name 'Syrtis' may be derived from the sucking action of the treacherous tides—'Syrtes ab tractu nominatæ' (Sall. Bell. Jug. 77). But it is sometimes connected with the Arabic sert, 'a desert,' which would refer to the desolate and sandy shore that marked the neighbourhood of the Syrtes (W. Smith, DGRG ii. [1868] 1081). Virgil (Æn. iv. 41) speaks of the 'inhospita Syrtis,' and there were many ancient tales, probably not a little exaggerated, of armies on land and even ships at sea being overwhelmed by clouds of drifting sand (Diod. xx. 42; Sall. Bell. Jug. 78; Herod. iii. 25, 26, iv. 173; Lucan, ix. 294 f.).

The crew of the scudding ship avoided the foreseen danger by laying her to on the starboard tack, i.e. with her right side to the wind. Luke's phrase, χαλασαυτες το σκελος ('lowered the gear,' Ac 27¹⁷ RV), only imperfectly describes this operation, as it leaves out an essential detail—the setting of the storm-sail. See J. Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1880, p. 110 f., and W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 328 f.

JAMES STRAHAN.

T

TABERNACLE (σκηνή, tabernaculum).—Tabernacle is the name given in the English Bible, since the time of Wyclif, to the moving sanctuary which, according to the OT priestly writers, was prepared by Moses as the place of worship of the Israelites during their wanderings in the wilderness. This tabernacle, which is described with elaborate detail in Ex 25-31, and which supplies the writer of Hebrews with the premisses of his great argument, is now almost universally regarded as a post-Exilic product of the Hebrew religious imagination, working upon a foundation of historical fact. Suggested by the Divine promise to Israel, 'My dwelling shall be with them' (Ezk 37²⁷)—where 'dwelling' (יָשָׁן) gives the literal sense of the word usually rendered by 'tabernacle'—it was an attempt to give ideal expression, by outward and visible symbols, to a people's faith in the real presence of God. Realizing the double truth of the Divine nearness and mysterious unapproachableness, the priests in a manner materialized the conditions under which the right relation between God and His people could be renewed and maintained. Their sanctuary was evidently a development of the sketch of Ezekiel (40-48); but, whereas his ideal was a hope to be realized in the Messianic age, theirs was represented as a reminiscence of the Mosaic time. In some respects following, but in others widely diverging from, the arrangements of the first Temple, its ritual was in all essentials actualized in the second and third Temples. Various allusions to the tabernacle are found in the apostolic writings.

1. The writer of Hebrews delights, like Philo, in the typical and allegorical interpretation of the OT Scriptures, which seem to him pregnant with hidden spiritual meanings. His aim is to prove that the Christian has passed 'ex umbris et imaginibus in veritatem.' Never referring to the Temple, always to the tabernacle, he lingers over the description of 'the vessels of the ministry' (9²¹), entering into details which would have been superfluous had he been writing merely to Jewish readers. While he recognizes the splendour of the old order, and reverently unfolds the significance of its ritual, he regards all the Levitical institutions as prophetic types which, having at length been fulfilled by Christ, may now be set aside without compunction or regret. His philosophical presupposition, or view of the world, is the Platonic and Philonic one, that heaven is the place of realities, while earth is the place of shadows; and his central doctrine is that Christ, having, as a 'minister of the true tabernacle (ἡ σκηνη ἡ ἀληθινη), which the Lord pitched, not man' (8²), entered within the veil, has won for every Christian the right of personal access to God. Holding, like the most enlightened Israelites before him, that the Mosaic ordinances were no more than Divinely appointed ceremonial forms, and asserting the spiritual ineffectiveness of the whole ritual, even of the supreme sacrifice of the Day of Atonement, he declares 'the first tabernacle' (9⁶⁻⁸), though made in all things according to a heavenly pattern (τύπον, 8⁵), to be superseded by 'a greater and more perfect tabernacle' (9¹¹), and the Levitical priesthood by 'a more excellent ministry' (διαφορετέρα λειτουργία, 8⁶).

2. The writer of the Fourth Gospel illustrates the Incarnation by saying that the Logos tabernacled (ἐσκηνώσεν) among us (Jn 1¹⁴). As God once dwelt, in visible cloud and flame, among His people, so Christ has sojourned among men, who have beheld His glory, which in this instance is the spiritual glory of a perfect manhood.

3. The author of the Revelation depicts the final state of Messianic happiness in the words: 'Behold, the tabernacle (σκηνή) of God is with men, and he shall dwell (σκηνώσει) with them' (21³). 'So closely does Shekinah resemble σκηνή, that the former has even been thought of as a transliteration of the latter' (C. Taylor, *Sayings of the Jewish Fathers*², Cambridge, 1897, p. 44). That was no more than a linguistic fancy, Shekinah being really derived from the same verb as mishkan, 'tabernacle.' But the Messianic promise is partially fulfilled in an intenser realization of the Divine Immanence in the world, where 'earth's crammed with heaven, and every common bush afire with God' (E. B. Browning, Aurora Leigh, bk. vii. line 844 f.), and a modern mystic declares that 'there is but one Temple in the world, and that is the Body of Man. Nothing is holier than this high form. Bending before men is a reverence done to this Revelation in the Flesh. We touch Heaven, when we lay our hand on a human body' (Novalis, Carlyle's Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, London, 1872, ii. 216). Cf. St. Paul's words, 'ye are a temple (ναός, from ναεῖν, 'to dwell') of God . . . the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are' (1 Co 3¹⁶⁻¹⁷). But when a promise is to be fulfilled by Christ, the best is yet to be.

LITERATURE.—W. Nowack, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie, Freiburg i. B., 1894; I. Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie, do., 1894; R. L. Ottley, Aspects of the OT (BL), London, 1897, pp. 226 ff., 261 ff.; A. R. S. Kennedy, art. 'Tabernacle' in HDB and EB11.

JAMES STRAHAN.

TABITHA.—See DORCAS.

TABLE (τράπεζα).—This word is used in the NT in various senses. On a technical meaning which it has in the Gospels see art. 'Bank' in DCG.

1. In the primitive Church the apostles deemed it unfitting that they should turn aside from their proper task of preaching the Word of God and give themselves to that of serving tables (διακονεῖν τραπέζαις, Ac 6²). They accordingly secured the appointment of the Seven, which left them free to give their undivided time and strength to the ministry of the Word (τῇ διακονίᾳ τοῦ λόγου, 6⁴). Two kinds of 'service,' or 'deaconship,' are thus specified, both of them evangelical and honourable, but each so arduous and absorbing that a division of labour became imperative. The 'serving of tables' probably included not merely the literal provision of repasts for the poor, but the task of determining the fitness of applicants for relief and the allocation of a central fund.

2. It is in one of St. Paul's letters that we first find the Eucharist called 'the table of the Lord' (τραπέζης Κυρίου, 1 Co 10²¹). It would be interesting to know whether he coined the phrase or found it already in use in the primitive Church (cf. Lk 22³⁰), but the point has to be left undetermined. Contrasting 'the Lord's table' with 'the tables of demons,' as he scornfully calls the riotous feasts of pagan idolatry, he urges the moral impossibility of passing from the pure atmosphere of Christian fellowship into the tainted air of heathen licence and debauchery.

3. Among the furniture of the Holy Place the writer of Hebrews names 'the table' (ἡ τράπεζα, 9²), meaning the table of shewbread, for the construction and ornamentation of which directions are given in Ex 25²³⁻³⁰. See SHEWBREAD.

Another word tr. 'table' is πλάξ, which is used in the LXX for πλ. St. Paul contrasts the tables of stone on which the Ten Commandments were written by the 'finger of God' with the tables that are not of stone but are 'hearts of flesh,' whereon the Holy Spirit writes the laws of the New Covenant (2 Co 3³). JAMES STRAHAN.

TALENT.—As a translation of the adjectival τάλαντια (fem. sing.), 'weighing a talent,' this word is found only in Rev 16²¹. The reference is to weight, and not to money. Even with the recovery of a supposed actual specimen (see art. 'Weights and Measures' in HDB iv. 906) we are still dependent on an average estimate of the weight of a talent. This may be given as a little over 90 lb. avoirdupois (=125 libra, Roman). This means that each hailstone was about as much as a man of average strength can lift. It is usual to compare Josephus, BJ v. vi. 3, where stones cast by engines of war are spoken of in similar terms. W. CRUICKSHANK.

TANNER.—See SIMON (the Tanner).

TARSUS (Τάρσος).—This city is famous as the capital of Cilicia and the birthplace of St. Paul (Ac 22³; cf. 9¹¹ 21³⁹). It was built on both banks of the Cydnus, in a rich and extensive plain, about 10 miles N. of the coast and 30 miles S. of the vast mountain-wall of Taurus. The river descends swift and cold from the snow-clad heights—ψυχρόν τε καὶ ταχὺ τὸ ρεῦμα ἐστίν (Strabo, XIV. v. 12)—and Alexander the Great almost lost his life from the effects of an imprudent bathe in its icy water (Plut. Alex. 19). Flowing, 200 ft. wide, through the heart of the city, it entered, some miles down, a lake called the Rhagma—now a fever-breeding marsh, 30 miles in circumference—which served as an excellent harbour for the shipping of the Mediterranean. But the Cydnus was navigable as far as the city itself, and all the world knows of Cleopatra's pageant on those waters (Plutarch, Antony, 25 f.; Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, act II. sc. ii. line 192 ff.).

The great trade-route from the Euphrates by the Amanus Pass joined the one from Antioch by the Syrian Gates about 50 miles E. of Tarsus, and the singleroad, after traversing the city, turned sharply northward towards the Cilician Gates—a natural pass, 70 miles long, greatly improved by engineering perhaps about 1000 B.C.—which gave access in peace and war to the vast central plateau of Asia Minor. Highways of sea and land thus combined to make Tarsus one of the most important meeting-places of East and West.

The 1st cent. Tarsus, whose most famous son was a Jew, a Hellenist, and a Roman citizen, resembled a composite photograph, in which the Greek type had been superimposed upon the Oriental, and the Roman upon both.

Tarsus is mentioned in the 'Black Obelisk' inscription as one of the cities captured by the Assyrian Shalmaneser about 860 B.C. (Records of the Past, ed. A. H. Sayce, new ser., 6 vols., London, 1888-92, iv. 47). Under the Persian Empire it was governed sometimes by satraps, sometimes by subject kings. Xenophon (c. 400 B.C.) found it a πόλις μεγάλη καὶ εὐδαίμων, where Syennesis, king of Cilicia, had his residence (Anab. i. ii. 23). The victories of Alexander the Great changed the face of the East, and Tarsus was one of the many cities that were Hellenized by the Seleucids. Antiochus Epiphanes IV. visited Cilicia about 170 B.C. for the purpose of allaying discontent in Tarsus and the neighbouring town of Mallus (2 Mac 4³⁴), and Ramsay thinks it probable that this king reconstituted Tarsus as an autonomous Greek city, and that, according to the practice of the Seleucids, he planted a colony of Jews there, giving them equal rights of citizenship (ἰσοπολιτεία) with the Greeks (The Cities of St. Paul, London, 1907, pp. 165, 180). The citizens of Greek towns were divided into 'tribes' (φύλαι), each observing its own special religious rites; and, as the individual could not enjoy civic privileges except in his relation to the tribe, there must have been a φύλη of Jews in Tarsus, each member of which could boast of being 'a Tarsian of Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city' (Ac 21²⁹). The far-reaching change which this Antiochus, who was at first no enemy of the Jews, made in Tarsus was commemorated by the new name given to the city—'Antioch on the Cydnus'—which, however, was soon dropped, as there were already so many Antiochs, and as Tarsus was still essentially an Oriental city. When Pompey reconstituted the province of Cilicia (in 64 B.C.), Tarsus became the headquarters of the Roman governor, but it lost this honour when Augustus formed the great joint-province of Syria-Cilicia-Phoenice (probably in 27 B.C.). Tarsus took Caesar's side in the Civil War, and in memory of a visit which the dictator paid it in his march from Egypt to Pontus it either received or assumed the name of Juliopolis. The republican Cassius plundered it on that account, but Mark Antony made it a civitas libera et immunis, and Augustus confirmed its privileges. Under a strong and just Roman government, Tarsus was left to the peaceful development of its great resources, and reached the zenith of its prosperity, while its Hellenization now went on apace. Inspired with an enthusiasm for learning and the arts, it established a university, which was not indeed so splendidly equipped as the older foundations of Athens and Alexandria, but, according to Strabo (XIV. v. 12), even surpassed them in zeal for knowledge. At the same time Tarsus developed a higher civic consciousness, and under the benign rule of Augustus' old preceptor, the Stoic Athenodorus, who received divine honours after his death, and of Nestor, the teacher of Marcellus and perhaps of Tiberius, it for a time realized the Platonic ideal of government by philosophers. T. Mommsen has called Asia Minor 'the promised land of municipal vanity' (The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1909, i. 328, n. 1), and it is curious to see how Tarsus, like so many other cities, arrogated such high-sounding titles as Metropolis, Neokoros, Free, First, Fairest, Best. But this was only the defect of her qualities, and all that was highest and worthiest in her life was associated with the intense local patriotism of her citizens.

We have not the means of accurately measuring the effect of such an intellectual environment on 'Saul of Tarsus' during his formative years. It cannot be proved that he received a liberal education in his native city before he went to study in Jerusalem. It is certain, however, that Tarsus was one of the great seats of Stoic philosophy, and 'it is not mere conjecture, that St. Paul had some acquaintance with the teachers or the writings of this school' (J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, London, 1878, p. 304). It is equally evident that he obtained in Tarsus an insight into civic and Imperial politics, which exercised a profound influence upon his thought as a Christian. He learned to give full value to the words πολίτης (Ac 21²⁹), συμπολίτης (Eph 2¹⁹), πολιτεία (Ac 22², Eph 2¹²), πολιτεύμα (Ph 3²⁰). He not only enjoyed, like all his compatriots in Tarsus (the συγγενεῖς of Ro 16⁷ II. 2), the freedom of his native city, but he had the far higher privilege, of which only few of them could boast, of being a Roman born (Ac 22²⁸). While his Tarsian citizenship availed him little outside the city, his Ρωμαῖος εἰμι—Civis Romanus sum—was a talisman which afforded him protection almost everywhere. And his double citizenship not only was in itself a privilege, but became a fruitful ideal. The thought of a citizen-life worthy of a Tarsian and of a Roman early penetrated his mind, and reappeared by and by in the sublimated form of a civic conduct worthy of the gospel of Christ (πολιτεύεσθε, Ph 1⁷), a conscientious citizen-life led always before God (πολιτεύεσθαι τῷ θεῷ, Ac 23¹).

After his conversion St. Paul spent several years in Tarsus and other parts of Cilicia (Gal 1¹), labouring and learning there in unrecorded ways, and it was in his native city that he was found by Barnabas (Ac 11²⁵). At the beginning of his second missionary tour he was again in Cilicia, confirming the churches which he had probably founded (Ac 15⁴), and he could not avoid Tarsus on his way through the Cilician Gates to Derbe and Lystra (Ac 16¹). His third tour also began with a journey from Syrian Antioch to the region of Phrygia and Galatia (Ac 18²³), no doubt via Tarsus, which he then probably saw for the last time.

Captured by the Arabs in the 7th, and by the Crusaders in the 11th cent., Tarsus ultimately fell into Ottoman hands in the 16th century. It has now a population of 25,000, a congeries of many nationalities.

LITERATURE.—W. J. Conybeare and J. S. Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 2 vols., London, 1877, i. 26 f., 59 f.; A. Hansrath, A History of the NT Times, 4 vols., do., 1895, iii. 4 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, The Cities of St. Paul, do., 1907; C. Wilson, in Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, do., 1895, p. 184 f. JAMES STRAHAN.

TARTARUS.—See HELL.

TATTLERS.—'Tattlers' is the translation of φλύαροι in 1 Ti 5¹³. As a noun the word is found only here in the NT. As a verb φλυαρέω occurs in 3 Jn 10, where it stigmatizes Diotrephes. In 4 Mac 5¹⁰ it is used as an adjective, and applied to a worthless kind of philosophy (ἀπὸ τῆς φλυαρου φιλοσοφίας).

In classical Greek the word is in common use to denote 'foolery,' 'silly chatter,' and generally 'playing the fool'; and not infrequently with a tinge of moral blameworthiness. In 1 Ti 5¹³ the word φλύαροι ('trifling silly talkers') is applied to the baser sort among the order of widows, and especially to the younger women of that order: 'And withal they learn also to be idle, going about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not.' 'From leisure springs that curiosity which is the mother of garrulity' (Calvin). Bengel translates by garrulae. 'The social intercourse of idle people is naturally characterised by silly chatter' (EGT, Edinburgh, 1910, in loc.).

We have here one of the vignettes of character, so abundant in the Pastorals, where one sees as in a mirror the frivolous side of the Greek temperament, its restlessness and curiosity, its 'itch' to hear or to tell some newer thing. In the land of gossips this propensity had invaded the Church, and threatened to become (as we can well believe) troublesome to good order, as well as hurtful to the grave and restrained life which was imperative on Christian women in the relaxed moral conditions of the cities of the Empire. Timothy is therefore warned to hold a tight rein over the troops of gadabout women with their prurient talk (λαλῶσαι τὰ μὴ δεόντα). See BABBLER.

W. M. GRANT.

TAVERNS.—See THREE TAVERNS.

TEACHER Comparison of Ac 13¹ with Ro 12⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹ 4³, Ja 3¹ shows that 'teachers' (διδάσκαλοι) are not a separate order of officials, but a class of men endowed with a particular gift, which they exercised in congregations already established. As distinct from the ecstatic exhortations of 'prophets,' the instruction given by 'teachers' would be exposition of the OT and of the words and acts of Christ. 'Teachers' were inferior to 'apostles' and 'prophets,' and were connected with 'pastors' (1 Co 12²⁸, Eph 4¹¹). 'Apostles' always had the gift of teaching; 'prophets' and 'pastors' usually possessed it; but men might have it without belonging to any of these classes. See CHURCH GOVERNMENT, MINISTRY.

A. PLUMMER.

TEACHING (διδάχῃ, διδασκαλία).—The place and function of teaching in the establishment of Christianity are facts of great historical interest and practical importance. That its effectiveness, as an instrument for the diffusion of the Christian religion, was recognized by the Jewish rulers is apparent from the prohibitions and persecutions with which they sought to prevent the apostles teaching 'in the name of Jesus' (Ac 4¹⁸ 5²⁸). As in the ministry of Jesus teaching occupied a prominent place (together with preaching and healing), so also with His followers it was one of the main features of their evangelical work. It was a chosen instrument for the spread of the new religion, and it gradually tended to reduce the truths which expressed the faith of the early Church to a recognized body of doctrine.

A distinction is to be drawn between the process of teaching and the subject-matter of teaching. To speak of the 'teaching of St. Paul,' for example, is ambiguous, since 'teaching' may mean either 'instruction' (the act of imparting truth) or 'doctrine' (the body of truth imparted). Sometimes, indeed, the biblical usage includes both meanings. The NT employs two terms for 'teaching,' viz. διδάχῃ and διδασκαλία. Generally speaking, the former signifies the act and the latter the substance of teaching. This distinction is not made so apparent in the AV, where both διδάχῃ and διδασκαλία are usually rendered 'doctrine,' whereas in the RV διδάχῃ (which occurs 16 times) is always rendered 'teaching' (Ro 16¹⁷ RVm), and διδασκαλία (occurring 17 times) is rendered 'doctrine' (11 times), 'teaching' (5 times), and 'learning' (once). To render διδάχῃ by the somewhat ambiguous word 'teaching' is convenient, as it always signifies the act and in many instances both the act and the content of Christian instruction, whereas διδασκαλία more frequently denotes the content alone, and is well expressed by 'doctrine.' Literally διδασκαλία means 'that which belongs to a teacher' (διδάσκαλος), and, in the judgment of H. Cremer (Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, Edinburgh, 1880, p. 182), is used 'for the most part in the objective, and therefore passive sense, that which is taught, the doctrine.' That the content of teaching is suggested by this term is apparent from such phrases as 'precepts and doctrines' (Col 2²²), 'sound doctrine' (1 Ti 1¹⁰, 2 Ti 4³, Tit 1⁹), and absolutely 'the doctrine' (1 Ti 6¹⁻³, Tit 2¹⁰).

1. The work of teaching.—The ability to impart Christian truth was looked upon by the members of the early Church as a spiritual gift of Divine grace. Teaching was therefore numbered among the charismata (χαρίσματα) which resulted from the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, and which included such gifts as prophesying, healing, working of miracles, and 'tongues' (Ro 12⁹, 1 Co 12¹⁰).

(1) Teaching and preaching.—While mentioned in close association with preaching, the gift of teaching was regarded as conferring on its recipient a distinct function in the ministry of the Word. As in the Gospels our Lord is described first as 'preaching' the glad tidings of the Kingdom (Mk 1¹⁴) and then as 'teaching' His disciples the inner meaning and principles of the gospel (4¹), so, in the early Church, preaching was one thing and teaching another, although in both instances they were often combined (Mt 4²³, Ac 5⁴² 28³¹). Preaching was primarily the proclamation of the good news of salvation through Jesus Christ, whereas teaching was the calmer and more systematic instruction in the details of Christian truth and duty which followed the summons to repentance and saving faith. While preaching and teaching were distinct as functions, they might, in some cases at least, be united in the ministry of one person (1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹), especially as the content both of the preaching and of the more elaborated instruction was necessarily often the same (Ac 5⁴ 15³⁵, Col 1²⁸).

(2) The position of teaching.—In the two more formal lists of the spiritually endowed, given by St. Paul, 'teachers' are mentioned after apostles and prophets (1 Co 12²⁸, Eph 4¹¹), and in a less formal list of spiritual functions 'teaching' is mentioned after 'prophecy' (Ro 12⁶), whereas in 1 Cor. the 'word of wisdom' and the 'word of knowledge,' which together constituted charismatic teaching, are placed before prophecy (12⁸, 10), and 'a teaching' comes before 'a revelation' (14²⁶). Prophecy was a specialized form of teaching. 'The difference between the two,' says A. C. McGiffert, 'lay in the fact that while prophecy was the utterance of a revelation received directly from God, teaching, specifically so called, was the utterance of that which one had gained by thought and reflection. The teacher might be led and guided by the Spirit,—indeed, he must be, if he were to be a true teacher and his teaching truly spiritual,—but what he said was in a real sense his own' (History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 529). Some prophets were able also to teach, but not all teachers were able to prophesy. The apostles might also teach. St. Paul speaks of himself as appointed to be both an apostle and a teacher (1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹). Teachers, like apostles and prophets, travelled about from place to place, being greatly honoured (Did. iv. 1) and having the right to expect support (ib. xiii. 1-3). They were not officials appointed by any ecclesiastical body. Teaching was not a clerical office, for even as late as the 5th cent. laymen are mentioned as teachers (Apostolic Constitutions, viii. xxxii.). But local congregations tested both the message and the moral character of these visiting instructors. Teachers were more likely than apostles and prophets to settle down in one place, and the reference to 'pastors and teachers' (Eph 4¹¹) shows this tendency at work. At a later stage it was one of the qualifications of a bishop that he should be 'apt to teach' (1 Ti 3²).

(3) Limitations and dangers.—Women were not permitted to teach (1 Ti 2¹¹)—at least in public—although, apparently in harmony with St. Paul's 'healthful teaching' (Tit 2¹), it was allowable for aged women to impart moral instruction (privately, it would seem) as part of the Christian training of young women in such duties as love of husband and children, sobriety, chastity, and kindness (Tit 2⁴). Warnings against 'false teachers' occur frequently in apostolic and sub-apostolic times. From the first, Judaizers dogged the footsteps of the apostles (Ac 15¹ 21²⁷, Gal 1⁷) to pervert the teaching of the gospel. Next, the existence of 'many teachers' within the Church (Ja 3¹) promoted an unhealthy spirit of rivalry and faction which could be eliminated only by a demand for a 'good life' in one who professed, as a teacher, to be 'wise and understanding' (v. 13). Then 'strange teachings' began to multiply (He 13⁹). False teachers arose, encouraging 'lusts of the flesh' (2 P 2⁻¹⁵), 'fornication' (Rev 2^{14, 20}), 'false doctrine' (1 Jn 2²⁶, 4¹¹, 1 Ti 1³, 2 Ti 4³), being prompted, too often, by a covetous love of gain (2 P 2^{3, 14}, Tit 1¹¹).

(4) Methods of teaching.—Instruction was often given collectively, in public or in private, 'in the temple and at home' (Ac 5⁴²), in the Christian congregation (11²⁶), and more generally in the meeting for edification such as St. Paul describes in detail (1 Co 14). In the latter the teaching came between the 'psalm' (or hymn of praise) and the prophetic 'revelation' (v. 26). Supplementary teaching was given privately 'from house to house' (Ac 20²⁰) or to individuals (18²⁶). The imparting of Christian truth to catechumens, who were to contribute towards the support of their teacher (Gal 6⁶), developed in the more settled churches of cities and even villages (Eusebius, HE VII. xxiv. 6). Many churches came to have regular schools for the teaching of catechumens, that of Alexandria being especially famous in later times.

The teaching was oral, as a rule, but it might be conveyed by means of didactic epistles, such as those contained in the NT or those of Clement of Rome and Ignatius, or works like the Didache and the Shepherd of Hermas. In addition to a recital of the facts concerning the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ (Ro 1³, 1 Co 15¹², Gal 4⁴), there would be doctrinal explanations of these facts, such as those contained in Acts and the Epistles. Then there were authoritative accounts of such institutions as the Christian sacrament (1 Co 11²⁴). Instruction was also conveyed in 'hymns and spiritual songs' (Col 3¹⁶) and would include 'admonition' (1²³), exhortation (1 Ti 4¹³ 6²), and even reproof and rebuke (2 Ti 4²), the administration of which called for patience and longsuffering on the part of the teacher.

(5) Historical development.—The place of teaching in the early Church underwent modification in process of time. In the earliest stage it was somewhat overshadowed by the supernatural gifts of prophecy and tongues. To the ordinary listener, the presence and influence of the Spirit were more evident in the revelations of prophecy or the ecstatic utterances of tongues than in the calmer discourse of teaching. Against the tendency to ascribe undue importance to glossolalia St. Paul had early to make protest in the interest of prophecy (1 Co 14). A second stage was reached when the early enthusiasm roused by prophetic and ecstatic speech cooled down and greater attention was given to the more systematic utterance of the teacher. The prophetic gift was sporadic, that of teaching was continuous; the former came by momentary inspiration, the latter was the outcome of long experience; and in the long run teaching won the day. The effect of stricter oversight and completer organization tended (up to a certain point) to encourage it. The very directions given by St. Paul to the Corinthians for the orderly conduct of their edification meetings gave to teaching a growing importance in the process of spiritual upbuilding. In the third stage (noticeable in the 2nd cent.) the function of teaching became absorbed in the office of administration and leadership. The teacher outlasted both the apostle and the prophet, but was eventually subordinated to the bishop, who combined in his office the functions of ruling and teaching. In earlier times the apostles, prophets, and teachers had authority because they possessed gifts of insight and knowledge qualifying them to give directions in belief and practice. But, as the need for organization and discipline increased pari passu with the decline of inspired utterance, teaching, at first overshadowed by prophecy, now became absorbed by leadership, although it remained a permanent function in the Church.

2. The content of Christian teaching.—The NT Epistles and the specimens of instruction preserved in Acts embody the content of Christian teaching during the 1st century. The amplification and modification of this primitive norm of belief and practice can be traced in the Didache, the Epistles of Clement and Ignatius, and the Shepherd of Hermas in the immediately succeeding years.

The detailed exposition and co-ordination of the contents of Christian teaching will be found in the various articles dealing with the subjects concerned. All that can be attempted here is to characterize broadly the early Christian teaching as a body of truth. Compared with the varied literature of the ancient world it was exclusively religious in character, and in contrast with the philosophic speculations of the Greek and Hellenistic schools it claimed to be a body of revealed truth. The Christian teacher did not so much unfold a philosophy of religion as expound and apply the truths embodied and revealed in Christ. He taught 'in the name of Jesus' (Ac 4¹³ 5²⁸), he used the doctrines of the OT inasmuch as they bore witness of Christ, he repeated the teaching given by Christ with the formula 'Remember the words of the Lord Jesus' (20²⁵), he continued 'in the apostles' doctrine' (2⁴²), and as occasion arose he applied the principles underlying the teaching of Jesus to the doctrinal and ethical problems that arose within the Church. In the later Epistles a conservative tendency is noticeable. The content of Christian teaching came to be fixed and authoritative. It was called 'the teaching' (1 Ti 6¹, 2 Jn 9; cf. Rev 22¹⁸) or the 'sound doctrine' (2 Ti 4²). St. Paul early utters a warning to the Romans against departing from 'the doctrine which ye learned' (Ro 16¹⁷), and later Timothy is called a good minister because he had been 'nourished in the words of the faith, and of the good doctrine' (1 Ti 4⁶), and in which he had continued.

The general character of the content of the teaching may be inferred from the fact that it is described (1 Co 12⁸) as the 'word of wisdom' (λόγος σοφίας) and as the 'word of knowledge' (λόγος γνῶσεως). The message of the teacher consisted of a discourse in which either 'wisdom' or 'knowledge' (γνῶσις) would predominate according to the special nature of the gift of teaching bestowed. A difference is to be noted between wisdom and gnosis. The former consisted in an acquaintance with 'God's wisdom' (1 Co 1⁻¹), or the Divine plan of redemption, which St. Paul calls elsewhere 'the mystery of God' (2¹). O. Pfleiderer describes it as 'the knowledge of elementary Christian truths in the simplest and most direct form of actual fact' (Paulinism, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1877, i. 235). On the other hand, knowledge (gnosis) came by intuition and consisted of insight into truth through spiritual illumination. In Christian wisdom the truth was arrived at by the teacher's powers of observation and reasoning; in the Christian gnosis the truth was bestowed as an immediate gift of the Spirit. The first enabled the teacher to explain the truth, the latter qualified him to interpret it. The knowledge of the teacher was largely an experimental acquaintance with the process of human redemption through Christ (Ph 3¹⁰).

The continuity of NT with OT teaching must not be overlooked. The teacher began with such truths as were common to Judaism and Christianity. The fundamental doctrine of the existence, unity, and holiness of God he would learn from the OT. He appropriated the Jewish beliefs as to the creation of the world and the nature and sinfulness of man. He insisted on the primary demands of the Moral Law.

After allowing for what was taken over from the OT and embodied in the NT, the remaining subject-matter of specifically Christian teaching consists of two elements—doctrinal and ethical.

(1) Doctrinal content.—The outstanding and ever-recurring subject in Christian instruction was the Person and Work of Christ. St. Paul's declaration to the Corinthians that he determined not to know anything among them 'save Jesus Christ and him crucified' (1 Co 2-) was true of himself not only as a preacher, but also as a teacher. The teaching of apostolic times, whether soteriological, eschatological, or practical, was essentially Christocentric. While the preacher, as a herald (κηρυξ), made his proclamation that Jesus was the Christ of God, and the Saviour of mankind, the teacher, in the meeting for edification or to individual listeners, had to unfold and explain the deep truths involved in this momentous fact.

The story of the events of the earthly life of Jesus, together with an account of His sinless character and His death and resurrection, had to be told (1 Co 15^{1ff}, 2 Co 8⁹, Gal 4^{4ff}) much in the same way as it has been preserved for us in the Four Gospels. But the doctrinal and theological implications of these historical facts had to be made explicit by appeal both to Scripture and to spiritual experience. The gospel concerning Jesus Christ needed much exposition. In order that men should intelligently believe that Jesus was the promised Christ, as proved by His resurrection 'according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15⁴), that He was the Saviour of sinful men through His expiatory death upon the Cross (Ro 5⁸, 2 Co 5^{18, 21}), that He was the redeeming head of the human race (Ro 5¹⁵, 2 Co 15²²), that, moreover, He was the eternal Son of God and the creative ideal of the whole universe (Eph 1¹⁰, Col 1^{16f}, 29), time was needed, and methods of explanation which were not at the disposal of the preacher. To the teacher was allotted the important task of expounding and co-ordinating the truths proclaimed in the preaching of the gospel.

The experiences of salvation, which came to believers through their faith in Christ, required reflective consideration; hence the prominence given in Christian teaching to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The historic gift of the Day of Pentecost proved to be also the indwelling principle of the new Divine life in redeemed men (Ro 5⁸, 1 Co 2¹², Gal 4⁵, Eph 3¹⁶). Although the dogma of the Divine Trinity was the outcome of much later reflexion, the elements of a doctrine of the three-fold nature of the Divine existence emerged in the teaching of the 1st century.

The preacher having summoned men to repentance and saving faith in Christ, the teacher exhibited the resultant state of salvation in many aspects. The legal aspect required the teacher to present the truth as evangelical justification; its regenerative results enabled him to speak of it as a 'new creation.' The family life illustrated the blessing as adoption and the possession of filial consciousness. The Jewish Dispensation supplied such ideas as the 'New Covenant' and 'royal priesthood,' by which the Christian's new relationship to God could be understood. Religious and ceremonial observances in the ancient world afforded the basis for a fresh and more ethical conception of salvation as mystical union with a dying and risen Saviour or as sanctification through the indwelling Holy Spirit.

Moreover, 'things to come' occupied a large place, not only in the teaching of Jesus, but in the more developed doctrine of the apostles. The preacher heralded an impending Parousia; he exhorted his hearers to repentance in view of the certain approach of Christ as Judge; he proclaimed the sure and certain hope of resurrection. The teacher, on the other hand, while including these great truths in his doctrinal instruction, had many questions to face in view of the apocalyptic fancies and hopes so rife in contemporary Judaism and the Greek speculations concerning immortality so widely propagated through the Hellenistic schools of religious philosophy. The very lapse of time brought its problems. The hope and belief of the primitive Church that Christ was immediately to appear called for explanation in view of what would appear to some a disappointing postponement. This drew from the teacher a deeper and more spiritual interpretation of eschatological truth. 2 Thessalonians shows St. Paul, as teacher, correcting the hopes roused in his hearers by the eschatological message of St. Paul, as preacher (Ac 17³, 1 Th 1¹⁰ 4^{13f}). In Corinthians the Apostle deals with problems of individual immortality raised through the grim fact of death among believers. In his later Epistles the cosmical aspect of 'things to come' emerges as implicated in his maturer and final teaching concerning Christ as the eternal Son of God, who existed before the visible universe and in whom all created things are recapitulated (Eph 1^{10f}.) and will find their final consummation in glory (Ph 3^{20f}, Col 1^{13ff}).

(2) Ethical content.—In speaking of the 'teaching of Jesus' or the 'apostles' teaching,' it is usually the doctrinal or theological content that is primarily thought of, to the exclusion of the practical and moral. But a careful study of the records and specimens of our Lord's instruction and that of His followers shows that the proportion of ethical teaching is very great. The historic interest in apostolic doctrine aroused through centuries of controversy has overshadowed the moral teaching. While it may be straining the niceties of philosophical terminology to speak of the 'ethics of the NT' as though it constituted a system of moral principles and precepts based on human reason, yet no one can be blind to the substantial body of ethical teaching contained in the NT. In the apostolic and sub-apostolic literature this teaching receives full and explicit exposition. Nor again can any one overlook the influence of such moral teaching upon the subsequent developments of human civilization.

The teacher in apostolic times based his moral commands as to conduct upon the requirements of the Moral Law. But there was a distinctively Christian 'way' (Ac 9²) or mode of life, which was taught and applied by the Christian teacher much in the same manner as the Jewish Rabbis dealt with their Halakha. The authoritative norm of such teaching was the moral teaching of Jesus as Lord. Hence St. Paul speaks of 'my ways which be in Christ, even as I teach everywhere in every church' (1 Co 4¹⁷). In warning the Ephesians against their former Gentile vices, the Apostle says, 'Ye did not so learn Christ; if so be that ye heard him, and were taught in him' (Eph 4²⁰). The various precepts, however, were all applications of the central principle of love, thus 'fulfilling the law of Christ' (Gal 5¹⁴ 6²). Negatively, the Christian ethic prohibited open vice, such as fornication and drunkenness; it exposed the sinfulness of spiritual errors, such as pride and covetousness; positively, it enjoined purity, self-control, humility, and above all Christian love (αγάπη). The supreme end of moral perfection, of holiness, was set before believers by the apostles and teachers, whom we see not only instructing converts in doctrine, but also 'admonishing every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ' (Col 1²⁸).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works quoted above, see W. F. Adeney, art. 'Teacher, Teaching,' in HDB; T. M. Lindsay, *The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries*², London, 1903; E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., do., 1904; C. von Weizsäcker, *The Apostolic Age of the Christian Church*², do., 1897-99.

M. SCOTT FLETCHER.

TEMPERANCE (ἐγκράτεια).—The aim of the present article is to determine the meaning of ἐγκράτεια in the NT. Our word 'temperance' is in popular speech limited to moderation in the use of intoxicants or total abstinence therefrom. This limitation of the word indicates the seriousness of the drink question in modern times; but temperance in the NT is not so restricted, so that the discussion of temperance in the modern sense can be touched on here only in so far as it is included in the more general question of ἐγκράτεια.

1. Temperance synthetically viewed as one of a catalogue of moral virtues or graces.—In the four cardinal virtues of Greek ethics and also the seven of scholastic and modern times temperance has a place, and its meaning is determined not only analytically but also synthetically, i.e. its relation in the moral life to other virtues is exhibited. Is there any synthetic treatment of it in the NT?

In Gal 5¹⁹⁻²³ it occurs at the end of a group of graces, and some have found in its position here a proof that it forms, as it were, the key-stone of the moral structure—the culminating point of a climax (A. B. D. Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, Glasgow, 1910, p. 184 ff.); but this is not the case. St. Paul may be opposing it to 'drunkennesses and revelings' in the corresponding list of vices, in which case the word would approach in meaning our own 'temperance'; but in all likelihood its position in the list is in no way regulative of its meaning, and so we are compelled to take it in its ordinary sense of self-control in food, drink, and especially in sexual indulgence. These ethical lists in St. Paul are not constructed logically. The lack of uniformity in them is a sufficient proof of this. Thus in Ac 24¹² temperance is associated with righteousness (not in the specific Pauline sense), and both are enforced in the light of the judgment to come. The reason for the association of the two is simply that Felix was notoriously deficient in both these points (Tac. Ann. xii. 54; Suet. Claud. 23). Here 'temperance' primarily, perhaps exclusively, means 'continence'—the περί τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἐγκράτεια of Xenophon (Ag. v. 4)—a restricted meaning which the verb has in 1 Co 7². Indeed the word tended towards this limited sense in later literature as our own word 'temperance' is restricted to the matter of drink. The reason is obvious. Immorality was even a graver sin for the Church than gluttony or drunkenness.

In Mt 23⁵ our Lord condemns the scribes and Pharisees for ἀπαγῆ and ἀκρασία, and if with Grotius (see Commentaries) we could explain the latter of sensual indulgence we would have exact opposites of righteousness and temperance as here used by St. Paul (cf. Jos. Ant. viii. vii. 5 for this meaning of ἀκρασία). The context, however, is more in favour of taking ἀκρασία as meaning over-indulgence in eating and drinking.

In Tit 1⁸ we have righteousness (among other virtues) joined with temperance as virtues necessary for a bishop or presbyter (δικαίον . . . ἐγκρατῆ). Here 'temperate' ought naturally to be taken in its ordinary meaning as control of bodily desires. It is not so comprehensive as σώφρων, a term which implies rational balance as well as moral self-control. The one (σώφρων) is a genus of which the other (ἐγκρατῆς) is a species. It is impossible, therefore, to arrange the terms of these Pauline catalogues genetically. The arrangement is often a matter of rhythm, not of moral nexus (see 2 Co 6³⁰), and therefore it is pedantic to see any immanent ethical connexion between the members of these lists.

To Tit 2¹² we owe the tripartite division of duties into duties to oneself (σωφρόνως), duties to others (δικαίως), and duties to God (εὐσεβώς)—'sobrie erga nos, juste erga proximum, pie erga Deum' (Bernard, quoted by Alford, in loc.). Our virtue of temperance would fall under the first of these as a species under a genus, but it is questionable if this division was in the writer's mind. 'Σωφρόνως can with as little propriety be referred merely to one's self as δικαίως merely to others, and by εὐσεβώς is also denoted the whole sphere of the Christian life' (A. Wiesinger, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1851, in loc.). Lucian has the same virtues together and calls them the pure world of the soul (see Alford, in loc.). The fact that in the Pastoral Epistles we have so many lists of virtues—similar yet never identical—is a proof that the Apostle did not write with a fixed system of ethics in the background of his mind.

In 2 P 1⁵⁻⁸ there appears on the other hand an inner psychological connexion between the various virtues mentioned. These are not thrown together at haphazard; there is a distinct moral progress, an advance like the Stoic προκοπή from a lower to a higher stage. Faith furnishes moral energy (ἀρετή), it knowledge, and it in turn ἐγκράτεια, till we are led up to love. Here undoubtedly its place in the list throws light on its meaning. It springs out of faith, which supplies the moral energy for and the practical acquaintance with the conduct that ought to be pursued and avoided. It is the mastery of self over its own internal hostile forces, just as ὑπομονή, 'endurance,' is mastery of the self in face of outward enemies. Temperance and endurance are indeed closely akin. When the struggle is against one's own lusts, the necessary virtue is temperance; when it is against hostile forces from without, then endurance—a military word—is the virtue required. The placing of knowledge and energy before it in the list shows that temperance needs both strength and insight as elements. The Christian Church, however, has never looked on this list in 2 Peter as an infallible norm. In Hermas ἐγκράτεια is made directly the daughter of faith—virtue and knowledge are omitted—and opposed to ἀκαρία (Vis. iii. viii. 7, Sim. ix. xv. 2). The fact is that the general literature of the period is full of such lists, and this one in 2 Pet. can be paralleled in parts from inscriptions (see Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, Tübingen, 1908, p. 239, Eng. tr., Light from the Ancient East, London, 1911, p. 322). We have a literary parallel in the Tabula of Cebes (xx. 3), and E. von Dobschütz quotes from Iamblichus, de vita Pythag., the vices that spring out of ἀκρασία—'lawless marriages and corruptions and drunkennesses, and unnatural pleasures and certain violent lusts.' For a discussion of the origin of these catalogues of vices (καταβάσεις) and virtues (ἀναβάσεις) the reader is referred to his excursus in Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 406 ff.

Before leaving this division of the subject the question which is raised by C. Bigg (ICC, 'St. Peter and St. Jude,' Edinburgh, 1901, in loc.) has to be faced. He considers that St. Peter regards temperance and the other virtues (except faith) as acquired by native moral effort working on the Divinely given deposit of faith, whereas St. Paul overlooks the human effort. Virtue was to St. Paul the result of Divine grace, not of ethical endeavour, to use Aristotle's distinction (Eth. Nic. i. 9), whereas to St. Peter the 'flame' was from God, but the oil to feed the flame came from man's own zeal and fidelity (Bigg, p. 257, quoting Bengel on 2 P 14). The fact is, however, that St. Paul never forgets moral effort. Whether virtue is obtained φύσει or ἐθει or διδασχῇ (Arist. Eth. X. ix. 6; cf. φύσει, μαθήσει, ἀσκήσει [Diog. Laert. v. 18]) was not consciously before his mind or before the mind of the writer of 2 Peter, but in his writings he acknowledges each mode. He writes in one place of the Gentiles doing good by nature (Ro 2¹⁴). He compares the Christian life with the athletic and the military. Moral growth is expressed by him as the gradual acquisition of virtues, as the Roman soldier puts on his armour piece by piece. The question as to the distinction between the work of God and the work of man in the Christian soul is not regarded in the NT in this antagonistic fashion. Both are recognized and emphasized without any feeling of opposition. To read into the NT our later synergistic difficulties is an anachronism.

The notion of a double morality came into Christianity very early. It is possibly found in the Didache, vi. 2, and in Ilermas (see C. E. Luthardt, History of Christian Ethics, tr. W. Hastie, Edinburgh, 1889, p. 126), but not in the NT. The NT ethics is of a piece, having a definite origin and a single aim. What is distinctive of the NT is not the precise determination of the sphere of different virtues or their place in a fixed catalogue—that is after all a scholastic problem—but rather the emphasis on their origin in the action of the Spirit of God in the soul (they are the fruit of the Spirit) and consequently on their inwardness and pervasiveness, thoughts and desires, aims and intentions, as well as actions being seriously taken into consideration. The influence on temperance of the doctrine of the Resurrection, e.g., is so profound that this virtue like all the rest is totally transformed, and, though often we may describe it as Plato or Aristotle would, we feel that we are in a new world, where virtues have new meanings and new values. We are in a realm where Divine grace and the hope of Christ's appearing are distinctly operative (Tit 2¹⁻⁴). We cannot therefore fix the meaning of these virtues by reference to these lists; they must be explained in the light of the whole Christian life. The aim of such lists is practical, and in practice now one virtue and now another has to be emphasized, one virtue may now be the cause and now the effect of another. Christianity deals with the personality as a whole, not in parts.

2. Ἐγκράτεια viewed analytically—its sphere and contents described.—Ἐγκράτεια had a long ethical history behind it in St. Paul's time. The non-ethical meaning does not concern us here.* Aristotle (Eudem. Eth. vii.) gives us the prevalent notions concerning it in his own day and tries to fix its intension and extension by criticizing these notions. According to him, the word was sometimes used vaguely in a wide sense so as to include control of all passions, emotions, and actions. He points out, however, that as a rule in these cases the word was not used simpliciter, but with the sphere indicated by the presence of a defining substantive, e.g. 'temperate as regards fame,' etc. The ambiguity as to the range of the word, however, is due to the fact that this was not always done. Ordinary speech is notoriously inexact. For this reason we cannot be sure how much the Apostle means to cover by it in Tit 1⁸. The Greek commentators took it in the wide sense—control of the tongue, the hand, and the eyes, the not being dragged down by any passion; but it is safer to regard it as referring mainly to self-control in the matters of eating and drinking and lust. In the OT, however, the verb is used simpliciter in the wide sense. Joseph, in order to control his emotion before his brethren, went into his chamber and wept there; then he came out and had control over himself (ἐξελθὼν ἐνεκράτευσας, Gn 43³¹). It is to be noted that here the term is used for control over generous impulses, which might have (by premature disclosure) spoiled their own good intentions. We see here what St. Peter may have had in his mind by making knowledge an element in self-control. He himself had lacked true self-control in the excess of noble impulses ungoverned by knowledge, as when he drew the sword for his Master's sake. St. Paul also has this in mind when he tells the Philippians that their love should increase in knowledge (Ph 1⁹) and every perception. Beneficence and charity may be spoiled by lack of insight, by being beforehand with their gifts. 'What he desires and asks of them in the matter of charity is not more sacrifice, in which regard the Macedonian Churches had already distinguished themselves (2 Co 8¹², 11⁹, 1 Th 4⁹), nor that simplicity in giving which he so often commends (Ro 12³, 2 Co 9¹³, Ja 1³, Mt 6³), but rather the opposite—a clear insight into and a careful consideration of the circumstances and conditions under which their charity may be exercised consistently with uprightness and good order' (T. Zahn, Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1909, i. 527). Thus we see that there may be intemperance in generosity, in charity, and in the very highest qualities of the soul. Very different from the temperance of Joseph is the false temperance of Saul. He offered sacrifice in Samuel's absence and thus exonerates himself: 'I overcame myself, and offered the holocaust' (ἐνεκράτευσάμην καὶ ἀνηγκα τὴν ὁλοκαύτωσιν), 1 S 13¹² (LXX 1 Kings). What appeared to Saul temperance was really lack of faith and lack of patience, and often we see men whose aims are good intemperate in their methods and in their haste. From these examples it is clear that the word 'temperance' may be used in the very widest sense.

The privative adjective is used thus widely also in Pr 27²⁰, but here the universe of discourse is distinctly mentioned (οἱ ἀπαλδευτοὶ ἀκρατεὶς γλῶσση, 'unrestrained in speech'; cf. 4 Mac 5³⁴ for a conjunction of the same ideas of training and self-control—οὐ ψευσμοὶ σε, παιδεύτα νόμῳ, οὐδὲ φευσμοὶ σε, φιλῇ ἐγκράτεια). St. Paul has the same ideas in Tit 2¹², but to him the source of true παιδεία is not the Law but the grace of God; yet in both cases the influence of training is recognized, and training here includes both the Aristotelian μάθησις and ἀσκήσις (Diog. Laert. v. 18). It is striking how large a vocabulary St. Paul has for sins of speech (cf. St. James also), and in the only place where he uses ἀκρατεὶς, side by side with it occurs διάβολοι (2 Ti 3³). Perhaps the reason for this emphasis on such sins is that these have always been a peculiar failing of the East.

As a strict terminus ethicus, however, ἐγκράτεια, as Aristotle points out, was restricted to control over the sensual desires—the desires for food, drink, and sexual indulgence. Similar to this is the usage in Sir 18^{30-19³}, a passage which is headed Ἐγκρατεία ψυχῆς. There gluttonous luxury (τροφή), wine, and women (οἶνος καὶ γυναῖκες) are condemned. 'Wine and women will make men of understanding to fall away: and he that cleaveth to harlots will be the more reckless' (19²). The passage may well be contrasted with 2 P 1⁹⁻¹⁰. In the one passage we have the advance in virtue of the man who makes provision (ἐπιχορηγήσατε) for the development of faith; in the other, the descent in vice of him who makes provision (χορηγήσεις) for his lusts.

* The non-ethical meaning occurs in 2 Mac 10¹⁵, 17: οἱ ἰδουμαῖοι ἐγκρατεῖς ἐπικαίρων οὐχυρωμάτων ὄντες, 'being masters of important strongholds'; ἐγκρατεῖς ἐγένοντο τῶν τόπων, 'they made themselves masters of the positions.'

Even inside this domain of sensual desires the word differs from σωφροσύνη, with which in popular speech it was often identified, for the latter indicates not only that a man has control of his passions, but that he has an easy mastery over them. Σωφροσύνη extends also to the highest faculties of man, which ἐγκράτεια when accurately used does not. In the σώφρων the passions are entirely harmonized with one another and unitedly under the persuasive hegemony of the reason, the more violent passions being thus excluded. On the other hand, the ἐγκρατής is subject to strong desires, which he can control only with difficulty and effort. This use of ἐγκράτεια agrees well with the manner in which St. Paul describes those Corinthians whose lusts were as a hidden fire or the heathen who burned towards one another in lust.

Ἐγκράτεια is thus lower in the moral scale than σωφροσύνη but higher than ἀκολασία (a term not found in the NT). The ἀκόλαστος has definitely adopted pleasure as his good and pursues it without qualms of conscience. The ἀκρατής knows what is right, but either his passions are too strong for him or he sophisticates his reason into thinking that in any particular action the doing of it is good for him. He may be compared to a State which passes good legislation but does not carry it out. The ἐγκρατής would carry it out by force if necessary. His morality at times may be a police and military morality, whereas the σώφρων may be compared to a State in which the citizens obey good laws instinctively and lovingly without the necessity of force, where right is followed easily because it is right. Aristotle also draws moral distinctions inside this virtue itself, saying that the incontinence of anger is not so bad as that of premeditated lust. The one is a momentary impulse, the other is crafty, full of stratagems in order to gratify the 'goddess of the Cyprian isle, artisan of many a wile.' There is no doubt that this is true. St. Paul when he lost his temper before the high priest was not so culpable as David in the case of Bathsheba, though both were guilty of a breach of ἐγκράτεια. We have a conspicuous example of temperance in Joseph in Potiphar's house, where everything conspired against him to test his self-control. The Greek moralist recognizes also those who are incontinent by heredity, by temperament, and by habit. In the discussion of this virtue the Greek thinker came face to face with the problem which confronted St. Paul also (Ro 7)—the problem of moral inability (ἀκρασία). 'How can any one with a right conception of duty be incontinent?' This is the standing moral difficulty of Greek ethics, and indeed of all ethics. In the letter of Aristeeas a similar question is asked: 'Why do not the majority of men take possession of virtue?' and it is answered thus—ὅτι φυσικῶς πάντες ἀκρατεῖς καὶ ἐν τὰς ἡδονὰς πρεσβύμενοι γυγνῶσιν (H. B. Swete, Introduction to the OT in Greek, London, 1900, p. 567). Socrates and Plato tried to solve the problem as one of knowledge; hence their insistence on a right education, because to them 'Vice is Ignorance.' Aristotle sees deeper: He maintains that the Socratic view is contrary to experience, but on the whole his solution of the moral problem is intellectual (Eudem. Eth. vii. 111). But how lame this is when it is contrasted with St. Paul's view! The exceeding sinfulness of sin, the rebellion of the will against law, even Divine law, the bitter cry, 'O wretched man that I am!' all reveal how deep Christian insight goes in its diagnosis of the moral condition of man; but this only in order to show the radicalness of the needed cure, the greatness of the moral regenerating power issuing from the Redeemer, and the glory of the deliverance effected for man and in man by Him. Greek thinkers were always prone to solve moral difficulties by placing emphasis on the sway of reason in the soul, but what if the reason itself be as disturbed and distorted as the other faculties? What if prior to education there are needed regeneration and repentance—a change affecting a man at the very centre of his personality? 'The Old World knew nothing of Conversion; instead of an Ecce Homo, they had only some Choice of Hercules. . . . What to Plato was but a hallucination, and to Socrates a chimera, is now clear and certain to your Zinzendorfs, your Wesleys, and the poorest of their Pietists and Methodists' (Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, bk. ii. ch. x.). This is after all the great crux in regard to temperance—not a minute analysis of the virtue itself, not a punctilious set of prohibitions and allowances, but its creation in the regeneration of the total character; and this can never be effected satisfactorily by crushing the emotions even to purify the intellect. The mind itself must be moved with a nobler passion, and it is because Christ does this that He is the Saviour of men. To those who indulged in wine wherein is profligacy the command is to be filled with the Spirit—one exalted emotional state is contrasted with another of a different quality.

To the regenerated man there remains the further question, viz. how his new life can be fostered and developed in a corrupt society and in a soul weak and imperfect. Certain things and states are dangerous, and temperance is thus essential. St. Paul is acutely conscious, for instance, of the danger of sexual lust. What does ἐγκράτεια mean in this respect? Does it in its perfection imply celibacy and virginity? This was the view that ultimately gained ground in the Roman Catholic Church, where the clergy cannot marry; and some would so read St. Paul in 1 Co 7, but without justification. St. Paul knew that in a city like Corinth it was almost imperative that men should marry, because otherwise they could not be continent. But if one can be continent without marriage, then his energies are more at the disposal of Christian service. It is clear that St. Paul is not here preaching celibacy per se as a duty. Continence is above celibacy or above marriage. His theme is the necessity of ἐγκράτεια. 'But he mentions himself rather than say ἐν ἐγκρατείᾳ to show that continence is not a utopian dream. Pierius, the Alexandrian commentator in the third century (Jerome, Ep. 49, Ad Pamm.), is not the last to maintain that the Apostle in this verse preaches celibacy' (T. C. Edwards, *1 Corinthians*², London, 1885, p. 162). To the Apostle marriage with continence is infinitely better than celibacy with concupiscence. Yet we find this view of ἐγκράτεια as celibacy gaining ground in the Church itself till it assumed the form of organized asceticism. The Encratites enjoined abstinence from marriage altogether. Tatian (Eus. HE iv. 29) says it is 'corruption and fornication,' εὐθρα καὶ πορνεία. This attitude is distinctly called a doctrine of demons by St. Paul (1 Ti 4¹⁻²), and was condemned by the Church on the ground of its dualistic basis, but the Church itself enjoined Encratite ethics on the clergy—without the Encratite foundation—while allowing the laity to be 'temperate' in marrying. The influences which brought this about were the real moral reactions against gross impurity and the consequent contempt of the marriage state—a contempt utterly alien to the practice and the ideal of Judaism. St. Peter speaks of the chaste conversation of wives, and St. Paul applies to the married bishop the qualification 'temperate' (Tit 1²).

The temperance of the NT is thus a demand on all—the celibate for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake is higher morally not because of his celibacy but because of his increased energy in the interests of the Kingdom. It is impossible to conceive St. Paul writing letters and treatises on virginity in the manner of the Fathers. He maintains that he himself and all Christians have the liberty to lead about a wife as St. Peter did (1 Co 9³). Although we can see how the rigorous view of ἐγκράτεια developed, and can in a sense justify it, yet this should not blind us to the fundamental difference between it and the NT view (see von Dobschütz, op. cit., p. 259 ff., for an excellent description of this development).

Similarly in regard to wine, animal food, and possessions. When abstinence from these is enjoined on dualistic grounds, then such abstinence is wrong. St. Paul exhorts Timothy to drink wine for his stomach's sake, and, even if we do not agree with those who hold that he was here combating total abstinence, yet it is a proof that such abstinence may be practised on false grounds. In our own times this question of abstinence from intoxicating drinks is the 'temperance' problem, and those who maintain that this abstinence is imperative do so on physiological grounds, on the ground of the tremendous havoc caused by drink, and they can defend it on St. Paul's view that for the sake of the weak brother the strong should avoid the creation of stumbling-blocks (see art. ABSTINENCE).

3. The full Christian ideal of ἐγκράτεια.—The locus classicus for NT temperance is 1 Co 9. Here the Apostle is dealing with the question of Christian liberty, and he unhesitatingly defends liberty in view of meats and drinks, in view of marriage, and also the liberty of the Christian pastor from manual labour because the Church ought to support him. But temperance comes in in the forgoing of these, if need be, for the sake of effectiveness in Christian work. The freeman of Christ is living in a world full of dangers. He has to face customs innocent in themselves but inextricably bound up with sinful temptations; he has to gain men, steeped in traditions and prejudices, to Christ; he has to think of brethren less advanced than himself, and he has to remember his own sinful tendencies. He is thus like an athlete with a race to run or a pugilist with an antagonist to knock out. The athlete or the pugilist had to undergo a rigorous training beforehand. For ten months before the actual contest, he was under oath to follow a prescribed diet (ἀναγκοπαγία) and a strenuous training (δοκίμις). He had to abstain 'venere et vino' (see Horace, Ars Poetica, 412 ff., Epict. Enchir. 3. 5, and Wetstein, in loc.). St. Paul applies all this to the Christian, and can illustrate it by his own conduct. The best commentary is 2 Co 6³⁷. It is possible to misunderstand all this impassioned rhetoric of the Apostle and to justify by it not only fasts and restrictions but also positive flagellation and even self-mutilation, but fortunately in Colossians the Apostle himself has made this impossible. The ἀφειδία τοῦ σώματος (Col 2²³) is not in the Apostle's mind. It is not the material of the body he fights, but the body as the organ of sin, and his disciplining is abundantly furnished by what he has to endure in the pursuit of the great end, viz. gaining others to Christ and self-progress in likeness to Him. His thorn in the flesh he prays against. He would never manufacture means of pain. Lecky is right in condemning useless self-sacrifice and unnecessary suffering, and St. Paul would never approve of Newinan's patient (cf. Map of Life, ed. London, 1901, pp. 56, 57). Men can be temperate on very low grounds.

The hunter can 'despise pleasure, and bear cold, hunger, and fatigue, as if they were no evils.' Cf. Hor. Car. i. i. 25.

"Manet sub Jove frigido

Venator, tenera conjugis immemor,

Seu visa est catulis cervæ fidelibus,

Seu rupit teretes Marsus aper plagas"

(Thomas Reid, Works, ed. Edinburgh, 1849, p. 579).

But it is not Christian temperance unless the aim is Christian, and St. Paul here has more in view—ininitely more—than mere physical self-control. To him the body itself is part of the personality to be redeemed and to rise with Christ a spiritual body. Christian temperance includes the guiding, directing, controlling, of all faculties and actions, the forgoing of privileges, the risking of reputation for others in order that they may be won to Christ. When a man can so stand against sensual dangers, against pedantic criticism, against self-ease and self-praise, against the accidents of fortune and the rage of enemies, and meet them all as a disciplined army meets the foe, and all this ἐν ἀγνότητι (2 Co 6⁶), in absolute purity of motive and temper, mind and body, then he is temperate in this wide, all-embracing sense.

LITERATURE.—See art. SOBRIETY, SOBERNESS; Plato, Republic, tr. B. Jowett³, Oxford, 1888, Index, s.v. 'Temperance'; Aristotle, Eudem. Ethics, bk. vii.; E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., London, 1904, esp. ch. xvi., and Notes 5 ('Vegetarianism among the Ancients') and 6 ('On the Terminology of Morality'). Consult numerous treatises on cardinal virtues: H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, 1874, s.v. 'Temperance'; T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, Oxford, 1883, bk. iii. ch. v.; E. Norman Gardiner, Greek Athletic Sports and Festivals, London, 1910. For Encraticism see Eusebius, HE, McGiffert's note, Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, Oxford, 1890, p. 208; A. G. Mortimer, The Chief Virtues of Man, London, 1904, p. 79 ff.; D. T. Young, The Enthusiasm of God, do., 1905, p. 217 ff.; J. Iverach, The Other Side of Greatness, do., 1906, p. 103 ff.; J. Clark Murray, A Handbook of Christian Ethics, Edinburgh, 1908, ch. iv. All text-books on Ethics deal with the virtue of temperance: cf. J. S. Mackenzie, Manual of Ethics, London, 1900, bk. iii. ch. iv.; J. Dewey and J. H. Tufts, Ethics, do., 1909, Index, s.v. 'Temperance'; J. Rickaby, Moral Philosophy, do., 1888. Consult also Gr. Lexicons, s.v. ἐγκράτεια; and NT Commentaries in loc. Suicer, i. 998, gives a full account of the later usage.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

TEMPLE.—The articles under this heading in HDB, DCG, and EBi make another description of the Temple and its services unnecessary. What is relevant here is an indication of the significance of the sanctuary and its ritual in apostolic Christianity.

1. Jewish Christians and the Temple.—St. Luke evidently attached much importance to the fact recorded at the end of his Gospel, that after the resurrection of Christ the apostles 'were continually in the temple, blessing God' (Lk 24⁵³). Their assurance of Jesus' Messiahship, proved by His victory over death, made no breach in the continuity of their Jewish faith and practice. It rather revealed to their minds a new wealth of meaning in the old ritual, and so fired themselves as worshippers with a new enthusiasm. A. C. McGiffert (History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 64 f.) thinks that 'it may fairly be supposed that the effect of their Christian faith was to make all of the early disciples more devout and earnest Jews than they had ever been.' 'We have distinct evidence that Christian Jews like other Jews frequented the temple, the sanctuary of the nation, and thereby maintained their claim to be Jews in the true sense' (K. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, London, 1894, p. 45). After the baptism of fire on the Day of Pentecost they are found 'continuing stedfastly with one accord in the temple' (Ac 2⁴⁶). Peter and John went up into the Temple at the hour of prayer (3¹), and in the fulfilment of their commission as witnesses for Christ (1⁸) they found their best audiences in the Temple-courts. At the Beautiful Gate—either the Gate of Nicanor leading into the court of the Israelites or the Eastern Gate of the outer court—they moved the crowd by performing an act of healing in Christ's name; and in Solomon's Porch—the long colonnade in the east of the Temple area—Peter testified to the raising of the Prince of Life whom the rulers had in ignorance killed. It is significant that two apostles were arrested not by the religious, but by the secular authorities, i.e. the head of the Temple police (στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ) and the Sadducees (Ac 4¹); and, if their freedom of speech was somewhat curtailed, this was not because of their attitude to the Temple and its services, which was evidently quite correct, but simply because they were said to be exciting the multitude and disturbing the peace. The reproof administered to them was as mild as their confinement was brief; and the Christian Jews, finding that they could not be excluded from the Temple precincts, continued to make Solomon's Porch their ordinary rendezvous (5¹). A second arrest of apostles followed, but the report has it that the angel who released them bade them go and speak in the Temple all the words of this life (5¹⁷⁻²⁰), and accordingly they are again found standing there and teaching the people (5²⁰). Until the appearance of Stephen created a new situation, the apostles were daily in the Temple, teaching and preaching Jesus as the Messiah. Against so strict and thoroughgoing Jews the guardians of the national religion, as embodied in the Temple and its cultus, had no ground of complaint, and the apostles on their side 'could still cherish the hope that the nation at large might be brought to turn and bow the knee to its true Messiah' (Hort, op. cit., p. 45 f.). For the present the bearing of their teaching upon the Temple itself was but dimly, if at all, perceived, and wholly unexpressed.

2. Stephen and the Temple.—It was the proto-martyr that brought Christianity into open conflict with Judaism. His attitude to the Temple has been variously understood. He was accused of speaking 'blasphemous words against Moses, and against the law' (Ac 6¹¹), of ceasing not 'to speak words against this holy place and the law' (v. 13). C. von Weizsacker (Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i. [London, 1897] 64) holds that his speech does not by any means refute the grounds of complaint. On the contrary, it is at least in part equivalent to a substantial justification of the doctrine complained of, since it declares at its close that the worship of God in this temple 'made with hands' had never been in accordance with the will of God. F. Spitta (Die Apostelgeschichte, Halle, 1891, p. 105 f.) also thinks that the building of the Temple is represented by Stephen as an unauthorized and presumptuous act. Teaching of such a kind, however, would have brought Stephen into collision not only with the Hellenistic Jews, but with the whole body of Christians in Jerusalem. It seems much more likely that he made no theoretical attack upon the Mosaic Law, while his declaration that 'the Most High dwelleth not in houses made with hands' (7⁴⁸⁻⁵⁰) was so far from being new that it merely echoed the words of Solomon at the dedication of the first Temple (1 Ks 7⁷). It was not the worship but the spirit of the worshippers that aroused his scornful indignation. Warning them, in the manner of the old prophets, that no amount of attention to outward ordinances could ever secure the favour of God, he demanded a spiritual as opposed to a mechanical religion. If he was in the habit of repeating Christ's prediction of the destruction of the Temple at the Parousia—and this was probably what gave colour to the charges made against him—he interpreted that threat not as an abrogation of the Mosaic Law, but as a judgment upon the nation for its sin. The third Temple might fall as the first had fallen, and yet the Torah itself remain intact. 'To call Stephen a forerunner of Paul, and to think of him as anticipating in any way Paul's treatment of the Jewish law and his assertion of a free Gentile Christianity, is to misunderstand him' (McGiffert, op. cit., p. 89). For him, as for every other Jewish Christian in Jerusalem, the Law, without distinction of moral and ceremonial precepts, was 'ordained of angels'; in his view the nation's treatment of its prophets and its Messiah was the supreme proof that the Law had not been kept; and the burden of his preaching was a call to Jerusalem not to close her Temple and abolish her ritual, but to take the lead in a national repentance for a broken Law.

3. St. Paul and the Temple.—The recognition of the validity of a Christianity to which Jerusalem and the Temple were negligible quantities was the result of a protracted controversy in which St. Paul was the champion of freedom. For him the observance of the ancient ritual laws and traditions, which had so long been a matter of principle, becomes at last one of indifference. He is consequently accused of 'teaching all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses' (Ac 21²¹). This he never did, and, to prove that the charge was groundless, he was advised, during his last visit to Jerusalem, to conciliate the great mass of Christian Jews by performing the vow of a Nazirite in the Temple. Weizsacker thinks that in the whole narrative of this episode 'practically nothing is historical' (op. cit., ii. [London, 1895] 14; but McGiffert holds 'that Paul may well have done just what he is reported to have done' (op. cit., p. 343). Had he been advised by James to prove that he habitually observed the Law as a matter of conscience, he could never have consented. But he had long been in the habit of identifying himself in things non-essential now with Jews and now with Gentiles in order that he might 'win some of them' (1 Co 9²⁰), and the last instance of conformity was merely the most striking. What impression the object-lesson actually made upon the law-abiding Christian Jews for whom it was specially intended is not recorded; but it clearly had other results which were not anticipated, for the Jews rose in arms against St. Paul as a profaner of the Temple, and the Romans arrested him as a disturber of the peace.

4. St. James and the Temple.—James the Just, the Lord's brother, represented two ideas—the continuance of the Church in union with the Temple, and the hope of the conversion of Israel. He was the acknowledged leader of those Christians who were zealous for the Law (ἐπιλωταὶ τοῦ νομοῦ, Ac 21²⁰). If he conceded the principle of Gentile Christian freedom, he did it reluctantly. He was the staunch defender not only of the primacy but of the permanence of Judaic Christianity. After his martyrdom (Euseb. HE ii. 23) his spirit and ideal survived for a time, but the swift and dramatic evolution of events made the position of the Christian Church in the Jewish nation and under the Law more and more untenable. When the excitement of the conflict with Rome gradually became intense, and the inevitable crisis approached, the Christians found it necessary (about A.D. 67) to quit Jerusalem and migrate to the Hellenistic city of Pella, beyond the Jordan. Their hope of a Jewish national Church, centralized in the Temple and giving both law and gospel to mankind, had at least to be postponed. But in this instance postponement meant ultimate abandonment. In three years the Temple was destroyed, Jewish nationality shattered, and St. James's theory of a hegemony of Judaic Christianity confuted by the remorseless logic of history. But a far higher ideal could then be realized. 'The hour cometh, when neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father' (Jn 4²¹). 'And he showed me the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God. . . . And I saw no temple therein' (Rev 21¹⁰—).

LITERATURE.—A. Hausrath, History of the NT Times, London, 1895, ii. 176 ff.; E. F. Scott, The Apologetic of the NT, do., 1907, p. 73 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

TEMPLE-KEEPER.—See DIANA.

TEMPTATION, TRIAL.—'Temptation' is the AV translation of πειρασμός in every instance except one (1 P 4¹²); and generally in RV, but not in Ac 20¹⁹, Rev 3¹⁰, 1 P 4¹², where we find 'trials,' 'trial,' and 'prove.' The cognate verb is usually tr. 'tempt,' but we also find 'assay,' Ac 9²⁶ and 16⁷ (AV and RV) 24⁶ (RV); 'go about,' 24⁶ (AV); 'examine,' 2 Co 13³ (AV), 'try' (RV). The compound verb ἐκπειράζω is tr. 'tempt' by both Eng. versions (1 Co 10⁹). The tempter is ὁ πειράζων (1 Th 3⁵, AV and RV). Ἀπειράστος is rendered 'cannot be tempted' (Ja 1¹³, AV and RV).

'Trial' in AV represents δοκιμή (2 Co 8²; RV 'proof'); δοκίμιον (1 P 1⁷; RV 'proof'); πειρα (He 11³⁸, AV and RV). 'Try' represents δοκιμάζω (1 Co 3¹³, 1 Th 2⁴, 1 P 1⁷, 1 Jn 4¹; RV 'prove'), which, however, in RV is always and in AV is more frequently tr. 'prove' or 'approve' (for 'approve' see G. L. Craik, The English of Shakespeare, London, 1869, p. 147f.); πειράζω (He 11¹⁷, Rev 2-10³¹⁰, AV and RV 'try'); πειρασμός (1 P 4¹²; RV 'prove'). 'Tried' is δδοκίμος (Ja 1¹²; RV 'approved'), in every other instance tr. 'approve' in both AV and RV.

To 'tempt' does not always mean to 'seduce to sin.' The Gr. word usually so tr. may mean merely 'attempt.' St. Paul 'attempted' to join himself to the disciples (Ac 9²⁰). He 'attempted' to go into Bithynia (16⁷). He was accused of 'attempting' to profane the Temple (24⁶). It may mean to 'try,' 'examine,' in order to ascertain the quality or nature of a thing or person. 'The hour of trial or temptation . . . is to come . . . to try or tempt them that dwell upon the earth' (Rev 3¹⁰). The angel of the church in Ephesus 'tried' or 'tempted' them which called themselves apostles and were not, and found them false (2²). 'Temptations' may be circumstances which give a man an opportunity of showing what is in him. Thus St. James exhorts his readers to count it all joy when they fall into manifold 'temptations' (1-). The ancient worthies were 'tempted,' and acquitted themselves like the heroes they were (He 11³⁷). St. Paul met with 'trials' which befell him by the plots of the Jews (Ac 20¹⁹; cf. He 11³⁶). Sometimes it is clear that the hope is entertained that the person tempted will stand the test. Abraham was 'tried,' and offered up Isaac (He 11¹⁷). St. Paul exhorts the Corinthians to 'try' themselves, to 'prove' themselves (2 Co 13³). The angel of the church in Smyrna is warned that some of them will be cast into prison that they may be 'tried' (Rev 2¹⁰). St. Peter tells his readers that the fiery trial (πυρώσις) among them cometh upon them to 'tempt' or to 'prove' them (1 P 4¹²). St. Paul rejoices that the 'temptation' to the Galatians in his flesh was overcome by them (Gal 4¹⁴). 'God cannot be tempted with evil' (Ja 1¹³), but there is a sense in which He may be 'tempted' or 'tried.' Men by their sinful and rebellious conduct may provoke Him to display His righteous indignation against sin, and when they act otherwise than in accordance with His will they may be said to be 'tempting' or 'trying' Him. Thus St. Peter says that Ananias and Sapphira are 'tempting' the Spirit of the Lord by their deceit with regard to their property (Ac 5⁹). The same Apostle asserts that the brethren are 'tempting' God by wishing to subject the Gentile converts to circumcision (15¹⁰). In the day of temptation in the wilderness the Israelites 'tempted' God (He 3⁸, 1 Co 10⁹). There are not a few instances in which 'temptation' means seduction to sin or exposure to the danger of falling before it. 'They that desire to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare' (1 Ti 6⁹). The married amongst the Corinthians are warned to beware lest Satan 'tempt' them because of their incontinency (1 Co 7⁵). St. Paul is afraid lest the Thessalonians have yielded to the 'temptation' to apostasy (1 Th 3⁵). He exhorts the Galatians to be considerate towards those who have been overtaken in any trespass, lest they also should be 'tempted' (6¹). St. James describes the course which temptation when unresisted takes. 'Each man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed. Then the lust, when it hath conceived, beareth sin' (1¹⁴). In the sense of enticing to evil it is Satan that tempts men. He is the tempter. St. Paul is anxious lest 'the tempter' had 'tempted' the Thessalonians, and his labour should be in vain (1 Th 3⁵). Satan may 'tempt' the Corinthians (1 Co 7⁵). Men transgress by the suggestions of 'the adversary' (Clem. Rom. li. 1). In this sense of the word God tempts no man (Ja 1¹³). He rather so regulates the temptation that men may be able to resist it. 'God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make also the way of escape, that ye may be able to endure it' (1 Co 10¹³). He 'knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation' (2 P 2⁹); and this is true also when 'temptation' means 'distress.' The Mighty One hath not forgotten the house of Israel in 'temptation' (in tentatione, 4 Ezr 12⁴⁷). Christ, too, succours the 'tempted.' Having been tempted Himself in all points like as we are, yet without sin (He 4¹⁵), having Himself suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted (2¹⁸).

Temptation, whether arising from trying circumstances or from incitement to sin, if successfully encountered, leads to progress in the moral life and to blessedness. Among the Agrapha is the saying, 'A man is unproved (ἀδοκίμος) if he be untempted' (ἀπειράστος, Didasc. Syr. ii. 8). Tertullian reports one to the effect that 'neminem intentatum regna cœlestia consecuturum' (de Bapt. 20). Faith tested results in patience (Ja 1²). 'Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he hath been approved (δδοκίμος), he shall receive the crown of life' (1¹). Those whose faith withstands manifold temptations shall receive praise and glory and honour (1 P 1⁶).

We have seen that the Gr. words usually rendered 'temptation' and 'tempt' sometimes have the meaning of trying or testing. But words used more frequently with these meanings are δοκιμή and its cognates, and in the rest of this art. it is with these words that we shall deal. Men and things are 'tried' in order to find out their true nature. Gold is 'tried' with fire (1 P 1⁷). Before partaking of the Lord's Supper a man must 'try' himself (1 Co 11²⁸). Men must 'try' themselves whether they are in the faith (2 Co 13³). Each man must 'try' his own work (Gal 6⁴). 'Test all things; hold fast that which is good' (1 Th 5²¹). Deacons must be 'proved' before they are allowed to serve (1 Ti 3¹⁰). Fire 'tests' the work of men (1 Co 3¹³). God 'tests' or 'examines' men's hearts (1 Th 2⁴). 'Prove the spirits, whether they are of God' (1 Jn 4¹). Sometimes it is evident that it is hoped that the testing will have a favourable result, and it may be pointed out that Satan is never said to 'test' men. St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians that he might know the 'proof' of them, whether they were obedient in all things (2 Co 2⁹). He 'proves' through the earnestness of others the sincerity of their love (8⁸). Frequently it appears to be taken for granted that the object 'tested' will be or has been found worthy. The Jew 'approveth' the things that are excellent (? Ro 2¹⁸). It is hoped that the Philippians will do the same (1⁹). Men may 'approve' what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God (Ro 12²). St. Paul has been 'approved' of God (1 Th 2⁴).

The Ephesians are exhorted to 'approve' what is well-pleasing unto the Lord (5¹⁰). Occasionally the word seems to mean 'to pass a verdict of worthiness upon.' 'Whomsoever ye shall approve by letters, them will I send' (1 Co 16³). 'Happy is he that judgeth not himself in that which he approveth' (Ro 14-).

One who conducts himself nobly under trial has advanced a step beyond patience (Ro 5⁴). He has attained a trustworthy character (Ph 2²²; cf. 2 Co 8-). He is 'approved' (δοκιμος). If the result of the testing is unsatisfactory, he is 'reprobate' (ἀδόκιμος). He who serves Christ in the Kingdom of God is 'approved' of men (Ro 14¹⁸). Apelles is 'the approved in Christ' (Ro 16¹⁰). One who refused to countenance divisions (αἰρέσεις) in the Church is 'approved' (1 Co 11¹⁹). 'Approval' means not self-commendation, but the commendation of the Lord (2 Co 10¹³). A workman needing not to be ashamed is 'approved' unto God (2 Ti 2¹⁵). Doing that which is honourable brings a person real, as distinguished from seeming, 'approval' (2 Co 13⁷).

LITERATURE.—EBi, art. 'Trial, Trying,' HDB, art. 'Tempt, Temptation,' DCG, art. 'Temptation'; SDB, art. 'Temptation'; *Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament*², Freiburg, 1892, s.v. 'Versuchung' in Indexes; H. Ewald, Old and New Testament Theology, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1888, p. 263 ff.; F. W. Robertson, Sermons, 1st ser., London, 1875, serm. vii.; John Foster, Lectures, do., 1853, i. 42 ff.

WILLIAM WATSON.

TEN.—See NUMBERS.

TENT, TENT-MAKING.—In only one instance is σκηνη translated 'tent.' This occurs in He 11⁹ RV, where 'tents' replaces 'tabernacles' of AV. Other passages containing σκηνη are dealt with under art. TABERNACLE. Of the derived meanings the only one that need be remarked on is found in 2 Co 5⁴, where σκῆνος (τό) in the sense of 'tabernacle' or 'bodily frame' evidently arises from the 'light tent-house that has no permanency' (A. Deissmann, St. Paul, London, 1912, p. 62; cf. p. 51); cf. σκηνώμα (2 P 1¹³⁻¹⁴) and the metaphor underlying το ἀνάλυσαι (Ph 1²³), ἀνάλωσις (2 Ti 4⁶), 'breaking up' (an encampment); see J. B. Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, London, 1878, p. 93.

The chief interest centres in the compound word 'tentmakers' (σκηνοποιοί), occurring in Ac 18³. The clause in which it appears is not found in Codex Bezae. This omission is significant in view of the indefiniteness of 20³⁴ (see W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 159, and St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 253). The collocation διὰ τὸ ὀρυτέχον εἶναι and ἦσαν γὰρ σκηνοποιοὶ τῇ τέχνῃ is felt by Ramsay to be awkward (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 253). In spite of this, most commentators are content to accept the additional clause (bracketed, AV; without brackets, RV), and devote attention to the nature of the craft or trade pursued by St. Paul. In regard to this, opinion is divided as to whether he was a weaver of the cloth for tents or whether, the cloth being supplied, he shaped and sewed this together to make tents (see W. M. Furneaux, The Acts of the Apostles, Oxford, 1912, p. 294; F. Godet, Introduction to the New Testament, The Epistles of St. Paul, Edinburgh, 1894, p. 69 f.). The word employed (σκηνοποιοί) favours the latter view, inasmuch as it names tents and not materials for tents. It may be objected, however, that the manipulation of the web for the specific purpose of tent-making was not sufficient to call for special artisans. All the processes of spinning, weaving, shaping, and sewing together are combined by the Bedouin of the present day (I. Benzinger, *Hebräische Archäologie*², Tübingen, 1907, pp. 88, 146). On the other hand, the fact that St. Paul was a native of Cilicia, where the industry of weaving goat's hair into a rough kind of cloth was general, supports the former view (E. Schürer, HJP II. i. [Edinburgh, 1835] 44 n.; HDB iii. 699^a). It is permissible to think that this cilicium, as it was called, passed as an article of commerce in the form of a web of stated dimensions, which would require adjustment before it could be used for particular purposes. On the whole, the likelihood is that St. Paul and his fellow-craftsmen made neither the web nor the complete tent, but curtains of several webs' width, which, when hung, formed tents (SDB, art. 'Spinning and Weaving').

Chrysostom's σκηνοβάφρος (from βάφω, 'sew or stitch together') would seem to point to the craft of tent-tailor, but the alternative σκυτοποιος, also given by him (and Origen), shows that he probably had another material, viz. leather, in his mind. That St. Paul was a worker in leather is accepted by J. Moffatt (*The Historical New Testament*², Edinburgh, 1901, p. 445; cf. H. A. W. Meyer, Acts of the Apostles, Edinburgh, 1877, ii. 131 f.). For a discussion of σκηνοποιος, 'saddler,' probably a confusion with σκηνοποιός (EGT, 'Acts,' London, 1900, p. 385), see ExpT viii. [1896-97] 109, 153, 286.

LITERATURE.—This is sufficiently indicated in the article.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

TERTIUS (Τέρτιος, a Latin name).—Tertius is the amanuensis of St. Paul who in Ro 16- interposes a greeting in his own name to the Apostle's readers, 'I Tertius, who write the epistle, salute you in the Lord' (RV), or possibly, 'I Tertius salute you, who write the epistle in the Lord' (ἀσπάζομαι ὑμᾶς ἐγὼ Τέρτιος ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν ἐν κυρίῳ). That St. Paul generally dictated his letters and added a few words in his own handwriting is clear from 1 Co 16²¹, Gal 6¹¹, Col 4¹⁸, 2 Th 3¹⁷, and probably Philem¹⁹. The amanuensis no doubt took down the Apostle's words in shorthand, which was extensively used at the time, and later wrote out the letter for transmission (the employment of different amanuenses has been thought to account to some extent for the considerable diversity of style in the Pauline Epistles; see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'⁴, 1900, p. 1x). Then St. Paul took up the pen and authenticated the letter, thus guarding against the palming off of forged documents under his name. Other postscripts of this kind have been suspected in the doxology (Ro 16²⁵⁻²⁷) and in 2 Co 13^{11a}, Ph 4^{21a}, 1 Th 5^{23a}. All this was quite in accordance with the custom of the time. If we can suppose, with some, that the 'stake in the flesh' from which the Apostle suffered was ophthalmia, or that he was unfamiliar with the use of the pen owing to his manual labour of tent-making, there would seem to be sufficient reason for St. Paul following the custom. Nothing further is known of Tertius. It is quite as unlikely that St. Paul kept a regular secretary as that Tertius was a slave whom he hired to do the work. He must have been a faithful attendant and companion of the Apostle, who, whether the alternative rendering given above be correct or not, 'wrote the epistle in the Lord,' i.e. as a Christian, in a spirit of loving service (see G. Milligan, Thessalonians, 1903, Note A, p. 124 ff.). His personal salutation does not necessarily imply that he was known to those to whom the letter was directed. If its destination was Rome, it is just possible that, as he bears a Latin name and was perhaps a Roman, he may have had friends among those whom the Apostle greets. If we suppose that the salutations were sent to Ephesian Christians, we may conjecture that Tertius had met many of them on the missionary journeys on which he may have accompanied St. Paul.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

TERTULLUS.—Tertullus, a diminutive of Tertius, was the name of the 'orator' employed by the Jews to lay their case against St. Paul before Felix (Ac 24¹). The term 'orator' indicates that the man belonged to the class of hired pleaders often employed in the provincial courts by those ignorant alike of Roman law and of the Latin tongue, in which as a rule all judicial procedure was carried on (but see Lewin, St. Paul, ii. 156). The speech delivered by Tertullus and briefly summarized in Ac 24 shows us the devices employed by such special pleaders. He seeks to conciliate the judge by flattering, if not very truthful, allusions to his actions as governor, particularly to his having established peace in the province (v. 2), no doubt a reference to the suppression of the bands of robbers that infested the country (Jos. Ant. XX. viii. 5, BJ II. xiii. 2). He carefully selects the points in the prisoner's career fitted to create the impression that St. Paul was a danger to the Roman rule—an exciter of sedition, a leader of a sect, a profaner of the Temple (vv. 5, 6). In all probability Tertullus was a Roman, and not a Jew, as has been supposed by Blass (Com. in loc.). It was customary for budding Roman pleaders to practise for a time in the provinces. The fact that in his speech Tertullus uses the plural form and speaks of 'our law' does not by any means prove Jewish birth or nationality. The advocate naturally speaks from the point of view of his clients.

LITERATURE.—R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 476; T. Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 2 vols., 1875, ii. 156 ff.; art. 'Tertullus' in UDB; F. W. Blass, Acta Apostolorum, 1890, in loc.; H. H. Wendt and H. A. W. Meyer, Acts, 1899, in loc. W. F. BOYD.

TESTAMENT.—See COVENANT.

TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS.

—Introductory.—The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs consists of a series of discourses assigned to the twelve sons of Jacob, varying in theme and style, but all more or less on the same general plan—(i.) some personal reminiscences; (ii.) some moral advice or psychological discussion; and (iii.) some predictions, usually including a warning to submit to the headship of Levi and Judah. The third section is invariably interpolated with Christian additions, which seldom occur in the other parts. The main theme in each Testament varies greatly; in one the interest may be moral, in another ceremonial and religious, in another military and political, in another psychological. In all except two Joseph is held up as an example of chastity or forgiveness. The references in Test. Naph. v. 7, vi. 6 are to the history of the Northern Kingdom but are quite free from the hostile comments passed on it in the Hebrew Test. Naph. i. 8, etc.

The work survives in a Greek primary version, valuable attestation being afforded by the secondary Armenian version, which towards the end of the book is remarkably free from Christian interpolations. The original work was written in Hebrew in the later years of John Hyrcanus, probably 109–106 B.C. The author was no doubt a Pharisee. He believes in the Resurrection and in angels, and lays great stress on prayer, almsgiving, and fasting. Visions are mentioned six times.

The work is remarkable for its high ethical teaching, in which it approaches nearer the NT than any other Jewish pseudepigraph, and for its expectation of a Messiah from the tribe of Levi. In the Resurrection life, however, the figure of the Messiah vanishes and in the reconstituted nation each tribe is ruled by its ancestor.

There are a number of Jewish interpolations of the 1st cent. B.C., some of which are as bitter in their attacks on the Hasmoneans as the original Testaments were fervent in their praises.

The Christian interpolations, which were somewhat limited in scope by their assumed context, reveal no great reflexion and an absence of developed theology. The Incarnation is crudely expressed, and there is one instance of Patripassian phraseology. Though there are several references to Baptism, there is not one to the Eucharist.

1. Contents.—The Testament of Reuben ('concerning thoughts,' β).—He implores his brethren and children to avoid fornication; for his own sin he was smitten with a sore disease for seven months, and would have perished but for the prayer of his father Jacob. On recovery he repented with abstinence from flesh and wine for seven years. In this period he received revelations concerning the seven spirits of deceit (i. 1–iii. 6, ii. 3–iii. 2 but is an interpolation, with Stoic affinities, describing the seven bodily senses). He bids his hearers beware of women, and confesses how he fell; advises them to set their mind on good works, study, and their flocks; impresses upon them the deadliness of fornication (iii. 8–iv. 7); reminds them of how Joseph conquered temptation (iv. 8–11), how women tempt; he cites the fall of the Watchers; he deprecates the meeting of men and women (v. 1–vi. 4); commands his sons to submit to Levi and bow down before his seed (vi. 5–12). Reuben dies and is ultimately buried in Hebron (vii. 1, 2).

The Testament of Simeon ('concerning envy,' β).—He tells how strong and fearless he was, yet he was jealous of Joseph and plotted his death, because the prince of deceit sent forth the spirit of jealousy and blinded his mind; but God's angel delivered Joseph, as Simeon was away when Joseph came. In punishment for his wrath, Simeon's right hand was half-withered for seven days, whereupon he repented and besought the Lord (i. 1–ii. 14). He warns against the spirit of deceit and envy; it wears away the envier and prompts to murder. After two years' fasting he learnt the remedy—to flee to the Lord; then the evil spirit flees, the envier's mind is lightened, and he sympathizes with the object of his envy (iii. 1–6). He recalls Joseph's forgiving treatment of his brethren; 'he was a good man, and had the Spirit of God within him.' Love expels envy with all its distracting power (iv. 1–v. 2). Simeon's descendants shall be few and divided, and not have sovereignty, as they shall be guilty of impurity, and resistance to Levi (v. 3–6). Still, if they forswear envy and still-neckedness, Simeon shall flourish and spread far in the persons of his posterity (vi. 1, 2). Canaan, Amalek, Cappadocia, the Hittites, and Ham shall perish. Shem shall be glorified, and the Lord Himself will appear, and save men; evil spirits shall be trodden under foot, and Simeon shall arise (from the dead) (vi. 3–7). He enjoins obedience to Levi and Judah; from whom will arise the salvation of God: from the one God will raise a High Priest, from the other a King (vii. 1–3). Simeon dies and is ultimately buried in Hebron (viii. 1–ix. 2).

The Testament of Levi ('concerning the priesthood,' β).—At twenty he avenged Dinah. He describes his vision in Abel-Maul, following on his sudden realization of the world's sin. He enters into each of the three ('seven,' β) heavens, which are briefly described (i. 1–iii. 10). He foretells the Judgment (iv. 1). Levi is to be freed from iniquity, and to become to God 'a son, and a servant, and a minister of His presence,' and light up in Jacob the light of knowledge ['until the Lord shall visit all the Gentiles in His tender mercies for ever'] (iv. 2–6). He beholds the heavenly temple, and the Most High, and receives the priesthood from Him (v. 1, 2). The angel who intercedes (so β) for Israel brings him back to earth, and arms him, and bids him execute vengeance on Shechem (v. 3–7). He and Simeon destroy the Shechemites; he had opposed (so c) their being circumcised. He speaks of their outrageous behaviour in general, and declares that 'the wrath of the Lord came upon them to the uttermost' (vi. 1-11). He foretells Jacob's conquest of the Canaanites (vii. 1-3). He describes his second vision; seven angels consecrate him and put on him the high-priestly robes; they foretell his descendants' three-fold offices (i.e. Moses, the Aaronite priesthood, the Maccabæan kings); the third portion shall be called by a new name, and shall establish a new priesthood, and hold a prophetic office (viii. 1-19). At Bethel Jacob is told in vision that Levi is to be priest; he pays tithes to God through him (ix. 1-4). At Hebron Isaac teaches Levi the law of the priesthood (ix. 5-14). [The future captivity of Israel and desolation of Jerusalem, owing to the sins of Levi's posterity (x. 1-5).] * Levi speaks of his marriage and sons (xi. 1-xii. 7). He commands his children to fear God, study the Law, and keep it; wisdom is the only inalienable possession (xiii. 1-9). [His descendants are intended to be the lights of Israel, and of the Gentiles; but they will abrogate the Law, and be guilty of sacrilege, profanity, and impurity. The Temple will be laid waste, and, but for the merits of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, all Israel would perish. For 'seventy weeks' they will go astray and profane the priesthood, and murder 'a man who reneweth the law in the power of the Most High' (xiv. 1-xvi. 5).] [A fragment in which seven jubilee periods are apparently described (xvii. 1-9).] [Another obscure fragment, referring to a fifth week (Ezra and the Return) and a seventh (marked by corruption of the priesthood in pre-Maccabæan times) (xvii. 10, 11).] He foretells the failure of the priesthood, and the rise of a new priest, as a king inaugurating a period of Messianic bliss (xviii. 1-5). ['The heavens shall be opened, and from the temple of glory shall come upon him sanctification, with the Father's voice. . . . And the spirit of understanding and sanctification shall rest upon him'; the Gentiles shall be enlightened, sin shall cease; 'he (or rather 'He'; see § 8) shall open the gates of paradise, and give the saints to eat from the tree of life, and Beliar shall be bound by him (xviii. 6-14).] Levi's sons take an oath to keep the Law (xix. 1-3).

The Testament of Judah ('concerning courage,' β).—Judah was an obedient son. His father blessed him and foretold his kingship (i. 1-6). He performed feats of strength, and slew Canaanite kings at Shechem and Hazor (ii. 1-iv. 3). He describes the storming of various Canaanite towns (v. 1-vii. 11); he speaks of his marriage with Bathshua (viii. 1-3), the war with Esau, who is slain by Jacob, the capture of the Edomite stronghold (ix. 1-8), Er and Onan's sin and death, the evil result of his [Judah's] Canaanite marriage (x. 1-xi. 5, xiii. 1-8). He recounts his own fall (xii. 1-12). Wine leads to fornication, which strips even a king of his kingship. In repentance he took no wine or flesh till his old age. The fear of God is the only safeguard in drinking wine (xiv. 1-xvi. 5). He warns against the love of money and gazing on women: they harm soul and body, and hinder the service of God. Avarice is connected with idolatry. God had mercy on him because he had acted in ignorance (xvii. 1-xix. 4). Two spirits attend man, that of truth [i.e. conscience] and that of deceit; the mind [i.e. will] is free to incline to either (xx. 1-5). He bids his sons love Levi; the priesthood is superior to the kingship (xxi. 1-5). [He foretells the sins of the (Maccabæan) kings, and the fall of the kingdom, till the appearing of God Himself. His sons will commit all manner of sins, be enslaved, repent, and be restored (xxi. 6-xxiii. 5).] The Messiah and His Kingdom shall then come (xxiv. 1-6). The patriarchs shall rise from the dead, and the twelve sons of Jacob shall reign—Levi first, Judah second, etc. He draws a picture of future Messianic bliss (xxv. 1-5). Judah dies (xxvi. 1-4).

The Testament of Issachar ('concerning simplicity,' β).—He begins with Rachel and Leah's dispute about the mandrakes. Rachel's continency is rewarded: she offers the mandrakes to the Lord (i. 1-ii. 5). Issachar was a man of upright character, a husbandman, and generous to the poor and oppressed. He dwells on the peace and power of the single heart. Levi is to have the priesthood and Judah the kingdom; he bids his sons obey both (iii. 1-v. 8). He prophesies the apostasy of his posterity (vi. 1-4). He is not conscious of sin ('unto death,' β). He bids his sons follow his chastity, abstinence, and truthfulness. He dies (vii. 1-9).

The Testament of Zebulun ('concerning compassion and mercy,' β).—He is not conscious of sin, except his suppression of the truth about Joseph. He gives details of the selling of Joseph: his price is spent on sandals by eight of the brethren; his [Zebulun's] grief is described (i. 1-iv. 13). He was compassionate towards man and beast, hence his preservation from sickness and drowning (v. 1-5). He first made a boat to sail, and caught fish; thus he supplied all who had need (vi. 1-8). [He once stole a garment from home to clothe the naked; he showed pity at all times (vii. 1-viii. 3)—in 3 MSS only.] He exhorts to unity; disunion will ruin his posterity (viii. 4-ix. 6); but they will repent, and will finally return on God's appearing. He assures his sons of his own resurrection—he will be their ruler. He dies (ix. 7-x. 7).

The Testament of Dan ('concerning anger and lying,' β).—He confesses his jealousy against Joseph. Anger blinds a man, and masters him body and soul (i. 1-iv. 4). Vexation of soul makes the Lord depart. He bids his sons avoid lying, and love the Lord and one another (iv. 5-v. 3). His sons will fall away and oppose Levi and Judah, but in vain; [their prince is Satan, and they will join Levi and Judah in sin (v. 6, 7)]; he foretells their captivity and return; salvation will arise from Judah and Levi; Beliar will be overthrown; 'the saints shall rest in Eden, and in the New Jerusalem shall the righteous rejoice' (v. 4-13). He bids his sons draw near to God and the angel that intercedes for them, 'for he is a mediator between God and man.' On the day on which Israel repents, the enemy's kingdom shall end. The Lord will transform Israel into an obedient nation, superior to the angels (vi. 1-6). He dies (vii. 1-3).

The Testament of Naphtali ('concerning natural goodness,' β).—He speaks of his birth and his mother's family. He was swift of foot, and his body corresponded with his spirit; bodily organs and their several functions are described (i. 1-ii. 10). He warns his sons not to go against nature and the law of God, as did the Gentiles, Sodom, and the Watchers (iii. 1-5). He prophesies his posterity's apostasy, and restoration, when a man shall come 'working righteousness' (iv. 1-5). He gives an account of his vision on the Mount of Olives: Levi obtains the sun, Judah the moon, and Joseph ascends on a winged bull. In a second vision—that of the Ship of Jacob in a storm—Joseph flees in a boat, Levi and Judah keep together; at Levi's prayer they reach land (v. 1-vi. 9). Jacob on hearing these dreams concludes that Joseph is alive (vii. 1-4). Naphtali foretells that from Levi and Judah shall salvation come. He contrasts the consequences of good and evil actions. He dies (viii. 1-ix. 3).

The Testament of Gad ('concerning hatred,' β).—Misjudged by Joseph, he hates him (i. 1-ii. 5).

* The passages in square brackets are Jewish interpolations.

Hatred recognizes no good, however good a man may be; it disregards God's law; and, while love would fain quicken the dead, hatred would in all things work for death (iii. 1-iv. 7). Hatred leads to lying, and poisons the life; the remedy is to be just and humble. 'True repentance after a godly sort' enlightens a man and 'leads the mind to salvation' (v. 1-9). Gad's sickness proved that 'by what things a man transgresses, by the same also is he punished.' Heart and will must be freed from hatred. One should love from the heart and forgive, whether a man repents or not; and pray for him who prospers more than oneself (v. 10-vii. 7). He bids his sons honour Judah and Levi. His posterity will fall away (viii. 1-5).

The Testament of Asher ('concerning the two faces of vice and virtue,' β).—He speaks of the two-foldness of things: if the soul is set on good, it does all well; but, if on evil, it does all ill. He deals with cases of good deeds with ill motives, and cases of the reverse. He warns his sons of the nearness of pleasures to their excesses or opposites (i. 1-v. 4). He emphasizes the importance of sincerity and unity of purpose. The peaceful soul at death is met by the angel of peace, the troubled by the evil spirit it has served (vi. 1-vii. 3). [He foretells the future sin and dispersion of his tribe, as also those of Gad and Dan; but they will finally be gathered again by God's mercy and for the sake of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (vii. 4-7).] He dies (viii. 1, 2).

The Testament of Joseph ('concerning self-control,' β).—In all troubles, God was with him—his brethren hated him but God loved him, he was enslaved and God freed him, sick and the Lord visited him, in prison and his God showed him favour (i. 1-7). God helped him in all his (ten) temptations (ii. 1-7). He resisted his mistress's wiles by strict fasting and abstinence, and prayers for himself and her. In prison he thanked God for deliverance from her (iii. 1-ix. 5). God exalts as well as delivers the humble and pure (x. 1-6). He told an untruth to the merchants and again to the Egyptian officer, even when examined by scourging, to save his brethren's honour; the Egyptian woman intervened to rescue and purchase him (xi. 1-xvi. 6). He exhorts his sons to do well even to those who seek their hurt (xvii. 1-xviii. 4). He recounts his two-fold vision: (1) of twelve harts, of which three remained and became lambs, then all were restored as twelve sheep; (2) of twelve bulls—then of a lamb which overcame all the beasts who attacked him (xix. 1-10). He bids them honour Levi and Judah; from them shall come Israel's salvation; his own kingdom would be transitory (xix. 11-12). He gives a dying charge concerning his bones and those of his wife (α) (xx. 1-6).

The Testament of Benjamin ('concerning a pure mind,' β).—He narrates the story of his birth. Joseph tells him in Egypt what his brethren did. He bids his sons fear God and love their neighbour, then they need not fear Beliar, man, or beast (i. 1-iii. 5). He speaks of Jacob's prediction that in Joseph should be fulfilled the prophecy of heaven—that the sinless should die for ungodly men (iii. 6-8). The good man overcomes evil with good (iv. 1-v. 5). His will is guided by the angel of peace; he desires nothing overmuch, riches, pleasure, or honour; and is sincere and single-minded (vi. 1-7). He warns them against Beliar and his sword of seven-fold evil, evidenced in the case of Cain (vii. 1-5). The pure mind like the sun cleanses away pollutions, itself undefiled (viii. 1-3). He foresees the impurity of his descendants; yet they shall have God's temple in their portion, and there shall the twelve tribes and the Gentiles meet (ix. 1, 2). He tells how he had a vision of Joseph in his absence (x. 1). He charges them to keep the Law; foretells the resurrection of all the patriarchs: each shall rule over his tribe. Israel shall be convicted by the chosen Gentiles (x. 2-11). In the latter days one beloved of the Lord [belonging to Benjamin's seed, i.e. Paul, β text] shall arise, to enlighten the Gentiles (xi. 1-5). Benjamin dies and is buried (xii. 1-4).

2. Title.—The title of the whole work, if it ever had one, is far from clear. The Stichometry of Nicephorus and the Synopsis of Athanasius refer to the book under the simple title Πατριάρχαι. But the earliest and indeed the only instance we possess of the use of the word 'patriarch' with special reference to the twelve sons of Jacob is in Stephen's speech in Ac 7⁸⁻⁹. The reference would not be clear enough, in the absence of any context, to serve as the title of a book. There is less difficulty with regard to the fuller title 'The Testaments of the (Twelve [?]) Patriarchs or [in Hebrew] Fathers.' The use of the word διαθήκη in our present Greek text does not, as was once thought, imply a late date and a conception borrowed from Roman law. It is true that in the LXX it is always the equivalent of ברית, 'covenant.' But in the (late?) Hebrew Testament of Naphtali (see § 6) we have the simple title, 'The Biddings of Naphtali the son of Jacob' (בְּרִית נַפְתָּלִי בֶן יַעֲקֹב). The title of the individual Testament was no doubt in this form. For the use of πῦρ to denote a 'testamentary disposition,' or a 'dying charge,' cf. Is 38¹. The Greek MSS differ greatly, but tend to amplify the title, the secondary (β) recension and the Armenian adding the main theme of each Testament thus, διαθήκη Πουβημ περί ἐννοίων.

3. Date.—The text supplies several indications of the date of the original work. It was earlier than the Roman domination, as the list of foreign conquerors in Test. Naph. v. 8 ends with the Syrians (Seleucidæ). It was during the rule of the Maccabæan princes,* as the military prowess of Judah and Levi, and more particularly the lists of cities stormed (e.g. Tappuah and Hazor; see Charles on Jubilees, xxxiv. 4), reflect the exploits of Judas and his brothers. The details of that great struggle are still fresh in the writer's mind. Further, a Maccabæan king of unique powers and position was reigning, a descendant of Levi, who was not only a warrior king (Test. Reub. vi. 10, 11), and a priest known by the 'new name' (i.e. 'priest of the Most High God'), apparently first assumed by Simon, but also 'a prophet of the Most High' (Test. Levi, viii. 14, 15). This designation is appropriate only to John Hyrcanus, 137-105 B.C. Further, as the Pharisaic author speaks of him in the highest terms, the date must be earlier than the tragic breach between Hyrcanus and the Pharisees, which occurred probably in 107 B.C. Charles finds an additional indication of date in the references to the overthrow of Shechem. Shechem itself fell to Hyrcanus about 132 B.C., but the allusion may be to the total destruction of Samaria in 120 B.C., the ancient Shechem being intended as an equivalent for the later Samaritan people.

4. Original language.—Until the last few years it was generally agreed that the Testaments, as we now have them, were not a translation but were originally written in Greek. Charles, however, preceded by two Jewish scholars, Kohler (JQR v. [1893] 400-406) and Gaster (PSBA xvi. 33-49,

* Burkitt points out in his Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, p. 35, that 'the political conditions of the reign of John Hyrcanus give point to the choice of the Twelve Patriarchs as the speakers in the book.' In a sense the ten non-Judaic tribes were represented by the inhabitants of Galilee, Samaria, and Perea, who were incorporated in the new Israelite kingdom of the Maccabees. In their case the ethical teaching was especially in point.

109-117), has put forward an unanswerable case for a Hebrew original (see his Greek Versions of the Testaments, pp. xxiii-xxxii). The text abounds in Hebrew constructions and expressions, e.g. ἐν στήθει δατέων αὐτοῦ (Test. Jud. xx. 4), and in curious mistranslations like ἑξαρχοὶ σκήπτρων for ἑξαρχοὶ φυλῶν (רַבְשִׁשִּׁים, xxv. 1), and ἡ τρυφή for 'Eden' (עֵדֶן, xxv. 2). The naming of the mountain 'Aspis' from the shield (ἀσπίς) found by Levi (Test. Levi, vi. 1) is no proof that the original was in Greek, as the reference appears to be to סִרְיֹן (Sirion) and סִרְיֹן ('body armour')—a word (occurring in the parallel passage in Hebrew in the Midrash Wajjissau), which is more properly rendered θώραξ in Test. Jud. iii. 5. In any case, no mountain is known named Aspis. If we add the dittographs and the numerous paronomasiae which are explicable or evident on retranslation in Hebrew, not to mention obscure or unintelligible passages which can be cleared up only by the same means, no doubt can remain that the work as a whole was composed in Hebrew. The related Hebrew and Aramaic fragments and narratives (see § 6) are a further proof of this fact. On the other hand, the Christian interpolations naturally show no trace of Hebrew phrasing or constructions.

5. Critical structure.—The prevailing view until quite recently was that the work emanated from a Jewish Christian or even a Gentile Christian source. This was made possible only by taking the work as it stands as the uninterpolated production of a single writer. But even so there remained insoluble problems. We should then be faced with a unique combination of Psilanthropism and Patripassianism, with an equally unique combination not only of the highest moral teaching with the primitive war spirit so evident, e.g., in Test. Jud., but of explicit (if unguarded) Christian theology with a very Judaic glorying in deeds of physical prowess. A decisive argument against any Christian origin, however, is to be found in the remarkable expectation of a Messiah from the tribe of Levi. All Christians from the first must have rejected this curious by-product of the Maccabean golden age.*

The fact is that the frank recognition of the composite nature of the text alone explains all the problems which are presented. We must first remove the Christian interpolations. In the main these are obvious (see below, § 8). There remain a number of other passages quite foreign to their context or contradicting the whole teaching of the book. Such are the interpolation after Test. Reub. ii. 2 of the passage dealing with the senses quite in the Stoic manner, and the violent anti-Maccabean invective in Test. Levi, xiv.-xvi. and Test. Jud. xxi. 6-xxiii. Charles regards as 1st cent. B.C. additions Test. Levi, x., xiv.-xvi., Test. Jud. xvii. 2-xviii. 1 (?), xxi. 6-xxiii., xxiv. 4-6, Test. Zeb. ix., Test. Dan. v. 6, 7, vii. 3 (?), Test. Naph. iv., Test. Gad. viii. 2, Test. Asher. vii. 4-7. They have as a common feature the frequent citation of the Book of Enoch. They refer not merely to a second great apostasy, but to a second destruction of the Temple and a second captivity and a final restoration wrought by God directly or through the Messiah. Charles regards these as genuine predictions. In Test. Levi, xvii. 1-9 there is a curious interpolation, which employs the jubilee system of chronology. Test. Jos. x. 5-xviii. is quite different in style and theme from the rest of that Testament. Test. Zeb. has two short sections on almsgiving (vi. 4-6, vii.-viii. 3) which occur in only three MSS and interrupt the narrative (see, further, Charles's edition, pp. lvii-lxi and notes).

6. Text.—The Hebrew original is not extant, but we have valuable evidence available towards the restoration of corrupt and difficult passages in kindred literature:

i. The Aramaic and Greek fragments of what appears to have been a Hebrew source both of the Testament of Levi and of the Book of Jubilees. For the discovery of these fragments and their mutual relation see Charles, Greek Versions of the Testaments, pp. liii-lvii. His conclusions are disputed by Conybeare, in Review of Theol. and Philos. iv. [1903-09] 373-382, who regards the Greek text preserved in the fragment as the source of our present Test. Levi, but his reasons are not convincing.

ii. The Hebrew Testament of Naphtali, which Gaster (PSBA xvi.) regarded as the source of our present Test. Naphtali. Charles rightly denies this view, and demonstrates the wide diversity between them, but perhaps wrongly assigns it to a late date.

iii. Various passages in Jewish literature, in particular the Midrash Wajjissau, which is very useful in regard to the war-passages in Test. Judah.*

The work now exists in (a) Greek, (b) Armenian, (c) Slavonic, and many mediæval and modern versions.

(a) The primary authority now extant for the text is the Greek version, which Charles divides into two main divisions, the α text and the β text. The latter has its best representative in the famous Cambridge MS β (10th cent.), used by Grosseteste for his Latin version and by Sinker (who cites it as C) for what was till recently the standard work on the Testaments. Charles prefers the α text, represented by three MSS, the earliest c being of the 13th cent., which he uses as the basis of his text. For a spirited attack on his position see J. W. Hunkin in JThSt xvi. 80-97. The variations in the 9 Greek MSS are beyond number, and present a most intricate problem to the critical student. A glance at Charles's Greek Versions shows at times one to half a dozen variations at almost every word.

(b) The Armenian version exists in 12 MSS, and falls into two main divisions, one recension being current in biblical MSS (corresponding roughly to the Greek β text), and the other in non-biblical MSS. The Armenian version is of special value in that it omits, or presents in a shorter form, several of the Christian interpolations (see § 8). It also alone preserves Test. Jos. xix. 3-7, without which the whole chapter is unintelligible.

(c) The Slavonic version is derived from the so-called Palea, historical narratives and chronicles based on various sources, and it is extant in a long and a short recension. This version represents a late form of text, and is not critically of much value.

7. Influence on the NT.—(a) Diction.—The influence of the Testaments on the Gospels is very clearly dealt with in Charles's edition, pp. lxxviii-xcix. In the rest of the NT two of the most remarkable passages are those which Charles adduces to prove that St. Paul used the Testaments in the Greek translation and in the α not the β recension (ib. lxxxv). Conybeare in his review (Rev. of Theol. and Philos. iv. 373-382) has shown how difficult it is to accept the latter statement.

The first instance is 1 Th 2¹⁶. The words ἐφθασεν δὲ ἐπ' αὐτοὺς ἡ ὁργὴ (τοῦ Θεοῦ, D, etc.) eis τέλος are difficult to explain on the accepted view of the early date of the Epistle. In Test. Levi, vi. 11, on the other hand, the reference is obvious and appropriate. It presupposes a slightly different text in Gn 30⁹, וַיִּהְיֶה instead of וַיִּהְיֶה. There is a curious resemblance to the phrase in Wis 19¹, but both there and in Ps 78¹ the words and the reference are different. In Test. Levi, vi. 11 the β texts read Κυρίου, and the α texts τοῦ Θεοῦ. (In 1 Th 2¹⁶ the Western text alone contains the latter.) On the other hand, αἰεὶ read ἐφάσσε δὲ αὐτοὺς, not ἐν αὐτοὺς, so that the balance of evidence is against Charles's view that the α text was followed. St. Paul appears to be quoting, with grim irony, the description of the Shechemites' doom in the Testaments (or some earlier work), with the application changed to the doom of the exclusive Jews, who would fain imitate the violent deed of Levi.

* For all these documents see Charles, Greek Versions of the Testaments, pp. li-lvii, 235-256.

* On the other hand, there exists a curious fragment attributed to Irenæus in which Christ is represented as descended from Levi and Judah (ed. W. W. Harvey, Cambridge, 1857, ii. 487): ἐξ ὧν ὁ Χριστὸς προετυπώθη καὶ ἐπεγνώσθη καὶ ἐγεννήθη. ἐν μὲν γὰρ τῷ Ἰωσήφ προετυπώθη· ἐκ δὲ τοῦ Λευὶ καὶ τοῦ Ἰούδα τὸ κατὰ σὰρκα ὡς βασιλεὺς καὶ ἱερεὺς ἐγεννήθη, κτλ. These ideas may have been suggested by the Testaments. At the same time the fact remains that our Lord's kinsman John the Baptist was of the priestly tribe, and a quite early tradition connects the Blessed Virgin with the Temple.

The second instance is Ro 12²: οὐ μόνον αὐτὰ ποιοῦσιν ἀλλὰ καὶ συνευδοκοῦσιν τοῖς πράσσουσιν (ποιούντες . . . συνευδοκοῦντες, B Clem. Rom. [?], also, with οὐκ ἐνόησαν earlier, D, Lat. Vers. etc.). Here the parallel in the Testaments—Test. Asher, vi. 2, καὶ πρᾶσσουσιν τὸ κακόν, καὶ συνευδοκοῦσιν τοῖς πρᾶσσουσιν—is less appropriate to its context, and is omitted by A (Arm. version) as well as by. But four other MSS of the β text support the α text here. It is not a clear case of quotation by St. Paul.

Other noteworthy parallels are—2 Co 6^{14, 15}, τίς κοινωνία φωτὶ πρὸς σκότος; τίς δὲ συμφωνήσῃς Χριστῷ πρὸς Βελιάρ; || Test. Levi, xix. 1, 'Choose for yourselves either the light or the darkness, either the law of the Lord or the works of Beliar.' Also Ro 12¹, 'present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable (spiritual) service (worship)' || Test. Levi, iii. 6, 'offering to the Lord a sweet-smelling savour, a reasonable (λογικὴν) and bloodless sacrifice' ('offering,' β). Ro 12¹, νῦκα ἐν τῷ ἀγαθῷ τὸ κακόν || Test. Benj. iv. 3, οὗτος τὸ ἀγαθὸν ποῶν νικᾷ τὸ κακόν. 1 Co 13³, (ἡ ἀγάπη) οὐ λογίζεται τὸ κακόν || Test. Zeb. viii. 5, ἀγαπάτε ἀλλήλους, καὶ μὴ λογίσεσθε ἕκαστος κακίαν πρὸς τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ. 2 Co 7¹⁰, ἡ γὰρ κατὰ Θεὸν λύπη μετάνοιαν εἰς σωτηρίαν . . . ἐργάζεται || Test. Gad, v. 7, ἡ γὰρ κατὰ Θεὸν ἀληθὴς μετάνοια . . . ὁδηγεῖ τὸ διαβούλιον πρὸς σωτηρίαν. Ph 2¹⁵, 'among whom ye are seen (or 'shine ye') as lights (φωστῆρες) in the world' || Test. Levi, xiv. 3, 'so also ye are (or 'be ye') the lights (φωστῆρες) of Israel.' In 1 and 2 Tim. Charles notes four almost exact parallels: 1 Ti 1¹³, 'I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly' || Test. Jud. xix. 3; 1 Ti 2⁵, μεστὴς θεοῦ καὶ ἀνθρώπων = Test. Dan, vi. 2; 2 Ti 2¹⁸, 'they will proceed further in ungodliness' || Test. Jud. xxi. 8; 2 Ti 4⁸, 'the crown of righteousness' = Test. Levi, viii. 2 (for 'crown of glory,' 1 P 5⁴, cf. Test. Benj. iv. 1). Ja 4⁷, 'the devil . . . will flee from you' = Test. Naph. viii. 4; Rev 3¹², 'new (καινή) Jerusalem' || Test. Dan, v. 12 (νέα). In Acts Charles notes five instances. Two worth noting, though not decisive, are: Ac 7¹⁰ || Test. Reub. iv. 8, 10, 'found favour in the sight of God and men . . . God delivered him from every evil ('seen,' β) and hidden death' (both passages refer to Joseph), and Ac 12¹¹ || Test. Sim. ii. 8, 'God sent forth His angel and delivered him out of my hands.' Also in Ac 8²³ the meaning of χολή πικρίας is illustrated by the function assigned to the χολή in Test. Naph. ii. 8, χολή πρὸς πικρίαν.

In the difficult passage Jude 22²³ Charles suggests the insertion of μὴ before διακρινόμενοι (better διακρινόμενοι), on the basis of Test. Zeb. vii. 2: ἀδιακριτως πάντας . . . ἐλεᾶτε, but this phrase hardly seems to bear on the passage, nor does it really aid in the problem of text or interpretation.

(b) Ideas.—The Pauline (and Johannine) metaphor of light and darkness, Ro 12¹ 13², Eph 4¹⁸ 5^{8, 9}, 2 Co 6¹⁴, is found in Test. Reub. iii. 8, 'darkening his mind' (cf. Test. Gad, vi. 2), Test. Naph. ii. 10, 'neither while ye are in darkness can ye do the works of light,' Test. Levi, xix. 1, 'Choose for yourselves either the light or the darkness, either the law of the Lord or the works of Beliar,' xiv. 4, 'the light of the law which was given to lighten every man' (cf. Jn 1⁹, where the 'light' is the ever-existing Word). The equation of covetousness and idolatry in Eph 5⁸, Col 3⁵ appears as a connexion of cause and effect in Test. Jud. xix. 1, 'the love of money leadeth to idolatry ('idols,' β); because, when led astray through money, men name as gods those who are not gods.' Ja 3¹⁰ is similar in idea to Test. Benj. vi. 5, 'the good mind hath not two tongues, of blessing and cursing.'

The prohibition of feminine adornment in 1 P 3³⁻⁵, 1 Ti 2⁹ is found also in Test. Reub. v. 5, and the reason given in v. 6, 'for thus they allured the Watchers who were before the flood,' helps to explain the obscure statement of St. Paul in 1 Co 11¹⁰, 'for this cause ought the woman to have (a sign of?) authority on her head, because of the angels.' In the Book of Enoch the invention of adornment was not previous but subsequent to the fall of the Watchers, who themselves were the first teachers of the art.

Reservation for judgment, asserted of the angels in 2 P 2⁴, Jude 6, is predicated also of women who adorn themselves in Test. Reub. v. 5 and of the unrepentant in Test. Gad, vii. 5. The juxtaposition of the fallen Watchers and the men of Sodom in Jude 6⁷ is paralleled by Test. Naph. iii. 4, 5. Both alike acted against their appointed nature (probably the AV rendering, 'which kept not their first estate' [αρχή]), is correct, as Test. Naph. iii. 5 has ἐν ἡλλάξαν τάξιν φύσεως αὐτῶν).

That self-judgment averts external judgment is a thought common to 1 Co 11^{31, 32} and Test. Benj. vi. 7, Test. Gad, v. 3; and the idea of self-condemnation is vividly expressed alike in Ro 2¹⁵ and in Test. Jud. xx. 5, while in 1 Co 4⁴ St. Paul seems to quote but immediately to condemn the self-satisfaction of Test. Iss. vii. 1, 'I am not conscious of committing any sin' (+ 'unto death,' β), and Test. Zeb. i. 4.

(c) Theology.—God is referred to twice (in passages which have been modified by Christian influence) as Father—'the Holy Father' in Test. Jud. xxiv. 2, and, in connexion with the Bath Qol, 'with the Father's voice as from Abraham to (or 'the father of') Isaac,' in Test. Levi, xviii. 6; as the 'God of peace' in Test. Dan, v. 2 (cf. 1 Th 5²³, Ro 15³³, Ph 4⁹); and as 'the Great Glory' in Test. Levi, iii. 4 (cf. 1 En. xiv. 20, cii. 3). Other titles are not noteworthy.

How far the expected theophany in Test. Sim. vi. 5, Test. Levi, ii. 11, v. 2, etc., was conceived in the original text as mediated through a Messianic personage we cannot say. The present writer's view is that an unmediated theophany was the only one mentioned in the pre-Christian work (see § 8).

The Spirit of God is referred to in Test. Sim. iv. 4, where it is said that 'Joseph was a good man and had the spirit of God within him.' Elsewhere the 'spirit' appears to be merely one of the constituents of man's nature imparted to him at creation or birth, and practically identical with the 'good will' or 'inclination,' as in Test. Jud. xx. 1, 5, where the 'spirit of truth' = the Ytzer ha Tob. The Hebrew Test. Naph. x. 9* is nearer the thought of St. Paul in 1 Co 3^{16, 17} 6¹⁹. The Apostle, however, regards the Spirit as a subsequent not an original gift. The two passages (Test. Jud. xxiv. 2, 3, Test. Levi, xviii. 7) which deal with the gift of the Holy Spirit on a specific occasion, the present writer regards as Christian.

The Priesthood of Christ, an idea so fully de-

* 'Blessed is the man who does not defile the holy spirit of God which hath been put and breathed into him, and blessed is he who returns it to its Creator as pure as it was on the day when He entrusted it (to him).'

veloped in the Epistle to the Hebrews, was until recently a conception the development of which could not be explained except as the synthesis of the thought of Christ as the perfect offering for sin with the thought of Him as the Divinely appointed and perfect Agent of the Father. The conception, however, receives new light from recent research into the theological views of the Maccaean period, when a priestly family ruled and were so highly gifted as to come to be regarded in the person of one or two kings as the embodiment of the Messianic idea. Ps 110 has a new appropriateness in view of this unprecedented situation. There the Messianic victor King is addressed, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek'; hence the continual emphasis—in Test. Reub. vi. 7–12, Test. Levi, xviii., Test. Jud. xxv. 1, 2, Test. Jos. xix. 11 (a)—on the pre-eminence of Levi. The most astonishing passage, however, is Test. Jud. xxi. 1–5: 'I command you, love Levi, that ye may abide, and exalt not yourselves against him, lest ye be utterly destroyed. For to me [Judah] the Lord gave the kingdom, and to him the priesthood, and He set the kingdom beneath the priesthood. To me He gave the things upon the earth; to him the things in the heavens, etc.

The striking prerogatives and powers which Charles (Testaments, p. xcvi) regards as ascribed to the Messiah tend to diminish seriously on a careful examination of the text (see § 8). Possibly there remain his freedom from sin, new priesthood, and prophetic office.

More important, because more reliable, is the light thrown by the angelology of the Testaments on the NT doctrine of Christ, especially as the unique and only Heavenly Intercessor. In Test. Levi, iii. 5f. the angels of the presence 'minister and make propitiation to the Lord for all the sins of ignorance of the righteous. And they offer to the Lord a sweet-smelling savour, a reasonable (λογικὴν) and bloodless sacrifice' ('offering,' β). In Test. Levi, v. 6 an angel (Michael or the angel of peace) 'intercedeth (β) for the nation of Israel that they may not be smitten utterly (cf. Test. Dan. vi. 5), for every evil spirit attacketh it.' In Test. Dan. vi. 2 prayer to this angel is commanded—'draw near unto God and to the angel that intercedeth (β) for you, for he is a mediator between God and man,' etc. It is just this Jewish doctrine that is combated in 1 Ti 2⁵, He 14¹⁴, etc.

The 'angel of peace' has a national and a personal function. He 'shall strengthen Israel, that it fall not into the extremity of evil' (Test. Dan. vi. 5); he guides the soul of the good man (Test. Benj. vi. 1), and at death meets his soul and leads him into ('eternal,' α) life (Test. Asher, vi. 7).

Angels are divided in Test. Levi, iii. 5–8 into 'angels of the presence' (β), or 'archangels' (α), and, in a lower heaven, 'thrones and dominions' (cf. Col 1¹⁶, Eph 1²¹), but the angelology of the book is far less developed than that of 1 Enoch.

The text of Test. Levi, ii. 7–iii. 8 has undergone a great deal of alteration, but in ii. 7–9 the α text clearly speaks of three heavens only, the older view, while the β text in ii. 9 and both texts in iii. 1–8 now speak of seven. St. Paul in 2 Co 12² seems to regard the third as the highest heaven.

The doctrine of sin is very full and varied. In the main it is traced to the action of the spirits of error, and their head, Beliar (see Test. Reub. iii. 3–6, Test. Sim. ii. 7, iv. 9, Test. Jud. xix. 4, etc.). Each sin has its own particular spirit, and several are attached to various organs of the body. Sin is also traced to man's free will, which can exclude all evil desire (Test. Reub. iv. 9), need not be in the power of any evil spirit (Test. Benj. vi. 1; cf. iii. 3, 4), and is free to choose good and evil (Test. Jud.

xx. 2, 'in the midst is the spirit of the understanding of the mind, to which it belongeth to turn whithersoever it will'). The will determines the quality of the action (Test. Asher, i. 6, 'if the soul take pleasure in the good, all its actions are in righteousness'). Inasmuch, however, as two inclinations appear to be born with a man, the evil as well as the good, the problem of freewill is not consistently or thoroughly faced. Thus God knows the inclination (Test. Naph. ii. 5), yet tries it by temptation (Test. Jos. ii. 6). Sin blinds the inclination (Test. Jud. xviii. 3), which in turn blinds the mind (xi. 1). The (evil) inclination can be destroyed by good works (Test. Asher, iii. 2).

Sin entails physical punishment (sickness, Test. Reub. i. 7, Test. Sim. ii. 12, Test. Gad. v. 9; cf. 1 Co 5⁵ 11³⁰), and spiritual (Test. Reub. iii. 8; cf. Ro 1²¹) and eternal (Test. Zeb. x. 3, Test. Gad. vii. 5) penalties. Sin is finally to be destroyed and Beliar cast into the fire for ever (Test. Jud. xxv. 3).

Repentance is a very prominent feature in the Testaments. In Reuben's case it includes lifelong penitence (Test. Reub. iv. 3) and seven years' penance in the way of strict abstinence from flesh and wine (i. 10); in Simeon's case prayer and weeping (Test. Sim. ii. 13) and two years' fasting (iii. 4¹); in Judah's case abstinence from flesh and wine and all enjoyment till old age (Test. Jud. xv. 4). Repentance includes a moral change and attainment of higher insight, 'for true repentance after a godly sort destroyeth ignorance, and driveth away the darkness, and enlighteneth the eyes, and giveth knowledge to the soul, and leadeth the mind to salvation' (Test. Gad. v. 7; cf. 2 Co 7¹⁰). National repentance will make possible national restoration—'on the day on which Israel shall repent, the kingdom of the enemy shall be brought to an end' (Test. Dan. vi. 4; cf. Test. Iss. vi. 3, 4; Test. Zeb. ix. 7). For the close connexion of repentance and the Kingdom of Heaven, cf. Mt 3². For the human conditioning of the coming of the Kingdom, cf. 2 P 3¹⁴.

Eschatology.—Death is referred to as 'sleep' in Test. Iss. vii. 9 and four other passages. In each of these four other cases, however, Charles would emend the phrase to 'died at a good old age' (so Test. Benj. xii. 2, β). In Test. Dan. vii. 1, Test. Jos. xx. 4 the β text reads, 'slept the eternal sleep.' 'Eternal life' awaits the righteous (Test. Asher, vi. 6; cf. v. 2). 'Hades' is mentioned three times, twice in Christian interpolations, and never as a place of punishment. The 'judgment' is referred to three times, twice in passages interpolated. The first passage, Test. Levi, iii. 2, 3, refers to the judgment on men and on the evil spirits. For the heavenly armies of iii. 3, cf. Rev 12⁷. The resurrection is expected of all the patriarchs from Enoch in order (Test. Benj. x. 6, 7) and the twelve sons of Jacob each amid his descendants (Test. Sim. vi. 7, Test. Jud. xxv. 1, Test. Zeb. x. 2, Test. Benj. x. 7). The resurrection is limited to the righteous Israelites in Test. Zeb. x. 2, but includes all mankind good and bad in Test. Benj. x. 8 (probably not original). The Resurrection life will be eternal (Test. Jud. xxv. 4, 5) and so will the punishment of the wicked (Test. Zeb. x. 3, Test. Gad. vii. 5).

Asceticism is a marked feature. See on Repentance above, and especially Test. Iss. iii. 5, iv. 2–4, Test. Jos. iii. 3–5, iv. 3, 8, viii. 1, ix. 2, x. 1–3. Almsgiving is also prominent (Test. Iss. iii. 8, v. 2, vii. 5, Test. Zeb. vi. 4, 5, Test. Jos. iii. 5). Zebulun even steals to clothe the naked (Test. Zeb. vii. 1).

Remarkable stress is laid upon the duty of love, not only to God, but also to one's neighbour. We may compare Test. Gad. iv. 7, 'the spirit of love worketh together with the law of God in long-suffering unto the salvation of men,' with Ro 2¹; and vi. 3–7, 'love ye one another from the heart; and if a man sin against thee, speak peaceably to him, and in thy soul hold not guile; and if he repent and confess, forgive him. . . . And though he deny it, . . . give over reproving him. . . . And if he be shameless and persist in his wrong-doing, even so forgive him from the heart, and leave to God the avenging' (cf. Ro 12¹⁹).

8. The Christian interpolations.—If we could be certain exactly where the Christian interpolations occur and where they begin and end, the evidence of the Testaments would be of higher value as a witness both to Jewish theology in the two centuries before Christ and to primitive Christian views as to the Person of our Lord. As it is, we can never feel certain that a striking parallel to NT theology may not be post-Christian in date, and the presumption lies that way unless there is evidence, e.g. in 1 Enoch or other pre-Christian pseudepigrapha, of the same view. In other words, the evidence of the Testaments can hardly be admitted in its own right as to pre-Christian beliefs and teaching. Charles's method has been rather to bracket only manifest Christian interpolations, and then never a word more than is absolutely necessary.

Very often the interpolation consists of a word or two, or the turn given to a passage: in such cases a slight alteration restores a perfectly Judaic text, at least not going beyond 1s 40²⁻¹⁰; cf. Test. Sim. vi. 5, Test. Dan. vi. 7: an important series of additions, often introduced by the word 'until', transforms an original theophany prediction into an unguarded expression regarding the Incarnation, e.g. 'the Lord God shall appear upon earth as man' (Test. Sim. vi. 5); 'since you have with you the God of heaven and earth walking with men in singleness of heart' (Test. Iss. vii. 7—a few inferior manuscripts read 'you walk,' etc.); 'the Lord shall be in the midst of it (Israel) living amongst men. And the Holy One of Israel shall reign over it, in humility and in poverty,' etc. (Test. Dan. v. 13); 'the Most High shall visit the earth, coming Himself as man, with men eating and drinking' (Test. Asher. vii. 3); 'worshipping the King of heaven, who appeared upon earth in the form of a man in humility,' etc. (Test. Benj. x. 7; the Armenian version is free from this addition). Similar statements are found more detached from the context, e.g. 'God hath taken a body and eaten with men and saved men' (Test. Sim. vi. 7c), 'this Branch of God Most High, and this Fountain giving life to all' (Test. Jud. xxiv. 4); 'ye shall see God in the fashion of a man' (Test. Zeb. ix. 8^{4a}); 'through his [Judah's] tribe shall God appear dwelling among men upon earth,' etc. (Test. Naph. viii. 3); 'God speaking in the person of man' (Test. Asher. vii. 3); 'when He appeared as God in the flesh,' etc. (Test. Benj. x. 8; Armenian version omits).

The language is frankly Patripassian in Test. Levi. iv. 1, ἔδωκεν σκυλευμένον ἐπὶ τῷ πάθει τοῦ ὑψίστου (which is a reference to Mt 27⁵²⁻⁵³). But cf. Ac 20²⁸, 'the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood' (N B). Two passages which would be Psilanthropist were they Christian are 'the compassion of the Lord shall come, a man (ἄνθρωπος) working righteousness and working mercy unto all them that are afar off, and to all them that are near' (Test. Naph. iv. 5), and 'a man (ἄνθρωπος) who reneweth the law in the power of the Most High ye shall call a deceiver; and at last ye shall rush (upon him) to slay him,' etc. (Test. Levi. xvi. 3). The reference in the latter is obscure, but both passages are obviously Judaic in origin.

Once Christ is called 'Son'—'until the Lord shall visit all the Gentiles in the tender mercies of His Son' (Test. Levi. iv. 4).

The Virgin Birth may be referred to in the strange and corrupt passage, Test. Jos. xix. 8: 'from Judah was born a virgin wearing a linen garment, and from her was born a lamb without spot.' A 'virgin' (cf. Is 37²²) might well represent the Jewish community (cf. Rev 12¹), but the context uses animal symbolism only. Twice the order 'from Levi and Judah' is varied. In Test. Dan. v. 10 and Test. Gad. viii. 2, Judah is put first. In Test. Jud. xxiv. 1, 5, 6 and Test. Naph. viii. 2^b, 3 descent from Judah alone is mentioned, and so too Test. Jos. xix. 8 (but here 'from Judah' is clearly an intrusion; see Charles's note).

The events of our Lord's life mentioned are: (1) His baptism (Test. Levi. xviii. 7^b); (2) descent of the Spirit, 'the spirit of understanding and sanctification shall rest upon Him in the water' (xviii. 7), 'the heavens shall be opened to Him, to pour out the spirit, even the blessing of the Holy Father' (Test. Jud. xxiv. 2); (3) the voice from heaven: 'the heavens shall be opened, and from the temple of glory shall come upon Him sanctification, with the Father's voice as from Abraham to (or 'the father of') Isaac' (Test. Levi. xviii. 6; cf. Test. Jud. xxiv. 2); (4) His crucifixion—'Nevertheless thy sons shall lay hands upon Him and crucify Him' (Test. Levi. iv. 4), 'the chief priests who shall lay their hands upon the Saviour of the world' (xiv. 2), 'there shall the Lord be treated with outrage and He shall be lifted up upon a tree' (Test. Benj. ix. 3; cf. Test. Levi. x. 2, xiv. 1 and [?] xvi. 3^{4a}); the rending of the veil of the Temple (Test. Levi. x. 3, Test. Benj. ix. 4); (5) His resurrection and ascension, 'He shall ascend from Hades and shall pass from earth into heaven' (Test. Benj. ix. 5).

Titles and attributes.—Christ is called 'the Lamb of God' in Test. Jos. xix. 11, Test. Benj. iii. 8, 'Saviour' in Test. Dan. vi. 7 (8), 'Saviour of the World' in Test. Benj. iii. 8, 'Saviour of the Gentiles' in Test. Dan. vi. 9, 'Prophet'—'only begotten Prophet' ('Son,' c) in Test. Benj. ix. 2, 'a prophet of the Most High' in Test. Levi. viii. 15 (possibly originally applied to Hyrcanus; see Charles's note). He is to be 'meek and lowly' (Test. Dan. vi. 9), to reign over Israel 'in humility and in poverty' (v. 13); He 'appeared upon earth in the form of a man in humility' (Test. Benj. x. 7). His suffering is vicarious. He 'taketh away the sins of the world' (Test. Jos. xix. 11). 'A blameless one shall be delivered up for lawless men and a sinless one shall die for ungodly men in the blood of the covenant,' etc. (Test. Benj. iii. 8). He redeems the souls of the saints (Test. Dan. v. 11). He 'teaches by His works the law of God' (vi. 9; cf. Test. Levi. xvi. 3). Belief in Him bestows a kingdom here and joy hereafter (Test. Dan. v. 13, Test. Benj. x. 7); unbelief shall condemn Jews first and then Gentiles (x. 8, 9).

The Gentiles.—Salvation is never explicitly limited to Israel in the Testaments, but every case of explicit inclusion of the Gentiles in the scheme of salvation is suspect, though quite probably in two cases their implicit inclusion (Test. Levi. v. 7 [8] and Test. Jud. xxiv. 6) is original (see Charles's Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, note on Test. Benj. ix. 2). The present writer cannot agree with Charles, however, in accepting the other passages as original. In Test. Benj. ix. 4, 'the Spirit of God shall pass on to the Gentiles as fire poured forth' after the Crucifixion. The chosen of the Gentiles will be used to convict Israel in the judgment (Test. Benj. x. 10; cf. Ro 2⁷, Lk 11^{31, 32}).

Christian baptism is referred to in Test. Levi. xvi. 5: ('through faith and water'), in Test. Asher. vii. 3: 'breaking the head of the dragon in the water' (δαίμον τοῦ ὕδατος).

Finally, though the first six lines may just conceivably be pre-Christian, the present writer regards the following passage, Test. Levi, xviii. 8-12, in its present form as indubitably Christian in point of view:

'For He shall give the majesty of the Lord to His sons in truth for evermore;
And there shall none succeed Him for all generations for ever.
And in His priesthood the Gentiles shall be multiplied in knowledge upon the earth,
And enlightened through the grace of the Lord:
[But Israel shall be diminished through ignorance,
And darkened through grief: all MSS except be]
In His priesthood shall sin come to an end,
And the lawless shall cease to do evil.
And the just shall rest in Him.
And He shall open the gates of paradise,
And shall remove the threatening sword against Adam.
And He shall give to the saints to eat from the tree of life,
And the spirit of holiness shall be upon them.
And Beliar shall be bound by Him,
And He shall give power to His children to tread upon the evil spirits' (cf. Test. Zeb. ix. 5b²).

The continual change in reference of the pronoun 'he,' 'him,' 'his' is very difficult. What can 'His sons' and 'His children' mean? Again, the last six lines would be unique if they referred to the Messiah, as Charles holds. Apparently they must refer to God. Surely only the Christian interpolator could be guilty of such an astonishing combination of what were no doubt originally two Jewish statements (possibly in one and the same passage), one referring to the Messiah, and one to the marvels which God would work in Messiah's days.

LITERATURE.—I. CHIEF EDITIONS OF THE TEXT.—(i.) In the Greek versions.—J. E. Grabe, *Spicilegium Patrum*², Oxford, 1714; R. Sinker, Testamenta XII Patriarcharum, Cambridge, 1869, Appendix (containing a collation of the Roman and Patmos MSS), do., 1879; R. H. Charles, The Greek Versions of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Oxford, 1908. (ii.) In the Armenian version.—H. Sargis Josephéantz, The Treasury of the Old and New Fathers, Venice, 1896, i. 27-151. (iii.) In the Slavonic version.—N. Tichonravov, Pamiatniki Otrechennoi Russkoi Literaturi, 2 vols., St. Petersburg, 1863. (iv.) In translations.—(a) From the Greek: Grosseteste's Latin version, Eng. tr. by A. Golding, London, 1581; F. Schnapp, in E. Kautzsch's Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen, Tübingen, 1900, pp. 458-506; R. H. Charles, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, London, 1908, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Oxford, 1913, ii. 236-360. (b) From the Armenian: J. Issaverdens, The Uncanonical Writings of the Old Testament, Venice, 1901, pp. 349-479.

II. COMMENTARIES AND CRITICAL INQUIRIES.—J. E. Grabe, *Spicilegium Patrum*², i. 129-144, 335-374; R. Sinker, Testamenta XII Patriarcharum, pp. 1-125; Testamenta XII Patriarcharum in DCB iv. 865-874; F. Schnapp, Die Testamente der zwölf Patriarchen untersucht, Halle, 1884, also in Kautzsch's Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen, ii. 455-506; W. J. Deane, Pseudepigrapha, Edinburgh, 1891, pp. 162-192; F. C. Conybeare, 'On the Jewish Authorship of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs,' JQR v. [1893] 375-398, sect. of art. 'Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs' in JE xii. 113, reviews of Charles in Rev. of Theol. and Phil. iv. [1903-09] 373-384; K. Kohler, 'The Pre-Talmudic Haggada,' JQR v. 400-406, sect. of art. 'Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs' in JE xii. 113-118; M. Gaster, 'The Hebrew Text of one of the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs,' PSBA xvi. [1893-94] 33-49, 109-117; A. Harnack, Gesch. der altchristl. Literatur, Leipzig, 1897, ii. i. 566-570; E. Schürer, GVF iii.³ [do., 1898] 252-262, HJP ii. iii. [Edinburgh, 1886] 114-124; R. H. Charles, 'Apocalyptic Literature,' EBI i. 237-241, 'Testaments of the XII Patriarchs,' HDB iv. 721-725, 'Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs,' *EBR*¹¹ xxvi. 666-668, HJ iii. [1905] 558-573, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, ii. 282-295; W. Bonssset, 'Die Testamente der zwölf Patriarchen,' in ZNTW i. [1900] 187-209, 344-346; F. C. Burkitt, in JThSt x. [1908] 135 t., Jewish and Christian Apocalypses (Schweich Lectures, 1913), London, 1914, pp. 34-37; J. W. Hunkin, in JThSt xvi. [1914] 80-97.

III. RELATED WORKS.—(a) A Hebrew Testament of Naphtali: text collated by M. Gaster, PSBA xvi. 109-117; translated in Kautzsch's Apok. und Pseud. ii. 489-492; original in Charles, Greek Versions, pp. 239-244, translated in his Testaments, pp. 221-227, and Apoc. and Pseud. ii. 361-363. (b) A source of the Testament of Levi: Aramaic text in JQR xix. [1907] 566-588; in Charles, Greek Versions, pp. 245-256, where also (c) Greek text (interpolation in Mount Athos MS, Test. Asher, vii. 2), pp. 247-253, and (d) Syriac fragment, p. 254. For translations see his Testaments, pp. 228-235, Apoc. and Pseud. ii. 364-367.

A. LL. DAVIES.

TESTIMONY.—See MARTYR, TRIAL-AT-LAW.

TETRARCH.—This title originally signified the governor of the fourth part of a country. Thus

* Cf. for this difficulty 1 En. xlviii. 7.

Philip of Macedon divided Thessaly into four districts called 'tetrarchies.' Later, however, the title came to be used in a loose sense of any petty ruler, and in this sense it is applied in the NT to Herod Antipas, Philip, and Lysanias. Of these Herod is called 'king' in Mt 14⁹; but the usual and correct designation of him is 'tetrarch,' and it is thus that he is mentioned in Ac 13¹, the only passage in the apostolic writings where the title occurs.
G. WAUCHOPE STEWART.

THANKSGIVING.—The true ideal of human life, as interpreted in the NT, is to make it a great service of thanksgiving. The thanksgivings of our Lord, culminating in His institution of the Eucharist, which was typified in His thanksgiving prayers at the feeding of the crowds, prepared the Church for this thought, linking worship with work.

It has been finely said: 'As prayer is a recognition of our dependence upon God amid the darkness and uncertainties of the future, so thankfulness is a recognition of our indebtedness to Him for the blessings of the past.'* St. Paul's Epistles are full of a deep spirit of joy which is the constant reward of a truly thankful spirit. All his letters addressed to churches, with the exception of the Epistle to the Galatians, begin with words of thanksgiving. We note this especially in 2 Co 1¹¹, when the dark cloud of grief over the backsliders at Corinth is passing (cf. 4¹⁵).

He regards unbroken and universal thanksgiving as 'the will of God in Christ Jesus' (1 Th 5¹⁸). He traces one root of the degradation of the heathen world to lack of thanksgiving (Ro 1-11). In Ro 14⁶ he demands that the scrupulous man no less than the Christian who is indifferent to ordinances about meats or days should show thankfulness.

The great collection for the poor saints in Jerusalem is to be motivated by thanksgiving, and will produce results beyond the material offering in the recipients as in the givers: 'Ye being enriched in everything unto all liberality which maketh through us thanksgiving to God' (2 Co 9^{11, 12}). In Eph 5²⁰ he teaches that thanksgiving is the inspiration of Christian poetry and music, in which it found its most characteristic expression.

That St. Paul feels that it cannot be carried too far is proved by such strong expressions as Col 2⁷, 'abounding in thanksgiving,' for the glory of the faith in Christ. His main line of thought is always 'in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him' (3¹⁷). He expects that the universality of our intercessions will be matched by equal universality in our thanksgivings (1 Ti 2¹).

Finally, we note that, when writing to the Philipians, whose unwavering loyalty was a constant solace to him in many trials, his thanksgiving (Ph 1³⁻⁵) was 'more than usually earnest. The Apostle dwells long and fondly on the subject. He repeats words and accumulates clauses in the intensity of his feeling' (Lightfoot, ad loc.).

In Rev 11^{17, 18} 'the Elders represent the Church in her great function of ευχαριστία' (Swete, ad loc.) and respond to the great voices of the living creatures in stirring strains.

The Apostolic Fathers strike the same note, e.g. Clement of Rome (Ep. ad Cor. i. 38): 'Seeing therefore that we have all these things from Him, we ought in all things to give thanks to Him, to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.' The Ignatian Epistles are redolent of the spirit of thanksgiving, especially for the Revelation in Christ and 'the love of the churches' (Ro 9) (see

* H. P. Liddon, Sermons on Some Words of Christ, London, 1892, p. 217.

Epistle of Barnabas, 7, quoted under PRAISE). See also art. PRAYER.

LITERATURE.—E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, London, 1904; W. H. Frere and A. L. Illingworth, Sursum Corda, do., 1911; W. Law, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, do., 1899; A. J. Worledge, Prayer, do., 1902, pp. 219-223. A. E. BURN.

THEATRE.—The ancient Greek theatre (lit. 'a place of spectacle,' 'a beholding place') was regularly a building of semicircular ground-plan, open to the sky. On the diameter were the stage and everything pertaining to it. The inner part of the semicircle below the level of the stage had an altar in the middle on which incense was burnt. Around this central part the tiers of stone seats rose to the top, intersected at regular intervals by passages to enable the spectators to reach their places. The entrances for spectators were at the ends of the stage. In origin theatrical exhibitions were in honour of the god Dionysos, and were held only on the days of his festivals. Attendance at the theatre on such occasions was an act of worship. Only in course of time did the theatre become a place of amusement entirely, divorced from all connexion with religion. The size of a theatre varied according to the size of the population of the city in which it was. As a general rule it was of necessity the largest building in the city, and, as on most days of the year it was not required for play-acting, it was available for public meetings. In Athens the meetings of the public assembly (ἐκκλησία) took place in the theatre. So at Ephesus (Ac 19), when the disturbance aroused by Demetrius took place, it was the most natural thing in the world that a rush should be made to the theatre (v. 29).

LITERATURE.—A. E. Haigh, The Attic Theatre, ed. A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, Oxford, 1907. A. SOUTER.

THEFT.—See STEALING.

THEOPHILUS.—Theophilus is the name of the person to whom the author of the Lucan Gospel and the Acts addressed his treatises. It is not certain whether Theophilus was a real person or a literary figment. The same doubt applies to other books in early Christian literature which seem to have been intended for a general public but are addressed to an individual, e.g. the Epistle to Diognetus. There is, however, no proof that the fiction of an imaginary address was a common literary artifice.

Origen (Hom. in Luc. i.), without rejecting the existence of a historical Theophilus, applied the name to all who are loved of God. Jerome (Anecdota Maredsolana, Maredsous, 1895, iii. 3. 20) equates Theophilus with 'amicus vel amator Dei,' and Salvianus (Ep. ix. 18) says that Luke addressed the two books 'ad amorem Dei.'

It is also possible that there is a reference to this interpretation in Tatian, Orat. adv. Graecos, xii. 3: τὰς θειοτάτας ἐρμηνείας αἱ κατὰ χρόνον διαγραφῆς ἐξηληγεμέναι πᾶν θεοφιλεῖς τοὺς προσέχοντας αὐταῖς πεποιθήκασιν (suggested by E. A. Abbott, EBi ii. 1790), but the point cannot be pressed.

Lightfoot (Biblical Essays, London, 1893, p. 197) seems to favour the view that Theophilus is a nom de guerre. If this be so, the following remarks as to the interests of Theophilus would need to be interpreted as referring to the class of which this imaginary person was typical. In this case it is interesting to note the parallel between Ac 1, τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον ἐποιήσαμην περὶ πάντων, ὡς Θεόφιλε, and Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 445, ὁ μὲν πρότερος λόγος ἦν ἡμῖν, ὡς Θεόδοτε, περὶ τοῦ κτλ.

Assuming that Theophilus was a real person, the use of the title 'excellent' (κράτιστος) in Lk 1³ has been used as a proof that he was a man of high official rank. It appears, however, that this title was often given to persons of good position as a matter of courtesy, and proves nothing. It is used by other writers in their dedicatory addresses (cf. Dion. Hal. de Orat. Antig. [ὡς κράτιστε Ἀμμαῖε] and the Epistle to Diognetus). W. M. Ramsay thinks that the title ought to be interpreted in the strictest official manner, though he admits that 'some Greeks were not so accurate as Luke' (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 388 n.); he endeavours to meet the obvious (and, in most writers' judgment, fatal) objection that Theophilus cannot be the name of a Roman of equestrian rank, as it is Greek and not Latin, by the suggestion that Theophilus is the baptismal name of an official who would have been compromised if his legal name had been used. Attractive as this theory is, it is faced by the difficulty, stated, but apparently not appreciated, by Ramsay himself, that there is no evidence of the use of baptismal names at any period which can be suggested for Luke's writings.

The question has often been disputed whether the Lucan writings assume that Theophilus was a Christian, or only an interested heathen inquirer. There seems to be nothing decisive either way, but, although the word κατηχήθης, used in Lk 1³, need not be used of Christian catechetical instruction, it is perhaps more likely that it ought to be taken in this sense. The most probable guess is that Theophilus may have been a 'God-fearer,' but there is no evidence either for or against this view.

There is no credible tradition as to Theophilus in early literature.

The Clementine Recognitions (x. 71) say that a rich citizen of Antioch named Theophilus founded a great basilica which was established as the See (cathedra) of Peter. Pseudo-Hippolytus identified this Theophilus with the one to whom Luke wrote, and in Apost. Const. vii. 46 Theophilus appears as the third bishop of Caesarea, Zacchæus and Cornelius being his predecessors. This tradition is almost certainly a confusion of the Theophilus of the Recognitions with the Theophilus who was living about 190. It is also to be noted that Seneca addressed his seventh letter to a Theophilus. The notes occasionally appended to MSS of the Gospels sometimes say that Theophilus was a disciple of Luke (H. von Soden, Die Schriften des NT, Berlin, 1902, i. 319), sometimes that he was a man of senatorial rank (συγκλητικὸν ὄντα καὶ ἀρχοντα τῶς) because he is addressed as κρατιστος (p. 324), but these statements are important only as showing the absence of any tradition or legend.

Among modern guesses, ingenious but devoid of any foundation, may be mentioned A. Beck's, who identifies Luke with the unnamed companion of Cleopas on the way to Emmaus and Theophilus with an Antiochene tax-collector, the friend of Chuza and Herod, who had gone to Caesarea with Herod and Berenice (Prolog des Lk.-Evangeliums, Amberg, 1900).

As 'tradition' is thus ignorant of any facts concerning Theophilus, the only source of information which we possess is contained in the implications of the Lucan writings. Using this clue, the interest of Theophilus in Christianity may fairly be regarded as identical with the purpose of Luke in writing. Fully or certainly to discover what this was is doubtless impossible, but a general consideration of the Lucan books, both by themselves and as compared with the other Gospels, gives some important clues.

The most remarkable feature of the Lucan writings is that, unlike Mark and Matthew, they contain a continuation of the history of Jesus. This clearly points to a circle in which Church life, as something distinct from the Synagogue, had become self-conscious. It must be remembered that, so far as Mark goes, there is nothing to show this self-consciousness. The Second Gospel seems to have been written to prove that Jesus was the Messiah, not to support the view that the Christians were the chosen people of God. Similarly in Matthew, though there is a great development beyond the position of Mark, the question is that of the Law, not of the Church, or congregation of God. Matthew's object is to show Christianity as the New Law, and therefore he added to Mark large sections expounding the teaching of Jesus in this light. He could not be satisfied with Mark, but was not obliged to consider the meaning of the Christian community. Luke, however, and Theophilus by implication, were concerned to give a reasonable account of the community, and to propound the view that the Christians, not the Jews, are the true Ecclesia—using the word which from its associations in the LXX implied that those to whom it was applied were the Ancient People of God. Acts especially seems intended to prove this proposition, and it justifies the conclusion that one of the λόγοι in which Theophilus had been instructed concerned the claim of Christians that they and not the Jews were the true people of God.

It is also possible that this contention had a further apologetic importance. It has often been noticed that Luke is anxious to prove that there was no lawful reason for persecution by the Romans. The right of the religion of Israel to toleration was unquestioned, and it was possibly part of Luke's apologetic aim that the Christians' Church, not the Jewish Synagogue, could claim this toleration.

LITERATURE.—J. Moffatt, DCG, art. 'Theophilus'; T. Zahn, Einführung in das NT, Leipzig, 1906, § 53, n. 5.

K. LAKE.

THESSALONIANS, EPISTLES TO THE.—1. The Thessalonian Church.—(1) The narrative of Ac 17.—Thessalonica, a free Greek city with the right to summon its own assembly, was a flourishing seaport and the capital of one of the four divisions of Macedonia. Thither, in the course of his second missionary journey, came Paul, together with Silas and Timothy, to carry on the work cut short in Philippi by the civil power. Beginning as usual with the Jews, the Apostle preached in the synagogue on three successive Sabbaths. The result of his preaching was the conversion of a few of the Jews, of a great multitude of Greek proselytes, and of a considerable number of the principal women. Subsequently the Jews, aided by the rabble* of the city, created an uproar, stormed the house where the apostles lodged, and dragged Jason their host before the municipal assembly. There they accused him of harbouring men whose presence was a menace to the public peace, adherents of a rival Emperor, one Jesus. To such a charge no Imperial officer could safely turn a deaf ear, least of all in a city possessing peculiar privileges. Yet the action of the politarchs was lenient. They bound over Jason and 'the rest' to keep the peace of the city and let them go, probably holding them responsible for the continued absence of Paul and Silas from Thessalonica (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 231). Meanwhile the apostles and Timothy had been sent by night to Berea, where they continued their missionary labours. But the hostility of the Thessalonian Jews still pursued them, and their work had to be abandoned. Paul departed to the sea,* probably to Dium, where he embarked for Athens. Silas and Timothy remained at Berea with instructions to rejoin him as soon as possible (ὡς τάχιστα, Ac 17¹⁵).

(2) Supplementary details supplied by the Epistles.—The reliability of Ac 17 is attested by the accuracy of its local information. The existence of the Thessalonian δῆμος (v.⁵), the title πολιτάρχης (vv.⁶⁻⁸), the greater freedom of women in Macedonian life as compared with that of Athens (v.⁴), are all facts substantiated by contemporary evidence (cf. Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 237 ff.; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 227, AJTh ii. [1898] 598-632). Yet the Acts narrative is an outline sketch rather than a finished picture (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 233; cf. Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, London, 1909, p. 206). Its appearance is considerably altered by the addition of details gleaned from 1 Thessalonians.

(a) Though the writer of the Acts admits that most of the Thessalonian Christians were Gentiles, he speaks only of Gentile proselytes to Judaism (τῶν τε σεβομένων Ἑλλήνων, 17⁴). 1 Thess. implies that the Thessalonian Church was composed largely of converts from heathenism (1⁹ 2¹⁴ 4¹⁻⁵). This discrepancy certainly disappears if we regard as the true text of Ac 17⁴ Ramsay's emendation πολλοὶ τῶν σεβομένων, καὶ Ἑλλήνων πλῆθος πολλὸν κτλ. (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 226 n.). But probably the insertion of καὶ by the Bezan and 'inferior' MSS on which it is based represents only a scribe's attempt to avoid the unusual phrase τῶν σεβομένων Ἑλλήνων (Askwith, An Introduction to the Thessalonian Epistles, p. 12 ff.).

(b) Ac 17 seems to suggest that Paul left Thessalonica soon after his three weeks of synagogue teaching. From 1 Thess. we gather that the Apostle settled down to his ordinary trade (2⁹; cf. 2 Th 3⁹), dealt personally with individual converts (2¹¹), and built up a simple form of church organization (5¹²). Twice at Thessalonica he received donations from Philippi (Ph 4^{15, 16}). These things would scarcely be crowded into three weeks. Clearly the Apostle spent a much longer time at Thessalonica. The chronological scheme of Acts would allow for a stay of six months (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 228).

(c) From Ac 18⁵ it would naturally be inferred that Silas and Timothy first rejoined Paul at Corinth. 1 Thess. makes it clear that before this they had been with him in Athens (3¹). These differences between Acts and 1 Thess., while they betray no fundamental contradiction, yet serve to show the complete independence of the two narratives. 'It is evident that that epistle was not in the hands of the author of Acts . . . nor was Acts in the hands of the author of 1 Thess.' (EBi iv. 5040 f.).

2. Occasion and date of the Epistles.—In Athens Paul was joined by Silas and Timothy, who caused him grave anxiety by their tidings of fresh persecutions suffered by the Thessalonian Church (1 Th 3¹⁻⁵). More than once Paul planned a return to Thessalonica, but the way was barred. What particular obstacle is meant by the Oriental phrase ἐνέκοψεν ἡμᾶς ὁ Σαραπας (2¹⁸) is uncertain. Perhaps it was the unrescinded prohibition of the Thessalonian politarchs (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 231). Whatever its nature, it did not affect Timothy, and accordingly Paul and Silas (cf. ἐρέψαμεν, 3¹) sent him in their stead to learn the state of the Church's affairs, and to strengthen the persecuted Christians. Left alone in Athens, after

* Lake (The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, p. 69 n.) suggests that ἀγοραίων (Ac 17⁵) means not 'loafers' but 'agitators' (cf. Plutarch, Emil. Paul. 38), and that the δῆμος to which the apostles were to have been brought was not a special juridical body, but merely the agitation meeting called into existence by the ἀγοραίοι.

* Zahn, following in v.¹⁴ the reading of the MSS HLP ὡς ἐν τῇν θάλασσαν, suggests that Paul travelled overland to Athens (Intro. to the NT, Eng. tr., 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1909, vol. i. p. 214).

a sojourn in that city of not more than four or five weeks Paul went on to Corinth, where Silas and Timothy found him on their return from Macedonia* (Ac 18⁵). Timothy's report, supplemented perhaps by a letter from the Thessalonians, was on the whole extremely satisfactory (see Exp. 5th ser. viii. [1898] 161 ff. for an attempt to reconstruct the supposed letter). The constancy of the Thessalonians under persecution not only had proved them worthy of their 'election,' but had also caused their example to be held up for imitation to all believers throughout Macedonia and Achaia (1 Th 1²⁻¹⁰ 3⁵⁻⁸). Yet they were beset by dangers. Adversaries of the apostles had misrepresented their motives in preaching at Thessalonica, possibly making capital out of their secret departure from the city (2^{3^{ff}}, where the words πλάνη, ακαθαρσία, δόλος, κολακεία, πλεονεξία, ζητουντες δόξαν seem to echo actual charges brought against the writers). If the Thessalonian Christians were once brought to distrust their teachers, it seemed probable that persecution would soon drive them back to heathenism.

Furthermore, difficulties existed within the Christian community. Heathen social life and the impurity tolerated by public opinion still had attractions for some (4¹⁻⁶); some were inclined to abandon useful employment for a life of idleness (4¹¹), while others showed a spirit of disorder and contempt for those in authority (5¹²⁻¹⁴). Misunderstandings had arisen as to the use of peculiar spiritual gifts (5¹⁹⁻²⁰). Some Christians who had lost friends by death were anxious to know what part these should have in the Parousia.

Harnack ('Das Problem des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefs,' in SBA II, 1910) thinks that Timothy also reported a serious cleavage between Jewish and Gentile converts; hence the insistence on 'all the brethren,' e.g. 1 Th 3¹² 5^{15, 25}.

To remove these difficulties, the two apostles and Timothy wrote the joint Epistle, 1 Thessalonians. It was the only possible substitute for a personal visit, and every paragraph bears witness to the warmth of personal affection existing between teachers and pupils. Who bore this letter to its destination, and whether he returned immediately to Paul, we do not know. By some means, however, the Apostle learned that fresh trouble had arisen at Thessalonica. Persecution still continued and was still bravely endured (2 Th 1⁴); but a new source of anxiety had arisen from a spreading belief in the imminence of the Parousia. 1 Thess. had spoken not of the time, but only of the suddenness of the Lord's coming, yet one phrase at least (ημεῖς οἱ ζῶντες κτλ., 4¹⁵) seemed to give colour to the idea that it was to be expected within the lifetime of the existing generation. This notion was fostered by men who claimed the authority not only of the apostolic letter, but also of their own personal gift of prophecy (2 Th 2²). Wild excitement followed, and men began entirely to neglect the duties of daily life (3¹¹).

To end this disorder, the three teachers wrote a second letter. Its main point lies in the section 2¹⁻¹², which supplements the eschatological teaching of 1 Thess., by dwelling on the number of things which must happen before the victorious coming of the Lord, and so removing all ground for the belief that it is near at hand.

This account of the order of writing of the two Epistles is generally accepted by those who admit their genuineness. Harnack, however, suggests that they were written at or about the same time, 1 Thess. to the Gentile, 2 Thess. to the Jewish section of the community† ('Das Problem des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefs,' in SBA II, 1910).

* Soon after Timothy's departure from Athens, Silas seems to have been sent on a similar errand to another Macedonian Church (Ac 18⁵), perhaps to Philippi (1 Th 4¹⁵).

† This theory of the destination of 2 Thess. is based chiefly on the essentially Jewish complexion of the Epistle, especially 2¹⁻¹²,

The actual date assigned to the Epistles depends upon the particular system of Pauline chronology adopted. Both, if genuine, were written during Paul's stay at Corinth at the end of his second missionary journey (Ac 18¹¹; see EBi iv. 5037), and must in any case have been composed between A.D. 47 and 53 (see Moffatt, *Historical NT*², pp. 121-137). The interval between them would be at most a few weeks.

3. Contents of the Epistles.—(i.) 1 THESSALONIANS.—After the opening salutation (1¹), which represents a combination of the conventional Greek and Hebrew greetings of the period (χαρίς και εἰρήνη), the Epistle falls into two sections.

(a) Narrative and personal (1^{2-3¹³}).—(1) Thanksgiving for the Thessalonians' steadfastness under trial and progress in the faith, which have made them a pattern for all Christians throughout Macedonia and Achaia. Their new strength springs from the fact that they have become servants of a God who is living and real (1²⁻¹⁰).

(2) Surely they can have no doubts about the apostles' motives, when they recall their freedom from all self-seeking, their solicitude for individuals, the persecution they had suffered, the labour and privation necessitated by their voluntary independence. Pupils themselves bear witness that their teachers' attitude was that of a father exhorting his children to walk worthily of God (2¹⁻¹²).

(3) The children have responded nobly. The message of power they received has inspired them bravely to endure persecution at the hands of their countrymen, even as the Jewish Christians had already done in Judaea (2¹³⁻¹⁶).

(4) Driven from Thessalonica, the apostles have longed to return. More than once Paul planned to do so, but in vain. Unable to bear suspense, he and Silas sent Timothy from Athens to learn how they fared.* The good news he brought back has put new life into the apostles. In spite of persecution, the Thessalonians have remained steadfast. The apostles therefore pour out their hearts in thanksgiving to God, and in new longing to revisit and strengthen their spiritual children (2^{17-3¹⁰}). May God soon grant them their desire, and lead their converts still further in the way of holiness (3¹¹⁻¹³).

(b) Hortatory and doctrinal.—(1) So far they have done well. They must not relax their efforts. The Christian watchword is progress. Christian progress will involve complete severance from the impurity of pagan life. They who wilfully sin against the body, the dwelling-place of the Spirit, lay themselves open to the vengeance of God (4¹⁻⁸).

(2) Brotherly love, already a manifest token of Divine guidance in them, must be maintained. One mark of its presence will be such quiet performance of daily duties as will be an example to heathen neighbours (4⁹⁻¹²).

(3) Let no one be anxious about departed friends. Christians are one with Christ. Those who sleep will awake and have their place along with the living at His coming (4¹³⁻¹⁸). When He will come no man can tell. Christians must so live as to be prepared for His coming at any time (5¹⁻¹¹).

(4) Finally, they must remember their duty of obedience to those in authority and of mutual help and forbearance to each other. Joy, prayer, thanksgiving are the basis of the Christian life. Peculiar spiritual gifts are to be neither discouraged nor over-estimated: that which is good must and on the reading εἰλατο ὑμᾶς ὁ θεὸς ἀπαρχὴν εἰς σωτηρίαν (2¹³). Its author is inspired by a desire to accept the authenticity of 2 Thess., although he thinks that its difference in tone from 1 Thess. makes it incredible that the two Epistles were written to the same people about the same time.

* καὶ ἐπεμψα (3⁵) may perhaps imply that St. Paul sent a second messenger on his own account.

be held fast; all that bears the image of evil must be rejected (5¹²⁻²²).

The Epistle ends with a prayer for their complete sanctification, a request for their intercessions, a command to circulate the Epistle itself, and a final benediction (5²³⁻²⁸).

(ii.) 2 THESSALONIANS.—(1) The salutation (1¹⁻²) leads up to a thanksgiving for the readers' spiritual progress, especially for their endurance under persecution. Such constancy is a proof of what awaits them at the Final Judgment (1²⁻⁴). The Final Judgment is then described in a rhythmical passage based on OT phrases (1⁵⁻¹⁰), perhaps an adaptation of a primitive Christian hymn (Bornemann, Die Thessalonicherbriefe, pp. 329, 336). May they be made worthy to set forth the glory of the name of the Lord Jesus in that day (1¹⁰⁻¹²).

(2) But let them not be misled. That day is not yet, whatever mistaken teachers may say, even though they claim the support of the Apostle's letter (2¹⁻³). Do they not remember the Apostle's teaching? A mystery of lawlessness is at work in the world, but as yet it is kept in check. First must come the removal of the restraining power, the great apostasy, the climax of lawlessness in the person of the man of lawlessness and the time of his temporary success. Then, and not before then, will Christ come in victory to destroy the 'man of lawlessness' and his followers (2¹⁻¹²). Thanks be to God who has delivered the readers from such a fate: let them hold fast those things which they have received, and may God strengthen and keep them steadfast (2¹³⁻¹⁷).

(3) Let them pray for their teachers, who have full confidence in their sincerity. God grant them love and patience (3¹⁻⁵).

(4) Idle and unruly brethren are to be shunned. Such conduct is opposed both to the teaching and to the example of the apostles. The Christian must be self-supporting or be cut off from the community (3⁶⁻¹⁵). May God's own peace rest on them all (3¹⁶). The Epistle closes with a salutation in Paul's own handwriting.

4. Teaching of the Epistles.—(i.) DOCTRINE OF GOD.—The dominant thought is that God is a living personal reality, as opposed to the abstractions of heathen philosophy or the mere fancies of heathen religion (1 Th 1⁹⁻¹⁰). God gave the apostles their message (2⁴⁻¹³), and His inward power moved their hearers to accept it (2¹³, 2 Th 2¹³), so that their life is now lived in His very presence (ἐμπροσθεν τοῦ θεοῦ, 1 Th 1⁹). From Him alone come grace and peace (3¹⁻⁵, 2 Th 2¹⁶⁻¹⁸). He is our Judge (1 Th 2⁴) but He is also our Father (1³ 3¹¹⁻¹³, 2 Th 1¹⁻² 2¹⁶).

(ii.) CHRISTOLOGY.—(a) Person of Christ.—It is not too much to say that the essential Divinity of Christ and His essential equality with the Father are everywhere taken for granted. Christ is the Son (1 Th 1¹⁰): He is linked with the Father as the source of the Church's life (1³, 2 Th 1¹; cf. 1 Th 2¹⁴), as the object of prayer (1 Th 3¹¹, 2 Th 2¹⁶), as the giver of supreme blessings (2 Th 1¹²; cf. 3¹⁸, 1 Th 5²⁰). To one trained in Jewish monotheism, this can have meant nothing less than that Christ Himself is God (see Sanday in HDB iii. 648). Therefore He is naturally called ὁ κύριος, a title commonly applied to God among the Hellenistic Jews. At the same time His humanity is indicated by the use of the simple human name 'Jesus' (1 Th 1¹⁰ 4¹⁴), and His Messiahship by the frequent repetition of the title Χριστός.

(b) Work of Christ.—On earth Christ died and rose again (1 Th 1¹⁰ 4¹⁴ 5¹⁰). His death was the means of man's salvation (5⁹⁻¹⁰); His resurrection is the pledge of the resurrection of His followers (4¹⁴), who shall hereafter share His glorified life (4¹⁷ 5¹⁰). As Messiah He will finally vanquish the forces of evil (2 Th 2⁸⁻¹⁰), and sit on the judgment-seat (1⁷⁻¹⁰).

(iii.) THE HOLY SPIRIT.—As the Son is linked with the Father, so also the Holy Spirit is associated with the Divine activity. The Holy Spirit inspired both the conviction with which the apostles preached and the joy with which their message was received (1 Th 1⁵⁻⁹). From the Holy Spirit came those charismatic gifts which abuse seemed likely to bring into contempt (5¹⁹). Bodily impurity is a sin against the Holy Spirit of God planted within (4⁸). It cannot be claimed, however, that the Holy Spirit is spoken of as distinctly personal.

(iv.) ESCHATOLOGY.—The eschatological teaching of these Epistles centres round the doctrine of the victorious coming of the Lord Jesus as the climax of human history. Yet in neither Epistle do the writers profess to give a complete description of that final event. They select only those points which bear directly on the practical question before them at the moment. The teaching of the First Epistle is framed to answer the question 'What part will dead Christians take in the Parousia?' That of the Second Epistle is shaped by the desire to quiet hysterical unrest at Thessalonica with an assurance that the Parousia is not imminent. If the statements of the two Epistles have few points of contact, it is because they are dealing with entirely different aspects of their subject.

(1) 1 Th 4^{13-5¹⁰}.—(a) The Parousia and the resurrection of the dead (4¹³⁻¹⁸).—No anxiety need be felt about the faithful departed. When Jesus comes again, God, who raised Him from the dead, will also raise up those who are united to Him.* Nor will they be at any disadvantage as compared with the living. 'For the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a commanding word (κελεύσματος), with the voice of the archangel and with the trumpet of God.' The dead in Christ will first rise; then they who are (still) alive will be snatched up along with them into the air in clouds to meet the Lord: thus shall they be ever with the Lord (4¹⁵⁻¹⁸). In this passage the writers claim to be speaking ἐν λόγῳ Κυρίου (4¹⁵). Whether they are referring to actual sayings recorded in the Gospels (e.g. Mt 24³⁰, Jn 6³⁹) or to some personal revelation to Paul is uncertain (cf. Milligan, Thessalonians, ad loc.). But there can be no doubt as to the source of many of the details of their picture. They have freely borrowed the bold imagery of Jewish Apocalyptic. This should be a sufficient warning against a too literal interpretation of their statements.

κελευσμα, φωνή ἀρχαγγέλου, σάλπιγξ θεοῦ, whether they be synonymous or distinct ideas, are the usual prelude to a theophany in Jewish imagery (Ex 19¹⁶, Zec 9¹⁴), and are especially connected with the end of the last world age and the Resurrection (Dn 12¹, 4 Ezr. vi. 23; cf. Targum on Zec 14⁴, 'at that time will Jehovah take in His hand a great trumpet and with it blow ten blasts to raise the dead'). The advantage of those who survive ('qui derelicti sunt'; cf. οἱ περιλειπομένοι) at the end over the dead is discussed in 4 Ezr. xiii. 21, though the conclusion is different from that of 1 Thessalonians. The mention of clouds in connexion with the Lord's coming seems to go back to Dn 7¹³ (cf. Mt 24³⁰ 26⁶⁴). The snatching up of the living in clouds as in a chariot (cf. Ps 104³) has no known parallel in earlier or contemporary writers, but the idea is quite in keeping with Jewish apocalyptic notions (see Thackeray, The Relation of St Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, ch. v.).

These examples are sufficient to show how large a use is made in 1 Thess. of traditional Jewish ideas. But these ideas have become the setting of new Christian truths—the knowledge of Christ's resurrection as a fact, and the assurance that His resurrection is the pledge of the resurrection of His servants (4¹⁴ 5¹⁰). It is in these truths that we find the real centre of the writers' interest. For them, as for us, the setting is relatively unimportant. The permanent lesson of their teaching is that 'neither death nor any cosmic crisis in the future will make any essential difference to the close relation between the Christian and his Lord' (Moffatt, EGT, 'Thessalonians,' p. 38).

* This seems to be the sense of the difficult verse 1 Th 4¹⁴ if we connect the clause δια τὸν Ἰησοῦν with ἀφεῖ rather than with κοιμηθέντας.

(b) The time of the Parousia.—The expression ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλειπόμενοι (4¹⁵, 17) is generally understood to imply that Paul expected the Parousia to be within his own lifetime. Perhaps this is reading too much into his words. The Thessalonians had asked a question concerning the relative advantages of 'those who are dead' and of 'us who are still alive,' in the event of a speedy return of Christ. It may be that the Apostle's answer merely repeats the terms of the question. Or the clause ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλειπόμενοι may well be paraphrased, 'When I say "we," I mean those who are living, those who survive to that day' (Lightfoot, Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, p. 66). At any rate, the writers definitely refuse to predict 'times and seasons' (5^{1, 2}). The Christian's duty is not to seek to know the future, but so to live as to be prepared for the Lord's coming at any time (5^{4a}).

(2) 2 Th 2¹⁻¹².—The signs of the end.—The eschatological teaching of the Second Epistle is supplementary to that of the First. It deals with the troublous times which will immediately precede the Second Advent. The coming of Christ is certain, but the end is not yet. First must come the apostasy, and the enlivenation of evil in the person of the 'man of lawlessness,' who will wage war on every object of human veneration, and take his seat in the Temple, claiming Divine honours as his right. Deceived by the signs and wonders he displays, those who have rejected the true Christ will hasten to follow this blasphemous imitator. Their infatuation is the Divine punishment of their previous wilful blindness.

The 'mystery of lawlessness,' of which these things will be the climax, is already at work in the world. But at present it is prevented by some influence (τὸ κατέχον, 2⁶) or person (ὁ κατέχων, 2⁷) from attaining its full development. Only when the restraining power has been removed will the 'man of lawlessness' be revealed. For a time he will succeed, but his reign will be ended by the coming of the Lord Jesus to destroy him and to set up the kingdom of the saints (2¹⁻¹⁰). This teaching claims to be merely an echo of instruction already given to the Thessalonians by word of mouth (2⁵). This will help to explain why to us it seems fragmentary and obscure. The readers for whom it was intended had clues to its meaning which we no longer possess. One thing, however, is certain. The main features of this 'Pauline Apocalypse' are taken unmodified from purely Jewish sources.

Later Jewish eschatology always spoke of the time immediately preceding the coming of the Messiah as one of great upheavals among the nations, and of unprecedented outbreaks of evil (see 4 Ezr. v. 1-12, vi. 19-28, Apoc. Bar. lxx., Jub. xxiii., Ass. Mos. x.; cf. Mt 24). Whether or not this idea has its roots in a primitive Babylonian Creation-myth (so Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, London, 1896; and H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit, Göttingen, 1895) is immaterial. It is sufficient to trace its development in Jewish literature. The very earliest 'Messianic' * prophecies of the OT represent the Golden Age as preceded by a time of conflict—the conflict which will destroy the particular oppressor of Israel at the time, and wipe out the ungodly in Israel itself (e.g. Am 9, Is 10²⁸⁻¹¹ 31. 32; cf. Hag 2⁶⁻⁹). The power to be overcome is in each case an actually existing Empire—Assyria, Babylon, or Persia—whose downfall will immediately usher in the glorious reign of peace. In the later prophetic books a difference appears. The Messianic age is thrown forward into a remote future, and is introduced by a struggle on a much vaster scale. Not one but all the heathen nations gather in a combined attack upon Jerusalem and are destroyed (Ezk 38. 39, Jl 3⁸⁻²¹; cf. Zec 14^{1-7, 12}). Obviously such descriptions are symbolical. They mark the transition-stage between prophecy properly so called and apocalypse.

In the apocalyptic literature of a later period, the general notion of a final conflict between the powers of the world and the kingdom of the saints reappears in varying forms. In times of unusual oppression it seemed to be near at hand, and existing heathen rulers seemed to represent the very incarnation of the heaven-defying world-spirit. The book of Daniel takes this view of Antiochus Epiphanes (Dn 11^{36a}), and at a later time the Psalms of Solomon seem to regard Pompey in a similar way (Pss.-Sol. ii. 1, 29, xvii. 13).

In later pictures of the last struggle a shadowy figure sometimes appears, half-human, half-demonic, who is to lead the world-forces in the last times (Apoc. Bar. xl.; cf. 4 Ezr. v. 1 ff., Sib. Orac. iii. 60 ff.). His reign will be a time of general impiety (4 Ezr. v. 1, 10-12); he will perform miracles (see 4 Ezr. v. 4, 7, Sib. Orac. iii. 65 ff., Asc. Isa. iv. 5) and deceive even the faithful (Sib. Orac. iii. 69), till finally he is slain by Messiah (Apoc. Bar. xl.). This is the person familiar to later speculation under the name 'Antichrist,' a name which first appears in 1 Jn 2¹⁸⁻²⁰. An allusion to this idea is possibly to be found in the personal character given to the 'abomination of desolation' by the use of the masculine participle ἐσθῆκορα in Mk 13¹⁴. Bousset, less probably, sees a similar reference in the words of Jn 5⁴, 'If another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive' (The Antichrist Legend, p. 134).

The picture of the 'man of lawlessness' is indubitably a phase of the Antichrist tradition. Like all Apocalyptists, the writer felt himself free to introduce new details, i.e. the crowning impiety of sitting as God in the Temple, and the idea of a restraining power, which was necessary to explain why the end was delayed. But the figure presented is purely conventional, and is not directly connected with any historical person or circumstances. Its main features are borrowed from Daniel's account of Antiochus Epiphanes (Dn 11^{36a}), with a possible reminiscence of Ezekiel's description of the prince of Tyre (Ezk 28³). The idea, common to most apocalyptic works, of a widespread apostasy in the last times seems to have sprung from the memory of the actual apostasy of many Jews in the time of Antiochus (1 Mac 1¹¹ 2^{15, 23}; cf. Mt 24¹⁰⁻¹³). For the miracles wrought by the 'man of lawlessness,' his deluding of the Jews, and his destruction by Messiah, Jewish parallels have already been quoted (cf. also Mk 13²²). It is not necessary to suppose that the writer of 2 Th 2 intended to make any close application of the details of the old tradition to the circumstances of his own age. Many interpretations of the chapter have been based on that supposition, but they are at best precarious and quite unnecessary (see Milligan, Thessalonians, p. 166 ff.; Findlay, Thessalonians, p. 223 ff.; HDB iv. 748). The one point which may be granted is that by the force which restrains the final outbreak of lawlessness is meant the Roman Empire. * The 'mystery of lawlessness'

* It is convenient to speak of these passages as 'Messianic,' although some of them contain no reference to a personal Messiah. The fact that in some cases the description of the Messianic age is of much later date than the account of the conflict is unimportant. It is sufficient that they were placed side by side when the prophetic books took their final form.

* τὸ κατέχον will then be the power of the Empire: ὁ κατέχων the Emperor as the representative of that power, or perhaps the angel which presides over the fate of the Empire (cf. Dn 10¹³).

is any power, whether Jewish or heathen, which actively opposes the spread of Christ's Kingdom. The portrait of the 'man of lawlessness' is wholly ideal, a kind of personification of the supreme effort of the anti-Christian forces.

Superficially viewed, this teaching may seem to be merely an echo of an obsolete myth. But it must not be forgotten that the language of Apocalypse is essentially symbolical. Paul has not hesitated to use all the imagery of Jewish Apocalyptic, yet through this conventional symbolism he expresses the truly Christian confidence that in the end the cause of Christ must triumph and all the powers of evil cease to be (see Findlay, Thessalonians, p. 230; Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 184).

5. Authenticity of the Epistles.—(i.) 1 THESSALONIANS.—At the present day it is scarcely necessary to defend the authenticity or even the integrity of 1 Thessalonians. Both are accepted as fully established by all modern critics (e.g. Jülicher, Wrede, Harnack, Milligan, Moffatt, Lake), except the small minority who regard all the Pauline Epistles as spurious (see EBi, art. 'Paul,' § 38). The only really doubtful clause is 2^{16b}, ἐφθασεν δὲ ἐπ' αὐτοὺς ἡ ὀργὴ εἰς τέλος, which seems to be a reminiscence of Test. Levi, vi. 11, and may have been added after the fall of Jerusalem. The genuineness of the rest of the Epistle is put beyond all doubt by its thoroughly Pauline style, its independence of the Acts narrative, and the absence of any doctrinal or polemical interest which could supply the motive of a forgery.

(ii.) 2 THESSALONIANS.—The case for 2 Thess. is not so clear. Its genuineness has been doubted on the following grounds.

(1) Its close resemblance in structure to 1 Thess., with which it is said to be coupled a difference in tone and colour so great as to make it incredible that the two Epistles were written by the same writer to the same community about the same time (Wrede). This is the most weighty objection that has been advanced, but it is by no means conclusive. It may be granted that, apart from the sections 1⁵⁻¹² 2¹⁻¹² 15³¹ 3¹⁰ 12¹⁷, the Second Epistle is almost a reproduction of the First. Yet, amid this general resemblance, we do not find those subtle differences of vocabulary and syntax which betray the hand of the imitator. The difference of vocabulary is not greater than can be accounted for on natural grounds (Moffatt, LNT, p. 79). There is an un-Pauline stiffness and formality about the style of some passages (e.g. 1¹⁰⁻¹² 2^{7b-10}), yet it occurs chiefly in what may be quotations of some semi-liturgical sentences (cf. Findlay, Thessalonians, p. lvii; EBi iv. 5044). A possible explanation of the close resemblance between the two Epistles may be that Paul had a copy of 1 Thess. before him when he dictated 2 Thessalonians. Such a reference to the earlier Epistle would be quite natural, in view of its having been quoted to support mistaken ideas about the Parousia (2-). The colder, more official tone of 2 Thess. as compared with the First Epistle may be explained by the necessity for plain speaking occasioned by the errors of some Thessalonians. Its more Jewish complexion is due to the essentially Jewish nature of its subject. Harnack's theory that it was addressed exclusively to the Jewish community is ingenious but unconvincing.

(2) Its eschatology.—(a) A former generation of scholars maintained that the passage 2¹⁻¹² contains references to events much later than the death of Paul (so Kern, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Bahnsen). This position is no longer tenable. Increased knowledge of Jewish and primitive Christian eschatology has shown that the references of the Epistle are not to actual events but to traditional expectations.

(b) A second argument has been based on the ground that the teaching of 2 Th 2¹⁻¹², which represents the Parousia as heralded by many signs, is incompatible with the view of 1 Th 5^{1a}, that it will be sudden and unexpected. In any case, this is not a fatal objection to the Pauline authorship of either Epistle. Such seeming inconsistencies are characteristic of all primitive Christian conceptions of the end (e.g. Mt 24^{24a}). But it is possible to exaggerate the discrepancy. Perhaps the meaning which the writer of 1 Th 5^{1a} intended to convey was that 'the day of the Lord comes as a thief in the night' only for those who are asleep in indifference. Those who are awake will not be taken unawares (see EBi iv. 5042). If this be the true explanation of the passage, the discrepancy between the two Epistles disappears.

(3) References to forged epistles.—A minor objection to the authenticity of 2 Thess. has been found in its supposed reference to the existence of forged epistles (2², μήτε δι' ἐπιστολῆς ὥς δι' ἡμῶν). It is certainly difficult to believe that spurious Pauline Epistles were circulated while the Apostle was alive. But close examination of the syntax of the verse 2² shows that the clause ὥς δι' ἡμῶν should be connected not with ἐπιστολῆς but with θροεῖσθαι. The allusion then is not to spurious epistles, but to erroneous interpretations of a genuine one (Askwith, Thessalonian Epistles, p. 92 ff.). Various theories of the origin of 2 Thess. have been formulated on the assumption that the whole or part of it is spurious, e.g. (a) that into a genuinely Pauline Epistle have been interpolated the two later sections 1⁵⁻¹² and 2¹⁻¹² (P. Schmidt, ad loc.); (β) that 2¹⁻¹² is a genuine Pauline fragment for which a later writer has provided a setting by a close imitation of 1 Thess. (Hausrath, History of NT Times, Eng. tr., 4 vols., London, 1895, iii. 215); (γ) that the Epistle was written by Timothy, who was influenced by a 'Caligula-apocalypse' (Spitta, Zur Geschichte und Literatur des Urchristentums, i. 111 ff.); (δ) that the whole of 2 Thess. was written to counteract the eschatological views encouraged by the Pauline Epistles. The writer took 1 Thess. as his model because it contains the most notable outline of Pauline eschatology (Wrede, 'Die Echtheit des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefs,' in TU, new ser. ix. 2). All these theories raise more difficulties than they remove. The style of 2 Thess. is too uniform throughout to lend any support to the theory of interpolation. The Epistle must stand or fall as a whole. On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that a forger wishing to correct Paul's teaching would address his work to a Church already in possession of a recognized Epistle of Paul. When all possible objections have been fully weighed, the conclusion which presents the least difficulty is that 2 Thess. is actually what it claims to be—an authentic letter of Paul to the Christians of Thessalonica. As such it found a place in the canon of Marcion and in the Old Latin and Syriac translations of the NT. Earlier still its language (1⁴) was quoted as Pauline by Polycarp (ad Phil. xi.), though by mistake he quotes it as addressed to the Philippian.

6. Value of the Epistles.—(1) The Thessalonian Epistles are probably the earliest extant Christian writings. They present to us a primitive stage in the growth of the Church, and an early form of Christian teaching. They may be compared with Paul's speeches at Lystra (Ac 14^{15a}) and at Athens (17^{22a}) as examples of his preaching to the heathen world. Though their teaching is simple and undeveloped, it is thoroughly Pauline in tone, and latent in it we may find the germs of the full-grown Pauline theology.

(2) These letters are an interesting expression of the writer's personality. They show us Paul the pastor and his method of treating newly-made converts, his self-sacrificing devotion, his gentle dealing with personal difficulties and temptations, his continual yearning for his children in the faith. They show us Paul the Hebrew, saturated with the eschatological ideas of his own race and age, though for him all the eschatology that matters is summed up in the words: 'Whether we wake or whether we sleep, we live together with Christ' (cf. 1 Th 5¹⁰).

(3) They help us to supplement the incomplete account of the founding of the Thessalonian Church given by the Acts.

LITERATURE.—(1) Artt. 'The Thessalonian Epistles,' 'Antichrist,' 'Man of Sin,' 'Apocalyptic Literature,' in Smith's DB, HDB, EBI, and *EB9*¹⁰.

(2) General works on the NT, especially the Introductions of T. Zahn (Eng. tr., 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1900); A. Jülicher (Eng. tr., London, 1904); B. W. Bacon (New York, 1900); J. Moffatt, *Historical NT*², Edinburgh, 1901, LNT, do., 1911; K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911.

(3) Commentaries: (a) German: P. Schmidt, Der erste Thessalonicherbrief, Berlin, 1885; W. Bornemann, Die Thessalonicherbriefe (Meyer's Kommentar über das NT), Göttingen, 1894; B. Weiss, *Brief an . . . die Thessalonicher*², Leipzig, 1902; G. Wohlenberg, Der erste und zweite Thessalonicherbrief ausgelegt (Zahn's Kommentar zum NT), do., 1903.

(b) English: H. Alford, *The Greek Testament*², London, 1857, iii.; B. Jowett, *Thessalonians, Galatians, Romans*², do., 1859; J. B. Lightfoot, Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, do., 1895; J. Denney, Thessalonians (Expositor's Bible), do., 1892; J. Drummond, The Epistles of Paul the Apostle (International Handbooks to the NT), New York, 1899; G. G. Findlay, Thessalonians (Cambridge Greek Testament), Cambridge, 1904; G. Milligan, Thessalonians, do., 1908; J. Moffatt, EGT, 'Thessalonians,' London, 1910; J. E. Frame, ICC, 'Thessalonians,' Edinburgh, 1912.

(4) Special Studies: E. H. Askwith, Introduction to the Thessalonian Epistles, London, 1902; F. Spitta, 'Der zweite Brief an die Thessalonicher,' in Zur Geschichte und Litteratur des Urchristentums, i. [Göttingen, 1893]; W. Wrede, 'Die Echtheit des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefs,' in TU, new ser. ix. 2 [Leipzig, 1903]; A. Harnack, 'Das Problem des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefs,' in SBAW, 1910.

(5) Historical and doctrinal: J. B. Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, London, 1893, pp. 253-269; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, do., 1895; H. St. J. Thackeray, St. Paul and Contemporary Jewish Thought, do., 1900; R. J. Knowling, The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, do., 1911; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, do., 1904; W. Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, Eng. tr., do., 1896.

A fuller list of authorities will be found in J. Moffatt, LNT, pp. 64-66. F. S. MARSH.

THESSALONICA (Θεσσαλονίκη, now Salonika).—Thessalonica was a large and important Macedonian city, whose original name of Therme, derived from the hot springs found in the vicinity, was preserved in the Thermaicus Sinus, the bay at the head of which the city stood. Refounded by Cassander about 315 B.C., it was named after his wife Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander the Great. 'He pulled down the cities in the district of Crucis and on the Thermaic Gulf, collecting the inhabitants into one city' (Strabo, VII. fr. 21). The site was well chosen alike for defence and for commerce. Rising in tiers of houses from the seamargin to the top of rocky slopes, and surrounded by high white walls, the city presented a striking appearance from the sea. Receiving the products of the vast and fertile plain watered by the Axios and the Haliacmon, it was the most populous city in Macedonia (Strabo, VII. vii. 4) and had a large share in the commerce of the Aegean. Under the Romans it became the capital of one of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided, and afterwards the virtual capital of the whole province. It was made a strong naval station, and during the first Civil War became the headquarters of Pompey and the senate. Having afterwards favoured the side of Octavian and Antony in the struggle with Brutus and Cassius, it was rewarded by being made a free city of the Empire. Cicero, who spent seven months of exile in it, was struck by its central position, the Thessalonians seeming to him 'positi in gremio imperii nostri' (de Prov. Consul. ii. 4).

With unerring judgment St. Paul chose Thessalonica as the scene of one of his missionary campaigns. He must have seen its strategic importance. If his aim was to establish Christianity in the governing and commercial centres of the Empire, in order that the light might radiate over the widest areas, his choice of Thessalonica was justified by an immediate and signal success. From the Christians of this city the word of the Lord sounded forth like a trumpet (ἐξηγγηται) not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but 'in every place' (1 Th 1⁸).

As a civitas libera Thessalonica enjoyed autonomy in all internal affairs. It was the residence of the provincial governor, but in ordinary circumstances he exercised no civic authority. The city was ruled by its own magistrates, who were known as politarchs (Ac 17⁶). Luke's accuracy in the use of political terms is here strikingly illustrated. The term πολιτάρχαι is not found in any classical author, though the forms πολιάρχαι and πολιτάρχαι occur; but the inscription on a marble archway, probably erected in the time of Vespasian and still spanning a street of modern Thessalonica, begins with the word ΠΟΛΙΤΑΡΧΟΤΝΤΩΝ, which is followed by the names of seven magistrates. As part of its constitution Thessalonica had no doubt a senate and public assembly, but it is not clear whether the people (δῆμος) to whom an attempt was made to bring out Paul and Silas was the regular public meeting, as W. M. Ramsay thinks (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 228), or the disorderly mob. In a free city even the canaille of the forum—οἱ ἀγοραῖοι—liked to feel that they had a semblance of power, and their passions could easily be played upon by flattering and panic-mongering demagogues.

But St. Paul's real enemies in Thessalonica were his own compatriots, who had been attracted to the city as a busy mart of commerce. Evidence of the presence of Jews in Macedonia is to be found in Philo's version of an Epistle of Agrippa to Caligula (de Virtut. et legat. ad Caium, 36). Their numbers and influence in Thessalonica are indicated by the 'great multitude' of Greeks who had accepted the Jewish faith (Ac 17⁴), as well as by the ease with which they made the city crowd the instrument of their will. St. Paul went to the synagogue of Thessalonica, doubtless a splendid one, according to his custom (κατὰ τὸ εἰωθός; cf. Lk 4¹⁶), his rule being to go 'to the Jew first' (Ro 2¹⁰). His preaching and reasoning on three successive Sabbaths—or perhaps during three whole weeks (σάββατα)—ended in the inevitable quarrel between Jew and Jewish Christian. Luke's succinct narrative might be supposed to imply that St. Paul's work in the city did not extend beyond the synagogue, and that Jewish intrigues compelled him to leave at the end of three weeks; but that can scarcely be the historian's meaning. Time must be allowed for the conversion of a large number of the Gentile population of Thessalonica, for the founding of an important and influential church, and for the Christians of Philippi, 100 miles distant, sending St. Paul their gifts 'once and again' (Ph 4¹⁶). The Apostle himself recalls a fruitful ministry among the Thessalonians, in which he 'dealt with each one' not publicly but privately, 'as a father with his own children' (1 Th 2¹¹), till he had formed the nucleus of a Christian church. This quiet house-to-house work could not be compressed into three weeks. Ramsay thinks that St. Paul's residence in Thessalonica probably lasted from Dec. A.D. 50 to May 51 (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 228). J. Moffatt's suggestion of a month or two (EGT iv. 3) seems barely sufficient.

As the hostile Jews of Thessalonica knew that they could not silence St. Paul by fair means, they resorted to foul, getting the rabble of the forum to do the work of which they personally were ashamed. The accusation which was trumped up against the Apostle amounted to high treason (Ac 17), and resembled the charge that had been levelled against Jesus Himself (Jn 19^{12, 15}). There was hypocrisy in the indictment. The Messianic hope cherished by every devout Israelite was counted no crime, yet the actual proclamation of 'another king, Jesus,' is set down as an act of open rebellion, and the Jews of Thessalonica, like those of Jerusalem, have no king but Cæsar. Though only the most ignorant of the populace took the charge seriously, and the politarchs soon satisfied themselves that it was baseless, yet lexa maiestas was much too grave a matter to be dealt with lightly.

Tacitus says that already in the reign of Tiberius 'the charge of treason formed the universal resource in accusations' (Ann. iii. 38), and in course of time it became more and more common. The mere suspicion of maiestas was many a man's ruin. Pliny the younger says in his panegyric of Trajan that nothing enriched the exchequer of the prince and the public treasury so much as the charge of treason, 'singulare et unicum crimen eorum qui crimine vacarent' (Paneg. 42).

The magistrates of Thessalonica saw that they had to demonstrate their loyalty to the Empire. As the peace of the city had been disturbed, the angry passions of the 'wild beast' aroused, and a dangerous state of public feeling created, they felt justified in binding over the Apostle's friends—Jason and others—to keep the peace, and in the circumstances this could be done only if those friends advised the man who was the innocent cause of the disturbance to leave the town. Against the verdict of civic prudence it was vain to protest, but St. Paul evidently continued to chafe long under the ingenious device which made the honour of his friends a barrier between him and the work he had so successfully begun. It was such subtlety, and not the hatred of the mob, that made him think of the devices of Satan (1 Th 2¹⁸).

The Christians of Thessalonica must have endured some persecution after he tore himself away from them. They imitated the Judæan churches in patient suffering (1 Th 2¹⁴). It was three or four years before St. Paul could return to Macedonia (1 Co 16⁹), and he certainly would not fail to visit the capital, unless its gates were still shut against him. Members of the church of Thessalonica whose names are known are Jason, Gaius, Secundus, Aristarchus, and perhaps Demas. In post-apostolic times the gospel made rapid progress in Thessalonica, which became one of the bulwarks of Eastern Christendom, winning for itself the name of 'the Orthodox City.' It has now a population of 130,000, of whom 60,000 are Sephardic Jews, speaking a corrupt form of Spanish, called Ladino.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, London, 1835; Murray's Handbook to Greece, do., 1900, 822-833. JAMES STRAHAN.

THEUDAS.—Theudas is mentioned only once in the NT. In Ac 5³⁶ Gamaliel counsels moderation in the treatment of the Christians, citing Theudas's career as evidence that a movement which is not of God will come to naught of itself. Regarding Theudas we are told that he claimed to be a unique person and drew to himself about four hundred followers, but the uprising was soon crushed and the leader slain. This incident is said to have taken place some time before the days of Judas of Galilee, who led a revolt at the time of 'the enrolment.'

These statements in themselves occasion no particular difficulty. It is only when they are placed beside similar statements in Josephus that any problem arises. In Ant. XX. v. 1 f. Josephus mentions a certain Theudas who set himself up as a prophet and persuaded a large number of persons to follow him to the Jordan, where he said he would stay the waters by his word and lead his followers across on dry land. But Fadus, the procurator of Judæa (from A.D. 44 to c. 46), sent out a band of horsemen, who scattered or slew Theudas's followers, captured their leader, cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem. Soon afterwards Fadus's successor, Alexander, put to death two sons of Judas of Galilee—the Judas who had raised an insurrection when Quirinius made an enrolment of the Jews. In another connexion Josephus describes this revolt, which occurred in A.D. 6-7 (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, 6, BJ II. viii. 1).

The agreement between Acts and Josephus with respect to Judas is apparent, although it is not certain that they have exactly the same date in mind (cf. Lk 2¹⁴). They are also in general agreement as to the performance and fate of Theudas, but they differ very radically as to his date. Josephus places him nearly forty years after Judas, and thus subsequent to the time of Gamaliel, while Acts makes Theudas precede Judas. It is this chronological discrepancy that constitutes the chief difficulty in the interpretation of Ac 5³⁶.

Various solutions of the problem have been proposed:

(1) It has often been assumed that Acts and Josephus refer to two different persons, and that Josephus's failure to mention the incident recorded in Acts is not a sufficient reason for doubting the latter. This explanation seems to have been current as early as the time of Origen (cf. c. Cels. i. 57), and it still has many advocates.

(2) Others, while also believing that Ac 5³⁶ and Jos. Ant. XX. v. 1 refer to different events, seek to discover elsewhere in Josephus an incident corresponding to that of Acts. Theudas is thought to have been one of the many revolutionists mentioned in Josephus by some other name. He has been identified with the Simon who is found among the disturbers arising soon after the death of Herod the Great (Ant. XVII. x. 6, BJ II. iv. 2). This was the opinion of Sonntag ('Theudas der Aufrührer' in SK x. [1837] 622-652). K. Wieseler (Chronologischer Synopse der vier Evangelien, Göttingen, 1843, p. 103 ff., Beiträge zur richtigen Würdigung der Evangelien und der evangelischen Geschichte, do., 1869, p. 101 ff.) equates the Theudas of Acts with Matthias (Θεοδῶς—θεοδωπος=ἡρώδης), who in the last days of Herod's reign incited his pupils to pull down the golden eagle which had been placed over the great gate of the Temple (Ant. XVII. vi. 2-4, BJ I. xxxiii. 2-4).

(3) Still other interpreters think the Theudas incidents of Acts and of Josephus are so similar in general content that they must have been originally identical, but it is Josephus, they hold, rather than Acts that is erroneous. So J. D. Michaelis (Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des Neuen Bundes, Göttingen, 1788, i. 62 f.), who says that Josephus is correct in mentioning an uprising under Fadus, but wrong in making Theudas the leader. More recently F. Blass (Acta Apostolorum, Göttingen, 1895, p. 89) explains the difficulty by assuming a textual corruption in Josephus. Originally he had given no name, or else a different one, and some Christian copyist under the influence of Ac 5³⁶ introduced the name of Theudas.

(4) Another type of explanation ascribes the error to Acts. B. Weiss would make the reference to Theudas a redactional interpolation (Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das NT, Berlin, 1889, p. 574, n. 4). Other analysts would also derive the verse about Judas from a secondary source. But most scholars who find Acts at fault think the error a part of the original composition and due to the author's defective knowledge of Josephus. Dependence upon Josephus has been argued most fully by M. Krenkel (Josephus und Lucas, Leipzig, 1894, pp. 162-174) and P. W. Schmiedel (art. 'Theudas' in EBi). Josephus, it will be remembered, after referring to Theudas's fate, goes on to remark that soon afterwards the sons of Judas of Galilee were put to death. The author of Acts, so the argument runs, had vaguely remembered, or carelessly noted, the succession 'Theudas . . . Judas,' without precisely observing that Josephus was speaking in this connexion not of the fate of the well-known Judas but of that of the sons of Judas. This oversight, accordingly, resulted in the anachronism of Ac 5³².

LITERATURE.—All the important commentaries on Acts discuss the present subject. See also, in addition to treatises already referred to, H. Holtzmann, 'Lucas und Josephus' in ZWT xvi. [1873] 85-93 and xx. [1877] 535-549; T. Keim, Aus dem Urchristentum, Zürich, 1878, i. 18-21; J. Belsier, 'Lucas und Josephus,' in Theol. Quartalschrift, lxxviii. [1896] 1-78 (esp. pp. 61-71); W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, London, 1898, pp. 252-260; E. Schürer, GVF i.⁴ [Leipzig, 1901] 566 (and literature cited in note 6). S. J. CASE.

THIGH 'Thigh' (μηρός) is found in the NT only in Rev 19¹⁶, 'on his garment and on his thigh a name written.' There is considerable doubt as to the interpretation (see HDB, s.v. 'Thigh'), but the general view is that the second phrase limits the first, i.e. the name was written upon the outer garment where it falls over the thigh; or it may have been that the inscription was partly on the garment and partly on the thigh (or what covered it). It was customary to attach a legend of some sort to statues, equestrian and other, and to place this in a prominent position. See references in H. Alford, Greek Testament, iv.⁸ [London, 1875] 728, and in H. B. Swete, *The Apocalypse of St. John*², London, 1907, p. 255. In contrast to v.¹² this name is not cryptic.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

THISTLES.—See THORNS.

THONGS.—The word tr. 'thongs' (pl. of ιμάς) in Ac 22²⁵ (AV and RV) refers to the leather straps with which a captive or criminal was tied in a leaning posture to an inclined post, preparatory to flogging. In carrying out the order of the chiliarch that St. Paul should be examined by torture, the centurion directed his subordinates to bind him in this fashion, the 'thongs' being the instruments used to effect their purpose. In RVm the term is taken to signify the leather strands or lashes of the scourge (horribile flagellum) with which the torture was inflicted. The 'thongs' are thus regarded as a synonym for whip (μάστιγις) in v.²⁴. It is doubtful, however, whether the word ιμάς in the plural is ever used in this sense. Grimm admits that it may bear either signification, but in the present instance prefers the latter.

W. S. MONTGOMERY.

THORN IN THE FLESH.—See PAUL.

THORNS, THISTLES (ἀκανθα, τριβόλος, σκόλοψ).—Apart from the Gospels, thorns or thistles are alluded to only twice in the NT. In He 6⁸ ἀκανθα, 'thorn,' and τριβόλος, 'brier,' occur together. The writer exhorts his readers to be steadfast in the faith, and reminds them of the spiritual blessings which they have received. Just as the earth 'which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it,' and in spite of that 'beareth thorns and briers, is rejected,' so too will those who, endowed with all blessings and graces from above, fail to bring forth the fruits of righteousness. The term for 'bearing' in this passage is ἐκφέρουσα, and in contrast with the normal term τικτούσα in v.⁷ indicates something which is unnatural. It is contrary to nature for a field which has been duly planted with good seed, and subsequently cared for and watered, to yield thorns and briers. It is equally unnatural for those in whom the spirit of truth has been planted, and who have received similar care and attention, to fall away and abandon the faith thus planted.

In 2 Co 12⁷ the word used is σκόλοψ, 'stake.' St. Paul writes that he has been given a 'stake for the flesh—the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure.' St. Paul elsewhere (Ro 6⁶ 8¹³) recognizes the need for mortifying or crucifying the flesh, while in 1 Co 5⁵, as here, he alludes to Satan's derived power for inflicting pain and suffering, a power which Satan, however, is impelled to use for the accomplishment of man's ultimate salvation. Opinions differ as to the nature of the stake for the flesh here alluded to, but there can be no doubt that it was a bodily ailment (cf. Lightfoot, *Galatians*⁵, p. 189 f.). It may possibly have been a permanent affection of his eyesight (cf. Gal 4¹⁵), or it may have been malaria, which would perhaps explain St. Paul's statement that he first visited Galatia on account of an infirmity in his flesh (Gal 4¹⁵), or it may have been a form of epilepsy.

Thorns and thistles of various kinds are found all over Palestine. They cover fallow ground, and must be burnt before the ground can be ploughed. Prickly plants are used as hedges, and they also form the regular food of camels and goats.

LITERATURE.—The Speaker's Commentary, iii. [London, 1881] 469 f.; B. F. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews, do., 1889, p. 152 f.; J. B. Lightfoot, *St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians*⁵, do., 1876, p. 186 ff.; SDB, pp. 600, 683; HDB iv. 753; EBi ii. 1456, iii. 3620.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

THOUSAND YEARS.—See APOCALYPSE.

THREE.—See NUMBERS.

THREE TAVERNS (τρεις ταβέρναι, representing the Lat. Tres Tabernæ).—Three Taverns was a station on the Via Appia, and probably a village of some importance on account of the stream of traffic constantly flowing through it. Cicero (ad Att. ii. 11) mentions it as the point where a branch road from Antium joined the Appian Way. Here St. Paul, who had landed at Puteoli and was proceeding to Rome, was met by a company of Christian brethren who had come from the capital to welcome him (Ac 28¹⁵). According to the Antonine Itinerary, the station was 10 Roman miles nearer Rome than Appii Forum (where the Apostle had already been met by Roman brethren), and 17 Roman miles from Aricia, which is known to have been 16 Roman miles south of Rome. Tres Tabernæ probably stood about 3 miles from the modern Cisterna, on the road to Terracina, and very near the northern end of the Pontine Marshes.

LITERATURE.—C. Baedeker, *Southern Italy and Sicily*¹⁵, London, 1908, p. 12. JAMES STRAHAN.

THRONE (θρόνος).—'Throne' in the NT always implies a seat of office (cf. Ac 2³⁰). Metaphorically it is used of God's sovereignty in Heb. and Rev. (cf. Rev 4²⁻⁶, 9. 10) and of Christ's (He 1⁸, Rev 3²¹ 20¹¹). In Rev 20⁴ there are thrones for the judges, where 'the plural is perhaps meant to include Christ and His assessors, the Apostles (Mt 19²⁸) and Saints (1 Co 6³)' (H. B. Swete, *The Apocalypse of St. John*², 1907, p. 261). In Rev 4¹¹ 11¹⁶ RV the elders are on thrones round about the throne of God. We also read of 'Satan's throne' (Rev 2¹³ RV) established at Pergamum, which is probably explained by the fact that Pergamum was the chief seat of Cæsar-worship, and the first city in Asia to erect a temple to Augustus; others connect it with the worship of Æsculapius, for which the city was also famous (cf. 13^o RV: 'the dragon gave him his throne,' and 16^o RV: 'the throne of the beast'). In Col 1¹⁶ 'thrones' form one of the classes of angels—the term occurs only here in the NT—but in systems of angelology 'thrones' belong to the highest grade. These angels may be so called as sitting on thrones round the throne of God, the imagery expressing their conspicuous and serene dignity (so Origen, Lightfoot, Meyer, Abbott, etc.). Clement of Alexandria thought that they were so called because they form or support the throne of God, like the cherubim (Ezk 10¹ 11², Ps 99¹), with which several of the Fathers identified them (Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Augustine). See PRINCIPALITY.

W. H. DUNDAS.

THUNDER (βροντή).—Thunder, the noise due to the disturbance of the air by the discharge of electricity, was regarded throughout the ancient world as supernatural. One of the elements of a theophany was 'the voice that shook the earth' (He 12²⁰), words reminiscent of Ps 46⁵ and of the manifestation on Sinai (Ex 19¹⁶ 20¹³). 'The thunder to the feeling of the ancients is the most important part of the storm, seeming to be the commanding voice, the terrifying exclamation of Jahwe' (H. A. von Ewald, Commentary on the Psalms, Eng. tr., i. [London, 1880] 94). Thunder is one of the most impressive categories of the Book of Revelation. Like the seven stars, churches, seals, trumpets, and bowls, the seven thunders 'form a complete portion of the apocalyptic machinery' (H. Alford, The Greek Testament, iv.⁵ [London, 1875], on Rev 10³ 4¹). To the prophet's imagination, thunder is now a celestial warning to wicked men, now a majestic chorus in praise of God. When an angel casts a censer filled with fire upon the earth, and another pours his bowl upon the air, there are lightnings and thunders (8⁵ 16¹⁸). When the lost Ark of the Covenant is restored to its place, the thunders of Sinai are again heard (11¹⁹). To conscience-stricken men it always appeared that lightnings and thunders proceeded from the very throne of God (4⁵); and even a modern poet says that 'if He thunders by law, the thunder is still His voice.' But thunder does not always suggest terrible things to the apocalypticist. His ear catches the echoes of thunder-music in heaven. The voice of harpers harping with their harps is as the voice of a great thunder (14⁻); and the voice of a great multitude is as the voice of mighty thunders, saying Hallelujah (19⁶).

JAMES STRAHAN.

THYATIRA (Θυάτειρα, neut. pl.).—Thyatira was a busy commercial city of northern Lydia, close to the southern border of Mysia. Situated a little to the south of the mountain ridge which is the watershed of the Caicus and the Hermus (Strabo, XIII. iv. 4), it controlled the traffic of the open and fertile valley of the Lycus, which flows S.W. to join the Hermus. Doubtless an old Lydian settlement, it retained its Lydian name, but its history begins with its refounding by Seleucus Nicator, the first of the Seleucid kings of Syria, who saw the advantage of establishing garrison cities and centres of Greek culture throughout his dominions, which extended from Western Asia to the Indus. The refounded city, 'a colony of the Macedonians' (Strabo, loc. cit.), was intended as a defence against Lysimachus, the master of northern Asia Minor. Some of the 2,000 Jewish families whom Antiochus the Great deported from Mesopotamia and Babylonia to Phrygia and Lydia (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4) must have been settled in Thyatira. In the Roman period the town became an important station on the overland route by the Hellespont (Dardanelles) to the East. It lay midway between the once royal cities of Pergamos and Sardis, but its own significance was always purely mercantile. It owed its prosperity to the manufacture of woollen goods, and especially to its dyed fabrics. An interesting evidence of the spiritual influence of the Jews in Thyatira is furnished by the fact that St. Paul's earliest European convert, the proselyte Lydia, is described as 'a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira' (Ac 16¹⁴). Many scholars think that 'Lydia' was not her proper name but her ethnic designation—'the Lydian.' It was probably at her home in the Lycus Valley that she had been attracted to the lofty theism and pure morality of Judaism, and, on going to Philippi as the agent of a house of Thyatiran manufacturers and dyers, she naturally sought out the fellowship of the Jewish proseuche.

Purple had a much wider meaning in ancient than in modern times. The purple of Thyatira was probably the well-known turkey-red, made from the madder-root which grows abundantly in that region.

The native deities of Thyatira, as appears from inscriptions on coins, were the male and female Tyrimnos and Boreitene, whom the Ionian settlers identified with Apollo and Artemis. Christianity was probably brought to the city at the time of St. Paul's prolonged mission in Ephesus (Ac 19¹⁰ 28³). Sown by whatever hand, the seed took firm root there and steadily grew. There was no ensuing decline of the Church's 'love and faith and ministry and patience,' her last works being more than her first (Rev 2¹⁸). Thyatira had, however, a perplexing moral problem to solve, and it is the handling of this question that makes the letter to the church of Thyatira (2¹⁹⁻²⁹) the longest and in some respects the most obscure of all the Messages to the Seven Churches. Like the craftsmen of mediæval Europe, those of many towns in Asia Minor were united in gilds, called ἐργα or ἐργασίαι. Inscriptions prove that no city had more flourishing societies of this kind than Thyatira, the workers in wool and linen, the tanners and bronze-smiths, the dyers and potters, and so on, all having their separate gilds. When the new religion was firmly established and became a real power in the city, the burning question of the hour came to be the attitude of the Christian society to the gild. Could the new and the old live peaceably side by side? One section of the church was led by a prominent and influential woman, admired by the weaker minds of the community as worthy to rank with those prophets whose oracular utterances in the primitive Church almost rivalled the inspired words of the apostles. The watchword of this party was hearty fellowship between the church and the gild. Throwing themselves with equal zest into the life of both, they no doubt justified themselves with specious arguments. All labour, they said, is sacred, the strong collective activity of the gild no less than the feebler service of the lonely toiler. It cannot be wrong for members of the same craft to associate themselves in order to defend and promote their common interests, as well as to assist one another in days of sickness and misfortune. To enlightened Christians no real harm can come from initiation into the gild with the conventional pagan rites, from partaking of food sacrificed to idols, and even from witnessing the riotous mirth of the heathen orgies. And in the name of liberty some so-called Christians of Thyatira evidently went still further, maintaining that a plunge into occult 'depths,' an experience of unnamed immoralities, could affect only the vile body, while it was powerless to soil or harm the pure immortal soul.

Writing in the name of Christ to the church of Thyatira, St. John uses the scathing language of indignant scorn, the piercing invective of wounded love. Leaving unanswered the theoretical question whether the gild might conceivably be so Christianized that the believing artisan might conscientiously seek its protection and share its fellowship, he keeps his eye on the actual situation. To him it is clear as daylight that no servant of God can become, or remain, a member of the gild as it is—steeped in idolatry and immorality. The union of the Christian Church with the pagan association is nothing less than treason to Christ; in the language of Hebrew and Christian Puritanism, it is fornication or adultery (Rev 2²⁰⁻²²). The 'prophetess' of the Thyatiran church is denounced as a new Jezebel, all the more subtly dangerous because she is not, like the first, a fanatical heathen defender of nature-worship, but a philosophical and sentimental dabbler in it, who is using her intellectual gifts to 'teach and seduce' the followers of Christ, reviving the old fallacy, 'ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.' To the indignant prophet of the Apocalypse this kind of reasoning is infernal; the 'depths' of experience into which members of the church of Thyatira are being initiated are the 'depths of Satan' (2²⁴). He warns the coadjutors and youthful victims of the Thyatiran 'prophetess'—called 'her lovers' and 'her children'—that they will see the couch of pleasure changed into the bed of sickness and disease, and find that no sophistry can prevent sin from working death (2²²⁻²³). All antinomian progress is retrogression; every ascent 'beyond good and evil' is a disastrous fall.

* Set the maiden fancies wallowing in the troughs of Zolaism, Forward, forward, ay and backward, downward too into the abyss.

(Tennyson, Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, 145-146).

Outside the gate of Thyatira, as an inscription (CIG, 3509) proves, there stood the shrine of a Chaldaean sibyl, whose name, Sambethe, was doubtless familiar to the whole town, and of whose sooth-saying St. John may well have heard. E. Schürer suggested (in Theol. Abhandlungen, Carl von Weizsäcker zu seinem 70ten Geburtstage gewidmet, Freiburg i. B., 1892, p. 39 f.) that this may have been the Jezebel denounced in the letter, but the theory has not found acceptance. That the writer of the Apocalypse may have seen some likeness between the two clever women, the sibyl and the 'prophetess,' each of whom had a large following in Thyatira, is not improbable; but the Jezebel whom the Church did wrong to suffer (v. 20), and who had been granted time to repent (v. 21), was clearly regarded by him as being not outside but inside the Christian community. Ak-hissar, as Thyatira is now called, is a large town of mud houses, almost hidden from view by the luxuriant vegetation of its gardens. The ruins are of no great importance.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, London, 1904; C. Wilson, in Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, do., 1905, p. 84 f.

JAMES STRAHAN.

THYINE WOOD (ξύλον θύϊνον, the tree being ἡ θύϊα or θύα, rarely τὸ θύϊον).—Thyine wood is mentioned among the precious wares of the Apocalyptic Babylon, i.e. Rome (Rev 18¹²). It was a hard, dark brown, aromatic wood, exported from N. Africa and used for the making of costly furniture (Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. v. iii. 7; Diod. v. 46; Pliny, HN XIII. xxx. 16). It is commonly identified with the Thuja articulata. The Greek name (probably from θυω) refers to the fragrance of the wood, which was burned as a perfume (Hom. Od. v. 60). The Romans called it citrus—probably a mutilation of cedrus—which must not be confounded with the citron. 'All thyine wood' refers, not to different species of the tree, but to the variety of objects made of this precious wood in the luxurious Imperial city.

JAMES STRAHAN.

TIBERIUS.—The Emperor Tiberius belonged to the family of the Claudii Neronēs, a branch of the patrician gens Claudia which separated from the original family about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. His father, Tiberius Claudius Nero, son of another Tiberius, appears in history in 54 B.C. as desirous to prosecute A. Gabinius for extortion. He made overtures in Asia for the hand of Cicero's daughter Tullia in 50, but her betrothal to Dolabella had already taken place in Rome. In 48 he distinguished himself as questor and admiral of the fleet to Julius Cæsar in the Alexandrian war. Later he was elected pontifex (46) and prætor (42). Having taken up arms against Octavian (40), he had to flee to Sicily with his young wife Livia Drusilla and his scarcely two-year-old son, the future Emperor. Later he removed to Sparta, and on returning to Rome with M. Antonius in 39 he was included in the general amnesty. Soon afterwards Octavian made Livia's acquaintance and prevailed upon Nero to give her up to him (38), though at the time she was expecting the birth of her second son, Drusus, which took place in Octavian's house. Thus it came about that the Claudian house supplied so many of the early Emperors. For Tiberius, having been brought to Octavian's house at the age of four, may be said to have known no other father: his own died not later than 33. Octavian's passion for Livia did not imply the treatment of her sons as his own. Circumstances alone forced him to this decision.

Tiberius was born on 16th Nov. 42 (Suet. Tib. 5) in a house on the Palatine Hill in Rome. He made successful appearances in the law-courts in his early youth, and was given two commissions, one connected with the corn supply and the other with the inspection of the barracks of Italy. He was a tribunus militum (colonel) in the expedition against the warlike Cantabri of N.W. Spain (25), and afterwards in the East placed the diadem on the head of Tigranes, king of Armenia (20). He also recovered from the Parthians the standards they had captured from Crassus in 53 (Hor. Od. iv. xv. 4-8). In 16 Augustus and Tiberius went to Gaul, and on 1st Aug. of the following year Tiberius and Drusus were victorious over the Rati and Vindelici. In 15 Tiberius' son Drusus and nephew Germanicus were born. [Tiberius' wife was Agrippina, the daughter of the great general, Augustus' right-hand man, Agrippa, and granddaughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, Cicero's correspondent. After the birth of the child Tiberius was compelled by Augustus to divorce his wife and to marry Julia (11), Augustus' own daughter by his wife Scribonia. Julia had been married in 25 to young Claudius Marcellus, who died in 23. She became the wife of Agrippa († 12) in 21, and bore him two sons, Gaius (20) and Lucius (17). In the latter year Augustus adopted these two grandsons of his as his own sons. Julia's profligacy, scarcely to be wondered at, led to her banishment in 2.] Tiberius' first consulship was passed in Rome in 13, and in the next year he succeeded Agrippa as governor of Pannonia, where he conducted campaigns in 11 and 10. In the following year Tiberius' brother Drusus, who had been co-operating in Germany with his brother in Pannonia, met his death, and Tiberius brought the body to Rome, on which occasion he triumphed over the Dalmatians and Pannonians. In 8 he was victorious over the Sugambri and other German tribes, and celebrated his triumph in 7. In 6 he received for the first or (according to some) the second time the tribunicia potestas for five years. This was one of the most important elements of the Imperial power. On receiving it he was sent on an important mission to the East, but retired for some years to Rhodes, whence he did not return to Rome till

A.D. 2. The death of Lucius on 20th Aug. A.D. 2 and of Gaius on 21st Feb. A.D. 4 forced Augustus at last to adopt Tiberius. First Tiberius was compelled to adopt as his son Germanicus, son of Drusus, and then Augustus adopted both as his own sons. At the same time the imperium proconsulare and tribunicia potestas were conferred on Tiberius, the latter either for five or for ten years. In this year he defeated the Cherusci, and for some years afterwards was engaged in almost continuous warfare, particularly in the country to the N.E. and the E. of the Adriatic. He triumphed in A.D. 9, but returned then to Pannonia and afterwards to the Rhine. In A.D. 12 he was in sole command there, and in A.D. 13 he triumphed for victories in Pannonia and had his proconsulare imperium and tribunicia potestas renewed without limit of time. On 19th Aug. A.D. 14, the day of the death of Augustus, he succeeded to the Empire.

Tiberius had shown himself a most capable general and had led for the most part a very strenuous life. For some years he had been colleague in the Empire, but the tyrannical manner in which Augustus had treated him, joined to his obvious unwillingness to adopt him, must have embittered one who was fully conscious of the splendid services he had rendered to the Empire. The period of Tiberius' sole rule makes melancholy reading, not entirely due to the gloom and suspicion cast over him by the genius of Tacitus. Tiberius seems to have been by nature fonder of retirement and study than of anything else, and despite his military achievements proved a bad ruler. In his reign began the encouragement of informers (delatores), who made life dangerous for all with birth, position, or wealth. Tiberius' naturally melancholy and morose disposition had developed into suspicion.

Few political events of importance took place during the reign. During the rule of Augustus, the popular elective assembly had gradually ceased to have any real voice in the elections, and at the very beginning of Tiberius' reign its electoral powers were transferred to the Senate. In A.D. 17 Cappadocia and Commagene were annexed. The chief literary events of the reign were the publication in A.D. 14 of the Astronomica of Manilius, 'the one Latin poet who excels even Ovid in verbal point and smartness' (A. E. Housman, M. Manilii Astronomicum, i. [London, 1903] p. xxi), the death of Ovid and of Livy in 17, the publication of the history of Velleius Paterculus in 30, and in this reign and the next the publication of Phædrus' Fables. The reign was distinguished by military operations. At the very beginning of it there were serious mutinies of the troops in Pannonia and Germany, and Germanicus, the adopted son of the Emperor, proved so brilliant a general as to arouse the Emperor's jealousy. In A.D. 15 the troops were exposed to terrible risks in the campaign against the German general Arminius (modern Hermann). In the next year Germanicus advanced to the Elbe and returned by sea to the Rhine. The project of the Elbe frontier was, however, abandoned and Germanicus was recalled. He triumphed on 26th May 17, and was then sent to the East. About the same time a rising took place in Africa under a native, Tacfarinas, which was not subdued for many years. A serious disagreement between Germanicus and Piso, the governor of Syria, was followed by the death of the former on 10th October 19. Piso, under strong and perhaps justifiable suspicion of complicity in the death of Germanicus, was compelled by his own troops to leave Syria, and, being next year charged with this crime and with treason, committed suicide. The year 21 saw the rising of Julius Florus and Julius Sacrovir in Gaul. Their defeat was celebrated by the erection of the still-existing arch at Arausio (Orange). In the same year Arminius was assassinated.

In the year 21 the moroseness of Tiberius took a serious turn, and he retired to Campania. It was a new thing for the Emperor to leave Rome except for military or administrative purposes, and, though technically it meant no loosening of his hold on the helm of State, practically it was bound to have that effect. In 22 the tribunicia potestas was conferred on his son Drusus, who, however, died in the following year. His death is attributed by Tacitus to L. Ælius Seianus, prefect of the prætorian guard, a man of inordinate ambition, who aimed at the purple. In 26 Tiberius finally left Rome, and from this date the office of præfectus urbi (governor of Rome) became a permanent institution of the Empire. The Emperor settled at Capræ (Capri), the island off the Campanian coast, where he lived for the rest of his days. There Seianus was accustomed to consort with him. The Senate was servile to both: Agrippina († 33), the widow of Germanicus, and her son Nero were exiled; another son, Drusus, was imprisoned (and executed in 33). The way was thus paved for Seianus' promotion to the imperium proconsulare in 31. But his ambition had overleapt itself. At last his Imperial master's jealousy was aroused against him, and he, his family, and his adherents were put to death. Tiberius himself died on 16th March 37.

It was in this drab and gloomy reign that the light of the gospel first shone forth. For the historian Luke tells us that it was in the 15th year of the rule of Tiberius Cæsar that 'the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias' (Lk 3¹⁻²). In spite of the elaborate synchronisms of the historian the question what date is really intended is not easy to answer. The best solution seems to be that of W. M. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, London, 1898, p. 199 ff.) that A.D. 25-26 is intended, Luke having counted from the time when Tiberius began to rule as colleague of Augustus with equal power in all provinces of the Empire (end of A.D. 11). Neither Jesus nor (so far as we know) any of the apostles came into personal contact with Tiberius. The nearest approach made by Jesus to the Imperial throne was on the occasion when He was tried before the Emperor's procurator, or agent, Pilate (Pontius Pilatus). Pilate obtained this appointment in 26. In 36, being accused of maladministration, he was sent to Rome by L. Vitellius, governor of Syria. Tertullian (Apol. 21) states, what is intrinsically probable, that Pilate sent a report of the trial of Jesus to Tiberius. He also (ib. 5) alleges that Tiberius himself proposed to the Senate the enrolment of Jesus among the gods, and that, on the proposal being rejected, he himself remained of the same opinion, and threatened persecutors of Christians with trial. These statements are now regarded as historically valueless, and may have been taken from some apocryphal work, possibly the original Acts of Pilate, known to Justin (Apol. I. xxxv. 9, xlviii. 3). Some, however, are of opinion that Justin is referring to official documents, and this is certainly the more natural interpretation to put upon his language. Tertullian, in that case, is probably borrowing from Justin. A supposed letter from Pilate to Tiberius or Claudius contained in the apocryphal Acts of Peter and Paul (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, ed. R. A. Lipsius and M. Bonnet, i. [Leipzig, 1891] 196 ff.), and the so-called Acts of Pilate (Gospel of Nicodemus) (C. de Tischendorf, *Evangelia Apocrypha*², Leipzig, 1876; F. C. Conybeare, in Studia Biblica, iv. [Oxford, 1896] 59-132; E. Hennecke, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, Tübingen, 1904, p. 74 ff.), is now generally dated in the 4th or 5th cent. and regarded as of no value as history. The reference to a certain Tiberius' proconsulship (of Africa) in Tertullian (Apol. 9) can hardly have anything to do with the Emperor of that name (cf. J. S. Reid in the Class. Rev. xxviii. [1914] 27).

LITERATURE.—The ancient authorities are Tacitus, Ab Excessu Divi Augusti Libri, i. vi.; Suetonius, Tiberius; Dio Cassius, Velleius Paterculus, etc. Modern works are the Histories of Rome by V. Duruy, History of Rome, 6 vols., London, 1884-86; H. F. Pelham, Outlines of Roman History, do., 1900; J. B. Bury, Student's History of the Roman Empire, do., 1893; T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, tr. W. P. Dickson, 2 vols., do., 1909; H. Schiller, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, i. [Gotha, 1883] 248-303; H. Furneaux's edition of the Annals of Tacitus (Oxford, 1896), 100-160; A. Viertel, Tiberius und Germanicus: eine historische Studie, Göttingen, 1901; A. von Domaszewski, Geschichte der römischen Kaiser, 2 vols., Leipzig, 1909, i. 251-319; chronology of principal events by J. S. Reid in J. E. Sandys' Companion to Latin Studies, Cambridge, 1913, p. 136 f.; an English monograph on Tiberius, J. C. Tarver, Tiberius the Tyrant, London, 1902; J. S. Reid, art. 'Tiberius,' in EBRl. For Tiberius' father see F. Münzer in Pauly-Wissowa, iii. 2777 f., and for Selaenus, P. von Rohden, ib. i. 529 ff.

A. SOUTER.

TIME.—1. The conception of time.—In all ages and among all peoples the idea of time tends to be expressed in the figure of a continually and evenly running stream. It is viewed, however, in sections; and each section brings with itself or takes up into itself all the events that happen. This conception is maintained consistently in the writings of the Apostolic Age. Time comes into being (διαγενομένου, Ac 27⁹, 'spent,' lit. 'had come through'). It passes by (ὁ παρεληλυθὼς χρόνος, 1 P 4³). It is generally looked at as a whole, but it is divisible into parts which differ quantitatively and may be measured—it is 'much,' or 'little,' or 'sufficient' (for a given purpose). 'Sufficient' (ἰκανὸς χρόνος, Lk 8²⁷ 23⁸, Ac 8¹¹; ἡμέραι ἰκαναί, Ac 9²³ 43 18¹⁸; ἰκανὼν ἐτῶν, Ro 15²³) as applied in measuring time is an expression of indefiniteness. The adequacy of the measure of time for the maturing of a definite plan is given in the idea of 'fullness.' Time accumulates as if in a reservoir and becomes sufficient for its end (πληρωμα του χρόνου, Gal 4⁴; cf. Ac 7²⁶). Naturally the flow of time involves succession and order as between first and last. But all time future to any particular moment may be from the view of it at that moment 'last.' The Christian outlook on the future involves a great consummation and a radical world change. The period just preceding this consummation was especially designated 'the last times' (ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν χρόνων, 1 P 1²¹; ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, Jn 6³⁹ 40 11²⁴; ἐσχάται ἡμέραι, Ac 2¹⁷, 2 Ti 3¹, Ja 5³, 2 P 3³; ἐσχάτη ὥρα, 1 Jn 2¹⁸).

The relativity of length of time to the mind is indicated in the conception that to God's mind human measures and standards of time have no inherent reality ('One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day,' 2 P 3⁸). The notion shows a trace of philosophical influence in the thinking which culminates in the apocalyptic conception of the transiency of time and its contrast with eternity ('There shall be time no longer,' Rev 10⁶).

2. Season.—Time from the point of view of its special content or relation to a definite event or events is specifically denoted by the term καιρός (generally, 'definite time'). The most accentuated usage of the term in this sense is the Apocalypticist's καιρὸν καὶ καιροὺς καὶ ἡμῖν καιροῦ (Rev 12¹⁴), where the evident design is to indicate a period of known duration, like a year (or century). The term is more nearly synonymous with 'season' when it designates a time (the time during the year) for the appearance of certain events (καιροὺς τοῦ θερισμοῦ, Mt 13³⁰; καιροὺς σῶκω, Mk 11¹³; cf. Lk 20¹⁰; τοὺς καρποὺς ἐν τοῖς καιροῖς αὐτῶν, Mt 21⁴¹). More generally καιρός is any division of time which differs from all others by some characteristic, as, for instance, that it ought to be observed as more sacred (μῆνας καὶ καιροὺς, Gal 4¹⁰); to be watched against because of the evil influences which it brings (καιροὶ χαλεποί, 2 Ti 3¹); chosen by God for special revelation of His word (Tit 1²); a period when certain special events develop, distinguished by the moral character of the Gentiles (καιροὶ ἐθνῶν, Lk 21²⁴); events have their own time (Lk 1³⁰), persons may have their own time for the full display of their peculiar character or the accomplishment of their work (e.g. the time of Jesus, ὁ καιρὸς ὁ ἐμὸς, ὁ καιρὸς ὁ ὑμέτερος, Jn 7⁸ 8⁹). The term καιρός thus differs from χρόνος in designating 'opportune' or 'fit' time, a time associated with, and therefore distinguished by, some special event or feature. In the phrase πεπλήρωται ὁ καιρὸς (Mk 1¹⁵) the more appropriate term would have been χρόνος, but since the intention of the writer is to show not the lapse of mere time, but the appearance of a new era, the word used expresses the idea more accurately.

3. The ages.—The largest measure of time known is the 'age' (αἰών, 'æon'). An 'age,' however, is not a definite period (though the 'present age' is estimated by some as 10,000 or 5,000 years in duration). It is rather a period of vast length. It so far transcends thought that it impresses the mind with the mystery of the whole notion of time. Hence the combination 'eternal times' (Ro 16²⁶) stretching back into the inconceivably remote past (practically the equivalent of the modern philosophical 'species of eternity').

The conception of the æon is specially prominent in the apocalyptic system, which looks on all duration as divided into æons. An æon combines in itself the essential content of the Hebrew olam and of the Greek αἰών. In the first the emphasis is laid on the mysterious aspect of time without measure and apart from all known conditions. In the second the conception is based on a cyclic return similar to that marked by the seasons of the year. The modern analogy may be found in the geologic period. On a still larger scale the æon has its analogy in the Hindu kalpa. Of such ages there is an indefinite series. This is given in the plural (αἰῶνες, Gal 1⁵, Ph 4²⁰, 1 Ti 1⁷, 2 Ti 4¹⁸, He 13²¹, 1 P 4¹¹, Rev., passim). The series taken together constitutes all time ('All the ages,' RVm, eis πάντας τοὺς αἰῶνας, Jude ²⁵).

Later Jewish thought singled out two æons (ages) and largely limited itself to their contemplation. From the practical point of view these were the only ones that concerned living men. These two were the 'present age' (ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος, ὁ νῦν αἰὼν, ὁ ἐνεστώς αἰὼν, ἡ νῦν ἐπὶ, Eph 1²¹, Mt 12³², Gal 1⁴, 2 Ti 4¹⁰, Tit 2¹²) and the 'future age' (ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, ὁ αἰὼν ὁ ἐρχόμενος, ἡ ἐπὶ ἐπὶ, He 6⁵, Lk 20³⁵ 18³⁰). The doctrine became prominent in the Apocalypses (cf. 4 Ezr. vii. 50). It fitted the apocalyptic scheme wonderfully. On one side it helped to define the older prophetic 'latter days' (as a distinct period when ideal conditions would prevail); at the same time it gave a background to the doctrine of the 'Day of Jehovah.' On the other side, by discovering an ideal moral character in the latter age, the doctrine infused comfort into the hearts of the faithful in the present evil days by promising a definite change with the beginning of the new era. Questions of the exact length of the age were raised and by some answered. The author of Ethiopic Enoch, xvi. 1, xviii. 16, xxi. 6, fixes the duration of the 'evil [present] age' as 10,000 years; the Assumption of Moses at 5,000. The apocalypticists consider that they are themselves living so near the end of the older age and the beginning of the new that it may be a question as to whether they will be still living when the crisis arrives and the one age yields to the other (4 Ezr. iv. 37, v. 50 ff., vi. 20; Syr. Bar. xlv. 8 ff.). These two ages (the present and the one to come) are successive. But this is not the case with all the æons of the series. 'Unto the ages of the ages' (εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων) suggests the inequality of some of the ages and the inclusion of the briefer within the longer ones (cf. G. B. Winer, *Grammar of NT Greek*³, Edinburgh, 1882, p. 36).

4. The era.—The NT writings contain no allusion to a uniform era. Undoubtedly each people of the period used its own era. The Romans dated events and documents from the founding of the city (A.U.C. = 752 B.C.); the Greeks went back to the beginning of the Olympiads (= 776 B.C.). The Jews, owing to the frequent vicissitudes experienced in their history, had changed their method of registering the relative dates of events. The Books of Kings and Chronicles use the very familiar device of synchronizing the regnal years of the kings of Israel and Judah respectively. Occasionally the deliverance from bondage in Egypt is used as a starting-point (1 K 6¹), or the building of the Temple of Solomon (9¹⁰), or the beginning of the Babylonian Exile (Ezk 33²¹ 40¹). The later Jewish usage settled down to reckoning all events from the creation of the world, which was supposed to have occurred in the 3761st year before the birth of Christ. But this computation is of post-Christian origin. In the Apocrypha, which may be regarded as the fair index of usage at the time, the Seleucid Era is frequently referred to. This was computed from the year of the seizure of Palestine by Seleucus after the battle of Gaza. It was also called the Era of the Greeks or Syro-Macedonians and (incorrectly) the Era of Alexander. By the Jews it was called the Year of Contracts (Tarik Dikarnaim) from the fact that it was obligatory in the case of all legal documents. The beginning of the era was dated in the first year of the 117th Olympiad or 442 A.U.C., hence 312 B.C. (1 Mac 1¹¹ 6¹⁶ 7¹⁵ 10¹). The Era of Simon (1 Mac 13²² 14²⁷) was proposed, but never extensively adopted.

In the New Testament events are associated with the reigns of contemporary rulers ('In the days of Herod the king' [Mt 2¹, Lk 1⁵], 'in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa,' etc. [Lk 3¹ -; cf. also Ac 11²⁸ 12¹]). But in all cases the dating is approximate and intended to serve practical rather than scientific ends. With the exception of Lk 3¹ -, all such dating of events seems not to be intentionally chronological (cf. A. Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, London, 1909, p. 6 f.).

The method of Matthew (1⁷) of giving a general intimation of date by the expedient of 'generations' is unique and highly artificial.

5. The year.—It has always been difficult to adjust with precision the limits of the year. In all the efforts to make the adjustment first the natural return of the seasons with their agricultural features calls for a definition that will harmonize with the apparent revolution of the sun around the earth in 365+ days. But the fact that this period approximately coincides with twelve lunar periods has tempted many peoples to settle down to a year of 354 days. In the Apostolic Age the problem had not as yet been solved fully. The usage of Palestine, inherited from early Canaanite and Babylonian antecedents, was still prevalent. The year began with the 1st of Nisan and was constituted of twelve months, with the periodical intercalation of a thirteenth to equalize difference. Intercalation was common all over the world, but the method of intercalating was different at different times, and probably not constant anywhere for any consecutive period of time. Among the Jews the Sanhedrin decided whether in any particular year a month should be intercalated. Among the Romans Plutarch testifies that 22 days were added every other year to the month of February (which, according to Varro, de Ling. Lat. vi. 55, was the last month of the year). But a more common way was the insertion of an additional month every three years, and as this left a troublesome margin it was corrected into three months every eight years and finally fixed as seven months in a cycle of nineteen years. This cycle was introduced into Athens by Meton the astronomer in 432, but found its way only gradually into general practice. Popularly the year must always have been viewed as divided into 12 months (Rev 22⁷).

6. The month.—Throughout the Apostolic Age the ancient way of fixing the month as the exact equivalent of a complete lunation was maintained. The month accordingly began with the appearance of the moon in its first phase, and ended with its reappearance in the same phase the next time. Within the New Testament months are mentioned generally, not with precise reference to their relations to one another in the calendar, but as an indication and a measure of time in the terms of the fraction of a year (Lk 1-4 36 38). In Acts it is probable that the usage is not meant to be minutely precise since the mention of months is invariably in threes (Ac 7²⁰ 19⁸ 20³ 28¹¹, but once in twice three—six, Ac 18¹¹).

So far as the calendar is concerned, there are evidences of mixed usage. The predominance at different times of different influences (Roman, Macedonian, Egyptian, older Jewish) brought into use different names. The occurrence of Xanthicus in 2 Mac 11³⁰ 38 (the sixth month of the Macedonian calendar) shows clearly the existence of a Macedonian element in the mixed usage. The name 'Dioscorinthius' (mentioned earlier in the same account, 2 Mac 11²¹) is also probably Macedonian and a modified form of the first month, Dios. It may, however, be a textual corruption for 'Dystrus' (the name of the fifth month), as H. A. Redpath, in Hastings' SDB, p. 937, suggests, supporting the suggestion with the Sinaitic text of To 2¹², where Dystrus is mentioned. Otherwise Dioscorinthius is the name of an intercalary month. That an intercalary month must have had a place in the Macedonian calendar is to be assumed, though its name and place are unknown. Of the Egyptian calendar traces are found in the names 'Pachon' and 'Epiphi' in 3 Mac 6²⁸.

7. The feasts.—A popular and practically useful method of reckoning time within the year is that which relates events to well-known religious festivals. This method is especially useful where for some reason or other the names of months have become involved in confusion. In the nature of the case, of such festivals in the New Testament the Passover ('the days of unleavened bread,' ἡμέραι τῶν ἀζύμων, Ac 12³ 20⁶, πάσχα, Ac 12⁴) stands prominent. The Day of Pentecost (ἡμέρα τῆς πενηκοστῆς, Ac 2¹ 20¹⁶) and the Day of Atonement ('fast,' νηστεία, Ac 27⁹) are also used as landmarks. But in the allusion to the Feast of Dedication (εγκαίνια, Jn 10²²) the intention perhaps was not so much to give the exact time as to account for Jesus' walking 'in the temple in Solomon's porch.' Similarly the Feast of Tabernacles (σκηνοπηγία, Jn 7²) is mentioned as explanatory of the course which Jesus had taken. In Jn 5¹ the purpose of the author would be defeated if he had meant to fix the time of the action (cf. also Lk 22¹, Mk 15⁶, Jn 6⁴ 12¹²).

8. The week.—Though peculiar to the Jewish people, the constitution of a unit of time by grouping together seven days was retained in the usage of the Christian Church. But no separate word was adopted to designate the week as such. In spite of the fact that the Greek language offered the tempting word ἐβδομάς (which came later into universal use) the period was generally known by its last day, the Sabbath (σάββατον, Lk 18¹²), and in the plural (σάββατα), as shown in the name of the first day (μία τῶν σαββάτων, Mt 28¹, Mk 16³, Lk 24¹). In Ac 17², σάββατα τρία (rendered 'weeks' in RVm) is, in the light of St. Paul's custom to use the Sabbath day as the time for preaching (Ac 18⁴), correctly translated 'three Sabbath days.' The seven-day period required to mature the process of fulfilling a vow is evidently not viewed as a week in the modern sense of any period of seven consecutive days (Ac 21²⁷).

With the exception of the Sabbath (the seventh day) the days of the week are given no names, but are distinguished by ordinal numbers. The first day, however, acquired greater importance among Christians because of its association with the resurrection of the Lord ('Lord's day', κυριακή ἡμέρα, Rev 1¹⁰). And this ultimately came to be the name of the day (= Dominica). It was the day on which the Christians assembled together for the observance of their services (the 'breaking of bread', mutual exhortation, taking up collections for the needs of their brethren, Ac 20⁷, 1 Co 16²). But in the earlier period the day was called the 'first of the week' (μία τῶν σαββάτων, Ac 20⁷). Other distinctions between the days of the week do not appear, with the exception of the fact that the day before the Sabbath was observed among the Jews as a season of preparation. Sometimes it was designated simply as the 'eve of the Sabbath' (παρασάββατον, Jth 8⁸, Mk 15⁴²); but in the NT oftener as the 'Preparation [day]' (παρασκευή, Mt 27⁶², Mk 15⁴², Lk 23⁵⁴, Jn 19^{14, 42}). It was scarcely as yet the fixed name of the day. This it became later as it was taken up by Christian usage, and persists to the present time as the proper name of Friday in modern Greek.

9. The day.—Jewish custom fixed the beginning of the day at sunset. Since that custom prevails to the present time among the Jews it is not likely that it was ever superseded among them. Nevertheless, the Roman way of reckoning from midnight was evidently prevalent at least in official circles. The testimony, however, is limited to the Fourth Gospel, and the point of view may be peculiar to the author (Jn 19¹⁴; cf. also 13^{39, 46}). The day was divided into two sections of twelve hours, i.e. from midnight to midnight. These two sections might be viewed together as a twenty-four-hour unit (St. Paul spent a νύκθήμερον, 'a night and a day,' in the deep, 2 Co 11²⁵). Of the night-day unit the day is the time for work (Jn 11⁹) and the night is divided into four military watches of three hours each (Mt 14^{25, 24, 3}, Mk 6⁴⁸, Lk 12³⁸).

Related to each day stand the day preceding and the day following or the day after. The day preceding ('yesterday', ἐχθές, Jn 4⁵², Ac 7²⁸, He 13⁸) is not so frequently mentioned as the day following ('morrow', ἡ αὔριον, Ac 4^{3, 5}, 23^{20, 25, 22}; ἡ ἐπαύριον, Ac 10^{9, 14, 20, 27}; ἡ ἐπιούσα, Ac 16^{11, 20, 25, 21, 18, 23, 11}; ἡ ἐχομένη, Ac 20^{15, 21, 26}; ἡ ἑξῆς ἡμέρα, Ac 21^{1, 25, 17, 27, 18}). The 'day after to-morrow' is spoken of as 'the third day' (τρίτην, Ac 27¹⁹).

10. The hour.—The primary object of the division of the day into hours is two-fold. It gives a small and convenient unit as a measure or time (the fraction of a day), and at the same time it furnishes a basis for fixing on the exact portion of the day for any important or critical events to be recorded. The system of beginning the day with sunset and counting twelve hours to sunrise, with another set of twelve hours from sunrise to sunset, would result in a variable hour with a maximum of 79 minutes and a minimum of 49, according to the season of the year. Whether this was overcome by the adoption of the Roman method of reckoning from midnight to midnight is not certain. But the question loses its importance from the NT standpoint when it is considered that all mention of hours is general and practical rather than precise and chronological.

Of the hour as a measure of time a clear case occurs in Ac 19³⁴ ('for the space of two hours,' ἐν ὥραις δύο; cf. also Mt 20¹², Mk 14³⁷, Lk 22⁵⁹, Ac 5⁷). Of the hour as giving the time of the day the usage is more abundant (Mt 20^{3, 5, 6, 27, 45, 46}, Mk 15^{25, 33, 34}, Lk 23⁴⁴, Jn 1^{39, 46, 52}, 19^{14, 27}, Ac 21^{15, 10, 23, 28}). Besides the designation of the relative place of the hours to each other by numerals, hours are sometimes associated with customary action such as a meal (Lk 14¹⁷, ὥρα τοῦ δεῖναι), the offering up of incense (Lk 1¹⁰, ὥρα τοῦ θυμιάματος), prayer (Ac 3¹, ὥρα τῆς προσευχῆς).

The hour, however, though the smallest definite unit in measuring, was not the smallest conceived division of time. An infinitesimal point of time is in the thought of St. Paul when he speaks of the resurrection change (1 Co 15⁵²) as in a moment (ἀτόμῳ, lit. 'indivisible' [fraction of time], explained by the 'twinkling of an eye' which immediately follows). Jesus too is reported as having been shown the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time (στιγμὴ χρόνου, Lk 4⁴).

LITERATURE.—A. Schwarz, Der jüdische Kalender, Breslau, 1872; G. Biffinger, Die Zeitmesser der antiken Völker, Stuttgart, 1886, Der bürgerliche Tag, do., 1888, Die antiken Stundenangaben, do., 1888; T. Lewin, Fasti Sacri, London, 1805; W. M. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, Oxford, 1895-97; T. H. Key, art. 'Calendarium,' in Smith's DGRA; E. Schürer, HJP i. (Edinburgh, 1890) i. 37, ii. App. iii.; HDB iv. 762-766, v. 473-484. ANDREW C. ZENOS.

TIMON.—We know nothing of this disciple except that his name appears as one of the Seven in Ac 6³. The list, like that of the first apostles (Ac 1¹³), may have been kept among the archives of the church at Jerusalem, to which St. Luke had access, or St. Luke may himself have procured it at Antioch. W. A. SPOONER.

TIMOTHEUS.—See TIMOTHY.

TIMOTHY.—The sources from which to estimate the work and character of Timothy are the Epistles of St. Paul (which for our purpose are to be separated into the earlier Epistles and the Pastorals) and the Acts of the Apostles.

1. The course of his life.—Assuming that 2 Timothy contains reliable historical data, it seems probable that Timothy was born at Derbe or Lystra, his father being a Greek, his mother Eunice a Christian Jewess. His grandmother's name was Lois, and from her he inherited the finest traditions of Hebrew piety (Ac 16³, 2 Ti 1^{5, 3, 14, 15}). His name (Τιμόθεος) is no indication as to whether he was regarded as a Jew or as a Greek, but Ac 16³ favours the latter view. Under whom he was converted to Christianity it is impossible to say, for there is no contradiction between 1 Co 4¹⁷ and Ac 16¹⁻³. It would appear that Paul on his second missionary journey found in Lystra, somewhat to his surprise, this highly esteemed believer, and, discerning in him an apt pupil and a promising helper, he had him set apart by the presbytery for the work of an evangelist (Ac 16³, 2 Ti 1^{6, 7}). The opening years of Timothy were full of promise through his possession of a rich spiritual endowment. In preparation for his missionary work Paul had him circumcised, because the presence in his company of an uncircumcised son of a Greek father would prejudice his influence among the Jews. Much doubt is cast by some upon the motive assigned in Acts for this procedure, which is held to be very different in principle from Paul's action in the case of Titus and towards Peter (Gal 2^a. 4. 11-14). We know, however, from 1 Co 9^{12a}. that the Apostle varied his practice to suit circumstances, and we cannot argue unconditionally as to Timothy from Paul's action with regard to Titus, who was a full Gentile and was under challenge as a test case.

Probably Timothy's first missions were near his own home. Soon he became acquainted with the life of hardship and suffering that his master led, and so grew into his spirit that Paul calls him his 'son in the Lord,' and tells the Corinthians that he can interpret to them his mind and practice (2 Ti 3¹⁰. 11, 1 Co 4¹⁷).

In the narrative of Acts, Timothy comes rapidly into prominence after the Apostle has crossed into Europe, where he now has Silas as his companion. In Philippi Timothy seems to have escaped imprisonment; in Berea he stays on with Silas to finish the work, and later joins Paul in Corinth. He seems to have soon won his way into the trust and affection of the Corinthians, for when, after the departure of the Apostle to Ephesus, troubles break out in Corinth, Paul first sends Timothy to compose the disorder, giving him authority to speak in his name (1 Co 4¹⁷). But the situation was too difficult for Timothy to cope with, and he was replaced by Titus.

The two chief centres of Timothy's subsequent activity were Macedonia and Ephesus (Ac 19²¹. 22, Ph 2¹². 20, 2 Ti 1¹⁵. 19 4¹³). He took part in organizing the collection for the Church of Jerusalem, though he seems not to have accompanied Paul thither (Ac 20⁴. 13-16). But he rejoined him shortly after he reached Rome, and in the greetings of the Epistles to the Colossians and Philippians his name is associated with the Apostle's (Ph 1¹, Col 1¹).

The Epistles to Timothy, especially the First, present so many difficulties that they must be taken by themselves (see below). He is addressed as having charge of churches in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, and as being exposed to serious dangers and temptations. In the Second Epistle Paul, who is represented as being in prison, abandoned by his friends, his death impending, urges Timothy to return to Rome at once and bring Mark with him. The last glimpse that we get of Timothy is in He 13², where it is announced that he has just been set free from prison, into which he may possibly have been thrown on his visit to the dying Paul. He was evidently a friend and travelling companion of the unknown author.

2. In ecclesiastical tradition Timothy is called the first bishop of Ephesus (Eus. HE III. iv. 6), and in the Acta Timothei of the 5th cent. he is said to have been made bishop of Ephesus by Paul in the reign of Nero, to have become an intimate friend of the apostle John, and to have suffered martyrdom under Nerva on 22nd January, when Peregrinus was proconsul of Asia. These traditions are the weaving of the legendary spirit.

3. The Timothy of the earlier Epistles.—Paul holds Timothy in the strongest affection, and associates him with himself in six of his Epistles (1 and 2 Thess., 2 Cor., Ro 16²¹, Phil., Col.). As his son in the gospel, he understands fully the Apostle's mind and purpose, and is an example to the brethren of what Paul would have them become (1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁰. 11, Ph 2¹²⁻²³). He seems to have lacked strength of character, but his failure in reconciling the warring factions of Corinth did not cause him to lose the confidence of Paul or of the churches. He remains to the end lovable and beloved, the most intimate of his disciples, unselfish in his ministry (Ph 2¹²⁻²³).

4. The Timothy of the Pastorals.—Many of the features of the earlier Timothy remain. He is the Apostle's beloved or true son (1 Ti 1¹⁸, 2 Ti 1² 2¹), a close follower of, and moulded by, his teaching

(2 Ti 3¹⁰. 11), and the dying Apostle clings to him (2 Ti 4⁹. 10). In 1 Tim., however, there is also an unfavourable view of his character. He seems to have grown languid in the performance of his duties (1¹³ 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 6⁵⁻¹⁶), to have yielded to the love of money (6¹¹), to temper (5¹), and to an ill-considered asceticism (5²³). Even in 2 Tim. he is presented as timid (1⁷), and as shrinking from suffering (2³). The Apostle addresses him as a youth and with urgency. If this is an authentic attitude, it may possibly contain a reminiscence of disappointment at Timothy's development as a leader and teacher (1 Ti 4¹¹⁻¹⁶), or it may express an old man's fear for a disciple who was diffident and prone to compromise, whom he had always guided as a father guides a son, and whom he knew to be at his best when under a leader.

Jülicher goes too far in saying that in 1 Tim. and 2 Tim. Timothy is addressed as the type of a young bishop. He has not the position of the monarchical bishop of the type of Ignatius or Polycarp. In 1 Tim. he is the representative of Paul in a circle of churches, an apostle with a special commission. In 2 Tim. his function as an evangelist is not unlike that which he exercised in the situations set forth in Acts and the earlier Epistles.

LITERATURE.—See under TIMOTHY AND TITUS, EPISTLES TO, and, in addition, A. Jülicher, 'Timotheus, der Apostelschüler,' in PRE³ xix. 781-783. R. A. FALCONER.

TIMOTHY AND TITUS, EPISTLES TO.—1. Purpose.—The Epistles to Timothy and Titus are conveniently, if inaccurately, called the Pastoral Epistles, because, in contrast to Paul's other letters, their object has been thought to be primarily that of equipping his two lieutenants, Timothy and Titus, for pastoral work in two particular regions—Ephesus, with its circle of churches, and Crete. This is, however, too narrow a scope. The letters deal with a situation, and are only secondarily concerned with the personal equipment of Timothy and Titus, whose ministry is not essentially different from that which Paul exercised throughout his churches (1 Ti 4⁶, 2 Ti 4⁵, 1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁰. 11, Eph 3⁷, Col 1²³. 25 4⁷, 1 Th 3¹). They cannot be regarded as outlining the character and work of the ideal pastor, but are intended, especially 1 Tim. and Titus, to impress upon the recipients the necessity of taking measures to preserve in its purity and strength the gospel which they had learnt from Paul, in view of special false teaching already present in Ephesus and Crete and threatening to increase. In the face of error, Timothy must boldly preach the gospel, and he and Titus must organize the churches with capable moral and spiritual leaders. The Second Epistle to Timothy is much more personal, and emphasizes his duty as an evangelist in a difficult situation.

The Epistles possess common elements of language, similar features of doctrine, discipline, and organization, and an atmosphere laden with kindred varieties of error, which constitute them a group distinct from the other Epistles of Paul, in fact so distinct that many scholars of varied schools have found difficulty in accepting them as authentic.

2. The text.—For the full discussion of noteworthy readings reference must be made to the standard works. Our purpose will be served by the mention of a few, chiefly from 1 Timothy.

- (1) 1 Ti 1⁴ (a) οικονομιαν, κα G₃ K L P, most cursives, arm.-boh. Chr.
- (b) οικοδομίαν, D⁸ and a few cursives.
- (c) οικοδομήν, D⁸ Lat. vg. go., syr. pesch., Iren.
- Most editors accept (a), and with good reason.
- (2) 1 Ti 3¹⁶ (a) ος εφανερωθη, κ* A* C* F₂ G₃ boh. sah. go. arm.-syr. hl.
- Origen, Theod. Mops., Cyril Alex.
- (b) ο εφανερωθη, D₃ lat. vg., syr. vg., arm.
- (c) θεος εφανερωθη, θς κ* C* F₂ G₃ K L P.

For treatment of evidence see the notes in Hort's Greek Testament, who rightly accepts (a) and is followed by nearly all modern editors.

(3) 1 Ti 4³ καλούντων γαρὲν, ἀνέχεσθαι βρωμάτων. Hort believes that there is a primitive corruption, and suggests that the reading may have been ἡ ἀρεσκῆς or καὶ γενεσθαι. Bentley conjectured that καλούντων had fallen out, but Blass finds an ellipsis in which καλούντων is to be supplied from καλούντων.

(4) 1 Ti 4¹⁰ (a) αγωνιζόμεθα, κ* A C E G.

(b) ονειδιζόμεθα, κ* D₂ vg. go. syr. boh. arm.

Most modern editors place (a) in the text, and yet (b) has much in its favour both externally and intrinsically. That Christians were held in scorn for their unsubstantial hope is an excellent interpretation of the passage.

(5) 1 Ti 6⁷ (a) οὐδὲ ἐξ., κ* A G₃ 17 vg. sah. boh. arm.

(b) ἀληθὲς οὐδὲ ἐξ., D₂^a m. go.

(c) ἔηλον οὐτι, κ* D₂^b κ L P Chr.

(d) οὐδὲ ἐξ., arm. Cyr., apparently Cyprian.

Hort seems to be right in accepting (d), and he suggests that οὐτι may have come in by dittography after κόσμον.

(6) 2 Ti 4¹⁰ (a) Γαλιταῖον, A D G K L P, vg. syr. Chrys., Theod. Mops.

(b) Γαλλίαν, C 5 cursives, vg. Epiph.

(a) is best attested and accepted by most editors, though it may mean European Gaul.

In the text, especially of 1 Timothy, apart from readings there are difficulties, occasioned apparently by some disorder owing possibly to a disarrangement of notes in the hand of an editor. Of this disorder the most evident traces are 1 Ti 5^{1. 2. 8. 16} 6^{9. 10. 17. 18. 19}. also 3¹¹ 5²³ 6^{20. 21} may be later interpolations. Less is to be said for the view, which, however, is plausible, that Tit 1⁷⁻⁹ has been inserted by a later hand, and that 1 Tim. originally ended at 5¹⁶.

3. Contents.—(i.) 1 TIMOTHY.—1¹⁻². Greeting.—Paul, in the full apostolic authority which he had received from God our Saviour and Christ Jesus, the surety for the Christian hope, formally addresses Timothy, his true son in the faith.

vv.³⁻⁷. General occasion of the letter.—Formal reminder of warning once given at Ephesus in person against false teaching, which substitutes idle speculation for Christian love, springing out of a pure heart and unfeigned faith, which it is the aim of preaching to produce. Already this error has shipwrecked some would-be teachers of the Jewish Law, who, without understanding it, pervert its meaning.

vv.⁸⁻¹¹. The right use of the Law.—According to its true spirit the Law is to be invoked against such vices as are condemned by the healthy teaching of the gospel.

vv.¹²⁻¹⁷. Paul's stewardship.—The gospel ministry of Divine power and salvation from sin was granted by an act of God's grace in Christ Jesus to the most unworthy Apostle, whose redemption is an example of many others to come; for all of which the writer makes solemn thanksgiving to God.

vv.¹⁸⁻²⁰. Paul recommits this ministry to Timothy. He encourages him that in spite of hard warfare he will not be defeated, because the Holy Spirit had led him to choose Timothy for this service. The fearful example of two apostates excommunicated in the hope that punishment would lead to their reformation.

(a) The furtherance of the ministry of the gospel.—(1) The ministry of the gospel is furthered by rightly ordered public prayer and worship (21¹⁵).

21⁸. Since Timothy is to preach the gospel of salvation for all, constant prayer must be made for all sorts and conditions of men, who have one Father and one Mediator of His will for men, Christ Jesus, who gave Himself as a ransom for all. Special supplication is to be made for kings, because if they are favourable the Church will have rest, its worship will continue undisturbed, and salvation will come to all men.

vv.⁹⁻¹⁵. These verses set forth woman's function in the Christian community. She is not to teach or pray in public, but is to be modest in apparel and to adorn herself with good works, performing her function in salvation by her maternal calling, whereby she will, in a life of faith, love, and holy restraint, redress the balance against her through the sin of Eve. (The formula πιστὸς ὁ λόγος probably refers to what precedes; if to what follows, it means that in the Church it is a common saying, 'if a man desires the office of a bishop, etc.' An inferior reading, ἀνθρώπινος, would be connected with what follows—'It is a common human saying'.)

(2) It is furthered also by the appointment of officials of worthy character (31⁴).

31⁷. The type of man to be chosen as bishop.—This office is eagerly sought after, and Timothy is to employ discretion in choosing candidates. They must be men of irreproachable character, possessing self-restraint, tact, ability to control others, as shown by the control of their own family, given to hospitality, able to teach, not youthful but fortified by experience against dangers to which such an office would expose the immature.

vv.⁸⁻¹³. The type of man for the diaconate.—Tested men with personal qualities and administrative powers similar, except for ability to teach, to those of the bishop. Their wives, probably bishops' as well as deacons', must be respected, discreet, and trustworthy (v.¹¹ reads in this connexion like an interpolation, and it may refer to deaconesses). Honourable service secures a good degree of honour and greater confidence in the gospel ministry (or a good basis for the next grade, i.e. bishop).

vv.¹⁴⁻¹⁶. The Church holds forth the truth, in opposition to error, of which an example is given (41⁶). After an interjected reference to the possibility of delay in coming to Ephesus, the Apostle states that the purpose of the letter is to instruct Timothy as to his right ordering of the Church, which, as the dwelling-place of the God of Israel, supports and is the foundation of the truth. This truth is a great mystery revealed in a Person only to those who lead godly lives, and is summed up in the words of a Christian hymn setting forth the gospel of the Incarnation.

The Spirit, through prophets in the Church, perhaps also through the words of written prophecy, foretells that there will be a great apostasy, led by teachers under demonic influence, who will enjoin abstinence from marriage and certain foods. But by the gospel the old Jewish distinctions of clean and unclean and heathen asceticism have been abolished, and the Christian may sanctify by prayer, and possibly by a psalm, any meat set before him, and thankfully partake of it.

Timothy is to fulfil his ministry by transmitting to his brethren the wholesome teaching of the Apostle (4⁸).

(b) Personal advice to Timothy (47¹⁵).—47¹⁰. The man of God must practise piety, and not asceticism. Piety has the sure promise of life here and hereafter; but the pursuit is arduous, and the goal will be attained only as we set our hope on the living God, who will save the believer unto eternal life.

vv.¹¹⁻¹⁶. Timothy must overcome his diffidence, which arises partly from his youth, and in the constant exercise of his Divinely inspired gift of teaching become an example in life and doctrine of what the Christian minister should be.

(c) Further advice as to various classes in the Church (51⁶).—Evidently there is insubordination, and the Apostle warns Timothy not to allow himself, when he breaks through his diffidence, to be swept into passionate rebuke.

53¹⁵. Widows in the Church.—(1) Those who have children or other relatives, or who are in the employ of a Christian woman: Christian piety demands that their support must fall upon these (vv.^{3. 4. 8. 16}). (2) The real widows above sixty years of age and destitute who have a character for stability, hospitality, and good works are to be enrolled for service in the Church, on whom their support must fall if their relatives are poor (vv. 5, 6, 7, 9, 10). (3) Since younger widows may fall into sin under passion, or into indolent enjoyment, they are advised to marry (vv. 11-13).

(Note the disordered arrangement of this section, esp. vv. 1, 2, 8, 16.)

vv. 17-25 The honourable position of the elder.—The elder who fulfils his function well, especially if he can preach and teach, is to be given double honour (or it may be double pay), and, in accordance with our Lord's instructions, is to be supported for his work's sake. The dignity of the office demands that charges preferred against elders are not to be lightly received; though, if they be substantiated, the rebuke is to be public. Judgment must be well considered and impartial, and no one is to be ordained without careful consideration. In order to be able to give such a judgment and not be involved in the sins of others, Timothy must keep himself pure, though he is not to be an ascetic. (Possibly v. 23 is interpolated to meet ascetic tendencies.) Such sins as drunkenness and open vice will be evident at once, but secret sins will come out in time. So with men's good deeds. With care he will not make mistakes.

6¹⁻². Slaves.—Service honourable to the faith must be paid to masters unbelieving or believing, in the latter case inspired by the knowledge that it is a service of love to brethren.

(d) Final exhortations (6³⁻²¹).

6³⁻⁵. Teach healthy doctrine, based on the teaching of Jesus, which ensures piety.—The befogged teacher of false doctrine does not practise virtue, but by his empty disputations stirs the churches into strife, and in the muddy waters he fishes, using so-called piety as a means of gain.

vv. 6-10 The practice of godliness in contrast with the pursuit of riches.

vv. 11-16. Solemn adjuration to Timothy.—The Christian minister must pursue those virtues the possession of which brings life, and Timothy must give a pure testimony to the gospel, even if through suffering. In a liturgical formula he reminds him that the Lord will come to judge.

vv. 17-19 Advice to the rich as to the use of wealth.

vv. 20-21 Final exhortation to guard the deposit of Christian faith and avoid the meaningless profanities of men who claim a 'gnosis' falsely so called, the pursuit of which has already caused some to lose their faith.

(This chapter also has a disordered arrangement. Cf. vv. 3, 20, 21 and vv. 9, 10, 17, 18, 19.)

(ii.) 2 TIMOTHY.—1¹⁻². Greeting.—Paul, appointed by God as an apostle of Jesus Christ to proclaim the promise of life in Christ Jesus, addresses Timothy, his well-beloved son in the gospel.

(a) Timothy to succeed Paul in the service, suffering, and final reward of the gospel of Christ (1³⁻²¹).

1³⁻¹⁴ Timothy is exhorted not to be ashamed, through fear of suffering, to preach the gospel for which Paul is a prisoner. Timothy, the thought of whose hereditary faith is a constant source of intense joy and affection to the Apostle, is urged to fan into flame his gift of preaching the gospel of Divine power, which cannot fail, even though thereby he, like Paul, may suffer. Of this gospel of salvation from death unto eternal life in Christ Jesus, Paul is an apostle and teacher, and he has made no mistake in committing himself to God in its service though he is a prisoner; and now Timothy is, by his preaching through the indwelling Spirit, to guard this pure gospel of faith and love in Christ.

vv. 15-18. Defections of followers in Asia serve as a warning, and devoted service on the part of Onesiphorus towards the Apostle as an encouragement.

21-23 Timothy is to be Paul's successor in the transmission of the gospel with its suffering, its triumph, its final reward. He is to draw his strength from the grace which is in Christ Jesus, and transmit the gospel to a succession of worthy men. The Christian teacher must, as a good soldier, endure the hard conditions of the campaign, or, like the athlete, obey the rules of the game, suffering being one of the conditions. Only the toiling husbandman gets his reward. When discouraged, Timothy must think upon the gospel that Jesus died and has risen in triumph. Paul also suffers as a malefactor, but these sufferings are for the furtherance of the gospel, and will bring a glorious reward in Christ's Kingdom, as is set forth in a verse of a hymn or a liturgical formula. (The formula πρωτὸς ὁ λόγος here refers to what follows.)

(b) Circumstances which demand faithful service in the gospel on the part of Timothy (21⁴⁻⁴³).

21⁴⁻¹⁸ Timothy must prove himself a reliable workman, and set forth the gospel according to the pattern laid down by Paul, and avoid profane idle talk which leads to apostasy, and which, like a running sore, will eat into the Church's life. Already some are teaching that there is no bodily resurrection.

vv. 19-26. The Church of God, however, is built upon a firm foundation, and its members must be pure; but, like a large house, it contains vessels of all qualities: some will have honourable, others dishonourable uses, and Timothy, as the true servant of God, must choose for Divine service vessels cleansed of the vices of the false teachers. Christian virtues are to be cultivated among the faithful as a protection against error, and the disputations of false teachers are to be avoided, though in a gentle spirit, in the hope that some of those who are in error may be granted repentance and be saved.

31-3. The worst has not come yet. Though already the Church has a commingling of good and evil, in the last days it will be invaded by men who, under the mask of piety, will practise manifold and abominable vices, and will cause some to apostatize, women especially becoming an easy prey. This will be a sign not that God has forsaken His Church, but of the end of the age; and, as was the case with the magicians who resisted Moses, these corrupt men will be detected in their folly.

vv. 10-17 To this error Paul's gospel and manner of life are the only antidote. He has always been Timothy's example, even in suffering; and with the invasion of these impostors sufferings will multiply. Timothy must abide by Pauline doctrine, which is the fulfilment of what was taught to him as a true Israelite; it is the doctrine of salvation contained in the inspired Scriptures from which the man of God must equip himself for his ministry.

4¹⁻⁸. Solemn appeal by the dying Apostle.—The Lord will assuredly return to judge the living and the dead, and to set up His eternal Kingdom. Timothy is therefore urged to preach the gospel, whether men are willing to receive it or not, and with much patience to rebuke sin and error. For soon many will refuse to listen to him and will turn to false teachers with their gossipy fables. He must not be discouraged, but must take up and carry to its completion, as far as in him lies, the work which the Apostle is about to lay down, when he will close a life of sacrifice in a martyr's death. St. Paul's bark is about to cast off from the shore of time; having kept the faith he will soon receive the crown of life, a reward which Timothy and all others will also get if they are faithful and eagerly look forward to greet their Lord.

(c) The Apostle's lonely state and his recent deliverance (4⁹⁻²²).

4⁹⁻¹³. Only Luke is with Paul. Some have failed him; others have gone on missionary duty. He urges Timothy to hasten and bring Mark to minister to him, also to bring his cloak and parchments from Troas.

vv. 14-15. Timothy is to be on his guard against Alexander the coppersmith. In spite of his abandonment by men the Lord gave the Apostle a wonderful deliverance from deadly peril which has enabled him to complete his ministry, and now he has received confidence in his final salvation.

vv. 19-22. Greetings to and from other friends.

(iii.) TITUS. — 1¹⁻⁴. Greeting. — Paul addresses Titus, his son in the Christian faith. This gospel, in the service of which he is an apostle, is the irreversible truth of God revealed according to His promise in Christ Jesus, and brings hope of eternal life to those who hold fast to its truth in a life of godliness.

vv. 5-9. The character of the men to be chosen by Titus for the eldership. — Titus was left behind in Crete, 'the island of an hundred cities,' to complete Paul's work by appointing elders. These men (also called 'bishops,' though possibly one bishop might preside over a presbytery) must be of blameless reputation, and as stewards of God's House prove their fitness by ruling well in their own families. Self-controlled, hospitable also and pious, they must hold so firmly to healthy doctrine that they will be able to refute perverse teachers.

vv. 10-16. False teachers. — In these churches, false and insubordinate teachers, of Jewish origin, full of empty talk, have arisen, who for money have perverted many of the Cretan families, inclined as they are by nature to sensuality. (He quotes a hexameter of Epimenides, one of the seven wise men of Greece, giving the Cretans a poor character.) These teachers and perverts must be sharply refuted so as to check the apostasy and to discountenance idle Jewish tales and Jewish precepts as to clean and unclean. Their professed distinctions between clean and unclean are meaningless when the heart is pure, for then outer distinctions vanish; and on the impure heart they have no effect. Though these errorists may profess to believe in God, like good Jews, their defiled lives prove that they are infidels.

21-26. Titus is to regulate the conduct of various classes within the Church. Old men must be self-restrained and dignified, and set forth healthy Christian virtues; especially must the older women be models of goodness, self-control, and family virtue to the younger women. Titus also must be a pattern of self-restraint, gravity, and sound doctrine for the young men. Slaves are to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour by faithful service.

vv. 11-15. The gospel motive. — The saving grace of God in Christ is for all men, and challenges us to a life in this present of self-restraint, justice to our fellows, and reverent holiness towards God; at the same time it creates the hope of the appearing of our Saviour, who died for us that He might redeem us as His true Israel, zealous of good works. These demands of the gospel must be authoritatively set before the people.

31-8. A life of goodness the fruit of Divine mercy. — These Cretans must defer to authorities and lead lives of gentleness and goodness, as all Christians do who have been converted from disobedient, sensual, and hateful lives. Everything is due to the goodness of God appearing in Christ, who, not for any righteousness of ours but of His grace, saved us from sin, when in baptism the Holy Spirit of renewal was poured out upon us through Jesus our Saviour, so that being justified by His grace we may become heirs of eternal life. It is all-important that believers should be careful to maintain good works.

vv. 9-11. Final advice as to false teachers. — Titus is to avoid disputations with the false teachers, and if, after warning, the factious man proves obdurate, he must be left alone.

vv. 12-15. Personal references. — Titus is to come to Paul at Nicopolis as soon as the Apostle can send Artemas or Tychicus to relieve him of his post. Hospitality in general is enjoined, and in particular towards certain visiting brethren.

4. The condition of the churches. — The churches of which Timothy has oversight are within the circle of Ephesus, and those under Titus are in the island of Crete. Their members are drawn from different social strata. Some are rich, and others aspire to become rich, though probably the average is similar to that of other Christian communities. There are masters, and there are slaves. Some were formerly Jews, and Jewish influence is strong (1 Ti 1⁷, Tit 1¹⁰⁻¹⁴), but the majority are, it would appear, of pagan origin. The Cretans, a people of crude morality and insubordinate temper, have fallen an easy prey to the same kind of error as was working havoc in Ephesus. Envy, strife, blasphemies, and suspicions abound (1 Ti 14^{1, 19, 20} 6^{4, 5, 21}, 2 Ti 2^{14, 23} 3⁶⁻⁹, Tit 1¹¹⁻¹³). The Church has become a commingled body or household with good and bad elements (1 Ti 4¹, 2 Ti 2²⁰), the gospel having been cast upon poor soil or choked by evil doctrine. Paul's influence in Asia has been seriously impaired (2 Ti 1¹⁵); already there has been apostasy, and worse is yet to come; grievous times are impending (1 Ti 4¹, 2 Ti 3¹). For such a serious state of affairs the only remedy is a powerful ethical revival, induced by the preaching of the gospel in its purity, and maintained in a healthy church organization, directed by officials of the highest character.

Either as a cause or as an effect of this condition false teaching has vogue in the churches.

(a) In form it was a 'knowledge which is falsely so called' (1 Ti 6²⁰), concerned with 'fables and endless genealogies' (1 Ti 1⁴), 'profane and old wives' fables' (1 Ti 4⁷, 2 Ti 4⁴), 'foolish inquiries and genealogies,' 'profane babblings and oppositions' (1 Ti 6²⁰, 2 Ti 2¹⁶), 'Jewish fables, and commandments of men' (Tit 1¹⁴). It gave rise to 'questionings and disputes' (1 Ti 6⁴, 2 Ti 2²³), 'strifes, and fightings about the law' (Tit 3⁹), and it was eating into the life of the churches like a cancer (2 Ti 2¹⁷).

(b) Those who propagated this error seem to have done so by an abuse of the liberty of prophesying, and also by a house-to-house propaganda, which carried away many women. The teachers, who were evidently of Jewish origin, talked much about the Law, but acted in a manner that was contrary to its spirit, turning that which was pure to impure purposes (1 Ti 1⁷⁻¹⁰, Tit 1¹⁰). They clung for self-enrichment to forms of piety (1 Ti 6⁵, 2 Ti 3⁵, Tit 1¹¹), some of them perhaps practising magic (2 Ti 3⁸); but they were indifferent to Christian virtue, being of corrupt minds, consciously insincere, full of lust, reprobate and unholy men (1 Ti 4^{1-6, 8}, 2 Ti 3¹⁻⁸ 4³, Tit 1¹⁵⁻¹⁶). As might be expected, they revolted against authority, as did Jannes and Jambres, the opponents, according to the Midrash, of the Divine prophet Moses (2 Ti 3⁸, Tit 1¹⁰; cf. also 2 Ti 2¹⁹, with quotation from Nu 16⁵ referring to the rebellion of Korah).

(c) It is held by some that there were varieties in the form of error, the teachers of 2 Ti 2¹⁸ being thought to differ from the supposed magicians of 3^{8, 9, 13}, and those of 1 Ti 1¹⁹ 6²¹, who missed the goal of faith, from the false teachers of the Law (1 Ti 1⁷). But, while there are not sufficient data to arrive at a confident opinion, it is probable that the differences might be explained as being common elements in a Hellenistic-Jewish type or thought which pervaded the Christian churches of Asia Minor and Crete like an atmosphere. Though the descriptions are vague, certain features stand out connecting this error with tendencies which prevailed during the latter half of the 1st century.

It is frequently assumed that it was a type of Gnosticism—in particular, such a phase as the Ophite sect—and the words ἀντιθέσεις τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως, μύθοι, γενεαλογίαι might easily describe their speculations, which were accompanied, as here, by emphasis on knowledge and on the practice of asceticism. It is not improbable, however, that 1 Ti 6²⁰⁻²¹ is a later addition. W. Bousset holds that “Gnosis” first appears in a technical sense in 1 Tim. vi. 20.¹ But the developed characteristics of Gnosticism, as he describes it, are not found in the false teaching condemned in the Pastorals—‘a mystic revelation and a deeply-veiled wisdom . . . the ultimate object is individual salvation, the assurance of a fortunate destiny for the soul after death. . . . The Gnostic religion is full of sacraments. . . . Sacred formulas, names, and symbols are of the highest importance among the Gnostic sects,’ . . . in order that the soul may find ‘its way unhindered [by demons] to the heavenly home.’ The basis of the Gnostic world-philosophy is a dualism and a theory of emanations, including a belief in the Demiurge, who created and rules over this lower world, together with a hostile attitude towards the Jewish religion, which was represented in the later Christian Gnosticism. ‘In Gnosticism salvation always lies at the root of all existence and all history, . . . is always a myth, . . . not an historical event’ (EBR¹¹ xii. 152 ff.).² In these Epistles we have no trace of any fundamental philosophical contrast between the Creator God, who is the God of the Law in the OT, and the God and Father of Jesus Christ. As regards the ‘mystery’ element, there are far fewer indications of the sacramental spirit than in the Epistles of Paul written to Corinth, where the ‘Gnostic’ tendencies were perhaps less strong than in Ephesus. There is, it is true, a reference to ‘magicians,’ but the Jewish world was only too submissive to their spells.

A primary fact is that this teaching was more or less of Jewish origin, which is to say that it was not ‘Gnostic,’ though the Judaism of Asia Minor had been much influenced by the pagan world, and had even yielded to some of the tendencies which were more powerfully expressed in Gnosticism, such as star worship and ‘mystery’ ideas. Ascetic practices found favour even with such a good Jew as Philo, who held to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. It is quite intelligible, therefore, that teachers who inculcated a false asceticism, forbidding marriage and enjoining abstinence from foods (1 Ti 2¹⁵ 4³ 5¹⁴⁻²³, Tit 1¹⁵ 2¹), who also discounted historical facts and taught that there was no resurrection (2 Ti 2¹⁸), were Jews of the 1st century or had come under their influence. Indeed, Colossians presents similar teaching on the part of those who extended the old Jewish prescriptions as to clean and unclean, and probably enjoined abstinence from marriage (cf. Col 2¹⁶⁻²³ with Tit 1¹²⁻¹⁵). Even in the Roman Church there were those who practised asceticism, which may have been supported by speculative theories (Ro 14; Wendland, op. cit., p. 237). The spiritualization of the resurrection also was, according to Hippolytus, found among the Nicolaitans of Rev 2⁶⁻¹⁵.

Moreover, the Jew of the Dispersion had fallen under the influence of the peripatetic schools of Hellenism and of the Greek lecturer, who played a large part in the Hellenistic world, speculating with empty verbal dialectic and setting forth pretentious moral theories about the simple and ascetic life. They freely used myths, romances, and love-stories for decking out traditions and historical personages, applying them even to the gods. In such ‘myths’ and ‘genealogies,’ profane and gossipy legends couched in rhetorical phrases (ἀντιθέσεις) with immoral tendencies, there was no reality (κενοφωρία). Borrowing the use of allegory from the Greek, perhaps also his frivolous literary methods, the Jew, even the Pharisaic Jew of Palestine, had long before this set to work upon the OT with such an aptitude that in his Haggadic Midrash, full of senseless stories and supposed genealogies of Hebrew heroes, and in the Book of Jubilees, which sets forth mythical lines of descent of the families of the Patriarchs, he easily rivalled his master in riotous imagination and subtlety* (Wendland, op. cit., pp. 199–202). This method did away with the reality of the fact; history was turned into phantasy. As applied to the Law, especially by the Hellenized Jew of Asia Minor, and to the facts of gospel history, it would produce similar results—that is to say, a false spiritualization, followed by indifference to the facts of morality; and so these triflers with silly tales may have undermined the reverence for the moral order of the Law which had been the bulwark of the Jew against the pagan world. This evil tendency would be further aided by the widespread influence in Asia Minor of pre-Christian Gnosticism and the mystery-religions, from which even the Jew could not escape; and, though he may not have adopted the pessimistic philosophy that lay at their roots, he often glided insensibly into asceticism or licence.

There are still traces in these Epistles of opposition to Paul on the score of the Law, though it is different from that of the earlier Epistles (1 Ti 1⁷, Tit 1¹⁰ 3⁹). Here it comes from teachers who by their interpretation and method take all the moral meaning out of the Law. These errorists are a piratical crew, who have seized the good ship and kept her in a pestilential harbour till her timbers are befoiled and worm-eaten.

It may be that in the emphasis placed upon the conception of God as One and the Saviour of all, and of Christ as the only Mediator (1 Ti 2¹⁻⁷, Tit 2¹⁰⁻¹⁴), there is an allusion to contemporary Gnostic tenets, but it is more justifiable to see in it a veiled protest against the tendency to ascribe divine honours to heroes or local dynasts, to whom, as possessing the manifest power of the Divine presence, the word ‘Saviour’ was often applied (ἐνεργησὶ ἐπιφάνεια [Wendland, op. cit., pp. 126, 127]). Quite probably Christians were often tempted to secure favour from their rulers by this homage and to cloke the profession of their faith. When 2 Timothy was written, the confession of Christianity, or at least the preaching of it, seems to have been dangerous (2 Ti 1¹⁰ 2¹¹⁻¹³), and Timothy is warned not to refrain on this account from delivering Paul’s message. In 1 Tim. the skies are clearer, and the Christians are bidden to pray for kings and rulers in order that under their governance the Church may have freedom in worship (1 Ti 2¹⁻⁴). If her testimony is open and unmolested, the gospel will have freer course. Possibly the words may mean that by this time Christianity had penetrated to circles near the throne, and the Church may have been looking for permanent relief. The Cretans, who are urged to obey rulers (Tit 3¹), seem to have led a secure life unless they provoked reprisals by violence or a harsh spirit, which might have given them the reputation of being haters of their kind (3-9). There is not sufficient evidence in any of the Pastorals to assume the existence of systematic persecution arising from an Imperial policy.

* G. Wohlenberg (p. 31 n.) quotes two relevant passages—Polyb. ix. ii. 1, who says that he will not follow the method of many who deal with τὰ περὶ τὰς γενεαλογίας καὶ μύθους, καὶ περὶ τὰς ἀποικίας ἐπὶ δὲ καὶ συγγενείας καὶ κτήσεις; and Philo, Vit. Mos. ii. 8, τὸ γενεαλογικὸν μέρος τοῦ νόμου, deals with the history of the human race until the giving of the Law.

* Cf. Wendland, *Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur*³, pp. 165, 168, 184 f.

5. Organization and worship of the Church.—The Church is the household of God, the successor of the old theocracy, to which the living God had at all times committed His Word (1 Ti 3¹⁵, 2 Ti 2¹⁹ 3¹⁴⁻¹⁷; cf. Eph 2¹⁹). As the warden of Divine truth, which has been fully revealed in Christ, it must be pure in life, sound in doctrine, and firmly organized. Apostasy from or injury to its fellowship incurs the worst consequences (1 Ti 1²⁰ 3^{6, 7}, 2 Ti 2¹⁸ 3^{8, 9}, Tit 3^{10, 11}). (It is to be observed, however, that, though the Church is to be kept pure by the removal of unclean elements, the excommunication of Hymenæus and Alexander, who were delivered over unto Satan [1 Ti 1²⁰], was intended to have a reforming effect upon them, whereas in other Christian communities, on occasion at least, a similar act had a severer issue [Ac 5¹⁻¹¹, 1 Co 5¹].)

In the earlier Epistles Paul addresses his churches both with authority in the name of Christ and with paternal solicitude (1 Co 7¹⁷ 11²³ 16¹, Gal 4¹²⁻²⁰, 1 Th 4⁴). In the Pastorals also the same notes rise clear in his urgent commands or appeals to Timothy and Titus (1 Ti 1¹⁸, 2 Ti 4^{1, 2}, Tit 1^{5, 13}). As formerly he handed on 'traditions' (παράδοσεις, 1 Co 11², 2 Th 2¹⁵ 3⁸) and 'injunctions' (παράγγελαι, 1 Th 4²), so now his lieutenants are to guard and transmit the Pauline deposit, which he claims to be the sound teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Ti 1¹⁸ 6^{3, 14, 20}), committing it to trustworthy and capable successors (2 Ti 2², Tit 1⁵)—a procedure in which some have discovered, though without sufficient reason, the beginnings of 'apostolic succession' and the mark of later Catholicity, 'quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus.'

The function of Timothy and Titus was to represent the Apostle with the authority of his gospel and of the order which he had established in his churches. Their duty seems to have been, for the time, confined to definite regions, being unlike that of the later monarchical bishop, who presided permanently over the church in one city. On former occasions also they had been sent on missions (1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁰, 2 Co 2¹⁵ 12¹⁸, Ph 2¹⁹⁻²³), but it is quite possible that Titus had also evangelized on an independent authority, both he and Timothy apparently being regarded as 'apostles' (cf. Ro 16⁷, 2 Co 8²³; cf. Ph 2²⁵, 1 Th 2⁷). In Ephesus and Crete, however, their duties are more arduous and more permanent, because of the necessity of getting distracted or turbulent communities into an ordered administration. Their ability to do this was due to the fact that they understood the Apostle's mind and practice as well as his gospel.

In the Second Epistle of Timothy the Apostle recalls to his disciple the fact that he is an evangelist and must speak with the authority of his gospel. When he was ordained this gift had descended on him with power, but its glow seems to have become hidden under a cooled surface; now he is to stir up his gift and to preach a pure gospel with courage, love, and prudence (1 Ti 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 2 Ti 1⁶ 3¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 4¹⁻⁵). Here is a challenge not to missionary evangelism of new regions, but to a revival of faith in old churches; and it rests not on extrinsic authority but on the power of the gospel of Christ.

In 1 Tim. and Titus the function of both these lieutenants is more of an organizing than an evangelizing character. They have great authority, and yet they are to act as brethren (1 Ti 5¹, Tit 2^{7, 8, 15} 3¹⁰). Timothy is to rebuke even an elder openly, to assign him honour or promotion, and not to invest with office by weak concession the wrong type of man. This authority seems to be personal rather than official.

There was still in the churches a remnant of the primitive charismatic gifts, for apparently it was under the guise of Christian prophecy that false prophets introduced their errors (1 Ti 4¹; cf. 1 Co 12²). But the sudden overpowering charism of earlier days seems to have given way to an endowment of more permanent and illuminating inspiration (1 Ti 1¹⁸ 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶, 2 Ti 3^{16, 17}). Against irresponsible, unrestrained, and immoral teachers, who profess to rely on the Spirit, a well-ordered and organized church becomes a bulwark of the faith.

In these Epistles no definite form of organization is prescribed, but an order is accepted as already in existence—one object of the letters being to emphasize the necessity that Timothy and Titus shall secure men of the proper character and qualifications to fill the constituted offices. The first order in government is that of the 'bishop' (1 Ti 3², Tit 1⁷), who seems to be identical with the 'presbyter' (1 Ti 5¹⁷, Tit 1^{5, 7}), of whom there were probably more than one in each church, though the article (1 Ti 3¹, Tit 1⁷) does not of itself indicate this. The office was invested with peculiar dignity (1 Ti 5¹⁹⁻²¹) and was much sought after (3¹); it was, therefore, the duty of the Apostle's delegates to select from the aspirants those whose character, abilities, and experience fitted them for directing the Church at the present crisis. It cannot be shown that the office was elective, but it may be that the function of Timothy and Titus was that of selecting suitable candidates from whom the brethren would make their choice (cf. 1 Ti 3^{2, 10} 5²²).

The qualifications for the bishop given in 1 Tim. and Titus are almost identical, though their order seems to be casual, and it cannot be assumed that they were meant to be an exhaustive list or had been codified; the emphasis was probably determined by local conditions. The bishop as the steward, with oversight of the house of God, should be a married man of proved capacity to govern, as shown in the lesser sphere of his own family. Free from the faults of youth, he must have won in the eyes of the world a character for uprightness and piety. Great stress is put upon the practice of self-restraint in all its forms, on tact and active goodness—probably to counteract the temptations to an undue exercise of authority. More distinctly official requisites are hospitality, freedom from avarice—needful in one who may have been responsible for finances—and ability to teach. If 'bishop' and 'elder' were identical, it may be inferred from 1 Ti 5¹⁷ that some elders did not teach, inasmuch as those who did were to receive either double pecuniary support or to be regarded as holding a more honourable office. In Tit 1⁹, however, the ability to teach and to resist heresy is emphasized as being so essential as almost to suggest that this distinction in the eldership did not exist in Crete. These officials were evidently to be supported by the churches which they served (1 Ti 5¹⁸).

It cannot be successfully maintained that already a 'clerical' morality beyond that required of the laity is being required of the bishop. The virtues are ordinary Christian virtues. The expression 'husband of one wife,' for example, if it means prohibition against having a mistress as well as a wife, sets forth the Christian rule, though the mention of it here would indicate how slowly those who emerged from paganism in these districts adjusted themselves to the higher standard. If the words imply that the bishop was not to contract a second marriage after the death of his first wife, as is probably what is intended, they indicate that the bishop must be a man whose manner of life would win for him the highest respect in the Christian community (1 Co 7³⁻⁹; cf. Lk 2³⁸⁻³⁷). On inscriptions of the Augustine age the word virginus is applied to a man who had married but once. By the 2nd cent. the standards became much more rigid.

The second rank, the diaconate, which was probably a stepping-stone to the higher office (1 Ti 3¹³), is mentioned only in 1 Timothy. The deacon seems to have been a younger man, though many of his qualifications are the same as those of the bishop—control over his family, a blameless character, freedom from drunkenness and avarice. No reference is made to the exercise of hospitality or teaching power, but the deacon is warned against being double-tongued, a danger to which he may have been exposed by gossip in his household-visitation.

Opinion is divided as to the meaning of 'women' in 1 Ti 3¹¹. If the integrity of the text be assumed, the more probable view is that it means the wives of bishops and deacons, this being supported by the possibility that in order to counteract a false asceticism (οἱ κωλύοντες γαμεῖν, 1 Ti 4³) Paul may have intended that bishops and deacons should be chosen from among married men. If, however, as is not improbable, the verse be an interpolation, it is a later reference to the order of deaconesses, which was in existence early in some churches (Ro 16¹). More is to be said for the view that there was an order of 'widows,' who were assigned a special ministry (1 Ti 5³⁻⁹, 10).

The 'young men' (1 Ti 5¹, Tit 2⁶) seem to have had some official standing, though it is probable that the line that divided between any class and the brethren was not sharply drawn.

Prominent though the idea of the Church and its organization is, the sacramental element does not appear in the Pastorals except in Titus. If it was regarded as an essential condition for the welfare of Christian life, it is strange that the 'mystery' of godliness should be expressed in doctrine (1 Ti 3¹⁶). Stress is everywhere laid on teaching, healthy instruction as to the gospel, right conduct; and to do the work of an 'evangelist' is to fulfil the ministry. The sacrament of baptism is, according to Tit 3⁵⁻⁷, the outward act whereby the Divine salvation is consummated. In this bath of regeneration the world beheld the Church cleansed from its old life of heathenism, and thereafter endued with the quickening Holy Spirit. No mention is made of any name or word as of mystical power: nothing is said of the laying on of hands as conveying any supernatural endowment. Whether baptism was a necessary channel of grace, and, if so, in what measure, is left undetermined. As in Ro 6¹⁻³ 8¹⁵⁻¹⁷, baptism with its concomitants is at least (1) a proof of the effectiveness of Divine grace, (2) a pledge of eternal life. A remarkably similar view of baptism to that of Tit 3⁵⁻⁶ is found in Eph 5²⁶⁻²⁷, with the addition of 'in a word.'

The public worship of the Church is well developed. Under the direction of presbyters, teaching takes the place held by prophecy in the Corinthian Church (1 Ti 4¹³⁻¹⁶, 2 Ti 2¹⁻²). There was public reading of the Scriptures accompanied by an exposition of the Word of God, of which perhaps the quotations in the Gospel of Matthew and in the Epistle to the Hebrews are good examples. 2 Ti 3¹⁵⁻¹⁷ refers to OT Scriptures. In them is Divine wisdom, which, when accompanied by faith, begets salvation; and all Scripture, or every passage of Scripture which is inspired (the false teachers used Jewish fables, etc.), is useful for equipping the man of God for his work. In these Epistles no trace of the canonization of the NT books is discoverable. Prayer also, rich and varied (1 Ti 2¹⁻², 8), was regulated, and again restraint appears in place of the freedom of the earlier charismatic days. It seems that, as in 1 Corinthians, only men took part in public prayer (1 Ti 2⁸⁻¹²). Hymns, germs of a creed, liturgical snatches, doxologies—all for public use—are embedded in these letters (1 Ti 1¹⁵ 1³ 3¹⁶ 6¹⁵ 16, 2 Ti 2¹¹ 12 13), everything combining to show that a regulated form of public worship was rapidly displacing the individual charismata of the more primitive days. In private also, prayer was employed to sanctify the daily meal (1 Ti 4⁴, 5).

6. Christian faith and life.—There is already a 'common faith' (κοινή πίστις) (Tit 1⁴), the substance of which is set forth in Tit 2¹¹ 14 3⁴⁻⁷. God is 'the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords' (1 Ti 6¹⁵), but also the Saviour (1 Ti 2³⁻⁴ 4¹⁰, 2 Ti 1⁹, Tit 3⁴) of all men, from whose goodness and 'philanthropy'† proceeds saving grace (Tit 2¹¹ 3⁴) in fulfilment of an eternal purpose (2 Ti 1⁹, Tit 1⁷). Between God and men there is only one Mediator, the man Christ Jesus (1 Ti 2⁵), who from a pre-incarnate life came into this world (1 Ti 1¹⁵, 2 Ti 1¹⁰). This manifestation, 'the mystery of godliness,' and the essential truth held forth by the Church (1 Ti 3¹⁵, 16), is expressed in a hymn, evidently a common confession of faith, though it does not contain a complete Pauline view of the 'mystery' (Ro 16²⁵⁻²⁷), omitting as it does the Death, and laying stress on the Ascension rather than the Resurrection. Jesus Christ, descended from David (2 Ti 2²³), came into the world to save sinners (1 Ti 1¹⁵). He annihilated death and brought life and incorruption to light (2 Ti 1¹⁰). By the gift of Himself on our behalf He ransomed the new Israel from sin, and made it pure (1 Ti 2³, Tit 2¹⁴). Jesus Christ is the living strength (1 Ti 1¹⁴) and hope of the Christian (1 Ti 1¹, Tit 2¹³), who lives his holy life in Him (2 Ti 3¹⁻¹); and the Holy Spirit, who is seldom mentioned, is given through Christ (2 Ti 1¹⁴, Tit 3⁶). The appearing of Christ, who will come to judge, is not far distant, and is longed for by the believer (1 Ti 6¹⁴, 2 Ti 4¹⁻⁸, Tit 2¹³). Then will be the final salvation unto eternal life (2 Ti 4¹⁸, Tit 3⁷).

The Church, built upon this solid foundation of Christian teaching, holds aloft the truth which shines forth in the lives of believers as a light in the darkness, and against such a beacon the waves of error will break in vain.

In 1 Tim. the Church, the house in which God dwells, takes a place of great importance as the organized body which guarantees the Truth. This Truth is healthy doctrine, but in 1 Ti 3¹⁶ it is also equivalent to 'the mystery of godliness,' and is set forth in a hymn which contains the salient features of the historic manifestation of Jesus Christ, what we might term an outline 'gospel.' The hymn seems most simply interpreted as referring to the Incarnation; the recognition of Divine sonship in the Baptism, Temptation, Transfiguration; the revelation of the historic Jesus to the heavenly world, as e.g. to the celestial choir

* Zahn finds traces of a fixed baptismal creed in 1 Ti 6¹²⁻¹⁶ and 2 Ti 2²⁻⁸ 4¹, though F. A. Loofs, while admitting that ἡ καλὴ ὁμολογία and the reference to the μαρτυρίαν Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐπὶ Πορτίου Πελλαγίου (1 Ti 6¹³) may be an allusion to a baptismal confession (which he thinks had its origin in Asia Minor, where also he places the home of the Pastorals at the end of the 1st cent.), does not believe that it was the original of the Roman symbol (Symbolik oder christliche Konfessionskunde, Tübingen, 1902, p. 23).

† There was hardly any virtue so often commended in the Hellenistic sovereign as φιλανθρωπία' (Wendland, op. cit., p. 407, note 4).

at His birth, the Transfiguration, Gethsemane (Lk 22⁴⁵), the Resurrection (Lk 24⁴⁻⁵; cf., for same idea, Jn 1⁹¹); the preaching to the Gentiles; the founding of the Church in the world; and the culmination of His triumph in the Ascension.* This survey fits into the scheme and purpose of the Gospel of Luke and the Book of Acts. According to 1 Ti 3¹⁶, this tradition of the historic Jesus, this mystery which is the Truth, is preserved in the Church of the living God, which must, therefore, be regulated by Timothy with a due sense of his responsibility. It is true that in the earlier Pauline Epistles we find the conception of the Church and the necessity of its organization (1 Co 12²³ 15⁹, Gal 1¹³), but there is no such emphasis on it as here. These verses remove us from the Pauline atmosphere of the gospel of the Risen and Living Christ, who Himself is the source of truth, the Person in whom through His Spirit the body of believers is held together. Instead of the Spirit, we find organization and order.

When the gospel is preached and is received in a pure heart, a good conscience, and with faith unfeigned, the moral life will manifest itself in the pursuit of righteousness, piety, love, patience under suffering, endurance never embittered whatever evil may befall, peace and hope in the living God who gives life eternal (1 Ti 1⁵ 4¹⁰⁻¹² 6¹¹, 2 Ti 2²³ 3¹⁰). This is similar to the righteousness of the Kingdom as it is set forth in the Gospels. Good though the soil may be, it must be tilled with care; vigorous effort is required of the Christian, in co-operation with the saving grace of God in Christ: true godliness must manifest itself in good works (1 Ti 2¹⁰ 6^{11, 17}, 2 Ti 3^{16, 17}, Tit 2^{11, 12} 3¹⁴). This side of the Christian life is emphasized in these Epistles both by the words employed to describe the effort and by the moral quality of the result. The word 'discipline' (παιδεία, παιδεύω) occurs four times in the Pastorals, and only three times in the other Pauline letters, but seven times in Hebrews and twice in Acts, where it is employed for the education of the child. A similar idea lies in the word 'exercise' (γυμνάζειν, 1 Ti 4⁷). As might be expected, teaching plays a large part in the discipline of a Christian character. The word 'teaching' (διδασκαλία) occurs fifteen times in these Epistles, being often qualified by the attributes 'good' (καλῇ) and 'healthy' (ὑγιαίνουσα), and only six times in the rest of the NT. Occasionally it is almost equivalent to the concept of 'faith' as the objective belief of the Christians (1 Ti 6¹⁻³, Tit 2¹⁰). In the early Epistles of Paul the gospel, which is a Divine mystery hidden from the wise and prudent, is revealed unto the saved by the Spirit as the power of God (1 Co 1^{18, 27}); but in these Epistles healthy doctrine may be taught to and understood by reasonable and moral men. It is one of the necessary qualifications of the bishop that he be 'apt to teach' (1 Ti 3²), and Paul himself is a 'teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth' (1 Ti 2⁷, 2 Ti 1¹¹).

The thoroughly disciplined Christian, instructed in sound doctrine, will deny 'worldly lusts' and 'live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world' (Tit 2¹²). The frequent occurrence of the term 'godliness' (εὐσέβεια) and its associated forms constitutes one of the features of these Epistles (1 Tim. ten times, 2 Tim. twice, Tit. twice). Outside the Pastorals they are found most frequently in Acts, in which also the phrase 'God-fearers' (οἱ σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν, οἱ φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν) is used of the proselytes who have discovered in the God of the Christians the true Jahweh and the object of reverent worship leading to a holy life. The terms are also very characteristic of pagan thought in the Hellenistic age. The root idea of the word is reverence, primarily as directed towards God, who is recognized as holy and must receive His due in worship, and then as shown in the conduct of a man who performs towards others what piety demands. The good man must be godly (εὐσεβής). His godliness must manifest itself in the performance of practical duties and in goodness towards all men in their several stations. 'Godliness' is almost synonymous with the righteousness of the citizen of the Kingdom of God, who has the promise both of this life and of that which is to come. It brings contentment with one's lot, and willingness to take all blessings from God's hand, surpassing by this religious motive the old Stoic virtue of contentment or independence of external goods. There was need of the practice of this virtue, because even in the Christian world of Ephesus riches had already become a root of manifold evils (1 Ti 6⁶⁻¹⁰). Other words from the same root peculiar to the Pastorals (with the exception of Ph 4⁸) are σεμνός and σεμνότης (cf. αἰδώς, 1 Ti 2⁹), which signify a reverent type of life becoming to the Christian and winning respect for him from his neighbours (2³ 3^{4, 8}, Tit 2⁷).

From 'godliness' (εὐσέβεια) it is not a long step to 'self-control' (σωφροσύνη) and its cognates, ten instances of which out of sixteen in the NT occur in the Pastoral Epistles. Self-restraint is a chief virtue for youth, and with reverence is the adornment of pious women (1 Ti 2⁹, Tit 2^{3, 6, 11}). Many parallels to the three virtues σωφροσύνη, δικαιοσύνη, εὐσέβεια are to be found in ancient ethics, σωφροσύνη in particular being the Greek ideal of a harmonious, well-ordered life as opposed to the character divided against itself by its passions. In contrast to the ecstatic worship or ascetic practices of the pagan religions, and even to the inspiration of the primitive Christian, the believer of the Pastorals is self-controlled, having disciplined his moral life into reverence and dignity. His character, however, has a supernatural source, Jesus Christ Himself being the fountain of piety, faith, and love (2 Ti 1¹³ 3¹²). But the emphasis is different from that of the major Pauline Epistles. There the Christian life is the fruit of the indwelling Spirit, from whom as the outcome of full liberty in Christ springs a splendid luxuriance of virtues. In these Epistles discipline and teaching prune the moral life, which shows itself in a reverent and restrained piety.

7. Relation of the Pastoral Epistles to the other books of the NT.—(i.) THE PAULINE LETTERS.—(a) 1 Timothy.—There is undoubtedly a strong Pauline basis underlying this Epistle.

Romans: 7¹² and 1 Ti 1⁸⁻⁹; 16²⁷ and 1 Ti 1¹⁷; 13¹ and 1 Ti 2¹⁻²; 23³⁰ 30^{5, 6, 10} and 1 Ti 24^{5, 6}; 14¹⁴ and 1 Ti 4¹.

Corinthians: 1 Co 5⁵ and 1 Ti 1²⁰; 1 Co 11^{8, 9} 14³⁴ and 1 Ti 2^{11, 12}; 2 Co 1¹³ and 1 Ti 2^{13, 14}; 1 Co 12³ and 1 Ti 4¹; 1 Co 16^{10, 11} and 1 Ti 4¹²; 1 Co 7^{8, 9} and 1 Ti 5¹⁴; same quotations in 1 Co 9⁸, 2 Co 13¹, and 1 Ti 5^{18, 19}; 1 Co 9^{23, 26} and 1 Ti 6¹⁴.

Ephesians: the conception of ministry, the need of unity and sound doctrine similar in Eph 4¹¹⁻¹⁴ and 1 Ti 3¹⁻⁶; cf. also Eph 2^{19, 20} and 1 Ti 3¹⁵; 4²¹ and 1 Ti 3^{15, 16}; 2² and 1 Ti 4¹; 6⁵ and 1 Ti 6¹.

Philippians: 4¹³ and 1 Ti 1¹²; 2²⁶ and 1 Ti 1¹⁸; 4⁶ and 1 Ti 2¹, 4^{11, 12} and 1 Ti 6⁵⁻⁸; 1¹ and 1 Ti 3^{8, 9}.

Colossians: 12²⁷ and 1 Ti 11^{4, 11, 12} 3^{15, 16}.

These parallels do not exhaust the likeness. Only a writer extremely familiar with Paul's writings or thought could have written 1 Ti 1⁸⁻²⁰ 2¹⁻⁷ 6¹¹⁻¹⁶, though the distinctively Pauline notes of justification, life in Christ, and the work of the Spirit have been toned down in the Epistle at large. Frequently also a word or conception strange to the Pauline soil is turned up by the critical ploughshare, e.g. the application of the attribute 'Saviour' to God. Further, the emphasis is changed. 'Teaching,' especially 'healthy' teaching (ὑγιαίνουσα διδασκαλία), is much commoner than in the earlier Epistles (1 Co 4¹⁷, Col 1²⁸ 2³¹⁶), and in 1 Ti 6¹ it is almost convertible with the gospel. Christian faith is spoken of less from the personal side than from the objective as a body of doctrine, twice, indeed, being synonymous with 'truth' (though, of course, this use of 'faith' is also found in the earlier Epistles) (1 Ti 1⁹ 4¹ 6¹⁰⁻¹¹); and Christian life and doctrine are the new law (ἐντολή) (v. 14). As has been remarked above, the prevalence of the idea of discipline and of the word 'godliness' (εὐσεβεία) is a feature of these later Epistles. Again, the use of the phrases 'faithful is the saying' (πίστος ὁ λόγος, 1⁵ 3¹ 4⁹) and 'the good confession' (1 Ti 6¹³) involves a measure of fixed creed, or at least of traditional formulæ, which seems alien to the originality of Paul's mind. Possibly also the 'words of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Ti 6³) were logia such as Luke and the other Evangelists used.

* For the use of the aorist to express the completeness of an event that may have recurred see F. W. Blass, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, Göttingen, 1896, § 571.

(b) 2 Timothy.—The affinities are much closer than in 1 Timothy.

Romans: 8¹⁵ and 2 Ti 1⁷; 11⁶ and 2 Ti 1¹³; 16²⁶ and 2 Ti 1¹⁹; 6¹⁷ and 2 Ti 1¹³; 1³ and 2 Ti 2⁵; 12³⁰ and 2 Ti 3²⁴; 2³⁰ and 2 Ti 3⁵; 4²⁴ 15⁴ and 2 Ti 3¹⁶.

1 Corinthians: similar relationship of Paul to Timothy: 1 Co 4¹⁷ 16¹⁰ 11 and 2 Ti 1⁶ 2¹ 3¹⁰ 11; 9⁷ 25²⁶ and 2 Ti 2⁴ 3; 31² 53 and 2 Ti 2¹⁹; 9⁹ 10 and 2 Ti 3¹⁶.

2 Corinthians: the idea of the ministry in 2 Co 3¹⁶ 4² is similar to that in 2 Tim., though in the latter it is less powerfully expressed; cf. 2 Co 4¹¹ 12 and 2 Ti 2¹⁰.

Ephesians: 3² 5. 9. 10 and 2 Ti 1⁹ 10; 11⁹ 20 and 2 Ti 2⁵; 31. 13 and 2 Ti 2⁹; 4¹¹ and 2 Ti 4⁵; 6²¹ and 2 Ti 4¹².

Philippians affords the closest parallels: 3³ and 2 Ti 1³; 13³⁰ 21⁹ 22¹⁰ 11. 17 4⁹ and 2 Ti 1¹³ 3¹⁰ 14; 12³⁰ and 2 Ti 1¹²; 3¹⁰ and 2 Ti 2⁵; 11²⁴ 21⁷ and 2 Ti 2⁹ 10; 21⁷ 31⁴ and 2 Ti 4⁶ 8.

There are no passages in 1 Tim. that ring so truly Pauline as 2 Ti 1³ 5. 8-12 13 31-5. 10-12 41. 2 5-8. But even in these sections non-Pauline words such as ἐπιφάνεια, εὐσεβεία (ὡς) occur, and their style and language conform in general to 1 Timothy, though this alone would not cast a serious suspicion upon 2 Timothy were it separated from its companion Epistles. Its vigour and personal references show that it takes its rise near the source of the Pauline stream. The form of the letter also resembles the earlier Pauline Epistles more than 1 Tim. or Tit. does. After the address comes a thanksgiving, as in Rom., Cor., Phil.; at the close a doxology, greetings, and blessing, which is very Pauline. See Wendland, op. cit., p. 413 ff.

(c) Titus.—There are here, as in the other Epistles, affinities in detail and in general.

Romans: 16²⁵ 26 and Tit 1⁴; 5² and Tit 2¹³; 13¹⁵ and Tit 3¹; 8-11 and Tit 3⁷; 16¹⁷ 18 and Tit 3¹⁰.

1 Corinthians: 4¹ and Tit 1⁷; 17 and Tit 2¹³; 6¹¹ and Tit 3².

Ephesians: in Eph 4¹¹⁻¹⁴ 5²⁵⁻²⁷ and Tit 1¹¹ there are similar ideas as to the necessity of the ministry in order to maintain the purity of the Church against false doctrine; cf. also Eph 1¹⁸ 10 and Tit 1¹⁴; 1¹⁴ 5² 25-27 and Tit 2¹⁴; 2⁵ 5⁸ and Tit 3²; 28. 9 5²⁶ 27 and Tit 3².

Philippians: 3²⁰ and Tit 2¹³; 4⁵ and Tit 3²; 3⁹ and Tit 3⁷.

Pauline doctrine is found in 1-3 21-14 31-8, though there is an inworking of non-Pauline ideas and language similar to that of 1 Timothy. Christianity is a recognizable form of piety to be adorned, observed, and taught (2¹⁰). Titus stands midway between 1 and 2 Timothy; it is more personal than the former, and is more closely related to the latter in its parallels to the Pauline letters and in its emphasis on the evangelical doctrines, but in 1⁵⁻⁹ 21-10 39. 10 it is connected more closely with 1 Timothy (3²² 11 5¹⁵ 6¹ 3-5).

(ii.) HEBREWS.—Several expressions and a few turns of thought, not found in Paul, are common to the Pastorals and Hebrews—the conception of the death of Christ, and the use of the term 'mediator,' He 8⁶ 9¹⁵ 12²⁴ and 1 Ti 2⁵, 2¹⁴ and 2 Ti 1¹⁰; cf. 12² and 2 Ti 2⁸.

(iii.) 1 PETER.—This Epistle affords even more close resemblances than Hebrews: 3¹⁻⁶ and 1 Ti 2⁹⁻¹¹; Tit 2³⁻⁵ 5¹⁻⁴ and 1 Ti 3⁷; Tit 1⁵⁻⁹; 3¹⁸ 22 and 1 Ti 3¹⁶; 4⁵ and 2 Ti 4¹; 21³⁻¹⁵ and Tit 2⁸ 3¹ 2; 3¹³ and Tit 2¹⁴.

(iv.) THE LUCAN WRITINGS.—There are remarkable points of contact between the Pastoral Epistles and the Gospel of Luke, and especially the Book of Acts. The attributes applied to God—'King of kings and Lord of lords' (1 Ti 6¹⁵), 'Saviour' (3 times in 1 Tim., once in 2 Tim., 6 times in Tit.), His χρηστότης και φιλανθρωπία (Tit 3⁴) and μεγαλειότης (cf. Lk 1¹⁵ 22 9²³, Ac 8¹⁰ 19²⁷ 28, Tit 2¹³)—show a striking similarity to the religious terminology current in Hellenistic Judaism and in Hellenistic cults (see Wendland, op. cit., p. 221; Dibelius on Tit 2¹⁴). In this respect the language of Luke and Acts is much more akin to contemporary Hellenistic usage than is that of Paul. The Gospel of Luke opens with a promise of what is really an ἐπιφάνεια of the Most High (12³² 35. 76 79). The term is frequent in contemporary religious language and occurs 5 times in these Epistles. Ac 14¹⁶ 17²⁴⁻²⁵ are a partial comment on the Divine χρηστότης και φιλανθρωπία. Jesus is the Saviour of sinners (Lk 2¹¹, Ac 5³¹ 13²³); Christ is Redeemer (λυτρωσθαι, 1 Ti 2⁶, Tit 2¹⁴; cf. Lk 1⁸⁸ 24²¹, Ac 7³⁵), Judge (2 Ti 4¹, Ac 10⁴² 17³¹). Cf. the gift of the Spirit (2 Ti 1⁶, Ac 13² 3; cf. 18²⁷); similar conceptions of the relation of the New to the Old Covenant and of Paul to Judaism (2 Ti 1¹³, Ac 24¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 26⁵ 22); hostility to the gospel traced to ignorance (1 Ti 1¹³; cf. Ac 3¹⁷ 17²³ 30); the Church the family of God, and its relation to the household (1 Ti 3¹⁵ 2 Ti 2²⁰, Ac 10² 11¹⁴ 16³¹ 18³); recognition of the widow (1 Ti 5³, Lk 2³⁷ 18³⁻⁶, Ac 6¹); evil effect of riches (1 Ti 6¹⁰ 17, Lk 8¹⁴ 12¹⁶⁻²¹ 16⁹); frequent use of 'good (or other adj.) conscience' (6 times in Pastorals, Ac 23¹ 24¹⁶, common in Hellenistic usage); similar use of δικαιοσύνη for proper conduct (1 Ti 6¹¹, Ac 10²⁵ 13¹⁰ 24²⁵). Acts, like the Pastorals, exhibits the influence of 'teaching' in the spread of the gospel, and also of the favourable disposition of rulers upon the growth of the Church, which, indeed, may be said to be one of its minor motives. Prayer for those in authority was in the synagogues of the Jews an equivalent for worship of the Emperor and a proof of loyalty (see Dibelius on 1 Ti 2²). For lesser parallels see 2 Ti 1¹², Lk 23⁴⁶, Ac 7⁵⁹; 2 Ti 2¹⁹, Lk 13³⁷; 2 Ti 3¹⁴, Lk 1⁴. Very close resemblances are found between the address of Paul to the elders at Miletus (Ac 20¹⁷⁻³⁸) and the Pastorals, especially in the closing scene in 2 Timothy. Paul reminds them of his blameless career (cf. 2 Ti 1¹² 14 3¹⁰ 11 4⁷). The joy of finishing his course makes his own life of small account since he is fulfilling the commission of Jesus Christ (Ac 20²⁴, 2 Ti 1¹¹ 12 4⁶ 7. 8). In spite of dangers that the preaching of the gospel brought upon him, he has been faithful, serving the Church without gain, and his example will strengthen his successors in the troublous days that are ahead (Ac 20²⁸ 30. 32-35, 1 Ti 6³⁻¹⁰, 2 Ti 1⁸ 2⁴ 3¹⁰ 11 14, Tit 1¹¹). The impending visitation of evil teachers creates the necessity of elders maintaining discipline and oversight (Ac 20¹⁷ 28. 29. 30, 1 Ti 3¹⁵ 4¹ 6⁵, 2 Ti 3¹ 6, Tit 1⁵ 11 3¹¹ [ἐξέστραπται]; cf. Ac 20³⁰). Cf. Ac 20³⁵ (λόγος τοῦ κυρίου) and 1 Ti 6². The quotation (1 Ti 5¹⁸, Lk 10⁷) is given in the exact words of Luke, whereas in other cases, e.g. 1 Co 9¹⁴, Paul does not use the Gospel Sayings of Jesus (cf. 1 Ti 5¹ with Lk 9³⁵).

It is just possible that the Book of Tobit may serve as a link between the Pastorals and the Lucan writings. Cf. especially 4⁹ and 1 Ti 6¹⁹; 4²¹ and 1 Ti 6⁵; 13⁶ and 1 Ti 1¹⁷ (see R. H. Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Oxford, 1913).

If Rendel Harris is correct in his view that the words of Ac 17²⁸, 'In him we live, and move, and have our being,' are taken from Epimenides, the Cretan poet, who is evidently the author of the hexameter verse in Tit 1¹², there is another subtle connexion between the Pastorals and Luke (Exp. 7th ser., ii. [1906] 305).

The hymn quoted in 1 Ti 3¹⁶ seems to follow the themes of the Gospel of Luke and of the Acts—the Incarnation, Baptism, Temptation, Transfiguration and other angelic manifestations, Mission of Seventy, the carrying of the gospel to Gentiles (in Acts), the foundation of the Church, and the Ascent through death into glory. See also under § 6.

In regard to the character of Timothy, A. Jülicher says: 'It is the Timothy of the Acts of the Apostles somewhat flattened out and diminished that the Pastoral Epistles show us' (PREE xix. 786); cf. Wendland: 'Many ecclesiastical customs and regulations bring [the author of Acts] into the neighbourhood of the Pastoral Epistles' (op. cit., p. 333).

8. References in post-apostolic literature.—While the witness of the earliest non-canonical writers is not so strong for the Pastorals as for Romans and Corinthians, it compares favourably with that for Galatians and Philippians, and is much better than that for 1 and 2 Thessalonians. The fact that they were addressed not to churches but to private persons may account for the silence.

Clement.—There is a fair degree of probability that the Pastorals, especially Titus, were known to Clement: Clem. ad Cor. i. 3 and Tit 2^{4,5}, ii. 7 and Tit 3¹ being the closest parallels; but cf. xxix. 1 with 1 Ti 2⁸; xxxii. 3. 4 with 2 Ti 1¹⁹, Tit 3⁵⁻⁷; xlv. 7 with 2 Ti 1³, 1 Ti 3³; lx. 3. 4, lxi. with 1 Ti 6¹⁶ 2², Tit 3¹.

Ignatius contains, it is highly probable, frequent reminiscences of 1 and 2 Timothy. Cf. Eph. xiv. 1, xx. 1, Magn. viii. 1 with 1 Ti 1³⁻⁵; Polyc. iii. 1 with 1 Ti 1³ 6⁵, iv. 3 with 1 Ti 6², vi. 2 with 2 Ti 2^{3,4}; Rom. ii. 2 with 2 Ti 4⁶, ix. 2 with 1 Ti 1¹³; Smyrn. iv. 2 with 1 Ti 1¹², 2 Ti 2¹⁶. For Titus: cf. Magn. vi. 2 with Tit 2⁷, viii. 1 with Tit 1¹⁴ 3⁹; Polyc. vi. 1 with Tit 1⁷. The evidence for Titus is weaker than for the others. Zahn asserts that scarcely a single chapter of the three Pastorals is without more or less marked parallels with Ignatius; Jülicher also admits that they are used in Ignatius and Polycarp.

Barnabas seldom, and with less probability, has traces of the Epistles (cf. Ep. Barn. i. 4 with Tit 1², v. 6 with 1 Ti 3¹⁶); but Polycarp is undoubtedly indebted to them. Cf. Polyc. ad Phil. iv. 1 with 1 Ti 6⁷⁻¹⁰; iv. 3 with 1 Ti 5⁶; v. 2 with 2 Ti 2¹⁻², Tit 3⁸; ix. 2 with 2 Ti 4¹⁰; xi. 2 with 1 Ti 3⁵; xi. 4 with 2 Ti 2²⁵; xii. 1 with 2 Ti 3^{14,15}; xii. 3 with 1 Ti 2^{1,2} 4¹⁵.

Justin, the Gnostic Acts of Paul, Hegesippus, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria know these Epistles. They are regarded as Pauline and canonical in the Muratorian Fragment, though, strangely, Marcion omits them from his Pauline group, probably on his own doctrinal grounds. Marcion had written a book with the title ἀντιθέσεις, and in 1 Ti 6²⁰ the readers are warned against ἀντιθέσεις τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως. It may be also that he rejected them because they were not addressed to churches, for Tertullian seems to see an inconsistency in his admitting Philemon. The silence of Marcion is difficult to explain clearly, but is insufficient for Jülicher's theory that the Epistles were not known before his time as Pauline and could not have appeared before A.D. 100.

9. Language of the Pastoral Epistles.—(a) The three letters are related to one another by the use of a large common vocabulary. Among the most distinctive words and phrases are εὐσέβεια and cognates, σώφρων and cognates, διδασκαλία often with ὑγιαίνονσα or καλός (καλός elsewhere in Paul only 16 times and then usually as a predicate, but in the Pastorals 24 times and as a rule attributively), παράθηκη, καθαρά or ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις, πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, ἐπίγνωσις ἀληθείας, δι' ἣν αἶτταν, and χάρις ἔχειν. Some 170 words are found nowhere else in the NT, 70 occur only in 1 Tim., 40 in 2 Tim., and 25 in Titus.* 1 Tim. and Tit. are more nearly related to each other than either is to 2 Timothy.

(b) At the same time there is a fundamentally Pauline vocabulary, though some of the most distinctively Pauline words and particles are not found, e.g. ἄδικος, ἀποκαλύπτειν, ἐνεργεῖν, καυχασθαι, παράδοσις, περιπατῆν, περισσεύειν, σῶμα, τέλειος, ἄρα, δοῦναι, δοῦναι. The absence from the Pastorals of the rhetorical expressions τί οὖν; τί γὰρ; ἄρα οὖν; οὐκ οἶδας, which occur in the greater Epistles, is not so remarkable, because they are found rarely in the Epistles of the Captivity; but the style has become less vigorous than that of these later letters. It never bursts its bounds or swirls aside into parentheses, though the intenser note of 2 Tim. seems to indicate a recent experience.

(c) Many words of these Epistles, while occurring occasionally in the Pauline letters, are more frequent in Luke and Acts,† e.g. ἀμαρτωλός, ἀναλαμβάνειν, ἀποδοχῇ (ἀποδέχεσθαι), διαμαρτυρεσθαι, ἐπαίρειν, ἐπέχειν, ἐπισκοπῇ, δοσιος (Hebrews, not in Paul), παραιθέναί, παρέχειν, συνείδησις ἀγαθὴ (in Paul συνείδησις absolutely), χῆρα.

(d) Many other words are found elsewhere in the NT only or mainly in Luke and Acts, or occasionally in non-Pauline books, e.g. ἀνοία, ἀχάριστος, βίος, βυθίζειν, δρόμος, δυνάστης, ἐξαρτίειν, ἐπιμελεῖσθαι, ἐπίστασθαι, ἐπιφαίνειν, εὐεργεσία, εὐσέβεια, ζήτησις, ζωργεῖν, ζωογονεῖν, κακούργος, λείπειν, μελετᾶν, μεταλαμβάνειν, νεώτερος, νομικός, νομοδιδάσκαλος, παρακολουθεῖν, περίεργος, περιστάναι, περιποιεῖσθαι, πρεσβυτέρων, προδότης, προπηγῆς, προσέχειν, προσμένειν (cf. Ac 11²³ with 1 Ti 1³), σωματικός, υγιαίνειν, φιλοφροσύνη, φιλάργυρος.

Further parallels with Lucan language are the use of πνεῦμα, 2 Ti 1⁷ (found also in Ro 8¹⁵), Lk 8⁵⁵ 13³¹, Ac 6¹⁰ 7⁵⁹ 17¹⁶; δοσις, relative of indefinite reference (1 Ti 3¹⁵, Lk 8³⁶); ἐπὶ πλεῖον (2 Ti 2¹⁶ 3⁹, Ac 4¹⁷ 20^{9,24}); ἐν with γίγνεσθαι (1 Ti 2¹⁴, 2 Ti 1¹⁷, Ac 13⁵ 22¹⁷); ἐν with εἶναι, a rare construction (1 Ti 4¹⁵, Lk 2⁴⁹).

(e) Other words are common with Hebrews, e.g. ἀφίλαργυρος, βέβηλος, γυμνάζειν (except once in 2 Pet.), ἐκτρέπεσθαι, ὀρέγεσθαι.

10. Situation of Paul as given in these Epistles.—Attempts have been made to find a place for these Epistles within the record of the life of Paul as it is given in the Book of Acts, but without success; and, if they are from his hand, they must be assigned to a later period, after his acquittal at the trial impending at the close of Acts. That he was acquitted seems probable to the present writer, but this solution of the question does not necessarily carry with it the authenticity of the Pastorals. 2 Timothy alone affords chronological data. Paul is now a prisoner in Rome. Active profession of Christianity brings one into a danger-zone. Suffering accompanies service—not that it is the acute result of systematic persecution, though in 2 Timothy this hovers on the horizon (2³)—and it has been sufficiently severe to cause wholesale defections in Asia and in Rome (1¹⁵ 4¹⁶⁻¹⁸), and to check the energy of a timid heart (1⁷⁻⁹). The author compares Timothy's sufferings with his own in Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (3^{10,11}). It is, however, not hazardous for Timothy and Titus to visit Paul at Rome, good friends like Onesiphorus, who had helped him in Ephesus, having apparently of late sought out the Apostle there (1¹⁶ 17), which might imply that he was in concealment, though 4²¹ shows that he kept in touch with the Christians

* Most of these, Wendland thinks, belong to the literary stratum of the Koine, and the influence of the LXX is small (op. cit., p. 364, note 5).

† The language of Luke and Acts also has more affinities with the literary Koine than that of any book of the NT but Hebrews.

of the city, even if, as may be inferred from 4^{10, 11}, the Apostle had his own small intimate circle apart from the larger church of Rome. It is for Ephesus and its environment, the churches of his earlier years, that he is most anxious, as the signs point to a gathering storm (2¹⁶ 3¹⁵). When Paul wrote Philippians and Colossians he was expecting an immediate and favourable decision of his case, and, if this was the result, during the interval that elapsed between Philippians and 2 Timothy he paid a visit to Ephesus, possibly also to Crete (Tit 1⁵). When he wrote Philippians and Colossians, he had with him Timothy (whom he hopes to send to Philippi, and in fact he may have sent him away before the close of the first trial), apparently Epaphroditus, Tychicus (who with Onesimus has just been sent to Colossæ), Aristarchus a fellow-prisoner, Mark (who is soon to go to Colossæ), Justus, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas. At the time of 2 Timothy, Demas has forsaken Paul and gone to Thessalonica, perhaps on worldly business, and Luke only is with him. He asks Timothy to bring Mark, which he has made possible by sending Tychicus to Ephesus. He seems to have been in prison for some time, and 'the first defence' most likely refers to a preliminary trial which involved danger to his disciples. Alexander the coppersmith, who may have led in the great defection from the Apostle (2 Ti 1¹⁵), possibly the same person as Alexander the Jew of Ac 19, may have followed him to Rome and brought against him some specious charge, which told powerfully before the Imperial court, now suspicious of the new sect, which was evidently different from and hated by Judaism. Apparently Paul is sending Timothy late news about Ephesus, whither he may be about to come, possibly from Macedonia, or, as Zahn suggests, from his old home in Lystra, where he may have been when Paul was last in Ephesus. The natural inference is that Erastus remained behind in his own home at Corinth when Paul came on to Rome, and that Trophimus had been left not long before at Miletus (2 Ti 4²⁰). This Trophimus, an Ephesian, had been a fellow-worker with Timothy before and was evidently known to Luke (Ac 20⁴ 21²⁰).

11. Authorship of the Pastoral Epistles.—Of all the letters which profess to have come from the apostle Paul these are the most disputed. A formidable account is laid against them, to wit—(a) the false doctrine which is said to be Gnostic teaching of the end of the 1st cent.; (b) the emphasis placed upon the Church, its organization and worship, in which are traced the beginnings of the monarchical episcopate, a clergy in due succession from the apostles with a higher standard of morality than the laity, liturgical forms and creeds; (c) fundamental changes from earlier Pauline doctrine both in emphasis and in conception—orthodoxy having supplanted faith, some indeed discovering the germ of the doctrine 'quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus'; good works as the outcome of moralism having taken the place of the fruit of the Spirit; justification by faith being no longer vital as against legalism; and the eschatology of the earlier days having lost its vividness; (d) a marked change of language and style, the original language coined by Paul for the expression of the facts of salvation having been displaced to a great extent by terms drawn from the current Jewish-Hellenistic religious terminology, and the old vigour having yielded to smooth or loose commonplace; (e) the fact that Paul, speaking in old age, addresses Timothy as though he were not yet a fully matured man; (f) the extreme difficulty of finding a place for these letters in the recorded life of Paul. As a result, many scholars suppose that they were written about the end of the 1st century.*

It has, however, been shown that the false doctrine of these letters is most easily explained as the result of tendencies both Jewish and pagan which were at work towards the end of Paul's life, and that it does not distinctively resemble what is called 'Gnosticism,' such as was prevalent at the end of the 1st century. The ecclesiastical order is not unlike that found in Philippians and Acts; there is no evidence of a clergy practising a higher morality and enjoying a distinctive privilege by transmission from the apostles. The view of the Church itself also and of its sacraments is very similar to that which is found in 1 Corinthians, Ephesians, and Acts. The Epistles, therefore, fit a period quite as early as Acts, and do not inherently need to be put later than A.D. 70 or 80.

There is, however, as we have seen, much force in the arguments urged against their authenticity which are drawn from the changes in the emphasis and formulation of doctrine, as well as from the remarkable differences between the early Pauline Epistles and these in style and language. Perhaps also the attitude of an old man to a youth assumed by Paul to Timothy, especially in the First Epistle, is somewhat artificial, though it may be justified by the Apostle's relation to him as given in 1 Co 4¹⁷ 16^{10, 11}, Ph 2²⁰⁻²². These difficulties are most obvious in 1 Tim., less so in Tit., and many of them disappear from 2 Timothy. As has been already remarked, if 2 Tim. had stood alone, its authenticity would probably not have been questioned.

Attempts have been made to discover Pauline fragments in these Epistles, but without much success, e.g. a genuine letter written towards the close of the Roman captivity, in 2 Ti 1³⁻⁵ 7¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 4⁵⁻¹² 21-22 and in Tit 1¹⁻⁴ 3¹²⁻¹⁵ (see especially Moffatt, LNT, p. 403 f.); but, as Jülicher remarks, 'the impression of unity given by the whole, especially of the close connexion originally existing between all the parts referring to the discipline of the Church, outweighs arguments in favour of division of material among several authors' (Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., p. 199). There seem to be, however, in 1 Tim. and possibly in Tit. some interpolated passages (see under § 2).

The remarkable similarities in language and ideas, religious and ecclesiastical, that exist between these Epistles and the writings of Luke, combined with their Pauline substance, may be best explained by supposing that Luke had a large share in their composition. He was alone with Paul at the time of his approaching death, and may have composed the 'second' Epistle to Timothy in such circumstances during the imprisonment of Paul that it was a reproduction of his ideas and even of his language rather than the work of an amanuensis. In that case, it may be called Pauline. It was almost certainly the earliest of the three.

Some years after the Apostle's death Luke, or one of his circle, may have put together, from his notes or reminiscences and from Pauline material, the first letter to Timothy and that to Titus almost simultaneously. His purpose in doing so was to strengthen the authority of Timothy and Titus in the face of a widespread and increasing invasion of the error referred to in 2 Tim., which was undermining the churches of Ephesus and Crete. Such a theory would account for most of the features of these Epistles, as, e.g., the disorder and lack of logical development of themes in 1 Tim., which may be due to a substratum of refractory materials. If Luke had written a free composition, it would have been a better literary product.

* 'The Pastorals sprang from the need of fixing in literary form the church ordinances which had grown up spontaneously and organically and thereby setting forth fixed statutes for the individual life of the church. The attempt is made to bring these rules under the authority of St. Paul and so to provide them with a more general validity' (Wendland, op. cit., p. 365).

LITERATURE.—(1) Commentaries: J. H. Bernard, Cambridge Greek Testament, 'The Pastoral Epistles,' Cambridge, 1899; N. J. D. White, in EGT iv. (London, 1910); B. Weiss, Die Briefe Pauli an Timotheus und Titus (H. A. W. Meyer, Kommentar, xi.), Göttingen, 1902; H. v. Soden, in Handkommentar zum NT, iii.² (Freiburg, 1911); F. Köhler, in Die Schriften des NT (Göttingen, 1908); G. Wohlenberg, in T. Zahn's Kommentar, xiii.² (Leipzig, 1911); M. Dibelius, in H. Lietzmann's Handbuch zum NT (Tübingen, 1913).

(2) Introduction: In addition to treatment in above Commentaries, see H. J. Holtzmann, *Einleitung in das NT*², Freiburg, 1896; C. v. Weizsäcker, *Apostolic Age*², Eng. tr., London, 1897-99; A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, do., 1891, Essay by G. G. Findlay, p. 343 ff.; F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, Cambridge, 1894, and The Christian Ecclesia, do., 1897; T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, do., 1902; A. Harnack, Die Chronologie der altchristlichen Literatur, i. (Leipzig, 1897); A. Jülicher, An Introduction to the NT, Eng. tr., London, 1904; W. Lock, in IBDB iv. s.vv.; T. Zahn, *Introduction to the NT*³, Eng. tr., 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1909; J. Moffatt, *The Historical NT*², do., 1901, LNT, do., 1911; W. M. Ramsay, in Exp, 7th ser., viii. (1909), ix. (1910), 8th ser., i. (1911); P. Wendland, *Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur und die urchristlichen Literaturformen*², Tübingen, 1912.

R. A. FALCONER.

TITHES (δέκαται).—It is admitted universally that the payment of tithes, or the tenths of possessions, for sacred purposes did not find a place within the Christian Church during the age covered by the apostles and their immediate successors. In the Hebrew religious community tithes possessed a two-fold character. They were either a charitable and regularly recurring contribution placed at the disposal of the humbler Levites and other poor or a yearly impost designed for the upkeep of the central house of worship and of the ministering priests (see W. Robertson Smith, *OTJC*², London, 1892, pp. 383 n., 446 f.; see also *RS*², Edinburgh, 1894, pp. 246-253).

Those who maintain that tithes are due de jure divino to the Church give as the reason for their non-existence in the Apostolic Age that the conditions of the infant Church in the initial stages of its growth raised insuperable difficulties against the practice of such systematic payments during that period (see Bingham, Antiquities, v. v. 1 ff. [Works, Oxford, 1855, vol. ii. p. 176 ff.]). As soon as the condition of the Church permitted, it is contended, the payment of tithes began as a duty obligatory on all individual Christians. Not only, however, is there no evidence of the truth of this contention, but such testimony as we possess from the pages of the NT goes to disprove it. Not that the duty of Christian giving was not recognized as binding, or that the discharge of that duty was considered outside of, or an unspiritual encroachment upon, the region of Christian ethics. On the contrary, as we shall see, it occupied an extremely important part in apostolic instruction and ideals. Its reason and purpose are raised to a loftier plane than they had ever occupied, and translated into language of the profoundest moral and spiritual content. 'The perfect law, the law of liberty' (Ja 1²³), reigns here as it does elsewhere (Gal 5¹³, 1 P 2¹⁶, Jn 8³², etc.), and the Christian's joyous liberality, like his other graces, may be characterized from the teaching of the NT as the expression of the individual's consciousness of his love of, and moral obligation to, his brethren.

The social and economic conditions of the early Church in Jerusalem demanded extraordinary efforts on the part of its wealthier members. Whatever be the source of the narrative embodying the history of the attempt to establish the life of that body on a communistic basis, there can be no doubt that it is in harmony with what we understand from other sources (see art. COLLECTION) to be the state of extreme poverty in which the humbler Christians of Jerusalem were sunk. The attempt to relieve this prevailing distress was essentially voluntary, as the questions said to have been addressed by St. Peter to Ananias testify: 'Whiles it remained, did it not remain thine own? And after it was sold, was it not in thy power?' (Ac 5⁴). Nor is it otherwise with the Antiochian Church, which organized a relief fund for the Jewish Christians some years later; 'every man according to his ability' (Ac 11²⁹) contributed, and we have no reason to believe that their giving was not free and spontaneous (ῥῆσαν). In reminding the Ephesian elders, gathered at Miletus, of his own example, St. Paul emphasizes (note the words κοπιῶντας δέ) the duty of the follower of 'the Lord Jesus' by the quotation, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' (Ac 20³⁵). His exhortation 'to help the weak' (cf. 1 Th 5¹⁴) includes in its scope that charitable disposition of our wealth, whether it be 'silver, or gold, or apparel' (Ac 20³³), which will meet the needs of poverty or misfortune. In formulating his scheme for the collection of funds for the poor 'saints' of Jerusalem, he laid down the rule for the guidance of the Corinthian Christians: 'upon the first day of the week let each one of you lay by him in store, as he may prosper' (1 Co 16²); and his enthusiastic praise of the Macedonian Churches for their earnest and liberal response to his appeal he justifies by the circumstances in which their single-minded generosity (τὸ πλοῦτος τῆς ἀπλόγητος αὐτῶν, 2 Co 8²) displayed itself. These attached supporters of the Apostle gave joyously (ἡ περισσεύα της χάρας αὐτῶν) in a time of sore trial (ἐν πολλῇ δοκιμῇ θλίψεως; cf. 1 Th 1⁶ 2¹⁴), and from their own deep poverty (ἡ κατὰ βᾶθους πτωχεία αὐτῶν). We are reminded of Jesus' words in praise of the widow's giving 'all the living that she had' (πάντα τὸν βίον, Lk 21⁴; cf. παραδύναμις, 2 Co 8³).

Not only did the Christians of Macedonia give of their own accord (αὐθαίρετοι), but they were even clamorous to be permitted to share in the work which lay so near to the Apostle's heart. His profound joy is intensified by the fact that he is able to recognize in their generosity the outcome of their previous complete self-surrender to the cause and Person of the Lord (note the emphatic phrase, ἐάντοῦς ἔδωκαν πρῶτον τῷ κυρίῳ of 2 Co 8⁵). Even in writing to the church in Rome, which he had not at the time visited, he is careful to remind his readers that the duty of giving to their poorer brethren is fundamental to the outward expression of a true Christian faith (Ro 12¹³; cf. 15²⁷); and, if we accept the Epistle to the Ephesians as St. Paul's, he makes this duty a grace to be anxiously sought and laboured for (note the ἵνα in Eph 4²⁸). This teaching was, indeed, not peculiar to the Apostle of the Gentiles. Liberality to the needy is the infallible test of the genuineness of Christian love (1 Jn 3¹⁷) and of a living faith (Ja 2¹⁵). It is a sacrifice evoking a Divine response to him who offers it (He 13¹⁶) and constitutes the foundation stone upon which to build that perfect character which alone can appropriate for itself (ἐπιλάβωμαι; cf. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews, London, 1889, p. 54 f.) 'the life which is life indeed' (1 Ti 6¹⁹).

In all the cases referred to, the essential freedom of Christian action is implied. There is no legal code formulated for the guidance of those whose love of the brethren is thus tested (οὐ κατ' ἐπιταγὴν λέγω, 2 Co 8⁹). On the contrary, each one has the choice and determination as to his attitude (ἐκαστος καθὼς προήρηται τῇ καρδίᾳ, 2 Co 9⁷). There is no external compulsion (ἐξ ἀνάγκης) to detract from the joy, or to set a mechanical boundary to the inclination, of the Christian's giving to the poor. We thus recognize the truth of Irenæus' words: 'Whilst they [the Jews] used to hold the tithes of their property as consecrated, they, on the other hand, who have grasped freedom, dedicate to the use of the Lord all things which they possess, giving joyfully and freely in greater abundance, because they have a greater hope' (Hæc. iv. 34).

The other purpose for which tithes were paid was the maintenance of the Temple services and of the attendant priests and Levites. Now there can be no doubt that the apostles and those who spent themselves in the propagation of the gospel from the first considered it their due to be supported by the gifts and contributions of their followers and converts. The aphorisms, 'The labourer is worthy of his hire' (cf. Mt 10¹⁰), 'Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn' (1 Co 9⁹, 1 Ti 5¹⁸), are quoted as applicable to the Christian missionary and his work. The fact that St. Paul so emphatically refused to accept any monetary aid from the Corinthian church (see Ac 18³ [cf. 20³⁸], 2 Co 11⁷⁻¹⁰, 1 Co 9¹⁸) makes all the stronger the words in which he asserts and presses the just rights of all the Christian teachers 'to live out of the gospel' (ἐκ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ζῆν, 1 Co 9¹⁴). The Apostle is insistent that he is forgoing with purpose his most elementary right in maintaining his financial independence. The scathing irony of his question, 'Did I commit a sin in debasing myself [by working for his daily bread] in order you might be raised up?' is followed by the startling emphasis of his expressions (note the collocation δωρεὰν τοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ εὐαγγέλιον, and his use of the military terms ἐσὺλησα, ὀψωνιον, 2 Co 11¹⁴; cf. 1 Co 9⁷). He had accepted his 'wages' from others in order that they might have his labours free of charge (δωρεάν). The force of his claim as a teacher is strengthened by his determination to act as he thought best, and refuse what he had a perfectly well recognized right to and what his detractors were in the habit of receiving. If the Corinthians chose to make his refusal a handle to accuse him of conscious charlatanism, he vehemently avers that what he did he did out of pure love for them (see the questions δια τί; ὅτι οὐκ ἀγαπῶ ὑμᾶς; and the solemn assertion ὁ θεὸς οἶδεν, 2 Co 11¹¹) and for their benefit (ἐν παντὶ ἀβαρὴ ἐμαυτὸν ὑμῖν ἐτήρησα, 2 Co 11⁹). Whatever may have been the original reason for this line of conduct on the part of the Apostle, we know that he solemnly reminded other churches of his own foundation that the recognition of this obligation to their spiritual teachers was an essential feature of true discipleship (μη πλανασθε, θεὸς οὐ μνηστῆρίζεται, Gal 6¹), and his touching gratitude to the Philippians for their loyal and repeated support when he was in want (Ph 4^{14a}) is sufficient proof that he was willing to accept what was due to him (πλην καλῶς ἐποιήσατε) not only for his own sake but still more for theirs (ἐκζητῶ τὸν καρπὸν τὸν πλεονάζοντα εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν, 4¹⁷). Not only is the general principle of maintaining the clergy a decided feature of the early Apostolic Church, but towards the close of the period we have evidence that there were gradations in the payment given, proportionate to the value of the work accomplished (οἱ καλῶς προεστώτες πρεσβύτεροι διπλῆς τιμῆς ἀξιοῦσθωσαν, 1 Ti 5¹⁷)—a not unexpected development of the old law, 'the labourer is worthy of his hire' (Lk 10⁷).

In all this there is no evidence of a giving which is not free and spontaneous and which has not a moral and spiritual basis. No allusion is made to the necessity for the continuance of the Mosaic law of tithes. This is all the more remarkable as we have in St. Paul's case a distinct reference to the parallel between the Levitical priesthood and the Christian ministry in this respect (1 Co 9¹³)—a parallel which is involved, consciously or otherwise, in the ordinance of Jesus (ὁ κύριος) that His missionaries were to be supported by the objects of their labours.

The relation between tithes and Christian giving may be apprehended as that between the law and the gospel as incentives and forces in life. It is the relation between a legal enactment which enforces by objective sanctions and a spiritual ideal which draws out all that is best and highest from those who recognize the significance of the blessedness of self-sacrifice for the sake of others.

LITERATURE.—A. Plummer, ICC, '2 Corinthians,' Edinburgh, 1915; A. Robertson and A. Plummer, ib., '1 Corinthians,' do., 1911; Foulke Robartes, The Revenue of the Gospel is Tythes, Cambridge, 1613; G. Carleton, Tythes Examined and Proved to be Due to the Clergy by a Divine Right, London, 1611; J. Selden, History of Tythes, do., 1618. J. R. WILLIS.

TITUS.—Titus, one of the apostle Paul's chief lieutenants, was a Greek, born probably in Antioch or its neighbourhood, and converted to Christianity perhaps by the Apostle himself (Tit 1⁴). He was among the earliest Gentile leaders in the Christian Church, and it has been suggested, not without plausibility, that the question of Gentile circumcision was first raised when he, along with others, was brought into the Church. In any case, Paul chose Titus to go with him to Jerusalem in order that the question might be decided by the apostles on appeal to a concrete case. Titus was almost certainly not circumcised (Gal 2⁵).

Henceforth he is a leader under Paul in work which made him well known to the churches of Galatia (2¹). When affairs had reached a dangerous climax in the church of Corinth during Paul's sojourn in Ephesus, Timothy was first dispatched by the Apostle to restore peace; but he failed, and Titus was then sent. Paul was confronted with a revolt of one of his important churches, the seriousness of which may be estimated by the tension of the Apostle as he awaited news of the mission of Titus (2 Co 2¹³, 7⁵⁻⁶). Titus was quite successful: the rebellious element was suppressed. As a result of his service, there sprang up between Titus and that church a deep affection, and he championed them in the matter of their liberality towards 'the saints' at Jerusalem, claiming that they would not be behind Paul's favourite churches of Macedonia (2 Co 8^{4, 16, 19}).

Titus was evidently a man of stronger character than Timothy, and may have been sent further afield on more independent missions; but nothing is known of his later activity apart from the Epistle addressed to him by St. Paul. It may be reasonably assumed that historical material lies embedded in this letter; and, if so, Titus continued to be Paul's 'partner and fellow-helper' (2 Co 3²) until the end of his life, and retained his confidence as one who was able to carry out difficult tasks to the Apostle's liking (Tit 1⁵). Crete, to which Paul took Titus, must have been in itself one of the hardest fields to evangelize (1^{12, 13}), and the appearance of the false teachers, who seem to have gained a foothold after Paul left, made a strong hand all the more necessary. These teachers were men 'of the circumcision' (1^{10, 14}), who possibly made use of the fact that Titus was an uncircumcised Greek to undermine his authority. Paul does not fear, as he does in the case of Timothy, that Titus will yield to pressure; but he may have dreaded that, not being a Jew, he would pay too much heed to the prestige of Judaism, and attach a fictitious importance to these Jewish teachers and their fables (1¹⁰⁻¹⁶, 3⁹). He, therefore, bids him make short work of unruly men and exercise his own authority (2¹⁵, 3¹⁰). His position in Crete is similar to that of Timothy in the churches of Ephesus—a representative of the Apostle holding a local commission. His function is that of an apostle, such as we find it in the Epistles, and cannot be identified with that of the monarchical bishop.

Paul at the end of his life's work turns towards his disciple, though no reason is given in Tit 3¹; but, as the churches of Crete need a present director, he promises to send Artemas or Tychicus to relieve Titus and permit him to join the Apostle in Nicopolis.

Jülicher thinks that Titus may have been the first Greek missionary to Crete and Dalmatia (PRE³ xix. 800). No reliance is to be put upon the later ecclesiastical tradition, which, working upon the Epistle, calls him the first bishop of Crete (Eus. HE iii. iv. 6).

LITERATURE.—See under TIMOTHY AND TITUS, EPISTLES TO; A. Jülicher, art. 'Titus,' in PRE³ xix. 798-800.

R. A. FALCONER.

TITUS (Emperor).—Titus, who was officially styled sometimes Imperator Titus Cæsar Vespasianus Augustus, sometimes Imperator Titus Vespasianus Cæsar Augustus, was originally named Titus Flavius Vespasianus. He was the son of a man of the same name, the Emperor Vespasian (see under VESPASIAN), and of Domitilla, and was born at Rome on 30th December, A.D. 39. Titus was brought up and taught along with Britannicus, son of the Emperor Claudius (q.v.), at the Court of the latter. He was early distinguished for bodily strength and manly beauty, and was accomplished not only in boxing and riding, but also in oratory, music, and verse composition. He gained his first military experience as tribunus militum (colonel) in Germany and Britain, and served with distinction. Afterwards he followed the usual career in the law courts, and at the same period married Arrecina Tertulla, daughter of the knight M. Arrecinus Clemens, who had been prefect of the prætorian cohorts under Caligula. After her death he married Marcia Furnilla, a lady of high birth, who bore him a daughter Julia and was later divorced by him. Titus was quæstor about the year 65, and in the beginning of 67 he was in command of a legion. From that time till the middle of 68 he assisted his father in the conduct of the Jewish War. He began the work by bringing the fifteenth legion (Apollinaris) from Alexandria to Judæa in a very short time, considering that it was winter, and successfully besieged Jaffa and Jotapata. Later he retired to Ptolemais, then to Cæsarea on the coast, and afterwards to Cæsarea Philippi, Scythopolis, and Tiberias. He gallantly besieged Tarichea, Gamala, and Gischala. In fact, all through the war his determined and skilled generalship was indispensable to his father. In quick succession Gadara, Peræa, western Judæa, Idumæa, and the neighbourhood of Jericho were besieged by the Romans. Afterwards the attack on Jerusalem was prepared. In the troublesome period following the death of Nero, Titus played an important part. He has the chief credit of the reconciliation of Mucian, governor of the province Syria, and Vespasian. Titus was also adopted by the old king Agrippa, and both visited Achaia in the winter of 68-69. The attitude of these powerful men in the East towards the kaleidoscopic changes in the West was complicated by the long delay in the arrival of news. The news of the death of Galba (15th Jan. 69) and the arming of Vitellius led Titus to hope that he would succeed his father, and he returned by Asia Minor, Rhodes, and Cyprus to Syria. Already the attractions of the Jewish princess Berenice had begun to influence him. Meanwhile Vespasian and Mucian had got the Jewish and Syrian army to swear allegiance to Otho. However, on the news of Vitellius' success against Otho, the soldiers forced Vespasian to undertake the Empire. There is no doubt that the popularity of Titus helped them to this decision, and later Titus accompanied Vespasian to Alexandria to strengthen his position there. In the year 70 Titus was commander-in-chief, in which year also he held his first consulship, along with Vespasian. The details of the final attack on Jerusalem and of the preliminaries to it are well known from the pages of Josephus, BJ v. and vi. This author had for some time been on friendly terms with Titus. The siege was one of the most stubborn in history, but the Jews were eventually defeated. Return home by sea was impossible during the winter, and Titus went from Cæsarea Philippi to Cæsarea Stratonis, then to Berytos. His visit to other Syrian cities was made all the more pleasant by the report of the splendid reception which his father had received in Italy. By Syrian Antioch he went to Zeugma on the Euphrates, where he received an embassy from the Parthian king. From Zeugma he returned, probably via Tarsus, to Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria (reached probably in May 71). After sending the fifth and fifteenth legions back to their former garrisons and selecting 700 captives for his triumph, he took the usual route by sea from Alexandria past Rhegium to Putcoli (see ROADS AND TRAVEL), and thence to Rome. The joint triumph of Vespasian and Titus took place probably in June, the month of his arrival. Some of the most conspicuous objects in the triumphal procession are represented on the reliefs of the still existing Arch of Titus in the Forum at Rome (see art. ROME).

There had been originally a question among the soldiers in the East whether Vespasian or Titus should be made Emperor. Their decision was for Vespasian, with the full understanding that Titus should succeed his father. Titus' military success, with the plunder thence accruing, made him popular with the soldiers, but he remained on the best of terms with his father. Already in 69 both Titus and Domitian received Imperial titles from their father, and early in Vespasian's reign, in 71, Titus was recognized as co-emperor. It is not necessary to follow here the details of his official career and the titles he held in the course of that part of it which lies within his father's period as princeps. In 79 Titus crushed a conspiracy against his father by putting the ringleader Alienus, a friend of his own, to death. The Jewish queen Berenice had come to Rome with her brother Agrippa in 75. Titus' fondness for her, though she was thirteen years his senior (see BERENICE), was notorious; but the Romans had still much of the same strong feeling against close association between their rulers and foreign women that they had shown in the days of Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra, and Titus felt compelled to dismiss her.

At the commencement of his reign anticipations were not pleasant. For he had shortly before shown signs of tyranny as well as of licentiousness. It is highly probable that disease had already begun its work on him. Vespasian having died on 24th June 79, Titus was thirty-nine years old when his sole rule as Emperor began. At once he named his brother Domitian his partner and successor; but this did not imply the double rule of two equals, as Domitian seemed to expect it would. He gave an unanticipated impression of mildness, and seems in every way to have realized his responsibility and reformed his previous manner of life. The great Stoic philosopher, Musonius Rufus, whose fragmentary writings (ed. O. Hense, Leipzig, 1905) preach the noblest ethics of classical antiquity, was recalled to Rome, though Vespasian had banished him. Agricola's success in Britain continued (see under VESPASIAN). It was in this reign that the great eruption of Vesuvius took place, on 24th August 79. Herculaneum (better form Herculaneum), Pompeii, and Stabiae were overwhelmed (see Herrlich, in Klio, iv. [1904] 209 ff.). Titus journeyed to Campania and remained there till next year, doing all that he could to help. His action provides an ancient counterpart to the services of King Victor Emmanuel on the occasions of the earthquakes of Messina and Avezzano. The great aqueduct, Aqua Marcia, which had fallen into ruins, was repaired, and the Roman supply of pure water thus notably increased (cf. Statius, Silvae, I. v. 26 ff.). Titus also superintended road-building in Italy, Dalmatia, and Numidia, as inscriptions prove. In the year 80, during the absence of Titus in Campania above referred to, a great part of Rome was destroyed by fire. A considerable number of the most splendid buildings were destroyed in the conflagration. Large sums were put at the disposal of the Emperor by private persons, princes, and towns, to enable him to restore them. He did not hesitate to furnish some of them from the Imperial palaces. A pestilence having broken out in Rome, the Emperor was as instant in help as he continued to be in face of the distress in Campania. Amidst great festivities the wonderful amphitheatre, which we know as the Colosseum (see art. ROME), was dedicated, along with public hot baths. The combats of wild beasts and gladiators, the mimic naval battles, and the exhibition of gifts lasted one hundred days. To this year belong also various improvements to roads in Italy, Spain, Galatia, and Lycia. Agricola acquired additional territory for Rome in Britain. In the same year in the East a false Nero appeared, and obtained considerable support for a time. The impostor was in reality a certain Terentius Maximus, a native of the province Asia, who was like Nero in appearance. To this episode there may be a reference in Rev 13³. In the year 81 we learn of further repairs to aqueducts in Italy, and of new roads in Cyprus. The Emperor's health had begun to fail seriously in the preceding year. The ancient authorities mention an attack of fever. Domitian, it was rumoured, had poisoned him, or at least had hindered his recovery from illness by neglecting the orders of the physician. Certainly Domitian left Titus' bedside in the Sabine land for Rome before the end, which took place on 13th September in the forty-second year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and twenty days.

LITERATURE.—The ancient authorities are: Josephus, B.J. bks. iii.→ii.; Tacitus, Histories, bks. i.→v.; Xiphilinus' epitome of Dio Cassius, bks. lxx. and lxxi.; Suetonius, Titus; Sextus Aurelius Victor, de Caesaribus Liber; numerous inscriptions collected to 1901 in H. C. Newton, The Epigraphical Evidence for the Reigns of Vespasian and Titus (Cornell Studies in Classical Philology, xvi., 'Coins'), Ithaca, N.Y., 1901.

Modern works: K. Weyand, in Pauly-Wissowa, vi. 2695 ff.; H. Dessau, in Prosopographia Imperii Romani, Berlin, 1897, ii. 79 (no. 264); M. Beule, Titus und seine Dynastie, ed. E. Doehler, Halle, 1875; also the relevant parts of the following histories: V. Dury, History of Rome, Eng. tr., 6 vols., London, 1883-86; J. B. Bury, Student's History of the Roman Empire, do., 1893; H. Schiller, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, i. [Gotha, 1883] 518 ff.; A. von Domaszewski, Geschichte der römischen Kaiser, ii. [Leipzig, 1908] 155 ff.

A. SOUTER.

TITUS, EPISTLE TO.—See TIMOTHY AND TITUS, EPISTLES TO.

TITUS JUSTUS (so in the MSS NE.; B reads 'Titius Justus' as do the Vulgate and the Memphitic Versions).—The name is mentioned only once in the NT, Ac 18⁷. He was a Gentile who had been brought under the influence of the Jewish synagogue in Corinth. As a proselyte, he heard St. Paul preach there. Evidently he was favourably impressed; and, when the opposition of the Jews drove St. Paul 'to the Gentiles,' Titus offered him the use of his house (which was practically next door to the synagogue) as a meeting-place. It is extremely likely that he became a convert to Christianity. Attempts have been made to identify him with several people, as, e.g., with Titus (the recipient of St. Paul's Epistle), and—by W. M. Ramsay, on much better grounds—with Gaius. Gaius was an early convert in Corinth (1 Co 1¹⁴); and St. Paul refers to him in Ro 16²³ as 'my host and of the whole church,' which might mean the person in whose house the church met. But no identification can be established.

A. C. Headlam describes Titus Justus as 'evidently a Roman or a Latin, one of the coloni of the colony Corinth' (HDB ii. 829^b)—i.e. a descendant of the colonists 'established there in B.C. 46, who would on the whole constitute a sort of local aristocracy' (W. M. Ramsay, ib. i. 481^a). Evidently his social position was good; and probably St. Paul accepted the offer of his house not because it was so near the synagogue as to be a rival meeting-house, but because it afforded the Apostle access to the more educated classes of the Corinthian population. Although St. Paul used an exasperating gesture when he broke with the Jews in the synagogue, there is no need to charge him with being deliberately non-conciliatory. But the opportunity of preaching in the house of such a citizen as Titus Justus overbore all other considerations. Codex Bezae describes St. Paul as leaving the house of Aquila to lodge with Titus; but this is due to the reviser's misunderstanding of the text.

LITERATURE.—A. C. Headlam, art. 'Justus' in HDB ii. 829^b; W. M. Ramsay, art. 'Corinth,' ib. i. 481-482; W. Lock, art. 'Titus,' ib. iv. 732^a; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 153, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, do., 1895, pp. 256-257; Exp. 8th ser., i. [1911] 341, v. [1913] 354 n.; EGT, '1 Corinthians,' do., 1900, p. 730; C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i², do., 1897, pp. 303-309. J. E. ROBERTS.

TOKEN.—This word occurs three times in the Pauline Epistles, and nowhere else in the EVV of the apostolic writings. The passages are 2 Th 1⁵, Ph 1²⁵, 2 Th 3¹⁷, AV and RV giving identical renderings in each. In 2 Th 1⁵ the Greek ἐνδειγμα is translated by 'manifest token'; in Ph 1²⁵ ἐνδείξις is translated by 'evident token'; in 2 Th 3¹⁷ 'token' renders σημείον. The two first passages may conveniently be taken together, both because of their general resemblance and because the two Greek words which 'token' represents are closely related. In 2 Th 3¹⁷ it represents a different word, occurring in a totally different context.

1. In 2 Th 1⁵, St. Paul, speaking for himself and his associates, says to the Thessalonians: 'We ourselves glory in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and in the afflictions which ye endure; which is a manifest token of the righteous judgement of God.' The word ἐνδειγμα ('manifest token') occurs only here in the Greek Bible; its general significance is 'proof' or 'evidence' (not exemplum as the Vulgate, but rather *indiciu*m as Beza). The interpretation of the passage involves a two-fold question: (a) What is meant by 'the righteous judgement of God'? (b) What is the 'manifest token' (ἐνδειγμα) of it? The 'righteous judgement' is the future and final judgment referred to in vv. 6-10, based on the principle of compensation laid down by our Lord in Lk 16²⁵, that the sufferers of this world shall rest hereafter, and the persecutors shall suffer. It is not, however, suffering per se that can look forward to this future rest and joy but suffering that comes of faith, and is endured for the Kingdom of God (v. 9). This suffering, inspired by faith in God and endured with the conviction that He reigns and will ultimately exhibit His 'righteous judgement,' is itself the 'evidence,' the 'manifest token' of the coming of that judgment.

The word ἐνδειγμα as related to ἐνδείξις indicates strictly the concrete result in contrast with the process. In meaning, however, the two words are practically indistinguishable. This becomes apparent from a consideration of the passage in which the latter word occurs.

2. In Ph 1²³, St. Paul bids his converts be 'nothing affrighted by the adversaries: which is for them an evident token (ἐνδείξις) of perdition, but of your salvation, and that from God'; i.e. if the Philippians do not waver before the attacks of the adversaries, but maintain their ground, this steadfast attitude in itself will be an 'evident token,' a 'proof' that the adversaries will suffer defeat, while the Philippians will enjoy the Divine salvation. 'Ενδείξις, like ἐνδειγμα, is a Pauline word, and does not occur in the Greek Bible apart from his Epistles. It is an Attic law term and appears to mean, more distinctively, 'proof' that rests on an appeal to facts, as contrasted with mere logical demonstration. 'Token' coupled with the adjectives 'manifest' or 'evident' is an adequate rendering of either ἐνδειγμα or ἐνδείξις.

3. In 2 Th 3¹⁷, St. Paul, referring to the concluding salutation written by his own hand, says that it is the "token" (σημείον) in every epistle.* An exhaustive account of these interesting words would require a general examination of the epistolary methods of the contemporary Græco-Roman world. It must suffice here to say that St. Paul, in accordance with the common practice of his age, probably dictated his Epistles to an amanuensis (cf. Ro 16²²), adding a few words at the end, in his own writing, to vouch for the authenticity of the document. These authenticating words might consist of the bare salutation, as in the present passage, or might contain other words in addition (cf. 1 Co 16²², Col 4¹⁸, Gal 6¹¹ 17; Deissmann goes so far as to hold that in 2 Cor. the apostolic autograph begins at 10¹). The probability is that the Apostle would authenticate every Epistle by his autograph greeting at the end. In the cases where he calls special attention to the fact (1 Co 16²¹, Col 4¹⁸, and the present passage; cf. too Gal 6¹¹) he may have been anxious to certify the letter, as against any forgeries that might be circulating in his name. The use of the word σημείον here, followed by the elucidating οὕτως γράφω (almost like our English 'signed') is closely parallel to the σσημειωμαι (generally contracted into σσην.) with which many papyri and ostraca close. An alternative method of certifying a letter was to give to the bearer a 'token' (σύμβολον) as proof of his commission (cf. S. Witkowski, Epistula Privata, Leipzig, 1906, no. 25).

LITERATURE.—J. B. Lightfoot, Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1895, p. 135 f.; A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr.², do., 1911, p. 153; G. Milligan, St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians, do., 1908, Note A, 'St. Paul as a Letter-Writer', pp. 121-130.

DAWSON WALKER.

TOMB.—See SEPULCHRE.

TONGUE.—Physiologically, the tongue (γλῶσσα) is accessory both to the sense of taste and to the faculty of speech, but in the literature of apostolic Christianity (e.g. 1 Co 14⁹) it is connected with speech alone.* Here, as in primitive thought generally, to which the nervous system and the more minute structure of the tissues were unknown, the tongue was thought to possess an inherent faculty of speech, and the ethical qualities attaching to what was said were attributed to the organ itself (ethnic parallels in J. G. Frazer, GP,²

* Similarly, in the OT, taste is not specially connected with the tongue (Job 20¹² refers to the mouth as a whole), but with the palate (77). For the more scientific Greek view, see Aristotle, de Anima, ii. 10.

London, 1900, ii. 421, 422, note). As, in the OT, the tongue is said to concoct deceit (Ps 50¹⁹), and iniquity is said to be in it (Job 6³⁰) or under it (Ps 10⁷), so, in the NT, it is said to defile the whole body, to be a restless evil, full of deadly poison (Ja 3⁸). This vivid language is not adequately characterized by saying, with Mayor, 'The tongue is of course merely the innocent instrument employed by the free will of man' (The Epistle of St. James, London, 1910, p. 220). That which seems to us to be 'odd and exaggerated' in the language of St. James really marks the difference between ancient and modern psychology. When joy (Ac 2²⁶, 1 Clem. xviii. 15), arrogance (1 Clem. lvii. 2), deceit (Ro 3¹³, 1 Clem. xxxv. 8) are connected with the tongue, a psycho-physical idea underlies the usage, which springs from the conception of the organ as an integral part of the whole personality.

Early Christian ethics seems to have found it necessary to emphasize the control of the tongue; it is even made the sine qua non of religion (Ja 1²⁶) and the condition of life (1 P 3¹⁰, 1 Clem. xxii. 3; cf. Ps 34¹³). It is particularly urged on women (1 Clem. xxi. 7, Hermas, Vis. II. ii. 3). Evidently 'the scourge of the tongue' (1 Clem. lvi. 10; cf. Job 5²¹) was a very real evil in early Christian communities. We may also note the rebuke of hypocrisy and insincerity, as shown by the contrast between the inner life and its outer expression: 'let us not love in word, neither with the tongue' (1 Jn 3¹⁸). On confession itself great emphasis was naturally placed (Ro 14¹¹; see also art. MOUTH); it is felt that the truth of the inner life will instinctively utter itself in the testimony of the spoken word: 'As the fountain gushes out its water, so my heart gushes out the praise of the Lord and my lips utter praise to Him, and my tongue His psalms' (Odes of Solomon, xl. 4, 5).

The word 'tongue' occurs in a figurative sense in Ac 2³ (tongues of fire; cf. Is 5²⁴) and Rev 5⁸, etc. (=language). On the phenomena of glossolalia, which St. Paul regards chiefly as a sign to unbelievers (1 Co 14²¹), see artt. TONGUES, GIFT OF, and HOLY SPIRIT.

LITERATURE.—The Commentaries; see also artt. MAN and MOUTH.

H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

TONGUES, GIFT OF.—The chief authority in apostolic literature for the gift of speaking with tongues (γλωσσολαλία) is 1 Co 14. What happened on the day of Pentecost is described (Ac 2⁴) as speaking 'with other tongues' (λαλεῖν ἑτέραις γλώσσαις). The emphasis lies on the distinguishing ἑτέραις. The speakers spoke in languages other than their own: under the stress of spiritual emotion they lapsed into a foreign tongue; it was a special phenomenon peculiar to a special occasion. In Ac 10⁴⁶ 19⁶ the same phenomenon according to some authorities re-appears; but, as the distinguishing ἑτέραις is absent, it is open to us to regard these passages as parallel to 1 Co 14 and as indicating a phenomenon other than the Pentecostal.

What are the chief features of glossolalia in the Corinthian church? (1) Like 'prophecy,' 'speaking with tongues' was one of the gifts of the πνευματικοί: it was reckoned among the charisms as an inspiration or endowment originating with the Holy Spirit. (2) It was unintelligible to others (1 Co 14², 'no man understandeth'). (3) It was personal to the speaker, who edified himself and not the church (v. 4). (4) It is described in the case of an individual as γλώσσαις λαλεῖν (v. 3) and again in the singular γλώσση (vv. 13, 27) or ἐν γλώσσῃ (v. 19) (διὰ τῆς γλώσσης, v. 9, refers to the instrument of speech). It is evident that 'tongue' in this connexion is used of a specific utterance. It is an open question whether it was deliberate, on the ground that ordinary language was unsuitable for prayer or fellowship or testimony regarding the spiritual life, or was produced apart from the volition of the speaker under the influence of spiritual excitement or emotion. The evidence is in favour of the latter view: in other words, that the speaker was the subject of a Spirit-possession which moved him to speak 'with the tongues of men and of angels' (1 Co 13¹). The distinction in the latter passage points to an ecstasy which on occasions appeared to be more than human, as if the Spirit used a human medium for angelic speech (cf. 2 Co 12⁴). It was used only in prayer (1 Co 14¹⁻¹⁴). It was speech 'not unto men, but unto God.' To the outsider it appeared a species of soliloquy. Intellect or νοῦς was passive or ἀκαρπός (14¹⁴). There were many types of tongues (γένη γλωσσῶν 12^{10, 28}).

Undoubtedly St. Paul recognized it as a spiritual gift, but inferior, as, e.g., compared with prophecy. It was of no value to an unbeliever, because it could not lead to faith: cf. St. Paul's application of Is 28¹⁴ in 1 Co 14¹. Indeed, to both the outsider and the unbeliever (v. 23) it would appear a kind of madness. Nor to the believer was it of real benefit unless there was an interpretation (v. 13); and the speaker-with-tongues was counselled to pray for such an interpretation, as if his utterance per se were of little value. St. Paul was no believer in unintelligibility (v. 11): hence his emphasis on a εἰσημός ('capable of being expounded') λόγος (v. 9). He claimed the gift as one of his own (v. 18), but preferred five instructive words spoken with the understanding to ten thousand in a tongue (v. 19). If his words were not understood, it was like pouring words into the empty air (v. 9). Hence an interpretation was essential, though this was a gift by itself and was not necessarily exercised by the speaker-with-tongues himself.

It is obvious that the Corinthians were specially susceptible to such abnormal powers; with a considerable section of the church γλωσσολαλία was more popular than teaching and prophecy, in spite of the fact that as a purely subjective phenomenon it was of no value to the outsider (ιδιωτής), who could not even say 'Amen' to the formula of thanksgiving (v. 16). The common sense of St. Paul was undoubtedly tried by its ineffectuality ('your thanksgiving may be all right, but then—the other man is not edified!') [v. 17 in J. Moffatt, *The New Testament: A New Translation*³, London, 1914)].

There is no need to look for the origin of this experience among contemporary ethnic cults. That the atmosphere of the Hellenistic world of St. Paul was full of the phenomena of mysticism and ecstasy is clear to all students of the mystery-religions. But the ecstatic manifestations of the Corybantic or Dionysiac devotee or the worshipper of Isis and Osiris are simply parallels with the Corinthian Christian phenomena; they are not sources of it. Κορυβαντιάδ (to use Philo's word, Quis Rer. Div. Heres, 69, quoted by Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions, p. 66) is a convenient generic term for Divine possession as found in the revivals of ancient and modern religions. To Huxley the Salvation Army appeared to be a kind of 'Corybantic Christianity,' judged by its external phenomena of religious excitement and enthusiasm. At the same time, the phenomena that have accompanied revivals such as early Methodism, the Salvation Army, and the recent Welsh revival have rarely been of the type of γλωσσολαλία: there have been sobs and ejaculations, but not unintelligible continuous speech. In a valuable appendix to his *Earlier Epistles of St. Paul*² (London, 1914) K. Lake ('Glossolalia and Psychology,' ch. iv. app. ii.) finds traces of glossolalia in the Testament of Job and in the magical papyri, e.g. the Leiden papyrus, where Hermes is invoked in unintelligible symbols. The use of strange words in magical formulas or charms which is to be found in circles alien to the apostolic communities may properly be adduced as parallels to glossolalia; but it would appear that glossolalia speedily vanished from apostolic Christianity. There is no reference to it in the Apostolic Fathers. The passages quoted from Irenæus (Hær. v. vi. 1) and Tertullian (c. Marc. v. 8) are not convincing proofs that the practice was in vogue in their own times, while Chrysostom in the 4th cent. is unable to explain what its real nature was. Lake notes the case of the Camisards, a sect of French Protestants in the early 18th cent., who are known under stress of religious emotion to have 'uttered exhortations in good French, although, in their ordinary state of consciousness, they were incapable of speaking anything but the Romance patois of the Cevennes' (loc. cit., p. 245). A clearer parallel to glossolalia is the more familiar case of the Irvingites, whose ecstatic utterances were an unintelligible jargon. Lake's examination of the phenomena as a whole demonstrates that from the standpoint of psychology there is nothing in itself unreasonable in uncontrolled or uncontrollable speech. When the subliminal consciousness is called into play or energy by religious emotion, there results a paraphasia which may take the form of speaking languages previously not known by the speaker, or uttering speech unintelligible to the hearer. The whole subject is invested with renewed interest by the modern study of religious pathology and psychology. It would now appear that speaking with tongues, like so many other phenomena of the spiritual consciousness, whether in the records of the Scriptures or in non-canonical writings or in the general annals of the Christian life in all ages, is capable of reasonable explanation on psychological lines, even if all the data fail to yield a satisfactory meaning to the inquirer.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works named under GIFTS and PROPHECY, the following may be consulted: K. Lake, *The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul*², London, 1914; H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions, London, 1913; J. Weiss, Der erste Korintherbrief, Göttingen, 1910; F. G. Hencke, 'The Gift of Tongues and Related Phenomena at the Present Day,' in AJTh xiii. [1909] 193-206; W. James, *The Varieties of Religious Experience*², London, 1903, lects. ix. and x.; E. Mosiman, Das Zungenreden, geschichtlich und psychologisch untersucht, Tübingen, 1911 (contains an excellent bibliography). R. MARTIN POPE.

TOPAZ (τοπάζιον).—Topaz is the ninth foundation-stone of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21²⁰). The topaz of modern mineralogy was almost unknown to the ancients, and the stone denoted by τοπάζιον was probably that variety of olivine which is now termed chrysolite or peridot. It was found in the τοπάζιος νῆσος of the Red Sea. Pliny (HN xxxvii. 8) speaks of it as held in very high estimation, 'e videnti genere,' and Strabo (XVI. iv. 6) says:

'The topaz is a translucent stone, sparkling with a golden lustre. It is not easy to distinguish in the daytime, because it is outshone, but at night it is visible to those who collect it. Placing a vessel over the spot as a mark, they dig (the stones) up by day. A body of men is appointed and maintained by the kings of Egypt to guard the place where they are found, and to superintend the collection of them.'

This ancient topaz was soft and easily engraved: 'eadem sola nobilium limam sentit' (Pliny, loc. cit.). The modern topaz, on the contrary, is nearly as hard as a diamond. JAMES STRAHAN.

TORMENT.—The noun 'torment' is the tr., in all passages except one, of βασανισμός, a Gr. word found in the NT only in Rev. In 1 Jn 4¹⁸ κόλασις is so tr. in AV (RV 'punishment'). The cognate verb βασανίζω is rendered 'torment' in four out of six passages, the exceptions being Rev 12⁹ (AV 'pained,' RV 'in pain') and 2 P 2⁸ (AV and RV 'vexed'). In AV κακοχέμαι is in one of the two cases of its occurrence rendered 'torment' (He 11³⁷: RV 'evil entreat'). In 4 Ezr. 'torment' is the rendering of cruciamantum in ix. 9, xiii. 38 (AV and RV), of cruciatu in vii. 67 (RV), of tormentum in vii. 36, 38 (RV), of supplicium in vii. 66, 80, 84, 86 (RV), of cruciamantum in ix. 12 (RV; AV 'pain'). Cruciare is tr. 'torment' in xiii. 38 (AV and RV) and torquere in v. 34 (RV).

Torment is physical, or mental, or both. Of mental torment we have instances in 2 P 2⁸, where Lot is said to have 'vexed' (RVm 'tormented') his soul with the lawless deeds of his neighbours; in Rev 11¹⁰: 'These two prophets tormented them that dwell on the earth'; in 4 Ezr. v. 34: 'My reins torment (torquent) me every hour while I labour to comprehend the way of the Most High'; and in vii. 64: 'By reason of this we are tormented (cruciamur), because we perish and know it.'

Of physical torment in this life we have a few instances. In one passage the pangs of childbirth are likened to 'torment'. The woman arrayed as the sun was 'travailing in birth, and in pain to be delivered' (βασανίζουμένη τέκειν, Rev 12²). Such men as have not the seal of God on their forehead are tormented by the scorpions five months; 'and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when it striketh a man' (Rev 9⁵). Of scorpions G. E. Post says (HDB, s.v.), 'Their sting is very painful, frequently causing a night of agony, which nothing but a large dose of morphine will assuage.' The torments of Babylon the Great consist of plagues, death, mourning, famine, and burning with fire (Rev 18⁷⁻¹⁸), especially the last (18¹⁰⁻¹⁸). The heroes of Israel were 'tormented' (He 11³⁷, RV 'evil entreated').

To torments after death we have fairly numerous references in Rev. and 4 Ezra. Those who worship the Beast and his image shall be tormented with fire and brimstone; and the smoke of their torment shall ascend for ever and ever, there being no rest for them day or night (Rev 14⁹⁻¹¹). A similar punishment awaits the devil, the Beast, and the False Prophet, who, after being cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever (Rev 20¹⁰). Those who have cast away despitefully the ways of God 'shall dwell in torments' (4 Ezr. ix. 9). Those who have scorned God's law must know it (or Him) after death by torment (ix. 12). The Messiah shall show the evil multitude 'the torments wherewith they shall be tormented, which are likened unto a flame' (xiii. 38). It is better with beasts than with men, for they know not of torments promised them after death (vii. 66). Fire and torments await the wicked (vii. 38). The apostates shall be tormented (vii. 72). The torments begin in the Intermediate Abode (vii. 75, 80, 86, 99), and are increased after the Final Judgment (vii. 36, 38, 84). The pit of torment is synonymous with the furnace of hell (vii. 36). Other instances of future torment are found in 2 Bar 36¹⁰⁻¹¹, 51⁶ 52³ 54¹⁴, 55², 75⁶ 59², 11 78⁶ 83⁸ 85⁹.

LITERATURE.—R. H. Charles, The Apocalypse of Baruch, London, 1896; P. Volz, Jüdische Eschatologie, Tübingen, 1903, § 39; Libri Apocryphi Veteris Testamenti, ed. O. F. Fritzsche, Leipzig, 1871; DCG, s.v. 'Torment.'

WILLIAM WATSON.

TOWN-CLERK.—The town-clerk of Ephesus (Ac 19³⁵⁻⁴¹), who displays tact and also points out the illegality of the whole proceedings of the crowd, with the proper means of redress if there be a real grievance, was a typical official of a Greek city with the Athenian type of constitution. In cities like Ephesus, which were the headquarters of a Roman governor, the town-clerk appears to have acted also as a kind of intermediary between the proconsul (with his staff) and the municipal authorities. The Acts narrative is in fact a precious document for the understanding of the town-clerk's position. With the advent of the Empire the free democratic constitution of most provincial cities was suspended. The assemblies could be held only with the permission of the governor, who was an Imperial official (cf. 19³⁸⁻⁴¹). No longer could a citizen bring a proposal before the assembly personally, but only through the presiding official. The old council of annually elected citizens remained, as did the old magistracies. These offices were held only by the rich, as no salary was attached to them. The στρατηγός (see MAGISTRATE, PRÆTOR) and the γραμματεὺς τοῦ δήμου formed the magisterial board of the city. Every measure to be brought before the people must first have had their approval and support. These magistrates seem to have presided over the assembly in rotation. A decree passed by the assembly required the confirmation of the governor before it could become law. The high importance of the town-clerk appears from the fact that his name alone is frequently given as a means of dating a decree, and, if it is his second period of office, inscriptions indicate that in the usual way. An inscription of Branchidæ in the same province of Asia as Ephesus (Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum, no. 921) provides the best illustration of the import of this riotous assembly in Ephesus (C. G. Brandis, in Pauly-Wissowa, ii. [1896] col. 1551). A citizen of Branchidæ in 48 B.C. is celebrated on it as having gone on an embassy to Rome and restored to the people of Branchidæ their former assembly and laws. Under the Empire privileges were apt to be taken away from cities if they were abused. This had happened in the case of Branchidæ, and only the intervention of a prominent citizen, who took the journey to Rome and doubtless spent a large sum of money, was able to recover their old rights for the populace. So in Ephesus and elsewhere the local officials were most careful to avoid punishment from the Roman authorities on account of assemblies illegally summoned.

LITERATURE.—O. Schulthess, s.v. γραμματεὺς in Pauly-Wissowa, vii. [1912] cols. 1708-1780; J. Menadier, Qua condicione Ephesii usi sint inde ab Asia in formam provincie redacta, Berlin, 1880; H. Swoboda, Die griechischen Volksbeschlüsse, Leipzig, 1890; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 231 ff., 305.

A. SOUTER.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.—1. Introductory.—

Trade and commerce occupied almost as great a place in the life of ancient communities as they do in modern times. Indeed, apart from such developments as the railway, the steamship, the telegraph, and the telephone have introduced, the chief difference between the two periods might be found in the somewhat changed attitude of the leisured and professional classes towards them. The attitude which the philosopher Plato adopts towards manual industries as βάσανοι, 'base, ignoble, vulgar,' was only too faithfully followed by the whole class of writers, Greek and Roman. It is wonderful how long the absurd hypocrisy has persisted in Europe, by which the very processes which bring the necessaries of life within our reach, and the very sources from which directly or indirectly many draw their income, are despised.

It would have been hardly necessary to mention this attitude except for the reason that it affords a ready explanation of the scant mention which trade and commerce receive in the ancient authors. The extreme meagreness of our information makes it impossible to give any comprehensive or detailed account of the subject. The inscriptions are here more valuable than the authors, and even they as a rule make mention of commercial matters rather by accident than of set purpose. The everyday experience of life is not as a rule that with which writers earlier than our own period have thought fit to deal. The obvious is avoided, and we are often left to inference more or less hazardous. There is one way, however, in which the permeating influence of trade makes itself everywhere felt, and that is in the language of metaphor. The Roman writers, for example, constantly employ metaphors from book-keeping.

The Jewish attitude to trade was altogether healthier than that of their Western neighbours. It was the custom to have every Hebrew child, whatever his station, taught a handicraft. The advantage of such a system from the mere health point of view, as a prevention of exaggerated mental development, is obvious. The prudential gain, under altered circumstances, is no less so. St. Paul, though a Pharisee, had been taught the trade of making tents out of rough Cilician material, and this enabled him to be independent of his churches. The valuable fruit of this independence was seen in his power to rebut charges that were levelled at fellow-apostles, who accepted a lawful material recompense for evangelistic work. The true Christian attitude has always given labour, however humble, an honourable place. It could hardly be otherwise, seeing that the Master Himself was a carpenter by trade, and that a large proportion of the early converts gained a livelihood from manual labour, whether as free men or as slaves.

2. In the NT.—The NT contains a considerable body of references to trade in one aspect or another, some of which may be mentioned here, while others are reserved for later mention. St. Paul (2 Co 2¹⁷) contrasts himself with the many who 'hawk (make merchandise of, καπηλεύονται) the word of God.' 'Christ has bought us (ἐξηγόρασεν) from the law's curse' (Gal 3¹³; cf. 4⁵, 1 Co 6²⁰ 7^{23, 29}). we are advised 'to buy up,' 'make a market of' (ἐξαγοραζόμενοι) the opportunity (Eph 5¹⁶, Col 4⁵; cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 148f.). One of St. Paul's favourite words is λογίζομαι, 'reckon,' 'calculate' (literally) (cf. Ro 4^{3, 4}; of some forty instances in the NT, only seven belong to other authors; cf. the rarer word ἐλογόω, ἐλόγησεν, Ro 5¹², Philem¹⁸). He constantly uses πλοῦτος, πλουτέω, πλουτίζω (e.g. 2 Co 8⁹, 1 Co 1⁵, Ro 2⁴, Eph 1⁷) of spiritual wealth; cf. θησαυρίζω (Ro 2⁵). A metaphor from the testing of coin, etc., is δοκιμος, 'approved,' and cognates (Ro 14¹⁸, 2 Co 10¹⁸, etc.); a metaphor from the earnest, the large portion of the price paid as a first instalment of a debt, is ἀρραβών (2 Co 1²² 5⁵, Eph 1¹⁴), and βεβαίωσις, βεβαίωσις (1 Co 1⁶, Ph 1⁷) are supposed by some to be connected with surety. Partnership in business is suggested by κοινωνός (2 Co 1⁷, etc.), κοινωνία, μετοχή (2 Co 6¹⁴ 8^{9, 12}, Ph 1⁵), συνκοινωνός, συνκοινωνέω, συνμετοχος (Eph 3⁶ 5^{7, 11}, Ph 4¹⁴, Ro 11¹⁷). Profit, gain, is suggested by κέρδος (Ph 3⁷), by the constant use of περισσος and its derivatives, by πλεονάζω, πλεονεξία (2 Co 8¹⁵ 9⁵, etc.), and perhaps by καρπος. Indeed, the language of St. Paul especially constantly suggests a mental background of trade and commerce, only natural in one brought up in great cities like Tarsus and Jerusalem. (On the subject of St. Paul's metaphors, see J. S. Howson's Metaphors of St. Paul, new ed., London, 1883, and W. M. Ramsay's Luke the Physician and Other Studies in the History of Religion, London, 1908, ch. x.)

3. Trade and the Roman army.—Trade in the Roman Empire both preceded and followed the eagles of the Roman army. That it preceded is a natural inference from the invariable practice of traders, who seek for every market that they can get, even at great personal risk. The ancient authors naturally say little of this phase of activity. But the facilities for greater trade activity opened up by the legions enormously increased its volume. The armies helped trade not only by keeping the population of a conquered country in subjection, but also by the building of those splendid military roads which, constructed for military purposes, benefited trade no less, by the rapidity and the security of movement which they made possible. The requirements of the army itself also brought trade to remote parts of the Empire. The soldiers were in time of peace citizens accustomed to the use of certain commodities and comforts. Traders, in order to supply these, settled at the armed camps and outposts, and the rows of their shops helped to convert the camps into towns. They at the same time served as valuable agents of Romanization, and helped the provincials to become Romans, in externals at least, in a very short time. Fifty years after Gallia Narbonensis became a province, all the business done by the provincials was done through the Roman merchants. The vast numbers of these in the rich Roman province of Asia as early as the beginning of the 1st cent. B.C. are revealed by the statistics of the Italians murdered by Mithradates, variously given as 80,000 and 150,000. Later evidence with regard to Asia points the same way. So with regard to Africa in the same century, our authorities show the abundance of Roman merchants, bankers, and commercial companies. In London, about the time of the death of St. Paul, the merchant class was already large, though the province Britain was then new. The importance of such merchants is also seen from the fact that, being Roman citizens, they constituted the aristocracy of every provincial community in which they lived.

4. Inter-provincial trade.—Not only were Italian traders to be found in all parts of the Empire, but provincials from one part are found established in trade in another part. At a place like Aquileia, a Knotenpunkt and distributing centre of commerce between the North-East provinces, Italy, the East, and Africa, there was a cosmopolitan population. But the Orientals were the great traders. The great Phœnician and Syrian cities had factories in Italian cities like Puteoli and Rome. Alexandrian commerce found ready markets in the great coast towns of the Black Sea. The officer who had charge of St. Paul found an Alexandrian trading vessel at Myra in Lycia (Ac 27⁶). The graves of Syrian merchants in particular are to be found all over the Roman Empire, and there is abundant evidence of their importance as bankers in the 5th and 6th cent. records of Gaul. There is, strangely, no evidence for commercial settlements of Jews.

5. Coins and bills.—As mediums of exchange coins and bills were in universal use, and the system of banking had reached a very considerable development. The coinage system of the Roman Empire was based on a settlement made between the senate and Augustus (15-11 B.C.). The right of coining gold and silver in Rome was reserved to the Emperor, but the senate was authorized to issue copper and brass coins, with the letters SC (= senatus consulto) stamped on them. The governors of senatorial provinces had the right to issue coins, which after A.D. 6 bore the portrait, not of the governor, but of a member or members of the Imperial family. The weight of the aureus, or gold coin, was reduced by Augustus from $\frac{1}{4}$ of a pound (=126 grammes), the weight of Julius Cæsar's, to $\frac{1}{2}$ (=120 grammes). The weight of the silver denarius remained as before, 60 grammes.

In the senatorial coinage brass (aurichalcum, used to render χαλκολεῖανφ in certain Latin versions of Rev 21⁸, copper alloyed with 20 per cent of zinc) was used as well as copper. The supervision of the senatorial coinage was nominally under the charge of three commissioners of senatorial rank, tres viiri auro argento ære flando feriundo ('for the melting and striking of gold, silver, copper'). The Imperial mint was a branch of the Imperial household, supervised by the a rationibus, or Keeper of the Privy Purse. The coinage from the Roman mint was inadequate to meet the needs of the great Empire, and was supplemented by other issues, which were also legal tender. Settlements of Roman citizens outside Italy (coloniae) might, if the Imperial permission were granted, issue bronze coins, a privilege which apparently was withdrawn about A.D. 70. A number of cities and unions of cities (κοινά) in the Eastern provinces were allowed to issue coins. Syrian Antioch and Cæsarea in Cappadocia (now Kaisariéh) issued large numbers of silver coins, and the cistophorus of republican times (cf. Cic. Att. II. xvi. 4) in Asia was replaced by a coin of the value of three Roman denarii. An enormous quantity of bronze was also coined in the East. The needs of the East were further in great part provided for by an Imperial mint at Alexandria. Besides these, smaller Imperial mints existed throughout the provinces, and the senate had a mint at Syrian Antioch; Lugudunum (Lyons), for example, served as a mint for the Gallic provinces.

An aureus was equivalent in value to 25 denarii. Under Nero both were reduced in weight, the aureus to $\frac{1}{2}$ of a pound, and the denarius to $\frac{1}{8}$ of a pound; the quality of the denarius was also debased. The victoriatus (so called because it has Victory crowning a trophy as reverse) deserves mention. It was a silver coin, originally $\frac{1}{4}$ of a pound in weight, in reality a Greek drachma, adopted by the Romans for purposes of trade with the Greeks of Southern Italy. Half victoriati and one double victoriatus have been found. Its weight was at least twice reduced. The senatorial coins in the baser metals, above mentioned, were the brass sestertius (four asses), brass dupondius (two asses), the copper as, and the copper semitis. The original value of the denarius was, as the name indicates, ten asses. The denarius was the standard coin in the Empire, and in it all legal payments were made.

6. Bonds and bankers.—The bond (syngrapha) and the banker (trapezita, tarpessita [Plaut.]) were Greek institutions, as their Greek names show (συγγραφή, τραπεζίτης; cf. Mt 23⁷, Mk 11¹⁵, and ||). In early Roman times a man's word was his bond. Contracts (sponsiones, stipulationes) were verbal, made in the presence of witnesses, and not written down. The whole system of credit had been elaborated by the Greeks of the Hellenistic period. The universality of the Greek language was accompanied by the Greek commercial system. The Romans readily adapted themselves to it. Syngrapha was used to indicate a bond, permutatio a bill of exchange, and perscriptio a cheque or banker's draft. The men who engaged in financial operations were called negotiatores, and are originally to be distinguished from the mercatores, merchant princes; but in Imperial times the distinction became obliterated. Two instances of the value of the negotiatores may be given. Cicero, in spite of his good government of the large province of Cilicia (the name included in his time Cilicia, Cilicia Tracheia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Pisidia, Isaurica, Lycæonia, Phrygia, and part of Galatia [Ramsay, Historical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, London, 1899, map opposite to p. 103]), was able to acquire about £18,000, which he deposited at Ephesus on his return journey (Correspondence of M. T. Cicero, ed. R. Y. Tyrrell and L. C. Purser, 7 vols., Dublin, 1879-1901, vol. iii. p. xxxvi). If he had not been so anxious for a triumph he could doubtless have entered Rome and cashed a cheque there. As it was, Pompey annexed Cicero's savings for the civil war. It is highly probable, also, that the great collections of the Pauline churches in the four provinces (Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, Achaia, Ac 20, etc.) for the poor Christians at Jerusalem were conveyed there, not in coin, but in the form of bank drafts on Jerusalem. The risk of conveying large sums by land and sea was considerable.

7. Profits.—With regard to the profits made by Roman traders not much can be said. Friedlander (Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire, i. 305) estimates that modern profits of European trade range between 10 per cent in Europe and 66 per cent in Japan, and is of opinion that Roman profits must have been still greater. The state of universal peace and the security of travel in the 1st cent. must certainly have conduced to the quicker circulation of money and the expansion of trade.

8. Travel.—In modern times correspondence and advertisement play a much larger part than they did in ancient times. If even we, however, have been unable to dispense with the personal interview (and indeed German foreign trade has been built up mainly by the persuasiveness and resource of German commercial travellers), in the 1st cent. it played an important part. The merchant prince himself made long journeys by sea and land from end to end of the Empire to sell his wares. Horace makes several allusions to the hardship of constant travel undergone by them in the pursuit of wealth (Carm. I. i. 15-16, xxxi. 10-11, III. xxiv. 39-40, Serm. I. i. 4-6, 16-17, Ep. I. i. 45, xvi. 71, Ars Poet. 117). The mercator seems to have impressed him as one of the greatest of fools. Other authorities are in accord with him as to the daring and tireless activity of the class.

One or two specimen voyages may be referred to in illustration. The best known case is that of a merchant Flavius Zeuxis of Hierapolis in Phrygia, an inland city, be it observed, who voyaged from Asia to Rome seventy-two times (CIG, 3920), taking the dangerous route by the south of the Peloponnese on each occasion, instead of the easier method of trans-shipment over the Isthmus of Corinth. A certain Gaius Octavius Agathopus at Puteoli mentions that place as his final home after many wearisome journeys East and West (CIL x. 2792). The Black Sea ports, Britain, and Ireland were known to such traders. The love of Christ led St. Paul to take the same risks as the merchants took for less worthy motives. Besides the classic account of the great voyage in Ac 27, we learn from 2 Co 11³⁻²⁶, which of course antedates, and does not post-date, as Pelagius imagined, the narrative in Acts, that St. Paul had suffered shipwreck three times, and had spent a night and a day in the deep, also that he had been in perils in (on) the sea.

9. Merchant ships.—There were, of course, various kinds of merchant vessels. There were the heavy merchantmen, or onuraria naves, the ponto and the corbita, of which the first appears to have been Gallic in origin (cf. Cæs. de Bell. Civ. III. xxix. 3, xl. 5). A mosaic found in the province of Africa shows us a ponto with a mainmast and a square sail, and with a foremast which appears to be dipped; it is also provided with long planks (wales) outside the bulwarks on either side, to protect the steering paddles. The stern is sharply pointed. The corbita, or basket-shaped vessel (from corbis, 'basket'), was, as its name indicates, a much dumpier structure and a very heavy craft. These two kinds of vessel would of course be more useful for river traffic. Lighter craft, more suitable for the open sea, were the actuaria (from ago) and myoparo. They are represented in the mosaic referred to as having a single mast and oars in addition to sail. They were designed for rapid rowing, and had a bank of oars, numbering from ten to thirty. Their character made them useful as dispatch-boats, and we hear of them as also used by pirates. They, however, used the myoparo (μυοπάρων, from μῦς, 'rowing-boat,' and παρόν, 'light ship') more frequently. Other craft which may be mentioned are the fishing-boat, very much like our own salmon-coble, called horeia, horicula, and carrying nets; the stlatta, greater in breadth than in length, used for river traffic; and the celox, a light rowing-boat.

10. Roman docks, etc.—Rome was itself a harbour-town, the quays for landing merchandise being at the foot of the Aventine Mount on the Tiber, and called the Emporium (ἐμπορίον). This quarter became more and more covered with large warehouses (horrea). Much, perhaps most, of the traffic which came to Rome by water did not come in ships direct. The great sea-harbour of Rome was at the mouth of the Tiber, at Ostia (lit. 'mouths'). Ostia is now a mile or two from the sea, owing to the silt thrown up throughout centuries by the yellow river (fluvius Tiberis), but the thorough excavation which the site is now undergoing at the hands of the Italian Government has revealed its importance. Horrea were long buildings bounded by a street on each of the longer sides, and divided by a wall longitudinally into two rows of store-rooms, placed back to back. Sometimes they formed the boundaries of a platea (square). At Ostia they were used to receive the heavy goods, pending their transportation up the Tiber on barges to Rome. From the warehouses in Rome, which were partly public and partly private, and not all situated in the Emporium quarter, the goods found their way to the tabernæ (shops), and thus to the private purchasers. There must have been large warehouses at Alexandria and Puteoli in connexion with the great corn traffic between Egypt and Italy, as well as at other ports (cf., in fact, the name Emporiæ, of a Greek city in N.E. Spain). We find instances of factories in the West belonging to Easterns. For example, various Syrian and Phœnician cities had factories at Puteoli, Rome, Naples, Portus, Ravenna. The Alexandrians had them at Perinthus (modern Eregli) in Thrace, and at Tomis (near modern Constantza) on the Black Sea.

11. Fairs.—The great fairs held in various parts of the Empire played their part in the dissemination of trade. The Mysteries of Eleusis near Athens and of Samothrace, the Feasts of Dionysus at Argos and of Pythian Apollo at Delphi, the Isthmian Games at Corinth, and the Olympian Games in Elis (Peloponnese), all attracted countless visitors and stimulated trade, being the ancient counterparts of the Stourbridge, Leipzig, and Nijni Novgorod fairs of more modern times. Thus the pursuit of athletics and of religion benefited trade.

12. Customs dues.—The harbour or customs dues in our period are not known. They were probably not high. The Empire was divided into large customs districts, and an ad valorem duty was charged on goods passing from one of these to another. A uicesima ($\frac{1}{5}$, i.e. 5 per cent) duty is known for Sicily and Africa, and was probably general; a quadragesima ($\frac{1}{4}$, i.e. 2½ per cent) duty was also in use, for example, in the province of Asia, in the Bithynia-Pontus and Paphlagonia group, and in the 'Three Gauls' (Gallia Lugudunensis, Gallia Belgica, Gallia Aquitania).

13. Trade with distant countries.—(a) Egypt and India.—Some account may now be given in detail of the distant countries with which trade was carried on by the Mediterranean peoples. Egypt holds a very important place. Not only did that country supply a third of the corn consumed in Italy; it was also the home of the papyrus plant, so extensively used as writing material. From there also were exported various building stones (cf. Stat. Silvæ II. ii. 86, Assouan), linen, glass, embroidered stuffs, etc. It was, further, the way to East India, the source of pepper, pearls, etc. From Alexandria the journey to Coptos up the Nile took twelve days, with a favourable wind. At Coptos the goods were laden on camels and Berenice-Troglodytice to the S.E. was reached in eleven or twelve days. Berenice with its warehouses was a centre for Arabia, India, and Ethiopia, and the trade-routes were guarded by Roman garrisons, which had also dug wells. Doubtless this was the route taken by the eunuch of the Candace mentioned in Ac 8. Thirty days were required to go from Berenice to Ocelis in Arabia at the south end of the Red Sea, or to Cane on the south coast of Arabia. From Cane it was forty days to Muziris on the coast of Malabar, whence goods went to Barace (Barygaza), their ultimate destination. The unloading and loading took little time, and in December they started the return journey. The whole journey from Alexandria to Barace and back took six months. From South Arabia, especially through Adane (Aden), came incense (cf. 'grana turis unius assis, Arabicæ arboris lacrimas,' Tert. Apol. 30) and other perfumes, spices, and precious stones. From the Great Lakes, East Africa, and Somaliland ivory was brought via Abyssinia to the Nile.

(b) Syria.—Syria was itself an important centre of production. The purple dyes of Tyre and Sidon are constantly referred to in ancient literature (cf. Stat. Silvæ III. ii. 139, 'qua pretiosa Tyros rubeat, qua purpura suco Sidoniis iterata cadis,' and especially Mayor on Juvenal, Sat. i. 27). Artistic work in glass was also associated with Sidon, and throughout Syria fine linen (Lk 16¹⁹, Rev 18¹²⁻¹⁶ 19¹⁴) was woven from the flax of the country. But Syria's chief significance was as a halfway house for the merchandise of the Further East. In addition to the Indian route mentioned in the last paragraph, goods from India could be brought by the port of Charax at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, by the Euphrates, and then by the caravan route passing through Palmyra to Damascus. The importance of Palmyra (cf. W. Wright, An Account of Palmyra and Zenobia, London, 1895) was very great. The tariff levied by that city brought it the greatest material prosperity (cf. Gibbon's Decline and Fall, vol. i. ch. xi., ed. J. B. Bury, London, 1905, p. 306). Another trade-route which passed through Syria was that by the head of the Arabian Gulf to Petra through Bostra to Damascus or, for southern Syria, to the port of Gaza.

(c) China.—Silk from China also reached Italy in part through Syria. Yellow silk from Cos (Cosæ uestes) and from Assyria (bombycinæ uestes) made from the cocoon of the wild silk-worm (bombyx) was the first kind known to the Romans, and references to these products abound from the beginning of the Augustan Age to the seventh decade of the 1st cent. A.D. But this sort was ousted from the market by the superior pure white silk of China (sericæ [from Seres, the Chinese] or holosericæ ['all-silk'] uestes [to the examples of the latter word in Lewis and Short's dictionary add pseudo-Augustine, Sermons, cclii. 1, cclxii. 1]).

Raw silk and silk thread were also exported. Four trade-routes brought the silk products of China to Rome: (a) the overland route from Northern China through Chinese Turkestan to Bactria, by the Caspian gates to Media and the Euphrates; (b) a branch of this, crossing the Pamirs from Kashgar and descending the valley of the Indus to Karachi, thence by sea to the Persian Gulf; (c) from Central China through Tibet and Nepal to Palibothra on the Ganges, down the Ganges, and then by sea to Egypt; (d) from Cattigara (Tonkin) (Jones, A Companion to Roman History, p. 320).

(d) The Baltic coast.—The amber trade opened up the north of Europe and the Baltic coast. From the latter district it was brought to Italy by a route which eventually passed through Carnuntum, an important military station (now Petronell, near Vienna) on the upper Danube. The discovery of various hoards of Roman coins and articles in Northern Europe suggests that there was a trade in other commodities as well. Certainly timber, iron ore, and gold were obtained in the northern provinces.

(e) Gaul and Britain.—The Romans had entered Gaul, even before Cæsar's conquest of it, from the old province of Gallia Narbonensis up the Rhone valley from Marseilles (later from Arles), and from Italy by the Great St. Bernard Pass. A cask of Italian or Narbonese wine bought a Gaulish slave, and it seems to have been chiefly wine that the Roman traders brought. Gallic clothing and pottery were also bought by the Romans. At the other northern corner of the Empire, at Dioscurias or Sebastopolis in the Caucasus, there was a great trading centre, at which the products of Southern Russia were exchanged. The lead-mines of the Mendip hills and North Wales were worked by the Romans. Iron was extracted in the Weald and the Forest of Dean, and gold in West Wales. A trade-route existed from Britain to the mouth of the Loire. But the most important country for the supply of minerals was Spain, from which copper, lead, silver, gold, and tin were obtained. From this short account, pieced together from scanty data, it is difficult to realize the tremendous commercial activity of Rome in every direction open to her.

14. Centres of distribution.—Not much is known of the distribution of the goods. Juvenal's words, 'iam pridem Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes' (Sat. iii. 62), are typical of the whole Empire. At Rome was the greatest distributing mart of the world. There everything that could be bought for money was obtainable. Other great distributing centres were Corinth (the most natural explanation of 'they of Chloe' [1 Co 11]) is that they were business agents of a house trading between Corinth and Ephesus), Alexandria, Syrian Antioch, Arles (now Arles). Alexandria was a distributing centre for paper, spices, etc. Tin was in stock almost everywhere, though found only in the West in a natural state. Amber was to be found everywhere. Iron goods—for example, Roman-made weapons—were universally known. The Italian pattern of stewpan or casserole has been found in various parts of Northern Europe. Greek pottery from the islands of the Ægean was sold widely, but Western was no less important (the classic work is that by J. Dechelette, Les Vases céramiques ornés de la Gaule romaine—Narbonnaise, Aquitaine et Lyonnaise, 2 vols., Paris, 1904; see also the literature referred to in P. Gwynne, The Guadalquivir: its Personality, its People, and its Associations, London, 1912). Each maker had his own hall-mark; the wares of Saguntum, Arretium, Mutina, Lyons, and other centres can thus be traced over the Western Empire. So also Alexandrian glass articles, Syrian fine linen fabrics, Italian wines, sausages, and hams, African carpets, Gaulish, Numidian, Rhætian, and British clothing, Tarentine wool, Cartagena fish-sauce, etc., were on sale in the most unlikely places.

15. Articles of commerce.—(a) Slaves.—But it is now time to pass to a more detailed account of the articles of commerce themselves. The most important of them were the slaves. Of these some of course were born in the house (uerna, ancilla, oikéris, oikéris) of mothers who were already house-slaves, and had for fathers either the master or another slave. By law every such child was a new slave for the master. But the household of slaves was also, and perhaps mainly, added to by purchase. All slaves were valued as representing so much capital, as well as for the service they rendered. Hardly a household existed without one, and no person of the slightest consequence would go out into the street unattended by one or more slaves. There were also grades of slaves, the more important having at their beck and call under-slaves, uicarii. They also varied in standing and cost according to the purpose for which they were bought. For instance, the beautiful boy-slave (puer delicatus; Stat. Silvae II. i. vi., laments for the death of such), as a luxury of the rich, sometimes, if not always, used for immoral purposes (cf. μαλακοί, 1 Co 6⁹), was exceedingly costly. But the rough farm labourer class of slave could be obtained cheap. Town service was much more highly appreciated by the slave class than country service, and a refractory town slave could think of no greater punishment than to be sent to his master's country estate (Horace, Sat. II. vii. 118). The slave born in the house grew up with the master's lawful children, and thus a close relationship was established between them, a sign of which is the fact that the house-slave referred to his master by his 'Christian' name, prænomen. The earliest purchased slaves were obtained directly through war, for the word mancipium comes from manu capere, but later through the medium of the slave market, a regular institution of all the ancient States; slaves reached this slave market generally as booty taken in war. Every successful war in which Rome took part brought in a number of captives as an essential part of the booty. After a victory or the capture of a town, thousands of captives were sold by the quaestor, either on the spot or at the nearest market. Another source of slaves was the robbery of defenceless persons committed by pirates and highwaymen, but this source had greatly dried up by the 1st cent. A.D. Different nationalities were associated with different aptitudes and held in various esteem. Phrygians, like Onesimus (in Philemon), were little esteemed, and were commonly employed to wait at table. Many interesting facts with regard to slaves must be omitted here, as we are concerned with them merely as articles of merchandise.

(b) Wild beasts.—The purchase of beasts for gladiatorial shows has some interest owing to the (metaphorical) expression of St. Paul (ἐθροπομάχῃσιν, 1 Co 15³²) and the experience of Ignatius, who was condemned to face the beasts in the arena at Rome (Ignatius, Ep. ad Rom.; Irenæus, adv. Hær. v. xxviii. 4). Beasts wild and tame were exhibited, or hunted by trained men. The wild beasts fought with one another or with men. The animals appearing in such exhibitions were elephants, lions, panthers, leopards, and bears from foreign parts, especially from Africa, besides stags, boars, and bears from Europe. Later in becoming known to the Romans were the hippopotamus, crocodile, rhinoceros, anthropoid ape, Gallic lynx, giraffe, tiger, zebra, elk, and bison.

Governors levied these contributions on the subjects of Rome, as is shown by the reiterated appeals of Cælius in Rome (Cic. ad Fam. viii.) to Cicero in Cilicia, to send him panthers for a show which he wished to give. The variety of the beasts shown is surpassed by the vast and incredible numbers in which they are said to have appeared. Augustus records that 3,500 African beasts were killed at his shows; at the dedication of the Colosseum in A.D. 80, 9,000 tame and wild beasts were killed, while in A.D. 107, after Trajan's second Dacian triumph, the number totalled 11,000. Details of all the means of acquiring these animals would be of the greatest interest, but they have not come down to us.

16. Food supply.—(a) Bread.—Something must be said of the Roman food supply. The corn was separated from the chaff either by animals, commonly horses, or by threshing machines worked by animals (cf. 1 Co 9^a, 10, 1 Ti 5¹³), or by flails. On the threshing floor, carefully prepared for the purpose, the corn was shaken out from the husk. The chaff of far (spelt) adhered so closely to the grain that it could be separated only by pounding. If the wind was not strong enough to blow away the chaff, a wicker basket (πινον, uannus, Mt 3¹²) was used for winnowing. The staple food of the early Roman was porridge (puls) made of pounded far. The pounding process gave rise to the name pistor, which thus came to have the meaning 'baker.' Triticum (triticum), 'winter wheat,' was grown in dry soils; of this, a variety siligo was the source of the finest flour. Barley (hordeum) was little used as human food except by slaves and gladiators. Millet (panicum or milium) was grown chiefly in Campania, and oats (avena) were sown only for green fodder (for which the general word was farrago). Other crops grown for fodder were lucerne, vetches, and tares. Peas and beans of various types were largely cultivated, especially lupines. The production of bread was long, as in Britain and elsewhere, a purely household matter. For boulangerie one depended on the work of the slaves at home; for pâtisserie one had to resort to the shops, probably most of them Greek. The handmill or quorn (mola), worked by women, was a feature of every house; the larger houses had mills worked by asses or mules. Water-mills were also known. The loaves were for the most part much smaller than those to which we are accustomed in Britain, being more like large rolls. Leaven (ζύμη, Latin fermentum) was usually employed in baking, unleavened bread being regarded as less health-giving. The resulting paste (φύραμα, massa, 1 Co 5⁶, etc.) was formed on the baking-board, either by hand or in a mould.

(b) Olive-oil.—The use of butter seems to have been very rare, except for medicinal purposes. Its place as a food was taken by olive-oil. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of the olive in the ancient world. The extent to which it was grown in Mediterranean lands is vividly shown by a map published in Deissmann's St. Paul: a Study in Social and Religious History, London, 1912. In Italy the olive area commonly begins where the uppermost part of the vineyard stops, on the mountain slopes. St. Paul refers in a well-known simile to the difference between the wild olive (αγριέλαιος, oleaster) and the cultivated olive (ἐλαία, olea) and to the grafting (Ro 11¹⁷⁻²⁴) of the former on the latter, a process probably less frequent than the reverse. The cultivated olive was introduced by Greek colonists to Italy. The Sabine country provided the largest yield, and the best oil came from Venafrum (modern Venafrò) in Samnium. Young trees were not removed from the seed-plots till they were five years old. They attain considerable age, and do not bear to their full capacity for a number of years. Olive-growing was therefore a trade for the capitalist, who could wait for his returns. Before the fruit was fully ripe it was picked, and the first process in the obtaining of the oil was to separate the pulp from the kernel. This was done by putting the olives into the oil-mill (trapetum), by which they were crushed. The pulp when separated was put into the oil-press (ἄγρος, torcular), and crushed there to obtain the oil. It was caught in a cistern (lacus) and afterwards strained of its impurities. Then it was ready for the large earthenware jars (dolia) in the oil-cellar.

(c) Wine.—The culture of the vine was of the highest importance, wine being then, as now, the staple drink of the Mediterranean peoples. Corn-growing in Italy had been largely abandoned in favour of the cultivation of the olive and the vine. Wine was rare and costly in early times in Italy; even in the 3rd cent. B.C. it was poor in quality, and till near the end of the Republic Greek wines, especially those of the Ægean islands, Chios, Cos, Lesbos, Rhodes, and Samos, held almost undisputed place among the citizens of the Italian cities. Even in Italy, however, the vineyard was the source of greatest profit to the agriculturist. We first hear of Falernian wine under Julius Cæsar, but only as two-fifths of the total supply provided at a Gargantuan banquet to the Roman people. Under the Empire, the vine-growers of Latium and Campania had so perfected their vintages that they were sought for even in India. In Pliny's time (died A.D. 79) two-thirds of eighty well-known brands were Italian; of these the best were the Alban and Cæcuban from Latium, and the Massic and the Surrentine (the latter recommended by physicians, e.g. Cælius Aurelianus, de Celeribus vel Acutis Passionibus, ii. 37). Columella, the agricultural writer of the 1st cent. A.D., shows that a profit of rather over 6 per cent was obtained from a vineyard of about 4 acres, but there is evidence in a favourable locality of as much as ten times that percentage.

(d) Vegetables and fruit.—Root-crops were not very commonly raised except in Cisalpine Gaul, where the turnip was used, as to-day, for the winter food of cattle. Flax (λίνον, linum) yielded large profits; hemp (cannabis) required a rich soil. Of fruit trees the lemon and the orange, now so characteristic of Italy, were unknown. Peaches and apricots were introduced in the course of the 1st cent., the pistachio nut in its first third, and about the time of the destruction of Pompeii the first melons aroused the interest of students and growers. Every town was surrounded by orchards and kitchen-gardens. The flower-gardens produced little but several varieties of lilies, roses, and violets, grown both for natural use and for the manufacture of perfumes. Each town was supplied with vegetables from its own environs, but these were sometimes also exported further afield; for example, Pompeii exported cabbages, figs, and onions, and Rome obtained peaches from Verona, asparagus from Ravenna, and roses from Pæstum. It was in the forum holitorium that fruit and vegetables were purchased at Rome. Varieties of fruit not already mentioned, which could be obtained there, were apples (Italian, African, Syrian), pears (Italian, Greek, and African), plums, quinces, medlars, chestnuts, grapes, walnuts, hazel-nuts, filberts, almonds, pomegranates, cherries. Of dried fruits, damsons, Carian figs, dates, and raisins (from Spain) were on sale. Of vegetables, in addition to those mentioned above, the following were to be found in the Roman market: squills, garlic (still so characteristic of Southern Europe), leeks, celery, artichokes (e.g. from Carthage and Cordoba), endives, elecampane, radishes, cucumbers, gourds, lettuce, cress, mallow, sorrel (cf. the soupe à l'oseille of modern France), rue, mustard, anise, fennel, coriander, cummin, dill, etc.

(e) Fish.—Fish was the real delicacy of the ancient table. This is seen in the history of the word ὀψων (opsonium), which originally indicated any sort of relish taken with bread, and latterly meant 'fish' exclusively (cf. Jn 6^{9, 11} 21^{9, 10, 13}). At first little fish seems to have been engaged in, but in the 1st cent. B.C. there were many aristocratic fish-breeders, who in their private ponds fed various sorts of rare fish for the enjoyment of the table. Among the fish eaten by the Romans were the sturgeon, bass, mullet, sea-mullet, the 'ruminating' parrot fish, pearl fish, turbot, eel, conger-eel, murry (a sea-eel), sheath fish, trout, salmon-trout, pike, prickly flounder. The common people esteemed the mackerel, the anchovy, the tunny, and the sand-smelt. Certain of the latter were used in making sauces. The pearl fish was common in the Mediterranean; the sheath fish was obtained in the Nile, Danube, Moselle, and Dnieper; the best murries were obtained from Tartessus, Messana, and the Carpathian Sea; the best turbot were caught off Ravenna; most eels were caught at Verona. The common fish abounded in the Italian seas.

(f) Meat.—In the meat-market (macellum, μακελλων, 1 Co 10²⁵; cf. Ital. macelleria) were to be found beef, goat's flesh, lamb, mutton, and pork. Pork was especially in demand, particularly for roasting on festal days. The parts of the animal most appreciated were the womb, udder, liver, ham, and toes, and there was also a great sale for salt beef and various kinds of sausages. A considerable portion of the meat sold in the meat-market had been sacrificed to gods by their priests. The inferior parts of the animal might then be burnt, but what the priests did not require for personal consumption was sold in the meat-market (cf. Ac 15²⁹ 21²⁵, 1 Co 8 [whole chapter] 10¹⁹, Rev 21^{4, 20}). Salt- and smoked-meat were imported into Rome from Gallia Cisalpina, the Pyrenees, the Cantabri, and the Sequani. In addition to domestic animals, game, whether obtained from hunters or from zoological gardens, was also sold, wild boar, sometimes served whole (as at Queen's College, Oxford, to-day), hare, venison, dormouse. Nor was poultry overlooked. Birds of various sorts were obtained in all parts of the Roman world, and preserved in aviaries for the table: pigeons of costly and rare types, fattened birds, particularly the diseased goose liver become abnormally large (cf. the modern pâté de foie gras), also the ptarmigan, woodcock, francolin or black partridge, fieldfare (fattened on pounded figs), partridge, quail, peacock, Guinea-fowl, pheasant, black grouse, capercaillie, crane, stork, and flamingo.

It is enough to mention milk and various kinds of cheese, of which the Alpine was the most famous (smoked cheese being also in demand), and honey.

17. Markets and retail dealers.—The various kinds of food were to be obtained in the large fora, or markets, but probably most of the business done in them was wholesale, at least in the great cities. From the fora retail dealers in all kinds of food obtained their supplies. Marquardt (Privatleben der Römer, p. 448 ff.) divides these retail dealers into ten classes: (a) corn-dealers, bakers, and millers; (b) greengrocers; (c) fruiterers; (d) butchers, game-dealers, and poulterers; (e) fishmongers; (f) wine-merchants; (g) oil-dealers; (h) honey-dealers; (i) salt-merchants; (j) cooks and innkeepers.

18. Textile fabrics.—(a) Production of wool.—We pass now to textile fabrics. By far the most important were those made from the wool of sheep, the earliest use of which is prehistoric, like the arts of spinning and weaving. Great care was shown in the breeding of sheep, and the varieties of wool, which was in some cases prepared on the spot, and in others exported as rough material, were very numerous. Different breeds of sheep were valued according to the fineness or thickness of their wool, or according to their colour. Cross breeding was freely employed to improve the quality of any particular wool. The best Italian wool was that from Tarentum, and the epithet Tarentine thus became a trade description for fine wool. On being obtained, commonly by shearing, sometimes by plucking, the wool was prepared for the spinner. Almost all the processes connected with wool were carried out by the women of the household from the beginning down to the Middle Ages. It was the Roman matron's proudest boast that she lanam fecit. In fact, a very large amount of the clothing used by the Romans and the ancients generally was made in the house. Costly carpets, hangings, coverlets, etc., were naturally manufactured by experts in factories. With the progress of time factories got more and more of the manufacture of clothing also to do. The wool was washed in hot water with soap, then spread out to dry, then picked and carded. All these processes were a necessary preparation for spinning and weaving.

(b) Fulling.—Fulling (cf. Mk 9³) was a very important trade in ancient times, both in the preparation of a new fabric and in the cleaning of soiled clothes. Only the simplest washing was done at home, except in very large houses. A number of guilds of fullers, as of other trades, are mentioned. It appears that water, for which they paid specially, was a necessary part of their equipment, and that they did not employ 'dry-cleaning,' at least exclusively. Soap, 'fuller's earth,' and sulphur were also used. Cutting and pressing concluded their work.

(c) Preparation of stuffs.—The same processes essentially were employed with flax (linen, Rev 15⁶; cf. Ac 10¹¹, Lk 24¹², Jn 19⁴⁰, etc.), cotton, hemp, and other vegetable stuffs, as also with silk, etc. Flax was treated much as it is to-day. Rough linen was used for bath-towels, ordinary towels, etc., while it is generally believed that fine linen is indicated by the word βύσσος. Cotton, or tree-wool, as the Greeks, like the Germans, call it, came from a plant which was in ancient times indigenous only in East India and Upper Egypt, and it seems to have been prepared specially on the spot. Of its preparation we in consequence know almost nothing. Greeks and Romans did not use hemp for weaving, but the Thracians are recorded by Herodotus to have done so. The fibres of the wild mallow were woven into garments probably only on the banks of the Indus, but these garments were known to the Romans for a long period. Silk as a material for clothing has been referred to above (13 (c)). Of skins used by the ancients, goat-skin was the most important. Especially in Spain, Africa (near the Syrtes), Phrygia, and Cilicia it was the custom to shear the long-haired goats and to weave rough material out of the hair. From the chief place of manufacture (Cilicia) fabrics of such material were known among the Romans as cilicia (St. Paul's 'tents' may have been made of this stuff, Ac 18³), while the Greeks gave them the name of σάκκος. Out of it were made cloaks, towels, bed-covers, hangings, shoes, and sacks.

19. Sewing.—Sewing did not in ancient times play the part with which we are now familiar. It was mostly in the addition of extra parts to a garment already woven practically complete that sewing was employed. The modern practice of weaving a whole bale of cloth, out of which a number of different garments are to be cut, was not known to the ancients. Among the Romans the use of the needle would appear to have been commonest with leather; otherwise it is difficult to understand how sutor ('sewer') came to mean 'shoemaker.' Needles of various sizes and thimbles were in use. An important part of ancient industry was the manufacture of cushions and bolsters, which were more extensively used than among ourselves, not only for sofas and beds, but also for seats of all kinds. The covers were of linen, wool, or leather, and the stuffing, which was in early times, and later also among humble people, straw, consisted at a later period also of rushes, seaweed, tufts of reeds, and soft leaves of plants, the commonest being flocks of wool, cotton, and feathers. Horshair was never used. Embroidery of various kinds was practised, especially in Phrygia. For the making of felt, sheep-wool in particular was used.

20. Dyeing.—Dyeing was well understood from an early period, especially in purple, and this process seems from the first to have been carried out, not at home, but in the factory. The characteristic word for 'to dye' is βάπτειν (cf. tinguere) from the dipping of the garment in the dye (cf. Rev 19¹³), and for 'the dye' φάρμακον (medicamen, medicamentum). As a rule, the stuff was dyed not as a fabric, but previously to weaving. The Egyptians, however, followed a practice akin to modern cotton-printing. The chief demand, of course, in all dyeing was that the dye should be lasting and proof against washing. Alum and other substances were used in dyeing, and animal and vegetable, but not mineral, dyes. They distinguished between herbal and snau dyeing. From the former were obtained madder, saffron, weed, woad, litmus, gall-nuts, etc.; from the latter, purple and scarlet. The most important, the subject of constant mention, is dyeing with purple. Purple (or rather violet-) dyeing, properly so called,—that is, dyeing with the juice of certain kinds of snails,—was a discovery of the Phœnicians, especially those of Tyre, whose products remained by far the best (and the dearest). Phœnician purple was always understood to have been produced in this way, while imitations from other countries were sometimes made from plants. Thus it is that the Latin and Greek words for shell-fish, with their derivatives, are very often used for purple-dyes. Three different types of shell-fish (murex, πορφύρα, purpura) were employed, one obtained at Tarentum and other places in the Adriatic for Tarentine purple, another obtained off the African coast for Gætulian or African purple, and the third off the Phœnician coast for Phœnician purple. Πορφύρα, though properly the name of only one shell-fish, came to be used quite generally for purple, and from it the derivatives came: e.g. πορφυρόπαις (purpuraria), Ac 16¹⁴, applied to Lydia of Thyatira, means a dealer in purple dyed wool and fabrics of all sorts. The name of another shell-fish, murex, was similarly used to describe purple in general. The means by which the dye was obtained need not be here described in detail. Several varieties of purple were produced by the mixture of the juices of various shell-fish. Tyrian (and Laconian) purple was always double-dyed (δίβαφον). The wool was first dipped in one dye (π. lagium), while the latter was still half-boiled, and then dipped in another (bucinum). The colour thus gained was like that of coagulated blood, blackish and shining, especially in sunlight. In addition to the genuine purple, brighter dyes were produced by the weakening of it through the use of various other substances.

Something must be said of dyeing with other materials. Crimson dye was obtained from the insect kermes (coccum), the female coccus of the kermes oak, in form like a berry, native of the northern shores of the Mediterranean. This dye is alluded to in the adjective κόκκινος (Mt 27²⁸, He 9¹⁹, Rev 17^{2, 4} 18¹⁻¹⁶). Yellow dye-stuff was obtained from the styles and stigmata of the saffron (κρόκος, crocus), which grows in S. Europe, from Italy eastwards, and Western Asia. The finest was obtained from Corycus in Cilicia, and Sicily was also noted for it. As a perfume at public shows and funerals it was well known. The mention of other ancient dyes may be here omitted.

21. Clothes and cloth-merchants.—The commonest colour in Greece for the χιτὼν and ἱμάτιον was white, but artisans wore darker clothes: gay clothes were worn only at festivals. So also with the Roman toga and tunica; the brighter colours came in later, especially for the lacerna and similar garments. The bright colours always found acceptance with Roman women, both of good and of bad character, both married and unmarried. At the same time, good taste forbade the use of glaring colours. Such colours as were employed had nearly always some natural model—stone, flower, plant, animal, or sky. The ancients certainly knew a wide variety of colours.

Some account of the number and cut of the garments worn by men may now be given. In historical times the dress of the Roman man consisted of an under garment (tunica, χιτὼν, Ac 9³⁹, Jude²³, as well as Gospel references) and an upper garment or wrap (toga, from tego, 'I cover,' ἱμάτιον, Ac 9³⁹ 7³⁸ 12³ 14¹⁴ 16² 18² 22²⁶, 23, Rev 3³ 13⁴ 19¹³, etc., from which the general word ἱματισμός, 'clothing' [Ac 20²⁸, 1 Ti 2², and often in papyri] comes). The toga was worn only outside the house. The tunic was a shirt consisting of two parts, a breast piece and a back piece, which were sewn together. It had sometimes no sleeves, and at other times they reached only to the elbow. Commonly it was girded over the hips, so that it reached only to the knees: soldiers and travellers wore shorter tunics (cf. Ac 12²⁸). The tunic could be worn loose in the house. Already in Plautus' time it was the custom to wear a tunica interior (subucula) under the tunica proper, and like it of wool. The toga was a white woollen garment of elliptical form, while the corresponding Greek garment (ἱμάτιον) was rectangular. The length was three times the height of the man up to the shoulder, but the breadth varied. The method of wear does not here concern us. The working classes, who wore only the tunica, not the toga, used the pænula (2 Ti 4¹³) as a protection against rain, wind, snow, and cold. It was the dress, for example, of muleteers, and of slaves who had to work in the open, as well as of soldiers, travellers, and others who had to face the elements in bad weather. It was made of shaggy frieze or leather, dark-coloured and thick, without sleeves, sticking close to the body. The characteristic great-coat of the soldier, sagum, had sleeves. The lacerna, a light cloak with a hood, was sometimes worn over the toga, and was variously coloured. Of the synthesis, or dinner dress, also of various colours, little is known, except that it was coloured and that several could be worn at a time showing off the variety of colours at the neck. The two varieties of head-dress, the felt cap (pileus), worn in Greece by fishermen, sailors, and artisans, and the flat hat (petasus), were also usual in Italy. As a rule, however, one appeared in public without a hat. Thessalian hats were worn in the theatre as a protection from the sun's heat, as also Macedonian causæ with broad turned-up brims.

Women's dress showed considerable variety, both because matrons, girls, slaves, and prostitutes wore distinctive garments, and because foreign women and freedwomen introduced foreign, and especially Greek, fashions with absolute freedom according to their own taste. All women wore the fascia, a sort of corset, then a tunica interior (subucula, interula), and above it the indusium, or tunica indusiata. It was in the character of the outer dress worn above these that the difference of status was shown. The stola, the distinctive dress of the matron or lawful wife, was a tunic, reaching to the feet, with sleeves to the elbows. At its lower end it had a train or flounce, and the whole garment was girt at the waist. About it the palla could be worn, and indeed in a special way to mark the class, for it was worn differently by maidens and foreign women, who did not wear the stola. Married women commonly covered the head out of doors (1 Co 11).

The traders associated with clothing were (1) the providers of raw material, such as wool, goat's hair, flax, the purple fishers, and the mussel fishers; (2) the dealers in raw material and the importers of foreign wares: dealers in wool, goat's hair, linen, silk, etc.; (3) manufacturers, felt-makers, wool-carders, dyers (including dyers in blue, wax, saffron, brown, purple), weavers (including weavers of wool, linen, damask), fullers, embroiderers, gold-beaters, lace-makers, corset-makers, shirt-makers, tailors and tailoresses, and centonarii (i.e. makers of garments out of centones, or old patches); (4) traders in stuffs and finished garments (uestiarii), who sometimes did business in shops, sometimes by means of touts (circitores); their chief business was in hangings, bed-covers, etc. (uestes stragulae, from sterno).

22. Skin and leather wares.—Nothing has hitherto been said of skin or leather wares. Covering with the hides of beasts was the earliest kind of dress. In the Empire skins were used for personal wear as well as for carpets and covers. Hides were imported from the Black Sea, Cyrene, Sicily, Asia Minor, Germany, and Britain, and tanning was known in Rome from the earliest times. The method appears to have differed but little from that now in use. Before the hair was removed, the skin was prepared by the leaves of the mulberry tree soaked in wine, or by the red-fruited white bryony. Of tanning proper the four modern methods appear to have been all current: (a) by the use of pine and alder bark, pomegranate skins, and sumach leaves, gall-nuts, acorns, the roots and berries of the wild vine, the fruit of the Egyptian acacia, etc.; (b) by the use of alum and salt, which produces fine leather (aluta); (c) by the use of oil or chamois dressing; and (d) by the plain method of cleaning, removing the hair, and scraping. In the colouring of leather also the ancients showed great skill. For this process they used, for instance, the bark of the lotus tree, madder, scarlet, and especially sulphate of copper (blue vitriol). Among hides used were those of sheep, goats, lambs, hyænas, roes, stags, wild sheep, wolves, martens, beavers, bears, jackals, seals, leopards, lions. Furs were not introduced into Rome till late times.

The finished leather was used by shoemakers, saddlers, and the makers of jerkins, belts, gloves, tents, wineskins, etc. It was cut with various types of knife, pierced with the awl, and shaped on lasts; the soles were made often of wood or cork, being sometimes studded with nails, and were sewn according to requirement. The use of oil to make the leather flexible and of blacking was also known. The shoemakers were divided into classes, according to the type of shoes that they sold. The prevailing type of boot among the senators had four latches; there was also the ordinary calceus, sold by calciarii, like a slipper with two upper flaps, one folded over the other and both knotted together. For indoor use sandals (soleæ, sandalia, Ac 12⁹), sold by solearii, were used, but they were taken off at dinner. Among other types was the military caliga, sold by the caligarii, studded with nails, but really little more than a sole, laced to the foot by a network of thongs.

23. Hairdressing and cosmetics.—Hairdressing and cosmetics need some reference (1 P 3⁹). The hairdresser, wig-dealer, perfumer did much business in the great cities. The hairdressing of the richer and idler Roman women in the 1st cent. was often of so elaborate a nature that great skill and much time were required for the preparation of the wonderful structures piled upon their heads. There was also a large sale for cosmetics, including white-lead and rouge. Wigs were commonly blonde in the 1st century. The barbers' shops were centres of gossip, just as George Eliot represents them centuries later in Florence. The decoration of women's hair and faces was done at home by specialist slaves.

24. Goods and utensils.—The subject of goods and utensils is much too large to be treated in full detail here, but it cannot be passed by. Such manufactured goods can be distinguished as the work of workers in hard substances—stone, metal, wood, ivory, glass—or that of workers in soft substances, such as clay or wax. The former are the work of the fabri, the latter of the figuli (Ro 9³⁰). Adjectives were added to the term fabri to indicate the special branch to which they belonged. Workers in timber, builders, shipwrights, carpenters, smiths (including silversmiths), ivory workers, etc., were all fabri. The figuli produced two classes of pottery—opus figlinum, corresponding to our porcelain, and opus doliare (from dolium, a large jar), a coarser type of work, including vessels and vases of any shape, roof-tiles, water-pipes, etc. The manufactories of these (figlinae) were generally owned by capitalists.

25. Building, metal-work, etc.—The stone used for building in the Roman Empire was of necessity generally taken from the districts where the building was to be erected. Thus at Rome, the tufa, the green-grey peperino, and the travertine of the neighbourhood provided what was necessary for monumental buildings. Private houses there were at first built of unburnt bricks, but afterwards of the much more durable burnt bricks. From Greek lands Rome learned the practice of using marble casings for the walls, as well as solid marble pillars to support the upper parts of buildings. White marble was obtained from Hymettus, Pentelicus, Paros, Thasos, Lesbos, and Tyre, and others from the Propontis, Gaul, Egypt, Eubœa, Laconia, Thessaly, Numidia, Lydia, Caria, Phrygia (especially Synnada), etc. The transport of these was an important part of Roman trade, and stone-breakers, stone-cutters, and stone-polishers abounded. The mosaic workers, who constructed their pattern for pavements of houses out of small pieces of stone and glass, deserve mention, as also the constructors of tessellated pavements, including the opus vermiculatum and the λιδόστρωτον (Jn 19¹³). The geometrical and pictorial elements were always distinguished. The pictorial part consisted sometimes of a landscape. The workers in mosaic were Romans or Romanized provincials. In building operations there were, of course, various classes of workmen concerned—stone-cutters, builders, pavement-makers (of various orders according to the kind of pavement), white-washers, wall-painters (often with real artistic power), lime-dealers, lime-burners, paint-sellers, brick-makers, etc.

In clay were constructed bricks of various kinds for walls (unburnt, called πλινθος, later; burnt, κεραμος, testa), etc., and tiles for roofs, the imbrices, the rounded or upper tiles, and the tegula, or flat tiles (cf. Lk 5⁹, Ro 9²¹, etc.). For house-building the air-dried brick was used in Greece and Rome. In Greece the baked brick was known fairly early, but was not introduced in Rome till the end of the Republic, and there gained only gradual vogue. These bricks were of various sizes. The burnt bricks were used by preference for important buildings. Other house-works in clay were pipes for heating, water-pipes, cubic and other forms of tile for mosaic, decorations on pillars, windows, cornices, gutters, outer and inner friezes. The last were in blocks with holes for nails, and often painted. Sarcophagi, drinking cups, bath-tubs, statues, lamps, were also made of clay. But the numerous kinds of terra-cotta vessels were the most conspicuous works in clay, the large wine casks (dolia), big enough to hold a man, the smaller wine-jars (amphoræ or cadi), the water pitcher (urna, ὕδρα, Jn 2⁶, 4²³), the lagena, ampulla, gutus, crater, cyathus, phiale (Rev 16, etc., where of gold), patera, calix, scyphus, cantharus, car-chesium, ciborium, wine-cups of various sizes and shapes, the mention of which is familiar to the reader of Horace (cf. Rev 2⁷). Plates and dishes for food, such as the ραποψίδες (Mt 23²³), washing basins, and cooking vessels of various kinds were also constructed of this useful material. Clay vessels were made in various colours—yellow-brown for wine casks and jars; red, various in shade and quality, for plates; grey and black.

Some reference has been made above to localities in which the manufacture of these vessels was carried on, such as various places in Italy, Greece, Spain, France, Germany, and Britain.

The metals in use in antiquity were especially gold, silver, copper, iron, and lead, which were subjected to the same processes as in modern times. Statuettes were made particularly in gold and silver, and there is a well-known reference to the latter in combination with shrines in Ac 19²⁴. Metal knobs as ornaments of sceptres, girdles, cups, bridles, etc., were known from early times. In the construction of weapons of war—shields, helmets, breastplates, etc. (cf. Eph 6¹²)—metal played, of course, a very important part. Wooden furniture of all kinds, such as couches, cupboards, chests, carriages, was tipped with metal or covered with metal plates, generally with relief work on them. In addition to the metals as above mentioned, bronze (1 Co 13¹) was much used for a great variety of purposes. A special department of metal work was that of wine-cups and other table furniture. The Roman tables were laden with silver plate, and the smaller houses took pride in their silver salt-cellars, which had descended as heirlooms, if they had nothing larger to pride themselves on. Of cast-metal the finest products were the Corinthian bronze statues, worth more than their weight in gold. Gold itself was used for collars, armlets, chaplets, charms, finger-rings (Ja 2²), as well as for coins, hair-pins, hair-nets, bandeaux, ear-rings, necklets, chains, bracelets, anklets, brooches, etc., either set with precious stones or not. It is hardly necessary to mention the use of metal for needles, pens, surgical instruments, knives, skin-scrapers, etc.

Wood obtained from the wood-merchants was used especially in the building of houses and ships. The builders of these were divided into various classes according to the particular work which each undertook, and the workers, like all others, were members of trade-gilds. The most elaborate internal work was that of the wonderful ceilings (lacunaria, laquearia) which became such a feature of the richer Roman houses. Tables, of which the most expensive were those of citrus wood from North Africa, couches of all kinds, chairs of various kinds, and benches were made of wood. Vehicles of all sorts were constructed for the most part of wood. It is remarkable that nearly all their types were of Gaulish origin, though certain of them (pūenta, carpenta) were early Roman. Sedan chairs must not be forgotten; they were much used in the city of Rome, because heavier carriages were forbidden there.

Leather work has already been referred to above in connexion with clothing. It was employed also for harness, tilts, armour, tents, saddles, whips, lashes, etc. Ivory was used for the decoration of walls, doors, couches, chairs, carriages, tables, sceptres, boxes, hilts of swords, etc. Ivory work came from the East through the Phoenicians to Latium. Glass work was later in becoming known at Rome than any other already mentioned, though known in Egypt as early as the third millennium B.C. It was known later in Assyria and Phoenicia. In Italy it first became known as a material for the manufacture of bottles, cups, plates, dishes, glasses, and lamps. Imitations of certain precious stones were made in it, as the process of colouring was known. The finest work was in the production of cameos and intaglios. The industry was in fact widespread in our period. Glass was also quite well known in windows, as well as for mosaics, already mentioned.

For the eye-powder for which Phrygia was famous (cf. Rev 3¹⁸) see W. M. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. [Oxford, 1895] 52.

LITERATURE.—H. Blümner, Technologie und Terminologie der Gewerbe und Künste bei Griechen und Römern, i. 2 [Leipzig, 1912]; J. Marquardt, Das Privatleben der Römer, pt. i., do., 1879; L. Friedländer, Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire, Eng. tr., i. [London, 1908] ch. vi.; the relevant chapters in J. E. Sandys, A Companion to Latin Studies, Cambridge, 1913; H. S. Jones, Companion to Roman History, Oxford, 1912; on the trade of the Italian towns, L. Friedländer, Petronii Cena Trimalchionis, Leipzig, 1891, p. 19 ff.

A. SOUTER.

TRADITION.—The body of religious literature contained in the OT is itself largely the deposit of oral tradition. As the result of its progressive canonization, this literature acquired the character of a fixed norm of faith and conduct. But the study devoted to the Scriptures (קְדוּשָׁה, 'seeking,' 'searching') led to a vast development in the religious traditions of Judaism. On the one hand, through the ceaseless activity of the scribes, the written Law was enriched by a wealth of oral statutes (בְּקוֹל מוֹרֵה, 'the Torah that came by mouth'), partly natural expansions of the Law, arising from the force of custom and the new necessities of life, or as legal precedents from the courts of justice, partly definitions, interpretations, or detailed applications of the Law. From their direct bearing on matters of conduct, these new statutes were described as Halakhoth (from הָלַךְ, 'go'), that is, rules governing the normal walk of life. But, while the scholastic mind thus busied itself with details of the Law, the imagination of more poetical spirits played around the narrative parts of Scripture, embellishing the history of Israel with a rich garland of legend, allegory, metaphysics, and morals, often grotesque enough, yet 'full of the strength and glow of faith' (H. Heine, Jehuda ben Halevy, pt. i. stanza 34). These more imaginative elements of tradition were termed Haggadōth (from הִגִּיד, 'show,' 'tell'), that is, lessons of life taught by way of principles and examples, actual or fictitious (less probably, tales or legends as products of the story-telling gift).

The oral character of both these developments of OT literature was long preserved. As late as the Christian era, the traditional Law was known as מִצְוַת הַזֵּקֵנִים, the 'command of the elders' (cf. the NT παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, 'tradition of the elders'), and a distinct prejudice operated against any part of its contents being reduced to writing. After the destruction of the Temple, however, the title Mishna (from שָׁנָה, 'repeat'), most probably in the sense of 'study' or 'teaching' (in spite of the δευτέρωσις of the Church Fathers), came to be applied to the oral Law; and various collections were now made by leading scholars like Hillel and Akiba, the standard edition being that of Judah ha-Nasi (c. A.D. 200). The Mishna itself is a compilation of Halākhōth, or formal statutes; but the Gemara, or 'supplement' of the Mishna (from גָּמַר, 'complete'), contains many Haggadōth as well. These were taken over by the Talmuds, especially the Babylonian Talmud, which contains by far the richest treasury of Jewish traditions.

Although originally mere expansions or embellishments of Scripture, the Halakhic traditions in particular acquired an authority and influence equal to those of the Law itself. This principle was explicitly taught in the schools of both Hillel and Shammai, and was accepted by the Pharisees generally, while the conservative Sadducees rejected the claims of tradition in toto (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6). Among the more rigid Pharisees, indeed, the oral Law was held to possess an even greater sanctity than the written; for the oral was the 'perfection' of the written, and he who knew and followed it was wiser and holier than he who observed merely the written. Thus the idea grew up that the traditional Law also was given to Moses on Sinai, and was delivered by him to Joshua, and by him to the elders, and by them to the prophets, and by them to the men of the Great Synagogue, and thence to the present generation (Pirke Aboth, i. 1 ff.). In later Talmudic tradition, the Law given to Moses was said to cover the whole body of Rabbinic doctrines. Thus the real heart of the Law was buried beneath the dead weight of tradition; and men too often used their zeal for tradition as a means of evading the moral demands of the Law (Mt 15²³, Mk 7¹², etc.).

The conflict with traditionalism, which figures so prominently in the Gospels, sinks into insignificance in the rest of the NT. The problem that confronted St. Paul was that of the Law itself, while the other writers were concerned with the weighty matters of Christian faith and life. Only a few faint traces of tradition appear in their writings—mere survivals from the dead past of Judaism. Thus the allusions of St. Stephen to the burial of Jacob and all his children in Sychem, to Moses' learning 'in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,' and to the presence of angels at the giving of the Law (Ac 7¹⁵, 22, 38, 53) are doubtless drawn from Jewish Haggadōth; examples of the same thing are found in St. Paul's references to the Rock that followed the Israelites (1 Co 10⁴), to the seducing of Eve by the serpent (2 Co 11³), and to the ministry of angels (Gal 3¹⁰; cf. He 2²), while the direct use of Haggadic literature is suggested in such texts as 2 Ti 3⁸, 1 P 3¹⁰, 2 P 2¹⁶, Jude 6². The influence of Halakhic exegesis is equally evident in the Apostle's method of argument in Ro 9⁷, Gal 4²¹, 1 Co 9⁹ (cf. 1 Ti 5¹⁹).

LITERATURE.—L. Zunz, Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, Berlin, 1832; E. Deutsch, Die Talmud, in his Literary Remains, London, 1874; H. L. Strack, Einleitung in den Talmud, Leipzig, 1908; M. Mielziner, Introduction to the Talmud, 2 vols., New York, 1903; S. Schechter, art. 'Talmud,' in IDB v. 57 ff.; W. Bacher, Die Agada der Tannaiten, 2 vols., Strassburg, 1884-90; Die Agada der babylonischen Amoräer, do., 1878; Die Agada der palästinischen Amoräer, 3 vols., do., 1892-93; F. Weber, Jüdische Theologie, Leipzig, 1897; E. Schürer, GJV 41. [do., 1902] 111 ff., ii. [do., 1907] 881 ff. (HJP i. [Edinburgh, 1890] i. 117 ff., ii. [do., 1890] i. 320 ff.); R. T. Herford, Pharisaism, 1912; J. Z. Lauterbach, art. 'Oral Law,' in JE ix. 423 ff.; A. C. Zenos, art. 'Tradition,' in DCG ii. 741 f.; H. St. J. Thackeray, Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, London, 1900.

A. R. GORDON.

TRAJAN.—Trajan's reign is of interest to the student of early Church history on account of its connexion with the treatment of Christians by the State. Spain, which had contributed during the 1st cent. a long line of celebrated names to Roman literature,—the Elder Seneca, Seneca the philosopher, Columella the agriculturist, Pomponius Mela the geographer, Lucan the epic poet, Martial the epigrammatist, and Quintilian the rhetorician,—gave in Trajan its first Emperor to the Roman Empire.

M. Ulpius Traianus was born at Italica, in the province of Hispania Baetica, which corresponded territorially to the modern Andalucia, on Sept. 18, A.D. 52 or 53. His father was the first of the family to attain to senatorial rank. Young Trajan served as military tribune under his father, who was governor of the important province Syria, in the year 76. This was only part of an extremely extensive military experience which fell to the lot of the future Emperor in his early manhood. It may be doubted, in fact, if any other aristocrat of the day had spent as much time in the field. Fortified by an assured military reputation, he returned to Rome in 78, and then passed through the regular succession of offices, attaining the praetorship, probably in 85. From 89 to 97 he was in command of a legion serving successively in Spain and Germany, and in the latter country he quelled a revolt of two legions at Vindonissa (modern Windisch). In recognition of these services, he was made one of the two chief consuls for 91. After a period of inaction he was, at the election of Nerva as Emperor in 96, appointed governor of the mountainous part of Germany (provincia Germania Superior), to secure a new frontier to the Empire, taking in the Agri Decumates (modern Schwarzwald, Black Forest). The aged Nerva on 27th October 97 adopted him as his son and successor, and he thus took the name Imperator Cæsar Nerva Traianus Augustus. In the same year he obtained the honorary title 'Germanicus' for his military exploits against the Germans. Later titles conferred upon him may be here enumerated: 'Pater Patriæ' in 98, 'Dacicus' at the end of 102, 'Optimus' in 114, and 'Parthicus' in 116. Nerva died on 25th January 98, and Trajan thus succeeded to the sole rule of the Empire, but he did not leave Germany till about a year after his accession. In 99 he reached Rome. He had already proved himself the ablest general of the time. He now showed affability to all classes, and conducted all his relations with the Senate and aristocracy in the most tactful manner. Details of his rule need not be given, but those best qualified to judge consider that of all the Roman Emperors, with the possible exception of Augustus, Trajan was the wisest, most competent, and greatest. Much of his reign was spent in necessary military operations, but the conduct of civil affairs was quite as excellent. The Emperor had to leave Rome in March 101 for the invasion of Dacia, which had proved a very troublesome foe in the time of Domitian. After two campaigns the Decebalus was defeated and his capital Sarmizegetusa captured (end of 102). A permanent bridge over the Danube, still in use, was built at Drobeta. A rising of the Decebalus, however, took place late in 104, and early in 105 Dacia was again invaded by the Romans. Baffled and defeated, the Decebalus committed suicide. The Dacian population was almost completely exterminated, and a new province Dacia was created, to which colonists were introduced from various parts of the Empire. These were the ancestors of the present inhabitants of Transylvania and Rumania, and their origin explains the character of the Rumanian language and the sympathies of the Rumanian people to-day. By the end of 106 Trajan was again in Rome. In the preceding year it had been necessary, in the interests of trade, to annex the territory of the turbulent Nabatean tribes of Arabia Petraea, and thus the Roman province Arabia was formed. From 106 to about 112 Trajan was in Italy, and among much beneficial legislation the permanent establishment of the system of alimentationes, inaugurated by Nerva, deserves mention. This was a system for the support of poor boys and girls, including orphans and foundlings, throughout Italy. Trajan's Forum and its features have been referred to in the article ROME. His interest in provincial government comes out in the official correspondence with C. Plinius Cæcilius Secundus, governor of the province Bithynia-Pontus about 111-113. The reader is impressed by 'the careful attention paid to details . . . the consistent desire . . . to respect local customs and usages, the avoidance of general rules and principles, and the equitable spirit which insists on the execution of the laws, but observes vested interests, and avoids the appearance of anything arbitrary' (E. G. Hardy, C. Plinii Cæcilii Secundi Epistulae ad Traianum Imperatorem cum eiusdem Responsis, p. 12). Pliny, having written that he had never taken part in trials of Christians, asked the Emperor what procedure he ought to follow. Trajan laid down that they must not be sought out, but that if duly prosecuted and convicted they must pay the penalty of execution. There is no real reason to suppose that Trajan inaugurated this policy. It was probably in the time of Vespasian or one of the other Flavian Emperors that the confession of Christianity in itself began to be regarded as an offence against the State, punishable with death. The affairs of Armenia caused the inevitable conflict with the Parthians on the eastern frontier, which occupied the last years of Trajan's life. The Emperor himself set out for the East at the end of 113, and in a succession of campaigns he was able to subdue the enemies of Rome and to add three provinces to the Empire—Armenia minor, Mesopotamia, and Assyria. But the conquest had been too rapid, and the last had to be relinquished. Trajan died at Selinus in Cilicia in August, 117.

LITERATURE.—The chief ancient authorities are Xiphilinus' Epitome of Dio Cassius, bk. lxxvii.; Pliny, Panegyricus and Correspondence with Trajan. There are also many important inscriptions and coins. Besides the relevant parts of the histories of H. Schiller, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, i. [Gotha, 1883]; V. Durny, History of Rome, Eng. tr., 6 vols., London, 1880-86; J. B. Enry, Student's History of the Roman Empire, do., 1893; A. von Domaszewski, Geschichte der römischen Kaiser, ii. [Leipzig, 1909] 171-185, there are the special monographs: J. Dieraner, Beiträge zu einer kritischen Geschichte Trajans, Leipzig, 1868; G. A. T. Davies, Lecturer in Roman History in the University of Aberdeen, is preparing a monograph on the Dacian campaigns (cf. his paper 'The Dacian Campaign of Trajan in A.D. 102,' read before the Society for the Promotion of Roman Studies on 3rd March 1914, and to be published in JRS); E. G. Hardy's C. Plinii Cæcilii Secundi Epistulae ad Traianum Imperatorem cum eiusdem Responsis, London, 1889, is important. On Trajan's attitude to the Christians, consult W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170, do., 1893, ch. x. pp. 196-225, and E. G. Hardy, Studies in Roman History, do., 1906, ch. vi. pp. 78-95; K. J. Neumann, Der römische Staat und die allgemeine Kirche bis auf Diocletian, i. [Leipzig, 1890] 17-26, may also be read.

A. SOUTER.

TRANCE.—The English word, derived through the French from Lat. transitus, is the translation of the Gr. ἐκστασις, which means 'standing out' of oneself, or outside of one's ordinary consciousness. It is used very loosely to describe the sleep-like state which is obviously different from that of ordinary sleep. Originally the soul was supposed to be temporarily withdrawn from the body: at the present time no such theory is generally held, but F. W. H. Myers would regard it as the abeyance of the supraliminal self, in order that the subliminal may be free to act. It is stated that Peter fell into a trance, by which is meant that whilst his body was probably in a cataleptic condition his spirit was engaged in beholding a vision (δραμα, Ac 10¹⁹ 11⁵). St. Paul was in a trance whilst praying in the Temple, when he saw the Lord and heard His voice (22¹⁷). The second stage of trance mentioned by Myers may be said to be reached when visions, or ecstasy proper, are experienced. The third stage which he mentions embraces those instanced in the NT as cases of demoniacal possession. Trance states are said by E. D. Starbuck to be 'the result of an over emphasis and irradiation of the relaxation and anæsthesia which begin in the higher centres, and work until consciousness is obliterated, and only the muscular centres are active, thus producing a cataleptic condition of the body' (Psychology of Religion, p. 163 f.). Ecstasy has in all ages been regarded as characteristic of periods of religious excitement, and the spectacle presented of a person in the condition of catalepsy has commonly inspired a sense of awe in the minds of beholders. It has been thought that 'the thorn in the flesh' of St. Paul was the physical accompaniment of his ecstasy. In the visions of Ezekiel (4⁸) the bearing of the cords and the days of his boundness are considered by R. Kraetzschmar (Das Buch Ezechiel, 1900, pp. v, vi, 45, 46) to be the functional cataleptic paralysis that followed, first on one side and then on the other. St. Teresa (Life, Eng. tr., D. Lewis, 1904, p. 163) speaks of her body being perfectly powerless during her raptures and her limbs remaining fixed in one position. The ecstatic condition which frequently accompanies unusual religious excitement has often been deliberately cultivated by means of suggestion, fasting, music, and bodily contortions. The inner aspect of the phenomenon is treated more fully in the art. RAPTURE.

LITERATURE.—W. Morgan, art. 'Trance' in HDB; E. D. Starbuck, *The Psychology of Religion*², 1901; F. W. H. Myers, Human Personality, 1903, vol. ii. ch. ix.; F. von Hügel, The Mystical Element of Religion, 2 vols., 1908-09, ii. 45, 46. J. G. JAMES.

TRANSFIGURATION Outside the Gospels the Transfiguration is only once directly referred to in the NT, in 2 P 1^{18a}, where it is mentioned as showing the credibility of those who preached Christ's Parousia, seeing that they had been eyewitnesses (ἐκστάται) of His majesty (μεγαλειότης) and had heard the voice; cf. Jn 1⁴, which also would seem to refer, inter alia, to the Transfiguration. Whatever view we take of the authorship of 2 Peter, the passage shows the importance of that event in the eyes of the early Christians. But why does not the writer appeal rather to the Ascension, of which the apostles were equally witnesses? The difficulty is the same, whether St. Peter or some later teacher wrote the Epistle. C. Bigg suggests, with much probability (ICC, 'St. Peter and St. Jude,' Edinburgh, 1901, pp. 231, 266), that those opponents who denied the Parousia perhaps denied the Resurrection as well, and that therefore it would have been useless for the writer to meet them by blankly affirming the fact of the Ascension; whereas they would acknowledge the truth of the events of our Lord's ministry. At any rate, the Epistle appeals to an event witnessed by St. Peter. This neither proves nor disproves the Petrine authorship. If the author was St. Peter (whether or not he gave a free hand to the scribe), the reference is natural enough; if he was a later writer wishing to pose as the Apostle, he might equally well introduce a Petrine reminiscence. It seems likely that the author, whoever he was, did not use the Gospel records, or at least not those which we now have. We notice (a) that he says that Jesus received from the Father honour and glory, which is not mentioned in the Gospels; (b) that he uses 'the excellent glory' for the 'bright cloud' of Mt 17⁵; (c) that he speaks of the holy mountain (the adjective has been thought to betray a later date, when sacred sites might have been held in reverence—but why not in the Apostolic Age?); (d) that he quotes the words of the voice differently from the Synoptists, though he is nearest to St. Matthew; he has ἐν ἑγὼ εὐδόκησα (an unusual construction) for ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα of Mt 17⁵; he omits 'hear ye him,' and in Codex B the order of the words is different. He also omits all reference to Moses and Elijah, but this does not affect the question of his source. The probable conclusion from these facts is that the writer, if he was not St. Peter, depended on oral tradition, and this would argue a comparatively early date. It has been noticed that in the context (2 P 14¹) we read of St. Peter's putting off his tabernacle (σκήνωμα) and of his departure (ἐξόδος), which may have been suggested by the σκηναί of Mk 9³ and || Mt. Lk., and the ἐξόδος of our Lord in Lk 9³¹, but this is very doubtful. It is possible that there is an indirect reference to the Transfiguration in 2 Co 3¹⁸ (note μεταμορφούμεθα; cf. Mk 9², Mt 17²), but the reference is to the glory of the Ascended Lord.

A. J. MACLEAN.

TRANSLATION (μετάθεσις).—The word 'translation' is used of Enoch (q.v.) in He 11⁵. The reference is to Gn 5²⁴, where we read: 'he was not; for God took (ἔλαβεν) him,' the LXX translation being οὐχ ἐνέλαβεντο, ὅτι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεός. The 'translation' of Enoch is mentioned in Sir 44¹⁶ (cf. also 49¹⁴, 'he was taken up from the earth'), and is probably alluded to in Wis 4^{7.10}: 'a righteous man, though he die before his time, shall be at rest . . . and while living among sinners he was translated.' The NT passage adds an interpretation of the 'translation,' namely, 'that he should not see death,' whereas the passages in Gen. and Sir. need not necessarily mean anything but a holy death; but it was undoubtedly the common belief that Enoch did not die. The similar word μεθίστημι is used of king Saul's death in Ac 13², and metaphorically in Col 1¹³ of our translation into the Kingdom of the Son.

A. J. MACLEAN.

TRAVEL.—See ROADS AND TRAVEL.

TREASURE, TREASURER, TREASURY.—Three times in the literature of the apostolic period (2 Co 4⁷, Col 2³, He 11²⁶) we find θησαυρός in the sense of 'treasure.' The word is from τίθημι with the paragogic termination -αυρος and means primarily 'the receptacle for valuables' (cf. Mt 21¹). But in the sense of 'treasury' we do not find it in the NT outside of Mt 12³⁵ 13⁵² and Lk 6⁴⁵. Elsewhere it is used of the things in the receptacle, the valuables, the treasure. In He 11²⁶ the word is applied to 'the treasures of Egypt' which Moses gave up for the reproach of Christ, which he considered greater riches. Here the term wavers between the literal and the metaphorical. But in the other two examples the metaphorical alone appears. In 2 Co 4⁷ it is the ministry of the gospel of Christ, and in Col 2³ it is the riches of wisdom in Christ, far in excess of human wisdom or the wisdom offered in the so-called 'mystery-religions' of the time. In Ac 8²⁷ γάλα is a Persian word current in the κοινή (see 2 Es 5¹⁷ 7²⁰; Polyb., Diod., Plut., etc.). The Persians used it for both 'treasury' and 'treasure,' as the Greeks did θησαυρός (see above); cf. Curt. III. xiii. 5.

'Treasurer' occurs only in Ro 16²: 'Erastus the treasurer of the city.' Here the word is οικονό- μος (οίκος, 'house,' and νέμω, 'manage'), 'manager of a house,' 'steward,' 'superintendent.' So ὁ οικονόμος τῆς πόλεως means 'superintendent of the city's business,' 'treasurer' (Vulg. arcarius civitatis); cf. Est 8⁹, 1 Es 4⁹, Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 7. The term is applied to apostles and ministers as God's stewards (1 Co 4¹, Tit 1⁷). As a matter of fact the Eunuch of Ethiopia was queen Candace's treasurer 'over all her treasure' (Ac 8²⁷).

A. T. ROBERTSON.

TREE (ξύλον).—'Tree' is used five times in the NT as a synonym for the Cross (Ac 5³⁰ 10³⁹ 13², Gal 3¹³, 1 P 2²⁴). In classical Greek ξύλον means wood cut, timber (as in 1 Co 3¹², Rev 18¹⁻³); an instrument of punishment, resembling the pillory (Herod. vi. 75, ix. 37; so in Ac 16²⁴); rarely a living tree (as in Rev 22^{2.14.19}); and never a cross. But in the LXX, where ξύλον is used for ῥα, 'tree,' the phrase 'hang on a tree' occurs several times (Gn 40¹⁹, Dt 21²², Jos 10²⁶); and the dread saying, κατηραμένος ὑπὸ θεοῦ πᾶς κρεμάμενος ἐπὶ ξύλον ('inaledictus a Deo est qui pendet in ligno'), seems to have been applied very early in the Christian Church—apparently many years before the writing of the Epistle to the Galatians—with a deep theological meaning as well as a poignant pathos, to the death of Christ, whose Cross then came to be commonly known as 'the tree.'

Among the ancient Israelites the criminal was not executed by being hanged, but hanged after execution, his corpse being exposed before all eyes as a proof that he had met the reward of his deeds (2 S 4¹² 21^{9.10}). But Gn 40¹⁹, which refers to a case in Egypt, may denote a death by suspension (see J. Skinner, ICC, 'Genesis,' Edinburgh, 1910). Be that as it may, the tree used for this gruesome purpose was no doubt a literal living tree, not an artificial 'gallows-tree.'

The Cross is called 'a tree' in two addresses which are said to have been delivered by St. Peter (Ac 5³⁰ 10³⁹), and 1 P 2²⁴ refers to Christ bearing our sins in His body upon the tree. Cf. also St. Paul's words in Ac 13²⁹ with Gal 3¹³. The theme 'crux est arbor' is a favourite one in mediæval poetry, and 'the tree' is a common synonym for 'the Cross' in modern hymnology.

In Jude¹² apostates are compared to autumn trees without fruit. The writer of the Apocalypse refers to a conflagration among forest trees (8⁷); also to trees spared by hurricanes (7^{1.3}) and by locusts (9⁴). See also TREE OF LIFE.

JAMES STRAHAN.

TREE OF LIFE.—1. Sources.—There are three sources for our knowledge of the idea of the tree of life: the OT, Jewish apocalypses and Jewish theology, and ethnic legends.

(1) In the OT the tree of life appears neither in Psalms nor in the Prophets, but only in Genesis and Proverbs. The Genesis story (2⁹ 3²⁻) intimates that there are two objects which man would grasp at—knowledge and immortality. It has been maintained, however, that in Gn 2⁹ the tree of life is a later addition, and was inserted only when the idea of the under world had suffered such a change that immortality became an object of desire (K. Budde, Die biblische Urgeschichte untersucht, Giessen, 1883, p. 53 f.; but cf. A. Dillmann, Genesis, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1897, i. 121 f.). In any case, by reason of his sin man was not permitted to eat of the fruit of this tree, which signified fullness of life. Driven out from the Garden of Eden, he was effectually debarred from this Divine good. In Proverbs (3¹⁸ 11³⁰ 13¹² 15⁴) wisdom, the fruit of the righteous, desire fulfilled, and a wholesome tongue are each a 'tree of life.' The reference is not to the recovery of a lost, or to the winning of a future, but to the enjoyment of a present, good (cf. Budde, op. cit., p. 85 f.).

(2) In Jewish apocalyptic three constant factors are associated with the tree of life: it is in Paradise; the righteous have access to its fruit; it will be available only after the judgment. Its first appearance is in Enoch, xxiv. 1-6, xxv. 4-6, xxxi. 1-3 (cf. Slavonic Enoch, viii. 3-5, 4 Ezr. vii. 123, viii. 52, Pss.-Sol. xiv. 3, Test. of Levi, xviii.—a Christian interpolation?). According to Jewish theology, its branches cover the whole of Paradise, and it has 500,000 kinds of taste and smell (F. Weber, *Jüd. Theologie*², Leipzig, 1897, p. 346; A. Wünsche, Die Sagen vom Lebensbaum und Lebenswasser, Leipzig, 1905).

(3) All Oriental religions which have risen above the nature stage have their legends of a tree of life. Sometimes it appears in a simple, at other times in a fantastic, form; but whoever, even a god, partakes of its fruit or its sap renews and preserves his life (cf. E. Schrader, JPhTh i. [1875] 124 ff.; W. W. von Baudissin, Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, ii. [Leipzig, 1878] 189 ff.; Friedrich Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies?, Leipzig, 1881, p. 148 f.). In the Babylonian-Assyrian circle this tree was date-palm, cedar, or vine (F. R. Tennant, The Sources of the Doctrines of the Fall and Original Sin, Cambridge, 1903, p. 49; T. G. Pinches, *The OT in the Light of the Historical Records and Legends of Assyria and Babylonia*², London, 1903, p. 71 ff.). In the Gilgamesh Epic the hero obtained a scion from the 'plant of life' which healed his mortal illness (cf. B. Meissner, Ein altbabylon. Fragment des Gilgamesepos, Berlin, 1902; A. Jeremias, Die babylonisch-assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode, Leipzig, 1887, p. 93). In the Zend-Avesta the tree of life is the white Haoma—death-destroyer—similar to a grape vine, with plentiful buds and jasmine-like leaves; whoever eats of the fruit becomes immortal (SBE xxiii. [1883] 20; cf. Rigveda, x. xcvii. 17). The Hindu tree of life grows in the midst of water; whoever looks on it is made young.

Much that is fantastic and unreliable has been written by Assyriologists concerning the tree of life. Two facts, however, stand out as incontestable: there was throughout the ancient world a worship of trees, and man's dependence on particular trees for support of life offered the basis for a profound religious suggestion. 'The tree had always been the seat of Divine life and the intermediary between Divine and human nature. . . . In the holy tree the Divine life is bringing itself closer to man' (W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, London, 1904, p. 248).

2. In Revelation.—The dependence of the idea of the tree of life in Revelation (2^o 22^o 14) upon earlier, especially Jewish, conceptions is evident. The legend has been traced to an Arabian or North African oasis, thence to Babylon, where the habitat of the tree became a garden; thence the Hebrews derived it (G. A. Barton, A Sketch of Semitic Origins, New York, 1902, p. 95 f.). With the shifting fortunes of Jerusalem, the garden was transformed into a city. The apocalyptists show this transformation under way. They picture the future as a garden (Enoch, xxiv., xxv.); then as a city—Jerusalem (Pss.-Sol. xvii. 33 f.; J. R. Harris, The Odes and Psalms of Solomon, Cambridge, 1909); finally, it is a city indeed, but with a garden enclosed (Rev 21 2^o; cf. also R. H. Charles, The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, Oxford, 1912, p. 53). Ezk 47^o has been influential here. In the prophet's vision, on each side of the river grow all trees bearing new fruits according to their months, which shall be for food, and their leaves for healing. The picture in the Revelation is of a city, in the midst of which is a garden; through this flows a river, on each bank of which is the tree of life (a word used collectively)—a row of trees bearing either twelve manner of fruits (AV, RV) or twelve crops (RVM). In the garden of God, then, grows the tree of life. For those who have been purified by faith, the doom man brought on himself in Eden, of prohibition from its food, is repealed. All that Judaism had lost, or mythology dreamed of, or Christianity awakened in the soul in the way of immortal longing was restored and fulfilled in the world to come. Not only is the fruit for food, but even the leaves have healing virtue. How this therapeutic property of the leaves is to be available for the 'nations' (cf. Rev 21²⁴⁻²⁷, Is 60³; Enoch, xxv. 4-6)—those not yet belonging to the New Jerusalem—is problematic. It may suggest the present functions of the Church in respect of social ills, or imply that after the Parousia the citizens of the city will have a ministry towards those outside, or, yet again, indicate that the writer had not fully assimilated the ideal proposed by Ezekiel (cf. C. A. Scott, Revelation [Century Bible], London, n.d., p. 297).

C. A. BECKWITH.

TRIAL.—See SUFFERING, TEMPTATION, TRIAL-AT-LAW.

TRIAL-AT-LAW.—1. Primitive justice.—The earliest form of justice was personal redress. An injury sustained by any primitive tribe, or individual member of the tribe, must be requited by those to whom the honour of the tribe was sacred. No account was taken of the motive; nor was it necessary to bring home crimes like murder to the actual perpetrator of the deed, still less to mete out vengeance by the exact measure of the wrong. The whole family or tribe of the criminal was held as guilty as himself, and had often to pay ten-fold the price of blood. Among the heathen Arabs the most honoured tribes were such as could boast, 'Never is blood of us poured forth without vengeance' (Hamasa, ed. F. Rückert, Berlin, 1846, p. 15), and 'Never shall the avengers cease without their fifty' (ib., p. 328). But murder was not the only crime that called for vengeance in blood. Everything that prejudiced the honour of the tribe—adultery, insult, wounds, and even robbery—was an offence worthy of death. The sensitive tribesman would not hesitate to shed blood 'but for the shoe's latchet' of his friend (C. J. Lyall, Translations of Ancient Arabic Poetry, London, 1885, p. 6 f.).

In this system of reprisals there were at least the germs of social justice; for the very ferocity of the vengeance deterred men from wrong-doing. But, once set in motion, tribal feuds were the source of interminable bloodshed. Thus society was driven in self-defence to seek a way out of them. It was hardly possible, indeed, to restrain the avenger of blood from exacting the due penalty of deliberate wrong. But compensation might be made for unpremeditated crimes by their price in cattle or money. Thus arose the widespread custom of submitting such cases to an arbiter or umpire chosen by the parties, with the full approval of the people. A suggestive example is found in the well-known picture on the shield of Achilles (Homer, Il. xviii. 497 ff.), where two men are represented 'striving about the blood-price of a man slain,' the one maintaining that he has paid the price in full, the other refusing to take aught (for to him there is no case for compensation), but both desirous of placing the issue in the hand of a daysman, and to this end demanding judgment of the elders, having first deposited in the midst the two talents of gold 'to give to him among them that spake the justest doom' (cf. Leaf's note sub loco).

We are still at the stage where the reference of a cause to an arbiter is purely voluntary, and neither party is legally bound by the decision given. But the force of public opinion was exerted increasingly on the side of law and order. The actual execution of justice was left to the injured party, and in the case of 'manifest' crimes like open murder and house-breaking ancient codes interposed no check on summary vengeance; but where the least doubt existed, and the accused claimed the privilege of trial, society demanded clear evidence of his guilt, at the same time seeking to control the fierce impulses of the avenger by limiting punishment to the responsible wrong-doer, and making the penalty correspond as nearly as possible to the gravity of the offence; in other words, replacing the principle of unrestricted vengeance by the ius talionis—'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth.' This higher platform of justice is represented by the simple courts that survive to the present day among the Arabs of the desert, and in the primitive village communities of Southern Russia. The suspected offender is haled before the council of elders, presided over by the local sheikh or village headman. As the result of a sharp canvassing of the facts and testing of evidence, often supported by oath, and in earlier times by the ordeal of battle, fire, or water, a decision is arrived at, inspired by that swift instinct for justice so characteristic of the primitive mind, which the condemned party can evade only at the cost of expulsion from his kindred and tribe.

2. Hebrew procedure. — The roots of Hebrew justice are embedded in the primeval principle of reprisals. Thus the patriarchal legends of Israel claim among that people's ancestors the Bedouin chieftain Lamech, whose standard of vengeance was a life for a bruise, and seventy-and-seven lives for one (Gn 4²³). But from the very dawn of national history the principle was restricted by the ius talionis, while summary execution was forbidden, except in the case of the red-handed criminal (Ex 21¹², Dt 19¹¹), or the son who defied his parents' authority (21¹⁸). Disputed cases were brought before the headman or leader of the people, who, in his combined capacity of priest and judge, submitted them to God (for decision by oracle, oath, or ordeal), and in His name gave authoritative sentence (cf. Ex 18¹³). Such resort to the 'ordeal' of Divine judgment continued to be made in difficult questions (cf. 22²⁸, Nu 5¹¹, Jos 7¹⁶, 1 S 14³⁷); but ordinary cases were decided by the 'elders' (i.e. the heads of families) seated as a formal court of justice. The institution of judgment by wise and able 'elders' is by the Elohistic writer ascribed to Moses, acting on the advice of his father-in-law Jethro (Ex 18¹⁷), and appears in full force with the settlement of the people in Palestine. The procedure before these 'courts' was much the same as among other primitive nations. A formal charge or complaint must first be lodged by the injured party in the case, who forthwith summoned, or forcibly dragged, the offender before the elders. In grave matters of blasphemy or notorious crime, the person accused might be openly denounced by 'witnesses' in presence of the people (cf. 1 K 21¹³). At a later date accusations were, occasionally at least, presented in writing (cf. Job 31³). The case was debated before the elders seated in judgment, usually in the market-place in front of the city gate, and therefore in full audience of the citizens. In times of social disorder, as the prophets lament so frequently, justice could be bought and sold for money (cf. Am 6¹², Is 5²³, etc.); but as a rule judicial procedure in Israel was marked by a stern regard for right. Each party was allowed the fullest freedom to present his case (רַב) before the judges. The strongest emphasis was placed on the character of the evidence given by each. If tangible proofs were not forthcoming, the presence of competent witnesses was encouraged by every means. A solemn adjuration was laid upon the eye-witness; and he that refused to tell what he had seen or heard was accounted a criminal (Lv 5¹, Pr 29²⁴). The defendant's rights were carefully safeguarded. In the précis of rules laid down in Deuteronomy, no doubt as the formulation of ancient practice, the testimony of two witnesses at least is required for condemnation. 'One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall a matter be established' (Dt 19¹⁵). Even the evidence of two or three witnesses must not be accepted without proof. The judge is to examine their testimony as they stand 'before the Lord' (i.e., doubtless, on oath administered by the priest), and to carry out on the person of the false witness 'as he had thought to do unto his brother,' thus putting away such evils from the midst of the people (vv. 16⁷). Later laws excluded the evidence of women and slaves, that of the former, according to Josephus, 'on account of the levity and boldness of their sex,' and of the latter 'on account of the ignobility of their soul' (Ant. IV. viii. 15).

Judgment was pronounced orally in the presence of both parties, and immediate effect was given to the sentence. Civil injuries were compensated, as a rule, by the exact equivalent of the loss sustained, though in the case of theft by two-, four-, or five-fold the amount (cf. the scale of damages in the Book of the Covenant, Ex 22¹). More serious crimes were punished by scourging, mutilation, or death by stoning. In the last case the witnesses cast the first stones, the rest of the people carrying through the execution, and thus sharing responsibility for the act of justice (Dt 17⁷).

Though the old district courts survived till at least the age of Ezra, the establishment of the monarchy imposed limits on their authority. As supreme judge, the king not merely acted as a final court of appeal, but exercised independent powers as well. Thus David sat by the gate, in person or through his deputy, to hear the suits that came to him for judgment (2 S 14¹ 15¹), while Solomon had a judgment-hall attached to his palace, where he tried such cases as baffled the ordinary judge (e.g. 1 K 3¹⁶), and matters generally affecting the welfare of the people. The judgment of kings like David and Solomon was naturally influenced by regard for the best interests of the people; but in the hands of more reckless monarchs this judicial absolutism was the source of grave perversions of justice, such as the suborning of false witnesses to compass the death of the innocent (1 K 21¹⁸), or the removal by banishment or imprisonment of good citizens whose presence was obnoxious to the king (e.g. Jer 32²).

A certain safeguard against injustice was found in the growing influence of the priesthood. As administrators of the oath, and keepers of the sacred lot (the Urim and Thummim), they had long enjoyed special authority in the courts. To them was further entrusted the codifying of legal decisions (דִּבְרֵי הַחֹק). They thus acquired a definite position as judicial advisers (cf. Dt 17⁹ 19¹⁷). On the fall of the monarchy they assumed the full responsibilities of justice. The high priest was the virtual king of the new spiritual community, with the lower priests as a council of assessors to confer with him in judgment. Thence was evolved the court of the Sanhedrin, the institution of which dates probably from the beginning of the Greek era. The name is sometimes used of the local courts of seven that now finally superseded the original councils of elders. It was technically applied, however, to the Great Sanhedrin of Jerusalem, the 71 members of which decided all cases of appeal from the lower courts, as well as the graver questions of law and conduct. The rules of procedure are codified in the Mishna Sanhedrin (c. A.D. 200), and show how strongly the passion for justice still possessed the Jewish mind—although gross miscarriages of justice may sometimes have occurred in practice—and how closely mercy is linked with judgment. Even in civil suits the principle is laid down that 'the court shall not listen to the claims of one party in the absence of the other' (i. 1); proof is required of every claim, however slight a bearing it may have on the main issue; the evidence of relatives and other interested persons, also of gamblers, usurers, and those 'vicious in money matters' (though not necessarily 'in heavenly matters'), is disallowed; and judgment must be given for the defendant if the case fails of proof (iv. 1 ff.). Far more stringent rules are prescribed for the conduct of criminal charges where life is at stake. Each witness must be carefully examined, after the most solemn adjuration to tell the truth, in the name of 'the Holy and the Blessed.' In the event of discrepancies, the accused was allowed the benefit of the doubt. Expert students of the law were likewise permitted to speak on his behalf, but not against him. In civil cases the judges might pronounce their opinions in any order; in criminal trials those in favour of acquittal must speak first. For acquittal a bare majority was sufficient, while for condemnation a majority of two at least was required; and, whereas a judge who had voted for guilt might change his mind, a vote for acquittal was irrevocable. If the accused was found innocent, the case was dismissed before nightfall; otherwise, judgment was deferred till the following day, the court meanwhile conferring together, 'eating little meat, and drinking no wine during that whole day.' On the morrow they voted afresh on the case, with the same precautions as before. Even after sentence of death was finally passed, the court remained sitting, to receive any evidence that might yet be brought in the criminal's favour; and he would be recalled, at a given signal, from the very place of execution (v. 5, vi. 1).

3. Procedure in Roman courts.—The judicial procedure of the Romans shows a decided advance in legal precision. There are still, indeed, survivals of primitive justice. Thus the technical term for joinder of issue—manus consortio—recalls the physical struggle for possession which originally took the place of judgment, while 'the magistrate carefully simulated the demeanour of a private arbitrator casually called in' (H. S. Maine, Ancient Law, p. 383 f.). The earlier method of decision, too, was by the sacramentum or oath taken before the pontiffs. But the religious administration of oaths soon yielded to a purely secular process. Clear distinctions were drawn between cases civil and criminal, separate courts being assigned to each. By the strict division between procedure in iure (before the magistrate) and that in iudicio (before the judge), the first bold steps also were taken towards the modern system of trial by jury.

In civil cases, the principal form of action was the Legis actio sacramento, a survival of the trial by oath before the pontiffs. Proceedings were invariably begun by the plaintiff, who found his man, summoned him by word of mouth to accompany him before the magistrate, haling him by force (manus iniectio) if he refused, or pointing his goods (pignoris capio) if he shut himself up in his house. The plaintiff stated his ground of complaint before the magistrate (king, consul, or prætor), and a date was fixed for further procedure, both parties engaging to present themselves, and the defendant offering securities (rades). On the day appointed, each appeared in court with a staff (festuca), the symbol of ownership, by which he laid claim (vindicatio) to the person or property in question. Issue being thus joined, both took the sacramentum (now secularized into a mere staking of money against defeat), and the case was referred to a special iudex or arbiter, before whom proceedings passed in iudicium. The formal question to be here decided was, 'Is the sacramentum of N. N. just or unjust?' This, however, raised the whole question afresh. According to ancient custom, the persona or res in dispute must be present in court. If the res were immovable, the court adjourned to the place, and vindicatio was made there, though at a later date some turf or stone taken from the spot was accepted in lieu of the property. The claim being made and disputed, probation was led before the iudex, and judgment given always in view of the specific charge, any failure to make good the full claim being regarded as a ground for acquittal.

The cumbersome methods and insecurity of the sacramental process led to the gradual adoption of the 'formular' system so widely in vogue during the Ciceronian age. Under this system the prætor (who from 367 B.C. presided over Roman justice as a whole), on hearing the claims of both parties in iure, drew up a judicial formula, embodying a brief statement of the case in dispute (demonstratio), the plaintiff's claim (intentio), a request to the judge to adjudicate the person or property as he thought most fitting (adjudicatio), and instructions to condemn the accused or dismiss the case as the evidence warranted (condemnatio). The formula being accepted by both parties and their respective witnesses (litis contestatio), it was forwarded to a iudex, to be tried on a day fixed by the court. The hearing before the judge was always in public, the judge being usually accompanied by a board of assessors (concilium), and the parties by skilled lawyers and orators (advocati and patroni), who helped them in their pleadings. The charge was presented by plaintiff or his counsel, the defence following with the counter-plea, a sharp altercatio or cross-examination usually terminating this part of the proceedings. Evidence was produced and commented on during the pleadings. In civil cases witnesses appeared voluntarily, their evidence being taken on oath (that of slaves under torture, but only in default of other witness). Written documents and declarations (tabulæ, codices, or instrumenta) might also be produced; and the opinions of juris-consults were often laid before the judge. The burden of proof rested, as a rule, on the pursuer; but the judge was allowed a wide discretion, subject only to the instructions given in the formula. On the full hearing of the case, the judge retired in consilium, to discuss the evidence with his assessors and arrive at an equitable decision. Judgment was delivered orally, without reasons given, in presence of both parties. Execution of judgment was left to the winner; but strong judicial pressure was brought to bear on a recalcitrant debtor. Appeal was allowed, either by a simple Appello in court, or by application for a dismissory letter to the judge of appeal, the letter stating the fact of the appeal and the names of parties and judge. The appeal involved a rehearing of the whole case, new facts and witnesses being freely allowed. Final judgment was arrived at through the evidence submitted to the higher court; and an unsuccessful appellant was made liable for four-fold his rival's costs in appeal.

Criminal cases were originally tried before the king in person; but at an early date special duumviri perduellionis and questores parricidii were appointed for charges of treason and murder. Appeal to the people against the death sentence (provocatio ad populum) was allowed as a right from the first year of the Republic; thus criminal cases came more and more to be tried directly before the comitia populi. Proceedings here began with an inquisitio or preliminary investigation, conducted by the magistrate in presence of a contio, or informal gathering of the people, which sat for three days, and heard evidence on both sides. The result of each day's investigation was embodied in a tentative accusatio, which could be modified or expanded by subsequent evidence. On the third day the charge was definitely formulated; and after an interval of three market-days (24 days), as a quarta accusatio, backed by a fresh contio of the people, it was brought before the comitia in the shape of a Bill (inrogatio) to be passed or rejected by vote of the assembly. The case against the accused was formally presented by the magistrate; defence was made in person, or by friends of the accused (the assistance of advocates being permitted in the later period of the Republic); witnesses were heard and examined as in civil suits; the comitia then voted as in the regular legislative proceedings of the assembly, and sentence was pronounced by the magistrate in terms of the vote. Execution was forthwith carried out by officials of the court, unless the accused had previously made good his escape and become an exile.

The multiplicity of criminal cases under the Republic suggested the institution of special courts (questiones), which Maine has aptly compared with the Committees of the House of Commons (Ancient Law, p. 391). The 1st cent. B.C. saw a vast development of this system in the shape of the questiones perpetuæ, or Standing Committees, which dealt with all the more serious crimes. The institution of these courts was 'in some sort a fusion of the processes of civil jurisdiction with those of the old criminal courts' (A. H. J. Greenidge, The Legal Procedure of Cicero's Time, p. 415). Here, however, the old distinction between ius and iudicium was abolished, the prætor presiding during the whole progress of the case. A criminal charge was likewise opened by a personal postulatio or request to the prætor for permission to institute proceedings. This might be made by any citizen (except an official), but must be supported by an oath of good faith. After some interval the nominis (or criminis) delatio—a more precise specification of the charge—was presented to the magistrate, usually in presence of the accused. A brief interrogatio or oral examination of the accused satisfied the prætor whether a prima facie case existed for further proceedings or the charge was the result of mere malice, and exposed the accuser to action for calumniæ. If the case was allowed, the prætor drew up a written statement of the charge (inscriptio), which was signed by the prosecutor and his supporters (subscriptores), and formally accepted by the prætor (nominis receptio). The court was summoned to meet on a certain date, not earlier than ten days from the delatio. Parties were cited by herald, and witnesses for the prosecution by a denuntiatio or mandate from the magistrate. Jurors were empanelled—originally from the senatorial order, but afterwards in equal numbers from the Senate, equites, and tribuni ærarii—and sworn. The prætor acted as president of the jury, sitting with them on the tribunal, he on his sella curulis and they on benches (subsellia) around him, while the parties with their advocates and witnesses occupied places in front of the tribunal. As under the older system of public hearings, the case was opened by plaintiff's counsel and followed up by defendant's, in set speeches (perpetuæ orationes), calculated to appeal not merely to the reason, but even more strongly to the feelings of the court. The effect of this appeal was heightened by the appearance of the accused (now a reus), who sat in court often in mourning, and with the deepest marks of grief on his face. At the close of the speeches evidence was taken, that of personal witnesses under oath, and written statements and testimonials to character (laudationes) when duly signed and attested. Evidence for the prosecution was obligatory, that for the defence voluntary. On both sides it was carefully sifted, and a written précis made in court. The case was finally closed by the reply of the prosecution and the rejoinder of defence, no longer in set speeches, but in the form of brief questions and answers by the respective advocates (altercatio). In the consideration of the verdict the prætor still sat with the jury, discussing the case with them, and thus helping them to reach a just decision. This was arrived at mainly on the evidence. Conviction was never allowed on the unsupported testimony of one witness. The character and standing of the witnesses were likewise taken into account. Judgment was given by ballot, and the verdict pronounced by the prætor in accordance with the vote of the majority. A verdict of 'not proven' (non liquet) resulted in a re-hearing of the case; but no appeal was allowed against a clear verdict (except on technical points), though sentence might be reversed through a subsequent decision of questio or people (in integrum restitutio).

In the free cities of Italy judicial procedure was modelled upon that of Rome, while the Roman coloniæ and municipia were governed by prefects under jurisdiction of the prætor. The over-seas provinces, on the other hand, were subject to the unfettered imperium of the governor. The provincial magistrate was really a king in his own domain. He and his delegates (legati) were responsible for the whole judicial administration of his province. As holder of the imperium, he had full powers of coercion by imprisonment, scourging, or death; and no appeal could be made, except by a Roman citizen, against his decisions. In practice, however, his judicial freedom was carefully restricted. A wise governor respected the customary laws of his province, allowing minor offences to be tried before the local courts, and even in graver crimes directing the proceedings of the national councils with a view to securing full Roman justice, rather than suppressing their former prerogatives. As a rule, too, he sought the assistance of a consilium of advisers, composed partly of Roman citizens and partly of his personal attendants (the cohors prætorialis). Cases of grave moment or difficulty might even be sent to Rome. Though the provincials had no direct appeal against the arbitrary acts of an unjust governor like Verres, they could successfully impeach him before the Roman courts, and secure his condemnation and recall.

Imperial government introduced a change in the spirit rather than in the form of justice. The popular comitia, indeed, passed out of existence; but the questiones remained as the regular courts for criminal procedure till almost the close of the 2nd cent. A.D. The prætors, too, maintained their position as presidents of the law-courts, their number being actually increased to sixteen. But the real threads of justice were increasingly gathered into the Emperor's own hand. He had not merely the absolute power of repeal or reversal of the judgments of the regular courts, but in cases involving grave matters of State, or the life and honour of persons in high rank, he held extraordinary jurisdiction, while the right of private complaint in criminal cases passed over to the infamous delator, who was too often a mere creature in the Emperor's power. Thus the old Roman principles of freedom and equality before the law yielded to the most unblushing absolutism.

4. Trials in the NT.—The trial of Jesus conformed to the letter, at least, of Roman law by its final appeal to Pilate. In the trials of the earlier Christians no such sanction was sought. The case against Peter and John was too vague to warrant criminal proceedings, and the Sanhedrists contented themselves with the scourging usual in minor breaches of the peace (Ac 5⁴⁰). The bolder outlook and speech of Stephen rendered him liable to the same charge of blasphemy as his Master had faced; but so infuriated were his judges by the aggressive tone of his defence that they hurried him out to execution without even the semblance of a formal condemnation (7⁵⁷). The proceedings of king Herod were still more summary, the ignominious death of James and imprisonment of Peter being carried through apparently without either accusation or trial (12¹⁸). Even the apostle Paul had to endure persecution and stoning apart from the regular forms of trial (9²³, 14¹⁹, etc.). But in his case Roman justice came definitely athwart the hot passions of Jewish prejudice; for the main sphere of his activity lay within the direct administration of Rome, and he himself enjoyed the privileges of a free-born Roman citizen.

His first appearance before a Roman magistrate was in the colonia of Philippi, soon after his landing in Macedonia. The charge levelled against him and Silas was the serious one of 'impiety'—introducing customs which Roman citizens could neither acknowledge nor observe. In the exercise of their official coercitio, the magistrates (σπαρτηγοί, prætores) stripped and beat the accused, leaving them in prison till the case might be formally tried, or the riot otherwise quelled. But the public scourging of Roman citizens, without trial, was a scandal that might involve the magistrates themselves in a criminal prosecution, and Paul and Silas were released with honour (16³⁸). At Thessalonica a similar charge of impiety, combined with the suggestion of treason against the Emperor, was brought by jealous Jews; but here the case was disposed of by the simple course of taking securities from the leading Christians of the city, while Paul and Silas went free (17³⁴). A renewed charge of illegal worship brought against Paul by the Jews of Corinth recoiled on their own heads; for the philosophic proconsul, Gallio, not merely resolved the accusation into a mere matter of 'words and names' and questions affecting their own law, but calmly permitted the mob to seize and beat Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, before the very tribunal (18¹²). At Ephesus, again, the Apostle was saved from the fanatical violence of the mob by the sanity of the town-clerk (ο γραμματεὺς, the city scribe or secretary), who reminded him that the courts were open and the proconsuls (ἀρχιπαῖροι, plur. of category) ready to hear all matters of public order and justice (19³⁵).

The final long-drawn trial of Paul affords the most interesting example of the interplay of national and Imperial justice around the person of a Roman citizen. The case was opened by the lawless attack of certain Jews from Asia, who laid hold of the Apostle, accusing him of treason against the Jewish law and people (21²⁷). His life was saved only through the forcible intervention of the Roman military tribune, who hurried him to the fortress of Antonia, where the garrison was stationed, and would have examined him by scourging, had not Paul once more asserted his privileges as a Roman citizen (22²⁵). The case being apparently one for the Jewish courts, the tribune summoned the Sanhedrin, and set the Apostle on his defence before them (22³⁰ 23¹²). No result being thus arrived at, the tribune, in strict harmony with Roman procedure, remanded him to the governor Felix, then residing in Cæsarea, with a formal dispatch explaining the main grounds of the charge, and his own tentative judgment on their validity (23¹²). The prosecution being judicially cited to appear before the governor, the high priest himself accepted summons, with a number or the Sanhedrists, and a trained orator, Tertullus, who formally accused the prisoner on the three counts of heresy, sacrilege, and treason (24¹). The case broke down, and Paul was detained for two more years simply through the governor's weakness and greed (v. 26). The rehearing of the case before Felix' successor, the brave and honourable Porcius Festus, would no doubt have resulted in the Apostle's acquittal, had he not chosen, in the exercise of his rights as a citizen, to entrust his life and liberty to Roman justice rather than expose them to the malice of his enemies in Jerusalem (25¹⁰). The appeal was allowed by Festus, after a brief deliberation with his consilium (v. 12), and Paul was sent to Rome, with a dismissory letter strongly in his favour (v. 31). Unhappily, the destinies of Roman citizens were then in the hands of a Nero; and as the result of a tedious process, the details of which are wrapped in obscurity, 'the prisoner of Jesus Christ' found no more justice at his court than he had experienced in Jerusalem, the powers of Rome and Jerusalem uniting to stamp out the Christian 'heresy' in blood (see art. PAUL).

LITERATURE.—On primitive justice cf. H. S. Maine, Ancient Law, ed. F. Pollock, London, 1907, ch. x., Lectures on the Early History of Institutions, do., 1875, chs. ix., x.; R. Dareste, Études d'histoire du droit, Paris, 1889, and Nouvelles études d'histoire du droit, do., 1902; M. Kovalevsky, Coutume contemporaine et loi ancienne, do., 1893; A. H. Post, Grundriss der ethnologischen Jurisprudenz, ii. (Oldenburg, 1895) 210 ff. On ancient Arabic justice see G. Jacob, *Altarab. Beduinenleben*² [= Studien in arab. Dichtern, III.], Berlin, 1897, p. 209 ff.; and on justice among the modern Bedouins cf. J. L. Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins and Wahabys, London, 1830; C. M. Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta, 2 vols., Cambridge, 1888, etc. On Hebrew legal procedure cf. W. Nowack, Lehrbuch der hebr. Archæologie, Freiburg i. B., 1894, and I. Ben-zinger, *Hebräische Archæologie*², Tübingen, 1907, with the Mishna Sanhedrin; and for Roman procedure see T. Mommsen, Römisches Strafrecht, Leipzig, 1899, to be compared with F. P. Walton, *Historical Introduction to the Roman Law*², London, 1912; A. H. J. Greenidge, Legal Procedure of Cicero's Time, do., 1901; H. J. Roby, Roman Private Law in Times of Cicero and of the Antonines, Cambridge, 1903, ii. 312 ff. The student should also consult Cicero, pro Quintio, pro Roscio Comedo, pro Tullio, and pro Cœcina, and The Institutes of Gaius and Rules of Ulpian, tr. J. Muirhead, Edinburgh, 1880, bk. iv. On the trial of Jesus cf. J. Moffatt's art. in DCG ii. 749 ff., with literature there referred to, especially A. Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ: A Legal Monograph, Edinburgh, 1899. On the trial of St. Paul see the standard Lives, and W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895.

A. R. GORDON.

TRIBES (φύλη).—From the earliest times the nation of Israel was divided into various tribes, the number invariably being given as twelve. Conflicting opinions have been held as to how these tribal divisions arose, the traditional theory being that the different families descended from the sons of Jacob multiplied till they formed tribes. Others take the view that the history of the sons of Jacob is really a history of the various tribal communities which were combined to form the nation, and that the divisions were to a large extent geographical. In the lists of the tribes, as we find them in the OT, considerable variations are to be found, and frequently the tribes descended from Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) have to be regarded as one in order to make the number twelve. Some of the tribes seem to have disappeared at an early date or were absorbed into larger communities, and the divisions tended more and more to become geographical. After the return from the Exile many members of other tribes probably came to Jerusalem along with Jews strictly so called, i.e. those belonging to the ancient tribe of Judah. Most of these returned exiles came to be regarded as members of the tribes of Judah or Benjamin, although some may have been able to trace their descent from a distinguished member of another tribe, and others determined their tribe from the locality which they left at the Exile. No doubt many members of the priestly caste were in a position to claim their descent from the tribe of Levi.

In the NT we have few allusions to any of the tribes, with the exception of Judah and Benjamin, which were always more or less closely associated. Anna the prophetess, however, is stated to have belonged to the tribe of Asher (Lk 2³⁶), and Barnabas is described as a Levite (Ac 4³⁶). The apostle Paul, a Jew brought up in the Roman province of Cilicia, claims to belong to the tribe of Benjamin (Ro 11¹, Ph 3⁵). The fact that Jesus was connected with the royal tribe of Judah is frequently mentioned, and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews calls attention to the fact in order to bring out the uniqueness of Christ's Priesthood (He 7¹³⁻¹⁴). In the same way the writer of the Apocalypse calls Him the 'lion of the tribe of Judah' (Rev 5⁵).

In NT times the conception seems to have been general that Israel even at that date still consisted of twelve tribes. Thus in Ac 26⁷ Paul, in addressing king Agrippa, uses the phrase 'our twelve tribes' as synonymous with 'Israel.' But just as the term 'Israel' came to be employed in a spiritual and Christian sense as the true people of God, so the expression 'twelve tribes' is used to signify Christian believers generally. Thus James (1²) addresses his Epistle to 'the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad.' In Rev 7^{4a} the writer speaks of the sealing of the servants of God. We are told that one hundred and forty and four thousand of 'all the tribes of the children of Israel' are sealed, and then follows a list of twelve tribes each furnishing twelve thousand. The tribes enumerated are Judah, Reuben, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Simeon, Levi, Issachar, Zebulun, Joseph, and Benjamin. The remarkable features about this list are the substitution of Joseph for Ephraim, and the omission of Dan, which seems to have fallen into disrepute at a comparatively early date. The fact that the writer has taken over a Jewish apocalypse and worked it into a Christian setting makes it difficult to settle who exactly are meant here by the servants of God who are sealed in their foreheads. Are the 'servants of God' of v.³ identical with the 'multitude' of v.⁹ 'whom no man can number'? Can this be the case when the sealed are numbered so definitely? If not, who then are the sealed? Are they faithful Jews of the OT dispensation, or are they Jewish Christians, and are the Gentile Christians not to be sealed? The first suggestion is impossible, as the sealed are evidently still on the earth. The view that Jewish Christians are the sealed, while possible, is unlikely, as the whole trend of the Apocalypse is to identify Christians as the true Jews, the Israel of God. Probably, in spite of all difficulties, the same persons are indicated in both passages, and neither the numbering of the sealed nor the reference to the various tribes of Israel is to be taken literally. The servants of vv.¹⁻³, who are safeguarded on earth, are the innumerable multitude of vv.⁹⁻¹⁷, viewed after their martyr death under a definitely Christian light. The OT imagery of the sealing is used to express the thought that God's faithful people are numbered and protected on earth to the last individual, while the subsequent vision (vv.⁹⁻¹⁷) points to their glory in heaven. For our writer as for James (Ja 1¹) and Paul (Gal 6¹⁶) the true Israel consists of Christian believers (cf. J. Moffatt, EGT, 'Revelation,' London, 1910, p. 395).

W. F. BOYD.

TRIBULATION.—'Tribulation' is used to translate θλίψις, but not quite so frequently as 'affliction,' in both AV and RV. We have 'tribulation' in Ac 11¹⁹ and 1 Co 7²⁸ (RV; AV 'persecution,' 'trouble'). In 2 Co 1⁴ 7⁴, where AV has 'tribulation' RV has 'affliction.' In 2 Co 1⁴ 8, where AV has 'trouble' RV has 'affliction.' θλίβω is tr. 'afflict' in RV in every passage in which it occurs except 2 Co 4⁸ ('press') and 1 Th 3⁴ (pass. 'suffer affliction'). The latter passage in AV is tr. 'suffer tribulation.' In half of the passages, however, this Gr. verb is rendered 'trouble' in AV. The Vulg. has tribulatio for θλίψις very frequently. In 4 Ezr. 'tribulation' is the rendering of tribulatio in xv. 19, xvi. 19 (AV and RV) and in xvi. 67, 74 (RV; AV 'trouble'), and of pressura in ii. 27 (RV). In Ass. Mos. iii. 7 we find the transliteration thlipsis (cod. clipsis).

Tribulation may affect either body or mind or both. Those who marry heedless of 'the present distress' 'shall have tribulation in the flesh' (1 Co 7²⁸ RV). St. Paul writes to the Corinthians 'out of much tribulation and anguish of heart' (2 Co 2⁴). Part of his tribulation in Macedonia consists of fears within, while his flesh had no relief (2 Co 7^{4c}). To him anxiety about the faithfulness of his converts and the progress of the gospel is a source of tribulation (1 Th 3⁷, Ph 1⁷).

Tribulation may be produced by various causes. The famine caused the inhabitants of Egypt and Canaan great tribulation (Ac 7¹¹). The captured Joseph suffered tribulation in Egypt (7¹⁰). Part at least of the tribulation of the Corinthians was poverty (2 Co 8¹³). By ministering to St. Paul's need the Philippians had fellowship with his tribulation (4¹⁴). The lot of the fatherless and widows is tribulation (Ja 1²⁷). Such tribulation may be relieved (1 Ti 5¹⁰). Sometimes tribulation is the punishment of sin. To those who trouble the Thessalonian Christians God will recompense tribulation (2 Th 1⁵). There shall be 'tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil' (Ro 2⁹). God will cast the woman Jezebel out of the Church of Thyatira and those who commit adultery with her into great tribulation (Rev 2²²). But it is the Christians who are specially subject to tribulation, and their tribulation consists largely of persecution and of the opposition which their religion meets in an unfriendly world. 'The tribulation which arose about Stephen' (Ac 11¹⁹ RV) was of course 'persecution' (AV). St. Paul speaks of all the 'persecutions and tribulations' which the Thessalonians endure (2 Th 1⁴). He says they received the word 'with much tribulation,' and entreats them not to 'be moved by these tribulations' (1 Th 1⁶ 3³). In 2 Co 8² we are told that the churches of Macedonia experienced much tribulation. St. Paul exhorts other converts to be 'patient in tribulation,' and to bless them that persecute them (Ro 12¹²⁻¹⁴). In his work of evangelization the Apostle met with much tribulation. He told the elders of Ephesus that 'bonds and tribulations' awaited him (Ac 20²³). He gloried in tribulations (Ro 5³), feeling that neither tribulation nor anguish nor persecution could separate him from the love of Christ (8³⁵). There is little doubt that he is referring to the difficulties and the dangers which he met with in his proclamation of the gospel. Tribulations are mentioned in the list he gives of his trials in 2 Co 6⁴. Bad news about certain Corinthians gives him tribulation (2 Co 1⁸ 2⁴ 4⁸). Tribulation, then, to the early Christians meant not so much ill-health, or poverty, or loss of friends, as the sacrifices they had to make and the perils they had to meet on account of their proclamation or profession of Christianity. In Hebrews the writer says that after his readers were converted, they 'endured a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, becoming partakers with them that were so used' (10³⁵; cf. 11³⁷). Tribulation is the appointed destiny of Christians. St. Paul reminds the Thessalonians that both he and they were appointed unto tribulations, and that he had told them before that they were to suffer tribulation (1 Th 3⁴). John is partaker 'in the tribulation and kingdom and patience which are in Jesus' (Rev 1⁹); and he tells the church of Smyrna that they shall suffer tribulation ten days (2¹⁰). 'Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God' (Ac 14²²).

Tribulation thus leading to the Kingdom, joy in tribulation is a phenomenon that can be understood. In much proof of affliction the churches of Macedonia had abundance of joy (2 Co 8²). The Thessalonians received the word with much tribulation, with joy of the Holy Ghost (1 Th 1⁶). In the case of the Christian, tribulation results in increased energy and blessedness of the spiritual life. 'Our light tribulation, which is for the moment, worketh for us more and more exceedingly an eternal weight of glory' (2 Co 4¹). 'Tribulation worketh patience' (Ro 5³; cf. Rev 1⁹). God comforts the faithful in tribulation (2 Co 1⁴ 7⁶), and the comfort thus given enables them to comfort others (1⁴). His judgment will put an end to their tribulation, and they will be rewarded with rest (2 Th 1^{5a}; cf. Rev 2¹⁰).

It was a common eschatological idea that before the Judgment could come evils of all kinds would greatly increase. This idea is found, e.g., in the Apocalyptic Discourse, and the coming of great tribulation is predicted (Mk 13¹⁹; cf. Zeph 1¹⁵, Dn 12¹). 'The inhabitants of the earth . . . shall fall into many tribulations. . . . And it will come to pass when they will say in their thoughts by reason of their much tribulation: "The Mighty One doth no longer remember the earth"—yea, it will come to pass when they abandon hope, that the time will then awake' (Apoc. Bar. xxv. 3, 4). The faithful martyrs who have come out of the great tribulation will receive the highest place of honour in heaven (Rev 7¹⁴). 'To the wicked the Judgment is 'the day of tribulation' (4 Ezr. ii. 27 RV; cf. 1 En. i. 1, xvi. 2), when they shall be recompensed for the tribulation which they have inflicted on the righteous (2 Th 1⁶).

LITERATURE.—J. Weiss, Die Schriften des NT, Göttingen, 1907, s.v. 'Trübsal' in Index; P. Volz, Jüdische Eschatologie, Tübingen, 1903, § 31; DCG, s.v.; John Foster, Lectures, London, 1853, lect. xli.

WILLIAM WATSON.

TRIBUTE.—The Roman system of taxation prevailed generally in those countries where Christians were living in the Apostolic Age. The taxes were of two kinds, viz. (1) indirect, such as customs-duty levied on merchandise in transit; and (2) direct, consisting of (a) taxes imposed upon products of the land (tributum soli or agri) and (b) poll-tax (tributum capitis). The indirect taxes were commonly controlled by local authorities who farmed them out to the so-called 'publicans.' The publican paid the Government a fixed sum for the privilege of collecting the customs from a given territory, reimbursing himself and paying his subordinates out of the surplus. Although the amount to be collected on different articles was probably in most cases fixed by law (see especially the Palmyrene inscription edited by Schroeder in SBAW, 1884, pp. 417–433), the collector frequently grew rich on the profits; and it is not improbable that he often made excessive assessments (cf. Lk 3¹³ 19⁸). On the other hand, the direct taxes—the 'tribute' proper—were not farmed out, but were collected by Roman officials. Levies on the products of the soil were paid partly in kind and partly in money, and the poll-tax was paid in Imperial coinage (Lk 20²⁴). From time to time in the provinces a census was taken (cf. Lk 2¹⁴) as a basis for regulating taxation.

Christians in apostolic times must have been quite familiar with all these forms of taxation, although the Christian writings of the period contain only a few references to these matters. It is true that the publicans (τελώναι) appear somewhat frequently in the Gospels (8 times in Mt., 3 times in Mk., 10 times in Lk.; also τελος in Mt 17²⁵, Ro 13⁷; and τελώνιον in Mt 9⁹ || Mk 2¹⁴ || Lk 5²⁷), but reference to direct taxation—the payment of 'tribute'—is less frequent. In Ro 13⁶ St. Paul admonishes his readers to pay tribute (φόρους) as a matter of conscience, since rulers are God's instruments in the preservation of civic order. All three Synoptic Gospels report an incident in which Jesus had advised submission to the existing order, even to the extent of paying the Imperial tribute (κῆνσος, Lat. census, Mt 22¹⁷, 19, Mk 12¹⁴; but φόρος in Lk 20²² 23² and σηράριον in Lk 20²⁴). The dues payable to the Temple in Jerusalem are also spoken of as 'tribute' (κῆνσος) in Mt 17²⁵, where Jesus again advised submission for practical reasons, although affirming that ideally Christians were free from this obligation.

LITERATURE.—J. J. Wetstein, Norum Testamentum Græcum, Amsterdam, 1751–52, i. 314–316; J. Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, ii. 2 (Leipzig, 1884) 150 ff., 261 ff., 289 ff.; B. P. Grenfell and J. P. Mahaffy, Revenue Laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus, Oxford, 1896; U. Wilcken, Griechische Ostraka aus Aegypten und Nubien, Leipzig, 1899, i. 194 ff.; E. Schrader, GJV 1⁴ (Leipzig, 1901) 474 ff., 510 ff.

S. J. CASE.

TRINITY.—See GOD.

TRIUMPH.—This verb (θριαμβεύειν) is used in later Greek as the equivalent of the Latin triumphare, to which it seems to be etymologically akin. It occurs twice in the NT—2 Co 2¹⁴, Col 2¹⁵. In Col 2¹⁵ the Crucifixion is represented as the triumph which crowns the Holy War of redemption. As the Roman conqueror led the vanquished captives in triumphal procession up to the Capitol and offered them to the supreme God, so in exalting to His right hand the Crucified Christ, by whom He has reconciled us unto Himself in the body of His flesh through death, God led in triumph the 'principalities and powers,' the world-governing spirits who are unfriendly to man, and to whose dominion man in the state of nature is subjected. The thought of the passage is similar to that of 1 Co 2⁸, where the spirit-rulers of this world are represented as ignorantly bringing about that crucifixion through which their own power is brought to naught (1 Co 15²⁴). In 2 Co 2¹⁴ the general meaning is clear. 'In a magnificent figure Paul represents himself as by God's ordinance sharing, in his travels through the world, the triumph Christ is celebrating over all that has withstood His cause' (A. Menzies, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 1912, p. 17). But in what capacity—as conqueror or as captive? The only meaning which the known usage of the word justifies is that St. Paul himself is the most auspicious trophy of the conquering power of Christ (Heinrici, Bousset). Many modern commentators, however (Schmiedel, Menzies, etc.), give the verb an active sense, 'maketh us to triumph' (AV), on the ground that, though no lexical parallel is found, the sense of the passage requires it. Others (Theodoret, Lietzmann) take the word in the more general sense of

'to lead about in a conspicuous manner,' for which Lietzmann quotes corroborative instances from Suidas. The RV 'leadeth us in triumph' is felicitously ambiguous. ROBERT LAW.

TROAS (Τρωάς).—Troas was a seaport on the N.W. coast of Asia Minor, opposite the island of Tenedos, midway between the Hellespont and Cape Lectum, and about ten miles south of the much more ancient Troja (Ilium). The name was an abbreviation of 'Trojan Alexandria' (Ἀλεξάνδρεια ἡ Τρωάς, Strabo, XIII. i. 2, Ptol. v. ii. 4; or Ἀλεξάνδρεια τῆς Τρωάδος, Strabo, II. v. 36; or Ἀλεξάνδρεια ἡ ἐν τῇ Τρωάδι, Paus. X. xii. 2). The qualifying adj., Τρωάς, which was needed to differentiate this Alexandria from the many other cities of the same name, came to be used sometimes alone (as in Pliny, HN v. 33, ipsaque Troas), though this led to ambiguity, Troas (ἡ Τρωάς, the Troad) being properly the whole territory once ruled by the kings of Troy.

The city, which was founded by Antigonos and named Antigonía Troas, was enlarged and improved by Lysimachus and renamed Alexandria. The names are found together on some coins. 'It appeared to be an act of pious duty in the successors of Alexander first to found cities which should bear his name, and afterwards those which should be called after their own. Alexandria continued to exist, and became a large place; at present' [i.e. under Augustus] 'it has received a Roman colony, and is reckoned among celebrated cities' (Strabo, XIII. i. 26). Troas was under the power of the Seleucids till the defeat of Antiochus the Great at Magnesia in 190 B.C., after which it was a free city of the kings of Pergamos, the last of whom bequeathed his realm to the Roman Republic in 133 B.C. The Troad had a romantic interest for the Romans as the traditional motherland of their race, and the honours which they lavished upon the city were the expression of a kind of filial devotion. As a colony with the ius Italicum, and as the seaport of a fruitful country, Troas rose to the front rank among the cities of Asia Minor. According to Suetonius (Jul. 79), Julius Caesar had thoughts of making it the capital of the Empire instead of Rome, and Augustus may have played with the same idea (Hor. Od. III. iii. 61 f.), which finally presented itself as a possibility to Constantine three centuries later, before he decided to make Byzantium the future seat of the Empire (Zosim. ii. 30).

St. Paul's connexion with Troas illustrates the high pressure at which he habitually worked. He was at least three times in the city, and could not but earnestly desire to stay and plant a church in a place of such importance, but each time he was torn away from it to some other sphere of labour. To Troas he came down from the borders of Bithynia, and received the vision which made him 'immediately' embark for Europe (Ac 16⁷⁻¹⁰). To Troas he came again, after his flight from Ephesus (Ac 20¹⁻⁹), 'for the gospel of Christ,' eager to preach to willing hearers, yet restlessly preoccupied by thoughts of Corinth, and soon compelled to turn his back upon 'an open door' (2 Co 2¹²⁻¹³). On a third visit he 'tarried seven days,' on the last of which—a Sunday—he took no sleep, but preached till midnight, breaking bread, and talking 'till break of day,' knowing that his ship was waiting him in the harbour (Ac 20⁶⁻¹²). On the Monday morning his companions went on board to rest, but the wakeful Apostle discovered that he could give a few more hours to Troas, take the short overland route—doubtless not on foot, if Christian courtesy and gratitude meant anything—to Assos, 20 miles distant, and there catch his ship after she had rounded Cape Lectum. And meanwhile how much could be done in the last flying hours of intimate and unforgettable fellowship!

On the theory that St. Paul never again visited Troas, it must be assumed that this was the occasion on which he left behind him the cloak and the parchments which Timothy was afterwards requested to bring to Rome (2 Ti 4¹³). But those who believe in the Apostle's release from prison hold that Troas was one of the places to which he returned. The point is fully discussed in A. C. McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 407 f.

Troas is now almost deserted. It bears the Turkish name of Eski Stambul or Old Constantinople, and its former greatness is attested by the extent of its ruins, including the old walls, which are six miles in circumference, and the supports of an aqueduct which conveyed water down from Mount Ida.

LITERATURE.—R. Chandler, *Travels in Asia Minor and Greece*³, London, 1817; Murray's Handbook to Asia Minor, do., 1895. JAMES STRAHAN.

TROGYLLIUM (Τρωγύλλιον, WH Τρωγύλιον).—Trogyllium was a promontory formed by the western termination of Mt. Mycale, on the coast of Asia Minor, about equidistant from Ephesus and Miletus. It runs out into the sea just opposite the island of Samos, from which it is separated by a channel less than a mile wide (Strabo, XIV. i. 12, 13). Its present name is Santa Maria. According to the TR of Ac 20¹⁵, St. Paul's ship, after leaving its anchorage at Chios, struck across to Samos, and, having tarried at Trogyllium, came the following day to Miletus. This in itself is likely to have happened, and, though the words καὶ μετὰ τὴν ἐν Τρωγύλλῳ are omitted by the great MSS (Σ ABCE), they are retained by Meyer, Alford, Blass, and Ramsay on the strength of DHP and many ancient versions. The reason for their omission may have been either the mistaken idea in the mind of the copyists that the text located Trogyllium in Samos, or the difficulty of imagining two night-stoppages, one in the harbour of Samos and another at Trogyllium, which is only 4 or 5 miles from Samos. But a night spent at Samos is quite imaginary, for the nautical term παρεβόλεμεν does not mean 'arrived at' (AV) or 'touched at' (RV). All that it implies is a crossing from one point to another; and, while Samos was merely sighted and passed, Trogyllium was the resting-place. An anchorage just to the east of the extreme point of Trogyllium now bears the name of 'St. Paul's Port' (W. J. Conybeare and J. S. Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1877, ii. 264 n.). JAMES STRAHAN.

TROPHIMUS (Τρόφιμος).—Trophimus was a Christian convert belonging to Ephesus (Ac 21²⁹) and a companion of the apostle Paul on his third missionary journey (20⁴). He is called along with Tychicus an Asian (Ἀσιανός), and the two appear together as deputies of the Ephesian church, by which they were appointed to carry their contribution to the poorer brethren of Jerusalem. Both were with St. Paul in Macedonia and accompanied him to Asia, and thence preceded him to Troas, where they were joined by the delegates from the other churches—Sopater of Beroea, Aristarchus and Secundus from Thessalonica, Gaius of Derbe, and Timothy. After the Apostle's arrival at Troas the whole company seem to have journeyed together to Jerusalem. We find from 21⁹ that Trophimus had been seen in the Apostle's company in Jerusalem, and the riot raised against the Apostle was made ostensibly on the ground that St. Paul had introduced Trophimus, a Gentile, into the Temple.

We have no means of knowing whether Trophi-mus accompanied St. Paul to Rome after his appeal to Caesar, but we find him again in the Apostle's company after the first imprisonment. He is mentioned in 2 Ti 4²⁰ as having been left at Miletus sick. In 2 Co 8¹⁸⁻²⁴ reference is made to two companions of the Apostle who accompanied Titus from Ephesus to Corinth with the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. It has been suggested that these two were the Ephesian friends of the Apostle, Tychicus and Trophimus, who had previously been appointed to travel with him, carrying the offerings of the Churches (2 Co 8¹⁹). We have, however, far too scanty evidence to make any certain identification (cf. J. H. Bernard, in EGT, '2 Corinthians,' 1903, p. 89). W. F. BOYD.

TRUMP, TRUMPET (σαλπιγξ, from σαλπίζειν, 'to sound a trumpet').—The word appears once in the Gospels, in the eschatological discourse of Jesus (Mt 24³¹), where we learn that the elect are gathered by trumpet-call for the final judgment. There are three references to trumpet in the Pauline Epistles, one in Hebrews, and six in Revelation. σαλπιστής (classical Greek, σαλπικτής) appears only in Rev 18²².

'The sound of a trumpet' (He 12¹⁹) occurs in the description of the scene at Sinai, and is illustrative of the awe-inspiring character of the Jewish dispensation. The passage from which it is taken (vv 13-23) closes the main argument of the Epistle, and 'offers a striking picture of the characteristics of the two Covenants summed up in the words "terror" and "grace"' (cf. B. F. Westcott, *The Epistle to the Hebrews*³, London, 1903, p. 411 f.). In 1 Co 14⁸ St. Paul continues his illustration from music to criticize an unedifying speaking with tongues. 1 Co 15⁵ develops his eschatological doctrine. The verse is part of the climax of the Pauline argument which bases the future resurrection on the resurrection of Christ. The trumpet blast seemed to his Jewish mind a fitting accompaniment of an unparalleled scene of Christian triumph. The reference in 1 Th 4¹⁶ is also eschatological. Once again the trumpet betokens majesty and command, and it may be that St. Paul had in his thought the Jewish tradition of archangelic music (cf. Jude 9¹⁴; and B. Jowett, Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans, 2 vols., London, 1855, i. 73-75).

The other references to trumpet appear in Revelation. In two of these it is used as a figure of speech to define the voice of the angel (1¹⁰), just as 'the sound of many waters' describes the speech of 'one like unto the Son of man' (v. 13). In Rev 8-6. 13 9¹⁴ we read of the seven angels who sounded their seven trumpets to the discomfiture of the earth. The imagery of the Apocalypse is in keeping with Jewish tradition, which saw in the trumpet-call the music appropriate to angels. H. B. Swete holds that the picture in Rev 8 has as its basis the scene of law-giving described in Ex 19¹⁶, and he sees possible allusions to Jos 6¹³ and to Jl 2¹ (cf. *The Apocalypse of St. John*², London, 1907, p. 107).

Thus the trumpet, which was so closely connected with Jewish ceremony in war and religion, acquired definitely Christian associations in the Apostolic Age. In the AV, 'trump,' 'trumpet,' and 'cornet' (cf. S. R. Driver, Joel and Amos, Cambridge, 1897, p. 144) are the translations of the two Hebrew wind instruments, שֹׁפָר and חֲזָזָה. In early Hebrew history they were used for secular purposes, such as signalling the approach of an enemy (Hos 5⁸, Am 3⁶), but in later days their use became increasingly religious. This is especially true of the latter. But, however they may have been confused in earlier times (cf. HDB iv. 816), they were different instruments in use, shape, and material. The שֹׁפָר was made of horn, usually that of a ram (Driver, op. cit., p. 144), and was blown at certain Jewish festivals. The חֲזָזָה, unlike the Roman tuba, was recognized as a priestly instrument. We read of it, for example, in Josephus (BJ iv. ix. 12). From Nu 10¹⁻¹⁰ we learn that Moses made two trumpets of silver, which the priests sounded on occasions of assembly, pilgrimage, and festival. The mention of seven trumpets in 1 Ch 15²⁴ and Neh 12⁴¹ is interesting in view of Rev 8². Josephus (Ant. III. xii. 6) gives a description of a trumpet, in which he mentions that it was about one yard long and a little wider than the flute, that at its mouthpiece it was somewhat expanded, and that, like the war-trumpet, its extremity was bell-shaped. This description is borne out by a coin struck in the days of the Emperor Hadrian. On the relief of the Arch of Titus there is a representation of two trumpets which appear similar to those of Egyptian origin, but are longer than those described by Josephus (ib.). For these representations compare J. Wellhausen, 'Psalms' in R. Hanpt's PB, p. 220. ARCHIBALD MAIN.

TRUTH.—In the apostolic documents the simplest meaning given to 'truth' is that of sincerity. St. Paul, writing of the different motives that had impelled people to make known the gospel of Christ, declared that he rejoiced that Christ was proclaimed 'whether in pretence or in truth' (Ph 1¹⁸). The same Apostle called upon the Corinthian Christians to banish all insincerity from their holiest religious ceremonies. 'Let us keep the feast not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth' (1 Co 5⁸). Even in passages like these it is evident that 'truth' tended to acquire a deeper and wider meaning, passing from mere sincerity to conformity with the highest ethical claims. The standard of ethical truth was embodied in Jesus, who was set forth as the example to which Christians should conform. Thus St. Paul warned his readers against a life of lasciviousness by recalling the way in which they had learned Christ, 'if so be that ye heard him, and were taught in him, even as truth is in Jesus' (Eph 4¹). (This passage is sometimes taken as asserting the identity of Jesus and the Christ, but the old reading and interpretation seem preferable.) For the most part, however, the apostles speak of truth as equivalent to truth κατ' ἐξοχήν, the revelation of God that reaches its fullness in the gospel of Christ. St. Paul made it synonymous with 'the gospel of your salvation' (Eph 1¹³), and, writing to the Thessalonians, he described the Divine and human sides of conversion as 'sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth' (2 Th 2¹³). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews declared that for those who sinned wilfully after they had gained a full knowledge of the truth there could be no further sacrifice for sin (He 10²⁶). In the Pastoral Epistles this use is specially prevalent—e.g. 1 Ti 2⁴, 'God willeth that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth'; 1 Ti 3¹⁵, where the Church of the living God is described as 'the pillar and ground of the truth'; 2 Ti 2¹⁵, 'a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the word of truth.' While these various aspects of truth are suggested in the apostolic writings, it would be a mistake to suppose that the apostles regarded truth as consisting of separate entities; rather they regarded it as a unity embodied in Jesus Christ, so that intellectual sincerity, ethical purity, doctrinal enlightenment, and spiritual experience were all manifestations of the one living and true God. This unity of truth seems to be the thought underlying the general principle set forth by St. Paul that 'we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth' (2 Co 13⁸). No one has power against truth, for all truth and all kinds of truth are one in God: the only power is given to those who seek to act in the service of truth. Wherefore it is the denial of God to endeavour to advance truth by any means that fails to yield to truth in every department of human thought and life.

Truth was fully embodied and expressed in Jesus Christ, but before His coming there had been partial revelations of truth 'by divers portions and in divers manners' (He 1¹), and St. Paul felt free to acknowledge that the Jew might claim that he had in the law 'the form (μόρφωσιν) of knowledge and of the truth' (Ro 2²⁰). This outward form was determined by the inner truth of which it was the outline or expression, but it was at the best only partial and imperfect. The apostles further taught that the truth of God outlined in the Law and embodied in Christ was brought home to the heart and mind of men by many various methods, but that all these methods received their virtue through the vitalizing influence of the Holy Spirit. The Day of Pentecost left its mark not only on the life but also on the teaching of the Apostolic Church, and St. Paul in his special experience learned on the way to Damascus and in the solitude of the desert that the gospel came to him through no human means but through revelation of Jesus Christ (Gal 1²). Hence there was constant insistence on the agency of the Holy Spirit as the real source of enlightenment in the truth of God. At the same time it was recognized that there was great diversity in the Spirit's working, for there was no dead uniformity in His operations. St. John offers the chief example of the revelation of truth being given by direct vision, and in his Apocalypse he shows how he received in this way the knowledge of things present and future when he was in the spirit on the Lord's Day. St. Paul claimed that he also was indebted to visions for knowledge that he had received, and for the hearing of 'unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter' (2 Co 12⁴). But such experiences were acknowledged by him to be unusual, so that he indulged in some modest boasting on account of the exceptional privilege granted to him. The more usual method of illumination was by the Spirit's interpreting the life of Jesus Christ to the needs of human experience, and making the Scriptures of the OT radiate a new meaning in the light of the sacrifice and work of the Saviour. Thus the Suffering Servant of Jahweh of Deutero-Isaiah led to a better understanding of the Crucified Lord (Ac 8³⁵), and prophets as well as private Christians learned the truth better through examination of the Scriptures (17¹¹).

One source of progressive knowledge was found by the apostles in the facts of their experience, an experience that covered not only their fellowship with Christ in the days of His flesh, but also the mighty working that followed His ascension to the right hand of God. This may be illustrated by the advance in truth that followed the outpouring of the Spirit of God upon Gentiles who believed in Jesus as the Redeemer. To St. Paul especially this fact of experience brought the assurance of God's readiness to save and bless all men through faith in Jesus Christ without the necessity of their submitting to any rite of Jewish origin. Thus there was heralded forth by him the free grace of God in Christ to all sinners. But in order that the truth of God might be received it was necessary, according to the apostles, that it should be not only understood but also obeyed (Gal 5⁷). The heart and will were as powerful as the mind in influencing the attitude to the truth in Christ. This not only was asserted positively, but may be inferred also from the reasons assigned by the apostles for some people not receiving the truth. Stephen in his defence charged those who denied Jesus Christ and His gospel with the crime of resisting the Holy Ghost as their fathers had been guilty likewise in persecuting the prophets (Ac 7⁵¹⁻⁵²), while St. Paul impressed upon his unbelieving hearers the fact that they might see and hear the truth, and yet be so hardened in their hearts that they would not believe (Ac 28²⁶). Indeed in his contrast of ψυχικός and πνευματικός St. Paul asserted that the spiritual truths could not be discerned by the natural man even with his highest intellectual capacity but only by the spiritual man in whom the Divine Spirit is living and working (1 Co 2¹⁴; cf. Ro 8³, 1 Jn 4⁶). But the apostles never exalted mere 'spirituality' at the expense of the moral side of life, for they insisted that nothing hindered the reception of truth more than a low ethical life. St. Paul foretold a time when men would be guilty of all excesses, loving pleasure more than God, and, led away by divers lusts, would be 'ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth' (2 Ti 3¹⁻⁷), and the same Apostle ascribed the lack of the free expansion of truth in some people to the fact that they kept it down by their unrighteous lives (Ro 1¹⁸). St. James, as might be expected, associated knowledge of truth with moral qualities such as the grace of meekness, and the absence of bitter envy and rivalry (Ja 3¹³⁻¹⁴). St. Peter was marked with the same spirit, for he traced the golden cycle of Christian experience as leading from purity of soul by obedience to the truth onwards inevitably to the love of the brethren (1 P 1²²). Thus the beginning and the ending of the Christian reception of truth were indissolubly linked to purity and love.

LITERATURE.—F. J. A. Hort, The Way, the Truth, the Life, Cambridge, 1893, p. 41 ff.; W. P. DuBose, Soteriology of the NT, London, 1892, p. 299; H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der NT Theologie, Freiburg i. B., 1896-97, ii. 375 f.; R. H. Hutton, Theological Essays, London, 1895, p. 19 ff.

D. MACRAE TOD.

TRYPHÆNA (Τρύφαινα, a Greek name).—Tryphæna is a woman saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹² and coupled with Tryphosa. The two are generally supposed to have been sisters, 'or at least near relatives, for it was usual to designate members of the same family by derivatives of the same root' (J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians, London, 1878, p. 175). It is possible, however, that we have here twin-names denoting twin-sisters, either form being a feminine of Τρύφων according as the accent falls on the first or the second syllable. Similar twin-names, in which a slight modification of the consonants or vowels is sufficient to distinguish one from the other, are Huz and Buz (Gn 22²¹), Muppm and Huppm (46²¹), Yama and Yami (Rigveda), Romulus and Remus, Baltram and Sintram (see J. R. Harris, The Dioscuri in the Christian Legends, London, 1903, p. 1 f.). Tryphæna and Tryphosa are described as women 'who labour in the Lord' (τὰς κοπιώσας ἐν κυρίῳ). The verb, which suggests painstaking effort, is used in Ro 16 of women only—of Mary (v. 6), of Persis (v. 12)—but elsewhere describes apostolic and other ministerial labours. It is unlikely, therefore, that the work of these women was limited to practical benevolence, such as showing hospitality (see art. PERSIS). We shall picture their activity at Rome or Ephesus according to our view of the destination of the salutations in Ro 16. Both names are found in inscriptions of the Imperial household (Lightfoot, op. cit.).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

TRYPHOSA (Τρυφώσα, a Greek name).—A woman saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16¹² and coupled with Tryphæna (q.v.).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

TUNIC.—See COAT.

TUTOR.—The word 'tutor,' which has taken the place of 'schoolmaster' (g.v.) in the RV of Gal 3²⁴, and of 'instructor' in 1 Co 4¹⁵, has itself given place to 'guardian' in the only passage of Scripture where it formerly appeared—Gal 4². It has in this passage, however, not an educational but a strictly legal connotation, rendering the word ἐκτελεστικός, in close connexion with οἰκονόμος—'guardians and stewards.' The ἐκτελεστικός is here employed to describe the guardian of the child under the will of the father, potentially if the father is still alive, actually if he is dead. Bengel calls the ἐκτελεστικός tutor heredis, the οἰκονόμος curator bonorum. Under Roman law a minor came of age at twenty-five, and was under a tutor till fourteen and a curator till his minority ceased. This was 'the day appointed of the father,' and St. Paul here compares the state of the world, both Jewish and Gentile, before Christ came to an heir in his minority. Then 'when the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them which were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons' (Gal 4⁴).

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, London, 1899, pp. 381 ff., 392 f.

THOMAS NICOL.

TWELVE.—See NUMBERS.

TWIN BROTHERS.—See DIOSCURI.

TYCHICUS (Τυχικός, 'fortunate').—Tychicus was an Ephesian Christian who journeyed with St. Paul from Macedonia to Asia and preceded him to Troas (Ac 20⁴). Thence he accompanied him to Jerusalem on the Apostle's last visit there, acting along with Trophimus as a delegate of the church of Ephesus and conveying the offerings of the church to the poor brethren at Jerusalem. He was a companion of the Apostle during his first captivity, and was sent to Ephesus from Rome probably with the Epistle to the Ephesians. He is described by St. Paul as a 'beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord,' and he is entrusted with the duty of telling the Ephesians of the writer's welfare and of comforting their hearts (Eph 6¹). In the same way in the Epistle to the Colossians (Col 4⁷) he is described as 'a beloved brother and faithful minister and fellow-servant,' and the same duty is committed to him of telling the Colossians of the Apostle's condition and comforting their hearts. In 2 Ti 4¹² the writer tells Timothy that he has sent Tychicus to Ephesus, from which we may conclude that he was with the Apostle in his second captivity in Rome. The same conclusion is borne out by the reference in Tit 3¹², where the writer purposes to send either Artemas or Tychicus to Titus in Crete with the injunction that Titus should meet the Apostle at Nicopolis. It is possible that the reference in 2 Co 8¹⁸ to 'the brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the churches,' and who was deputed along with Titus and another unnamed Christian to carry the Second Epistle to the Corinthians from Ephesus to Corinth, may be Tychicus, and the other unnamed deputy may be Trophimus. This, however, is little more than conjecture, although from Ac 20⁴ we may gather that these two Ephesians were known to the church in Corinth, and that the two deputies referred to in 2 Co 8¹⁸ were also well known to those addressed.

A late tradition makes Tychicus bishop of Chalcedon in Bithynia. The Greek Menologion (9 Dec.) reports that he was bishop of Colophon after Sosthenes, and suffered martyrdom for the faith.

W. F. BOYD.

TYPE.—1. Word and idea.—Though τύπος and ἀντίτυπος both occur in the original, 'type' and its correlative 'antitype' are theological rather than Scriptural terms. In theological usage a type is a person or thing in the OT dispensation that represents and prefigures a person or thing in the NT, hence called the antitype. In the text of EV, however, neither 'type' nor 'antitype' is found, though RV gives 'in the antitype' as an alternative rendering in 1 P 3¹². Even in the Greek NT, where ἀντίτυπος occurs twice, the word appears to be employed not substantively but adjectively in the forms ἀντίτυπα (He 9²⁴) and ἀντίτυπον (1 P 3²¹), which RV renders respectively 'like in pattern' and 'after a true likeness'; while τύπος, again, which is of frequent occurrence, is used with a variety of meanings and only once (Ro 5¹⁴) in a sense corresponding to that of a doctrinal type. In Jn 20²⁵ it denotes the impression left by a stroke ('the print of the nails'); in Ac 7⁴³ the figure or image of a god; in 23²⁵ a form of writing; in Ro 6¹⁷ a form of teaching; in Ac 7⁴⁴, He 8⁵ a pattern or model for the making of the tabernacle. From this last meaning the transition is easy to the ethical sense of an example of conduct. In 1 Co 10⁶ it designates an example that is to be avoided; in other cases (Ph 3¹⁷, 1 Th 1⁷, 2 Th 3⁹, 1 Ti 4¹², Tit 2⁷, 1 P 5³) an example that is to be copied. In Ro 5¹⁴, where Adam is said to be τύπος του μέλλοντος (i.e. of Jesus Christ), and where EV renders 'figure,' the word is used at last in a doctrinal sense and the idea of type and antitype comes clearly into view.

When once this idea is accepted, however, it becomes evident that the NT uses of the word are far from exhausting the cases in which the idea is present. The contrasts in Col 2¹⁷ between the σκιά and the σῶμα, in He 8⁵ between the σκιά and the εὐαγγέλιον, in 10¹ between the σκιά and the εἰκὼν are all of them contrasts between types and their antitypes—between a prefiguring ordinance of the old dispensation and a corresponding spiritual reality of the new. The case is similar in Gal 4¹⁰⁻¹², where St. Paul contrasts the two covenants, in He 9⁹, where the author represents the first tabernacle as a παράβολη 'for the time now present,' and very notably in 5⁷, where he works out at length the relation between Melchizedek, 'made like unto the Son of God' (7³), and Jesus Himself, 'a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek' (5⁶ etc.). In these and many other familiar passages which will have to be considered more particularly, the NT authors bring before us the idea of type and antitype—the idea that persons, events, and institutions of the OT represent, and were designed by God to represent, persons, events, and institutions of the Christian dispensation.

2. Origin of the idea.—The typological idea, as it meets us in the NT, is not a peculiar or isolated phenomenon, but a natural outgrowth from the more general conception of the OT revelation as prophetic, and of Jesus and the gospel as fulfilling the hope and promise made to the fathers. The forward look of their own Scriptures was apparent to the Jews themselves; to the apostles it had become evident that what prophets and psalmists looked for was now in their very midst. Jesus had announced the arrival of the Kingdom of God and had declared Himself to be the expected Christ. On His first public appearance He had read a passage from Isaiah (61¹⁻²) which throbs with the good tidings of the Lord's acceptable year, and had said to the listeners, 'To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears' (Lk 4¹⁻⁴). From that time onward He had pointed out repeatedly that what was written in the OT Scriptures was now being accomplished, that what prophets and righteous men of old had desired to see and hear was now being seen and heard by those around Him (Mk 7⁶, Mt 13³⁷). That the Scriptures bore witness of Christ the disciples understood even during His earthly life, but their understanding of this fact was wonderfully enlarged by His death and resurrection, which cast a flood of light upon aspects of prophecy that had previously been obscured (cf. Ac 8²³⁻³⁵). St. Peter's speeches in Acts (cf. 2¹⁴⁻³⁰) and his First Epistle show how strong a sense he had that the Spirit of Christ was in the Prophets (1 P 1¹¹). To St. Paul with his larger outlook upon history and revelation the whole of Scripture was prophetic—the Law as well as the Prophets (Ro 3²¹); and so the Law became 'our tutor to bring us unto Christ' (Gal 3⁻⁴). With their view of the OT writings as prophetic of Christ and Christianity at point after point, it was natural that the NT authors should apply to the revelation in the history of Israel the principles they had already applied to its record, and should find Christ and the Christian salvation prefigured in the persons, events, and institutions of OT history, as they had already found them foretold in the OT Scriptures. Such an extension of the principle of prophecy from utterances to types was the natural outcome of a belief in a progressive revelation passing from a lower to a higher stage. If the older dispensation as a whole contained within it the promise of the Christ who was to come, it was only to be expected that there should be correspondences in detail between the two economies. Prophecy and type, indeed, run into each other, the difference being one of form rather than of nature, so that at times they are hardly distinguishable (cf. Is 28¹⁶, 1 P 2⁶). And, if the authority of Jesus Himself had been required for the adoption of a definitely typological interpretation of OT history, the apostles and other NT writers might recall His use of Jonah's experience to typify His own (Mt 12⁴⁰), of the wisdom of Solomon to suggest the wisdom of One greater than Solomon (v.⁴), of the flood that came in the days of Noah to prefigure the coming of the Son of Man (24^{37ff}), and of the serpent uplifted by Moses in the wilderness to stand as a prophetic symbol of the truth that the Son of Man must be lifted up (Jn 3¹⁴).

3. Applications of the Idea by apostolic Christianity.—(1) The primitive circle.—Springing naturally out of the conception of the OT as prophetic of the Christian dispensation, and being justified by the language of Christ Himself, the idea of type and antitype appears in the teaching of those who belonged to the original apostolic circle. Sometimes it is hardly distinguishable from the use of historical examples for purposes of illustration (1 P 3⁶, Ja 2^{21, 22}, 5^{11, 17}), but at other times it stands out with unmistakable clearness. In St. Peter's speeches in Acts Moses as a prophet becomes a type of Jesus Christ (3⁻), the covenant with Abraham of the blessings of the Christian salvation (v.^{25f}), the rejected stone which was made the head of the corner (Ps 118²²) of Jesus in His humiliation and exalted power (Ac 4¹¹). In 1 Peter the Apostle takes the unblemished lamb of the Passover (Ex 12⁹) to typify Christ as a lamb without blemish and without spot (1 P 1¹⁹), and sees in Noah's ark a prefiguration of baptism as a means of salvation (3²¹). In 1², again, the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ upon the elect is evidently an antitype of the action of Moses in sprinkling blood first on the altar and then on the people for the inauguration of the covenant (Ex 24⁸).

(2) The Pauline Epistles.—This typical conception of the history and institutions of Israel was taken up by St. Paul, and received from him much wider and more frequent application. Sometimes it is the persons or characters of the OT that he treats as types. In Ro 5¹⁴, 1 Co 15²² Adam, the natural head of the race, is taken as a type of Christ, the spiritual head. In Gal 3⁹ faithful Abraham is a type of all who believe the gospel. In 2 Co 3^{7ff} Moses with the glory on his face represents the more glorious ministration of the Spirit. In Gal 4^{22ff}, where allegory is blended with type through a deeper meaning being read into the OT narrative than it naturally bears, Sarah and Hagar, Isaac and Ishmael are used as types of Judaism in bondage to the Law and Christianity set free from its yoke. At other times types are found in the transactions or events of the OT narratives, as when the union of Christ with the Church is held to be prefigured by the union of Adam with Eve (Eph 5³²; cf. Gn 2²⁴), Christian baptism by the passage of the Red Sea (1 Co 10¹⁻⁴), the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper by the manna and water of the wilderness (vv.^{3, 4}), and Christ Himself by the rock from which the water flowed (v.⁴). Most frequently, however, it is in the religious institutions of the OT that St. Paul discovers types of the new economy. The paschal lamb and Christ (1 Co 5⁷; cf. Ro 3²⁵, Eph 5⁻), the Temple and the Christian Church (1 Co 3¹⁶, 2 Co 6¹⁶), the ministry of the altar and the ministry of the gospel (1 Co 9¹³), circumcision and baptism (Col 2^{11, 12}), the sacrificial communion of Judaism and communion at the Lord's Table in the body and blood of Christ (1 Co 10^{16, 17})—these are particular instances he gives of the fact that the institutions of the old dispensation were anticipative and symbolic of the new. In the later Epistles he states the case more broadly. In Col 2¹⁷ the general principle is laid down that the legal institutions of Judaism are only 'a shadow of the things to come,' viz. the institutions of the Messianic Age, while the body, i.e. the substantial reality, is of Christ. The antinomy between Law and Gospel which meets us in the earlier Epistles is now resolved, for he sees that the Law as a Divine ordinance was temporary, indeed, in its obligatory character, but possessed of an abiding significance as typical of the future blessings of the Kingdom of grace. Circumcision finds its meaning in 'a circumcision not made with hands' (v.¹¹; cf. Eph 2¹¹, Ph 3³), the expiatory sacrifices of tabernacle and temple in the self-surrender of Christ to God on our behalf (Eph 5²), the free-will offerings in those gifts of Christian liberality which are a sacrifice acceptable to God (Ph 4¹⁸), the whole Levitical service (λατρεία; cf. Ex 12²⁵ LXX) in a service wrought by the Spirit of God (Ph 3³) of which the self-sacrificing ministry (leitourgia; cf. Nu 8²²) of St. Paul to his converts (2¹⁷) or theirs to him (v.³⁰) may be taken as an example.

(3) The Epistle to the Hebrews.—In this Epistle we find the typological interpretation of the OT carried to its fullest results. Conceiving of religion as a covenant between God and man, the author's purpose is to prove to his Jewish readers that Christianity, the religion of the New Covenant, is better than Judaism, the religion of the Old; and the method which he employs is to draw a series of contrasts between the Old and the New regarded as type and antitype. If the doctrinal keynote of the Epistle may be found in the twice-quoted prophecy of Jeremiah, 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah' (Jer 31^{31ff}; cf. He 8^{8ff}, 10^{16ff}), the method of its apologetic argument is given when the legal service of tabernacle and temple is described as 'a copy and shadow of the heavenly things' (8⁵ RV), and the Levitical Law generally as 'having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things' (10¹). All through the Epistle there runs a series of contrasts between Judaism as preparatory and typical and Christianity as antitypical and perfect. (a) In the opening verses the fragmentary and varying revelation 'of old time' by the prophets is set over against God's speech unto us in His Son (1²⁻³), and this is immediately followed by the contrast of angels as ministering spirits sent forth to do service for the heirs of salvation (v. 14) with Him who was made a little lower than the angels that He might bring many sons unto glory (2⁹⁻¹⁰). (b) Next comes (3-4¹⁵) a contrast between Moses, a faithful servant in God's house, and Christ, a Son set over it (3⁵⁴), in the course of which a further contrast is drawn between the good tidings preached to the Israelites in the wilderness and the word of the Christian gospel (4²)—the promised rest of Canaan being used as symbolic of the rest that remains for the people of God (v. 9). The relation of type and antitype clearly underlies these two contrasts, but (c) in the next section of his work (4¹⁴⁻¹⁰), where a contrast is drawn out between the Levitical or Aaronic high priest of the OT and Christ, the Son, conceived as a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek, the author typologizes more boldly and directly, following here a suggestion derived from the OT itself (Ps 110⁴). Melchizedek, he says, the mysterious king-priest, was 'made like unto the Son of God' (He 7³); and he describes Christ not only as 'a high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek' (6²⁰; cf. 5⁶⁻¹⁰ 7¹¹⁻¹⁷ 21), but as a priest 'after the likeness of Melchizedek' (7¹⁵). Side by side, however, with this typology of likeness there is introduced a typology of contrast—the contrast between the order of Aaron and the order of Melchizedek (v. 11). If Melchizedek typifies Christ as another priest of the same order, Aaron typifies Him as a priest of a higher order than his own, who becomes the surety of a better covenant than that given under the Levitical Law (v. -; cf. v. 11). The anticipatory and typical relation of the Levitical priesthood, as serving that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things (8⁵), to the high priesthood of Christ, as ministering the heavenly things themselves (9²³) in the heavenly sanctuary (8¹⁻²), is carried by the author into great detail. The tabernacle that Moses pitched pointed to the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man (vv. - 5), and so became 'a parable for the time now present' (9⁹), i.e. for the age of the OT. The first covenant, inasmuch as it was not faultless, gives the promise of the second and better covenant (8⁶⁻⁷). In the passage of the high priest once a year into the holy place with his sacrifice of blood, the Holy Ghost signifies that the way into the holy place has not yet been made manifest (9⁸), and that Christ Himself must come as the Mediator of the New Covenant, offering Himself through the eternal Spirit without spot unto God (v. 14^c). In all these cases of contrast between the tabernacle made with hands and the greater and more perfect tabernacle, between the earthly ministry of the Levitical priesthood and the ministry of Christ Himself, the relation of type and antitype is made perfectly apparent. It is a relation between copies (ὑποδείγματα) of the things in the heavens and the heavenly things themselves (v. 23), between what is like in pattern (ἀντίτυπα) to the true (v. 24) and the enduring realities foreshadowed thereby.

(4) The Apocalypse.—The typology of the NT, so far as we have hitherto considered it, bears upon the relation between past and present; it consists in the use of persons or things in the OT to represent and prefigure the present realities of the Kingdom of God. But God's Kingdom has a future as well as a present, and when we reach the Apocalypse—a book that claims to be a revelation of 'things which must come to pass hereafter' (4¹; cf. 1¹)—we find that the writer goes to the OT for his types of the Christian future, just as St. Paul and the author of Hebrews have done for their types of the Christian present. In the messages to the Seven Churches, it is true, he deals with existing situations, and the use which he makes in this connexion of OT types does not differ in character from what we find in other books of the NT. The seven lamps of the golden lampstand in the tabernacle become types of the Seven Churches themselves (1¹²⁻²⁰); Israel's kings and priests, of a kingdom and priesthood to God already enjoyed by all whom Jesus has loosed from their sins by His blood (v. 5^c). And the history of Israel furnishes types not only of the living Christianity within the churches, but of a false doctrine and debased morality that were making the lamps of the churches burn dim—Balaam has his antitype in the contemporary Balaamites (2¹⁴) and Jezebel in the false and wicked prophetess by whom God's servants are seduced (v. 20).

But, apart from his rapid glance at existing circumstances in the churches with which he was familiar, the gaze of this writer is forward and upward; he is looking through a door opened in heaven, he is thinking of the things that must come to pass hereafter (4¹). From the actual churches in Asia he leads his readers to the great vision of the Church that is to be, saying to them in the words of the angel, 'Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the wife of the Lamb' (21⁹). And in his descriptions of the coming glory that is to crown the long struggles of the Church on earth he finds in the OT foreshadowing types of the final consummation. Some of his types are taken from the story of human beginnings in the early chapters of Genesis, as if to show the unity of the Divine plan from first to last. The Garden of Eden prefigures and anticipates 'the Paradise of God' (2⁷); the tree of life in the midst of the garden (Gn 2⁹), from which fallen man had to be debarred (3²²), another tree of life, whose fruit is given to be eaten (Rev 2⁷) and whose leaves are for the healing of the nations (22²). Other types are offered by the history of the chosen people and the chosen land. Sodom and Egypt have their spiritual counterparts (11⁸), the fall of Babylon becomes a parable of the fall of that great city which made all nations drink of the wine of her fornication (14⁸). The triumph song of Moses and the children of Israel (Ex 15¹, Dt 31²⁰ 32¹) becomes 'the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb' (Rev 15³); the manna by which Israel was fed in the wilderness tells of a hidden manna given to him that overcometh (21⁷); the twelve tribes reappear in the twelve companies of the sealed servants of God (7⁴⁻⁸); Jerusalem itself is transfigured into the new Jerusalem, the city of God (3¹⁻²¹ 21²⁻¹⁰); Mount Zion, to which the tribes went up, becomes the gathering place of the hosts of the redeemed (14¹⁻³). But, as was natural to one who conceived of the heavenly blessedness as consisting essentially in acts of adoring worship (7⁹⁻¹⁵ 22³), note that 'to serve [λατρεύειν] God' = 'to worship Him', the writer of this book finds his most frequent types in the sanctuary and sanctuary service of ancient Israel. The tabernacle in the wilderness anticipated that 'tabernacle of God' in which He shall dwell for ever with His people and they with Him (21³); the Temple in Jerusalem, 'the temple of God' which is in heaven (11¹⁹; cf. 3¹² 7¹⁵ and passim); the very pillars of the Temple are types of the strong overcoming soul who shall go out of the temple no more (3¹²). Aaron and his sons in their holy garments of glory and beauty (Ex 28¹⁵) reappear in the angels of the celestial temple 'arrayed with precious stone, pure and bright, and girt about their breasts with golden girdles' (Rev 15⁶). In antitypal reality the golden altar with its four horns (Ex 30³) still stands before God (Rev 9¹⁸; cf. 6⁸ 8³); the ark of the covenant is still seen in His temple (11¹⁹; cf. 'the tabernacle of the testimony,' 15⁵). There is a golden censer in the heavenly courts, and golden bowls full of incense; but the incense of heaven is the prayers of the saints (5⁸ 8³; cf. Lv 16¹²). And, as an atoning sacrifice was the central and culminating act of all the sanctuary worship of Israel (Ex 30¹⁰; cf. He 9⁷), Jesus, the antitype of all ancient sacrifice, appears predominantly (27 times) under the figure of 'the Lamb'—the sacrificial and victoriously redemptive significance of the name being made evident on its very first appearance in the book, when the Lamb is described as having been slain, and yet standing in the midst of the throne (Rev 5⁶ 9. 12; cf. 'I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore, and I have the keys of death and of Hades,' 1¹⁸), endowed with all might and all knowledge ('having seven horns, and seven eyes,' 5⁶), and yet having bought us with His blood (v. 9; cf. 7¹⁴ 12¹¹).

LITERATURE.—P. Fairbairn, The Typology of Scripture, 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1864; CE, s.v.; B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of NT, Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1882-83; W. Beyschlag, NT Theology, Eng. tr., 2, do., 1908.

J. C. LAMBERT.

TYRANNUS (Τύραννος).—In the narrative of St. Paul's sojourn at Ephesus we are told that after he had spent three months in arguing with the Jews in the synagogue he succeeded in rousing the hostility of their rulers to such an extent that he was compelled to withdraw from the synagogue altogether, and that he remained in the city for a period of two years, 'reasoning daily in the school of Tyrannus' (Ac 19⁹). The reference here is extremely vague, and it is not impossible that the first readers were more familiar with the situation alluded to than we can be.

There is a remarkable variation in the Greek text, and the original reading is doubtful. Some of the best MSS (e.g. NAB), several cursives (13, 27, 29, 81), and a number of the ancient versions (Sah. Boh. Syr. Pesh. Vulg. followed by Tisch. WH RV Weiss and Wendt) omit τινος ('a certain' Tyrannus), which we find in TR. Probably τινος is an addition by some early copyist, to whom Tyrannus was merely a name. Another variation is found in the addition by D and T and several versions of ἀπὸ ὧρας πέμπτης ἕως δεκάτης, which is accepted as original by several critics, including Blass, Belser, Nestle, Zockler, while Wendt sees in it a passage in which D has retained some elements of the original text, otherwise lost. B. Weiss (Der Codex D, in der Apostelgeschichte (TU xvii. 1 [Leipzig, 1897]), 110) thinks it may have been added according to an old oral tradition. Ramsay (The Church in the Roman Empire, p. 152, St. Paul, p. 270 f.) expresses the view that the phrase is probably part of the original text or at least that the tradition gives an actual account of the real state of affairs. He quotes Martial, ix. 68, xii. 57, Juvenal, vii. 222-226, to prove that schools opened at daybreak, and that by the fifth hour, 11 a.m., the pupils would be dismissed and the place free for the use of the Apostle.

The word σχολή, tr. 'school,' means originally 'leisure,' then 'the products of learned leisure,' 'treatises,' and lastly 'the place where literary instruction is given,' a 'school.' The 'school of Tyrannus' was in all probability some such place, where instruction was given, and more definitely where philosophic lectures were delivered. The question here arises, Is Tyrannus to be conceived of as a lecturer in philosophy in Ephesus at the date of the Apostle's visit, who gave his lecture-room for the use of the Christians? Two explanations are possible.

(1) If the reading τινος of TR, etc., be correct, the most probable theory is that Tyrannus was a private teacher in Ephesus who granted the use of his building to St. Paul either free or for hire. This view is strengthened if we accept the other addition to the text which we find in Codex Bezae, 'from the fifth to the tenth hour.' Tyrannus would thus be a teacher or lecturer who used his schola for the early hours of the day and left it free for the Apostle from one hour before noon to two hours before sunset. From Greek and Latin sources we find that the hours for teaching, and, in fact, for the general business of the day, were the early hours of the forenoon (cf. Ramsay's allusions to Juvenal and Martial referred to above). Ramsay (HDB iv. 822) expresses the opinion that the full Western text establishes the meaning of an otherwise obscure passage, giving a natural and satisfactory sense. He sees no reason to account for the additions to the text, but thinks that there was considerable temptation to allow the words to drop out, as they seemed quite unimportant to 3rd cent. students. But may not the words have been inserted by one who did not understand the reference to the school of Tyrannus and who desired to make it more intelligible?

It is impossible to settle the question whether this Tyrannus supposed to be teaching at Ephesus at the date of the Apostle's visit was a Jew or a Gentile. It is unlikely that an unconverted Jew would give his building for the Apostle's use and thus incur the hatred of his co-religionists, and the reference seems to imply that St. Paul had left the unbelieving Jews behind him in the synagogue and taken his adherents with him to the new meeting-place.

(2) The only other possible explanation is that the 'school of Tyrannus' was the name of some public building in Ephesus which had either belonged to or been used by a person named Tyrannus some time before, and been gifted to the city as a place of public instruction. Teachers of philosophy frequently gave lectures in public buildings or open spaces available to the whole population. Thus the apostle Paul himself addressed the Athenians in the Areopagus, while in an ancient Pompeian painting a schoolmaster is represented as teaching in the open forum. On the other hand, it is doubtful if the Apostle could have continued to teach for the period of two years in a public building unless he had received the sanction of the civic authorities to do so, and it is far from probable that he either sought or obtained such permission. At the same time, we have evidence that he was on friendly terms with the Asiarchs (cf. Ac 19³¹ 37), and it is not impossible that he may have been allowed to teach without any formal permission or recognition being granted. If the text of the best MSS, which has been adopted in the RV, be correct, then it does seem more than likely that the 'school of Tyrannus' was a public or semi-public place of resort and that the phrase would have as its modern equivalent some such expression as 'the McEwan Hall,' or 'the Trades Hall,' or the like. But the whole matter remains in uncertainty, and there is perhaps more to be said for the view implied in the Western text, that Tyrannus was a teacher lecturing in Ephesus at the date of the Apostle's visit.

LITERATURE.—R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 404; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 152, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 270 f., art. 'Tyrannus' in HDB; A. C. McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 285; F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894, p. 93. W. F. BOYD.

TYRE (Τύρος).—Tyre, the ancient mother of colonies and mistress of the seas, 'the merchant of the peoples unto many isles' (Ezk 27³), ceased to be politically important under the Greeks and Romans. But, along with the sister-city of Sidon, it still retained its commercial prosperity, though they had now a very formidable rival in Alexandria. 'Both,' says Strabo (XVI. ii. 22), 'were formerly, and are at present, illustrious and splendid cities, but which of the two should be called the capital of Phœnicia is a matter of dispute among the inhabitants.' Confined to an island-rock with a surface area of only 140 acres, in which room had to be found not only for dwelling-houses but for factories, dockyards, a canal, and a great temple, Tyre solved the problem of space in an un-Oriental manner by running up buildings of many stories, 'of more even than at Rome' (ib.). Since the time of a memorable siege by Alexander the Great (332 B.C.), the island had been connected with the mainland by a mole half a mile long, which was gradually widened by the accretion of sand—it is now $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile broad. In the Roman period, when 'the great number of dyeing works' rendered the city 'unpleasant as a place of residence' (ib.), suburbs began to rise along the coast, on or near the site of Old Tyre, Palæ-Tyros.

The Tyrians were devoted to the worship of Melkart ('king of the city'), whom the Greeks identified with Hercules (as in CIG 122, c. 180 B.C.). The coming of Christianity to Tyre was foreshadowed when many of its inhabitants journeyed to Galilee to see the Prophet of Nazareth, and when He returned their visit (Mk 3⁸, Lk 6¹⁷, Mk 7²⁴, Mt 15²¹). Luke relates that the dispersion of Christians from Jerusalem, consequent upon Stephen's death, sent preachers to Phœnicia, who confined their message to the Jews (Ac 11¹⁹); and, further, that the story of Paul's first missionary journey and of 'the conversion of the Gentiles' was told to 'all the brethren' of Phœnicia before it was heard by the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15³).

Ac 21³⁻⁶, which is a 'we-section,' gives an indication of the measure of progress made by the new faith in Tyre by A.D. 56 (C. H. Turner in HDB i. 423*), when Paul and Luke landed there at the end of the third missionary journey. They 'found the disciples,' but the verb (ἀνευροῦντες) implies that they had to 'look them up'—querendo reperire (F. Blass, Acta Apostolorum, Gottingen, 1895, p. 225)—evidently because the Christians were still numerically a feeble folk in the great heathen city. They are not called a church, yet among them were some who spoke 'through the Spirit,' with the rapt utterance of NT prophets. At the end of a week of fellowship, 'they all, with wives and children,'—the language still suits a small company of converts—escorted Paul and his comrades outside the city. On the beach there was enacted a sacred and pathetic scene very similar to the one at Miletus (20³⁶⁻³⁸), and with this the story of nascent Christianity in Tyre suddenly ends.

The Elder Pliny refers to the prosperity of Tyre, in the middle of the 1st cent., and indicates its staple trade in the words: 'Nunc omnis ejus nobilitas conchylio atque purpura constat' (HN v. 17). Jerome, at the end of the 4th cent., calls it still the first commercial city of the East, 'an emporium for the commerce of the whole world' (Com. ad Ezk on 26⁷ 27²). Septimius Severus made it a Roman colony, and among its illustrious citizens were Origen and Porphyry. From 1124 to 1291 it was an impregnable stronghold of the Crusaders. Deserted by the Christians after the fall of Acre, it was destroyed by the Muslims. It is now an unimportant town among scattered fragments of ruins (see PHœNICIA).

LITERATURE.—A. P. Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, new ed., London, 1877, p. 270; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, do., 1910, pp. 155-172; C. Baedeker, *Palestine and Syria*⁴, do., 1906, pp. 267-269.

JAMES STRAHAN.

U

UNBELIEF.—One of the great problems of the Apostolic Age was to account for the unbelief of the Jews. Unhappily, it was only too clear that the Jews not only had brought Jesus Christ to the Cross through their representative leaders, but also after Pentecost had refused to listen to the gospel preached by the apostles, and had become the main opponents of the Christian faith. To those whose eyes had been opened to see the glory of God in Christ Jesus, it seemed the strangest of all experiences that those whom God had taken to be His peculiar people, and to whom He had granted so many privileges, should have turned away in unbelieving scorn from the Lord who had come to be their Redeemer. Hence the poignancy of the confession: 'He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not' (Jn 1¹¹). In the apostolic history that experience was sadly repeated (Ac 13⁴⁵).

Three chief questions were raised by this unbelief of the Jews. (1) Did this unbelief not cancel the early promises made by God? (2) Did this unbelief not defeat God's plan? (3) Could God's salvation be complete apart from the Jewish people? These questions are dealt with by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans in the sympathetic method that might be expected from one whose pride in his ancient lineage was never concealed, and whose faith was clear and enlightened as well as intense. To the three-fold problem St. Paul made reply.

(1) The promises of God did not depend upon man, for God would keep His word whatever man might do. God would be true and faithful however His people might be convicted of falsehood and unbelief (Ro 3⁴). (2) God's purpose was both narrower and wider than was commonly supposed. In all the Jewish history the purpose of God was to redeem some within the Hebrew race to be the means of blessing, and even in the Christian era, as of old, there was a 'remnant' that believed and shared in the purposes of God. So too God's purpose was wider than was supposed. From the earliest times His plan looked forward to embracing the Gentiles within its scope, and through the very unbelief and defection of the Jews there had come a marvellous fulfilment of this wider purpose. 'By their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles' (11¹¹). (3) St. Paul believed with all his heart that the Kingdom of God would not be complete apart from the Jews. This was so far true even in the Apostolic Age. 'Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace' (11¹⁵). But in the future there would be a glorious return of the chosen people. St. Paul represented the Jews as being subjects of unbelief and disobedience, so that in the gracious purpose of God they might be objects of the Divine mercy. The Most High would unfold all the width of His salvation when after their period of darkness the Jewish people would come forth into the light.

Then would come the final consummation, and the receiving of them would be truly 'life from the dead' (11¹⁵).

The same problem of the unbelief of the Jews was treated in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The discussion in this Epistle centred round the rest of God into which God Himself entered after the work of creation, and to which He called His people. This rest was offered to Israel in the time of Moses and was not realized by them through unbelief. The mere entrance into Canaan under Joshua was no true fulfilment of the promise, for 'if Israel had believed they would have entered in, the Rest would have been appropriated, and God's gracious design satisfied, and a Rest would have been no more "left" for others' (A. B. Davidson, The Epistle to the Hebrews, Edinburgh, n.d., p. 98). When their unbelief left this rest still open, it was offered again by God in the new revelation that He made. His voice was heard through His Son in the end of those days in which He had spoken to the early believers on to the time when He should come again. Thus the promise that was unrealized in the Old Covenant was renewed in the New Covenant. These conclusions are largely the same as those reached by St. Paul—that unbelief marked the Jews in all their history, and that their unbelief opened the way to the receiving of the Gentiles. But there is not in this Epistle the forecast of the glorious future yet in store when Israel would turn again, only an insistence upon the need of giving diligence to enter into that rest, 'that no man fall after the same example of disobedience' (He 4¹¹).

It is worthy of note that in all these apostolic discussions unbelief and disobedience are almost interchangeable terms. Both words, apistia and ἀπειθεῖα, are derived from the same root and express the intimate connexion that is found between faith and life. What is thus suggested by the use of these words is corroborated by the general apostolic teaching, where unbelief is ascribed to the hardening of the heart (Ac 19⁹), to blindness caused by the god of this world (2 Co 4³⁻⁴), to the evil working of the prince of the power of the air (Eph 2¹⁻²), to the corrupt heart that believes a lie (2 Th 2¹¹⁻¹²). Hence we read of the evil heart of unbelief, and of the deceitfulness of this sin (He 3¹²⁻¹³). As unbelief sprang from moral causes it could be removed best by the declaration of the gospel wherein Jesus Christ was made known as meeting the moral and spiritual needs of life. It is for this reason especially that St. Paul magnified 'prophesying' in contrast to 'speaking with tongues.' He suggested that an assembly where all were speaking with this strange utterance would seem to an outsider like a gathering of madmen, and would confirm any unbeliever in his unbelief, whereas the general practice of prophesying would reach the reason and the heart of any unbelievers who happened to be present, and would lead such to confess that God was truly present in this Christian assembly (1 Co 14²²⁻²⁴). From such a passage as this it may be inferred that the apostles distinguished between those who were unbelievers because Christ had not been presented to them fully and those who had resisted the truth when it was made known to them and who had openly denied the Lord. The latter class, who 'denied that Jesus was the Christ,' seemed so base in the eyes of the apostles that St. John characterized it as Antichrist (1 Jn 2²²), and it seemed so hopeless of change that the same Apostle placed the unbelieving among the vilest, whose part shall be in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone' (Rev 21⁸). One phase of unbelief caused no little perplexity to the apostles, viz. unbelief among those who had professed their faith in Jesus as Christ and Lord. To the apostles this faith had so wondrously purified their hearts and enlightened their minds that they could hardly conceive of a faith that omitted some of the great essential truths. An example of this phase may be found in the Corinthian church, where many failed to believe in the resurrection of the dead and were not slow to express openly their unbelief. They accepted the common faith in the personal resurrection of Jesus Christ, but they seemed to have assumed that this was a unique occurrence, and to have rejected the general truth of the recovery and resurrection of the body as sharing in the Christian salvation. St. Paul in his reply asserted that such unbelief was destructive of the faith of the Church, and affirmed in some of the most brilliant passages of all his writings that the resurrection of Christians was part of the Christian redemption, gave inspiration to the Christian life, and crowned with glory the Christian experience (1 Co 15).

Two practical questions affecting the relation of Christians to unbelievers in the Apostolic Age are worthy of notice. The higher and nobler conceptions of marriage that arose through Christian teaching suggested to many the question whether relations contracted under pre-Christian conditions should be continued, especially where one spouse refused to accept the Christian faith and became an unbeliever. St. Paul dealt with this question in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, where he affirmed that the unbelieving spouse was sanctified by the believing member, that the Christian spouse was not to seek divorce from the non-Christian; but, if the latter insisted on separation, then it was to be acquiesced in. But such separation was undesirable, for peace was better for a Christian than disunion, and there was always the possibility that the unbelieving spouse might be won to the faith by the believer (1 Co 7¹⁰⁻¹⁶; cf. 1 P 3¹). On the other hand, marriage of a believer after conversion with an unbeliever was deemed an un-Christian act (2 Co 6¹⁴). The other practical question was with regard to the practice of Christians carrying their quarrels before unbelievers. The Corinthians were litigious as well as licentious, and even after they adhered to the Christian faith they were beset by their old weaknesses. They were guilty of quarrelling, and insisted so much on their presumed rights that they did not hesitate to go to law with a Christian brother before pagan judges. St. Paul denounced this practice as showing the lack of Christian love, as bringing disgrace upon the whole Christian community, and as implying that there were none within the Christian fellowship able to settle the petty differences that had arisen. Even the Jews exercised jurisdiction over internal affairs, and reckoned as guilty of impiety any of their number who brought a matter of law before idolatrous judges; much more should Christians shun heathen courts, and seek rather the judgment of their fellow-Christians, especially when they remembered that to believers was given by God the judgment of the world, and even of the angels in heaven (1 Co 6¹⁻⁶).

D. MACRAE TOD.

UNCIRCUMCISION.—See CIRCUMCISION.

UNCLEAN.—See CLEAN.

UNCORRUPTNESS (ἀφθαρσία).—The Eng. word is used in the AV only in 1 Co 15^{42, 50, 53, 54}, but the Gr. word occurs also in Ro 2⁷, Eph 6²⁴, 2 Ti 1¹⁰. The RV renders 'incorruption' not only in each of the four verses in 1 Co 15, but in Ro 2⁷ and 2 Ti 1¹⁰, where the AV has 'immortality.' In Eph 6²⁴ the AV gives 'sincerity' and the RV 'uncorruptness.' In Tit 2⁷ 'uncorruptness' (AV and RV) represents ἀφθορία (or ἀδιαφθορία). The noun ἀφθαρσία is derived from the adj. ἀφθαρτος (a priv. and φθείρω, 'to corrupt'), which is found in Ro 1²³, 1 Co 9²⁵ 15³², 1 Ti 1¹⁷, 1 P 1⁴ 23 3⁴, and in the RV is always rendered 'incorruptible.' The RV is correct in this consistent use of 'incorruptible' for ἀφθαρτος, and more correct than the AV in using 'incorruption' for ἀφθαρσία in those cases where the latter has 'immortality,' which properly represents ἀθάνασία (1 Co 15³³ 54, 1 Ti 6¹⁶). But corresponding to 'incorruptible' for ἀφθαρτος, 'incorruptibility' would have been still better than 'incorruption' for ἀφθαρσία (Tertullian [de Cultu feminarum, ii. 6] and subsequent writers render incorruptibilitas; Vulg. in most cases incorruptio, which probably suggested 'incorruption' or the EV), since the word really denotes the quality of imperishableness. The fact that 'incorruption' is the AV rendering in 1 Co 15, so familiar to English ears from its place in the order for the burial of the dead in the Book of Common Prayer, may have determined the Revisers to use it in that chapter, and the principle of adopting as far as possible a uniform rendering of particular words (see Revisers' Preface) would lead them to adhere to it elsewhere. In Eph 6²⁴ they have departed from their usage in other places by substituting 'uncorruptness' (AV 'sincerity'), but it is questionable whether by doing so they have brought out the writer's real meaning. It seems quite likely that he was employing the word in its usual sense, and was thinking not of the purity of the Christian's love for Christ, its freedom from corrupt elements, but of its incorruptibility, i.e. its imperishableness. In Ti 2⁷, where ἀφθορία is applied to the doctrine which Titus was to teach, that word is properly translated 'uncorruptness.'

It may be noted that when the two terms 'incorruptibility' (ἀφθαρσία) and 'immortality' (ἀθάνασία) are set side by side in 1 Co 15³³ 54, we are not to understand the former as applying to the body and the latter to the soul. In classical Gr. such a distinction might be valid, but not in the NT. If we read of God in 1 Ti 6¹⁶ 'who only hath immortality,' we also read in 1¹⁷ that He is 'the King eternal, incorruptible, invisible.' Unlike Plato, St. Paul has no doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul; and in 1 Co 15 he is dealing specifically with the resurrection of the body, so that 'incorruptibility' and 'immortality' are practically synonymous. J. C. LAMBERT.

UNCTION.—See ANOINTING.

UNDERGIRDING.—See SHIP.

UNGODLINESS (ἀσέβεια; the verb is ἀσεβέω and the adj. ἀσεβής).—ἀσέβεια is the religious designation and estimate of impious and immoral conduct (Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, p. 523); cf. Ro 1¹⁸, where it stands side by side with ἀδικία. It appears also in Ro 9²⁶, where it is in the plural in an OT quotation translating עֲוֹנָה. Elsewhere it occurs only in the Pastoral Epistles (2 Ti 2¹⁶, Tit 2¹) and Jude (v. 13). The verb ἀσεβέω occurs only in 2 P 2⁶, Jude 13; ἀσεβής is more frequent: Ro 4⁵ 6 (opp. δικαίος) 5⁶ 8 (synonymous with ἀμαρτωλός), 1 Ti 1⁹, 1 P 4¹⁸, Jude 15 (joined with ἀμαρτωλός); also in 2 P 2⁵ 3⁷, Jude 4.

Cremer remarks interestingly on the rare use of ἀσεβέω and the comparatively rare use of the whole group in the NT: 'Generally the negative and strong terms ἀδικεῖν, ἀσεβεῖν, ἀνοσία ποιεῖν, which occur often in profane Greek, are met with in Scripture far more rarely than the positive ἀμαρτανεῖν, . . . which in profane Greek was far less morally, and still less religiously, estimated. Herein is manifest, on the one hand, the far deeper religious view of Scripture, which estimates "failings," or sins of omission, so seriously, and, on the other, its deeper humanity, which does not resort to the strongest terms to designate whatever is actually sinful' (op. cit., p. 524).

It is an interesting point in NT criticism that the ἀσεβής group is not confined, like the opposed εὐσεβής group, practically to the Pastoral Epistles and 2 Peter. As we have seen, St. Paul uses ἀσεβής and ἀσέβεια not infrequently in Romans. This furnishes an argument to those who maintain the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epistles. In opposition to the argument that the use of the word εὐσέβεια, etc., in the Pastorals to express practical religion, both as faith and morals within the sphere of the Church, is un-Pauline and represents a stage of development entirely subsequent to the Apostle, it is argued that, even if there be a fresh emphasis on piety within the sphere of the Church in the Pastorals, the idea is one that might naturally have come to St. Paul in view of changing conditions, and that the linguistic argument from the absence of εὐσεβής, etc., in the earlier Pauline Epistles proves nothing, since his use of the opposed group shows that it was mere accident (see GODLINESS). For ἀσέβεια in the sub-apostolic writings see 2 Clem. xvi. 1, 'flee impiety'; and for ἀσεβής see 2 Clem. xviii. 1.

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, Biblico-Theological Lexicon of NT Greek, Edinburgh, 1880, p. 523 f.

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

UNION WITH GOD.—The idea of union with God, as conceived of by the apostolic writers, always implies an element of plurality and difference or distinctness as characterizing the being of which such union is affirmed (e.g. Jn 1¹). It is thus incompatible with the pantheistic conception of God as embracing all reality within an undifferentiated unity of being. Further, according to the apostolic conception, union with God, while it is not equivalent to simple identity with God, admits also of varying degrees of intimacy or perfection.

1. Union of Christ with God.—The apostolic idea of union with God, in the highest degree of intimacy and perfection, is most clearly illustrated and exemplified in the case of the historic personality of Jesus Christ, whose union with God is so intimate and complete that He can say with truth, 'I and the Father are one' (Jn 10³⁰).

Yet this oneness is not that of simple identity, so that Jesus could say, 'I am the Father,' but rather a oneness which is compatible with plurality and distinctness such as makes it possible for Him to say, 'My Father is greater than I' (Jn 14²⁸). This oneness of the historic Christ with God is explained by the apostolic writers in two ways, or as due to two sources or conditioning causes, one of which may be described as metaphysical and the other as moral or spiritual.

(a) From the metaphysical point of view, the oneness is explained as being due to the fact that the historic personality of Jesus Christ is the incarnation or a pre-existent Divine principle, or power of Deity, termed in the Fourth Gospel the Word or Logos, which belongs to the Divine essence, or eternally co-exists with God, and in the fullness of time becomes man (Jn 1¹ 3, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God'; Jn 1¹⁴, 'And the Word became flesh, and dwelt among us').

By St. Paul this pre-existent Divine principle or power of Deity, termed in the Fourth Gospel 'the Word,' is represented as already personal, and as becoming man by an act of voluntary condescension or 'self-emptying' motivated by love (2 Co 8⁹, 'Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor; that ye through his poverty might become rich'; cf. Ph 2⁵⁻⁷, 'Christ Jesus who, being in the form of God, counted it not a thing to be grasped to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men'). This conception of the nature and origin of the human personality of Jesus Christ, supplemented by the definite personification of a third principle or power of Deity, viz. the Holy Spirit, which, while one in essence, is yet also regarded as in some way distinct in function and activity alike from the Father and from the Son (Jn 14^{16, 17} 16⁷, etc.), gave rise to the Catholic Christian doctrine of the Trinity or Triunity of God which was explicitly set forth by the Council of Nicæa in A.D. 325. Union with God, metaphysically conceived of as predicated of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Spirit, was thus regarded not as equivalent to simple identity, but as admitting of plurality and distinctness within the fullness of the one God.

(b) From the moral and spiritual point of view, again, the oneness of Christ with God is explained by the apostolic writers as due to the perfect harmony of thought and feeling, desire and volition, subsisting between the historic Christ and God the Father Almighty. This point of view is seen in such sayings as Lk 24⁹, 'Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?'; Mt 11²⁷, 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him'; Jn 4³⁴, 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work'; Jn 5¹⁷, 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work'; 8²⁸, 'I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak'; Jn 14¹⁰, 'The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself: but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works.'

From this point of view, while the metaphysical background of the historic personality of Christ in the pre-existing Logos is not denied, it is not emphasized or made prominent as that which constitutes the oneness; the emphasis is on the rational, emotional, and volitional activities of the historic human personality, which are so intimately in harmony with the mind and will of God the Father that Christ is described as 'the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his person' (He 1³). Christ Jesus, by the free exercise of those faculties of knowledge, feeling, desire, and will which are the characteristic elements of human personality, so lifted human nature into union with the Divine that in His historic personality the invisible God is expressed or manifested in human form (Jn 1¹⁸, 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him'; Jn 14⁹, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father'). From this ethical and spiritual point of view, the oneness of Jesus Christ with God is not conceived of as a oneness completed from the first, apart from historical and ethical process, but as a oneness progressively realized or exhibited in a truly human life lived under human conditions. And, inasmuch as this oneness with God does not de-personalize or de-humanize Christ Jesus, but is compatible with His being truly man—the Son of man par excellence (Mt 12⁸)—it becomes the incentive and inspiring motive-power whereby Christian believers, through faith-union with Christ and participation in His Spirit, may hope to reach an ethical and spiritual union with God similar to, if less complete and perfect than, that of Christ (Jn 17²¹, 1 Co 6¹⁷). Neither in Christ's case nor in the case of Christian believers does union with God involve the de-personalizing, in any pantheistic way, of those persons who attain to such union. Whether metaphysically or spiritually regarded, union with God, according to the apostolic teaching, admits of plurality and distinctness of personality, which are yet not a barrier to a true oneness with God.

2. Union of the material world with God.—The apostolic writers are far from thinking of a union of the material world with God in any pantheistic sense, such as would tend to eliminate the personal existence of God, or do away with the distinction between the world and God. According to them, the material world owes its existence to a creative act of the will of the personal God (He 11³, Ro 1²⁰). It has a real existence for God, distinct from His own personal existence, though intimately related thereto. It is the expression of His thought, the product of His creative word, the instrument of His supreme all-controlling will.

Equally removed is their conception from a philosophic dualism like that of Plato, which would erect matter into a principle of being co-eternal with God the supreme Spirit, and serving, as the source of evil, to oppose an insurmountable limit to His omnipotence and infinitude.

Yet in the apostolic doctrine of the eternal Word, or the pre-existent Christ, and the way in which this is thought of in relation to God on the one hand, and to the material created world on the other, there are elements of affinity both with the dualistic and with the pantheistic view. Thus, in relation to God, the eternal Word is one with Him, yet there is plurality or distinctness (Jn 1¹). There is therefore an element of plurality or 'dualism' which is eternal, though not such as to be incompatible with the Divine oneness, or to thwart eternally the Divine sovereignty, for Son and Father are one.

Again, the eternal Word or pre-existent Christ is at once the active agent in creation, the underlying ground and teleological goal of the created universe, and the principle of coherence which gives meaning and system to the whole (Jn 1³, 'All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made. In him was life; and the life was the light of men'; Col 1¹⁶⁻¹⁷, 'All things have been created through him, and unto him; and he is before all things, and in him all things consist' [i.e. 'hold together']).

Thus the created world is not something entirely external to or apart from God, but is in intimate union with God, through the Logos, in whom it has its source, and ground, and principle of subsistence or coherence.

Yet this union of the material world with God, through the Logos, is not incompatible with its having a distinct existence for God as the product of His creative will and the instrument of His all-controlling power (He 11³). The union of the material world with God through the Logos, as thus presented, is metaphysical rather than moral or spiritual, and cannot be realized except through ethical and spiritual process. Yet the further thought seems to be expressed in the Pauline writings that, through the influx of sin, the created world as a whole has in some way become alienated from God, and 'made subject to vanity' (Ro 8⁻⁹), and that the issue of Christ's redemptive mission to the world is to be the reconciliation, not of humanity only, but of the whole created world, to God, in a moral and spiritual union which is at present lacking. The completed redemption of mankind will be accompanied by a renewed world fitted to be the home of the redeemed sons of God (Ro 8^{22, 23}, 'We know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body'; Col 1^{12, 20} 'It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and, having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven'; Rev 21¹, 'And I saw a new heaven and a new earth'.

3. Union of man with God.—The apostolic conception of the Logos as an essential principle in the nature of God, and also the underlying principle and teleological goal of creation, which conditions the apostolic conception of the material world and its relation to God, conditions also in a special way the apostolic conception of man and his relation to God.

As the highest of the creatures, the crown of creation, man stands in a relation of special nearness to the Divine Logos, who, while immanent in all created existence, is immanent with special fullness in man. Thus man is described as 'the image and glory of God' (1 Co 11⁷) and as 'living and moving and having his being' in God (Ac 17²⁸). This furnishes the basis for affirming a certain metaphysical union between man and God, in virtue of creation, which is yet not incompatible with plurality and personal distinctness. Further, the union between man and God which is due to creation, or to the fact that man's being is rooted and grounded in the Divine Logos, is not yet a complete ethical and spiritual union, but only furnishes the potential basis for such union, which awaits realization through ethical and spiritual process. Man as man is 'made in the image of God' (Gn 1²⁶) and predestined 'to be conformed to the image of his Son' (Ro 8²⁹) and to participate in the Divine eternal life. But this can be realized only through ethical process, involving the exercise of freedom of will by man as a moral personality distinct from, though intimately related to and grounded in, God. The influx of sin, through man's perverse misuse of his free will, is represented as hindering and preventing this intended spiritual union between man and God, which is the true goal of creation.

Sin is represented, in apostolic thought, as causing alienation and separation of man from God, with all the bitter consequences flowing therefrom (Ro 5¹⁻⁵, 1 Jn 3³, Ja 1¹³). Though man's being, as man, is rooted and grounded in the Divine Logos (Ac 17²⁸), yet sinful men are not in spiritual union with the holy God as sons in whom He is well pleased, but are alienated from Him and under His wrath and curse (Ro 1¹⁸ 2⁸ 3⁷⁻⁸, Eph 2³, Gal 3¹⁰, etc.). That perfect spiritual union of man with God which the natural head of our human race, the first Adam, failed to attain to, through sin, has, however, been attained to and realized in the Person of Jesus Christ the second Adam, who is the perfect 'Son of man' and also 'Son of God' (1 Co 15^{22, 45-49}). As made in the image of God, the form of man furnished a form of being capable of expressing the Divine Logos in fullness of measure. And, in the fullness of time, there appeared on earth a man in whom the Divine Logos was incarnate and dwelt in perfect fullness—the man Christ Jesus (Jn 1¹⁴, Ph 2⁶⁻⁸). In Him the incarnation of the Divine Logos receives supreme and perfect individual expression, and union of man with God is perfectly realized. And the aim and purpose of this incarnation of the Logos in the individual historic personality of the man Christ Jesus is said to be 'the bringing of many sons unto glory' (He 2¹⁰)—the bringing into being of a kingdom of redeemed humanity under Christ as King, in which love, the principle of the Divine nature, reigns supreme (Col 1¹³).

The fall of mankind under the power of sin, with all its bitter consequences, conditioned the task which the perfect Son of man and Son of God, when He appeared on earth, had to undertake and accomplish, in order to bring about reconciliation and effect the redemption and restoration of sinful men, and establish the Kingdom of God.

As the representative and head of our sinful race vicariously bearing our sins in His body (1 P 2²⁴) and on His Spirit (Mt 8¹⁷), He had to suffer and die, 'the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God' (1 P 3¹⁸). And it is through union with Him by faith that sinful men, alienated from God through sin, become reconciled to God and enter progressively upon that ethical and spiritual union with God which is man's true goal (1 Co 6¹⁷, 2 Co 5¹⁷⁻²¹, etc.). Thus, according to the apostolic conception, union of man with God, in the ethical and spiritual sense, implied in the relation of sonship to God, is not something already belonging to man in virtue of creation, and persisting in spite of sin, but something to be attained to and realized through ethical and spiritual process. And for sinful men the only way of attainment is through union by faith with Jesus Christ the 'one mediator between God and men' (1 Ti 2⁵). This union with Christ, and thereby with God, realized in the life of Christian faith, is brought about by the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit in the minds and hearts of individuals, working through the means of grace, viz. the Word, the sacraments, and prayer.

But, while the agency of the Holy Spirit in bringing about this union is emphasized and made prominent by the apostolic writers, the individual human personality is regarded, not as purely passive in the process, but as co-operating through free will, at least to the extent of yielding freely to the Spirit's gracious influences and allowing the life to be moulded thereby (Ro 8¹⁴, Ph 2¹²⁻¹³, 2 Co 3¹⁸). Union with God, mediated through the gracious influences of the Spirit, is thus set forth by the apostolic writers as essentially of an ethical or spiritual rather than of a mystical kind. It is not an ecstatic rapture of a Neo-Platonic kind, tending to dissolve the individual personality in a wider whole, though traces of such a conception are not altogether wanting in the apostolic records (e.g. 2 Co 12²⁻⁴). Rather is it an experience of an ethical and spiritual order, the goal of which is not the absorption of the individual in God, in a kind of Nirvana, but the completion and perfecting of all that is of worth and value in individual personality in loving communion with God through Christ (Jn 17²³, Rev 21³). The literature of the 1st cent., outside the canon of Scripture, including the epistles of Clement and Barnabas and perhaps the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, fragments of Papias, and the Shepherd of Hermas, so popular in the Church during the 2nd and 3rd centuries, contains nothing new or distinctive bearing on the subject of union with God as compared with the apostolic writings.

Clement has some fine passages about creation (Ep. ad Cor. xx., lix., lx.) in which a clear distinction is drawn between Creator and creature. God's name, he says, is 'the primal cause of every creature' (ch. lix.); and God's immanence in man is recognized ('His breath is in us' [ch. xxi.]). He recognizes also, in a clear way, the mediatorship of Christ, through faith in whom we rise into union with God, 'looking up to the heights of heaven' and 'tasting of immortal knowledge' (ch. xxxvi.). He is eloquent, too, in praise of love as that which 'unites men to God' (ch. xlix.).

Barnabas dwells on the idea of believers being the spiritual temple of God through the indwelling presence of His Spirit in them (Ep. of Barn. xvi.).

In the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles the union of the world with God through His creative activity and sovereign controlling power is recognized ('The workings that befall thee receive as good, knowing that apart from God nothing cometh to pass' [ch. iii.]; 'Thou Master Almighty didst create all things for thy name's sake' [ch. x.]). The words 'Let grace come and let this world pass away' (ch. x.) seem to point, like Ro 8²²⁻²³ and Rev 21¹, to the coming of 'a new heaven and a new earth' as the result of the final triumph of Divine grace. Christ is recognized as the Mediator of spiritual union between man and God, through whom life and knowledge have been made known to men, and the Church of the redeemed is to be 'gathered from the ends of the earth' and 'sanctified for the kingdom prepared for it' (chs. ix., x.).

Papias says of believers that 'they ascend through the Spirit to the Son and through the Son to the Father, and that in due time 'the Son will yield up his work to the Father' (frag. v.; cf. 1 Co 15²³⁻²⁸).

Hermas says of God, 'who created and finished all things and made all things out of nothing,' 'He alone is able to contain the whole, but himself cannot be contained' (Mand. 1). Again, 'They only who fear the Lord and keep his commandments have life with God; but as to those who keep not his commandments, there is no life in them' (Mand. 7), and 'The Lord dwells in men that love peace, because he loved peace; but from the contentious and the wicked he is far distant' (Sim. ix. xxxii. 2).

LITERATURE.—J. Rendel Harris, Union with God, London, 1895; articles on 'Union,' 'Oneness,' 'Unity,' in DCG; The Apostolic Fathers, tr. A. Roberts and J. Donaldson (Ante-Nicene Christian Library, i.), Edinburgh, 1887; J. R. Illingworth, Divine Immanence, London, 1898. D. S. ADAM.

UNITY.—The idea of unity is one of those that are most pervasive in the apostolic writings; and naturally so. Christianity is the religion of reconciliation; and, fully recognizing the radical character of the antagonisms that reveal themselves in experience, it everywhere discloses a profounder unity in which these opposites are harmonized. While it does not assume the function of a philosophy, it does claim to give, from the moral and theological standpoint, a synthetic view, and, indeed, the only synthetic view, of reality; in Christ it finds the way, the truth, and the life by which the unity of God and man and the whole universe of being must be finally achieved.

On the cardinal issue, existence is seen both as a unity and as a duality. The duality is wholly and tragically real. Physical evil is no illusion, but is the correlate of moral evil; and moral evil is not an inevitable stage in the evolution of moral good, but is sin, that which absolutely ought not to be. Yet this duality exists within the circumference, so to say, of an eternal unity before and after; an original self-existent principle of evil is excluded by NT thought. On the other hand, it attempts no solution of the problem how duality has arisen out of pre-existent unity; it is content to trace sin back to the beginning of human history, or, if further, to the agency of a Tempter who had himself fallen from his first estate. Its interest in the problem is not at all speculative, but solely practical—to emphasize, on the one hand, the fact of man's innate sinfulness, and, on the other, the fact that sin is precisely that which has no point of origination in the Divine causality, but is in essential antagonism to the nature and will of God.

1. The Being of God as the primal source of all unity.—(a) As against all polytheistic or dualistic systems, apostolic thought posits this as its first truth (1 Co 8⁴⁻⁶, Eph 4⁶, Ja 2¹⁹). And this ensures a unity in nature and history. Although the marks of imperfection and disorganization are everywhere seen upon the face of Creation, although it is in bondage to the law of decay and corruption, and is the scene of apparently fruitless tragedy (Ro 8²⁰⁻²²), yet it is pervaded by a unity of rational purpose and control (v.²³, Ac 27²²⁻²⁴); and this is true not only of natural processes and events, but of those that are brought about by the volition of men or other free agents (Ac 2²³ 21¹⁰⁻¹⁴, 2 Co 12⁷).

(b) The Divine nature is ethically a unity—light in which there is no darkness at all. God is 'faithful' (1 Jn 1⁹, 2 Ti 2¹³), unchangeably self-consistent (Ja 1¹⁷). His different modes of action upon different objects only prove the immutability of His moral nature (Ro 2⁸⁻¹⁰, 2 Th 1⁶⁻⁷, 2 P 2⁴⁻⁹). And the centre of this unity, from which all His ethical attributes derive, is Love; the ultimate explanation of all that God does, and purposes, and permits is—God is Love (1 Jn 4⁸). Hence, also, the Righteousness of God, His Will as imperative for all beings capable of ethical life, is a unity. His Law is an ethical organism, expressing in every part the same principle (Ro 13⁸⁻¹⁰), to violate which in one point is virtually to violate the whole (Ja 2¹⁰). Hence, again, sin is a unity. Within all individual sins (ἀμαρτήματα) there lives that (ἡ ἀμαρτία) which makes them to be sinful. St. Paul almost personifies this principle of sin (Ro 7¹¹⁻¹⁴). St. John defines it as ἀνομία, lawlessness, the assertion of an evil egoistic will against the perfectly good will of God (1 Jn 3⁴). Sin is not seen in its true character until it is seen in its unity.

2. Unity of mediation.—The explanation of the dualism we are conscious of in experience is not found, as in Gnosticism, in the transition from the transcendent God to the created universe. The unity of the Divine self-existence is not lost when related to other being; its fullness is not portioned out in successive separate emanations. There is one God, and one Mediator (1 Co 8⁶, 1 Ti 2⁵)—He who became in human history the 'man Christ Jesus.' In Him, as the Image and Only-begotten of the Father, the undivided fullness of the Godhead dwells (Jn 1¹⁴, Col 2⁹); and He is not only, by His Incarnation, the one Mediator to mankind of all Divine life, truth, and saving grace, but the Divine agent in all creation (Jn 1³, Col 1¹⁶), and the principle of its unity (Col 1¹⁷). See FULLNESS; MEDIATION.

3. The unity of man.—(a) The generic unity, physical and moral, of mankind (already seen in the OT and in Stoicism) is a presupposition of Christian soteriology; human nature has everywhere the same spiritual capacities, needs the same salvation, and is capable of appropriating it by the same means (Ro 1¹⁶, etc.). This unity is categorically affirmed (Ac 17²⁶); historically it has its source in descent from one common primal ancestor (Ro 5¹⁴⁻¹⁹, 1 Co 15²²⁻⁴⁷), but ultimately in the fact that man as man is the image and offspring of God (Ac 17²⁸⁻²⁹).

(b) Hence there is unity as regards responsibility. Apart from special revelation, man possesses a rational and moral nature, made for the knowledge and love of God, with capacities for discerning the self-manifestations of God in His creative and providential activities (Ac 14¹⁷, Ro 1¹⁹⁻²¹); and especially does conscience bear witness to the sovereign imperative of His righteousness (214¹⁵).

(c) But, actually, unity in responsibility has become unity in sin. Human character has become corrupt at its hereditary source (Ro 5¹²⁻¹⁷⁻¹⁹, 4 Ezr. iii. 216, Apoc. Bar. liv. 15, 19); human life universally characterized by wilful sin (Ro 3⁹⁻²⁰), involving guilt (v.¹⁹) and that separation from God (Eph 4¹⁸, Col 1²¹) which is death (Ro 6²³, Eph 2¹⁻⁵, Col 2¹³).

4. Unity of redemption.—(a) For the common human need one common redemption is provided (Ac 4¹, Ro 10⁴⁻¹², 1 Jn 2¹), to be received by the same means (Ro 4¹¹⁻¹⁶, Gal 2¹⁶, 1 Jn 1⁷⁻⁹), working to the same issues of forgiveness (Ro 8¹, Rev 1³), reconciliation to God (Ro 5¹⁻¹⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹), endowment with the Spirit (Ro 8¹⁻¹⁶), eternal life (5¹⁷⁻²¹, 1 Jn 5^{11-13, 20}). Possessing such fellowship with God in Christ, as the source of their common life and object of their common faith, Christians also possess a unique spiritual affinity and fellowship with each other. And, in the Apostolic Age, the consciousness of unity reaches its intensest point in the conception of this fellowship, alike Divine and human, as embodied in the Church. In this, racial and social distinctions—Jew and Gentile, bond and free—serve only to emphasize and enhance the fact that those who are united in Christ, however different in all else, have immeasurably more in common than those who are separated by Christ, however alike in every other respect (1 Co 7²², Gal 3²⁸, Eph 2¹¹⁻²²). So, also, distinctions of custom and even of conviction do not disappear (Ro 14⁹); yet even such diverse interpretations of truth and duty ought only to evoke a fuller realization of supreme truth and duty, the faith and love in which all are one. Unity is emphasized as against mere uniformity (1 Co 12). In the spiritual body, as in the physical, a rich diversity of gift and function is necessary to the complete expression of the organic life-principle (vv. 4-6). It is only in its complex collective unity that renewed humanity can reach its Divine ideal (Eph 4¹¹⁻¹³).

(b) But in the Pauline Epistles it is seen that, Christ being what He is, universal Mediator and Lord, He is destined to become by His reconciling work the centre of a unity that embraces all existence, and that is essential even for the full redemption of man. Christ must be Head over all things to His Body, which is the Church (Eph 1-); hostile elemental forces must be subdued (1 Co 15²⁴, Eph 1²¹); all things, whether on earth or in heaven, must come under His reconciling sway (Col 1²⁰), and the whole creation be emancipated into the liberty that belongs to the glorified state of God's children (Ro 8²¹), that God may be all in all (1 Co 15²⁸).

5. The final unity.—As has been said, the NT attempts no solution of the problem how duality has arisen out of an original unity, and the same is largely true of the converse problem, how the existent duality is to be finally overcome, resolved into the eternal unity of Divine truth and love. One thing only is seen as a certainty for Christian faith: of such unity Christ is the sole cause and ever-living centre. He must reign: it is unto Him that all things must be subdued; it is as the fruit of His sacrifice that God will reconcile all things unto Himself; it is in His name that every knee shall bow, Him that every tongue must confess as Lord, to the glory of God the Father. But in apostolic thought (which here virtually means Pauline) the age to come seems to be viewed in different perspectives. In the one the curtain falls upon an unresolved or, at any rate, imperfectly resolved dualism. Christ's enemies are made His footstool; yet their subjection, if not merely physical, is not completely moral. Evil is still evil, though in chains and, to this extent, subject to the righteousness of God. This is the vision which arises when the final issue is viewed from the side of human freedom and responsibility. If absolute finality is not ascribed to the spiritual choices of the present, the future of those who in this present world reject the life-giving Spirit is left in unrelieved gloom. From another point of view, the necessary consummation of Christ's victory is seen to be nothing less than the moral unification of all existence. The ruin wrought by Adam and the redemption wrought by Christ seem to be co-extensive in human history (Ro 5¹⁶, 1 Co 15-); and in the dispensation of the fullness of the times it is God's purpose to bring all things again into unity (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι) in Christ (Eph 1¹⁰; cf. Col 1^{19, 20}, Ph 2⁹⁻¹¹). When Christ's work is done, God will be all in all (1 Co 15²⁸). And this is the vision that arises when the final issue is regarded from the side of Divine sovereignty and purpose. As to the means by which such a consummation may be hereafter achieved the NT is silent. Again it has to be said that its interest in the problem is wholly practical, not speculative—to emphasize the fact that there is complete, eternal deliverance and blessedness for all who are Christ's; that in some sense, at some time, by some means beyond our ken, Christ will be universally victorious, because God is God, and God is Love.

ROBERT LAW.

UNIVERSALISM.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

UNKNOWN GOD (Ac 17²³; AV and RVm 'TO THE UNKNOWN GOD,' RV 'TO AN UNKNOWN GOD' [the absence of the article in Greek was common in inscriptions, so that either rendering is permissible]).—It is often stated that light is thrown on this subject by an incident in the life of Epimenides as related by Diogenes Laertius (Epimen. i. 110). We are told that the hero, in a time of plague at Athens, took white and black sheep to the hill Areopagus and let them loose. Wherever one of the animals rested, an altar was erected, in the supposition that the sheep was pointing to the god whose shrine was situated nearest to that particular spot. The reason for this procedure was that the people were ignorant as to which deity was offended, and they hoped in this way to ascertain which god they ought to propitiate in order that the plague might be stayed. Among the ancients such a dilemma seems to have been frequent (cf. at Rome, Aul. Gell. ii. 28; Horace, Epod. v. 1, Sat. ii. vi. 20; see also Theophrastus, Char. 17). But the chief objection to this theory is that the altars are distinctly said to be 'anonymous,' which can only mean that they bore no inscription.

It is just possible that some such inscription as that in the text was afterwards added, but not likely. Nor are we helped by Jerome, who states (on Tit 1²) that the inscription actually read, 'To the gods of Asia and Europe and Africa, to unknown and strange gods,' for such an altar could not possibly be that referred to by the Apostle. The main difficulty lies in the fact that no extant inscription exactly bears out the Apostle's words; and yet there is sufficient evidence to lead us to suppose that he is correctly reported. For instance, Pausanias (i. i. 4) says that on the road from the Phaleric port to the city he had noticed 'altars of gods called unknown, and of heroes' (βωμολὲ δὲ θεῶν τε ὀνομαζόμενων ἀγνῶστων καὶ ἥρώων), which may quite well mean that he saw several altars bearing inscriptions similar to that mentioned by St. Paul, yet in v. xiv. 6 he speaks again of 'an altar of unknown gods' (πρὸς αὐτῷ δ' ἔστιν ἀγνῶστων θεῶν βωμός). Similarly Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. vi. 3) says that at Athens are found 'altars of unknown deities.' It is, therefore, impossible to say with certainty whether such altars were erected 'to an (or 'the') unknown god' or 'to unknown gods.' The only passage where direct support is found for the words of Acts is in the dialogue of Philostratus—attributed to Lucian—where one of the characters swears 'by the unknown god of Athens.' But, as this work belongs to the 3rd cent. A.D., it may only be a quotation from this passage. The same objection is in part valid with regard to the Mithraic inscription of Ostia, now in the Vatican Museum; a sacrificial group is represented bearing the legend 'the symbol of the undiscoverable god.' The date of this is probably the 2nd or 3rd cent.; but, on the other hand, the Mithraic cult is a good deal older than that. The Greek word (ἀγνωστος) translated 'unknown' possibly bears also the meaning 'unknowable,' though it is less probable. In this connexion we may compare a passage from Plutarch (de Is. et Osir. 9) which tells of an inscription on the veil of Isis at Sais. It runs as follows: 'I am, and I was, and I shall be; no mortal has lifted my veil.' Such suggestions as that there is a reference in 'unknowable' to Jahweh, who was spoken of by Gentile writers as 'wholly hidden' (Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. 10), or that such an altar might date from the period when writing was unknown, are quite fanciful and cannot be entertained.

Some writers, as F. C. Baur and E. Zeller, regard the whole incident as unhistorical, from the fact that the inscription is in the singular, whereas none such has been found, while the plural is more in keeping with the prevalent polytheism. At any rate there is an element of doubt in some of the references, and, had the writer so wished, he could easily have fallen into line in this matter. Even F. Overbeck admits that the above references allow the possibility of such an inscription. It is difficult to suppose that a mere romancer would have invented such a point; and, if St. Paul made any such reference, it is unthinkable that he would have been inaccurate.

LITERATURE.—See the Commentaries on Acts; also E. H. Plumptre, Movements in Religious Thought, London, 1879, p. 78 ff. F. W. WORSLEY.

UNLEAVENED BREAD.—See PASSOVER.

UNRIGHTEOUSNESS (ἀδικία, subs. corresponding to ἀδικεῖν = to be ἀδικος, i.e. out of harmony with δίκη, 'established usage,' 'what is right and fit').—In the NT, where men are described as ἀδικοί (e.g. 1 Co 6⁹, 1 P 3¹⁹), the interchangeable EVV equivalents are 'unrighteous,' 'unjust.' Where the verb ἀδικέω occurs, the versions vary between 'do wrong,' 'be an offender (wrong-doer),' 'be unjust (unrighteous)'; see Ac 7²⁸ 25¹⁰ (trans.) and Ac 25¹¹, Rev 22¹¹ (intrans.). As for ἀδικία itself, the usual equivalent in the EVV is 'unrighteousness' (see Romans, passim). 'Iniquity' occurs as an alternative: but only once the RV prefers the variant 'wrong-doing' (2 P 2¹³). 'Iniquity' as = 'unrighteousness' springs from a kindred primitive conception—the uneven surface as compared with the crooked line. The ἀδικος may be represented indifferently as being 'out of the level' or 'out of the straight' (see both ideas in parallel use in Is 40³⁻⁵). There is a simple adequacy in these primitive modes of describing human character and action that no development of ethical doctrine can outgrow.

1. In the vocabulary of the Apostolic Church 'righteousness' and 'unrighteousness' form an antithetic pair in correspondence with others, such as 'light' and 'darkness.' An ethical dichotomy this, which has its rise in far-off early days, gains new force in the teaching of Jesus (the broad and narrow ways), and lives on with undiminished vigour. Interesting parallels are furnished in the Shepherd of Hermas (Mand. vi. 2): 'There are two angels with a man—one of righteousness, and the other of iniquity. . . . It is good to follow the angel of righteousness, but to bid farewell to the angel of iniquity' (Ante-Nicene Christian Library, vol. i., 'Apostolic Fathers,' Edinburgh, 1867, p. 359 f.); in the Epistle of Barnabas (chs. 18-20), where both the two ways and the two angels occur in association: 'There are two ways of doctrine and authority, the one of light, and the other of darkness . . . over one are stationed the light-bringing angels of God, but over the other the angels of Satan.' Cf. also the Two Ways (of Life and of Death) in the Didache. One unflinching demand is made of the Christian in the primitive Church—he must 'depart from iniquity' (2 Ti 2¹⁹).

2. In St. Paul's doctrine of justification 'unrighteousness' appears as the salient, universal characteristic of man as such, and figures as a necessary pre-supposition. He cannot, however, be legitimately claimed as supporting the view that this unrighteousness is the sequel of a lapse from an 'original righteousness' in which the 'first parents' of mankind were created (cf. A. Ritschl, The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1900, p. 330). The righteousness, moreover, which the ἀδικος may attain through faith ('righteousness-of-God,' 'righteousness-by-faith') is not a mere matter of imputation (iustitia imputata of a past theology): for St. Paul's emphasis on 'Christ in us' must not be overlooked. His robust ethical quality also appears in his vigorous rejection of the plea that might be suggested in excuse for man's unrighteousness, viz. that it serves as a foil against which the righteousness of God shows more splendidly (Ro 3⁹). Note further a conspicuous use of 'truth' as the antithesis of 'unrighteousness' (Ro 2⁸, 1 Co 13⁶, 2 Th 2⁻). 'Injustice is falsehood in deed' (B. F. Westcott, Gospel according to St. John, 2 vols., London, 1908, i. 268).

3. A brief dictum in the Johannine teaching deserves notice: 'All unrighteousness is sin' (1 Jn 5¹⁷), with which may be compared the valid converse of the proposition in 3⁴: 'Lawlessness is sin.' Thus sententiously all distinction between various forms of deliberate transgression is abolished. Wrong as from man to man is also wrong as from man to God. Due thought of God's perfect righteousness, together with man's relation to Him, demands this heightening of the conception of unrighteousness. Similarly, the claim that there is 'no unrighteousness' in God's perfect Messenger (Jn 7¹⁸) rests on the fact that He is sent by God in whom no unrighteousness dwells (cf. Plato, Theat. 176 C: 'In God is no unrighteousness at all; He is altogether righteous'). J. S. CLEMENS.

UPPER ROOM.—See HOUSE.

URBANUS (Ὀὐρβανός, a Latin name, common among slaves and found in inscriptions of the Imperial household).—Urbanus is saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16⁹ and described as 'our fellow-worker in Christ' (τὸν συνεργὸν ἡμῶν ἐν Χριστῷ). Prisca and Aquila are saluted in v. 3 as 'my fellow-workers in Christ Jesus,' and Timothy is referred to in v. 21 as 'my fellow-worker.' Elsewhere the term is used of Aristarchus (Col 4¹¹, Philem⁻), Clement and others (Ph 4³), Demas (Philem²⁴), Epaphroditus (Ph 2⁻⁵), Jesus Justus (Col 4¹¹), Luke (Philem²⁴), Mark (Col 4¹⁰, Philem⁻), Philemon (v. 2), Titus (2 Co 8²³). It is the commonest of the designations used by St. Paul (cf. the use of the verb in connexion with the household of Stephanas, 1 Co 16¹⁶: ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς ὑποτάσσησθε τοῖς τοιούτοις καὶ παντὶ τῷ συνεργούντι καὶ κοινῶντι). The Apostle and his fellow-workers were also fellow-workers with God (1 Co 3⁹, θεοῦ γὰρ ἐσμεν συνεργοί). Outside St. Paul's Epistles the only other use of συνεργός in the NT is 3 Jn⁸, where hospitality to Christians is commended, 'that we may be fellow-workers with the truth.' Nothing further is known to us of the form which the work of Urbanus took, but it is clear that he assisted the Apostle in his missionary labours in some way well known to the readers of these salutations. We shall suppose him to have been resident at the time of writing in Rome or in Ephesus, according to our view of the destination of Ro 16. 'In the adjective "our" the Apostle may include with himself either the pair he has just named [Prisca and Aquila], or the whole of those mentioned in the list before Urbanus; or, on the other hand, his constant companions like Timothy, Silvanus, and Titus' (see C. von Weizsacker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i. [1894] 394).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

UTTERANCE.—The word 'utterance' is found five times in the AV of the NT: once in Acts (2^d) and four times in the writings of St. Paul (1 Co 1st, 2 Co 8th, Eph 6th, Col 4th). In the passage in Acts it does not represent any substantive in the original, the phrase translated 'as the Spirit gave them utterance' being literally 'as the Spirit gave them to speak' (ἀποφθέγγεσθαι). Where it occurs in St. Paul's Epistles it represents the Greek word λόγος, and in two passages (1 Co 1st, 2 Co 8th) it is used in conjunction with 'knowledge' (γνώσις). In Col 4th the phrase of the AV 'a door of utterance' has been changed by the Revisers to 'a door for the word.' The meaning to be attached to λόγος has, therefore, been changed from the power of expression possessed by the speaker to the Divine message which he is charged to deliver.

The significance of the word in the NT seems to be the power of speech rather than what is actually spoken. This power is a gift of the Holy Spirit, bestowed on certain individuals, with the implication that it has been given for some special purpose. It might therefore be fittingly applied to the prophets (cf. 1 Co 14), though it is not so used in fact.

The Apostolic Fathers do not use λόγος in this sense.

R. H. MALDEN.

V

YANITY.—Neither in the OT nor in the NT is the word 'vanity' used in the sense of self-conceit or vainglory (see PRIDE): it is always a rendering of ματαιότης, which is an essentially Scriptural word, not being found in an ethical sense in the classical writers. There is, however, an adjective, rendered 'vain,' which has no corresponding substantive, namely κενός. Perhaps the prevailing sense of κενός is 'emptiness' or 'hollowness,' while μάταιος rather expresses 'futility' or 'fruitlessness,' and denotes an absence of aim or a purpose unfulfilled; but the two epithets are so nearly synonymous even on the showing of R. C. Trench (*NT Synonyms*⁹, London, 1880, p. 180 f., where he defines κοπος κενός [1 Co 15th] as 'labour which yields no return') that the distinction cannot always be pressed. J. B. Mayor on 2 P 2¹⁰ (see The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1907) discusses the passages of LXX where ματαιότης is found, e.g. Ps 4th 39th and the famous Ec 1- ('vanity of vanities'), and concludes that in these cases, as in 2 P 2¹⁰, the word approximates to the Pauline use in Ro 8th ('the creation was subjected to vanity') and denotes what is simply passing and transient. On the other hand, in Ps 26th 119th 144th and Eph 4th he is of opinion that the word expresses moral instability, being used 'of men without principle on whom no reliance can be placed.'

As against the view of Mayor, it should be remembered that in Ro 8th the meaning of resultlessness or ineffectiveness (see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'⁵, Edinburgh, 1902, in loc.) is equally harmonious with the context as indicating the opposite of τελείος, that is, the disappointing character of the present existence with its unfulfilled aims and its pursuit of ends never realized. The word is found in Barn. iv. 10; Polyc. ad Phil. vii. 2; Ignatius, ad Trall. viii. 2. On the whole, an examination of the passages where ματαιότης and μάταιος are found as well as compound words like ματαιολογία and ματαιοπορία tends to support the theory that 'vanity,' or ματαιότης (Heb. 777, though in LXX the word is also a rendering of 777), denotes 'either absence of purpose or failure to attain any true purpose' (J. Armitage Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, London, 1909, on 4th).

R. MARTIN POPE.

YEIL (καταπέτασμα).—The tabernacle was divided into two parts by means of a veil or curtain, which the writer of Hebrews calls 'the second veil' (το δεύτερον καταπέτασμα, 9th), to distinguish it from the screen which hung before the entrance to the Holy Place. It was of fine tapestry, and was suspended upon four pillars overlaid with gold (Ex 26³¹⁻³²). Josephus (Ant. VIII. iii. 3) calls it ἐνδότερον καταπέτασμα, and Philo (de Gig. 12) τὸ ἐσώτατον καταπέτασμα, but it was pre-eminently the veil (777), while the curtain at the door of the Holy Place was known as 777, tr. 'a screen' in RV), and it is the only one referred to in the NT. In He 6¹⁹ 'the place within the veil' (τὸ ἐσώτερον τοῦ καταπέτασματος), which only the high priest might enter once a year, is figuratively used of heaven, the inmost shrine into which Jesus, a High Priest of another order, has entered as a Forerunner. In 10th the veil is allegorized as the corporeal and earthly nature of the Christ, who is said to have dedicated a way into heaven 'through the veil, that is, his flesh.' As the veil of the tabernacle, and that of the Temple, hung between the high priest and the shrine which was hallowed by the Shekinah, so Christ's frail humanity lay between Him and the glory of the heavenly sanctuary. His flesh had to be rent—as the Temple veil was rent (Mk 15th)—that He might enter, and by so entering He became a Pioneer and Path-finder for all seekers after immortality.

JAMES STRAHAN.

VENGEANCE.—The word 'vengeance' (ἐκδίκησις), with its corresponding substantive 'avenger' (ἐκδικος, 1 Th 4th, Ro 13th), is an essentially NT word and never carries with it the suggestion of arbitrary or vindictive reprisals: it is always a just retribution, and a retribution inflicted by God Himself or His instruments (1 P 2¹⁴). If the idea of wrath is associated with the use of the word, as in Ro 3th 13th, such 'wrath' (ὀργή) is the eternal righteousness or justice of God acting in harmony with His revealed will. In both Ro 12th and He 10th the words 'Vengeance is mine; I will repay' are quoted somewhat loosely from Dt 32th (ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐκδίκησεως ἀπαποδώσω). The verb (ἐκδικέω) occurs in the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18th 7-8) in the sense of affording protection from a wrong-doer and so vindicating the right of the injured person. It is then applied by our Lord to the Divine vindication of the 'elect,' the phrase used being παῖν τὴν ἐκδίκησιν τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν, which suggests the protection of persevering saints as well as the just penalty inflicted on their aggressors.

In the ethics of Christianity the Golden Rule solves the problem of private and personal revenge. Revenge at the bidding of momentary passion or as the gratification of a selfish emotion is resolutely condemned by the teaching of Christ, and forgiveness takes the place of the old savage law of retaliation (see Mt 5³⁸⁻⁴⁸). Of the assertion 'Vengeance is mine,' W. H. Moberly (in Foundations, London, 1912, p. 280) writes: 'This limits, but at the same time consecrates, the notion of retribution. The disinterested infliction of retribution is sometimes a moral necessity'; and he further quotes T. H. Green (Principles of Political Obligation, § 183): 'Indignation against wrong done to another has nothing in common with a desire to revenge a wrong done to oneself. It borrows the language of private revenge just as the love of God borrows the language of sensuous affection.'

Punishment, if it is to carry any moral weight, must involve the vindication of law, and consequently the new ethic of Christianity which controlled the conduct of the Apostolic Church is based on love, which rules out of revenge the element of private and personal malevolence (see some cogent remarks by J. S. Mackenzie, Manual of Ethics, London, 1900, p. 404 f.). The repetition of the quotation from Dt 32³⁵, in the form in which it comes to us in two such representative Christian writings as the Epistles to the Romans and the Hebrews, shows clearly that the Christian consciousness had grasped the idea of punishment as in effect a Divine prerogative. The private individual has not to assume judicial functions which properly belong to a recognized legal tribunal or 'powers' regarded as Divinely ordained (Ro 13¹⁻⁶).

On the relation of the subject to war, E. Willmore (HJ xiii. [1915] 340) describes how the doubts of a friend—a Territorial soldier—as to the moral rightness of war (based on 'Vengeance is mine,' etc.) were resolved by reading of the atrocities of Belgium and the nature of German atheism. 'Vengeance belongs to God,' he wrote; 'then we are God's instruments.' War as a method of giving expression to the law of international righteousness is admittedly repugnant to the Christian conscience; but until the method is superseded as the result of a consensus gentium, a Christian nation is not absolved from the duty of vindicating either by offensive or by defensive warfare the eternal principles of right and justice.

R. MARTIN POPE.

VESPASIAN.—Titus Flavius Vespasianus was Roman Emperor from 1st July A.D. 69 to 24th June (other authorities, 23rd July) 79, and ruled under the style Imperator Cæsar Vespasianus Augustus (sometimes Imperator Vespasianus Cæsar Augustus). He sprang from an obscure family, his grandfather having been a citizen of the Sabine country-town Reate, who served as a centurion on the side of Pompey against Julius Cæsar in the Civil War till the battle of Pharsalus (48 B.C.), after which he returned home.

Vespasian was brought up by his grandmother Tertulla on her estate at Cosa in Etruria. Flavius Sabinus, the father of Vespasian, was a highly respected revenue official in Asia Minor, who afterwards removed to Switzerland, where he died. Vespasian's mother, Vespasia Polla, was of better family than her husband, for her father, a citizen of Nursia in the Sabine country, had been a military tribune, and her brother was a senator.

Vespasian was born on 17th November A.D. 9, at Palacrine, a place near Reate. His elder brother, Flavius Sabinus, had attained senatorial rank, and Vespasian was ambitious to follow in his footsteps.

As quaestor he was allotted to the province Crete and Cyrene. He held the office of ædile under Caligula, probably in 38, and the prætorship in 39. In this year, on 30th December, his eldest child, the future Emperor Titus (see art. TITUS), was born, his mother's name being Flavia Domitilla. In the year 41-42 Vespasian was sent to Germany in command of a legion, at that time stationed at Argentoratum (Strasbourg), and fought against the Germans. With this legion, the Legio II. Augusta, he crossed to Britain in the expedition of 43, and conquered two powerful tribes, twenty towns, and the Isle of Wight. In consequence he obtained ornamenta triumphalia in the triumph of 44, and further honours later. On 24th October 51, in November and December of which year Vespasian was consul suffectus, his second son Domitian was born. After this date Vespasian was in temporary retirement. His patron Narcissus, the powerful freedman of Claudius, died in 54, and Agrippina, widow of Claudius and mother of Nero, pursued his former friends with hatred. She also perished in 59, when Vespasian was proconsul of Africa. In favour of his rule in Africa this at least can be said, that he returned from the province in financial embarrassment. In the year 66 he accompanied Nero on his theatrical and musical tour to Greece, but incurred the Emperor's disfavour through his lack of interest in the performances.

The Jewish War provided Vespasian with an opportunity which he was not slow to seize. Judæa had always been a hot-bed of dissension, more particularly since the commencement of Roman rule. There were disputes between the Jews and the Syrians, risings, Messianic expectations, and dissatisfaction with the procuratorial administration. All these causes contributed to the colossal rebellion against Rome. Gessius Florus, who became procurator of Judæa in 64, outraged Jewish feeling in every possible way, particularly by robbery and massacre. Cestius Gallus, governor of Syria, after a short success against Jerusalem, was forced to retire. War could not then be avoided. Nero felt compelled to recall Vespasian to Court as the only suitable man to inflict the deserved punishment on the Jews. The precise status conferred upon Vespasian is uncertain; he was to co-operate with Licinius Mucianus, the competent but ambitious governor of Syria. Sending his son Titus very early in 67 to bring a legion from Alexandria, he himself went from Nero's quarters in Achaia over the Hellespont by land to Syria, and collected the Roman forces there. From Antioch he marched to Ptolemais, where Titus joined him. Their combined forces amounted to three legions, twenty-three cohorts, six squadrons, and a large number of Asiatic auxiliary troops, or a total of 60,000 men. His first aim was to subdue Galilee, and in this campaign the most important phase was the stubborn siege of Jotapata. Jaffa was taken about 26th June, and Jotapata, after about 40 days' resistance, was captured about 2nd July. Among the captives taken was Josephus, the commander of the Jewish forces in Galilee, and the future historian of the war, who was kindly treated by Vespasian. On 5th July Vespasian left for Ptolemais, and thence he went to Cesarea on the coast. There he put two legions into winter quarters, and sent the third to Scythopolis. Certain of the troops were sent to besiege Joppa, the headquarters of the Jewish pirates. Vespasian himself joined Herod Agrippa at Cesarea Philippi, and after twenty days marched against the cities Tarichea and Tiberias, which had revolted from him. Titus brought the army from Cesarea and met his father at Scythopolis. The Roman party in the city surrendered Tiberias to Vespasian. Vespasian came to Tarichea after Titus had besieged it. A small naval victory was won by the Romans. After the capture of Tarichea, Gamala and Gischala were also taken, and the rebellion, so far as Galilee was concerned, was crushed.

One legion being sent to Scythopolis, with the other two he marched again to Cæsarea on the coast. Jamnia and Azotus were besieged, and thus in the end of 67 Jerusalem was cut off from the sea. In the winter of 67-68 Vespasian made arrangements for the government of the besieged district, and began to employ his army against the capital. His plan was to destroy all opposition elsewhere before proceeding to the siege of the capital, a plan necessitated by due regard for his communications. So he took Gadara, 27th February 68, and left the rest of Peræa to be conquered by a subordinate, Placidus. Having heard reports of the rising of Vindex in Gaul, he returned hurriedly from Cæsarea by Antipatris, Thamna, Lydda, and Jamnia to Ammaus, where he established one of his legions. Proceeding to Idumæa, he left troops there, and marched by Ammaus through Samaria to Jericho, where he arrived about 24th June 68. The city fell into his hands. After a visit to the Dead Sea, he established various camps in Judæa, in order to surround Jerusalem on all sides.

On returning to Cæsarea he learned of Nero's murder. The news delayed his advance on Jerusalem. When the further news of Galba's accession came, it was necessary for him to await Galba's orders, because Nero's arrangements had by his death become null and void. He sent Herod and Titus to Rome to obtain these orders. Titus' departure followed in the first half of 69. In Corinth he learned of the murder of Galba, of the arming of Vitellius, and of the accession of Otho. Leaving Herod to go on his way, Titus returned to Vespasian at Cæsarea. The armies of Mucian and Vespasian had already taken the oath of allegiance to Otho. Meanwhile the war languished. On returning to Cæsarea from a short journey to the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, Vespasian learned that Vitellius had become Emperor, having been recognized as such by the senate on 19th April. Vespasian and Vitellius were personal enemies, and the former was not ready to submit to the elevation of the latter without a struggle, in spite of his distance from the centre of the Empire and the consequent difficulty of operations. Vespasian's hesitation was removed by the attitude of his troops, who were jealous that the German legions had been able to create an Emperor. They received with absolute silence Vespasian's proposal that they should take the oath to Vitellius. The support of Mucian removed the last trace of Vespasian's hesitation. The charm of Titus had brought the two erstwhile jealous governors into friendly relations; so that it may be said that Titus got the Empire for his father. Vespasian had made sure of the support of the prefect of Egypt, Tiberius Julius Alexander, and now wrote to tell him that he was making a bid for the Empire, and counted on his support. It was this Alexander who in Alexandria on 1st July 69 proclaimed Vespasian Emperor, and made the two legions in Egypt take the oath to him. It was not till 22nd December that the senate conferred all the titles and privileges of Emperor upon him, such as the tribunicia potestas, the title 'pater patriæ,' the supreme pontificate, etc. As Emperor, Vespasian held the ordinary consulship eight times. The censorship was held by Vespasian and Titus together in 73.

The year 69 was notable chiefly for the continued prosecution of the Jewish War. Before 10th July all the troops in Judæa and Syria as well as Egypt, and certain client-princes, had taken the oath to Vespasian. The necessary military and financial preparations were made to assert his claim against Vitellius. Vespasian marched to Antioch and, after entering into relations with the Parthians and Armenians, accompanied Titus to Alexandria. The aim of this visit was to occupy Egypt, as it was one of the chief centres of the corn supply, a rich province, and a suitable base of operations. Dispatches were sent to all the generals and armies, and Mucian undertook the campaign against Vitellius. Anicetus, a freedman of the last Pontic king Polemo, attempted to create a rising in favour of Vitellius, but he was crushed and put to death. About the end of November Vespasian heard that Mucian had fought a decisive battle at Cremona in N. Italy (29th October). Early in November Mucian had also sent a legion to put down the Dacians, who took advantage of the unsettled state of the Empire to attack the Roman military camps in Mœsia. Mucian's army numbered about 20,000 men, and with him the Byzantine fleet co-operated. The army crossed Asia Minor by Cappadocia and Phrygia. Meanwhile the Illyrian army had declared for Vespasian. The result of this was that in all six legions were added to his forces. A number of other legions, however, adopted a waiting attitude. Antonius Primus, commander of the seventh legion, had been ordered to remain at Aquileia, but of his own accord he marched into Italy. The Adriatic and Tyrrhenian fleets deserted to Vespasian. Antonius Primus, in the night battle at Cremona already mentioned, defeated the Vitellians utterly. Three legions in Spain and one in Britain now came over to Vespasian. In Rome his party, led by his brother, did not fare so well; for on 19th December Sabinus was captured and put to death. Domitian, however, escaped with his life. On 21st December Antonius came to Rome and captured it, the capture being followed by the death of Vitellius. Domitian was welcomed by the army as Cæsar, and the next day the senate recognized Vespasian as Emperor. At the same time the Flavian generals received honours. Early in 70 the interests of Vespasian were in the hands of Mucian, who meantime enjoyed all the prestige of the princeps. There were serious disturbances in Germany and Gaul, in which Julius Civilis, a man of noble descent among the Batavi, played a prominent part. At first he allowed the troops to declare for Vespasian, but afterwards he explained that he wanted to fight for freedom from the yoke of Rome. Defection spread widely. Mucian, accompanied by Domitian, had been preparing a counterblow. It is not necessary to give the details of the campaign. Suffice it to say that the Roman dominion was speedily restored. In the first half of the year disturbances in Africa had been quelled, and the Sarmatians, who had invaded Mœsia, were defeated.

Vespasian received the news of his recognition by the senate early in January, while he was still in Alexandria, where his financial arrangements were mocked at by the people. He postponed his departure till the summer, and travelled by Rhodes and Greece to Coreyra and Calabria. The exact date of his arrival in Rome is unknown. The restoration of the city, which had suffered seriously in the recent disturbances, early engaged his attention. In particular, the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was rebuilt, and the documents which had perished in the Record Office were, as far as possible, replaced. A road was built in Sardinia. In this year also a consular legate was sent to govern the province Cappadocia, instead of a procurator as hitherto. In 71, probably in the middle of June, Titus arrived in Rome, and about 1st July the joint triumph over Judæa took place (see art. TITUS). As a sign of universal peace the temple of Janus was closed, and the building of a Temple of Peace begun. Aqueducts and streets in the city were restored at the cost of the Emperor. Lucilius Bassus completed the work of the subjugation of Judæa.

Palestine was now made the private property of the Emperor, like Egypt; 800 veterans were settled at Ammaus, about 3 or 4 miles from Jerusalem, and the old Temple tax (Mt 17³) had to be paid to Jupiter Capitolinus. Important changes were made in the constitution of the legions at this time, especially by the discharge of those that had proved disloyal. Loyal discharged soldiers were settled in coloniae. In Britain the gentle Vettius Bolanus was replaced by the more vigorous Petilius Cerialis. About this time the worship of the Emperor was established in Africa. In 72 Sardinia and Corsica, previously a senatorial province, became Imperial. In the same year Antiochus IV. of Commagene revolted from Rome, but was defeated and captured by the governor of Syria, Cæsennius Pætus. Antiochus was ordered to live at Lacedæmon, and his sons were allowed to come to Rome, where they obtained the citizenship. Commagene was taken over and added to the province Syria.

The year 73 was marked by the exercise of the censorship on the part of Vespasian and Titus. The activities of this office, which had for the most part fallen into disuse, were manifold. For example, these colleagues planned anew, or refounded, the city of Rome. The constant problem of the overflowing of the Tiber also engaged their attention. The permanent camps at Vindonissa and Carnuntum were enlarged. Thus the Danube line was strengthened against the troublesome Danube peoples, and the towns Scarbantia and Savaria on the road to Aquileia were protected. Vespasian took away the liberty Nero had restored to Greece, and made it again a province Achaia, on the perfectly good ground that the Greeks had ceased to understand how to use liberty. As a senatorial province it was governed by an ex-prætor with the title proconsul, as it had been previously in St. Paul's time. A rising of the Jews was subdued in this year, and the town Masada, the last stronghold of the Sicarii in Palestine, was destroyed. They, however, aroused the Alexandrian Jews against the Empire. As a punishment the secondary temple at Heliopolis was destroyed, by order of the Emperor. A further disturbance in Cyrene needs mention only. In 74 the regulation of the Tiber was continued, and the censorship came to an end. In recognition of the support which Spain had given to Vespasian, the whole free population of the province was given the partial Roman citizenship known as ius Latii. Another aspect of censorial duty was the purging of the orders. Many unworthy members of the senatorial and equestrian orders were ejected. The patrician families were (in 73) increased from 200 to 1000, among the many men thus promoted being Cn. Julius Agricola, later the governor of Britain. About this time a number of Stoic and Cynic philosophers, who were of anti-monarchical tendencies, were expelled from Rome. From inscriptions only do we learn of important military operations in Germany (e.g. the Black Forest) at this time, accompanied by the building of a new road with fortresses, perhaps to keep the way open between the Rhine and the Danube. The repair of a road in Sardinia is also recorded for this year. In 75 the Temple of Peace, begun in 71, was completed and opened. Of this richly adorned temple, which included a library, not a trace remains. In the same year a colossal statue of Nero (100-120 ft. high), which had stood in his Golden House, was converted into a statue of Apollo as the Sun-god, the protector of the Flavian house. It was afterwards removed by Hadrian, but the base is preserved. Many pieces of public land in Rome, Italy, and the provinces which had been illegally taken possession of by private persons were taken back by the State. The boundary of Rome was also extended. Rutilius Gallicus (Statius, Silvæ, i. iv. 83) collected taxes, re-imposed by Vespasian, in the province of Africa, the boundary line of which was at this time definitely fixed. About this period Vespasian seems to have given help to Vologæsus, king of the Parthians, against the Alani, a northern tribe which invaded Parthia. It was in this connexion probably that a road was built in Little Armenia. We hear also of important repairs to roads in the province Asia. In 76 the authorities mention repairs to the Via Appia, and great works on the roads, etc., in Africa. In the same year Vologæsus adopted a hostile attitude to Rome, but was compelled to ask for peace. In this war the father of the Emperor Trajan, as legate of Syria, took part. Sextus Iulius Frontinus, as legate in Britain, gained a victory over the Silures. By a statute of the same year certain officers and men of the household troops were given the right to enter on legal marriage. In 77 Vespasian erected in Rome, south of the Templum Pacis, a building, which after successive alterations and restorations became the church of Saints Cosmas and Damian. In the same year important work was done on roads in Italy, Spain, and elsewhere. For 78 there are records of road-building in Dalmatia and Bithynia. In the same year there was a successful campaign, conducted by Rutilius Gallicus, against a German tribe, the Bructeri. One of their leading women, a prophetess Velea, was brought captive to Rome. It was probably in the same year that Agricola's period as governor of Britain began; before its end he had almost destroyed the Ordovices and recovered the island Mona (probably Anglesey) for the Romans.

The year 79 was the last of Vespasian's rule. There were great road- and bridge-building operations carried out in Hispania Bætica (modern Andalusia). The rebel Iulius Sabinus, of the Gaulish tribe of the Lingones, had for nine years been in hiding, but was in this year discovered, brought to Rome, and condemned, with his wife. In this year also there was a conspiracy against Vespasian, fomented by two men whom he had regarded as friends, Aulus Cæcina Alienus and Titus Clodius Eprius Marcellus. Titus, Vespasian's son, had obtained knowledge of the guilt of the first, invited him to his table, and had him struck down, before Vespasian had an inkling of the plot. Eprius, after being tried and condemned by the senate, took his own life. While on a visit to Campania, Vespasian had a slight attack of fever. He returned to Rome, and from there went to his usual summer residence, Aquæ Cutiliæ, in the Sabine land, near Reate. There he fought the disease manfully, giving unbroken attention to business. Certain symptoms led to the report that Titus had given him poison. He died on 24th June in his sixty-ninth year, after a reign of almost ten years.

After his death he was, like most of the Emperors, deified by the senate. He had been a worthy Emperor, with the solid qualities characteristic of the best of the Italians. After the folly and waste of the Neronian period, such a rule as his was at once a necessity and a blessing to Italy. His chief services to the State were his care for finance and at the same time for the roads of the Empire, as the details enumerated above will have shown. He deliberately founded a dynasty, and, to secure it, made his sons Titus and Domitian joint-rulers with himself during his own life-time. He was on the best of terms with the senate, to which he showed great respect. The doctrinaire Stoics, especially Helvidius Priscus, constituted an element hostile to the Emperor. By habitually making one or other of his sons his colleague in the consulship, he retained the presidency of the senate in the hands of his family. The senate itself he strengthened by the introduction of worthy Italians and provincials, and he also made promotions of suitable persons to the equestrian order. Knights and freedmen found in this reign greater scope for their activities, in official positions under the Emperor himself. He took a very great interest in the provinces, a number of which he had personally visited. As one who owed his elevation to the army, he busied himself with its organization. He lived simply and thriftily, and encouraged teachers of rhetoric, poets, and artists, but banished philosophers and astrologers.

Of his attitude to Christianity nothing is known for certain, but it has been plausibly conjectured that, since in Nero's time Christians were condemned only for crimes punishable in any case, while in Trajan's time it is clearly established that confession of Christianity was in itself a crime, the changed attitude is due to an administrative principle settled under Vespasian (W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170, pp. 242, 252-319).

LITERATURE.—The ancient authorities are: Josephus, BJ, bks. iii.-vii., in the composition of which memoirs of Vespasian himself were used; Tacitus, Histories, bks. i.-v. (reaching only to autumn 70); Dio Cassius, bk. lxxvi., existing now only in the abridgment of Xiphilinus; Suetonius, Vespasian, and later authorities; the rich collection of inscriptions is put together by H. C. Newton, The Epigraphical Evidence for the Reigns of Vespasian and Titus (Cornell Studies in Classical Philology, xvi.), Ithaca, N.Y., 1901. Modern works are V. Duruy, History of Rome, Eng. tr., 6 vols., London, 1883-86; H. Schiller, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, I. [Gotha, 1883] 390-400, 490-513; J. B. Bury, A History of the Roman Empire, London, 1896, pp. 365-381, etc.; A. von Domaszewski, Geschichte der römischen Kaiser, II. [Leipzig, 1909] 145-154; K. Weymann in Pauly-Wissowa, VI. 2623-2635 (an admirable detailed monograph). On Vespasian's connexion with Christianity, W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170, London, 1893.

A. SOUTER.

VESSEL.—Though the drift of the passage 'That each one of you know how to possess himself of his own vessel in sanctification and honour' (1 Th 4¹) is clear, the exact meaning to be attached to 'vessel' (σκεῦος) has long been a matter of dispute. Some take it to refer to the body; others interpret it as meaning 'wife.' The first interpretation is adopted by many early writers, and is found as far back as Tertullian (de Resurrectione Carnis, 16): 'Caro . . . vas vocatur apud Apostolum, quam jubet in honore tractari.' This meaning is adopted by Chrysostom, Theodoret, Calvin, Beza, and many others.

No objection can be raised to this sense of σκεῦος. The term 'vessel of the soul' is applied to the body by classical writers, e.g. Lucretius, iii. 441: 'corpus, quod vas quasi constitit ejus (sc. animæ)'; and the passage 2 Co 4⁷ gives the same idea: 'Ἐχομεν δὲ τὸν θησαυρὸν τούτων ἐν δοτακίνοις σκεύεσιν.' But this interpretation forces an unnatural meaning on κραθαί, which can mean only 'to acquire,' not 'to possess' or 'to keep.' Chrysostom, who saw this difficulty, tried to get over it by explaining κραθαί as equivalent to 'gain the mastery over': ἡμεῖς αὐτὸ κτώμεθα, ὅταν μὲν καθαρὸν καὶ ἔστιν ἐν ἁγιασμῷ, ὅταν δὲ ἀκαθαρτὸν, ναυαγία. But this meaning does not fit in with ἐν ἁγιασμῷ, etc.

The interpretation of σκεῦος as 'wife' is held by Augustine: 'ut sciret unusquisque eorum suum possidere vas, hoc est, uxorem' (c. Jul. IV. x. 56). With this agree Schott, de Wette, and many German commentators, and, among English, Alford, Jowett, and Ellicott. Lightfoot seems unable to decide.

Hence neither word presents any difficulty, as κραθαί is used of marrying a wife: καὶ γὰρ Ποῦδὴ τὴν Μωαβεΐτιν τὴν γυναῖκα Μααλὼν κέκτημαι ἐμαυτῷ εἰς γυναῖκα (Ru 4¹⁰ LXX); ὁ κτώμενος γυναῖκα ἐνδράχεται κτήσεως (Sir 36²⁹).

The sense of the passage, then, will be that men should avoid fornication, and that, if a man cannot exercise continence, he should marry. The same thought occurs in 1 Co 7²: δια δὲ τὰς πορνείας ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα ἐχέτω. The objection which has been raised, that the injunction would thus be made to apply to men only, is not serious, for, as is often the case, the corresponding obligation on the part of the woman is implied. Lightfoot considers it a more serious objection that by using such an expression as σκεῦος κραθαί the Apostle would seem to be lowering himself to the sensual view of the marriage relation, and adopting the depreciatory estimate of the woman's position which prevailed among both Jews and heathen at the time, whereas it is his constant effort to exalt both the one and the other. But is it the fact that the term σκεῦος was necessarily depreciatory?

On the whole, the second interpretation seems to harmonize the better with the context and to avoid the difficulty of a strained interpretation of κραθαί, but it must not be overlooked that many names of weight are in favour of the first.

MORLEY STEVENSON.

VESTURE.—See CLOTHES.

VIAL.—See BOWL.

VINE (ἄμπελος, βότρυς, ἀμπέλων).—Apart from the Gospels, the only books in the NT containing a reference to the vine or to grapes are the Epistle of St. James (3¹²) and the Apocalypse (14¹⁸). In 1 Co 9² a vineyard supplies the subject for one of St. Paul's rhetorical questions. Wine is frequently alluded to, chiefly in apostolic exhortations against excess in this direction (see art. ABSTINENCE).

In the apocalyptic vision, as elsewhere in the NT, the work of judgment is compared to the vintage. In the OT both the vintage and the wheat-harvest are used as similes of the overthrow of the enemies of Jahweh, but here the wheat-harvest represents the ingathering of the faithful (see art. HARVEST).

In Palestine the vintage is the latest crop gathered in the autumn. In the warmer parts of the country it commences at the beginning of September. There are few countries so well adapted for the cultivation of the vine, and the extensiveness of the industry in ancient times is attested by the numerous presses and vats found all over the country. From the Mishna we learn that vine-culture was still flourishing about A.D. 200, but with the coming of the Arabs it almost entirely disappeared. Within the last century, however, it has revived under European influence, and large numbers of imported vines have been planted by German and Jewish colonists.

The mode of their cultivation depends on the natural characteristics of the particular district. In very stony soils parallel ridges are made of the loose stones, and the vines are planted near the side of one or other of these ridges. The shoots are trained up these primitively constructed walls, carried over the top, and brought down to the other sides by stones attached to them. Where, however, the conditions permit, and the vineyards are extensive, the plants are arranged at a considerable distance apart, and are allowed to grow to a height of about 6 or 8 ft.; the bearing shoots supported by poles are carried horizontally across to the adjoining row. In ancient times they were carefully fenced in to protect them from human spoliators, on the one hand, and from the trespasses of sheep and cattle, whose partiality for vine-leaves is well known, on the other (cf. 1's 80^{12, 13}, Ca 2¹⁸, Is 5²). Apparently every vineyard had its own wine-press. In many cases it is difficult to say whether the fruit-press under consideration was an olive-press or a wine-press. Those which are deep and well adapted for treading were probably wine-presses.

No doubt many of the large quantities of grapes produced in olden days were used for dibs, a thick sweet juice which is still made in Syria, and which was probably used to a much greater extent in ancient times when cane-sugar was unknown.

See, further, artt. ABSTINENCE, HARVEST.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, *The Natural History of the Bible*¹⁰, London, 1911, pp. 402-413; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 3 vols., ed. do., 1881-86, passim; J. C. Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, do., 1903, pp. 50-52, 74; H. B. Swete, *The Apocalypse of St. John*², do., 1907, p. 254 f.; J. B. Mayor, *The Epistle of St. James*², do., 1910, p. 125; C. Bigg, ICC, 'The Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude,' Edinburgh, 1901, p. 168; The Speaker's Commentary, iii. [London, 1881] 776; R. A. S. Macalister, The Excavation of Gezer, 3 vols., do., 1912, passim; DCG ii. 800 f., 824; SDB, pp. 959, 973 f.; UIDB iv. 868-870. P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

VIPER (ἑχίδνα).—Apart from the Gospels, the only passage in the NT in which reference is made to the viper is in Ac 28³. The viper mentioned here is probably the Vipera aspis, which is fairly common on most of the larger islands in the Mediterranean, but is no longer found in Malta. The last-named fact has been urged as an objection to the story, but that argument is singularly invalid. Wolves were found in England centuries after this viper at Malta, but they are extinct to-day, and it would be still more remarkable if poisonous vipers had managed to survive in Malta after so many centuries (cf. R. B. Rackham, The Acts of the Apostles, London, 1901, p. 492). On the other hand, the suggestion that the viper in question is rather to be identified with one of the non-poisonous species which are still found in the island is discountenanced by the whole context. It is manifest that the writer regards the incident as an extraordinary preservation from imminent danger (cf. Mk 16¹⁹). The Vipera aspis is very partial to wood, and it is significant that the viper in Ac 28³ came out of the firewood. The aboriginal forest has been cleared in Malta, and accordingly the disappearance of these venomous reptiles which infested the woods is merely what one would expect. See, further, SERPENT, ASP.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, Survey of Western Palestine, London, 1884, p. 140 ff.; *Natural History of the Bible*¹⁰, do., 1911, p. 276 f.; SDB, p. 837; UIDB iv. 460.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

VIRGIN, VIRGINITY.—1. Metaphorical usage.—St. Paul regards himself as the paronymph—the one who brings the bride to the bridegroom on the marriage day. The Corinthian Church is the intended bride, and St. Paul's ambition is to present her, a chaste virgin, to Christ. (The Rabbis ascribed this honour to Moses in the case of Israel.) Just as Israel was regarded by the prophets (Hos 2¹⁹, Is 62⁵, etc.) as the bride of Jahweh, so St. Paul regards the Church here (2 Co 11²). The figure was used by our Lord Himself. To Him His earthly sojourn with His disciples was like a marriage feast and His removal was regarded as the time of their widowhood (Mt 9¹⁹). Elsewhere the Apostle (Eph 5^{25 ff.}) urges husbands to love their wives 'as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself up for it; that he might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing of water with the word, that he might present the church to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing.' Here Christ Himself is at once Paronymph and Bridegroom, and in both cases the days of the Church's espousals are in the future—at the Parousia. In 2 Co 11² St. Paul uses the thought to safeguard the Corinthians from deception, so that the fate of Eve, whom the serpent beguiled, might not be theirs. St. John has the same figure (Rev 21). He sees the bride adorned for her Husband. It is noteworthy that marriage is used by both as a fit symbol of this most glorious reality. St. Paul regards Christian marriage as in some way deriving its glory from the true Marriage—of Christ and His Church (Eph 5^{27 ff.}). In Rev 18² the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride are typical of earthly joy, and their absence in overthrown Babylon (Rome) is a proof of its utter destruction; so also Jeremiah in regard to Jerusalem (25¹⁰); cf. Jos. BJ vi. v. 3.

2. Quasi-metaphorical usage.—In Rev 14⁴ παρθένου is masculine (W. H. Simcox, Cambridge Greek Test., 'Revelation,' Cambridge, 1893, in loc., says this is the first example of this usage). In later ecclesiastical literature this usage becomes common, and 'virgins' is so used at times in our own language. Thus Jeremy Taylor: 'But Joseph [i.e. Mary's husband] was a virgin, and had kept under all his inclinations to loose thoughts' (Life of Christ, ed. London, 1811, vol. i. p. 207). St. John himself is styled a virgin by Jerome—'a Domino virgine mater virgo virgini discipulo commendatur' (c. Jov. i. 26)—and by others, e.g. Photius: τοῦ παρθένου καὶ εὐαγγελιστοῦ Ἰωάννου (see Lexicons, s.v. παρθένος). Whether St. John or any of the other apostles was married we cannot say, save in St. Peter's case (cf. Eus. HE iii. 30). The passage in Rev 14⁴ is, 'These are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins.' Is the term here literal or not? T. C. Edwards (on 1 Co 7²) says that it is obviously metaphorical, and so also B. L. Wordsworth (quoted by Alford on Rev 14⁴), and many more. Had the words 'with women' been wanting, this meaning would be the natural one, and the reference would be to those who as the true bride of Christ refused to give worship to Caesar; but the words 'with women' make the literal interpretation practically certain, and the passage indicates not so much a depreciation of marriage as an ascetic horror of immorality. There is also the feeling (probably based on the writer's experience) that the man who was bound up with wife and children found it more easy to compromise and more difficult to accept martyrdom. The horrible possibility would arise in such cases of a man having to obey the Divine call of faithfulness unto death in the face of weeping wife and children (cf. the beautiful story of Peter leading his wife to martyrdom saying, 'Oh thou, remember the Lord' [Clem. Strom. vii. 11; Eus. HE iii. 30. 2], a story which if true proves that marriage was not an insuperable obstacle to the highest fidelity). There were always in the Church celibates for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake, but not at this time as an organized body, or in obedience to ecclesiastical orders. Long after this Paphnutius, himself a celibate, opposed a motion to make celibacy binding on the clergy; cf. Soz. HE i. 23: 'But Paphnutius, the confessor, stood up and testified against this proposition; he said that marriage was honorable and chaste, and that cohabitation with their own wives was chastity, and advised the Synod not to frame such a law, for it would be difficult to bear, and might serve as an occasion of incontinence to them and their wives; and he reminded them that according to the ancient tradition of the church, those who were unmarried when they took part in the communion of sacred orders were required to remain so, but that those who were married were not to put away their wives. . . . The Synod concurred in his counsel, enacted no law about it, but left the matter to the decision of individual judgment, and not to compulsion' (Nicene and Post Nicene Fathers, Oxford, 1891, p. 256). While the writer here does not directly oppose marriage yet he does regard virginity for the Lord's sake as a privileged position and as receiving from the Lord a corresponding reward, and, although the number 144,000 is an apocalyptic ideal, yet we may safely infer that there was a considerable opinion in favour of celibacy in St. John's day. He would, however, agree with St. Paul that unless a man could exercise continence of desires—as so many of the so-called monkish celibates could not—he had better marry.

3. Literal usage.—(a) In Acts 21⁹ we read of Philip the evangelist at Caesarea and his four virgin daughters who were prophetesses. These daughters lived at home with their father and entertained St. Paul and his companions. Whether they were bound by a public vow of virginity we know not. It is curious to note that Clement of Alexandria in Eus. HE iii. 30 says: 'For Peter and Philip begat children; and Philip also gave his daughters to husbands' (τὰς θυγατέρας ἀνδράσιν ἐξέδωκεν). It is possible, however, that Philip the apostle is referred to (ib. iii. 31), in which case he also had two daughters prophetesses and 'another daughter who lived in the Holy Spirit.' The probability is that Clement—as evidently Eusebius—identifies the two names. From the saying in Acts we cannot infer the existence thus early in the Church of an order of virgins. A later age saw the conditions of their own time in the Apostolic Age. They 'peopled the Apostolic age with virgins living in community and presided over by the Virgin Mary: see, for example, Dormitio Mariæ (Tischendorf, Apocal. Apocr. 1861), p. 96f.; Coptic Apocr. Gospels, F. Robinson, 1896. But this picture has no historical authorisation, and is simply the reflex of a subsequent institution' (J. A. Robinson, in EB iv. 5252).

(b) The locus classicus for our subject is 1 Co 7²⁵⁻³⁸. St. Paul here discusses the question of the marriage of virgins (i.e. maidens of marriageable age) as a specific instance of the question of marriage in general, and he does so not abstractly or exhaustively but in view of a definite situation. He makes it clear that marriage is no sin, not even though in his view this world-age is speedily coming to an end. He says also that he has no command from the Lord, either directly or indirectly, on this question. What he gives is his own opinion (γνώμη), not, however, as an obiter dictum, but as the opinion of one who knows his Lord's mind.* He recommends, however, in view of the present necessity, of the shortened earthly horizon, of the straits to which Christians were put, and of the fact that marriage made it more difficult for parties to face these conditions, that they remain as they are, married and unmarried alike. He widens this to apply to circumstances, business, emotions even. His opinion is based, not on any idea as to the spiritual superiority of virginity in itself, but on the view that the fashion of the world is passing away, and that for the married there might arise the fearful alternative of loyalty to Christ or loyalty to the ties of home. In 1 Timothy, where the outlook is different, he advises young widows to marry, while the older ones should be loyal to their first faith, evidently to their resolution not to marry. The Apostle sees clearly the objections to his views, especially in the case of daughters of marriageable age. Such a daughter ought not to be kept from marrying if she had been already promised, or if her moral life was endangered thereby, or if it shocked public opinion. In such cases let her marry. But if the father was firm in his resolution to keep her a virgin, if his heart was convinced that this was best, and if he had come to this resolution freely without external pressure, then he is right in keeping her a virgin. Nothing is said of the maiden's own opinion, unless from v.²⁸ we infer that the father should not put pressure on the daughter if she desired a reasonable marriage. It is evident that the Apostle is face to face with a situation so different from the conditions of our own time—when the end of the age is not regarded as imminent, when social conditions are based on political and civil freedom—that we have to be very careful in drawing modern practical inferences from his words. There is also no hint of an order of virgins, and the Apostle deprecates ecclesiastical or even apostolic interference with the liberty of the individual.

This passage, however, has been recently explained as referring not to marriageable daughters at all but to what are known as 'virgines subintroductæ' (or συνελαττοί).^{*} In later times unmarried women and widows resided with the clergy in their homes—a monk in the desert might have his 'uxor spiritualis.' Both parties were under vows of virginity and yet lived together and sometimes slept together. Latterly the practice became a scandal. It is to this custom, according to some, that the Apostle is here referring, and his recommendation is that where the woman has fallen in love either with him who cohabits with her or with another then marriage should take place: where, however, firmness of purpose in virginity exists, this condition of cohabitation should continue. The reader is referred for further information on this topic to art. 'Agapetæ,' ERE i., by H. Achelis, who with hesitation explains St. Paul as referring to this custom—an explanation which the present writer cannot accept. In 1 Co 9⁵, where St. Paul speaks of a 'sister as wife' (ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα), Jerome (c. Jov. i. 26) and others found a reference to this custom. As our Lord was ministered to by women of substance so were the Apostles, but this view is almost certainly wrong. The earliest Christian writer who seems to mention this form of living together is Hermas, and although he writes in visions and similitudes it is quite possible that he knew the custom and approved of it. The passages are Sim. ix. ii. 3, x. iii.; Vis. ii. ii. 3 (see notes by A. Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Canonem receptum, Leipzig, 1876, in locis). At first this custom may have arisen from the highest spiritual motives among those to whom sexual intercourse even in marriage was degrading, and it may have been practised by married persons who resolved to live in absolute chastity;† but as events proved it was bound to end in disaster. It is almost certain that St. Paul does not refer to this custom in 1 Co 7^{25a}, or anywhere else, nor is there any hint of it in the NT.

(c) From 1 Ti 4³ we learn that even in St. Paul's time there were those who forbade marriage, and in the 2nd cent. the practice of abstaining from marriage became common. Justin (Apol. i. 15) refers to many men and women of sixty and seventy who had been from infancy disciples of Christ and had kept themselves unpolluted (see E. von Dob-schütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., London, 1904, p. 261 f., for the growth of the feeling in favour of ascetic virginity). But in the Pastoral Epistles there is no reference to virgins. Even the deaconesses are not required to be unmarried (1 Ti 3¹¹); and, as we saw above, the younger widows are to marry again so that they may not be a burden on the Church funds, and so as to save them from sexual temptation. It was only in the 4th cent. that virgins became a definite Church order, although there are references to individual virgins earlier as existing both in orthodox and in heretical circles. St. Paul advises older widows who are on the Church rolls for relief to adhere to their decision to remain unmarried, and these seem to have been called *virgines (see Ign. ad Smyrn. 13, 'I salute . . . the virgins who are called widows'), but they are not so named in the NT (see art. WIDOWS). The question as to the perpetual virginity of Mary is not raised in the NT, although it is usually raised by commentators in the discussion concerning 'the brethren' of our Lord. Jerome maintained the Aei-virginitas on a priori grounds as to the superiority of the virgin life, and he tried to defend it from Scripture (see J. B. Lightfoot, *Galatians*², London, 1876, p. 252 f.; J. Eadie, Galatians, Edinburgh, 1869, p. 57 ff.; for a spirited vindication of the Helvidian view, with which the present writer agrees, see F. W. Farrar, Early Days of Christianity, London, 1882, vol. i. bk. iv. ch. xix.).

* It was on this text (Vulgate) that the distinction between precepts of law (præcepta legis) and counsels of perfection (consilia evangelica) was founded. The former were binding on all, the latter on a select few, and their superior excellence accumulated a store of transferable merit (works of supererogation), according to some. Yet it is possible to hold to the distinction without the ideas of supererogation and merit (see an excellent note in T. C. Edwards, *1 Corinthians*², London, 1885, p. 158f.).

* The term was given at Antioch as a nickname to the female companions of Paul of Samosata (see Eus. HE vii. 30. 12).

† In the Acts of Thomas, § 51, we have an account of a converted youth who killed his wife because she refused to abide with him in chastity. The Apostle raised her again to life.

LITERATURE.—H. Achelis, in art. 'Agapetæ,' ERE i., and literature cited by him, gives information about 'virgines subintroductæ'; see also art. 'Subintroductæ' and 'Virgines' in Smith and Cheetham's DCA ii. For 1 Co 7²⁸ consult T. C. Edwards, G. G. Findlay (EGT), and Meyer-Weiss; for Rev 14⁴, J. Moffatt (EGT) and H. B. Swete. H. C. Lea, *History of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church*³, 2 vols., London, 1907, gives the history.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

VIRTUE.—1. The term.—Ἀρετή (tr. 'virtue' in Ph 4⁸, 2 P 1³.⁵ [AV and RV]; pl. 'virtues' AVm of 1 P 2⁹) was the common heathen term for 'moral goodness.' In this sense it is used in the books of Maccabees. But it was also the LXX tr. of הַרְוּת ('magnificence,' 'splendour,' Hab 3³, Zec 6¹³) and הַדָּבָר ('glory,' 'praise,' Is 42¹² 43²⁰). In Ph 4⁸ ('Whatsoever things are true . . . if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things') and in 2 P 1⁵ ('In your faith supply virtue; and in your virtue knowledge') the reference is to a human attribute, and the sense is the ordinary classical one of moral excellence possibly coloured with its LXX meaning of 'praiseworthiness.' (The association of εὐαίως with ἀρετή in the former passage suggests that this fuller significance is in the writer's mind; cf. the coupling of ἀρετή with δόξα in 2 P 1².) J. B. Lightfoot gives us the meaning of ἀρετή in Ph 4⁸, 'Whatever value may reside in your old heathen conception of virtue' (Philippians, London, 1878, p. 162). In the other two NT passages (2 P 1³, 1 P 2⁹) the reference is to an attribute of God or Christ, and the LXX senses of 'glory' and 'praise' are more appropriate. G. A. Deissmann (Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, p. 95 f.) contends that ἀρετή sometimes signifies neither the righteousness nor the praise of God, but the manifestation of His power. He compares 2 P 1³ with an inscription of Stratonicea in Caria belonging to the earliest years of the Imperial period, and considers that in both ἀρετή bears the meaning of 'marvel.' 'Marvellous power' would well suit the context in 2 P 1³ and 1 P 2⁹.

2. The Christian conception of virtue.—(a) The motives of Christian virtue, according to the writers of the Apostolic Church, are: (1) the rewards and punishments of God's moral law (Gal 6⁷⁻⁹, He 10³⁶, 1 Co 10¹⁴, etc.) and of the coming Day of the Lord (Ro 2⁵, 2 Th 1⁵, Ja 5⁷, 1 P 4¹⁷, etc.); (2) the consciousness of a future life ('If after the manner of men,' i.e. from merely human motives, 'I fought with beasts at Ephesus, what doth it profit me? If the dead are not raised, let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die' [1 Co 15³²; cf. 2 Co 5¹⁰]); (3) the promise of faith, reinforced by the inspiration of ancient heroes and the general exemplarship of Jesus (He 11. 12); the example of Jesus is specifically a motive for humility (Ph 2⁵) and generosity (2 Co 8⁹); (4) the inspiration of Christian idealism—'the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus' (1 Ph 3¹⁴), the recognition of a Divine mission ('Necessity is laid upon me; for woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel' [1 Co 9¹⁸]); (5) highest of all, the imperative of the love of God (1 Jn., etc.), the constraining love of Christ (2 Co 5¹⁴)—the dynamic of the 'unio mystica.' Virtuous life is the natural fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5²², etc.); hence also the justification of St. Paul's emphasis on 'faith'—communion with the Oversoul: right 'works' will proceed from right attitude.

(b) The guiding principle of Christian virtue is the 'royal law' (Ja 2⁸)—the loving one's neighbour as oneself. 'He that loveth his neighbour hath fulfilled the law' (Ro 13⁸, 14¹⁵ 15¹⁴, 1 Co 8. 10²⁴, Gal 5¹³, 1 Jn., etc.). The law of brotherly love limits the freedom of action which otherwise might belong to the strong Christian. 'All things are lawful; but all things are not expedient' (1 Co 10²³). Virtue must be interpreted not merely in the light of abstract right, but also in the light of brotherly service.

(c) Christian virtue stands in contrast to Stoic virtue, inasmuch as the latter (1) is uninfluenced by immortality, and (2) insists on the suppression of the emotions. 'The sage will console with them that weep, without weeping with them' (Seneca, de Clem. ii. 6). The general tendency of Christianity has been to exalt the amiable rather than the heroic qualities.

(d) Asceticism is not a virtue of the NT Church, yet there must be self-mastery and self-restraint. Marriage is lawful and honourable (1 Co 7, He 13⁴), though with its dangers to supreme spiritual service (1 Co 7, Rev 14⁴), but sexual immorality is strongly denounced (1 Th 4³, 1 Co 5, etc.). The apostolic insistence upon elementary morality among the Christians is noteworthy. 'That is a reminder that the churches were composed of converts from heathenism, and lived in the midst of a heathen environment' (R. Mackintosh, Christian Ethics, London, 1909, p. 63).

(e) The communistic spirit of the early Church created its own set of virtues—mutual hospitality, contribution to the Church's poor, the ignoring of distinction between rich and poor believers (Ja 2¹⁻⁴). One also notes the stress laid upon loyalty to Church rule (1 Th 5¹³, He 13¹⁷, Jude¹⁷) and avoidance of Church divisions (see art. MURMURING). The references to 'false teachers' and schismatics are impressively severe.

(f) St. Paul appears to acquiesce in the system of slavery, and the apostolic ideals of womanhood are obviously imperfect. We must distinguish between the detailed virtues of the 1st cent. Church and the master-principle which inspired them. The implications of brotherhood will unfold with the progression of civilization. Christian principles abide, yet 'New occasions teach new duties; Time makes ancient good uncouth' (J. R. Lowell, The Present Crisis, 171 f.).

Consult, further, the various lists of virtues (Eph 4²⁸ 5⁵, etc.) and the various duties for special classes—husbands, wives, church officials, women, widows, young men, masters, slaves, etc.

* The Greek word χήρα, indeed, is used of a woman without a husband (either 'widow' in our sense or 'unmarried').

LITERATURE.—W. E. H. Lecky, History of European Morals, 2 vols., London, 1888; J. Vernon Bartlett, art. 'Didache,' in HDB v.; Newman Smyth, Christian Ethics, Edinburgh, 1892; T. B. Strong, Christian Ethics (BL), London, 1896; T. B. Kilpatrick, Christian Character, Edinburgh, 1899; J. Butler, Fifteen Sermons (1726), ed. R. Carmichael, London, 1856; J. R. Seeley, Ecce Homo, do., 1866; L. N. Tolstoy, Religion and Morality, 1894; R. W. Dale, Lives of Christ for Common Life, London, 1891. For fuller list of authorities see ERE, art. 'Ethics and Morality (Christian),' Literature, sect. 3.

H. BULCOCK.

VISION.—In modern English, 'vision,' from Lat. videre, 'to see,' is almost synonymous with 'sight,' but in the older use of the word the conception is that of images presented to the more or less abnormal states of consciousness, and generally produced by supernatural agency. The latter is the sense in which the Bible uses the term. It is the distinctive function of the seer (וִּיחֵד and רֹאֵה) to see visions, and those isolated and exalted persons are well represented by Samuel, who is the only seer known to us by his proper name. In his childhood, we are told, the vision (חֹזֶן) was not widely diffused (1 S 3¹). The same word for 'vision' is found in Pr 29¹⁸ in the statement 'Where there is no vision, the people perish,' or 'cast off restraint.' Words from the same roots are frequently employed in Daniel and Ezekiel. Jeremiah warns the people against the visions of false prophets which are elaborated out of the uninspired minds of those whom God had not sent (14¹⁴ 23¹⁶).

In the OT it is evident that visions, though often associated with dreams (Jl 2²⁸), are to be distinguished from them. Whilst dreams may be the medium for God's revelations, by way of 'special providences' during sleep, visions may occur during waking moments and by the exaltation or perhaps the transcendence of the natural powers of sight. A vision is thus the 'sight' or perception of spiritual realities, communicated either by means of the illumination or exaltation of the natural senses or by immediate consciousness through the supersession of them. It may be said that the evolution of the prophet in the OT involves a change from the state of rapture or ecstasy to that of ethical interpretation. Some writers affirm that the imagery of the revelation is supplied, in the case of the later prophets, by their own illuminated thought, whilst the truths themselves in more abstract form were the material of the communication. Whether this be so or not it is difficult to determine, inasmuch as the cases of vision in the NT and in more recent times imply a direct presentation in a concrete or personal form, or as an image before the consciousness.

The usual words in the NT are ὄραμα and ὁράσια, the latter probably having a less objective significance than the former. In the report given to our Lord by the two disciples on their way to Emmaus of the vision of angels seen by the women, the word ὁράσια is used (Lk 24²³). When St. Paul referred before Agrippa to the heavenly vision he spoke of the ὁράσια (Ac 26¹⁹), but in the account of the actual occurrence given by St. Luke the word ὄραμα was used (Ac 9¹⁰ 12²). That this word connotes a high degree of reality and objectivity is evidenced by the fact that it was used by our Lord when, referring to the Transfiguration, He warned His disciples to tell the vision (ὄραμα) to no man (Mt 17⁹). Peter's vision, whilst it conveyed to him God's revelation as to his treatment of the conscientious Gentile, was presented in a concrete form, the objectivity of which seems never to have been questioned (Ac 10). On the other hand, when he doubted the actuality of the presence of the angel (12⁹), and the deliverance which had been wrought, he thought he had seen a vision (ὄραμα).

Probably no recital of visions engaged the minds of the Christians in the 1st (if the earlier date be accepted) or the 2nd cent. more than that of 'The Shepherd of Hermas,' in which, somewhat after the style of Dante's Divina Commedia, teachings are presented for the instruction of the Church. The 'Shepherd' is the divine teacher, who imparts his lessons by means of precept and allegory, and the Church appears as an aged woman, whose features become increasingly youthful the oftener she is gazed upon.

LITERATURE.—HDB, art. 'Vision' and 'Prophecy'; Shepherd of Hermas (Lightfoot [Apostolic Fathers, London, 1891] and other editions); F. W. H. Myers, Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death, do., 1907.

J. G. JAMES.

VITELLIUS.—Aulus Vitellius, son of Lucius Vitellius (consul A.D. 34) and Sextilia, was born either at Luceria or at Nuceria (in Italy) on 7th or 24th September A.D. 15. He spent his boyhood and early youth in the entourage of the Emperor Tiberius on the island of Caprea (modern Capri). His addiction to chariot-racing made him a friend of Gaius (Caligula), and his fondness for dice-playing brought him the favour of Claudius; nor was he less acceptable to Nero. He attained the consulship in A.D. 48 along with L. Vipstanus Publicola, and was also elected into various priest-hoods. He held the proconsulship of Africa, one of the very highest posts in the Empire, apparently in A.D. 60-61, and in the following year was legatus to his own brother, who succeeded him in the proconsulship. His government is highly praised. After having superintended various public works, he was sent by Galba to northern Germany as governor. He entered the province on 1st December 68, and on 3rd January 69 he was hailed by the legions in Germany as Emperor, receiving also the honorary surname Germanicus. On conquering Otho (see art. OTHO), he was recognized as Emperor at Rome (19th April). He postponed the adoption of the title Augustus, and refused at first the name of Cæsar. He entered Rome, apparently in May, and was henceforth known officially sometimes as Imperator Aulus Vitellius Cæsar, sometimes as Aulus Vitellius Imperator Germanicus. He took over the office of chief pontiff on 18th July, and, after arranging the elections for ten years, he appointed himself perpetual consul. He was put to death at Rome about 20th December, after ruling eight months and some days.

His first wife was Petronia, daughter of Publius Petronius, consul suffectus of A.D. 19. She bore him a son, Petronianus. After divorcing Petronia, who became the wife of (Gnaeus Cornelius) Dolabella, he married Galeria Fundana, whose father had held the praetorship, and had a son Germanicus, who was put to death by Mucianus (see art. VESPASIAN), and a daughter, who was betrothed to Valerius Asiaticus in A.D. 69 and befriended by Vespasian. It is reported that the pleasures of the table were Vitellius' chief concern, and certain dishes were named after him.

LITERATURE.—Ancient authorities are Suetonius, Vitellius; Tacitus, Histories, bks. i.-iii.; Dio Cassius (Xiphilinus' epitome), bks. lxxv., lxxv.; Ptolemy, Galba; inscriptions, particularly those of the Arval Brothers. Modern authorities are A. v. Domaszewski, Geschichte der römischen Kaiser, ii. [Leipzig, 1909] 97-113; V. Durny, History of Rome, Eng. tr., 6 vols., London, 1883-86; J. B. Bury, A History of the Roman Empire, do., 1896, pp. 337-349; E. Klebs, P. de Rohden, and H. Dessau, Prosopographia Imperii Romani, 3 vols., Berlin, 1897-98, iii. 449 f. (the facts succinctly stated by H. Dessau).

A. SOUTER.

VOCATION.—See CALL.

VOICE.—The word 'voice' (φωνή) is used in the NT of any tone or inarticulate sound, whether of animate beings or inanimate things, e.g. Lk 14¹, 'the voice of thy salutation,' or the sound of thunder, wind, water, and musical instruments. More frequently it implies the articulated utterance of a speaker, whether the speech be jargon or intelligible. The exact signification of φωνή—a very common word in early Christian literature—whether literal or metaphorical, articulate or inarticulate, is to be determined by the context.

In 1 Co 14¹⁻¹⁹ St. Paul treats of the subject of tongues (g.v.) and declares that mere articulation without intelligibility is of no moment. Even the sound of inanimate instruments such as the flute or the harp is useless, if there are no intervals in the music; for no air can be made out by the listener if the laws of harmony are ignored. Prophecy is superior to glossolalia because it conveys a spiritual message in language that can be understood. The Apostle adds, 'There are ever so many kinds of language (γένη φωνῶν) in the world, every one of them meaning something' (v.¹⁰) (Moffatt, The NT: A New Translation, London, 1913). In his use of the word St. Paul includes both the speech of the human voice in its many languages and the notes of musical instruments.

In the Apocalypse φωνή is found very frequently. The formula 'I heard a voice' or 'a great voice' or 'the voice that I heard' (1¹⁰ 4¹ 5¹¹ 6⁸ 7 9¹³ 10⁴ 8 12¹⁰ 14² 13 16¹ 18⁴ 19¹ 21³) applies to the voice of God, or of the Lamb, or of the angel of Christ, or of one of the angels of the Presence or of the whole concourse of angels. The voice nearly always implies a personality, even when it is compared to 'a trumpet speaking' (4¹); but it is applied to the utterance of the beasts (6²) as well as their riders (6⁸). It is to be noted that in the Apocalypse the voices of the unseen world frequently, though not invariably, convey a distinctive and intelligible message or aspiration or doxology.

In the NT φωνή θεοῦ, 'the voice of God,' which is equivalent to the command of God, is an expression found in He 3⁷ 15 4⁷, all passages being quotations from the LXX (Ps 94[95]⁷); cf. Barn. viii. 7. The phrase 'the voice of the Lord' used in Ps 29 metaphorically of thunder is quoted in Ac 7³¹ by Stephen of God's self-revelation to Moses.

For Bath Kol see art. 'Voice' in DCG, art. 'Bat Kol' in JE, art. 'Bath Kol' in PRE³ ii. 443 f., and G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1902, p. 204 f.

'The voice of God'—the command or call of God—to the soul is not in either OT or NT an audible message, but rather an inward impression wrought within the consciousness of the recipient by the operation of the Divine Spirit. The objectivity or otherwise of the accompanying phenomena, whether of vision or of sound, is to be determined by the evidence of the context. Take the classical example of the narratives of St. Paul's conversion in Ac 9¹⁻²² 22³⁻¹⁶ 26⁹⁻¹⁸. Here we have an intense realization of the presence of the Risen Christ, of the actual words He addressed to the Apostle, and of a succeeding colloquy. To the Apostle's consciousness the call of Christ took the form of an audible appeal and conversation, just as later on Augustine was to hear the 'Tolle, lege,' or authoritative command of God which resulted in his spiritual illumination. The phenomena of sound and speech were valid for the awakened soul in both cases, though the exact message was heard by each alone; cf. the statement that St. Paul's companions 'stood speechless, hearing the voice, but seeing no man' (Ac 9⁷), i.e. they heard a sound, but no articulate utterance. It is easy to understand how the language of the senses—especially seeing and hearing—came to be metaphorically employed in all religious literatures to express the spiritual apprehension of the Divine and the Infinite. 'Sometimes the symbol and the perception which it represents become fused in that [the surface] consciousness: and the mystic's experience then presents itself to him as "visions" or "voices," which we must look upon as the garment he has himself provided to veil that Reality upon which no man may look and live' (E. Underhill, *Mysticism*², p. 93).

LITERATURE.—The student must consult dictionaries like DCG, Grimm-Thayer, and E. Preuschen's Vollständiges griechisch-deutsches Handwörterbuch zu den Schriften des NT, Giessen, 1904-10, for the passages where 'voice' occurs; but for the larger question of the relation of sensual perception to supernatural realities see E. Underhill, *Mysticism*², London, 1913, p. 93, as quoted under 'Auditions' in the Index, p. 58⁷.

R. MARTIN L'OEUF.

VOTE.—In his defence before Agrippa, St. Paul said 'when they were put to death, I gave my voice (ψῆφος, RV 'vote') against them' (Ac 26¹⁰). In Greek judicial procedure, pebbles (ψῆφοι) were used—black for condemnation, and white for acquittal (A. O. Seyffert's Dict. of Class. Antiquities, ed. H. Nettleship and J. E. Sandys², London, 1899, p. 333^a). Amongst the Romans, voting papers (tabellæ) were used (W. Ramsay, Manual of Roman Antiquities, London, 1866, p. 108). In the Jewish Sanhedrin, decisions were given by word of mouth (HDB, art. 'Sanhedrin'). It is very doubtful whether Saul was a member of the Sanhedrin. Most probably, when he spoke of his vote, he was expressing his approval of the sentence of condemnation pronounced against the Christians. The word is also found in Rev 21^{7,14}, 'To him that overcometh (νικῶντι) . . . will I give a white stone,' etc. In Greek judicial procedure, the man who was acquitted was spoken of as 'having overcome' (νικησας) (C. G. Wilke and C. L. W. Grimm, Clavis Nov. Test., Leipzig, 1888, s.v. ψῆφος). (For other interpretations see Smith's DB, artt. 'Stones' and 'Hospitality'; Expt i. [1889-90] 1.) In both instances the word is used metaphorically.

JOHN REID.

VOW.—The word 'vow' occurs twice (as tr. of the Greek word εὐχη) in the AV of the NT (Ac 18¹⁸ 21²³). In both passages it has been retained by the RV. In Ac 18¹⁸ we are told that St. Paul, when on his homeward route at the close of his second missionary journey, had the hair of his head cut at Cenchreæ before sailing from the port, 'for he had a vow.'

In Ac 21²³ reference is made to four members of the Church at Jerusalem who had a vow upon them. St. Paul had just returned from his third journey, and disquieting rumours had preceded him to Jerusalem. It was reported that he was teaching all the Jews of the Dispersion 'to forsake Moses, telling them not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs' (Ac 21²¹). Grave offence was thereby being given to the Jewish Christians, who were all 'zealous for the law.' Accordingly, James and the elders urged the Apostle to seize the opportunity of vindicating his character which circumstances offered. By purifying himself with the men who had the vow, and by bearing the expenses incidental to its due completion, he would be able to prove that he had not abandoned the ancient custom of his nation.

There is nothing distinctively Christian about such vows as these. Indeed, the whole point of the course urged upon St. Paul lay in the fact that the vow was a purely Jewish custom, which would be completed in the Temple by a purely Jewish rite.

Such vows are not uncommon in the OT: c.g. the detailed exposition of the vow of the Nazirite in Nu 6¹⁻²² (the LXX here translates the Hebrew word נזיר, which is rendered 'vow' in the EV, by εὐχή). They consist of an obligation, commonly self-imposed, to observe some special form of ceremonial purity for some specified time. The duration of the vow was marked by allowing the hair of the head to grow freely, its expiration by trimming the hair in the normal manner, and by the offering of certain special sacrifices. The vow of a Nazirite might be for life, as in the case of Samson (Jg 13⁷), or might even include an entire clan for several generations, as in the case of the Rechabites (Jer 35⁶⁻¹¹). The terms of St. Paul's own vow are unknown; but it is to be noted that it was terminated at a distance from Jerusalem, and therefore without sacrifices. As his departure from Cenchreæ was virtually the end of the evangelistic work of his second journey, he may have considered that his vow expired automatically at that point. Or he may have terminated it in view of the impossibility of maintaining on shipboard the conditions which it imposed.

The only other passage in the NT in which the word εύχνη occurs is Ja 5¹⁵ ('the prayer of faith' [EV]). The idea of a vow may be present here, but is certainly not prominent. εύχνη is used once in what may be called the technical sense by Clement of Rome (ad Cor. i. xli. 1). J. B. Lightfoot (Apostolic Fathers, pt. i. vol. ii., London, 1890, p. 292) translates θυσίαι ευχῶν by 'free-will offerings,' i.e. offerings made in discharge of vows which have been voluntarily undertaken.

The NT gives us one example of a vow of a rather different kind. In Ac 23³⁴ we read that more than forty of the Jews bound themselves with a curse (ἀνεθεματίσαμεν εαυτούς) not to eat or drink until they had killed St. Paul.

We see, therefore, that to a Jew a vow was an obligation of a religious, or semi-religious, character, incurred for some definite, specified time. Publicity was of its essence, for while it lasted the person who was under it was distinguished by unmistakable outward signs. And the expiration of the vow was, as a rule, marked by special sacrifices in the Temple. The word εύχή is not used by Ignatius or Polycarp in this sense. But in Ignatius' Epistle to Polycarp (5) there is a reference to vows of celibacy: 'If any one is able to abide in chastity to the honour of the flesh of the Lord, let him so abide without boasting. If he boast he is lost; and if it be known beyond the bishop, he is polluted.' Here we have for the first time a type of vow which is distinctly Christian and differs in certain important respects from its Jewish predecessors. (1) It is a vow of celibacy. Amongst Jews, to whom the continuance of the holy nation was a matter of supreme importance, abstinence from marriage was virtually unknown. The idea that the celibate is in itself higher than the married life was altogether alien from Jewish thought. The development of Christian thought on this point belongs to a later period of Church history and therefore lies outside the scope of this article. For an illustration of the tendency we may compare the interpolated passages in Ignatius' Epistle to the Philadelphians (see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii. vol. iii.², London, 1889, p. 209) with St. Paul's teaching (1 Co 7). (2) It is a vow for life. (3) Its value consists in its privacy. The Christian who has taken such vows is not to be distinguished outwardly in any way. He is not to wear any distinctive dress or to withdraw from the ordinary concerns of life. He is to recognize that his principal danger is pride, and, though celibate in fact, must not let it be known that he is celibate in principle. Thus, though we have here the germ of the idea which bore fruit in the monasticism of later ages, we are still a long way from the 'monastic profession' with its distinctive externals and narrow delimitation of 'the religious life.'

R. H. MALDEN.

VOYAGE.—See ROADS AND TRAVEL, PAUL.

W

WAITING.—Waiting involves expectancy or hope (q.v.), being related to an event or contingency regarded as still in the future. It finds varied expression in the apocalyptic atmosphere of early Christianity with its expectation of an immediate Parousia (q.v.). Of its more general form, as distinguished from this Parousia-expectation, we can find no better illustration than Ro 8¹⁹, where St. Paul vividly describes the eager longing (ἀποκαρδοκία) of all creation which is waiting for the sons of God to be revealed, that is, the issue of the world-sifting process of life and history in the ultimate triumph of the good (see ExpT xxii. [1910-1911] 71 f. for ἀποκαρδοκία). In the succeeding verses (8²²⁻²⁵) the Apostle expounds the experience of full sonship, and identifies this with 'the redemption of our body,' for which the believer is in this stage of existence ever waiting. In each of these passages the verb used is a compound of δέχομαι in the form ἀπεκδέχομαι. It is used again in Gal 5⁵ in reference to an issue of Christian experience, namely 'the hope of righteousness' (ἐλπίδα δικαιοσύνης); but, as a rule, the verb is applied to the Parousia, as in 1 Co 1⁷ and Ph 3²⁰, while in 1 P 3²⁰ it is found in an absolute sense, of the long-suffering of God in the days of the Flood, though the context suggests that what is waited for is the repentance and moral resurrection of mankind.

Other compounds of the same verb, namely ἐκδέχομαι and προσδέχομαι, are also found to express the notion of waiting. The former, with the suggestion of selection or concentration, is found in 1 Co 16¹⁴, He 10¹³ 11¹⁰, Ja 5⁷, Ep. Barn. x. 11 (τὸν ἅγιον αἰῶνα), 2 Clem. xii. 1 (τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ) and xx. 3 (ταχὺν καρπὸν). The latter, with the suggestion of welcome, is found in the Synoptics (Mk 15⁴³, Lk 2³⁵, 23⁵¹) and in Ac 23²¹ 24¹⁵; it is also found in Tit 2¹³ (τὴν μακαρίαν ἐλπίδα καὶ ἐπιφάνειαν τῆς δόξης κτλ.), Jude 2¹, and Herm. Vis. III. xii. 2 (τὴν ἐσχάτην ἡμέραν).

The same thought is conveyed by such compounds of μένω as περιμένω (Ac 1⁴) and ἀναμένω (1 Th 1¹⁰). This mood or attitude of the spiritual life finds a parallel in the waiting on or for the Lord (יְיָ) in the Psalms passim, indicating the spirit of expectancy which can be satisfied only by a token of the Divine favour in the form of 'salvation' or some manifestation of the Divine will.

R. MARTIN POPE.

WALK.—See CHRISTIAN LIFE.

WALL.—The explorations of recent years have yielded a rich store of materials for reconstructing the fashion of the walls of cities in ancient times. It can now be said with a great measure of definiteness to what period the remains of walls belong. This is of much importance as a test of the reliability of tradition. An instance falling within the Apostolic Age is found in the wall of Damascus, referred to in Ac 9²⁵ (cf. 2 Co 11³²). Examination of the wall as it now stands reveals three kinds of masonry—Turkish, Arabic, and Roman, the last in the lowest courses. The window shown as that by which St. Paul was let down is above the Turkish wall (cf. art. BASKET), so that the tradition has little value.

The walls of Jericho are mentioned in He 11³⁰ (cf. Jos 6). The allusion is to the narrative of the OT, and gives no insight into the local conditions during apostolic times. The recent excavations of Sellin, following previous surveys of other explorers, enable us to trace the history of Jericho, both in OT times and in the time of Christ. The walls, outer and inner, of the Canaanite Jericho have now been laid bare for a considerable part of their circuit, and much insight has been gained into the life of the ancient city. The first conclusions drawn after excavation have been somewhat modified (see PEFSt xlii. [1910] 54 ff., 234; cf. ExpT xxi. [1909–10] 353 ff.). The remains of the Roman or Herodian Jericho are a mile or two south of the ancient city.

The remaining examples of τείχος, a city wall, are grouped in Rev 21, where there are six occurrences of the word (vv. 12, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19). Although fully 200 ft. in height (or in breadth), the wall is insignificant compared with the height of the city itself (12,000 furlongs). The foundations are represented as monoliths of precious stone, filling the interval between adjoining gateways. See, further, art. GATE.

Walls of houses (τείχος) are referred to only metaphorically. The 'whited wall' of Ac 23³ is usually explained in the light of Mt 23²⁷, where there is a reference to the practice of whitewashing the cippus (cf. Dt 27^{2, 4}), or memorial stone, which marked the presence of graves (or rather, ossuaria). The practice extended to the stone door leading into underground tombs (see EBi, art. 'Tomb'), and to monuments on a large scale, if they chanced to contain graves. Apart from the reference to the dead, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the practice of treating the walls of houses with a coating of whitewash in order to freshen the exterior would suggest such a figure of speech. It would be most pointed in the case of Ananias, the high priest, if he sat to judge in a white robe, which clothed a character that was not white (see W. M. Furneaux, The Acts of the Apostles, Oxford, 1912, p. 360).

The 'middle wall of partition,' μεσότοιχον (ἀπαξ λεγ. in the NT) τοῦ φραγμοῦ of Eph 2¹⁴, is a metaphor having its origin in the practice of building dividing walls, which were found between the rooms of ordinary houses, or between adjoining properties. While the figure of speech may well stand apart from the chel, or barrier, which marked off the Temple precincts in the narrower sense, and gave the limit not to be passed by any Gentile, we can imagine that this fence would be the φραγμός in especial to the Jewish mind. Some commentators think it did suggest the figure (Westcott); others think any kind of fence would serve the purpose (Meyer). Alford thinks the primary allusion is to the rending of the veil at the Crucifixion.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

WANDERING STARS.—The Epistle of Jude is an earnest warning against false teachers with a strong denunciation of them. In vv. 12, 13 the writer uses one metaphor after another to depict the falseness, sensuality, and apostasy of these men. The list ends with 'wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved for ever.' ἀστéρες πλανήται are words used to distinguish the planets from the fixed stars; but the regular motion of the planets would supply no fit comparison for the author's idea, and we must rather see a reference to meteors or shooting stars, whose sudden and terrifying appearance, rapid transit, and speedy disappearance into a darkness rendered more intense by contrast would be a fitting picture of the short-lived fame and hurtful influence of the false teachers, and a prediction of that abyss of darkness into which they were hurrying. MORLEY STEVENSON.

WAR.—Of the three great Asiatic religions which have poured into Europe, the youngest has never found any difficulty about war; to Islam war is a power, not a problem. The Qur'an sanctions and enjoins warfare upon non-Muslims as part of the propaganda of the mission. To 'fight in God's way,' i.e. on a jihad, or holy war, is a pious duty, and the Muhammadan who falls in battle against the infidels is ipso facto a martyr.

'Say, "Fighting therein [in the sacred month] is a great sin; but turning folks off God's way, and misbelief in Him and in the Sacred Mosque, and turning His people out therefrom, is a greater in God's sight; and sedition is a greater sin than slaughter"' (Qur'an, tr. E. H. Palmer, ii. 213); 'What ails you that ye do not fight in God's way, and for the weak men and women and children?' (iv. 76); 'O thou prophet! urge on the believers to fight. If there be of you twenty patient men, they shall conquer two hundred' (viii. 67); 'When ye meet those who misbelieve—then strike off heads until ye have massacred them, and bind fast the bonds!' (xlvii. 4); 'O thou prophet! fight strenuously against the misbelievers and hypocrites and be stern towards them; for their resort is hell, and an evil journey shall it be' (lxvi. 9).

In practice toleration of infidels has been not uncommon, partly owing to political considerations, but in theory the 'curse and smite' policy is put forward.

Muhammad held up Joshua for the admiration of his followers as a model fighting captain of the Lord, and in ancient Israel also war was sanctioned by religion. Jahweh was a 'man of war,' and Israel fought their way from the Red Sea into freedom. 'He teacheth my hands to war' (Ps 18³⁴) is the proud, grateful word of David, or of the community voicing the Davidic ideal. But the altered political situation after the Exile had re-set the primitive and naive view of war (cf. HDB v. 635 f.). In Judaism the Semitic custom which determined the relation of the people to war as tolerated, or even under certain circumstances enjoined, by the principles of their faith, as an enterprise for which warriors were consecrated before they fought at all, had undergone a change at the period when Christianity arose in Palestine. Even earlier, in a battle-song like the 68th psalm, militarism is abjured: 'Scatter thou the people that delight in war' (v. 30). Judaism, before Christianity, abhorred aggressiveness and discouraged military rapacity. The Hebrews warred in later days for the defence of their religion and country rather than for aggrandizement. But even the older conception of a theocracy under arms for the defensive, which had flashed up brilliantly in the Maccabæan wars (cf. 2 Mac 15¹⁵), against a corrupt and domineering civilization, had given place to a fairly general repudiation of revolt against the Romans—a repudiation which the authorities, who were passivists, voiced for more or less prudential reasons. 'The Zealot and the "passivist" were really agreed on the general principle, but they differed on the question of expediency. The former would exercise his military rights at once, while the latter would wait for God to take the initiative' (S. J. Case, 'Religion and War in the Græco-Roman World,' in AJTh xix. [1915] 190). Pious Jews were not agreed whether they were bound to start the rebellion which would inaugurate the armed intervention of Messiah or whether they were to wait for His orders or even whether He would not do all the fighting for them. At the same time, the working compromise at the opening of the 1st cent. A.D. covered hot ashes, which might flame up; two elements still survived in Jewish religion—the intractable passion for national freedom and supremacy which was represented in an extreme form by the Zealots, and the strain of militant messianism which glowed in apocalyptic circles.* The problem of Christianity's relation to war, during the primitive period, is partly determined by these two factors in the contemporary situation. We must therefore begin by taking account of their bearing upon the ideas and practice of the early Church.

1. The teaching and practice of Jesus in relation to war.—The religion of Jesus was never intended to spread by force of arms. So much is clear from the teaching of the Gospels. He never aimed at heading a Galilean revolt against the Roman power, and in fact He explicitly discouraged all attempts to exploit His personality and influence for nationalistic ends. He deliberately disappointed such hopes. It is a fair verdict that some sections of His teaching cannot be understood (cf. H. M. Hughes, in Expt xxvii. [1915-16] 151 f.; K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911, p. 392 f., The Stewardship of Faith, London, 1915, p. 30 f.) apart from the theories of the Zealots or the dagger-men of the age (cf. DAC i. 103; H. B. Sharman, The Teaching of Jesus about the Future, Chicago, 1909, p. 113 f.), whom He implicitly repudiates. He is not an Essene, opposed to war, but He is not a Zealot. One of His disciples, Simon, had originally belonged to that party, but Jesus evidently had offered him a nobler outlet for his enthusiasm. The mere fact that He stood aloof from such aspirations must have seemed intensely unpatriotic, even to the Pharisees. Josephus is speaking more as a pro-Roman than as a Pharisee when he argues that, as the Jews have never succeeded in war, they are evidently meant by God to be pacifists (see below), but the Pharisaic party practically acted on a policy of inaction. They opposed the Zealots. Only, they opposed Jesus even more.

‘At great political crises he who opposes the patriots is not so likely to be considered their worst foe, as he who ignores them. It was not that our Lord preached submission to Rome, though no doubt the decision as to the tribute money was capable of being represented in that light—it was that He raised a spirit which moved in another plane than that of resistance or submission to imperial power. He created a weapon (it would seem) and withheld it from the service of the State. It will be found, in general, that no other treason is felt so deadly as this. To use power against the State is penal;—to hold power, and not use it for the State, is, to the zealot for the State, far more hateful. Christ would neither join the alliance with worldly power, nor the fanaticism of revolt against worldly power.’†

And, as Jesus declined to be drawn into any revolutionary movement of His own nation, as He ‘withdrew’ (Jn 6¹⁵) when an enthusiastic crowd of Galileans would have forcibly made a king of Him, as He seems to have shown no sympathy with the Galileans whom Pilate had ruthlessly murdered (Lk 13¹⁻²), so He withheld His own party from resenting by force any attack or outrage on themselves. When the Jew would retaliate, if he could, and take up arms against any foreign power which violated his religious scruples or profaned his sacred possessions, the disciple of Jesus was to suffer patiently and passively. Neither hot word nor quick blow was to defend His faith. Like the great prototype of their Leader, who was led as a lamb to the slaughter, His followers were to let their throats be cut, unresisting sheep as they were, butchered by the cruel knife (cf. Ro 8³⁵⁻³⁶).

In the apocalyptic address of the Synoptic tradition the disciples in Judæa are warned that they will ‘hear of wars and rumours of wars’ (Mk, Mt; ‘of wars and disturbances,’ Lk); but they are not to be scared. Why? Because this does not mean the end of all things yet. Mark and Matthew regard these terrors as the first stage of the end, while Luke, who omits the apocalyptic αρχη ωδίνων ταρα, rather suggests that they are simply prior to the end; but in either case the outlook is the same. There will be international strife as well as physical catastrophes. But Christians are never for a moment supposed to take any part in the former; it is a clash of pagan powers. In the invasion of Judæa the disciples will suffer, but they are bidden withdraw to the hills and leave Jerusalem to its fate, since the ‘City of Peace’ had failed to recognize ‘the things that belonged to’ her true peace. There is no active role for them in this grim prelude of the final tragedy. It is now the period of the end, but they have no concern with the issue between Jews and Romans; it will be a miserable time, throbbing with social anarchy and the horrors of an invasion, with convulsions and delusions, but soon the Son of Man will appear to muster His non-combatant elect for safety and bliss, lifting them right out of the jarring, untoward world. It was not His design to ‘restore the kingdom to Israel’ (Ac 1⁶). He had no faith in the nationalistic fury and programme of Judaism. He foresaw a catastrophe, and His regulations for the disciples were made in view of a crisis, not only for the Jews but for the universe.

When the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans was imminent, the local Christians did withdraw to Pella. Whether this was in consequence of the apocalyptic oracle preserved in the Synoptic tradition, or whether this oracle reflects to some extent the course of affairs, it is not easy to say. The main point of interest for us here is the interpretation of the spirit of Jesus upon which the primitive Church acted, and out of which this apocalyptic address arose. The Palestinian Christians disavowed any connexion with the national cause of Judaism. The vultures were gathering over the corpse of Jewish nationalism. Why should they linger beside it? It is possible that this policy was not adopted unanimously; the language of Mt 24¹⁰⁻¹¹ may hint at Jewish Christians who, in the excitement of the crisis, took a more popular line. ‘The Jewish war saw at least one Essene heading the rebels, and others in the ardent ranks of the Sicarii and the Zealots’ (ERE v. 400). If the stress of war produced this cleavage in the ranks of the pacific Essenes, it may have had a similar effect upon the local Christians. But the majority, or at any rate the vital section, must have been those who fled to Pella and abandoned Jerusalem to its fate. That policy of abstention from the use of force in aid of Jerusalem or in defence of themselves against persecution may have been trying, but it was thoroughly consonant with the trend of the teaching of Jesus. Under no circumstances did He contemplate any active measures on the part of His disciples as patriots or as attacked persons. The position of affairs indeed ruled out a militant attitude. The eschatological outlook rendered the downfall of Jerusalem a foregone conclusion, and in this way made for quietism.

* Both were combined in the revolt of Bar Cochba (c. A.D. 135), for Rabbi Akiba made the tragic mistake of hailing him as the fulfiller of Nu 24¹⁷. The rebellion was so serious, especially after the outbreak against Trajan, that Hadrian had no alternative but to crush Judaism as a national menace to the empire. After this, war ceased to be a serious outlet for Jewish nationalism or religion. The vitality of the Jews ‘was thenceforth pressed into two channels only: (a) the study and cultivation of a curiously subtle and profound, but narrow and in many ways morbid, system of theology and law . . . (b) international commerce and trade’ (Emil Reich, General History of the Western Nations, ii. [London, 1908] 273-274).

† Julia Wedgwood, The Message of Israel, London, 1894, p. 305.

Besides, His kingdom was not of this world; no Christians who had understood His instructions could dream of allying themselves with the daggersmen in Jerusalem or even with the loyalist Jews who manned the walls of the city so heroically, in the spirit, though not with the success, of their ancestors who faced pagans with 'the high praises of God on their lips and a two-edged sword in their hands' (Ps 149⁶). As for self-defence, His own word in Gethsemane (Mt 26⁵²⁻⁵⁴) to the disciple who impulsively struck with a sword was sufficient: 'Put your sword back into its place; all who draw the sword shall die by the sword. What! do you think I cannot appeal to my Father to furnish me at this moment with over twelve legions of angels? Only, how could the scriptures be fulfilled then—the scriptures that say this must be so?' He had already told the disciples that they were being sent out like sheep among wolves, defenceless against any brutal attack; He had censured the Elijah-spirit in the two disciples who were indignant at the churlish behaviour of a Samaritan village; He had bidden His followers face arrest, ill-treatment, and death itself, rather than be untrue to their confession; and the refusal of armed help for Himself was only the climax of the regulations which He had laid down for their conduct.*

These regulations were followed by the early Church. There was never any serious fear of armed rebellion on the part of Christians against the Roman power. From St. Paul onwards responsible Christian teachers inculcated submission to the legal authorities. Christians had to accept civil government as they had to accept the weather in the world of God. Towards the end of the 1st cent. the insane suspicions of Domitian led him to arrest some grandsons of Judas the brother of Jesus, on the ground that rumour connected the descendants of David with a revolutionary movement. But, when he found they were horny-handed sons of toil, simple peasants of Palestine, instead of turbulent Jews or influential agitators, and when he heard that Christ's kingdom was a pious dream of the far future, he dismissed the alleged revolutionaries with contempt (Eus. HE iii. 20). Malicious cries might be raised by the Jews that these Christians were overt agitators, setting up 'another king, called Jesus' (Ac 17⁷); but the conduct of the Christians disarmed suspicion as a rule. It is true that in the 2nd cent. Christianity did seem often to the authorities to be a secret, immoral, Eastern society, which might be harbouring political designs. But, whenever investigations were made, the idea of a political menace disappeared. Although the Christians were still regarded as adherents of a perverse superstitio, i.e. a religion which was not the Roman religion, they were steadily drawing away from the Jews, and this helped to clear their character, so far as the suspicion of rebellion went. Whoever were 'assidue tumultuantes,' it was not they. The authorities did not know much about Jesus, but they knew plotters when they saw them, and Christians had little difficulty in establishing their peaceful character. To the Romans both Jews and Christians seemed obstinate creatures. Only, Jewish obstinacy would seethe into rebellion now and then; the Christians merely offered a passive resistance. When they were afterwards put to death for high treason, it was not because they rose in armed revolt. The charge of disloyalty did not rest upon their disposition to fight for themselves. Their Jesus had not come to draw the sword.† What they believed about His policy is

* Cf. F. Naumann, Briefe über Religion, Berlin, 1910, p. 681, and C. Hargrove, 'The Warlike Context of the Gospels,' in IJ xiv. [1916] 366-379.

† The true meaning of a passage like Mt 10³⁴ was explained in the Clementine Recognitions, ii. 20-31, as Mic 7⁶ was in well expressed in this beautiful description from the 2nd cent. Epistle to Diognetus (7): 'Was He [Christ] sent, as one might suppose, to set up a sovereign rule, to make men fear and shudder? By no means. He sent Him in gentleness and meekness,* as a king might send his royal son; He sent Him as God, sent Him as a man to men, sent Him to save, to use not force but persuasion—for force is no attribute of God (βλα γὰρ οὐ πρόσκειται τῷ θεῷ). He sent Him to summon, not to persecute; sent Him to love, not to judge.' There is a slight flavour of sentimentalism in these words, but, so far as they go, they are adequate and accurate. It is the Fourth Evangelist who says that Jesus set Himself to win the heart of the world ('he that hath the bride is the bridegroom'), but the truth that Jesus came to reign by other powers than those of the sword is written over all the Gospels.

It is in the Lucan writings, not only in Acts (cf. S. Buss, Roman Law and History in the NT, London, 1901, p. 322 f.) but in the third gospel as compared with Mark and Matthew, that the most numerous references to war and the army are to be met. Luke, e.g., not only omits the disarming rebuke of Jesus in Gethsemane (Mt 26⁵²), but (i.) preserves the tradition that John the Baptist, instead of ordering the soldiers† who consulted him to leave the army, merely told them that it was their duty to abstain from what was called concussio, or the ill-treatment of civilians, i.e. from extorting money by violence‡ and making false charges; they were also to be content with their pay (Lk 3¹⁴). The negative part of the counsel (μηδὲνα διασεύετε μηδὲ συκοφαντῆστε) is not quite clear. The 'violence' may mean overbearing poor civilians, and soldiers had many opportunities of taking such unfair advantage, not only in war but in the police-duties which they discharged during a peace. If extorting money by threats is not covered by διασεύετε, it is embraced by συκοφαντῆστε, which also could connote rough treatment, as is plain from the Passio S. Perpetuae (iii.), where the hapless martyrs are exposed not only to privations in gaol but to hard usage from their guard of soldiers (στρατιωτῶν συκοφαντίας πλειστάς). The soldiers bullied the prisoners, in order to get money from them for certain privileges and slight relaxations of the prison regime. The general sense of John's advice is therefore plain, and the point is that, if John the Baptist was not a Theudas, he was not a 'pacifist.' Furthermore, among the special parables, or rather illustrations, of St. Luke's gospel, we find (ii.) the only § military one (14³¹⁻³²) which Jesus is recorded to have spoken. It is an illustration of forethought and deliberation. 'What king sets out to fight against another king without first sitting down to deliberate whether with ten thousand men he can encounter the king who is attacking him with twenty thousand? If he cannot, when the other is still at a distance, he will send an embassy to do homage to him.' The prudent action of Toi, King of Hamath, as told in the LXX text of 2 S 8⁶ (cf. H. St. John Thackeray, in JThSt xiv. [1913] 389-399), is an OT illustration, if not a source, of the parable. But this analogy is as old as Socrates. When Glaucon asked him how it was possible to enrich a State at the expense of its enemies, he replied that it was quite possible if the State first made sure that it was stronger; otherwise, it would run the risk of losing what it already possessed. 'Consequently, when one will consider with whom he may fight, he must find out his own State's strength and the strength of his opponents, so that, if the force of his State be superior, he may counsel aggressive measures, whereas, if it be inferior to its opponents, he may advise caution' (Xen. Mem. iii. 6. 8; and again in iv. 2. 29). A third item (iii.) in St. Luke's contribution to the martial aspect of the gospel-story is the detailed reference to the siege-operations of the Roman army when it invested Jerusalem in the war of A.D. 67-70 (19³⁹⁻⁴⁴), 'a time is coming for you when your enemies will throw up ramparts round you and encircle you and besiege you on every side and raze you and your children within you to the ground, leaving not one stone Sanhedrin, 97a: the sword which Jesus brought is the symbol of division in families and households caused by one believing and others refusing to believe.

* Cf. 2 Co 10¹ (δὲ τῆς πρᾶτης καὶ ἐπιεικείας τοῦ Χριστοῦ).
† Auxiliary troops of Rome or mercenary soldiers of Herod, not necessarily of Jewish birth (cf. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, London, 1907, i. 348 f.).

‡ For the general 'Prussian' attitude of Roman soldiers to civilians, Juvenal's 16th satire is an accessible piece of evidence; but officers were also held responsible for the conduct of their men (cf. Vopiscus, Vita Aureliani, 7: 'Si vis tribunus esse, immo si vis vivere, manus militum contine . . . annonæ suæ contentus sit. De præda hostis non de lacrimis provincialium habeat'). For a specific case of military extortion in A.D. 37, in some Egyptian village, see Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, ii. [1899] 134. This browbeating or blackmailing is the point of the allusion in Sir 36³¹ (35): 'Who trusts an armed band that roams from city to city?'

§ Except that of the strong man armed, in Mk 3²⁷ (cf. Is 49^{24f}, Ps. Sol. 5⁴), etc., an allusion to His own defeat of Satan in the temptations.

upon another'; also 21³⁰, where the apocalyptic allusion of Mk. and Mt. to Dn 12¹¹ is replaced by the concrete and historical 'Jerusalem surrounded by armies'. This, like the sentence in Mt 22⁷ (where the Roman στρατιῶναι are agents of God's retribution on His disobedient people, as the Assyrians had been in Is 104, etc.), is a water-mark of the date of the gospels. But the outstanding item (iv.) is the puzzling bit of conversation just before Jesus and His disciples left the upper room for Gethsemane, a fragment of tradition preserved by St. Luke (22³⁵⁻³⁸) alone. 'And he said to them, "When I sent you out" with neither purse nor wallet nor sandals, did you want for anything?' "No," they said, "for nothing" (v. 35). Then He said to them, "But he who has a purse must take it now (ἀλλὰ νῦν), and the same with a wallet; and he who has no sword must sell his coat and buy one (v. 36). For I tell you, this word of scripture must be fulfilled in me: he was classed among criminals. Yes, there is an end to all that refers to me (καὶ γὰρ τοῦ περὶ ἐμοῦ τέλος ἐχέει)" (v. 37). "Lord," they said, "here are two swords!" "Enough! enough! (ἰκανοὶ ἐστέ),"^(v. 38) He said'

(a) The least unsatisfactory interpretation is to suppose that Jesus was speaking of the dangers that awaited the disciples in the immediate future, when His arrest and death would alter their circumstances. Formerly, they did not need to provide for themselves. Now, they must look to their livelihood and even their very existence, for neither will be secure. 'Take your purses and wallets with you now, and equip yourselves with swords.' We can imagine Jesus uttering these words with a realistic touch of grave suggestiveness. The supreme crisis is at hand. You are going now into an enemy's country, and you will need to cut your way out of the difficulties created by My death as a so-called criminal. He did not mean literally that they were to use force against force, or to defend themselves against physical attacks; His words were a proverbial and metaphorical expression for alertness in view of the critical situation ahead. But the disciples were too prosaic to catch this meaning. They evidently thought that He intended them to defend Himself and themselves against the Jews; they were armed with a couple of swords or long knives (cf. v. 49), and they naively hastened to assure Him of their equipment. They pulled out the weapons. Would these do? 'Enough! enough! that will do!' Jesus replied, with a sigh and a note of something like irony in His words. It was useless to discuss the matter any further with men who could so misunderstand Him.

This allusive interpretation ('Totus hic sermo allegoricus est: quasi dicat, "Vixisti adhuc in pace, commilitones, nunc vero bellum instat acerrimum, et ceteris rebus omissis de unis armis cogitandum." Quoniam autem illa sint arma, ipse, quum in horto precaretur et Petrum gladio ferientem reprehenderet, suo exemplo docere maluit, quam importune hoc loco stupidis adhuc et ad res istas non satis attentis discipulis explicare' [Beza]), favoured by writers like Strauss and Keim, has been recently defended by Burkitt, in his Gospel History and its Transmission, Edinburgh, 1906, p. 140f. The words of this passage, he observes, 'are among the saddest words in the Gospels, and the mournful irony with which they are pervaded seems to me wholly alien from the kind of utterance which a Christian Evangelist would invent for his Master. . . . It is impossible to believe that the command to buy a sword was meant literally and seriously: it is all a piece of ironical foreboding.' He adds that the words 'afford us a very welcome glimpse into the mind of our Lord. They shew us that there was in Him a vein of what I have no other name for but playfulness, a tender and melancholy playfulness indeed, but all the more remarkable that it comes to outward expression in moments of danger and despondency.' But the passage, even in this light, remains unique. On any interpretation of it, the connexion of the verses is a difficulty. V. 35³⁶ seem to refer to the future experiences of the disciples by themselves; it is almost impossible to believe that they were expected to make all these new preparations before they started for the garden of Gethsemane. Yet v. 38 seems to imply that the disciples at any rate, if not Jesus Himself, thought of the imminent danger in the garden. Furthermore, v. 37 comes in abruptly, although it is possible to see a link between it and the foregoing words without undue straining. This is furnished in one way by—

(b) The literal interpretation, which assumes not only that Jesus advised the disciples to defend themselves in future by force, if need be, but also that He intended to use force in order to prevent Himself from being assassinated. It was only when He found that He was to be arrested officially by agents of the government, instead of being murdered by the hired ruffians of the hierarchy, that He stopped His disciples from taking active measures in His defence (v. 51)†. The latter verse, however, does not fit in smoothly with this reconstruction of the scene.

(c) A more plausible modification of the literal interpretation is to suppose, with J. Weiss (Die Schriften des NT, Göttingen, 1907-08, i. 513 f.) and F. von Hügel, that this word of Jesus was connected with a special situation which never recurred. He went up to Jerusalem to set men ablaze (Lk 12^{49c}), to kindle a fierce conflict in which He was destined to perish Himself, but out of which He hoped His disciples would be able to force a passage. His words refer to this exclusively. He is momentarily depressed, and reverses His earlier instructions to His followers. When He says, 'Enough!', He resigns Himself to the disciples' misapprehension of the seriousness of the situation for Himself; there is no thought, in His mind, of offering any resistance to His enemies. Jesus has no illusions about His own fate; 'but, as to His disciples, He hopes that they will be able to cut their way out and escape, and He feels that they will be morally free to do so. But even this much He adverts to only for a moment; since, when they offer Him the two swords, and He says "It is enough," He has already dropped that passing attention to this earthly contingency, and, in a sad, ironical reference to the non-comprehension by the disciples of the magnitude of the coming trouble, and to the obvious inadequacy of these physical defences, if physical force were really to be used, He breaks off the discussion by this short, ambiguous word' (F. von Hügel, in CQR lxxix. [1915] 262). This is preferable, at least, to the literal interpretation, according to which the closing words are either couched in a vein of sad, ironical resignation, as if Jesus felt how little the disciples realized that their physical preparations were quite inadequate to the crisis, or as if Jesus seriously thought that two swords would be sufficient for the defence which He intended should be made against His captors in the garden. The early Church was divided as to the meaning of the passage. Augustine (c. Faustum, xxii. 77) appears to take the words literally, though he is not clear about what the injunction meant. Peter, he thinks, was told only to carry a sword, not to use it! 'No doubt the intention of the Lord in ordering them to carry arms and not to make use of them was obscure. But it was for Him to give proper orders and for them to obey without any reserve.' Origen, as we might expect, spiritualizes the words of Jesus. But by the middle of the 9th cent. Isho'dad of Merv reports that 'in many copies, instead of "Let him buy a sword and take it," it is written, "Pray for your enemies." The text evidently was so difficult that early pacifists tampered with it. Isho'dad himself spiritualizes the words of Jesus, as an injunction "to teach them figuratively that henceforth they must take care of themselves" (M. D. Gibson, Horæ Semitice, v. [Cambridge, 1911] 198 f.).

The choice lies, in all likelihood, between (a) and (c), and the balance of probability is slightly in favour of (a). In either case, the singular and militant tone of the saying is the best proof of its genuineness; it is more easy to understand why it should have been passed over by the other evangelists, if they knew it, than how it could be invented by apostolic tradition. What measures of self-defence could it have been devised to justify? The early Christians did not defend themselves against attacks (cf. Ro 8³, 1 P 3¹⁴). Even the peaceful Essenes carried arms, to defend themselves against robbers (Jos. BJ ii. 125: ἀπὸ τῶν ληστῶν ἐφορούσαν). But, so far as we know, the primitive disciples of Jesus did not go about their work armed. We do not find anything in their primitive record that would suggest the need of putting a word like this into the lips of Jesus. That is one inference to be drawn from the passage. Another is that, whether it is taken in the light of (a) or of (c), it cannot be set up against the other pacific sayings which are so characteristic of the teaching of Jesus; if it is literal, it is only meant for a special occasion, and not laid down as a rule which supercedes the entire earlier instructions of our Lord against resisting evil. No more flagrant abuse of it could be imagined than that of Pope Boniface viii. in his famous Bull Unam Sanctam (Nov. 1302), which gave the imprimatur of the Lateran Council to the view not only that the two swords denoted the spiritual power and the temporal power ('in hac eiusque potentate duos esse gladios, spirituales videlicet et temporales evangelicis dictis instruimur'), but also that the latter as derivative must be subordinate to the former ('oportet autem gladium esse sub gladio, et temporalem auctoritatem spirituali subijci potestati').

2. Militant messianism and the primitive church.—The influence of the militant spirit in some circles of messianic faith presents a more complicated problem. So far as Jesus was concerned, the views of His mission which we have already outlined are enough to prove that He stood aloof from all the current expectations of a national supremacy for Judaism as the dominant power on earth. He compared the spread of His kingdom to the dropping and the sprouting of seed; His emissaries were sent out to teach and to heal, not as an organized force of armed adherents. Even the apocalyptic aspect of His kingdom was non-militant. The conceptions of a book like Enoch were influential; yet, when we read a passage like 56^{5c}, which describes the last onset of the pagan powers upon Israel, stirred up like lions and wolves to attack the holy city but ruined by quarrels and finally annihilated, we feel at once the difference between this apocalyptic outlook of nationalism and the hopes of the primitive church. The Son of Man whose sword is drunk with the blood of the mighty opponents of Israel (62^{6c}) is not the Son of Man in the Gospels; Jesus can be stern,

* Referring to the mission of the twelve (in 95) or the commission of the seventy (in 104).

† Cf. O. Pfeiderer, Primitive Christianity, ii. [London, 1909] 151, and A. Loisy, Les Évangiles synoptiques, Paris, 1907-08, ii. 554-563, following the earlier hints of Schleiermacher and Renan, and followed by E. A. Sonnenschein, in HJ xiii. [1915] 865 f.

but this is not His kind of sternness; and, when a sword is given to the sheep (i.e. the pious Jews) wherewith to rout their brutal enemies (90¹⁹), we instinctively think of the sword or knife by which the early Christians were constantly butchered (Ro 8³⁶; cf. Rev 5⁶). Yet the apocalyptic eschatology did carry with it suggestions of martial exploits, which may have appealed to some members of the primitive church. We have only to look at the setting from which the fulfilment of a prediction* about Jesus as the peaceful conqueror was taken, in order to see how closely the OT predictions of Him were bound up with more or less incongruous elements. War-weariness had prompted some fair dreams of peace in the older Jewish literature, but it should never be forgotten that the peace was to be the result of a conflict;† only, as the international situation had so altered that the saints could not win the battle for themselves, they were generally content to wait till God or His messiah chose to intervene supernaturally in order to win it for them, or at any rate to call on them for aid. The very increase of a belief in demons and in the Satanic dominion which confronted God and stood behind the opposing powers of human life, did not altogether remove this conflict from the region of actual war. No stable peace could be looked for in the future unless and until the non-Jewish world had been reduced to subjection or annihilated along with the devil and his angels. The messianic interpretation of psalms like the 2nd and the 110th, which originally depicted a martial monarch, like the mediæval St. Louis of France, kept such beliefs and hopes alive. No doubt, when the little groups of Christians succeeded to this tradition, it was re-set for them by their conception of Jesus. Their ardent expectation of His return in order to take them safe to heaven prevented the large majority of them from cherishing the least interest in the fortunes of the world around them. Eschatology tended to insulate and isolate the Christians far more than the Jews. Their faith detached them from the destinies of nations. The figure of Diocletian would have been intelligible to them; the figure of Constantine never. The last thing of which they dreamed was the conversion of the Roman empire, and much less its subjugation by their celestial Lord. The sovereignty of God meant to them another kind of rule than that of a theocracy on earth, such as the fanatical Zealots dreamed of, who believed that God would not help them in their messianic hope unless they struck together a blow for faith (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 1). But, while this was true theoretically and, in the main, practically, while the rôle of Christians was to hold the fort till they were relieved by the appearance of their messiah on the clouds of heaven, their literature shows occasional traces of another mood.

So far as the gospels go, it is again St. Luke's which suggests that the Apostolic Age had slightly affected the primitive outlook.

Twice we meet suggestions of this kind. The first group (a) is less important, viz. the references in the birth narrative; the second (b) in 187^c carries more significance. (a) The former contains the militant imagery of the Magnificat and the Bene-

* In Zec 9⁹; cf. the present writer's Theology of the Gospels, London, 1912, pp. 163-164.

† To take a parallel from history: the sincere and intense craving for peace and order, and the enthusiastic hopes entertained of Augustus, as a donor of quiet to the empire, were due to the weariness felt by Romans who had come through the internal strife of the later Republic. But the peace of Augustus was not disarmament; it was to be the result of a strong, wise, non-aggressive ruler—in a word, a peace resting on the master of the legions. The ideal monarch, who is the hope of a Hebrew lyric like the 72nd psalm, also rules by 'crushing the oppressor'; his justice and good order win him widespread homage and secure peace, but he enforces good government by the sword, if need be.

dictus—for the only allusion to the sword (23⁵: 'a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also') is of course metaphorical. But the warlike terms of the songs are religious reminiscences of the OT—e.g. of Hannah's song—and are fundamentally 'figurative also. Jesus did not come to 'put down the mighty from their seats' in Casarea Philippi or at Rome; John was arrested by Herod, according to Josephus, because the Jewish ruler feared that his popularity would develop revolutionary tendencies, but John's mission was not to 'deliver the Jews from the hand of their' Roman 'enemies.' Oriental symbolism is enough to account for such terms in those hymns of the primitive Palestinian church (cf. J. G. Machen, in Princeton Theol. Review, x. [1912] 1-38). This interpretation is not affected by the song of the angels at the birth of Jesus (2¹⁴), which, in the mistranslation, 'on earth peace, good will toward men,' especially when it is unconsciously read in the light of Milton's Ode on the Nativity, seems a definite programme of peace. The peace proclaimed is between God and man, however, not between man and man. The gospel is not announced as an international league of peace. Charles Wesley was right when he put these two lines of interpretation into his Christian hymn—

'Peace on earth, and mercy mild,
God and sinners reconciled'

The line of the angels' song is meant to allay any suspicion of God's goodwill towards men. 'Of God's goodwill to men, and to all creatures, for ever, there needed no proclamation by angels,' says Ruskin (Val d'Arno, x. 253). But this was precisely what did need to be proclaimed, in view of human sin and ill-will towards God. The coming of Jesus implies and proves that the divine thoughts to men are thoughts of peace and not of evil, that the suspicions of God which sin prompts are unjustified, and that He intends to create harmony between men and Himself. There is now 'peace on earth for men whom He favours.' And this message is sung by a detachment of the angelic στρατια!

It is a very different matter when we turn to (b) the language of 187^c, where, after describing how even a selfish and callous magistrate will attend to a widow's complaint, if she is only persistent enough, Jesus asks: 'And will not God see that justice is done to his elect who cry to him by day and night? Will he be tolerant to their foes (ἐν τῷ αὐτοῖς, as in Sir 35²², of which this passage is a reminiscence)? I tell you, he will quickly see justice done to his elect.' The wording is judicial, but justice in the East was military in the last resort, and that is the meaning here. The Sirach passage describes the confident hope that God will effectively interpose on behalf of the oppressed who cry out bitterly against the tyrannical power of the overlords. These pagan oppressors will be put down from their thrones, and Israel, the mourning widow, relieved. The Lucan words suggest that some saying of Jesus has been sharpened in the course of transmission through a period of what seemed to the Apostolic Church to be almost intolerable misery. It is a momentary relapse into the terms if not into the spirit of militant Jewish eschatology. But the wonder is that such relapses were not more frequent. Besides, the cry for vengeance on the foes of religion is the Oriental expression of the innate yearning for justice in the moral order. The note of impatience with God's apparent toleration of evil men and His intolerable delay (cf. 2 P 3⁹), as well as the longing for the speedy end of things in order that the present distress may be relieved, is not so definite and characteristic as the appeal for retribution, however, and, as this is loudly echoed in † Rev 6¹⁰⁻¹¹—the great Quousque of the church—it obliges us to look back upon the course and trend of religious feeling which prompted it.

War, in the present, had been regarded by Israel as occasionally a punishment of the nation for wrong-doing; the prophets had taught that faithlessness to Jahveh might be required by invasion and defeat at the hands of a foreign power raised

* There is a parallel (see, further, F. H. Chase, TS i. 3 [Cambridge, 1891], pp. 31 f., 147 f.) in the eleventh Benediction of the early Jewish liturgy: 'Restore our judges as at the first, and our counsellors as at the beginning; remove from us grief and suffering; reign thou over us, O Lord, thou alone . . . and for slanderers let there be no hope, and let all wickedness perish as in a moment; let all thine enemies be speedily cut off, and the dominion of arrogance do thou uproot and crush, cast down and humble speedily in our days. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who breakest the enemies and humblest the arrogant.' This primitive petition may be 'for the restoration of political autonomy, but it seems more probable that the significance is Messianic' (Abrahams, in Authorised Daily Prayer Book, London, 1914, p. xlv). Perhaps; and yet the messianic outlook includes the national supremacy. Would a primitive Christian, especially if he had been trained in this discipline, always be able to pray 'Thy Kingdom come' without similar associations?

† The older cry in Enoch 47^{1c} runs: 'In those days shall have ascended the prayer of the righteous, and the blood of the righteous from the earth before the Lord of Spirits. In those days the holy ones who dwell above in the heavens shall unite with one voice . . . on behalf of the blood of the righteous which has been shed . . . that justice may be done them, and that they may not have to suffer for ever.' The Son of Man enables the elect themselves to annihilate the enemy (48^{9c}).

up by Jahweh for that purpose. The people might need to be chastised or purged by some 'bitter and hasty' outside conqueror, although eventually Jahweh throws away His very tool (cf., e.g., the Book of Habakkuk and Dt 32³¹). This is still recognized not only in the Psalms of Solomon but as late as the Pirke Aboth, where (5¹¹) 'the sword comes upon the world for the suppression of justice and the perversion of justice, and for those who do not explain the Torah according to rule' (i.e. for heterodox ways).^{*} Even in the Zadokite document (Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, ii. 816) the militant messiah himself destroys the disloyal by the sword for their disobedience to the new covenant (9⁸). But the last-named prediction is eschatological, and it suggests the three war-scenes in the last act of the drama, as eschatology usually shaped the future course of the world. (a) Wars and bloodshed, the 'wars and rumours of wars' of which the Gospels speak, precede the dawn of the messianic age; international strife ushers in the new era here as in the contemporary astrological scheme of Hellenism,[†] but it is not war waged upon Israel. The people of God may suffer in the conflict, but they are not the objects of the pagan campaign. (b) Then comes a campaign of God or messiah against the opponents of Israel, who are supposed to be instigated by Satan and his agents. This hope, which thrills through one class of apocalypses, including Enoch, Baruch, the Psalter of Solomon, and the early Jewish strata of the Sibylline Oracles, is still maintained in 2 Es 13³²; the colours of the sketch vary, from Is 24-27 downwards, but the general outline remains the same; the assault of the massed pagans is a failure, and they are enslaved or annihilated, so that the saints can now enjoy the peace for which they have lived and longed. Nevertheless, these dreams of peace are always based on war; Jahweh or messiah must do for the people what they cannot do for themselves, i.e. rout and overpower the foe. 'The allegiance of the nations is evidently thought of as growing out of their fear and awe in the presence of the irresistible God. He reigns as a great conqueror. He fights no more because there is nobody left to oppose him. The peace that is to prevail is a peace that has been conquered by the sword of Yahweh. The day of Yahweh which is to usher in the Golden Age is the day of battle upon which he from the heavens sets the battle in array and once for all overthrows all his foes, whether spiritual or temporal.'^{*} As the demonology developed, the foes became more supernatural, not so much isolated powers as agencies of a transcendental evil realm; but the human instruments of the Satanic delusion were never entirely left out of the picture. Then (c) the closing battle between God and the spiritual hosts of Satan rounds off the campaign and the drama of the ages. This is a single combat, so far as God or messiah is concerned; even less than in (b) is there any real place for hosts of men or of angels aiding the divine conqueror. They may escort Him, but by a breath or a word He wins the victory single-handed. Thus evil is finally routed where it originally arose—in the spiritual, supra-natural region.

Living in an atmosphere which was charged with such militant elements, an atmosphere breathed by some of the most ardent and earnest souls of the age, did Christianity in the early church become affected by this hot air? To answer this question, we must first of all glance at the Pauline eschatology and christology.

The prevalent idea that the crucifixion had been a disastrous strategical error on the part of the supernatural Powers of evil in the universe (1 Co 2⁹) was naturally connected with the idea that Jesus had then and there triumphed over these dethroned authorities of the present age. The forgiveness secured by Christ at His death and resurrection is, in one aspect, a signal triumph over the hostile demon-spirits (Col 2¹⁵): 'he cut away the angelic Rulers and Powers from us, exposing them to all the world and triumphing (θριαμβεῖν) over them in the cross.' They are disarmed and rendered impotent to injure Christians. St. Paul drives home the paradox by his military metaphor. The cross is not the ignominious defeat of Jesus; it marks the open subjugation of His supernatural foes, it is a trophy of His victory, which has decisively stripped them of their power. The metaphor is military, as in the martial quotation of Eph 4⁸, but it is more than a metaphor. The human soul is beset by those real supernatural forces, and the victory of Jesus inaugurates the peace and freedom of His people (so 1 P 3²²). Thus it is that Athanasius (de Incarn. xxiv. 4) takes the crucifixion—although he proceeds, in his passion for demonology, to add (xxv. 5f.) that Jesus was lifted up on the cross to 'clear the air' from the demons who infested it and beset the human soul with their stratagems. In 1 Co 15²⁵ the last battle in the campaign is described, when death is finally annihilated after the rout of all the anti-divine authorities and powers; then and only then does the triumphant Christ, at the end of the ages, hand over His royal authority to the Father. Even if τάγμα ('each in his own division') in v. 23 is not a military metaphor, as ταρῶν, the visit of a potentate, certainly is, the following passage definitely depicts a Christian replica of (c) above, and human as well as supernatural foes are included in the rout which brings the messianic reign to a successful conclusion.^{} The influence of the tradition in the 110th psalm is felt here as elsewhere, even, e.g., in an epistle like Hebrews, where the primitive eschatological idea of the enthroned Christ waiting in heaven until His enemies are humiliated and forced to do homage, or, as the Oriental phrase went, 'put under his feet' (10²²), is out of keeping with the author's characteristic scheme of things. In Hebrews the expression is almost entirely figurative. But in the Pauline eschatology the realistic idea emerges in the apocalyptic prediction of 2 Th 1⁷ and 2³², where the apostle hints that King Jesus must ultimately intervene to defeat the lawless one whom even the restraining power of the Roman empire could not hold in check. The mysterious opponent is a sort of false messiah, issuing from Judaism, and invested with a Satanic authority which produces apostasy on the verge of the end. The delusion sweeps Jews and pagans alike into an infatuated rebellion against God. St. Paul has nothing to say about the fate of Satan, who instigates the outburst. It is the victims and tools of Satan who are destroyed, those who at present persecute Christians and those who dare to engage in the last and imminent struggle to their own doom—'men who will pay the penalty of being destroyed eternally.' This apocalyptic prediction draws upon sagas like those in Daniel ^{} Josephus (EJ vi. 40) makes Titus ask his troops confidently, at the siege of Jerusalem, 'What do their dissensions and famine and siege mean, except that God's wrath is against them and His aid on our side?'

[†] The parallels, which are sometimes close, are collected by F. Boll, Aus der Offenbarung Johannis, Leipzig, 1914, pp. 130-135.

[‡] J. M. P. Smith, 'Religion and War in Israel,' in AJTh xix. [1915] 30.

^{*} Ultimately, this messianic triumph goes back to the cosmological myth of a contest between God and the powers of the abyss; but, long before Christianity, the myth had been moralized and developed, so much so that an incidental glimpse of this hinterland, like that in Ps 89¹⁰ ('thou hast broken Rahab in pieces'), seems almost foreign to the OT.

and in the Ascensio Isaie; it is from the former especially that the note of self-dedication as a trait of the last deceiver is derived.

Half a century later the ardent messianic hope of a campaign against antichrist (cf. DAC i. 67 f.), which breathes through this passage in 2 Thess., broke out again under the strain of the Domitianic persecution. In 2 Thess. the hot air of the later Judaism, with its apocalyptic anticipation of the jus talionis applied by God to the enemies of His people and His cause, produces a climax of history which is judicial* rather than distinctively military. The moral order is vindicated by an overwhelming manifestation of the divine glory which sweeps all enemies of Jesus and of Christians to ruin. The outraged conscience becomes indignant and even vindictive at the sight of cruelty to itself or to others. The relief of the distressed elect means the doom of their foes, and the encouragement offered is the hope of such a speedy and crushing intervention. Christians need not stir a finger. Their very suffering sets in motion the divine engine of retribution against these wanton foes of goodness. This is emphatic enough, but it is when we pass forward to the apocalypse of St. John (cf. DAC i. 71 f.) that we come upon what is by far the most explicit reproduction of this militant messianism, from the livid horse of 6⁸ (for the horse is invariably a martial figure; cf. DAC i. 585 f.) onwards, amid the horrors and terrors of the period which the prophet anticipates in the near future, when Christians are harried ruthlessly by the authorities for refusing to join in the Imperial worship. The prophet repeats unflinchingly the message of Jesus: submit patiently to the trial (13⁹⁻¹⁰), do not resent the cruelty and injustice of the ordeal.

'Let any one who has an ear listen:—Whoever is destined for captivity, to captivity he goes:† whoever kills by the sword, by the sword must he be killed. This is what shows the patience and faith of the saints,' viz. abstaining from the use of force, when they were sent to prison or put to death for declining to invoke the emperor's genius and throw a few grains of incense on the altar. Even when the pagan hordes from the East are roused by God to attack and destroy Rome, the saints rejoice, but it is the rejoicing of those who 'stand still and see the salvation of God' in the rout of their oppressor; they take no active part in the campaign.‡ The prophet maintains the primitive Christian standpoint on this issue. There is no question whatsoever of an armed revolt against the State. The duty of Christians is simply to wait, under any storm of persecution, until God intervenes to inaugurate the reign of the saints by destroying their tyrant. But this passivity is accompanied by a certain vindictiveness (cf. the taunt-song in ch. 18 and 19¹⁴). Now vindictiveness, which is the temptation of moral indignation, is often more likely to beset those who can do nothing but look on than those who are able to take some active part in avenging atrocities. So it is here. The Christians exult over Rome's doom, and their satis-

* This is true even of the Epistle of Jude (v. 14^c), where a flaming quotation from Enoch describes the capital sentence upon the impious; but the previous description of the deity as issuing from his camp (ἐκ τῆς παρεμβολῆς αὐτοῦ, 14) in battle array is omitted.

† The seven-fold evil of the sword, in Test. Benj. 72, is: bloodshed, ruin, tribulation, captivity, dearth, panic, and destruction.

‡ All that they have to do is to await the vengeance which God takes on their behalf. So an earlier apocalypticist had preached, in the Secrets of Enoch 50³⁻⁴: 'Endure for the sake of the Lord every wound, every injury, every evil word and attack. If ill-requitals befall you, return them not either to neighbour or enemy, because the Lord will return them for you and be your avenger on the day of great judgement, that there be no avenging here among men.'

faction is bound up with an attitude of grim quietism. This is thrown into relief against a singularly dramatic background of militant supernatural power in action, depicted on the ordinary lines of apocalyptic hope. Such a hope becomes intelligible when it is remembered that its heart is 'the doctrine of the approaching Judgement, and the doctrine of the approaching Judgement was in essence an expression of the Jews' unquenchable conviction that God would not altogether allow His Chosen People to perish in their struggle with the Civilization of the heathen world' (Burkitt, Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, London, 1914, p. 49). Already this had been partially moralized and made transcendental. Now it is Christianized, perhaps as far as it ever could be. The prophet will have his people remain unintimidated by the last threats; he assures them that it is the fury of desperation—of a foe whose end is near. 'The devil is come down to you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.' St. John encourages the church by the thought that the quarrel between them and the Roman power is God's affair, a Satanic challenge of their God which can have only one ending. But this thought is worked out in a series of predictions which are sometimes truculent and weird; the adversary of God is no longer a political power, it is an incarnation of supernatural evil; the Roman State is an inspiration of the devil, and the final struggle is between the protagonists of good and evil. This Asiatic Christian prophet allows no considerations of patriotism to qualify or check his exultant anticipations of the doom that is to fall upon the Roman empire. He anticipates, as some of the later Sibyllinists did, the triumph of the East over the West; only, the antipathy is based on a resentment not of Rome's economic maladministration but of her irreligious policy in the Eastern and especially the Asiatic provinces. There is to be an end, before long, to the fascination, the impiety, and the luxury of Rome—all due to her possession by the evil one! The victory already won over the dragon in the upper world is being followed by the dragon's final campaign on earth;* in the crushing offensive taken by God the prophet sees a bloody rout of the enemy, messiah in action as a triumphant conqueror, and the total destruction of all Satan's hosts, human and supernatural. The divine retribution is worked out in history. The transcendental and supernatural transformation of messiah's conquest is as obvious as in the later Jewish apocalyptic, more obvious indeed at several points, but this does not mean that the historical process is evaporated into a spiritual sequence. The book lent itself to allegory, but allegory was the last thing in the writer's mind. The author or prophet is dealing with realities of this world; the Roman religious policy is to him the supreme device of Satan, and the seriousness of the situation calls out the powers of God and His messiah. It is a holy war which ends in a ghastly Armageddon for the wanton world-power which has proudly defied the moral order and stained itself with blood, especially with the blood of the Christian martyrs. Not until this victory has been won (19¹⁴ 21²⁴) can the warrior-messiah celebrate His marriage; but, once the divine commandant has triumphed, He and His Bride, the Church, have an endless day of peace and bliss before them.†

* Most of these ghastly touches (e.g., 14²⁰; cf. En 100⁸) have precedents, if not sources, in the militant apocalyptic messianism; e.g. the formation of angelic hosts to destroy the wicked is a commonplace of the apocalyptic strategy, as is the evil (which was supernaturalized).

† It is only fair to contrast this with the Jewish Psalms of Solomon in the 1st cent. B.C., where the political quietists who claim to be the righteous party in Israel accept the sufferings

It is a proof of the quietist temper in early Christianity that, even when a book of such ardent language and spirit was admitted to the canon, it did not make the church swerve from the path of non-resistance into rebellion against the Roman empire. The church adhered to the 'loyalist' passivity of St. Paul on this issue. The section of St. John's apocalypse which resisted the spiritualizing interpretation longest was the prediction (20¹⁻⁶) of the saints' reign on earth; what the book seems to have fostered was chiliasm rather than militarist hopes of a supernatural kind, even though the military setting of the eschatology is prominent in its pages as it is not in 2 Thessalonians. It is true that the chiliasm itself had a martial setting, but at first it was not interpreted in a militant sense. The early chiliasts were not Fifth Monarchy men. There was a danger of this, but the danger was never real in the early centuries. The ideal of Christianity remained peaceful—an important point, for no aspirations of martial success were excited in the church's mind, and there was no glorification of the sword. In the main* the church kept, practically as well as ideally, to an eschatology which was not coloured by the militant hopes of this apocalyptic tract.

3. Martial metaphors and illustrations.—But, if it is difficult to estimate the extent to which some primitive Christians took a realistic view of their new messianic hope in its eschatological outlook, there is no doubt raised by their description of the Christian life in military terms. The one passes into the other through the conception of Satan as the inspirer of heresy (e.g. Ro 16²⁰) and persecution (1 P 5³; cf. DAC i. 294), as the foe to be resisted. The very resistance tends to assume militant forms of expression. As the Persian dualism had contributed to develop the demonology of the later Judaism, it intensified the sense of moral conflict. Mithraism was one outcome of this tension, in the later days. But the dualism never became so sharp, metaphysically and morally, in Christianity or even in Judaism; Satan was never considered to be on anything like equal terms with his divine antagonist. Note how this militant expression of the faith prevailed. Early Christians spoke of themselves as soldiers of God, just because they were not literally soldiers as, e.g., the Maccabees had been. They were not even crusaders. Their military language is purely metaphorical and figurative. But it is none the less significant on that account. And it is curiously widespread. The early Christian writers drew upon agriculture, architecture, slavery, law, marriage, sea-faring, and even the games, to illustrate their faith, but scarcely any one of these departments of life furnished such a number of apt and favourite metaphors for the heroic aspect of the new religion as the Roman army. When we consider that these Christians had as yet no rank or standing in the Roman world, and also that they inherited traditions of a resolutely pacific nature from their Lord, this becomes all the more remarkable. In one aspect it was part of the de-orientalizing of Christianity. As 'messiah' was replaced by the equivalent 'Lord,' so 'carrying the cross' involved ideas which were more intelligible to non-Semitic people when they were expressed in military figures. More than once we feel that the early Christians were sensible of the paradox and even delighted in the use of such language. To state the gospel of peace in terms of warfare was a telling as well as an intelligible method of self-expression. To say that their faith was 'the victory which conquers the world,' or that by bearing persecution and suffering they were 'more than conquerors,' was to put a new edge on language. Besides, their principles were so well known that these militant terms could be employed without the smallest risk of misconception, either to themselves or to those who overheard them.

Take the Pauline epistles, to begin with. St. Paul never calls himself the soldier of God or of Jesus Christ, but in two of his latest letters, when he was in daily contact with the Roman troops in his captivity, he describes Epaphroditus (Ph 2³) and Archippus (Philem²; cf. DAC i. 89) as his fellow-soldiers.* St. Paul's experience of Roman soldiers was happier than that of Ignatius. The latter was disgusted with them. He calls his armed escort a set of wild brutes (ad Rom. v. 1): 'I am bound fast to ten leopards (that is, a company of soldiers), who, the better they are treated, grow worse and worse.' When pious Christians gave these soldiers money (see above, p. 648),† in order to get access to Ignatius, the guard did not cease to ill-treat him; they only became more brutal and bullying to their prisoner. St. Paul makes no complaints against his military guard (Ac 23¹⁶), and indeed we know that not only the procurator Felix (Ac 24²⁶) but the officer of the Imperial regiment (DAC i. 123 f.) who conducted him to Rome behaved with courtesy and consideration (Ac 27³)—a feature which more than once recurs in the red record of the martyrs, for soldiers had police-work to do, and they could alleviate a prisoner's lot, if they chose. St. Paul's epistles draw repeatedly and lavishly on the military vocabulary. Thus, the apostolic instructions which were to regulate the practice of the church at Thessalonica are called by the technical military term παράγγελαι (1 Th 4¹), as in 1 Ti 1¹⁵ (ταύτην τὴν παράγγελίαν παρατίθεμαι σοι), in order to emphasize their authority. A similar note of discipline is struck in 2 Th 3⁶, where the church is told that it must not degenerate into a disorderly mob of individuals who break their ranks (παράγχεσθαι δὲ ὑμῶν, κτλ.); also, mutineers are to be avoided, just as the Roman general Germanicus had ordered in the case of a mutiny (see Lightfoot's Notes on Epp. of St. Paul, London, 1895, p. 129). On the contrary, churches which are free from insubordination and united in a common obedience to the orders of the gospel are commended; it is a pleasure, the apostle writes to the Colossian Christians (Col 2⁹), 'to note your steadiness and the solid front of your faith in Christ,' which no specious heresies had been able to break; and the Philippian Christians are congratulated on having presented an undivided front against persecution and suffering (Ph 1²⁷): 'Let me know you are standing firm in a common spirit, fighting side by side like one man for the faith of the gospel. Never be scared for a

* Sirach's naive remark (37⁵⁻⁶) is rather different:

'A good friend fights with one's enemy,
And holds the shield up against adversaries:
Forget not a comrade in conflict,
And forsake him not when thou art taking spoil.'

Still, this could be partially turned into metaphor, as by Julian (Orat. viii. 242a: τοῦ πιστοῦ φίλου καὶ προθύμου συνασπιστοῦ καὶ πρὸς τοὺς κινδύνους ἀποθάρσυνον κοινωνοῦ) in his grateful praise of Sallustius. Caesar used to address his troops not as soldiers but by the term 'comrades' (Suet. Cæs. 67: 'Blandiore nomine commilitones appellabat'); but St. Paul addresses his two friends neither as their leader nor in flattery. They and he are serving side by side in the ranks of God.

† Perpetua and her friends paid in order to get occasionally out of the foul, dark cell into the larger prison ('constituerunt praeemptio ut paucis horis emissi in meliorem locum carceris refrigeraremus' [Passio S. Perpetuae, iii.]). Josephus mentions a similar case in Ant. xviii. 233.

of Pompey's invasion, in the hope of an ultimate triumph of messiah. The triumph leads to a reign which is not military, but it means a national predominance of Israel; and 'the purely ethical interest is subordinate to the national one, and more particularly to the Pharisaic programme' (E. F. Scott, The Kingdom and the Messiah, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 45).

* The Acta Pauli (see below), perhaps contemporary with Celsus, show how the language, if not the actions, of Christians could give rise to suspicions of treason.

second by your opponents, etc.'; 4³: 'These women . . . have fought at my side in the active service of the gospel, along with Clement and the rest of my fellow-workers'.* Thrice the pay of the soldier is mentioned: in Ro 6²³ ('The wages of sin is death,' where δὲναια, meaning the rations and pay of the soldier, which he gets as his due, is contrasted with the χαρίσμα,† or free gift of eternal life); in 1 Co 9⁷, where the right of an apostle to be supported at the expense of the church is defended or illustrated by the analogy of a soldier in the legions ('Does a soldier provide his own supplies?'); and in 2 Co 11⁸, where he explains to the Corinthians that he had not accepted any remuneration from them because he had 'made a levy on other churches, taking pay (δὲναιον) from them so as to minister to you.' In addition to the trumpet, sounding for the charge (1 Co 14⁸: 'If the trumpet sounds indistinct, who will get ready for the fray?'—the assumption being that all are brave enough to serve if they only hear the signal, whereas the coward in Theophrastus, Char. xxv. 5, sits in his tent and grumbles that τὸ πολεμικὸν is sounded only too distinctly!), the familiar and splendid procession of triumph, accorded to a successful general at Rome, is used to describe the success won by God through St. Paul's preaching missions: 'Wherever I go, thank God, he makes my life a constant pageant of triumph in Christ' (2 Co 2¹⁴). The second epistle to the Corinthians has two other military allusions of interest, besides that in 6⁷ to weapons for attack and defence—one to envoys or ambassadors (cf. DAC i. 52) who press the offer of peace (5²⁰: 'I am an envoy for Christ, God appealing by me, as it were—be reconciled to God, I entreat you on behalf of Christ'), the other to an evangelist's work as storming the citadel (10³⁴: 'I do live in the flesh, but I do not make war as the flesh does; the weapons of my warfare are not weapons of the flesh, but divinely strong to demolish fortresses§—I demolish theories and any rampart thrown up to resist the knowledge of God, I take every project prisoner to make it obey Christ, I am prepared to court-martial any one who remains insubordinate, once your submission is complete'). The latter passage, with its siege-metaphor, which Philo had already employed (e.g. de Confus. Ling. 26, on Jg 8⁹, de Abrah. 26, 38), is a vigorous account of St. Paul's activity in fighting for the good cause till it was triumphant; he claims to make a trenchant attack on all church theories, however formidable, which in his view dispute the freedom and authority of the gospel; he will give them no quarter; any notion subversive of the faith starts him to take the offensive; the pride and rebelliousness which are entrenched in the human mind, even within the church, are a perpetual summons to him. The siege of Mansoul is a challenge to his powers. And he emphasizes at the end his apostolic authority over the members of the church; he will court-martial any seditious and disorderly person.

* So Ignatius begins his letter to the Christians of Magnesia (ad Magn. i. 1) by praising 'the splendid order' of their devotion to God (τὸ πολυειτακτόν). Even σύνφυγος in Ph 4³ may be equivalent to commilito.

† Tertullian's love of military phrases leads him to translate even χαρίσμα by an army term, donativum (de Resurr. Carnis, 47). See below, p. 655.

‡ In the opening stanza of his hymn on St. Paul (Hymni et Sequentiae, lvii.) Abelard compares him to such a trumpet:

Tuba Domini, Paule, maxima,
De coelestibus dans tonitrua,
Hostes dissipans, cives aggrega.'

The effect of the trumpet-call upon a camp is vividly described in the pseudo-Aristotelian de Mundo (399^b), which is not much later than the NT.

§ The battering-rain was twice used against Jerusalem, by Pompey (Ps. Sol. ii. 1) and by Titus (Josephus, BJ vi. i. 3). These siege-machines are discussed and described in Justus Lipsius, Poliorticeion (Amsterdam, 1605), bk. iii.

Hardly any passage is so vivid with military allusions, except the description * of the Christian armour in 1 Th 5⁸ and Eph 6¹⁰. The former reference to faith and love as the coat of mail, and the hope of salvation as the helmet of the Christian, implies (1) that faith in God and mutual love are a unity, and that, instead of requiring to be protected, they form the real protection of the Christian character against the moral dangers that threaten the church in the last days; they are ours to be used, not to be admired or laid aside as too good and delicate for contact with the rough world. (2) What protects the vital centre of the Christian life is hope of the future salvation which is imminent; this is a Christian addition to the OT imagery which St. Paul probably has in mind; to lose hope is to lose everything. He is saying metaphorically what is put otherwise in Lk 21²⁸ ('when these things begin to happen, look up and raise your heads; for your release is not far distant'). In Eph 6¹⁰ the details are much enlarged, and the supernatural opponents are brought into the foreground. 'Be strong in the Lord and in the strength of his might; put on God's armour [best description of the Roman panoplia in Polyb. vi. xxiii. 2f.] so as to be able to stand against the stratagems of the devil' [as the inspirer of heresies—cf. 4¹⁴—and persecutions]. The devil, I say, 'for we have to struggle, not with blood and flesh but with the angelic Rulers, the angelic Authorities, the potentates of the dark present, the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly sphere.† So take God's armour‡ [a military phrase; cf. Jth 14³; Jos. Ant. xx. 110, etc.], that you may be able to make a stand upon the evil day and hold your ground by overcoming all the foe. Hold your ground, tighten the belt of truth [which keeps everything in its place] about your loins, wear integrity as your coat of mail, and have your feet shod with the stability § of the gospel of peace; above all 'the Roman panoplia consists first of all in the shield'—five feet by two and a half (Polybius), take faith as your shield, to enable you to quench all the fire-tipped darts ¶ flung by the evil one, put on salvation as your helmet, ¶ and take the Spirit as your sword'; i.e., the writer adds, 'the word of God'—the idea being, apparently, that an apt and ready memory of Scripture would form an effective means of countering and defeating evil suggestions (cf. the use of the OT by Jesus in His temptations). The long passage closes by an appeal for prayer  as a further means of success in the Christian conflict. With prayer there is (v. 19, eis touto agnizontes) the suggestion, though it is no more than a suggestion, of alertness, as of a sentry on duty; this is also hinted at in other semi-military passages like Ro 13¹² and 1 Th 5⁶, but the most direct allusion to the divine sentinel is one which occurs in Ph 4⁷ ('God's peace shall keep guard over your hearts and minds in Christ Jesus')—a thought echoed by Francis Thompson in 'A Fallen Yew':

'The hold that falls not when the town is got,
The heart's heart, whose immured plot
Hath keys yourself keep not!

Its keys are at the cincture hung of God;
Its gates are trepidant to His nod;
By Him its floors are trod.'

* Like Wis 51¹⁷, it is modelled on the description of the Divine Warrior in Is 59¹⁷, but, unlike Wis., it applies the imagery to the individual saint. The details of the armour, in Roman days, are discussed in bk. iii. of Justus Lipsius, De Militia Romana (editio ultima, Amsterdam, 1604, with illustrations).

† The difficulty of this phrase, ἐν τοῖς πνευματικοῖς, led to the Syriac (pesh.) v.l. vnoṣpaniois, and also to the idea (Chrysostom, Theodoret, etc.) that the words meant, 'our struggle is for (possession of) the heavenly sphere.' Origen, in his 11th Homily on Joshua (110), explains that perfect Christians like St. Paul fight against the spirit-forces of demons, whereas the immature Christian has still to fight against flesh and blood (i.e. the passions).

‡ i.e. be fully equipped—a metaphorical use, already popular (e.g. Tacitus applies the simile to an orator [Dial. 32], and Philostratus to the serious arguments of a philosopher [Vita Apoll. vi. 16]). The Roman confessors (Cyprian, Epp. xxxi. 5) apply this text to themselves, as they await martyrdom in A.D. 250 during the Decian persecution; they are being trained by Christ as an army in their prison, before being called upon to meet the foe in the open, i.e. in martyrdom.

§ Plutarch says that Marcus Cato 'showed himself effective with his hands in battle and sure and steadfast of foot' (M. Cato, i.), i.e. he never slipped and so failed to get in his blows. Officers usually wore leather boots; ordinary soldiers had thick, nailed sandals.

¶ The πυροβόλα mentioned by Plutarch (Camillus, xxxiv.). Cf. Livy's description of the phalarica used at the siege of Saguntum: 'etiāmsi haesisset in scuto, nec penetrasset in corpus, pavorem faciebat, quod, quum medium accensum mitteretur, conceptumque ipso motu multo majorem ignem ferret, arma omitti cogeabat, nudumque militem ad insequentes ictus praebat' (xxi. 9). The metaphor of repelling darts is used by Seneca in the last paragraph of the 53rd of his Epistles: 'Incredibilibus philosophiae vis est ad omnem fortuitam vim retundendam. Nullum telum in corpore eius sedet; munia est et solida; quaedam defatigat; et velut levia tela sinu eludit; quaedam discutit, et in eum usque qui miserat respuit.'

¶ 'He was covered by his helmet and breastplate at all parts of the body where he could be mortally wounded' (Jos. BJ vi. 88).

 One of Tertullian's daring metaphors, in this line, is of the church, as it were, besieging God by prayer ('ad deum, quasi manu facta, precationibus ambibus orantes' [Apol. 39]).

The military allusions in the Pastoral epistles are of high importance. One is adduced to illustrate the undivided attention required of a true evangelist and leader in the church: 'Join the ranks of those who bear suffering, like a loyal soldier of Christ Jesus. No soldier gets entangled in civil pursuits; his aim is to satisfy his commander' (2 Ti 2³⁴).^{*} The special vocation demands absorption, and hardships are to be borne as part of one's duty in the ranks (cf. Seneca, Ep. Mor. cxx.: 'Civem esse se universi et militem credens, labores velut imperatos subiit'). The writer might have chosen other metaphors—e.g. that of priests, as St. Paul does in another connexion (1 Co 9¹³)—but he prefers the military to the sacerdotal (cf., e.g., Servius' comment on Verg. Æn. vi. 661: 'Hi qui sacra maxima accipiebant renuntiabant omnibus rebus, nec ulla in his nisi numinum cura remanebat') figure, in order to give the idea of undivided attention. It is the same conception which Jesus sets in unmilitary language, in Lk 9⁵⁷. The other allusion, to 'the good fight' (1 Ti 1⁸): 'I transmit these instructions to you, Timotheus my son, . . . fight the good† fight on these lines, keeping hold of faith and a good conscience—as weapons which cannot be dropped without danger to life), proves afresh that στρατεύσθαι is practically an equivalent for living up to the Christian position in this world.

It is in a Roman document, like the Epistle of Clement (xxxvii.), however, that we find the organization and discipline of the army held up definitely as a pattern to the Christian church (cf. DAC i. 217). What St. Paul had expressed in the metaphor of the body and its members (1 Co 12¹⁴) Clement puts in military language, before he echoes the Pauline metaphor. 'My brothers, let us serve with all earnestness in our army, after His faultless commands. Let us consider those who serve our [i.e. the Roman] generals. With what excellent order, how readily, how submissively they discharge their appointed duties! Not all of them are prefects, nor tribunes, nor centurions, nor in command of fifty men, or the like, but each in his own rank executes the orders of the Emperor and the generals. The great cannot live without the small, nor the small without the great; ‡ there is a blending § of all ranks and one makes use of the other.' The moral is that rich and poor, wise and humble, ascetics, and all other varieties in the church must learn to render mutual help and avoid insubordination; the dutiful member must not decline to help if he is not promoted—an idea already put in military language by Cicero (ad Attic. iv. 6: 'Immo etiam in bellum et in castra. Ergo erimus οραδοί qui ταγῶν esse nolumus? Sic faciendum est') and still more aptly by Seneca (de Tranquill. Animæ, 4: 'Quid si militare nolis nisi imperator aut tribunus? etiamsi alii primum frontem tenebunt, te sors inter triarios posuerit, inde voce, adhortatione, exemplo, animo milita').

Similarly, there is quite a military tinge in the advice given by Ignatius to the church or clergy of Smyrna (ad Polyk. vi. 2): 'Give satisfaction to Him whom you serve [στρατεύσθε; cf. 2 Ti 2³], and from whom you receive your pay [δὲνῶν, as above, p. 654]—let none of you be found a deserter.' The supreme reproach of cowardice in the OT had been the word of Ps 78⁹: 'The children of Ephraim, being armed and carrying bows, turned back in the day of battle.' Ignatius, like the early Christians, preferred to take the contemporary illustration of desertion from the legions. Then he proceeds: 'Let your baptism remain as your shield, your faith as helmet, your love as spear [an item never mentioned in 1 Th 5⁸ or in Eph 6¹³], your patient endurance as armour; let your works be your deposits, that you may receive the arrears due to you.'

The latter allusion is to the custom of payment in the Roman army (cf. Grenfell, Hunt, and Hogarth, Fayum Towns and their Papyri, London, 1900, p. 252 f.). Soldiers at the moment received only half of the donativa,* or bounties, awarded to the army on any special occasion; the other half of these gratuities was deposited in the bank or common purse (folis) of the regiment, together with any sums which the soldiers chose to deposit of their own accord. At the conclusion of their term of service they were entitled to receive these arrears and whatever stood to their credit in the bank. It was their own property, exempt even from the patria potestas.

The rest of the paragraph is partly an echo of NT allusions, with the characteristic addition of the word on baptism. The reference to desertion, a reference as old as Plato (Apol. 23 D, the famous refusal of Socrates to desert his post, which Epictetus [i. 9. 22 f.] quotes against rash and cowardly suicide), had already been made by a Christian writer like Clement, who observes (xxi. 4), 'It is right that we should not be deserters from His will,' and argues that in a world where God is present at all places there is no escape for the guilty: 'What world shall receive those who would desert from Him?' None, he replies, quoting Ps 139⁷ to clinch his reasoning (xxviii. 2 f.). Unfaithfulness to God, which the Hebrew † had preferred to express in terms of the marital relationship, was generally stamped by the early church not as 'adultery' but as 'desertion'; there were exceptions to this, of course, perhaps the most notable being the Commonitorium of Vincent of Lerins, who adjures all Catholics to 'adhere to the holy faith of the holy fathers' by proving themselves 'genuine sons of mother church' (xxxiii.). But Christians went more often to the army than to the family for metaphors to denote disloyalty. They could not select any term with more fateful associations than 'deserter' to convey their detestation of cowardice under persecution. An excellent specimen of this figure is afforded by Commodian's Instructiones (l., lii. [ii. 9, 11]), and the allusions to fighting against the lower passions ‡ (Ro 6¹³, 8⁷ 12¹, Ja 4⁷, etc.), which

* See above, p. 654. Tertullian translates Eph 4⁸: 'dedit data filiis hominum, id est donativa,' and in the Acts of Perpetua (i.) donativa is the Latin equivalent for χαρίσματα. The word passed into English; it occurs in a 17th cent. Roman Catholic version of Damiani's hymn 'ad Perennis Vitæ Fontem':

'O Christ, true soldier's Crown, when I
These arms shall have laid down,
Endenized in full liberty,
Me as Thy free-man own;
There to receive, among the blest,
My donative of rest.

† Philo, however, employed the military expression: 'It is quite proper for the subordinates and lieutenants of God, as for generals in war, to punish severely deserters who abandon the ranks of the Just one' (Decal. 33). So in de Gigantibus, 15, where he explains that the meaning of Nimrod (Gn 10⁹) is 'deserter.'

‡ This recurs in Minucius Felix (8: 'Quod corporis humana vitia sentimur et patiamur, non est poena, militia est'), but it had been a favourite illustration with 4 Maccabees, and also with Philo, e.g. in de Ebrietate, 25, where he allegorizes Ex 32¹⁷⁻¹⁹ (making the camp, where the sound of war is heard, to represent the body with its tumultuous, unruly passions), or in de Posteritate Caini, 54. In view of a passage like Ro 5⁷, where φρονεῖν τι is associated with a military allusion, it may be recalled that this difficult NT expression could mean 'side

* This text and military parallel became a special favourite (e.g. Origen, Princip. iv. 24, in Num. Hom. 25, etc.), particularly when the ascetic or clerical ideal had to be defended in the early church. It is quoted, e.g., in 8th cent. Barlaam and Joasaph (xxxix. 351; cf. also xviii. 160: οἱ συνασκηταὶ μὲν καὶ συνοστράτωται).

† την καλὴν στρατείαν. καλός is almost as untranslatable as the medieval French prud'homme, which sometimes is not very distant from it in meaning.

‡ Cf. Sophocles, Ajax, 159 f. (tr. F. Storr):

'Without the great the small Ill could guard the city wall;
Leagued together small and great
Best defend the common state.'

§ Perhaps a reminiscence of the fragment from the Æolus of Euripides, which is cited by Stobæus, Florileg. xliii. 20.

are equally common, as they had been in pagan writers (e.g. Lucretius, de Rerum Natura, v. 43 f.), are also illustrated finely by the same writer (liii, lxiii, [ii. 12, 22]) in his verse, as well as by Clement of Alexandria in the prose of the Quis dives salvetur? (25), although nothing equals the extraordinary description of the battle against the flesh and the devil which Arnobius Junior in the 5th cent. addressed to a young married lady at the Roman court (cf. G. Morin, Études, Textes, Découvertes, i. [Paris, 1913] 383 f.).

Clement's martial references are not characteristic, not nearly so characteristic as the nautical or musical, but they are sometimes striking. Thus, after describing the proclamation of the gospel by Christ (Protrept. xi. 116), he adds: 'When the loud trumpet peals out, it musters the troops and proclaims war; and shall not Christ, breathing a melody of peace to the ends of the earth, muster His own soldiers of peace? He has mustered the bloodless army of peace, by His blood and by the word, and assigned them the realm of heaven. The trumpet of Christ is His gospel. He has sounded this trumpet, and we have heard it. Let us arm ourselves with the armour of peace.' Then he quotes loosely from Eph 6^{14f.}, putting in the sacramental touch of the sword-blades being dipped in the water of baptism to temper their edge—a touch which even Ignatius had not attempted in his military reference to baptism (ad Polyk. vi. 2: το βαπτισμα ὑμῶν μενεῖται ὡς σπῆλαι). Similarly, when Clement has to speak of God's discipline, he compares it not only to parental training and medical treatment but to the military discipline of the refractory (Pæd. i. 8, 65): 'As the general has a good end in view and acts for the admonition of his subordinate officers when he imposes fines, corporal punishment, fetters and abject disgrace on offenders, sometimes even inflicting death, so that great General of ours, the Logos, who is in command of the universe, admonishes those who will not be amenable to his law, in order to release them from the bondage, deceit, and captivity of the adversary and overthrow the passions of the soul, thus conducting them peacefully to the sacred harmony of citizenship.' Again, to insult or injure a Christian is to dishonour the Christian's God, for 'as those who maltreat soldiers insult the general, so the mishandling of his consecrated ones is contumely shown to the Lord' (Strom. vii. 3. 21). The supremacy of Christ is thus described: 'The Son of God never leaves his watch-tower . . . all the host of angels and divine beings is subject to Him' (Strom. vii. 2. 5).

Later, in the early part of the 3rd cent., Minucius Felix, the Roman lawyer, betrays a genuinely humanitarian view in his dialogue; he drops several remarks about war—e.g. about the rapacious policy of invasion and oppression which had built up the Roman state (25), about the frequency of it ('When was there ever an alliance of empires, which began in good faith and ended without bloodshed?' [18]), and about the melancholy truth which the Greek tragedians had already noted, that 'in the heat of battle it is the better men who generally fall' [5], but he boldly claims the Christian martyr as the true conqueror (37). So does the author of 4 Maccabees (e.g. 1¹ 18⁴), which was a favourite book in some circles of early Christianity; but the point is different. The Jewish homilist reflects that the endurance of Eleazar and his brother as martyrs for the Torah defeated the tyrant by rousing the martial spirit of the Maccabæan fighters, who so resented the cruelties inflicted by Antiochus on their patient brethren that they broke into successful revolt. Minucius Felix takes another view of the victory won by a martyr.

'How fair a spectacle it is to God when the Christian joins battle with pain, when he is arrayed against threats, punishments, and torture, when in triumph and victory he exults over the very man who has sentenced him! For he conquers who obtains the object for which he contends. What soldier would not be emboldened to challenge danger under the eyes of his general [in de Bell. Gall. ii. 25, when Cæsar was rallying his right wing against the Nervii, his very appearance nerved the troops. 'Cuius adventu spe inlata militibus ac redintegrato animo, cum pro se quisque in conspectu imperatoris etiani in extremis suis rebus operam navare cuperet']? For no one with,' as in Lucian's Zeus Tragoedus (17), where Zeus observes that the Athenian sophist Timocles was on the side of the gods in the debate and championed their interests (τα ἡμέτερα ὁ Τιμοκλῆς ἐφάρκει καὶ ὑπερβάλλει). It is more practical and real championship that the apostle demands, however. A further illustration of ὀφρυνεῖν in this sense occurs in Aristoph. Pax, 638 f.—a passage which exemplifies the false accusations noted below (p. 655).

receives a reward before he is put to the proof; and yet a general does not give what he does not possess; he can only glorify military service, he cannot preserve life. Whereas the soldier of God is neither forsaken in pain nor put to an end by death.'

The concentration of the soldier idea upon the martyrs* was inevitable; in the long period of persecution the martyrs came to be regarded more and more as the fighting-line of the church against the devil, and, if the conception of the Christian life as a warfare was not reserved for them, it acquired, in connexion with them, an accent and emphasis of its own.

Two extracts will serve to bring this out, both from the literature of the 2nd century. Thus, in A.D. 177, the churches of Lyons and Vienne, describing the outburst of local persecution as due to the devil, add that Christians were enabled to bear the brunt of the attack, because 'the grace of God acted as their general against him (ἀντιπροστάτης ὁ ἡ χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ) . . . and they joined battle with him' (Eus. IE v. 1), i.e. by their passive resistance to the violence of the mob and by their adhesion to Christ in face of dreadful sufferings and threats. The refusal to apostatize is the weapon of the Christian, and his inspiration is the grace of God, which suggests and maintains these tactics of defence. Then, again, Tertullian writes as follows in A.D. 197 to Christians who were lying in prison awaiting martyrdom (ad Mart. 3): 'Granted, O blessed men that a prison is irksome even to Christians. We were summoned to the active service (militiam=campaigning) of the living God at the very moment when we repeated the words of the sacrament [sacramenti verba, i.e. the baptismal confession, regarded as the Christian's oath of fealty and allegiance]. No soldier takes luxuries with him on a campaign; he goes out to battle not from a bedroom, but from narrow, pitched tents, where all sorts of hard, rough, and unpleasant experiences abound.' When he turns to encourage the women, he develops the figure of training for the athletic games, but the male Christians are reminded of their oath of loyalty to Christ as general, in the deadly warfare against evil. Their very harmony—and Tertullian (ib. 1) pleads for this, since even martyrs sometimes quarrelled in those days as afterwards—is an effective weapon of war against the devil; Satan wins a triumph if he can succeed in making imprisoned Christians fall out among themselves.

In fact, by the 3rd cent., especially through the Latin Christians of Northern Africa, the ritual and organization of the church began to be infused with military expressions. Thus, 'burden' in Mt 11³⁰ is rendered sarcina, the soldier's load, by Tertullian. A term like συσσημῶν had been used by Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 1), echoing the OT—e.g. Is 49² 62¹⁰, where Jahweh raises His standard in Jerusalem for men to rally round; Jesus, says Ignatius, was crucified 'in order to raise an ensign for all ages by means of his resurrection, for his saints and loyal people.' It is not far from this to the cognate use of vexillum, and, after the cross had been set upon the standards of the army by Constantine, the vogue of ποταίον became increasingly popular in the vocabulary of Christian writers. Feretrum had been already used metaphorically by Tertullian, practically as equivalent to 'trophy'; in lauding the virtues of Job (de Patientia, 14), he exclaims: 'What a trophy (feretrum) God set up over the devil in a man like that! What a banner (vexillum) did He raise over the Adversary of His glory, when this man, in reply to all the load of bad news, uttered nothing but thanks to God! . . . And so he who worked hard for the victory of God, repelling all the darts of temptation by the breastplate and shield of his patience, presently received his health of body from God's hand.' But words of still greater importance were to be taken over from the troops. 'Legion' had already become a popular term for a large and powerful number (cf. DCG ii. 23). This, however, was only the first of such borrowed words, and one of the least significant. A far more vital case was that of sacramentum. If this term for a binding promise was not adopted by the church on account of its apt associations as the oath of loyalty, it was the military

* Subsequently, from Origen onwards, upon the ascetics as the real soldiers of God, and later still upon the monks. Pachomius, one of the founders of Egyptian monasticism, had been a soldier under Constantine, just as Loyola had been a Spanish officer before he founded the Jesuit order in the 16th century.

suggestiveness of absolute devotion that certainly helped to popularize it (cf., e.g., Tertullian, de Spectaculis, 24). The troops swore individually to obey their general's orders to the letter, never to desert, and always to be ready to face death unflinchingly for the Roman State. When the Christian answered the questions put at baptism, he assumed as real responsibilities and pledged himself to an equally heroic allegiance (see E. Debacker, in Musee Belgique, 1909, pp. 147-155). So with statio, which meant outpost or picket duty, when soldiers had to keep awake and do without food, a more dangerous, trying, and responsible position than that of the ordinary sentries of the camp. Stationarii was one of the military metaphors adopted by Judaism even. But by the middle of the 2nd cent. (Herm. Sim. v. 1) statio had begun its long career in the Christian vocabulary as a technical term for fasting and vigils, since fasts, as Ambrose (Serm. 25) afterwards explained, 'protect us from attacks of the devil; in fact, they are called stationes because by standing (stantes) and staying in them we repel the foes who plot against us.' In Tertullian this military vocabulary* is already rooted and thriving; in Cyprian it is full-blown—especially the idea (see above, p. 656) that Christians are fighting for their faith under the General's eye (e.g., Ep. x. 2, lviii. 4, lx. 2, lxxvi. 4). The bishops and clergy are the officers, the laity are the rank and file of the Christian army. On statio, Cyprian observes (de Orat. 19) that the term 'is derived from the model of war—for we are God's army (nam et militia Dei sumus),' and (de Jejuniis, 10) 'soldiers, though ever mindful of their military oath (sacramenti), are still more true to their outpost duties (stationibus).'

How far the term 'soldier of Christ' had become current even before Tertullian may be gathered from the Acta Pauli (D.A.C. i. 32). The presbyter of Asia Minor who composed this religious historical novel tells, in the section of the 'Martyrdom' (cf. L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Paul, Paris, 1913, p. 273 f.), how Nero's cupbearer Patroclus confessed that he had been raised from the dead by 'Christ Jesus, the king of ages,' after falling like Eutychus (Ac 20⁹) from a height. 'The Caesar answered (ραπαθεῖς) woefully, "Then he is to rule the ages and destroy all kingdoms?" Patroclus tells him, "Yes, he destroys all kingdoms and he will live alone for ever, and not a kingdom will escape him." Nero then struck him on the face and said, "So you fight for (σπαρεῖν) this king, Patroclus, even you?" "Yes, lord Caesar," he replied, "he raised me from the dead." Then Barsabas Justus the flat-footed, and Urien the Cappadocian, and Festus of Galatia, Nero's chief men, said, "We fight also for him, for the king of ages." So Nero imprisoned them, inflicting fearful torture on them of whom he had been extremely fond, and ordered the soldiers of the great King to be sought out' (2). When St. Paul appears, he declares, 'Caesar, we gain recruits not only from your command but from the whole world. Our orders are to refuse no one who will fight for my king.' When the guard offers to let St. Paul go, instead of killing him, he declines: 'I am not a run-away (δραπετης) from Christ, but a loyal (ενομος) soldier of the living God' (4). Finally St. Paul appears after death (6) to Nero, saying, 'Caesar, here is Paul the soldier of God. I am not dead but alive,' and threatening the emperor with doom. This illustrates the semi-political tinge of eschatology (see above, p. 653) and it brings out afresh the martyr-application to which reference has been already made. 'The noble army of martyrs' is an English misrepresentation of the original 'martyrum candidatus exercitus' in the 4th cent. hymn of praise, but 'noble' answers to the feelings of the early Church towards those faithful soldiers of Christ. A 5th cent. hymn, attributed to Ambrose, hails them as 'Ecclesiarum principes,

Bellī triumphales duces,
Coelestis aulae milites.'

* The figurative element in the 2nd cent. Odes of Solomon (cf. E. A. Abbott, Light on the Gospel from an Ancient Poet, Cambridge, 1912, p. 381 f.), so far as it is really figurative, is for the most part messianic and moulded upon OT patterns. It should not be forgotten that militia had been already used metaphorically of sports and exercises which involved exposure and hard work, as in Hor. Sat. ii. 2. 10. But even here it retained its military associations of severity and discipline; it was the antithesis of all that was soft and effeminate. Later on, the term lost even this connotation and was applied generally to the imperial service, civil as well as military. Hence the metaphorical use of 'secular militia' (Vincent of Lerins, Common. i.; Jer. Ep. lii. 1).

They are ranked next to the apostles and the prophets; they are also promoted at death more rapidly than the rank and file of the Church militant. Titus, or at any rate Josephus (BJ vi. 47), is sure that 'the souls of brave men, which are parted from their bodies by the sword in battle, are taken up by the ether, the purest of the elements, and set among the stars, where they shine forth as beneficent daemons and heroes friendly to their posterity.' This is an almost exact parallel to the early Christian belief about the martyrs as soldiers of God who have died in battle, or been burned, beheaded, and flayed alive for their Leader. They pass immediately into glory. For example, the Scillitan martyrs, on receiving their death-sentence and on the point of being led away to execution, thank God: 'To-day we are in heaven.' The special honour thus paid to the martyr in early Christian eschatology does not seem to be paralleled by any corresponding feature in rabbinic eschatology. It is a distinctive homage offered by the Church to her champions in the early battles against paganism.

This rich and varied use of military metaphors, however, throws no light upon the opinions cherished by the early Christians about war in itself. Three of the writers who explicitly oppose war, Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian, are in fact lavish in their use of military terms. Origen, in his homilies on Joshua and Judges, e.g., delighted to allegorize the most martial passages in the OT, and Cyprian did more than almost any one else to domicile the idea of the church as the army of God, with Christ as its imperator, the martyrs and confessors as the leaders, the sacramentum of baptism, the stationes of fasts and vigils, and heretics or schismatics as rebels against the castra dei. Origen's allegorizing of the OT enabled him, of course, to counter Marcion's repudiation of it as too militant for the Christian church. As a pacifist he uses military language, just as Bernard, the celibate, loved the vocabulary and ideas of marriage—though, unlike Bernard, Origen did not allow the vocation in question to any one. Similarly, Lucretius detested war (i. 23 f.), but he employs military figures with force in order to illustrate his theme (e.g. in ii. 5 f., 40 f.). These illustrations from St. Paul onwards merely indicate the martial environment of the new religion within the Roman world of the first three centuries; they no more prove that the church encouraged or even approved of war than the less frequent allusions to the games and the theatre prove that these were sanctioned by the conscience of the primitive Christians. Besides, the use of military illustrations is not confined to Christian writers by any means. The newer advocates and exponents of moral philosophy, and in especial of Cynicism and Stoicism, frequently employ metaphors culled from the Roman army to adorn their semi-religious convictions.

The disciple of Poseidonius who wrote the pseudo-Aristotelian treatise de Mundo about A.D. 100 (?) declares that 'God is in the universe as the helmsman in the ship, the general in the army' (400^b), the only difference being that God's rule causes Him no trouble or fatigue. Seneca could compare human life to a campaign ('vivere, Lucili, militare est' [Ep. Mor. xcvi. 3]), which absorbed the serious man ('nobis quoque militandum est: et quidem genere militiae, quo nunquam quies, nunquam otium, datur. . . . Quidni malit, quisquis vir est, somnum suum classico quam symphonia rumpi?' [ib. li. 2]); he could summon men to cheerful resignation under the divine discipline by reminding them that 'it is a poor soldier who whines as he follows his captain' (ib. cvii. 9); he is particularly delighted (ib. lix. 5: 'movit me imago ab illo posita') with a military simile of S. Sextius, who compared the wise man deploying his virtues against evil to an army marshalled against an enveloping attack; he insists that the moral life is promoted not by coaxing and subtle addresses but by such manly demands as those of an officer to his troops ('in aciem ducturus exercitum, pro confugibus ac liberis mortem obitum, quomodo exhortabitur? . . . Dux ille Romanus, qui ad occupandum locum milites missos, quum per ingentem hostium exercitum ituri essent, sic adlocutus est: ire, commilitones, illo necesse est unde redire non est necesse! Vides quam simplex et imperiosa Virtus sit' [ib. lxxxii.]). The Cynic philosopher, in Lucian's Βίος Ἰππικῆς (S.), declares that he 'fights like Hercules, against pleasures, not as a conscript but as a volunteer, his aim being to purify human life.' The slave-philosopher Epictetus also draws some of his most impressive appeals from the terminology of the military profession. Thus, after explaining that every man has a guardian angel or indwelling spirit (δαίμων), he proceeds (i. 14): 'You ought to swear an oath to this divine being just as the soldiers do to Caesar. These hired soldiers swear to regard the safety of Caesar above all else; will not you swear, and swearing keep your oath, when you have received such a number of great boons? And your oath? Let it be this: never to disobey, never to blame, never to find fault with anything he gives to you, never to do or to suffer against your will anything that is needful. Is this oath like the oath of the soldiers? Why, they swear to honour no one above Caesar; you swear to honour no one above yourself.' Or, again, in a passage which recalls 2 Ti 2⁴ even more than 1 Co 13³⁵, he observes (iii. 22. 69) that the genuine Cynic must not be expected to entangle himself with ordinary duties: 'In the present state of things, which resembles an army on active service, the Cynic must be free from all distractions in order to serve God with his entire attention,' instead of being tied down to domestic cares. Nor must you blame the Cynic for being a busybody (οὐτε περίεργος οὐτε πολυπράγμων ἐστίν (iii. 22. 97)), for you might as fairly say that 'the general is a busybody, when he is inspecting his troops, examining them, keeping watch over them, and punishing the insubordinate.' Such allusions are scattered over his talk. The most sustained is the well-known paragraph in iii. 24. 31-34, which reiterates the conception of life as a warfare (cf. Job 7¹ 14¹⁴, Is 40²): 'Don't you know that life is a campaign (στρατεία τοῦ χρόνου σου)? One man has to stand sentry, another has to go out as a spy, another has to fight. It is impossible, it is undesirable, that all should be in exactly the same position. And here are you, neglecting the commands of the general, and grumbling when any rather severe duty is imposed upon you. You don't understand what you would have the army become, if it depended on you; if everybody copied you, no one would dig a trench, no one would put up a rampart, no one would keep on the alert, no one would take any risks, everybody would prove useless for campaigning. . . . Every man's life is a sort of campaign, and it is long and varied: you must follow the rôle of a soldier, and do everything at the nod of your general, divining what he wishes done, if possible—for there is no comparison in strength or superiority of character between this general and any other.' Finally, it is possible that a passage in iv. 13. 5 illustrates the misconduct censured by John the Baptist (Lk 31⁴). Epictetus is warning men against loose talk about themselves, and he clinches his advice by this reference to contemporary life: 'A soldier in private dress sits down beside you and starts to abuse the Caesar. Then you join in, assuming that you can trust his fidelity because he began the talk. You say what you think—and then you are arrested and taken to prison.' Even in the later pages of Marcus Aurelius military figures recur, although they are by no means so numerous and distinctive as we might expect, considering that this melancholy and self-conscious philosopher had been for years in command of troops. Once we do get a saying like this: 'Be not ashamed to receive help; you are bound to do the duty that falls to you like a soldier when a wall is being stormed; if owing to lameness you cannot scale the battlements alone, cannot this be managed with the help of another?' (vii. 7). But in his metaphors and similes the emperor talks more of doctors and sailors and bees than of soldiers. His pages are a warning against the common idea that a man's vocation may be deduced from his metaphors, or that a man invariably tends to colour his language by the associations of his calling. The really noticeable thing in this military emperor's little book is a couple of disparaging allusions to war; it is ranked (x. 9) with slavery and the mimes as a deteriorating influence, and (x. 10) military conquerors are frankly described as robbers: 'The spider is proud of catching a fly, one man is proud of catching a hare, another of netting a fish, another of capturing wild boars, another of seizing Sarmatians,' as the writer had done himself or was doing when he wrote this sentence. 'Are they not robbers, if you look into their principles of action?' A century earlier another Stoic philosopher, the Roman knight Mucianus Rufus, had done more than write resigned commonplace about the iniquity of war. With the officiousness for which the Stoics were sometimes blamed (see above), this eminent teacher of Epictetus had contrived to push himself in among the troops of Vitellius and Vespasian during the strained situation of A.D. 69. Tacitus tells us how he then 'began to lecture the men-at-arms upon the blessings of peace and the hazards of war. Many jeered at him, the majority were impatient with him; some would have hustled him and trampled on him, had he not given over his ill-timed philosophizing at the warning of the better sort and under threats from others' (Hist. iii. 81). Tacitus, of course, had no sympathy with such a move, and we should perhaps allow for his military sympathies in judging the philosopher. Still, a manlier tone breathes through the sentences of Demetrius of Phalerum (Stobaeus, Anthol. viii. 20), describing how differently Courage and Cowardice speak to a soldier in battle-order. 'Would not Courage bid him stay where he was and keep his place in the ranks? "But I'll be wounded!" "Endure." "But I'll be killed!" "Die rather than leave your place."' The diatribal harangues are often marked by such military figures, but it is needless to quote further from this field.

The prevalence of these military symbols and images was so widespread in the period under survey that it is gratuitous to refer their popularity and spread to any single origin. The allusions in the Stoic philosophers were probably derived in the main from the contemporary vocabulary of the cults. But the use of such militant expressions is spontaneous, especially in a military age and empire. As for primitive Christianity, during the apostolic period at any rate, the Jewish devotional literature might be thought more likely to have suggested many of the details into which, as we have seen, the Christians worked their parallel of religion and military service. With the OT and the later Jewish literature at hand, we might imagine that the early church would scarcely require to go far afield for suggestions of this kind. But their Jewish environment and their use of the OT are not upon the whole sufficient to account for the majority of the military turns of expression which are to be found in the earliest strata of their devotional literature from the end of the 1st cent. onwards. Occasionally an OT passage is employed in this connexion, as we have already noted. The homiletic use of the historical books also enriched the spiritual vocabulary with martial terms. Bunyan owed more to this source than to his brief service in the army, when he wrote his military allegories, and we might expect it to have been so with most of the primitive Christians. Yet a glance at the devotional sections of the OT—e.g. at the Psalter—reveals the comparatively limited use of military metaphors. It is always difficult to determine whether an allusion to war is literal or metaphorical, for some of the psalms were battle-songs,* but, even when we set aside those which are probably literal, and which reflect the ordinary horrors of war, its havoc, its atrocities, the provocation of reprisals (125³), the passions of revenge and moral indignation, the perplexities of 'captive good and captain ill,' and so forth, the remainder of the psalms' allusions fall generally under the heading of God's aid for men—God as a shield or fortress, God shooting His arrows against the foes of the good man, God starting up out of sleep to champion the defenceless, God's mighty army of stars, angels, and the elements, God the conqueror riding home into the city after a victory, and so on. Such is the scope of the Psalter's war-metaphors. The armour is almost altogether God's, not man's.

This is not unnatural, for the psalms are mainly the cry of an oppressed little community, struggling against outside pagan foes and godless enemies of religion within their own nation. They are on the defensive. Faith is besieged (Ps 31^{1,2}), or harried. Now and then, as in a psalm like the 18th or the 44th, a more vigorous note is struck; the plaintive appeal for divine succour is exchanged for a resolute confidence that the army of the pious cannot triumph except by God's help. But this is probably a literal expectation, in some period of revolt, a return to the traditional ideal of Dt 33²⁹:

'Happy art thou, O Israel!

Who is like thee?—

A people victorious by Yahweh,

Who is thy shield to help, thy sword to maintain thy power.

So shall thy enemies come cringing to thee,

And thou shalt march over their heights.'

Books like Proverbs and Ecclesiastes show a certain fondness for military phraseology and illustration—e.g. Ec 3⁸ 8⁸ ('there is no discharge † in war') 9¹¹ 9¹⁴⁻¹⁵ (siege) and Pr 18¹⁹ (an instance of the difficulty of love 'winning its way with extreme gentleness | Through all the outworks of suspicious pride'), 20¹⁸ and 24⁵⁻⁶ (statesmanship and war) 21³¹ (the horse) 24³⁴ 25¹⁸ (cf. La 3¹²) 30⁵⁻⁷—but this is not characteristic of them or even of the pacific Philo. He is not always pacific indeed. He extols the bloody punishment inflicted by the Levites on Israel (Ex 32²⁶) as an 'immaculate slaughter, which ought to be regarded as the most brilliant and important of all gallant deeds' (de Spec. Leg. iii. 22); it was a holy war, 'voluntarily undertaken for God's honour' (Vita

* The same difficulty emerges in connexion with the 2nd cent. Christian hymn-book called The Odes of Solomon, several of which are drenched in a martial messianism. See p. 657.

† I.e. no furlough. Man cannot control the wind, or stave off death, or get leave of absence during a campaign.

Mos. iii. 20). And in de Plant. i. 33 f., his exposition of Dt 20⁵ is a realistic, sympathetic sketch of military methods. But the Jewish philosopher also indulges in martial images (see above, p. 654). Thus, in order to illustrate the truth that compulsion to help other people is not necessarily a mark of slavery, he appeals to the business of an army (Quod omnis probus, 6), in which the soldiers have to wear heavy armour and carry loads, besides cutting trenches and so forth, all for the sake of the common good; they are under strict orders, but that does not make them slaves. Other warlike figures recur in his comments on Gn 42¹¹ and Jer 15¹⁰ (de Confus. Ling. 11 f.) and in de Gigantibus (11). Still, this line of illustration is not Philo's forte. Now and then quite original touches occur in the OT literature—e.g. in the magnificent picture of the war-horse (Job 39¹³⁻²⁵; cf. Jer 8⁵), or in the comparison (cf. Job 10¹⁷) of overwhelming troubles to 'a king ready for battle' (15²⁴), or in the account of Job's popularity and honour, when he occupied a position of dignity among his fellows, 'and dwelt as a king in the arroy, as one that comforteth mourners' (29²⁵).^{*} Similar allusions are present in Sirach (e.g. spies, 11³⁰ 14²; the blare of trumpets, 26²⁷; the beacon or fire-signal, 43³); † they are not infrequent in the prophets, who lived in periods of war and occasionally were stirred by the militant eschatology even to depict Jahweh as a redoubtable warrior, blood-stained (Is 63¹⁴) and exultant, sometimes whirling a monarch like Cyrus (? Jer 51^{30f.}) as his battle-axe against the nations. Now and then the gnomic wisdom was couched in military figures (e.g. 1 K 20¹¹, Ps 127⁴) like the erotic passion (Ca 6⁴ 1⁵). The 'bow,' e.g., denoted the manly vigour which could protect itself and champion the interests of the oppressed (Job 29²⁹). Nevertheless, a survey of the military metaphors and illustrations in the Jewish literature before the Christian era or contemporary with the primitive Church shows that this source does not account for the range and detail in which the Christians of the first three centuries worked, when they drew upon war to body forth their religious convictions. Their environment in the Roman world, where the legions were constantly in evidence, the spontaneous instinct which prompts ardent religious feeling to clothe itself in such terms, and possibly—in the later stages probably—the lead given by the mystery-religions need also to be taken into account in this connexion.

For military service, as a symbol of devotion and an emblem of unflinching loyalty, did influence the mystery-religions and cults of the period ‡ as well as Christianity. It is natural to expect this in the case of a cult like Mithraism, which was so popular in the army itself; probably one of its attractions for soldiers lay in the fact that the Mithra initiates were enrolled in a 'sacred army,' swearing an oath (sacramentum) when they enlisted in the cult, and devoting themselves to a campaign against immorality and mortality. The unconquerable god of the cult marshalled his devotees against the powers of darkness. The organization of the cult was partly modelled on military lines; the third grade in the hierarchy was that of miles, according to Jerome (Ep. 107, in A.D. 403), who reminds the Roman lady Lacta that her kinsman Gracchus had only a few years ago destroyed the Mithraeum at Rome with all the images, before which (cf. ERE viii. 756) the initiates were ranked as Raven, Gryphus, Soldier, Lion, Persian, Heliodromus, and Father.* One of the ceremonies of initiation consisted in the solemn abjuring of a crown; the votary had a crown placed on his head, which he formally removed, saying that Mithra was his crown. This, according to Tertullian (de Corona, 15), stamped him as a Mithra miles.

In the cult of Isis also the votaries of the goddess were considered to be her sacred troops; the initiate, as we learn from Apuleius (Met. xi. 14-15), took a solemn oath on entering the sancta militia, and thenceforth belonged to the cohort of the goddess. It was a conception of the religious life which was familiar in connexion with the cults, long before Christianity; Livy (xxxix. 15. 13), e.g., witnesses to the use of sacramentum as a term for the oath taken by those who had been initiated into the mysteries of Bacchus, and he chronicles a similar practice among the Samnites (x. 38: 'Et deorum etiam adhiberant opes ritu quodam sacramenti vetusto velut initiatis militibus . . . iurare cogebatur diro quodam carmine in execrationem capitis familiaeque et stirpis composito, nisi isset in proelium quo imperatores duxissent'). One factor which developed its usage in the religious world was probably the oath of allegiance taken by the subjects of Oriental monarchs who were regarded as semi-divine on earth. Thus loyalism blended with piety, and military allegiance acquired a religious sanction, so that, per contra, the religion of the cults, Syrian, Egyptian, and Persian, became more than ever adapted to the ideas of an absolute devotion on the part of members to their sovereign deity. 'The sacred militia of the mysteries,' says Cumont (Les Relig. orientales, p. xvi), 'is simply this civic morality viewed from the standpoint of religion.' With regard to the Isis cult, in particular, early in the 2nd cent. † we come upon an invocation of Isis Myrionyma, a rignarole of her various titles and excellences, which shows how even a female deity inspired this sense of adoring confidence in her votaries. The military aspect is repeatedly visible; e.g. she is hailed as 'victorious,' 'saviour of men,' 'swiftly victorious,' 'warlike,' 'warding off attacks,' 'the queen of war and rule, who easily destroyed tyrants by trusty counsels.' Her Egyptian initiate adores her for satisfying the manifold needs of men and women; he has a religious and naive assurance that she will never disappoint her loyal followers. Later on, the pious emotions of an Isis-worshipper are described by Apuleius of Madaura in the 11th book of his Metamorphoses. Apuleius was an Oscar Wilde of the 2nd cent. literature; an unclean brilliance shines from his pages, and the more devoutly he writes, the more we suspect him of posing. But his delineation of what Lucius felt and said at Corinth, when he was admitted to the cult, is probably a faithful transcript, on the whole, of the better

* 'Did he not,' Jerome adds—and this should be quoted as a fresh proof of the military language of the early Church—'did he not send them before him like hostages and so win for himself Christian baptism? Paganism even in Rome is left desolate. . . . The standards of the soldiers have the ensign of the cross. . . . The ruddy, yellow-haired hosts of the Getae carry with them tents for churches, and perhaps they hold their own against us because they rely on the same religion as we do.'

† Cf. Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, xi. [1915] 190-220.

* This blending of a martial and a pacific metaphor is not unparalleled; cf., e.g., Ps 91⁴ ('He shall cover thee with his feathers. . . his truth shall be thy shield and buckler') and Is 9³ ('They joy before thee according to the joy in harvest, as men rejoice when they divide the spoil').

† If the reading is correct, the 'absent-minded beggar' appears as early as Sir 26²⁸ ('For two things my heart is grieved, and for three things wrath comes on me: a soldier [πολεμιστης] suffering from poverty, wise men suffering contempt, and one who turns from righteousness to sin—the Lord prepare the sword for him!'). But the Syriac version makes a rich man out of the Greek πολεμιστης.

‡ The relevant texts are collected by F. Cumont in his Monum. Myst. Mithra, Brussels, 1894, i. 317, n. 1; see, further, his Les Religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Paris, 1907, p. xiii f. (Eng. tr., Chicago, 1911, p. xx f.), and R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Leipzig, 1910, p. 66 f.

elements in Isis-worship. The convert is told to enrol himself in this holy warfare ('da nomen sanctae huic militiae' [xi. 15]), and he adores the goddess as his saviour from fate and sin, as the deity who can shut and open the lower and the upper worlds.

The moral aspirations and hopes which were expressed in this sancta milita of the cults, and for which the military organization was felt to be an extremely suitable image, were three-fold.

(a) In the first place, a confidence in the deity, an unshaken faith that the divine being who presided over the cult was able to ensure his devotees' triumph over the 'slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' over the powers of darkness and immorality in this world and the terrible, mysterious dangers which beset the soul as it passed at death into the circles of the upper air or the lower world. As the Roman legions held away over the world, so these initiates believed that their respective cults represented the dominant powers, from a religious point of view. The victories of the army, which were assumed to be due to the emperor, and which were often won by his personal generalship,* symbolized the triumph of a cult-deity like Mithra, the 'Sol Invictus,' or like Isis, the 'orbis totius domina,' 'victrix,' 'invicta.' For these deities were cosmopolitan in their sway. They claimed to control the universe. The cults breathed into their adherents the sense of participating in the triumph of a sovereign power, not of a mere local and provincial sect, and this is not invalidated by the fact that such a belief was more pious than well-based. The early Christians also put this faith into their martial imagery, to express their absolute confidence in the Lord, who would enable them to master demons with their onset of persecutions and heresies, and to overcome the fear and power of death itself. The term 'Lord' included this; the terms 'king of kings' and 'imperator' brought it out.

(b) This supremacy of redeeming power, guaranteed by the deity, required from men a devotion and loyalty like that accorded by soldiers to their generals. It was a confidence which implied moral surrender and absolute dedication. The mystery-religions gave the individual a new sense of his value, but his personality was realized through service and self-sacrifice. This was the second note in the military conception which pervaded the cults. To a modern the methods and aims do not always seem particularly moral, and they are tinged by superstitious elements which eventually proved their weakness. But as a rule the relation of the individual to the deity was characterized by a thoroughgoing allegiance, which made stringent demands upon him—demands so stringent that their nearest analogy was felt to be the binding tie of the soldier to his military superiors. In the case of Mithraism, especially, this tie involved a moral earnestness. It was attained through ritual, but 'one of the conditions indispensable to the final victory of good was purity,'† and few contemporary cults, if any, pressed this requirement so stringently and sharply on their votaries. Here, also, the martial symbolism served Christianity (see above, p. 659). It was accentuated by the fact that the sacramentum, or oath of allegiance, was supposed to be taken to the commander in person, and was renewed by all the troops on the emperor's birthday and on the 1st of January every year. Eventually it was extended to civilians as an oath of allegiance, but technically and originally it denoted the army's loyalty to its leader; the sacramentum was for the campaign, and was renewed for a fresh term of active service under new leaders. Personal devotion to one's leader, in fact, became more and more characteristic of military service. The general or officer could inspire and exact obedience; the soldier followed and fought, without asking questions. A modern writer puts it thus: 'Alan was in the right trade as a soldier; this is the officer's part to make men continue to do things, they know not wherefore, and when, if the choice was offered, they would lie down where they were and be killed. And I daresay I would have been a good enough private; for in these last hours it never occurred to me that I had any choice but just to obey as long as I was able, and to die obeying' (R. L. Stevenson, Kidnapped, ch. xxii.). This absolute and unqualified devotion corresponds to the Roman ideal in the early centuries of the church (cf., e.g., Seneca, Ep. Mor. xc. : 'Quemadmodum primum militiae vinculum est religio et signorum amor, et deserendi nefas, tunc deinde facile cetera exigunt mandanturque iusturandum adactis, ita in his quos velis ad beatam vitam perducere, prima fundamenta facienda sunt, et insinuanda virtus'), and it readily suggested the devotion of the Christian to his Lord and Leader, the unqualified demands made upon him for self-sacrifice and detachment from other ties, and at the same time the satisfaction of abandoning himself without reserve to One who would reward all service, who would take all responsibilities for His soldiers, and who was personally interested in them. The issue and strategy of the campaign were His; theirs only to follow

* As far back as the 1st cent. B.C. the military reforms are said to have produced a concentration of the soldier's devotion to his general; he was detached more than ever from the ties of civilian life. The soldier learnt to owe allegiance to the man who led and fed him, his affections were centred on the only home which he knew—the camp' (E. H. Alton, in *A Companion to Latin Studies*², Cambridge, 1913, p. 463).

† J. Toutain, Les Cultes païens dans l'empire romain, ii. [1911] 131.

where He led and do their best, unhampered by any suspicion or doubt* of their lives being thrown away. When Christianity was to be put as a religion of loyalty, in which the oath of duty ruled out any personal choice or preference, the army furnished a telling set of ideas and words.

(c) A third element was probably the cohesion and new sense of brotherhood provided by the cults at their best, though this was by no means so prominent as the thought of renunciation. The initiates were taught to regard each other as comrades, fighting side by side in the ranks of their faith. A common religious hope bound them together. This is known to have been a feature of Mithraism, in theory if not in practice, and we might have expected it to flourish in the church. But it was not so. Early Christianity on the whole preferred other expressions for the solidarity and cohesion of the faithful; it went to the family, to architecture, or to the physical organism, rather than to the army, when it needed metaphors for unity; 'brothers,' 'stones' in a building, or 'limbs' in the body were much more common than 'fellow-soldiers,' though the cults also used the first of these terms quite freely.

4. Attitude of the early church towards war.—

We now turn to sketch the attitude of the primitive Christians to war and the army as realities instead of analogies (cf. A. Harnack, *Mission and Expansion of Early Christianity*², London, 1908, i. 303 f., ii. 52 f.). Down to the reign of Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 161–180) military service does not seem to have presented itself as a problem at all to the conscience of the Church; it is only during this emperor's reign that indications of a difficulty are to be noted for the first time. But, in order to appreciate the situation which was now rising, we must glance at the preceding period, when the political and social conditions of the life of Jesus were passing or had passed away, and when Christians were no longer in the environment of those to whom the words of Jesus had been spoken. A wider situation was emerging than that of Jews in a small subject province of the empire.

During the Apostolic Age the first non-Jew to enter the Christian Church was a Roman officer. The Ethiopian treasurer of queen Candace had indeed been baptized previously by Philip, but he disappears in the south, far from any fellowship of the Church. On the other hand, Cornelius (cf. DAC i. 259), the captain of the Italian regiment stationed at Caesarea, comes before us definitely in St. Luke's history as a convert whose case led to a new development of the Church's policy. Nothing is said about his profession being inconsistent with the faith. It was the fact that he was uncircumcised, not that he was in the army, that raised suspicion and opposition in the conservative party of the Church at Jerusalem. This forms a fresh proof, if proof were needed, that, if the gospel did not start by encouraging war, it certainly did not prohibit from the outset any connexion with the army as absolutely inconsistent with the faith. No one dreamt of any problem here, any more than in the case of marriage or of slavery.

The first war undertaken by a man of God in the Bible was Abraham's campaign against Chedorlaomer for the liberation of Lot (Gn 14^{14c}), in which he proved himself effective, loyal, and generous, both as a general and as an ally; but this daring exploit is not selected by the author† of Hebrews (cf. 11⁸⁻¹²) as an instance of his faith. He did not pass it over, however, from any sense of embarrassment, for he goes on to recount other military events in the story of Israel with unhesitating enthusiasm, from the downfall of Jericho to the Maccabæan struggle (11^{30c}, 'men who by faith conquered kingdoms, administered justice, . . . escaped the edge of the sword, from weakness won to strength, proved valiant in warfare, and routed hosts of foreigners'). This frank recognition of the historical connexion between war and religion deserves to be contrasted with one of the most nauseous pieces of sophistry in Josephus, i.e. the appeal which he says that he made to his fellow-countrymen at the siege of Jerusalem to surrender to the Romans. He actually advised them not to fight, on the ground that Israel had never succeeded in war, and that all she needed to do was to trust in God, if her cause was just—which this renegade Jew, from the shelter of the legions, coolly denied. In the old days, said Josephus to his indignant countrymen, 'God carried on these campaigns for our fathers, because they dispensed with active service and arms and committed their case to Him to vindicate. . . . In short, our fathers won no success by war and never failed to succeed when they abjured war and committed all to God' (BJ v. 386, 390). Pacifist special pleading like this was untrue alike to history and to the OT. The author of Hebrews took a more sane view of Israel's record, and included martial exploits in his list of honour. These achievements* are ranked in the same class as the martyrdom of Abel and the passive glories of Isaac and Joseph. It is true that the writer 'seems with a tender instinct to avoid anything like stress on the exploits of warriors. Of the twelve persons having a share in the detailed expositions, David is the only warrior, and his character as a man of war is eclipsed by his greater attributes as a prophet, or declarer of the Divine counsels. It is yet more noteworthy that Joshua, who had so fair a fame, but who was only a warrior, is never named in the chapter, and we are simply told that "by faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they had been compassed about seven times." But the series of four names, which are given without any specification of their title to appear in the list, are all names of distinguished warriors. They had all done great acts of faith and patriotism against the enemies of Israel—Gideon against the Midianites, Barak against the hosts of Syria, Samson against the Philistines, and Jephthah against the children of Ammon. Their title to appear in the list at all is in their acts of war.'† At the same time there is not the slightest hint that in the people of God who live under the spirit and hope of Jesus any successors of these martial saints were expected to arise. The promise of Dt 31⁶ and Jos 1⁵ is taken out of its very militant setting and transformed into a word of encouragement for those who needed to be freed from worldly anxiety about their possessions (He 13⁵: 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee'). The situation of the community to which the writer addresses himself was too remote from public affairs to suggest any difficulties about such matters as the relation of Christians to the army or to any other function of the Empire. At this stage, indeed, no difficulties were felt at all.

* 'Il y a, sous les armes, une grande dignité de vie. . . Il faut être prêtre ou soldat pour ne pas connaître les angoisses du doute' (Anatole France, *Le Livre de mon ami*¹⁸ Paris, 1896, p. 69).

† In Sirach's hymn of praise (44^{19c}) the same omission is made, though the martial note is frequently struck farther on (45^{24c} 46^{1c} 47^{4c}).

When we read of conflicts and wrangles in Ja 4⁴, the writer‡ is referring to the private animosities of Christians; he is not laying down any philosophy of war and its causes in the outside world, but simply denouncing (cf. Ps 120⁷, Mic 3⁵) the passions of greed, envy, and selfishness which stir up feuds in small religious communities. His words have not the scope of the similar passage in Cicero's de Fin. i. 13 ('the passions are insatiable; they ruin not merely individuals but entire families, and often actually undermine the fabric of the State; from them come hatred, discord, quarrels, seditions, wars'); they belong rather to the diatribal class of sayings about so-called 'peace' being really a state of bitter warfare, thanks to the strife and aggressiveness of men (cf. the quotations in P. Wendland, Philo und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe, Berlin, 1895, p. 39 f.). On the whole, we are justified in regarding Justin Martyr's allusions in Apol. i. 39 and Dial. 110 as no more than an expression of Christian antipathy to such aggressiveness in public and private.

The former passage runs: 'When the prophetic Spirit is prophesying what is to happen, it speaks thus: "For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge among the nations and rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughs and their spears into sickles, and nation shall not lift the sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any longer." You can be convinced that it happened thus. For men, to the number of twelve, did go forth from Jerusalem into the world, and, although they were untrained and unable to make speeches, by the power of God they made it known to every race of mankind that they were sent by Christ to teach all men the Word of God; and we, who formerly murdered each other, not only do not make war on our enemies but die confessing Christ gladly, so as not to lie or to deceive those who examine us—though we might indeed have practised the saying,

"My tongue has sworn, my mind has sworn no oath."

It would be absurd if the soldiers you muster and enlist were to put life itself, their parents, fatherland, and all their kindred second to their confession of loyalty to you, to people who cannot give them any incorruptible reward, while we, who long for incorruption, could not endure all things in order to gain our heart's desire from Him who is able to bestow it.'

Here we are in the middle of the 2nd cent., with an author who had mingled in the great world, a man who had grown up in the age when Trajan had extended the Roman Empire to its limits, and when Tacitus had regretfully compared his period with the older military opportunities which his predecessors enjoyed (Ann. iv. xxxii. 2 f.). Historians and politicians alike saw that a military imperialism was the policy of Rome. But Justin's holy empire is not Roman. The issue of martyrdom has been also raised sharply; there is to be no holy war even of a defensive character, and Christians are to die cheerfully rather than retaliate on their persecutors or abandon their convictions.* But there is no more than this, even when Christians are thus described in the Dialogue (110): 'We who were filled with war and mutual slaughter and every wickedness have each of us throughout all the world altered our weapons of war, turning our swords into ploughs and our spears into agricultural instruments, and cultivating piety, righteousness, human kindness, faith, and hope, which we have from the Father Himself through the Crucified.' The spirit of Jesus still controlled the church in which and for which words like these were written. The ideal was that of the Beatitudes, and Justin sought to have that ideal realized. Rome was at war with Parthia when he wrote, and fighting her way up into Scotland; the disaffection in Palestine was to blaze up in the revolution of A.D. 161; on almost every frontier the empire had to hold its own by force of arms. But Justin steadily set his eyes upon the peaceful advance of Christianity, unarmed and non-resisting. Even yet, however, the question of the Christian as citizen had not fully presented itself to the Christian consciousness. The political horizon had altered and broadened since the days of Jesus, but the Church was still unconscious that its very development must, in the providence of God, bring it face to face with the problem of its relation to the Empire in more than a merely antagonistic or aloof spirit.

* Contrast a passage like Sir 35^{18f.} (39³⁰), where God is expected to intervene with a militant stroke.

* Clement of Alexandria has an admiring account (Strom. i. 24) of the strategy of Moses as a military commander. Yet Clement is no panegyrist of war. One of his sumptuary rules is that Christians must not wear seals which have a sword or a bow engraved upon them, since these emblems are unsuitable to lovers of peace (Pæd. iii. 11. 59).

† W. E. Gladstone, Later Gleanings, London, 1897, viii. 126 f.
‡ In the epistle of James the brevity and uncertainty of life (4¹⁴) are not compared, as in Wis 5¹², to the flight of an arrow ('as when an arrow is shot at a mark, the air is parted and closes up again at once, so that men know not where it passed through; so, as soon as we were born, we ceased to be, we had no sign of virtue to exhibit').

A quarter of a century later Irenæus echoed Justin's faith and hope from far-off Gaul. The bishop agreed with the apologist. He quotes the Isaianic prediction (iv. 34. 4) to the same effect, as a direct prophecy of Jesus Christ, since these pacific results were produced by the preaching of the gospel, 'which made such a change that swords and spears were converted into ploughs, and altered into sickles for reaping grain—that is, into tools of peace—so that people are now ignorant how to fight, but when struck offer also the other cheek.' Seneca had longed for the time when only farmers' tools would be made out of iron (Thyestes, 930: 'Ferrum omne teneat ruris innocui labor'). Irenæus claims that Christians were already devoting themselves entirely to peaceful agriculture. He proceeds, however, to allegorize the Isaianic prediction, and this is his main interest; e.g. the plough signifies the creation or first sowing of humanity, and the sickle denotes the ingathering of the elect by Christ. There is nothing in his pages any more than in Justin's to betray the least consciousness that war as a function of the State seriously presented a problem to the conscience of the church. Neither of them speaks so clearly and sharply as their predecessor Tatian, the bitter, earnest Syrian apologist, about the middle of the 2nd century. Tatian loathes war. But his antipathy is not based on any positive statement of the Christian faith so much as on the associations of warfare with the pagan Greeks. The wars of the Greeks, from Homer downwards, and their connexion with the pantheon of Olympus, furnish him with shafts to wing against polytheism, and this is practically all that we find in the allusions scattered through the Oratio ad Græcos. Thus, he upbraids the Greeks for using poetry to describe the battles and amours of the gods (1), sneers at Athena as a homicide (Schwartz omits ἡ πολεμοποιός in 8), derides the delight of Ares in war, and tells his pagan readers bluntly, 'divination is an aid of your worldly lusts: you want to make war, and you take Apollo to advise you about slaughter: he who makes you fond of wealth is he who reveals to you the secret of money-making; he who stirs up strife and war predicts victory as well' (19). This is the standpoint of the martyr Carpus (Acta Carpi, etc., in TU iv. iv. [1888] 446), who tells the magistrate that the devil sets wars afoot and also pretends to reveal the future.

Twenty years later, c. A.D. 170, when the legions had conquered the Parthians and were now, under Marcus Aurelius, fighting among the Balkans, in the long campaign against the Marcomanni, the apologist Athenagoras happened to touch the subject of war. Athenagoras was a sensitive soul. He could not bear bloodshed, and he recoiled in horror from armed conflict, but his pages contain no direct repudiation of war or of the military profession. It is impossible to interpret his language as conveying a direct censure of military service. The relevant passage occurs in his Legatio pro Christianis (35), where he has occasion to refute the widespread calumny that Christians were cannibals. To eat human flesh, he declares sarcastically and indignantly, you must first of all kill a human being. Now, who can prove that against us? 'Who can accuse us of homicide or of cannibalism, when they are well aware that we cannot bear to see a man put to death even justly?' We decline to watch the gladiators in the theatre, he adds, since 'our opinion is that to watch a man being put to death is much the same thing as actually putting him to death.' This is repeated later by Lactantius (A.D. 260-340). It would have been indeed strange if the early Christians had not lifted up their testimony against war, as distinguished pagans had done before them, from the peripatetic philosopher Dikæarchus of Messana, who in the 4th cent. B.C. calculated that war had killed more people than all other causes of destruction put together (Cicero, de Offic. ii. 5), down to Plutarch in the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D.

Lactantius is one of those who endeavoured to set public opinion in the Church against the war spirit, but he (Div. Inst. vi. 20) carries his protest forward into a philosophic repudiation of war as inconsistent with the character of the just man. He protests that the spectators of the games, at which condemned criminals had to fight, were exposing themselves to a corrupting influence. 'He who thinks it a pleasure to watch the slaying of a man, even though he has been justly condemned, pollutes his conscience as much as if he watched and shared a secret murder. And yet people call them "sports," at which human blood is shed.' He objects to all capital punishment, inflicted in the gladiatorial games, and concludes: 'When God forbids us to kill, he does not merely prohibit violent attacks (latrocinia), which even the public laws condemn, but warns us against doing what men consider lawful. Thus it will not be lawful for the just man to fight in the army, for his real warfare is justice itself; nor to accuse any one of a capital crime, for there is no difference between putting a man to death by the sword or by a word; what is forbidden is to put to death at all. Consequently, there ought to be no exception to this order of God; it ought always to be wrong to kill man, man whom God willed to be a sacred creature (sacrosanctum animal).' This humanitarian objection to war is a favourite thought of Lactantius. He protests against the deification and glorification of great generals (i. 18), as if the path to immortality lay through indiscriminate bloodshed and slaughter. The successful military conqueror, he sneers, is just a multiple murderer. He bewails and ridicules the insane delusion that immortal fame and glory are to be gained by making war on one's fellow-creatures. And in another passage (v. 17 f.) he avows that Horace's 'Integer vitæ' ode is the ideal and pattern of the just man, who would rather die than owe his life to the death of another human being. Cicero had pointed to the fact that Rome's high spirit and passion for martial fame were shown by the statues in the capital, which were generally in soldiers' uniform (de Offic. i. 18), but Lactantius was Ciceronian only in style. He shrank from war and force. The man who could write the pro Murena was no model for him in political philosophy. No early Christian is so Tolstovan in his ethics as Lactantius. He refuses to allow any retaliation whatsoever, and he does so on philosophic grounds rather than upon definitely Christian principles; his proofs are drawn from his humanitarian considerations rather than, as in the case of his predecessor Tertullian, from appeals to the NT.

5. Christians in the army.—The extant literature of the Church down to the close of the 2nd cent. betrays no sense of military service as incompatible with Christianity; it is discouraged rather than disparaged, when it is noticed at all. Neither then nor afterwards did the Church ever decline to baptize a soldier, or to allow him to remain in the army. Tertullian, writing about A.D. 197, proudly claims that Christians are so numerous that they have swarmed into every department of Roman life, into the army as well as into civil employments (Apol. 37). How can you taunt us, he asks the Romans (ib. 42), with being parasites and useless members of the State, when we fight at your side, trade along with you, and prove every day of our lives that we are no recluses? The language is hyperbolic, especially when he warns the Romans that Christians, by their sheer force of numbers, could wreck the State if they were to withdraw or to rebel. But, although the rhetorical bent of Tertullian always made him care more for emphasis than for accuracy, the significant point is that a Christian apologist was able to make this claim about Christians in the army, conscious that the fact could not be denied by his opponents, and sensible of no objection to it on the part of the Church. As we shall see, Tertullian had other private views on the advisability of Christians serving in the army, and later on he developed these into a rigid repudiation of military service as a sphere for genuine Christians; but as an apologist he makes no scruple whatsoever about using the existence of Christian soldiers as an argument in favour of the Church's claim to consideration at the hands of the empire. Even later, in his vehement protest ad Scapulam (4), he witnesses to the presence of Christian soldiers in the legions, mentioning again, as he had already done in the Apology (5), the case of the 12th legion in A.D. 174, which, by its prayers, was believed to have rescued the army of Marcus Aurelius from a desperate plight.

The Roman troops were in straits for lack of water; these Christian soldiers knelt down, and in response to their prayers God sent rain for themselves and their fellows, while thunder and lightning scared their enemies, the Germans and Sarmatians. So the story ran. The legion was called after its headquarters at Melitene in S. Armenia, in the neighbourhood of which it was recruited; it supplied more than one martyr subsequently, and, as both S. Armenia and Edessa, which also supplied soldiers to it, are known to have been penetrated by Christianity, at least as early as the beginning of the 3rd cent., there is no reason to doubt that Christians did serve in its ranks.

Whatever be the historical truth of the tale,* it was firmly believed by the early Church from the end of the 2nd cent. onwards (see Eus. HE v. 5), and for our purpose this is sufficient; the acceptance of the story proves not only that Christians must have been in the army but that their presence there did not raise the slightest sense of embarrassment or disapproval in the Church. The Pax Romana, within which Christianity itself was growing, would not have been maintained unless there had been plain, duty-loving men at arms, Christians as well as pagans, who were content to serve in the legions with the same kind of healthy spirit as that which Marius expressed (Sallust, Jug. lxxxiii.: 'Illa multo optima rei publicae doctus sum—hostem ferire, praesidium agitare, nihil metnere nisi turpem famam, hiemem et aestatem iuxta pati, humi requiescere, eodem tempore inopiam et laborem tolerare').

No reliable clue either to the relative number of Christians in the legions or to any deduction from that number as to the general feeling of the Church about military service can be found in the many allusions scattered throughout the Christian inscriptions. Soldiers are not often mentioned in the extant Christian epitaphs. But this is not so significant, perhaps, as it might seem to be. It must be recollected that soldiers fell in battle all over the empire, and usually on the far frontiers. Of all professions, the military was the least likely to furnish material for epitaphs in Christian cemeteries at Rome or in any of the leading cities of the empire. Death abroad, perhaps with no Christian comrade at hand, perhaps with no epitaph beyond the 'sed miles, sed pro patria' muttered in pride and regret, was a frequent end to the Christian soldier's career. This must be taken into account in estimating the comparatively infrequent notice of the military profession in the catacombs and elsewhere. Besides, the worldly calling of a Christian is by no means universally inserted in his epitaph. Many a soldier may have been buried without a word being set up to preserve his profession. And this omission need not have been due to a sense of disapprobation or shame. In the presence of God social distinctions were often regarded as beneath notice; a modesty or reverence in the survivors forbade such secular positions being perpetuated in the memory of men. The grave of a slave was not always marked by the addition of 'slave' to the name of the departed, and the same would apply to soldiers.

Another technical regulation must have restricted for a time the number of Christians in the legions. Although the ancient practice of admitting only Roman citizens to the army had been relaxed, no slaves were allowed into the ranks; the penalty of death was inflicted upon any who managed to make their way into the coveted service. Military service was still, in one sense, a privilege; there were obvious reasons, as Juvenal's sixteenth satire shows, why not only officers but men were glad to embrace the army as a profession, for it held out to some a life of adventure and economic independence and it opened up to others an avenue leading to considerable social and political influence. The exclusion of the slave,* except in dire cases of emergency, and even of the freedman, naturally ruled out a considerable percentage of Christians. This ought not to be forgotten in any attempt to estimate the possible numbers of Christians in the legions. The majority of Christians were by no means all Roman citizens; that is, they were not qualified to serve. Besides, the recruiting system did not sweep in even the non-slave classes of Christians automatically. The conscription only required a certain number, as a rule, in order to keep the legions up to their full strength; the legions were not large, in proportion to the population of the empire,† and any one whose name was drawn could (from Trajan's reign onwards) provide a substitute, if he chose and could afford it. The voluntary principle was in force under the empire ('plerumque voluntario milite numeri suppletur,' Dig. XLIX. xvi. 5). It is only in a modified sense that we can speak of conscription being the means of recruiting for the Roman army. Consequently, if a Christian was in the army, he was usually there of his own free choice—unless, of course, he had been in the service before he became a Christian at all. Even under the empire the Romans were not a nation under arms. Military service still retained its associations of privilege; no doubt, the possession of a certain income involved liability to serve in the legions, and this was irksome to a certain number, but they could sometimes gain exemption—indeed they were eventually allowed to buy exemption; and on the other hand there were many freedmen and others whose anxiety to join the army enabled the State to enrol them even although, on the strict principles of the older law, they were disqualified. Furthermore, the sons of legionaries tended to adopt their father's profession, and this was particularly true of the period after Septimius Severus, when regular marriage was permitted in the army.

This two-fold fact, that no Christian slaves could enter an army which was primarily reserved for Roman citizens (cf. DAC i. 93), and that even other Christians were not regularly pressed into the service, helps partly to explain why, during the first century and a half of the Church, the problem of war never became a serious matter for Christians. But, when their number increased, when converts were made in practically all ranks and vocations of life throughout the Roman world, the difficulties of military service began at last to be realized. Primarily, they met men who were in the army when they became Christians. A private or officer had then to consider his position, once the scruple had been voiced. Ought he to remain? Should he not withdraw from so compromising a profession? The rigorist party in the Church seems to have considered it his duty to leave the legions without any hesitation. But the conditions of military service prevented any Church-discipline from being enforced as easily as on civilians at home; not all the Christian soldiers were rigorists, and for various reasons it was difficult to agree with this cut-and-dry principle. Had not St. Paul told Christians to remain in the calling and position in which they were converted (1 Co 7²⁰)? Did not that apply to soldiers as well as to slaves? The question might be asked sophistically, but it was also asked quite seriously. Clement of Alexandria, e.g., assumes this position without the least hesitation. His argument is (Protrept. x. 100): 'Practise farming, we say, if you are a farmer, but know God as you till your fields; sail away, if you are fond of sea-faring, but call upon the heavenly Pilot; if the knowledge [i.e. of the gospel] has come upon you in the army, listen to the General who gives orders that are righteous.' The implication is that the soldier is to be pious where he is, like the sailor and the farmer. What makes this remark all the more significant is that Clement feels no need of arguing the point; he was stating the normal Christian principle. Besides, what were Christian soldiers to do if they left the ranks, perhaps after years of service, when they were more or less incapable of taking up a new profession? Were they to forgo the valuable retiring allowances which they would earn at their discharge? And, even if they wished to leave the army, was that feasible? The law recognized only two exits—disease which incapacitated a man from active duty, and an honourable discharge at the end of his sixteen, twenty, or twenty-five years of service. Desertion was the ugly and ominous name for the conduct of those who forsook the eagles upon any other plea.

* Digesta, XLIX. xvi. 11: 'ab omni militia servi prohibentur.' There is an interesting illustration of the strictness with which the authorities excluded slaves, in Trajan's letter to Pliny (Ep. x. 32).

† Hardly more than about 320,000 men, as a rule (cf. W. T. Arnold, The Roman System of Provincial Administration, Oxford, 1914, p. 113). Eventually barbarian serfs were allowed as vicarii, or substitutes.

* Probably, as A. C. McGiffert observes (on Eus. HE v. 5. 1), 'the whole legion prayed for deliverance to their respective deities, and thus quite naturally each party claimed the victory for its particular gods.' E.g. an Egyptian soothsayer was supposed to have brought about the miracle by his incantations to Hermes. Cf. Renan, Marc-Aurèle, Paris, 1882, p. 273 f.

It is premature to speak of a 'rigorist party' even in the days of Marcus Aurelius, when Christian soldiers were serving freely in the legions, but from the remonstrances and taunts of the pagan patriot Celsus (170-185), which we overhear in the pages of Origen (c. Cels. viii. 73 f.), it is fairly obvious that he had met Christians who were already holding back from military service. He gives no hint as to their reasons. All that concerns him is the fact, and he deploras it as a lover of the Empire. He cannot understand these conscientious objectors. Their attitude is all the worse because it professes to be religious. To him it is part and parcel of the pusillanimity which characterizes these skulking, contemptible, superstitious sectarians. Celsus was an earnest Epicurean, as Lucretius had been before him, but he is as devoted to the Empire as the poet had been indifferent, and he endeavours to overcome the apathy of Christians. He quotes from Homer's Iliad (ii. 205) to base a sound principle of government and order; there must be one strong royal hand. Then he turns to Christians and tells them, 'if everybody were to do as you do [i.e. abstain from military service and loyal, patriotic self-sacrifice], there would be nothing to prevent the king from being left quite alone and forlorn, and the affairs of this earth would fall into the hands of the wildest and most lawless barbarians.' At the same time this antipathy to the army was by no means universal among Christians, for, as we learn from the stories of the 12th legion (see above, p. 663) and of the Acta Pauli, which probably were put into shape during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, soldiers belonging to the Church not only served in the legions but were occasionally persecuted.

6. The problem first raised.—The next half-century, however, i.e. from the end of the 2nd cent. to the middle of the 3rd, was to witness a slight change, or rather an oscillation of feeling, and the first to voice it was the very Tertullian who had formerly appealed to the army as proving the existence and spread of Christianity within the Empire. Both he and Origen after him are the protagonists of the extreme section in the Church which now frankly disavowed the military profession. Froude declares that he and Hurrell were told by their oldest brother that they might begin to think for themselves, if they saw Newman and Keble disagreeing. Did the divergence of opinion between contemporary leaders like Tertullian and Clement set the rank and file thinking for themselves on the question of war? Perhaps it did. At any rate, scattered cases occur of Christians either refusing to join the army or throwing down their arms for conscientious reasons. Whether these incidents were due to the literary propaganda of the two pacifist writers, and if so how far, we cannot tell; in one case, at least, the recalcitrant recruit declares that no one had instigated him.* The point is that a certain feeling of dislike to the army was in the air, among some circles of Christians, and it is important to notice the reasons put forward by this serious fraction of the early Church.

Lord Acton said that he would never write in the Rambler upon unworthy conciliation or virulent controversy. Tertullian in his day wrote of both, especially of what he considered the former. He came to regard all the State service, military and civil, as an unworthy combination of faith and idolatry; public work was too equivocal; neither an official nor an officer could keep his position without compromising his Christian religion, and Tertullian had no patience with any one, clerical or lay, who asserted that these professions were compatible with a true faith. It is significant that several of the 'pacifist' writers, from Tatian onwards, were or became eccentric and heretical. So it was in Tertullian's case. After writing his Apology, he had gradually identified himself with an extreme position on various points, which finally drew him over to sympathy with the Montanists. Theologically, the change did not make him much less orthodox; in fact, his great contributions to the doctrines of Christology and the Trinity, which date from this later period, are unspoiled by Montanist aberrations. It was not so, however, in the field of ethics. His opposition to what he considered the laxity of the Catholic Church made him an ultra-puritan, and the idea of a Christian serving in the army now became anathema to him.

He gave sweeping and brilliant expression to this view in two tracts, de Corona† and de Idololatria. They are specimens of his special pleading at its best—or at its worst. A noble spirit of devotion to Christ is blended with a fanatically anti-social bias, and a number of the arguments are not only scornful but quite fantastic. The de Corona was written after news had reached Carthage of an incident involving a Christian soldier. When Septimius Severus died at York in 211, during his campaign in Britain, the emperors Caracalla and Geta signalized the new reign by presenting the troops at Lambesa in N. Africa with a largesse, or donativum. Each legionary received this, coming forward for the money with the usual crown of laurel on his head, a ceremonial badge of respect for the State deities of the army and the empire. One soldier, however, violated the etiquette of the proceedings. He carried the crown in his hand, and was promptly arrested for this breach of discipline. He explained that as a Christian he could not wear a crown, and, abjuring military service, was imprisoned before being executed. Apparently this was quite an exceptional case. His action was blamed as rash and idle by his fellow-Christians, within and without the army. But

* Maximilianus (see below, p. 669). When the proconsul asks, 'Quis tibi hoc persuasit?' he replies, 'Animus meus, et is qui me vocavit.'

† Gibbon (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ch. xv.) holds that 'by the mention of the emperors (Severus and Caracalla) it is evident that Tertullian composed his treatise de Corona long before he was engaged in the errors of the Montanists.' Recent research has proved that this is not evident; the earlier date, prior to A.D. 193, is no longer tenable. At the same time, if the de Pallio (ch. 6) is an early composition, Tertullian even when he wrote his Apology must have had some private views about military service which did not agree with the normal church view of which he was at that time, for apologetic reasons, the trenchant spokesman. There is a full discussion of his attitude to war in C. Guignebert, Tertullien, Paris, 1901, p. 189 ff.

Tertullian, on hearing of it, heartily approved. Here is a true miles gloriosus,* he cried—a soldier whose glory is in God! Here is a man who will not sell his Lord for money! To the objection that there was nothing in the Bible to prohibit a Christian from wearing a chaplet of flowers, Tertullian can only answer sophistically that this prohibition is one of the excellent customs which have grown up in the Church, excellent because flowers are meant to be admired or smelt or carried in the hand but not worn on the head, which would be unnatural! You never read of bishops or saints being crowned with flowers! Only pagans wear such crowns, pagan deities like Isis, and pagans who seek thus to honour their idols. The laurel is sacred to Bacchus and Apollo. Besides, Christ is the head of the man (1 Co 11³⁴), and He was only crowned with thorns! The head should be kept sacred to Him, who will crown it one day with the crown of life eternal (15). Such is the kind of pleas which, in all seriousness, Tertullian advances in defence of this soldier's refusal to wear a laurel crown. But he goes further. Not only is such a crown inconsistent with Christianity, for a Christian must not touch the symbols of idolatry, but the military profession (11) itself is tabued, because (i.) the sacramentum, or oath of loyalty, which a Christian takes to his Lord, supersedes and invalidates any other sacramentum; (ii.) when Jesus said, 'He who uses the sword shall perish by the sword' (Mt 26⁵²), He made it unlawful for a disciple to use the sword at all; (iii.) if a Christian cannot go to law (1 Co 6⁷), much less can he, as a son of peace, go to battle; (iv.) if he is not allowed to avenge injuries done to himself (Ro 12¹⁹), he cannot consistently take part in imprisoning or torturing or punishing his fellow-creatures; (v.) the military calling interferes with the regular practice of his religion—e.g. he may have to do sentry-duty on the Lord's Day,† or to stand sentry over pagan temples. The mixture of real and fantastic objections becomes bewildering at this point. Tertullian, e.g., asks how a soldier can hold a spear, when Christ's side was pierced by a spear, or allow himself to be raised from sleep by a trumpet, when he hopes to be raised from death by the last trumpet! But there are deeper notes in the appeal for severing all connexion with so compromising a place as the camp. He admits that the case of men converted when they are already in the army is a special case, like that of the soldiers who came to John the Baptist or of the centurions in the gospels and Acts of the Apostles; still, once soldiers have accepted the faith, 'a man must either quit the service, as many have done, or absolutely refuse to do anything contrary to God (and yet neither course is permissible, according to military law), or finally he must suffer death for his God, as a civilian Christian has also to do; in terms of his loyalty. Military service will not hold out to him any prospect of impunity in the matter of sin, or immunity from martyrdom. A Christian is never anything but a Christian, no matter where he is. The gospel is one and Jesus is the same Jesus, who will deny every one who denies God and confess every one who confesses Him, who will save the life that has been lost for His sake and on the other hand destroy the life which has been valued over against His name. In His eyes the civilian (paganus) believer is just as much a soldier (i.e. of Christ) as the pagan (paganus)—a play on the double meaning of the term! soldier is no soldier (i.e. of Christ). There can be no plea of necessity, in the region of faith; those for whom the one thing needful is to avoid sin have no plea of necessity for sinning.' And so on. It is a radical assertion that Christians have no right to enter the army, and that Christians within the army must risk death itself in order to maintain their faith against the most trivial association with pagan religion.§ In fact, Tertullian shuts out the profession of arms as well as philosophy from the Christian religion. The vexed question of military service primarily turns, for him, upon the polytheistic and idolatrous practices which were bound up, more or less directly, with the entire fabric of Roman civilization. They met the Christian in almost every branch of trade as well as in a profession like education and in the pleasures and intercourse of social life; as we might expect, therefore, Tertullian takes up this problem again in the de Idolatria, where he handles it with an equally paradoxical and uncompromising vigour, refuses to hear of any bowing in the house of Rimmon, reiterates that Christianity is a holy war against idolatry, in which the catechumen at baptism takes the sacramentum, or oath of fealty, to his divine Imperator, and (19) rules out the army even more drastically than in the de Corona. The question is, whether a believer can take to military service, and whether one can be admitted into the Christian faith who belongs to the army either as a private* or as a menial servant who is not obliged to take part in sacrifices or capital punishment. The divine oath of loyalty (sacramentum) and the human have not a thing in common, there is no affinity between the standard of Christ and the standard of the devil, between the camp of light and the camp of darkness: one soul cannot serve two masters, God and Caesar. "Moses carried a rod [like the centurion's ritis or wand]? Aaron wore a clasp [like the soldiers on their shoes]? John was belted with a leather girdle? Joshua the son of Nun led an army? The people [of God] made war?" To talk thus is to trifle! How can people make war, how can they even do military duty in times of peace, when God has deprived them of their swords? For, although soldiers did come to John and receive instructions on their duty, though a centurion did have faith (Mt 8¹⁰),† the Lord subsequently disbanded every soldier when He disarmed Peter (Jn 18¹¹).‡

In this last sentence Tertullian argues that John the Baptist's regulations were not final. John the Baptist met soldiers at the opening of his mission, and he died by the hand of a soldier—a σπεκουλάτωρ, as Mark notes (Mk 6⁷), i.e. a gendarme, one of the non-commissioned officers called by that name, who were sometimes employed as executioners (cf. Seneca, de Ira, i. 16) as well as in the capacity of coniers. Their domineering and tyrannical conduct to provincials, when they were employed on police-duty, was the fault that John had rebuked (cf. W. M. Ramsay, Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the NT, London, 1915, p. 316 f.). But, according to Tertullian, John's mere prohibition of this was not the last word; Jesus had excluded a Christian even from being a just σπεκουλάτωρ. This is a fairer view than the disparagement or even the sweeping rejection of John which many other extremists within and without the Church advocated—e.g. the Manichæans of a later day ('Manichæi Johannem aperte blasphemare consuerunt,' Aug. c. Faustum, xxii. 74). But it was far from general in the Church. Tertullian's contemporary, Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. iii. 12. 91), denied that it was John, and only John, who spoke: 'The Lord gives by John to soldiers the command, "Be content with your pay."‡ The belief in inspiration must have told seriously against any exegesis which, for however high an end, depreciated even a word like that of Lk 3¹⁴.

The Isaianic prediction, for which there are striking parallels in Plutarch's Vita Numæ (20) and in the discussion of the relative merits of agriculture and the army by Maximus of Tyre (Diss. xiii. f.), lent itself so naturally to allegorizing that we are not surprised to find it elaborated by Origen (c. Cels. v. 33), in the same sense as Irenæus, a century earlier. He does insert λογικας before μαχαίρας and υβριστικας afterwards, as though he allegorized the weapons of war into rhetorical devices and sophistical harangues. But the context indicates that the literal sense of the prediction was not forgotten by him. Later on, in vii. 26. he makes his point clearer. There is this difference, he says, between the Mosaic polity and the Christian, that the Jews could not maintain the former if they accepted the gospel; 'for Christians could not follow the Mosaic law in destroying their enemies or those who were condemned to be burned or stoned for having transgressed the law; the very Jews are unable, much as they desire to do so, to carry out the punishments ordered and enjoined by the law.' Origen sees a providential purpose in the removal of the Jewish state; it removes from the Jews the need and opportunity, which had been essential to them in

* Cyprian borrowed this epithet and applied it to the martyrs (Ep. xlii. 2: 'Magis militibus gloriosis et bonis congruit intra domestica castra consistere').

† This had been an old difficulty for the Jews, under the Hasmonæans (cf. 1 Mac 2³⁴⁻⁴¹), for, as nothing could be carried on the Sabbath, to carry arms was held by some to violate the strict law of the Sabbath. At the request of Hyrcanus, Dola-bella and Mark Antony exempted Asiatic Jews on this very ground (Jos. Ant. xiv. 223-230) in 49-42 B.C. Cf. JE ii. 123.

‡ 'Quod aequè fides pagana condixit'—paganus being equivalent to non-military or civilian. In the Christian vocabulary of the 4th cent. paganus thus came to mean all who did not belong to the real 'army,' i.e. to the Church.

§ His language (see above, p. 659) seems to imply that the votaries of Mithra in the Roman army were exempted from wearing crowns, and that the similar religious scruple of Christians ought to be recognized—or at least that Christians should maintain it.

* The militia caligata really included not only privates but soldiers up to the rank of centurions.

† The first time that πίστις is mentioned in Mt.

‡ There is a striking parallel in the instructions given by Josephus to his armed force of Galileans, to avoid quarrelsomeness and to be satisfied with their rations (συμβουλευόντων προς μηδέν μήτε πολεμείν μήθ' ἀρπαγή μολύνειν τὰς χεῖρας, ἀλλὰ σκεπνύν κατὰ τὸ πεδῖον ἀρκευμένους τοὺς αὐτῶν ἰφοδίους [Vita, 244]).

OT ages, of maintaining their national existence by force of arms. 'To have deprived them of the right of making war on their enemies and of fighting for their country and of executing or in some way punishing adulterers, murderers, or persons guilty of similar crimes, would have been to expose them to sudden and utter destruction, whenever their enemies attacked them; for in that case their very law would have crippled them and prevented them from resisting their enemies.' Origen admits that war is vital to nationality, and so he rejoices that nationality no longer exists for the Jews. He cannot of course imagine that it could exist for Christians either.* Tertullian had no positive notion of the state in his Christian ethic. Origen betrays a slight consciousness of this problem, but as yet, while the political conditions had begun to alter the focus assumed in the NT, they had not developed sufficiently to enable any satisfactory view to be propounded. Christians do not spread the gospel by force of arms, and they do not form a nation in the ancient sense of the term. This is all that Origen can say. But the further question arises, Have Christians, as citizens of the Roman empire, any duty of loyalty which obliges them to fight in the legions on behalf of their empire? Are they to enlist voluntarily or to obey the orders of the recruiting-sergeant, when their names are called? It is clear that some hesitation had been felt on this point. As we have already seen, Celsus had urged Christians to rally to the help of the emperor, for the maintenance of justice and order against the barbarians, and in viii. 73 f. Origen meets this tacit criticism of political indifference among members of the Church.

We Christians, he argues, help the State by being good men, by putting on the panoply of God (Eph 6¹¹), and also by offering prayers for kings and authorities, as the apostle enjoined (1 Ti 2¹⁻²).† 'The more pious any one is, the more serviceable he is in support of those who reign, more serviceable than soldiers who sally forth to fight and slay as many of the enemy as they can. Besides, when the opponents of the Faith bid us do battle for the common weal and slay men, our answer is this: "Among yourselves the priests at certain shrines and the attendants of your gods keep their hands free from bloodshed for the sake of the sacrifices, so that they may have unstained and pure hands to offer the appointed sacrifices to those whom you consider gods. Even when war comes, you do not make the priests serve in the ranks. Well, if that is a reasonable and laudable custom, how much more so, that while the rest of men are fighting, these persons [i.e. Christians] should serve as priests and ministers of God, keeping their hands pure and wrestling in prayer to God for those who are fighting in a righteous cause and for a righteous king, that all opposition to righteous agents may be crushed."‡ Also, as we vanquish by our prayers all the demons who stir up war and the violation of oaths and disturbances of the peace, we thus prove of more help to kings than those who take up arms. Besides, we do take part in public affairs, for from a righteous life we offer up prayers, conjoined with ascetic discipline and meditations which instruct us to scorn delights instead of being carried away by them. We fight for the king better than any one else. We do not take up arms along with him, even though he presses us, but we take arms on his behalf, raising a special regiment of religion (ὁὖν στρατοπέδον εὐσεβείας) by means of our supplications to God. If Celsus wants us to fight on behalf of our country as well, let him know that we do so fight. And our fighting is not for the purpose of being noticed by men or of winning vain glory, for our prayers are in secret, in the inner life, ascending as from priests on behalf of our fellow-citizens. Besides, Christians render more help to their countries than other men, for they train citizens and teach piety towards the supreme Deity.' This course of reasoning would naturally have seemed evasive to Celsus, and he would have been still more disappointed with the plea (viii. 63 f.) that the wild barbarians would not bring Roman civilization to ruin, because, if they were converted to Christianity, they would make excellent citizens, law-abiding and humane. Origen recalls the prediction of Zeph 37¹², but he is not very certain about its meaning, though he actually brings it forward in all seriousness against the remark of Celsus that any wholesome agreement between the barbarians and the Romans was in the last degree unlikely.

Origen, in fact, falls back upon fatalism. He propounds a holy experiment, which had no relation to the moral order or to the actual situation of the empire. He declares that, if the Romans would all accept Christianity, their prayers would enable them to overcome their foes—or rather, he adds, they would not require to fight at all, since the divine power which promised to save five cities for the sake of fifty just men would be their safeguard. One can imagine how chilling and unreal these airy excuses would sound to Roman patriots who were celebrating with a glow of enthusiasm in A.D. 248 the thousandth anniversary of the founding of Rome.* Besides, to suggest disarmament as the only alternative to militarism was worse than folly to any serious citizen of the Empire in the 3rd cent.; it suggested an unhealthy conscience. But the plea of Celsus was as much beside the point as Origen's answer. Neither dealt with realities. When Celsus asked Christians to serve in the army, he did not realize that the religious rites associated with military and civil service were a genuine stumbling-block to Christians. He forgot, as Renan (Marc-Aurèle, p. 370 f.) says, that in upholding the established religion he was asking Christians to agree to absurdities greater than those which he attacked in Christians themselves. Celsus had an Epicurean's healthy scorn for superstition and a Roman's inability to see how any religion could be real or reasonable apart from nationality. Both of these traits prevented him from doing justice to Christianity. Origen's main position is sound, but then he weakens it by letting himself be drawn off into doctrinaire opinions and speculations about politics. It is true that in one passage he incidentally (c. Cels. iv. 82, Philocalia, xx. 9) appears again to admit that war in certain circumstances might be justified for non-Christians. He has been speaking of bees, which obey a sovereign and engage in wars. 'Perhaps,' he adds, 'the so-called wars of the bees suggest how just and regular wars (if such must be—ἐν ποτὶ θεοῖς) should be prosecuted by men.' But this is an obiter dictum, although, as we have just seen, he contemplates Christians praying for a righteous cause and army.

So far as the straight issue went, Origen answers Celsus on this point with a blunt 'Non possumus'; he is not so defiant as Tertullian, but he is equally decided. The reasons added to his decision are less convincing; they remind us too vividly of the ingenuous philosophy of war which his fellow-Alexandrian had propounded two centuries earlier. Philo's simple scheme of things (de Præm. et Pæn. 15-16) divides the enemies of man into two classes, animals and human beings. Wild beasts are our natural enemies (τῶν φύσει πολεμῶν); war against them has no ending, for their nature is alien to ours. The only prospect which Philo sees of any improvement in man's relations to the beasts—and it is a dim prospect—lies in the taming of the human passions; 'is it not silly to imagine that we can avoid injury from wild beasts external to us, when all the while we are training the wild beasts within to awful savagery? Hence, we must not give up hope that, once our wild passions of the soul are subdued, animals also will be broken in.'

* When Ulfilas came to translate the OT for the warlike Goths in the latter half of the 4th cent., he is said by Philostorgius (HE ii. 5) to have left out the books of the Kings, 'since they are merely a story of military deeds, and since the Gothio tribes, who were particularly fond of fighting, required to have their militant passions checked rather than spurred on to warlike exploits.'

† Including, as we learn from Arnobius (adv. Gent. iv. 36), prayers for the army.

‡ If a Roman had taken this seriously, he might have allowed the exemption of the Christian clergy, for the same reason as not only pagan priests but rhetoricians, philosophers, and physicians were not obliged to serve against their will. The notion of all Christians being priests would not have been intelligible to him.

* For this dating of Origen's treatise see K. J. Neumann, Der römische Staat und die allgemeine Kirche bis auf Diocletian, Leipzig, 1890, pp. 265-273.

In this way Philo hopes further that the wars of man against man will be ended; once the wild beasts are overcome by human gentleness and self-command, men will feel ashamed to pursue wars of aggression which make them lower than the brutes.* 'It will seem most disgraceful if venomous, carnivorous, unsocial, and ferocious animals have become on good terms with man, and if man himself, who is naturally gentle, and endowed with a sociable and harmonious disposition, is truculent and bent on destroying his fellow-creatures.' For an idealist like Philo to write in such terms was harmless, if it was useless. His dream compromised nobody. But, when Origen talked about the possibility of the barbarians becoming Christians, at a time when Rome was face to face with the wild Goths on the northern frontiers, he forgot that there is a time and a season for everything, even for dreaming dreams. To suggest, as he did, that the barbarians were not really so dangerous as Celsus had made out was to run the risk of giving Roman citizens a false and poor impression of Christian sagacity, to say nothing of Christian loyalty. Tertullian's outburst was less likely to do harm; it was meant for Christians. But Origen's utterances would reach the outside public more readily than his predecessor's.

The second of the great African fathers admired Tertullian and on this point agreed with him. Cyprian, in A.D. 246, invites his friend and fellow-rhetorician Donatus (Ep. i. 'ad Donatum,' 6)† to look at the state of the world: 'roads rendered impassable by brigands, seas infested with pirates, wars waged on every side with the bloody horror of camps, the world drenched with internecine bloodshed (mutuo sanguine), and murder—a crime, when committed by an individual—a virtue when committed wholesale. Impunity is claimed for crimes not because they are free from guilt but because of the large scale of their cruelty.' There is a tinge of sentimental melancholy and weariness of the world in these words penned amid the charming ease and quiet of his gardens at Carthage. But Cyprian's position amounts to a discouragement of war in general. He has no room for it in his scheme of things. Half a century later the trenchant African objection to war was repeated by Arnobius of Sicca (i. 6), from whom Lactantius may have learned his pacifism as well as his rhetoric. Arnobius claims, however, that wars have abated in the Empire since the coming of Christ, though he insists that Christians 'would rather shed their own blood than stain their hands and conscience with the blood of other people.' One of the points which he makes later (vii. 12) is the absurd situation created by two nations at war sacrificing to the same gods for victory. What are the poor gods to do? To side with each, time about, or with neither? But he uses this illustration to bring out the futility of imagining that the divine favour can be influenced by human offerings, not to emphasize the incongruities of war and religion. Neither Cyprian nor Arnobius nor even Lactantius and Athanasius,‡ however, dented Christian opinion like Tertullian and Origen.

7. The pressure of the problem.—Yet the dint was neither deep nor permanent. Fortunately for the early Church, the views of Tertullian, Origen, and Cyprian did not alter the situation. Tertullian and Origen, like Tatian, happened to be suspected by the orthodox on other grounds. Cyprian's influence might have been expected to exercise far more influence; apparently it did not. Of the four great African fathers, only the last, Augustine, recognized the sad, stern necessity of war as a sphere for Christian civic loyalty; Tertullian, Cyprian, and Lactantius take the opposite position. Yet Christians still continued to serve in the army. Had the extremists succeeded in their policy of tabuing military service, it is very doubtful if the victory of Christianity in the next century would have been possible; had the Church committed herself to an open line of disloyalty, by forbidding her members to join or to remain in the legions, the perils of the new religion would have been seriously increased, and Constantine would hardly have felt justified in raising it to the position of the State-religion. One of the factors of the Church's triumph in the 4th cent. was that the Christians had made themselves necessary to the well-being of the Empire and proved themselves in deed as well as in word loyal citizens. A saving instinct kept the Church from yielding to the Gnostic and Manichaean tendency which was implicit in the fanatical anti-civic repudiation of force voiced by Tertullian and Origen. By the end of the 3rd cent. Christian soldiers were so considerable an element that one of the aims of Diocletian, in his ruthless policy, was to purge the army of their presence. The fact speaks for itself.

To it we may add, more for the sake of interest than of importance, that in the first half of the third cent. a Christian actually wrote on military tactics. (An incidental parallel occurs in the advice of Ep. Aristeas, pp. 193 L., 231, where a Jew gives Ptolemy Philadelphus some good counsel on military matters.) This was Sextus Julius Africanus, the versatile and indefatigable friend of Origen, who not only travelled widely in the East and studied science, but composed pages on subjects as diverse as chronology and agriculture. The recent discovery (cf. Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, iii. 38 f.) of a papyrus containing the end of the 15th book of his Κεσμοι η παραβολα removes any reason for scepticism as to his authorship of the latter work. The Κεσμοι were, like the Stromata of Clement, a miscellany or encyclopaedia, but of a more secular character; they discussed all manner of topics from charms and medicines to strategy, from literary criticism to methods of warfare. Africanus seems to have been on intimate terms with the emperor, Alexander Severus; he arranged a library for him at the Pantheon, and his interests, theoretical as well as practical, were by no means confined to ecclesiastical affairs. He stood in the front rank of contemporary culture, and was a man of affairs as well as a scholar. Whether or not he had served in the army, it is significant that he could transcribe from his note-books information about matters of military science such as poisoning wells and provisions or the best methods of attack.

But the 3rd cent. witnessed the rise of difficulties for Christian soldiers on a serious scale, which produced a certain reaction against the service. Some part of the repugnance obviously felt by Christians for military service may have been due to the fact that Mithraism was one of the favourite religions among the troops. From Memphis to the south of Scotland, from Armenia and the Balkans to Spain, the presence of the legions has left more or less distinct traces of this cult; from the reign of Commodus onwards, it was patronized by various emperors as the fautor imperii sui; sometimes, as under the reactionary policy of Julian, it was favoured actually as a counter-weight to

Is 24 is being visibly fulfilled. Formerly the entire life of barbarians 'used to be spent under arms; their staff was a sword, and it was their stay in all emergencies . . . but when they hear the teaching of Christ, they at once turn from war to agriculture . . . and, instead of fighting among themselves, take arms against the devil and evil spirits, subduing them by self-control and by the soul's virtue.' It was in fear of war turning against themselves that the demons incited men to war against men!

* Seneca (Ep. Mor. xcv.) also holds up animals in order to shame men out of their pugnacity and militarism. 'We forbid homicide and individual slaughter. What of wars and the "glorious" crime of slaying nations? . . . Man, the mildest of beings, is not ashamed of rejoicing in a fellow-man's blood, or of waging wars and handing them on to posterity to wage, when even dumb, wild beasts are at peace among themselves. . . . Man, a sacred thing to man, is now killed in sport and jest.' The entire passage agrees with the pleas of Lactantius (see above, p. 662).

† He addresses Donatus in military terms: 'Tu tantum quem iam spiritualibus castris militia celestis signavit' (15).

‡ In the de Incarn. Verbi Dei (50-53) he attributes war to the machinations of demons, and, as these are being routed by 'the faith of Christ and the sign of the Cross,' the prediction of Christianity, and all this may have sharpened the distaste of the Church for a branch of the public service which was so closely identified with the rival and belligerent cult of Mithra. But the reasons for the Christian hesitation lay deeper. Some Christians felt (see above, p. 662) that the sixth commandment forbade the taking of human life at all, and that the soldier's trade was no better than murder. This had never been the aim of the OT command, of course, and a man like Athanasius (Ep. xlviii.) frankly recognized the difference between murder as prohibited by the sixth commandment and the duty of the soldier to kill his enemies. Still, under a Christian regime which discouraged and had to discourage murder, it was inevitable that such a conclusion should occasionally be drawn. Far more serious was the difficulty raised by the compromising association of the Roman army with polytheism and the State-religion. These offered a real obstacle to some early Christians, and it was on this score that the issue was sharply raised. The allegiance of the army was bound up with a statutory recognition of the Emperor as the semi-divine head of the State; the military standards, decorated with gold and silver images of gods and emperors, were set up periodically as sacra to be venerated; and altars were erected, from the reign of Gallienus onwards, to the genius of the Emperor and subsequently to the genius of the Roman people. Camp religion, said Tertullian, is nothing but a veneration of the standards; the whole camp swears by them, and sets them up above all other gods (Apol. 16).^{*} The 'genii of the legion,' the 'genii of the cohort,' and so forth, made up a military religion of their own, alongside of the Capitoline deities. On the other hand, all this 'religious' side of the army could be, and evidently was, regarded by many Christians as a purely formal and official business; it was an unpleasant and distasteful item in the organization, but it could be judged from the point of view of patriotism, and many who were not Christians at all showed that they did not take it seriously. Church-parades were even then what they are often now. Besides, the offering up of the prescribed sacrifices was the duty of the officers; the rank and file had no direct personal share in the ceremony, although they tacitly assented by their presence on parade. And Christian officers cannot have been very numerous, at any rate in the 2nd century. At the same time, the army obviously was a place of special danger to the Christian who wished to be perfectly consistent. The situation was undoubtedly equivocal. The pagan Cæcilius, in the dialogue of Minucius Felix (6), proudly claims that the Roman service had a distinctly religious accompaniment: 'Exercent in armis virtutem religiosam . . . cultu religionis armati.' Trouble was almost inevitable before long for members of the Church who had to face the religious rites of the camp in the light of what some Christian authorities were saying about idolatry. For example, a Christian soldier was put to death at Cæsarea under Gallienus (Ens. HE vii. 15) for refusing to offer the usual sacrifice to the emperors, which was required of all officers. Marinus had been elected to the position of centurion, but his election was challenged by a rival, who objected that Marinus could not take the honour as he was a Christian and therefore unable to perform the due sacrifice. On examination this was found to be correct, and the Christian forfeited his life. The local bishop, Theoteknus, came to him during the three hours given him for reconsidering his position, and, taking him into the church, asked him to choose between the sword at his side and the gospels which the bishop put before him. The soldier took the gospels. Once again, a case of voluntary death on the part of two Christian soldiers is chronicled in the famous inscription of Pope Damasus on the Appian Road (cf. H. Achelis, in TU xi. ii. [1894] 431, where their later Acta are discussed), which commemorates the martyrdom of Nereus and Achilleus; they were buried in the cemetery of Domitilla, the niece of Domitian. The exact date of their death is uncertain. But they certainly felt that their Christian faith was incompatible with their profession, and acted upon their feeling ('conversi fugiunt ducis impia castra, reliquunt clypeos, faleras, telaque cruenta, confessi gaudent Christi portare triumphos'). In like manner, there were isolated cases of men refusing to take part in the pagan religious rites which the army practised. One of these is known to have taken place at Tangiers, where a centurion called Marcellus, during some ceremony of sacrifice in honour of the Emperor's birthday, suddenly threw off his military belt and declared that he was a soldier of Jesus Christ the eternal King. 'From this time,' he shouted, 'I cease to be a soldier of your emperors, and as for worshipping your gods of wood and stone, I scorn to do it; they are deaf and dumb idols.' For this breach of discipline he was arrested and beheaded (cf. T. Ruinart, Acta Primorum Martyrum, Amsterdam, 1713, p. 343 f.). Marcellus suffered under Maximian and so did the Christian soldiers of the Thebaic legion (i.e. from Thebais, in Upper Egypt), which is said to have been twice decimated for refusing to participate in some pagan rite; both officers and men died for thus incurring the charge of insubordination.

Again, what were Christians in the army to do when they were ordered to take part in the arrest and even in the execution of Christian civilians during a persecution? This task often fell to soldiers. Indeed, it was one of their temptations to harshness and extortion (see above, p. 653). Christians who desired to avoid persecution could bribe soldiers, as Tertullian implies (de Fuga, 12: 'Tu autem pro eo pacisceris cum delatore vel milite . . . quem coram toto mundo Christus emit. . . . Quid enim dicit ille concussor? Da mihi pecuniam'). A Christian soldier would not be likely to take bribes from a cowardly Christian civilian, and it would be dangerous, if not impossible, for him to connive at the escape or exemption of his fellow-believers. What then was he to do? Military discipline left the troops no alternative but to obey such a distasteful command. And yet how could they as Christians participate in the punishment of their fellow-Christians? Eusebius describes one case, during the fierce Decian persecution of the Church at Alexandria (HE vi. 41. 22 f.). Four or five legionaries standing beside the tribunal attracted the attention of the court by the marks of violent disapprobation^{*} which they made when a Christian prisoner seemed on the point of recanting. Without waiting to be arrested, 'they ran forward to the presiding magistrate and confessed proudly that they were Christians.' This encouraged the civilian Christians who were awaiting their trial. The legionaries themselves were executed; but, as Dionysius the Alexandrian bishop, from whom Eusebius quotes the story, is careful to add, their martyrdom was a triumph for their God (Θραυβευοντος αυτοις ενδελως τοῦ θεοῦ; cf. 2 Co 2¹⁴). Half a century earlier, when Perpetua and Felicitas were tortured to a horrible death at Carthage in A.D. 203, a humane soldier, Pudens, who was in charge of them was so impressed by ^{*} Germanicus cheered on his troops to 'follow the Roman birds [i.e. the eagles], the special deities of the legions' ('propria legionum numina' [Tac. Ann. ii. 17]).

^{*} Rufinus, in translating this, expands it, in order to suggest that they tried by signs to encourage the hesitating prisoner.

their conduct that he became a Christian (Passio S. Perpetuae, 9, 16). Whether he remained a soldier or not, we are not informed. He was by nature a kind man, like Julius the officer who had charge of St. Paul (see above, p. 653), but Pudens advanced from humane feeling to faith. He did not suffer with the two women and Saturus, however. The Passio closes with Saturus, on the eve of his own death, encouraging Pudens to believe with all his heart. There is no claim made that he came forward to seal his confession alongside of his prisoners. But this infectious courage sometimes caught up a soldier. When Potamiana, the beautiful girl-martyr of Alexandria, was being led away to be burned, e.g. (Eus. HE vi. 5), the Roman officer who was in charge of the prisoner chivalrously protected her from the coarse violence of the mob. In gratitude for his kindness, she told him that she would ask her God, after she died, to reward him. Shortly afterwards Basilides, the officer, declined to take one of the usual military oaths on the ground that he was a Christian. He attributed his conversion to visions of the woman whom he had watched dying for her Lord, and was beheaded for his own confession. Another case occurred during the Decian persecution at Alexandria (Eus. HE vi. 41. 16), when a soldier called Besas checked the riotous mob round the martyrs and was beheaded promptly. The probability is that he was already a Christian, like his five fellow-soldiers of the Second Trajan legion (see above), but the story leaves it a fair question whether he was not suddenly converted by the bearing of the prisoners.

Another case may be selected. Writing in A.D. 250-251 (Ep. 39), Cyprian warmly commends Celerinus as 'the leader in the battle of our own day, the foremost of Christ's soldiers to advance (antesignanus),'* a man who, although racked and tortured, defeated the devil his enemy by his constancy. He had prevailed, says Lucian, one of his Carthaginian friends (Cyprian, Ep. 22), 'against the chief Snake, the quartermaster (metatorem) of antichrist'—the metatores (cf. Lipsius, op. cit., p. 300 f.) being the advance-party who laid out the camp.

Cyprian's comment is: 'In the case of a servant of God, the glory of the wounds constitutes a victory.' Celerinus came, on both sides of his family, from a military household. Not only had his grandmother been a martyr, but 'his two uncles, on the father's and the mother's side, Laurentius and Exnatus, once fought themselves in the armies of the world, and, true, spiritual soldiers of God as they were, overthrew the devil by confessing Christ, thereby winning palms and crowns from the Lord.'

These two Christian soldiers had not renounced their profession. They suffered rather than renounce Christ, but at the time of their martyrdom they were still in the army.

The difficulty of reconciling Christianity with military service also met recruits. One case has been preserved, which occurred in 295 in Numidia, where a certain Maximilianus, the son of a veteran, declined to enlist on the ground that he was a Christian: 'I cannot fight, for I am a Christian.' Militare is for him the same thing as malefacere. 'Non milito saeculo sed milito deo meo.' In spite of all threats the youth refused to do his duty, and the recruiting authorities, who behaved with considerable patience, had no alternative except to order his execution for disloyalty (Ruinart, p. 340 f.). He is reminded that there are Christians already in the army, but that does not remove his scruples: 'Ipsi sciunt quod ipsis expediat.'

* The antesignani were the picked men who fought in the front rank, originally in front of the standards (see Livy's account, xiii. 5). Calvin uses the same metaphor in his note on 1 Ti 118 ('militiae nomine subindicat certandum esse. Atque in universum piis id convenit: proprie tamen Christianis doctoribus, qui sunt velut antesignani aut duces').

We may sum up the evidence thus. The available data for the 3rd cent. go to prove that, if some Christians left or tried to leave the army, others found it quite possible to remain; if some had conscientious objections to entering the legions, others enlisted of their own accord. Naturally, it is the cases which led to martyrdom that are chronicled. Instances of men who suffered in the army or for declining to join the army come repeatedly to light. But their number must not be exaggerated. It should be remembered that there was nothing to attract attention to the other class of Christian soldiers who, for one reason or another, never came up to the critical issue, who fought for their country either without raising the general question of war at all or after weighing the problem and deciding that a healthy conscience could not look at any other alternative than to serve in arms. How important a factor they were in the army by the end of the 3rd cent. may be gathered indirectly but decisively from the fact that they were more than once made the special or primary target of official persecution. Thus, Galerius, incited by his pagan mother, over-persuaded Diocletian, his colleague, to persecute Christians, and one circumstance which whetted the older man's wrath was that the presence of Christians was supposed to obstruct the pagan rites of divination; when some Christians who had to be present at the ceremony made the sign of the cross, the soothsayers at once blamed this for the failure of the rites. The persecution was specially directed against officers and the rank and file of the army (Lact. de Mort. Persecut. 10), who were ordered to offer sacrifice on penalty of dismissal from the service. At first, however, the attack on Christians in the army was not pushed home (cf. Eus. HE viii. 4); the authorities evidently found that their Christian officers and privates were too resolute and also too numerous to make a ruthless policy advisable. Only one or two cases of martyrdom occurred. But during the five years of the great persecution, from 303 onwards, the army contributed its martyrs to the roll-call of the Church, men like Dasius the private, who refused to take part in the revels of the Saturnalia (cf. F. Cumont, in Analecta Bollandiana, Brussels and Paris, 1897, xvi. 5 f.), Sebastian, an officer in the Praetorian Guard, who was shot to death by archers for declining to abandon his religion (cf. H. Delehaye, in ib. xvi. 209 f.), and Seleucus, either a veteran or one who had withdrawn from the army (Eus. de Mart. Pal. xi. 20-23), and who was put to death at Caesarea (further particulars in A. J. Mason, The Historic Martyrs of the Primitive Church, London, 1905, p. 203 f.). The (early 4th cent.) Acts of Callistratus (cf. F. C. Conybeare, *Monuments of Early Christianity*², London, 1896, p. 273 f.) also assign to the great persecution under Diocletian the martyrdom of that saint and forty-nine of his fellow-soldiers, either at Rome or at Constantinople.

'Early in 303 the Great Persecution was begun with the demolition of the Church at Nicomedia: and there was a tall young officer looking on with thoughts of his own, like Napoleon watching the riot of June 1792.*' But Constantine was not to get his chance, even three years later when he became one of the Caesars. It was only in 311 that the death of Galerius gave him the opportunity of crushing Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge in 312; even then the vision of the Cross did not definitely stamp the victorious general or the army as Christian, but the Christians and Constantine were drawing closer together, and their union was sealed by the final struggle with Licinius (A.D. 323), who suddenly committed himself to a fresh policy of repression against the Church, ordering all the Christians in his army to apostatize, on penalty of dismissal from the service. The sacrifice involved in this dismissal was serious, for, when a veteran received his honourable discharge (honesta missio), he not only received his bounty (see above, p. 655) but was generally made a Roman citizen, if he was not already enfranchised; he was also assigned land to settle upon as his own property. The mere prospect of the pay secured to him at the end of his service was a strong motive for adhering to the army, as Vegetius observes (ii. 20: 'Miles . . . qui sumptus suos scit apud signa depositos, de deserendo nihil cogitat, magis diligit signa, pro illis in acie fortius dimicat'). We are hardly surprised, therefore, to discover that some of those who allowed themselves to be cashiered rather than offer the pagan sacrifices, and who conscientiously gave up their military belts, reconsidered their position afterwards and by bribery regained their position in the army. It is their case that is decided by the Council of Nicæa (canon xii.), which ordered such soldiers, who had returned like dogs to their vomit (an echo of 2 P 2²²)—i.e. to serve in a pagan army fighting against Constantine, who was sympathetic to the Church—to undergo a prolonged penance. But no censure was passed on military service as such. Others were apparently treated with more rigour than dismissal from the service,* if the famous story (cf. Basil's 19th Homily, 'in Sanctos Quadraginta Martyres' of the Forty Soldiers of Sebaste is to be referred to this period. For declining to sacrifice, they were first plunged in an ice-cold lake, and then tortured to death. These heroes belonged to the famous Melitene legion, which had already Christian traditions (see above, p. 663), and it was to this legion that Polyenctes also belonged, although the 4th cent. Acts of this military martyr (cf. F. C. Conybeare, *Monuments of Early Christianity*², pp. 123-146) yield no authentic evidence for the period of his death. The martyrdom of Theodore, an officer in high command (ib., p. 217f.), is, however, definitely assigned to the period when Licinius was purging his army. Soldiers who had recanted under the terrible pressure of the Diocletian persecution formed a special item in the problem which the lapsi furnished to the Church (Epiph. Hær. lxviii. 2).

* H. M. Gwatkin, in Cambridge Medieval History, i. [Cambridge, 1911] 2.

It would be unjust to infer that the Christian soldiers who were not martyred were necessarily of inferior quality to their fellows. The Romans were not a persecuting people. Except on special occasions† of popular fury, they did not as a rule force the issue even on civilian Christians, and in the army, particularly on active service in the provinces, where men held together in face of a common enemy, there would seldom be any occasion or desire to throw a legionary into difficulties by raising the question of his religious beliefs. The enforcement of even an imperial edict depended largely on the local authorities. It was not uniformly put into execution throughout the army, and this explains partly why some soldiers suffered while others seem to have been exempted. How far Christian soldiers even acted as missionaries of the faith we can only surmise. The devotees of Mithra in the legions certainly carried their worship with them, and Mithraeums were erected all over the Empire where the army had their headquarters. Did Christian soldiers push the propaganda of their faith also? Was it to them, or to traders, that the early introduction of Christianity

* The 18th Homily of Basil ('in Gordium Martyrem') is on a centurion who withdrew from the army rather than soil his faith by offering sacrifice. But he was not martyred for that.

† In a general persecution, e.g., like that of Decius (A.D. 250), soldiers as well as civilians are expressly said to have suffered at Alexandria (Eus. HE vii. 11. 20).

into Britain was due—the introduction of which Tertullian speaks so proudly by the end of the 2nd cent. (adv. Jud. 7)? In our present state of knowledge, this is a question which can only be asked. Probabilities are not evidence, and there are no reliable data to support even inferences that might serve as an answer.

8. The practical solution of the problem.—It is only upon a generous estimate of the scope of this Dictionary that the survey has been carried down even this length; but for the sake of completeness a word may be added upon the final solution of the problem, so far as it was finally settled, for the early Church. The open adhesion of Constantine to Christianity, after his defeat of Licinius, entirely altered the focus of the problem. When the head of the army had become a Christian, and especially when he used the nails which were alleged to have been used for the cross to fix his armour (Socrates, HE i. 17: τοὺς ἡλούς δε, οἱ ταῖς χερσὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ κατα τοὺν σταυρὸν ἐνεπάγησαν, ὁ Κωνσταντῖνος λαβὼν . . . χαλκίνοὺς τε καὶ περικεφαλαιὰν ποιήσας, ἐν τοῖς πολέμοις ἐκεκρίτη), a whole series of difficulties was removed; theoretically, a number of the objections urged during the pagan regime fell to the ground. The army had received a semi-consecration. Christians were no longer exposed to pagan seduction in the army. A passing wave of reaction might alter the situation under Julian,* but this was temporary, and the position after Constantine was in the main established. The only scruple which Christians could now feel about military service was with regard to bloodshed. Was war, even under the auspices of a Christian Emperor, and in defence of the State, permissible or advisable for members of the Church? The question had reduced itself to this. Yet, at the same time, it was soon to broaden out; for, when the Church and the State were allied, their common interests were sometimes bound to make war assume the position of a holy war.

As early as 314 a Council of the Church in the West seems to have been anxious to prove the loyalty of Christians to the army, in view of Constantine's sympathies. The third canon of the Council of Arles runs thus: 'De his qui arma projiciunt in pace, placuit abstinere eos a comunione.' The difficulty of the phraseology was felt at an early period, as is plain from the v.l. proelio, which would mean that soldiers who proved cowards in face of the enemy were to be excommunicated. But would they have lived to be excommunicated? The army would surely have dealt with them before ever the Church could. The canon does not refer either to this or, as even Hefele thought, to gladiators. It appears to be a repudiation of Christian soldiers who gave way to their scruples about war; since the Church now enjoyed 'peace,'† under Constantine, there was no reason for this desertion, and all such persons were debarred from communion. The adhesion of the Church to the State is complete, on this interpretation of the canon. It is all the more likely that the declaration of Arles is to be read in this

* Militiae cingulum non dari nisi immolantibus iubet (Rufinus, Eus. HE x. 33). Martin of Tours left the army rather than accept a donativum before battle against the Gauls (Sulpicius Severus, Vita S. Martini, 4). He also used army discipline once to enforce the argument for celibacy. An ex-soldier who had become a monk desired to have his wife beside him, pleading that she had vowed as well as he to be a soldier of Christ, i.e. to abstain from sexual relations. Martin asked if he had ever seen women standing in the ranks of an army drawn up for battle. The ex-soldier blushed at the reproach, and admitted that this was unheard of. Well, said Martin, in the Christian army the soldiers must keep separate from the women too (Sulp. Severus, Dial. ii. 11).

† Or, 'in pace' may refer to periods when no actual war was proceeding, and when it was less dishonourable and dangerous to leave the army. A Roman army in peace built bridges and roads, and did general repairing work, besides police-duties.

light, as the Western Church would be anxious at this period to lend its moral support to a general like Constantine.

Constantine himself acted afterwards upon a broad policy of toleration. He (Eus. Vita Const. ii. 33) left it to Christian officers to decide whether they would be reinstated in the army from which they had been ejected on religious grounds by Licinius, or would accept an honourable discharge from the service. The choice lay with themselves. He would not force any Christian to serve against his will. This made it more easy for the Church to form a conclusion, but it did not help matters. The question was still left to the individual, and we have few data for determining how far it was felt to be a question at all. Now that the scruple about idolatry had fallen, the scruple about bloodshed became vital. This had always been recognized, even in army regulations; the pious sacrifice or lustration of the army at the close of a campaign was both Semitic (see Nu 31¹⁹), after a ruthless massacre of prisoners) and Roman—though W. Warde Fowler (The Religious Experience of the Roman People, London, 1911, p. 217) cannot find any trace of it except in 'a statement of Festus that the soldiers who followed the general's car in a triumph wore laurel wreaths "ut quasi purgati a caede humana intrarent urbem." This scruple about the taint of bloodshed now appears in Christian ecclesiastical rules. On the one hand, there must have been a feeling abroad in certain circles which led up to the attitude adopted in the later Canons of Hippolytus and Testament of our Lord, not earlier than the end of the 4th cent., which propound a stringent ecclesiastical discouragement of the army as a sphere for earnest Christians. The Testament is more sympathetic to teachers than to soldiers; the latter are not only forbidden to shed blood and bidden to be content with their pay (cf. Lk 3¹⁴),* but, 'if they wish to be baptized in the Lord, they must give up military service absolutely' (ii.). In the same way, the Tertullian-spirit dominates the Canons of Hippolytus (13, 14), which prohibit a soldier from wearing chaplet or crown, and exclude him from the sacrament till he has done severe and long penance for any blood he may have shed. But these extreme attempts did not represent the normal temper of the Church, as is plain from their later editions: in the Canons of Hippolytus the sentence of the 14th Canon (71-73) that 'no Christian is to go and become a soldier' is qualified (74: 'nisi sit coactus a duce'; cf. TU vi. iv. [1891] 82) afterwards by the insertion of the clause, 'unless he is obliged to do so'; that is, a Christian is allowed to join the army if he is called up by conscription, but he is not allowed to enlist voluntarily. The profession is discouraged for members of the Church, principally on the ground that it involves bloodshed. Similarly, in the later Coptic version of the Testamentum Domini, the claim that a catechumen must leave the army before he can be baptized is omitted, although Christians are still prohibited from joining the legions of their own accord.

Over against these extreme views we may set not only the distinctly loyalist tone of Eusebius, but the extreme appeal of a writer like Firmicus Maternus, in the middle of the 4th cent., who urges the sons of Constantine to root out paganism forcibly. The weeds which he has in view particularly are Eastern cults like those of Isis, Mithra, and Magna Mater, which had hitherto seemed to many Romans to possess the same origin and aim as Christianity itself. Firmicus Maternus regards them as the 16th cent. reformers regarded the Mass. He advocates, for the first time in the history of the Church, a holy war (de Errore profanarum religionum, 16 ff.). Paganism requires a rough surgery, 'et, si conualuerit malum, et ignis adhibetur et ferrum.' 'O Constantius and Constans,' he cries, 'most sacred emperors, only a little more action and the devil will lie prostrate, under the blow of your laws, the dreadful plague of idolatry will vanish and perish; raise the standard (vexillum) of the Faith, you for whom the Deity has reserved this honour: raise the banner of the Law for men to reverence . . . may weal and bliss accrue to the state, because you have laid low the enemies' armies amid heaps of slain victims. Blessed are you also, for God has made you participators in His glory and His will; and, out of kindness to the people, Christ has granted you with your own hands to destroy idolatry and demolish the shrines of the profane. He conquers evil spirits with spiritual arms, you have conquered earthly evils. Raise the trophies of victory . . . you have won the battle for man's salvation, Christ Himself fighting in the conflict' (20). Firmicus Maternus believes strongly in a Lord of hosts. When a Roman army in the old days came back from victory over foreign foes, it had to march through the Porta triumphalis, and Fowler (p. 217) suggests that this custom 'most likely had as its original meaning the separation of the host from the profane world in which it had been moving.' To Firmicus Maternus an army which had been putting down idolatry required no such purging from profane influences; its task had been high and holy. Yet his contemporary Basil, who succeeded Eusebius in the bishopric of Caesarea, looked more askance at Christian soldiers. In the first of his 'canonical letters' to Amphilochius, the bishop of Iconium, he would exclude from communion for three full years all soldiers who retire when their term of service is over: 'Our fathers did not consider homicide in war to be homicide, presumably because they wished to make allowance for men who fought on behalf of chastity and true religion. Perhaps it is well, however, to counsel that those whose hands are not clean should only* abstain from communion for three years' (Ep. clxxxviii. 13). He had already (ib. 8) discussed the difference between intentional and unintentional homicide, and argued that all attacks on other people in battle are intentional, since soldiers fight to kill their enemies; such acts are ranked by Basil as murders, on the same plane of guilt as deaths caused by robbers and poisoners. This is the plea against war which we have already noticed (p. 662 f.). Basil seems to have considered it possible for soldiers to avoid bloodshed, but this cannot have been a common experience, for most of the legionaries must have seen active service in his day. He himself had correspondents in the army. One of his short letters (cvi.) is to a soldier-friend, evidently high up in the service. 'I have learned,' says the bishop, 'to know one who proves that even in military service it is possible to maintain absolute love to God, and that one should distinguish a Christian not by his style of dress but by his temper of soul. It was a great delight to meet you, and I am now extremely glad whenever I recollect you.' Basil's ecclesiastical opinion on war is coloured by his strict asceticism, like his objection to lending money on interest, and his restriction of the ordinary practice of discipline for the sacrament was never acted upon by the Church. It is significant that even

* This precedent of John the Baptist has come up so repeatedly in the course of our survey that we may recall one of the ironies and grim coincidences of history, viz. the fact that, when the turbulent citizens of Florence turned to Christianity, they converted the temple of Mars into the Baptistry of John!

* 'Only'—because intentional homicides were to be kept from communion for twenty years (Ep. ccxvii. 56). The soldier gets off with three.

he, however, does not venture to brand military service as unchristian. Asceticism led then and afterwards to extravagant and heretical developments, but Basil had enough good sense to prevent him from declining to bracket 'Christian' and 'soldier' together.

The problem of the army at this period was complicated by the increasing number of mercenaries who were pouring into the legions. 'The military spirit had almost died out among the Romans. Ever since the 3rd cent. the military profession had been declining in the public esteem. Recruits were branded on entering the service, as if they were slaves in an ergastulum. The aversion to military service appears to have been growing.'* Efforts were naturally made to avert the lowering and paganizing of the legions. By A.D. 416 Theodosius II. had strictly forbidden any pagan to enter the army; it was to be composed entirely of Christian soldiers, and uncontaminated by heathen recruits. The ideal was 'a lovely company'; only Theodosius was not a Cromwell, and the supply of honest and godly men was inadequate. Now, if men occasionally mutilated themselves rather than enter the army, it was natural that Christian scruples should also operate against the service, when service had become otherwise unpopular. The steady verdict was given by Augustine in the opening of the 5th century. On this, as on many other points of dogma and practice, his opinion came to be virtually authoritative. It was not an abstract decision. He was consulted by some officers on the matter, among others by Boniface, the distinguished military governor of N. Africa,† and his correspondence with them presents his mature opinion. Intrinsically, he holds, Christianity does not forbid military service; otherwise, John the Baptist would not have allowed the soldiers to remain in the army.‡ Besides, think not only of David but of the centurions whom Jesus and Peter praised. In the present situation of mankind some must fight against the barbarians in defence of order and justice; every one has his own gift from God, and military service is at least a subdivision of labour in the one kingdom of the Lord. He repudiates militarism; few writers in the early Church speak more sternly of the callousness, the havoc, and the senseless retaliation which war may breed; war for war's sake is wrong. Also, even in a just war, ferocity and treachery are inconsistent with a Christian soldier's duty ('When a promise is made, it has to be kept even with the enemy against whom you are fighting'), as he tells Boniface. He would have heartily agreed with Seneca, who canonized Scipio Africanus, 'non quia magnos exercitus duxit, . . . sed ob egregiam moderationem pietatemque' (Ep. Mor. lxxxvi.). He emphasizes the need of personal religion, in view of the many temptations incident to military life. In short, the Christian soldier now becomes a definite type, more definite than the εὐσεβὴς στρατιώτης of Ac 10⁷. This attitude was widely accepted. What Augustine did was (i.) to re-affirm not only the legitimacy but, for certain men, the duty of serving in the army, and (ii.) to suggest some of the principles which should determine war. He includes among just wars (in which, he admits, terrible suffering is caused [de Civ. Dei, xix. 7]) even a war for the purpose of humbling some arrogant power—the 'debellare superbos' of Vergil's time. He assigns a paternal authority to the Roman State, in virtue of which war may be a disciplinary measure for the good of other peoples. But into the details and consequences of this Augustinian philosophy and moralization of war we cannot enter. The relevant point here is to note that Augustine's opinions, expressed incidentally (a) in some of his commentaries like the sixth book of the Questionum in Heptateuchum, or (b) in his correspondence with Christian officers and officials, or (c) in the treatise c. Faustum (xxii. 74 ff.), possess a significance which attaches to no individual judgment prior to himself, and for the first time present a considered judgment upon war from the Christian standpoint. They express the central good sense of the Church, which declines to identify Christianity with either the negation or the glorification of warfare.

(a) In the commentary on Joshua (vi. 10) he claims that a righteous war, and a righteous war alone, justifies the use of stratagems and spies such as Joshua employed. 'Righteous wars may be defined as wars to avenge wrongs, when a nation or state has to be attacked for neglecting either to make reparation for some misdeeds committed by its own citizens or to restore what has been wrongfully seized.'

(b) The correspondence with Marcellinus, the Imperial commissioner, and with Boniface elaborates Augustine's judgment on war from a Christian standpoint. In a long letter (Ep. cxxxviii.) to the former on various doctrinal and practical difficulties, including the question of the compatibility of the Sermon on the Mount with effective citizenship, he uses Lk 31³ to prove that the Christian religion did not prohibit military service. If all soldiers—and even citizens—would live up to these gospel-demands, there would be no fear of weakness to the State (cxxxviii. 3. 15). He repeats to Boniface (Ep. clxxxix.) this argument from John the Baptist's rule, and adds that war is only a lamentable necessity, a last resort, a means to secure peace, not an end in itself. 'Peace ought to be your desire, war only your necessity. . . . peace is never sought for the purpose of stirring up war, but war is waged in order to win peace.* Hence, even in warfare, be a peacemaker, that you may, by conquering your assailants, bring them over to the advantages of peace. . . . Let it be necessity, not your desire, which slays the foe in fight.' This is a Christian replica of the spirit which prompted Lucan's (ix. 199) famous praise of Pompey: 'Praetulit arma togae, sed pacem armatus amavit.' It is civilians who are truculent more often than those who have actually to fight, but Augustine knew that even generals needed a word on moderation in the hour of victory. When Boniface, after his wife's death, had almost resolved in a fit of depression to quit the public service and become a monk, Augustine (Ep. cccx. 3) dissuaded him, pointing out that by forcibly restraining the invaders of N. Africa he could render far better service to the Church, which would then be protected from these barbarian hordes. The supreme obstacle to a good life, as he says, is not militia but malitia, not the army but iniquity. Thus Augustine not only indicates the army as a profession for Christian laymen,† but actually insists on military efficiency no less than on self-restraint in a general (cf. Cicero, de Offic. i. xi. 35). A Christian soldier must regard his profession as a 'gift from God,' in the sense of 1 Co 7⁷, and he must therefore use his gift to the fullest advantage for God.

(c) It is 'a passion for doing injury, cruel revenge, a fierce and implacable temper, savage fury, the lust of power, and things like these, that sum up what is rightly reprobated in war. It is generally to punish these crimes rightly that good men undertake war at all and carry it on, in obedience to God or some lawful authority, against violent opposition.' This had been, of course, the aim of the ideal Hebrew monarch; he wielded the sword (Ps 45³⁻⁴) 'on behalf of loyal piety, humility, and justice.' But Augustine refers to a NT argument. He quotes: 'Render to Caesar what is Caesar's and to God what is God's.' Then he adds, 'And tribute money is paid for the very purpose of providing pay for the soldiers who are needed to fight. . . . The natural order of things, which promotes the peace of mankind, lays it down that a ruler has the authority

* Samuel Dill, Roman Society in the Last Century of the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 196.

† Cf. J. Moffatt, 'St. Augustine's Advice to an Army Officer,' in Exp. 8th ser., xi. [1916] 409.

‡ This passage is referred to in the prayer of the (13th cent.?) Benedictio novi militis, the bishop blessing the sword against heretics, pagans, and plotters, and then bidding the recruit 'esto miles pacificus, strenuus, fidelis, et deo devotus.'

* As Cicero had already urged (de Offic. i. xliii. 80: 'War should be undertaken in such a way as to make it plain that the only aim is peace'; i. xi. 35: 'Wars have to be undertaken simply in order to secure freedom from harm in peace, but, once the victory has been gained, those who have not been cruel and savage in warfare are to be spared').

† Eusebius is the first (Dem. Evang. i. 8) to assert that fighting in a just cause is one of the secular avocations which, like trade and family-life, are not permissible to the apostolic spirit of the clergy; but he makes this remark quite incidentally. It is only in the so-called Apost. Canons (5th cent.?) that the clergy are forbidden to take military service, and even there it is pluralities that are condemned ('any bishop or presbyter or deacon engaging in military service and claiming to hold both offices, that of a Roman official and of the Christian priesthood, shall be deposed. For what is Caesar's is Caesar's, what is God's is God's,' 83).

and ability to undertake war, while soldiers must serve in the execution of military orders on behalf of the common peace and safety. It is wrong to doubt that war is righteous when it is undertaken in obedience to God, to overawe or crush or master human arrogance. . . . There is no power except from God (Ro 13¹), by His command or permission; consequently a righteous man who happens to be serving under even a sacrilegious king, is justified in fighting under his monarch's orders '—for, even when these orders are not obviously just, the responsibility does not lie with the soldier. Such is the argument of the treatise against Faustus. Ever since the fulfilment of Ps 72¹¹ ('All kings of the earth shall worship him, all nations shall serve him') in Christ, who is the true Solomon or Peace, 'Christian emperors, putting entire confidence in Christ, have won splendid victories over sacrilegious foes who relied on the rites of idols and demons.' The entire argument turns upon the objection raised by the Manichæans, as earlier by the Marcionites, to the use of force by the OT God.

LITERATURE.—In 1908 Karl Kautsky published a monograph on Der Ursprung des Christentums (Stuttgart), a so-called 'historical investigation,' in which (especially p. 334 f.) he attempted to prove that Jesus had been a Messianic leader of revolt, who had really been put to death for His seditious and fanatical Galilean uprising, and that the failure of this movement led to a pacific reinterpretation of His career, which in the NT has replaced but not entirely obliterated the originally militant aspect of His gospel. The reply to this unhistorical restatement of primitive Christianity came from Hans Windisch in his Der messianische Krieg und das Urchristentum, Tübingen, 1909. In addition to the literature already cited in the course of this article, the following more or less recent monographs on the relation of early Christians to warfare and the Roman army may be mentioned as specially valuable: A. Bigelmair, Die Beteiligung der Christen am öffentlichen Leben in vorconstantinischer Zeit, Munich, 1902, pp. 164–201; K. H. E. de Jong, Dienstverreiening bij de oude christenen, Leiden, 1905; A. Harnack, Militia Christi: die christliche Religion und der Soldatenstand in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Tübingen, 1905; P. Batiffol, essay in the volume of collected essays entitled L'Eglise et la Guerre, Paris, 1913; some pages (pp. 24–25) in E. Le Blant, Les Persécuteurs et les martyrs aux premiers siècles de notre ère, do., 1893, as well as in his earlier Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule, do., 1856, i. 81–87; J. B. Mullinger, art. in DCA ii. 2023–2030; and H. B. Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, London, 1906, pp. 181–188. The European war has naturally produced a crop of pamphlets and studies, which occasionally discuss the early Church's attitude to war in general, but seldom to any scientific profit; the large majority, whether written by pacifists or by patriots, suffer from an unhistorical imagination, and for the most part discover evidence for conclusions already formed. C. W. Emmet's essay on 'War and the Ethics of the NT,' in The Faith and the War, London, 1915, is a notable exception.

JAMES MOFFATT.

WASHING.—See LAYER, PURIFICATION.

WATCHING.—If waiting (q.v.) rather points to the expectation of a specific experience or event, watching indicates a general attitude of alertness on the part of the Christian believer, in view of actual or imminent tests of his spiritual life. It is a favourite word of our Lord (γρηγορέω, Mt 24⁴², 43, 25¹³, 26³⁸, 40, 41, Mk 13³⁵, 14³⁴, 37, 38, Lk 12³⁷, 39), employed in inculcating the duty of vigilance (frequently combined with prayer) in regard either to the sudden day or hour when the Son of man shall arrive or to some actual crisis or trial (especially the agony of Gethsemane), or as a preparation for some impending temptation. In Ac 20³¹ it is found in the exhortation by St. Paul to the elders at Miletus, in view of the apostasy that has taken place or may be repeated under the influence of 'fierce wolves.' The duty of alertness as opposed to a slack or somnolent spirit is proclaimed in 1 Th 5⁶, 1 Co 16¹³, Col 4[–] (where J. Moffatt, *The New Testament, a New Translation*³, London, 1914, p. 252, translates the verb 'maintain your zest for prayer by thanksgiving'), 1 P 5³, Rev 3[–] 16¹⁵. With these may be compared a passage in Ignatius, ad Polyc. i. 3, where the duty is pointed by reference to the ἀκοιμητον πνεῦμα of the Christian. In two of the above cited passages (1 Th 5⁶ and 1 P 5³) the verb 'to watch' is combined with νηφω, 'to be sober,' which in 2 Ti 4³ and 1 P 4[–] is translated in AV as 'be watchful' or 'watch': νηφω means, however, to be temperate or sober (originally, to abstain from wine) and conveys the sense of calmness or coolness prepared for any emergency and arising out of abstinence from what will excite rather than the more general self-control of ἐγκράτεια and σωφροσύνη.

To sum up, watchfulness or watching indicates that the Christian is alert or vigilant, in order to defend himself against a spiritual foe or to be properly prepared for any surprise or sudden change in his circumstances, and above all in order that his fellowship with God in prayer may be undistracted and efficacious.

R. MARTIN POPE.

WATER (ὕδωρ).—In the NT, after the Gospels, water is nearly always used in a figurative or symbolical sense.

1. The words employed by Christ in Ac 1⁵ seem to echo Mt 3¹¹, Mk 1⁸, Lk 3¹⁶, Jn 1³³. Water was the element in which John baptized his penitents, and the best that he had; but he was profoundly conscious of its inadequacy, and eagerly expectant of an altogether different kind of baptism, to be introduced by the Messiah. It has been contended that the πνεῦμα ἁγίων and the πυρ which he desired were the sweeping wind and the destroying fire of judgment (so, e.g., A. B. Bruce, EGT, 'Matthew,' London, 1897, p. 84), but it is more likely that what he longed for was the life-giving breath and the purifying fire of the Messianic era. If we must not read into his words the Pentecostal and similar experiences, we need not eliminate from them the highest prophetic ideals. When Christ confirms His forerunner's distinction between baptism in water and baptism in the Holy Spirit (Ac 1⁵), He certainly regards the latter not as a blast of judgment but as the supreme gift of Divine grace; and Peter, who 'remembered the word of the Lord,' and no doubt the tone in which He uttered it, quotes it not as a menace but as an evangelical promise (11¹⁶). Water is referred to in connexion with the baptism of the eunuch (8³⁸, 39) and of Cornelius (10⁴⁴). In the latter case the baptism in water is the immediate sequel to the earliest baptism of the Gentiles with the Holy Spirit, which was attended with the rapturous utterances known as glossolalia.

2. In Eph 5²⁶ the Church is said to be cleansed by the washing (or laver, τῷ λουτρῷ) of water with the word, baptism being regarded as the seal and symbol of a spiritual experience which is mediated by faith in the gospel.

3. The writer of Hebrews (9¹⁹) says that water was used along with blood—either to prevent coagulation or as a symbol of purity—at the institution of the ancient covenant, a detail which is not mentioned in Ex 24³⁵. It is a striking fact that in his review of the Levitical ordinances this writer never quotes the LXX phrase ὕδωρ παρτυροῦ, 'water of sprinkling,' which occurs four times in Nu 19, but coins in its place the phrase αἷμα παρτυροῦ, 'blood of sprinkling' (He 12²⁴). It is his conviction that, while the blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of a heifer (according to a Scripture which he does not question) cleanse the flesh (9¹³), and while water purifies the body (10²), only the blood of Christ can sprinkle the heart from an evil conscience (9[–] 10²²). He does not, as F. Delitzsch (Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, ii. [Edinburgh, 1870] 179) thinks, suggest that the water of baptism has cleansing virtue because 'sacramentally impregnated' with the blood of Christ. Just as he altogether ignores the sacramental value of the Levitical rites which he enumerates, it is not his task to give a philosophy of the Christian sacraments. His distinctive doctrine, to the enforcement of which he devotes his whole strength, is that, while all ritual is at the best but outward and symbolic, the spiritual appropriation of Christ and His atonement by faith has virtue to penetrate and purify the whole personality, beginning with the heart.

4. Peter sees a parallel between the water of Noah's flood and that of baptism (1 P 3²⁰), and Paul finds a mystical and sacramental meaning in the sea and the cloud, in both of which the Israelites may be said to have been baptized into Moses (1 Co 10²).

5. It is the teaching of John that Jesus Christ came by (ὁδῷ) water and blood, not with (ἐν) the water only, but with the water and the blood (1 Jn 5⁶). Historically the baptism and death of the Messiah were crises in His activity, occurring once for all at the beginning and the end of His ministry, but spiritually He ever abides with and in the water and the blood, which are 'the two wells of life in His Church, His baptism being repeated in every fresh act of baptism, and His blood of atonement never failing in the communion cup' (H. J. Holtzmann, Handkomm. zum NT, Freiburg i. B., 1891, ii. 236).

6. James (3¹¹⁻¹²) illustrates the moral law that the same heart cannot overflow in both blessings and curses by the natural law that the same fountain cannot send forth both sweet water and bitter—a variation on Christ's words in Mt 7^{16, 17}.

7. The prophet of the Revelation (recalling Ezk 1²⁴ 43²) once compares the voice of Christ (1¹⁵), and twice that of the great multitude of the redeemed (1²⁴ 19⁶), to the voice of many waters, in the one case thinking perhaps of the music of waves quietly breaking, in the other of the thunder of great billows crashing, around the Ægean island which was his place of exile. He constantly uses fountains of water, and clear rivers, as symbols of spiritual life and blessing. Per contra, he imagines 'the angel of the waters' turning Rome's rivers and fountains of water into blood (16⁴); for, as she has shed the blood of saints like water, it is but just that she should have to drink blood—a grim species of poetic justice. The great star Wormwood falls in Earth's sweet waters, turning them to wormwood, and those who drink of them die because they are so bitter (8⁹⁻¹¹). The waters of the Euphrates are to be dried up, like the Jordan before Joshua, that the powers of the East—Parthia and her confederates—may come to the invasion of the Roman Empire (16¹²). The great harlot, Rome, sits proudly upon many waters—ruling peoples and nations by many rivers and seas (17^{1, 15})—but her day of judgment and dethronement is in sight (17¹).

JAMES STRAHAN.

WAY (ὁδός).—A striking peculiarity of the Book of the Acts is that in several passages the Christian religion itself is called 'the Way.' Saul, if he finds at Damascus 'any that were of the Way' (ἐάν τις εὕρῃ τῆς ὁδοῦ ὄντας), is to bring them to Jerusalem (9²). 'Some were . . . speaking evil of the Way'; 'there arose no small stir concerning the Way'; 'I persecuted this Way unto the death'; 'Felix, having more exact knowledge concerning the Way' (19^{8, 23, 224, 242}). The idiom, though found only in the Acts, must have been familiar. We do not wonder that a word lending itself so easily to figurative use should be applied to religion as frequently as is the case in Scripture, and that Christianity should be called pre-eminently 'the Way.' It is an interesting parallel that in Taoism, the second indigenous religion of China, Tao means 'Way'; Tao-teh-king = 'Book of the Way of Virtue.' In the NT we are familiar with 'way of the Lord,' 'of salvation,' 'of God,' 'of truth'; 'I am the way' (Jn 14⁶); 'the narrow and the broad way' (Mt 7¹³⁴). The phrase is even more common in the OT than in the NT, as a reference to the art. in HDB (iv. 899) will show. It is specially frequent in the Psalter: 'The way of the righteous . . . the way of the wicked' (Ps 1⁶). Other notable passages are Is 30²¹ 35⁸. The Didache, an early Christian manual, expatiates on the way of life and the way of death. The phrase seems to suggest the active, practical aspects of religion—God's dealings with man, man's conduct towards God and his fellows. The commandments, worship, prayer, holiness, repentance, all have an ethical side and are even ethical in essence. J. Butler's remark that religion is a practical thing is quite in the spirit of the whole of Scripture, as seen in the Prophets, the Sermon on the Mount, the Parables, and the Epistles. 'Every one . . . which heareth these words of mine, and doeth them . . . and doeth them not' (Mt 7^{24, 26}); 'Inasmuch as ye did it . . . did it not' (Mt 25^{40, 45}). The proof of love is keeping the commandments. The teaching of Paul and Peter, John and James is no less practical than that of the Master.

LITERATURE.—Commentaries on Ac 9²; A. E. Garvie, HDB, art. 'Way.' J. S. BANKS.

WEALTH.—There seem to be in the NT two main conceptions about wealth and the wealthy: the first that wealth and the desire for wealth are dangerous to the moral and spiritual life, the second that the wealthy as a class are wicked. It is possible that these two conceptions are related to each other, but it is also possible that the conception of the rich as normally an ungodly class represents some special tradition of the later Judaism.

There are not many references to the subject in the Gospels, but the few there are are very emphatic. In the exposition of the Parable of the Sower our Lord speaks of the 'deceitfulness of riches' as one of those things which 'choke the word' and render it unfruitful (Mk 4¹⁹, Mt 13²²; cf. Lk 8¹⁴), and this conception finds a dramatic illustration in the story of the rich young ruler, whose refusal to give up his wealth and follow Christ leads our Lord to say, 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!', and 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God' (Mk 10^{23, 25}, Mt 19^{23, 24}, Lk 18^{4, 25}). To these sayings of our Lord is probably related the phrase, 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon' (Mt 6²⁴, Lk 16¹³). It is alongside of these passages in the Gospels that we should place the treatment of wealth and of the desire for wealth in 1 Timothy. The desire for wealth is dangerous to men, and 'the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil' (1 Ti 6⁹⁻¹⁰); the wealthy are warned not to be high-minded, or to put their trust in riches, but to use their wealth in good works (1 Ti 6¹⁷⁻¹⁹). In these passages of the Synoptic Gospels and of the Pastoral Epistles we have, then, no condemnation of the wealthy, or of wealth as intrinsically evil, but warnings against the great dangers that attend its possession.

In the Epistle of St. James we have a somewhat different conception. Here the wealthy are treated as though they were normally wicked and enemies of the Christian community. God has chosen the poor, but the rich dishonour and set them at naught, and drag them before the judgment-seat, and 'blaspheme the honourable name by the which ye are called' (Ja 2⁵⁻⁷). And, again, the rich are warned of the judgment which is about to overtake them; they have oppressed and defrauded the labourers, and have killed the righteous man (Ja 5¹⁻⁶).

It is not very clear to which of these conceptions our Lord's words as reported in St. Luke's Gospel belong, 'Woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation! Woe unto you, ye that are full now! for ye shall hunger' (Lk 6^{24, 25}).

A. J. CARLYLE.

WEEK.—See TIME.

WHEAT (σῖτος, σιμῖδαλις). — Apart from the Gospels the only books in the NT which contain a reference to wheat are the Acts of the Apostles, St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, and the Apocalypse. The reference in Acts (27³⁸) requires no comment. The operation there alluded to completed that begun in v. 18. In 1 Co 15³⁷ it occurs in a simile introduced by St. Paul in his dissertation on the Resurrection. The general meaning of the passage is: Thou sowest not the body that shall appear—i.e. the bladed stem with ears of corn—but a naked grain. In Rev 6⁶, the Voice fixes the maximum price for the main food-stuffs. The denarius was the daily wage (cf. Mt 20²) and a χοῖνιξ of wheat the average daily allowance of the workman. Barley, being much cheaper, formed the main staple of food of the poor, and in NT times the proportionate value of these two different kinds of grain was probably as three to one as estimated here. The Greek measure χοῖνιξ was probably something under two pints. The proclamation is addressed to the nameless rider who represents Dearth, and is a prohibition of famine prices.

In the great dirge over the fall of Babylon in Rev 18, reference is made to fine flour and wheat as two of the commodities for which the merchants of the earth are no longer able to find a market. The fine flour was no doubt imported for the wealthy. The word used, σιμῖδαλις, is a ἀπαξ λεγ. in the NT. The wheat supply of Rome came largely from Egypt and was conveyed by ship from Alexandria. The land of its origin is a matter of speculation, but Mesopotamia, the enormous wheat-harvests of which were in ancient times proverbial, probably has as good a claim as any other country.

The knowledge of agriculture certainly goes back to pre-Semitic times, for grind-stones belonging to that period have been discovered (cf. the present writer's Latest Light on Bible Lands, London, 1913, p. 213). Several varieties of wheat are grown in Palestine, of which the most common is the Triticum spelta. Two other important varieties are the Triticum compositum and the Triticum hybernum. Wheat has been an article of export from very early times (cf. Ezk 27¹⁷, Ac 12²⁰). The principal wheat-growing district is the plain of the Hauran.

See, further, HARVEST, SICKLE.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, Natural History of the Bible, London, 1911, pp. 488-493; R. B. Rackham, The Acts of the Apostles, do., 1901, p. 490; A. Robertson and A. Plummer, ICC, 'First Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians', Edinburgh, 1911, p. 369 f.; H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, London, 1907, pp. 88, 234; The Speaker's Commentary, iii. [do., 1831] 367; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 3 vols., do., 1831-86, passim; J. C. Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, do., 1903, p. 53; DCG ii. 821; SDB, p. 972; EBi iv. 5299 f.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

WHITE.—See COLOURS.

WHORE, WHOREMONGER.—See HARLOT.

WHOREDOM.—See FORNICATION.

WICKED.—The words 'wicked,' 'wickedness' occur 24 times in the AV of the English Bible. The passages are Mt 12³⁵ 13⁴⁰ 16⁴ 18²² 22¹⁸ 25²⁶, Mk 7²², Lk 11²⁶, 39 19²⁷, Ac 23⁸ 8²² 18¹⁴ 25⁸, Ro 13⁹, 1 Co 5⁸, 13, Eph 6¹², 16, Col 1²¹, 2 Th 2⁸ 3-3, 2 P 2⁷ 31⁷, 1 Jn 5¹⁹. In eight of these RV has substituted some other reading: 'evil' in Mt 12³⁵, Lk 11²⁶, Eph 6¹⁶, Col 1²¹, 1 Jn 5¹⁹, 'lawless' in Ac 23⁸ (on the basis of a different reading: διὰ χειρὸς ἀνόμων instead of TR διὰ χειρῶν ἀνομῶν), 2 Th 2⁸, 'amiss' in Ac 25⁸. In four of these instances the change from 'wicked' to 'evil' is due to the fact that evil spirits are referred to; in Ac 23⁸, where, with the changed text, ἀνομος ceases to be an attribute of hands and becomes a characterization of persons, it naturally resumes its literal meaning of 'lawless'; in 2 Th 2⁸ 'the lawless one' is preferable, because ἀνομος probably rests on pre-Pauline Jewish tradition which represented the Antichrist as an enemy to the Law, so that 'wicked' would be too vague a translation; in Ac 25⁸ 'amiss' reproduces ἀτοπον more closely than 'wicked.' The change in Col 1²¹ from 'wicked works' to 'evil works' has nothing in the context to recommend it.

The prevailing Greek equivalent for 'wicked,' 'wickedness' is πονηρός, πονηρία. κακία occurs only once (Ac 8²²), ἀθεσμος twice (2 P 2⁷ 31⁷). The ἀθεσμος is one who transgresses fundamental Divine ordinances for moral conduct (from ἀ-τιθέναι). In regard to the specific force of πονηρός and its difference from κακός the following should be noted: πονηρός is derived from πόνος and usually explained as 'qui ponens facit,' 'who causes trouble.' But according to others (Schmidt, Cremer) the connexion between it and πόνος would be of a different nature, the poor being called πονηρόν because their life is laborious, full of πόνος, and then, by a not unusual transition, through what Trench calls 'the aristocratic tendencies of the language,' the word for 'poor' becoming also the word for 'wicked.' But, whether etymologically correct or not, the former explanation strikingly illustrates the specific meaning of πονηρός and its difference from κακός. While κακός describes a thing or person as inherently lacking that which is required by its idea, nature, or purpose, either in a physical or in a moral sense, πονηρός expresses the positive tendency to do harm in things, and the conscious pursuit of the injury of others in persons. The opposite of κακός is αγαθός (see art. GOODNESS); of πονηρός it is χρηστός (see art. KINDNESS). This difference between the two words can best be felt in passages where both are combined (1 Co 5⁸, Rev 16⁷, Mt 15¹⁹; cf. with Mk 7²¹). In Mt 7¹⁸ 'evil fruits' = 'unwholesome, injurious fruits'; Ac 28¹, 'evil words' are 'harmful words'; 1 Co 5⁸, 'the wicked' fornicator is so called because his uncleanness infects the whole Church (v. 6). 'Evil times' are dangerous times (Gal 1⁴, Eph 5¹⁶ 6¹³). Sometimes the word is used in a less serious sense of the harmfulness of inefficiency (Mt 25²⁶, 'wicked and slothful servant'; cf. the κακός δούλος of 24⁴⁸, who is lacking in fidelity and diligence). Especially of Satan and other evil spirits the word πονηρός is appropriately used, because they are intent upon doing evil and working harm (Eph 6¹⁶), but for the same reason it applies to men who seek to injure others (Ac 17⁵ 18¹⁴ 25¹⁸). In Col 1²¹ the works of paganism are called ἔργα πονηρά because they establish enmity between God and men: the rendering 'wicked works' of AV expresses this better than 'evil works' of RV. Cf., further, 2 Th 3² of the maliciously persecuting Jews, 2 Ti 3¹³, 3 Jn 10.

From the connotation of evil intent it is to be explained that το πονηρόν, τα πονηρά are never used of the physical evil of Divine retribution. κακόν and κακά are the words for this, because, even when God finds it necessary to punish, no evil intent can be predicated of Him. This applies to both the LXX and the NT. It is no exception when occasionally the adjective is used with such things as ελκος, νόσος in the sense of 'malignant,' for here the evil intent is metaphorically attributed to the disease (Dt 6²²).

In Mt 6¹³, Jn 17¹⁵, 2 Th 3³, 1 Jn 5¹⁹, expositors differ on the question whether the inflected forms are from the masculine ὁ πονηρός or the neuter τὸ πονηρόν. Only in regard to the last-mentioned passage is the personal reference to Satan placed beyond doubt by v.¹⁸; hence the rendering of RV, 'in the evil one,' is to be preferred to the 'in wickedness' of AV. In the other cases where the two versions differ in the same manner no certain contextual indications to decide the question are present.

LITERATURE.—J. A. H. Tittmann, De Synonymis in NT, London, 1829-32, p. 19; R. C. Trench, *NT Synonyms*⁸, do., 1876, pp. 303-306; G. Heine, Synonymik des neutest. Griechisch, Leipzig, 1898, pp. 100, 106; H. Cremer, *Biblisch-theologisches Wörterbuch der neutest. Gräcität*⁹, Gotha, 1902, pp. 500-534, 850-853; J. H. H. Schmidt, Synonymik der griechischen Sprache, Leipzig, 1876-86. GEERHARDUS VOS.

WIDOWS.—Widows and orphans are alluded to by St. James (1⁷) as a class specially needing sympathy and support, and those who visit this class and extend to it sympathetic help thereby truly serve God, who is 'a father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows' (Ps 68⁹). An emphatic expression of the same idea, viz. of charity to widows as true worship, occurs in Polycarp (ad Philipp. 4), who speaks of widows as a θυσιαστήριον, 'altar of sacrifice,' on which Christians should lavish their offerings as of old worshippers of Jahweh placed their gifts on the altar in the Temple. The same expression is reproduced in Apost. Const. (iii. 6). The same attitude towards widows is found in almost all the literature of the sub-Apostolic Age. In Hermas we find repeatedly such sentiments as the following: 'Instead of fields then buy ye oppressed souls as each one can, and widows and orphans mercifully visit (ἐπισκέπτεσθε) and do not overlook them' (Sim. i. 8). Fasting is recommended so that by the saving thus effected the widow and the orphan might be filled (v. 3). Deacons who exercise their office wickedly, robbing widows and orphans of their livelihood, are spots on the Church (ix. 26). Heretics are censured by Ignatius because 'they do not care for the love-feast or for brotherly love (περὶ ἀγάπης), nor yet for the widow nor the orphan' (ad Smyrn. 6). As against this, those who do care for this class are praised. Aristides in his Apology can say of Christians as a whole: 'From the widows they do not turn away their countenance; they rescue the orphan from him who does him violence' (see Hermas, Vis. II. iv. 3; Ep. Barn. xx. 2; Justin, Apol. i. 67; Apost. Const. ii. 26, iii. 6; and many similar passages). That there was need of such injunctions is clear, because church-officers might selfishly appropriate funds for their own use, and also because widows themselves might in a mercenary spirit take too much and 'make their widowhood a profitable trade' (E. Hatch, art. 'Widows,' in Smith and Cheetham's DCA ii. 2033^b; see also Apost. Const. bk. iii., where the faults of widows are enumerated).

The OT (Dt 14²⁹, Job 29¹³, Is 1¹⁷, Jer 22³, Ezk 22⁷, Zec 7¹⁰, Mal 3⁵), the Apocrypha (Sir 4¹⁰, 'Be as a father to orphans, and in place of a husband to their mother'), and Rabbinical literature (W. O. E. Oesterley, EGT, London, 1910, on Ja 1⁷) all lay stress on the duty of 'practising kindness' towards widows. There were deposits for widows and orphans in the treasury of the Temple (2 Mac 3¹⁰), and from the gospel we learn that even well-to-do widows were robbed by the Pharisees and that others were subject to spoliation without legal redress (Mk 12⁴⁰; see Swete, in loc.; Lk 18¹⁻⁸; see also, for widows in the early Church, J. B. Mayor on Ja 1⁷).

No doubt the poor among the Palestinian saints for whom St. Paul cared so much (τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῶν δυνάων, Ro 15²⁶), and whom he helped by means of the offerings of the Gentile churches (1 Co 16), would include widows. Of course there were widows who were not poor, such as the mother of John Mark, and there were others for whom their relatives could provide; but as a class widows were poor, and the Church could not let them starve. From Ac 6^{1ff} we learn that in the Church of Jerusalem there were many widows, not only Aramaic-speaking widows, but also those of Jewish blood who spoke Greek. The latter class was evidently neglected compared with the former, but when this grievance was brought to the notice of the Apostles they appointed seven men to supervise the charity of the Church. This was in intention a temporary and local arrangement. It is possible that seven were appointed because there were seven meeting-places in the city, but one cannot be in any way certain that there was any special reason for the precise number. These men saw to it that the Hellenist widows as well as the others were fed at the daily ministration—probably meals were procured daily wherever the church met for worship. Monetary help and clothing would also be provided. Before this the duty of helping the poor, and among them widows, was left to the dictates of spontaneous individual charity in the daily ministration; now it was partially organized. Nothing is said, however, of a roll of widows or of specific qualifications such as age being necessary before relief could be given. These questions were yet to arise in the expanding Church. Certainly there is nothing here of the nature of a definite Church order. In Joppa Tabitha (Dorcas) had instituted a species of clothing society for the help of widows (Ac 9^{36ff}), and no doubt in other places also this class was helped if not by the Church as a whole then by individuals of an active charitable disposition. In both of these passages widows are brought before us as a needy class who were tended by the charity of their fellow-believers. Christian benevolence would not indeed be restricted to the household of faith, but it had the first claim.

When 1 Ti 5³⁻¹⁶ was written the question of the Church's relation to widows—in Ephesus at any rate—had become a serious problem. There were at least two pressing questions, viz. (1) the wise administration of the Church's financial resources, and (2) the clear enunciation of the basal principles of Christian charity. The Apostle makes it clear that no widows were to be relieved who had children or grandchildren able to support them. This was not simply to save the scanty finances of the Church, but much more in order to enforce a binding moral principle. There is every reason to believe that there were families who tried to evade what was a cardinal obligation of piety by attempting to get their widowed mothers or grandmothers to be supported by the Church. Possibly some widows were themselves eager to do so, so as to gain thus greater personal liberty. Against this St. Paul is emphatic in declaring that descendants ought to support their widowed relatives. He repeats this duty thrice. To neglect it is not only to violate Christian law (Mk 7¹⁰⁻¹³), but also to fall below the moral standard of paganism (cf. 1 Ti 5³, 'But if any one exercises no care for his relatives, and especially members of his own family, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever'). The principle is stated generally in vv. 3-4, 'Respect widows who are really widows. But if any widow has children or grandchildren, let such descendants learn first of all to act piously towards their own households and to requite their parents'; and a specific application of the same principle is thus expressed: 'If any believing woman has widows, let her provide for them, and let the church not be burdened, lest really deserving widows have not sufficient support' (v. 16). The Apostle here lays down a basal principle of Christian charity in general, making it apply specifically to the case of widows. Church support is not a substitute for filial indifference or neglect. To the Apostle the family is the important unit in regard to charity, not the Church. The Apostle also states that those widows who lived a fast life—a living death—were not to be supported out of Church funds. Those widows only are to be cared for who are really destitute and who have their hope fixed on God and keep to their prayers night and day—in other words, thoroughly God-fearing widows who have no relatives to whom they can look for help. This gave Timothy a guiding principle by which the resources of the Church could be husbanded and by which moral duty could be enforced at the same time. If the Apostle had stopped here, there would be no difficulty in understanding the teaching of the passage, but he goes on to speak of a roll (κατάλογος) of Church widows, and the question is whether this roll is a poor roll simply or whether it is a sort of inner circle selected from all those widows whom the Church relieved. If the latter view be correct, then we have an indefinite band of destitute widows, of all ages, supported by the Church, and of this band a select few who are on a roll of honour because they occupy some status in the Church. As regards this roll, what the Apostle says is this. Only destitute widows of sixty and upwards can be included, who have hitherto had a blameless career and a record of good works. Such an enrolled widow must have been 'a woman of one man,'* must have brought up her family well, must have washed the disciples' feet, shown hospitality to strangers, done service to the oppressed. If the Apostle intended the help of the Church to be restricted to such, then what was to become of destitute widows under sixty or even of those who did not come up to the moral requirements demanded? It is because this ruling appears so harsh that many scholars see in this catalogue not a poor catalogue at all, but a roll of widows with ecclesiastical functions and status. The Apostle excludes from this roll all younger widows. Before this, evidently, they were not excluded, and the consequence was that many of them married, others, owing to their freedom, went about as busybodies and gossips, and indeed some succumbed to sensual temptations, with the result that Christianity was evil spoken of. The widows on the roll were expected to remain unmarried, but the Apostle advises the younger widows to marry and become good housewives.

It is clear that this catalogue, even if it is regarded as more than a poor roll, cannot refer to the widows found in the Western Church in the 5th cent. and onwards, for in this order were included all widows of whatever age who took the vow of abstinence and donned a special ecclesiastical dress. They had little or nothing to do with Church support, and indeed many of them were well-to-do. The duties of this later class in the West corresponded with the duties of deaconesses in the East. But it is contended that there was an earlier order of widows in some churches (cf. Tert. de Virg. Vel. 9) dating at least from the 3rd cent., and that we find here the earliest evidence of its existence. The much-disputed passage in Ignatius (ad Smyrn. 13), 'I salute the virgins who are called widows' (see Lightfoot in loc.), is claimed to support the contention, but against it is the fact that the Apostle says nothing as to the duties of the catalogued widows; and indeed the age limit imposed would render many of them unable to do any strenuous work for the Church. Besides, the whole passage is on the face of it concerned mainly with Church support, and again in the East, even in Chrysostom's time, widows were regarded mainly if not exclusively as Church pensioners. That the Apostle does not refer to deaconesses is plain because in a previous section (31st) he discussed them. No doubt by the end of the 2nd cent. deaconesses would in many cases be taken from the ranks of the widows (Tert. de Virg. Vel. 9, ad Uxor. i. 7; cf. Ign. ad Smyrn. 13). In Tit 2nd the aged women referred to are not female presbyters, and so on the whole it is better to regard the roll here spoken of as a catalogue of those widows who ought to be supported by the Church, and perhaps of these it was expected that they would give their time and skill to the service of the Christian community. Certainly they were not to remarry; in fact, the age limit made that practically impossible.* There is no reason, however, to think of a fixed ecclesiastical order with definite status and functions. That St. Paul speaks so strongly about the remarriage of young widows is no proof—on our view of the meaning of 'a woman of one man'—that younger widows if they remarried and again became widows would be excluded from the roll, for they would still be faithful to one husband. On the other hand, the case of a destitute widow under sixty is not directly discussed. It is not the Apostle's manner, however, to be exhaustive in his treatment of any subject. Such a woman would not be left to starve, but she might well be helped to look after herself and to abstain from going definitely on the roll of the Church. The Church's earlier relations to widows were distinctly eleemosynary, whatever the later may have been, and there is no reason to believe that anything else is intended by St. Paul here.

The right of widows to remarry is tacitly taken for granted by the Apostle in Ro 7th and 1 Co 7th; and, although in the latter passage he advises them to remain as they are, it is because of special reasons of temporal distress. His view on this subject, even in 1 Cor., is separated by a wide chasm from the opinion which became prevalent later when the remarriage of widows was regarded with horror. This view was based on the depreciation of marriage itself as early as the Pastor of Hermas (Mand. iv. 4), but remarriage is not yet regarded as sinful. But it is so regarded by Athenagoras, who says that 'a second marriage is a pleasing adultery' (εὐκταρής μοιχεία, Leg. 33; cf. Clem. Strom. iii. xii. 82, and the long note by A. Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Canonem Receptum, Leipzig, 1876, p. 173). In 1 Tim. the Apostle shows a much more sympathetic appreciation of family life and of the marriage relationship.

Once, in Rev 18th, the term 'widow' is used of a city in affliction—a usage borrowed from the OT prophets (cf. Is 47th). The idea of Grotius that Eudodia and Syntyche mentioned in Ph 4th were 'widows' can be neither proved nor disproved.

LITERATURE.—Bible Dictionaries, art. 'Widow.' For widows of a later age, see E. Hatch, art. 'Widows,' in Smith and Cheetham's DCA ii. 2023 ff.; J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii.², London, 1889, ii. 304, 322; A. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr. 3, do., 1908, i. 122. All these discuss the relation between the widow and the deaconess. See, further, J. S. Howson, Deaconesses, London, 1862; Cecilia Robinson, The Ministry of Deaconesses, do., 1898. All expositors of 1 Ti 5th deal with the question; see also W. M. Ramsay, Exp. 7th ser., ix. [1910] 436 ff.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

WIFE.—See FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

WILDERNESS.—See DESERT.

WILL.—The consideration of the place of the will in the teaching of the apostolic writings must

* Whether St. Paul himself fixed this age limit or whether he found it in existence we cannot say.

* This phrase can mean either (1) a widow who has been only once married, or (2) a widow who has been faithful to one man, i.e. who was not guilty of pre-nuptial or viduary fornication or of conjugal infidelity. To the present writer the latter meaning is far more likely.

be carefully distinguished from the question of free-will (see art. FREEDOM OF THE WILL). The line between them is not easy to draw in all cases; but the aim of this article is to consider the conception or conceptions of the will implied in the Acts and Epistles, and its relation to views current in modern psychological writings. At the present time there is a strong tendency to throw commanding emphasis on the will. All consciousness, it is agreed, implies the three factors, volition or conation, cognition, and sensation or feeling; but, if any one of these can be said to be primary, it is volition. Consciousness grows by functioning; and, except in its rudimentary stages, functioning is impossible apart from volition. Much attention has naturally been given to the relations between will on the one hand and wish and desire on the other, to the connexion between will and attention and habit, and also to the possibility of action against the will. Is the will a matter of detached impulses or is it properly the expression of the personality, the self? These questions are of great importance to the student of the NT. Schopenhauer, and later Nietzsche, raised the subject of the will to a new importance in philosophic discussion; and the questions mentioned above have been recently emphasized by the various writings of William James, and the important and far-reaching contentions of Eucken and of Bergson. The theist has a further set of questions to answer: What is the relation of the will of man to the will of God? Does the latter compel the former? And is it similar in kind? What is the real meaning of the 'surrender of the will' so often demanded in religious writings? Which should be placed highest in religion, the active and conative, the intellectual, or the emotional element?

All these questions, more or less connected with one another, occur at once to the mind; but in the NT no direct answer to them is to be found. The NT writers were not in any sense psychological analysts; their object was to describe their religious experiences and to induce them in others. Their psychological equipment for doing this—if the adjective can be used at all—was the language of the OT and the simple categories common to the conversation of plain but thoughtful men. In their psychology the Rabbis themselves were no more than thoughtful amateurs—perhaps the world has gained rather than lost thereby. On the other hand, the language of the NT writers on this subject—like their use, e.g., of the Greek prepositions—though simple, is surprisingly careful. They did not work out their theology; but a theology was implicit in all that they wrote; and, without being conscious of doing so, they have given us materials for a reasoned conception of the will, as it may be predicated of both God and man.

To understand this, we must first pay attention to the writers' vocabulary. The choice of words is determined as much on subconscious as on conscious levels; we employ one expression and reject another instinctively; and in cases like the present, where a system or a belief is implicit rather than explicit, language yields some of our best evidence. The language of the OT suggests three manifestations of will: (a) desire and aversion—the latter perhaps more often actually expressed—אֶתְּ, אֶתְּ (אֶתְּ), אֶתְּ, terms which can all be applied either to man or to God; (b) satisfaction in a certain state of things, real or contemplated—אֶתְּ, with the cognate noun, and אֶתְּ; these again are equally applicable to man and to God; (c) a continued and persistent purpose, אֶתְּ, or the phrase אֶתְּ or אֶתְּ; the former is more commonly used of man; the latter suggests the familiar connexion between will and attention, אֶתְּ being always regarded by the Hebrews as the seat of thoughts rather than of emotions. The NT writers start from the same circle of ideas. From the undifferentiated material of likes and dislikes are developed deep mental and moral satisfactions, and acute physical desires or loathings. Will, for or against, is the natural precursor of action. Two wills may clash—those of man and man or of man and God. And out of will may grow a steadfast purpose, good or evil, which may fix the destiny of the whole life. When we examine the NT vocabulary more closely, a further distinction emerges. 'Will' is expressed by both θέλω and βούλομαι and their cognate nouns, as well as by a further little group of words which must also be noticed.

θέλω is nearly always used of man. There are exceptions in Ac 18¹, Ro 9^{18, 22}, 1 Co 4¹⁹ 12¹⁸ 15³⁶, 1 Th 2¹³ (the only occurrence of the word in this Epistle), Col 1²⁷, and Ja 4¹⁵. In the Gospels, the word is very commonly used of man in general, and of Jesus; rarely of God, outside the quotations from the OT—Hos 6⁸ in Mt 9¹³ and parallels, and Ps 22³ in Mt 27⁴³ (where the original is פָּתַח). The non-classical cognate noun, θέλημα, however, is almost entirely used of God. There are exceptions in Eph 2³ (cf. 1¹¹) and 2 P 1²¹. The word is generally singular, but the plur. occurs in Ac 13²² and Eph 2³. In He 2⁴ θέλησις is found, also of God. The same usage is found in the Gospels, especially in the Fourth Gospel ('the will of my Father,' 'of him that sent me'); the exceptions really prove the principle (1¹³ 5³⁰ 6³⁸).

The above makes it clear that the verb is used quite generally for 'wish,' 'desire,' and 'want.' The distinction common in English psychology since T. H. Green, between more and less conscious self-presentation in the act of will, is absent from the NT. But the verb covers a range wide enough to stretch from St. Paul's favourite phrase, οὐ θέλω ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, to the baffling experiences hinted at in Ro 7. It can thus be used of both man and God. On the other hand, the noun is practically confined to the idea of a solemn Divine purpose; hence its inapplicability to human desires.

When we turn to βούλομαι we find that the verb is always used of man, except in Lk 22⁴², He 6¹⁴ (the only case where the word occurs in Heb.), 2 P 3⁹, and Ja 1¹⁸ (cf. Mt 11²⁷, 1 Co 12¹¹). The nouns βούλη and βούλημα are rare; βούλη is used about equally of God and of man (for the latter use see Ac 5³⁸ 19²⁷ 27¹² 42; for the former Eph 1¹¹ and He 6¹⁷; note also 1 Co 4⁵, βουλὰς τῶν καρδιῶν). In the Gospels it occurs only twice—in Lk 7³⁰ of God, and in 23⁵¹ of man. βουλήμα is used once of man (Ac 27⁴³), once of God (Ro 9¹⁹), and once of the 'nations' (1 P 4⁸).

The verb thus denotes plan and settled deliberate purpose, rising, however, out of uncertainty, needing effort for its realization, and liable to frustration; hence it is unsuitable for application to God. The noun denotes a deliberate and settled choice, which is more appropriate to the calm omnipotence of God (cf. Ac 2²³) than the ignorant strivings of man; it may, of course, imply a choice of alternatives, though not necessarily a long balancing between them. βούλημα does not occur; βουλεύομαι is not used of God. βούλη, indeed, would seem to correspond somewhat nearly to the Aristotelian προαίρεσις (Eth. Nic. iii.). εὐδοκία denotes a choice in which satisfaction is found; it is used of both God and man; like the cognate verb, however, it is comparatively rare (cf. Ro 10¹, Ph 1¹⁵, 2 Th 1¹¹). In Lk 2¹⁴ εὐδοκία corresponds to the Hebrew רָצוֹן, and the whole phrase most naturally means 'men in whom God feels satisfaction,' not 'good-will' in the sense of the AV.

ἐπιθυμία, on the other hand, denotes an eager longing or craving, which may pass out of control and become πάθος, an overmastering passion. The verb ἐπιθυμῶ is used only of man. It occurs outside the Gospels six times in a bad sense, twice in a good sense, and twice neutral; in the Gospels, however, out of six instances only one is bad. The noun is generally used in a bad sense, often with reference to bodily desires (note Jn 8⁴⁴). Like the verb, it is never used of God. πάθος suggests an ungovernable passion in the three places where it occurs (Ro 1²⁶, Col 3⁵, 1 Th 4⁵). A deep and overmastering longing for a good object is expressed by ἐπιποθέω (e.g. Ro 1¹¹, 2 Co 9¹⁴, Ph 1⁸, 1 P 2²; it also meets us in the obscure passage in Ja 4³).

Hence, out of the simple material of desires and aversions are developed overpowering cravings or settled purposes; when the latter become thought of as entirely fixed, they are connected exclusively with God. At the same time, NT language shrinks from the idea that God could actually deliberate. Thus the main distinction recognized by the language is religious rather than psychological; it is drawn between the will as manifested in man and in God rather than between the greater and less identification with the self.

But further questions arise at once. (1) What is the relation of a man's will to God? Is a clash, as of two independent wills, really possible, until a point is reached where man says 'Not as I will but as thou wilt?' (2) Is man's will equally independent as regards evil? Here too we shall find no system; but we must ask whether by anything in the apostolic expressions an intelligible system is implied. We shall begin with the second point. Several expressions imply an influence exercised by evil, as itself an independent power, over the will—e.g. Ac 5³: 'Why hath Satan filled thy heart?' (but note v.⁹: 'How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord?'); 2 Co 2¹¹: 'that no advantage may be gained over us by Satan'; 2 Co 4⁴; Ja 1¹⁴: 'Each man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed' (the words used suggest the metaphor of an angler). Ac 8²³ 13¹⁰ hint at the same idea, and perhaps Gal 3¹; cf. also Ro 7¹² 20, where sin itself is spoken of as the agent of deception and death (cf. Ro 8²⁰). This does not, however, destroy the responsibility of the sinner (Ro 1²⁴ 25 26 27, and Ac 23²⁸ 34, quoted from Is 63¹⁰). The last passages imply a state; the evil will is a matter not of acts out of habits, or, as Aristotle would call them, ἕξεις (cf. Nic. Eth. iv. 2, 1122^b 1). This state is called death, the absence of all will, or power, i.e. of all will to do good (Eph 2¹, 2 Co 4³). Very similar language is used by St. Paul about the race as a whole—'death passed unto all men, for that all sinned' (Ro 5¹²). On the other hand, a man so dead can be made alive (Eph 2⁵, Col 2¹³); cf. also 1 Jn 3¹⁴: 'We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren.' Life, however, means death to sin and to the Law which enslaved to sin (Ro 7⁶, Col 2²⁰ 3³ 4: 'Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God . . . Christ, who is our life'). To this state the term death (to sin) is applied, since here the will is regarded, at least by implication, as being 'dead' to evil impulses, as before to good ones. Yet it is noteworthy that the activity of the will is still called for—'Let not sin reign in your mortal body' (Ro 6¹¹ 12 16); and that this activity is essential is shown very clearly by the appeals to moral conduct which occur regularly at the close of St. Paul's Epistles, as well as elsewhere in the NT.

A definite cycle seems thus to be contemplated, whether as regards the race, the 'heathen' (Ro 1), or individuals: first, there is the active will to evil; then, evil becomes inevitable; the agent is practically powerless, 'sold under sin' (Ro 7¹⁴); then, after his rescue from this state, the will is again called for, but this time it points habitually in the opposite direction. That is to say, choice is a real thing, but it exists in a world which contains both certain definite uniform sequences and an enticing and enslaving power of sin and 'lusts' (Ja 1¹⁴). This is sometimes but not always connected with the discarnate personality called Satan (see artt. DEVIL, SIN).

But what of the rescue itself? Is it independent of man's will? Does it simply depend on God's decision to effect it, in some cases, but evidently not in others? Man's will appears to be clearly called for in such passages as 2 Co 5²⁰, 'Be ye reconciled to God,' but against them Ro 9¹³ may be quoted, and perhaps, though it is not dogmatic or doctrinal in tone, Ac 2²¹ (see CONVERSION, FREEDOM OF THE WILL). However this antinomy is reconciled, there is no doubt that St. Paul regards grace and faith as vital to the change (Eph 2⁴ 8: 'God . . . quickened us together with Christ—by grace have ye been saved— . . . for by grace have ye been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God'; cf. also Ro 4⁵, Gal 1⁵). By itself the reference to grace might imply that man was merely passive; but the call for faith (as we shall see below, faith is an act of the will) shows that this is very far from being the case; indeed, faith is in general emphasized considerably more than grace as the agent in conversion. A still more fundamental connexion between the activities of God and man is expressed in what at first seem wilful contradictions in terms, in Ph 2¹⁻¹² and Gal 2²⁰ ('Work out your own salvation . . . for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work'; and 'I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me'). In Gal 3³ we read of faith as 'coming,' with the result that we are 'no longer under a tutor,' but 'sons of God through faith' (cf. 1 P 1¹³, 'the grace that is being brought unto you,' RVm). But even in this new sphere of life through faith the will reappears, as a persistent endeavour after progress (Ph 3¹², 2 P 1¹⁰). The new life is marked by special gifts—χαρίσματα—but they must be strenuously cultivated (Ro 12, 1 Co 12). The whole Church may receive an illumination from the Holy Spirit, yet it will use language that implies co-operation rather than passivity (Ac 15²⁸). The new condition can therefore be rightly called one of freedom (cf. Gal 5¹³), and as such it is characterized by the confidence of open speech, as of equal with equal (παρρησία, Eph 3¹², He 3⁶, 1 Jn 3²¹).

It is thus quite clearly, though perhaps even yet not explicitly, recognized that will is something more than an impulse or a series of impulses, good or bad. It is the expression of the self, which, when bad, needs to be changed by an operation which has an external origin. Yet it is manifested in constant choices and struggles. The Christian is conscious of a new power in him (Gal 2²⁰), seizing him (Ph 3¹); yet the result is to produce in him for the first time the true activity. Transformed conation becomes the central thing in his life.

There is another aspect of the subject which is familiar to modern psychologists, and is not as entirely neglected in the NT as might at first appear. Conation is often represented as being almost identical with deliberate attention. Fully developed conation demands that prolonged presentation of an object to consciousness whose basis is voluntary attention. For the cultivation of self-control and the building up of character this truth is of the greatest importance. In the NT the chief elements in the growth of the Christian character are faith, hope, and love. To the new life, and therefore to the new will, these are vital. They have been regarded as being mainly emotional qualities. But this is a mistake. Each involves a trained and cultivated attention. This is clearly the case with He 11. The psychologist might well describe the conception of faith worked out in that famous chapter as the concentration of attention on what would otherwise be forced up to, or beyond, the margin of consciousness (esp. vv. 6, 13-16, 27 and 12¹). A wider rôle is assigned to faith in the Pauline Epistles, but the element of unswerving attention therein is clear from Ro 4²⁰ and Gal 3, (passim). This is even more marked in the Epistles of St. John. There faith is spoken of as the weapon by which the world is overcome (1 Jn 5⁴⁻⁵). But the nerve of this faith is the conviction that Jesus is the Son of God; in other words, if the attention is concentrated on this object, the universe of evil around him is powerless to harm the Christian. In the Synoptic Gospels faith means confidence in the power of Jesus to do what He offers or is asked to do; but the demand for faith thus made involves the securing of attention by means of a strong suggestion. In Ph 4⁸, St. Paul appears to recognize the value of wisely directed attention still more clearly.

It is not always easy to distinguish between faith and hope in the apostolic writings; hope, like faith, is directed on the unseen, and it demands endurance (Ro 8²⁴⁻²⁵), i.e. the deliberate holding of an idea before the mind; indeed, the connexion of hope with endurance rather suggests that it is the part of faith to set the object before the attention, and of hope to keep it there. Love, as St. Paul describes it in 1 Co 13, is very much more than an emotion; it is distinctly an attitude; the qualities mentioned in vv. 4-6 all point to attention directed to objects which most of us, especially under provocation, find it very hard to bear in mind. In the Epistles of St. John, faith, love, and obedience form an inseparable triad; the Christian character is secured, and fulfilled, by fixing the mind on Christ's precepts and carrying them out. Of this process, love is both the pre-requisite and the end; and, if this seems a contradiction, we must remember that to the psychologist, as to the theologian, analysis is but a makeshift; everything that appears in the course of the development of a conscious state was there at the beginning, or it could not have come into existence at all. Love is the going out of the whole soul to God, or to men in eager desire for their highest bliss; but this is impossible apart from definite mental concentration. The three Christian graces thus imply attention, and are all conative.

It is strange that all this was not analyzed further in the NT. But the main interest of the writers, after all, lay in God's will, not in man's. The patience needed by the descriptive psychologist was impossible for men whose one desire was to express the highest rapture of their lives, the sense of the redeeming and sanctifying will of God surging through every part of their being. And this constant turning of the attention to God led them to emphasize aspects of God's will which might seem to come near to fatalism, were it not that God's will is always thought of as acting through the good man, not outside of him. These aspects are four: a certain irresistible compulsion experienced by the Apostles, reminding one of Socrates' daimon, but going far beyond it (Ac 16⁶⁻⁷; cf. 18⁹); a curious sense of the 'fated,' or πεπρωμένον, as a classical Greek might have called it, which especially pervades Ac 20. 21. 27; the eschatological expectation, prominent in the earlier Epistles of St. Paul and in Rev.; and, side by side with this cosmical aspect of the sovereign will of God, the recognition of a moral necessity, especially in the sufferings of the Messiah, which formed the great fulfilment of prophecy (Ac 3¹⁸⁻²¹, He 2¹⁰ 7²⁶). In fact, we may almost think of God's will as a kind of primum mobile, the all-embracing sphere by which the other spheres are controlled and set and kept in motion. The maturity of man's will is thus an attainment, not an endowment. It acts properly only when it is roused and directed by Divine grace. The necessity for its exercise will never be superseded; but the more it is exercised under Divine control, the more it becomes God's will in man, and the more it becomes man's own will, acting at last in complete freedom. St. Paul's metaphors of the soldier and the athlete are quite natural and harmonious. They provide room for the sternest endurance and struggle, and yet they point to the perfect precision and joy of well-disciplined activity. And this perfect precision is not simply in obedience to God's will; it becomes the actual manifestation of God's will. So experienced, God's will is identical with His love. It 'moves the sun and the other stars'; it is the πρῶτον κινῶν.

We are now in a position to sum up briefly the relation of the NT conception of the will to modern psychological discussions. Cognition, conation, and feeling are all recognized; activity is central and is something more than response to impulse; it is self-expression as opposed to wish or desire. Action against the will is possible, but only when the will is itself imperfect. Surrender of the will is really re-affirmation of the will in a new direction. The conceptions of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche, however, the 'will to life' or 'to power,' constitute a perilous self-assertion which can only lead to death. There is much in the thought of St. Paul that recalls Eucken. The controlling force of the world is spiritual; and into the little land-locked pools of our own individuality, soon becoming stagnant if left to themselves, must flow the great tides of the Divine will. But that will is personal and redemptive; it is not a mere force, however exalted; it is the loving activity of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. St. Paul has less in common with Bergson. The principle of life is not merely change; nor is its action experimental and uncertain. It moves onward through all time with a directness which can also communicate itself to our own wills. Finally, we may refer to the well-known phrase of the pragmatist William James, the 'will to believe.' The expression is not meant to state a relation between will and belief, but is used to suggest that belief (whatever its psychological analysis) is founded only on a subjective and individual choice, not on truth or fact. Mathematical formulæ and scientific 'laws' are accepted by us because they 'work'; God's love and man's immortality are accepted for the same reason. To St. Paul the principle, so stated, would have been incomprehensible or impious. Love and immortality are true because they are 'revealed,' brought to light; it is the function of will to fix the mind on them, and act in accord with them. W. James's view is a simple case of ὁστέρον πρότερον. As a psychological or philosophical basis for belief, its correctness is not here in point; what is significant to the student of NT thought is that the great doctrines of Christianity are there felt to become more and more clear as the will accepts and obeys them. The will does not create truth; but there is not a truth which the will does not illumine and test (Jn 7¹⁷, 1 Jn 2²⁰, 27 5²⁰).

LITERATURE.—For representative modern discussions of the question of the will in general see J. Martineau, *Study of Religion*², 2 vols., Oxford, 1889, vol. ii. bk. iii. ch. ii.; H. Lotze, Microcosmus, Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1885, vol. i. p. 256 ff.; J. Ward, Naturalism and Agnosticism, London, 1899; G. F. Stout, *Analytic Psychology*², 2 vols., do., 1902, vol. ii. chs. ii., iii., xi.; W. James, Varieties of Religious Experience, do., 1902, lectures ix., x., Will to Believe, do., 1902, pp. 1 ff., 145 ff.; H. Bergson, Time and Free Will, do., 1910, ch. iii. For discussions of the subject from a theistic point of view see T. B.

Strong, Christian Ethics, do., 1896, chs. i, ii.; W. L. Walker, Christian Theism and a Spiritual Monism, Edinburgh, 1906, pt. ii.; W. R. Inge, Faith and its Psychology, London, 1909; G. Galloway, Philosophy of Religion, Edinburgh, 1914. For the psychology of religion see E. D. Starbuck, Psychology of Religion, London, 1899, chs. xxv.-xxvii.; J. B. Pratt, Psychology of Religious Belief, New York and London, 1907; G. B. Catten, Psychological Phenomena of Christianity, London, 1909, ch. xxv. For the biblical conceptions of the will see H. Wheeler Robinson, Christian Doctrine of Man, Edinburgh, 1911, 'Hebrew Psychology in Relation to Pauline Anthropology,' in Mansfield College Essays, London, 1909; H. Weinell, St. Paul, the Man and his Work, Eng. tr., do., 1906; W. P. DnBose, The Gospel according to St. Paul, do., 1907. See also Literature under art. FREEDOM OF THE WILL.

W. F. LOFTHOUSE.

WILL (TESTAMENT).—Here, accepting the conclusion (see art. COVENANT) that in Gal 3¹⁵ and He 9^{16, 17} we find the thought of a human 'will' or 'testament,' we proceed to ask whether the idea can be more closely defined.

1. In his Historical Commentary on the Galatians (p. 349 ff.), Ramsay argues that there are clear indications that St. Paul is alluding to the customs of Greek law. He maintains that a Greek will was (a) public and (b) irrevocable. It was 'confirmed' (3¹⁵) when it had passed through the Record Office of the city; when duly executed it could not be revoked, even by a subsequent act of the testator. Hence, whilst St. Paul could not apply to God an analogy drawn from such wills as we are familiar with, his illustration is seen to be a perfect one as soon as we recognize the nature of a Greek will. Yet on closer examination these positions appear untenable. Norton states that only two instances are to be found where a will was deposited in official custody; and he adds: 'There is no evidence or trace of registration of Greek wills in the classic period, nor of official inspection of their contents' (A Lexicographical and Historical Study of ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ, pp. 61-62). As to the question of irrevocability, he quotes an interesting case from Isæus, which turned on the question whether undue influence had not been exerted to prevent a dying man from exercising his undoubted right of amending his will (ib., pp. 63-64). Ramsay's only proof appears to be that wills found in Egypt often contained the provision that the testator is free to alter or invalidate (op. cit., p. 366). But, whatever may be the explanation of this, it cannot mean that by inserting a clause to this effect the testator could alter an established law. It reminds us rather of our modern legal phrase 'without prejudice,' which claims acknowledged rights without creating new ones. (For a fuller examination of this question see Schmiedel's searching discussion in Ebi ii. 1608-11.)

2. Halmel, in his pamphlet Über römisches Recht im Galaterbrief, urges, on the other hand, that St. Paul uses the technical terminology of Roman law with scientific exactness. According to Roman law a man could make a will, and afterwards either invalidate it or add codicils at his pleasure. St. Paul's argument is that the Mosaic Law is not a will at all, but a codicil which does not revoke the will but merely suspends its operation. In general this seems the best exposition. Halmel's attempt to illustrate St. Paul's use of the singular 'seed' (σπέρμα) as opposed to the plural 'seeds' (σπέρματα) from the Roman provision that the legatee must be exactly defined (persona certa), and that a number of persons loosely designated (personæ incertæ) could not inherit, seems too fantastic. St. Paul's argument savours more of the Rabbinic school than of the Roman law-court. (For a full discussion of Halmel see Dawson Walker, The Gift of Tongues, 'The Legal Terminology in the Epistle to the Galatians,' p. 101 ff.)

3. Both passages (Gal. and Heb.) are explained when we remember that in NT times the general principles of Roman law were well established and were known throughout the Empire. The mixed population of the Galatian churches, whether we adopt the N. or the S. Galatian theory, forbids us to think that when St. Paul speaks 'after the manner of men' he would appeal to specialized knowledge familiar only to certain sections of his readers. But all St. Paul's readers, as well as the readers of the Epistle to the Hebrews, whether these were Palestinian or Italian, knew the general customs with regard to will-making—customs which have lasted to our own day.

LITERATURE.—The works cited under COVENANT, esp. F. O. Norton, A Lexicographical and Historical Study of ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ, Chicago, 1908; W. M. Ramsay, Historical Commentary on the Galatians, London, 1899; T. Zahn, Der Brief des Paulus an die Galater, Leipzig, 1905; Dawson Walker, The Gift of Tongues, Edinburgh, 1906, pp. 83-175; A. Halmel, Über römisches Recht im Galaterbrief, Essen, 1895; P. W. Schmiedel, art. 'Galatia,' in Ebi ii. 1608 ff.

WILFRID J. MOULTON.

WINDOW (θυψίς).—The Gr. word properly means 'little door' (from θυπά). Though glass was largely manufactured by the Phoenicians, who may have learned the art from the Egyptians (as is maintained in Ebi ii. 1737, but see *EBr*¹¹ xii. 98), it was apparently never used by them or their Jewish neighbours for windows, which were mere apertures—or apertures fitted with lattice-work—in the walls of houses. The discoveries at Pompeii furnish convincing evidence that glass had begun to be used for windows in the early days of the Roman Empire. In the tepidarium of the public baths a bronze lattice has been found with some of the panes still in the frame. In the houses of the East, which still differ but little from those of ancient times, windows do not usually look out upon the street, but balconies project from the upper stories over the street, with windows in which the lattice-work is often of a highly ornamental kind. In the case of houses built upon the city wall, the window has always afforded a ready means of escape into the country (Jos 2¹⁵, 2 Mac 3¹⁹, 2 Co 11²⁸). Baskets are often seen being lowered from such windows to-day, most likely for the purpose of being filled with fruit (W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, London, 1910, p. 78). While St. Paul was preaching in the upper room of a house at Troas, Eutychus sat on the window-sill (ἐπὶ τῆς θυψίδος), and, falling asleep and losing his balance, fell down from the third story (ἀπὸ τοῦ τρίτου οὐρου) (Ac 20⁹). In a crowded room lighted with lamps the windows would naturally be wide open.

LITERATURE.—W. Ramsay, art. 'Vitrum' in Smith's *DGRA*², London, 1875; G. M. Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, do., 1893, p. 95 f.; C. Warren, art. 'House' in HDB.

J. STRAHAN.

WINE.—See ABSTINENCE, DRUNKENNESS, EUCHARIST, TEMPERANCE.

WING (πτερυξ).—The term occurs but five times in the NT: three times in its usual significance, of birds (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 13³⁴, Rev 12¹⁴), and twice of imaginary creatures (Rev 4⁸ 9⁹). The three passages which fall within the scope of apostolic history are very instructive.

1. Rev 4⁸. 'And the four living creatures, having each one of them six wings, are full of eyes round about and within: and they have no rest day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God, the Almighty, which was and which is and which is to come.' The Seer here combines in one picture the characteristics of Ezekiel's cherubim (1⁴⁻²⁸) and of Isaiah's seraphim (6¹⁻⁴). It is the seraphim that supply the 'wings.' He ignores any differences which may originally have existed between cherubim and seraphim (cf. Enoch lxi. 10). Combined, they are here the representatives of redeemed creation, vicegerents of God, powerful and filled with judgment, praising God's holiness, and confident of God's victory in the tribulations which are sure to follow.

2. Rev 9^o, 'And they [the locusts] had breastplates, as it were breastplates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of chariots, of many horses rushing to war.' The picture here is that of a destructive swarm of weird locusts coming out of the smoke of the deep abyss, presenting a dire vision of judgment. The locusts are fancifully and preternaturally magnified by the Seer's imagination; they have crowns of gold on their heads, the faces of men, the hair of women, the teeth of lions, breastplates of iron, 'wings' that sound like the sound of many chariots, and tails like the tails of scorpions (cf. Jl 2^{a-11}). Arabian poets describe locusts in a similar manner.

3. Rev 12¹⁴, 'And there were given to the woman the two wings of the great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness unto her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent.' In this picture the woman is the embodiment of light and the emblem of the historical Church of God. As such she has a mission in the world, but she must perform it in the midst of tribulation and severe persecution. The dragon is ever ready to oppose her and devour her offspring; he leads the hosts of darkness. But the woman is not forsaken in the contest. 'The two wings of the great eagle' of God's protection are given her that she may fly into the wilderness, unto the place prepared of God for her protection. There is an emphasis apparently upon the 'two,' God's protection being commensurate to her need of it.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

WISDOM.—1. In OT and Apocrypha.—In the OT, Wisdom in its nature and office is discussed in the series of books known as the Hokhmāh or Wisdom literature of the Hebrews. We find here not so much a philosophy as the rudiments of a philosophy on the practical side. The 'wisdom,' e.g., of Joseph or Solomon, in the earlier literature of the OT, is 'the clever judicial decision, the faculty of clothing a practical experience in a rule of life or a witty saying, the acuteness which can solve an enigma' (Duncker, quoted by Skinner in Cent. Bible, 'I and II Kings,' p. 88).

Wisdom was not regarded as the peculiar possession of Israel; indeed in certain portions of the OT, Edom is regarded as its home. As time went on, however, and brought the people sorrow and crisis, when trouble pressed hard upon the heart, and faith wavered or declined, Wisdom developed into a serious spirit of inquiry.

A. B. Davidson (Biblical and Literary Essays, London, 1902, p. 29) differentiates the Hebrew Wisdom from the Greek or any other secular philosophy by its standpoint or approach to the problems of the world's life; the former started with God, while the latter reached Him, if at all, only at the end of a long process. The Wisdom of the Hebrews, since it came down from God upon life, was a process of recognition, while secular philosophy was one of discovery. The nature of the Hebrew Wisdom is apparent: 'It is not a view of the Universe distinct from God, much less a view of God distinct from the Universe; it is a view of the Universe with God indwelling in it' (ib., p. 32).

For the understanding of Wisdom, as it appears in the discussions of the Apostolic Age, the Book of Proverbs (chs. 1-9, and especially ch. 8) is of capital importance, for there in germ is the speculation of Philo, and the subsequent identification of Wisdom with the Logos of the Fourth Gospel. 'The eighth chapter of Proverbs, and those associated chapters of the Apocryphal Wisdom-books, are fundamental for the primitive Christology'

(Exp., 8th ser., xii. 169). The development has been thus traced—'the unity of thought and efficiency that animates and operates the world may be abstracted from God, the actual living Operator. . . . This plan or organism of principles may be idealized, and regarded as animated and active, and have consciousness attributed to it, . . . it may become the Fellow of God . . . it may be described as "playing" before God, in the joyous consciousness of power and capacity, and having its delights with the children of men. . . . This remarkable conception is the contribution which the literature of the Wisdom furnishes to the Christology of the Old Testament. . . . There can be no doubt that' this conception of Wisdom 'entered into the Messianic consciousness of Israel, and enriched it; and' it is 'reproduced in the New Testament in connection with the Son. "The Word was with God." "All things were made by Him." "In Him do all things subsist"' (Davidson, pp. 34, 80 f.; the reader may also be referred to an interesting series of papers by Rendel Harris on 'The Origin of the Prologue to St. John's Gospel' in Exp., 8th ser., xii. 161). This Wisdom literature strongly influenced both the Jewish and the Christian Church, but it is, perhaps, in its later developments, in the Book of Wisdom and Sirach, and, above all, in the other Apocrypha and Pseud-epigrapha of the OT, that we can see the developments of thought that enriched and guided Judaism in the age 180 B.C.—A.D. 100 (cf. R. H. Charles, Religious Development between the Old and the New Testaments, London, 1914, p. 184 ff.).

But the Wisdom books, as a preparation for the gospel, raised difficulties which they could not solve, and thus pointed forward to the revelation of God in Christ; through them also contact was made with the Greek world; Judaism and Hellenism met together over the pages of the LXX, especially in its sapiential portions (cf. R. L. Ottley, The Religion of Israel, Cambridge, 1905, pp. 154, 172).

In estimating the influence which OT Wisdom literature had upon thought in the Apostolic Age, regard should be had to the various currents of Judaism, and to the fact that in some cases the Wisdom books have a different outlook from that of the prophetic message. Often 'the counsel of the wise' was chiefly political and secular; even Sirach sometimes commends a line of conduct that is more prudential and self-centred than religious. Above all, we should remember the pervasive influence of Hellenism, especially in a centre like Alexandria, where East and West met and mingled (cf. Hort, The Ante-Nicene Fathers, London, 1895, passim). All these influence the conception of Wisdom as it crosses the path of apostolic Christianity.

2. Wisdom in the Apostolic Age.—The discussion may be confined to the use of the term in 1 Co 1-3. Other references (Eph 1⁸, 17 3¹⁰, Col 1⁹, 23 23, 23) will be covered by that discussion. For it is improbable, e.g., that in Colossæ any definite system was being propagated. The indications point rather to a blend of elements from Eastern faiths with notions and practices current among Jewish circles which were sensible to semi-Alexandrian influences (cf. J. Moffatt, LNT, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 152).

'The Church of God which is at Corinth' explains the vindication which St. Paul had to make of his gospel and the manner in which he presented it as well as the difficulties he found in the defence of Christian teaching and social order. For Corinth was the city of licence. 'He was here confronted not merely by the old religion of polytheism, not only by a stunted or degraded moral sense; the greatest barrier was the prevailing mode of thought, the spiritual atmosphere, the habit of judging everything according to the form, the rhetoric, and the dazzling dialectic with which it was presented, the habit of accepting nothing, of even being willing to hear nothing, which did not respond to these demands' (C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, i. [London, 1897] 311). 'Corinthian words' was only another synonym for rhetoric and the frothy speech with which one intellectual party confuted the opinions of another.

It was not strange, therefore, that these parties should be perpetuated inside the Christian Church, where Jew and Greek met one another, each with his contribution to the preparation for the gospel, or his idiosyncrasy of thought inherited from his fathers. From this there sprang up what has been called 'a Gracised Judaism,' an anticipation of the later Gnostic systems, which endeavoured to construct a theology from an allegorical interpretation of the OT, the loftier forms of philosophy, and also from the ideas and mythologies of various Eastern religions. The process is seen in Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 480 [P.]), whose leading idea is that the Divinely ordained preparation for the gospel ran in two parallel lines, that of the Jewish Law and Prophets, and that of Greek Philosophy (cf. Hort, Ante-Nicene Fathers, p. 88). Thus, in Corinth, Hellenism and Judaism met and mingled, and there sprang from the combination the pseudo-philosophy which is the morbid growth of an intellectual age among a people that has passed its meridian.

The intellectual ferment imported from the city and the schools into the church at Corinth manifested itself in an outcrop of party-feeling and division which at first was of Jewish origin. But the corrupting leaven soon spread in a community that Clement of Rome (Letter to the Church of Corinth, iii.) characterized as prone to faction and quarrel (στάσις), and led away by an unrighteous and impious jealousy (ζήλος).

The difficulties of the Church were increased by the fact that in Corinth the Christian religion had to find its footing on Græco-Roman soil. It was not easy for Hellenic thought to fit itself to the new faith whose centre was a Cross, and one can sympathize with, or at least understand, men of an intellectual type who honestly thought they were doing a service to the good cause in presenting Christianity as a σοφία, and proclaiming its message in terms of the philosophy of the day. 'Greeks seek after wisdom,' but St. Paul's speech and the thing he preached were not in persuasive words of wisdom (1 Co 2⁴ RVm). There is no ground for connecting Apollous with the special method favoured by the Corinthians, which departed from St. Paul's positive doctrine of the Christ, though it may well have been that the eloquent Alexandrian's teaching 'awakened a tendency to further free speculation' (Weizsäcker, i. 322).

From St. Paul's First Epistle we are left in no doubt as to the substance of his first gospel preaching in Corinth. He did not 'begin by opposing idolatry and inculcating monotheism,' and so 'advancing from this basis to the doctrine of redemption, of Christ. . . . He began with the mystery of redemption. . . . He did not begin with those rational principles that might have paved the way for his gospel, but he presented to his hearers in all its strangeness, yet in all its power, the doctrine of the cross' (Weizsäcker, i. 314f.). These are the historical facts he imparted to them in the first instance: 'I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried; and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures; and that he appeared to Cephas; then to the twelve; then he appeared to above five hundred brethren at once, of whom the greater part remain until now, but some are fallen asleep; then he appeared to James; then to all the apostles; and last of all, as unto one born out of due time, he appeared to me also' (1 Co 15³⁻⁸). 'That was absolutely the whole gospel. . . . It was the doctrine with which he began' (Weizsäcker, i. 314).

'Christ! I am Christ's! and let the name suffice you,
Ay, for me too He greatly hath sufficed:
Lo with no winning words I would entice you,
Paul has no honour and no friend but Christ'
(F. W. H. Myers, St. Paul).

From the vehemence with which the Apostle reiterates the staple of his message, one can infer the distaste with which 'the foolishness of the preaching' was received. The cultured and ruling classes rejected it with something of the energy of contemptuous loathing with which cultured Athenians spoke of the οἱ βάρβαροι; it was good enough only for the vulgar, the illiterate, and the base. They, on the other hand, were to be saved by the wisdom of the schools.

To this St. Paul's answer was two-fold: (a) the gospel was not a philosophy to be discussed, but a message of God to be believed (cf. EGT ii. 774); (b) in point of fact, σοφία had not brought them the knowledge of God. The verdict of history had shown that 'the world by wisdom knew not God' (1 Co 1²¹). It has not been saved by dialectic; God 'will not be apprehended by intellectual speculation, by "dry light"' (EGT ii. 769). The wisdom of the world (κόσμος=the material world) in its very nature could not but fail to interpret the spiritual world (1 Co 2¹¹⁻¹²). As a matter of historical fact, reason, apart from a special revelation, has never been able to attain any practical knowledge of God, nor has it been able 'to show to the soul a fountain of cleansing, healing, and life.' These things 'are beyond the limits of man's intellectual tether' (cf. 1 Co 2¹⁴).

The Apostle's experience in Athens (Ac 17¹⁶⁻³⁴) had not encouraged him to meet philosophers on their own ground, and, when he came to Corinth, it was with the deliberate purpose of not commending his message by the devices of rhetorical display, or the arguments of philosophy—'I came not with any striking rhetorical or philosophical display, for I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ, and him crucified' (1 Co 2¹ -). 'When [therefore] eccentric teachers inculcated views which threatened to transform Christianity, to alter, as it were, its centre of gravity, or to pivot it on some new axis, resistance was instinctive' (R. Rainy, The Ancient Catholic Church, p. 95).

This resistance ruled St. Paul's presentation of his message: οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ λόγου, ἵνα μὴ κενώθῃ ὁ σταυρὸς τοῦ Χριστοῦ (1 Co 1¹⁷). 'The term κενοῦν denotes an act which does violence to the object itself, and deprives it of its essence and virtue. Salvation by the cross is a Divine act which the conscience must appropriate as such. If one begins with presenting it to the understanding in the form of a series of well-linked ideas, as the result of a theory concerning man and God, it may happen that the mind will be nourished by it, but as by a system of wisdom, and not a way of salvation. . . . The fact evaporates in ideas, and no longer acts on the conscience with the powerful reality which determines conversion' (F. Godet, Com. on St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, Edinburgh, 1893, i. 89).

Denney in illustration of this point instances a Hindu Society which had for its object to appropriate all that was good in Christianity without burdening itself with the rest. 'Among other things which it appropriated, with the omission of only two words, was the answer given in the Westminster Shorter Catechism to the question, What is repentance unto life? Here is the answer. "Repentance unto life is a saving grace, whereby a sinner, out of a true sense of his sin, and apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, doth with grief and hatred of his sin turn from it unto God, with full purpose of, and endeavour after, new obedience. The words the Hindus left out were in Christ; instead of "apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ" they read simply, "apprehension of the mercy of God." But they knew that this was not compromising. They were acute enough to see that in the words they left out the whole Christianity of the definition lay' (Studies in Theology, London, 1894, p. 130). St. Paul perceived that by the abstractions of Greek philosophy the gospel would be emptied (κενῶν) of its significance and power, and his answer to this was: 'We preach Christ'—not a system, but a Person—and Christ as crucified.

His method was justified by his experience of the Corinthian Church. Even though 'by the enticing words of man's wisdom' a number of intellectually disposed Greeks had been attracted to the Church, in the absence of what has been called 'profound conscience-work,' the results were not lasting. 'The wants of the understanding and imagination had, in many cases, more to do with their adherence than those of the heart and conscience' (F. Godet, 1 Corinthians, i. 18). From the Corinthian letter we can see that there was an outcrop of old pagan habits and a reversion to type among men who had never really been evangelized. This was another evidence of the failure of wisdom as a substitute for 'the word of the cross.'

Yet, while the Apostle rebukes and resists the superficial σοφία of the Corinthians, he also has his wisdom by which he relates the fact of Christ and 'the word of the cross' to his general view of the world: 'unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, [we preach] Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God' (1 Co 1²⁴). Thus he appropriates for the Crucified the 'power' and 'wisdom' of God, terms which were recognized 'synonyms of the Λόγος in the Alexandrian-Jewish speculations' (EGT, in loc.). But, since the Corinthians were no philosophers (1 Co 1²⁶), 'we speak wisdom among them that are perfect' (2⁶), i.e. his philosophy is intelligible only to the initiated and to the spiritually mature. To them all the things that God hath prepared are revealed. There is a wisdom; it is a revelation, not a discovery but a recognition (cf. Hebrew Wisdom, ut supra); it is mediated to men by the Spirit, and otherwise it cannot be discerned. This wisdom the Apostle would have proclaimed ab initio, for it is no esoteric doctrine; but how could he? The Corinthians were Christians, they had believed (3⁵) but they had not yet (οὐπω) reached the stage of a purely spiritual appreciation. 'There is nothing esoteric in Christianity, but the presentation of it has to be adapted to the capacities of those who are taught' (J. E. McFadyen, The Epistles to the Corinthians, London, 1911, p. 46). Of some things our Lord said to the Twelve, 'Ye cannot bear them now' (Jn 16¹²), and He pointed them to the revealing Spirit who would bring them into the full knowledge of the truth. Similarly, concerning the preaching of the true wisdom, St. Paul says, 'I was not able (οὐκ ἠδυνήθην), because ye were not yet able (οὐπω ἔδυνασθε)' (1 Co 3¹⁻²).

3. Humanism versus Christianity. — Apart from its application to the experience of the Apostolic Church, St. Paul's discussion of wisdom has timeless interests in its bearing on the evangelization of the world, and on the true method of what is called evangelical preaching. R. Flint (Sermons and Addresses, Edinburgh, 1899) raises the subject in a discourse on the text 'Christ is made unto us wisdom.' 'There were people,' he says, 'who thought he [Paul] might profitably have imitated admired philosophers and popular orators; that he should have had a wider range of subjects and used more enticing words. Those foolish Corinthians have many successors among ourselves, who fancy that the pulpit would gain greatly in power if ministers would only discourse more about science and philosophy, nature and history, political and social reform, and the various so-called questions of the day. . . . The power of the pulpit will most certainly not be increased by ministers forsaking their own glorious work, the direct preaching of Christ, for the lecturing on lower themes. . . . The power of the pulpit lies in preaching Christ, and will be strong or feeble according as He is faithfully and zealously or faithlessly and coldly preached' (p. 217). The persuasions to depart from the centre which Flint, himself a great preacher, so energetically repudiates meet every minister on the very threshold of his office, and are echoed again and again in the more or less strident voices of the world. There is always the aversion of men of taste to evangelical religion, from Corinth to the present day. 'If our connection with Christianity is nothing better than a mixture of captious criticism and transient enthusiasm, with a dash of graceful posing thrown in, we are in danger . . . of just playing with Christ's religion—playing, too, in the marketplace, surrounded by the realities of life and death, where business has to be done with God. The grace and gospel of Jesus are too serious to be thus trifled with. Their genius and office are not to be profaned by æsthetic handling either in the pulpit or in the pew' (J. Moffatt, Reasons and Reasons, London, 1911, p. 137). One does not need to be an obscurantist or illiberal in turning back again to St. Paul as he contends for the purity and simplicity of the gospel message and vindicates its power. In every generation there will be found some who decry it as 'weak and foolish,' yet history has abundantly justified the power of the word of the Cross, and also the apostolic method in the delivery of the message. The victory over the world has never been with 'moonlight theology' or 'extra-mural Christianity.' Philo was a contemporary of St. Paul, but Philonism did not save the world; it was the simple, unaffected word of the Cross from a preacher such as St. Paul that won the Roman Empire, and brought—what Greek philosophy had failed to bring—a real knowledge of God to bond and free. If a system is to be judged by its fruits, if a method of preaching is to be so judged, one may well endorse the words, 'I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God' (Ro 1¹⁶). If Humanism and Christianity be placed on their trial as instruments for the regeneration of the mass of mankind, Christianity has no need to blush for its record, while philosophy, as regards the mass of mankind, has been a light only to itself and an ornament. The contrast between St. Paul and the Corinthian seekers after wisdom is seen in historical examples; in the message of Luther and Erasmus; the Evangelical Revival, 'by its intense reality, its earnestness of belief, its deep tremulous sympathy with the sin and sorrows of mankind, did what no intellectual movement could, it changed in a few years the whole temper of English Society' (J. R. Green, A Short History of the English People, London, 1882, p. 718). Thomas Chalmers draws a sad picture of the failure of his earlier ministry, when he preached apart from the Centre, or, as St. Paul would say, laid another foundation for life than that which had been laid. When the light of the Cross broke upon him, his method was changed, and the fruit appeared, and that not only in specifically religious results, but also in the social reforms that the old method (directly as it had sought them) failed to produce.

Amiel, who will not be suspected of narrowness, or bondage to old forms, speaking of the efficacy of religion, writes: 'When the cross became the "foolishness" of the cross, it took possession of the masses. And in our own day, those who wish to get rid of the supernatural, to enlighten religion, to economise faith, find themselves deserted, like poets who should declaim against poetry, or women who should decry love. . . . It is the forgetfulness of this psychological law which stultifies the so-called liberal Christianity. It is the realisation of it which constitutes the strength of Catholicism' (Journal, Eng. tr., London, 1891, p. 171). In 'Cleon,' Browning adopts the same attitude in his study of the failure of paganism, even in its forms of highest culture, to solve the riddle of human life and to answer the requirements of the human spirit. Cleon has heard of Paulus and of Christus, but who can suppose that a mere barbarian Jew 'Hath access to a secret shut from us'?

The doctrine of Christ preached on the island by certain slaves is reported by an intelligent listener to be one which no sane man can accept. And Cleon will not squander his time on the futile creed of slaves (Poetical Works, London, 1883, v. 299). But wisdom is justified of her children. The best Humanism is founded upon the word of the Cross, because it appeals to needs that are common to all the generations of men. This is the Wisdom St. Paul preached: Christ Jesus who was made unto us Wisdom—that is to say, righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption (1 Co 1³⁰); 'a triangular constellation, with Wisdom reigning in splendour in the centre' (cf. A. B. Macaulay, The Word of the Cross, London, 1912, p. 162f.).

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Wisdom' in HDB iv. and EBi iv.; art. 'Philo' in HDB v.; A. B. Davidson, Biblical and Literary Essays, London, 1902, p. 23; R. L. Ottley, The Religion of Israel, Cambridge, 1906, p. 172; R. H. Charles, Religious Development between the Old and the New Testaments, London, 1914, p. 206; C. F. Kent, The Makers and Teachers of Judaism (Historical Bible), do., 1911, p. 162; Expt viii. [1896-97] 393; Exp. 8th ser., xii. 161 ff.; C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, I., Eng. tr.², London, 1897, p. 303 ff.; F. J. A. Hort, Six Lectures on the Ante-Nicene Fathers, do., 1895, passim; R. Rainy, The Ancient Catholic Church, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 95; M. Dods, An Introduction to the NT, London, 1888, pp. 100, 139 ff.; EGT, do., 1900, ad loc.; ICC, '1 Corinthians,' Edinburgh, 1911 (Robertson and Plummer), 'Ephesians and Colossians,' do., 1897 (T. K. Abbott); R. Flint, Sermons and Addresses, do., 1899, p. 213. W. M. GRANT.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON.—1. Place in Canon.—This apocryphal book is not quoted by name in the NT, unless the citation from 'the wisdom of God' in Lk 11⁴⁹ can be regarded as a paraphrase of Wis 2^{18, 20}, but it is used in the Epistle to the Romans where 9²¹ is a reproduction of Wis 15⁷, while in the Epistle to the Hebrews 1³ is a reference to Wis 15³⁶ (for, indeed, the word παιδαγωγία occurs nowhere else in the NT); further, in Mt 27⁴³ a reference to Wis 2¹⁸ appears to be conflated with one to Ps 22⁸, which perhaps has displaced the former ('If the just man be the son of God, he will help him and deliver him from his enemies'), though enough remains to permit of the identification. The quotation in 1 Co 15⁴⁵ bears some relation to Wis 15¹¹ (where the ψυχή ενεργούσα and πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν are distinguished like the ψυχή ζῶσα and πνεῦμα ζωοποιούν in the quotation), but is not likely to be taken directly from it.

The work was, therefore, accepted by the early Church as part of the OT, and figures as such in the Canon of Melito (c. A.D. 170), though some MSS of Eusebius alter the text (HE iv. xxxiii. 15) so as to identify it with Proverbs, and this method is followed in the Syriac version. It is cited by Irenæus (Hær. iv. 37, noticed by Eusebius, HE v. 29); as 'the Prophet' by Hippolytus (adv. Judæos, iv. 16); as 'Solomon' by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. vii. 120); and as 'Scripture' by Dionysius of Alexandria (c. A.D. 260; M. J. Routh, Reliquiæ Sacrae, 4 vols., Oxford, 1814-18, ii. 406); also by early Latin Fathers, e.g. Tertullian (adv. Valentin. 2). Eusebius in the 4th cent. classifies it with the Antilegomena (HE vi. xiii. 6), and Epiphanius (Hær. i. i. 6) says the Jews have it, but regard it as of doubtful authenticity. Jerome says (Præf. in Proverbia) 'apud Hebræos nusquam est.' In the Muratorian Canon it is said to have been written by Solomon's friends in his honour. It would seem then that its authenticity was assumed in the early Church, but that about the beginning of the 4th cent. its place in the Canon became insecure.

Nothing, it appears, is to be learned about it from the Jewish writers of the 1st cent., Philo and Josephus. To the former Solomon is 'one of Moses' disciples,' and the author of the Proverbs; he shows no acquaintance with the remarkable comments of Wisdom on the manna. Josephus (Ant. viii. ii. 5) transcribes what is said of Solomon's works in Kings, and adds that he had left a collection of charms and spells whereby demons could be controlled; this, as we learn from Bab. Gittin, 68a, was ultimately based on an interpretation of Ec 2¹. The references to it in the Oral Tradition will be noticed in the next section.

2. The language.—Although the Greek, whence the remaining texts which we possess are in the main derived, is exceedingly ambitious and at times eloquent, the literary form of large portions (especially chs. 1-9) in which the Hebrew parallelism is observed indicates that Greek is not the original language in which the work was composed; for those Israelites who composed original works in Greek naturally adopted Hellenic literary styles, the tragedian Ezekiel (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. xxiii. 155) writing iambics, the Jewish Sibyl hexameters, and Josephus imitating Thucydides. Further, numerous passages display the irresponsibility of a translator. That the original language was Hebrew is made certain by the preservation in the Jewish Oral Tradition (Genesis Rabba, 96, and Jer. Hagiga, ii. 1) of a fragment which is clearly grossly mistranslated in 14¹⁰¹, καὶ γὰρ τὸ πρᾶχθεν συν τῷ δράσαντι κολασθήσεται· διὰ τοῦτο καὶ ἐν εἰδώλοις ἐθνῶν ἐπισκοπῇ ἔσται, 'for that which is done shall be punished with the doer; on this account there shall be a visitation also on the idols of the Gentiles,' where the first proposition is meaningless, while the attempt to give it a meaning in the AV, 'for that which was made shall be punished together with him that made it,' assigns to the two verbs πράττειν and δρᾶν a sense which they have in no Greek writing of any period,* and introduces a proposition which is very little better than the other. The true proposition is 'that which is worshipped (הַנִּיבָר) shall be punished together with the worshipper (הַמִּבָּר);' wherefore he says "and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgements" (Ex 12¹²). The verb נִבָּר in both Jewish and Christian Aramaic frequently represents the Greek πράττειν, and this sense of 'to do' is wrongly given it in the LXX of Dt 12³⁰; that the Greek of Wisdom is in this case a mistranslation of the maxim quoted by the Rabbis does not therefore admit of question. And, as the text occurs in the middle of a paragraph with which it is closely related, the inference drawn extends further than the actual verse.

* In 15⁶ of ἔδωκεν means 'the doers,' but is a mistranslation of הַעֲשִׂים, Ps 115⁸.

The work is otherwise used by the Oral Tradition, yet perhaps not in such a way as to permit of any inference with regard to its language. In Exodus Rabba, 25, the manna is described as 'having in it all sorts of tastes, so that each Israelite was tasting what he wished'; this represents Wis 16²⁰, πρὸς πᾶσαν ἡδονὴν ἰσχύοντα καὶ πρὸς πᾶσαν ἀρμόνιον γεύσειν, but the correspondence is not quite literal. In Mechilta, 13, on Ex 12³⁰ (= Pesikta, 7) it is stated that, when the first-born of any Egyptian died, the father made an image of him, which he set up in his house; this comes from Wis 14¹⁸, where it is suggested that idolatry thus arose, the intention being also to account for the apparent identification of the gods of Egypt with their first-born in Ex 12¹². The Oral Tradition employs it for a different purpose; if its phrase אִינוּן אֶרֶץ be the original of εἰκόνα ποιήσας, the language must have already been affected by Greek. In the Midrash Tanchuma, i. 79b (ed. Warsaw, 1879), the substance of 18⁴ is thus given: 'they [the Egyptians] thought to bind them [the Israelites] in the prison-house; He brought upon them the darkness.' In Bab. Sanh. 63b (end) the substance of 14^{12, 13} is represented by 'the Israelites knew that the idols had no reality in them and only worshipped them in order to consummate unlawful unions,' though the correspondence may be accidental.

The text of 14¹² appears to contain an indication of the language in which the book was written, but it is not easy to interpret. 'Moreover this was not enough for them that they erred in the knowledge of God; but whereas they live in a great war of ignorance, they call such great evils peace' (τα τοσαῦτα κακά εἰρήνην προσαγορεύουσιν). It is certain that the Greek word εἰρήνη is not a name for any idolatrous system; but the Hebrew phrase 'to call peace to' (קראו להם שלום, Jg 21¹³; cf. Dt 20¹⁰) means not to designate by the name 'peace,' but to invite to peace, or offer friendship to; and this is what the phrase appears to signify in the passage cited, since the justification of the proposition in what follows is that the idolaters keep on perpetrating various atrocities. The thought is then somewhat like 1¹⁶.

The fact of the work being a translation accounts for the infelicity of many passages, in some of which the underlying Hebrew can be restored with certainty, e.g. 4¹³, ὄψονται καὶ ἐξουθενήσουσιν, 'they shall see and despise,' where the context requires 'they shall see and pine away'; the original יבאסו, which signifies both, can be restored with certainty from Ps 112¹⁰; in 13¹⁰, 'or a useless stone, the work of an ancient hand,' 'useless' is the new-Hebrew sense of פסול, which should have been rendered 'carved.' The word 'hand' should probably have been 'monument,' which is another sense of the Hebrew word for 'hand.' In 3¹³, ἥτις οὐκ ἔγνω κολήν ἐν παραπτώματι, the last words probably stand for Hebrew בעל (as in Ezk 3²⁰, 18²⁶) and should have been rendered γαμμήν. In 12²², ἡμᾶς οὖν παιδεύων τοὺς ἐχθρούς ἡμῶν ἐν μετριότητι μακρογυίας, the sense required by the argument is 'in order to teach us Thon dost chastise our enemies with leniency'; ἐν μετριότητι, 'in ten-thousand-ness,' is apparently a mistranslation of some Hebrew word which seemed to be an abstract noun from רבו or רבה, but it is not clear what; possibly רבה read רבה, since these letters are confused in many scripts. In 19⁹ (of the Israelites in the bed of the Red Sea), ὡς γὰρ ἱπποὶ ἐνεμήθησαν καὶ ὡς ἄνθρωποι διεσκέπησαν, 'they fed like horses and skipped like lambs,' the author clearly did not intend 'fed'; from Is 63¹³ as explained by Kimchi it would seem that the original had רוּ, 'they ran' (used of horses in Jl 2⁴, Am 6¹²), misread רוּ. Kimchi's words are, 'just like the horse which runs (הרץ) in the desert where there is no stone nor mud whereon he can stumble, so the Israelites were able to run (הרץ) on that sea-bed.'

In many cases, however, the phrase employed shows clear signs of mistranslation, but restoration of the original is difficult; examples are 1¹⁶ 'thinking him a friend they melted,' where the sense requires something like 'they summoned him'; 7⁴ 'I was reared in swaddling-clothes and cares'; 4^{19a} 'for he will break them voiceless prone'; 5⁷ 'we were filled (ἐνεπλήσθημεν) with the paths of lawlessness and destruction'; 12²⁴ 'thinking gods the despicable even among the beasts of the enemies'; 18³⁰ ἥλιον δὲ ἀβλαβῆ φιλοτιμου ξενιτείας παρέσχες. These last words are in any case a paraphrase of Ex 13²² 'and by night a pillar of fire to give light to them'; but by what process this has become 'a harmless sun of ambitious peregrination,' which appears to be an absolutely meaningless combination of words, is exceedingly obscure.

The notion that Greek is the original language of the book is probably due to its containing paragraphs which, both in style and in content, bear little resemblance to the OT. Against this we must set the fact that it is replete with Hebraisms (e.g. 9⁵ 'I am thy slave and the son of thine handmaid,' v. 9 'knowing what is pleasing in thine eyes, and straight [הישר] in thy commandments,' v. 10^b 'send her from the throne of thy glory' כסא כבודך, Jer 14²¹), v. 11^c 'and she shall guard me in her glory' [apparently a confusion of חדרה, 'her chamber, with הררה as in Sir 14²⁷]). It is most improbable that so ambitious a stylist as the person responsible for the Greek of this book would have admitted these idioms had his hands been free; but as a translator he could avoid them only with the greatest difficulty. Sometimes he takes the trouble, e.g. 5^{14d}, where μετὰ καταλίστου μονομήμερον probably stands for Jeremiah's נחם ללון בארם (14⁸) or something equally simple.

The general elaboration of the Greek makes it probable that the translation is far from faithful; and in a few cases references to Greek authors can be identified. In 18¹⁶ the Almighty Word which slew the first-born of the Egyptians is said to have 'touched heaven, while standing upon the earth,' καὶ οὐρανοῦ μὲν ἤπτετο, βεβήκει δ' ἐπὶ γῆς; the original of the phrase seems to be found in 1 Ch 21¹⁶, where the destroying angel 'stands between heaven and earth'; yet the Greek of Wisdom may be influenced by the description of Strife in Il. iv. 443, οὐρανῷ ἐστήριψε κάρη, καὶ ἐπὶ χθονὶ βαίνει. The fragment preserved in the Oral Tradition indicates that the original did not exhibit the phenomenon which characterizes the Greek—complete absence of proper names. Thus in the latter the patriarchs and others are designated by such epithets as 'the just one,' 'the servant of the Lord,' 'the refugee from his brother's wrath,' the nearest approach to a proper name being the Red Sea, and rentapolis, used of the cities of the Plain. The proper names Noah, Moses, Jacob, etc., are usually supplied by the Syriac version, which is (at any rate in the main) made from the Greek. The most probable explanation of their omission in the latter is a stylistic objection to the use of barbarous words in a Hellenic text. Josephus resorts where possible to such expedients as substituting 'Ægisthe' for 'Haggith,' 'Chalkens' for 'Calcol,' in order to deal with this difficulty. Plato (Critias, 113A) explains how in his narrative Egyptians come to have Hellenic names; Solon had translated them! Even in the Iliad the Trojans with rare exceptions have Greek names owing to this sentiment.

3. Date and authorship.—The date of the Greek text can be fixed only by its relation to other books. There can be little doubt that it is quoted in the Pauline Epistles; yet this would not necessarily imply that it was earlier than Philo, to whose language and even style it occasionally shows some resemblance. So late a date, however, seems to be excluded by the fact that it appears to have been used by the LXX translator of Isaiah; for the rendering of Is 3¹⁰, 'say of the righteous that it is well,' by ῥησάμεν τὸν δίκαιον ὅτι δόσχητος ἡμῖν ἔστιν, 'let us bind the righteous because he is disagreeable to us,' is most easily explained as a reminiscence of Wis 2¹², ἐνεδρευσάμεν τὸν δίκαιον ὅτι δόσχητος ἡμῖν ἔστιν, since on the one hand the adjective belongs to the choice vocabulary of the latter rather than to that of the Greek Isaiah, and on the other the substitution of the 1st for the 2nd person seems to require this explanation; for if ῥησά had been merely misread ῥησ, the 2nd person would have been retained. The same account is probably to be given of LXX Is 41²⁰ compared with Wis 15¹¹, while in 11²² of the latter the substitution of 'a drop of morning dew descending to the earth' for 'a drop of a bucket' (Is 40¹⁵) makes it improbable that the Greek of Wisdom is borrowing from that of Isaiah. Since the LXX translation of Isaiah cannot well be later than 150 B.C., that of Wisdom should be somewhat earlier than that date.

On the other hand, it is probably later than the LXX translation of the Pentateuch, since it exhibits certain technicalities which are likely to have been introduced by that work, e.g. ὀλοκάνωμα, ποδῆρης, ἐξέλασμός, χειροποίητον for לִבְיָא, בְּדֵלִימָא for הִתְנַה, etc. Yet where passages of the Pentateuch are reproduced the translator of Wisdom did not always consult the LXX, e.g. 18⁶, ἐκείνη ἡ νῦν προεγνώσθη πατράσιν ἡμῶν represents Ex 12⁴², לֵב הָא זֶה הָא, where the LXX renders the words differently. In 16⁻¹ the unintelligible ἡ μὲν γὰρ ὑπόστασις σου τὴν σὴν πρὸς τέκνα γλυκύτητα ἐνεφάνισε appears to treat the word לָב, 'white,' in Ex 16³¹ as the Hebrew for 'to a son,' where the LXX renders the word correctly.

The character of the language is probably in agreement with the date thus indicated, i.e. about 200 B.C.

The relation of the original work to the books of the OT is very much more difficult to determine. Except for the statement of the author that he had been commanded by God to build the Temple in imitation of the Tabernacle (9⁸), wherein he clearly claims to be Solomon, its historical information scarcely goes beyond Numbers, the last event narrated being the plague described in Nu 17⁹⁻¹⁰ (18²³). There are, indeed, numerous cases in which the matter contained in Wisdom is parallel to passages in the other books of the OT; in some of these, if we could trust the canon that the author of a passage is the person who understands it best, we should certainly assign the priority to Wisdom. Thus in Dt 8³ the lesson of the manna is said to have been 'that man does not live by bread alone, but by every utterance of the mouth of God'—an obscure proposition, since the manna is repeatedly called 'bread'; and even if it be admitted that the Deuteronomist does not allow it that title (29⁹), the 'utterance of the mouth of God' is far from clear. In Wis 16²⁶ the lesson is worded 'that the fruits which grow do not feed the man, but Thy word maintains them that trust in Thee,' and it is inferred from the fact that the nutritive power of the manna was dependent on the observation of certain precepts: collected in the morning, it would resist the heat of the oven; but the heat of the sun would melt it, etc. Hence the nutritive power must have lain in the observation of the precepts, not in the substance itself. Were there no other facts to be considered, we should naturally regard the text of Deuteronomy as a mis-statement of the passage of Wisdom.

Much the same is to be said of the description of the making of wooden images: Is 44¹²⁻¹⁹ 40²⁰, compared with Wis 13¹¹⁻¹⁶. In the latter the carpenter selects suitable timber* for some article of furniture, uses the chippings to cook his food, and, if some crooked and knotty piece remain which is of no use for either purpose, fashions it in his leisure into a god. In the account in Isaiah, 'half of it he burneth in the fire; on half of it he eateth flesh, he roasteth roast and is satisfied; yea he warmeth himself; and the residue thereof he maketh a god,' wherein apparently two parts of the timber are employed as firewood, and the remainder used for the idol—the important matter, that the primary object was a piece of furniture, the secondary firewood, being forgotten by the prophet, yet very clearly somehow in his mind. The fact that the idol so fashioned has then to be secured by a nail appears in its right place in Wis 13¹⁵, whereas in Is 41⁷ it is remembered, but is out of its right place; further, Is 41⁶⁻⁷ gives the appearance of being a confused reminiscence of Wis 15⁹, where the potter is shown to be the most contemptible of all idol-makers, for, instead of reflecting that he is clay himself, he tries to rival the goldsmith and the worker in bronze.

Similarly, whereas, according to the author of the Book of Kings, Solomon was told in a dream to make a wish and chose wisdom, the account of the matter in this book is much less fantastic; he was, he says, a lad of great talent, and pursued the study with all his might, employing among other expedients prayer. In the prayer (9⁷) he says: 'Thou hast chosen me to be king of thy people, and judge of thy sons and daughters'; in Kings, in lieu of this modest description of his subjects, he calls them (1 K 3⁸) 'a great people, that cannot be numbered nor counted for multitude,' which in the Chronicles (2 Ch 1⁹) is improved to 'a people like the dust of the earth in multitude.' Here too sobriety is on the side of Wisdom.

Internal evidence then, at least to some extent, would be in favour of making Wisdom older than the OT books which contain these parallels; nor is it easy to charge the writer—on the supposition that the work is pseudonymous—with any actual anachronism; thus, whereas Philo gives as the list of his own accomplishments ('the handmaids of Wisdom,' ed. Mangey, i. 530) grammar, geometry, and music, those claimed for Solomon (7¹⁷⁻²⁰) are 'to know how the world was made and the operation of the elements, the beginning, ending, and midst of the times (i.e. probably ancient, modern, and mediæval history), the alterations of the turnings (of the sun) and the change of seasons, the circuits of years and the position of stars, the natures of living creatures and the dispositions of beasts, the forces of the winds and the reasonings of men, the diversities of plants and the virtues of roots'—a list which shows little sign of Greek influence, but is much more suggestive of the learning of Egypt, Phœnicia, and Arabia. It may be observed that 'the operation of the elements,' i.e. the use to which substances can be put, is thought by many to be what is meant by knowledge of good and evil in Gn 3⁵. The most decided Hellenism in the book appears to be the Platonic tetrad of the virtues in 8⁷, which, however, is likely (cf. the Syriac version) to be an introduction of the Greek editor. And, with regard to those ideas which are peculiarly Jewish, too little is known of the real history of the Israelitish mind to permit of any certain chronology of its products.

Besides this, it seems surprising that an author of such marked ability should employ a pseudonym, * εὐκρίνον ξύλον, of which the original seems to be נָחַל עֵץ; Exodus Rabba, 15, in a similar context, misread נָחַל. The Armenian has this right, phait geghetsik.

and in particular adopt the mask of Solomon, in whose mouth the fierce condemnation of idolatry is peculiarly inappropriate, whilst the attack on unlawful unions and their fruit is scarcely tolerable. On the other hand, it is undoubtedly true that the tone and style of many sections are suggestive of a date many centuries later than Solomon; side by side with passages which in sublimity are equal to the most striking parts of the prophecies and the Psalms, there are some which resemble the subtleties of the Midrash and the mechanical rhetoric of Philo. There is, however, the greatest difficulty in assigning any date to matters which come in these categories. Thus with regard to the definition of fear in 17¹², 'fear is nothing but the betrayal of the succours provided by the reasoning,' Goodrick (ad loc.) says: 'This sententious statement is probably direct from the lips of some Greek teacher in the schools of Alexandria.' He is, however, unable to quote any definition by Greek philosophers which remotely resembles it, and no author can be charged with borrowing until his source has been indicated. The sentence which follows in the Greek is so mistranslated as to be unintelligible.

It would seem then that, without a longer specimen of the original than the fragment preserved in the Midrash, location of the work is impossible.

4. Contents.—The work falls into three main divisions: (1) 1-6¹⁴, addressed to rulers who are warned against tyranny on the ground of future judgment; this portion is entirely in verse of the Hebrew style; (2) 6¹²-8²¹, definitions of Wisdom and a brief autobiography; (3) 9-end, containing the author's prayer to the Divine Being, into which homilies on the early biblical history are inserted. In the two last sections verse and prose are mixed.

In all three parts the author expresses some remarkable views. The first is noteworthy for the account of the conspiracy to kill the Just Man by a shameful death, whose resurrection, however, brings confusion on the conspirators, who are now convinced that His claim to be the Son of God was no idle boast. This passage (2¹-5²³) seems closely related to Is 53, while some of the traits resemble the description of the fate of the Just Man in Plato's Republic, bk. ii.; it is, however, far nearer the Christian conception of the Passion than either of those passages, and appears to have been of great importance in the formation of that conception. When in Mt 27⁶⁴ those who watch the portents that arose at the Crucifixion infer that 'this was the Son of God,' Wis 5¹⁷⁻²³ would seem to furnish the argument.

In the second section the author gives an account of Wisdom so worded that the Greeks would without hesitation have identified her with their goddess Athene, who in the Homeric poems, as the early commentators observed, is the forethought, skill, and virtue of the characters. By entering from generation to generation into holy souls she reproduces friends of God and prophets. His theory, then, of prophecy is that afterwards formulated by Maximus of Tyre (Dissert. 13), according to whom it is an intensified form of knowledge; the person whose knowledge of the conditions is most thorough will best be able to foretell the result. Thus Wisdom is 'a radiation of eternal light, a stainless mirror of the divine activity, and an image of His goodness' (7²⁶). His idea of this 'radiation' is materialistic; it is a substance so fine as to be able to penetrate all other things, which it also excels in rapidity. In the long list of epithets whereby he endeavours to describe it (7²²⁻⁴¹), it is probable that each was intended to convey some feature, but, if the passage be a translation, we cannot always be sure that the sense has been given faithfully.

In the third section the author applies his theory of Wisdom to the national records, and is doubtless to some extent a rationalist; if, e.g., Wisdom enabled Noah to save the human race from the Flood, the meaning is evidently that Noah possessed the knowledge which enabled him to foretell the catastrophe and devise means to escape it. And, indeed, when he asserts that Wisdom became a shade in the day and a star-flame at night (10¹⁷) and brought 'them' through the Red Sea (v. 18), he very probably implies some Euhemeristic interpretation of the miracles. On the other hand, while apparently accepting the miraculous narratives, he endeavours to show the Divine wisdom which they involved. Comparison between the treatment meted out to the Canaanites and the Egyptians leads him to discuss pagan worships, which he attributes to intellectual feebleness; the most excusable are to his mind the various forms of nature-worship, the least excusable the cult of clay images. To idolatry he attributes all the vices, and dwells especially on its connexion with sexual immorality and infanticide. The work ends with powerful descriptions of various scenes of the Exodus, wherein the appropriateness of the punishments is especially emphasized.

5. Value of the work.—From the point of view of intellectual ability the work is incomparably superior to the rest of the Apocrypha; besides containing many brilliant aphorisms it displays a capacity for continuous and consistent thinking which is rare in Semitic products. As an expounder of Scripture the author exhibits great ability. We may notice his proof of man's potential immortality from the fact that in the story of creation everything is commanded 'to be'; there is no mention of a death-plant (whereas there is of a tree of life), and the sovereignty of the earth is given not to Hades but to man (13^{13, 14}). The work was probably of the greatest importance in securing the early progress of Christianity. Of Scriptures showing 'that Christ ought to have suffered these things and enter into his glory' (Lk 24⁶) there is none comparable in clearness with Wis 2-5, and the potency of this weapon in the hands of such controversialists as Hippolytus is probably what occasioned the loss of the book to the Synagogue. The Resurrection and the Final Judgment are taught with a clearness and certainty to which the OT offers no parallel. Further, Christian controversy with pagans would seem to have been directed by the discussion of idolatry which occupies chs. 13-15. In St. Paul's address to the Athenians the words (Ac 17²¹) ζητεῖν τὸν θεὸν ἐλθέτωσαν αὐτὸν καὶ εὐραῖον seem to be a reminiscence of θεὸν ζητοῦντες καὶ θέλοντες εὐρεῖν in the same context in Wis 13⁶, and the words which follow in the address, χρυσῷ ἢ ἀργύρῳ ἢ λίθῳ, χαράγματι τέχνης καὶ ἐνθυμήσεως ἀνθρώπου, paraphrase what follows in Wisdom (13¹⁰), ἔργα χειρῶν ἀνθρώπων χρυσὸν καὶ ἀργυρὸν, τεχνῆς ἐμμελέτημα. Further, the list of crimes which in Ro 1²⁵⁻³¹ is said to be the result of idolatry appears to be a rearrangement of Wis 14²³⁻²⁸. The notion of a spiritual Israel which is found in the Pauline Epistles is to some extent anticipated by, even if it be not actually based on, the theory of Wisdom that the righteous are the sons of God, and Israel are the righteous.

6. The text.—The variants of the Greek MSS are for the most part of slight importance, but in a few cases they suggest revision from a Hebrew original; so 10¹ ἐξέλατο, MS 68 ἐξέτεινεν, perhaps העלה and העלה; 14¹⁶ ἐφύλαχθη, MSS 106, 261 ὠνομάσθη, perhaps הכריז and הכריז; 9⁹ ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς, MS 248 ἐνώπιον. Where the Greek is obscure, it is often difficult to decide whether this is due to mistranslation or corruption; such a case is 15¹³, καὶ τὰ ζῶα δὲ τὰ ἐχθίστα σέβονται· ἀνοία γὰρ συγκρινομένη τῶν ἀλλων ἐστὶ χεῖρονα.

Of the ancient versions the Peshitta Syriac, the Latin, and the Armenian are of some importance for the criticism of the text. The first of these appears to be made from the Greek, which it often seriously mistranslates; there are, however, passages where it offers what seems to be the sense intended by the author, where the Greek text misrepresents it—e.g. 8⁶, for εἰ δὲ φρόνησις ἐργάζεται the Syriac offers 'if a man desires to do handicraft,' which is certainly more like what was meant. It seems doubtful whether in any case these varieties can convincingly be ascribed to the use of a Hebrew original. The Latin seems to have preserved a line lost in the Greek copies, 28^b; in some places it shows curious agreement with the Syriac—e.g. 9¹⁷ 14¹⁹, 'qui se assumpsit' for τῷ κρατῶντι, which in Syriac is naturally represented in this way. The Armenian has some noteworthy renderings—e.g. 15⁷, 'on the [potter's] wheel' for ἐπιμοχθον, which appears to be what was intended. The source of these is obscure.

LITERATURE.—The Commentary of A. T. S. Goodrick, London, 1913, in the Oxford Church Bible Commentary, surpasses its predecessors. See also E. Schürer, HJP ii. iii. (Edinburgh, 1886) 230 ff.; F. Susemihl, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur in der Alexandrinerzeit, Leipzig, 1891, ii. 621; W. Bousset, *Die Religion des Judentums im neutest. Zeitalter*², Berlin, 1906.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

WITCHCRAFT.—See DIVINATION.

WITNESS.—In confirmation of the gospel message the NT appeals to two kinds of witness, in themselves distinct, but serving the same end.

1. The human witness to Christ.—The primary business of the Apostles was to testify as eye-witnesses to the facts of the earthly life of Christ and above all to His resurrection. The ability to do this was the qualification demanded in the successor to Judas (Ac 1²²), and the ground on which the Apostles justified their claim to preach Jesus (Ac 2³² 3¹⁵ 5³² 10³⁹) and to speak with authority in the Church (1 P 5¹). This witness could be borne only by those who had been specially chosen to do so, and had been trained by personal communion with the risen Christ (Ac 10⁴¹, 1 Jn 1-4¹⁴). It is noticeable that St. Paul is careful to show that he had experienced this, though not in the same way as that in which it had been granted to the older apostles (Ac 22¹⁵, 1 Co 9¹). It soon became clear that this witness must be given at the risk of liberty and life, and, though in the NT μαρτυρ does not pass absolutely into the sense of 'martyr' (see MARTYR), yet in Rev. the μαρτυρία 'Ἰησοῦ, in nearly every case, is connected with suffering (e.g. 1⁹ 6⁹ 20⁴). In 1 Ti 6¹³ a like connexion of ideas is applied to our Lord Himself, who is said to have 'witnessed the good confession' before Pontius Pilate. A similar sense may attach to μαρτύριον in He 12¹ if we regard the 'cloud of witnesses' as consisting of those who have already sealed their faith by suffering. But the word may here mean no more than interested onlookers watching those engaged in the warfare which they themselves have already accomplished.

2. The Divine Witness.—Throughout the apostolic writings runs the conviction that God is constantly witnessing in various ways to the truth of the gospel. In Ac 14³ 15⁸ miracles are taken to be the means by which the preaching of Christ among the Gentiles is so attested (cf. Gal 3⁵). But it is chiefly through the work of the Holy Spirit that this witness is borne. This work is seen in the individual and in the Church. The hope that Christ has made us sons of God is converted into a certainty by the voice of the Divine Spirit speaking within us (Ro 8¹⁶). In 1 Jn 5⁶⁻¹¹ the meaning of this witness is drawn out in fuller detail. Christ's coming was by water (baptism) and blood (the Cross). But these historic facts must be brought into personal relation with every life, or they have no reality for that life. It is the Holy Ghost who does this. He teaches every man to know that new life has come to him because Christ accepted His mission and died upon Calvary. 'There are three who bear witness, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood' (v.⁸). This witness is Divine (v.⁹); every one can test it in his own heart (v.¹⁰); and it consists of the possession of eternal life through the Son (v.¹¹). But the witness of the Holy Spirit to Christ is not confined to this inward conviction. It appears also in the bestowal of charismatic gifts on the faithful (He 2⁴), especially that of preaching, which exists only to testify to Jesus (Rev 19¹⁰), and in the fulfilment by Christ of Scriptures in which the Spirit has spoken of Him (He 10¹⁵; cf. 1 P 1¹¹).

The consistency with which the NT writers dwell upon this varied testimony of the Holy Spirit to Christ is remarkable. Modern preaching has not yet fully recovered this note, but there is an increasing sense of the need of it, and the results of evangelistic work, especially in the foreign mission field, are daily illustrating its meaning in the life of the Church.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, London, 1909; D. W. Forrest, The Authority of Christ, Edinburgh, 1906, ch. vii.

C. T. DIMONT.

WOE.—The word οὐαί (LXX equivalent for נָא and וְ) occurs freely in the LXX, in the Book of Enoch (esp. xciv., c.), and in the Gospels, but is found only twice in the Epistles (1 Co 9¹⁶—'Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel,' and Jude 11, where a reference is made to the false teachers in the Church—'Woe unto them! for they went in the way of Cain,' i.e. as men in the wrong, entertaining a murderous hostility towards the lovers of truth. The idiom here is the familiar one of prophetic denunciation—'Woe be to.' The sense in 1 Co 9¹⁶ is 'Woe is mine,' i.e. 'Divine penalty awaits me').

In the Apocalypse, the word is used followed by the accusative in Rev 8¹³. The solitary eagle flying across the sky cries with a great voice, 'Woe, woe, woe, for them that dwell on the earth' (the three-fold woe possibly corresponding to the three plagues yet to fall upon the earth). The idea here is hardly that of denunciation, but of ominous announcement. Similarly in Rev 12¹² (where the accusative instead of the dative is again used)—'Alas for the earth and for the sea,' οὐαί introduces each section of the three-fold dirge of lamentation uttered by the mourners of fallen Babylon (Rev 18¹⁰ 16 19) and is followed by the nominative—the broken construction suggesting the emotion of the mourners.

οὐαί is used in Rev 9¹³ 11¹⁴ as a feminine substantive ('woe,' 'calamity') indicating the disasters following the blowing of the last three of the seven trumpets. The first woe is the plague of tormenting locusts; the second is the slaughter wrought by the fiery horses and their angel riders; the last is apparently the final overthrow of Satan and the completed destruction of the wicked in the drama of 12-20.

H. BULCOCK.

WOMAN.—The position of woman in any section or period of society is a recognized test of the contemporary level of morality and general enlightenment. Apostolic Christianity need not fear this test. In fact, the exaltation of womanhood is justly claimed as one of the best examples of what Christianity has done for the world. Doubtless this feature of its influence has often been exaggerated, either by painting too darkly the vices of paganism or by neglecting the actual limitations of historical Christianity. We must certainly beware lest we take the sixth Satire of Juvenal as descriptive of the character and conduct of women in general in the 1st cent. of the Roman Empire. 'At the worst, these vices infected only a comparatively small class, idle, luxurious, enervated by the slave system, depraved by the example of a vicious court. . . . Both the literature and the inscriptions of that age make us acquainted with a very different kind of woman' (S. Dill, *Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius*², p. 87). Nor must we forget that the just rights of married women were much more fully recognized by Roman law than by the ecclesiastical law which replaced it: 'it is by the tendency of their doctrines to keep alive and consolidate the former [proprietary disabilities of married females], that the expositors of the Canon Law have deeply injured civilisation' (H. S. Maine, Ancient Law, new ed., 1907, p. 163; cf. *EBR*¹¹ xxviii. 783). J. Donaldson (one of the editors of the Ante-Nicene Christian Library) indeed went so far as to say that 'in the first three centuries I have not been able to see that Christianity had any favourable effect on the position of women, but, on the contrary, that it tended to lower their character and contract the range of their activity' (CR lvi. [1889] 433). So far as this somewhat questionable judgment is sound, it relates to the asceticism of the Church subsequent to the Apostolic Age. The Pauline 'asceticism' springs from a different source, i.e. the expectation of a rapidly approaching end to all earthly things. This is an important fact to remember, for the attitude of apostolic Christianity to woman is largely due to the interaction of two distinct principles—the fundamental Christian assertion of the intrinsic worth of human personality, and the eschatological foreshortening of the time, which could not fail to hinder the social application of the former principle.

1. The religious equality of woman with man before God is clearly asserted by Paul: 'as many of you as were baptized into Christ did put on Christ. There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁷. 28). The mutual dependence of man and woman, and their common origin in God, teach that the male has no exclusive place 'in the Lord' (1 Co 11¹¹. 12). This result of the evangelical evaluation of human nature (see art. MAN) lifts the Christian idea of woman clearly above that of the contemporary Judaism, which in several noticeable ways differentiated woman religiously from man (cf. Bousset, *Die Religion des Judentums*², p. 490 f.). The morning service of Judaism still retains the ancient thanksgiving: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast not made me a woman' (Authorised Daily Prayer Book, p. 6). We naturally think of the 'Court of the Women' in the Temple, beyond which no woman might pass. 'Her work is to send her children to be taught in the synagogue: to attend to domestic concerns, and leave her husband free to study in the schools: to keep house for him till he returns' (C. Taylor, *Sayings of the Jewish Fathers*², Cambridge, 1897, p. 15). If such significant limitations as these are found in contemporary Judaism, notwithstanding the general humanity of its relationships and the intensity of the national religion, it need not surprise us to find no effective assertion of the religious equality of woman emanating from Roman patriotism or Greek philosophy. Plato, it is true, had argued that the differentiae of sex ought not to constitute any barrier to the exercise of a woman's personal powers: 'None of the occupations which comprehend the ordering of a state belong to woman as woman, nor yet to man as man; but natural gifts are to be found here and there, in both sexes alike; and, so far as her nature is concerned, the woman is admissible to all pursuits as well as the man; though in all of them the woman is weaker than the man' (Republic, 455, Eng. tr.³ by J. Ll. Davies and D. J. Vaughan, London, 1906, p. 161 f.). But this theoretical judgment relates to social, not religious, equality. Probably the nearest parallel to the welcome given to woman in Christian worship could be found in the cults of Isis and Magna Mater, which became so popular in the early Christian centuries (not to be found in Mithraism; cf. F. Cumont, *Les Mystères de Mithra*³, Brussels, 1913, p. 183). To the welcome which those cults gave to woman they owed no small measure of their success; by its deeper satisfaction of woman's needs Christianity was helped to win its victory over them. That there is much in the gospel of the Cross to appeal to the peculiar nature and temperament of woman needs no argument. There is some measure of truth in the assertion that 'the change from the heroic to the saintly ideal, from the ideal of Paganism to the ideal of Christianity, was a change from a type which was essentially male to one which was essentially feminine' (Lecky, *History of European Morals*⁸, vol. ii. p. 362). But the full truth is seen rather in the perfect humanity of Christ; as F. W. Robertson has well said (Sermons, 2nd ser., London, 1875, p. 231): 'His heart had in it the blended qualities of both sexes. Our humanity is a whole made up of two opposite poles of character—the manly and the feminine.'

2. A larger life of social fellowship and service was thrown open to women by apostolic Christianity. The story of the primitive Church significantly begins with the inclusion of women in the apostolic meetings for prayer (Ac 1¹⁴). Their presence and activity are clearly illustrated by the references to Tabitha (9³⁶), Mary the mother of John Mark (12¹²), Lydia (16¹⁴), Damaris (17³⁴), Priscilla (18²). The story of Sapphira (5¹⁴) implies the comparatively independent membership and responsibility of women within the Christian community. Priscilla illustrates their active evangelism (18²⁶). Attention is expressly called to the 'multitudes' of women converts added to the Church (5¹⁴). The story of Thekla (Acts of Paul and Thekla, in F. C. Conybeare's *Monuments of Early Christianity*², London, 1896, pp. 61–88) doubtless rests on some historic basis. 'Thekla became the type of the female Christian teacher, preacher, and baptiser, and her story was quoted as early as the second century as a justification of the right of women to teach and to baptise' (W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 375). Clement of Rome, at the end of the century, refers to the sufferings endured by women under the Neronian persecution (Ep. ad Cor. i. 6). The spread of Christianity amongst women of high rank is probably exemplified in Pomponia Graecina (Tacitus, Annals, xiii. 32), the wife of Plautius, the conqueror of Britain. Another probable example is supplied by Domitilla (banished in A.D. 96), the niece of the Emperor Domitian (Dio Cassius, lxxvii. 14).

The details of Church life which we gather from the Pauline Epistles, particularly as to the Church at Corinth, amply confirm what has been said (e.g. 1 Ph 4². 3, 1 Co 1¹¹; the numerous salutations to women in Ro 16). Paul speaks of Phœbe as a 'deaconess' of the Church at Cenchreae (Ro 16¹), in terms that suggest her ability and will to give generous help to poorer Christians. The deaconesses of whom Pliny speaks, early in the 2nd cent. (Ep. x. 96), were slave girls. It is clear that women equally with men could be regarded as the organs of the prophetic spirit in the Corinthian Church (cf. Priscilla and Maximilla among the Montanists), since Paul desires that every woman praying or prophesying shall have her head veiled (1 Co 11⁵). This is a corollary from the admission of women into the Church, since Christian fellowship is essentially constituted by the gift of the Spirit (Ro 8¹⁴). To this proof of woman's religious equality with man there seems to be no necessary contradiction in the fact that Paul a little later (1 Co 14³⁴) forbids women to speak (λαλέειν) in the churches (see, however, the Commentaries on this disputed passage); the contrast simply shows that the Spirit could over-ride ordinary social conventions (cf. the prophesying of the four daughters of Philip the evangelist, Ac 21⁹; the virginity of these, as of the daughters named in 1 Co 7³⁶, does not yet constitute an 'order'). In the Pastoral Epistles we find a regular roll of 'widows' (see art. WIDOWS), who have provision made for them by the Church (1 Ti 5³²; cf. Ac 6¹ 9³⁸⁻⁴¹). Thus Christianity met the physical needs of a class specially likely to suffer (cf. E. Renan, Les Apôtres, Paris, 1866, p. 122), as it met the spiritual needs of women in general.

3. The place of women in marriage gained a higher interpretation. The Greek world is characterized by the practical absence of family life in the best sense; the Greek wife lived in seclusion and ignorance. 'The courtesan was the one free woman of Athens' (Lecky, op. cit., ii. 293). The Roman matron had indeed held a high place in the ancient Roman home, though she passed into the absolute legal power of her husband by the older type of religious marriage. Under the early Roman Empire, the position of married women was often one of social and legal independence (Friedlander, Roman Life and Manners, Eng. tr., i. 236), but this was the outcome of the newer type of marriage as a civil contract; its laxity of divorce and the break-up of the older family life show its peculiar perils. Roman morality, in fact, broke down, here as elsewhere, because it had not found its reinforcement and transfiguration in religion (cf. W. Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, London, 1911, p. 466). It was in the identification of morality and religion that the strength of Judaism lay. The Jewish wife, it is true, held a legal position decidedly inferior to that of the husband. But the relationship was redeemed by the quality of the humanity which was so typical a product of the OT religion. Consequently, the family life of the Hebrew-Jewish people, in some measure, prepared for the applications of the principle of woman's religious equality made by apostolic Christianity (cf. the fine portrait of the 'virtuous woman' in Pr 31¹⁰⁴). What these were may be seen from Paul's statement of the mutual relationship of husband and wife (Eph 5-³³). Not only is the spirit of that relationship to be the new law of love, but the relationship itself is made sacramental by its comparison with that existing between Christ and the Church. We can hardly exaggerate the gulf that separates this idea of marriage from that in which the relationship is primarily physical. Indeed, the religious disabilities of women seem to rest, at least in part, on primitive sexual tabus (cf. W. Robertson Smith, *The Religion of the Semites*², London, 1894, pp. 299 n., 379 n.; A. E. Crawley, The Mystic Rose, London, 1902, p. 52). Christianity, in principle, if not always in practice, has lifted woman above the sexual level, at which her chief raison d'être is the gratification of man's passions, and has joined her personality to his, as contributory to a common social life. Marriage is to be held in honour among all (He 13⁴; cf. 1 Ti 4³). Paul, indeed, prefers celibacy because of the peculiar conditions of the time (i.e. on eschatological grounds). But he recognizes both the innocence of the sexual tie and the equal claims of the man and the woman in regard to it (1 Co 7³⁴)—surely a disproof of any 'asceticism' in the ordinary sense of the word. The emphasis on chastity (6¹², Eph 5³), so characteristic of early Christian ethics, is based on the principle that the body is the temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Co 6¹⁹); the condemnation of extramarital sexual relationships is the natural complement of the attitude to marriage itself (1 Th 4⁴). The moral tie that unites the Christian even to an unbelieving partner is fully recognized (1 Co 7¹²); the unbelieving husband may be won by the conduct of the Christian wife (1 P 3¹), which is a better adornment than that of outward apparel (v. ³²; cf. 1 Ti 2⁹). The ideals of Christianity in the 1st cent. in regard to womanly conduct are well summarized in the exhortation of Clement of Rome: 'Let us guide our women toward that which is good: let them show forth their lovely disposition of purity; let them prove their sincere affection of gentleness; let them make manifest the moderation of their tongue through their silence; let them show their love, not in factious preferences but without partiality towards all them that fear God, in holiness' (ad Cor. xxi. 7, The Apostolic Fathers, tr. J. B. Lightfoot, London, 1891; cf. Tit 2³¹).

4. The limitations of apostolic Christianity in regard to women were such as were inevitable from its historical origin and eschatological outlook. The Jewish training of Paul, for example, accounts for much in his attitude, such as the argument that women should be veiled 'because of the angels' (1 Co 11¹⁰). The expectation of a speedy end largely explains his preference of celibacy to marriage (7¹; cf. Rev 14⁴), which is certainly not due to his Judaism (cf. Bousset, op. cit., p. 493). The asceticism of Paul must be ascribed to a cause different from and more innocent than the dualistic (Greek) asceticism of the later Church. Naturally, some of the premisses in the NT arguments for woman's subjection to man no longer appeal to us, even if the conclusion does (e.g. 1 Ti 2¹²). Westermarck's criticism of this ultimately Jewish emphasis on woman's subjection to man, as being 'agreeable to the selfishness of men' (Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas, i. 654), ignores the atmosphere which redeems it, i.e. its moral and religious interpretation in the Christianity of the NT. We should rather recognize, as Dobschütz does (Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 377) in regard to Paul's asceticism, that 'Christ triumphs in him over the spirit of the age.'

LITERATURE.—L. Friedländer, *Sittengeschichte Roms*⁸, Leipzig, 1910, Roman Life and Manners, Eng. tr. of 7th ed., 3 vols., London, 1908-09, vol. i. ch. v.; W. E. H. Lecky, *History of European Morals*⁸, 2 vols., do., 1883, ii. 275-372; C. L. Brace, Gesta Christi, do., 1882, bk. i. chs. iii., iv.; R. S. Storrs, The Divine Origin of Christianity, do., 1885, pp. 146 f., 466 f.; C. von Weizsäcker, Das apostolische Zeitalter der christlichen Kirche, Freiburg i. B., 1886, Eng. tr., The Apostolic Age, 2 vols., London, 1896, bk. v. ch. iii. § 7; J. Donaldson, 'The Position of Women among the Early Christians,' CR iv. [1889] 433; J. Gottschick, 'Ehe, christliche,' in PRE³ v. 182 f.; W. F. Adeney, art. 'Woman,' in HDB iv. 933-936; E. von Dobschütz, Die urchristliche Gemeinde, Leipzig, 1902, Eng. tr., Christian Life in the Primitive Church, London, 1904; A. Harnack, *Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums*², Leipzig, 1906, Eng. tr., *The Mission and Expansion of Christianity*², 2 vols., London, 1908, vol. ii. ch. ii. § 4 (best survey of the data); S. Dill, *Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius*², do., 1905; J. McCabe, The Religion of Woman, do., 1905 (attacks the Christian claims); W. Bousset, *Die Religion des Judentums im neutest. Zeitalter*², Berlin, 1906; E. Westermarck, The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas, i. [London, 1906] ch. xvi., ii. [do., 1908] ch. xl.; T. G. Tucker, Life in the Roman World of Nero and St. Paul, do., 1910, ch. xvi.; A. Robertson and A.

Plummer, ICC, '1 Corinthians,' Edinburgh, 1911, pp. 130-162, 230-236, 324-328; C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Edinburgh, 1912, Index, s.v. 'Woman'; W. M. Ramsay, The Teaching of Paul in Terms of the Present Day, London, 1913, sect. xlv., 'The Family in the Teaching of Paul.'

H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

WONDER.—See MIRACLES, SIGN.

WOOL (ἐρίον).—The two passages in which wool is mentioned in the NT (He 9¹⁹, Rev 1¹⁴) call for little comment. In He 9¹⁹ the writer alludes to the symbolic and ceremonial use of scarlet wool in the Mosaic ritual, while in Rev 1¹⁴ the hair of the Son of Man is compared to white wool. White wool, here as elsewhere (cf. Ps 147¹⁸, Is 1¹⁸, Dn 7⁹), is the emblem of purity. St. John clearly has in view the locus classicus, Dn 7⁹, where, however, the white hair belongs to the Ancient of Days. The transference of the metaphor to the Son of Man is noteworthy, in view of the strict adherence to Daniel's account in the Apocrypha (cf. Enoch, xlii. 1).

Wool has always been an important article of commerce in Syria. In early days the sole measure of a man's wealth was the number of flocks and herds in his possession. Among these the sheep was the most important and was valued especially for its wool. At a time when silk was unknown and flax was scarce and hardly obtainable out of Egypt, wool formed the principal material for clothing. The region of Gilead, Moab, and Ammon was pre-eminently the land of sheep-pasture as it is to-day.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, *Natural History of the Bible*¹⁰, London, 1911, p. 133 ff.; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, new ed., do., 1910, p. 313; J. C. Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, do., 1903, pp. 12, 81-84; R. H. Charles, The Book of Enoch, Oxford, 1893, p. 127; B. F. Westcott, *The Epistle to the Hebrews*², London, 1892, p. 267 f.; H. B. Swete, *The Apocalypse of St. John*², do., 1907, p. 16; SDB, p. 977; HDB iv. 937; EBI iv. 5353.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

WORD.—The English substantive 'word' is used in the RV to translate two Greek originals, λόγος and ῥῆμα. Of these λόγος is by far the more common, occurring 194 times in the NT, excluding the Gospels. In 153 of these it is translated 'word'; in the remainder it has a rather wider significance, e.g. 'treatise' (Ac 1¹), 'matter', 'reason', or 'account' (Ac 8²¹ 10²⁹ 15⁸ 18¹⁴ 19³⁸ 40 20²⁴, Ro 14¹², Ph 4¹⁸ 17, He 4¹² 137, 1 P 3¹⁵ 45). It is used generally to mean 'speech' or 'utterance' (Ac 14¹² 20², 1 Co 1⁵ 2¹ 4¹⁴, 2 Co 8⁷ 10¹⁰ 11⁸, Eph 4²⁹ 6¹⁹, Col 4⁶). In Ac 11²² it is translated 'report', in Col 2²³ 'show' (i.e. 'pretext'). In Ac 6⁵ 7²⁹, 1 Co 15⁵⁴, 1 Ti 1¹³ 3¹ 4⁹, 2 Ti 2¹, Tit 3⁸ it is translated 'saying.' In the last five of these passages the phrase is the same, 'faithful is the saying' (πιστός ὁ λόγος), which seems to refer to a quotation from a Christian hymn or from some recognized liturgical formula.

Clement uses λόγος 11 times. In 9 of the passages it is simply equivalent to 'word' in the ordinary sense. But he twice introduces a quotation from the OT with the phrase 'For the holy λόγος says' (ad Cor. 13, 56), and there the sense seems to approach closely to that attached to the word in the quotations from the Pastoral Epistles given above, i.e. a statement of recognized authority.

Λόγος is found three times in the Didache and twice in the Epistle of Barnabas. But in neither of these writings is it employed in any way which cannot be paralleled from the NT.

Ignatius has it three times (Magn. viii., Rom. ii., Smyrn. inscr.). In the first of these he refers to our Lord as the Word of God; in the second he calls himself a 'Word of God,' meaning that his life and death are a testimony which is not to be interfered with by his friends. He greets the church of Smyrna as being 'in the Word of God,' where the λόγος is conceived as the inward monitor which directs the Christian's life (cf. J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii. [1889] vol. ii. p. 288).

Outside the Gospels ῥῆμα is found only in 29 passages of the NT, 14 of these being in Acts. It is always translated 'word' in the RV except in Ac 5³² ('things') and 10³⁷ ('saying'). Of the 15 passages in which it occurs elsewhere six are quotations from the OT. It is used once by Clement (ad Cor. 30) in a quotation from Job 11². It is not found in the Didache, Ep. Barn., or Ignatius. There is nothing in its use by the NT writers which calls for special comment.

In many passages of the NT no special significance attaches to λόγος. It means simply 'that which is said.' But 'the Word,' or 'the Word of God,' or 'the Word of the Lord' is frequently used in a semi-technical sense for the content of the message which the Church is charged to deliver. Thus in Ac 4²⁹ the infant Church prays for courage to speak 'thy word' with boldness in the face of persecution. In Ac 6² the apostles refuse to forsake 'the word of God' to serve tables. After the appointment of the deacons 'the word of God increased.' It is unnecessary to multiply examples of this usage. In Ac 16³⁶ λόγος is used of the message sent by the magistrates at Philippi to St. Paul's jailer. We find it combined with a number of different substantives: e.g. 'grace' (Ac 14³ 20³⁴), 'exhortation' (Ac 13¹⁸, He 13²²), 'salvation' (Ac 13²⁶), 'promise' (Ro 9⁹), 'the Cross,' i.e. the gospel of the Crucified Saviour (1 Co 1¹⁸), 'wisdom and knowledge' (1 Co 12⁹), 'truth' (2 Co 6⁷, Eph 1¹³, Col 1⁵, 2 Ti 2¹⁵, Ja 1¹⁸), 'the word of Christ' (Col 3¹⁶), 'life' (Ph 2¹⁶, 1 Jn 1¹), 'hearing' (He 4²), 'righteousness' (5¹³), 'oath' (7²⁸), 'prophecy' (Rev 1³ 22⁷ 9. 10. 18. 19; cf. the προφητικὸς λόγος of 2 P 1¹⁹), 'patience' (Rev 3¹⁰), 'testimony' (12¹¹). 'Word' is contrasted with 'power' or 'reality' in 1 Co 4²⁰, 2 Co 10¹¹, Col 3¹⁷, 1 Th 1⁵, 1 Jn 3¹⁸. This distinction is common in writers of the classical period, e.g. Thucydides.

In most of these passages the meaning is a spoken message. The content is not precisely defined, and might vary a good deal from time to time. But λόγος is also applied to written documents. Thus the mention of the 'word of promise' in Ro 9⁹ is followed by a quotation of the angels' pledge to Abraham (Gn 18¹⁰). In 2 P 1¹⁹ the whole corpus of the prophetic writings is summed up as the prophetic λόγος. In Gal 5¹⁴ the whole Law is said to be summed up in one λόγος, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' In 2 Ti 1¹³ the 'pattern of sound words' which the Apostle exhorts Timothy to hold may be presumed to be some definite doctrinal statement, of the nature of a creed. In Rev 22 the phrase 'the words of the prophecy of this book' occurs 4 times, 'the words of this book' once, meaning the exact text which the writer has just completed. Thus as a rule 'word' in the NT means rather more than in current English. But the meaning is sometimes narrowed to the one customary among ourselves.

Λόγος is personal in two passages in the apostolic writings: 1 Jn 1¹, where the author speaks of having seen and handled the Word of life; and Rev 19¹³, where it is said that the name of the crowned heavenly horseman 'is called The Word of God.' But any discussion of the Johannine Logos-doctrine lies outside the scope of this article.

In He 4¹² ('For the word of God is living, and active,' etc.) there is perhaps a slight approach towards a personification of the spoken or written Word. There is a somewhat similar metaphorical use of ῥῆμα in Eph 6¹⁷ ('Take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God').

R. H. MALDEN.

WORK.—This article deals with the special sense in which the word is employed in the NT of the office of the preacher of the gospel. (For other senses see BUSINESS, LABOUR.) Popular opinion tends to regard spiritual ministry as the spontaneous activity of a certain temperament requiring no particular effort. The teaching of the NT directly contradicts this notion. It declares that it is only by systematic and severe labour that we can win men for God. This is borne out by the terms used in the apostolic writings. In the Fourth Gospel we hear the Lord speaking of the fulfilling of the 'work' which He had been sent to accomplish (Jn 17⁴). This word (ἐργον) was taken up by the Church and applied to the task set before its evangelists. The mission entrusted to Saul and Barnabas is described as 'the work' to which they received a vocation from the Holy Spirit (Ac 13²; cf. 14²⁶).

In the Pauline Epistles this work is said to be 'the work of the Lord,' i.e. the definite service which Christ lays upon believers of proclaiming the gospel. All the faithful are called to this. The special charismata of some are bestowed in order that they may be used for 'the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering' (Eph 4¹). Abundant activity in this office follows a firm belief in the Resurrection (1 Co 15⁵⁸). In 1 Co 3¹⁰⁻¹⁷ the 'work' is likened to a building which must be built so as to stand the test of the fire of judgment. It is therefore natural to speak of the Christian minister as the ἐργάτης whose ideal is to produce nothing which will shame him (2 Ti 2¹⁵). The dignity of his vocation is expressed in the highest terms when he is named a 'fellow-worker with God' (1 Co 3⁹, 2 Co 6¹; cf. 1 Th 3² RVm). The spirit in which the work is to be done is denoted by another word, κόπος, which is 'almost a technical word for Christian work' (H. B. Swete, Apocalypse, London, 1907, p. 25), and signifies the weariness which attends the effort required of those who undertake this work. It suggests the idea of an athlete undergoing great fatigue (see J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, London, 1891, p. 161). With its cognate verb St. Paul uses it in this connexion some twenty times. The leaders of the Church are distinguished by it (1 Th 5¹²). It must be endured by those who would be teachers of the Word (1 Ti 5¹⁷). The Apostle himself had experienced it to the full (1 Co 15¹⁰, 2 Co 11²³).

LITERATURE.—A. W. Robinson, Co-operation with God, London, 1908. C. T. DIMONT.

WORLD.—The conception of the world in the apostolic writings is one of much complexity. Its content is derived partly from the OT, partly from later Judaism; but it has also assimilated an important element from Greek thought, and the peculiar experience of early Christianity has added to it a sinister significance of its own. Thus the various synonyms by which it is expressed reveal so many narrowly differentiated senses in each, and also shade off into each other in such a way, that a delicate problem for exact exegesis is often created. The three terms chiefly to be considered are ἡ οἰκουμένη, ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος, and ὁ κόσμος, which in their proper significance denote the world respectively as a place, a period, and a system.

1. The spatial conception of the world.—The spatial conception of the world as the orbis terrarum, the comprehensive abode of man and scene of human life, is rendered in the OT by עֲרֵץ and its more poetical synonym עֲלָם, which in the LXX are translated, the former by γῆ, the latter by οἰκουμένη (vice versa in a few passages in Isaiah). In the apostolic writings γῆ is retained in this sense in quotations from the LXX (e.g. Ac 2¹⁹, Ro 9¹, He 1¹⁰), also in Ac 17²⁶, Ja 5⁵, and frequently in the Apocalypse (1⁵, 7³, etc.). The more distinctive term is ἡ οἰκουμένη (sc. γῆ). Originally it was used, with racial self-consciousness, to signify the territorial extent of Greek life and civilization (Herod. iv. 110); but after the conquests of Alexander, and in consequence of the same unifying influences as those by which the Greek dialects were merged in the κοινή, it came to express a view and feeling of the inhabited world as overpassing all national distinctions and boundaries. Later, when the rule of the Cæsars seemed to be practically co-extensive with the habitable earth, it acquired a more special sense—the Empire as a territorial unity (e.g. Lk 2¹); but in the apostolic writings it has the larger significance, the world-wide abode of man (Ac 11²⁸, 17⁶, and 19²⁷ by passionate exaggeration, 24⁵, Ro 10¹⁸, Rev 3¹⁰ 16¹⁴), or, by a natural transition, mankind (Ac 17³¹, Rev 12⁹). As an example of the elasticity which characterizes the use of these terms, it may be noted that to express the same thought of the world-wide field for the dissemination of the gospel St. Paul prefers κόσμος (Ro 1⁸, Col 1⁶); and that, on the contrary, the writer of Hebrews gives to οἰκουμένη the proper significance both of κόσμος, the 'terrestrial order' (1⁶), and of αἰὼν (cf. the unique ἡν μέλλουσιν οἰκουμένην of 2⁵ and μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, 6⁵).

2. The temporal conception of the world.—The temporal conception of the world as a sæculum, a cycle of history, complete within itself yet related to a before and an after, is distinctively expressed by αἰὼν, or in contrast with the 'world to come,' as actually it always is, by ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος (1 Co 1²⁰ 2⁶, 7⁸ 3¹⁸, 2 Co 4¹, Eph 1²¹; variants, ὁ ἐνεστώς αἰὼν, Gal 1⁴; ὁ αἰὼν του κόσμου τουτου, Eph 2²; ὁ νυν αἰων, 1 Ti 6¹, 2 Ti 4¹⁰, Tit 2¹²; ὁ νυν καιρος, Ro 3²⁶ 8¹³).

The use of αἰὼν in this sense, as denoting the present order of existence, does not occur in the OT (Ec 3¹¹ ?), but is characteristic of later Hebraism, the contrast between the two 'æons' (עוֹלָם הַזֶּה, עוֹלָם הַבָּא) being an essential feature in the Apocalyptic view of history. Dalman remarks upon the absence of evidence for this form of expression in any extant pre-Christian writing (Words of Jesus, p. 143); it occurs chiefly in the later parts of the Baruch Apocalypse, in 4 Ezra (e.g. vi. 9, vii. 12, 13, viii. 1, 52), and the Slavonic Enoch. In Rabbinism (Dalman, p. 150) the earliest witnesses for the expression are Hillel and Jochanan ben Zakkai (fl. c. A.D. 80). The idea, however, is vouched for by earlier documents, Enoch, Jubilees, Assumption of Moses (see on the whole subject Bousset's Religion des Judentums, p. 278 ff.), and the frequency of its occurrence in the NT, with the assumption of its familiarity, seems to imply its popular currency (contrariwise, Dalman—'the expressions characterised the language of the learned rather than that of the people' [p. 151]).

But while αἰὼν οὗτος is primarily a time-concept, this world-age in contrast with the future age of the 'regeneration,' the temporal element tends to become secondary. The notion of a period of time (emphatic in 1 Co 7³¹) is always implied; but the ruling idea approximates to that which properly belongs to the κόσμος, the organic system of terrestrial existence (e.g. in 1 Co 1²⁰ ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος and ὁ κόσμος are parallel and synonymous). The opposition between the two 'æons' is qualitative even more than temporal: the one is 'evil' (Gal 1⁴), under the dominion of the Devil (2 Co 4⁴) and kindred spirits (1 Co 2⁶, 8), a world of sin and death in contrast with that other eternal world of righteousness (2 P 3¹³) and life. The two, indeed, are thought of as in a sense contemporaneous; the 'world to come' projects itself into the present; its 'powers' are already experienced by all in whom the Spirit of God dwells and the work of spiritual quickening and transformation is begun (He 6⁵).

3. The world as an organic system.—The world as an organic system, a universe, is distinctively ὁ κόσμος.

The idea which underlies all the various uses of κόσμος is that of order or arrangement (as in the common Homeric phrases, κατὰ κόσμον='in an orderly manner'; κατὰ κόσμον καθίζειν = 'to sit in order'), and since the strongest impression of unvarying and reliable order in nature is given by the movement of the heavenly bodies, it was probably to this that the term was first applied in a more special sense. In classical Greek, while it is sometimes used with reference to the firmament above, and its sense is not anywhere restricted to the earth, so also in the LXX it translates קִיּוֹן, the 'host' of heaven (in Enoch also, κόσμος των φωστήρων, xx. 4), and elsewhere appears only in the sense of 'ornament.' Pythagoras is credited with having been the first to employ the word to express the philosophical conception of an ordered universe of being (Plutarch, de Plac. Phil. 886 B); and from the Pythagoreans it passed into the common vocabulary of philosophic poetry and speculation. Plato (Gorgias, 508 A) defines κόσμος in its widest extent, οὐρανὸν καὶ γῆν καὶ θεοὺς καὶ ἀνθρώπους τὴν κοινωνίαν συνέχειν καὶ φιλίαν καὶ κοσμιότητα καὶ σωφροσύνην καὶ δικαιοσύνην, καὶ τὸ ὅλον τούτο διὰ ταῦτα κόσμον καλοῦσιν . . . οὐκ ἄκοσμιον, οὐδὲ ἀκοσμίαν. In Stoicism the idea was further developed in a mystical and pantheistic fashion. The universe, the macrocosm, was conceived after the analogy of the microcosm, man. It was a ζῶον ἐμψύχον καὶ λογικόν; and as the human organism consists of a body and an animating soul, so God was the eternal world-soul animating and ruling the imperishable world-body. Through the influence especially of Posidonius, this conception of the Cosmos became widely influential in the Græco-Roman world (see P. Wendland, Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur, Tübingen, 1907, p. 84 ff.). In the OT there is neither term nor conception corresponding to the Hellenic κόσμος (yet cf. 727, Jer 1016, Ec 115); it is in Hellenistic compositions such as 2 Maccabees and the Book of Wisdom that they first appear in Judaism. In the latter the idea of the Cosmos is specially prominent. ἡ σύστασις κόσμου is formed by the word of God out of formless matter (114 717 117) and the ever-living Spirit of God is active in all things (121); Divine wisdom and beauty pervade the world in all its diverse parts, establishing all things by number, measure, and weight (724 81 1130), and at the same time giving to human intelligence its power to apprehend the Divine ordering of all things (717-23 83), a striking anticipation of Ro 120. In the same book there is another anticipation of NT usage, the employment, unknown to classical Greek, of κόσμος for the world of mankind, the human race as a unity. Thus Adam is described as πρωτοπλάστος πατὴρ κόσμου (101); a multitude of wise men is the salvation of the world (624), as the family of Noah was its hope (145).

Such indications of the penetration of Hellenic influences into Jewish thought explain, from a historical point of view, the use of κόσμος, both as term and as concept, in the apostolic writings. (a) Primarily the Cosmos is the rerum natura, the sum of terrestrial things, without moral reference. Occasionally the conception is simply this (1 Co 84, there is no such thing as an idol, ἐν κόσμῳ; 1410, there are various kinds of sounds in it); but normally the thought of God as Creator of the Cosmos is expressed or implied (e.g. Ac 1724, Ro 120, Eph 14, He 43).

The simple pictorial phrase, 'the heaven and the earth,' by which the OT expresses the idea of the visible creation as contrasted with the Creator, is still retained in the liturgical and rhetorical style (Ac 4-4 1415 1724), and for the sake of special emphasis (Eph 110, Ph 210, Col 116-20, Rev 2011 211). To the same effect Paul uses ἡ κτίσις (Ro 819-20, 21-22, Col 115; cf. 2 P 34, Rev 314), but more frequently τα πάντα (Ro 95 1136, 1 Co 86 1528, etc.; cf. He 18 28-10 34, Rev 411).

And when the Cosmos is defined as the 'terrestrial order' it is to be remembered that in the apostolic cosmology this includes the heavens with their inhabitants as well as the earth and mankind. The world created in the πρωτότοκος includes 'all things in the heavens and upon the earth, visible and invisible' (Col 116). 'Heaven,' in the popular sense of the word, the sphere of God's immediate self-manifestation, the place of His Throne and Majesty on high (Col 31, He 13), the sphere from which Christ comes (1 Co 1547) and to which He returns (Col 31), the kingdom of eternal light in which believers already have an inheritance (2 Co 51, Ph 320, Col 112), is 'above all heavens' (Eph 410). It does not belong to 'this world' or to 'this age'. All else does. The heavens and the spiritual beings that dwell therein belong naturally and morally to the same cosmic system as the earth and its inhabitants (1 Co 26. 8 49 62. 8 1110, Eph 22 612, Col 118. 20 24. 20).

(b) Yet the immediate interest in the Cosmos lies in its relation to man as the physical environment of his life, and thus it naturally acquires the more limited significance of the terrestrial order in association with mankind—the world of human existence, into which sin comes (Ro 512 13), into which Christ comes (1 Ti 115, He 105, 1 Jn 49), where He is believed on (1 Ti 316). (For Jewish parallels see Dalman, p. 173.) Hence also it easily comes to mean (as already in Enoch [see above]) mankind in general (1 Co 413, He 1138); and, by further natural transitions, worldly possessions (1 Jn 317), and the whole complex of man's secular activities and relationships (1 Co 723-33).

More characteristically the word is used with moral implications more or less strong. In the majority of its occurrences the idea is coloured by the dark significance of the αἶων οὗτος. It is the present material order together with its inhabitants, both demonic and human, as lying under the power of evil, destitute of God's Spirit and insensible to Divine influence—not merely profane and unchristian humanity, but the whole organism of existence which is alienated from God by sin. It has a spirit of its own (1 Co 212) which is antagonistic to the Spirit of God; a wisdom of its own (120. 21) which is foolishness with God (319); a sorrow of its own (2 Co 710) which is opposite in character and effect to godly sorrow; its moral life is governed by the 'prince of the power of the air' (Eph 21; cf. 2 Co 41); physically it lies directly under the dominion of elemental powers (στοιχεῖα) hostile to man (Col 28. 20, Gal 43); the Christian is redeemed from it and inwardly no longer belongs to it (Gal 614, Col 220); its kingdoms finally become the Kingdom of God and of His Christ (Rev 1115; cf. 1 Co 15-8, Eph 110, Col 120) in the new Cosmos which arises in its place (Rev 211).

But here, again, since the primary interest is in man and his salvation, the Cosmos naturally comes to mean the human race as under sin, and as the object of Christ's redeeming and reconciling work (Ro 310-19, 2 Co 519, 1 Jn 22 414). In the later apostolic writings, especially the Johannine, it takes on a still darker hue. It is not only the world of fallen sinful humanity; it is that portion of society, Jewish or Gentile, with its opinions, sentiments, and influences, which is definitely antagonistic to the Church and the Christian cause. It hates the people of Christ as Cain hated Abel (1 Jn 312 13); its character and conduct are dominated by the 'lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the vainglory of life' (1 Jn 216), and are morally polluted (Ja 127, 2 P 220); it offers a fruitful field to anti-Christian teaching (1 Jn 41-7, 2 Jn 7); its friendship is incompatible with loyalty to God (Ja 44, 1 Jn 215).

For the sake of clearness the various uses of κόσμος may be thus tabulated, with the proviso that at certain points classification cannot be more than tentative.

- (a) κόσμος = adornment (1 P 33).
- (b) = (metaphorically) a universe (Ja 86).
- (c) = οἰκουμένη, the world-wide abode of mankind (Ro 13, Col 16, 1 P 59).
- (d) = the Gentile world in contrast with the elect people (Ro 413 1112. 15).
- (e) = the terrestrial order, without moral implication; simply as such (1 Co 84 1410, Eph 212 [?]), as related to the Creator (Ac 1724, Ro 120, 1 Co 322, Eph 14, He 43 926, 1 P 120, 2 P 25 36, Rev 139 179).
- (f) = the terrestrial order without moral reference, but as especially associated with humankind (Ro 512. 13, 1 Ti 116 816 67, He 105, 1 Jn 49), as associated with men and angels (1 Co 49), with the secular activities and relationships of men (1 Co 731-34, 2 Co 112 [?]).
- (g) = mankind in general (1 Co 413, He 1138).
- (h) = material possessions (1 Jn 317).
- (i) = the terrestrial order, together with its inhabitants as lying under the power of evil (1 Co 120. 21. 27. 28 212 319 510 67 1132, 2 Co 710, Gal 43 614, Eph 23, Col 28 20, Ja 25, 1 Jn 417, Rev 1115).
- (j) = the human race as sinful and needing redemption (Ro 38. 19, 2 Co 519, 1 Jn 22 414).
- (k) = human society as definitely hostile to Christ, the gospel, and the Church (He 117, Ja 127 44, 2 P 14 220, 1 Jn 215 16. 17 31. 13 41. 3. 4 5. 17 54. 5. 19, 2 Jn 7).

To sum up, the world is an organic whole of being, a system (συνέστηκεν, Col 117) in which there is a complete interrelation of parts; having a transitory existence, beginning in time and in time coming to an end, an 'æon' within an encircling eternity; not self-originating but created; in the most ultimate sense God's world, because not only created but continually upheld and animated by Him (Ac 17²⁸); and not only God's world but Christ's, who mediatorially is the source of its existence and the active principle of its unity (q.v.). But while necessarily retaining its creaturely dependence on God and its natural unity, it has fallen as a whole under the dominion of moral and consequently of physical evil. Sin and death entered into the human Cosmos through the disobedience of our first father (Ro 5¹², 1 Co 15²²), but anterior to this, and in some causal relation to it, sin was existent in the angelic Cosmos (2 Co 11³, 1 Ti 2¹⁴, 2 P 2¹, 1 Jn 3⁹), and from this source human sin is still inspired (2 Co 4¹, Eph 2², etc.). Into the speculative question of the origin of evil apostolic thought does not enter. It is enough that sin is not inherent in the Cosmos, but entered into it, and that therefore its presence there may come to an end. Christ has come into the Cosmos, directly into the world of mankind, and God is in Him reconciling it unto Himself. But the scope of Christ's redeeming work is destined to include the whole Cosmos in both its physical and its spiritual elements (Ro 8²¹, Eph 1¹⁰, Col 1²⁰, 1 Co 15²⁴⁻²⁸). Yet this ultimate consummation will not be attained within the present æon. That must pass away through the fires of Divine judgment, before Christ is universally triumphant, and God is all in all.

This scheme of the world and its history inevitably leaves vast questions shrouded in mystery, and in its conception of the intermediate process by which nature is operated and governed it moves in regions of ideas which are remote from those of the modern mind. Yet essentially all that it endeavours to express in the terms of contemporary thought—that man is God's creature and child; that, therefore, the existing condition of human life is radically abnormal and sinfully wrong, yet is salvable by the sacrificial love of God in Christ; that the world is God's world, and that, therefore, its existing condition also is abnormal and cannot be otherwise regarded than as the correlate of sin; that it is a fruitful source of temptation to the evil tendencies in man but also a school of salutary discipline and a field of moral victory for those who seek the things that are above; and that, finally, a new and perfect environment is destined for the regenerate and perfected life—all this belongs to what is central and abiding in the Christian faith. See, further, art. WORLDLINESS.

LITERATURE.—V. H. Stanton, art. 'World' in HDB; A. Ritschl and J. Weiss, art. 'Welt' in PRE³; H. Cremer, Lexicon of NT Greek³, Edinburgh, 1880; commentaries, esp. J. Weiss, Der erste Korintherbrief³, Tübingen, 1910 (particularly the note on 11²⁰⁻²⁰), and B. F. Westcott, The Gospel according to St. John, 2 vols., London, 1908, i. 64 ff.; W. Beyschlag, NT Theology, Eng. tr., 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1895, ii. 100-109; G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., do., 1902, pp. 147-179; W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums², Berlin, 1906, pp. 278-286; M. Dibelius, Die Geisteswelt im Glauben des Paulus, Göttingen, 1909.

ROBERT LAW.

WORLDLINESS.—To elucidate the conception of worldliness in the apostolic writings, we must start from the primary truth that the world is God's world, His by creation and sustenance, by sovereign purpose and control (see art. UNITY and WORLD). There is in those writings no hint of an absolute dualism and, consequently, none of an absolute principle of asceticism. Nothing is unclean of itself (Ro 14¹⁴). Physical acts and enjoyments neither lie apart from the sphere of the moral life (as in the Gnostic conception of τὸ ἀδιαφόρων ἵπν) nor are they a mere clog and hindrance to it; on the contrary, they have an indispensable part in its development, furnishing occasion in the common daily life for the most effective exercise of the moral nature, in diligence (Eph 4²⁰) and self-restraint (1 Co 9²⁵), in unselfish consideration for others (1 Co 7³⁻⁵ 8¹³, etc.), and in the sense of grateful dependence on God (Ro 14⁶, 1 Co 10³⁰⁻³¹, Eph 5²⁰, 1 Ti 4¹). Even where St. Paul's utterances, evoked by special emergencies and motives, might plausibly be construed in an opposite sense, his wider ethical doctrine repudiates such interpretation. If in a special situation he seems to deprecate and even disparage marriage and the family-life (1 Co 7^{1-7.8.28.40}), he yet shows unrivalled insight into their ideal significance and their value for spiritual education (Eph 5²²⁻⁶⁹). If he dreads anxious absorption in secular activities as incompatible with single-minded devotion to the Christian's spiritual calling (1 Co 7²⁰⁻³¹), on the other hand he sees in the earthly calling the sphere within which the spiritual is to be actually accomplished (1 Co 7²⁰, Eph 6⁵⁻⁹, Col 3-4¹) and apart from which it cannot (1 Th 4¹¹⁻¹², Eph 4²⁸ Tit 3⁸). He steadily asserts that the Christian must recognize the structure of society as based upon Divine purpose and take his place therein accordingly. While he is bound to exclude from intimacy those who are unsympathetic with his inner life (1 Co 5⁹), he is by no means to hold aloof from ordinary intercourse with all sorts and conditions of men (1 Co 5¹⁰), but here also is to find a field for that exercise of Christian principles and virtues (2 Co 1¹², Col 4⁵⁻⁶) by which he shall shine as a light in the world (Ph 2¹²; cf. 1 P 2¹⁵ 3¹⁶). And, though St. Paul waxed indignant at those who sued their fellow-Christians before heathen tribunals (1 Co 6^{1ff.}), he strongly maintains the Christian duty of loyal submission to constituted civil authority (Ro 13¹⁻⁷, 1 Ti 2¹⁻³, Tit 3¹; cf. 1 P 2¹³⁻¹⁷). In a higher sense than to other men the world belongs to the Christian (1 Co 3²¹), as a system of Divinely appointed duties and opportunities, all subservient to the education and development of Christian character—as that apprenticeship in doing the will of God which is most perfectly adapted to his present capabilities and needs (1 Co 7⁴). This is not merely an end for which the world may be used, but the end for which it exists. All things are 'of God,' but we are 'unto him' (1 Co 8⁶). It is not as by afterthought or special manipulation that 'to them that love God all things work together for good, even to them that are called according to his purpose' (Ro 8²⁸; cf. Eph 1⁴). Christian character is not a by-product of the Cosmos, but its purposed, proper, and eternal end.

But the achievement of this end presupposes devotion to it as the absolute good. It implies that the personality thus environed is dominated by an active faith in God and the spiritual life, by an earnest endeavouring after the 'new man' both for oneself and for others. When these conditions are absent, when life in the world is not inspired by love to God, to the higher self, and to one's neighbour as oneself, it inevitably becomes 'worldly'; and even when these are present, worldliness is a danger still to be guarded against. The terrestrial environment appeals directly not to the spiritual but to the psychical and animal nature, and where, as even in the Christian, life is not entirely emancipated from the bias of sin, where higher and lower elements mingle and contend, there is necessarily a tendency for the relatively good to displace the absolutely good; and if this tendency is not counteracted and overcome, the uses and enjoyments of the world—innocent in themselves and capable of being elevated to the higher range of values—become the means of chaining life to the lower.

The single passage in the apostolic writings that suggests a psychology of worldliness is 1 Jn 2¹⁶, where its constituents are given as 'the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the vainglory of life.' Here it is seen that the world exerts its downward pull upon human nature principally in two ways: by the desire (ἐπιθυμία) it excites, and by the false confidence (ἀλαζονεία) it inspires.

(a) First, there is the desire 'of the flesh,' the appetite for physical gratification. The vulnerability of human nature on this side is strongly accentuated in the apostolic writings. The sensuality of the pagan world is the subject of unsparing indictment (Ro 12¹⁶, 1 Co 6⁹⁻¹¹); but also of degenerate professors of the Christian faith St. Paul writes, even with tears, that their 'god is their belly' (Ph 3¹⁹). The Epistles are full of warning against the tyranny of the senses and their attendant appetites (e.g. Ro 13¹³, 1 Co 6¹²⁻¹³, Gal 5¹⁹⁻²¹, Eph 5¹⁸ Col 3⁵, 1 Th 4⁴⁻⁵, 2 Ti 2²², 1 P 2¹¹, 2 P 2¹⁸). But a subtler appeal is to the desire 'of the eyes,' which brings a higher range of material interests into view. The outstanding example is, of course, the lust of possession—covetousness which is 'idolatry' (Col 3⁵), a fruitful source of spiritual disaster (1 Ti 6⁹), a root of all evil (6¹⁰), and incompatible with inheritance in the Kingdom of God (Eph 5⁵). Less widely destructive, yet harmful, are the lust of vain display in apparel and personal adornment (1 P 3³); the lust of idle curiosity, the craving for continual novelty of intellectual sensation (Ac 17²¹); the lust of pre-eminence (3 Jn 9) and self-assertion, which produces strife and friction, ambitions and envious rivalry (1 Co 1¹⁰⁻¹¹ 4⁶⁻⁷, 2 Co 12²⁰, Gal 5²⁰, Ph 2³, Ja 3¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 4¹⁻³).

(b) The second chief element in the worldly temper is what St. John calls 'the vainglory of life—the delusive satisfaction, the baseless sense of security (atheistic) or of superiority (egoistic) which the attainment of worldly desire engenders. Confidence in the stability of material conditions and circumstances and the security thence begotten take the place of trust in the living God and 'the peace that passeth all understanding.' Men presume upon the prolongation of life, and arrange their future without reference to the Divine will on which moment by moment their being depends (Ja 4¹³⁻¹⁵), and thus more readily come to think of their life-work as the doing of their own will rather than God's. They make riches (1 Ti 6¹⁷) their 'strong tower'; they regard the objects of their secular activities as the things that are solid and abiding (1 Co 7²⁹⁻³¹, 1 Jn 2¹⁵); and thus throw away immortal powers upon what is fugitive and incidental, blind to the truth that the things which are seen and temporal are, in their proper purpose, only the bough that is meant to bear the fruit of things unseen and eternal (2 Co 4¹⁸). And no less characteristic of the worldly mind are the uneasiness and distress consequent upon the lack of such sense of security: God-forgetting anxiety, painful and harmful as it is futile (Ph 4⁶, 1 P 5⁷); repining over worldly losses and disappointments, the 'sorrow of the world' that 'worketh death' (2 Co 7¹⁰), reaching its climax in that sense of instability and vanity in all earthly things which, without its counterpoise of faith in spiritual reality, leads directly to the inverted worldliness of pessimism, and by rebound to cynical hedonism—'let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die' (1 Co 15³²).

Again, the 'vainglory of life' exhibits a form which is distinctively egotistical. Successful achievement, the possession of external wealth, or still more of personal gifts and qualities which are an object of desire and envy to others, produce a feeling and attitude of arrogant superiority towards one's fellows, and of self-idolatry in relation to God. The adulation of the populace is fatal to the worldly prince (Ac 12²²⁻²³); the rich are tempted to be 'highminded' (1 Ti 6¹⁷); the consciousness of superior insight 'puffeth up' (1 Co 8¹) those in whom it is not united with love and a sense of love's responsibilities. Gifts, even of a religious kind (1 Co 1⁷), unless safeguarded by gratitude, become incitements to arrogance (1 Co 4⁷⁻⁸). And here also, the self-satisfaction which is produced by the sense of possession has its negative counterpart in the no less egotistical discontent and envy which are excited by the consciousness of defect (1 Ti 6⁴, Tit 3³, 1 Jn 3¹⁵). Finally, this whole view of life, for which spiritual realities are non-existent, finds expression in the 'wisdom of this world' (1 Co 1²⁰, 'fleshly wisdom,' 2 Co 1¹²), the wisdom whose furthest horizon is that of the present age (1 Co 2⁶), which moves, however skillfully, only on the plane of material things and interests (τὰ ἐπιγεια φρονούντες, Ph 3¹⁹), and which therefore inspires much self-sufficiency in men (1 Co 1²⁰), to which the Cross of Christ is foolishness (1 Co 1¹⁸) but which is itself foolishness with God (1 Co 3¹⁹).

As to the general conception, it would be a grave mistake to suppose that worldliness is due simply to the quick responsiveness of human nature to its terrestrial environment. Its sensitiveness to material stimulus is one element in the case; but the determining factor is its insensitiveness to the Divine. The problem of worldliness runs back into the wider and deeper problem of sin. Thus the NT writers see in human worldliness the replica of a type of mind previously existing in the spirit-world, and attribute it, in part at least, to this superhuman source. St. James describes its 'wisdom' as not only earthly and sensuous, but δαμονιώδης (3¹⁵). St. Paul identifies the 'wisdom of the present age' with the wisdom of its spirit-rulers, who in their blindness compassed the crucifixion of Christ (1 Co 2⁶⁻⁸), and ascribes to the 'god of this æon' the incapacity of men to perceive His Divine glory (2 Co 4⁴; cf. 1 Jn 4³⁻⁵). And this 'spirit of the world' (1 Co 2¹²), blind to the truth of Christ and antagonistic to His cause, has its social embodiment in that section of mankind which in a more special sense is 'the world' (see art. WORLD). Hence arises a clear and concrete issue. The sincere Christian cannot love the world (1 Jn 2¹⁵). It is the home of all opinions, sentiments, and influences which are most inimical to his convictions and aspirations. The programme it lays down for its devotees is wholly incompatible with self-denying love and holy obedience of the followers of Christ (Tit 2¹², 2 P 1⁴, 1 Jn 2¹⁵⁻¹⁶). Its friendship is enmity with God (Ja 4⁴).

Worldliness, as depicted in the apostolic writings, is not a natural and naïve materialism; it is the bondage to the material of a being who is essentially spiritual. Made for fellowship in the life that is Divine and eternal, man craves for satisfactions which the natural use and enjoyment of material good cannot yield; and these he therefore seeks in wanton excess and perversions of nature (Ro 12¹⁻²). The covetousness of those who have enough, the excesses of sensuality, the unappeasable hunger of vanity and ambition, the unceasing pursuit of excitement, envy, jealousy, the gnawing hatred of others' good—all show how the soul, deprived of its proper nutriment, vainly flies to the world for a substitute.

And as the root of the evil is man's unresponsiveness to the higher realities, there must the remedy be applied. The apostolic Epistles abound, indeed, in exhortation to the severance of all correspondences with the lower environment that are unnecessary, or are found in experience to be harmful. But always they find the one effectual antidote to worldliness in the quickening of the spiritual life by faith in Christ crucified, risen and victorious, and in the earnest pursuit of positive Christian ideals (Gal 6¹⁴, Ro 12¹⁻² 13¹²⁻¹⁴, 1 Co 10³¹, Gal 5¹⁶, Eph 5¹⁻² 18, Col 3¹⁻², 1 Ti 6¹¹, 1 Jn 5⁴). 'This is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith' (1 Jn 5⁴).

LITERATURE.—H. Bisseker, art. 'Worldliness' in DCG; A. Ritschl and J. Weiss, art. 'Welt' in PRE3; A. B. D. Alexander, The Ethics of St. Paul, Glasgow, 1910; R. Law, The Tests of Life, Edinburgh, 1914, pp. 145 ff., 275 ff.; W. Alexander, The Epistles of St. John, London, 1889, pp. 136 ff., 149 ff.; Phillips Brooks, Sermons, do., 1879, p. 353 ff.; J. Foster, Lectures, do., 1853, vol. i. p. 11 ff.; J. M. Gibbon, Eternal Life, do., 1890, p. 36 ff.; H. P. Liddon, Easter in St. Paul's, do., 1885, p. 253 ff.; A. Maclaren, After the Resurrection, do., 1902, p. 142 ff.; A Year's Ministry, 1st ser., do., 1884, p. 85 ff.; J. Martineau, Endearours after the Christian Life, do., 1876, p. 439 ff.; J. H. Newman, Parochial and Plain Sermons, new ed., do., 1863, i. 215 ff.; F. W. Robertson, Lectures on St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians, new ed., do., 1873, p. 127 ff., Sermons, 3rd ser., new ed., do., 1876, pp. 15 ff., 169 ff.; T. G. Selby, The Unheeding God, do., 1839, p. 182 ff.; W. L. Watkinson, The Blind Spot, do., 1899, pp. 135 ff., 201 ff.

ROBERT LAW.

WORMWOOD (δψυθος).—The only passage in the NT in which δψυθος occurs is Rev 8¹¹. Wormwood is referred to several times in the OT, the Heb. word used being נֶזֶל, but δψυθος is nowhere used in the LXX as its Greek equivalent. There is, however, no doubt that 'wormwood' is the correct translation of δψυθος (cf. Liddell and Scott, s.v.). The Heb. נֶזֶל and its Arabic equivalent are both derived from a root meaning 'to curse.' It is nearly always associated with gall, the two together being apt emblems of sorrow and calamity by reason of the bitterness of their taste.

There are, according to Tristram, seven species of the Artemisia or wormwood, the Artemisia absinthium being the most common. They all have a bitter taste.

In Rev 8¹¹ wormwood is not mixed with water but the third part of the water is turned into wormwood. The former operation would not necessarily be destructive of human life, whereas unmixed wormwood is represented as having that effect. Just as the creatures of the sea perished by reason of the burning mass cast into it (v. 9) so human life was destroyed by the conversion of the rivers and streams into wormwood.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, *Natural History of the Bible*¹⁰, London, 1911, p. 493, Survey of Western Palestine, do., 1884, p. 331; H. B. Swete, *Apocalypse of St. John*², do., 1907, p. 112; EBI iv. 5354 f.; SDB, p. 978; HDB iv. 940 f.; Murray's DB, p. 951.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

WORSHIP.—It has been well said that 'for St. Paul and the members of the early Christian brotherhood the whole of life was a continuous worship, and the one great feature of that worship was prayer.'* If we use the word 'prayer' in the widest sense, as including praise as well as petition and intercession, the words agree with the opinion of Dollinger: 'When the attention of a thinking heathen was directed to the new religion which was spreading in the Roman Empire, the thing to strike him as extraordinary would be that a religion of prayer was superseding the religion of ceremonies and invocations of gods; that it encouraged all, even the humblest and the most uneducated, to pray, or, in other words, to meditate and exercise the mind in self-scrutiny and contemplation of God.'† In that age many men who showed respect for the externals of worship doubted their efficacy and the very existence of the gods. The calm confidence of Christian believers in their faith, unseared by the superstitions which had brought them to scepticism, could not fail to impress thoughtful men. Inquiry revealed to them forms of worship in the Christian Church austere in their simplicity, but hallowed alike by their association with the sacred traditions of Jewish worship and by the vivid consciousness of the presence of God to whom they could draw near as their Father through Jesus Christ, their Saviour, in the power of His Holy Spirit poured out upon all flesh.

1. History of Christian worship.—The worship of the Apostolic Church followed the precedents both of the Temple and of the Synagogue. At first the Apostles were diligent in their attendance at the Temple (Ac 2⁴⁶), and the keen desire of St. Paul to keep the Feast at Jerusalem (20¹⁶) shows that the services of Christian assemblies were as yet regarded as supplementary to the central worship at the shrine of Jewish devotion. From the Temple came eventually the gradual evolution of the liturgy which summed up in a central service the profound thought of the Epistle to the Hebrews on the sacrifice of Christ as fulfilling all the types of Jewish sacrifice. The visions of the Apocalypse fill in the picture of Christian worship in the Eucharist as the representation on earth of the worship of heaven.

'These thoughts, though found in these books themselves, did not find expression till a later age.'* Clement of Rome has the idea of Christ as 'the high-priest of our offerings,' but the ideas of the heavenly Priesthood of our Lord, and the 'Lamb standing as slain' of the Apocalypse, found only very isolated expression in liturgical prayers before the 4th century. Irenæus has the 'heavenly altar' (iv. 18. 6) and Origen dwells on the High Priesthood of Christ (de Oratone, 10), but the Eucharist of pre-Nicene times moved rather in a simpler circle of ideas. It is in Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, and (in the West) Ambrose that we find these ideas developed. The earlier ideas seem derived not from the Temple and its associations but from the primitive idea of the 'thankoffering' (e.g. εὐχαριστίας of the Institution and the εὐχαριστία of Ignatius, Clement, and the Didache), together with the thought of the One Body of St. Paul; cf. again the Didache prayers. The 'thankoffering' idea was expanded into the glorious eucharistic prayer found in its largest and fullest range in the liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions. The idea of the One Body explains the emphasis and concentration of thought in the pre-Nicene prayers on 'communion,' as opposed to worship of the Lamb standing as slain, which is the feature of the Greek liturgy from the time of Cyril of Jerusalem. And this 'hieratic' element in Christian liturgy is much more marked in Greek-speaking lands than in the West.

This somewhat lengthy quotation seems necessary to show how the ideas in the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Apocalypse were eventually expanded. The immediate purpose of the Epistle to the Hebrews was on another line. When the blow fell and the Temple at Jerusalem was destroyed, the mind of the Jewish Christian Church was prepared for the catastrophe. In the meantime, development had taken place in the worship both of Jewish and of Gentile Christians in the house-churches to which their assemblies were of necessity confined.

We can distinguish two lines of development: (i.) meetings for edification; (ii.) for the Supper of the Lord, the breaking of bread, in which, at first, the Eucharist was combined with the Agape or 'Love Feast' (Jude¹; cf. also 2 P 2¹³). But, as Srawley points out, 'the use of the term Agape, and the distinction between the Agape and the Eucharist, as applied to the conditions described in Acts and 1 Corinthians, are possibly anachronisms. As yet there was no sharp distinction between the two parts of the meal, such as took place when the specially eucharistic features assumed a more developed liturgical form.*

* J. H. Srawley, The Early History of the Liturgy, p. 240 ff.

* W. Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, London, 1911, p. 463.

† J. J. I. Dollinger, The First Age of Christianity and the Church, Eng. tr., do., 1906, p. 344.

Lindsay has described in a graphic way the meeting for edification in one of the Gentile churches founded by St. Paul.

'The brethren fill the body of the hall, the women sitting together, in all probability on the one side, and the men on the other; behind them are the inquirers; and behind them, clustering round the door, unbelievers, whom curiosity or some other motive has attracted, and who are welcomed to this meeting "for the Word."

'The service, and probably each part of the service, began with the benediction: "Grace be to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ," which was followed by an invocation of Jesus and the confession that He is Lord. One of the brethren began to pray; then another and another; one began the Lord's Prayer, and all joined; each prayer was followed by a hearty and fervent "Amen." Then a hymn was sung; then another and another, for several of the brethren have composed or selected hymns at home which they wish to be sung by the congregation. . . .

'After the hymns came reading from the Old Testament Scriptures,† and readings or recitations concerning the life and death, the sayings and deeds of Jesus. Then came the "instruction"—sober words for edification, based on what had been read, and coming either from the gift of "wisdom," or from that intuitive power of seeing into the heart of spiritual things which the apostle calls "knowledge." Then came the moment of greatest expectancy. It was the time for the prophets, men who believed themselves and were believed by their brethren to be specially taught by the Holy Spirit, to take part. They started forward, the gifted men, so eager to impart what had been given them, that sometimes two or more rose at once and spoke together;‡ and sometimes when one was speaking the message came to another, and he leapt to his feet,§ increasing the emotion and taking from the edification. When the prophets were silent, first one, then another, and sometimes two at once, began strange ejaculatory prayers, in sentences so rugged and disjointed that the audience for the most part could not understand, and had to wait till some of their number, who could follow the strange utterances, were ready to translate them into intelligible language.¶ Then followed the benediction: "The Grace of the Lord Jesus be with you all"; the "kiss of peace"; and the congregation dispersed. Sometimes during the meeting, at some part of the services, but oftenest when the prophets were speaking, there was a stir at the back of the room, and a heathen, who had been listening in careless curiosity or in barely concealed scorn, suddenly felt the sinful secrets of his own heart revealed to him, and pushing forward fell down at the feet of the speaker and made his confession, while the assembly raised the doxology: "Blessed be God, the Father of the Lord Jesus, for evermore. Amen."¶¶

The elements of such worship—prayer and praise and instruction—combined to make what Duchesne in a happy phrase calls 'a Liturgy of the Holy Ghost after the Liturgy of Christ, a true liturgy with a Real Presence and communion.' In one form or another they passed into the later offices, beginning with vigil services, then morning services, which combined to make what was known in later days as the Divine Office. These had their roots in the Synagogue services, but were distinguished by the new fervour which the gift of the Holy Spirit stamped upon them, so that while the keynote of the Synagogue service was instruction the new keynote was praise.

We may trace the same trend of thought in the Epistle to the Ephesians, regarded as a circular letter eminently calculated to raise the whole tone of worship. It is written from a point of view at which the Apostle feels free to pass away from the warnings needed by local churches and to rise into a higher region of emotion and thanksgiving.††

2. The Eucharist.—In 1 Co 11²⁰⁻²⁴ the Eucharist seems to have followed the Agape. St. Paul writes of it as a well-known service (1 Co 10¹⁶). Putting together the scattered hints in the Epistles along with the references in Clement of Rome and Justin Martyr, we may suppose that it followed a service such as that described above and that it always included the following elements: a prayer of thanksgiving (1k 22¹⁹, 1 Co 11²⁴ 14¹⁸, 1 Ti 2¹); the blessing of the bread and wine, with the recital of the words of Institution (1 Co 10¹⁶, Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁸, Mk 14²²⁻²⁴, Lk 22¹⁹⁻²⁰, 1 Co 11²³); * prayers, remembering Christ's death (Lk 22¹⁹, 1 Co 11²³, 25, 26); the people eat and drink the consecrated bread and wine (Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁷, Mk 14²², 23, 1 Co 11²⁶⁻²⁹). The evidence of the Didache is still in dispute. Some suppose that it contains prayers for the Agape rather than the Eucharist. In either case they are of interest and may be quoted here.

'Every Sunday of the Lord, having assembled together, break bread and give thanks, having confessed your sins, that your sacrifice be pure' (xiv. 1).

'Concerning the Thanksgiving, give thanks thus. First, for the cup: We give thanks to thee, our Father, for the holy vine of thy servant David, which thou hast shown us through thy servant Jesus. Glory to thee for ever. But for the broken (bread): We give thanks to thee, our Father, for the life and knowledge which thou hast shown us through thy servant Jesus. Glory to thee for ever. As this broken bread was scattered over the mountains, and has been gathered together and made one, so may thy Church be gathered from the ends of the earth into thy kingdom; for thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever. But none is to eat or drink of your Thanksgiving except those who are baptized into the name of the Lord; for because of this the Lord said: Do not give the holy thing to dogs' (ix.).

'After ye are filled give thanks thus: We give thanks to thee, holy Father, for thy holy name which thou hast made to dwell in our hearts, and for the knowledge and faith and immortality which thou hast shown us through thy servant Jesus. Glory to thee for ever. Thou, Almighty Lord, hast created all things for thy name's sake and thou hast given food and drink to men for enjoyment that they might give thanks to thee. Above all we thank thee because thou art mighty. . . . Glory to thee for ever. Remember, O Lord, thy Church to free her from all evil and make her perfect in thy love; gather her from the four winds and make her holy in thy kingdom which thou hast prepared for her; for thine is the power and the glory for ever. Let grace come and let this world perish. Hosanna to the God of David. If any one be holy let him draw nigh; if any one be not, let him repent. Maran atha. Amen. But let the prophets give thanks as much as they will' (x.).

If the early date is allowed, we find here anticipation of the great thanksgiving of the later liturgies, mention of God's work in creation and in redemption, a thanksgiving after Communion and prayer for the Church with the germ of the act of praise which grew into the Gloria in excelsis.

The Epistle of Clement of Rome has references to the order observed for the worship of God, e.g. ch. 40:

'Now the offerings and ministrations He commanded to be performed with care, and not to be done rashly or in disorder, but at fixed times and seasons.'

It contains also quotations from a wonderful prayer of intercession and thanksgiving (qq.v.), and a close parallel to the later Sanctus.

Ch. 34: 'For the Scripture saith; Ten thousands of ten thousands stood by Him, and thousands of thousands ministered unto Him: and they cried aloud, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Sabaoth; all creation is full of His glory. Yea, and let us ourselves then, being gathered together in concord with intendment of heart, cry unto Him as from one mouth earnestly that we may be made partakers of His great and glorious promises.'

The Epistles of Ignatius contain many liturgical phrases but no further hints as to the form of worship beyond the maxim, 'Do nothing without the bishop and the presbyters,' and such general exhortation as the following:

ad Magn. 7: 'And attempt not to think anything right for yourselves apart from others: but let there be one prayer in common, one supplication, one mind, one hope, in love and in joy unblameable, which is Jesus Christ, than whom there is nothing better. Hasten to come together all of you, as to one temple, even God; as to one altar, even to one Jesus Christ, who came forth from One Father, and is with One and departed unto One.'

* We may doubt whether there was any definite idea as yet of a 'formula of consecration.' As Srawley has said, 'the "thanksgiving" was regarded as the sanctification of the meal, which in virtue of this thanksgiving pronounced over it became the spiritual food of the faithful' (op. cit., p. 227).

* Op. cit., p. 16.

† St. Paul does not mention the reading of Scripture in his order of worship; but it must have been there. He takes for granted that the OT Scriptures are known and used, in 1 Co 6¹⁶ 9⁸⁻¹³ 14²¹, 2 Co 6¹⁶, 18 8¹⁵ 9⁸.

‡ 1 Co 14³¹.

§ 1 Co 14³⁰.

¶ 1 Co 14²⁷, 28.

¶¶ The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, p. 44 ff.

 Christian Worship, p. 43.

†† Eph 1¹⁵ 23 8¹⁴, 21.

Pliny's letter to the Emperor Trajan, important as it is from other points of view, does not fill in any details for us in the scheme of worship. Pliny asserts that the Christians were 'accustomed on a certain day to meet together before daybreak and to sing a hymn alternately to Christ as a god' (Ep. xvi. 7). He continues that, having bound themselves by an oath to commit no crime, they dispersed but met again to eat food—a hint of the separation of the Agape from the Eucharist.

The testimony of Justin Martyr in his First Apology is much more definite, and must be quoted in full:

Ch. 65: 'But we [Christians], after that we have thus washed him who has been convinced and has assented [to our teaching], lead him to the place where those who are called brethren are assembled, in order that we may offer hearty prayers in common for ourselves and for the illuminated [i.e. baptized] person, and for all others in every place, that we may be counted worthy, now that we have learned the truth, by our works also to be found good citizens and keepers of the commandments, so that we may be saved with an everlasting salvation. Having ended the prayers, we salute one another with a kiss. Bread and a cup of wine mingled with water are then brought to the president of the brethren: and he, taking them, gives praise and glory to the Father of the Universe, through the Name of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, and offers thanks at considerable length for our being counted worthy to receive these things at His hands. And when he has concluded the prayer and thanksgivings, all the people present express their assent by saying, "Amen." . . . And when the president has given thanks and all the people have expressed their assent, those who are called by us deacons give each of those present the bread and wine mixed with water, over which the thanksgiving was pronounced, and they carry away a portion to those who are not present.'

66: 'And this food is called among us the Eucharist, of which no one is allowed to partake but he who believes that the things which we teach are true, and who has been washed with the washing that is for the remission of sins and unto regeneration, and who is so living as Christ hath enjoined. For we do not receive these [elements] as common bread and common drink, but in like manner as Jesus Christ our Saviour, having been made flesh by the word of God, had both flesh and blood for our salvation, so likewise have we been taught that the food which is blessed by the prayer of the word which comes from Him, and from which our blood and flesh are nourished by transmutation, is the flesh and blood of that Jesus who was made flesh.'

Justin goes on to quote the words of Institution from the Gospels, and in ch. 67, repeating his account of the Eucharist, emphasizes the fact that it is celebrated on Sunday, and adds that the Gospels are read 'or the writings of the Prophets, as long as time permits.'

'And the well-to-do and the willing give what each person thinks fit, and the collection is deposited with the president, who succours orphans and widows, and those who are in want through sickness or any other cause, and those who are in prison, and the strangers sojourning among us, and, in a word, he takes care of all who are in any need.'

3. Principles.—From these scattered hints, from which we may endeavour to reconstitute the form of worship in the Apostolic Church, we must now turn to the principles. In the evolution of the primitive liturgy we can discern a close adherence to the apostolic combination of prayer and praise with instruction and intercession leading up to the gift of sacramental grace. At the same time we note the constant loyalty to the principle on which Hooker lays such stress—that sacraments are 'not physical but moral instruments of salvation, duties of service and worship, which unless we perform as the Author of grace requireth, they are unprofitable.'

This finds emphasis in the constant teaching of the need of purification for participation in holy rites. This is expressed in He 10²²: 'Let us draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our body washed with pure water.' In other words, devotion must be sincere and not formal, faith must be enlightened and firmly held. The writer goes on to refer to the confession made at baptism (v. ²⁹): 'Let us hold fast the confession of our hope that it waver not.' Other references could be multiplied, but it may suffice to quote 1 P 1^{16, 17}, where the exhortation to holiness of life accompanies reference to 'calling on the Father.' The thought is summarized in the ancient proclamation by the bishop to the people, 'Holy things to holy persons.'

* Ecclesiastical Polity, v. lviii. 4.

Again we find that the primary characteristic of apostolic worship was to offer to the Lord the honour due unto His name in holy worship (Ps 29²). The desire of the Psalmist was fulfilled. The Church met to give as well as to receive.

This thought leads straight up into the high region of speculation entered by Freeman when he traces back the ultimate principle of the Eucharist and of the Divine Office to the fundamental doctrines of the Incarnation and the Perpetual Priesthood of Christ. The Incarnation is linked up with the foundation truth of sacrifice. 'Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor.'* All Christian worship is enriched by that thought. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Under the conditions of human sinfulness the incarnate life of Christ was necessarily consecrated by suffering, which found its culmination in the Cross of Calvary, His Passion being the perfecting of His Priesthood. So it is the privilege of the Church in the Eucharist to show the Lord's death till He come, to offer in this memorial sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving 'the one true pure immortal sacrifice.'

The Divine Office of a later age, which traces its roots to the simple congregational meetings for edification, allied, as we have seen, to the Synagogue services, is based on the thought of the Perpetual Priesthood of Christ. Constant reference to the mediation of Christ in the familiar ending of prayers 'through Jesus Christ our Lord' kept this ever in mind.

LITERATURE.—L. Duchesne, *Christian Worship*², Eng. tr., London, 1904; A. Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services, do., 1874; A. Fortescue, The Mass, do., 1913; P. Freeman, The Principles of Divine Service, Oxford, 1863; T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, London, 1902; J. H. Srawley, The Early History of the Liturgy, Cambridge, 1913; F. E. Warren, Liturgy and Ritual of the Ante-Nicene Church, London, 1897.

A. E. BURN.

WRATH.—See ANGER.

WRITING.—1. The autographs of the Apostolic Age. — The problem regarding 'writing' and 'book' in the Apostolic Age might be expressed by the following question: With what materials and in what forms were letters and longer works written in the primitive Christian community and the Christian churches of the period between A.D. 30 and c. A.D. 100? This question would be easily answered if we still possessed autographs (αὐτογραφαί, ἀρχέτυπα, ἰδιόχειρα) from the hands of Christian writers in that period—if, e.g., we had NT Epistles by St. Paul or other writers, Gospels, or, say, the First Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, in the handwriting of the authors or their amanuenses, or even if we had the earliest transcripts of the originals. Unfortunately this is not the case. Down to the present time not the smallest scrap of an autograph from a Christian source in the 1st cent. A.D. has come to light. It is quite conceivable that such an autograph might have withstood the ravages of time until now, for we actually possess MS fragments of considerably earlier origin than the autographs of the NT—a fact which shows the durability of the ancient writing material in cases where the external conditions gave it a fair chance of survival, and, in particular, where the papyrus was protected against damp. Hitherto, however, all reports announcing the discovery of primitive Christian autographs, and all, even the earlier, references to their being in existence at the time, have proved to be utterly valueless. Moreover, even granting it possible that some fragment of a Christian autograph dating from the 1st cent. may yet fall into our hands, we can hardly cherish the hope that in particular the original MSS of the NT will be found. In this connexion we must remember the distinctive character of a large proportion of the NT writings—the fact, namely, that, while they came in time to rank as literature in the highest sense, the majority of them were not originally designed for the general public at all. The Epistles of Paul were certainly not given to the world as books in the sense recognized by the ancient book-trade; on the contrary, they were sent as true letters, letters in the handwriting of the sender or his amanuensis. The one much-handled MS, passing from reader to reader, perhaps from church to church, would undoubtedly suffer damage in the process, and it is hardly likely that in the primitive communities the material upon which such letters and their first transcripts were written would be of the most expensive or most durable kind. Again, as regards the primitive Christian writings that may conceivably have been bought and sold as books, it is highly improbable that they were written and preserved with the extreme care that looks to a long future; for, as we know, the mind of the primitive Christian community was for the most part not greatly concerned with the earthly future at all. When Clement of Rome, writing to the Church in Corinth c. A.D. 96, says ‘Take up (ἀναλάβετε) the letter of the sainted apostle Paul’ (ch. 47), his words cannot be reasonably supposed to prove that the autograph of St. Paul’s First Epistle to the Corinthians was still in their possession. The disputes of the 2nd cent. regarding certain NT passages are intelligible only on the assumption that the disputants neither possessed the autographs nor knew of their existence. Whether the words of Tertullian in de Præscriptione Hæreticorum, 36—‘percurse ecclesias apostolicas apud quas ipse adhuc cathedræ apostolorum suis locis præsidet (præsidentur [?]), apud quas ipse authenticæ literæ eorum recitantur, sonantes vocem et repræsentantes faciem unius cuiusque’—are to be taken as implying that Pauline autographs were still extant in many places, as e.g. Thessalonica, the present writer cannot definitely say. In view of all the circumstances, therefore, we must endeavour to reconstruct the facts regarding ‘writing’ and ‘book’ in Christian circles in the Apostolic Age, our data being sporadic references in the primitive Christian writings themselves, and what we know of the general practice of writing in the period.

* 2 Co 8⁹.

2. Writing materials.—In Goethe’s Faust the hero offers a wide choice of materials for the document which Mephistopheles demands:

‘Die Herrschaft führen Wachs und Leder . . .
Erz, Marmor, Pergament, Papier?
Soll ich mit Griffel, Meissel, Feder schreiben?’

In the Apostolic Age there was a similar variety of choice. The available materials of that period, however, did not include the modern paper—the thin, more or less smooth, white or yellow fabric manufactured from cotton or linen. Such paper seems to have been an invention of the Chinese in very early times, and became known to the Arabs after their conquest of Samarra in A.D. 704. The Arabs came at length to use it for writing purposes to the exclusion of almost every other material, and it was in this way carried to Sicily and Spain; in all likelihood it reached other Western lands as a result of the Crusades and the consequent growth of intercourse between the eastern and western regions of the Mediterranean. In any case, paper as known to us cannot have been used for the autographs of the Apostolic Age.

According to Lk 1⁶³, Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, made use of a writing tablet (πινακίδιον, v.l. πινάκισ, of which πινάκιδιον is a diminutive; cf. Epictetus, Diss. iii. 22, 74). The ancient writing tablets, which may be said to survive in our slates, were made of metal or wood, sometimes even of ivory, and were often whitewashed, or covered with a layer of stucco; two or more tablets might be bound together with thread. Frequently, too, the inner part of the tablet was deepened, the edges being allowed to stand out like a frame—a device that gave a better protection to the writing. The hollow part was often smeared with wax; notes could then be entered upon the thin film by the metal stilus, and, when these had served their purpose, the wax could be smoothed for fresh use. It was not very easy to write rapidly on the wax, and the script was rather indistinct to the eye. The pointed stilus frequently had at its other end a small thin plate with which erasures could be made. As other sorts of writing material were relatively high in price, these tablets had generally to suffice for briefer records. Such a tablet, inscribed with its short message, could be sent by one person to another, somewhat like a post-card, and the receiver could smooth the wax, write his reply, and send back the tablet without delay. By the 1st cent. A.D., however, the wax film was coming to be superseded by a small sheet of parchment. It would probably be safe to say that, in much the same proportion as people carry notebooks at the present day, the Christians of the Apostolic Age who were fairly able to write carried and made use of writing tablets. It is of special importance to note that the folding tablets form a link in the development that resulted in the codex. Nevertheless, as the tablet could carry but little writing—at most perhaps a message about as long as the Third Epistle of John or the Epistle to Philemon—it need hardly be taken into account with reference to the autographs of primitive Christian writings.

The other available materials that might be used for the writings of the Apostolic Age were sheets of papyrus and parchment. Papyrus,* the manufacture of which is described—not indeed altogether clearly or accurately—by Pliny the Elder (HN xiii. 21–27), was a product of the papyrus plant, a rush that grew in the Nile Delta. The pith of the plant was cut into thin strips, which were laid horizontally side by side, and covered with a similar layer of strips at right angles. The whole was made to cohere by some glutinous substance, and then pressed, dried, and polished. The side upon which the fibres ran horizontally was latterly regarded as the proper one for writing upon; it was used first, and for the most part the other was left blank. The process of manufacture became at length so highly developed as to yield sheets in which toughness and durability were combined with a remarkable degree of thinness, and which were sometimes so smooth that the steel pen of to-day moves freely over them. The preparation of papyrus in Egypt is a very ancient industry, its beginnings being clearly traceable to the 3rd or 4th millennium B.C.

The use of leather as a writing material seems to go back to an equally early time; it is said to have been a very ancient practice in the East (cf. Herod. v. 58; Diod. Sic. ii. 32). Thick leather, however, was hardly a substance adapted for the production of larger works, and only its preparation in the form of the thinner and more delicate parchment could make it avail for such a purpose. The invention of parchment has been usually connected with the desire of Eumenes II., king of Pergamum (197-158 B.C.), to institute a great library on the model of that in Alexandria. The kernel of fact in Pliny's statement to that effect (HN xiii. 21) may well be that in the first half of the 2nd cent. B.C. Pergamum became a centre for a more frequent use and a more refined preparation of the skins of animals as a writing material. It is probable, however, that prior to this there had been a slow process of development—a process tending towards an increased refinement in the preparation of leather for writing, and at length, in the 2nd cent. B.C., reaching a stage at which even extensive works could be written wholly upon parchment, and still kept within the limits of convenient size.

* The pronunciation with the y long is probably the correct one.

The notion that the Jews from the first wrote their sacred books upon leather rolls is not confirmed by evidence satisfactory to historical science. As a matter of fact, we know that the use of papyrus reached Phœnicia as early as the 11th cent. B.C., and accordingly the books in roll form referred to in the OT (Jer 36^{1st}, Ezk 29 3^{1st}, Ps 40⁷ [cf. He 10⁷], Zec 5^{1st}; cf. also Is 34¹, and the words ἀναπτύσσειν [2 K 19¹⁴] and εἰλάσσειν [Rev 6¹⁴]) might quite well have been formed of papyrus; indeed, the words χαρτίον and χαρτης, the specific terms for a papyrus sheet, are quite correctly used in LXX Jer 43 (Heb. 36). Characteristically enough, the earliest record of the Jews having transcribed their sacred writings upon rolls of parchment or leather is found in Josephus (Ant. XII. ii. 11; the work was finished c. A.D. 93-94), and thus dates from an age when the use of parchment had been fairly well established for some time; we shall hardly err in supposing that the transition to the use of that more lasting material reached its term among the Jews not earlier than the last pre-Christian centuries. The Jews would naturally desire to have the most durable substances for the preservation of their sacred writings (cf. Mishna, Megilla ii. 2, Shabb. viii. 3), and this, again, would be of importance for the use of parchment in Christian circles. It is of course quite possible that Israelites and Jews had long made use of polished leather for records of a shorter kind.

Which of these two substances, then, may we suppose to have been employed for the NT writings? E. Reuss (*Geschichte der heiligen Schriften neuen Testaments*², Brunswick, 1860) could still write: 'Parchment was certainly not unknown, but too expensive for general use.' The present writer is of opinion, however, that the results of recent research prove the very opposite: papyrus sheets came in course of time to command so high a price that parchment, at once cheaper, more durable, and better adapted for being written upon on both sides, came to be more generally used in quarters where price was a consideration. Among the Greeks, this transition from papyrus to parchment was checked by two material considerations, viz. the lightness and delicacy of the papyrus fabric, and the relief which, in contrast to the glossy and often dazzling parchment, that fabric afforded to the eye of both writer and reader—though the larger characters generally used for writing on the parchment sheet were relatively more legible to weak eyes. From the artistic point of view, moreover, the papyrus roll of the Greeks certainly seemed the most finished and elegant form of book in a reader's hands, and that form was doubtless retained as long as possible. But while the Greeks, from the 5th cent. B.C. to the 4th cent. A.D., mainly employed papyrus as the material vehicle of their literature, they certainly began, as early as the 1st cent. A.D., and, in the first instance, for the use of schools, to transfer the texts written on papyri to the more durable parchment. It is instructive to note that Martial, writing not later than A.D. 84-85, speaks of books in papyrus as being dearer and more valuable than books in parchment; and this is to be explained by the fact that the manufacture of papyrus was almost wholly confined to the Nile Delta, so that an increased consumption, or a poor crop, would naturally tend to advance the price. The date at which the general use of parchment seems definitely to have superseded that of papyrus falls at the earliest in the 4th or 5th cent. A.D., and the intervening period from the 1st cent. must therefore be regarded as a time of transition.

In view of these data it is impossible to maintain absolutely that the autographs of the Apostolic Age—the originals of the primitive Christian writings down to the First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians—must all have been written upon papyrus. That the Christians of that age might use papyrus, that, e.g., St. John, writing perhaps c. 85, wrote his Second Epistle on a papyrus sheet, appears from the words (v. 12): πολλὰ ἔχω ὑμῖν γράφειν, οὐκ ἤβουλήθην διὰ χάρτου καὶ μέλανος, but this supplies no evidence as to the material generally used in the Apostolic Age. Somewhat earlier, c. A.D. 66 (?), St. Paul (2 Ti 4¹²) writes: τὸν φαλδῆρον δὲν ἀπέλιπον ἐν Τρωάδι παρὰ Κάρπῳ, ἐρχόμενος φέρε, καὶ τα βιβλία, μαλιστα [δὲ] τὰς μεμβράνας. ἡ μεμβράνα is simply the Lat. membrana, 'skin', 'parchment.' That St. Paul here uses the word in the sense of codex membranaceus, or 'parchment roll,' cannot be proved; and we can therefore hardly think that it refers to leather rolls of the OT. The μεμβράνα was in fact the single sheet, i.e. the word denoted the material; thus Horace (Sat. ii. 3. 1), writing c. 30 B.C., says: 'You write so seldom that you do not require membranam four times in a whole year'; the writing material used by the person whom the satirist here describes amounted in all to four sheets of parchment in a year. In all probability, therefore, St. Paul's membranæ were sheets of parchment, either blank or containing notes and extracts, and thus not included among the βιβλία, i.e. his papyrus rolls. According to Quintilian (Inst. Orat. x. iii. 31), it was impossible in his day to write with the desired facility on parchment, which clearly had not as yet been brought to the requisite degree of polish, and it was necessary to make use of large letters; this circumstance tended to impede the general employment of parchment. If we may infer from Gal 6¹¹ (ἴδετε πηλικοὺς ὑμῶν γράμμασιν ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ) that St. Paul wrote the whole impassioned Epistle, or at least its conclusion, with his own hand, the 'large letters' might no doubt be taken as indicating a considerable defect of vision, and it would thus be possible and conceivable that the Apostle had here made use of sheets of parchment. That relatively short letter, even if written in characters more than usually large, would not require many such sheets; and, on the whole, the hypothesis must be regarded as a possible one. But the present writer certainly does not believe that longer works of the Apostolic Age were written as yet upon parchment. The fastening together of a number of sheets so as to form a continuous parchment roll, while no doubt it was practised, was certainly attended with difficulties. It would be possible, of course, to employ the form of the codex (i.e. that of the modern book in folded sheets), in which the prepared skin was folded upon the flesh-side, thus causing flesh-side to face flesh-side and hair-side to face hair-side throughout, so that the front of the sheet, the recto, was smooth, and the back, the verso, rough; and in point of fact the codex form seems to have originated in the 2nd cent. B.C. in Asia Minor, and is therefore not to be regarded as a discovery of the first or later Christian centuries. Still, the relatively late appearance of the codex in art, and especially in art of Christian origin, hardly justifies us, the present writer thinks, in assuming that parchment MSS in that form were very numerous in the Apostolic Age and the Apostolic Church, though this argument might doubtless be met by the hypothesis that art, in clinging to the papyrus roll, and continuing to do so even at a time when, as in the 4th and 5th centuries A.D., the codex had become firmly established, and the roll was all but wholly superseded, was simply showing its general tendency to conservatism. On the whole, therefore, while it is absolutely certain that in course of time Christian literature and the NT were transmitted in growing measure by parchment and codex, so that in fact 'parchment codex' and 'Christian literature' are related in the closest way, it may be presumed that this was not the case at first, and there can be little doubt that the great majority of the primitive Christian autographs, as well as of their earliest copies, were written on papyrus.

The fluid used for writing on papyrus was a soot-ink, i.e. a mixture of pine soot and glue dissolved in water, but, as this mixture did not adhere very well to parchment, a metallic ink of gall-apples was employed for the latter. Gall-apple ink, however, is not mentioned until the 5th cent. A.D.—c. 470 (Martianus Capella, iii. 225 [ed. F. Eyssenhart, Leipzig, 1866, p. 55])—and thus the ink used in the Apostolic Age would probably be the mixture first mentioned, as referred to in 2 Co 3³ (γεγραμμένος μέλανι), 2 Jn 12 (διὰ χάριτος καὶ μέλανος), and 3 Jn 13 (διὰ μέλανος καὶ καλάμου). Inkstands were also in use, though they are not mentioned in the Christian writings of the Apostolic Age. In 3 Jn 13 we hear also of the καλάμος, the reed used for writing. It is probable that originally this was applied like a small brush, but in the period under consideration it was in all likelihood a pen in the proper sense. It was shaped and pointed exactly like the quill pen of later times; the writing accessories of the time included a knife for splitting the reed, and a piece of pumice stone for re-sharpening the point. The best equivalent for καλάμος is therefore 'reed-pen.'

3. Roll and codex.—If we would figure to ourselves the outward structure of one of the longer works written on papyrus in the Apostolic Age—as, e.g., the Gospel according to St. John—we must dismiss from our minds the appearance of a modern book, which in reality preserves the form of the codex. It is true that codices were sometimes made of papyrus (cf. Jerome, Ep. lxxi., 'ad Lucinium': 'et descripta vidi in chartaceis codicibus'); and we should probably agree with Schubarth in assuming—on the ground of an inscription of Priene, dedicated to Aulus Æmilius Zosimus the town-clerk—that papyrus codices were to be found in Asia Minor as early as the 1st cent. B.C.; but it is hardly likely that this form of book was generally or even frequently resorted to in that age. We may therefore safely infer that, e.g., the Gospel according to St. John was first written upon a roll; in Jn 20³⁰ 21²², in fact, it is called τὸ βιβλίον. Such a roll was formed of a number of papyrus sheets of equal size carefully joined together in a continuous strip, which may sometimes have been from 20 to 30 ft.—say 7 to 10 metres—long. The writing began with a vertical column at the extreme left, and was continued towards the right in similar columns, though we also find cases where the lines ran at right angles to the length of the roll, and were thus massed in a single column. There was great variation in the size of the sheet, and thus also in the breadth of the roll, which may usually have been some 20–30 cm., but was often only 12–15 cm. in width. The number of lines in a column was likewise far from constant, and the breadth of the upper and lower margins introduced fresh variations; but generally the number of lines would lie between 20 and 30. The breadth of the column did not usually depend on that of the sheets, which were so carefully joined that the pen moved freely over the line of attachment. At its maximum the line was probably about equal in length to the hexameter, comprising some 36 letters, but more commonly it contained 20–25 letters. Hence, taking average measurements—say, a column of 25 lines consisting of 23 letters; each letter with its necessary space 3·5 mm.; lines with spaces between, 7 mm.; upper and lower margins, 3 cm. each; space between columns, 2 cm.—we may estimate that the Gospel according to St. John (1–20), with about 70,000 letters, would fill a papyrus roll 23·5 cm. broad, 12·5 m. long, and containing 122 columns. Similarly, Revelation would fill a strip 8·5 m. in length; Mark, one of 10 m.; Matthew, one of 16 m.; Luke and Acts, each one of some 17 m. (Luke's δεῦτερος λόγος having probably been written on a roll of the same dimensions as his πρῶτος λόγος).

These estimates are of course merely approximate, and are meant to give but a general impression. Moreover, they are made on the assumption that only the recto of the roll was used. Occasionally, however, from motives of thrift, lack of space, or the like, the verso also—that on which the fibres ran vertically—was written upon; and that this practice was known among the Christians of the Apostolic Age appears from Rev 5¹: καὶ εἶδον ἐπὶ τὴν δεξιὰν τοῦ καθημένου ἐπὶ τοῦ θρόνου βιβλίον γεγραμμένον ἔσωθεν καὶ ὀπισθεν [the readings ἔσωθεν καὶ ἔξωθεν and ἔμπροσθεν καὶ ὀπισθεν may be disregarded] κατεσφραγισμένον σφραγίσιν ἑπτά. The 'book' here spoken of is not a codex, but a papyrus roll, which would lie quite securely in the palm of the outstretched hand—a position depicted also in ancient art. The term ὀπισθόγραφον was a familiar one (cf. Lucian, Vitarum Auctio, 9; Pliny, Ep. iii. 5; Juv. Sat. i. 6, 'a tergo'; Martial, viii. 62, 'in aversa charta'; LXX Ezk 2¹⁰, ἔμπροσθεν καὶ τὰ ὀπίσω), and the phrase ἔσωθεν καὶ ὀπισθεν in Rev 5¹ must have been understood by readers of the Apostolic Age as indicating a papyrus roll written upon both sides [but cf. Literature (B) 3 (a)]. In this passage, as in Ezk 2¹⁰, the circumstance that the book was written on both sides is to be taken as signifying the fullness of the contents.

Other matters of detail, even if not referred to in the apostolic writings, may safely be taken from the general practice of the age. The upper and lower edges of the roll were often trimmed and smoothed, just as modern books are edged, and were probably also coloured; as pieces of the sheet would crumble away through frequent use, repairs were sometimes necessary; in order to protect the material against the ravages of worms, insects, etc., the back of the sheet was often washed with cedar-oil; the first sheet, as most liable to injury, was specially strengthened; the title of the work was inscribed on a small label (σιγτοῦσος or σιλλυβος) attached to the upper end of the standing roll. Now and then we meet with ὁ ὀμφαλός, umbilicus, the cylindrical stick (for κέρας, the knob, the evidence is doubtful), though not always within the roll; it would appear, however, that the stick was not, as hitherto believed, glued to the last sheet, which was in the middle of the closed roll, but was held in the hand so as to give a better support to the roll, and served as a pivot upon which the portion already read could be rolled by the left hand.

Sometimes the roll seems to have been kept in a leather cover or sheath, like the case now used for university diplomas, etc.; it might also have a cord or a ribbon tied round it, as with letters, and rolls thus kept closed by threads or ribbons could then be sealed upon these. The 'book' of Rev 5¹ is to be thought of as sealed with seven seals in this way; the phrase ἀνοῖξαι τὸ βιβλίον (v.²)—if the author had a distinct picture in his mind—must signify, not the unfolding of the roll, but simply the loosing of the seals. It is certainly possible that in the author's thought the opening of each separate seal stood for the opening of a distinct portion of the whole work, but the opened book (as found also in Rev 10², βιβλαρίδιον ἡνεωγμένον) is simply the unsealed, not the unrolled, volume.

A number of rolls could be fastened together with tape in a parcel, or kept in a case (κιβωτός, κιβωτίον, κίστη; also τεύχος), which was cubical or cylindrical in shape, and made of wood or leather. The present writer does not think it probable that the φελόνης (φαλόνης) of 2 Ti 4¹³ denotes such a case or cover, though this interpretation is a very ancient one, being found, indeed, in the Syr. Peshitta; φελόνης was doubtless derived from φενόλης (Lat. pænula) by transposition of consonants; but the latter term is never met with in the sense of a case for rolls, and the former always bears quite a different meaning. The word pænula or φενόλης, though not the specific term, might of course quite well be applied to the cover of a single roll, but what use could St. Paul have had for a single article of the kind? Thus in all likelihood the φελόνης of the passage referred to denotes a traveller's cloak, which he had left behind him and now required in view of the approaching winter (cf. 4²).

The papyrus 'book-roll' here described comes before us in Greek under the general name βιβλος, which in the Christian writings of the Apostolic Age is found in the following forms: (1) ἡ βιβλος (Mt 1¹, Mk 12²⁸, Lk 3⁴ 20², Ac 1²⁰ 7² 19¹³; 1 Clem. xliii. 1; also in the phrase βιβλος ζωής, for which see art. BOOK OF LIFE); (2) τὸ βιβλίον (Lk 4¹⁷ 21, Jn 20³⁰ 21²⁵, Gal 3¹⁰, 2 Ti 4¹³, He 9¹⁹, Rev 1¹¹ 5¹²; Ep. Barn. xii. 9, Hermas, Vis. i. ii. 2, ii. iv. 2, 2 Clem. xiv. 2; for βιβλίον ζωής see art. BOOK OF LIFE); the fact that the 'bill of divorcement' is called βιβλίον ἀποστασίον in Mt 19⁷, Mk 10⁴, leads us to think first of all of the papyrus material of the document; (3) as a double diminutive τὸ βιβλαρίδιον (Rev 10² 22; cf. also Hermas, Vis. II. i. 3, iv. 3; c.l. βιβλαρίδιον, in both Revelation and Herm.), though subsequently τὸ βιβλαρίδιον (already found in Ign. ad Eph. xx. 1, Herm. Vis. II. i. 3 f., iv. 1). It is difficult to say how far, in each particular case, there was a consciousness of the fact that the word was derived from βύβλος, the Egyptian papyrus plant. It would be quite wrong to render the term always by 'book-roll,' since the main reference is very often to the contents of the book.

In the Christian writings of the 1st cent. there is nothing—not even a specific term—to indicate that the codex, i.e. a construction of parchment or papyrus sheets in the form of a modern book, was the vehicle of the autographs, or the first copies, of the Christian writings. In the Epistle of Aristaeas, a Jewish work dating from the 2nd cent. B.C., we find the words ἀνεγνώσθη τα τεύχη, and it has been supposed that they refer to Jewish codices of the LXX; but Birt in his Die Buchrolle has effectively shown that the reference is to book-rolls. When we bear in mind, however, that the codex was in fact the book of the common people, and that the NT Epistles were written, not as books or literary works, but as actual letters, in rolls, or (in the case of a few shorter compositions) on wax tablets, or, again, frequently on parchment sheets,—which we may perhaps think of as having been single leaves,—we must regard it as at least possible that at the time when the Christian books began to be transcribed and collected, the codex form was the recognized one in Christian circles. Nor does it seem impossible, in view of the history of the codex as a whole, that Christianity, with its earliest literature, gave an important and powerful impetus to the transition from the roll to the codex. The course of this development in the literary and artistic products of the period from the 2nd to the 5th cent. presents a fascinating subject of study.

4. Writing and reading.—Birt emphatically asserts that the Greeks and Romans never used a table as a support in the act of writing (γράφειν, ἀναγράφειν [in Hermas], ἀναγραφὴ [1 Clem.], καταγράφειν, ἐγγράφειν, etc.), but generally wrote in a squatting or sitting position, and either simply upon a tablet held in the hand or, where a papyrus roll was used, upon this supported by the raised knee or the left fore-arm. Birt takes his stand upon the representations of ancient art, which undoubtedly lend colour to his contention; but the use of something in the nature of a table or board is so natural that we are almost forced to regard the data of art as defective at this point.

While it is possible that in general the Christian authors of the Apostolic Age wrote their books and epistles with their own hands, we know that St. Paul frequently dictated his letters—as was the practice more especially among people of wealth or rank—but added the closing salutation in his own hand (cf. 1 Co 16²¹, Col 4¹⁸, 2 Th 3¹⁷; in Ro 16—his amanuensis, Tertius, is mentioned by name). The Epistle to the Galatians, or at least its concluding paragraph, was penned by the Apostle himself. As regards the First Epistle of Peter, the question depends upon the interpretation of 5¹² (διὰ Σιλβανοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ πιστοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, ὡς λογιζομαι, δι' ὁλίγων ἑγραψα), where we may either, with Zahn (Einleitung, ii.², p. 10 f.), regard Silvanus as the real author of the letter or suppose that, as the present writer thinks, he wrote it to St. Peter's dictation. In course of time it came to be a very common practice in Christian circles to employ tachygraphers and secretaries.

As regards the reading (ἀναγιγνώσκειν, a word of very frequent occurrence) of the papyrus roll, Birt has brought before us such a profusion of excellent data that we can quite well picture to ourselves how the people of the Apostolic Age would read, say, the Epistles of St. Paul. The most vivid representation of the act is given by the Attic sepulchral relief in the Abbey of Grottaferata (see A. Conze, Die attischen Grabreliefs, Berlin, 1890, ii. plate 121, no. 622; Birt, op. cit., pl. 157, fig. 90), which shows the reader holding the roll, with its text arranged in columns, before him, his left hand rolling up the portion already read, while his right unrolls the portion still to be read. Just as rotulmen, from rotlere, is the Lat. term for the papyrus strip that could be formed into a roll, so we have in Greek—somewhat rarely, it is true—the term ἐρείλημα (first in Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 11), from εἰλίσσω (εἰλίσσω) 'turn,' 'wind,' 'roll round'; the special sense of the verb appears also in Rev 6¹⁴, where the departing heavens are compared to a scroll being folded up, ὡς βιβλίον ἐλισσόμενον (similarly in the Apocalypse of Peter [beginning of 2nd cent.], ed. E. Preuschen, Antilegomena, Giessen, 1905, p. 88). In Lk 4¹⁷ we find the correlative term ἀναπτύσσειν used to denote the unfolding of the roll; the reading ἀνοίξας which appears in a number of codices is probably not original here; as we saw above, in connexion with Rev 5¹², ἀνοίγω is the technical term for loosing the seal, and was only subsequently, by association of ideas, transferred to the opening of the codex.

5. Letters; signs to the reader.—As minuscule MSS first emerge about the end of the 7th cent. A.D., we must assume that the autographs of the NT were written in a majuscule script, and without doubt in the Greek capitals known to us. But we must here distinguish between the literary or book form of writing on the one hand and the form used in everyday life on the other. The distinction between the two corresponds very much to that between manuscript and print at the present day. The cursive hand arose, of course, from the desire to write rapidly and, where possible, continuously and without breaks. As most of the NT writings were not in the first instance produced as literary works—not being designed for the public at large—we may assume that the NT Epistles at least, and probably also the first transcripts of the other books, were written in a cursive hand and in capitals, as found in various papyri of the 1st century.

Devices to indicate pauses (paragraphus, double dot, larger and smaller spaces) were in use by the 1st cent. B.C., but as a rule were not used at all, or used but sparingly, in the Christian papyri of the 1st cent. A.D.—a circumstance that naturally brought in its train numberless possibilities of misreading and of making false combinations among the words.

LITERATURE.—(A) GENERAL.—T. Birt, Das antike Buchwesen, Berlin, 1882; L. Mittels and U. Wilcken, Grundzüge und Chrestomathie der Papyrskunde, 4 vols., Leipzig, 1912; E. Nestle, *Einführung in das griechische NT*³, Göttingen, 1909; T. Birt, Die Buchrolle in der Kunst (with 190 illustrations), Leipzig, 1907; W. Schubart, Das Buch bei den Griechen und Römern (with 14 illustrations), Berlin, 1907; K. Dzatzko, art. 'Buch,' Byblos in Pauly-Wissowa², iii.; A. Gercke, 'Das antike Buch,' in Einleitung in die Altertumswissenschaft, Leipzig, 1910, i. 1-26; A. Deissmann, *Licht vom Osten*³, Tübingen, 1909, Eng. tr., Light from the Ancient East, London, 1911; also the Introductions to the NT by T. Zahn (Eng. tr., 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1909), etc.; the older literature is given in E. Reuss, *Die Geschichte der heiligen Schriften neuen Testaments*³, Brunswick, 1860, p. 340 ff.

(B) SPECIAL.—To 1. On the roll in Ignatius, ad Philadelphinos, viii. (ἐν τοῖς ἀρχαίοις), see Zahn, in Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, ed. O. von Gebhardt, A. Harnack, T. Zahn, ii. [Leipzig, 1876] 77 ff., and on the passage in Tertullian, cf. T. Zahn, Geschichte des neutest. Kanons, i. [do., 1889] 652; I. E. I. Walch, De Apostolorum Litteris Authenticis a Tertulliano Commemoratis, Jena, 1758. On the Gospel of Matthew found in the tomb of Barnabas, cf. Theodor Lector in Migne, PG, vol. lxxxvi. col. 189; Severus of Antioch, in J. S. Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, Rome, 1719-28, ii. 8; Vitae omnium XIII Apostolorum, ed. A. Thome in ZWT xxix. [1886] 453. On the supposed existence of the autograph of John's Gospel in Ephesus, see Chronicon Paschale (7th cent. A.D.): καθὼς τὰ ἀκριβῆ βιβλία περιέχει αὐτὸ τὸ ἰδιόχειρον τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ, ἀπὸρ μέχρ' τοῦ νῦν πεφυλακται χαριτὶ θεοῦ ἐν τῇ Ἐφεσίων ἀγιατῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ ὑπο τῶν πιστῶν ἐκείσε προσκυνεῖται; cf. also Petrus Alexandrinus, De Paschale (cf. G. Stosch, De Canone NT, p. 44), Philostorgius, vii. 14, Nicephorus Callistus, x. 33. On the alleged autograph of Mark in Venice and Prague, cf. J. Dobrowski, Fragmentum Pragense Evang. S. Marci, vulgo autographi, Prague, 1778. For a supposed Heb. autograph of Peter, P. de Lagarde, Aus dem deutschen Gelehrtenleben, Göttingen, 1880, p. 117 f. C. Simonides, Facsimiles of Certain Portions of St. Matthew and of the Epistles of St. James and Jude, written on Papyrus in the 1st Century, London, 1862, is a forgery. Most of the older literature on the question of autograph shows a certain prejudice in the interests of dogma: J. G. Berger, De autographis veterum, Wittenberg, 1723; G. Stosch, De Epistolis Apostolorum idiographis, Guelf, 1751; J. F. Mayer, Utrum autographa biblica hodie extant, Hamburg, 1692; B. G. Clanswitz, De autographorum iactura rei christ. et innoxia et utili, Halle, 1743. The reader will gain some idea of the appearance of the autographs from J. R. Harris, NT Autographs (Supplement to the ATPh xii. [1891]), Baltimore, 1892, pp. 54, with 3 plates, but still better from F. G. Kenyon, The Palaeography of Greek Papyri, Oxford, 1899, the plates of which exhibit papyri from the Apostolic Age (A.D. 15 and 72-73). What is probably the earliest known fragment of a NT MS, a transcript of Mt 11-15, dating from the 3rd cent., is shown in B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, Oxyrhynchus Papyri, i. [1898] pl. i., and in E. Nestle, op. cit. pl. 11. No Christian text as yet discovered can be assigned with certainty to a date earlier than the beginning of the 3rd cent.; cf. L. Mitteis and U. Wilcken, Grundzüge der Papyrskunde, i. 1. 130 f.

To 2. (a) Paper: G. F. Welck, Vom Papier, den vor der Erfindung derselben üblichen Schreibmassen u. andern Schreibmaterial, Halle, 1789, with Supplementum, Hanover, 1790; Lalande, L'Art de faire le papier, Paris, n.d.; E. Egger, Le Papier dans l'antiquité et dans les temps modernes, do., 1867; W. Wattenbach, *Das Schriftwesen im Mittelalter*², Leipzig, 1870, p. 114 ff.; V. Gardthausen, Griechische Paläographie, do., 1879, pp. 48-51; E. Kirchner, Das Papier, 3 vols., Biberach, 1897-99. (b) The writing tablet: A. Socin, in H. Guthe's Kurzes Bibelwörterbuch, Tübingen, 1903, p. 590; W. Schubart, op. cit. pp. 16-19. (c) The manufacture of papyrus: Fortia d'Urban, Essai sur l'origine de l'écriture, Paris, 1832; T. Birt, Das antike Buchwesen, Die Buchrolle, p. 4 ff.; K. Dzatzko, Untersuchungen über ausgewählte Kapitel des antiken Buchwesens, Leipzig, 1900; A. Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 15 ff., Eng. tr., p. 23 ff.; V. Gardthausen, op. cit. p. 29 ff.; F. Woenig, Die Pflanzen in alten Ägypten, Leipzig, 1886; U. Wilcken, 'Recto und Verso,' in Hermes xxii. [1887] 487-492. (d) The papyri in general: C. Haebler, Griechische Papyri, Leipzig, 1897; F. G. Kenyon, op. cit. (with 20 facsimiles), art. 'Papyri' in HB v. 352-357; A. Deissmann, art. 'Papyri' in EB iii. 3556-3563 and art. 'Papyrus und Papyri' in PRE xiv. 667-675. (e) The use of parchment and papyrus among the Hebrews: H. L. Strack, in PRE xvii. 763; L. Blau, Studien zum althebräischen Buchwesen, Strassburg, 1902; L. Low, Graphische Requisite und Erzeugnisse, i. [1870]. (f) Comparative prices of parchment and papyrus: Birt, Buchrolle, p. 24 ff.; Kenyon, op. cit. p. 113. (g) The 'parchments' of St. Paul: T. Zahn, 'Bücher und Pergamente des Paulus,' Geschichte des neutest. Kanons, ii. 2 [Leipzig, 1892], 938-942; Birt, Buchwesen, p. 88 f., Buchrolle, p. 21, note; W. Weinberger, in Berliner philologische Wochenschrift, xxiv. [1904] 1107 f. (h) NT passages written on papyri: Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 21 ff., EB, loc. cit., *PRE*³, loc. cit.; cf. also Mitteis and Wilcken, Grundzüge der Papyrskunde, i. (i) Ink: Gardthausen, op. cit. p. 76 ff. (j) The reed: E. C. A. Riehm, Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums, ed. F. Baethgen, Bielefeld, 1893, ii. 1400-1402 (art. 'Schilf und Rohr'); the writer's pen-knife is mentioned in Jer 36²³.

To 3. (a) Exegesis of Rev 51st: T. Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, ii². [Leipzig, 1900] 599 f. (Zahn regards 'the book on the hand of God' as a codex, and interprets the adjectival phrase thus—'written within and sealed without,' so taking οὐρανὸν with κατεσφραγισμένον); cf., as against this, Birt, Buchrolle, p. 85 f. (b) Sealing: E. Huschke, Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln, Dresden, 1860; Zahn, Einleitung, ii² 600; A. Erman, in Archiv für Papyrusforschung, i. [Leipzig, 1900] 75. (c) φελόνρι: Birt, Buchwesen, p. 65; Zahn, Gesch. des Kanons, ii. 939, note 2. (d) The Letter of Aristaeas: Birt, Buchrolle, p. 32. (e) Roll and codex in the Christian Church during the 2nd-5th cent.: V. Schultze, 'Rolle und Codex,' in Greifswalder Studien, Gütersloh, 1895, pp. 147-158. (f) Book-boxes, libraries, book-trade, multiplication of books, etc.: Birt, Buchwesen; Schubart, op. cit. pp. 133-154.

To 5. Of special importance here is the thoroughgoing Palaeography of F. G. Kenyon (20 facsimiles); C. Wessely, Papyrorum scriptura graeca specimina isagogica, Leipzig, 1900 (with documents of 1st cent. A.D. in autograph form); W. Schubart, Papyri graeca Berolinenses, Bonn, 1911 (with 50 plates); Gardthausen, op. cit.; W. Wattenbach, *Anleitung zur griechischen Paläographie*³, Leipzig, 1895; E. M. Thompson, Handbook of Greek and Latin Palaeography, London, 1893, Facsimiles of Biblical Manuscripts in the British Museum, do., 1900; B. de Montfaucon, Palaeographia graeca, Paris, 1708, otherwise a most creditable work, supplies but little material for a reconstruction of primitive Christian autographs.

H. JORDAN.

Y

YEAR.—See TIME.

Yokefellow.—See SYNZGUS.

YOUNG MEN.—Several Greek words, with little difference of meaning, are thus translated in Acts and the Epistles. (1) νεᾱνίας: 'laid down their garments at the feet of a young man' (Ac 7st, also 20⁹ 23⁷, etc.). (2) παῖς: 'they brought the young man (RV 'lad') alive' (Ac 20¹² AV). This word has often the significance of servant. (3) νεᾱνίσκος: 'the young men came in and found her dead' (Ac 5¹⁰, 1 Jn 2¹³, etc.). The termination has a diminutive force. (4) νεᾱνέρος: 'the younger men arose and . . . carried him out' (Ac 5⁸ [RVm], 1 Ti 5¹, Tit 2⁴, 1 P 5⁵); also younger women (1 Ti 5²), widows (1 Ti 5¹¹⁻¹⁴). A well-marked distinction between old and young was a characteristic feature of the life of the ascetic communities in Palestine (Hatch, p. 63), of the θιασμοί of the Greeks (Weizsacker, ii. 331 f.), and apparently also of the Apostolic Church. Age was regarded as a title to honour, and one of the qualifications for office. Submission and reverence were the duty of the young. Age and rank or office are so closely related, as in the word πρεσβύτερος, that it is not easy to distinguish whether a writer in the Epistles is speaking of age or of office. This ambiguity is also found in the Epistle of Clement of Rome (Hatch).

Interest attaches to the question whether young men (νεώτεροι) held any office in the Church. The relative texts are 1 Ti 5¹, 1 P 5⁵, and Ac 5⁶⁻¹⁰. In the first two instances the context has to be taken into consideration. 'Rebuke not an elder (πρεσβυτέρῳ) but exhort him as a father; the younger men as brethren: . . . the younger (women) as sisters' (1 Ti 5¹⁻⁴). Here it is evident that the words 'elder,' 'younger' have nothing to do with office but refer to age (Hart, White, EGT in loc.). The passage in Peter runs: 'The elders therefore among you I exhort, who am a fellow-elder. . . . Likewise, ye younger (νεώτεροι), be subject unto the elder' (πρεσβυτέροις). If πρεσβύτερος in v.¹ is official, it would be natural to conclude that it has the same significance in v.⁵, and that νεώτερος is also official. But πρεσβύτερος in v.¹ is unexpectedly qualified by the words 'among you,' as if indicating a class more numerous than the official elders, and Peter can scarcely be regarded as referring to office when he speaks of himself as a 'fellow-elder' (συνπρεσβύτερος). Had he been referring to his official position, he would have said 'an apostle' (1¹). He appears to be giving injunctions to the older and more experienced members of the Christian community to 'tend the flock of God,' and does so, not on his authority as an apostle, but as one who was, like themselves, advanced in age and experience. Accordingly, it seems best to conclude that νεώτερος has not an official significance in this passage. In Ac 5⁶, 'the younger men arose . . . and carried him out' (RVm), νεώτερος is taken by some as indicating regular servants of the Church (Meyer, Lindsay, etc.), but against that view is the fact that the young men are described as νεανίσκοι in v.¹⁰ (Knowling, Neander, Lechler, etc.). The absence in the NT of any clear reference to them as officials is also an objection. Most probably they are simply distinguished as a class in the Christian community, in accordance with Eastern custom. The distinction between 'elder' and 'younger' was not confined strictly to difference of age. It also included difference of experience and length of connexion with the Church (Weizsacker, Hatch).

LITERATURE.—Comm. on Acts by R. J. Knowling (EGT, 1900), T. M. Lindsay (1884-85), H. A. W. Meyer (Eng. tr., 1877), in loc.; C. von Weizsacker, Apostolic Age, ii. [1895] 331 f.; E. Hatch, Organization of the Early Christian Churches, 1881, p. 63 f.; J. H. A. Hart, '1 Peter,' in EGT, 1910, in loc.; N. J. D. White, '1 Timothy,' in ib., in loc.; C. Bigg, ICC, 'St. Peter and St. Jude,' 1901, in loc.; A. C. McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, pp. 283, 663.

JOHN REID.

Z

ZEAL.—Zeal is always in the NT the tr. of the same word, ζήλος, ζηλωτής, and always in a good sense; the bad sense is translated by 'envy.' As a desirable quality in the Christian, the word is almost peculiar to St. Paul's letters and speeches. Its contemporary use was chiefly in a bad sense; it stood for envy, and as a proper noun it furnished the party name that covered a very pernicious patriotism (Ζηλωταί). St. Paul converted the word, as he converted the quality in himself, kept its force, and rightly directed its aim. (Cf. the redemption of the word 'enthusiasm' in the last century.)

1. Zeal of God for man.—Both OT and NT insist on the zeal of God for man, the direct opposite of the Epicurean idea. 'The zeal of the Lord of Hosts' (2 K 19³¹, Is 37³²) is for man's love, man's righteousness, for man to be sensible with himself and regard his own permanent interests (Dt 30²⁰), and make it possible for God to continue His abundant liberality (Ps 81¹³⁻¹⁶); for the welfare and vigour of the Chosen People, the hope of mankind; at least a working remnant shall be preserved. Men may appeal to the zeal by intercession (Is 33¹⁵). God's 'jealousy' is love demanding love, not satisfied with toleration or occasional faithfulness. To remember God's zeal frees His ever-presence from all savour of spying (Ps 139), and His commandments from the nature of arbitrary exactions (Dt 32⁴, Ezk 18²³). In the NT God's zeal for man is the motive of the Incarnation (Jn 3¹⁶), and is set forth in parables, such as the Lost Sheep and the Wicked Husbandman. God's zeal is burning love in action through boundless sacrifice.

2. Zeal for God in man.—Zeal for God in man is commanded and commended—even consuming zeal (Ps 69⁹, approved by being quoted of the Christian's zeal, Jn 2¹⁴). Language of strong reproof is addressed to the sluggard about his own character, the lukewarm in works of love, to those neither hot nor cold (Rev 3¹⁵, 1 Co 14¹²). Such faith cannot save (Ja 2¹⁴⁻¹⁸). Christians are to be 'a peculiar people, zealous of good works' (Tit 2¹⁴), 'not weary in well-doing' (Gal 6⁹), with zeal making light of hardship, like a soldier's (2 Ti 2³). Phinehas received a reward as 'zealous for his God' (Nu 25¹³). Elijah, out of zeal for God's honour as much as fear, could not remain among a people whose daily life was blasphemous against Him. 1 Cor. is filled with practical solutions needed by Christian zeal if it was not to drive men out of the world, where the most ordinary customs had heathen significance. How far may the zealot for a higher morality and a purer religion seem to compromise with such? May he dine with his heathen relatives? marry them? divorce them if already married? Can slaves continue to serve heathen masters? Also the Christian must have zeal for his own character, develop all his talents for usefulness, have an ambitious morality, and not allow wealth (Mt 19²¹) or even natural claims (Mt 10³⁷) to hinder consecration to God.

3. Perversion of zeal.—The acquisition in all languages of a bad meaning by words originally denoting true zeal is evidence of universal experience that zeal is liable to dangerous perversion. This occurs through (i.) impatience at God's patience, (ii.) over-devotion to an object subsidiary to the highest, (iii.) intrusion of feelings for self.

From (i.) comes the depression which breaks out in the opening verses of so many Psalms (cf. Ps 22; note the triumphant assurance and renewed zeal of its close). The despair of Elijah is replaced by the calmer zeal of Elisha, ever mindful of the invisible forces at work for good (2 K 6¹⁶). Zeal is not the same as haste for results (Is 28¹⁶). The latter when powerless leads to depression, when powerful to persecution (2 K 10¹⁸, 2 S 21²). (ii.) The Pharisees had a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. The over-exaltation of legal observance and of national independence led them to the axiom that Jesus was a foe, to be consistently opposed whatever He said or did, and to be silenced some way or other (Jn 11⁴⁷⁻⁵⁰). Their zeal thus leads almost to blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and to the Crucifixion. From (iii.) come spiritual conceit, the idea that we have 'whereof to glory' (Ro 4²) even toward God; the showy religionism of the Pharisees (Mt 23³); the love 'to have the pre-eminence' (3 Jn 9), and that envy which is 'the rottenness of the bones' (Pr 14³⁰). It is also a basal motive of σχισματα, zealous preference for a truth, leading to the abandonment of a society in which satisfactory prominence is not given to this special object of enthusiasm.

4. Zeal in man against God.—There is a final perversion of zeal possible, the zeal in man against God. Compare the fierce activity and watchfulness of Judas with the sluggishness of the most zealous apostle, Peter.

STACY WADDY.

ZEBULUN.—See TRIBES.

ZENAS.—In Tit 3¹³ Titus is urged to 'set forward (πρόπεμψον) Zenas the lawyer and Apollos on their journey diligently (σπουδαίως), that nothing be wanting unto them.' We gather that Zenas and Apollos were fellow-travellers who had come to Crete and were contemplating going elsewhere.

Perhaps they were travelling preachers; or Zenas may have been the travelling companion of the eloquent Apollos. Anyhow, Paul asks for them a 'send-off' worthy of devoted Christian workers. Zenas is described as a 'lawyer' (νομικός). It is likely, therefore, that he was a convert from the ranks of Jewish lawyers—men skilled in the Jewish law. It is significant that he is found in the company of Apollos, whose preaching had a Jewish tinge (cf. art. APOLLOS). Though a convert to Christianity, and evidently a valued worker, he did not shake off his legalism completely; he favoured the Apollos type of preaching rather than the Pauline. It has been suggested that Zenas and Apollos were the bearers of the Epistle to Crete because they were known to have influence amongst Jewish converts from whom the troubles in Crete seem to have chiefly arisen (cf. 3⁹)?

LITERATURE.—A. C. Headlam, art. 'Zenas' in HDB iv.; W. Lock, art. 'Titus,' ib., p. 782^b; J. E. Roberts, art. 'Apollos' in DAC; W. B. Jones, art. 'Zenas' in Smith's DB iii. (for tradition); Exp, 8th ser., v. [1913] 329.

J. E. ROBERTS.

ZEUS.—See JUPITER.

ZION (Gr. Σιών).—Zion was one of the hills or ridges (probably the east) on which Jerusalem was built. On this mount the Temple was built, and hence Zion was spoken of as the dwelling-place of Jahweh. Latterly it was synonymous with 'Jerusalem,' and 'daughter of Zion' became a prophetic designation for the whole nation. In the NT the expression 'Mount Zion' is spiritualized. Hebrews (12^{18ff.}) contrasts it with Mount Sinai, comparing the fear of the Old Covenant with the freedom of the New. Revelation (14¹) names the city of God which is above, 'Mount Zion,' recalling the phrase in Hebrews 'the heavenly Jerusalem.'

J. W. DUNCAN.

INDEXES

I. INDEX OF SUBJECTS

- Aaron, i. 1^a.
 Aaron's Rod, i. 1^b.
 Abaddon, i. 2^a, 294^a, 545^a.
 Abba, i. 2^a.
 Abel, i. 3^a.
 Abiding, i. 3^a.
 Abomination, i. 3^b.
 Abounding, i. 4^a.
 Abraham, i. 4^b.
 Abstinence, i. 6^a.
 Abuse, Abusers, i. 11^a.
 Abyss, i. 11^b, 545^a, 681^a.
 Acceptance, i. 12^a.
 Access, i. 13^a.
 Account, i. 14^a.
 Accursed, i. 55^b.
 Acceldama, i. 47^a.
 Achaia, i. 14^a.
 Achaicus, i. 14^b.
 Acts of the Apostles, i. 15^a, 281^b, 402^b; ii. 138^b.
 Acts of the Apostles (Apocryphal), i. 29^b.
 Adam, i. 39^b, 394^a ff.
 Adjuration, ii. 98^b.
 Administration, i. 41^a.
 Admonition, i. 41^a, 174^a.
 Adoption, i. 41^b, 175^a, 510^a, 698^a.
 Adorning, i. 43^a, 520^b.
 Adramyttium, i. 43^b.
 Adria, i. 43^b.
 Adultery, i. 417^a; ii. 16^a.
 Advent, ii. 123^b [Parousia].
 Adversary, i. 44^a.
 Advocate, ii. 121^a [Paraclete].
 Æneas, i. 44^b.
 Æon, i. 44^b, 454^a; ii. 580^b.
 Affliction, ii. 533^b [Suffering].
 Agabus, i. 45^b.
 Agape, i. 300^b f., 717^a; ii. 134^b.
 Age, i. 46^a.
 Aged, i. 46^b.
 Ages, ii. 580^b.
 Agriculture, i. 94^a.
 Agrippa I., i. 564^b f., 26^b, 275^a, 278^b, 638^b f.
 Agrippa II., i. 565^a, 277^a, 278^b, 639^a.
 Air, i. 46^b.
 Akeldama, i. 47^a.
 Alexander, i. 47^a.
 Alexandria, i. 47^b.
 Alexandrians, i. 49^a.
 Alien, ii. 530^b.
 Allegory, i. 50^a.
 Allotment, i. 712^b.
 Almighty, i. 458^b.
 Alms, i. 50^a, 7^b, 449^b.
 Alpha and Omega, i. 50^b, 185^b.
 Altar, i. 51^a.
 Ambassador, i. 52^a, 46^b.
 Amen, i. 52^b.
 Amethyst, i. 54^a.
 Amomum, i. 54^a.
 Amphipolis, i. 54^a.
 Amplias, i. 54^b.
 Ampliatus, i. 54^b.
 Ananias, i. 54^b.
 Anathema, i. 55^b.
 Anchor, i. 56^b; ii. 475^b.
 Andrew, Acts of, i. 36^b.
 Andronicus, i. 57^a, 83^b.
 Angels, i. 57^b, 61^b, 101^a, 229^a b, 230^a b, 287^b, 340^b; ii. 273^a, 523^a.
 Angels of the Seven Churches, i. 61^b, 60^a.
 Anger, i. 62^b.
 Annas, i. 65^b.
 Anointing, i. 65^b, 129^a.
 Answer, i. 66^b.
 Antichrist, i. 67^a, 101^a, 145^a, 146^a, 360^a, 361^a; ii. 7^a.
 Antinomianism, i. 685^a [Law].
 Antioch, i. 69^a, 199^b, 280^a.
 Antipas, i. 71^a.
 Antipas (Herod), i. 564^b, 278^b.
 Antipatris, i. 71^b.
 Antitype, ii. 623^b.
 Antonia, i. 170^b, 637^b.
 Anxiety, i. 169^b.
 Apelles, i. 71^b.
 Gospel of, i. 498^b.
 Apocalypse, i. 71^b; ii. 625^a f.
 Apollonia, i. 81^a.
 Apollos, i. 81^a, 255^a.
 Apollyon, i. 2^a.
 Apostasy, i. 82^b.
 Apostle, i. 82^b, 582^a.
 Apostolic Church Ordinance, i. 298^b.
 Apostolic Constitutions and Canons, i. 84^b, 298^b.
 Apostolic Creed, i. 238^a.
 Appeal, ii. 615^b f.; i. 164^b.
 Appearing, ii. 123^b [Parousia].
 Apphia, i. 86^b.
 Appii Forum, i. 86^b.
 Appius, Market of, i. 86^b.
 Aprons, i. 87^a.
 Aquila and Priscilla, i. 87^a; ii. 408^b.
 Arabia, i. 88^a.
 Archangel, ii. 35^b.
 Archippus, i. 89^a, 400^a.
 Areopagite, Areopagus, i. 89^b.
 Aretas, i. 90^b, 275^a.
 Aristarchus, i. 91^a.
 Aristobulus, i. 91^b, 399^b, 565^b.
 Ark, i. 91^b.
 Armageddon, i. 524^a.
 Armour, i. 92^a.
 Army, i. 93^a; ii. 662^b ff.
 Artemas, i. 93^b.
 Artemis, i. 295^a.
 Arts, i. 94^a.
 Ascension of Isaiah, i. 99^a.
 Ascension of Jesus Christ, i. 95^b, 222^a b, 385^b, 638^b.
 Asceticism, i. 6^b.
 Asia, i. 102^a.
 Asiarch, i. 102^b, 332^b.
 Asmodeus, i. 2^a, 294^a.
 Asp, i. 103^a.
 Assassins, i. 103^b.
 Assembly, i. 104^a.
 Assos, i. 104^a.
 Assumption of Moses, i. 105^a.
 Assurance, i. 107^b.
 Asyncritus, i. 109^a.
 Athens, i. 109^b.
 Atonement of Jesus Christ, i. 110^b; ii. 260^b.
 Attalia, i. 123^b.
 Augustan Band, i. 123^b.

- Augustus, i. 124^a.
 Author and Finisher, i. 125^b.
 Authorities, i. 125^b.
 Authority, i. 126^a.
 Avenging, ii. 635^b [Vengeance].
 Azotus, i. 126^b.

 Baal, i. 126^a.
 Babblor, i. 126^b.
 Babblings, i. 127^a.
 Babylon, i. 524^a.
 Backbiters, i. 381^a.
 Balaam, i. 127^b.
 Balak, i. 127^b.
 Band, i. 127^b.
 Bankers, ii. 602^a.
 Baptism, i. 128^a, 43^a, 247^b, 300^b,
 333^a, 364^b, 461^b, 599^b; ii. 73^a,
 425^a, 589^a.
 for the Dead, i. 128^b.
 Barak, i. 136^b.
 Barbarian, i. 137^a; ii. 462^b.
 Bar-Jesus, i. 137^a.
 Barnabas, i. 138^a; ii. 117^a.
 Epistle of, i. 139^a, 298^a.
 Barsabbas (Joseph), surnamed
 Justus, i. 649^a.
 (Judas), i. 656^b.
 Bartholomew, Gospel of, i. 502^b.
 Baruch, Apocalypse of, i. 142^a.
 Basilides, Gospel of, i. 498^a.
 Basket, i. 144^b.
 Beast, i. 145^a, 74^b.
 Beating, i. 145^a.
 Beautiful Gate, i. 311^a, 443^a; ii.
 556^b.
 Bed, i. 145^b, 588^a; ii. 524^a.
 Beginning and End, i. 50^b [Alpha and Omega], 185^b.
 Belial, Beliar, i. 146^a, 67^b, 100^b.
 Belief, i. 389^a [Faith].
 Believers, Bodily Resurrection of,
 ii. 355^b.
 Priesthood of, ii. 271^a.
 Beloved, i. 146^b.
 Benediction, i. 146^b.
 Beor, i. 148^b.
 Berenice, Bernice, i. 148^b.
 Beroea, i. 148^b.
 Beryl, i. 149^a.
 Biblical Greek, i. 551^b.
 Bigamy, ii. 14^a.
 Bills, ii. 601^b.
 Binding and Loosing, i. 381^b,
 382^a.
 Birthright, i. 410^b.
 Bishop, i. 149^b, 598^b; ii. 588^b.
 Bithynia, i. 151^a.
 Bitterness, i. 151^a.
 Black, i. 231^b.
 Blasphemy, i. 151^b; ii. 71^a.
 Blastus, i. 152^a, 173^a.
 Blessedness, i. 152^a.
 Blessing, i. 146^b, 210^b.
 Blindness, i. 152^b.

 Blood, i. 153^a.
 Bloody Flux, i. 315^b.
 Boanerges, i. 626^a.
 Boasting, i. 154^a.
 Boat, ii. 474^b [Ship].
 Body, i. 154^b, 518^a, 528^a.
 Spiritual, ii. 325^a f., 347^b f., 357^b f.
 Boldness, i. 156^b.
 Bond, i. 157^a; ii. 602^a.
 Bondage, i. 157^b.
 Bonds, i. 173^a.
 Book, ii. 699^b.
 of Life, i. 158^a, 699^a.
 with the Seven Seals, i. 159^a, 158^a.
 Bosor, i. 148^b.
 Bottomless Pit, i. 11^b.
 Bowl, i. 159^b.
 Bread, ii. 605^a.
 Breaking of, i. 373^b, 717^b; ii.
 134^b, 426^a.
 Breastplate, i. 92^b.
 Brethren, i. 159^b, 424^a.
 of the Lord, i. 628^b, 658^b.
 Bride and Bridegroom, i. 398^b;
 ii. 13^a.
 Brimstone, i. 160^a.
 Brother, i. 399^b f.
 Brotherhood, i. 160^a, 184^a, 405^b [Fellowship].
 Brotherly Love, i. 160^b, 246^a, 526^b.
 Buffet, i. 162^b.
 Building, i. 162^b, 94^b; ii. 608^b.
 Burial, ii. 469^a.
 Business, i. 163^b.

 Cæsar, i. 164^a.
 Cæsar's Household, i. 164^b, 399^b;
 ii. 223^a.
 Cæsarea, i. 165^a.
 Cæsarism, i. 330^a [Emperor-worship].
 Caiaphas, i. 165^b.
 Cain, i. 3^a.
 Cainites, i. 165^b.
 Calf, i. 166^b.
 Caligula, i. 166^b.
 Call, Called, Calling, i. 167^b; ii.
 188^b.
 Calvin, ii. 183^a.
 Canaan, i. 168^b.
 Candace, i. 168^b.
 Candle, i. 683^a.
 Candlestick, i. 683^a, 588^b.
 Canker, i. 442^b.
 Cappadocia, i. 168^b.
 Captain of the Temple, i. 169^a;
 ii. 422^a.
 Captivity, i. 157^b [Bondage].
 Care, Careful, i. 169^a.
 Care of the Person, i. 94^b.
 Carnal, i. 169^b, 412^a.
 Carpus, i. 170^a.
 Castaway, i. 170^b.

 Castle, i. 170^b.
 Castor and Pollux, i. 302^b.
 Catechumens, i. 130^a.
 Catholic Epistles, i. 171^a.
 Cauda, i. 171^b.
 Celibacy, i. 8^a, 385^b; ii. 11^b, 555^b.
 Cenchræ, i. 171^b.
 Censer, i. 172^a.
 Centurion, i. 93^a.
 Cephas, ii. 191^a.
 Cephas-party, i. 255^a; ii. 198^a.
 Cerinthianism, i. 646^a.
 Cerinthus, i. 172^b.
 Certainty, i. 107^b [Assurance].
 Chain, i. 173^a.
 Chalcedony, i. 173^a.
 Chamberlain, i. 173^a.
 Chanaan, i. 168^b.
 Charaan, i. 521^b.
 Charismata, i. 450^a, 320^b, 357^b,
 383^b; ii. 116^b.
 Charity, i. 50^a [Alms], 713^b [Love].
 Charity, Feast of, i. 717^a [Love-feast].
 Chastisement, i. 173^b.
 Cheerfulness, i. 174^a.
 Cherubim, i. 174^b.
 Chief Priests, ii. 269^a.
 Child, Children, i. 398^b.
 Children of God, Sons of God, i.
 174^b.
 Chiliasm, i. 358^a, 359^b.
 Chios, i. 176^b.
 Chloe, i. 177^a.
 Christ.—See Jesus Christ.
 Christianity, i. 80^b, 331^b; ii. 17^b, 211^a, 213^b, 407^a, 440^a, 511^a,
 528^a.
 Christian Life, i. 200^b, 9^b, 538^a,
 697^b; ii. 589^b.
 Christians, i. 199^a, 392^b, 639^b; ii.
 17^b, 173^a ff., 440^b, 531^b, 662^b.
 Christology, i. 177^a.
 Acts of the Apostles, i. 28^a.
 Barnabas, Epistle of, i. 140^b.
 Clement of Rome, i. 218^b.
 Ephesians, i. 347^b.
 Galatians, i. 432^b.
 Gnostic, i. 454^a.
 Hebrews, i. 536^b.
 Ignatius, i. 601^b.
 James, i. 185^a.
 Philippians, ii. 226^a.
 Thessalonians, ii. 571^a.
 Christ-party, i. 255^b, 308^b; ii.
 198^a, 338^a.
 Chronology, i. 274^a [Dates].
 Chrysolite, i. 203^b.
 Chrysopraxe, i. 203^b.
 Church, i. 203^b, 101^b, 239^b, 256^b, 346^b, 399^b, 578^b.
 Attitude to War, ii. 660^a.
 Condition, ii. 586^b.
 Discipline, i. 259^a, 303^b.

- Church—
 Doctrine, i. 563^b.
 Government, i. 209^b.
 Organization, i. 259^a, 563^a, 598^a, 640^a; ii. 588^a.
 Worship, ii. 697^a, 588^a.
 Cilicia, i. 211^a.
 Cinnamon, i. 211^b.
 Circumcision, i. 211^b.
 Cis, i. 678^b.
 Citizenship, i. 212^b, 696^b; ii. 406^b.
 Claudia, i. 171^b.
 Claudia, i. 213^b.
 Claudius, i. 214^a, 276^b.
 Claudius Lysias, i. 728^a.
 Clay, i. 95^a; ii. 254^b.
 Clean, i. 215^a.
 Clement, i. 215^b.
 Clement of Rome, Epistle of, i. 216^a, 250^a.
 Cloke, i. 221^a.
 Clothes, Clothing, i. 221^a, 94^b; ii. 607^b.
 Cloud, i. 222^a.
 Cnidus, i. 222^b.
 Coals, i. 223^a.
 Coat, i. 223^a.
 Codex, ii. 462^a, 701^b, 702^a.
 Cohort, i. 93^b, 127^b, 170^b, 623^{a-b}.
 Coins, ii. 601^b.
 Collection, i. 223^b.
 Colony, i. 225^b, 213^a; ii. 406^b, 472^a.
 Colossæ, i. 226^a.
 Church of, i. 226^b, 342^a.
 Colossian Heresy, i. 228^b.
 Colossians, Epistle to the, i. 227^a, 281^b; ii. 143^a.
 Colours, i. 231^a.
 Comfort, Comforter, i. 232^a.
 Coming, ii. 123^b [Parousia].
 Commandment, i. 233^a.
 Commendation, i. 234^a.
 Commerce, ii. 600^b.
 Common, i. 215^a.
 Communion, i. 234^b.
 Community of Goods, i. 235^b, 368^a.
 Compassion, ii. 240^a, 29^b.
 Concision, i. 212^b.
 Concupiscence, i. 723^b.
 Condemnation, i. 236^b.
 Confession, i. 237^a; ii. 278^b.
 Confidence, i. 239^a.
 Confirmation, i. 239^a, 133^a.
 Congregation, i. 239^b.
 Conscience, i. 239^b, 529^a, 697^a.
 Consecrate, Consecration, i. 242^a.
 Consolation, i. 232^a.
 Conspiracy, i. 243^a.
 Constraint, i. 244^a.
 Contentment, i. 244^a.
 Contribution, i. 245^b.
 Conversation, i. 246^a.
 Conversion, i. 246^b.
 Conveyances, ii. 394^a.
 Coppersmith, i. 248^b.
 Core, i. 680^b.
 Corinth, i. 248^b.
 Church of, i. 216^a, 225^a.
 Corinthians, Epistles to the, i. 250^b, 281^a; ii. 141^b.
 Cornelius, i. 259^b, 623^a, 656^a.
 Corner, i. 260^a.
 Corner-stone, i. 260^a, 418^b.
 Cos, i. 260^b.
 Cosmetics, ii. 608^b.
 Couch, i. 145^b, 588^b.
 Council, ii. 454^a [Sanhedrin].
 Council House, i. 638^a.
 Courage, i. 156^b.
 Courts, ii. 613^b [Trial-at-Law].
 Courtyard, i. 587^b.
 Covenant, i. 261^a, 535^b, 536^a.
 Covetousness, i. 263^a.
 Crafts, i. 94^a.
 Creation, i. 263^b.
 Crescens, i. 265^a.
 Crete, Cretans, i. 265^b.
 Crispus, i. 266^a.
 Cross, i. 266^a, 256^b.
 Crown, i. 269^a, 221^b.
 Crucifixion, i. 266^a, 274^b.
 Crystal, i. 269^b.
 Cubit, i. 269^b.
 Cup, i. 270^a.
 Curse, i. 270^b.
 Custom, i. 271^a.
 Customs Dues, ii. 603^a.
 Cymbal, i. 271^b; ii. 256^b.
 Cyprus, i. 272^a.
 Cyrene, Cyrenians, i. 272^b.
 Dalmatia, i. 273^a, 606^a.
 Damaris, i. 273^a, 398^a.
 Damascus, Damascenes, i. 273^b.
 Damnation, i. 661^b.
 Darkness, i. 700^b, 545^b.
 Dates, i. 274^a.
 David, i. 283^a.
 Day, ii. 582^a.
 and Night (Figurative), i. 283^b.
 of the Lord, ii. 123^b [Parousia]. of Repentance, i. 107^a.
 of Wrath, i. 65^a.
 Day-star, i. 284^a.
 Deacon, Deaconess, i. 284^b; ii. 589^a.
 Dearth, i. 401^a.
 Death, i. 699^b, 393^b [Fall]; ii. 501^a, 512^b. of Jesus Christ, i. 181^a, 267^b, 385^b, 537^b; ii. 260^b, 303^b ff., 351^a, 437^b, 445^b.
 Second, i. 545^b, 681^b, 700^a.
 Debt, Debtor, i. 285^a.
 Decree, i. 286^a.
 Deliverance, ii. 444^a f.
 Deliverer, i. 286^a.
 Deluge, i. 412^b [Flood].
 Demas, i. 286^b.
 Demetrius, i. 287^a, 647^b.
 Demon, i. 287^b; ii. 249^a.
 Dependents, i. 398^b.
 Deputy, i. 288^b.
 Derbe, i. 288^b.
 Descent into Hades, i. 289^a, 664^b.
 Desert, i. 292^a.
 Destruction, i. 292^b, 236^b; ii. 165^a.
 Devil, i. 293^a; ii. 472^a.
 Diadem, i. 269^a.
 Diana, i. 295^a.
 Diaspora, i. 304^b, 549^b.
 Didache, i. 296^a.
 Didascalia, i. 298^b.
 Digamy, ii. 14^b.
 Dionysius, i. 89^b.
 Dioscouri, i. 302^b.
 Diotrophes, i. 302^b, 647^b.
 Disciple, i. 302^b.
 Discipline, i. 303^a, 173^b.
 Disobedience, ii. 628^a.
 Dispersion, i. 304^b.
 Divination, i. 306^b.
 Divisions, i. 308^b.
 Divorce, ii. 15^b; i. 523^b.
 Docetism, i. 645^b.
 Doctor, i. 308^b.
 Doctrine, ii. 552^a.
 Dog, i. 309^a.
 Dominion, i. 309^a.
 Domitian, i. 309^b; ii. 179^a.
 Door, i. 311^a, 443^a, 587^b.
 Dorcas, i. 311^b.
 Doxology, i. 312^a; ii. 256^a.
 Dragon, i. 313^a, 293^b, 546^b.
 Dream, i. 313^b.
 Dress, i. 221^a [Clothes].
 Drunkenness, i. 314^a.
 Drusilla, i. 315^b, 277^a.
 Dyeing, ii. 607^a.
 Dysentery, i. 315^b.
 Eagle, i. 315^a.
 Ear, i. 316^b.
 Earnest, i. 317^a.
 Earth, Earthen, Earthy, Earthly, i. 317^b.
 Earthquake, i. 317^b.
 Easter, ii. 132^b, 135^a.
 Ebionism, i. 318^a, 369^a; ii. 79^a.
 Ebionites, Gospel of the, i. 494^a.
 Ecclesiasticus, ii. 503^b.
 Eclecta, i. 647^b.
 Ecstasy, ii. 299^a.
 Edification, i. 320^a.
 Education, i. 321^a.
 Egypt, i. 325^a.
 Egyptian, The, i. 103^b.
 Egyptians, Gospel of the, i. 495^a.
 Eight, ii. 94^b.
 Elamites, i. 325^b.

- Elder, i. 325^b, 149^b, 210^b, 211^a; ii. 585^a.
Elect lady, i. 647^b.
Election, i. 326^a, 510^a; ii. 262^a.
Elements, i. 323^a.
Elijah, i. 329^b; ii. 169^b.
Elkesaites, i. 320^a, 369^a.
Elymas, i. 137^b.
Emerald, i. 330^a.
Emperor, i. 124^a [Augustus].
Emperor-worship, i. 330^a, 593^b, 706^b.
Emulation, i. 341^b.
Enlightenment, i. 332^b, 679^a.
Enmity, i. 333^b.
Enoch, i. 334^a.
Book of, i. 334^b.
Envy, i. 341^a.
Epenetus, i. 341^b.
Epaphras, i. 342^a.
Epaphroditus, i. 342^b; ii. 217^a.
Ephesians, Epistle to the, i. 343^a, 281^b; ii. 143^a.
Ephesus, i. 349^b, 280^b.
Epicureans, i. 351^a.
Epicurus, i. 351^b.
Epistle, i. 353^a, 694^b.
Era, ii. 581^a.
Erastus, i. 353^b, 173^b.
Esau, i. 354^a.
Eschatology, i. 354^b, 257^b, 454^b; ii. 322^a [Resurrection], 379^b, 571^b, 573^a.
Esdras, The Second Book of, i. 365^b.
Essenes, i. 367^a.
Eternal, Everlasting, i. 369^b.
Fire, i. 409^b.
Life, i. 370^a, 610^b, 698^b; ii. 5^b, 188^b.
Ethics, i. 370^b; ii. 451^b.
Ethiopians, i. 372^b.
Ethiopian Eunuch, i. 373^a.
Ethinarch, i. 373^a.
Eubulus, i. 373^b.
Eucharist, i. 373^b, 257^a, 300^b f., 364^b, 365^a, 599^b f., 717^b; ii. 134^a, 425^a ff., 698^a.
Eunice, i. 377^b, 704^b.
Eunuch, i. 173^b, 373^a, 385^b.
Euodia, Euodias, i. 377^b; ii. 218^a.
Euphrates, i. 378^a.
Euraquilo, i. 378^b.
Euroclydon, i. 378^b.
Eutychus, i. 378^b.
Evangelist, i. 379^a.
Eve, i. 379^b.
Gospel of, i. 504^b.
Everlasting, i. 369^b.
Evil, i. 380^a, 264^b.
Evil-speaking, i. 381^a.
Excommunication, i. 381^b.
Exhortation, i. 383^a.
Exorcism, i. 383^b; ii. 71^a.
Expediency, i. 385^a.
Expiation, i. 110^b [Atonement]; ii. 281^b [Propitiation], 431^b [Sacrifice].
Eye, i. 387^b.
Fable, i. 388^a.
Faction, i. 388^b.
Fair Havens, i. 389^a.
Fairs, ii. 603^a.
Faith, i. 389^a, 538^a, 540^a, 578^a, 657^b; ii. 259^a, 383^a, 589^b. and Works, i. 432^a, 434^a, 669^a; ii. 384^a.
Faithfulness, i. 392^a.
Fall, i. 393^b.
False Prophet, i. 68^b.
False Teachers, i. 60^b, 600^a, 645^a, 659^a, 727^b; ii. 550^b, 586^a.
Family, i. 397^b.
Famine, i. 401^a.
Fast, The, i. 401^b.
Fasting, i. 6^b, 132^a, 300^b; ii. 116^b.
Father, i. 398^a.
Fatherhood of God, i. 175^b, 347^b, 399^b, 459^b.
Fathom, i. 402^b.
Fear, i. 402^b.
Feasting, i. 403^b.
Feasts, ii. 581^b.
Feet, i. 405^a.
Felix, i. 405^a, 276^a.
Fellowship, i. 405^b, 234^b, 246^a; ii. 188^a, 224^a.
Right Hand of, i. 521^a.
Festus, i. 406^b, 276^a.
Fever, i. 407^a.
Field of Blood, i. 47^a.
Fig, Fig-tree, i. 407^a.
Final Destinies, i. 356^b, 363^b; ii. 351^b.
Finisher, i. 125^b.
Fire, i. 407^b.
Coals of, i. 223^a.
First and Last, i. 50^b [Alpha and Omega].
First-born, First-begotten, i. 410^b.
First-fruit, i. 411^a; ii. 134^a.
Fish, ii. 606^a.
Flesh, i. 411^b, 578^a, 689^a, 724^b; ii. 500^a.
Flock, i. 412^b.
Flood, i. 412^b.
Flute, ii. 239^a, 256^b.
Food, ii. 605^a.
Fool, i. 413^a.
Footwear, ii. 476^b.
Forbearance, i. 704^b [Long-suffering].
Foreigner, ii. 530^b.
Foreknowledge, i. 413^b.
Foreordination, ii. 262^a.
Forerunner, i. 414^b.
Forgiveness, i. 414^b.
Form, i. 415^b.
Formalism, i. 416^a.
Fornication, i. 417^a, 523^b; ii. 16^a.
Fortunatus, i. 418^b.
Foundation, i. 418^b, 587^a.
Four, ii. 94^b.
Fragments of Uncanonical Gospels—
Coptic, i. 505^a.
Fayyûm, i. 506^b.
Oxyrhynchite, i. 499^a.
Sahidic, i. 500^a.
Unidentified, i. 489^a, 506^b.
Frankincense, i. 420^a.
Freedom, i. 420^a [Freedom of the Will], 696^b [Liberty].
Freedom of the Will, i. 420^a, 522^a; ii. 289^b, 452^a.
Friends, Friendship, i. 424^a.
Fruit, i. 424^b; ii. 605^b.
Fulling, ii. 606^b.
Fulness, i. 425^b.
Future Life, i. 354^b [Eschatology], 584^b, 608^b.
Gaius, i. 427^a, 582^a.
Galatia, i. 427^a.
Galatians, i. 427^b.
Galatians, Epistle to the, i. 430^b, 281^a; ii. 140^b.
Galba, i. 437^a.
Galilee, i. 437^b.
Gallio, i. 439^b, 26^b, 275^b.
Gamaliel, i. 440^a; ii. 174^a, 460^b.
Gospel of, i. 504^a.
Games, i. 441^a, 322^a; ii. 276^a.
Gangrene, i. 442^b.
Garden of Eden, ii. 123^a.
Garlands, i. 442^b.
Garments, i. 221^a.
Gate, i. 443^a, 587^b.
Gaul, i. 430^a.
Gaza, i. 443^a.
Gehenna, i. 544^b, 107^b.
Genealogies, i. 443^b.
Generation, i. 444^b.
Gentiles, i. 445^a, 529^a; ii. 156^a, 211^a, 415^b.
Gentleness, ii. 27^a [Meekness].
Gideon, i. 449^a.
Gift, i. 449^a.
of the Spirit, i. 29^a, 132^b, 135^b, 184^a, 511^a, 574^a; ii. 353^a.
of Tongues, ii. 598^b, and see Glossolalia.
Gifts of the Spirit, i. 450^a, 320^b, 357^b, 383^b; ii. 116^b, 550^a.
Girdle, i. 451^b.
Glass, i. 587^b; ii. 42^b.
Glory, i. 451^b.
Glossolalia, i. 18^a, 183^b, 320^b, 581^a; ii. 162^b, 598^b.
Gnosticism, i. 453^a, 259^b, 320^a, 369^a, 645^b; ii. 153^a, 220^a.
Goad, i. 457^a.
Goat, i. 457^a.

- God, i. 457^b, 33^b, 218^b; ii. 571^a.
 Faithfulness, i. 392^a.
 Fatherhood, i. 175^b, 347^b, 399^b, 459^b.
 Grace, ii. 152^a, 390^a.
 Kingship, i. 675^b.
 Love, ii. 389^b.
 Presence, ii. 267^a.
 Revelation in Nature, ii. 77^b.
 Righteousness, ii. 376^a, 152^a, 282^b f., 359^b, 390^a.
 Sovereignty, ii. 186^b.
 Unity, ii. 632^a.
 Voice, ii. 644^a.
 Will, ii. 187^a.
 Wrath, i. 63^b, 567^b; ii. 339^b.
 Godliness, i. 467^a; ii. 590^a.
 Gog and Magog, i. 467^b; ii. 462^b.
 Gold, i. 468^a.
 Gomorrah, ii. 517^b.
 Good, i. 468^b.
 Goodness, i. 470^a.
 Goods, ii. 608^b.
 Gospel, i. 471^b; ii. 224^a f.
 Gospels, i. 474^a, 79^b, 282^a.
 Gospels (Uncanonical), i. 478^a b.
 Government, Governor, i. 506^b.
 Governments, i. 507^a.
 Grace, i. 507^a; ii. 78^a.
 Grafting, i. 513^a.
 Grave, Gravity, i. 513^b.
 Grecians, Greeks, i. 514^b.
 Greece, i. 515^a.
 Greek, Hellenistic and Biblical, i. 551^b.
 Grief, i. 516^b.
 Groaning, i. 517^a.
 Growth, i. 517^b.
 Guard, i. 518^a.
 Guardian, ii. 623^a.
 Guardian Angels, i. 60^a.
 Guile, i. 519^a.
 Guilt, ii. 450^a, 499^a, 500^b.
 Gymnastics, i. 95^b, 323^b.
 Hades, i. 519^a, 340^b, 544^b, 681^a.
 Descent into, i. 239^a, 664^b.
 Hagar, i. 519^b.
 Hail, i. 520^a.
 Hair, i. 520^b; ii. 608^b.
 Hallelujah, i. 520^b.
 Hamor, ii. 474^a.
 Hand, i. 521^a.
 Handkerchief, i. 521^b.
 Hands, Laying on of, i. 132^a, 210^b, 521^a; ii. 115^a.
 Handwriting, i. 157^a; ii. 699^b.
 Haran, i. 521^b.
 Hardening, i. 521^b.
 Harlot, i. 523^a.
 Har-Magedon, i. 524^a.
 Harp, i. 524^b; ii. 256^b.
 Harvest, i. 525^b.
 Hatred, i. 526^b.
 Head, i. 527^a.
 Head-dress, i. 221^b.
 Healing, i. 450^b.
 Heart, i. 523^b.
 Heathen, i. 529^a.
 Heaven, i. 530^a.
 Hebrews, i. 533^b.
 Hebrews, Epistle to the, i. 534^b, 58^a, 282^a.
 Heifer, i. 542^b.
 Heir, i. 543^a.
 Hell, i. 544^b.
 Hellas, i. 515^a.
 Hellenism, i. 547^b.
 Hellenistic and Biblical Greek, i. 551^b.
 Helmet, i. 92^b.
 Helps, i. 560^a.
 Heresy, i. 560^b.
 Heritage, i. 543^a.
 Hermas, i. 561^a, 298^a.
 Shepherd of, i. 561^a.
 Hermes, i. 564^a; ii. 29^a.
 Hermogenes, ii. 234^b.
 Herod, i. 564^b.
 Herodion, i. 565^b.
 Hetairai, i. 417^b.
 Hierapolis, i. 565^b.
 High Priest, ii. 269^a.
 Hinnom, Valley of, i. 681^a.
 History of Joseph the Carpenter, i. 489^a.
 Holiness, i. 566^a; ii. 451^b.
 Holy Day, i. 571^b.
 Holy Ghost.—See Holy Spirit.
 Holy of Holies, ii. 453^b.
 Holy Mount, ii. 46^b.
 Holy Place, ii. 453^b.
 Holy Spirit, i. 573^a, 218^b, 348^a, 432^b, 463^a, 614^b; ii. 121^a, 162^b, and see Gift of the Spirit.
 Home, i. 581^b.
 Honest, i. 582^a.
 Honey, i. 582^b.
 Honour, i. 583^a.
 Hope, i. 583^b.
 Horn, i. 585^a.
 Horse, i. 585^b.
 Hosea, i. 586^a.
 Hospitality, i. 586^a, 582^a.
 Hour, ii. 582^a.
 (Figurative), i. 586^b.
 House, i. 586^b.
 Humility, i. 588^b.
 Husband, i. 398^a; ii. 11^a [Marriage].
 Hyacinth, i. 624^a.
 Hymenæus, i. 589^b.
 Hymns, i. 590^a.
 Hypocrisy, i. 591^b.
 Hypostasis, ii. 533^a.
 Hyssop, i. 592^b.
 Iconium, i. 592^a.
 Idolatry, i. 593^a, 215^b, 606^a.
 Idol-meats, i. 258^a, 418^a, 593^b; ii. 412^a.
 Ignatius, i. 594^a.
 Ignorance, i. 605^a.
 Illumination, i. 332^b, 679^a.
 Illyricum, i. 605^b.
 Image, i. 606^a.
 Immersion, i. 131^b.
 Immortality, i. 607^b; ii. 351^b.
 Incarnation, i. 177^a ff., 536^b; ii. 226^a f.
 Incense, i. 611^b.
 Incorruption, ii. 628^b.
 Increase, i. 517^b.
 Infant Baptism, i. 136^a.
 Inheritance, i. 543^a.
 Inns, ii. 395^a.
 Inspiration and Revelation, i. 612^a.
 Intercession, i. 618^a, 97^a.
 Intermediate State, i. 356^a, 363^a.
 Interpretation, i. 619^b.
 Iron, i. 620^b.
 Isaac, i. 620^b.
 Isaiah, i. 621^a.
 Ishmael, i. 620^b.
 Israel, i. 622^a, 533^b.
 (=Jacob), 625^a.
 Israelite, i. 623^a.
 Italian Band, i. 623^a.
 Italy, i. 623^b.
 Ivory, i. 624^b.
 Jacinth, i. 624^a.
 Jacob, i. 624^a.
 Jaffa, i. 648^b.
 Jailor, i. 625^a.
 Jambres, i. 633^a.
 James and John, the Sons of Zebedee, i. 625^b, 280^a b; ii. 18^a.
 James, the Lord's Brother, the Just, i. 628^b, 83^b, 201^b, 280^a, 368^a, 638^a, 640^a; ii. 81^b, 557^b.
 James, Epistle of, i. 629^a, 280^b.
 Jannes and Jambres, i. 633^a.
 Jason, i. 633^b.
 Jasper, i. 633^b.
 Jealousy, i. 633^b.
 Jephthah, i. 633^b.
 Jericho, i. 634^a.
 Jerusalem, i. 634^a.
 Jesse, i. 640^b.
 Jestings, i. 640^b.
 Jesus, i. 641^a.
 (=Joshua), i. 653^b.
 Jesus Christ, i. 177^a.
 Appearances, ii. 333^b ff., 340^b ff.
 Ascension, i. 95^b, 222^a b, 385^b, 638^b.
 Atonement, i. 110^b; ii. 260^b.
 Attitude to War, ii. 647^a.
 Blasphemy, ii. 172^b.
 Burial, ii. 470^b.

Jesus Christ—

- Death, i. 181^a, 267^b, 385^b, 537^b;
ii. 260^b, 303^b ff., 351^a, 437^b,
445^b.
Divine Attributes, i. 464^a.
Divinity, i. 462^a; ii. 349^a.
Exaltation, i. 96^a; ii. 352^b.
Faithfulness, i. 392^b.
Glorified, i. 188^b; ii. 349^b.
Headship, i. 528^a.
Historic, i. 183^a, 192^a, 197^a.
Humanity, i. 465^a.
Incarnation, i. 177^a ff., 536^b; ii.
226^a f.
Institution of Sacraments, ii.
427^b.
Judge, i. 180^b, 198^b, 355^b.
King, i. 97^b, 674^b, 676^b.
Logos, i. 198^b.
Lord, i. 178^b, 180^a, 187^b, 188^b, 462^b, 705^b; ii. 349^b, 352^b f.
Mediator, ii. 21^a.
Messiah, i. 178^a ff., 355^a, 573^b;
ii. 173^b, 260^a, 348^b.
Mysticism, ii. 64^a.
Name, i. 130^a; ii. 67^a, 72^a.
Nazarean, i. 178^b.
Naziritism, ii. 81^b.
'Our Passover,' ii. 134^a.
Paraclete, ii. 121^a.
Passion, i. 256^b; ii. 445^b.
Pattern, ii. 187^b.
Person, i. 177^a [Christ, Christology], 256^a, 359^b, 509^a; ii.
187^b, 571^a.
Pre-existence, ii. 264^a; i. 193^a,
464^a.
Presence, ii. 267^a.
Priest, i. 97^a, 118^b, 196^b, 535^a;
ii. 28^a, 269^b.
Prince, i. 179^b.
Prophet, i. 97^b.
Ransom, ii. 298^a, 303^a ff.
Resurrection, ii. 329^a; i. 112^b,
183^a, 608^b; ii. 260^a, 324^a ff.
Sacrifice, i. 536^b; ii. 388^b, 435^a.
and St. Paul, ii. 156^b f.
Saviour, i. 179^b; ii. 445^a.
Second Adam, i. 40^a, 190^a; ii.
354^a.
Servant of God, i. 179^a.
Session, i. 96^a.
Son of God, i. 180^a, 189^a, 198^a,
462^a; ii. 113^a, 350^a.
Son of Man, i. 179^b, 198^a.
Spirit, i. 189^b. and the Stranger, ii. 531^a.
Sufferings, ii. 534^a.
Surnames, ii. 539^a.
Truth, ii. 622^a.
Union with God, ii. 629^b.
Victory, ii. 633^a.
Witness, ii. 689^a.
Work, i. 256^a, 578^a; ii. 571^a.
- Jew, Jewess, i. 641^a, 534^a, 645^a;
ii. 170^b, 415^b.
Jewish Christian Gospels, i. 489^b.
Jezebel, i. 642^a.
Job, i. 642^b.
Joel, i. 643^a.
John, the Baptist, ii. 81^b.
John, the Son of Zebedee, i. 625^b.
John, Acts of, i. 35^b.
Apocalypse of, i. 74^a, 358^b.
Epistles of, i. 643^b, 282^b.
Joppa, i. 648^b.
Joseph, i. 649^a.
(=Barnabas), i. 138^a.
Barsabbas, i. 649^a.
Josephus, i. 649^b.
Josias, i. 138^a.
Joshua, i. 653^b, 641^a.
Joy, i. 654^a.
Judæa, i. 655^a.
Judaism, ii. 315^a.
Judaizing, i. 655^b, 430^b, 432^a; ii.
197^a.
Judas Barsabbas, i. 656^b. of Damascus, i. 657^a.
the Galilæan, i. 657^a.
Iscariot, i. 657^b.
Judas, Gospel of, i. 504^b.
Jude, the Lord's Brother, i. 658^b.
Jude, Epistle of, i. 658^b, 282^a.
Judge, Judging (Ethical), i. 660^a.
Judgment, i. 661^b, 14^a, 236^b, 340^a, 355^b, 356^a, 363^a, 409^a b.
Judgment-hall, i. 664^b.
Judgment-seat, i. 664^b.
Julia, i. 665^a.
Julius, i. 665^a.
Junias, Junia, i. 665^a, 83^b.
Jupiter, i. 665^b.
Justice, i. 665^b.
Justification, i. 666^a, 432^a, 510^a;
ii. 354^b, 383^b f., 450^a.
Justus, i. 641^a, 649^a; ii. 597^a.
- Keeper, i. 518^a.
Key, i. 673^a.
Kindness, i. 673^b.
King, i. 674^b.
King of Kings and Lord of Lords,
i. 676^a.
Kingdom, Kingdom of God, i.
676^a; ii. 358^b, 368^b.
Kish, i. 678^b.
Kiss, i. 586^b; ii. 443^a.
of Peace, i. 132^a.
Kitchen, i. 587^b.
Kleromancy, i. 710^b.
Knowledge, i. 678^b.
Koine, i. 547^b, 551^b ff.; ii. 140^b.
Korah, i. 680^b.
Kyria, i. 647^b.
- Labour, i. 680^a.
Lake of Fire, i. 681^a, 410^a, 545^a.
Lamb, i. 681^b.
- Lamp, i. 682^b.
Lampstand, i. 682^b, 588^b.
Laodicea, i. 683^a, 722^b.
Lapis Lazuli, ii. 457^b.
Lasciviousness, i. 684^a.
Lasea, i. 685^a.
Last Supper, i. 373^b.
Laver, i. 685^a.
Law, i. 685^a, 114^b, 432^b, 577^b; ii.
381^b.
Lawyer, i. 693^b.
Leather, ii. 608^a, 700^b.
Leaven, i. 693^b.
Legion, i. 93^a.
Leopard, i. 694^a.
Letter, i. 694^b, 353^a; ii. 703^b.
Leucian Acts, i. 29^b.
Leucius, i. 29^b.
Levite, i. 694^b.
Lewd, Lewdness, i. 695^a.
Libertines, i. 695^b; ii. 509^b.
Liberty, i. 696^b.
Libya, i. 698^a.
Lictors, ii. 471^b.
Life and Death, i. 698^a.
Light and Darkness, i. 700^b.
Light of Nature, ii. 78^a.
Lightning, i. 702^a.
Likeness, i. 415^b [Form].
Linen, i. 702^a.
Linus, i. 702^b.
Lion, i. 702^b.
Lips, ii. 47^a.
Living, i. 703^b.
Locust, i. 703^b.
Lois, i. 704^b, 377^b.
Longsuffering, i. 704^b.
Lord, i. 705^b.
of Lords, i. 676^a.
Lord's Day, i. 707^a, 571^b; ii. 424^a.
Lord's Supper, i. 234^b, 374^b; ii.
535^b.
Lot, i. 710^b.
Lots, i. 710^b.
Love, i. 713^b, 161^a, 526^b.
Love-feast, i. 717^a, 404^b.
Lucas, i. 718^b [Luke].
Lucius, i. 718^b, 273^b.
Luke, i. 718^b, 17^a, 652^b.
Lukewarm, i. 722^b.
Lust, i. 722^b.
Lycaonia, i. 725^b.
Lycia, i. 726^a.
Lydda, i. 726^b.
Lydia, i. 726^b, 378^a, 398^a; ii.
577^b.
Lydia (place), i. 727^a.
Lying, i. 727^b.
Lyre, i. 525^a.
Lysias, i. 728^a.
Lystra, i. 728^b.
- Macedonia, ii. 1^a.
Madian, ii. 36^a.
Magic, i. 306^b; ii. 429^b.

Magistrate, ii. 2^a.
 Magog, i. 467^b.
 Magus, ii. 493^b.
 Majesty, ii. 2^b.
 Malice, ii. 2^b.
 Man, ii. 3^a, 632^b.
 Man of Sin, of Lawlessness, ii. 7^a; i. 68^a, 101^a; ii. 572^a f.
 Mana, ii. 68^b.
 Manaen, ii. 8^a; i. 564^b.
 Manna, ii. 8^a.
 Man-stealing, ii. 29^a.
 Mantle, ii. 8^b.
 Maran atha, i. 56^a.
 Marble, ii. 8^b.
 Marcion, Gospel of, i. 498^b.
 Mark (John), ii. 8^b; i. 272^b.
 Market-place, ii. 9^b.
 Markets, ii. 606^a.
 Marks, ii. 10^a.
 Marriage, ii. 11^a; i. 8^a, 215^b, 258^a, 569^b; ii. 555^b, 628^b, 641^a, 691^a.
 Mars Hill, i. 89^b.
 Martyr, ii. 17^a.
 Mary, ii. 19^a.
 Gospel of, i. 502^a.
 Master, ii. 19^b.
 Masters and Servants, ii. 509^a [Slave, Slavery], 320^a.
 Matthew, ii. 19^b.
 Matthias, ii. 20^a.
 Gospel of, i. 501^a.
 Meat, ii. 606^a.
 Medes, ii. 20^b.
 Mediation, Mediator, ii. 20^b, 632^b.
 Meekness, ii. 27^a.
 Megiddo, i. 524^b.
 Melchizedek, ii. 27^a; i. 537^a; ii. 623^b, 625^a.
 Melita, ii. 28^a.
 Menahem, ii. 8^a; i. 657^b.
 Men-stealers, ii. 29^a.
 Mercurius, ii. 29^a.
 Mercury, ii. 29^a.
 Mercy, ii. 29^b.
 Mercy-seat, ii. 29^b.
 Mesopotamia, ii. 30^a.
 Messiah, i. 178^a ff., 355^a, 573^b; ii. 173^b, 260^a, 348^b.
 Messianism, Militant, ii. 649^b.
 Metal-work, i. 94^b; ii. 608^b.
 Metaphors, ii. 30^b; i. 441^a; ii. 653^a.
 Michael, ii. 35^b; i. 107^a.
 Midian, ii. 36^a.
 Milestones, ii. 395^a.
 Miletus, ii. 36^a.
 Millennium, i. 359^b; ii. 88^a.
 Millstone, ii. 37^a.
 Mind, ii. 37^a.
 Minister, Ministry, ii. 37^b; i. 219^a, 256^b, 301^b f.; ii. 114^a [Ordination], 271^b, 584^a.

Ministration, ii. 39^a.
 Minstrel, ii. 39^a.
 Miracles, ii. 39^a; i. 450^b.
 Mirror, ii. 42^b.
 Missions, i. 162^b, 206^a.
 Mithraism, i. 209^a; ii. 59^a, 426^b.
 Mitylene, ii. 43^a.
 Mnason, ii. 43^a; i. 272^b.
 Moderation, ii. 553^a [Temperance].
 Moloch, ii. 43^b.
 Money, ii. 674^b [Wealth].
 Monogamy, ii. 14^a.
 Month, ii. 581^b.
 Moon, ii. 43^b.
 Morality, i. 370^b [Ethics]; ii. 188^b, 371^b.
 Morning-star, i. 284^a.
 Mortify, ii. 43^b.
 Moses, ii. 44^a.
 Assumption of, i. 105^a.
 Testament of, i. 105^a.
 Mother, i. 398^a, 400^a.
 Mount, Mountain, ii. 45^b.
 Mourning, ii. 46^b.
 Mouth, ii. 47^a.
 Murder, ii. 47^b.
 Murmuring, ii. 48^a.
 Music, ii. 256^b.
 Myra, ii. 48^b.
 Mysia, ii. 48^b.
 Mystery, Mysteries, ii. 49^a; i. 235^a, 333^a, 364^a.
 Mystery-religions, i. 377^a; ii. 51^a.
 Mysticism, ii. 62^b.
 Naassenes, Gospel of the, i. 498^b.
 Nabatæans, i. 88^b.
 Nahor, i. 521^b.
 Name, ii. 64^a; i. 130^a.
 Napkin, i. 521^b.
 Narcissus, ii. 76^a; i. 399^b.
 Nation, ii. 76^b.
 Natural, ii. 77^a.
 Nature, ii. 77^b.
 Navigation, ii. 474^b [Ship].
 Nazarene, ii. 78^b; i. 318^b f.; ii. 79^b.
 Nazareth, ii. 79^b.
 Nazirite, ii. 80^a.
 Neapolis, ii. 82^a.
 Neighbour, ii. 82^b.
 Neophyte, ii. 92^b; i. 131^b.
 Nereus, ii. 83^a.
 Nero, ii. 83^a; i. 75^a; ii. 178^b.
 Redivivus, i. 68^b, 75^a, 101^a, 409^a; ii. 94^b.
 Nerva, ii. 84^b.
 New Birth, i. 135^a; ii. 5^b, 310^a [Regeneration].
 New Covenant, ii. 435^b.
 New Jerusalem, ii. 85^b.
 New Life, i. 117^b, 371^a; ii. 354^a, 390^a.

New Moon, ii. 89^a.
 Nicanor, ii. 90^b.
 Nicknames, ii. 65^b.
 Nicodemus, Gospel of, i. 504^a.
 Nicolaitans, ii. 90^b; i. 456^a.
 Nicolas, ii. 91^a.
 Nicopolis, ii. 91^a.
 Niger, ii. 541^a.
 Night (Figurative), i. 283^b.
 Noah, ii. 91^b.
 Book of, i. 338^a.
 Noble, ii. 92^a.
 Novice, ii. 92^b.
 Number of the Beast, i. 75^a; ii. 94^a.
 Numbers, ii. 92^b.
 Nurture, i. 173^b [Chastisement].
 Nympha, Nymphas, ii. 96^b.
 Oath, ii. 97^a.
 Obedience, ii. 99^b; i. 671^b.
 Occupation, i. 680^a [Labour]; ii. 693^a [Work].
 Odes of Solomon, ii. 100^a; i. 591^a.
 Offence, ii. 106^b.
 Offering, ii. 431^b [Sacrifice].
 Officer, ii. 107^b.
 Oil, ii. 107^b.
 Ointment, ii. 108^a.
 Old Testament, ii. 108^a.
 Olive, ii. 111^a; i. 513^a.
 Olive-oil, ii. 605^a.
 Olives, Mount of, ii. 46^a, 111^b.
 Olivet, ii. 111^b.
 Olympas, ii. 111^b.
 Omega, i. 50^b, 185^b.
 One, ii. 95^a.
 Onesimus, ii. 112^a.
 Onesiphorus, ii. 112^b.
 Only-begotten, ii. 112^b.
 Oracle, ii. 113^b.
 Oracles, Sibylline, ii. 477^a.
 Oration, ii. 114^a.
 Orator, ii. 559^b [Tertullus].
 Ordinance, ii. 114^a.
 Ordination, ii. 114^a; i. 210^b f.
 Organization, i. 209^b.
 Original Sin, i. 395^b; ii. 498^b [Sin].
 Ornaments, i. 222^a.
 Otho, ii. 118^b.
 Overseer, i. 150^b.
 Paganism, i. 331^a, 529^b.
 Palace, ii. 118^a.
 Palestine, i. 526^a, 549^b.
 Pallas, i. 276^b.
 Palm, ii. 119^b.
 Palsy, ii. 120^a.
 Pamphylia, ii. 120^a.
 Paper, ii. 700^a.
 Papyrus, ii. 700^b.
 Paphos, ii. 120^b.
 Paraclete, ii. 121^a; i. 222^a.

- Paradise, ii. 122^b.
Parchment, ii. 700^b.
Pardon, i. 414^b [Forgiveness].
Parents, i. 398^a.
Parmenas, ii. 123^b.
Parousia, ii. 123^b; i. 222^b, 257^b, 355^b ff., 408^a; ii. 268^a, 571^b f.
Parthians, ii. 131^a.
Pascha, ii. 131^b, 135^a.
Passion, Passions, ii. 131^a.
Passover, ii. 131^b; i. 277^b.
Pastor, ii. 135^b, 474^a.
Pastoral Epistles, ii. 583^b; i. 281^b; ii. 143^b.
Patara, ii. 135^b.
Patience, ii. 136^a; i. 704^b.
Patmos, ii. 137^a.
Patriarch, ii. 137^b.
Patrobas, ii. 137^b.
Pattern, ii. 138^a.
Paul, ii. 138^b; i. 17^b, 32^a f., 250^b ff., 305^b; ii. 117^a (Saul), 18^b, 63^a, 260^a, 396^a, 413^b, 463^a, 529^b, 557^b, 592^b f., 620^a, 682^b f.
Acts of, i. 32^a.
Paulinism, ii. 150^b, 153^a.
Peace, ii. 159^a.
Pearl, ii. 160^b.
Pedagogue, i. 399^a; ii. 459^a.
Pen, ii. 702^a.
Penny, ii. 160^b.
Pentecost, ii. 160^b; i. 112^b, 183^b, 279^b, 574^a.
People, ii. 164^a.
Perdition, ii. 165^a.
Perfect, Perfection, ii. 165^a.
Perfection, Gospel of, i. 504^b.
Perga, ii. 166^b.
Pergamus, Pergamum, ii. 167^a.
Persecution, ii. 168^a.
Perseverance, ii. 186^a.
Persis, ii. 190^b.
Personality, ii. 67^b; i. 116^b.
Peter, ii. 191^a; i. 34^a, 277^b, 280^a; ii. 18^b.
Acts of, i. 34^a.
Epistles of, ii. 201^a; i. 282^a.
Gospel of, i. 496^a; ii. 200^b.
Pharaoh, ii. 210^a; i. 521^b f.
Pharaoh's Daughter, ii. 210^a.
Pharisees, ii. 210^a, 289^a.
Phenice, ii. 232^b.
Philadelphia, ii. 211^b.
Philemon, ii. 212^a.
Epistle to, ii. 212^b; i. 281^b; ii. 143^a.
Philetus, i. 589^b.
Philip (Apostle), i. 566^a.
(Evangelist), ii. 214^a.
(Herod), i. 278^b.
Acts of, i. 39^b.
Gospel of, i. 500^b.
Philippi, ii. 215^a.
Philippians, Epistle to the, ii. 216^b; i. 281^b; ii. 143^b.
Philo of Alexandria, ii. 227^b.
Philologus, ii. 231^a; i. 665^a.
Philosophy, ii. 231^a; i. 680^a.
Phinehas, i. 127^b.
Phlegon, ii. 231^b.
Phœbe, ii. 231^b.
Phœnicia, ii. 232^b.
Phœnix, ii. 233^a.
Phrygia, ii. 233^b.
Phygelus, ii. 234^b.
Physician, ii. 234^b; i. 399^a.
Pilate, Pontius, ii. 238^a; i. 277^b, 638^b.
Pilgrim, ii. 530^b.
Pillar, ii. 238^a.
Pipe, ii. 239^a, 256^b.
Pidisia, ii. 239^b.
Pit, i. 11^b.
Pity, ii. 240^a.
Place (His own), ii. 241^a.
Plague, ii. 241^b.
Pleroma, i. 425^b.
Plot, i. 243^a.
Poets, ii. 293^b [Quotations].
Poison, ii. 241^b.
Politarch, ii. 2^b.
Pollution, ii. 242^a.
Pollux, i. 302^b.
Polycarp, ii. 242^a, 41^b.
Polygamy, ii. 14^a.
Pontus, ii. 247^a.
Poor, ii. 248^a.
Poplios, ii. 290^a.
Porch, ii. 248^a.
Possession, ii. 248^a; i. 288^a, 383^b.
Possessions, ii. 674^b [Wealth]; i. 235^b [Community of Goods].
Potentate, ii. 254^a.
Potter, ii. 254^b.
Pottery, i. 95^a.
Poverty, ii. 248^a.
Power, Powers, ii. 254^b, 39^b.
Prætor, ii. 255^a, 2^a.
Prætorian Guard, i. 518^b.
Prætorium, ii. 255^a, 118^b, 223^a.
Praise, ii. 255^a.
Prayer, ii. 257^a; i. 180^b, 303^b, 401^a; ii. 74^b, 116^a.
for the Departed, ii. 258^a.
Preaching, ii. 258^b, 550^b.
Precious, ii. 261^a.
Precious Stones, ii. 261^a.
Predestination, ii. 262^a; i. 153^a.
Pre-existence of Christ, ii. 264^a; i. 193^a, 464^a.
Preparation, ii. 266^b.
Presbyter, Presbytery, i. 149^b, 210^b, 325^b, 582^a; ii. 272^a.
Presence, ii. 266^b.
Pricks, i. 457^a.
Pride, ii. 268^b.
Priest, ii. 269^a; i. 1^a, 535^a.
Prince, ii. 272^b.
Prince of the Power of the Air, i. 47^a.
Principality, Principalities, ii. 273^a.
Principles, ii. 274^b.
Prisca, Priscilla, i. 87^a; ii. 408^b.
Prison, ii. 275^a.
Prize, ii. 276^a.
Prochorus, ii. 277^a.
Proconsul, ii. 277^a; i. 288^b.
Procurator, ii. 277^a; i. 277^b f.
Profane, ii. 278^a.
Profession, ii. 278^b.
Profits, ii. 602^b.
Promise, ii. 279^a.
Property, ii. 674^b [Wealth]; i. 235^b [Community of Goods].
Prophecy, Prophet, Prophetess, ii. 279^b; i. 76^a, 615^a; ii. 169^a.
Propitiation, ii. 281^b; i. 116^a.
Proportion, ii. 284^a.
Proselyte, ii. 284^a; i. 260^a.
Prosenche, ii. 285^b.
Protestantism, ii. 182^b.
Protevangeliū Jacobi, i. 483^a.
Province, ii. 286^a.
Psalms, ii. 287^a; i. 590^a.
of Solomon, ii. 287^b; i. 591^a.
Psaltery, i. 525^a.
Pseudo-Matthew, Gospel of, i. 488^a.
Ptolemais, ii. 289^b.
Publius, ii. 290^a.
Pudens, ii. 290^a.
Punishment, ii. 290^b; i. 544^b, 700^a; ii. 391^b.
Purification, ii. 291^a.
Purity, i. 570^a.
Purple, i. 231^b; ii. 577^b.
Puteoli, ii. 291^b.
Pylon, i. 443^a.
Pyrrhus, ii. 292^a.
Python, ii. 292^a, 215^b.
Quartus, ii. 293^a.
Quaternion, ii. 293^b; i. 518^b.
Queen, ii. 293^b.
Quicksands, ii. 547^a.
Quotations, ii. 293^b.
Race, i. 441^b; ii. 276^b.
Rahab, ii. 297^a; i. 523^a.
Railing, i. 381^a.
Rainbow, ii. 298^a.
Ransom, ii. 298^a, 302^b ff.
Rapture, ii. 299^a.
Reading, ii. 299^b, 703^b.
Rebecca, ii. 300^b.
Recompense, ii. 368^a.
Reconciliation, ii. 300^b; i. 116^b, 510^a.
Red, i. 231^b.
Redemption, ii. 302^b; i. 268^a, 698^a; ii. 633^a.
Red Sea, ii. 309^b, 463^b.
Reed, ii. 309^b.

- Reformation, ii. 309^b.
 Regeneration, ii. 310^a.
 Rejection, ii. 314^b.
 Religion, ii. 315^a.
 Re-marriage, ii. 14^b.
 Remission, i. 414^b [Forgiveness].
 Remnant, ii. 315^b.
 Repentance, ii. 316^a; i. 247^b.
 Rephan, ii. 317^b.
 Reproach, ii. 317^b.
 Reprobate, ii. 318^b.
 Reproof, ii. 319^a.
 Reputation, ii. 319^b.
 Respect of Persons, ii. 319^b.
 Rest, ii. 320^a.
 Restitution, ii. 321^a.
 Restoration, ii. 321^a.
 Restoration of Offenders, ii. 322^a.
 Resurrection, ii. 322^a; i. 100^b,
 340^a, 356^b, 363^a; ii. 571^b.
 of Christ, ii. 329^a; i. 112^b, 183^a,
 608^b; ii. 260^a, 324^a ff.
 Retribution, ii. 635^b [Vengeance];
 i. 340^b.
 Revelation, i. 612^a.
 Book of, i. 71^b [Apocalypse].
 Revelling, ii. 367^b.
 Revenge, ii. 635^b [Vengeance].
 Reward, ii. 368^a, 391^b.
 Rhegium, ii. 369^b.
 Rhoda, ii. 370^a.
 Rhodes, ii. 370^a.
 Riches, ii. 674^b.
 Right, ii. 370^b.
 Righteousness, ii. 370^b; i. 115^a,
 432^a, 540^a, 671^a; ii. 414^b.
 Ring, ii. 393^a.
 River, ii. 393^a.
 Roads and Travel, ii. 393^b.
 Robbers of Churches, ii. 399^b.
 Robbery, ii. 400^a.
 Robe, i. 221^b.
 Rock, ii. 400^a.
 Rod, ii. 401^a.
 Roll, ii. 462^a, 701^a, 702^a.
 Roman Church, ii. 181^a; i. 604^a;
 ii. 412^b.
 Empire, ii. 401^a.
 Law in NT, ii. 404^b; i. 543^b.
 Romans, Epistle to the, ii. 408^a;
 i. 281^a; ii. 142^a.
 Rome, ii. 417^b, 175^a, 178^b, 603^a.
 Roof, i. 587^a.
 Rooms, i. 587^b.
 Rudiments, i. 328^b.
 Rufus, ii. 421^b; i. 273^b.
 Ruler, ii. 422^a.
 of the Feast, ii. 14^a.
 Sabaoth, ii. 422^a.
 Sabbath, ii. 422^b; i. 571^b, 703^b ff.;
 ii. 133^b.
 Sackcloth, ii. 424^b.
 Sacraments, ii. 425^a; i. 364^a.
 Sacramentum, ii. 50^b, 425^a.
 Sacrifice, ii. 431^b; i. 119^a, 235^a.
 Sacrilege, ii. 399^b [Robbers of Churches].
 Sadducees, ii. 438^a, 289^a.
 Sails, Sailors, ii. 475^a.
 Saint, ii. 440^b; i. 569^a.
 Salamis, ii. 441^b.
 Salem, i. 634^a [Jerusalem]; ii.
 27^a.
 Salmone, ii. 441^b.
 Salt, ii. 442^a.
 Salutations, ii. 442^b.
 Salvation, ii. 444^a; i. 180^b, 701^b f.; ii. 262^b, 266^a.
 Samaria, ii. 447^a.
 Samos, ii. 448^b.
 Samothrace, ii. 448^b.
 Samson, ii. 449^a.
 Samuel, ii. 449^a.
 Sanctification, ii. 449^a; i. 510^a,
 569^b; ii. 355^a.
 Sanctuary, ii. 453^b.
 Sandal, ii. 476^b.
 Sanhedrin, ii. 454^a.
 Sapphira, i. 54^b.
 Sapphire, ii. 457^b.
 Sarah, ii. 457^b.
 Sardis, ii. 457^b.
 Sardius, ii. 458^b.
 Sardonyx, ii. 458^b.
 Satan, i. 293^b, 287^b, 307^b; ii. 472^a.
 Saul, ii. 459^a.
 Save, ii. 444^a.
 Saviour, ii. 444^a; i. 179^b.
 Scarlet, i. 231^b.
 Sceva, i. 384^b.
 Schism, i. 560^b.
 School, i. 321^a; ii. 626^a.
 Schoolmaster, ii. 459^a.
 Science, ii. 459^b.
 Scorpion, ii. 459^b.
 Scourging, ii. 460^a.
 Scribe, ii. 460^b.
 Scripture, ii. 460^b; i. 577^b.
 Scroll, ii. 462^a.
 Scythian, ii. 462^a.
 Sea, ii. 463^a, 398^a.
 of Glass, ii. 464^b, 464^a.
 Seal, ii. 465^b; i. 129^a.
 Season, ii. 580^a.
 Second Adam, i. 40^a, 190^a; ii.
 354^a.
 Second Advent, Second Coming,
 ii. 123^b [Parousia]; i. 354^b [Eschatology].
 Second Death, i. 681^b, 700^a.
 Sects, i. 560^b; ii. 66^a.
 Secundus, ii. 466^a.
 Security, ii. 466^a.
 Seed, ii. 466^b.
 Seleucia, ii. 466^b.
 Self-control, ii. 554^a f., 590^b.
 Self-denial, ii. 467^a; i. 385^b.
 Self-examination, ii. 468^b.
 Selfishness, i. 725^a.
 Senate, ii. 454^a.
 Sentence, ii. 469^a.
 Sepulchre, ii. 469^a.
 Sergius Paulus, ii. 471^a; i. 277^a.
 Serjeants, ii. 471^b.
 Serpent, ii. 472^a.
 Servant, ii. 38^a, 509^a.
 Seven, ii. 93^b, 95^a, 96^b.
 Seven, The, i. 210^a, 285^a, 640^a.
 Seven Heavens, i. 101^a.
 Sewing, ii. 606^b.
 Shadow, ii. 472^b.
 Shambles, i. 94^a.
 Shame, ii. 473^a.
 Sharon, ii. 473^b.
 Shaving, i. 520^b; ii. 80^a [Nazirite].
 Shechem, ii. 473^b.
 Sheol, i. 289^a, 340^b.
 Shepherd, ii. 474^a, 135^b.
 of Hermas, i. 561^a.
 Shewbread, ii. 474^b.
 Shield, i. 92^b.
 Ship, ii. 474^b, 602^b.
 Shoe, ii. 476^b.
 Sibylline Oracles, ii. 477^a; i. 72^b.
 Sicarii, i. 103^b, 639^a; ii. 48^a.
 Sickle, ii. 490^b.
 Sickness, ii. 491^a.
 Sidon, ii. 491^b.
 Sign, ii. 492^a, 39^b.
 Sign of the Cross, i. 132^a.
 Silas, ii. 492^a; i. 19^b; ii. 205^b f.
 Silk, ii. 493^a.
 Silvanus, ii. 492^a.
 Silver, ii. 493^a.
 Simeon, ii. 191^a.
 Simeon called Niger, ii. 541^a.
 Simon (the Tanner), ii. 493^b.
 of Cyrene, i. 273^b.
 Magus, ii. 493^b; i. 456^a; ii.
 199^a.
 Peter, ii. 191^a.
 Simplicity, ii. 493^b.
 Sin, ii. 493^b; i. 192^b, 340^b, 348^a, 358^a, 372^a, 397^a, 421^a, 469^b;
 ii. 4^a, 151^b, 385^b, 452^b, 631^a.
 Sinal, ii. 503^b, 46^a.
 Singing, ii. 256^b.
 Sirach, ii. 503^b.
 Sister, i. 399^b f.
 Six, ii. 94^a.
 Skins, ii. 608^a.
 Slander, i. 381^a [Evil-speaking].
 Slave, Slavery, ii. 509^a; i. 398^b;
 ii. 10^a, 213^b, 585^a, 604^b.
 Sleep, ii. 512^b.
 Smoke, ii. 513^a.
 Smyrna, ii. 513^b.
 Soberness, Sobriety, ii. 514^a.
 Sodom and Gomorrah, ii. 517^b.
 Soldier, i. 92^b, 93^a.
 Solomon, ii. 517^b.
 Solomon's Porch, i. 637^b; ii.
 248^a, 556^b.

- Son of God, i. 180^a, 189^a, 198^a, 462^a, 536^b; ii. 113^a, 350^a.
 Sons of God, i. 174^b.
 Son of Man, ii. 518^a; i. 179^b, 198^a.
 Soothsaying, ii. 518^b.
 Sopater, ii. 519^a.
 Sorcery, ii. 519^a.
 Sorrow, ii. 316^a; i. 516^b.
 Sosipater, ii. 520^a.
 Sosthenes, ii. 520^b; i. 440^a.
 Soul, ii. 521^a.
 Spain, ii. 521^b.
 Spearman, i. 93^b.
 Spice, i. 54^a.
 Spinning, i. 94^b.
 Spirit, Spiritual, ii. 522^a.
 Spirit, Holy, i. 573^a, 218^b, 348^a, 432^b, 465^a, 614^b; ii. 121^a, 162^b, 188^a.
 Spirits in Prison, ii. 522^b; i. 289^b f.; ii. 206^b.
 Spiritual Gifts.—See Gifts of the Spirit.
 Spiritual Songs, ii. 524^a; i. 590^a.
 Sponsors, i. 132^a.
 Stachys, ii. 524^a.
 Staff, ii. 524^a.
 Star, ii. 524^a.
 Stealing, ii. 524^b.
 Stephanas, ii. 525^a.
 Stephen, ii. 525^a; i. 243^b, 280^a, 638^a; ii. 18^a, 174^a, 529^a, 557^a.
 Steward, ii. 526^a.
 Stigmata, ii. 10^a.
 Stilus, ii. 700^b.
 Stocks, ii. 526^b.
 Stoics, ii. 526^b; i. 244^a.
 Stone-work, i. 95^a.
 Stoning, ii. 528^b.
 Stranger, ii. 530^a.
 Strangled, ii. 532^a.
 Street, ii. 532^a.
 Strife, ii. 532^b.
 Stripes, i. 145^a [Beating]; ii. 460^a.
 Stumbling-block, ii. 106^b.
 Subordination, i. 465^b.
 Substance, ii. 533^a.
 Suffering, ii. 533^b.
 Suggestion, ii. 252^b.
 Sun, ii. 534^b.
 Sunday, i. 710^a.
 Superstitious, ii. 535^a, 315^a.
 Supper, ii. 535^b.
 Surname, ii. 536^a.
 Swastika, i. 266^a.
 Swearing, ii. 97^a.
 Sword, i. 92^b.
 Sychem, ii. 473^b [Shechem].
 Symbols, ii. 429^a, 436^b, 464^b.
 Symeon, ii. 191^a.
 Symeon called Niger, ii. 541^a.
 Synagogue, ii. 541^b; i. 104^a, 211^a.
 Syntyche, ii. 545^b; i. 378^a, 398^b; ii. 218^a.
 Synzygus, ii. 545^b; i. 378^a; ii. 217^b, 218^a.
 Syracuse, ii. 546^a.
 Syria, ii. 546^b.
 Syrtis, ii. 547^a.
 Tabernacle, ii. 547^a.
 Tabitha, i. 311^b.
 Table, ii. 548^a; i. 588^b.
 Tablets, Writing, ii. 700^b.
 Tabu, ii. 70^a.
 Talent, ii. 548^b.
 Tanner, ii. 493^b.
 Tanning, i. 94^b; ii. 608^a.
 Tarsus, ii. 548^b.
 Tartarus, i. 544^b.
 Tattlers, ii. 549^b.
 Taverns, ii. 576^b.
 Teacher, ii. 550^a; i. 322^b.
 Teaching, ii. 550^a, 258^b.
 Temperance, ii. 553^a.
 Temple, ii. 556^b; i. 637^b.
 Temple-keeper, i. 296^a.
 Temptation, ii. 558^a.
 Ten, ii. 94^a.
 Tent, Tent-making, ii. 559^a.
 Tertius, ii. 559^b.
 Tertullus, ii. 559^b; i. 693^b.
 Testament, i. 261^a.
 Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, ii. 560^a.
 Testimony, ii. 17^a [Martyr], 613^b [Trial-at-Law].
 Tetrarch, ii. 567^a.
 Thanksgiving, ii. 567^b.
 Theatre, ii. 568^a.
 Theft, ii. 524^b.
 Theophilus, ii. 568^a.
 Theosophy, i. 680^a.
 Thessalonians, Epistles to the, ii. 569^a; i. 280^b; ii. 141^a.
 Thessalonica, ii. 574^a.
 Theudas, ii. 575^a; i. 440^b.
 Thigh, ii. 576^a.
 Thistles, ii. 576^a.
 Thomas, Acts of, i. 37^a.
 Gospel of, i. 485^b.
 Thongs, ii. 576^a.
 Thorn in the Flesh, i. 173^b, 295^a; ii. 155^a, 576^b.
 Thorns, ii. 576^a.
 Thousand Years, i. 78^b, 359^b; ii. 88^a, 326^b.
 Three, ii. 93^a, 95^b.
 Three and a Half, ii. 93^b, 96^a.
 Three Taverns, ii. 576^b.
 Throne, ii. 576^b.
 Thunder, ii. 577^a.
 Thyatira, ii. 577^a.
 Thyine Wood, ii. 578^a.
 Tiberius, ii. 578^b.
 Time, ii. 580^a.
 Timon, ii. 582^b.
 Timotheus, ii. 582^b.
 Timothy, ii. 582^b; i. 19^b; ii. 117^b.
 Timothy and Titus, Epistles to, ii. 583^b; i. 281^b; ii. 143^b.
 Tithes, ii. 594^a.
 Titles, ii. 66^a.
 Titus, ii. 595^b; i. 212^a.
 (Emperor), ii. 596^a.
 Justus, ii. 597^a; i. 249^b.
 Titus, Epistle to, ii. 583^b.
 Token, ii. 597^b.
 Tomb, ii. 469^a.
 Tongue, ii. 598^a.
 Tongues, Gift of, ii. 598^b, and see Glossolalia.
 Topaz, ii. 599^b.
 Torment, ii. 599^b.
 Town-clerk, ii. 600^a.
 Trade and Commerce, ii. 600^b; i. 163^b, 322^a.
 Trade-gilds, i. 404^a, 418^a, 642^b.
 Tradition, ii. 609^b.
 Trajan, ii. 610^b, 179^b.
 Trance, ii. 611^a.
 Transfiguration, ii. 611^b.
 Translation, ii. 612^a.
 Travel, ii. 393^b, 602^b.
 Treasure, Treasurer, Treasury, ii. 612^a.
 Tree, ii. 612^b.
 of Life, ii. 612^b.
 Trial, ii. 558^a, 533^b [Suffering], 613^b [Trial-at-Law].
 Trial-at-Law, ii. 613^b.
 Tribes, ii. 617^b.
 Tribulation, ii. 618^b.
 Tribute, ii. 619^a.
 Trinity, i. 100^a, 460^a.
 Triumph, ii. 619^b.
 Troas, ii. 620^a.
 Trogyllium, ii. 620^b.
 Trophimus, ii. 620^b.
 Trump, Trumpet, ii. 621^a.
 Truth, ii. 621^b.
 Tryphæna, ii. 622^b.
 Tryphosa, ii. 622^b.
 Tunic, i. 223^a.
 Tutor, ii. 623^a; i. 399^a.
 Twelve, ii. 93^b.
 Twin Brothers, i. 302^b.
 Two, ii. 95^a.
 Tychicus, ii. 623^a.
 Type, ii. 623^a.
 Tyrannus, ii. 626^a.
 Tyre, ii. 626^b.
 Unbelief, ii. 627^a.
 Uncircumcision, i. 211^b [Circumcision].
 Unclean, i. 215^a.
 Unconruptness, ii. 628^b.
 Unction, i. 65^b [Anointing].
 Undergirding, ii. 475^b.
 Ungodliness, ii. 629^a.
 Union with God, ii. 629^b.

Unity, ii. 632^a; i. 466^a. Universalism, i. 354^b [Eschatology]; ii. 321^b. Unknown God, ii. 633^b. Unleavened Bread, ii. 131^b. Unrighteousness, ii. 634^a. Upper Room, i. 588^a. Urbanus, ii. 634^b. Urim and Thummim, i. 711^b. Utensils, ii. 608^b. Utterance, ii. 635^a. Vainglory of Life, ii. 696^a. Vanity, ii. 635^a. Vegetables, ii. 605^b. Veil, ii. 635^a. (=Head-dress), i. 221^b, 527^b. Vengeance, ii. 635^b. Vespasian, ii. 636^a. Vessel, ii. 639^a. Vesture, i. 221^a [Clothes]. Vial, i. 159^b. Vine, ii. 639^b. Viper, ii. 640^a. Virgin, Virginitv, ii. 640^a. Virtue, ii. 642^a; i. 371^a. Vision, ii. 643^a. Vitellius, ii. 643^b; i. 638^b. Voice, ii. 643^b. Vote, ii. 644^b. Vow, ii. 644^b.	Voyage, ii. 398^a, 146^a ff. Vulture, i. 315^a. Waiting, ii. 645^a. Walk, i. 246^a. Wall, ii. 645^b. Wandering Stars, ii. 646^a. War, ii. 646^b. Washing, i. 685^a. Watching, ii. 673^a. Water, ii. 673^b. Way, ii. 674^a. Wealth, ii. 674^b. Weaving, i. 94^b. Week, ii. 581^b. Wheat, ii. 675^a. White, i. 231^a. Whore, Whoremonger, i. 523^a. Wicked, ii. 675^a. Widows, ii. 676^a; i. 46^a; ii. 14^b, 584^b. Wife, i. 398^a; ii. 11^a [Marriage], 639^a. Spiritual, ii. 641^b. Wild Beasts, ii. 604^b. Wilderness, i. 292^a. Will, ii. 677^b. (=Testament), ii. 681^a; i. 261^a. Window, ii. 681^b; i. 587^a. Wine, i. 8^a, 314^a, 373^b [Eucharist]; ii. 556^a, 605^b.	Wing, ii. 681^b. Wisdom, ii. 682^a. of Solomon, ii. 685^a. Witchcraft, i. 306^b [Divination]. Witness, ii. 689^a, 17^a. Woe, ii. 689^b. Woman, ii. 689^b; i. 258^a; ii. 216^b. Wonder, ii. 39^b, 492^a. Wool, ii. 692^a, 606^a. Word, ii. 692^a. Work, ii. 693^a, 39^b. World, ii. 693^a. World-flight, i. 8^b. Worldliness, ii. 695^a. Wormwood, ii. 697^a, 524^b. Worship, ii. 697^a; i. 86^a, 599^b; ii. 315^a, 428^a. Wrath, i. 62^b. Writing, ii. 699^b. Year, ii. 581^a. Yokefellow, ii. 545^b. Young Men, ii. 704^a. Zeal, ii. 705^a. Zealots, i. 657^b. Zenas, ii. 706^a. Zeus, i. 665^b. Zion, ii. 706^b, 46^b.
--	---	--

II. INDEX OF GREEK TERMS

ἀγαθός, i. 468^b, 470^a. ἀγαθότης, i. 471^b. ἀγαθωσύνη, i. 471^{a,b}, 674^a. ἀγαλλίασις, ἀγαλλιᾶν, i. 654^a. ἀγαπᾶν, i. 713^b. ἀγάπη, i. 147^a, 161^a, 285^b, 604^b, 714^a. ἀγαπητός, i. 146^b. ἄγγελος, i. 57^b, 62^a; ii. 524^b. ἀγέννητος, ii. 113^b. ἀγέννητος, ii. 113^b. ἄγια, ii. 453^b. ἀγιασμός, i. 567^b; ii. 449^a, 451^b. ἄγιον, ii. 453^b. ἅγιος, i. 566^b; ii. 440^b, 449^a. ἀγιότης, i. 567^b. ἀγνεία, ii. 12^b. ἀγνισμός, ii. 291^a. ἀγνός, i. 570^b; ii. 12^b. ἀγών, i. 441^a. ἀγωνίζεσθαι, i. 441^a. ἀδελφή, ii. 232^b. ἀδελφός, i. 159^b, 424^a.	ἀδίκημα, i. 695^b. ἀδικία, ii. 634^a. ἀδόκιμος, i. 170^b; ii. 318^b. ἄδολος, ii. 498^b. ἄζυμα, ii. 131^b. ἄθεσμος, ii. 675^b. ἀθλέω, i. 441^a. ἀτίδιος, i. 369^b. αἰδώς, ii. 473^b. αἷμα βαντισμοῦ, ii. 673^b. αἵρεσις, i. 560^b. αἰσχροκερδής, i. 263^a. αἰσχύνη, ii. 473^a. αἵτημα, ii. 257^b. αἰών, i. 44^b, 264^b n., 369^b; ii. 580^b. αἰὼν οὐτος, ii. 693^b. αἰῶνες, i. 44^b. αἰώνιος, i. 369^b, 409^b. ἀκαθαρσία, i. 684^b. ἀκάθαρτος, i. 215^a, 684^b. ἄκακος, ii. 498^b. ἀκέραιος, ii. 498^b. ἀκρατής, i. 695^a.	ἀκριβώς, ii. 165^b. ἀλαζονεία, i. 154^b; ii. 268^b. ἀλαζων, i. 154^b. ἀλλοσγημα, ii. 242^a. ἄλωσις, i. 173^a. ἀνάβασις, i. 95^b. ἀναγκάζειν, i. 244^a. ἀναγκαστῶς, i. 244^a. ἀνάκειμαι, i. 588^b. ἀνάληψις, i. 95^b. ἀναλογία, ii. 284^a. ἀνάπαυσις, ii. 320^b. ἀναστρέφεσθαι, ἀνατροφή, i. 246^a. ἀνεσις, ii. 320^b. ἀνόητος, i. 413^a. ἀνομος, ii. 675^b. ἀνοχή, i. 705^a. ἀντίδικος, i. 44^a. ἀντικείμενος, i. 44^a. ἀντιλέγω, i. 66^b, 381^b. ἀντιλυτρον, ii. 298^a, 303^a. ἀντιμισθία, ii. 368^a. ἀντίτυπα, ii. 138^a.
---	--	--

ἀντίτυπος, ii. 623^b. ἀνώγειν, i. 588^a.
 ἀπάθεια, i. 244^b.
 ἀπαρχή, i. 190^a, 411^a; ii. 134^a. ἀπειθεια, ii. 628^a.
 ἀπέχω, i. 283^a.
 ἀπιστία, ii. 628^a.
 ἀπλότης, ii. 498^b. ἀποβάλλειν, ii. 314^b.
 ἀποδιδωμι, i. 285^a; ii. 368^a. ἀποδοκιμάζω, i. 260^b; ii. 314^b. ἀποθήκη, i. 588^a. ἀποκάλυψις, i. 71^b f., 612^a. ἀποκαταδοκία, ii. 645^a. ἀποκατάστασις, ii. 321^a. ἀπὸλλυμι, i. 293^a.
 ἀπολογία, i. 66^b.
 ἀπολύτρωσις, ii. 303^a, 308^a. ἀποστασία, i. 82^b. ἀποστολός, i. 52^b. ἀπρόσκοπος, ii. 107^a.
 ἀπωθεῖσθαι, ii. 314^b. ἀπώλεια, i. 2^a, 293^a; ii. 165^a. ἀργύριον, ii. 493^a.
 ἀρετή, ii. 642^a.
 ἀρπαγμός, i. 194^a. ἀρσενοκοίτη, i. 11^b.
 ἀρτιος, ii. 165^b.
 ἀρχή, i. 125^b f.; ii. 2^a, 273^a, 274^b.
 ἀρχηγός, i. 125^b; ii. 272^b.
 ἀρχων, ii. 2^a, 272^b.
 ἀσέβεια, ἀσεβής, i. 467^a; ii. 629^a. ἀσέλγεια, i. 684^a.
 Ἀσιάρχης, i. 102^b.
 ἀσκεῖν, i. 8^b.
 ἀσκησις, i. 9^a.
 ἀσοφος, i. 413^a. ἀστέρες πλανῆται, ii. 646^a. ἀστοργος, ii. 77^b.
 αὐλή, i. 587^b. αὐλητής, ii. 39^a.
 αὐξάνω, αὐξήσις, i. 517^b. αὐτάρκεια, αὐτάρκης, i. 245^a. αὐχεῖν, i. 154^b. ἀφesis, i. 415^a.
 ἀφθαρσία, ii. 326^a, 628^b. ἀφθαρτος στέφανος, ii. 276^b. ἀφίγημι, i. 414^b.
 ἀφορίζω, i. 381^b.
 ἀφρων, i. 413^a.
 ἀφυστερῶ, i. 285^a.
 βαπτίζω, i. 128^b, 129^a. βάπτισμα, βαπτισμός, i. 129^a. βαπτιστής, i. 129^b. βασιλεία, i. 675^a.
 βασιλεύς, ii. 66^b.
 βαστάζω, ii. 10^b.
 βεβαίω, βεβαίωσις, i. 239^b. βέβηλος, i. 354^a; ii. 278^a.
 βήμα, i. 664^b. βιβλιον, ii. 462^a, 701^b, 703^a.
 βίος, i. 698^b. βλασφημεῖν, βλασφημία, βλάσφημος, i. 151^b, 381^a.

βούλομαι, ii. 678^b. βραβεῖον, i. 441^b; ii. 276^a.
 βωμός, i. 51^b.
 γενεά, i. 46^a, 444^b. γένεσις, ii. 34^a.
 γεννητός, ii. 113^b.
 γένος, ii. 76^b.
 γυνῶσις, i. 413^b, 444^a, 453^a ff.; ii. 459^b. γογγύζειν, γογγυσμός, ii. 48^a. γράμμα, ii. 461^a.
 γραμματεὺς, i. 693^b. γράφειν τὰ αὐτά, ii. 221^a.
 γραφή, ii. 460^b f. γρηγορέω, ii. 673^a. δαιμονίζεσθαι, ii. 249^a, 515^b.
 δαιμόνιον, i. 287^b.
 δαίμων, i. 287^b; ii. 249^a. δέσις, ii. 257^b.
 δειλία, i. 403^b. δεισιδαιμονέστερος, ii. 535^a. δεισιδαιμονία, i. 287^b; ii. 315^a. δεισιδαίμων, i. 287^b; ii. 315^a, 535^a. δέρω, i. 145^b.
 δεσμά, δεσμοί, i. 173^a. δεσμωτήριον, ii. 275^a. δεσπότης, i. 705^b; ii. 19^b.
 δῆμος, ii. 164^b n.
 δηνάριον, ii. 160^b.
 διαβεβαιούσθαι, i. 239^a. διάβολος, i. 287^b, 293^a, 381^a. διάδγμα, i. 269^a.
 διαθήκη, i. 261^a f., 285^b. διακονεῖν, i. 284^b; ii. 38^a, 39^a. διακονία, i. 41^a, 224^a, 284^b; ii. 38^a, 39^a. διάκονος, i. 284^b; ii. 38^a, 232^b. διαταγή, ii. 114^a. διδάσκαλος, ii. 459^a.
 διέρχομαι, i. 272^b.
 διθάλασσος, ii. 28^b.
 δικαιοπράγμα, ii. 375^b.
 δίκαιος, i. 182^a, 470^b, 568^b; ii. 370^b, 375^b. δικαιοσύνη, i. 665^b; ii. 371^a, 375^b. δικαίωμα, ii. 114^a, 375^b. δικαίωσις, ii. 375^b. διόρθωσις, ii. 310^a.
 δόγμα, i. 233^b; ii. 114^a.
 δοκιμάζω, i. 660^b; ii. 468^b. δοκῶντες, ii. 319^b.
 δόμα, i. 449^b.
 δόξα, i. 451^b, 583^a.
 δόσις, i. 449^b.
 δουλεία, i. 157^b.
 δουλεύειν, ii. 38^a.
 δοῦλος, i. 193^a, 194^a, 416^a; ii. 10^b, 38^a. δράκων, i. 293^b.
 δρᾶν, ii. 685^b.
 δυνάμενος, ii. 255^a. δύναμις, i. 126^a; ii. 39^b, 254^b, 255^a, 273^a. δυνατὸν, ii. 255^a.

δυσφημία, i. 381^b.
 δῶμα, i. 587^a.
 δωρεά, δῶρημα, δῶρον, i. 449^b.
 ἐγγαστρίμυθοι, ii. 215^b, 292^b. ἐγγυος, i. 285^b.
 ἐγκαίνια, i. 243^a.
 ἐγκαινίζω, i. 242^b.
 ἐγκεντρίζω, i. 513^a. ἐγκράτεια, ii. 553^a. ἐθνάρχης, i. 373^a.
 ἔθνη, i. 445^a, 529^b.
 ἐθνικοί, i. 529^b.
 ἔθνος, ii. 76^b.
 ἔθος, i. 271^a. εἰδωλόθυτα, i. 258^a. εἰδικρινεα, εἰδικρινής, i. 570^b. εἰρήνη, ii. 159^a.
 ἐκδύσασθαι, ii. 126^b.
 ἐκκλησία, i. 104^a, 204^b, 239^b. ἐκλεκτοί, i. 167^b, 326^a. ἐκνήφω, ii. 514^a. ἐκστασις, ii. 299^a, 611^a. ἐλεεῖν, ii. 240^a.
 ἔλεος, ii. 29^b, 241^a.
 Ἑλληγες, i. 514^b.
 Ἑλληνισταί, i. 514^b.
 ἐλλογέω, i. 285^a.
 ἐμβατεύω, ii. 24^b.
 ἐνδειγμα, ii. 597^b. ἐνδειξις, ii. 598^a.
 ἐνδυναμώω, i. 517^b.
 ἐντευξις, i. 618^a; ii. 257^b.
 ἐντολαί, i. 233^b.
 ἐντρέπειν, ἐντροπή, ii. 473^b. ἐξισταμαι, ii. 299^a. ἐξορκίζω, ἐξορκισμός, i. 384^a. ἐξουθενέω, i. 260^b.
 ἐξουσία, i. 125^b; ii. 2^a, 254^b, 255^a, 273^a, 370^b.
 ἐπαγγελία, ἐπάγγελμα, ii. 279^a. ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι, ii. 278^b, 279^a. ἐπενδύσασθαι, ii. 126^b. ἐπιβουλή, i. 243^a.
 ἐπιθυμείν, ἐπιθυμία, i. 723^a; ii. 678^b. ἐπιλήψις, ii. 249^a. ἐπιποθεῖν, i. 723^a; ii. 679^a. ἐπισκοπος, i. 150^b, 219^a. ἐπίτροπος, i. 399^a, 507^a; ii. 277^a, 526^a. ἐπουράνια, i. 46^b.
 ἐρᾶν, i. 713^b.
 ἔργον, ii. 39^b, 693^a.
 ἐρημία, ἐρημος, i. 292^b.
 ἐριθεία, i. 388^b.
 ἔρις, i. 388^b.
 ἐρμηνεία, i. 619^b.
 ἐτοιμασία, ii. 266^b.
 εὐαγγελίζειν, ii. 258^b. εὐαγγελιζέσθαι, i. 379^a.
 εὐαγγελιον, i. 379^a, 471^b. εὐγενής, ii. 92^a. εὐεργούμενοι, ii. 253^a. εὐθυμείν, εὐθυμος, εὐθύμως, i. 654^a.
 εὐθύς, ii. 370^b.

εὐλάβεια, i. 403^b. εὐλογέομαι, i. 152^a.
 εὐσέβεια, i. 467^a; ii. 590^a. εὐσπλαγχνος, ii. 240^a. εὐσχημόνως, i. 582^b.
 εὐτραπέλεια, i. 640^b. εὐφραίνειν, i. 654^a. εὐφροσύνη, i. 654^a.
 εὐχή, ii. 257^b, 644^b.
 ζῆλος, i. 341^a, 633^b; ii. 705^a. ζηλωτής, ii. 705^a.
 ζωή, i. 698^b.
 ἡγεμῶν, i. 506^b.
 ἡδονή, i. 724^a.
 ἡλικία, i. 46^a.
 θάνατος, i. 293^a, 699^b.
 θανατοῦν, ii. 43^b.
 θαρρεῖν, θάρσος, i. 156^b, 239^a. θεατριζέσθαι, i. 442^a. θέατρον, i. 442^a.
 θεῖον, i. 160^a n.
 θέλω, ii. 678^b.
 θεμέλιος, i. 418^b.
 θεός, ii. 67^a.
 θεραπεία, θεραπεύειν, θέρᾳπων, ii. 38^a. θερίζω, i. 525^b.
 θησαυρός, ii. 612^a.
 θλίψις, ii. 618^b.
 θράσος, θρασύτης, i. 156^b. θρησκεία, i. 416^b; ii. 315^a. θυματήριον, i. 172^a. θυσιαστήριον, i. 51^b. ἱερεὺς, ii. 269^a. ἱερόδουλοι, i. 249^a; ii. 10^a.
 ἱερός, i. 566^b.
 ἱερόσυλοι, ii. 399^b.
 ἱκετηρία, ii. 257^b. ἰλάσκεσθαι, ii. 281^b, 283^b. ἰλασμός, ii. 281^b, 283^a. ἰλαστήριον, ii. 23^b, 29^b, 281^b, 282^b, 388^b. ἰμάτιον, i. 221^b.
 Ἰουδαϊσμός, ii. 315^a.
 ἴρις, ii. 298^a.
 ἰσχυς, ii. 255^a. καθαρισμός, ii. 291^a.
 καθάρως, i. 215^a, 570^b. καιρός, ii. 580^a.
 κακία, ii. 2^b f.
 κακότης, ii. 3^a.
 κακολογείν, i. 381^b.
 κακός, i. 695^a; ii. 675^b.
 κάλαμος, ii. 309^b, 702^a.
 καλεῖν, i. 167^b f.
 καλός, i. 468^b, 582^b.
 καταβολή, i. 418^b.
 κατὰδεσις, ii. 69^a. καταλαλεῖν, καταλαλιά, κατάλαλοι, i. 381^a.

κατάλυμα, i. 588^a. καταρτίζειν, ii. 165^b, 322^a. κατὰτομή, i. 212^b.
 καταχράσθαι, i. 11^a.
 καυχασθαι, καύχημα, καύχησις, i. 154^a, 654^a; ii. 269^a. κένωσις, ii. 226^a f.
 κῆνος, i. 164^a.
 κηρύσσειν, ii. 258^b.
 κιθάρα, i. 524^b; ii. 256^b. καθαρίζειν, καθαρώδης, i. 524^b. κινύρα, i. 525^a. κληρονομέω, κληρονομία, κληρονόμος, κλῆρος, i. 543^a, 712^a. κλῆσις, i. 168^a.
 κλητοί, i. 167^b f., 326^b. κλινάριον, i. 145^b, 588^a. κλίνη, i. 145^b, 588^a. κλινίδιον, i. 588^a.
 κοῦρός, i. 215^a.
 κοινωνία, i. 161^b f., 184^a, 224^a, 225^b, 234^b, 245^b f.
 κοίτη, i. 145^b.
 κοιτών, i. 587^b.
 κόλασις, ii. 290^b.
 κολαφίζω, i. 162^b.
 κολοβοδάκτυλος, ii. 8^b.
 κοπετόν, ii. 47^a.
 Κορινθιάζεσθαι, i. 249^a.
 κόσμος, i. 264^b n.; ii. 693^b. κράβατος, i. 145^b, 588^a. κράτιστος, ii. 92^a.
 κράτος, i. 309^a; ii. 254^b.
 κρέας, i. 411^b.
 Κρητίζειν, i. 266^a.
 κρίνω, i. 661^a.
 κριτήρια, i. 664^b.
 κρίσταλλος, i. 269^b.
 κτίσις, κτίσμα, i. 264^b n.; ii. 114^a. κυβερνήσεις, i. 506^b, 507^a. κυκεών, ii. 54^a.
 κυνάρια, i. 529^b.
 κυριακή, i. 708^a.
 κύριος, i. 178^b, 180^a, 462^b, 705^b; ii. 19^b, 66^a, 67^a. κυρίως, i. 309^b; ii. 273^a. κυρώ, i. 239^b.
 κῶμος, i. 403^b; ii. 367^b. λαμπάς, i. 683^a.
 λαός, i. 445^a; ii. 164^a. λαός θεοῦ, ii. 164^b.
 λείμμα, ii. 315^b.
 λειτουργία, i. 224^a, 449^b; ii. 38^a. λειτουργός, ii. 38^a, 271^b.
 λιβανωτός, i. 172^b.
 λίνον, i. 702^b.
 λογεία, λογία, i. 224^a. λόγιον, ii. 113^b.
 λόγος, ii. 692^a.
 λοιδορεῖν, i. 381^b. λουτρόν, i. 685^a.
 λύτρον, λυτροῖσθαι, λύτρωσις, λυτρώτης, i. 286^a; ii. 298^a, 303^a, 308^a.

λυχνία, i. 588^b, 683^a. λύχνος, i. 683^a.
 μακάριος, μακαρισμός, i. 152^a. μακροθυμεῖν, μακρόθυμος, i. 704^b. μακροθυμία, i. 704^b; ii. 136^b. μαρτυρεῖν, μαρτυρία, ii. 17^b, 689^a. μάρτυς, ii. 17^a, 689^a. ματαιότης, ii. 635^a. μεγαλειότης, ii. 2^b. μεγαλῶσυν, ii. 2^b.
 μεμβράνα, i. 701^b.
 μεμνημαί, i. 245^a.
 μεσιτεύω, i. 239^b. μεσίτης, i. 262^a.
 μεστόχοι του φραγμοῦ, ii. 646^a. μεταμελομαι, ii. 316^a. μετάνοια, μετανοεῖν, ii. 316^a. μετροπαθεῖν, ii. 240^b. μισθαποδοσία, μισθαποδότης, ii. 368^a. μισθός, i. 285^a; ii. 276^a, 368^a. μίσθωμα, i. 285^a, 588^a.
 μνημα, μνημεῖον, ii. 469^a. μοιχεία, i. 417^a; ii. 16^b.
 μονογενής, ii. 112^b f.
 μορφή, i. 193^a f., 415^b f.; ii. 226^b.
 μορφή θεοῦ, ii. 264^b. μορφώω, i. 416^a.
 μόρφωσις, i. 415^b.
 μῦθος, i. 388^a.
 μυστήριον, ii. 49^a, 425^a.
 νάβλα, i. 525^a. νεκροί, ii. 523^a.
 νεκροῦν, ii. 43^b.
 νεομενία, ii. 89^a.
 νεόφυτος, ii. 92^b.
 νεωκόρος, i. 296^a. νεώτερος, ii. 703^a.
 νηστεία, i. 402^a.
 νηφάλιος, ii. 514^b.
 νήφω, ii. 514^b, 673^a.
 νομκοί, i. 693^b.
 νομοδιδάσκαλοι, i. 693^b.
 νόμος, i. 687^b.
 νοουσία, i. 41^a, 174^a. νοουθετέω, i. 41^a.
 νοσηνία, ii. 89^a.
 νοῦς, ii. 37^a.
 ξενία, i. 588^a.
 ξένοι, ii. 531^b.
 ξύλον, ii. 526^b, 612^b. οἰκείοι, οἰκέται, οἰκέτεια, i. 399^a. οἶκημα, ii. 275^a.
 οἰκία, i. 164^b, 397^b. οἰκιακοί, i. 398^b, 399^a. οἰκοδομή, i. 162^b, 320^a b. οἰκονομεῖν, i. 399^a. οἰκονόμος, i. 399^a; ii. 526^a.
 οἶκος, i. 397^b, 581^b; ii. 33^b. οἰκουμένη, ii. 693^a.
 οἰκουργοί, οἰκουροί, i. 581^b.

οἰκτεῖρειν, ii. 240^b.
οἰκτιρμός, ii. 29^b, 240^b. ὀλεθρος, i. 293^a.
ὀλυνθος, i. 407^a.
ὀμοιοπαθής, ii. 131^b.
ὀμολωμα, i. 192^b.
ὀμολογεῖν, ὀμολογία, ii. 278^b. ὀμφαλός, ii. 702^b.
ὀνειδισμός, ii. 318^a.
ὄνομα ἄβρητον, ii. 71^a. ὄπτασις, ii. 643^a.
ὄραμα, ii. 643^a.
ὄργη, i. 293^a.
ὄργυιά, i. 402^b.
ὄρεξις, i. 724^a.
ὀρίζειν, ii. 262^a.
ὀρκίζειν, ὄρκος, i. 383^b.
ὄσιος, i. 568^b.
ὄσς, i. 316^b.
ὄφειλειν, i. 285^a. ὄφειλέτης, ὄφειλή, i. 285^b. ὄψωνια, ii. 654^a, 655^b.

παθεῖν, ii. 131^a.
πάθημα, ii. 533^b.
παθήματα, παθητός, ii. 131^a. πάθος, i. 724^a; ii. 678^b. παιδαγωγός, i. 399^a; ii. 459^a. παιδεία, παιδεύω, i. 173^b. παιδευτής, ii. 459^a. παιδονόμος, ii. 459^a. παλιγγενεσία, παλινγενεσία, i. 135^b; ii. 311^b, 321^a. πανήγυρις, i. 104^b.
πανουργία, i. 379^b. παραβιάζομαι, i. 244^a.
παραβολή, ii. 30^b.
παραγγελλαι, i. 233^b.
παραδόσεις, i. 233^b. παραινέω, i. 41^a.
παρακαλέω, i. 383^a. παρακληθῆναι, ii. 316^a. παράκλησις, i. 232^a, 383^a. παράκλητος, i. 232^a, 646^b. παραμυθία, παραμύθιον, i. 232^a. παράπτωμα, i. 394^a; ii. 106^b. παραπτῶσις, ii. 107^a. παρατίθημι, i. 234^a.
παρεμβολή, i. 170^b.
πάρεσις, i. 415^b.
παρίστημι, i. 234^a.
πάροικοι, ii. 531^b. παροξύνομαι, i. 110^a n.
παρουσία, i. 257^b, 258^a. παρρησία, i. 156^b, 239^a. παρρησιάζεσθαι, i. 156^b.
πάσχα, ii. 131^b.
πάσχα ἡμῶν, ii. 134^a.
πάσχω, ii. 533^b. πατριά, i. 397^b.
πατριάρχης, ii. 137^b.
πέλθειν, i. 107^b.
πειράζειν, ii. 468^b. πεποιθέναι, πεποιθήσις, i. 239^a. περιπατεῖν, i. 246^a.

περισσεύω, i. 4^a, 517^b. πίστις, i. 107^b. πλατεῖα, ii. 532^a.
πλεονάζω, i. 4^a, 517^b. πλεονέκτης, i. 263^a.
πλεονεξία, i. 263^a, 417^b, 684^b.
πληγή, ii. 241^b.
πληροφορεῖν, πληροφορεῖσθαι, πληροφορία, i. 107^b f.
πλήρωμα, i. 425^b.
πλησίον, ii. 82^b. πνεύμα, ii. 312^a, 522^a. πνεύματα, ii. 523^a. πνευματικός, i. 576^b; ii. 521^a, 522^a.
ποδήρης, i. 221^b.
ποιμαίνειν, ii. 135^b. ποιμήν, ii. 135^b, 474^a.
ποίημιον, i. 412^b.
πόλις, i. 581^b. πολιτεύεσθαι, πολιτεύμα, i. 246^a. πολύσπλαγχνος, ii. 240^a.
πονηρός, i. 293^b, 695^a; ii. 675^b. πορεύεσθαι, i. 246^a. πορνεία, i. 417^a f.; ii. 16^b.
πόρνη, πόρνος, i. 523^a. πράττειν, ii. 685^b. πραΰτης, ii. 27^a. πρεσβεύω, i. 52^a.
πρεσβύτερος, i. 150^b, 219^a; ii. 269^a, 705^a.
πρεσβύτες, i. 46^b; ii. 213^a n.
πρόδρομος, i. 414^b. πρόθεσις, i. 286^a.
προκόπτω, i. 517^b.
προκυρώ, i. 239^b. προορίζειν, ii. 262^a. προσαγωγή, i. 13^a. προσευχή, ii. 257^b, 285^b. προσήλυτος, ii. 284^a. πρόσκομμα, ii. 107^a. προσκοπή, ii. 107^a.
προστάτις, ii. 232^b. προσωποληψία, ii. 319^b. πρώτος, ii. 29^a. πρωτότοκος, i. 410^b.
πτῶμα, i. 154^b.
Πυθία, ii. 292^b.
Πύθων, ii. 292^b.
πύλη, πυλών, i. 443^a, 587^b.

ράβδιζω, i. 145^b; ii. 401^a. ράβδος, ii. 524^a. ῥαδιοῦρημα, i. 695^b. ῥαντισμός, i. 571^a.
ῥήμα, ii. 692^a.
ῥύεσθαι, i. 286^b.

σαββατισμός, ii. 320^b. σανδάλια, ii. 476^b.
σαργάνη, i. 144^b.
σαρκικός, σάρκινος, i. 169^b f.
σάρξ, i. 154^b, 193^a, 411^b; ii. 312^a.
Σεβαστός, i. 124^b.
σεβόμενοι, i. 110^b.

σεμνός, σεμνότης, i. 513^b, 582^b; ii. 590^b. σημεῖον, ii. 39^b, 492^a, 598^a. σιμικλίνθια, i. 87^a.
σκάνδαλον, ii. 106^b.
σκεπάσματα, i. 221^b. σκεῦος, ii. 475^a, 639^a.
σκηνή, ii. 547^a, 559^a.
σκήνος, ii. 32^b.
σκόλοψ, ii. 576^b.
σμάραγδος, i. 330^a; ii. 298^a. σουδάριον, i. 521^b.
σοφία, ii. 683^a.
σπεκουλάτωρ, ii. 665^b. σπερμολόγος, i. 110^a, 126^b. σπλάγχχνα, σπλαγχνίζειν, σπλαγχνίζεισθαι, ii. 240^b. σπυρίς, i. 144^b. σταυρός, i. 266^a.
στέγη, i. 587^a.
στενάζω, i. 517^a. στέφανος, i. 221^b, 269^a, 441^b, 442^b; ii. 276^b. στηρίζω, i. 239^b.
στοά ανατολική, ii. 248^a.
στοά βασιλική, ii. 248^a.
στοιχεῖα, i. 328^a; ii. 33^b. στρατηγός, ii. 255^a.
συμβιβάζω, i. 107^b. συμφέρεi, συμφέρον, i. 385^a.
συναγωγή, i. 104^a, 204^b, 239^b; ii. 541^b. συνειδήσις, i. 239^b.
συνείσακτοι, ii. 641^b. συνέχειν, i. 244^a.
συνέχομαι, i. 249^b.
συνίστημι, i. 234^b. συνωμοσία, i. 243^a.
σφραγίς, i. 129^a; ii. 465^b. σφυρίς, i. 144^b.
σχῆμα, i. 193^a f., 415^b. σχίσμα, i. 560^b. σώζειν, ii. 444^a.
σῶμα, i. 154^b.
σωματική γυμνασία, i. 9^a.
σωτήρ, i. 180^a; ii. 66^b, 444^a. σωτήρια, σωτήριον, σωτήριος, ii. 444^a. σωφρονέω, ii. 515^b. σωφρόνως, ii. 516^a.
σωφροσύνη, ii. 516^a, 590^b.

ταμείον (ταμειών), i. 588^a. τάφος, ii. 469^a.
τείχος, ii. 646^a.
τέλειος, i. 46^a, 333^a; ii. 166^a. τελειόω, τελειώσις, i. 242^b.
τέλος, i. 242^b, 271^b, 285^b.
τέρας, ii. 39^b.
τετελειωμένος, i. 242^b, 532^a. τήρησις, ii. 275^a.
τιμή, i. 583^a.
τιμωρία, ii. 290^b. τοῖχος, ii. 646^a.
τολμᾶν, τολμηρῶς, i. 156^b.

 τρόπος, i. 246^a. τύπος, i. 416^a; ii. 138^a, 623^a. τύπτω, i. 145^b. τυφώω, ii. 268^b. εβρις, ii. 268^b. ὕδωρ βαντισμοῦ, i. 542^b; ii. 673^b. νόσθεσία, i. 41^b. νίδς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, ii. 518^a. νίδς ὑψίστου, ii. 540^b. ὕκασις, ii. 99^b. ὑπαρξίς, ii. 533^a. ὑπεναντίος, i. 44^a. ὑπερηφανία, ii. 268^b. ὑπερφρονεῖν, ii. 516^b. ὑπερφών, i. 588^a. ἔκπρετειν, ii. 38^a. ὑπηρέτης, ii. 38^a, 107^b. ὑπόδειγμα, ii. 138^a. ὑποδήματα, ii. 476^b. ὑποκρίνεσθαι, ὑπόκρισις, i. 591^b. ὑπόλειμμα, ii. 315^b. 	 ὑπομονή, i. 705^a; ii. 136^a. ὑπόστασις, i. 107^b, 460^b; ii. 533^a. ὑποταγή, ὑποτάσσεσθαι, ii. 99^b. ὑποτύπωσις, i. 416^a; ii. 138^a. ὑπωπιδῶ, i. 162^b. φαίδολης, φαινόλης, i. 221^a; ii. 703^a. φαρμακεία, φάρμακον, φαρμακός, ii. 519^b. φάσκειν, ii. 278^b. φελόντης, φενόλης, i. 221^a; ii. 703^a. φθεῖρω, φθορά, i. 293^a. φθόρος, i. 341^a. φιδλή, i. 159^b. φιλαδελφία, i. 160^b. φιλανθρωπία, i. 716^a. φιλαργυρία, i. 263^a. φιλεῖν, i. 713^b. φλύαροι, ii. 549^b. φόρος, i. 164^a, 285^b. 	 φρσνεῖν, ii. 37^b. φυλακή, ii. 275^a, 523^a. φυσικός, ii. 77^a. χαίρειν, i. 654^a. χαλκός, ii. 248^b. χαρά, i. 654^a. χαρίζεσθαι, i. 415^b. χαρίσματα, i. 320^b, 450^a. χάρτης, χαρτίον, ii. 701^a. χειρόγραφον, i. 157^a. χειροτονεῖν, i. 599^b; ii. 114^b. χιτών, i. 221^b, 223^a. χρηματίζω, i. 41^a. χρηστός, i. 674^a, 695^a. χρηστότης, i. 674^a. χρίσμα, i. 3^b, 568^a. χριστός, i. 21^a, 178^a; ii. 66^a, 540^b. χρώς, i. 154^b. ψυχή, i. 698^b; ii. 521^a. ψυχικός, ii. 77^a, 521^a.
---	---	--

III. INDEX OF SCRIPTURE TEXTS

GENESIS.		MATTHEW—continued.		LUKE—continued.
5 ²⁴	i. 334 ^a .	17 ¹¹	ii. 321 ^a .	18 ^{7L}	ii. 650 ^b .
14 ^{17b-20}	ii. 27 ^b .	19 ²³	ii. 321 ^a .	19 ³⁹⁻⁴⁴	ii. 648 ^b .
47 ³¹	i. 625 ^a .	23 ¹⁵	ii. 285 ^a .	21 ²⁸	ii. 306 ^b .
		23 ¹⁶⁻²²	ii. 97 ^a .	22 ³⁵⁻³⁸	ii. 649 ^a .
	LEVITICUS.	24 ¹⁰⁻¹²	ii. 647 ^b .	22 ^{57L}	ii. 98 ^b .
11 ^{44L}	i. 567 ^a .	26 ⁵²⁻⁵⁴	ii. 648 ^a .	23 ⁴³	ii. 123 ^b .
	NUMBERS.	26 ⁵³⁻⁶⁵	ii. 98 ^b .	24 ²¹	ii. 307 ^a .
6 ¹⁻²¹	ii. 80 ^a .	27 ^{34L}	i. 658 ^a .		JOHN.
		28 ¹⁹	i. 134 ^a , 575 ^a ; ii. 74 ^a b.	6 ^{36L}	i. 610 ^b .
	PSALMS.		MARK.	6 ^{40. 44. 54}	i. 590 ^a .
16	i. 283 ^a .	7 ¹⁹	i. 553 ^b .	12 ³²	ii. 321 ^b .
41 ⁹	i. 658 ^a .	7 ²²	i. 684 ^b .		ACTS.
69 ²⁵	i. 658 ^a .	7 ²⁷	i. 529 ^b f.	1 ⁵	ii. 673 ^b .
109 ³	i. 658 ^a .	8 ¹²	ii. 99 ^a .	1 ¹⁶⁻²⁰	i. 657 ^b f.
	HOSEA.	10 ¹²	ii. 17 ^a .	1 ^{23L}	ii. 20 ^a .
2 ²³	i. 586 ^a .	14 ³⁶	i. 2 ^a b.	2 ⁹⁻¹¹	ii. 76 ^b .
		14 ^{61L}	ii. 98 ^b .	2 ¹⁰	ii. 285 ^a .
	MATTHEW.		LUKE	2 ²⁹	ii. 470 ^a .
3 ¹²	i. 129 ^b .	1 ⁶³	ii. 307 ^a .	4 ¹¹	i. 260 ^a .
5 ³²	ii. 16 ^a .	2 ³⁸	ii. 307 ^a .	5 ⁶	ii. 705 ^b .
5 ³³⁻³⁷	ii. 97 ^a .	3 ¹⁴	ii. 648 ^b .	6 ⁹	i. 695 ^b f.
6 ¹⁻³	i. 567 ^a .	6 ³⁷	i. 660 ^a .	7 ¹⁶	ii. 470 ^b .
7 ^{1L}	i. 660 ^a .	12 ⁵⁸	ii. 2 ^a .	7 ³³	ii. 36 ^a .
14 ¹³	i. 553 ^b .	14 ³¹⁻³²	ii. 648 ^b .	8 ²⁶	i. 443 ^b .

ACTS—continued.		ROMANS—continued.		1 CORINTHIANS—continued.
8 ²⁷	ii. 285 ^a .	7 ^{23, 25}	ii. 37 ^a .	4 ⁵	i. 701 ^b .
8 ³⁷	i. 237 ^a .	8 ¹⁻³⁰	ii. 325 ^a .	5 ^{1-5, 13}	ii. 15 ^a .
9 ²³⁻²⁵	i. 274 ^a .	8 ³	i. 192 ^b .	5 ⁵	i. 294 ^b .
10 ^{2, 22, 35}	ii. 285 ^a .	8 ⁶	ii. 37 ^a .	5 ⁶⁻⁸	ii. 133 ^b .
10 ³⁴	ii. 320 ^a .	8 ^{9f.}	i. 614 ^b .	6 ²	i. 661 ^a .
11 ²⁰	i. 272 ^b .	8 ¹⁰	ii. 372 ^b .	6 ⁹	i. 11 ^b .
12 ⁸	i. 146 ^a .	8 ^{14f.}	i. 614 ^b .	6 ⁹⁻¹¹	ii. 449 ^b .
13 ¹⁻³	ii. 117 ^a .	8 ¹⁵	i. 2 ^a .	7 ¹⁴	i. 569 ^b .
13 ⁵	ii. 38 ^b .	8 ¹⁸⁻²⁵	i. 380 ^b .	7 ²⁰⁻²⁴	ii. 511 ^a .
13 ²⁹	ii. 470 ^b .	8 ¹⁹	ii. 645 ^a .	7 ²⁵⁻³⁸	ii. 641 ^a .
13 ⁴³	ii. 285 ^a .	8 ²¹	i. 158 ^a .	7 ³¹	i. 11 ^a .
14 ²³	ii. 115 ^b , 116 ^b .	8 ²³	ii. 306 ^b .	7 ³⁴	i. 569 ^b .
15 ¹⁸⁻²¹	ii. 45 ^a .	8 ²³⁻²⁵	ii. 645 ^a .	9 ¹⁶	i. 244 ^a .
15 ²⁰	i. 417 ^b .	8 ²⁹	i. 411 ^a .	9 ¹⁸	i. 11 ^b .
16 ⁶	i. 434 ^b f.	8 ³⁸	ii. 32 ^b .	9 ²⁴⁻²⁷	i. 7 ^b ; ii. 276 ^b .
16 ¹²	ii. 1 ^b .	8 ^{38, 39}	ii. 274 ^b .	9 ²⁷	ii. 318 ^b .
16 ¹⁴	ii. 285 ^a .	9-11	i. 380 ^b .	10	i. 374 ^b f.
17 ^{4, 17}	ii. 285 ^a .	9 ⁴	i. 262 ^b .	10 ⁴	ii. 33 ^a , 400 ^b .
17 ⁵	i. 695 ^a .	9 ⁵	i. 312 ^b .	10 ⁹	ii. 472 ^a .
17 ²³	ii. 633 ^b .	9 ¹⁰⁻¹³	i. 354 ^a .	11 ^{4ff.}	i. 221 ^b .
17 ³¹	ii. 324 ^b .	9 ¹¹	i. 624 ^a .	11 ^{9f.}	i. 39 ^b .
18 ⁷	ii. 285 ^a .	9 ¹³	i. 527 ^a .	11 ¹⁸⁻³⁴	i. 717 ^b f.
18 ¹⁴	i. 695 ^b .	9 ²¹⁻²³	ii. 319 ^a .	11 ^{20, 21}	ii. 535 ^b .
18 ¹⁸	ii. 81 ^b .	9 ^{25f.}	i. 586 ^a .	11 ^{28, 29}	ii. 468 ^b .
18 ²³	i. 435 ^a .	9 ²⁷	ii. 315 ^b .	12 ³	i. 237 ^a .
20 ^{6f.}	ii. 132 ^b .	9 ³³	ii. 400 ^b .	12 ⁴⁻¹¹	i. 616 ^b .
20 ²⁸	ii. 116 ^b .	10 ⁹	i. 237 ^a .	12 ²⁸	i. 450 ^b , ii. 459 ^a .
21 ²³⁻²⁶	ii. 82 ^a .	10 ¹⁰	i. 390 ^b .	13 ¹	i. 271 ^b .
23 ^{13ff.}	i. 243 ^a .	11 ⁵	ii. 315 ^b .	14 ¹⁻¹⁹	ii. 644 ^a .
24 ⁵	ii. 78 ^b .	11 ¹⁶	i. 411 ^a , 569 ^b .	14 ⁷	i. 524 ^b .
24 ²⁵	ii. 374 ^a .	11 ¹⁷⁻²⁴	i. 513 ^{a, b} .	14 ¹¹	i. 137 ^a .
27 ^{8ff.}	i. 401 ^b .	11 ³²	ii. 321 ^b .	14 ^{14, 15, 19}	ii. 37 ^a .
27 ²⁹	ii. 400 ^b .	11 ³⁶	i. 312 ^a .	15	ii. 324 ^b .
28 ^{2ff.}	i. 137 ^a .	12 ¹⁻⁸	ii. 516 ^b .	15 ²⁰	i. 411 ^b .
		13 ³	i. 285 ^b .	15 ^{21ff.}	i. 395 ^a .
		14 ⁴	i. 660 ^b .	15 ²²	ii. 321 ^b .
		14 ^{5f.}	i. 572 ^{a, b} .	15 ²³	i. 411 ^b .
		14 ¹³	i. 661 ^a .	15 ^{23f.}	ii. 651 ^b .
		14 ²²	i. 660 ^b .	15 ²⁹	i. 128 ^b .
		15 ³	ii. 318 ^a .	15 ³⁷	ii. 675 ^a .
		15 ¹⁰	ii. 318 ^a .	15 ⁵⁴	ii. 33 ^a .
		15 ²⁰	i. 418 ^b .
		16	ii. 76 ^a .
		16 ⁵	i. 411 ^b .
		16 ¹⁵	i. 400 ^b .
		16 ²⁷	i. 312 ^a .

2 CORINTHIANS—continued.

5¹⁴⁻²¹ ii. 302^a.
 5²¹ ii. 387^b.
 6⁷⁻¹⁴ ii. 371^b.
 7¹² i. 254^b; ii. 15^a.
 9⁹ ii. 371^a.
 10³⁴ ii. 654^a.
 11³ ii. 472^a.
 11³² i. 274^a, 373^b.
 12²⁴ ii. 123^b.
 12²⁷ ii. 576^b.

GALATIANS.

1¹ ii. 117^a.
 1⁵ i. 312^a.
 1¹⁹ i. 83^b.
 2⁶ ii. 319^b.
 2¹¹⁻¹⁴ i. 591^b.
 2²⁰ ii. 324^b.
 3¹⁰⁻¹³ i. 271^a.
 3¹³ ii. 23^a.
 3¹⁵ ii. 681^a.
 3¹⁵⁻¹⁷ i. 262^b, 543^a.
 4³ i. 328^b.
 4⁴ ii. 33^a.
 4⁶ i. 2^a.
 4⁹ ii. 33^a.
 4¹⁰ i. 572^a.
 4²⁴ i. 262^b, 519^b f.
 5¹⁷ i. 722^b.
 5²² i. 425^b.
 6⁷ i. 525^b.
 6¹² i. 244^a.

EPHESIANS.

1¹⁰ ii. 321^b.
 1¹⁴ ii. 306^b.
 1¹⁵⁻¹⁹ ii. 257^b.
 2¹² i. 262^b.
 2²⁰ i. 260^b, 419^a.
 2²¹ i. 163^a.
 3¹ i. 618^b.
 3¹⁴⁻¹⁵ i. 618^b; ii. 257^b.
 3¹⁵ i. 397^b.
 3²¹ i. 312^a.
 4¹¹ i. 450^b.
 4¹³ i. 46^a.
 5¹⁴ i. 590^b.
 5²⁶ i. 128^a, 685^a; ii. 673^b.
 6⁹ ii. 320^a.
 6¹⁰⁻¹² ii. 654^b.
 6¹⁸ ii. 257^b.

PHILIPPIANS.

1⁹⁻¹¹ ii. 257^b.
 1²² i. 425^a.

PHILIPPIANS—continued.

1²⁸ ii. 598^a.
 2⁵⁻¹¹ i. 192^b f.; ii. 226^a.
 2⁶⁻⁸ i. 463^b.
 2¹⁰⁻¹² ii. 321^b.
 3⁴⁻¹⁴ ii. 467^a.
 4³ i. 342^b.
 4²⁰ i. 312^b.

COLOSSIANS.

1⁹⁻¹¹ ii. 257^b.
 1¹²⁻¹⁴ i. 701^b.
 1¹⁵ i. 410^b, 606^b.
 1¹⁸ i. 411^a.
 1²⁰ ii. 321^b.
 2⁸ i. 328^b f.; ii. 33^b.
 2¹⁴ i. 157^a b.
 2¹⁵ ii. 274^a.
 2¹⁶ i. 572^b, 661^a.
 2¹⁸⁻¹⁹ ii. 33^b.
 2²⁰ i. 328^b f.
 2²³ i. 583^b.
 3⁵ i. 263^b.
 3¹¹ i. 137^a.
 3²⁵ ii. 320^a.
 4¹⁷ i. 89^a.

1 THESSALONIANS.

1²⁻³ ii. 257^b.
 2¹² i. 615^b.
 4³⁻⁵ i. 417^a.
 4⁶ i. 263^b.
 4¹³⁻⁵¹⁰ ii. 571^b.
 4¹³⁻⁵¹¹ ii. 124^b.
 4¹⁶ ii. 36^a.
 5³ ii. 654^b.

2 THESSALONIANS.

1⁵ ii. 597^b.
 2 ii. 125^a.
 2¹⁻¹² ii. 7^a, 572^a.
 2⁶⁻⁷ ii. 125^b.
 3¹⁷ ii. 598^a.

1 TIMOTHY.

1¹⁰ i. 11^b.
 1¹⁷ i. 312^b.
 1¹⁸ ii. 655^a.
 1²⁰ i. 294^b.
 2⁵⁻¹² ii. 24^b.
 2¹²⁻¹³ i. 39^b, 379^b.
 2¹⁵ ii. 517^a.
 3⁷ ii. 318^a.
 3¹⁶ i. 590^b.
 5¹ ii. 705^a.
 5³⁻¹⁶ ii. 676^b.

1 TIMOTHY—continued.

5⁹ i. 46^a.
 5¹⁷ i. 583^a.
 5²² ii. 115^b.
 6¹⁹ i. 419^a.

2 TIMOTHY.

1⁶ ii. 117^b.
 1¹³ i. 416^a.
 2³⁻⁴ ii. 655^a.
 2¹⁹ i. 419^a.
 4¹⁷ i. 703^a.
 4¹⁸ i. 312^b.

TITUS.

2¹² ii. 516^b.
 3¹ ii. 2^a.
 3⁵ i. 685^a; ii. 310^b.

HEBREWS.

1¹⁴ i. 615^b.
 1³ ii. 533^a b.
 1³⁻⁴ i. 463^a.
 1⁹ ii. 107^b.
 3¹ i. 237^a.
 3¹⁴ ii. 533^a.
 4¹⁻¹¹ ii. 320^b.
 5⁷ ii. 238^a.
 5¹² ii. 274^b.
 5¹³ ii. 374^a.
 6¹ i. 419^b.
 6¹⁻⁵ i. 333^a.
 6² i. 128^a.
 6⁴ i. 128^a.
 6⁶ ii. 316^b.
 6⁸ ii. 318^b, 576^a.
 6¹³⁻¹⁴ ii. 99^a.
 6¹⁹ i. 56^b.
 7¹¹ i. 695^a.
 7²⁰⁻²¹ ii. 99^a.
 7²⁸ i. 242^b.
 8⁶⁻⁷ i. 262^a.
 9¹⁰ ii. 309^b.
 9¹¹ i. 163^a b.
 9¹⁶⁻¹⁷ ii. 681^a.
 9¹⁶⁻¹⁸ i. 262^a.
 9¹⁹ ii. 673^b.
 10¹⁰ ii. 449^b.
 10²⁰ i. 242^b f.
 10²² i. 128^a.
 10³² i. 333^a.
 10³³ ii. 318^a.
 11¹ ii. 533^b.
 11² ii. 92^a.
 11⁵ i. 334^a.

HEBREWS— continued.		1 PETER— continued.		REVELATION
11 ⁷	ii. 374 ^a .	4 ⁹	ii. 48 ^b .	5 ⁹	i. 585 ^a .
11 ²¹	i. 146 ^a .	4 ¹¹	i. 312 ^b .	5 ¹²	i. 590 ^b .
11 ³³	ii. 318 ^a .	5 ²	i. 244 ^a .	5 ¹³	i. 312 ^b .
11 ³³	ii. 374 ^a .	5 ⁵	ii. 705 ^a .	6 ¹³	i. 407 ^a .
11 ³⁵	ii. 308 ^a .	5 ¹¹	i. 312 ^b .	7 ¹²	i. 312 ^b .
12 ²	i. 125 ^b .	2 PETER.		8 ¹¹	ii. 674 ^a .
12 ¹⁰	i. 567 ^b .	1 ¹	ii. 374 ^b .	8 ¹³	i. 316 ^a .
12 ¹¹	ii. 373 ^b .	1 ^{18a} .	ii. 611 ^b .	9 ⁹	ii. 682 ^a .
12 ²³	i. 104 ^a , 411 ^a .	1 ²⁰	i. 619 ^b .	9 ¹¹	i. 2 ^a .
13 ¹³	ii. 318 ^b .	2 ¹	i. 560 ^b .	9 ¹³	i. 585 ^a .
13 ²¹	i. 312 ^b .	2 ⁵	ii. 92 ^a , 374 ^b .	10 ^{5f} .	ii. 99 ^a .
13 ²⁴	i. 624 ^b .	2 ¹³	i. 404 ^b , 718 ^a .	11 ⁹	ii. 471 ^a .
JAMES.		2 ¹⁸	i. 158 ^a .	11 ¹⁵⁻¹⁸	i. 590 ^b .
2 ¹	ii. 320 ^a .	2 ¹⁹	i. 329 ^b .	12 ¹	i. 292 ^b .
2 ¹²	i. 661 ^a .	3 ¹⁰	i. 329 ^b .	12 ⁷	ii. 35 ^b .
2 ¹⁴⁻²⁶	i. 416 ^b , 630 ^b .	3 ¹²	i. 329 ^b .	12 ¹⁴	i. 316 ^a ;
2 ²³	ii. 373 ^b .	3 ¹³	ii. 374 ^b .	13 ¹	i. 585 ^a .
3 ⁵⁻¹²	ii. 34 ^a .	3 ¹⁸	i. 312 ^b .	13 ⁸	i. 158 ^a .
3 ⁶	i. 544 ^b .	1 JOHN.		13 ⁹⁻¹⁰	ii. 652 ^a .
3 ^{11, 12}	ii. 674 ^a .	2 ¹⁶	ii. 696 ^a .	13 ¹¹	i. 585 ^a .
3 ¹²	i. 407 ^a .	2 ²⁰	ii. 107 ^b .	14 ²	ii. 674 ^a .
4 ⁵	i. 341 ^a , 723 ^a .	5 ⁶	ii. 674 ^a .	15 ³	i. 590 ^b .
4 ^{11f} .	i. 660 ^b .	JUDE.		16 ⁴	ii. 674 ^a .
5 ⁴	i. 285 ^a , 525 ^b .	v. 7	i. 409 ^b .	16 ¹²	ii. 674 ^a .
5 ¹²	ii. 97 ^a .	v. 9	ii. 35 ^b .	17 ^{1, 15}	ii. 674 ^a .
5 ¹⁴	ii. 107 ^b .	v. 11	i. 166 ^b .	17 ³	i. 585 ^a .
1 PETER.		v. 12	i. 404 ^b , 718 ^a .	17 ¹⁸	i. 585 ^a .
1 ^{4f} .	i. 544 ^b .	v. 12	ii. 646 ^a .	19 ⁶	ii. 674 ^a .
1 ^{15f} .	i. 567 ^a .	vv. 12, 13	i. 312 ^b .	19 ⁸	ii. 374 ^a .
1 ¹⁷	ii. 320 ^a , 374 ^a .	v. 25	i. 312 ^b .	19 ⁹	ii. 536 ^a .
1 ¹⁹	i. 681 ^b .	REVELATION.		19 ^{17, 18}	ii. 536 ^a .
2 ⁷	i. 583 ^{a, b} .	1 ⁵⁻⁶	i. 312 ^b .	20 ^{5f} .	i. 590 ^a .
2 ⁸	ii. 400 ^b .	1 ⁷	ii. 47 ^a .	20 ¹²	i. 158 ^b .
2 ²³	ii. 374 ^a .	1 ¹⁵	ii. 674 ^a .	21 ^{9-22⁵}	ii. 88 ^a .
3 ¹⁸⁻²⁰	i. 609 ^{a, b} .	2 ⁷	ii. 123 ^b .	21 ¹⁷	i. 270 ^a .
3 ²⁰	ii. 92 ^a , 674 ^a .	2 ²⁰	i. 642 ^a .	21 ¹⁸	i. 163 ^b .
3 ²¹	i. 128 ^b .	3 ⁷	i. 283 ^b .	21 ¹⁹⁻²¹	ii. 88 ^b .
4 ³	i. 684 ^b .	4 ⁷	i. 316 ^a .	21 ^{22, 23}	ii. 88 ^b .
4 ⁶	i. 609 ^b .	4 ⁸	i. 567 ^a , 590 ^b ; ii. 681 ^b .	21 ²⁴⁻²⁷	ii. 88 ^b .
		5 ⁵	i. 703 ^a .	22 ^{1, 2}	ii. 89 ^a .
				22 ³⁻⁵	ii. 89 ^a .
				22 ²¹	i. 148 ^a .