3. Preaching and faith.—That preaching was the Divinely ordained means for the diffusion of Christianity appears from the successful appeal it made to the capacity for faith which is latent in all men. 'Belief cometh of hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ' (Ro 10¹⁷). The ancient world was familiar with much propaganda work done by travelling teachers of various philosophical schools. But the basis of appeal in these cases was to the speculative curiosity of their hearers. The preachers of the gospel, on the contrary, did not depend upon the assent of reason (1 Co 2¹⁻⁴). Not that the gospel had no place in a rational view of man and his relation to the universe and God; there was a 'wisdom' to be spoken among mature believers (v. 6). But the message of the early Christian preachers was more in the nature of a Divine summons to the human heart to trust in the fatherly love of God and to believe in Jesus Christ as the pledge of His redeeming grace.

It was a call to the human will, estranged by sin, to yield in trustful submission to the Divine will. The faith which the preacher sought to arouse was no mere intellectual belief in a system of doctrine, but an act of the whole personality, in which trust, belief, and volition united in a self-commitment to a Divine Person—God or Christ. And a careful study of the NT shows that such a close connexion between preaching and faith was established: 'So we preach, and so ye believed' (1 Co 15¹¹). The philosophic teacher might capture the intellect, the mystery-monger might stir superstitious hopes and fears, but 'the first Christian preachers testified that they had found salvation through faith in the Gospel of the Cross as they presented it. With the consciousness of the same need awakened, their hearers believed the testimony that was thus given them; they embraced the Saviour who was thus presented to them; and so believing, they entered into the same experience of salvation as belonged to their teachers' (W. L. Walker, The Cross and the Kingdom, 1911, p. 25 f.). The gifts of the Spirit received by the 'hearing of faith' authenticated both the believer (Gal 3²) and the preacher (1 Co 2⁴).

4. Kinds of preaching.—The preaching of the Apostolic Age was marked by great variety. The sources available for a characterization are the historical portions of Acts, together with the actual discourses contained therein, and also what may legitimately be inferred from the Epistles. The Epistles should not be regarded as specimens of apostolic preaching, being rather, in form and content, examples of primitive teaching. But they contain many allusions to preaching, and thus help us to reconstruct historically the conditions under which it took place, the forms it assumed, and its main doctrinal contents.

The variety of apostolic preaching was determined by the individuality of the speakers, the nature of their audiences, and the stage in the doctrinal development of the message. But beneath all differences a unity was preserved round the central theme of the Person and work of Jesus Christ in human redemption. It was 'preaching Christ,' whatever might be the local or personal conditions under which the message was proclaimed. Three main characteristics are to be noted. (a) First in historical order came the preaching to the Jews, which may be called Messianic. St. Peter's addresses in Jerusalem and St. Paul's sermons in the synagogues on his missionary journeys appeal to the resurrection of Jesus in proof of His Messiahship, and support it by quotations from the OT. Exhortations to repentance naturally followed this kind of preaching, especially as the exaltation and second coming of the Christ were emphasized. (b) Next there was the preaching to the Gentiles, which may be described as missionary. The evangelization of heathen without any knowledge of the Scriptures or of the facts concerning Jesus naturally employed different methods of appeal. On the negative side it exposed idolatry, superstition, and degrading notions of God, and condemned human sin. The positive element was the proclamation of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of all men. This included the facts of His earthly life, and His death and resurrection (Gal 4¹, 1 Co 15³⁻⁴). (c) The third kind of preaching was what may broadly be called edifying. It was addressed to congregations composed of Jewish Christians and converts won from heathenism. In these spiritual communities meetings for edification were held, in which every one who had a 'gift'—whether of prophecy or interpretation, or 'tongues,' or praise (1 Co 14²⁶⁻³²)—used it for the upbuilding of the Church. It was in such gatherings that preaching, in the more generally accepted sense of the term, was exercised.

In St. Paul, who is the preacher par excellence of the Apostolic Age, we see all the foregoing kinds of preaching illustrated, together with a marvellous variety of modes of address to win his hearers. In the case of Jews he appealed, like St. Peter, to the OT (Ac 13^{40, 47} 15¹⁶, 17²⁴). In Athens he did not hesitate to quote a pagan poet (17²⁸), and expounded the philosophy of the Christian religion. To the people of Lystra (14¹⁵) he used the arguments of natural theology. But it was in Corinth that he opposed his central theme of 'Christ crucified' to the impurity, commercialism, and superstitions of the city (1 Co 1² 2²). Attention has also been drawn (A. C. McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 255) to the fact, which is often overlooked, that St. Paul in his preaching did much personal work among individuals (Ac 18², 1 Th 2⁹), in addition to addressing audiences. The effective preaching of Philip to the Ethiopian eunuch (Ac 8³⁵) may be quoted as an earlier example of this 'hand-to-hand work' in Christian evangelization.

5. Content of apostolic preaching.—The elaborated doctrinal aspects of the gospel proclaimed by the apostles are dealt with in the artt. GOSPEL and TEACHING and those concerned with the points of biblical theology involved. All that can be attempted here is to indicate the main outlines of the subject-matter of the preaching of the apostles.

(a) God and Christ.—Our Lord proclaimed as good tidings the coming of the Kingdom of God. But after His death and resurrection a new content appears in the preaching of His followers, viz. the Person and work of Christ Himself. Not that the subject of the Kingdom was dropped (Ac 8¹² 20²⁵ 28³¹); but it became subordinated to the gospel concerning Christ, through whom the Divine sovereignty was to be established on earth, and to the ultimate question about the nature of God and His grace, through which alone such a Kingdom could come among sinful men. As a basis for missionary Christological preaching the doctrine of the existence and unity of God would form a large element in the glad tidings to heathen living under the distractions of polytheism and demonism (Ac 17²², 1 Th 1⁹). But undoubtedly in the forefront was the proclamation to all nations of the 'unsearchable riches of Christ' (Eph 3⁸). In one word, Christ was the main content of apostolic preaching. Among those who under stress of persecution went about 'preaching the word' was Philip, who in Samaria 'proclaimed unto them the Christ' (ἐκήρυσσεν τὸν Χριστόν, Ac 8⁴⁴), while to the Ethiopian eunuch he 'preached Jesus' (ἐνγγελλισατο τὸν Ἰησοῦν, v. 35). Others came to Antioch 'preaching the Lord Jesus' (εὐαγγελιζόμενοι τὸν Κύριον Ἰησοῦν, 11²⁰). St. Paul warns the Corinthians against anyone who 'preacheth another Jesus, whom we did not preach' (ἐκρύξαμεν, 2 Co 11⁴); and he rejoices when, even under conditions of faction, 'Christ is proclaimed' (Χριστὸς καταγγέλλεται, Ph 1¹⁸). The very Person of Jesus Christ constituted a gospel worth preaching. He embodied and expressed in human nature the final revelation of God (cf. Jn 14⁹).

(b) Resurrection and Messiahship of Jesus.—It was no mere abstract conception of the personality of Jesus that was preached. As pointed out by B. Weiss, 'like Jesus Himself, His apostles commenced, not with a religious doctrine or an ethical demand, but with the proclamation of a fact' (Biblical Theol. of NT, Eng. tr., 1882-83, i. 173). That fact was the Messiahship of Jesus. But another fact formed the basis of this proclamation—and that was the fact that Jesus had been raised from the dead. 'The resurrection of Jesus,' says G. V. Lechler, 'appears in primitive Christian preaching as the fundamental fact, the Alpha and Omega of apostolic announcement' (Apostolic and Post-Apostolic Times, Eng. tr., 1886, i. 267). Hence it was after the Resurrection and the supernatural gift at Pentecost that the apostles 'ceased not to teach and preach (εὐαγγελιζόμενοι) Jesus as the Christ' (Ac 5⁴²; cf. 2³⁶ 3¹⁴, 4¹⁰ 5³¹). This close connexion between the Resurrection and Messiahship of Jesus appears also in the preaching of the Apostle of the Gentiles. St. Paul declared in the synagogue at Thessalonica: 'it behoved the Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead; and this Jesus whom I proclaim unto you is the Christ' (Ac 17³; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰). Later in Corinth he testified that 'Jesus was the Christ' (18⁹), reminding them afterwards that the 'gospel preached' unto them was that 'Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures . . . and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15¹⁻⁴). It must be remembered that the good tidings of the resurrection of Jesus carried with it the glad message also of the believers' share in the Messianic blessings (Ac 3¹⁹⁻²⁶), and a participation in the future resurrection (1 Co 15²⁰; cf. Ac 17¹⁸: St. Paul 'preached Jesus and the resurrection').

(c) Death and Atonement of Christ.—The earliest hearers of the gospel, however, could not lose sight of the prior sinister fact of the crucifixion and death of Jesus. That was a 'stumbling-block' to the Jews and 'foolishness' to the Greeks. But St. Paul found in the death of Christ the central theme of his preaching, for in it he discerned Christ's redeeming work as Saviour of all men. 'We preach' (κηρύσσομεν), he says, 'a Messiah crucified' (1 Co 1²³). 'I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified' (2²). It was because 'the word of the cross' (1¹⁸) was also the 'word of reconciliation' (2 Co 5¹⁹) that St. Paul preached it so fervently, and because he had proved in his own experience that this, 'his gospel,' was the 'power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth' (Ro 1¹⁶). 'Only a man,' says W. Beyschlag, 'in whom the Lord who is the Spirit has come to dwell, who exhibits the love of Christ in its transforming power, can kindle that flame of divine life in others; and the fire is spread, not by instruction in a doctrinal system, but by testimony to a personal experience of the gospel of God coming from the heart with individual truth and freedom' (NT Theology, 1895, ii. 169). That this conception of the redeeming efficacy of the death of Christ formed a large part of apostolic preaching may be inferred from many different passages (He 9¹³, 1 P 1¹⁸, 1 Jn 1⁷ 2²).

To 'preach Christ,' then, was to proclaim, as good news to sinful and dying men, the many-sided fact of Christ, the whole scheme of salvation—pardon, regeneration, spiritual enrichment, personal immortality—involved in Christ's death, resurrection, and exaltation. This may be seen from several expressions in which the term 'preaching' does not apply to the gospel message, e.g. 'Moses hath in every city them that preach (κηρύσσωτας) him' (Ac 15²¹), where the whole Mosaic dispensation is the content of the preaching. Again, 'the baptism which John preached' (ἐκήρυξεν, Ac 10³⁷), and to 'preach circumcision' (Gal 5¹¹), indicate clearly other and wider contents than 'baptism' and 'circumcision.' If to 'preach Moses' meant to proclaim the validity of the whole Mosaic legislation, then to 'preach Christ' involves not only the proclamation of the religious significance of Jesus Christ but the whole evangelical scheme of redemption and reconciliation that centres in Him. Hence one can 'preach peace' (Eph 2¹⁷) in view of the results of the gospel, or 'preach the faith' (Gal 1²³), or 'preach the word of God' (Ac 13⁵) as a Divinely given message to be proclaimed and as a gospel of salvation.

PRECIOUS.—The word is of frequent occurrence in the NT, and represents various Greek terms: ἐντιμος, τιμή, τιμος, ἰστίμος. The root idea is something of great worth, which also becomes precious or an honour to those who possess it. It is applied to jewels (Rev 17⁴ 18^{12, 16} 21^{11, 19}), to wood (18¹²), to the fruit of the earth (Ja 5⁵), to costly stones used in building, i.e. stones of large size or of great price, like marble, etc. (1 P 2^{4, 6}, 1 Co 3¹²; cf. 2 Ch 3⁶). It is also applied to the great promises (2 P 1⁴), to the blood of Christ (1 P 1⁹), and to faith, 'equally precious faith' (2 P 1¹, RVm). The AV rendering of 1 P 2⁷, 'Unto you therefore which believe he is precious,' is changed in RV to 'For you therefore which believe is the preciousness.' In this passage the RVm 'honour' is to be preferred (see HONOUR). JOHN REID.

PRECIOUS STONES (λίθοι τιμοί; λίθος τιμῶς used collectively in Rev 18¹²⁻¹⁶).—The writers of Scripture share to some extent the instinctive delight of mankind in precious stones, 'a subject in which the majestic might of Nature presents itself to us within a very limited space, though, in the opinion of many, nowhere displayed in a more admirable manner' (Pliny, HN xxxvii. 1). St. Paul uses precious stones figuratively (1 Co 3¹²), in allusion either, generally, to the marbles and other costly materials employed in the building of palaces and temples, or, in particular, to the 'pleasant stones' (LXX, λίθοι ἐκλεκτοί, Vulg. 'lapides desiderabiles') of Is 54¹. He thinks of Christians, of characters, or of creeds (apparently the last are more immediately in view) as the precious stones which may be built upon the one foundation, Jesus Christ. The writer of the Rev. alludes to the proper colours of precious stones in a very technical manner, displaying 'that exact knowledge of particulars only possessed by persons either dealing with precious stones, or from special circumstances compelled to have a practical acquaintance with their nature' (C. W. King, *The Nat. Hist. of Precious Stones and of the Precious Metals*², 1867, p. 325). He figures Him that sits on the throne of heaven as like a jasper and a sardius (4³). The light (φῶς) within the New Jerusalem is like a very precious stone, a jasper, crystal-clear (21¹¹); and the foundations of the city are adorned with all manner of precious stones (21¹⁹). The merchandise of Imperial Rome of course includes precious stones (18¹), with which, indeed, the city decks herself (18¹⁶). While Pliny, a contemporary of the writer of Rev., expresses a sober regret that the admiration of precious stones 'has now increased to such a universal passion' (loc. cit.), the Hebrew-Christian prophet writes with a holy indignation, since to his mind the things that are most precious have become an adornment for her who is most vile—for 'Babylon, the mother of harlots (Rev 17^{4, 5}).

The idea of a New Jerusalem built of precious stones (21¹⁹⁻²¹) was not original, for it occurs in the prayer of Tobit (To 13^{16, 17}). St. John's list of 12 precious stones is closely related to that of the 12 engraved stones in the breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28¹⁷⁻²⁰ 39¹⁰⁻¹³), and thus to that of the king of Tyre (Ezk 28¹³, where the LXX, diverging widely from the Massoretic text, simply reproduces the stones of the breastplate). It was probably the writer's intention to name all the 12 stones which had been consecrated by use in the ephod, but he quotes loosely from memory, omitting some and adding others. Sardius, topaz, emerald, sapphire, jacinth, amethyst, beryl, and jasper reappear in his list, though in a different order. Carbuncle (marg. 'emerald'), diamond (marg. 'carbuncle'), agate, and onyx (marg. 'beryl') are omitted, and their place is taken by chalcedony, sardonyx, chrysolite, and chrysoprase.

Various causes make the identification of the precious stones of the ancients a difficult matter. The classical treatises of Theophrastus (c. 300 B.C.) and Pliny (c. A.D. 100) are full of interest, but the descriptions of particular stones are often too vague for diagnosis. The old principle of classification was colour rather than chemical affinity. Various red stones—ruby, red spinel, and garnet—were grouped together under the general name of carbuncle (ἀνθραξ), while many green stones—emerald, peridot, green fluor spar, malachite, and certain kinds of quartz and jade—were each called σμάραγδος. Stones once deemed valuable have fallen out of esteem, and their names have been transferred to others which have risen into favour. Stones which were, and still are, precious have had their names interchanged. Of the twelve foundation stones in Rev 21^{19, 20}, the jasper, the emerald (a corruption of σμάραγδος), the sardonyx, the sard, the beryl, and the amethyst have (on the whole) retained their ancient meanings; but the ancient sapphire is our modern lapis lazuli, the chalcedony our agate, the chrysolite our topaz, the topaz our chrysolite, and the jacinth our sapphire. Moreover, it is very improbable that the stones in the Hebrew ephod were in all instances so precious as the Greek names assigned to them in the Ptolemaic period would seem to indicate. As taste developed, it normally moved away from the common to the rich and rare. The conquests of Alexander brought into the Western markets all the gems of the gorgeous East, and established a new standard of values in precious minerals. The diamond and the ruby, which became well known in the Greek and Roman periods, are anachronisms in the OT (where even the RV retains them); and Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 619 ff.) has stated strong reasons for holding that the 'sardius' of the Hebrew breastplate (Ex 28¹⁷; cf. Rev 21²⁰) was an opaque red jasper, the 'emerald' a quartz crystal, the 'topaz' a yellow green serpentine, and the 'beryl' a green felspar. The question whether the writer of Rev. gave the terms he found (mostly) in the LXX an ancient or a modern connotation is one which perhaps scarcely occurred to himself.

It is probable that precious stones were originally valued less for their beauty and rarity than for the magical and medicinal powers which they were supposed to possess. By a kind of sympathetic magic the amethyst (ἀ, 'not,' and μεθύσκω, 'make drunk') with its wine-red colour was reputed to be a preventive of intoxication, the red jasper (or blood-stone) was a cure for hæmorrhage, the green jasper brought fertility to the soil, and so forth. According to the doctrine of 'signatures,' each mineral was supposed to be marked by some natural sign which indicated the particular medicinal use to which it could be put. The belief in 'lucky stones' was widespread. Pliny gravely sets down the peculiar virtues of many of the precious stones which he describes: the diamond 'neutralizes poison and dispels delirium'; amber, 'worn on the neck, is a cure for fevers and other diseases,' and so on. From this superstition the writer of Rev. is far removed. It does not appear that his precious stones have any occult or mystical meaning. He merely uses their colours æsthetically, as the pigments of a splendid picture. His sole desire is to fire the imagination with an idea of the radiant beauty of the city whose builder and maker is God.

PREDESTINATION.—1. Context.—Predestination in its widest reference, as attributed to God, is 'His eternal purpose, according to the counsel of His will, whereby, for His own glory, He hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass' (The Shorter Catechism, A. 7). The word 'predestinate' appears nowhere in the AV of the OT, and in the NT it has now disappeared, having given place to 'foreordain' in the RV in the four places where the AV had it (Ro 8^{29, 30}, Eph 1^{5, 11}). 'Foreordained' of the AV has also given place to 'foreknown' in the RV of 1 P 1²⁰ (where the Gr. is προεγνωσμένον). See FOREKNOWLEDGE). 'Foreordain' in the passages referred to above, and also in Ac 4²⁸ (AV 'determined before'), 1 Co 2⁷ (AV 'ordained'), renders προορίζειν, the tense employed in these six instances being the aorist, as befitting a purpose of the Divine mind from eternity. The simple ὀρίζειν occurs similarly with a kindred meaning (Lk 22²²; κατὰ τὸ ὀρισμένον; Ac 2²³: τῇ ὀρισμένη βουλῇ; cf. Ac 10⁴² 17^{26, 31}, Ro 1⁴).

2. Connotation.—Election and predestination belong to the purpose of grace cherished in the Divine mind from all eternity; and as far as salvation is concerned they are the expression of the entire dependence of sinful man upon the grace of God from the beginning to the end. They are included together by St. Paul among the spiritual blessings bestowed upon believers; and the two transactions are regarded as taking place before the foundation of the world (Eph 1^{4, 5}). Election has in view the persons who are to be the objects of Divine blessing; predestination the privileges and blessings which are to be their portion (Ro 8^{29, 30}, Eph 1^{4, 5}). Foreknowledge (πρόγνωσις, 1 P 1²; cf. Ro 8²⁹, 1 P 1²⁰) belongs to the same purpose of grace, and is spoken of by St. Paul as the first step in the Divine plan of salvation, for it is those whom God 'foreknew' whom He also 'foreordained' to be conformed to the image of His Son. The word 'chose' (ἐΐλετο) in 2 Th 2¹³ includes 'foreknew' and 'foreordained' of Ro 8²⁹, and has itself apparently the force of 'elected' (ἐξελέξατο).

3. Predestination in the moral world.—It belongs to the very nature of God that He should have a counsel or purpose which embraces all things from the beginning to the end, and that this counsel shall be assuredly accomplished. This is again and again declared in Scripture: 'The Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil' (Pr 16⁴); 'My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure' (Is 46¹⁰). St. Paul affirms this truth when he speaks of 'the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his will' (Eph 1¹¹). Not only the good but the evil of the world comes under the Divine predestinating purpose, for the evil as well as the good is known beforehand to the Omniscient (Ac 15¹⁸). 'In him we live, and move, and have our being' (17²⁸), and every act of man, whatever its motive, is performed with bodily life and strength, with faculties and powers which He has supplied, and continues to supply, to the best and to the worst, to the noblest and the most depraved. Whilst not Himself the author of sin, He not only suffers the evil designs and wicked purposes of men, but uses them (and by using them shows that He purposed to use them from all eternity) for ends of His own, even the loftiest and holiest of which men can form any conception. The death of Christ was an essential element in the Divine plan of redemption. To bring to pass the death of Christ He made use of the hatred of the Jews, the baseness of the betrayer, and the culpable weakness of the Roman governor. The first Christians discerned and acknowledged this as they lifted up their united voice in prayer to God and said: 'Of a truth in this city against thy holy Servant Jesus, whom thou didst anoint, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the peoples of Israel, were gathered together, to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel foreordained to come to pass' (ὅσα ἡ χεὶρ σου καὶ ἡ βουλή προώρριεν γενέσθαι, Ac 4^{27, 28}). And St. Peter declared the same truth to the Jewish multitudes on the Day of Pentecost: 'Him being delivered up by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye by the hand of lawless men did crucify and slay' (τῇ ὀρισμένη βουλῇ καὶ προγνώσει τοῦ θεοῦ, Ac 2²³). It was in language no less strong that the Lord Himself predicted His betrayal and death: 'The Son of man indeed goeth, as it hath been determined (κατὰ τὸ ὀρισμένον, Lk 22[—]): but woe unto that man through whom he is betrayed.' We also read that He showed 'unto his disciples, how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up' (Mt 16[—]). These passages 'combine to show that not only in the physical world, which is generally admitted to be subject in all its provinces to the absolute control and regulation of the Almighty, but also in the moral world, all circumstances and events, dependent though they may be on the voluntary actions of His intelligent creatures, are nevertheless pre-arranged and pre-determined by Him; or, in other words, that whatsoever God does by His own personal agency in any department of the universe, and whatsoever He permits to be done by the agency of His rational creatures, is done or permitted by Him purposely and designedly, in accordance with His own determinate counsels, and for the accomplishment of His own contemplated ends' (Crawford, Mysteries of Christianity, p. 303).

4. St. Paul's view of predestination and salvation.—Predestination, however, in its bearing upon salvation finds its great exponent in the apostle Paul. That God has foreordained particular persons from all eternity to salvation and eternal life, that He has provided for them the means to that salvation in the work of Christ and the gracious ministry of the Holy Spirit, and that He bestows upon them grace to persevere to the end, is especially the teaching of St. Paul. Here, again, as in his teaching upon election, St. Paul follows up the teaching of the Lord. 'No man can come to me,' says Jesus, 'except the Father which sent me draw him: and I will raise him up in the last day' (Jn 6⁴⁴). 'My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me. . . . My Father, which hath given them unto me, is greater than all; and no one is able to snatch them out of the Father's hand' (10^{27, 29}). 'All that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me' is, as the older divines would have put it, an article in the Covenant of Redemption between the Father and the Son in the counsels of eternity; 'and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out' is an article in the Covenant of Grace wherein the offer of a free and a full salvation is made to all (6³⁷). It is this teaching which St. Paul casts into his own more philosophical moulds and expounds in language which has not only passed into the vocabulary of theology, but even become familiar in the religious speech of many types of evangelical Christians. 'We know,' he says in a characteristic utterance, 'that to them that love God all things work together for good, even to them that are called according to his purpose. For whom he foreknew, he also foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8²⁸⁻²⁹). The sovereignty in which St. Paul here reposes such confidence is the sovereignty of a God of grace and faithfulness; and he is confident that He who began a good work in him and his fellow-believers 'will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1⁶). The end to which God 'foreordained' those whom He 'foreknew' is conformity to the image of His Son, that they should be sons of God after His likeness of love and holiness here and dignity and glory above. This end is that which apostolic teaching always has in view, and no other: the apostles have nothing to say of predestination to wrath or destruction (cf. 1 Th 1²⁻³, 2 Th 2¹³, 2 Ti 1⁹, 1 P 1¹⁻²).

In the opening passage of the Epistle to the Ephesians St. Paul sets forth in still greater detail this great doctrine (Eph 1³⁻¹²). It is 'the saints which are at Ephesus and the faithful in Christ Jesus' who are the objects of this Divine choice and blessing, persons who are believing men and women (τοῖς πιστοῖς) and Christians indeed (τοῖς ἁγίοις). The benefits bestowed upon them in common with the Apostle are enumerated as 'redemption,' 'forgiveness of sins,' 'holiness,' 'adoption' as sons of God, 'a heavenly inheritance,' and they comprise 'every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ'—benefits not merely offered but actually enjoyed, and that in accordance with the purpose of God before the foundation of the world. The Divine choice rested upon them and took effect in them not because of their merits or attainments, not because God foresaw in them a holiness and a faith marking them out as recipients of eternal favour and blessing, but 'according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace.' They were chosen not because of foreseen holiness and blamelessness, but 'in order that they should be holy and without blemish.' If we adopt the punctuation which connects 'in love' (at the close of v. 4) with 'having foreordained' (at the commencement of v. 5), and which has some textual authority, we should hold that it was in love that He foreordained them, moved by 'an "unseen universe" of reasons and causes wholly beyond our discovery' (H. C. G. Moule, Cambridge Bible, 'Ephesians,' 1886, p. 48). Whatever the grounds of God's predestinating purpose, they did not lie in any merits or qualifications of theirs, for they were called 'not according to their works, but according to his own purpose and grace before the world began' (2 Ti 1⁹). Election is a spontaneous act of God's favour and grace, uncalled for by anything in the objects of it moving Him thereto. Before the ages of time God foreordained the glory of the saints, and with a view to that consummation He purposed both creation and redemption (1 Co 2⁷ with T. S. Evans' note in Speaker's Com. iii. [1881]).

Whilst St. Paul in speaking of God's predestinating purpose towards the saints calls them 'vessels of mercy which he afore prepared unto glory' (Ro 9²³), he is careful not to attribute to the immediate agency of God 'the destruction' which overtakes the 'vessels of wrath' (Ro 9²²). These the Apostle describes as 'fitted unto destruction,' whom God 'endured with much longsuffering'; and he regards them as bringing upon themselves by their obstinacy and continued sinfulness the natural penalty of their guilt, the just judgment of God. The issue of glory for the saints proceeds from God's predestinating purpose 'according to the good pleasure of his will' and without any foresight of merit on their part; the issue of destruction for the wicked proceeds from the rejection of offered grace and their persistence in transgression and sin. The distinction is that set forth by St. Paul when he says: 'The wages of sin is death; but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Ro 6²³).

That God's sovereignty in predestination is exercised consistently with man's perfect liberty to choose is an antinomy which it is impossible for us to reconcile, but which, nevertheless, stands out clear in the teaching of St. Paul. In Ro 9²⁰⁻²¹ St. Paul appeals to one side of the antinomy and affirms the Divine sovereignty by reference to the figure of the potter; and in Ro 10¹¹⁻¹² he exhibits the other side when he affirms the universality and freeness of the gospel offer, saying, 'Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?' Whilst St. Paul, as we have seen, affirms the doctrine of absolute predestination to life, he asserts no less clearly the truth of human responsibility. Underlying all his exhortations to holiness, and all his presentations of gospel privilege and blessing, there is the assumption of the freedom of the human will to avail itself of offered grace or to refuse it, to put forth effort or to remain inactive. Whilst the kindling of the Divine life in the soul through the exercise of faith in Christ is of sovereign grace (Eph 2⁸), the increase and fruitfulness of the Divine life through prayer and service depends upon the same grace, as St. Paul exhorts: 'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work, for his good pleasure' (Ph 2¹²⁻¹³).

5. Predestination in Christian experience.—The doctrine of predestination has the analogy of Christian experience to support it. Every Christian man is ready to acknowledge that there was some power at work for his salvation before his own freewill. 'We love,' says St. John, 'because he first loved us' (1 Jn 4¹⁹). It is He who, through the Holy Spirit, by the use of the means of grace, quickens into spiritual life men who are dead in trespasses and sins. And there are multitudes who acknowledge their experience to have been that of Lydia, 'whose heart the Lord opened, to give heed unto the things which were spoken by Paul' (Ac 16¹⁴). In Christian experience there is the conviction of this gracious influence which has been beforehand with us in showing us the guilt of sin and leading us to Christ for salvation, but there is also the consciousness of moral responsibility, requiring from us the constant exercise of faith and the diligent use of all the means of grace. 'I could no more,' says Erskine of Linlathen, writing to Thomas Chalmers from Herrnhut (Letters, 1800-1840, ed. Hanna, 1877), 'separate the belief of predestination from my idea of God, than I could separate the conviction of moral responsibility from my own consciousness. I do not, to be sure, see how these two things coincide, but I am prepared for my own ignorance on these points. We know things, not absolutely as they are in themselves, but relatively as they are to us and to our practical necessities.' There we must be content to leave the antinomy, believing that though it is beyond our limited powers to reconcile, it is reconciled in the mind of the All-knowing and Eternal God.

6. Practical applications.—The doctrine of predestination has practical applications full of comfort and encouragement. A reasonable assurance of salvation finds in the eternal decree, whose sole cause is the good pleasure and eternal will of God, its most certain and abiding ground. To have a well-grounded persuasion, through the fruit of the Spirit and the evidences of the new life, that one is of the number of those whom God foreknew and foreordained to be conformed to the image of His Son, cannot fail on the one hand to fill one with gratitude and humility, and on the other to stimulate one to the pursuit of holiness and all the graces of the Christian life. The belief that God in His predestinating purpose has His elect—known to Him when unknown to man—in every community and every congregation where Christ is preached, is an encouragement to faithful ministry, as it was to St. Paul when in a vision of the night the Lord said to him: 'I have much people in this city' (Ac 18¹⁰). 'The doctrine of this high mystery of predestination,' says the Westminster Confession (ch. iii. 8), 'is to be handled with special prudence and care, that men attending to the will of God revealed in His word, and yielding obedience thereunto, may, from the certainty of their effectual vocation, be assured of their eternal election. So shall this doctrine afford matter of praise, reverence, and admiration of God, and of humility, diligence, and abundant consolation to all that sincerely obey the Gospel.'

PRE-EXISTENCE OF CHRIST.—With regard to pre-existence, the apostolic Scriptures furnish material for the two-fold conclusion, that it does not belong to the primary data of Christian faith in the Historic and Exalted Jesus, but that it is a necessary implicate of that faith. It forms no element in the primitive doctrine recorded in the opening chapters of Acts. Under the impulse of the Spirit, the conviction of their Master's resurrection wrought in the first disciples a victorious re-assertion of faith in Him as the Messianic Redeemer. He is proclaimed as 'both Lord and Christ'; and under the category of Messiahship this primitive gospel involves all that is characteristic in historical Christianity (see Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, p. 15 ff.). Jesus is sovereign in the government of the world as in the realm of spiritual ideals, author of salvation in every sense of the word, moral and eschatological; but there is no emergence of the thought that His origin must be transcendent as His destiny—no hint of pre-existence. Christ's place in eternity is in the foreknowledge and counsel of the Father.

Coming to the Pauline Epistles, we enter a Christological atmosphere which is startlingly different. In the earlier Epistles the Pre-existence is not so much asserted as taken for granted. In marked contrast with such themes as the Atonement or Justification, it is never made the subject of the Apostle's dialectic; but deductions, both practical and speculative, are drawn from it as an axiomatic truth, familiar equally to writer and to readers, and disputed by no one. And although it is only in the later Epistles that the necessity of the Pre-existence as the basis for a full world-embracing redemption is deliberately set forth, there is no evidence of a real development either in the conviction of the fact or in the conception of its significance.

The chief Pauline passages are the following. With regard to the closely parallel texts, Gal 4⁴ and Ro 8³, it is not too much to say that the obviously intended contrast between the dignity of God's 'own Son' and the conditions of His earthly life ('born of a woman, made under the law,' 'in the likeness of sinful flesh') is fully illuminated only by the assumption of His pre-existence. In speaking of the sacraments of the wilderness (1 Co 10¹⁻⁴) St. Paul clearly presupposes the activity of the pre-incarnate Christ in the history of Israel. The statement that the Rock in Kadesh was Christ does not imply that he regarded it as an actual Christophany (Bousset, Die Schriften des NT, ii. [1908] 115); but it does imply that, in St. Paul's view, the water miraculously furnished by it was 'spiritual drink' because in it Christ was sacramentally active for receptive souls. In 1 Co 8⁶, as one God, the Father, is the ultimate source and end of all creation, so one Lord, Jesus Christ, is its Mediator—the first hint of that more fully formulated conception of the 'cosmic' Christ which is a feature of later Epistles. A similarly anticipatory passage is 2 Co 8⁹—'Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, he for your sakes became poor,' which cannot be naturally understood in any other sense than that Christ's earthly life was to His prior condition as beggary to wealth. This thought of the Incarnation as an act of self-abnegation, by which an original state of heavenly glory was voluntarily exchanged for one of human limitation and suffering, is expanded in Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹, the most deliberate and majestic of St. Paul's utterances upon the subject. Whether we understand by μορφή θεού a form which is separable or that which is inseparable from the Divine essence, one which was surrendered or that which could not be surrendered, does not affect the assertion of pre-existence. Christ became man only by laying aside a state of being to which an equal participation with God in all Divine prerogatives (τὸ εἶναι ὅρα θεῶν) naturally belonged. Finally, in Colossians and Ephesians St. Paul develops the thought of Christ's relation to created being as a whole. In His pre-incarnate state, He is the ἀρχή, the Head or Origin, the πρωτοκός πάσης κτίσεως, begotten before all creatures and the agent of their creation, therefore possessing supremacy, absolute and universal (Col 1^{15, 16}). The same conception is implied in Eph 1¹⁰—as all things are originally centred in Him, so they are destined to be gathered together and re-centred in Him; while in Eph 1⁴ His pre-existence is brought more directly into relation with human redemption—we are chosen 'in him' before the foundation of the world.'

In the later Epistles, it thus appears, there is a larger use of the concept of pre-existence, a more deliberate unfolding of its relations to God, humanity, and the created universe; but, while this enables us to apprehend more clearly how the concept was already latent in the primary faith-experience of the Exalted Christ, it cannot be said that the later Epistles, as compared with the earlier, show any distinct advance in the Apostle's or in the Church's belief in the fact. And here we are confronted with a problem. The thought of the Apostolic Church has advanced from the position reflected in the first chapters of Acts, in which there is no hint of a doctrine of pre-existence, to that presupposed even in the earlier Pauline Epistles, where its presence and activity are fully assumed; and apparently nothing save a process of development so gradual, silent, and unconscious as to have left no trace, bridges the distance between the Pentecostal discourses and Colossians. By what processes of thought may it be supposed that this remarkable transition was effected? Various attempts have been made to find a solution of the problem ab extra.

(a) Jewish apocalyptic.—'Even as a Jew, Saul believed the Messiah to be already in existence'

(H. Weinel, St. Paul, Eng. tr., 1906, p. 45). 'Jewish Messianic speculation had already imagined a picture for the completion of which really nothing was wanting but the Nicene dogmas' (ib. p. 313). It is true that such passages as 2 Es. xii. 32, xiii. 26, xiv. 9, En. xlviii. 6, lxii. 7 bear out the statement that pre-existence of the Messiah was a feature of traditional apocalyptic doctrine; nor is there any antecedent improbability that the development of Christian belief may have been influenced from this quarter. At the same time it is to be noted that the apocalyptic tenet has its place in a connexion of ideas quite different from the Christian. Since according to the cherished apocalyptic hope the Redemption was imminent and might arrive at any moment, it followed that the Messiah must be already in existence, waiting only to be revealed (Dalman, Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., 1902, p. 302). No such stimulus was applicable to the development of the Christian belief.

(b) Rabbinism.—According to its peculiar mode of thought, Rabbinism expressed the transcendent value of any person or thing by assigning to it a pre-existent celestial archetype. Thus, according to the Midrash on Ps 8⁹, the Throne of Glory, Messiah the King, the Torah, ideal Israel, Repentance, Gehenna, were created before the world. But the inclusion of Repentance in this list sheds a significant light upon the sense in which these entities are regarded as having preternatural existence. In Rabbinism, according to the best authorities, the pre-existence of the Messiah was only ideal—'not literal, but present only in God's eternal counsel of salvation' (Weber, Jüdische Theologie, p. 355). The name of the Messiah was ideally pre-existent (ib. p. 198). 'As a matter of fact, the earlier rabbinism was content with holding, on the basis of Ps 72¹, the pre-existence of the name only' (Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 301).

(c) Alexandrian Judaism.—According to Philo (Sac. leg. alleg. on Gn 2⁷ [ed. Mangey, i. 49], de Mundi opificio, ed. Mangey, i. 30), God created two kinds of men—a 'heavenly' man, made after the image of God, incorruptible and super-terrestrial; the other formed of the dust, composed of body and soul, male and female, by nature mortal. And, with 1 Co 15⁴⁴⁻⁹ as almost a sole support, it has been maintained by various scholars since Baur, that St. Paul has simply taken over the Alexandrian theory. That some such theory has, directly or indirectly, suggested the wording of the Pauline passage seems certain. But if there is any intentional reference, it can only be by way of refuting the Philonic view (see Bonsset, Religion des Juifs, p. 406). The 'heavenly' man, who with Philo is the 'first,' is with St. Paul the 'second' (as if to emphasize the point, it is expressly said, 'that was not first which was spiritual, but that which was natural; and afterward that which is spiritual'). When, moreover, St. Paul distinguishes the two as 'from earth' and 'from heaven,' he points to their respective sources and qualities of being, implying nothing as to a previous state of being.

While the history of primitive Christianity proves its eclectic genius, its hospitality towards all ideas and forms of thought by which it could express its sense of the inexpressible religious value of Christ, and while there is no a priori reason to deny that it may have incidentally woven into its own web sundry hints of a pre-existent Messiah or Ideal Man, it seems impossible that the rapid Christological advance which had taken place by the time the Pauline Epistles were written can have been in any vital way influenced by the recondite speculations of apocalyptic, Rabbinical, or Hellenistic Judaism.

That this advance was connected chiefly with Pauline lines of thought is perhaps suggested by the fact that little or no use is made of the conception of pre-existence in 1 Peter. The language of 1¹¹—τὸ ἐν αὐτοῖς σπύρισμα Χριστοῦ—suggests but does not necessarily imply it (see Hort's note in loc.). To say that the Spirit who inspired the prophets was the Spirit of Christ does not imply that Christ was personally coeval with the prophets (cf. He 1²⁶). In 1 P 1²⁰ it is claimed that κατεπαύθητος implies pre-existence, since only that which already exists can be manifested; but, on the contrary, the parallelism between κατεπαύθητος and προγεννημένος excludes a reference to personal pre-existence. He who was manifested is He who was foreknown, and the object of Divine foreknowledge must be the incarnate, not the pre-existent Christ. Nor is the present writer able to appreciate the force of the reason for which Chase (HDB iii. 193^b) regards 3¹⁸ 19 as decisive—viz. that the 'spirit' in which Christ was 'quickened' and ministered to the 'spirits in prison' is represented as something assumed by Him no less than the 'flesh' in which He was 'put to death,' and that, therefore, Christ is conceived as having existed before the beginning of His human life. To deduce from the words ἐν ᾧ that Christ had a personal existence prior to His possession of the 'spirit' in which He acted after His death in the flesh, seems to lay on them a greater stress than they are fitted to bear.

The advance in Christological ideas which had taken place by the time of the Pauline Epistles must be ascribed to an innate necessity of thought. The concept of pre-existence lay implicit in the Church's most primitive consciousness of the Crucified and Exalted Christ as Saviour. The form in which this first found expression was Messianic. Jesus was the Lord Christ, the Person by whom the people of God were to be turned from their iniquities, and the Divine Kingdom brought to men. Without intellectual perception that this implied His proper Divinity, the Exalted Lord was felt as God; the instinctive attitude towards Him was that of faith and worship. But in a community which entirely retained the fundamental theocentric postulate of OT religion, such an attitude could not long remain merely instinctive. Granted the premise that Jesus is Saviour and that only the Eternal God can save, we pass, logically, at a single step from the Acts of the Apostles into Colossians. The inevitable conclusion, slowly as it may come to formulation, is that in Him the fullness of the Godhead dwells; otherwise it is a man, not God, who takes the central place in faith's universe. And to connect the Historical Christ with the being of Eternal God, the category of pre-existence was indispensable; for to Jewish monotheism the idea of θεοποίησις—that any one should become God—was unthinkable. He who was Divine unto everlasting must have been Divine from everlasting; in whatever sense God is preternatural, in the same sense must Christ also be.

Further, there are two lines along which this necessity of thought is seen to be especially urgent.

(a) Ethical.—It cannot be said that the great ethical appeal of the gospel to self-sacrificing love is explicit in its first proclamation. It is implicit there in its central truth of the suffering Messiah; but the presentation is shaped by the polemical necessities of the hour, and the chief aim is to establish that the Crucified Jesus is Lord rather than to emphasize that His sovereignty is won by sacrifice. In St. Paul's Epistles the ethical appeal is dominant throughout. His experience of salvation was an experience of forgiveness and eternal life bestowed with an unspeakable fervour of Divine love—love that by infinite sacrifice reconciled the sinner unto God. And in his conception of this love, the pre-existence of Christ had a two-fold function. (i.) It raised the earthly manifestation to infinitude. The redeeming sacrifice of Christ was not a love that was commensurable with any human self-sacrifice. It is voluntary poverty seen against a background of Divine wealth. The most amazing in the series of His self-emptyings is the first—the choosing to renounce the Divine form of existence for another in which He was destined to reach the absolute point of humiliation and suffering. This was the love beyond compare, passing knowledge. (ii.) In the same way, we may suppose, the conception of pre-existence helped St. Paul to relate the love of Christ to the love of God. It is not inconceivable, indeed, that St. Paul should have found in the historical life and death of Jesus ample reason for such expressions as, 'Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift,' 'He that withheld not his own Son'; but how much more amazing and subduing is the thought, if the Son thus delivered up for us all 'was God's 'own image,' His 'first-begotten before every creature.' It scarcely permits of doubt that this was the thought in the Apostle's mind.

(b) Soteriological.—Salvation in the full sense includes not merely a subjective change in man, but a corresponding change in man's environment. No more than humanity itself does nature embody the perfect final will of God. In its present constitution it is the correlative of human sin; it lies under the dominion of 'principalities and powers' that are unfriendly to man; and for man to be spiritually renewed and reconciled to God, and yet left in the midst of a hostile universe, would be no complete redemption. Thus, even in St. Paul's earlier Epistles it is seen that Christ's redeeming work must extend its influence over all created things (1 Co 15²⁴⁻²⁸, Ro 8¹⁹⁻²², 37-39) and in Colossians the cosmic Redemption, the vision of a 'Christianized universe,' becomes one of the Apostle's central themes. The Church's Lord and Redeemer must be Lord and Reconciler of all things (Col 1¹⁵⁻²⁰, 24, 15; cf. Ph 2^{10, 11}). But this is possible only to One in whom the undivided fullness of the Godhead dwells (Col 1^{19, 20}, 29, 10; cf. Ph 2^{6, 9}), who is the one Mediator between God and the created universe. And this, again, involves His pre-existence (πρωτόβροκος πάσης κτίσεως, Col 1¹⁵). Only He who is the original and eternal principle of unity in all things (1⁷), who stands in such a relation to God (ἐκὼν τὸν δοξάσαντος θεοῦ, 1¹⁵) that this must be His relation to the universe, can bring the universe into final unity with the Divine character and purpose. Only He who is the mediatorial beginning can be the mediatorial end; only the First can be the Last.

The question immediately arises for theology: How is one to relate this conception of the Pre-existent Christ to the Eternal Unity of the Godhead? Beyschlag's theory of an ideal pre-existence in the Divine thought and will is wholly inadequate as a historical interpretation of Pauline thought; and the same may be said of the theory (Baur, Pileiderer) according to which the conception of the 'Man from Heaven,' the 'Second Adam,' is the fountainhead of the Pauline Christology. The point in which the effort of NT thought to answer this question culminates is the Johannine doctrine of the Logos; and to treat of this lies beyond the scope of the present article. Suffice it to say here, that for the whole Johannine group of writings—Apocalypse, Gospel, Epistles—the truth of Christ's pre-existence is absolutely fundamental. On the one hand, there is the deliberate endeavour to relate this, through the concept of the Logos, to the Godhead; on the other hand, and especially in the First Epistle, the strongest emphasis is laid upon the complete, personal, permanent identity of the Pre-incarnate with Him who became flesh and tabernacled among us. That 'Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh' is the test and watchword of the Christian faith. Though the foundation for the cosmic significance of the Incarnation is laid in the prologue to the Gospel (1³) this is nowhere elaborated as by St. Paul. The ethical interest absorbs all others; and here St. John has spoken the last word (Jn 3¹⁶, 1 Jn 4^{9, 10}). The love of Christ is the manifested love of God. He who died on Calvary, the propitiation for our sins, is He who came forth from the bosom of the Father.

LITERATURE.—This is enormous: all the text-books on NT Theology, including those by Baur (1893), Beyschlag (Eng. tr., 1893), Feine (1910), Holtzmann (1911), Schlatter (1906), Stevens (1899), Weinel (1913), B. Weiss (Eng. tr., 1882-83). Among special treatises the following may be mentioned: H. R. Mackintosh, The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ, 1912; A. B. Bruce, The Humiliation of Christ, 1881; W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judenthums, 1906; J. Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, 1908; A. Harnack, History of Dogma, Eng. tr., 1897, vol. I. app. 1; P. Lobstein, Notion de la préexistence du Fils de Dieu, 1883; W. Olschewski, Die Wurzeln der paulinischen Christologie, 1909; R. L. Ottley, The Doctrine of the Incarnation, 1896; O. Pileiderer, Paulinismus, Eng. tr., 1891, i. 123-159; D. Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 1897; F. Weber, Jüdische Theologie, 1897. R. LAW.

PREPARATION.—In the NT Epistles the word appears only in Eph 6¹⁵: 'having shod your feet with the preparation (ετοιμασία) of the 'gospel of peace.' The exhortation was suggested by the sandals (caligæ) of the Roman soldier. They were very heavy, thickly studded with hobnails, and strongly laced. The purpose which they served in the equipment of the Roman soldier is to be served by the ετοιμασία provided by the gospel of peace. The sandals gave the soldier firm footing, and fitted him for fighting or marching through any kind of country. The word has two meanings: in general, that of 'preparation,' 'preparedness,' or 'readiness,' and in particular, 'firm foundation' or 'firm footing.' Illustrations of the latter meaning are found in Ps 89¹⁴ (15), 'Righteousness and judgement are the foundation of thy throne' (RV), also in Zec 5¹¹, Ezr (LXX 2 Es) 2²⁸. The verb 'to prepare' (ἐτοιμάζειν) in the sense of 'firmly fix' or 'establish' is found in Ps 24², 'and established it upon the floods,' also 99⁴, Pr 3¹⁹, 2 S 5¹². In the NT it has the sense of 'destined' in Mt 20³ ('for whom it hath been prepared of my Father') 23^{34, 41}, 1 Co 2⁹, He 11¹⁶. The common translation of ετοιμασία in Eph 6¹⁵ is 'preparation' (EV, Erasmus, Hodge, Eadie, etc.), but 'foundation' or 'firm footing' is strongly supported (Chrysostom, Bengel, Hatch). The weakness of the translation 'preparation' is that it does not indicate the kind of equipment which is referred to. It translates the word but not the idea. The more restricted meaning of 'firm footing,' with its suggestions of confidence or assurance, brings out more clearly what the gospel of peace provides. This 'firm confidence' is not only necessary for 'standing' in 'the evil day,' but for the general warfare of the Christian at all times.

PRESBYTER, PRESBYTERY.—See ELDER, BISHOP.

PRESENCE.—In the apostolic writings the following Greek words lie behind our English term 'presence,' ἀπέναντι, ἐμπροσθεν, ἐνώπιον, κατενώπιον (prepositions = 'in the presence of,' and frequently rendered 'before'); παρουσία and πρόσωπον (nouns). There is no need to dwell on such common expressions as the 'presence' of Pilate (Ac 3¹³) or of the Council (5⁴), or even on St. Paul's mention of his presence (or absence) in the letters to Philippi (Ph 2¹), Corinth, and Thessalonica. The question of the Apostle's 'bodily presence' being 'insignificant' (2 Co 10¹⁰) is discussed elsewhere (see PAUL). There remain those passages which speak of the presence of the angels and of the Lamb (Rev 14¹⁰), and the presence of God. From this source come 'times or refreshing' (Ac 3¹⁹) for the repentant, but also of 'destruction' for the disobedient (2 Th 1⁹, in reference to the Second Advent or Parousia; cf. 1 Th 2¹⁹). No man, however wise or strong, may boast in the presence of God (1 Co 1²⁹); in that presence Christ appears on our behalf (He 9²⁴); and there 'before the presence of his glory' we ourselves may hope to stand (Jude 24). There is matter for reflexion in all these statements, but it is better to leave this somewhat artificial and mechanical schedule of references in order to discuss the general idea of the presence of God as it is found in the writings of the Apostolic Age.

1. In some of the passages cited above there is unquestionably a reminiscence of the sense of sanctity with which the royal presence was invested in ancient times. The OT is full of references to this fact. We have it literally in such passages as Gn 41⁴⁵ ('the presence of Pharaoh'), Ex 10¹¹, 1 S 19⁷, 2 S 24⁴, 1 K 1²³ 12², 2 Ch 9²³, Neh 2¹, Est 1¹⁰ 8¹⁵. Generally speaking, these references to the kingly presence carry the suggestion of favour, graciousness, assent, or benediction. When a ruler turned his countenance towards a suppliant or courtier, it meant that his desire was granted, or that he was a persona grata in the court (cf. Est 8¹⁵); when it was turned away, it foreboded refusal, the loss of favour, or serious disgrace (cf. 1 K 12²). The same association of ideas governs the usage of such phrases as 'the presence of the Lord' (Gn 3³, Job 1¹² 27²³, Ps 16¹¹ 97⁷ 140¹³, etc.). Those hidden in the Divine presence are safe from harm (Ps 31²⁰ 91¹); to be driven from God's presence is to be outcast indeed (Ps 51¹¹); it is even to perish utterly (68-). The minds of the NT writers were saturated with Hebrew notions, and their usage of language corresponds with this fact. Thus the 'presence of Pilate' (Ac 3¹³) means his seat of authority (cf. 5⁴¹); the 'presence of the Lord' is the source of all spiritual blessing (3¹⁹), of Divine authority (Lk 1¹⁹), and of eternal felicity (Jude 24); while the opposite is suggested in Rev 14¹⁰. God's presence, in a word, saves or damns those who are exposed to its searching radiance, according to their spiritual relation to Him.

2. It is, however, the positive suggestions of the phrase that require exposition. The presence of God (or of Christ who brought 'life and incorruption to light through the gospel,' 2 Ti 1¹⁰) means in apostolic literature all that is implied in the revelation of His nature, and the instrumentalities of His grace. In the OT that presence was largely mediated through nature and Providence (cf. Job and the Psalms passim); in the NT this aspect has largely faded into the background, probably as a result of the Deistic attitude of later Judaism, which substituted cultus or worship (especially in the form of a mass of liturgical and ceremonial acts and processes) as the chief medium of the approach of man to God, or of God to man. God Himself became remote, His very name was avoided. Belief in a present Deity, glad faith in a God who manifests Himself in actual experience is found only in such exalted experiences as the Maccabean struggle. Men tried to bridge the chasm by angels, especially natural guardian angels, and by such quasi-personalities, quasi-abstracts as the Wisdom, the Word, Shekinah of Glory, the Spirit of God. But all such efforts were far from successful. What differentiated the heightened spiritual consciousness of the primitive Church was its assurance that in Jesus Christ God had come near to man in a new and living way. This fact is expressed with matchless felicity in St. John's words ('we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father), full of grace and truth' (1¹⁴), and in St. Paul's 'God' hath 'shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 4⁶). The same idea is given in

He 1³, 'God . . . hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son, . . . being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance.' To His immediate disciples the physical person of Christ was evidently full of attractiveness and power, because of the spiritual radiance that shone from His presence; they afterwards dwelt lovingly in thought on the expression of His face, on His looks and gestures, which must have been eloquent of His inner disposition, thoughts, and purposes; and they afterwards found a deep mystical significance in these things as they brooded on His words and dealings with them. It was the Resurrection-life of Jesus that provided the interpretative light in which all His earthly life was transfigured in the memory of His immediate circle of friends, and which brought home the real meaning of His dealings with them in the days of His flesh.

3. This personal objective nearness of God in the 'presence' of Christ as mirrored in the Gospels, becomes in the Epistles a subjective nearness in the souls of believers. Christ dwells in their hearts by faith (Eph 3¹⁷); they 'have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; through whom also we have had our access by faith into this grace wherein we stand'; they 'rejoice in hope of the glory of God' (a synonym for His radiant favouring presence, Ro 5²), and Christ who is the 'image and glory of God' (1 Co 11⁷) becomes at last in them 'the hope of glory,' i.e. of a blessed immortality (Col 1²⁷). This indwelling presence of God in human hearts is not the mere 'inner light' of which the mystics speak, but that light made opulent with all the spiritual content for which Christ stands. It is a Life within the life, a Self within the self, a Divine presence enriching and irradiating the recesses of the soul with its high benefit and power. St. Paul is perpetually conscious of this new element in his life which, when he first had it, made him 'a new creature,' and which made 'all things new' to him (2 Co 5¹⁷ [καίριος = 'fresh,' 'bright,' 'glittering']). Whether he speaks of the believer being in Christ (Col 1²), or of Christ being in him (v. 2⁷), or of being together with Christ (Eph 2⁵; cf. 2¹²), he is referring to the same supreme experience in its various aspects. This personal fellowship of the Risen Lord around and within him becomes at last a permeative and enfolding presence in virtue of which he becomes identified with Him 'in inmost nearness,' as when he says, 'I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2²⁰). The mystical sense of oneness with Christ is the highest and most distinctive experience of the Christian life. It is seen in its purity only in the very finest saints, such as Origen, Athanasius, Augustine, Abelard, Tauler, Luther, Wesley; but all true believers know it more or less in proportion to their spiritual sensitiveness, and to their faithfulness in cultivating the 'practice of the presence of God' in their hearts. This experience has naturally found abundant expression in our hymns, e.g. in Eliza Scudder's

'Thou life within my life, than self more near,
Thou veiled Presence infinitely clear,
From all illusive shows of sense I flee,
To find my centre and my rest in Thee'
(Worship Song, line 156 ff.).

4. Rich and glowing as such experiences are, they are by no means exclusively mediated through isolation. The NT, indeed, enforces and illustrates the truth that the presence of God is often most vividly apprehended when a community of disciples, whether they be few or many, meet in His name for fellowship, praise, and edification. There are collective experiences to which the recluse is a stranger, and the monk, whether he live in a cell or walk the fields instead of joining with those who assemble themselves together, shuts himself off from some of the highest possibilities. The early Christian churches, though comprising many who were but 'babes in Christ' and were far from maturity in ethical and spiritual matters, were happy in the united exercise of their gifts and in the reality of the Divine presence which characterized their meetings for worship. In marked contrast to the OT nothing is said in the NT of church buildings, hardly anything about the conduct of worship, and there is a striking absence of regulations regarding rites and ceremonies. But the real thing is there—the presence of God, without which the most magnificent architecture, the most elaborate ritual are a vain show. We remember how St. Paul would have the Corinthian Christians worship in such a fashion that if the man in the street chanced to drop in to one of their services he should be 'reproved by all . . . judged by all,' so that the secrets of his heart should be made manifest, 'and so he will fall down on his face and worship God, declaring that God is among [or in] you indeed' (1 Co 14²⁴). Such an event is indeed connected by the Apostle with 'prophecy,' or, as we should call it, preaching, but it is not only, perhaps not mainly, the sermon that thus overwhelmingly convinces the outsider of the presence of God in a people. Nor is it the observance of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, although therein, whatever be their varying conceptions of its mode and form, disciples of Christ frequently discern the Real Presence more fully than in any other act of worship or experience of everyday life. There is the sense of prayer and of fraternal union, the atmosphere of devotion and of brotherly love. These, added to a preaching of the Word of God which is alive and powerful, piercing and exposing, cleansing and comforting, are the signs and tokens of the presence of God in a community, and are visible not only to those within but to those without the circle.

5. Finally, there is in the NT consciousness a strong and eager forelooking to a higher experience still. The experience of believers on earth, while strengthened and uplifted by a sense of the presence of the Saviour through His spirit in the heart, and by the operation of His saving grace, yet lacks the precision and definiteness of a real personal presence. It is better than the objective fellowship of Jesus with His disciples which was limited by the disabilities of the flesh, for as He was then with them, He is now in them (Jn 14¹⁶); but it is not the perfect communion for which the soul craves in its highest moods. The Parousia or Second Coming of the Lord shaped itself to the imagination of primitive believers as a quasi-physical appearance of the Lord, in glory and great power 'in the clouds' and with a retinue of 'holy angels' (1 Th 4¹⁷; cf. Rev 1⁷ 'He cometh with the clouds; and every eye shall see him'; also Mt 16²⁷). In the later writings of St. Paul this cruder anticipation is spiritualized. He speaks of death as a door into the nearer presence of Christ (Ph 1²³ 'to be with Christ; for it is very far better'); he is 'willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be at home with the Lord' (2 Co 5⁸); and he warns his readers that all must 'be made manifest before the judgement-seat of Christ' to give an account of their earthly life (v. 10). In St. John this process of spiritualization is carried still further. There is no mention of any spectacular or objective Parousia. The 'Comforter' is promised as Christ's representative presence with His disciples after His departure to the Father (Jn 14¹⁸), while He remains with the Father, and makes preparation for the time when

His followers will rejoin Him, that where He is there they may be also (Jn 14¹⁻³). It may be said that while the hope of the Second Coming of Christ in the earlier sense has never died out of the Christian Church, the normal Christian attitude throughout the ages has been rather that mirrored in St. John than that suggested in 1 Th 4¹⁶⁻¹⁷ or 1 Co 15⁵¹. Believers hold firmly that while they have fellowship with Christ in the flesh, this is but a dim foretaste of the perfect fellowship that awaits the redeemed with their Saviour in the eternal world. We know nothing of the details of the life beyond the grave; it is enough to know that there Christ reigns even more surely and triumphantly than here, and that where He is there will be blessedness and fullness of life (Jn 10¹⁰), and a 'joy unspeakable and full of glory' (1 P 1⁸).

'To heaven's high city I direct my journey,
Whose spangled suburbs entertain mine eye;
Mine eye, by contemplation's great attorney,
Transcends the crystal pavement of the sky.
But what is heaven, great God, compared to Thee?
Without Thy presence, heaven's no heaven to me.

Without Thy presence, earth gives no reflection;
Without Thy presence, sea affords no treasure;
Without Thy presence, air's a rank infection;
Without Thy presence, heaven itself no pleasure.
If not possessed, if not enjoyed in Thee,
What's earth, or sea, or air, or heaven to me?'
(Francis Quarles, Divine Emblems, 1635).

PRICKS.—See GOAD.

PRIDE.—This word occurs thrice in the AV: in Mk 7²² as the rendering of ὑπερηφανία, in 1 Jn 2¹⁶ of ἀλαζόνεια, in 1 Ti 3⁶ as the rendering ('lifted up with pride') of τυφώω (the same verb is found in 1 Ti 6⁴, 'he is proud' [RV 'puffed up'], and in 2 Ti 3⁴, 'highminded' ['puffed up' RV]); it is formed from the substantive τύφος, 'smoke' or 'cloud,' which does not occur in the NT, but is found in the metaphorical use in 1 Clem. xiii. 1 along with ἀλαζόνεια and suggests the pride which beclouds the moral sense and destroys self-control). In 1 Co 13⁴, where we read that love 'vaunteth not itself' (οὐ περπερευεται, 'is not puffed up' (οὐ φυσιοῦνται), the first verb appears to denote the arrogant or forward manner of one who sounds his own praises, the latter (cf. 1 Co 4⁸) the disposition of self-conceit which loves pre-eminence.

The two words ὑπερηφανία and ἀλαζόνεια, with their corresponding adjectives, are common in the literature of the early Church: e.g., in Hermas, Mand. vi. ii. 5, both stand together as signs of the presence within the heart of 'the messenger of wickedness.' In Ro 1³⁰ with these is associated the epithet ὕβριστής (AV 'despiteful,' RV 'insolent'); but ὕβρις indicates the unrestrained insolence of wrong-doing (common in Greek tragedy) rather than pride in the strict sense: it is essentially the contempt of others breaking forth into acts of wantonness and outrage, and therefore the strongest word of the three in the scale of guilt. In distinguishing the pride of the ἀλάζων from that of the ὑπερήφανος, R. C. Trench (NT Synonyms, 1880, pp. 98–105) rightly refers the former to 'speech,' the latter to 'thought,' but not thought, it must be noted, as merely quiescent and passive. The pride of overmastering language is definitely brought out in the use of ἀλαζόνεια in such passages as Ja 4¹⁶ (AV 'boastings,' RV 'vauntings') and 1 Clem. xxi. 5; in 1 Jn 2¹⁶ Trench suggests that the Germ. Prahlerci is the most adequate rendering; the English 'pride' is too vague and colourless; and Beza's 'gloriosus' is a better rendering of ἀλάζων than Vulg. 'elatus.' On the other hand, ὑπερηφανία (Germ. Hochmuth) is a vice developed not so much in society as in the secrecy of the heart; none the less, it manifests itself in outward acts of arrogance, cruelty, and revengefulness. The 'proud' of Ja 4⁶, 1 P 5³, Pr 3³⁴ are those whose overweening treatment of others calls forth and merits the Divine antagonism.

B. F. Westcott (*Epistles of St. John*², 1886, p. 65) suggests that while ἀλαζονεία may be referred to a false view of what things are in themselves, empty and unstable—a sin against truth—υπερηφάνια is a sin against love as implying a false view of what our relations to other persons are. Thus, 'the vainglory of life' is a false view of the value of our possessions, and therefore ἀλαζονεία in 1 Jn 2¹⁶ is rightly associated with life (βίος) in its external and transient significance, not in its essential principle (ἡγή).

It may be noted that the verb καυχόμαι, with its corresponding nouns καύχημα and καύχησις (see art. BOASTING) is often used by St. Paul in a good sense to indicate the legitimate pride with which an apostle contemplates the effects of his ministry in the life and conduct of his converts (e.g. 2 Co 9², Ph 2¹⁶); it also expresses the sacred glorying of the inner life in God or Christ (e.g. 1 Co 1³¹, Ph 3³, and elsewhere)—a characteristic and very common Pauline expression.

The pride of racial exclusiveness, e.g. of Greek towards barbarian and especially of Jew towards Gentile, as done away in Christ, is a common theme with the same apostle; cf. Ro 10¹² (and argument of the whole chapter), Gal 3²³.

R. MARTIN POPE.

PRIEST.—Much of the ambiguity of the term arises from its use even in the RV to represent two different Greek words. The one is lepeús, a sacrificing priest, whose services were necessary in the ritual of any such religion as that of the ancient Jews. In other cases the term represents πρεσβύτερος, 'presbyter,' from which indeed it has been derived by a process of compressing the several syllables into one. Before our period it was in use both in Egypt and in Asia Minor to designate the members of a secular corporation, and in the former case also the members of a college of priests (Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, pp. 154 ff., 233 ff.), and its connotation had already come to refer to office and not to age. The implications of the word with either origin may be conveniently examined in its application in turn to Jewish officials, to Jesus Christ, to Christians generally, and to the ministry of the Church.

1. Use in regard to Jews.—The actual high priest of the day figures in Acts alone (4⁶ 7¹ 22³ 23⁴, etc.), whilst in Heb. the original and typical high priest, Aaron, is introduced for the purpose of comparison with the priest of the New Covenant. The term is used with some laxity even in Acts, as in 4⁶, where it is applied to Annas, whose son-in-law Caiaphas was the actual holder of the office. Apparently it covered the group of ex-high-priests, whose number varied with the frequent changes of appointment made by the Roman authorities, and was the style of address of the occupant of the chair at any important meeting of the Sanhedrin. The phrase 'chief priests,' again confined to Acts,* is of the same elastic kind. It included such officials probably as were 'of the kindred of the high priest' (Ac 4⁶), with such representatives of the priesthood as were prominent through ability or influence. Technically it was confined at first to the heads of the twenty-four courses; but the term was convenient and fluid, and when used loosely, embraced any priests whose character or status gave them a certain recognized authority. After the fall of Jerusalem they rapidly declined in influence through their loss of income and inability to discharge their sacrificial duties. But their priestly pedigree still remained a distinction, preserved by the incidence upon them of special prohibitions, though not investing them with any authority comparable in fact with that of the Rabbis, the masters and expounders of the Law. A sacrificial priest becomes an anachronism when his duties are in abeyance, and the opportunity for their discharge is but a hope always deferred.

2. The priesthood of Jesus Christ.—According to apostolic teaching, Jesus Christ (a) gathered to Himself all the ideas essential to the conception of a sacerdotal person or ministry; (b) particularly was the antitype, in regard alike to qualification and to function, of all the distinctive features of the Jewish institution, but stood eternally above all His predecessors, closing the line of development in Himself in such a final and complete way that no other priest is needed, and no real want of the human soul is left unmet.

(a) In the earliest times the priestly was a part of the parental function, but was so far separable from it that any adult man was held to be able to approach God for himself with offerings or prayers, and after due preparation to communicate Divine responses to others. Gradually the offices were differentiated. Access to God in aspiration and vow remained the recognized privilege of every man, while in the case of sacrificial duties, of everything that belonged to the deep religious life and to the promptings begotten of the consciousness of an actual or imminent breach in right relation with God, resort was had to an official class or family. In the course of time the members of this class were invested with a quasi-sacred dignity, and were regarded as intermediaries between God and man. On the one hand, they were the representatives of man to God, and through them only could offerings be made that would expiate sin or propitiate an offended Deity. They were the custodians of the prescribed ritual, the acknowledged mediators. On the other hand, they were the representatives of God to man; and, however this character may have been claimed or possessed by the prophets, the prophets were rather preachers of righteousness, and not directly concerned with the administration of institutional religion. The priest presented the sacrifice to God, and blessed the people 'in the name of the Lord' (Dt 21⁵), settling difficult perplexities and sending men away from the altar with the assurance of Divine grace and help. For Jesus Christ as Priest and High Priest the NT claims this doubly representative character. The phrase 'appointed for men in things pertaining to God' (He 2¹⁷ 5¹) suggests, if it does not actually cover, 'appointed for God in things pertaining to man.' He offers Himself, as representing man, as a sacrifice for man. Between God and man there is only 'one mediator, himself man' (1 Ti 2⁵), who gave Himself a ransom for all, and in whom men are blessed with every spiritual blessing (Eph 1³). As representative of God, He reveals the Father, and gives men in Himself the sum of all benediction. As representative of men, He approaches God with an adequate offering, and continues permanently to act as our Paraclete or Advocate (1 Jn 2¹)—an office which includes, though it is not confined to, His priestly work.

The NT is far from silent in regard to the conditions of His appointment as Priest and Representative. He was not self-appointed, nor on the other hand was He selected and chosen by those whom He represents. The latter course was impossible in the case of a priesthood affecting all generations, future and past as well as present; and the former would have been open to all the objections, and liable to all the defects, that attach to every assumption of the right to speak or act for others. The appointment was made by the Father (He 5⁴), and the action of the Son was not that of initiation but of loving and resolute consent (10^{7a}, 1 Jn 5²⁰). He needed no constraint, and was more than ready to undertake a priesthood that involved the pains of a life upon earth and death for men. Love, resolute from the beginning and persisted in through all difficulty and human unresponsiveness, is the explanation of the Incarnation on His part, and a fundamental qualification for priesthood.

* In the Didache the title is given to the prophets, who are represented as pronouncing the blessing at the Eucharist in such words as they pleased. But the question of the date and trustworthiness of this part of the document has lately been reopened, and a date within our century is impossible (see C. Bigg, The Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles, 1893, and especially J. Armitage Robinson, JThSt xiii. [1911-12] 339 ff.).

If it be asked, What is it exactly that constitutes the representative character of Christ? or Why did the Father appoint Him and no other? apostolic thought suggests several replies, that give prominence in turn to the typical, the federal, and the immanent relation of Christ to man. He is the antitype of Adam, between whose relation to the race and that of Christ a striking parallel, with a more striking contrast, may be drawn (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹ 1 Co 15^{21f. 45ff.}). The one was the medium of sin and death, the other of redemption and life; and as the one stands for a race sinful before God, so, in virtue of what He does for the race, lifting men up to higher spiritual privileges than the unfallen Adam ever knew, the other is even a fitter representative. These typical representations of Christ's Headship of the race have at times to be modified into His Headship of the Church on account of the different attitudes towards Him that men assume (Col 1¹⁸, Eph 1^{22f.}, 1 Jn 2²), and are strengthened by various federal considerations. He brings the race into unity, especially by His priestly exercise of sympathy and brotherliness (He 2¹⁰⁻¹⁷ 4^{14f.}), and creates human solidarity by the common tie of brotherhood, binding each individual to Himself (Jn 17²³). Thereby again He is qualified to act for all; and an effective motive is secured for unlimited forbearance among men and for mutual kindness and helpfulness of every degree.

But deep down at its foundations the representative character of Christ rests not so much upon His ethical qualities and their exhibition and effects, or upon typical connexions with OT beliefs, as upon what He actually is, upon His intrinsic and essential nature. He is God as well as man, and as God He is immanent in every man, and thereby naturally qualified to act as his representative. This is implied in the frequent references to the indwelling of Christ as a racial fact, which becomes when recognized a source of assurance and strength, to the universal Fatherhood and Sonship, and to the action of the Holy Spirit in leaving no man without internal witness and preventive grace. Not only are we insphered in God (Ac 17²⁸), but we are the shrine in which His Spirit dwells (1 Co 3¹⁶ 6¹⁹; cf. Ro 8^{9f.}), dishonoured and powerless, or allowed to rule, and leading on to perfection. All the differentiations of the universe, personal or impersonal, were produced by Christ from an original unity, of which He was the centre (Col 1^{15ff.}), just as again they will eventually be gathered up into a unity in Him (Eph 1¹⁰). Meanwhile 'in him all things consist,' or hold together; and Christ is thus the secret of the world's order and the natural representative of the race in the presence of God. In the apostolic period it was too soon to discuss at length the relations between the Divinity and the humanity of Christ, or to recover the doctrine of immanence from the pantheistic schools and apply it to the solution of the problems of Christ's work. Yet the germs are distinctly present, and one part of St. Paul's writings guards and completes the teaching of another. Christ as Priest is the substitute and representative of man, not by any arbitrary appointment on the part of God, still less by a legal fiction with which there is no correspondence in actual fact, but because as God He is immanent in every man, and therefore in His nature the fit and only Person to act in the behalf and stead of all. As God-Man He stands in virtue of what He is between the two parties to be brought together, and represents perfectly each to the other.

(b) Since the apostolic teaching sprang immediately out of Jewish conceptions, it was to be expected that it would represent the Priesthood of Christ specifically as a continuation of the sacerdotal ministry of the OT, and knit the two together as a preparation with the fulfilment, or as provisional with the ideal (He 8⁵ 9^{23ff.}) and permanent. This it does in respect alike to the priestly qualifications and to the priestly functions of Christ. To the qualifications already referred to—(1) Divine appointment and (2) sympathy—several are added. The list begins with (3) His perfect humanity, involving oneness with the men for whom He acts, with the experience in His case as in theirs of the discipline of suffering and temptation (He 2^{9f.} 4¹⁵). (4) In personal character He was holy and guileless (He 7²⁶, 1 P 3¹⁸, Ac 3¹⁴), not only free from moral disqualification, but an example of virtue and godliness, with a personal right of access to God. (5) This freedom from limitations extends beyond the range of morality to all the infirmities to which man is subject (He 7²⁶ 5²), and lifts Christ altogether above the Aaronic order. A better comparison is suggested by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews; see MELCHIZEDEK. The Priesthood of Christ is royal from the beginning, and still He sits 'on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens' (8¹). (6) Its timelessness and indissolubility arise from Christ's triumph over death (Ro 6^{8f.}, He 7^{26f.}), and render any delegation of His priestly duties unnecessary, and any succession to His office impossible. Because 'he ever liveth to make intercession,' salvation 'to the uttermost' (7²⁵) is a gift He can bestow at any moment upon the sincere and strenuous. Other priestly aids become superfluous and an encumbrance. (7) Finally, the offering He presents is perfect both in itself (Gal 1⁴, Eph 5², He 9¹⁴⁻²⁴) and in its value and effect (Ro 5²¹ 6^{9f.}, He 9^{23ff.} 10¹⁻¹⁴⁻¹⁸, Tit 2¹⁴).

Of the actual priestly work of Christ two views are combined, according as it is regarded as reaching its supreme point on the Cross or as still continuing; and in either relation it may be considered under various aspects.

(1) Prominence is given in the NT to the fact that the offering of Christ was expiatory. It stands in a line with the sacrificial institutions of the OT, and even takes up into itself the meaning of each. It is a burnt-offering (Eph 5², Ph 4¹⁸), a sin-offering (2 Co 5²¹), a peace-offering (Eph 2¹⁴, Col 1²⁰), and it moves easily amid the implications of the Passover and Day of Atonement (1 Co 5^{7f.}, He 9^{7. 12-14. 24ff.}). The very variety of the typical sacrifices, handled and offered by our Priest, tells of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and of the primary need of expiation through the shedding of blood (He 9²², Eph 1⁷) as the ground of remission.

(2) From this idea of such a treatment of sin as destroys its offensiveness, wiping it out or neutralizing its relation to natural justice, it is but a step to that of propitiation. By linking His offering with our sin our Priest removes the necessity for a Divine reaction in our condemnation, and even propitiates God, i.e. takes away the hindrances to the manifestation of His goodwill, and enables His grace to exhibit itself in forgiveness (Ro 3^{25f.}, He 2¹⁷, 1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰; cf. Lk 18¹³). As the passages show, propitiation is not regarded as a priestly act by which love is excited in God, for God devised it and arranged its method, but as an act so altering the condition of the sinner that the unchanged love is able to exhibit itself and stream out upon him. His sin, and not merely his creatureliness, is rendered inoperative and null; and the active goodwill of God is the natural response to Him who substituted Himself in sacrifice, and to those for whom He acts.

(3) Hence complete reconciliation between God and man is rightly viewed as the culmination of Christ's priestly work upon earth. In effecting it He removes altogether the alienation in heart and will of man from God, and the alienation, under the necessities of His perfect nature, of God from sinful man. Of these two aspects of His priestly work, the one is explicit in Scripture (Ro 5^{10c}, 11¹⁵, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²⁰, Col 1⁻¹), the other is present in frequent logical implication. Not only is reconciliation itself a mutual process, involving a changed sentiment on either side (cf. Mt 5²³, where the advice is to do everything to turn a brother's coolness or resentment into forgiveness), but God's attitude changes from apparent displeasure to evident pleasure (Ro 8^{3, 16c}), from accumulating wrath to wonder-awakening grace (2 Th 1^{9, 10}). He provides the means whereby forgiveness may be granted without moral harm, and, the means being used, His unchangeable nature reacts accordingly, and the love that is outraged but not quenched by sin becomes the most assured feature of His relationship with the penitent. Thus the Priestly Mediator covers the sin of man with His sacrifice, enables a God who is compacted of all moral perfections to act without denying the legitimate rights of any of them, and, breaking down all non-moral distinctions, makes men everywhere one by making each severally in the enrichment of his faith one with God (Eph 2^{14c}, Col 1^{10c}).

(4) To this whole process from its beginning in the experience of the regenerate to the ultimate perfecting, as anticipated by St. Paul, the term 'redemption' is freely applied. Redemption is thus the result either of the offering by the priest of a propitiatory gift in satisfaction for a forfeited life, or of the payment of the required price for the release of a person from servitude (1 P 1^{18c}, Ac 20²⁸). The servitude is variously represented as captivity to sin (He 9²⁶), with its accompanying curse (Gal 3¹³) or with its penal liabilities (He 2^{14c}). The price paid by the Priest is Himself (Gal 1⁴, Tit 2¹⁴); and that is what the references to His life (Mt 20²⁸) and to His blood (Eph 1⁷, Rev 5⁹) really mean. Thereby He binds men to Himself as His property (1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³); and to His rights of ownership, as to their obligation of devoted service, there is no limit.

(5) At His death the sacrificial part of Christ's priestly work was completed (He 7²⁷ 9²⁸); and after His ascension He entered (6²⁰ 9^{12, 24}, Eph 4¹⁰) and 'passed through the heavens' (He 4¹⁴) to the very presence of God (9²⁴), where from His throne on the right hand (He 1³ 8¹) He continues to act as the Priestly Representative of men, interceding for them (7²⁵, Ro 8³⁴), Himself the permanently valid propitiation for their sins (1 Jn 2²), and therefore the triumphant Advocate of the case of every one in fellowship with Him.

3. The priesthood of believers.—It has been seen already that, according to early belief, all sacrificial institutions and ministries were gathered up into Jesus Christ, whose Priesthood is complete, admitting no rivalry, with no residue of opportunity or work for a successor. Yet metaphorically the sacrificial term is applied to the whole Christian community, irrespective of office or any other distinction (1 P 2^{5, 9}), and also with implications of future enlargement (Rev 1⁶ 5¹⁰ 20⁶). Thus the conception of Israel in Ex 19⁶ is transferred to the community of believers, whose priestly rights are common and equal, whatever administrative grades are introduced with a view to efficiency and order. To all alike the priestly privilege of access to God belongs (Ro 5², Eph 2¹⁸, He 4¹⁶ 10¹⁹, 1 P 3¹⁸). All alike are called upon to offer spiritual sacrifices of praise and prayer (Rev 10³), of body and soul (Ro 12¹, He 13¹⁵), with such actual gifts in charity and helpfulness as are prompted by love to God (He 13¹⁶, 2 Co 9¹, Ph 4¹³). Nothing of this kind is an offering for sin, the virtue of that made by Christ being inexhaustible. No longer does any distinct priestly class or caste mediate between God and man; but the priestly functions and status, in a strict sense reserved entirely to the Saviour, pass over, as far as they can pass over, to the whole body of believers, each of whom has the indefeasible right of access to God through Christ alone. Of himself the individual has to give account, and no artificial system of mediation prevents him from standing in personal and incommunicable responsibility before God.

4. The priestly theory of the Christian ministry.—It follows that this theory is without direct Scriptural warrant. The word used for the office is πρεσβύτερος, from which sacrificial associations are absent, and never ιερεύς, from which such associations are inseparable.

(a) No argument can be based upon the passages in which compounds of that term or cognate expressions occur. The nearest is probably Ro 15¹⁶ RVm: 'a minister of Jesus Christ unto the Gentiles, ministering in sacrifice the gospel of God.' Here the sacrificial allusions are unquestionable but entirely figurative. St. Paul is a λειτουργός, i.e. one who performs functions that are sacred inasmuch as they serve the needs of the community, whether viewed as an ecclesiastical (1 Ch 16⁴, He 10¹¹ 8⁻) or a social (Nu 18², Sir 10²⁵, 2 Co 9¹⁹) unit. In such a sense priests may be said to minister in the house of God (2 Es 20³⁶), or the 'ministers' may be distinguished from the priests (2 Es 20³⁹). The word may be used of the work of prophets and teachers (Ac 13²), and even of the ministry of the rich to the poor (Ro 9¹² 15²⁷); and its technical use in non-sacrificial connexions is well authenticated. St. Paul accordingly applies the term to himself as a minister of Christ to the Gentiles, and by a familiar figure compares his functions with those of a sacrificing priest, the offering which he presents being that of converted men. Each of them in a figure presents himself as a sacrifice (Ro 12¹), their apostle in a figure presents them all. But that the ministry of the Church is in some special sense priestly and sacrificial is not said and not to be inferred. Similarly with Ph 2¹⁷—'If I am offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith'—the metaphor does not make St. Paul the priest, but the Philippians themselves, while their faith with the accompanying works is the sacrifice. So great is the Apostle's eagerness to help them that he is ready to die for Christ's sake in their behalf, or, as he puts it, to have his blood poured out as a libation, according to the practice in the heathen rites with which they were familiar (see Lightfoot, in loc.).

(b) This silence of Scripture in regard to the priestly character of the ministry is not relieved by an assumed identification of the ministry with the priests of Judaism or by the assumption of a parallel between them. There is no such parallel, as far as our period is concerned; for the line of typological development from the OT conception, as we have seen, runs up directly to Jesus Christ and terminates in Him, while the circle of analogy encompasses all the faithful, investing them with common privileges and the same obligations, and recognizing no distinction between the classes of clergy and of laity. All alike are priests of God, required each to present himself a living sacrifice; and the priestly work of Christ is so completely done that the intervention of any official to repair or supplement it is superfluous in regard to man and an undesigned relexion upon the Saviour.

(c) It is the non-sacrificial term 'presbyter' that is consistently used in the NT as the chief and technical designation of a Christian minister. Other officials of lower rank, and, in later centuries, of higher rank, were appointed in the interest of fitness and efficiency (1 Co 14⁴⁰); but to none of them did sacerdotal functions appertain. The ministers of a congregation, whether engaged in teaching or administration (1 Ti 5¹⁷), were called elders or presbyters, probably in imitation of the practice of the synagogue (Ac 11³⁰ 14²³ 15²). For this term 'bishops' was sometimes substituted in churches where Hellenistic influence was strong (Ac 20²⁸, Ph 1¹, 1 Ti 3¹, Tit 1⁷, 1 P 5¹⁻²), the new term being familiar to the people as the title of the presiding official in their local confraternities and guilds. In NT times and afterwards the terms were interchangeable (1 Clem. 21, 42, 44), and for either substitutes could be used. The holders of the office were responsible rulers (Ro 12⁸, 1 Th 5¹², He 13²⁴, 1 Clem. 1), stewards of God (Tit 1⁷), messengers of the churches (2 Co 8²³), ministers (1 Ti 4⁶), and servants (Ph 1¹) of Christ Jesus; but of sacrificial duties they had none, and in sacerdotal rank they ranged with the laity, whose worship they shared and conducted, and over whose faith they watched. Of actual altar and literal sacrifice since Christ died there is no need; for even the altar of He 13¹⁰ is that of Christ, on which each Christian must offer for himself the sacrifice of praise (He 13¹⁵) and good works. In all such things the minister should be an ensample (1 Ti 4¹², Tit 2⁷, 1 P 5³); but with the passing away of the sacrificial ritual there ceased also the need and the possibility of any sacerdotal or vicarious activities. For the sake of order, the minister still leads and represents the people, and speaks with authority when he proclaims the word of God; but he is himself one of them, separated from them by no personal quality or privilege whatever. He has no offering to make in anybody's behalf except his own, and no immunity or personal sanctity except such as arises from his own relation to God.

(d) Nor is there any trace in the Apostolic Age of the emergence of a ministerial theory to which the sacerdotal factor was integral. (1) The apostles proper never claimed either to be or to appoint priestly officers. Their specific work was to bear the witness of their senses to the historical Christ (Ac 1²¹, 1 Jn 1¹⁻³); and while they were shrewd enough to take steps for the effective organization of the little groups of disciples they attracted, they never pretended to link on to the new Church any fragments of a sacrificial system that was in their opinion outworn and spent. (2) Or, if it be assumed that the ministerial office soon began to be conceived as the result of a fusion of apostolic and presbyteral functions, as there was no priestly element in either of the original constituents, there could be none in their conflation. If, consequently, such an element subsequently appeared, its introduction must have been surreptitious, and a legitimate descent from Scriptural teaching cannot be claimed. The minister was regarded as a priest in no other sense than was every disciple. Every disciple had access through Christ to God, and was charged with the priestly function of evangelism or the establishment of real contact between man and God. When the communities became organized, suitable disciples were appointed to the various offices; and the appointment to at least the presbyterate involved three concurrent actions—the commission of God (Ro 10⁵, 1 Co 9¹⁰; cf. Jn 17¹⁸), and selection by church leaders or 'men of repute,' with the consent of the church (Ac 14²³ 15²⁷, 1 Ti 2², Tit 1⁵, 1 Clem. 44). But while such appointment carried the right to preside at the Eucharist and other church meetings, it added no priestly quality or prerogative to those which the minister already as a disciple possessed.

PRINCE.—This is the rendering of two Gr. words in the NT, viz. ἀρχηγός and ἀρχων. The translation 'prince' is assigned to ἀρχηγός in two passages in Acts, viz. 31^{4c}, 'desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of life' (AVm and RVm 'Author'); and 5³¹, 'Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour.' In the latter passage the title evidently denotes the royal dignity to which Jesus has been raised by the Resurrection; but in the other quotation ἀρχηγός τῆς ζωῆς rather refers to His work as Saviour, and thus the marginal translation is preferable. He is the Author of life in the sense that He is the Mediator to others of eternal life (cf. He 2¹⁰, ἀρχηγὸν τῆς σωτηρίας αὐτῶν [AV and RVm 'captain of their salvation', RV 'author'], and 5⁹, αὐτοῦ σωτηρίας αἰωνίου [AV and RV 'author of eternal salvation', RVm 'cause']). The title 'author of life' is specially suggestive in the passage in Acts in virtue of the contrast it presents to the 'murderer' whom they desired instead.

The title 'Prince' (ἀρχων) is applied to Jesus Christ in Rev 1⁵, 'firstborn' (RV 'firstborn') of the dead, and the prince (RV 'ruler') of the kings of the earth' (cf. Ps 89²⁷). In virtue of the Resurrection Jesus has been exalted to Divine Lordship (cf. Mt 28¹⁸, Ph 2⁹). The title 'prince of the kings of the earth' corresponds to the 'King of kings and Lord of lords' of Rev 17¹⁴ 19¹⁶. It is characteristic of Rev., with its transference to the Christ of the attributes of the theocratic king, to emphasize the sovereignty of the Exalted Christ over all earthly potentates.

There are two other passages in the apostolic writings in which ἀρχων is translated 'prince.' In one, Eph 2², 'the prince of the power of the air' (ὁ ἀρχων τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος), the reference is plainly to Satan. ἐξουσία is here used collectively to denote the whole array of the hosts of evil. These are conceived as having their dwelling in the air, i.e. midway between heaven and earth (cf. 6¹, τὰ πνευματικά τῆς πορνείας ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις). The other passage is 1 Co 2⁶. There is difference of opinion as to who are 'the princes of this world' (RV 'rulers of this world', RVm 'age') here referred to. There are some who see merely a reference to those who through birth, culture, and power hold a high place in the esteem of their fellows. But others find in the passage an allusion to the evil spirits to which there was a tendency in later

Judaism to assign part at least of the government of the world. These spirits are represented as having brought about the death of Christ in their blind ignorance of the Divine wisdom. Had they known the Lord of glory, they would never have committed such a fatal mistake.

PRINCE OF THE POWER OF THE AIR.—See AIR.

PRINCIPALITY, PRINCIPALITIES (ἀρχή, 'the first place, principality, rule, magistracy' [Grimm-Thayer]).—In the Epistles the Gr. word occurs four times in the singular in this sense (1 Co 15²⁴, Eph 1⁻¹, Col 2¹⁰, Jude⁶), and six times in the plural (Ro 8³⁸, Eph 3¹⁰ 6¹², Col 1¹⁸ 2¹⁵, Tit 3¹). The AV gives 'principalities' uniformly for the latter, and 'principality' in two of the former, preferring 'rule' in 1 Co 15²⁴, and 'first estate' in Jude⁶. The RV appears to use 'principality' only where the reference to angelic beings is undoubted; it gives 'rulers' in Tit 3¹, and 'rule' in 1 Co 15⁻¹ and Eph 1¹, where earthly powers may be included (T. K. Abbott thinks that this applies also to Col 1¹⁸). So in Lk 12¹¹ 20²⁰ the RV gives 'rulers' and 'rule.'

For the term as used of angels compare certain passages in Daniel (10¹³ 12¹), where Michael is called the 'prince' of the Jews (LXX ἀρχων), and there is also a hostile angel, 'the prince of the kingdom of Persia.'

It is convenient to consider in this article the various special terms applied to angels in the Epistles, viz. thrones (θρόνοι), dominions (κυριότητες), principalities (ἀρχαί), authorities (ἐξουσίαι), and powers (δυνάμεις).

Ro 8³⁸—'angels, principalities, powers.'

1 Co 15²⁴—'rule (ἀρχή), authority, power.'

Eph 1⁻¹—'rule (ἀρχή), authority, power, dominion.'

Eph 3¹⁰ 6¹²—'principalities, powers.'

Col 1¹⁸—'thrones, dominions, principalities, powers.'

Col 2¹⁰—'principality, power.'

1 P 3²²—'angels, authorities, powers.'

The contexts show that in some of the above passages all possible kinds of power, spiritual and earthly, are included; in some the reference is limited to good angels, and in others to evil angels, as Eph 6¹². It may be noted that Milton uses these titles for unfallen and fallen angels alike (Paradise Lost, ii. 11 and v. 601, 769).

Do these titles correspond to any objective revelation in the minds of the writers? Lightfoot's opinion, which Abbott (on Eph 1²¹) adopts without any hesitation, is that 'in this catalogue [Col 1¹⁸] St. Paul does not profess to describe objective realities, but contents himself with repeating subjective opinions.' The Apostle takes the terms used by Colossian teachers and does not inquire how much or how little truth is in them; Christ is elevated above them all. Salmond (on Eph 1²¹) says that we must take the terms not as teaching or implying any doctrine of graduated ranks, but as rhetorical terms brought together to express the unique supremacy and absolute sovereignty proper to Christ. And Beet (on Col 1¹⁸) states that 'in this verse . . . the existence of angelic powers is not absolutely assumed. Paul merely says that if there be such, be they what they may, they were created in the Son of God.' If the terms were found only in Col., where a tendency to angel worship had to be met, this might be admitted, but similar terms are found in Eph., where there is no such polemical reference, and elsewhere. On the other side may be quoted Ellicott (on Col 1¹⁸), who holds that it is by no means so certain as it is assumed to be that St. Paul is simply repeating subjective opinions; there is nothing to show that he regarded these grades and orders as mere theological speculations. Peake says: 'in face of the detailed proof that St. Paul accepted the doctrine of various orders of angels, Lightfoot's remark (on Col 1¹⁸) that a spirit of impatience is shown cannot be maintained, nor is there any polemical reference in Eph 1²¹'; and Moule's opinion is that 'St. Paul is glorifying the Son of God by a view of His relation to created being; and assuredly this would not be best done by alluding to phases of created being which might all the while be figments of the imagination.' St. Paul's experience (2 Co 12⁻¹) must not be forgotten, and Alexander says that not without reason has a Greek Father (St. Gregory, in Hom. in Ezek. 8) found in these glowing words a probable reminiscence of that which was actually beheld by him who was 'caught up to the third heaven.'

A further question is—Can anything be inferred from the order in which these terms occur? No list contains them all; Eph 1²¹ and Col 1¹⁸ have four each, but they are not the same four, and while 'dominion' is last in Eph. it is second in Col. Fritzsche and Meyer think that in Col. the superior and inferior classes form pairs, but this is precarious. It may be noted, however, that principalities, authorities, and powers (ἀρχαί, ἐξουσίαι, δυνάμεις) always occur in the same order; one may be omitted, but they are never reversed. It is quite possible that in Col. the Apostle is following the order of the false teachers. The Rabbis had a classification of ten orders (see Fritzsche on Ro 8³⁸ 39), but it was elaborated under the influence of Platonism, and evidently at a later date than St. Paul (Meyer). The names, too, are quite different from those of the NT. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Levi, 3) arranges the angels in seven heavens, placing powers (δυνάμεις τῶν παρεμβολῶν) in the third, and thrones and authorities in the fourth. The Slavonic Enoch (xx. 1) says that in the seventh heaven 'Enoch saw . . . all the fiery hosts of great archangels, and incorporeal powers, and lordships, and principalities, and powers: cherubim and seraphim, thrones and the watchfulness of many eyes' (quoted in Peake, Colossians).

Turning to Christian writings, we find that various systems of angelology were put forward, but it is difficult to say how far they are independent of St. Paul. From Hermas (Vis. iii. 4) we learn that instruction as to the positions of angels (τοιοῦθας τὰς ἀγγελικὰς) was regarded as teaching for the more perfect. The lists given by the Fathers vary. Thus Origen (on Jn 1³⁴) gives thrones, principalities, dominions, authorities, adding that there are other names not so familiarly in use (cf. Eph 1⁻¹); but in de Principiis (I. v. 3, vi. 2) he gives in an ascending scale a different order—principalities, authorities, thrones, dominions. Ephrem Syrus (Op. Syr. i. 270) arranges them in three classes: (1) gods, thrones, dominions; (2) archangels, principalities, authorities; (3) angels, powers, cherubim, seraphim. The same order appears in Basil of Seleucia (Orat. 39). Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. xxviii. 31) mentions angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, principalities, authorities, splendours, ascents, intellectual powers or intelligences. The pseudo-Dionysius gives (1) thrones, cherubim, seraphim; (2) authorities, dominions, powers; (3) angels, archangels, principalities. And Gregory the Great (Hom. in Ezek. xxxiv. 7) has the following classes—angels, archangels, powers, authorities, principalities, dominions, thrones, cherubim, and seraphim.

These variations will confirm the opinion of St. Augustine when he says (Enchir. 58): 'what the organization is of that supremely happy society in heaven: what the differences of rank are, . . . and what are the various significations of those four names under which the apostle seems to embrace the whole heavenly company without exception, "whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers":—let those who are able answer these questions, if they can also prove their answers to be true; but as for me, I confess my ignorance.' Meyer's conclusion is that for Christian faith there remains and suffices the testimony as to different and distinctively designated stages and categories in the angelic world (cf. Mt 18¹⁰), while any attempt to ascertain more than is written in Scripture passes into the fanciful domain of theosophy (on Col 1¹⁶).

Two of the above passages require a more detailed examination, viz. Col 2¹⁵, Ro 8³⁸. In Col 2¹⁵ (RV 'having put off from himself the principalities and the powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it'; AV 'having spoiled') there is hardly a phrase the meaning of which is undisputed. The Greek is ἀπεκδυσάμενος τὰς ἀρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἐξουσίας ἐδείγματίσεν ἐν παρρησίᾳ, θριαμβεύσας αὐτοὺς ἐν αὐτῷ. ἀπεκδυσάμενος is a rare word which does not appear to occur before St. Paul (though Meyer thinks it is the right reading in Plato, Rep. 612A); and being middle it should mean 'having put off from himself' (cf. Old Lat. exuens se principatibus): so the RV. The older EVV, following the Vulg., give it the active meaning 'having spoiled,' which is preferred by Bengel, Meyer, Moule, and Peake. It is admitted that the middle is a difficulty, but it is explained as implying victorious self-interest (sibi exspolians). It might apply to good or bad angels, according to the context. If, with the RV, we take it in the natural middle meaning, the next questions are—What was put off? and Who is the subject? Many of the Greek Fathers and others say that the evil angels were put off, that the Lord by His death stripped away all the opposing powers of evil which sought to win a victory over Him in His human nature. 'When He died on the cross, when He dissolved that temple into which they, both in earlier, and later and perhaps redoubled efforts of temptation, had vainly endeavoured to make sacrilegious entry, He reft them away for ever, and vindicated His regal power' (Ellicott). There are two objections to this view. (1) When and in what sense did Christ wear these opposing powers as a robe? Lightfoot says that 'the powers of evil, which had clung like a Nessus robe about His humanity, were torn off and cast aside for ever'; on which Beet's criticism is: 'I do not know that enemies attacking are ever so described: and of such desperate struggle with evil powers we have as yet in this place no hint.' (2) It necessitates a change of subject, of which the context gives no intimation; in vv. 11–13, 14 the subject is God the Father, and no one would think of changing it but for the difficulty of otherwise giving to 'principalities and powers' the meaning of evil angels. The common interpretation of the Latin Fathers was 'putting off from Himself His body' (see RVm), and it found its way into the text of G (τὴν σάρκα καὶ τὰς ἐξουσίας, ἀρχὰς being omitted; 'having laid aside His flesh, He made a show of the powers'). The introduction of the metaphor is very abrupt, and there is again the change of subject.

But it is possible to keep the middle meaning of ἀπεκδυσάμενος, and the same subject throughout, if 'principalities and powers' are good angels. This was first suggested by J. Peirce (in *A Paraphrase and Notes on Colossians*², 1729) and adopted by Alford, Ritschl, Beet, Findlay, and Peake. It is consistent with 2¹⁰ and 1¹⁶, where good angels are meant, and there is no allusion in the Epistle to hostile angels. Peirce's paraphrase is, 'and having taken from the good angels their authority, He subjected them to Christ, and proposed them publicly as an example of cheerful obedience to Him (i.e. to Christ), causing them to triumph in Christ.' What was this authority? In Gal 3¹⁹, He 2², Ac 7⁵⁸ angels are described as the medium through which God revealed Himself at the Law-giving, and in this sense they might be called His robe or veil. But when Christ came the veil was laid aside and the angels took an inferior position (cf. He 1⁶), God henceforth manifesting Himself in the Person of His Son. 'He has put off and laid aside the garb of angelic mediation in which, under the Law, He was wont to hold intercourse with men' (Findlay). On this view, 'made a show of them' implies no shame, only that He exhibited them in a true position of inferiority, and therefore not to be worshipped. The chief objection lies in the word 'triumphing,' which, if taken in the Roman sense of 'captives led in triumph by a victorious general,' seems to require that the principalities and powers should be hostile angels. This is obviated if Findlay's contention can be established, viz. that 'triumph' (θριαμβεύω) here has the meaning of θριαμβος—a hymn sung in procession in honour of Dionysus; accordingly, the sense would be—God has formed them into a festal chorus 'who follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth,' hymning His praises, and devoted to His service.

In Ro 8^{38, 39}: 'I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers . . . shall be able to separate us from the love of God' (RV), the same question arises as in Col 2¹⁵. As the other influences are in pairs of opposites, some find here also a contrast, 'angels being heavenly beings and 'principalities' earthly; or 'angels being good spirits and 'principalities' evil. Others think that both terms mean evil angels, arguing that the good would not try to separate us from the love of God. But this may be only a hypothesis like Gal 1⁵, and the point is that nothing, however powerful, whether likely to harm us or not, can separate us from the love of God; and Godet well says that what is itself good may contribute to lead us astray, if our attachment or adoration stops short at the creature, instead of rising to God. See artt. AUTHORITY, DOMINION, POWER, THRONE.

PRINCIPLES (ἀρχή, He 5¹² 6¹).—In Greek philosophy ἀρχή is an element or first principle—that by which anything begins to be. When it is distinguished from στοιχείον—the terms are often interchanged—it means the formal and active as opposed to the material cause. The two words are used together in He 5¹², 'the rudiments of the first principles of the oracles of God' (τὰ στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς τῶν λόγων τοῦ θεοῦ). The tautology is studied and effective. The writer is chiding his readers for not endeavouring or perhaps caring to advance beyond the ABC (in Luther's phrase, die ersten Buchstaben) of the gospel. He reminds them that they are no longer νήπιοι. Milk is the natural food of babes, but babes are potential adults, and the food of men (τελειώω, 'perfect,' i.e. 'full-grown,' is emphatic), and of those who aspire to be such, has to be more solid than that of infants (5¹⁴). The backwardness which the writer reproves is alike intellectual and spiritual, while his grave tone differs from that of Horace's 'blandi doctores,' who give their pupils cakes 'elementa velint ut discere prima' (Sat. I. i. 25 f.). That there is an immense difference between the αρχή and the τέλος of Christianity; that Jesus is not only the Beginner but the Perfecter of our faith (ἀρχηγὸν καὶ τελειωτὴν, He 12¹)—these are the truths he wishes to drive home. Childhood is beautiful, but only a false sentiment would prolong it. The same thought is frequent in St. Paul's writings (1 Co 3¹ 13¹¹, Eph 4¹⁴). The Rabbis spoke of their younger pupils as 'sucklings.' Perhaps in He 5¹²⁻¹⁴ we have a case of one Alexandrian echoing another, for Philo says (de Agric. ii.): 'Since milk is the food of infants, but cakes of wheat (τὰ ἐκ πυρῶν πεμματα) are the food of full-grown men, so also the soul must have a milk-like nourishment in its age of childhood, namely, the elementary lessons of art and science (τὰ τῆς ἐγκυκλίου μουσικῆς προπαιδεύματα), but the perfect food which is for men is education in prudence, temperance, and every virtue.'

PRISCA, PRISCILLA.—See AQUILA.

PRISON.—1. Greek words translated 'prison.'—The term φυλακή is almost invariably rendered 'prison' in AV and RV. It is also used in a more restricted sense to designate a portion of a prison, in one instance 'the first and the second ward' (Ac 12¹⁰ AV and RV), traversed by the apostle Peter on his way to freedom; in another, 'the inner prison' (Ac 16⁴ AV and RV) in which St. Paul and Silas were immured by the Philippian jailer. The word δεσμωτήριον, frequently applied by Attic orators to the prison at Athens, and used in the Acts interchangeably with φυλακή, is translated 'prison-house' in the RV (5²¹⁻²³ 16²⁵). The word οἶκημα ('a room in a house'), a polite equivalent in Attic Greek for δεσμωτήριον, is used (Ac 12⁷) to denote 'the cell' in which the apostle Peter was confined by order of Herod. Another word for prison, τηρησις, translated 'hold' (RV 'ward'), is employed in Ac 4³ to designate the place of confinement into which the apostles were thrown by the sacerdotal authorities at Jerusalem; also in Ac 5¹⁸ qualified by the adjective δημοσία (AV 'common prison,' RV 'public ward').

2. The prison in apostolic times.—In most of the instances mentioned in the NT, prisons appear to have been a part of buildings mainly devoted to other uses, such as palaces and fortresses, rather than buildings exclusively set apart for the purpose. The system then in vogue differed in this and other respects from the one that largely prevails at the present day. As a rule, prisons were intended not as places of punishment for convicted criminals, but as places of detention for persons awaiting trial, or pending their execution. In support of this view may be cited the imprisonment of the apostles recorded in Ac 4³ 5¹⁸⁻²⁰, that of the apostle Peter in Ac 12³⁻¹⁰, and that of the apostle Paul at Jerusalem, Cæsarea, and Rome. Among the Jews, as well as among the Greeks and Romans, it was usual to inflict other penalties than imprisonment for offences against law and order, e.g., fines, scourging, death.

In Philippi, which was a Roman colony, the prison into which St. Paul and Silas were cast seems to have been a separate establishment devoted to the purpose. But it is rash to assume that prisons in the provinces were planned on the same principle as the Mamertine prison at Rome. There is nothing to indicate that 'the inner prison' in which the Apostle and his companion were incarcerated was a subterranean dungeon. The reference to 'doors' (Ac 16²⁶) and to the circumstance that the jailer 'sprang in' (v. 23) points to the fact that their portion of the prison was on a level with the other portions. The narrative affords us one of the few glimpses obtainable into the interior of a Roman prison, with its different cells, provided with the inevitable appurtenances of chains and stocks, and its governor's house above. In Ac 12³⁻¹⁰ an interesting glimpse is also given into the interior of the prison in which the apostle Peter was confined at Jerusalem. This was probably a guard-room in the fortress Antonia, situated at the north-west corner of the Temple area, escape from which could be effected only by passing through 'the first and the second wards,' lying between it and the iron gate leading into the city. The place of custody to which the apostles were committed by the Temple guard (Ac 4¹⁻³ 5¹⁸⁻²⁰) was probably attached to the Temple or high priest's palace, as it would appear to have been adjacent to the court in which the Sanhedrin subsequently met for the trial.

Among the evidences which St. Paul adduces of his pre-eminence in suffering is his 'more frequent' confinement 'in prisons' (2 Co 11²³). Besides his imprisonment at Philippi and other unrecorded instances which preceded the writing of 2 Cor., he became painfully familiar with custody in prison and out of prison at subsequent dates. (1) As the result of the riot in the Temple, set on foot by the fanatical Jews of Asia, he was consigned for a time to the barracks (παρεμβολή, AV and RV 'castle') connected with the fortress Antonia (Ac 21³⁴), the scene of St. Peter's imprisonment at an earlier date. (2) The discovery of the plot aiming at his assassination led to his being transferred to Cæsarea, where he was detained for upwards of two years in the prætorium of Herod, now the residence of the procurator (Ac 23³⁵). Here the strictness of his confinement was sufficiently relaxed to admit of his friends having free access to him. (3) On his being transferred to Rome, as the result of his appeal to Cæsar, a still larger measure of liberty was granted him. 'He dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him' (Ac 28³⁰). (4) If we are to assume a second imprisonment at Rome—a subject still under discussion—it seems not unlikely, judging from references in 2 Tim., that he was subjected to severer treatment. According to tradition, his place of custody was the Mamertine prison, in the lower dungeon of which, known as the Tullianum, prisoners condemned for crimes against the State were executed.

3. Metaphorical use of 'prison.'—The word 'prison' is applied in a figurative sense (1) to the place of confinement of the spirits 'which were disobedient . . . in the days of Noah' (1 P 3¹⁹⁻²⁰; cf. Gn 6⁴). * These are probably to be identified with 'the angels which kept not their first estate,' declared in Jude (v. 6) to be 'reserved in everlasting chains under darkness to the judgment of the great day,' and with 'the angels that sinned,' who are 'consigned to Tartarus' (2 P 2⁴, ταρταρώσας), as distinguished from Gehenna, 'to be reserved unto judgment.' The allusion in all these passages appears to be to the Book of Enoch, which represents the fallen angels as undergoing temporary punishment (in Tartarus, xix. 1-3; cf. xx. 2) until the day of their final doom. (2) The term 'prison' is also applied to 'the bottomless pit' (RV 'the abyss'), in which Satan is bound a thousand years (Rev 20¹; cf. v. 1).

PRIZE.—According to the Gospels, reward (μισθός) finds a place in the teaching of the Kingdom of God. But the doctrine is redeemed from mercenariness by the fact that the reward is reckoned of grace and not of debt (Mt 20¹⁻¹⁶, Lk 17¹⁰) as well as by the nature of the reward. It is no mere external or material reward. Generally speaking, it is the Kingdom of God or, according to the Fourth Gospel, eternal life, that our Lord sets before His followers as the reward to which they may look forward. The blessedness which is to be theirs consists in the attainment of that moral perfection after which they strive. They that hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be filled: the merciful shall obtain mercy: the pure in heart shall see God.

The same doctrine is found in the apostolic writings. But here the reward is described as a prize. This phraseology is most common in the speeches and Epistles of St. Paul, but it occurs also in the Epistles of St. James and St. John and in the Revelation of St. John. The imagery is taken from the Greek games which occupied such a large place in Greek life and were invested with almost religious significance. The four great festivals were the Isthmian, the Nemean, the Olympian, and the Pythian games. Of these the Olympian were pre-eminent in theory, being the chief national festival of the Greeks, and in practice they outlasted all the others, continuing to be celebrated till the reign of Theodosius. But when the Epistles of St. Paul were written the chief interest of Greece was in the Isthmian games, which also from their proximity to Corinth were likely to supply the Apostle with the metaphors of the foot-race, the pugilistic contest, and the prize, of which he makes frequent use. The Isthmian games were held on the Isthmus of Corinth, in a grove of pine-trees sacred to Poseidon, near the shrines of the Isthmian Poseidon and Melicertes, in the first month of spring, in the second and fourth year of each Olympiad. The contests consisted of gymnastic exercises, horse races, and competitions in music. Besides the customary palm the prize in Pindar's time consisted of a wreath of dry σέλινον (often translated 'parsley,' but more probably identical with the 'wild celery'—apium graveolens). After the destruction of Corinth, a crown of pine-leaves was substituted for it. The Nemean games, which were celebrated in the valley of Nemea in the territory of the Argive town Cleonæ, consisted of gymnastic, equestrian, and musical contests. The prize was a palm-branch and a garland of fresh σέλινον. The Olympian games, held in honour of Zeus at Olympia in the Peloponnesian district of Pisatis, consisted of foot-races, chariot-races, leaping, quoit and spear throwing, wrestling and boxing; and the prize was a wreath of the leaves of the sacred wild olive, said to have been originally planted by Heracles, which had been cut with a golden knife. The Pythian games, held on the Crissæan plain below Delphi, consisted of gymnastic and athletic contests similar to those held at Olympia, with the addition of musical ceremonies. The prizes were a wreath from the sacred bay-tree in the Vale of Tempe and a palm-branch (Seyffert, Dict. Class. Ant., pp. 326, 413, 427, 531).

It was doubtless these games, more particularly the Isthmian games, that suggested to St. Paul the comparison of the Christian life to a race and to a boxing-match, and led him to insist on the need for discipline and self-denial in order to gain success. And it is from these games that he borrows the figure of the prize which awaits the successful runner of the Christian race. In two passages (1 Co 9²⁴, Ph 3¹⁴) the term used is βραβεῖον, the word regularly employed to denote the award to the victor in the games, a prize (Grimm-Thayer, s.v.).

It is also used by Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. i. 5, ὑπομονῆς βραβεῖον; cf. Mart. Polyc. 17, and Tatian, ad Græc. 33. The word occurs in its Latin dress, bravium or brabium, in Tertullian, in the translation of Irenæus, and in the Latin versions of the Scriptures. In 1 Co 9²⁵, 2 Ti 4⁸, Ja 1¹², 1 P 5⁴, Rev 2¹⁰ 3¹¹ the word used is στέφανος, meaning 'wreath' or 'garland,' such as was given as a prize to victors in the public games (Grimm-Thayer, s.v.), whilst in 2 Ti 2⁵ the verb στεφανοῦται is used with the same reference. That the metaphor was borrowed from the Greek games is evident from 1 Co 9²⁴⁻²⁵, where not only is mention made of οἱ ἐν σταδίῳ τρέχοντες, but the φθαρτὸς στέφανος won by the successful competitor in the games is contrasted with the ἀφθαρτος στέφανος aimed at by the Christian.

The nature of the ἀφθαρτος στέφανος set before the Christian is further defined in the NT. In 2 Ti 4⁸ it is described as ὁ τῆς δικαιοσύνης στέφανος, 'the crown or garland which belongs to, or is the due reward of, righteousness'; in Ja 1¹² and Rev 2¹⁰ ὡς τὸν στέφανον τῆς ζωῆς, 'the crown or garland which consists of eternal life' (cf. 1 Ti 6¹⁷); and in 1 P 5⁴ ὡς τὸν ἀμαράντινον τῆς δόξης στέφανον, 'the crown or garland consisting of glory which will never fade,' in contrast to the garlands of σέλινον, olive, laurel, or pine won by the competitors in the games, which withered sooner or later. βραβεῖον is described in Ph 3¹⁴ as τὸ βραβεῖον τῆς ἀνω κλήσεως τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, 'the prize of God's high call in Christ Jesus' (J. Moffatt, *The New Testament: A New Translation*³, London, 1914, ad loc.).

That the prospect of winning this prize is a legitimate motive in inciting the Christian to exert himself to the utmost in the Christian ἀγων and δρόμος is implied in 2 Ti 4⁷⁻⁸, where it is evident that St. Paul was inspired to fight the good fight, to finish the course, to keep the faith, by the hope of having τὸν τῆς δικαιοσύνης στέφανον bestowed on him by the righteous Judge at that day: and it is explicitly asserted by him in 1 Co 9²⁴⁻²⁷ and Ph 3¹²⁻¹⁴. In 1 Co 9²⁴⁻²⁷ St. Paul, taking the foot-race as his illustration, says in effect to his readers, 'It is not enough merely to run—all run; but as there is only one who is victorious, so you must run, not with the slowness of the many, but with the energy of the one' (Stanley, ad loc.). 'In the Christian race there is no competition. The prize is within the reach of all. But then each runner must be as much in earnest as though there were competition and only one prize. And this is what the Apostle expresses. He does not say "run so—in such a way—as to obtain"—but, "run so—as those runners run—in order that ye may obtain." In their case there is rivalry, and therefore they are in earnest. In your case there is no rivalry; but their earnestness of purpose is an example to you' (Howson, Metaphors of St. Paul, pp. 151, 152). When St. Paul adds (v. 25), 'They do it to win a fading crown, we do it for an unfading,' he makes still clearer the reference to the Greek games, and also the legitimacy of the desire for the prize as a motive to Christian exertion. According to his teaching in this passage the hope of the prize conduces to earnestness of purpose, self-restraint, definiteness of aim, and persevering effort. The same truths are expressed in Ph 3¹²⁻¹⁴, where, speaking of himself, St. Paul says, 'I press on, if so be that I may apprehend that for which also I was apprehended by Christ Jesus. . . . One thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal unto the prize (βραβεῖον) of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus,' where the imagery and terminology are plainly borrowed from the Greek games, more particularly the foot-race, and where the prospect of the βραβεῖον nerves the Apostle to press on and reach forward toward the goal. In agreement with this is Rev 2¹⁰, where the hope of receiving τὸν στεφάνον τῆς ζωῆς is held out as a reason for being faithful unto death; and also Rev 3¹¹, where the angel of the Church in Philadelphia is exhorted to hold fast 'that which thou hast, that no one take thy crown' (τὸν στεφάνον σου). Thus all the passages in the writings of the Apostolic Church in which reward is represented as a prize (βραβεῖον) or garland of victory (στεφάνος) uniformly teach that the hope of winning the prize or garland is a legitimate motive in stimulating the Christian to greater earnestness and faithfulness and persevering effort.

PROCHORUS.—Prochorus was one of the Seven appointed and ordained in Ac 6³. He is said to have been a bishop of Nicomedia, and martyred at Antioch.

PROCONSUL.—Down to the time of Augustus this word had not become one, but was still two words—pro consule, 'in place of a consul.' It signified a man with the rank and insignia of a consul, whether he had already held the office or not. In practice the title was conferred on certain governors of provinces, and only the Emperor possessed the power belonging to this office within the walls of the city of Rome. Nothing need here be said of such governors during the Republican period. By the arrangements of January, 27 B.C., all the provinces of the Roman Empire (see PROVINCE) were divided between the Senate and the Emperor Augustus. In conformity with his desire to keep all the real power in his own hands, while the semblance was left in the hands of the Senate, the governors of Imperial provinces were given humble titles such as legati Augusti pro pretore, etc., whatever had been their career, but all governors of senatorial provinces were called proconsules. The senatorial provinces were divided into two grades—the higher grade, open only to ex-consuls, comprising Asia and Africa; and the lower, open to ex-pretors, comprising all the other senatorial provinces. The governors of Asia and Africa were provided with three legati each. In the NT only three proconsuls are referred to—the proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus (Ac 13⁷), the proconsul of Achaia, Gallio (18¹²), and the proconsul of Asia (19³, the plural is generalizing, and does not imply more than one at a time).

PROCURATOR.—The position of procurator, in the sense in which we are familiar with the word, cannot be understood without a knowledge of the word's history. Before the Roman Empire was ever thought of, and regularly also after it had come into existence, a procurator (Greek, ἐπιτροπος) was one qui procurat, 'who attends to' or 'manages,' particularly the affairs of a household or an estate—an agent, steward, or bailiff, in fact. Such a person was a superior servant, acting for his master, but still a servant. The Emperor required servants to manage his property in various parts of the Empire, and these were regularly known by the name procuratores. They derived what importance they had solely from the high position of their master. If this had been clearly understood, probably we should have been spared much cheap criticism of a man like Pilate, procurator of Judæa, whose career could be made or marred by a master's whim. Such a man was in an entirely different position from an ordinary governor of a province, who would be a member of the Senate, still a privileged body, and might be of as good as, or of better blood than, the Emperor himself. It is true that an Emperor could also get rid of such, but not so easily.

Procuratores were of many kinds, but were never of higher rank than the equestrian. Once or twice they were Imperial freedmen. The Emperor had procuratores in all provinces, senatorial and Imperial alike, who attended to his financial interests there. The Emperors had private property in the provinces, often consisting of estates that had belonged to the domains of various gods and goddesses. These demanded a large staff of workers of many kinds, and over them were set procuratores. Sometimes these would take over the command of a province on the occasion of the death or absence of the real governor. They are to be distinguished from the procuratores who were actually set over provinces as governors. Only Imperial provinces were thus governed, and only the less important of these (see GOVERNOR, PROVINCE). They took the place of the earlier military prefects. The following provinces among others were governed at one time or another by them—the two Mauretaniæ, Rætia, Noricum, Alpes Maritimæ, Alpes Cottiae, Judæa, Cappadocia, Epirus, the Hellespont, Corsica, Sardinia, Bithynia, Pamphylia. To the student of Christian origins Judæa is the most interesting. Of Pontius Pilate we know almost nothing, but Felix was the first man born a slave who governed a Roman province and commanded the troops in it. Antonius Felix was brother of Claudius' great minister of finance (a rationibus), Pallas, and, probably on account of his marriage into a higher class, was raised to the equestrian order before his appointment to Judæa. Such governors had a lower status than the finance procurators in other provinces. The troops under their command were auxiliaries, which were for the most part drawn from the country itself, and militia formed from the able-bodied men of the province. Such troops did not belong to the Imperial army in the strict sense. In Judæa, e.g., there was an ala formed of Cæsariani and Sebasteni, the ala prima gemina Sebastenorum (apparently drafted in Vespasian's time to Mauretania), and five cohorts (cf. Ac 10¹ for the name of one of them), which also appear to have been raised entirely in the country, and were probably in part also commanded by officers of Eastern birth (e.g., probably, Claudius Lysias, Ac 23³⁴). Only one of these cohorts had its quarters in Jerusalem. The 200 δεξιολάβαι (probably 'slingers') who were sent as an escort with St. Paul (Ac 23²³) probably did not form a separate troop. In their quality of commanders of troops the procurators had beneficarii under them. Sometimes also a sub-procurator (ἀντεπίτροπος) of equestrian rank is mentioned as an assistant to the procurator. Lower posts, filled by Imperial freedmen and slaves, were those of the tabularii, commentarienses, librarii, arcarii (cf. Ro 16²³, where dispensator would be a more exact translation; also CIL iii. 556, v. 8818), and dispensatores with their vicarii, to which titles the name of the province is always added. These officials, to avoid the appearance of partiality, were never natives of the provinces in which they served.

The functions of the procurators were judicial, financial, and military. The last tended to become less important in the later Empire. They had supervision of the taxes. They had to pay the soldiers, not only in procuratorial but also in the other Imperial provinces. Each had charge of the carrying out of road-building and other buildings in his province. In the more important Imperial provinces the financial procurators acted ordinarily with the governors in the supervision of building and also in the settlement of boundary disputes, but also sometimes independently. In the ordinary Civil Court (Recorder's Court, Court of Common Pleas) they had a jurisdiction like that of other governors, and in later times at least they could appoint a guardian to a ward (tutoris datio). Criminal jurisdiction over non-citizens was extended to them in Judæa already in Augustus' time in full compass (Jn 19¹⁰), but over Roman citizens they had no power of life and death (ius gladii), unless this had been communicated to them in a special mandate from the Emperor. The right of pardon belonged only to the Emperor, and the liberation of such a criminal as Barabbas can have been made possible only by a clause in the special lex provinciae, according to which Judæa was governed (Jn 18³⁹). The procurator of Judæa appears to have stood in a special position of dependence under the governor of the Imperial province of Syria. Pilate was deposed, or at least suspended, by L. Vitellius, the governor of Syria (Josephus, Ant. XVIII. iv. 2), with the command that he should appear before the Emperor in Rome, and a provisional governor appointed for Judæa. A similar experience fell to the lot of later procurators of Judæa, Felix and Cumanus, at the hands of Ummidius Quadratus, governor of Syria. But it has been pointed out that both these governors had a wider command than Syria, extending in fact over the neighbouring provinces as well. There was, however, a close connexion between Judæa and Syria, the result of Syria's importance as a frontier province with four legions stationed in it.

PROFANE (βέβηλος, 'trodden under foot'; profanus, 'outside the shrine').—The word denotes not simply what is common (see CLEAN), but a temper which despises sacred things (1 Ti 1³); cf. 'profane language.' Esau was 'profane' (He 12¹⁶) because he despised his spiritual birthright. St. Paul is accused of 'profaning' the Temple (Ac 24¹⁴) by bringing Gentiles into it. It is the temper of those who know the good and yet despise it. In the early days of Christianity we do not find this sin remarked on, because Christianity was then novel and unrecognized, and hostility to it was passionate rather than profane. But later, as in 1 and 2 Tim., when it became a tried institution with recognized doctrine (1 Ti 4⁹), and had a clientele amongst men, then there was room for this sin. The term 'profane' is applied especially to those who under cover of Christianity foist their own errors and deceits upon the Church. Judaism from behind and Gnosticism coming on in front are the worst offenders. They simulated Christianity and brought their mischief into its very centre. Thus 'profane fables' (1 Ti 4⁷) recalls the foolish stories of Rabbinical preaching (Tit 1¹⁰⁻¹⁴). 'Profane babblings and oppositions of knowledge falsely so-called' (1 Ti 6²⁰, 2 Ti 2¹⁶), if they are not Gnostic, are leading to Gnosticism, its hair-splittings, cloud of words, pride of knowledge, unnatural asceticism, and moral looseness. Gnosticism, with all that led up to it, was peculiarly profane, because it brought into the meekness of Christianity the dialectical pride of the West and the 'caste' feeling of the East; it pretended to have special knowledge; it made purity into a formal distinction between matter and spirit (see CLEAN); it indulged in capricious philosophical views of Christian truth, and became a masquerade of sacred things.

PROFESSION.—Several words are used in Acts and the Epistles to express avowal, professing, or confessing. (1) In the general sense of professing or avowing something we have φάσκειν ('professing themselves to be wise, they became fools,' Ro 1²) and ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι ('which becometh women professing godliness,' 1 Ti 2¹⁰; 'they profess that they know God,' Tit 1¹⁰). (2) In the particular sense of professing or confessing faith, the words ὁμολογῆναι and ὁμολογία are regularly used. In this connexion the word 'profession' disappears from the RV and the more accurate word 'confession' takes its place: e.g. 'Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed the good confession' (1 Ti 6¹³). In the specific sense of confessing faith in Jesus Christ it is the technical term. The locus classicus is Ro 10⁹⁻¹⁰. 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord . . . thou shalt be saved: for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation' (cf. Ac 24¹⁴, 2 Co 9¹³, 1 Ti 6¹², He 3¹⁴). In the 1st and 2nd Epistles of John, particular stress is laid on the confession of the reality of the human life of Jesus—no doubt with reference to the Docetic heresy: e.g. 'Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God' (1 Jn 4², also 4³, 2 Jn⁷).

The etymological meaning of ὁμολογῆναι is 'to say the same thing' as others. It fitly expresses the condition necessary for joining the company or society of those who believed in Jesus Christ. Those who confessed their faith 'said the same things' about Him as those who were already in the society. At first the contents of the confession were very simple. Most probably the confession was the avowal of belief in Jesus as the Messiah, as in the great confession of Peter, 'Thou art the Christ' (Mk 8²⁹). To the Christian Jew of Palestine He was the 'Messiah'; to the Hellenistic Christian Jew He was the 'Christ'; to the Christian Gentile He was the 'Lord.' Cf. 'No man can say, Jesus is Lord, but in the Holy Spirit' (1 Co 12³; see ExpT xv. [1903-04] 289, 296 ff.). Out of that simple confession there quickly grew other relative beliefs which were implicit in it, e.g. His resurrection (Ro 10⁹), His Divine Sonship (1 Jn 1⁴⁻⁷), His coming in the flesh (1 Jn 4⁻), and the baptismal confession or formula (Mt 28¹⁹).

Some writers on the Creeds believe that there are references to statements of belief, or summaries of doctrines which may have been included in the confession, in such phrases as 'the form of sound words' (2 Ti 1¹³), the 'first principles of Christ' (He 6¹), etc., but it is more likely that all such passages have only a general meaning (see art. 'Creeds,' EB⁹ vii. 393). Not till the time of Irenæus and Tertullian (A.D. 175-200) is there evidence of definite credal statements, embodying the faith of the Church. It is, however, highly probable that there were some summaries of Christian doctrine before that time. As the custom of baptizing immediately after conversion gave way to the system of the catechumenate, the particular elements of Christian doctrine in which the catechumens had been instructed would naturally reappear in the questions that were asked, or the confession of faith that was made, before baptism. The process of creed-formation was largely assisted by the catechizing of the candidates for baptism (q.v.). The rise of error also had a marked influence in determining the particular beliefs that were to be confessed at different times, or at least the particular form in which they were to be confessed.

In the early Church the confession of faith was made in public, or before the Church. The Pauline principle, 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord' (Ro 10⁹), was decisive on that point, to say nothing of our Lord's evident dislike for secret disciples. The public confession was not only a testimony for Christ, leading, it might be, to the conversion of others; it had a strong psychological effect on those who made the confession, confirming them in their relation to Christ, and calling certain forces of their nature to the side of devotion. Those who were to be received into the Church sometimes had a form of words provided for them which they might use, but the convert was also allowed to speak for himself, as in the famous instance of Victorinus, whose testimony or confession can still be read with interest (see Augustine's Confessions, bk. viii. ch. 2).

JOHN REID.

PROMISE.—The idea of promise is one of the great elements of Scripture teaching. It is a peculiarity of the Bible; no other religious book has that as a distinguishing feature. It is the element of promise that runs through its various books, binds them into an organic whole, and unites in a vital union the OT and the NT. The promise of the OT is fulfilled in the blessing of the NT. Many promises may be taken as predictions. They constitute at least part of the content of prophecy. To write about promise in all its relations would involve the discussion of prophecy, the preparation for the coming of Christ, the manifestation of the grace of God, etc. In what follows, reference is restricted to 'promise' in the apostolic writings of the NT.

In Acts and the Epistles the element of promise is very prominent. The words ἐπαγγελία, ἐπαγγελμα, ἐπαγγέλλομαι are of frequent occurrence.

(1) They are used in a general sense as in the phrases 'looking for a promise from thee' (Ac 23²¹); 'the first commandment with promise' (Eph 6²; also 1 Ti 4⁸, 2 P 2¹⁹).

(2) They are employed with special reference to the promises of God, out of which arose the economy of grace as it is set forth in all the variety of its blessing in the NT. Reference is often made (a) to the great fundamental promises given to Abraham, relating to the birth of Isaac, the blessing of his descendants, and the inheritance of the land of Canaan (e.g. 'for this is a word of promise . . . Sarah shall have a son' [Ro 9⁹; also 4²⁰, Gal 4²³, Ac 7¹⁷, He 11^{9, 13, 17}, etc.]); (b) to the whole spiritual content of the Messianic blessing involved in the promise (e.g. 'Now I stand here to be judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers' [Ac 26⁶], 'strangers from the covenants of the promise' [Eph 2¹³; also Ro 9⁴, Gal 3^{16, 17}, He 6¹³, etc.]). The passage where the significance of 'promise' is expressed is Gal 3⁶⁻²⁹ (cf. also Ro 4¹³⁻²¹). St. Paul is the chief exponent of the meaning of the promise given to Abraham and his seed. He emphasizes the fact that the promises in all their variety and fullness were fulfilled in Christ, 'for how many soever be the promises of God, in him is the yea: wherefore also through him is the Amen' (2 Co 1²⁰). The blessings of the promise are those which Christ brings ('fellow-partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel' [Eph 3⁶]). They who receive the blessings are those who belong to Christ: 'if ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, heirs according to promise' (Gal 3²⁹). Faith is the general condition of receiving: 'the scripture hath shut up all things under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe' (Gal 3²²). Particular emphasis is laid on the fact that the promise is of grace, and not of works of the law; 'for this cause it is of faith, that it might be according to grace; to the end that the promise may be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all' (Ro 4¹⁶). The term 'promise' is itself a witness to the spontaneity of the grace of God. Among the Messianic blessings the promise is sometimes identified with the gift of the Holy Ghost: 'that upon the Gentiles might come the blessing of Abraham in Christ Jesus; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit' (Gal 3¹⁴; also Ac 2³⁹, Eph 1¹³). The forgiveness of sins is also regarded as included in the promise (Ac 2^{38, 39}).

(3) The Messianic promises of the OT are not only fulfilled in Christ, but out of His work many other promises are referred to, as 'whereby he hath granted unto us his precious and exceeding great promises' (2 P 1⁴). Among these we must include 'life' (2 Ti 1¹), 'eternal life' (1 Jn 2²⁵), 'the crown of life' (Ja 1¹²), 'new heavens and a new earth' (2 P 3¹³, etc.).

PROPHECY, PROPHET, PROPHETESS.—Christianity produced a revival of the ancient gift of prophecy, which was so marked a feature of the religious life of Israel. It was the spoken utterance of the man of vision and inspiration; it was a declaration of the 'word of Jahweh'; it was a revelation of the Divine will not so much in the sense of prediction—an aspect of prophecy not original, but subordinate—but rather in the sense of spiritual instruction involving a special degree of religious and ethical insight. John the Baptist, the herald of Christ, may be called the last of the older prophets. Christianity did not supersede the earlier revelation but fulfilled it, as the first and greatest Prophet of the new order declared (Mt 5¹⁹); hence Christian prophecy is continuous with the prophecy of Israel, and the functions of both Jewish and Christian prophet are substantially the same. It was the content of the prophecy which was changed with the new revelation of God in Jesus Christ. Christian prophecy was born on the Day of Pentecost, the day of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, which seemed to St. Peter to be a direct fulfilment of ancient prophecy (cf. Jl 2^{28f.}).

1. The office of prophet.—It is natural to look for the prophet in the earliest environment of Christianity; and, as a matter of fact, we find prophets and prophetesses from the very beginning of the early Jewish Church. Christian prophets are referred to in the context of Ac 2¹⁸, where προφητεύουσιν is not part of the original quotation; and the gift which developed at Pentecost in the Church at Jerusalem was destined to spread wherever a Christian society came into being. To take the word 'prophetess' first, we find in Lk 2³⁸ Anna described as a prophetess, in Ac 21⁹ the four daughters of Philip the Evangelist, and in Rev 2²⁰ Jezebel, 'which called herself a prophetess.' It was evidently a function in which women might share, as we gather from 1 Co 11⁵, where public prophecy and public prayer are associated as gifts of Christian women. Prophets are mentioned in the Acts—Agabus (11²⁸ 21¹⁰), Symeon Niger, Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, in addition to Barnabas and Saul (13¹), and Judas and Silas (15³²). We have evidence of prophecy not only in the churches of Jerusalem and Caesarea, but also in Antioch (Ac 11²⁷ 13¹), in Rome, Corinth, and Thessalonica (Ro 12^{6t}, 1 Co 14^{32t}, 1 Th 5²⁰).

'The three members of the Christian group—apostles, prophets, teachers—were already to be met with in contemporary Judaism,' but 'the grouping of these three classes, and the special development of the apostleship, were the special work of the Christian church' (Harnack, *The Mission and Expansion of Christianity*², Eng. tr., i. 334). The 'apostles' were the itinerant missionaries of the Christian Church; they were also by nature of their office prophets and teachers (cf. Eph 2²⁰, 'the foundation of the apostles and prophets,' where the two are virtually identified; also 3¹⁵ and 4¹), where 'classes of functions rather than persons' are indicated; see Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 166). 'Prophet' stands second in the list, but there is a wide sense in which this term could be applied to each of the three classes. The prophet in Did. xi. 10 is called a teacher, and teaching was undoubtedly an element in the prophetic gift (cf. Polycarp, ap. Eus. HE iv. xv. 30, διδάσκαλος ἀποστολῆς καὶ προφητικῆς). But though all three were speakers of the word (λαλοῦντες τὸν λόγον [Did. iv. 1]), prophecy was a distinctive χάρισμα (see GIFTS), distinguishable from that of the 'apostle' and the 'teacher.' While the 'apostle' is a wandering missionary, the 'prophets' and 'teachers' were in general attached to a local church; e.g. Silas and Judas, prophets of the Church of Jerusalem, are described as ἡγούμενοι (Ac 15²²); and in He 13⁷ such ἡγούμενοι or leaders are described as speaking 'the word of God.' Neither the 'prophet' nor the 'teacher' was appointed by the apostles, as were 'bishops' and 'elders'; their gifts were an endowment of the Spirit, and both fulfilled the function of speaking in the spirit (λαλεῖν ἐν πνεύματι).

2. The nature of prophecy.—The characteristic quality of the prophet was not his power of expounding the facts of the Christian faith in their relation to each other or to life and conduct; it was 'revelation.' This did not necessarily mean rapture or ecstasy accompanied by unintelligible utterances. On the contrary, 'prophecy' is a greater gift, a nobler function than γλωσσολαλία or 'tongue-speaking.' The former gift was exercised with the consciousness of the subject, and it issued in something logically intelligible. To use the latter gift, which issued in a jargon of words and unduly excited the speaker, was to speak to God instead of man' (Selwyn, Christian Prophets, p. 1 f.). 'Prophecy' is of course a larger term than 'revelation' (ἀποκάλυψις; see art. APOCALYPSE): it includes 'revelation' among its specific forms of expression and yet may be distinguished from it, e.g. 1 Co 14⁶ (where the Apostle might speak 'either by apocalypse, or gnosis, or prophecy, or teaching'). Prophecy is connected not only with revelations, but with 'visions' (2 Co 12¹⁻³). 'The Apocalypse, which is the great prophetic book of the NT and the most conspicuous relic we have of the prophecy of the primitive Christian Church, is a series of visions seen by a prophet and related by him' (T. M. Lindsay, *The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries*², 1903, p. 95, who further refers to the Shepherd of Hermas, a Roman presbyter who was also a 'prophet'). In 1 Ti 1¹⁸ St. Paul expresses himself as guided by 'prophecies' in relation to the separation of Timothy for the Christian ministry. These apparently were 'mysterious monitions of the kind called prophetic' (Hort, op. cit. p. 182), either arising within himself or through the lips of Silas, or both; cf. also 'prophecy' as the medium of the spiritual gift which was imparted at Timothy's ordination (1 Ti 4¹⁴). There was undoubtedly a mystical or ecstatic element in prophecy, but it had a practical aim. In 1 Co 14³ St. Paul mentions three functions of the prophet: 'He that prophesieth speaketh unto men edification, and comfort, and consolation': in other words, he builds up the Christian character, utters ethical precepts and warnings, and gives the encouragement arising from personal testimony, example, and sympathy. 'He edifieth a church,' while 'the speaker with tongues edifieth himself.' In Ro 12⁶ by the use of the phrase ἀναλογία τῆς πίστεως the Apostle declares that a prophecy is required to agree with the accepted doctrines of the faith; while 1 Co 12¹⁰ (διακρίσεις πνευμάτων) shows that criticism of prophecy was a regular practice (cf. 14²⁹). The canon of edification is conspicuous in the remarkable set of rules laid down in 1 Co 14^{6t} for prophetic and other ecstatic utterances. Two or three prophets may speak, while the rest are to discriminate as to the character of their addresses; but if a 'revelation' be given to another sitting by, the first prophet must keep silence. 'Ye can all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted (and the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets),' which means that, although individual inspiration is legitimate and undoubted, it is subject to the control of the prophets collectively. Thus, St. Paul did not limit freedom of speech, but in urging that only two or three prophets should address a given meeting he aimed at securing not only spiritual edification, but reverence and order in the assembly. Even if we had no evidence of the apocalyptic character of prophecy beyond the statements of St. Paul, it would not be going too far to argue that the expectation of the Parousia would naturally give rise to a predictive element in prophetic utterances. The author of Revelation speaks of the prophets as his fellow-servants, and of the Church as made up of 'saints, apostles, and prophets' (18²⁰), 'prophets and saints' (v. 24), and 'saints and prophets' (16⁶); and in such a connexion it is easy to understand how ecstasy might lead to a vivid realization of the circumstances of the Parousia. But the general evidence is in favour of the spiritual and ethical quality of the prophetic utterances, which, as we gather from 1 Co 14²⁴, were addressed to pagans as well as to Christians.

3. The history of prophecy in the sub-Apostolic Age.—The locus classicus for the subsequent development of prophecy in post-apostolic times is Did. 11, which is the clearest evidence afforded by extra-canonical literature of the established influence of Christian prophecy in the Church. The prophet is rooted in the life of the Church; but there are divergences from the Pauline tradition. No apostle is ever to remain more than three days in one place, otherwise he is a false prophet (ψευδοπροφήτης). The spiritual test of his genuineness is not so definite as St. Paul's ('no man can say that Jesus is Lord, but in the Holy Spirit' [1 Co 12³]). He has indeed to speak ἐν πνεύματι; but his speech is to be confirmed by his possession of 'the ways of the Lord,' i.e. the general test of his Christian conduct. This is so far sound; but the subordinate tests (e.g., asking for money, ordering a table [i.e. an Agape] in which he himself is to participate, not practising what he teaches) suggest a lower type of spirituality both in prophet and people. There is further the obscure proviso that he is not to 'make assemblies for a worldly mystery' (or to 'act for a worldly mystery of the church'), but the difficulty of understanding the phrase as it stands forbids any deduction as to the character of this test. Again, the prophet when he speaks in ecstasy is above criticism: to criticize one who 'speaks in the spirit' is the unpardonable sin. He is to receive 'the first-fruits': for 'the prophets are your high-priests.' Both 'prophets' and 'apostles' hold a higher rank in the Didache than bishops and deacons (presbyters are not mentioned), concerning whom the warning is given not to 'despise' them. The apocalypse with which the Didache closes has many phrases that recall Mt 24, e.g., the warning against false prophets, and the prediction of lawlessness and persecution and of the appearance of the world-deceiver (ο κοσμοπλάστος). Thus it would appear that the authority of the prophets was already beginning to be undermined by the appearance of false and covetous prophets. In the Apostolic Fathers 'prophets' are not mentioned; when Ignatius speaks of prophets, they are OT prophets: at the same time, he claims to receive revelations, lofty and incommunicable (Trall. 5), and waits for such (Eph. xx. 1), while Polycarp is to pray for them (Polyc. ii. 2). Hermas considers himself to be a prophet commissioned by God to comfort and persuade his hearers and to sound the call to repentance (Mand. xii. iii. 2-3). Harnack's suggestion that the silence of Hermas as to prophecies is due to the fact that he reckoned himself a prophet is not convincing (op. cit. p. 340). In Mand. xi. he refers to false prophets as mere magicians practising on people of wavering faith who apply to them ως ἐν μαγίᾳ. If the Didache represents the situation immediately after the Apostolic Age, the Shepherd of Hermas may be reasonably regarded as fixing the time when the authority of Christian prophecy was beginning to decline. Ecstasy in either its orderly or irregular forms was gradually to die under the development of the Church Order as represented by bishops and elders. We have to wait for the rise of Montanism in the 4th cent. for a revival of the extemporaneous enthusiasm and unconventional apocalypses of individual Christians. But it is more likely that the decline of prophecy was due less to Church organization and discipline than to the fact that the gift was so open to abuse. Even the apostolic safeguards could not save it: these depended on a high ideal of Christian conduct for their efficacy. Prophecy disappeared because its spiritual dignity and power were difficult to maintain in a community where the degrees of spirituality differed so widely, and where the mystical elements of the faith had necessarily to be subordinated to the practical in the evolution of Christian character. On the other hand, prophecy in its less reputable forms became a barrier to Christian progress and lent colour to the criticisms of outsiders like Celsus (see Origen, c. Cels. vii. 9), whose intellectual tastes were offended by the excesses of certain types of prophet, and who had not sufficient insight or tolerance to estimate the spiritual value of prophecy as a whole.

R. MARTIN POPE.

PROPTIATION.—Propitiation occurs in the apostolic literature of the NT only four times: (1) Ro 3²⁵ as the rendering of ἱλαστήριον: 'whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, by his blood, to shew his righteousness, because of the passing over of sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God'; (2) as the rendering of ἱλασμός, 1 Jn 2²: 'and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world'; (3) 1 Jn 4¹⁰: 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins'; (4) in RV it is also used in He 2¹⁷ as the translation of τὸ ἱλάσκεσθαι: 'Wherefore it behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people'; ἱλαστήριον also occurs in He 9⁵, rendered 'mercy-seat' (RVm 'Gr. the propitiatory'). These, with the verbal form ἱλάσθητι in the story of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18¹³, 'God be merciful,' RVm 'be propitiated'), and the use of the adjective ἱλαρός twice (Mt 16²⁵, He 8¹²) constitute all the guidance afforded by the NT in seeking the meaning of 'propitiation,' a term of much importance in apostolic thought. Consequently we are largely dependent for help in its interpretation upon what we know of the use of cognate terms in the LXX, and upon the ideas associated with their Hebrew equivalents in the OT; for the classical use of the Greek terms from Homer downwards helps mostly by contrast, presenting a usage different from that found in the LXX and the NT. (For details and discussion of Heb. and Gr. usage see art. 'Propitiation' by Driver in HDB; also for Gr. usage B. F. Westcott, *Epistles of St. John*², p. 55 f., and an interesting discussion in T. V. Tymms, The Christian Idea of Atonement, p. 191 ff.; and for the opposite view, maintaining the classical and pagan use of the Gr. term in the apostolic literature, see G. Smeaton, The Apostles' Doctrine of the Atonement, p. 455 ff.) H. Bushnell also maintains that the language of Scripture accords with the pagan idea of propitiation, but he rejects the idea itself on ethical grounds, suggesting that the apostolic writers did not really mean what their words mean—an evasion which creates an exegetical impasse (cf. The Vicarious Sacrifice, London, 1866, p. 447 ff.).

In classical Greek the verb 'propitiate' (ἱλάσκειν) is common, but it is construed regularly with the accusative of the deity (or person) propitiated. This construction is never used by apostolic writers; it is very rarely found in the LXX, even when used of a human subject (cf. Gn 32²⁰, Zec 7², Pr 16¹⁴). In the LXX it is commonly construed with πρὸς ('on behalf of'), followed by the person on whose behalf the propitiatory act is performed. This difference of construction marks a difference between pagan and biblical ideas; for although propitiating God may be indirectly involved in phrases used in the OT, it is not direct and prominent as in non-biblical writers. The restoration of God's favour and the forgiveness of the worshipper are generally the aim of the propitiatory sacrifice (cf. Lv 4²⁰); but the idea of directly appeasing one who is angry with a personal resentment against the offender, which is implied when the deity is the direct object of the verb, is foreign to biblical usage. This distinction of usage corresponds with the fact that the higher biblical conception of God is more ethical and less anthropomorphic than the conception in heathen writers; it also accords with the fact that the Hebrew term represented in the LXX by ἱλάσκειν and its derivatives early came to be used in a specialized rather than in a literal sense in its application to the acknowledged ethical relations between the God of Israel and His people. The root meaning of this term (kipper, כָּפַר) is probably 'cover over'; so Arabic also; the Syriac (and probably the Assyrian) cognate = 'wipe' (cf. Pr 30²⁰), or 'wipe away,' e.g. tears or sins, and therefore 'disperse' or 'abolish.' W. R. Smith (The OT in the Jewish Church, Edinburgh, 1881, p. 438 f.) adopts the latter as the primary meaning—e.g., 'to wipe clean the face blackened by displeasure' (cf. Gn 32²¹). Obviously both 'cover over' and 'wipe away' are convenient metaphors for the common idea of rendering null and void; the OT supplies frequent examples of the use of each in regard to sin (cf. Ps 32¹ 85, Is 43²⁵ 44²², Jer 18²³; see also HDB iv. 123; P. Haupt in JBL xix. [1900] 61, 80). But in OT theological terminology, kipper, which holds an important place, is used always in a figurative or moral sense with the collateral idea, which in time became the dominant if not the exclusive one, of conciliating an offended person or screening an offence or offender. Guilt is covered or withdrawn from the sight of the person propitiated, so that the way is clear for the guilty to approach him with confidence. G. F. Moore objects altogether to the use of etymological meanings, as a fault of method, and as fruitful of error. Plain facts of usage, which suggest no reference to 'wiping out' or 'covering,' are the sole guide for interpreting the term (cf. EBi iv. 4220). Several points in the OT usage should be carefully noted. (a) Its subject is usually either God or the priest; its means, when indicated, either a gift or a sacrifice. (b) Its use in the Levitical system is especially associated with the sin-offering, whose characteristic potency lies in the blood of the sacrifice, because 'the blood is the life,' and it is followed by 'it shall be forgiven him' in reference to sin; whether the fault is ritual or moral is not always clearly distinguished. (c) The idea of appeasing God in the heathen sense by offering Him an inducement to alter His disposition towards the offerer is absent, 'nor is it ever implied that the offerer of such a sacrifice is outside God's dispensation of grace, or the object of His wrath' (Driver, HDB iv. 131); the propitiation is Divinely appointed; the motive as far as indicated is the grace of God. (d) The idea of the offender hiding or covering his sin is not tolerated; he is to confess and repent of it: 'the object is never the sin, but the person (or thing) on whose behalf the offering is made' (ib. iv. 130). (e) Propitiation was only for unintentional sins (except in four specified cases); for deliberate and wilful sin—sin 'with a high hand'—propitiatory provision was not made.

With some such connotation as here suggested the Hebrew term for 'propitiation' passed on through the LXX from OT usage to that of the apostolic writers, possibly hardened also by the priestly and Rabbinical emphasis of their times. It became for them a naturally serviceable term in which to state and interpret into current forms of religious speech the new experience of God's act of forgiveness of sins, which they unhesitatingly connected directly with the suffering death of Jesus Christ. But this transition was made in the light of the conviction that the transcendent and final character of the redemptive work of Christ raised a term connected chiefly with legal and ritual significance into a realm of ethical and spiritual realities of which its ancient use had been merely typical and tentative. Moreover, the apostles' application of the term as interpretative of the meaning of Christ's offering of His sinless life to do away with the power of sin to separate between God and man was marked by a certain personal freedom of usage. This freedom expresses itself in differences discernible in the use of the NT term. The Pauline usage may be distinguished from that of the writer of the Johannine Epistles and from that adopted by the writer to the Hebrews. These apostolic writers held in common the fundamental idea that it was by an offering in His blood which Christ made in His death that He fulfilled a function analogous to, but infinitely transcending, that to which the term 'propitiation' was applied in the OT. By this means the grace of God was expressed towards man, and became efficacious through the removal of the obstacle raised by the sin that hindered the freedom and confidence of his access to God. But the propitiation was always of God's providing, as it was also His setting forth. St. Paul in his use of the term is specially concerned to make clear 'the setting forth' of the propitiation in relation to the law of God's righteousness; the Johannine writer uses it to declare the source of an actual cleansing from the defilement of sin, whilst the writer to the Hebrews chooses it to express the resultant privilege of the propitiation revealed in direct access to God in the sanctuary of His holiness. But this illustrative use of the term by these three apostolic writers, whilst it contributes figuratively to a legal, ethical, and ceremonial interpretation of the one reality of a common spiritual experience of redemption in Christ's blood, involves no essential divergence in their respective teaching. Each writer selected a particular phase of the import of propitiation. This he did rather to meet the exigencies of the occasion for his writing than to indicate a difference of view respecting the historical fact or the spiritual experience involved; these last were central to all apostolic teaching. Consequently the several applications of 'propitiation' exhibit a diversity in unity. It seems improbable that practically the same term was used within nearly the same period in the primitive apostolic community with any essential difference of meaning, especially when we consider the common stock of OT and later Jewish ideas from which the term was taken over by each separate writer. Moreover, sin, whether regarded with St. Paul as guilt, with the Johannine writer as moral defilement, or with the writer to the Hebrews as a religious hindrance in access to God, is the one reality which is the occasion of 'propitiation.'

(1) The Pauline use.—The Pauline use (Ro 3²⁵) states the propitiation in relation to a Divine righteousness expressed in 'a wrath of God revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold down the truth in unrighteousness' (1¹⁸); its purpose is to show God's righteousness to be consistent with the fact of His forbearance 'in the passing over of sins done aforetime': for there has never been a time under any dispensation when God has not dealt graciously with sinful men; He is always God the Saviour, 'whose property is always to have mercy.' But lest the persistent exercise of Divine grace in the forgiveness of sins should be considered as a challenge of God's righteous opposition to sin, He set forth Christ Jesus a propitiation by His blood that He 'might himself be just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus' (3²⁶). In this propitiation something is done by God in Christ which demonstrates the consistency and inviolability of His righteousness in the presence of His mercy. What that something is St. Paul does not further define; he simply asserts the efficiency of the propitiation for the ethical situation implied. His chosen word (ἱλαστήριον) has caused his commentators great trouble, but the great majority of all schools agree that the view here expressed is in substance St. Paul's teaching. The opinion, formerly influentially supported (e.g. by Luther, Calvin, Ritschl, Cremer, Bruce), that ἱλαστήριον signifies 'the mercy-seat,' 'the lid of the ark,' as in He 9⁵, is now generally rejected as fanciful and inadequate (for reasons see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895, p. 121 f., Eng. tr., Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, p. 124 ff.; Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 61). Its interpretation as 'a propitiatory offering'—a means of rendering God consistently favourable towards sinful men and the means of reconciliation between God and man—is the most natural, and is indeed the only meaning suitable to the context of Ro 3; other Pauline passages harmonize with it better than with any other meaning (cf. Ro 5⁹, 1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³, Gal 3¹³ 4³).

It is evident that St. Paul regarded the propitiation as essential to the manifestation of the Divine nature in love and righteousness; it was not an arbitrary appointment dependent simply on God's mere good pleasure; it implied a rational and ethical necessity in His being. Judging from the affinities of St. Paul's thought generally, it is probable that he may have regarded propitiation less in the light of a Levitical sacrificial offering than in that of the prophetic ideal of vicarious suffering, or possibly even after the analogy of human sacrifice—one man dying for another (cf. Ro 5⁷; see Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, p. 167 ff.). St. Paul certainly held that the propitiation was provided by God; he expounded it as exhibiting the love rather than the wrath of God. Although such phrases as 'propitiating God' or God 'being propitiated' are foreign to apostolic teaching, the Pauline view relates the propitiation to God as recipient. The propitiation being thus provided by God and received by Him, the question has arisen, Does St. Paul teach that it is also offered by God—that is, that God propitiates Himself? Probably the best answer is that St. Paul constantly conceives of the propitiation as the work of God in Christ (cf. 2 Co 5^{1st}); it is not something done outside God, but 'God-in-Christ' stands for St. Paul's conception of God as Redeemer—that is, God united with human nature. It may, therefore, be the best approach to the sanctuary of the unfathomable mystery of God's redeeming work to suggest that strictly He did not propitiate Himself. God requiring, providing, receiving the propitiation, it was offered by Christ, who was God-in-man, acting not as God, but as the Representative of man. God gave humanity in Christ the means of making propitiation (cf. H. Cremer, Bibl. Theol. Lex. 3, p. 91 ff.; HDB iv. 206). This suggestion is the more probable as it harmonizes with St. Paul's great doctrine of the self-identification of Christ with the human race, and through Him of the race with God (cf. Ro 5 and 6, 2 Co 5^{1st}).

(2) The Johannine use.—Although the Johannine writer uses for 'propitiation' a different Greek word (ἱλασμός, not ἀποστήριον) there is no satisfactory ground for maintaining a meaning essentially different from that presented in the Pauline thought; characteristic words of a common religion cannot safely be applied in a different sense where it is obvious that the same great circle of ideas is acknowledged. Propitiation is part of an apostolic system of ideas of redemption, and is found in the writings of St. John associated with its correlatives of sin and righteousness, and with the blood of Christ as the means of putting away sin and establishing righteousness, ideas with which it is vitally associated in the Pauline Epistles (for the opposite view cf. Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 108 ff.). The Johannine conception of propitiation is inseparably associated with 'Jesus Christ the righteous,' in whom 'we have an Advocate with the Father' (1 Jn 2¹), implying that the righteous nature of God involves a righteous order in the Divine method of dealing with sin. Moreover, the declaration is unmistakable that Christ is a propitiation 'not for our sins only, but also for the whole world,' implying an objective accomplishment, a finished work for the whole world as the basis on which the individual forgiveness and cleansing from sin proceed; for the virtue of the propitiation extends beyond the subjective experience of those who actually are made partakers of its grace. Whilst these points of contact with the Pauline view of propitiation appear, there are nevertheless lines of distinction in the use of the term which constitute a Johannine variety distinguishable from that found in the Pauline usage. For instance, the propitiation is more vividly personal: 'He' is our propitiation; the life of Christ as well as His death is involved—His Person as well as His work. Then its perpetual persistence as a process as well as its achievement as a fact is a dominant Johannine idea: 'he is the propitiation,' 'his blood is cleansing us from all sin' (1 Jn 1⁷). It is more than a completed act; the propitiation abides as a living, present energy residing in the personality of Christ Himself (cf. J. McLeod Campbell, The Nature of the Atonement, London, 1895, p. 170 f.). Hence the Johannine emphasis falls naturally upon the issues of the propitiation set forth in terms of cleansing from sin rather than of justification in the sight of the Law. But the main Johannine distinction is probably found in the wealth of the Divine love, in which the writer makes explicit what is elsewhere implied in the teaching on propitiation, where it is associated more closely with the righteousness of the Law. Universally assumed in the apostolic teaching, the love of God in the propitiation suffuses the whole Johannine conception with radiant light. So far from being contrasts, love and propitiation become interchangeable realities—necessary to one another, explaining one another, even lost in one another. The writer defines love by propitiation, and propitiation by love: 'in this have we come to know what love is, that he (ἐκεῖνος) for us (ὡς ἡμεῖς) laid down his life' (1 Jn 3¹⁶). 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins' (4¹⁰). This is the writer's closer definition of what he means by 'God is love'; he can convey no idea of love in God beyond that which shows itself in propitiation; for that is love's last word; the ultimate meaning of propitiation is love's ultimate meaning too; contrast between them is unthinkable.

'If the propitiatory death of Jesus is eliminated from the love of God, it might be unfair to say that the love of God is robbed of all meaning, but it is certainly robbed of its apostolic meaning' (Denney, Death of Christ, p. 276).

(3) Use in Hebrews.—Propitiation in the Epistle to the Hebrews (2⁷, 'to make propitiation for sins,' τὸ ἱλασκεῖσθαι) is interpreted in terms of sacrifice and comes nearest in apostolic teaching to the OT usage. Christ is the High Priest who offers Himself; He is at once Victim and Priest in a propitiation that procures forgiveness of sins and thereby the privilege of direct access to and communion with God. The writer noticeably departs from the classical construction of the verb, and adopts the biblical, making its object 'the sins of the people'; he thus avoids making God the object of the propitiation, producing in doing so a construction strange at the same time to Greek ears and to pagan ideas. What relation this propitiation bears to the nature of God this loose construction is too vague to indicate; clearly, however, it deals in some sacrificial way with the sin that separates from God. The writer assumes that propitiation is necessary for this end, and the only propitiation known to him is that made by a priest through sacrifice; but the necessity for it lies in a Divine fitness rather than in any definite legal obligation; the Pauline idea of the law of righteousness is absent. If a Pauline philosophy of redemption lies behind the use in this Epistle of a term common to apostolic thought generally—as seems probable—the meaning would be that the propitiation Christ offered so dealt with sin that there no longer remained in the Divine mind an obstacle to sin's forgiveness (cf. Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. 2, Tübingen, 1911, ii. 300, favouring this view, and Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 84, criticizing it). The particular contribution, however, made by the writer of Hebrews to the apostolic teaching on propitiation is the discussion of the conception that the propitiation offered by Christ is capable of dealing with all and every kind of sin as a barrier between God and man, and not with sins of ignorance and infirmity alone; the key to the discussion is that Christ's is a 'better sacrifice,' which perfects the imperfect, abolishes the typical, and lifts the whole significance of propitiation from the circle of legal and ceremonial ideas into the realm of abiding ethical and spiritual realities; Jesus, 'who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God,' thus becomes the author of eternal salvation—a salvation whose characteristic is finality; 'through his own blood, (he) entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption' (cf. He 9¹¹⁻¹⁵).

The Fathers of the Apostolic and the sub-Apostolic Ages adhered in their interpretation of propitiation to the sacrificial language of the OT and to the usage of NT terms by the apostles (cf. Polycarp, ad Phil. i. 8; Clement of Rome, ad Cor. i. 7, 32).

PROPORTION.—The Greek word ἀναλογία is of frequent occurrence in classical writings, but in the NT it is found only in Ro 12⁶, 'Whether prophecy [let us prophesy] according to the proportion of faith' (AV); RV 'according to the proportion of our faith'; RVM 'according to the proportion of the faith'). Interpreters are divided as to whether 'the faith' is to be taken subjectively (Meyer, Sanday-Headlam) or objectively (Vaughan, Liddon). The first alternative would mean that they who had received the gift of prophecy were to exercise it in consistency with the extent (or limits) of their own faith, the measure of which had been allotted to them (v.³); the second, in harmony with 'the faith' as referring to the gospel as a whole. The latter is very attractive, but the usage of the NT is against it. There is no instance in the Epistles of St. Paul of the use of ἡ πίστις in the sense of 'the gospel.' It is, however, found in Jude 20, and is one of the indications of its late date. The ἀναλογία τῆς πίστεως must be taken as parallel with, and not different from, μέτρον πίστεως (v.³). (For an elaborate examination of 'Analogy considered as a guide to Truth' see the work of J. Buchanan, published under that title, Edinburgh, 1864.) JOHN REID.

PROSELYTE.—1. Meaning of the term.—The word προσῆλυτος is not found in classical Greek. It is still an open question whether those who formed the word from προσέρχομαι thought of the verb in its primary sense of 'advenio,' or in its religious sense of '(deum) adeo' (cf. He 7²⁵, τοὺς προσερχομένους δι' αὐτοῦ τῷ Θεῷ). In the former case, προσῆλυτος originally meant advena, 'new-comer' (for which the classical equivalent is ἐπηλύς); in the latter, it meant 'proselyte' in the sense of 'one who comes or draws near to God.' In his exhaustive study of προσῆλυτος in the LXX (Exp, 4th ser., x. 264 ff.), W. C. Allen argues from the fact that the word is correctly used in a majority of cases for the גֵּר to whom certain rights were conceded in Israel (Oxf. Heb. Lex., s.v. גֵּר 2 [p. 158*]), that its meaning was from the first that of 'proselyte'—the meaning of 'stranger' being secondary, and arising from the proselyte's having his home 'in a strange land' (like the Israelites themselves in Egypt: hence they are called προσῆλυτοι, Ex 22²¹ 23*, Lv 19³⁴, Dt 10¹⁹). The statement of Philo (de Monarch. 1. 7, τοὺς δὲ καλεῖ προσηλύτους ἀπὸ τοῦ προσεληλυθέναι καὶ ἡ φιλοθέῃ πολιτεία), and also the words of Josephus (Ant. XVIII. iii. 5, νομίμοις προσεληλυθῆναι τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις), are in favour of this view. What prevents us, however, from giving it our full adhesion is that the LXX does not use προσῆλυτος in all the passages where גֵּר seems to mean or to approximate in meaning to 'proselyte,' but has sometimes παρόικος. This, of course, may be due to different hands having been employed in the work of translation. Valuable for guidance is W. R. Smith's note (*OTJC*², p. 342): 'In the Levitical legislation the word גֵּר is already on the way to assume the later technical sense of proselyte' (cf. Driver, ICC, 'Deuteronomy,' p. 165).

The distinction drawn between 'the proselyte of the gate' (גֵּר דְּבֵי, גֵּר דְּבֵי), who accepted the 'Seven Noachian Laws' (ERE iv. 245*), and 'the proselyte of righteousness' (גֵּר דְּצִדְקָה, גֵּר דְּצִדְקָה), who by complete adoption of Israel's laws became incorporated with the covenant people (HDB ii. 157*), belongs to Rabbinical Judaism (ERE vii. 592*), and is not found in Scripture. It had its precedents, however, in the differences of religious standing observable among the גֵּרִים in Israel; while the σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν mentioned by Josephus (Ant. XIV. vii. 2), and frequently in Acts, may roughly represent the 'proselytes of the gate' of the Gemara. It has been suggested that the גֵּר דְּבֵי of Ps 22²³ 115¹¹ 13 118⁴ 135²⁰ are identical with the φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν of Ac 13¹⁶ 26, but A. B. Davidson has shown that the general usage of the OT is against the identification (ExpT iii. 491). While Bertholet and others maintain that προσῆλυτοι, οἱ φοβόμενοι τὸν θεόν and οἱ σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν are synonymous (EBi iii. 3904), the view of Schürer (HJP II. ii. 314 ff.) that the first term means proselytes in the technical sense, and the other two those who, without having submitted to the rite of circumcision, joined in Jewish worship, has gained a wider acceptance. The adherence of Gentiles to Judaism in the centuries immediately preceding and following the fall of Jerusalem 'ranged over the entire gamut of possible degrees,' depending upon 'the different degrees in which the ceremonial precepts of the Law were observed' (Harnack, *The Mission and Expansion of Christianity*², i. 12, 10). The following passage from Theodore Reinach well illustrates this:

'Judaism possessed the prudence and tact not to exact from its adepts [converts] at the outset full and complete adoption of the Jewish Law. The neophyte was at first simply a "friend" to the Jewish customs, observing the least enthralling ones—the Sabbath and the lighting of a fire on the previous evening; certain fast-days; abstinence from pork. His sons frequented the synagogues and deserted the temples, studied the Law, and contributed their obol to the treasury of Jerusalem [cf. Neh 10³⁴, ERE vii. 592]. By degrees habit accomplished the rest. At last the proselyte took the decisive step: he received the rite of circumcision, took the bath of purity . . . and offered, doubtless in money, the sacrifice which signaled his definitive entrance into the bosom of Israel. Occasionally, in order to accentuate his conversion, he even adopted a Hebraic name. . . . In the third generation, according to Deut. xxiii. 8, there existed no distinction between the Jew by race and the Jew by adoption' (JE iv. 570).

'The bath of purity' here spoken of refers to the baptism of proselytes. This is described by W. Brandt (ERE ii. 408) as 'a practice of ceremonial ablution altogether new,' which 'we may safely assume . . . was not of later origin than Christian baptism.' It is not mentioned in the OT, and the traces of it found by Talmudic scholars in Gn 35, Ex 19¹⁰ are quite imaginary. It is referred to by Epictetus (who taught till A.D. 94) in his conversations as a matter of common knowledge: 'When a man,' he says, 'takes upon himself the arduous life of the baptized and the elect (τοῦ βεβαμμένου καὶ ἡγμένου), then he is really what he calls himself, a Jew' (Arrian, Diss. Epicteti, ii. 9). The Babylonian Talmud reports that about the end of the 1st cent. two famous Rabbis disputed with one another as to its necessity, which shows that at that period it was not universally regarded as indispensable. It was designated in later times 'the immersion of proselytism,' and the manner of its administration was as follows: 'The individual who desired to become a Jew was conducted to the bath, and there immersed himself in the presence of the Rabbis, who recited to him portions of the Law' (cf. Plummer, art. 'Baptism,' in HDB i. 239 f. for other references).

2. NT passages referring to proselytes.—(1) Mt 23¹⁵. Gratz's conjecture that this verse refers to an actual incident, the voyage of R. Gamaliel, R. Eliezer, R. Joshua, and R. Akiba to Rome, where they converted Flavius Clemens, the cousin of Domitian (cf. ERE vii. 592b), would imply that the saying is not justly attributed to our Lord. It is probable, as Adolf Jellinek, the famous Austrian Rabbi and scholar (1821-1893), suggested, that what is here condemned is the Pharisees' practice of winning over every year at least one proselyte each (E. G. Hirsch, JE x. 221). (2) There were proselytes among the multitude who witnessed the miracle of Pentecost (Ac 2¹⁰), some of whom may have been added to the Church; the selection of 'Nicolas a proselyte of Antioch' (6⁵) as one of the seven deacons indicates that there was a certain proportion of men of his class in the primitive Christian community. (3) In Ac 13⁴³ τῶν σεβουμένων προσηλύτων is perhaps a conflate reading (EBr iii. 3902), but the phrase appears to be a popular designation of 'God-fearing proselytes'—the same whom St. Paul twice appeals to (13^{16, 26}) as οἱ φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν. (4) Ac 8⁷. The chamberlain of Candace is included by Reinach among the 'distinguished recruits' of the Jewish faith (JE iv. 570b). (5) Cornelius was one of the φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν (Ac 10^{2, 22, 35}); note that in v. 35 St. Peter's words have not the breadth often assigned to them—he only goes the length of recognizing the manifest signs of God's acceptance of a Gentile who 'feareth him, and worketh righteousness.' (6) Lydia (Ac 16¹⁴), Titus Justus (18), and the σεβόμενοι of Thessalonica and Athens (17^{4, 17}) illustrate the important aid that members of this class gave to St. Paul in his travels. He did not, however, always find the σεβόμενοι γυναῖκες favourable to the gospel (13⁵⁰). It was partly owing to the fact of the Christian faith having found so many adherents among the σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν that the class of 'half-proselytes' or 'half-converts' came to be regarded by Rabbinical teachers with doubtful approval.

3. Outline of the history of proselytism.—Conversions to Judaism went on unimpeded in NT times, both before and after the Jewish war (Parting of the Roads, pp. 286, 305). The chief source of our information on this point is Josephus, whose historical accuracy is now generally admitted (HDB v. 466). Some of the proselytes whom he mentions by name were acquisitions of very doubtful value, as the kings Azizus of Emesa and Polemo of Cilicia, who were prompted to embrace Judaism by the desire to contract advantageous marriages with Herodian princesses (Ant. xx. vii. 1, 3), and the Empress Poppaea, whom he calls θεοσεβής (ib. xx. viii. 11). On the other hand, the conversions of Helena, queen of Adiabene, and her son, Izates, seem to have been due to sincere conviction, and the chapters in which the historian records their life and virtuous deeds are some of the most attractive of his great work (ib. xx. ii.-iv.).

The bitterness engendered by the persecution which followed the failure of the rising against Hadrian (A.D. 132-135), and the growth of the Christian Church, were joint causes which led the Rabbis to make conversion to Judaism more difficult. 'Qualified conversions to Judaism' were 'regarded with increasing disfavor,' R. Johanan declaring 'that if after a probation of twelve months the ger toshab did not submit to the rite of circumcision, he was to be regarded as a heathen' (E. G. Hirsch, JE x. 222a). But the גֵּר טָב—the who, in St. Paul's words, 'by receiving circumcision, became a debtor to do the whole law' (Gal 5⁵)—was always admitted with fervour. 'That proselytes are welcome in Israel and are beloved of God is the theme of many a rabbinical homily' (Hirsch, loc. cit.).

It should be mentioned that in two passages of the LXX where a proselyte proper is meant (Ex 12¹⁹, Is 14¹) γ is rendered, not by προσήλυτος but by γειώπας, an Aramaic word derived from γ (HDB iv. 133^a; Exp, 4th ser., x. 269; cf. HDB ii. 157^a).

PROSEUCHE. — προσευχή, the name for the Jewish place of worship, originally meant 'prayer,' afterwards 'place of prayer' (τόπος τῆς προσευχῆς, 1 Mac 3⁴⁶). The word is found in 3 Mac 7³⁰; Philo, in Flacc. 6, 7, 14 (Mangey, ii. 523, 524, 535), Leg. ad Gaium, 20, 43, 46 (Mangey, ii. 565, 596, 600); Josephus, Vita, 54, where it is described as 'a large edifice capable of receiving a great number of people.' As a rule, however, the Proseuche was situated outside the city, near the river or the sea, where there was a supply of water for the ablutions required before prayer (see Ac 16¹² and Josephus, Ant. xiv. x. 23; cf. Tertullian, de Jejuniis, 16, ad Nationes, i. 13; and Epiphanius, Hær. lxxx. 1). Frequently these prayers seem to have been said in the open air (cf. also Josephus, c. Apion. ii. ii. 2). This would best account for the strange opinion expressed by Juvenal (Sat. xiv. 97) and others that the Jews prayed to or worshipped the heavens. The name 'Proseuche' is frequently found in inscriptions. See E. Schürer, GJV 2 ii. [1898] 443, note 53, and 447, notes 64 and 65. See also art. SYNAGOGUE. K. KOHLER.

PROVINCE.—The word provincia, the derivation of which is unknown, has originally no territorial application. Provincia is in fact 'a sphere of duty,' whether that be in an office or court, like that of the urban prætor at Rome, or that of a governor of a vast district. It is only because it came to be generally associated with the rule of large districts out of Italy, that it ultimately obtained the territorial sense of 'subjugated territory out of Italy under Roman government' (R. Ogilvie, Horæ Latinæ, 1901, p. 229). The original wide sense of the word had not, however, died out in the classical period.

The Roman Empire grew by that inevitable process of expansion which is the lot of all great Empires. For the first two and a half centuries of the Republic expansion had been confined to Italy (see ROMAN EMPIRE). With the conclusion of the First Punic War (241 B.C.) a new situation had arisen. Having worsted a foreign people in a long-continued contest (264–241 B.C.), they found it necessary to maintain a stand beyond the bounds of Italy. The war itself had led to the construction of the earliest Roman fleet, and now the problem of governing overseas dominions faced them. One of the conditions of peace between Rome and Carthage was that Carthage should evacuate Sicily. This condition having been complied with, all of Sicily except Syracuse and its territory, which remained in the possession of King Hiero, the ally of Rome, became the first Roman province, Provincia Sicilia, governed by an annual prætor, elected for the purpose, over and above the regular establishment of two prætors, who remained in the city of Rome.

During the Republic at least, the same method was always carried out in taking over a province. The Senate appointed commissioners (legati), usually (if not always) ten in number, who left Rome together for the country in question, and studied its circumstances on the spot. The normal Greek-speaking country of that time consisted of a number of πόλεις (ciuitates, 'city-States') with their territory surrounding them. Such of these States as had especially favoured Rome during the preceding war might receive preferential treatment. Individual States, e.g., might be allowed to enter into a special, individual fœdus (treaty) with Rome, and thus join the class of ciuitates fœderatæ. Such a reciprocal treaty presupposed that the two parties to the treaty were in a sense on an equality. Subject States prized this position very highly. But the majority of the communities were treated as subjects in the fullest sense. After the commissioners, in consultation with the victorious general, had studied the conditions fully, they made a report to the Senate, which thereupon drafted a lex provincie, which remained for the future the statute regulating the conditions under which that province was to be governed, the taxes to be paid, etc. For each Roman province there was in existence a special statute of this nature. The text of none is extant.

Our chief knowledge of provincial government during the Republic concerns Sicily and Cilicia. In the speeches of Cicero against Verres (70 B.C.) there is much information about the government and administration of Sicily, in which Cicero himself had been questor. From Cicero's letters we learn much of the details of his own government of the province Cilicia, where he was governor in the year 51–50 B.C. For the Imperial period we have the correspondence between Pliny, governor of Bithynia-Pontus, and the Emperor Trajan (c. A.D. 113). The experience of the Republic was invaluable to the Empire. For the most part, no doubt, the conditions in the provinces were the same in both periods, with the exception that in the later period extortion by governors was for various reasons much less frequent. In this article we must confine ourselves as far as possible to the Empire, under which the Apostolic Church came into existence.

In the middle of the 1st cent. A.D. the Roman provinces encircled the Mediterranean. The senatorial provinces, those belonging to the Senate and people by the arrangement of January, 27 B.C., were eleven in number—Asia, Africa, Hispania Bætica, Gallia Narbonensis, Sardinia et Corsica, Sicilia, Macedonia, Achæa, Creta et Cyrenæ, Cyprus, Bithynia et Pontus. These were in a peaceful state, and, with the exception of Africa, had no army. Asia and Africa were governed only by ex-consuls with three legati each, and were in a class by themselves. The others could be governed by ex-prætors, but all were entitled proconsuls (see PROCONSUL); each had one legatus. Asia comprised roughly the western third of the country we call Asia Minor, Africa corresponded roughly to the territory of modern Tunis, Hispania Bætica to Andalusia, and Gallia Narbonensis to the south-eastern quarter of France. The important Imperial provinces, which required the presence of an army, were twenty-one in number: Suria (Syria), Hispania Tarraconensis, Germania Superior, Germania Inferior, Britannia, Pannonia Superior, Pannonia Inferior, Moesia Superior, Moesia Inferior, Dalmatia, Lusitania, Gallia Aquitania, Gallia Lugudunensis, Gallia Belgica, Galatia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Cilicia et Syria et Phœnice, Numidia, Cappadocia,* each governed by a legatus Augusti pro prætore, and Egypt, governed by an equestrian præfectus Egypti, acting for his master the Emperor, who reigned as king of Egypt. Some further Imperial provinces of less importance were governed by procuratores (see under GOVERNMENT, PROCURATOR). It is inexact to speak of Judæa as a province at this period. It remained from the beginning down to the time of Vespasian a client-State, whether ruled by one king or by a number of princes, or by a Roman procurator in company with an ἀρχιεὺς καὶ ἐθνάρχης. The king was subordinate to the governor of the province Syria. The procurator's position, however, was like that of the præfectus Egypti. He took the place of the highest ruler (the Emperor), but neither Judæa nor Egypt was part of the Roman Empire in the strict sense of the term (T. Mommsen, Gesammelte Schriften, vol. iii.: 'Juristische Schriften,' 1907, p. 431, n. 1, contradicting his earlier work, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., vol. ii. p. 185).

During the Empire all the provinces were subject to taxation, even those ciuitates which had formerly been and were still liberæ being now compelled to contribute. This change is traced to Pompey. Immunity of cities was an exceptional privilege in the Empire, belonging exclusively, or almost exclusively, to coloniæ, in virtue of the fact that they, like the inhabitants of Italy, owned their soil. Augustus first grappled with the task of numbering the subjects of the Empire, and apportioning the fiscal burdens among the provinces and individuals in them. The census of Egypt occurred every fourteen years (A.D. 19–20 the earliest attested date), and the same or a similar arrangement was doubtless current in other provinces, though it must be remembered that the situation in Egypt was peculiar. The census-papers were the basis for the levy of the poll-tax, as well as for the fixing of the proportion of other public burdens due from each householder. The taxes were either land-taxes or imposts on the person. The land-tax in a few cases was paid in kind. The poll-tax pure and simple was rare; generally the basis of taxation was the profession, the income, or the value of the movable property. In the public provinces the stipendium (as it was called) was perhaps collected by the States themselves and by them handed over to the quaestor, while in the Imperial provinces the tributum ('war-tax,' properly) was paid direct to the procurator. But it must not be forgotten that the Emperor had his procuratores even in senatorial provinces: these, however, may have been specially concerned with the management of his private estates. The publicani, however, the middlemen farmers of taxes, still had their place in Nero's time, for measures had to be taken to repress their exactions. A definite allowance (salarium) was now given to governors of provinces, and this must have lessened extortion somewhat. The legati of proconsuls had more definite jurisdiction. The legions in the Imperial provinces had their own military commanders (legatus legionis) apart from the governors. While the proconsuls held office for one year only, the Emperor's legates were retained in office during his pleasure.

The Romanization of the provinces was a gradual process. To begin with, it was against Roman practice to give a provincial constitution to a district until it had been civilized to a sufficient extent by its own ruler (or rulers), and so was ready for the further process. Romanization itself took place through the channels of social and trade intercourse, but in the West more conscious efforts were made towards it. We can see how proud the inhabitants of South Galatia were of their Roman connexion. One of the secrets of Rome's success was that her governors were always content to let well alone. No attempt was made to unify the type of administration throughout the Empire. In most cases slight adjustments and the gradual purifying of municipal life were sufficient to bring all the local machinery into harmony with the central government.

LITERATURE.—The standard work for the individual provinces is T. Mommsen, Römische Geschichte, v. 2 (Berlin, 1855), tr. W. P. Dickson, The Provinces of the Roman Empire from Caesar to Diocletian, 2 vols., London, 1886: improved and cheaper edition by F. Haverfield, one of the leading authorities on this subject, do., 1900. Otto Hirschfeld's Die kaiserlichen Verwaltungsbeamten bis auf Diocletian, Berlin, 1905, is invaluable. Principles of administration of the provinces in general are summarized in A. H. J. Greenidge, Roman Public Life, London, 1901, chs. viii. and xi. Students will find it helpful to concentrate on one province, and Galatia is suggested on account of the masterly treatment by W. M. Ramsay, A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, London, 1899. On the fourteen years' census in Egypt, cf. W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ born in Bethlehem?, London, 1898, and G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1910, pp. 44 ff., 72 f.; both provide texts and mention other relevant literature.

PSALMS.—'Psalms' in the Apostolic Church included OT Psalms and similar hymns of praise to God, as sung to musical accompaniment. In 1 Co 14²⁵ St. Paul contemplates impromptu utterances under the influence of the Spirit, and appeals for the use of the reason in praise no less than in prayer. In v. 26 he assumes that members of the congregation will bring their assembly psalms which they have composed or learnt and wish to sing with or before others. The Psalms of Solomon, which may be dated c. 50 B.C., prove the use of sacred poetry among the Jews at this period. Forceful hymns, full of noble indignation against Roman oppression and Jewish secularity, in their praise of patience and resignation they express the feeling that Israel deserves chastening. Like the Benedictus they look for a Messiah of the house of David. But they fall short of the canticles of the NT in spiritual insight. The tone is self-righteous and sometimes fierce.

The use of psalms in private is referred to in Ja 5¹³: 'He that is merry let him sing psalms' (cf. Eph 5¹⁹).
A. E. BURN.

PSALMS OF SOLOMON.—These Psalms are eighteen in number, and were probably written in the 1st cent. B.C. It is doubted whether they are even indirectly cited in the NT; but both the language and the thought in them are of importance for a complete study of the Apostolic Age.

1. MSS and YSS.—It is generally admitted and is practically certain that these Psalms were originally written in Hebrew; but not even a fragment of any Hebrew MS of them, nor any Hebrew quotation from them, exists. The MSS in which the Psalms have survived are (1) Greek, and (2) Syriac. The Syriac is a secondary version, made from the Greek; but the Greek is probably a direct version from the lost Hebrew original.

Eight Greek MSS are now known. Of these the earliest (H) was written in the 10th or 11th cent., the latest in 1419, the rest in the 11th to the 14th centuries. The first edition of the Greek text was published in 1626 by John Louis de la Cerda; it was printed from a faulty copy of a MS which is now in Vienna (V) and which is derived from H. Later editions of the Psalms, down to and including that of Ryle and James in 1891, also rested entirely on H, or MSS derived from it. A more accurate text became possible when use could be made of other MSS, especially R (reproduced in vol. iii. of Swete's Old Testament in Greek) and J, which, though written later, were independent of H and in many respects superior to it. A critical text based on the eight known MSS was published in 1895 by Oscar von Gebhardt.

The Syriac Version first became known in 1909, when Rendel Harris published the Syriac text from a nearly complete MS which came into his possession 'from the neighbourhood of the Tigris.' This MS is probably no older than the 16th or 17th century. Subsequently a fragment of another MS of the Syriac text was found in the Cambridge University Library, and yet another and much earlier (incomplete) MS in the British Museum.

The Syriac MS edited by Rendel Harris is defective both at the beginning and at the end, and title and colophon are consequently missing; the separate psalms are numbered, but are without titles. The same is true of the more ancient British Museum MS described by Burkitt (see Literature). A general title to the whole collection occurs only in the Greek MSS L, H which represent a late stage in the textual history. On the other hand, in most of the Greek MSS, including R and J, nearly every individual psalm is entitled 'of Solomon,' τῷ Σολομῶνι, with which we may compare the τῷ Δαυὶδ in the LXX version of the canonical Psalter. (For details, von Gebhardt's textual apparatus and his remarks on p. 47 f. should be consulted; see also E. A. Abbott, Light on the Gospel from an Ancient Poet, 1912, pp. 1-7.)

But for the connexion of Solomon's name with these Psalms we can pass behind the MSS. They originally stood in the Codex Alexandrinus (5th cent. A.D.) of the Bible; and, though the part which contained them has perished, the entry in the table of contents or catalogue at the beginning of the Codex survives and reads: 'Psalms of Solomon XVIII.' This entry constitutes the earliest direct external evidence not merely of the association of Solomon's name with the Psalms, but of the existence of the Psalms themselves.

Rather earlier indirect external evidence of the existence of the Psalms has sometimes been sought elsewhere; but it is at least doubtful whether the fifty-ninth canon of the Council of Laodicea (c. A.D. 360), when it directs that 'private psalms (ιδιωτικὸν ψαλμὸν) are not to be read in the church,' and a similarly vague reference in Ambrose, refer to the Psalms of Solomon; and it is now certain that the Odes of Solomon mentioned in the Pistis Sophia (c. A.D. 250) and by Lactantius (4th cent.) are not these Psalms, but a different set of poems, which actually precede the 18 Psalms in Harris's Syriac MS.

The inclusion of these Psalms originally in the Codex Alexandrinus, and perhaps, too, in the Codex Sinaiticus, the association of them in most of the eight Greek MSS in which they now survive with other Solomonic works, canonical and apocryphal—the Psalms commonly standing between Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus—indicate the position which they occupied in the early history of the Church; but the paucity of references to them and quotations from them shows at the same time that they proved neither very attractive nor very influential: they probably owed their preservation to the fact that they bore the name of Solomon.

2. Contents.—The chief contents of the Psalms may be briefly indicated as follows:

Ps 1.—Suddenly, in the midst of prosperity, threatened with war and assault, Zion, confident in her righteousness, had appealed to God; but closer examination had convinced her that secret sins, surpassing those of the heathen, had been committed, and the sanctuary of God polluted.

Ps 2.—Foreigners have shattered the walls of Jerusalem with a battering-ram, and treated God's altar profanely. This and the captivity of many Jews that followed seem to the writer to be the punishment meted out by God for the previous profanation of the sacrifices by some of the Jews, 'the sons of Jerusalem,' themselves. Nevertheless, the foreign executant of God's anger had outgone his commission; he too is punished; he is slain in Egypt, and his body exposed to dishonour.

Ps 3.—The character, conduct, and faith of the righteous and unrighteous are contrasted.

Ps 4.—The 'men-pleasers' are described as hypocrites—outwardly, even extravagantly respectable and severe in their condemnation of sinners; but actually consumed with lust, in their gratification of which they destroy the peace of family after family. May God reward them with dishonour in life and death, with penury and lonely old age.

Ps 5.—The goodness of God towards animals and men alike is without stint: man's is a grudging goodness.

Ps 6.—Happy is the man who prays.

Ps 7.—Let God, if needs be, chasten Israel, but not by giving them up to the nations.

Ps 8.—A more elaborate treatment of the theme of the first Psalm: the wickedness of a party of the Jews had consisted in immorality and the profanation of the sacred precincts and the sacrifices by disregard of the laws of ritual cleanness. In vv. 15-24 a specific account is given of the progress of the invader and of his reception.

Ps 9.—Righteousness in God and man: man's free-will, and God's goodness to the penitent. Through God's goodness Israel hopes not to be rejected for ever.

Ps 10.—Happy is the man whom God chastiseth: Israel shall praise Him for His goodness.

Ps 11.—The return of the Diaspora to Jerusalem.

Ps 12.—May God curse the slanderers, and preserve the quiet and peace-loving.

Ps 13.—God has preserved the righteous at a time when the 'sinners' perished miserably. If God chastens the righteous, it is as a father his first-born. The life of the righteous and the destruction of the sinners are for ever.

Ps 14.—Eternal life and joy await the pious; but Sheol, darkness, and destruction are the lot of sinners, whose delight is in 'fleeting corruption.'

Ps 15.—Similar to 13 and 14.

Ps 16.—But for God's mercy and strength, even the righteous would slip down to the fate of the wicked. A prayer for preservation from sin, from beautiful but beguiling women, and for strength to bear affliction with cheerfulness.

Ps 17.—Sinners who had set up a non-Davidic monarchy have been removed: a man of alien race has laid waste the land of Judah and carried men captive to the West. The psalm closes (vv. 23-31) with a long description of the Messianic king, for whose advent the author prays.

Ps 18.—'Again of the anointed of the Lord.'

3. Date.—Two things in particular stand out clearly in these Psalms: (1) the Jewish nation is divided sharply into two sects or parties, the 'righteous,' to whom the writer belongs, and the 'sinners,' or the party of his opponents; (2) the nation has suffered severely from the invasion of unnamed foreigners. More than one period in Jewish history would satisfy these conditions, and certainly the period of the Maccabæan revolt (167 B.C. and following years); and in the profanation of the altar to which Ps 2 refers it is tempting at first to see an allusion to Antiochus Epiphanes' act in setting up on the altar the 'abomination of desolation' (1 Mac 1st). To this period, then, some scholars have assigned the Psalms. But the whole of the more specific allusions taken together, and most of them even taken separately, are far better satisfied by the circumstances of the middle of the 1st cent. B.C.—a period of bitter feud between the Pharisees and the Sadducees, and of the invasion of Judah by the Romans under Pompey. It is to this period, therefore, that most recent scholars refer the Psalms. The (alien) nations (2nd 6. 10. 24 7th 6th 8th) who attack Jerusalem, and by whom the Jewish captives are led away, and against whom the writer prays for deliverance, are the Romans. Their commander, 'who is from the end of the earth, who smiteth mightily' (8th), who is met by the Jewish princes and at first invited by them to Jerusalem, but ultimately has to capture the fortresses and the walls of Jerusalem by force (8th 21), by bringing battering-rams to play upon them (2nd), who allows his soldiers profanely to trample upon the altar (2nd), who carries his captives to the West (17th), and whose end was a dishonoured death 'on the mountains of Egypt' (23rd 31) is Pompey. For he, as a Roman, came from the West, and thither he led back to grace his triumph in Rome the Jewish prince Aristobulus; he availed himself of the quarrels between the Jewish princes Hyrcanus and Aristobulus and their supporters to secure the Roman power in Judah; he was at first approached and welcomed by both these princes, but in the end he was resolutely resisted by Aristobulus in Jerusalem, so that he was compelled to bring up battering-rams from Tyre wherewith to break down the fortified wall of Jerusalem; he shocked Jewish feeling by intruding into the Holy of Holies, and fifteen years after he had captured Jerusalem and profaned the Temple, he was slain beside Mons Cassius near Pelusium, his body being at first left unburied on the Egyptian shore, and then hastily and unceremoniously burned.

A considerable similarity of tone and temper and the possibility of satisfying all the specific allusions, more or less completely, by what is known independently of the condition of the Jews between about 80 and 40 B.C. and of the circumstances of Pompey's treatment of them, and of his death, favour the commonly accepted view that these Psalms (possibly with the exception of Ps 18) were written in Palestine (and probably indeed in Jerusalem) within a single generation, and not improbably by a single writer; absolute proof, however, of single authorship is not forthcoming, and some of the more colourless of the Psalms might then belong to another age. The second Psalm, which refers to the death of the foreign invader, must have been written after, but probably soon after, Pompey's death in 48 B.C.; the rest of the Psalms (except 18) were probably written rather earlier, most of them soon after Pompey's capture of Jerusalem in 63 B.C., but one or two (4 and 12) perhaps earlier still, before the Jews in general had suffered at Pompey's hands and the party of the 'sinners' had received that severer treatment which Pompey measured out to Aristobulus and his party.

4. Main ideas.—(1) Pharisees and Sadducees.—The chief interest of these Psalms is that they reveal the temper and ideals of those two parties which in the period of the formation of the NT played so conspicuous a part in Jewish life: the author is a Pharisee, and the opponents whom he denounces are Sadducees. The Psalms indeed run back two or three generations before the separation of the Christian Church from the Jewish religion, but we can trace in them much that was still characteristic of the two parties later.

The Sadducees are to the writer 'the unrighteous' (ἄδικοι), 'sinners' (ἁμαρτωλοί), 'transgressors' (παράνομοι), 'the profane' (βέβηλοι), the 'men-pleasers' (ἀνθρωπάρεσκοι). The use of these terms and the charges brought against the Sadducees of insolence, self-reliance, disregard of God, and gross sensual sins may largely represent the generalizations, exaggerations, or inventions of a political or religious opponent. But in charging them with profanation of the sanctuary and its sacrifices he implies that somewhat intimate association of the priesthood with the Sadducees which is conspicuous later. So again in charging them with setting up a non-Davidic monarchy (17⁷⁻⁸), i.e. with recognizing the royal dignity which the Hasmonæans had claimed since Aristobulus I. (104 B.C.), he implies a readiness in that party to acquiesce in an existing polity, even though it was inconsistent with the Messianic promises, which seems natural enough in the ancestors of the Sadducees of the 1st cent. A.D.

Over against these 'sinners' the writer sees in his own party, i.e. the Pharisees, 'the righteous' (δίκαιοι), 'the pious' (δῖοι, representing the Hebrew hasidim), 'those that fear the Lord' ([οἱ] φοβούμενοι τὸν κύριον), 'the guileless' (ἄκακοι); occasionally too this party appears as 'the poor' (πτωχοί, πένητες). They were devoted to the Law (14¹), troubled about sins done in ignorance yet convinced that the punishment of the righteous for sins done in ignorance was something very unlike that which awaited the 'sinners' (13⁴⁻⁵). As a matter of fact, though 'righteous' and 'sinners' alike must have suffered greatly from the necessary results of Pompey's attack on and capture of Jerusalem, it was the party of the Sadducees, the adherents of Aristobulus, who with his children were taken captive, that suffered most. But in their view of a future life these Pharisees of the 1st cent. B.C. already found further ground for differentiating the lot of the sinners and the righteous. 'They that fear the Lord shall rise to life eternal, and their life shall be in the light of the Lord, and shall come to an end no more' (3¹⁶). When the wicked depart into 'Sheol and darkness and destruction,' the righteous will obtain mercy and 'the pious of the Lord shall inherit life in gladness' (14⁶⁻⁷; cf. also 13⁹⁻¹¹ 14⁻³ 15¹⁵ 16¹⁻⁵). On the other hand, the end of the wicked, if not actual annihilation, is but the miserable life of Sheol indefinitely prolonged: whereas the righteous 'rise to life eternal,' the sinner 'falls and rises no more' and his destruction is for ever (3¹³⁻¹⁵; cf. 9⁹ 12⁷ 13¹⁰ 14⁶ 15¹¹). With this hope the righteous pray that they may, and the writer claims that they already do, accept with patience the present passing chastisement of God.

(2) Free-will.—In their view of man's free-will the author of the Psalms and his party are at one with the Pharisees of the 1st cent. A.D. as described by Josephus (Ant. II. viii. 14): i.e. like the Sadducees they assert man's freedom, but at the same time they differ from the Sadducees by asserting and indeed emphasizing the Divine knowledge and control of human action: 'Man and his portion lie before Thee in the balance: he cannot add to, so as to enlarge, what has been prescribed by Thee' (5⁶). 'Our works are subject to our own choice and power to do right or wrong in the work of our hands.'

(3) The Messianic hope.—Lastly, we may note the very important light cast by Pss 17 and 18 on the Messianic hope as cherished in this circle. The Messiah is to be, unlike the actual king whom the sinners had presumptuously set up (17⁷⁻⁸), a descendant of David (v.²³). He will enjoy the old title of the Hebrew kings—the anointed of Jahweh (or the Lord); for the phrase 'Christ (the) Lord' (cf. Lk 2¹¹) which occurs in the MSS at 17³⁶ is probably, even if it be the original Greek reading, nothing but a mistranslation (as in La 4²⁰) of the ordinary Hebrew genitive phrase 'the anointed of the Lord.' This Messiah is also called 'the king of Israel' (17⁴) and 'the son of David' (v.²³). He will appear at a time determined by God (18⁵), being raised up, or brought forward again (though the idea of a pre-existing Messiah detected by some in this phrase is very doubtful) by God Himself. He will purge Jerusalem alike from heathen enemies who profane it, and from native unrighteous rulers. He will then restore the true kingdom to Israel—a kingdom righteous, holy, glorious, worldwide—and rule as the vicegerent of God, who Himself remains over and above this human ruler, the king of Israel, 'for ever and ever' (17³¹).

PTOLEMAIS (Πτολεμαῖς).—Ptolemais is the ancient Canaanite town of Acco (mentioned in Jg 1³¹ and in the corrected text of Jos 19³⁰), still known in Arab. as Akka. Standing on the rocky promontory which forms the northern boundary of the sandy Bay of Acre, protected by the sea on the W., S., and S.E., and strongly fortified on the landward side, it came to be regarded as the key of Palestine, and its chequered history is chiefly a record of sieges, of which it has probably had to endure more in ancient and modern times than any other Syrian town. Between it and the hills of Galilee lies the fertile Plain of Acre, six miles in width, watered by the Nahr Namein, the ancient Belus, a river famous for the manufacture—Pliny (HN xxxvi. 65. 26) says the invention—of glass at its mouth, as well as for the murex shells from which purple dye was extracted by the Phœnicians.

The town rose to considerable importance under the Macedonian kings of Egypt, who converted it into a Greek city, and its new name—given probably by Ptolemy Soter, and retained when the rival kings of Syria gained the mastery—continued to be used till the end of the Roman period, after which the old native name was revived. The city played a prominent part in the Maccabæan wars. There Simon routed the Syrian Greeks (1 Mac 5¹⁵), and there Jonathan was treacherously captured by Trypho (12⁴⁵⁻⁴⁸). Ptolemais had an era dating from a visit of Julius Cæsar in 47 B.C. Augustus was entertained in it by Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xv. vi. 7), and Claudius established it as a colonia (Pliny, HN v. 17). The Romans used it as a base of operations in the Jewish war, at the outbreak of which its inhabitants proved their loyalty to Rome by massacring 2,000 Jews resident in the city and putting others in bonds (Jos. BJ II. xviii. 5).

Ptolemais is mentioned only once in the NT. St. Paul touched it in sailing from Tyre to Cæsarea (Ac 21⁷). Its distance from Tyre is 25 miles. The Apostle saluted the Christians whom he found in the town, and remained a day in their company. The founder of the Church is not known. Philip the Evangelist, who laboured in Cæsarea, has been suggested.

Under the name of Accon (St. Jean d'Acre of the Knights of St. John), the town was the scene of many conflicts in the time of the Crusaders, who made it their chief port in Palestine. Its capture by the Saracens brought the kingdom of the Franks to an end. The destruction of the city 'produced terror all over Europe; for, with its fall in 1291, the power of the Christian nations of the West lost its last hold upon the East' (C. Ritter, The Comparative Geography of Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula, 1866, iv. 361). Reconstructed in the 18th cent., besieged in vain by Napoleon (1799), captured by Ibrahim Pasha (1831), and bombarded by the fleets of Britain, Austria, and Turkey (1840), it still has some commercial importance, though the recent growth of Haifa has told heavily against it.

PUBLIUS (Πόπλιος).—Publius was the leading man of Malta at the time of St. Paul's shipwreck there, when he hospitably entertained the shipwrecked party (Ac 28⁷). His father, who was sick of fever and dysentery, was healed by the Apostle (v. 8). The epithet ὁ πρῶτος, 'the chief man,' seems to have been an official title peculiar to Malta (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, 1895, p. 343). The form 'Poplios' may be either the Greek popular equivalent for the Roman prænomen Publius or the Greek rendering of the nomen Popilius. Ecclesiastical tradition makes him the first bishop of Malta.

PUDENS (Πούδης).—Pudens was a Christian of Rome who along with Eubulus, Claudia, and Linus sends greetings to Timothy (2 Ti 4²¹). He was thus on intimate terms with the apostle Paul at the time of his last Roman imprisonment. Nothing certain is known regarding him. He is supposed by many to have been the husband of the Claudia of the same verse and has been identified with the Pudens of Martial's Epigrams, whose wife also bore the name Claudia (Epigr. iv. 13, xi.

54). For a full account of various identifications and literature, see art. CLAUDIA.

PUNISHMENT.—The word 'punishment' is employed to translate κόλασις (1 Jn 4¹⁸ RV) and τιμωρία (He 10²⁹). The corresponding verbs κολάζω and τιμωρέω, translated 'punish,' are used indiscriminately (Ac 4²¹, 2 P 2⁹; cf. Ac 22²⁸ 26¹¹); so that the classical distinction, exemplified in Plato and Aristotle, between τιμωρία, which regarded the retributive suffering, and κόλασις, which regarded the correction of the offender, can hardly be pressed in the case of NT usage (for the distinction, see R. C. Trench, *Synonyms of the NT*⁸, London, 1876). Other words translated 'punishment' are δικη (2 Th 1⁹ RV), ἐκδίκησις (1 P 2¹⁴, 'vengeance' in RV), and ἐπιτιμία (2 Co 2⁶).

The term 'punishment' (Lat. pœna) may be defined as pain or suffering inflicted in expiation of a crime or offence by an authority to which the offender is subject. The authority inflicting it may be human or Divine. The human authority may be civil or ecclesiastical. Human authority to inflict punishment is ultimately derived from a Divine source.

1. Punishment inflicted by human authority.—Under this head may be mentioned (a) that inflicted by civil authority. Roman magistrates, under the supremacy of the Emperor, in so far as they administered just laws, are regarded as executors of the Divine wrath or vengeance against evil-doers, and submission to their jurisdiction is made imperative on members of the Apostolic Church (1 P 2¹⁴; cf. Ro 13¹⁻⁵).

(b) That inflicted by ecclesiastical authority. (a) In the Jewish Church, the supreme Sanhedrin at Jerusalem and local Sanhedrins claimed and exercised the right to punish persons adjudged guilty of contumacy, schism (αἵρεσις), or seducing the people. On the basis of such charges it was sought to make the apostles and others who adhered to their doctrine and fellowship amenable to punishment (Ac 4²¹ 22²⁸ 26¹¹). (β) In the exercise of discipline, the members of a Christian church, acting as a judicial body, were vested with the power to inflict censure, or the severer punishment of exclusion from the fellowship of the Church, on every brother who walked disorderly (1 Co 5³⁻⁵, 1 Th 5¹⁴, 2 Th 3⁶). In carrying out the sentence of exclusion, the name and authority of Christ, as King and Head of the Church, were solemnly invoked. While the extreme penalty of exclusion was called punishment (ἐπιτιμία, 2 Co 2⁶; ἐκδίκησις, 7¹¹), the object of its infliction was the ultimate restoration of the offender to Church privileges (2 Co 2⁶; cf. 10⁸ 13¹⁰).

2. Divine punishment.—In passages in which the term occurs it is conceived as eschatological. (a) It is associated with the Intermediate State. (a) According to representations derived from apocalyptic literature, the fallen angels are depicted as undergoing punishment in Tartarus while awaiting the Final Judgment (2 P 2⁹; cf. 2⁴, Jude⁶, 1 P 3¹⁹). (β) The inhabitants of the Cities of the Plain have been continually subjected to punishment since the period when it was first inflicted upon them in the time of Lot (Jude⁷ RV).

(b) Punishment is associated with the Parousia. (a) At the Second Advent the heathen and unbelieving Jews who have persecuted or ill-used members of the Church are to receive the due reward of their deeds. The punishment meted out to them is more particularly defined as 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord and from the glory of his might' (2 Th 1⁹ RV). (β) Apostates from the Christian faith, being guilty of wilful sin, for which no further sacrifice is provided, are liable under the New Covenant to far severer punishment at Christ's Return than that which overtook

The primary purpose of punishment, human or Divine, is to vindicate the law, and uphold the moral order of the world, which, in the absence of such sanction, would fail to command the respect of the law-breaker. Punishment may also be imposed with a view to reform the offender or to deter others from the commission of like offences by making an example of him. It must be maintained, however, that even should punishment fail to exercise a corrective or deterrent effect, its infliction as righteous retribution would still be justified (see W. N. Clarke, An Outline of Christian Theology, Edinburgh, 1893, pp. 253-255, and R. Mackintosh, Christianity and Sin, London, 1913, p. 215). Punishment is the natural correlate and consequence of guilt. It presupposes that the wrong-doer is responsible for the acts which have exposed him to it, and justly merits its infliction. Divine punishment is the reaction of God's holy nature against sin. It is the outward manifestation of the Divine wrath against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. As the manifestation of God's just resentment, it is mainly, though not exclusively (in opposition to Ritschl, see A. E. Garvie, *The Ritschian Theology*², Edinburgh, 1902, pp. 307-310), eschatological. Punishment by itself, i.e. apart from disclosures of Divine grace, leading to 'the apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ' (Shorter Catechism, A. 87), has no redemptive or remedial effects upon the character, and cannot produce repentance (Ro 2⁴ 4¹⁵, 2 Co 7¹⁰). Doubtless it is for this reason that the future punishment of the impenitent is never regarded as tending to the purification of the sufferers. Whatever possibilities the eternal future may have in store, the NT draws a veil over the fate of those who have failed to improve the opportunity afforded by the dispensation under which men are now living.

PURIFICATION (ἀγνισμός, Ac 21²⁶; καθαρισμός, He 1³, 2 P 1⁹).—Purification is an old-world idea and ideal. It arose out of the mystery of God and the misery of man. The signification of ἀγνισμός is that we must approach God carefully, of καθαρισμός that we are unable to do so without the help of some mediator who cleanses. Men instinctively felt that those mysterious presences which surround man were dangerous forces, and that both in approaching and leaving them a wise ritual of restrictions was necessary. Outside the Bible these restrictions are called 'tabus.' Aaron, for instance, washed both before and after the act of atonement (Lv 16⁴ 23-4; W. R. Smith, *RS*², 1894, p. 152 ff., and additional note B). Man's misery had taught him the need of being made fit, and so there lurked at the heart of tabu the idea of an act of moral cleansing. It was to be such as both to annul man's guilt and to appease God. Thus after child-birth, bringing with it the mystery of Divine forces, the mother kept days of purification. Whenever man sighted the Unseen Powers—when with the dead, e.g., or in war—he was under tabu. The Nazirite vow (Nu 6, Ac 21²⁶) was a continuous tabu, an active hourly recognition of the Unseen. St. Paul was Jew enough to respond to these forms, and Christian enough to extract value out of them (Ac 18¹⁸)—to make them 'days of separation' (Nu 6⁴, He 7²⁶) in the religious life.

The Jewish sacrificial system is the specially Divine one among the primitive systems of sacrifice and tabu. It puts into dogmatic form the vague

God-ward instincts of the primeval heart. One instinct was the community of blood between the god, man, and the animal world, so that, if the blood of a human or an animal victim was shed, it was an offering of their common life, and, if the flesh was eaten, they became one in a mysterious sacrament (W. R. Smith, op. cit. p. 312 ff.; J. G. Frazer, *GB*² [1900] ii. 318). So the sin-offering was eaten (Lv 6²⁶), embodying man's guilty feelings towards God and God's appeased feelings towards man. The final act of this mystery is when 'God made Jesus Christ to be sin,' a sin-offering, a setting forth of man's guilt and God's purification. He made 'purification of sins' (He 1³). How?

There are three answers. (a) Psychological.—He fulfils the vague cravings for a guilt-offering from the beginning. That which we cannot put into words, but which has written itself in history, in language, in religion, in instinctive humanity, He is and does. (b) Ethical.—An exhibition on a great scale of an act of justice purges a people. Aristotle made this one of the uses of tragedy, to purify the passions by pity and terror (cf. S. A. Brooke, Life and Letters of F. W. Robertson, new ed., 1868, Letters 86, 87). Christ's death was such an exhibition. (c) Spiritual ('cleansing their hearts by faith').—Personal identification with His suffering cleanses (J. R. PUTEOLI (Πυτρίοι, now Pozzuoli).—The town of Puteoli lay on the northern shore of the Bay of Naples (Sinus Cumanus), and on the eastern side of the lovely Sinus Baiæ, which was a bay within a bay. Originally a Greek settlement, it retained the name of Dicaearchia till the Romans established a colony there, when the Latin element swamped the Greek. Eastward the town was separated from Neapolis by a headland (Posilipo) which Augustus pierced with a tunnel, while westward it joined hands with Baiæ, the gay resort of fashionable Rome. By the short Via Campana (or Consularis) it was connected with the Via Appia at Capua, which was 125 miles from Rome. Puteoli was not only the usual landing-place of travellers for Rome—such as St. Paul (Ac 28¹³), Josephus (Vit. 3), and the prisoner Ignatius (Martyr. 5)—but the haven for the merchant-ships of Syria and Egypt in the east, of Carthage and Spain in the west. It was 'the Liverpool of Italy' (Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, ii. 433). Seneca (Ep. 77) gives a life-like picture of the Puteolan crowd gathering on the pier in spring to watch the fleet of Alexandrian corn-ships heaving in sight, easily distinguished 'in magna turba navium' because they alone were allowed to enter the bay carrying their top-sails. The mercantile supremacy of Puteoli is explained by Strabo (c. A.D. 20): Ostia 'has no port, owing to the accumulation of alluvial deposit brought down by the Tiber, . . . vessels therefore bring to anchor farther out, but not without danger' (v. iii. 5). All this was changed by the construction at Ostia of the Portus Augusti, begun in the reign of Claudius and finished in that of Nero, close to the time (A.D. 59 or 60) of St. Paul's arrival in Italy. The Apostle's ship, however, sailed for the old port, so that he and his companions had to make the usual overland journey. In Puteoli they 'found brethren' of whom they had no previous knowledge (as the absence of the article proves), and 'were cheered among them (παρεκλήθημεν παρ' αὐτοῖς), remaining seven days' (Ac 28¹⁴). This reading is preferred by W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 212) and F. Blass (Acta Apostolorum, 1895, p. 287) to 'were entreated by them' (ἐπ' αὐτοῖς), which would convey the idea that St. Paul, though a prisoner, was able to make his own arrangements; whereas the truth probably was that when Julius decided that a halt must be made for a week, the Apostle used the measure of liberty given him, and passed the time in happy fellowship with the little Christian Church. There had been a colony of Jews in Puteoli before the time of Christ (Jos. Ant. xvii. xii. 1, BJ ii. vii. 1), so that the soil had been partly prepared for the seed of the gospel; and as ships plied between Puteoli and every port in Syria and Egypt, it was nothing wonderful that St. Paul found Christianity already planted in that great commercial city. Other Eastern cults took root there sooner than in Rome, as a temple of Serapis, frequented in the 2nd cent. B.C., proved. The modern town (population, 17,000) retains many relics of ancient greatness—amphitheatre, baths, circus, villas. Its cathedral is built into a temple of Augustus.

PYRRHUS (Πύρρος, a Greek name).—In N ABDE and several ancient versions Sopater of Beroë, who accompanied St. Paul on at least part of his return journey from Greece to Palestine, is described in Ac 20⁴ as 'the son of Pyrrhus' (Σώπατρος Πύρρου). In the TR Πύρρον is omitted in accordance with later MSS and versions. Hence the omission in the English AV and the addition in the RV. Nothing further is known of Pyrrhus or of Sopater (q.v.), unless the latter, as is possible, is identical with Sosipater of Ro 16²¹, who is one of three men who send salutations from Corinth as 'kinsmen' of St. Paul, i.e. fellow-Jews. If we consider this identification likely, we shall suppose father and son to have been Hellenistic Jews, and perhaps both to have been among the 'many' converts made at Beroë during the Apostle's visit there (Ac 17¹⁰⁻¹⁴). The mention of Pyrrhus at all may indicate that he had become well known as a Christian. On the other hand, some commentators consider that his name has been inserted purposely to distinguish Sopater from Sosipater. This is the only instance of a patronymic of the usual Greek fashion in the NT. It may point to a family of some social position.

PYTHON.—The primitive Aryans worshipped a deity named, from ἀπέλλα, 'the fold,' Ἀπέλλων or Ἀπόλλων, 'he of the fold,' the special god of the cattle-pen, the patron deity of cattle-rearing. He was also called Λύκιος, 'he who frightens away the wolf.' As Φαῖβος, the sun-god, was the deity who opened the ἀπέλλα ('cattle-pens') in the morning and drove out the herds, the one god became identified with the other. Apollo dwelt in caves.* Certain tribes of Aryan Hellenes who invaded and conquered what is now called Greece brought with them their cave-dwelling deity. One of these tribes settled in a narrow vale shut in between Mount Parnassus and Mount Cirphis. The place, afterwards called Delphi, was then named Πύθω or Πύθων. In Πύθων was a cavern which emitted vapour of a more or less mephitic character. To the autochthons this was clear evidence of the presence of a chthonian spirit, most probably nameless, whom they worshipped. The cults of the two cave-dwellers inevitably amalgamated, and Apollo took the place of the nameless chthonian spirit and was called Πύθιος.* The name Πύθων is in some way connected with πύθειν, 'to rot.' Such a cave in primitive times was certain to have been a resort of serpents, and an ætiological myth arose to the effect that the cavern, which had been possessed by Themis, had been guarded by an immense serpent called Πύθων who was the offspring of Gaia, produced from mud after the flood of Deucalion. Four days after his birth Apollo, the child of Zeus and Leto, killed the serpent, from whom he took the name, its carcass being allowed to rot where it was killed.†

Cattle-rearing being the chief employment of the earlier Aryans and Apollo being the protector of the fold, we can understand how helpfulness became one of his characteristics. This developed along two lines. (1) He suggested means by which calamities might be avoided. This led (2) to the conception of a power of prediction. In this way Apollo became the prophet of Zeus. Plato calls him 'the interpreter of religion to all mankind.'‡ His oracle made Delphi particularly famous,§ he became the most typical representative Hellenic deity, and his oracle at Delphi the most powerful influence in guiding and moulding the growth of Hellenism.¶ At Delphi his cult and oracle-giving became recognized and organized institutions. The oracle in historic times was of the ecstatic, enthusiastic, or epileptic kind. The chief agent was the Πύθια (the fem. of Πύθιος). When an oracle was asked, she, after preparation, drank the water of the sacred stream, chewed the leaves of the sacred laurel, mounted a tripod above the cavern from which the mephitic vapour arose, and then began to speak. Near her were the δαῖοι, five priests who listened and interpreted her sayings.¶ Thus the Πύθια, a virtuous woman, became a mere tool in the hands of the Holy Ones, whose power has been aptly compared to that of the prophet Samuel. Apollo had the power of communicating this gift of oracle-giving to others besides the Πύθια.†† Persons who were ventriloquists, in the original sense of that term, would naturally be supposed to have had it conferred on them. Hence Πύθων meant equally the divine being and the person whom it possessed. These ἐργαστηριμυθοὶ were apparently very common throughout the countries where Greek influence predominated. They were called Eurykleidai, Sternomanteis, and Pythones.

Such diviners belonged to the lowest grade of the profession and were evidently for the most part ventriloquists.‡‡ One such is brought before us in Ac 16¹⁶⁻¹⁸, in the Greek city of Philippi, during a visit paid to it by Paul and Silas. She was not a priestess of the Pythian Apollo, or in other words an accredited agent of the Delphic Oracle, as has been supposed,§§ but a female slave, probably a ventriloquist, afflicted with lunacy of a mild chronic QUARTUS (Κουάρτος, a common Latin name).—Quartus is a Christian whose greeting is sent in Ro 16²³ from Corinth with that of Erastus, 'the treasurer of the city.' He was probably a member of the church there, and was associated with St. Paul at the time of writing. He was almost certainly a convert from heathenism, not from Judaism, and in this respect was unlike the three men whose salutations are sent in v. 1 and who are distinguished from Tertius, Erastus, and Quartus, as 'kinsmen' of the Apostle. The name Quartus itself might of course have been borne by a Jew (cf. Lucius, v. 21). It has been conjectured that Tertius and Quartus were brothers, but there is no ground for thinking so. If we suppose Rome to have been the destination of these Corinthian salutations, Quartus may have been a Roman with friends in the church in the city. It is, however, easier to believe that members of the Church at Corinth had friends in Ephesus, to which city some scholars think that the greetings were directed. We should remember, at the same time, that in the Apostolic Church personal acquaintance was not necessary to create Christian sympathy. Quartus is described simply as 'the brother' (ὁ ἀδελφός). Elsewhere in the Pauline Epistles, Apollos (1 Co 16¹²), Epaphroditus (Ph 2²⁵), Onesimus (Col 4⁹), Sosthenes (1 Co 1¹), Timothy (2 Co 1¹, etc.), Titus (2 Co 2¹³), Tychicus (Eph 6²¹, Col 4⁷) are similarly described (cf. also 2 Co 8¹⁸ 12¹⁸), while two Christian women, Phœbe and Apphia, are alluded to as 'our sister' (Ro 16¹, Philem⁻). One of the earliest titles used by Christians of themselves was 'the brethren.' 'The brethren,' forming with Asyncritus and four others a household or district church, are saluted in Ro 16¹⁴. The term was perhaps taken over from Judaism. It is frequently found in Acts addressed to Jews by Jews (2²⁹ 3⁷, etc.), and Saul before his baptism was called 'brother Saul' by a Christian, Ananias (9¹⁷). It was also in use among the heathen to designate members of the same religious community (see G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, 1901, p. 87 f., and the authorities there quoted). St. Paul over and over again addresses the readers or hearers of his Epistles as 'brethren,' i.e. simply 'fellow-Christians,' members of the one great spiritual family of which God is Father and Jesus Christ the Elder Brother, 'the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8²⁹). In one passage at least (1 Th 5¹⁴) it is possible that the leaders of the church are addressed as 'brethren' (see G. Milligan, Thessalonians, 1908, ad loc.), and indeed we may say that in the Apostolic Church the terms 'brother' or 'sister' and 'minister' (διακονός) were practically synonymous. To be a member of the community was to be a 'servant' of the community according to one's gift. We cannot doubt that Quartus was an active worker. T. B. ALLWORTHY.

QUATERNION (τετραδίων, from τετράς, 'the number four'; Vulg. quaternio, whence the English word).—St. Peter, arrested by King Herod Agrippa, was handed over to four quaternions of soldiers (Ac 12⁴), probably at the fortress Antonia. A quaternion was a guard consisting of four men, two of whom would be chained to the prisoner in the cell, while the other two kept watch outside (cf. Philo, in Flaccum, 13; Polyb. vi. xxxiii. 7). The second two were apparently the 'first ward' (φύλακῆς), which had to be passed before the iron gate was reached (Ac 12¹⁰). Four quaternions were required, as the night was divided in Roman fashion into four watches of three hours each.

QUEEN (βασίλισσα).—The only person bearing this title that meets us in the apostolic writings is Candace, queen of the Ethiopians (Ac 8²⁷). This people appear frequently to have had female sovereigns, and the name Candace seems to have been handed on from one to another, as we meet with several queens of this name in their early history. The only other passage in which the title occurs is Rev 18⁷, where Babylon is represented as sitting as a queen, priding herself upon her power and immunity from sorrow (cf. Is 47⁷).

QUOTATIONS.—A wide variety has been found to exist in the literary allusions of the four Gospels. The same freedom pervades the rest of the NT. Characteristic differences are, no doubt, to be met with in different groups of apostolic writings; but the field of quotation, direct and indirect, extends throughout from exact reproduction of the original texts to the merest suggestion or reminiscence, often hardly to be traced. The present article seeks to cover the more obvious reminiscences, as well as explicit citations, in the NT books under review.

1. Acts of the Apostles.—The direct quotations in Acts are confined to speeches of the apostles and the story of the Ethiopian eunuch (8³²). They are invariably drawn from the LXX, even when that Version departs considerably from the Hebrew (as in 7⁴², 15¹⁶), and normally introduced by formulæ like 'It is written (in the book of Psalms),' 'This is that which hath been spoken by the prophets,' 'For David saith concerning him,' etc. A number of the citations are exact, viz. 2²⁵⁻²⁸ = Ps 16⁸⁻¹¹, omitting the last clause (identity being secured by reading ἡ καρδία μου with NAD, etc.); 234¹=Ps 110¹; 425¹=Ps 21¹; 832¹=Is 53⁷. (with addition of αὐτόν, as in NA, etc.); 23³=Ex 22²³ (in Lucian's recension); 232¹=Is 69¹ (apart from a slight difference in the opening formula). Under the same category is virtually to be placed the long citation from Jl 2²⁸⁻³² woven into Peter's speech at Pentecost (217-1), the only changes from the LXX (NA) being a substitution of the eschatological phrase ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις (from Is 2³, Mic 4¹) for the simple μετὰ ταῦτα of the original, the insertion of the solemn formula of Divine utterance λέγει ὁ θεός, and the transposition of the clauses relating to the young men and the old. In close dependence on the historical narratives from Genesis to Kings stands Stephen's long survey of the Divine leading and mission of Israel (71¹), many of the verses being abbreviated, but sufficiently exact, citations of biblical texts (cf. esp. vv. 3, 6, 26-28, 30-34, 40 with Gn 12¹ 15¹³, Ex 21³¹ 32²⁷ 32¹). More deliberate alterations are evident in 1⁴⁰, where the general denunciation of wicked men in Ps 69²⁵ (amplified by a further reference to Ps 109⁸) is directly pointed against Judas; 230, an indirect citation of Ps 132¹¹; 3-21 (abbreviated in 73⁷), a conflate of Dt 18¹⁵⁻¹⁹ and Lv 23²⁹; 3²⁵, a free blending of the promises addressed to the fathers in Gn 12³ 18¹⁸, etc.; 4¹¹, a loose citation of the verses (Ps 118²²⁻²⁶) which are fully reproduced and applied to Christ in Mt 21⁴ and parallel texts; 742¹, where the famous words of Am 5²²⁻²⁹ are quoted with considerable changes, the most remarkable being the substitution of 'Babylon' for 'Damascus' (due either to accident, or, more probably, to a desire to bring the prophecy into line with later events); 749¹, where the prophet's great contrast between the heavens of the Most High God and even the noblest temple built by man (Is 66¹⁴) is reproduced with considerable freedom; 13²², a noteworthy conflate of Ps 89²³, 2 S 23¹ (or Ps 72²⁰), 1 S 13¹⁴, and Is 44²⁸; other verses from St. Paul's speech at Antioch, esp. 133³⁴, 35, 41, 47, which are abbreviated citations of Ps 27, Is 55³, Ps 16¹⁰, Hab 1⁵, and Is 49⁶ respectively; 151¹⁸, a free rendering of Am 9¹¹, introduced by a phrase from Jer 12¹⁵; and 261⁷, an application to St. Paul himself of the prophetic passage Is 42⁷⁻¹⁶.

In addition to direct citations, however, there are many reminiscences of Scriptural phraseology scattered through Acts. The following may be presented as most suggestive of the original texts: 224 (cf. Ps 18⁴, 116³, Job 39²⁷); 239 (cf. Is 57¹⁹, Jl 2³², etc.); 240 (cf. Dt 32³); 434 14¹⁰ 1724 (cf. Gn 1¹, Ex 20¹¹, etc.); 434 (cf. Dt 15⁴); 5⁴ (cf. Jos 24²⁷, etc.); 8³ (cf. Gn 50¹⁰); 82¹ (cf. Dt 12¹³, Ps 78³⁷); 103⁶ (cf. Ps 107²⁰, Is 52⁷, etc.); 177 (cf. Is 55⁶, etc.); 1729 (cf. Is 40¹⁸, 46⁵); 1731 (cf. Ps 9³, etc.).

Outside of the OT, no texts are ever cited as Scripture. Other sources are, however, clearly before the mind of the writer. Thus 7-1 suggests Wis 11¹⁴ 18⁵; 1729 Wis 13¹⁰; and 1730, Wis 11²³ 12³. The phraseology of 314 (cf. 75- 2214) 412 104 1731 recalls Enoch, xxxviii. 2, xlviii. 7, xcix. 3, and xli. 9 respectively. In St. Stephen's speech (736-384) R. H. Charles finds distinct evidence of dependence on the Assumption of Moses (iii. 11-13). There is here also (716) betrayed an acquaintance with extra-canonical Jewish tradition regarding the burial of Joseph's brethren, as it was afterwards committed to writing in the Book of Jubilees (xli. 9f.). Finally, St. Paul's great speech at Athens brings classical poetry into the service of Christ. The final clause of 1723, Τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἐσμέν ('for we are also his offspring') has long been recognized as an exact quotation from Aratus' Phaenomena, line 5 (cf. the similar phrase, ἐκ αὐτοῦ γὰρ γένος ἐσμέν, from Cleanthes' Hymn to Jove, line 4). But Rendel Harris has recently traced the immediately preceding words

('for in him we live and move and have our being') to the Minos of the Cretan poet, Epimenides, from which also Tit 1- is drawn, the text being restored as follows:

τύμβον ἐτεκτῆναντο σέθεν, κύδιστε, μέγιστε,
Κρήτες δὲ ψεύσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί.
'Ἀλλὰ σύ γ' οὐ θηήσκεις, ἔσθηκας γὰρ ζῶδος αἰεὶ, ἐν γὰρ σοὶ ζῶμεν καὶ κινούμεθ' ἡδὲ καὶ ἐσμέν
(cf. Exp, 8th ser., iv. [1912] 348 ff.).

2. The Pauline Epistles.—These are peculiarly rich in allusions. Every important doctrinal argument is buttressed by an appeal to Scripture; and even moral counsels are, as a rule, referred to some basal principle of the OT. The Apostle's ordinary language is likewise steeped in OT phraseology. Here too the LXX is the great storehouse of literary reference. 'More than half of the direct quotations of the OT in the Epistles of St. Paul are taken from the LXX without material change' (H. B. Swete, Introduction to the OT in Greek, Cambridge, 1900, p. 400). In the remaining cases he allows himself considerable freedom, sometimes quoting from memory, or otherwise altering the text for the purpose immediately in view, though occasionally there is evidence of direct translation from the Hebrew.

(a) The Epistle to the Romans is a veritable mine of quotations. Exact reproductions of the LXX are found as follows: 346=Ps 51^{4b}; 4³ (cf. v. 35¹)=Gn 15⁶; 47¹=Ps 32¹¹; 47¹ (πατέρα πολλῶν ἐθνῶν τέθεικά σε) is excerpted from Gn 17⁶; 41⁸ (οὕτως ἔσται τὸ σπέρμα σου) from Gn 15⁵; 77 (οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις) from the Decalogue (Ex 20¹⁷); 836=Ps 44²²; 97 (ἐν Ἰσαὰκ κληθήσεται σοὶ σπέρμα) comes from Gn 21¹²; 913 (ὁ μέλων δουλεύσει τῷ ἐλάσσονι) from Gn 25²³; 913=Ex 33¹⁹; 929=Is 1⁹; 1013=Jl 2³²; 1016=Is 53^{1a}; 1018=Ps 19⁴; 12-0=Pr 23²¹ (omitting the last words); 139 (ἀπαρτίσεις τὸν πλῆθον σου ὡς σπανόν) comes from Lv 19¹⁸; 153=Ps 69⁹; 159=Ps 13⁴⁰; 1510 (εὐφράνητε, ἔθνη, μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ) from Dt 32⁴³; and 1511 (acc. to certain MSS)=Ps 117¹. The quotation from Hab 2⁴ introduced in 17 is identical with the LXX save for the omission of μου (cf. Heb. יִהְיֶה, 'through his faith'); 28 likewise differs from Pr 24¹² only in the pronouns. The long citation, 310-18, opens with a phrase from Ec 7²⁰; the rest is almost an exact reproduction of the LXX text of Ps 141³, though this is really a conflate of various OT passages (Ps 5⁹ 140⁵ 10⁷, Is 59⁷, and Ps 36¹) interwoven with the original. 320 is clearly introduced as a quotation (from Ps 143²), but differs considerably from both the Hebrew and the LXX; 9⁹ is a free, abbreviated reference to Gn 13¹⁰⁻¹⁴, and 913 a citation from Mal 1², with a trifling transposition of the opening words. 917 (from Ec 9¹⁶) shows a distinct approach to the original Hebrew. On the other hand, 926¹, 271, 321, are free reproductions of the thought of Hos 1¹⁰ 22³, Is 102¹² 23¹⁸ (blended with 814) respectively, in the last instance so free as to yield a sense quite contrary to the original. The final clause of 933 is repeated in 1011 with the addition of πας; while 10⁶ is a direct application of Lv 18⁵ to 'the righteousness that is of the law.' The long passage on the nearness and saving power of the Word of God (106-9) is another free compound of Dt 94 30¹¹⁻¹⁴, etc. 1015 (from Is 52⁷) gives further evidence of direct use of the Hebrew; 1019 differs from the LXX text of Dt 32²¹ only in the substitution of the personal pronoun 'you' for 'them,' and 1020¹ from Is 63¹¹ in a slight transposition of words. 1131 (from 1 K 19^{10a}) has been altered and transposed under Hebrew influence. 11⁸ is a free blend of ideas from Is 29¹⁰, Dt 29⁴, etc. (with traces of Hebrew influence); 1126¹ is also a complex from Is 59²⁰ (in the main) and Ps 147, Is 27⁹, etc. 118¹, again, is a close, though abbreviated, citation of Ps 69²², and 1134¹ is but slightly altered from

Is 40^{13f}. (in the fuller reading of NA, etc.). 12¹⁹ (from Dt 32³⁰) shows the same approach to the original Hebrew as the Targum of Onkelos. 14¹¹ is a somewhat free rendering of Is 45²³, with introductory phrase from Is 49¹⁸, or a similar context; 15¹² is an abbreviated reference to Is 11¹⁰ (cf. Is 42⁴); and 15²¹ is the exact equivalent of Is 52¹⁵, except for the transposition of δύοι.

(b) A number of these citations are repeated in other Epistles of St. Paul. Thus the fundamental assertion of justification by faith (Ro 1¹⁷=Hab 2⁴) reappears in Gal 3¹¹, and the texts Ro 3³⁰ (from Ps 143⁷) in Gal 2¹⁶; Ro 4⁸ (=Gn 15⁶) in Gal 3⁶; Ro 10⁵ (from Lv 18⁹) in Gal 3¹²; Ro 13^{9b} (from Lv 19¹⁸) in Gal 5¹⁴; and Ro 11²⁴ (from Is 40¹³) in 1 Co 2¹⁶ (a different close being here adopted).

Fresh quotations from the OT are found as follows: Gal 4²⁷=Is 54¹; 4³⁰=Gn 21¹⁰ (with the significant change of της ελευθερίας instead of Ἰσαάκ); 3⁸, a blend of the promises in Gn 12³ 18¹⁸, etc.; 3¹⁰, from Dt 27²⁶, with phrase inwoven from Dt 9¹¹; 3¹⁴, an abbreviated, and slightly altered, citation from Dt 21²³; 3¹⁶, a direct application to Christ of the promise to Abraham and his 'seed' (Gn 12⁷ 13¹⁵ 17³, etc.).

The closing phrase of 1 Co 6¹⁸ comes directly from Gn 2²⁴ (the whole verse being reproduced in Eph 5³¹); 9⁹ (in reading of NA²⁷, etc.)=Dt 25⁴ (repeated in 1 Ti 5¹⁸ with transposition of words); 10¹=Ex 32⁶; 10²⁶, a phrase from Ps 24¹; 15³²=Is 22¹³. 1^{19c} comes from Is 29¹⁴, with alteration of verb; 1³¹ (repeated in 2 Co 10¹⁷) is a free reproduction of Jer 9²³, and 2⁹ a very free rendering, perhaps through independent Jewish channels (cf. below), of the ideas in Is 64⁴, with suggestions from Is 65¹⁶ or Jer 3¹⁶; 3¹⁹ is from Job 5¹³, under direct influence of the Hebrew; 3³⁰, from Ps 94¹¹, with 'of the wise' substituted for 'of men' (to make the application more apt); 10³⁰ (δαιμονίους και οὐ θεοὺς θύοντες) from Dt 32¹⁷, with a change in the order of words; 14²³, a very free citation, supported by λέγει Κύριος, of Is 28¹¹; 14³⁴ 15³. 4. 15. 45. 47, free allusions to Gn 3¹⁶, Is 53¹², Hos 6⁷, and Gn 2⁷, all adduced as 'written' or Scriptural authorities; 15²⁷ (cf. Eph 1²², Ph 3²¹), from Ps 8⁶ with direct reference to the Hebrew; 15^{54c}, a free conflate of Is 25⁸ and Hos 13¹⁴.

2 Co 4¹⁸ (ἐπιστεῦσα διὰ ἐλπίδα) exactly=Ps 116¹⁰; 6²=Is 49⁸; 9⁹=Ps 112⁹; 13¹ (cf. 1 Ti 5¹⁹)=Dt 19¹⁵ (Luc.); 4⁶, a free blend of Gn 1^{2c}, Is 9¹⁴, etc.; 6¹⁶, a loose conflate of Ezk 37²⁷ and Lv 26^{11c}; 6¹⁷, abbreviated from Is 52¹⁴ and Ezk 20³⁴; 6¹⁸, a compound of Jer 31⁸, Is 43², 2 S 7⁸, etc.; 8¹⁵, from Ex 16¹⁸, with direct approach to the Hebrew; 9¹, a free reproduction of Pr 22⁹ (cf. Ex 25²).

Eph 4⁸ is from Ps 68¹⁸, with the ελαβες boldly altered to ἔδωκεν, to make it more applicable to the Giver of good; 4²⁵, from Zec 8¹⁶ with the ης more accurately rendered by μετὰ τοῦ; 4²⁶, an excerpt from Ps 4⁴; 5¹⁴, a very free reproduction of Is 60^{1-19c} (cf. below); 5¹⁸, from Pr 23³¹ (with οὐκ for ἐν οἴκοις); 6¹, from the Decalogue (Ex 20¹⁴), the motive being somewhat altered, and a new clause added to emphasize the element of 'promise.'

Ph 1¹⁹ is a literal extract from Job 13¹⁶; and the two 'seals' of 2 Ti 2¹⁹ are free citations of Nu 16⁵ and Is 26¹³ respectively. Direct quotations from the OT are not found in Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Titus, or Philemon.

Among the more striking reminiscences may be noted Ro 1²⁸ (cf. Dt 4¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Ps 106³⁰); 2⁵ (cf. Ps 110⁶, Zeph 1¹⁸); 3^{4c} (cf. Ps 116¹¹); 3^{26c} (cf. Mal 2¹⁰); 4¹¹ (cf. Gn 17¹¹); 4¹⁵⁻¹⁶ (cf. Tit 2⁶ (cf. Gn 3¹⁶); 2¹⁴ (cf. Ex 19⁵, Is 53^{4c}, Ezk 37²³, etc.).

The Pauline Epistles also show the influence of apocryphal books. A clear instance is found in Ro 12¹⁵, compared with Sir 7³⁴ (μη νυστερει ἀπὸ κλαυθύνων, καὶ μετὰ πενθούτων πένητον); cf., further, Ro 2¹¹ (Sir 32^{15c}) 16²⁷ (Sir 1⁸), 1 Co 6¹² (Sir 37²⁸), 6¹³ (Sir 36²³) 7¹⁵⁻²⁶ (Sir 42^{24c}), Col 2³ (Sir 1²⁵), 1 Th 4⁸ (Sir 5³). Between Romans and the Wisdom of Solomon there are several close parallels betraying St. Paul's intimate acquaintance with the latter; cf., especially, Ro 1^{18a} (Wis 13^{10c} 14^{9c}), 8¹⁶ (Wis 3^{4c}), 9^{19c} (Wis 12¹²), 9²¹ (Wis 15⁷), 9²¹ (Wis 2¹¹), 11³² (Wis 11²³), 13¹⁰ (Wis 6¹⁸). Of the other Epistles, cf. 1 Co 11⁷ (Wis 2²³) 15⁴⁵⁻⁴⁷ (Wis 15¹¹), 2 Co 5^{12c} (Wis 9¹⁵), Eph 1¹⁸, Col 1¹² (Wis 5⁹), Eph 2¹³ (Wis 3¹⁸), 6^{11c} (Wis 5^{17c}), 1 Th 1¹⁰ (Wis 16⁹). To a common use of Wisdom one has no doubt to be traced the frequent resemblances between the Epistles and Philo. A considerable list of parallels with the Book of Enoch has been drawn up by Charles, the most obvious being Ro 8³⁸, Eph 1²¹, Col 1¹⁶ (En. lxi. 10), Ro 9⁵, 2 Co 11³¹ (En. lxxvii. 1), Ph 2¹⁰ (En. xlviii. 5), Col 2³ (En. xlii. 3), 2 Th 1⁷ (En. lxi. 10), 1 Ti 1¹⁵ (En. xciv. 1). The very free citation, 1 Co 2⁹, is referred by Origen and other Church Fathers to the Apocalypse of Elijah, and is actually found in the Latin version (ii. 34); this may well have been the direct source, its ultimate dependence on the OT explaining the formula καθὼς γέγραπται (cf. 1 Clem. xxxiv. 8, where the text recurs in almost the same form, though in a different context). Eph 5¹⁴ is likewise traced by Epiphanius to the Apocalypse of Elijah, though other Fathers give different sources (Isaiah, or an apocryphal work of Jeremiah); it may, however, be but a loose rendering of Is 60^{1-19c} (cf. above). Further acquaintance with Jewish tradition—probably derived from the actual Book of Jannes and Jambres mentioned by Origen (on Mt 27⁹)—is presupposed in the reference to the withstanding of Moses (2 Ti 3⁸). Various phrases recall the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: e.g. Ro 1³² (Asher, vi. 2) 12²¹ (Benj. iv. 3), 2 Co 7¹⁰ (Gad, v. 7), 1 Th 2¹⁶

(Levi, vi. 11). There are also two direct citations of classical texts: 1 Co 13³³ ('evil communications corrupt good manners') from Menander's Thais—ultimately perhaps from a lost play of Euripides (cf. Socrates, HE iii. 16)—and the verse from the 'prophet' of the Cretans (Tit 1¹), an excerpt from the Minos of Epimenides already alluded to (cf. Ac 17²⁸). Both were apparently common tags, Kῆρες δὲ ψεύσται being introduced as a familiar quotation in Callimachus, ad Jovem, line 8. The Apostle may thus have received them from floating tradition, instead of direct acquaintance with the texts. The analogies with stoical writings and the mystery-religions, at all events, show the influence of the Zeitgeist rather than first-hand study of the literature (cf. H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery-Religions, 1913).

The Apostle reveals in his letters a varied knowledge of Christian tradition and even words and deeds of Jesus, afterwards embodied in the Gospels. Thus in 1 Co 7¹⁰ (on divorce) he contrasts his own advice with definite instructions of our Lord, which may be compared with Mt 5³² 19⁹ and parallel passages. His counsel to remain unmarried because of the coming distress (1 Co 7^{25ff.}) recalls Mt 24¹⁹, etc. The Christian principle of living by the gospel (1 Co 9¹⁴) is directly referred to the Master's ordinance (cf. Mt 10¹⁰, Lk 10⁷). The words of institution at the Lord's Supper (1 Co 11^{23ff.}) are in close harmony with Mt 26^{26ff.} and parallel passages, and belong undoubtedly to common tradition. Other reminiscences of the Gospels (or their sources) are found in 1 Co 11¹⁹ (cf. Mt 10³⁴, etc.); 1 Co 13² (cf. Mt 17⁹, etc.); 2 Co 1¹⁷ (cf. Mt 5²⁷); Gal 5¹⁴ (cf. Mt 22^{39f.}, etc.); 1 Th 2^{15f.} (cf. Mt 23^{11f.}); 1 Th 4⁸ (cf. Lk 10¹⁶); 1 Th 4^{16f.} (cf. Mt 24^{30f.}); 1 Th 5^{17f.} (cf. Mt 24^{36ff.}).

3. The Epistle to the Hebrews.—This Epistle equals Romans in its dependence on the OT. It is, indeed, 'in great part a catena of quotations' (Swete, p. 402). A considerable number are either wholly or virtually exact: 1^{5a} (5⁹)=Ps 27¹; 1^{5b}=2 S 7¹⁴; 1^{6b}=Dt 32²³ (in Lucian's recension); 1^{6c}=LXX addition to Ps 45^{6f.} (with one or two changes, absent from certain MSS); 1¹⁰⁻¹²=Ps 102²⁵⁻²⁷ (with slight textual differences); 1¹⁸=Ps 110¹; 2⁶⁻⁸ (with addition in NAD, etc.)=Ps 84⁸; 2^{13b}=Is 8¹⁸; 3⁷⁻¹¹ (individual verses repeated in 3¹⁵ 4³. 5. 7)=Ps 95⁷⁻¹¹ (with slight textual differences, not found in several MSS); 4¹ (cf. 4¹⁰)=Gn 22² (Luc.); 5⁶ (cf. 7¹⁷ and, with variations, 5¹⁰ 6²⁰ 7¹¹. 21)=Ps 110⁴; 10^{30b}=Dt 32³⁵; 13⁶=Ps 118⁹. Of the remaining citations, 1⁷=Ps 104⁴, with πυρὸς φλόγα for πυρ φλόγον (A: πυρὸς φλόγα)=Heb. עֵשֶׂת עֵשֶׂת; 2¹²=Ps 22²³, with ἀπαγγεῖλω for διηγέσθαι (Heb. הִגִּידְתִּי); 2^{13a}=Is 8¹⁷, with transposition of words; 6^{13f.}, from Gn 22^{16f.}, exact, but abbreviated; 7¹⁻¹⁰, a historical survey depending, often literally, on Gn 14^{17ff.}; 8⁵=Ex 25¹⁰, with δειχθέντα for δεδειγμένον; 8⁸⁻¹² (abbreviated, and somewhat altered, in 10^{16f.}), from Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴, with certain alterations pointing the prophecy directly to Christ; 9²⁰ (cf. 10²⁹ 13²⁰), from Ex 24⁹, with changes, in part suggested by the words of institution (cf. Mt 26^{26ff.}, etc.); 10⁵⁻⁷ (repeated with changes in v. 8⁶), from Ps 40⁶⁻⁸, with accidental and other alterations; 10^{30a}, from Dt 32³⁵, in the same form as in Ro 12¹⁹; 10³⁷, from Hab 2²⁴, the principle of justification repeated as in Ro 1¹⁷ (the two instances thus pointing to some common original, either in tradition, or in a written collection of Messianic prophecies), and a δ inserted before ἐρχόμενος to give the text a still clearer Messianic reference; 11^{4a}, the roll-call of heroes, drawn from the historical books from Gen. onwards, often with close dependence on the texts (cf. vv. 5. 18. 21 with Gn 5²⁴ 21¹² and 47³¹ respectively); 12^{6f.} (detailed application in vv. 7-11), from Ps 31^{1f.}, with verbal changes due probably to textual transmission; 12²⁰, a free reproduction of Ex 19¹³, probably from memory; 12²¹, from Dt 9¹⁹, with addition of καὶ ἐντρομος; 12²⁸, from Hag 2⁶, verbally altered to emphasize the argument; 12²⁹, from Dt 4²⁴, with γαρ added in harmony with Heb. 7; 13⁵, from Dt 31⁶, changed into the form of a direct quotation by the use of the first person; 13²⁰, a complex of phrases from Is 63¹¹ and Jer 32⁴⁰, etc.

Among reminiscences of OT texts may be given 1⁸ (cf. Ps 110¹); 3². 5 (cf. Nu 12⁷); 3¹⁷ (cf. Nu 14²¹. 32¹); 6⁸ (cf. Gn 31^{7f.}); 6¹⁹ 10²⁰ (cf. Ex 26³³ Lv 16²); 8¹ 10^{12f.} 12² (cf. Ps 110¹); 8² (cf. Nu 24⁹); 9^{2f.} (cf. Ex 26^{15f.}); 9²⁸ (cf. Is 53¹²); 10²⁷ (cf. Is 26¹¹); 10²⁸ (cf. Dt 17⁶); 12¹² (cf. Is 35³, Sir 25²³); 12¹³ (cf. Pr 4²⁶); 12¹⁵ (cf. Dt 29¹⁸); 12¹⁶ (cf. Gn 25³³); 12¹⁷ (cf. Gn 27³⁸); 12^{18f.} (cf. Ex 19^{16ff.}); 13² (cf. Gn 18³ 19^{12f.}); 13¹¹ (cf. Lv 16²⁷); 13¹⁵ (cf. Ps 50¹⁴. 23, Hos 14³).

In 1³ we have another clear mark of the influence of Wis. (7^{25f.}). The description of the martyrdoms in 11^{35f.} probably derives certain elements from 1 Mac 9²³, 2 Mac 6^{10ff.} 7¹², etc., as well as the tradition of Isaiah's death by sawing (Ascension of Isaiah, v. 11-14). A few passages recall the Book of Enoch, e.g. 4¹³ (En. ix. 5); 11¹⁰ (En. xc. 29). A suggestion of the 'words of institution' has been found in 9², while the reference to the Master's 'strong crying and tears' (5⁷) recalls the scene in Gethsemane (cf. Mt 26^{38f.}), though known to the writer only from tradition. In Hebrews there is no trace of classical literature.

4. The Catholic Epistles. — (a) James. — The practical character of James necessitates less reliance on OT authority. Of direct quotations in his Epistle there are but six, 2³. 23 and 4⁸ being virtually exact reproductions of the LXX text of Lv 19¹⁸, Gn 15⁶, and Pr 3³⁴ respectively, 2¹¹ an original version of the Decalogue (Ex 20¹³. 15), 5⁰ a rendering of Pr 10¹² with direct dependence on the Hebrew (though here possibly introduced from an intermediate source), and 4⁹ a reference to some unknown passage definitely recognized as 'Scripture.' In addition there are various reminiscences of OT and apocryphal books: e.g. 1^{9f.} (cf. Jer 9²³); 1^{10f.} (cf. Is 40^{6f.}); 1¹⁹ (cf. Pr 14²⁹ 17²⁷, Ec 7⁹); 2²¹ (cf. Gn 22⁹); 2²⁵ (cf. Jos 21⁶. 6¹⁷); 5³ (cf. Ps 21⁹); 5⁴ (cf. Is 5⁹, Ps 18⁶, etc.); 5⁷ (cf. Dt 11¹⁴); 5¹¹ (cf. Ps 103⁸ 111⁴, etc.); 5^{17f.} (cf. 1 K 17^{11f.} 18^{18f.}); 1⁵ (cf. Sir 20¹⁵); 1¹³ (cf. Sir 15^{11f.}); 1¹⁹ (cf. Sir 5¹¹); 5¹⁻⁶ (cf. En. xciv. 8-11). The remarkable feature about the Epistle, however, is the number of correspondences with sayings of Jesus, especially those included in the Sermon on the Mount, e.g. 1^{2f.} (cf. Mt 5³⁻¹²); 1⁵⁻⁸ (cf. Mt 6⁶⁻¹⁶); 1^{10f.} (cf. Mt 6¹⁹⁻²¹); 1^{22f.} (cf. Mt 7^{21ff.}); 1^{26f.} (cf. Mt 6¹⁻¹¹); 3^{11f.} (cf. Mt 7¹⁶⁻²⁰); 4³ (cf. Mt 7⁷); 5¹³ (cf. Mt 5³³⁻³⁷). The mind of the Apostle was evidently saturated with Jesus' thoughts and words; and they came to him unbidden in a form resembling their original. The relation of the Epistle to other parts of the NT belongs rather to the region of literary criticism.

(b) Of the other Catholic Epistles, 1 Peter offers a number of quotations from the OT, some of them exact equivalents of the LXX, as 1¹⁶=Lv 11^{44f.}; 2⁷=Ps 118²²; 3¹⁰⁻¹²=Ps 34^{12-16a} (with simple change from imperative to jussive); 3^{14c}=Is 8^{12f.} (with Χριστόν instead of Κύριον); 4¹⁸=Pr 11³¹ (a passage where the LXX differs widely from the original); 5⁵=Pr 3³⁴; while others show distinct evidence of the Hebrew, e.g. 1^{24f.} (from Is 40⁶⁻⁸), 2⁶ (from Is 23¹⁸), 2⁹ (from Is 8¹⁴), 4⁸ (from Pr 10¹²); 2¹⁰ is a free reproduction of the thought of Hos 2²; 2⁹ a loose conflate of Ex 19^{16f.}, Is 43^{20f.}; and 2²² of Is 53⁸, Zeph 3¹³. Reminiscences of OT texts may be traced in 1¹⁸ (cf. Is 52³), 2³ (cf. Ps 34³), 2^{4f.} (cf. Ps 118²²), 2¹⁷ (cf. Pr 24²¹), 3⁶ (cf. Pr 3-2), 4^{14b} (cf. Is 11²), 5⁷ (cf. Ps 55²²); while a direct allusion to the Book of Enoch (x. 4-6, 12 f.) is found in 3^{19f.}.

The author is further acquainted, not merely with Synoptic tradition, and parts at least of Acts, but also with the Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians (on details, and the bearing of the facts, cf. the standard NT Introductions and Commentaries, or the art. on 'Peter, First Epistle of' in HDB).

(c) In contrast, 2 Peter and Jude show little trace of the influence either of the OT Scriptures or of Christian tradition and literature. The only explicit citation of the OT is in 2 P 2¹, where the saying from Pr 26¹¹ ('the dog returning to his own vomit again'), directly translated from the Hebrew, is referred to as 'the true proverb.' There are, however, a few suggestions of OT texts, e.g. 2 P 2⁴ (cf. Gn 6¹); 2¹⁵ (cf. Nu 22⁵); 3⁶ (cf. Gn 7²); 3⁸ (Ps 90⁴); 3⁹ (Is 46¹³); 3¹³ (cf. Is 65¹⁷ 66⁻); Jude 9 (ἐπιτιμῆσαι σοι Κύριος), from Zec 3². But the most remarkable fact about these Epistles is their dependence on apocryphal writings. 1 Pet. had already alluded to the legend of the fallen angels as narrated in En. x. 4-6, 12f. The same context is drawn from, in still more detail, by 2 P 2⁴ and Jude 6. An actual quotation from En. (i. 9) is given in Jude 14¹, and introduced as a prophecy of 'Enoch, the seventh from Adam.' According to the united testimony of the Church Fathers, the reference to the contest of Michael for the body of Moses (Jude 9) comes from the Assumption of Moses; while v. 16 is composed of fragments from v. 5, vii. 7, 9 (Latin text) of the Testament of Moses. The language of Jude 6, 7, 13 likewise recalls the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Napht. iii. 4, Asher, vii. 1). The parallels in 2 Pet. are doubtless derived from Jude.

(d) The only OT allusion in the Epistles of John is found in 1 Jn 3¹² (cf. Gn 4³). There are naturally, however, many reminiscences of the Fourth Gospel. For these compare Commentaries, etc.

5. Revelation.—In Revelation there are no formal citations, but the whole work is saturated with OT allusions. These are drawn from almost the entire range of the OT Canon, though Psalms, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel contribute by far the largest number. The Book of Enoch, and probably other apocalyptic works, add to the writer's treasury of symbols. Here too the LXX supplies the basis; but the writer seems occasionally to have used Theodotion or some other Greek version, and often to have gone direct to the Hebrew. In the present article only a few representative allusions can be offered; for the rest such sources as Westcott and Hort's Greek text and Swete's Apocalypse, p. cxxxix ff., must be referred to.

The coming of the Messiah with the clouds (1⁷) is clearly based on Dn 7¹³, and the rest of the verse on Zec 12¹⁰⁻¹⁴. The actual description (1¹³) closely follows Dn 7⁹. 10⁵. Various expressions in the Letters to the Churches recall OT phraseology, e.g. 2⁷ (Gn 2⁹) 2¹⁷ (Is 62⁶) 2³⁶ (Ps 2³⁴) 3⁷ (Is 22²³) 3¹⁴ (Pr 8²³) 3¹⁹ (Pr 3¹³) 3²⁰ (Ca 5⁷). The vision of the King on the throne (4²) rests on Is 6¹, Ezk 1²⁶. (cf. En. xiv. 18 ff.); that of the sealed book (5¹) on Ezk 2⁹ (cf. En. lxxxix. 70 f., xc. 20). The number of the worshipping angels (5¹¹) follows Dn 7¹⁰ (cf. En. xiv. 22). The vision of the horses (6²) is based on Zec 1⁸, and the earthquake (6¹²) on Jl 2¹⁰; the hiding in the rocks (6¹⁵) on Is 2¹⁰, and the 'day of wrath' (6¹⁷) on Jl 2¹¹ 3⁴, etc. The picture of the final blessedness of the saints (7¹⁵⁻¹⁷) recalls Is 49¹⁰, En. xlviii. 1. The fall of the star (8¹⁰ 9¹) is based on Is 14¹² (cf. En. lxxxvi. 1), and the plague of locusts (9³) on Jl 1⁶. The allusion to the worship of demons and idols (9²⁰) recalls Dt 32¹, Dn 5⁴⁻²³, the sealing of the vision (10⁴) Dn 12⁴, and the eating of the book (10⁸) Ezk 2⁸ 3¹. The measuring of the new temple (11¹) is based on Ezk 40⁵, the olive trees and candlesticks (11⁴) on Zec 4², the raising of the dead martyrs (11¹¹) on Ezk 37⁵, and the Messiah's eternal reign (11¹⁵) on Ps 2⁴. The description of the dragon (12³) is suggested by Dn 7⁷, and that of the Beast with the horns (13¹) by Dn 7³. The peal for the fall of Babylon (14³ 18²) comes from Is 21⁹ (combined with Dn 4²⁷). The vision of the sickle (14¹⁵) follows Jl 3¹³, the 'Song of Moses' recalls Ex 15¹ and the description of the 'fear' (15⁴) Jer 10⁷. The account of the last plagues (16¹) is based on that of the plagues of Egypt (Ex 7¹⁷), and the language used to describe the terror of the earthquake (16¹⁸) recalls Dn 12¹. The actual description of Babylon and her downfall (18¹) follows various prophetic passages (Is 47⁷⁻⁹ 52¹¹, Jer 50⁵, etc.). The treading of the winepress (19¹³) recalls Is 63¹⁻³, and the mention of Gog and Magog (20⁸) Ezk 38¹, the judgment scene (20¹¹) Dn 7⁹, En. xlvii. 3, and the yielding up of the dead (20¹³) En. li. 1. The picture of the New Jerusalem (21¹⁰) contains features from Ezk 40¹, Is 52¹ 60¹, To 13¹⁶, etc., while the passing of the curse and the dawn of everlasting day for the righteous (22³) is clearly reminiscent of Zec 14⁷.

RACE.—See GAMES.

RAHAB (Ραάβ).—Rahab, the harlot (ῥάβνη) of Jericho, is the heroine of the romantic story told in Jos 2. At the risk of her life she sheltered two Hebrew spies and cunningly contrived their escape, receiving as her reward her own safety and that of her whole house. She is accorded a place in a great roll of the faithful (He 11³¹), and her case is cited by James (2²⁵) in support of his thesis that one is not 'saved' by faith alone but by faith and works

(cf. F. Weber, Jüd. Theol., ed. F. Delitzsch and G. Schnedermann, Leipzig, 1897, p. 332). These high estimates of her are doubtless based on an edifying speech (Jos 2⁹⁻¹³), in which she acknowledges that Jahweh has given her land to Israel, and that He is God in heaven above and on earth beneath.

The Jewish Rabbis and Christian Fathers alike took much interest in her story. Some of them softened the statement that she was a harlot, Josephus (Ant. v. i. 2), followed by Chrysostom, suggesting that she was merely an innkeeper; others, confessing her evil behaviour, represented her as seeking forgiveness from the God of Israel and pleading the merit of her good works (Mechilta, 64b). The allegorizing of her scarlet thread was begun by St. Clement of Rome, who calls her 'the hospitable Rahab.'

'Through faith and hospitality Rahab the harlot was saved. . . . And they [the spies] proceeded further to give her a sign, that she should hang from her house scarlet, making it manifest beforehand that through the blood of the Lord there should be redemption to all who believe and hope upon God. Behold, beloved, how there was not only faith, but prophecy in the woman' (Ep. ad Cor. i. 12). JAMES STRAHAN.

RAINBOW (ῥαῖς).—The rainbow which the writer of the Revelation saw around the throne of God was 'like an emerald to look upon' (Rev 4³). Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 620) argues from this passage that σμάραγδος was not an emerald but a rock-crystal, as only a colourless stone can show a rainbow of prismatic colours. But while the glory encircling the throne was like a rainbow in shape, it may well have been conceived, not as prismatic, but as having the soft green colour of an emerald. Any nimbus round another body, as the halo of the moon or a candle, was called an ῥαῖς (Arist. Meteor. iii. iv. 9). What the prophet depicts is a startling contrast: the very throne from which proceed lightnings and thunders (Rev 4⁵) is yet arched with emerald. In other words, mercy tempers justice: 'Deus in judiciis semper foederis sui meminit' (Grotius, quoted by H. Alford, *Greek Testament*⁵, Cambridge, 1875, p. 596). Noah's rainbow and its traditional (mythological) explanation (Gn 9¹²⁻¹⁷) were doubtless in the background of the Seer's mind. When the dread storm, in which the lightnings were Jahweh's arrows and the thunder His voice, was passing, His bow appeared in the clouds as a sign that His anger was appeased. 'The brilliant spectacle of the upturned bow against the dark background of the retreating storm naturally appeals to man as a token of peace and good-will from the god who has placed it there' (J. Skinner, ICC, 'Genesis', Edinburgh, 1910, p. 172). The Jewish Rabbis would have agreed with the English poet who apostrophizes the rainbow:

'I ask not proud Philosophy
To teach me what thou art'
(T. Campbell, To the Rainbow, 31.).

They discouraged (Hagiga, 16a) the study of a mysterious phenomenon which was to them a sacrament or covenant of Divine grace.

RANSOM.—'Ransom' is the rendering in AV and RV of a word (ἀντίλυτρον) rare in apostolic literature, and possibly coined by St. Paul for use in 1 Ti 2⁶, 'Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all.' It appears to be a strengthened form of λύτρον (cf. EGT, '1 Tim.', 1910, p. 105), the word attributed to Jesus, and rendered 'ransom' in Mt 20²³, Mk 10⁴⁵, 'to give his life a ransom for many.' The strong substitutionary force of ἀντί in the compound word may be reduced by the ὕπερ ('on behalf of') which immediately follows in 1 Ti 2⁶. 'Ransom' is not elsewhere used in the NT.

In each place it is the figure chosen to indicate the redemptive significance of the death of Christ which had become familiar in the Apostolic Church, and had apparently become specialized by the time the Pastoral Epistles were written. Access to its meaning in the apostolic times may be sought in (a) the fairly frequent uses in the NT of cognate or derivative forms of λύτρον for expressing the saving processes or issues of Christ's death for men; e.g. ἐλυτρώθητε (1 P 1¹⁸), λύτρωσις (He 9¹²), ἀπολύτρωσις (Ro 3²⁴, Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴); as so used its reference is clear; it offers an illustrative form of the great apostolic unity of thought which directly relates the death of Christ to the reconciliation of God and men; (b) the occasion and context of the term as used by the Synoptics (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²³); here the redemption for which the Son of Man gave His life a ransom is closely connected in the context with the liberation of the disciples of Jesus from the thralldom of worldly and ambitious self-seeking, and their entrance into the liberty of self-imparting service in the Kingdom of God which it was the mission of Jesus to establish by His death (so Beyschlag, NT Theol. i. 153; Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 47f.); but this view is not fully adequate to the expiatory value attributed to Christ's death by Christ and His apostles (Mt 26²⁸, 1 Co 11²⁵ 15³); (c) the attempt to find, with most expositors, a closer definition of the term by isolating it from its context and treating it as a word study; it is the representative in the LXX of certain much-used Hebrew words. Several of these are there rendered by a common use of λύτρον. Which of them corresponds most closely to the NT usage is a matter of discussion. One of them, קָפַר, is said to have the root idea of 'covering,' or of 'wiping away,' though it is almost entirely used in an accommodated moral sense of 'making propitiation' (cf. Driver in HDB iv. 128, G. F. Moore in EBi iv. 4220). The leaning here is, therefore, towards sacrificial implications. The alternative words are קָנָה and כָּאַר with the primary significance of 'liberating,' which lean towards the social or legal notion of redemption, illustrated possibly by the obligation to redeem laid upon the goel or kinsman (cf. Lv 25⁵¹; see T. V. Tynms, Christian Idea of Atonement, London, 1904, p. 240 ff.). The majority of expositors favour the former derivation, though Wendt and others criticize its linguistic basis. The idea of ransom is thus obtained from the idea of 'covering' or 'clearing the face' of an offended person by means of a gift, especially by a gift which is the satisfaction for the life of a man paid either to God or man (cf. Ex 21³⁰ 30¹², Nu 21³⁰, Job 33²⁴, Is 12³, Ps 49⁷, Pr 6³⁵, Am 5¹²; cf. also Cremer, *Bibl.-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek*³, p. 408; B. Weiss, Bibl. Theol. i. 101). Support for the second line of derivation with the primary idea of a ransom price paid is found in the rendering of קָנָה in Is 35¹⁰, Ps 69¹⁸, Hos 13¹⁴, Is 51¹¹, Jer 31¹¹; and in the rendering of כָּאַר in Is 51¹⁰, Jer 31¹¹. (d) Dissatisfied with a reference of the NT passages to the LXX, and assuming that Jesus spoke not Greek, but Aramaic, G. Hollmann has sought by elaborate investigation to discover the Aramaic term of which λύτρον is the equivalent; he thinks that this inquiry results more favourably for the idea of 'liberating' than of 'covering' in the Hebrew original (Die Bedeutung des Todes Jesu, Tübingen, 1901, p. 98 ff.). One advantage of the precarious method of thus going behind the Greek term has been a fruitful suggestion by Ritschl that Ps 49⁷ and Job 33²³ (cf. Mk 8³⁷), where both קָנָה and כָּאַר occur, may furnish the best interpretation of λύτρον in the mind of Christ (cf. *Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung*⁴, ii. 69 ff.; Denney, Death of Christ, p. 43f.).

Whichever line of derivation may be followed, the resultant idea from the Hebrew terms, of which λύτρον is the representative in the LXX, is that the word indicates the means or cost by which a redemption is achieved. Consequently the apostolic interpretation will lie within that circle of ideas which carry the implication that life in the higher sense may be lost, and that man has no means of buying it back. To meet such a situation Christ laid down His life as a price or means of redemption by which the forfeited possession was restored. The further implication we should gather from the consensus of the teaching of Jesus and His apostles is that this ransom was not His death alone, but His life also—Himself indeed, in that perfect unity of which the life lived, laid down, and taken again are integral parts. It is not stated to whom the ransom price was paid. This has been the subject of wide conjecture. It does not seem essential to the apostolic use of the metaphor to state it. Nor is it stated precisely from what the ransom delivered; it was a saving advantage for men. A closer definition when sought will best be supplied from the analogy of faith as it deals with the issues of the death of Christ and from the more definite use of analogous terms in the apostolic teaching (see ATONEMENT and REDEMPTION).

FREDERIC PLATT.

RAPTURE, ECSTASY.—The English word 'rapture' is derived from Lat. raptus, the act of seizing and carrying away, hence transport of mind or ecstasy (ἔκστασις). In classic Greek ἔκστασις means frenzy; in the NT it rarely expresses this high degree of emotion, but may include distraction of mind, caused by wonder and astonishment, or exceptional joy and rapture. In Ps 16¹ (LXX) the latter condition seems to be implied. Amongst the results of the healing of the paralytic by Christ, St. Luke tells us that 'amazement (ἔκστασις) took hold on all' (Lk 5²⁶), whilst St. Mark, in describing the effects of the Resurrection upon the minds of the women, as they fled from the tomb, states that 'trembling and astonishment (ἔκστασις) had come upon them' (16⁸). In Mt 12²³, Mk 2¹² 6⁵¹ the verb ἐξίσταμαι is used, also in reference to the effects upon the multitude of the bestowal of the 'gift of tongues' (Ac 2⁷⁻¹²), and further of the preaching of St. Paul in the synagogues immediately after his conversion (9²¹). The stronger sense of the word, translated in English as 'trance,' is found in the description of St. Peter's vision of the vessel full of unclean beasts (10¹⁰ 11⁵). Whilst engaged in prayer in the Temple at Jerusalem, St. Paul fell into an ἔκστασις, in which he was warned by the Lord to escape from the city (22¹⁷⁻²¹). These references to the word do not by any means exhaust the instances of undoubted rapture or ecstasy found in the OT or the NT. When the prophets felt that the hand of the Lord was upon them, there would doubtless have been the exaltation of spirit and the entrance upon the higher transcendent experiences, accompanied more or less by a cataleptic condition of the body. Whatever the gift of tongues implied in the early Church, it certainly included the power of rapt and ecstatic utterance, sometimes incoherent and requiring interpretation (1 Co 14). St. Paul claimed to possess this gift, but he placed it on a lower level than the work of instruction that tended to edification. As an instance of the second stage of trance in which the spirit is believed to make excursions into other states and come into contact with other beings in the spirit world, we may instance St. Paul's rapture on being caught up into Paradise and hearing unutterable words. St. John in his apocalyptic vision of the Lord of Churches was in the Spirit, and he saw the Living One in all His glory, when he 'fell at his feet as one dead' (Rev 1¹⁷).

In all mystical experiences and in all great religious revivals such outbursts of rapture are especially noticeable. The bodily powers are held in abeyance, and it seems as though the soul were actively engaged in cognizing spiritual objects, as St. Teresa experienced when 'she simply felt Christ close by her.' F. von Hügel deals with this subject fully, and indicates the manner in which these experiences may be tested by the moral and spiritual value of their results. W. James, who works out the psycho-physical accompaniments of these states, dwells upon the authoritative value they have for the experiencers themselves, and shows that they tend to break down the exclusive authority of the non-mystical or rational consciousness. They are as real as their results are real, and their value is to be judged by their effects in a higher order of morals and of life.

READING (ἀνάγνωσις).—In apostolic literature the mention of reading occurs almost invariably in connexion with the OT Scriptures. A few references are made to those writings which later formed part of the NT. The subject resolves itself into the three questions as to what was the usage of the early Church in regard to (1) the public reading of the OT; (2) the private reading of Scripture; (3) the place assigned to Christian writings.

1. The public reading of the OT, both Law (Ac 15⁻¹, 2 Co 3¹⁴) and Prophets (Lk 4¹, Ac 13¹⁵ 27), was regularly observed by the Jews in their synagogue service. It is only natural to suppose that the custom was followed by both Gentile and Jewish Christians in their worship, especially in their meetings for edification. The lack of direct reference to it as a practice, noticed by most writers on the history of the period, is perhaps the best proof that Scripture was so used. For there are certain considerations, in the nature of indirect proof, which, as McGiffert says, 'make it practically certain that the Scriptures were diligently read and expounded in their meetings' (A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 533). The OT was treated with great reverence by Christians, being spoken of as 'the holy scriptures' (Ro 1-), 'the sacred writings' (2 Ti 3¹⁶), or absolutely as 'the scripture' (Ac 1¹⁶, Gal 3⁸, 1 P 2⁶) or 'the scriptures' (Ac 18⁻³, 1 Co 15⁴). Truths are quoted and duties frequently enforced by the formula, 'it is written' (Ac 7⁴², Ro 1¹, 1 Co 9⁹, He 10¹, 1 P 1¹⁶, and many others). The OT was regarded by Christians as inspired by God; to it men did well to take heed (2 P 1⁻⁴); and it was able to make men 'wise unto salvation' as well as 'furnished completely unto every good work' (2 Ti 3¹⁶). The Scriptures were freely quoted, and allusions were made to them in a way that presupposes that even Gentiles had frequently heard them read.

The procedure of St. Paul in his missionary work enables us to see the transition from the Jewish usage to the Christian. In Thessalonica he went into the synagogue, as was his custom, and 'reasoned with them from the scriptures, opening and alleging that it behoved the Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead' (Ac 17⁻²). In Berea the Jews 'examined the scriptures daily, whether these things were so' (v. 11). The Corinthian believers are reminded by St. Paul of his preaching, wherein he had proved that Christ died for our sins and was raised 'according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15⁻²). This question as to the Messiahship of Jesus makes it practically certain that the early Christians read the Scriptures in their meetings. To prove that the events in the life of Jesus, His death, and resurrection were in harmony with the OT prophecies, involved frequent reading of the passages concerned (Ac 22³¹, 42¹, 15^{6a}, Ro 15¹²). St. Paul's injunction to Timothy to 'give heed to reading' (τὴν ἀναγνώσει, 1 Ti 4¹³) almost certainly refers to the public reading of Scripture, as it is connected in the immediate context with 'exhortation' and 'teaching.' Weizsäcker makes an ingenious suggestion that the part of the heavenly rites described in the Apocalypse in which a book was opened and read (Rev 5^{1a}) was typical of what took place ordinarily in the Divine service on earth (The Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., London, 1894-95, ii. 277). That the Scriptures were read in the Christian assemblies from the earliest times is evident from the testimony of Clement of Rome: 'Ye know the Holy Scriptures, and know them well, and ye have deep insight into the oracles of God' (Ep. to the Corinthians, ch. 53), and the statement of Justin Martyr that in his day this was so (Apol. i. 67).

2. The question as to the private reading of Scripture in the early Church is of special importance because of the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church in the matter. No prohibition against Bible reading can be found in the NT; nor, on the contrary, is it urged as a duty. But that the Scriptures were actually read in private by the Christians of the 1st cent. cannot be doubted. The Jews did so before the time of Christ (1 Mac 1^{56a}). The Gentile proselytes had their own copies of portions, at least, of the OT, which they read diligently. This gave the Christian missionary an opportunity for delivering his message. For example, Philip found the Ethiopian eunuch reading Isaiah, and 'beginning from this scripture he preached unto him Jesus' (Ac 8³⁵). Among Jewish Christians the practice would not be discontinued, as they had special reason, in wishing to prove the Messiahship of Jesus, for making a careful study of the Prophets. Harnack, who has investigated the subject in his Bible Reading in the Early Church (Eng. tr., London, 1912), says the Jewish usage of reading the OT 'simply and easily passed over from the Jewish to the Gentile Christians, for the Holy Scriptures in the Greek translation were fully accessible to, and were read by, the Jews of the Dispersion. Moreover, we know that among the Gentile Christians the order of public worship and private and family discipline in matters of religion and morality took form in accordance with the Jewish (Jewish Christian) models' (p. 32).

The only restriction experienced was that imposed by the bulky form of Scripture. It existed in separate rolls of parchment or papyrus (see F. G. Kenyon, *Textual Criticism of the NT*², London, 1912, ch. ii.), and a complete copy of the OT would be possessed by but few people. Still, the existence of collections of extracts, the widespread use of papyrus, and the diffusion of a popular literature like the apocalyptic, make it a probable conjecture that the sacred writings in part, if not in whole, were possessed and studied by many private persons. Harnack argues that, as the knowledge of Scripture brought to light by the apologists of the 2nd cent. and the controversies of the great Gnostic movement could not have been derived solely from what was heard in public worship, we may conclude that the sacred writings were in private hands also in the period before Irenæus, and that from the first the Christians were in the habit of reading the OT.

3. The reading of Christian writings.—It is obvious that the apostolic Epistles were read in the meetings of the church to which they were addressed. St. Paul either directs explicitly that this be done (1 Th 5²⁷, Col 4⁶), or presupposes it (1 Co 5⁹, 2 Co 1¹³ 10^{3a}). Other writings were thus read to assemblies of Christians. Of the Book of Revelation, for example, the writer says, 'Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of the prophecy, and keep the things which are written therein' (1³; cf. 22^{18.19}). Letters were exchanged between churches (Col 4¹⁶) or one congregation addressed another, e.g. the Church in Rome sent an epistle to Corinth (Clement, Epistle to the Corinthians, 47). In the 2nd cent. and later the Shepherd of Hermas and Epistles like those of Barnabas, Ignatius, and Polycarp were read in churches.

It is more difficult to determine whether during the 1st cent. narratives from the life of Jesus and collections of His sayings were so read. That there were such writings is evident from the early existence of Mark and Q, the common source of much of the First and Third Gospels, and from the use of such records in Christian teaching (Lk 1⁴). As eye-witnesses of Jesus died out, the oral or written tradition of His life would be highly prized by the early Christians, and the parenthetical remark, 'Let him that readeth understand' (Mk 13⁴, Mt 24⁴⁵), points to the reading, publicly or privately, of such records. It must not be supposed, however, that even the apostolic writings, though widely read for didactic purposes, were regarded at first as 'Scripture.' The Sayings of Jesus were quoted as of supreme authority (Ac 20³⁵, 1 Co 7¹⁰ 9¹⁴, 1 Th 4¹⁵) in matters of belief and practice, but the written record of these and the separate apostolic writings were not looked upon as 'Scripture' till the 2nd century. But even then the writings which now form the NT did not displace the OT, though they found a place in the public reading of Scripture. Justin, describing the practice of his day (c. 155), says, 'There are meetings of all of us who live in cities or the country, and the memoirs of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as long as time allows' (Apol. i. 67).

REBECCA (Ῥεβέκκα).—Rebecca, the wife of Isaac, received a Divine oracle before the birth of her twin sons, Esau and Jacob, foretelling her that she would be the mother of two nations or peoples, of whom the elder would serve the younger (Ro 9¹⁰⁻¹², from Gn 25²⁴⁻²⁶). St. Paul uses this tradition as illustrating a mysterious principle which he observed in the operation of Divine grace. Even within the family of Abraham, to whom the promises were given, God more than once made choice, rejecting Ishmael and accepting Isaac, loving Jacob and hating Esau (Ro 9¹³). In the OT those preferences were regarded as purely arbitrary, Jahweh having the right to do as He pleased with any mother's sons; but the Apostle discerns in His sovereign decrees a gracious design which embraces all mankind—'the purpose of God working by means of election' (ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν πρόθεσις). RECOMPENSE.—See REWARD.

RECONCILIATION (καταλλαγή).—'Reconciliation' is the elect word in the apostolic literature to denote the changed relations issuing in the restoration, brought about by means of the Person and work of Jesus Christ, of the fellowship between God and man, which sin had interrupted. The Greek term is based upon the idea of exchange, especially the exchange or equivalent values; this passes, through the ideas of exchange of sympathy, mutual understanding and reciprocal confidence, into the notion of reconciliation, and thus becomes a term expressive of personal relations, with the implication that a previous hostility of mind or heart is now put away. Whilst the English 'reconciliation' (and its German equivalent Versöhnung) implies a mutual putting away of hostility, the Greek term is frequently used where only one person ceases to be angry with another and receives him into favour (see Grimm-Thayer, Edinburgh, 1890, p. 333). In the apostolic writings it is used both where the enmity is one-sided and where it is mutual; in the former case the context must show on which side the active enmity exists; the word in and of itself cannot declare on which side the adjustment is required or whether the hostility is mutual. 'Reconciliation' is the redemptive term specially acceptable to the modern mind, which seeks to interpret the Atonement in terms of personality; because it states the apostolic thought on the redemptive relations of God and man in personal and therefore in ethical terms, and not in terms of law or of sacrifice. The practical value of the term, and the immediacy of its application to living experience, make a similar appeal; for in the apostolic teaching it is directly and organically connected with 'the ministry of reconciliation' and 'the word of reconciliation' (2 Co 5¹⁸⁻¹⁹) which constituted the essence of the apostolic preaching. Moreover, it presents 'at-one-ment' as the result of atonement; it brings the mystery of a past 'propitiation' into the light of present and abiding personal relations Godward and manward; for it declares a restored communion to be a permanent attitude of God to man, and at the same time a progressively realized experience in man himself; 'God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation,' is also 'in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses, and having committed unto us the word of reconciliation' (2 Co 5¹⁸⁻¹⁹).

Unlike 'propitiation,' 'reconciliation' is a term without direct ancestry in OT usage, and in the NT it is a redemptive term peculiar to the writings of St. Paul. The Pauline usage is found in Ro 5¹⁰⁻¹¹, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻¹⁹, Eph 2¹⁶, Col 1²⁰⁻²¹ (cf. also 1 Co 7¹¹ and Jer 31³⁰ [LXX]), 2 Mac 1⁵ 7³ 8²⁹, Mt 5²⁴). In Ro 5¹⁰⁻¹¹ the context distinctly shows that the reconciliation spoken of is that of God to man; it is something received by man as an accomplished fact; and, although the act of man in 'receiving' the reconciliation by obedient faith is implicitly recognized as perfecting the Divine purpose by his becoming himself reconciled to God, the clear Pauline contention is that there is a reconciliation on the part of God that is not only antecedent to any reception of it on the part of man, but is independent of any change of feeling on the part of man brought about by the Divine redemption; it is not an alteration in his relation to God accomplished by man. God is regarded as having established anew a relation of peace by putting away His hostility towards man in his sin (cf. Ro 11²⁵, Eph 1⁶). 'While we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son' (Ro 5¹⁰); 'enemies' (ἐχθροί), whilst it is a term used both actively, denoting hostility towards God, and passively, denoting hostility from God, almost certainly includes the latter in this place as it obviously does in 11²⁵, where it is correlated with 'beloved' (ἀγαπητοί), which is certainly passive—'beloved of God'; the verb 'were reconciled' (καταλλάγημεν, 5¹⁰) is a real passive; men are primarily the objects, not the subjects, of the reconciliation. Otherwise the force of St. Paul's great argument that God's 'own love towards us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us' (v.⁸) was sufficiently strong to account for this changed attitude would be of little value. He can exalt the love only by pointing to what God has done, not to what we have done; our laying aside our hostility, though ultimately required to make the reconciliation complete, is wisely and intentionally ignored here; it has no place in the demonstration of the transcendent and unearned love of God in providing the means of reconciliation and in establishing with men a relation of peace. Both in this passage and in 11²⁵, Col 1²⁰⁻²¹, Eph 2¹⁶ this distinctively Pauline sense prevails—and it is the most direct indication we have of the general apostolic thought—that reconciliation is a work complete on God's side before man's share in it begins, a work wrought by God in Christ and made available for the world, which men are besought to 'receive' in order that it may become effective in them individually. That this is the Pauline teaching is acknowledged by the great body of NT exegetes, although some distinguished scholars seriously question it (e.g. A. Ritschl, Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, ii. 230 ff.; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians, London, 1879, p. 159; B. F. Westcott, Epistles of St. John, do., 1892, p. 85; cf. also Askwith in Cambr. Theol. Essays, p. 206). Some others, who personally disagree with St. Paul, frankly acknowledge that the hostility overcome by the reconciliation is regarded by him as mutual, and 'hence any reconciliation which is accomplished between God and man must be two-sided. Not only must man renounce his hostility to God, but God must change His attitude toward man—must relinquish His wrath and resentment' (Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 59). Cremer thus states the case in favour of the same position: 'As this view is grammatically as possible as the other; as, further, there are no lexical difficulties in its way; and as, finally, it is indicated by the context of both passages (Ro 5¹¹ and 11²⁵)—no solid objection can be raised against it; whereas the other quits the biblical circle of thought, and has merely a hortatory character, but no force as evidence, such as is required, especially in Ro 5' (Bibl.-Theol. Lex., p. 92). A reasoned theological defence of the same situation is given in HDB iv. 205 ff. (cf. also Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans', p. 129 f.; J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans', 1900, p. 625 f.; B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, Eng. tr., 1882-83, i. 428 ff.).

The reluctance to accept the Pauline view that reconciliation must deal with hostility on God's side as well as on man's arises mainly from two causes. (a) There is an exaggerated anthropomorphic interpretation of the significance of God's anger against sin; it is set in opposition to His love, as if these were mutually exclusive, or it is made the expression of the purely judicial demand for punishment. This is not the apostolic view; for in it there is no conflict between the Divine wrath and the Divine love, nor do they dwell apart; they are expressions of the one perfect Personality whose name and nature is love. All the processes of redemption are traced in the Pauline discussion to God's own love for sinful men. His anger is real; it is not simply official as the hostility of a law-giver in presence of a law-breaker; it is personal, but not a fitful personal resentment: it is the hot displeasure of a fatherly love in presence of all that disturbs the filial relations of His children with Himself, and destroys His ideal for their peace; it is love's crowning sign, not its contradiction. His anger is the indication that His love discriminates; for righteousness and love are moral differences which would be lost in a love of God which was incapable of moral indignation and hostility to wrong. (b) There is the unethical conception of the Divine immutability, which leads to confusion of thought; as a true Personality God can and does change His feelings and attitudes; these must change to correspond with His moral activity towards the changing character and conduct of men; whilst behind the varying attitudes involved in a change from hostility to complacency, such as reconciliation supposes, lie the unchangeable character and the changeless moral purpose which give unity and consistency to all God does (cf. I. A. Dorner's 'Divine Immutability' in A System of Christian Doctrine, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1880-82, i. 244, iv. 80; W. Adams Brown, Christian Theology in Outline, do., 1907, p. 117 f.).

In 2 Co 5¹⁴⁻²¹, the locus classicus for the apostolic doctrine of reconciliation, St. Paul is supremely concerned with its practical results in the ethical and spiritual history of mankind and in the personal experience of the individual. These results are profoundly assured in the self-identification of God in Christ with mankind, whilst their blessedness is individually realized by the response of a reciprocal self-identification with God in Christ on the part of man; in this response the reconciliation is perfected. To achieve this end God in Christ has given a 'word of reconciliation' and inspires the tender persuasions of a 'ministry of reconciliation,' which are to us men the mystic wonder of the whole redemptive process: for they reveal a love of God which humbles itself to beseech sinful men, 'as though God were intreating by us: we beseech you on behalf of Christ, be ye reconciled to God' (v.²⁰). But in this work of reconciliation the initiative is taken by God; and its cost in sacrificial self-giving is borne by Him. We never read that God has been reconciled; God Himself does the work of reconciliation in and through Christ, 'God was in Christ reconciling the world (even a world) unto himself' (v.¹⁹). The self-identification of God with men is made in Christ—it is truly God's self-identification; the humanity of Christ is the humanity of Deity, which is made manifest in time. In His death particularly Christ identified Himself with men; He 'died on behalf of all (ὐπὲρ πάντων), therefore all died' (v.¹⁴). The death on behalf of all involved the death of all; because through His self-identification with all Christ was the Representative of all. As it was the death of all men which was died by Him, His self-identification with men, being real in the flesh as in the spirit, involved a true but mysterious fellowship in the deepest mystery of their experience in the flesh—their sin. 'Him who knew no sin he [God] made to be sin on our behalf' (v.²¹). His death on behalf of all was a death unto sin once for all, that in the flesh He might destroy sin in the flesh. Such a death on their behalf was virtually the death of mankind with whom He was self-identified. The further significance of His death on behalf of all is 'that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (v.²¹). 'Because we thus judge... he died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again' (v.¹⁵). The issue of this self-identification of God in Christ with man is that 'he is a new creature, the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new' (v.¹⁷). In this new creation of humanity with its new identities with God in Christ is found the reconciliation to which 'the love of Christ constraineth us' (v.¹⁴). But the justification as well as the source of all this is God—God Himself, not Christ apart from God; not man by his penitence or by the response of his submission to God. 'All things are of God who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation' (v.¹⁸). The heart of the apostles' teaching, their gospel of reconciliation, is 'all things are of God.' Reconciliation is a Divinely accomplished fact, done once for all. In the Apostolic Church it was believed that this reconciliation was the issue of that which God had done in the setting forth of Christ Jesus to be a 'propitiation' (Ro 3²⁵). Such a propitiation is the Divinely appointed sanction and constraint of the apostles' doctrine (λόγος) of reconciliation—'To wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses' (2 Co 5¹⁹); see, further, PROPITIATION. But whatever may be the Godward side of reconciliation, they proclaimed on its manward side, with beseeching urgency, a ministry of reconciliation. Their doctrine gave no countenance to the idea that man is secure in the Divine favour through something accomplished for him apart from the obedience of his own faith, by which the reconciliation is personally 'received.' The wistful word of their beseeching, 'Be ye reconciled to God' (v.²⁰), is at one with the lingering pathos of their admonition, 'and working together with him we intreat also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain' (6¹). A man's whole attitude towards sin must be changed, otherwise the incidence of this yearning admonition must rest upon him.

A careful examination of the apostolic documents available leaves an irresistible conviction that the Apostolic Church held the view that 'reconciliation' was a change from mutual hostility, resulting from the sinfulness of mankind, to mutual friendship between God and man; that this change was God's own work accomplished in Christ through His life and death; but that it was also a process, carried on by God in Christ, requiring for its completion the receiving of it as a grace and the consequent participation in it as a Divine operation by men individually. Whether this view accords with the teaching of Jesus recorded in the Synoptics, and whether it is an interpretation of the experience of salvation binding permanently upon the faith of the Church are questions beyond the scope of this article.

REDEMPTION.—Among the figures employed by the apostolical writers to set forth the nature of the transaction by which our Lord has saved His people, none is more illuminating than that which we are accustomed to speak of as 'redemption.' The terms 'redeem,' 'redemption,' 'redeemer' are a gift of the Latin Bible to our theological language. They fail in complete exactness as renderings of the terms which they are used to translate in the apostolical writings, in so far as there still clings to them the notion, intrinsic in their form, that the buying which they denote is distinctively a 'buying back.' The English word 'ransom,' etymologically a doublet of 'redeem,' has more completely lost its etymological implication of specifically 'buying back,' taking on in its stead rather that of 'buying out.' The series 'ransom,' 'ransoming,' 'Ransomer' might on this account serve better as equivalents of the Greek words currently employed by the apostolical writers to convey this idea. These are: [λύτρον, Mt 20²⁸, Mk 10⁴⁵]; ἀντὶ λύτρον, 1 Ti 2⁶; λυτροῦσθαι, Lk 24²¹, Tit 2¹⁴; 1 P 1¹⁸; λυτρωσις, Lk 1⁶⁸ 2³⁸, He 9¹; ἀπολύτρωσις, Lk 21²⁸, Ro 3²⁴ 8²³, 1 Co 1³⁰, Eph 1⁷ 14 4³⁰, Col 1¹⁴, He 9¹⁵ 11²⁵; [λυτρωτής, Ac 7³⁵]. No words provided by the Greek language could convey more distinctly the idea which we commonly express by the term 'ransoming.' Their current employment by the writers of the NT to describe the action of our Lord in setting His people free is proof enough of itself that this action was thought of by them not broadly as 'deliverance,' but as a deliverance in the distinct mode of 'ransoming.' If 'deliverance' alone, without implication of the mode of accomplishing it, had been what was intended to be expressed, the simple forms λύειν, λύσις, λυτήρ or some of their strengthened prepositional compounds lay at hand. These were in common use in the sense of 'delivering,' and indeed some of them (like λύεσθαι and ἀπολύεσθαι) had even acquired the special sense of 'ransoming.' Instead of them, however, the NT writers elected to employ forms which embody in their very structure an open assertion that the mode of deliverance spoken of is by 'ransom.' To say λυτρον is to say 'ransom'; and to say λυτροῦσθαι, λύτρωσις is to say λύτρον; while ἀπολύτρωσις is but a stronger way of saying λύτρωσις.

Of course, even words like these, in the very form of which the modal implication is entrenched, and which owe, in fact, their existence to the need of words emphasizing the mode unambiguously, may come to be used so loosely that this implication retires into the background or even entirely out of sight. In our common English usage the words 'redeem,' 'redemption,' 'redeemer' retain no sure intimation of their etymological denotation of 'buying back,' but suggest ordinarily only a 'buying out.' They are sometimes used so loosely as to convey no implication even of purchase. That λυτροῦσθαι, λύτρωσις, ἀπολύτρωσις have suffered in their NT usage such a decay of their essential significance cannot be assumed, however, without clear proof. In point of fact, the actual accompaniments of their usage forbid such an assumption. In a number of instances of their occurrence the intimation of a price paid is prominent in the context; in other words, the deliverance spoken of is definitely intimated as a ransoming. In the remaining instances this intimation becomes no doubt rather an assumption, grounded in their form and their usage elsewhere; but that is no reason for neglecting it. The apparently varying usage of the terms depends merely on an oscillation of emphasis between the two elements of thought combined in them. Sometimes the emphasis is thrown on the mode in which the deliverance asserted is wrought—namely, by ransoming. Sometimes, on the other hand, it is shifted to the issue of the ransoming which is affirmed—namely, in deliverance. In the former case the stress falls so strongly on the idea of ransoming that the mind tends to rest exclusively on the act of purchasing or the price paid. In the latter it rests so strongly on the idea of deliverance that we are tempted to forget that an act of ransoming is assumed as its procuring cause. In neither case, however, is either element of thought really suppressed entirely. Christ's ransoming of His people is of course always thought of as issuing in their deliverance. His deliverance of His people is equally thought of always as accomplished by a ransoming.

We may be surprised to observe that the epithet 'Redeemer' ('Ransomer,' λυτρωτής) is never applied to our Lord in the NT. Even the broader designation, 'Deliverer,' is applied to Him only once, and that in a quotation from the OT (ὁ ρυόμενος, Ro 11²⁶, from Is 59²⁰; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰). In fact, we do not meet with 'Redeemer' (λυτρωτής) as a designation of our Lord in extant Christian literature, until the middle of the 2nd cent. (Justin, Dial. xxx. 3; cf. lxxxiii. 3), and it does not seem to become common until three centuries later. Nevertheless, Justin himself tells us that it was in ordinary use in the Christian community when he wrote. 'For we call Him Helper and Redeemer,' he says, with an allusion to Ps 19¹⁴. And it seems that in the only instance of the appearance of the term in the NT—Ac 7³⁵, where it is used of Moses—its employment as a designation of our Lord is already presupposed. For it is applied to Moses here only as the type of Christ, and with a very distinct reference to the antitype in the choice of the word. The Israelites had demanded of Moses, 'Who made thee a ruler and a judge?' Stephen, driving home his lesson, declares that him who was thus rejected as 'ruler and judge' God has sent 'both as ruler and as redeemer.' The 'both . . . and' is to be noted as well as the change of term. 'Redeemer' is introduced with great emphasis; attention is called markedly to it as a significant point in the argument. 'Observe,' says H. A. W. Meyer, 'the climax introduced by λυτρωτήν in relation to the preceding δικαστήν. It is introduced because the obstinacy of the people against Moses is type of the antagonism to Christ and His work (v. 31); consequently, Moses in his work of deliverance is a type of Christ, who has effected the λυτρωσις of the people in the highest sense (Lk 1⁶⁸ 2³⁸, He 9¹, Tit 2¹⁴)' (Commentary on the NT, 'Acts,' vol. i. [1877] p. 204 f.). We must look upon the absence of instances of the application of the epithet 'Redeemer' to Christ in early Christian writers, therefore, as merely a literary phenomenon. Christians were from the first accustomed to speak of their Lord as 'Redeemer.' The usage undoubtedly was not so rich and full in the earlier ages of the Church as it has since become. The intense concreteness of the term probably accounts in part for this. But it was already in use to express the apostolic conception of the function of our Lord as Saviour.

The basis of this apostolic conception is laid in our Lord's own declaration, 'For verily the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸), a declaration elucidated and enforced in those others, preserved by John, in which He speaks of laying down His life for the sheep (Jn 10¹¹), or His friends (15¹³), or of giving His flesh for the life of the world (6⁵¹). In this great declaration our Lord is commending a life of service to His disciples by His own signal example. He adduces His example after a fashion which runs on precisely the lines repeated by Paul in Ph 2^{5a}. He calls Himself by the lofty name of the Son of Man, and, by thus throwing the exaltation of His Person into contrast with the lowliness of the work He was performing, He enhances the value of His example to a life of service. He describes His whole mission in the world as service, and He adverts to His ransoming death as the culminating act of the service which He came into the world to render. He, the heavenly man of Daniel's vision (Dn 7¹³), came into the world for no other purpose than to perform a service for men which involved the giving of His life as a ransom for them. Thus He makes His ransoming death the final cause of His whole manifestation in the world. The terms He employs to describe His death as a ransom are as simple and precise as possible. He speaks of 'giving his life,' emphasizing the voluntariness of the act. He speaks of giving His life as a 'ransom,' using the most exact word the Greek language affords (λύτρον) to express the price paid to secure the release of prisoners, the manumission of slaves (see A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, p. 322 ff., with some of the necessary correctives in T. Zahn, Der Brief an die Römer, 1910, p. 180, note 51 from the middle), or the purchase of immunity for faults committed against Deity (see F. Steinleitner, Die Beicht im Zusammenhange mit der sakralen Rechtspflege in der Antike, p. 37 f.). He speaks of giving His life as a ransom 'for,' or rather 'in the place of,' 'instead of,' 'many,' the preposition (ἀντί) employed emphasizing the idea of exchange, or, we may say shortly, of substitution. In this declaration, then, our Lord Himself sets forth in language as precise as possible His work of service for man as culminating in the vicarious payment by His voluntary death of a ransom price for them. This is what He came to do; and in this, therefore, is summed up briefly the nature of His work for men.

It would be strange if so remarkable a declaration had produced no echoes in the teaching of our Lord's followers. A very distinct echo of it sounds in 1 Ti 2⁶, where it is declared of the man Christ Jesus, the only Mediator between God and men, that 'he gave himself a ransom for all.' The term employed for 'ransom' here is a strengthened form (ἀντίλυτρον), in which the idea of exchange, already intrinsic to the simple form (λύτρον), is made still more explicit. This idea having thus been thrown into prominence in the term itself, the way was opened to add an intimation of those with whom the exchange is made by means of a preposition which indicates them as beneficiaries of it (ὑπέρ). The voluntariness of the ransoming transaction on our Lord's part is intimated when it is said that He 'gave himself' a ransom for all, a phrase the full reference of which on Paul's lips may be gathered from Gal 1⁴: 'who gave himself for our sins' (cf. Gal 2²⁰, Eph 5⁻⁵). Every element of thought contained in Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸, in a word, is repeated here; and what is there represented by our Lord as the substance of His mission, is here declared by Paul to be the sum of the gospel committed to him to preach. It is the 'testimony in its own times, whereunto I was appointed a preacher and an apostle' (1 Ti 2⁷).

It is only an elaboration of the central idea of this declaration when Paul (Tit 2¹⁴), stirred to the depths of his being by the remembrance of all that he owes to 'our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ,' for 'the epiphany of whose glory' he is looking forward as his most 'blessed hope,' celebrates in burning words the great transaction to which he attributes it all: 'who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a people for his own possession, zealous of good works.' The fundamental fact thrown up to observation here too is that Jesus Christ 'gave himself for us.' The assertion is the same as that of 1 Ti 2⁶, and the meaning is the same: our Lord voluntarily gave Himself as a ransom for our benefit. This statement dominates the whole passage, and doubtless has determined the choice of the verb 'ransom' in the first clause of the telic sentence which follows. But it is the effects of this ransoming which are particularly developed. Paul's mind is intent in this context on conduct. He would have his converts live worthily of the grace of God which has come to them, their eyes set upon the recompense of the reward. If Christ gave Himself for our sins, it was that we might sin no more. That is expressed in Gal 1⁴ thus: 'That he might deliver us out of this present evil world.' It is expressed here thus: 'That he might ransom us from all iniquity and purify for himself a people for his own possession, zealous of good works.' The two statements have fundamentally the same content, expressed, however, in the one case negatively, and in the other positively. Christ ransomed us by the gift of Himself, that we might no longer belong to the world but to Him. To belong to Christ is to be holy; and therefore those who are His, while still in the world must live soberly, righteously, and godly, expecting His coming, that their deliverance out of this evil world may be completed. The verbs used in the two statements are, however, different. In the one case, the verb employed (ἐξαίρεισθαι, Gal 1⁴) declares the effect wrought exclusively, with no intimation of the mode of action by which it is attained: the purpose of Christ's giving Himself for our sins is our rescue, deliverance, out of the present evil world. In the other case, the verb employed (λυτροῦσθαι, Tit 2¹⁴) has a distinct modal connotation: Christ's purpose in giving Himself for us is to ransom us from every iniquity, and thus to purify for Himself a people of His own, zealous of good works. The concept of ransom intrinsic in Christ's giving Himself for us is here expressly carried over to the ultimate effects, our deliverance from all iniquity, and our purification for Christ, 'so that,' as B. Weiss puts it, 'His giving Himself up for our liberation from guilt is conceived as the ransom-price, apart from which these things could not result' (Die Briefe Pauli an Timotheus und Titus, 1885, p. 384 n.). This is only to say, in our current modes of speech, that the ransom paid by Christ, when He gave Himself for us, purchases for us not only relief from the guilt but also release from the power of sin.

How little such a reference to the revolution wrought in the life of Christians empties the term 'to ransom' of its implication of purchase may be learned from 1 P 1^{18,4}. Peter is here as completely engrossed with conduct as Paul is in Tit 2¹⁴. He too is exhorting his readers to a life, during their sojourn here expecting the revelation of the Lord, consonant with their high dignity as a people of God's own possession. And he too seeks to gain force for his exhortation by reminding them of what they owe to Christ their Ransomer. The thing asserted to be secured by this ransoming is, with Peter as with Paul, an ethical deliverance. 'Knowing,' says he, 'that ye were redeemed . . . from your vain manner of life handed down from your fathers' (1 P 1¹⁸). The thought is closely similar to that of Gal 1⁴: 'That he might deliver us out of this present evil world.' If we should be tempted to suppose that, therefore, the term 'ransomed,' as here used, has lost its implication of purchase, and become the exact equivalent of the 'deliver' of Gal 1⁴, Peter at once undeceives us by emphasizing precisely the idea of purchasing. The peculiarity of the passage consists just in the fullness with which it dwells on the price paid for our deliverance. Paul contented himself in Tit 2¹⁴ with saying merely that Christ 'gave himself for us.' Peter tells us that this means that He poured out His blood for us. 'Ransomed' here, although used exactly as in Tit 2¹⁴, cannot possibly mean simply 'delivered.' It means distinctively, 'delivered by means of the payment of a price.'

What the price was which Christ paid to ransom us 'from our vain manner of life, handed down from our fathers,' Peter develops with great fullness, both negatively and positively. Negatively, he tells us, it was no corruptible thing, no silver or gold. His mind is running on the usual commodities employed in the ordinary ransomings familiar to everyday life; and we perceive that he intends to represent the ransoming of which Christians are the object as similar in kind to them. It differed from them only in the incomparable greatness of the price paid; and this carries with it the greatness of the evil from which it delivers us and the greatness of the good which it secures for us.

The price paid, Peter tells us positively, is the blood of Christ. This blood he characterizes in a two-fold manner. On the one hand, he speaks of it, enhancing its value, as precious. It is at great cost that we have been ransomed. On the other hand, intimating the source of its efficacy, he compares it with the blood 'of a lamb without blemish and without spot' (1 P 1¹⁹). The sacrificial allusion here is manifest, whether we think (with Hermann Gunkel), through the medium of Is 53, of the ordinary offerings (cf. Lv 23¹⁻⁴), or (with F. J. A. Hort) particularly of the Paschal lamb (cf. Ex 12⁹). The main point to observe is that Peter feels no incongruity in blending the ideas of ransom and sacrifice. The blood which Christ shed as a sacrifice is the blood by which we are ransomed. The two modes of representation express a single fact.

Peter does not inform his readers of these things as something new to them. He presents them as matters which are of common knowledge: 'knowing, as you do, that,' etc. 'It is an appeal to an elementary Christian belief' (F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter I. 1-II. 17, p. 75). Of course, then, there are other allusions to them, more or less full, scattered through the NT. There is, for instance, a similar conjunction of the notions of sacrifice and ransom in He 9¹². There we are told that Christ, in contrast with the priests of the old dispensation, 'a high priest of the good things to come, . . . not by means of the blood of goats and calves, but by means of his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place having obtained eternal ransoming.' There are not two acts intimated here: by the one shedding of His blood, Christ both entered once for all into the holy place and obtained an eternal ransoming. The correspondence of the 'once for all' in the one clause and the 'eternal' in the other should not be overlooked; it is a binding link assimilating the two assertions to one another. Christ, unlike the Levitical priests with their repeated entrances, entered the holy place 'once for all,' because the ransoming He was obtaining through His blood was not like theirs, temporary in its effect, but 'eternal,' that is to say, of never-failing absoluteness (cf. 'eternal Spirit,' v.¹⁴, 'eternal inheritance,' v.¹⁵). The effect of the sacrificial shedding of Christ's blood is here expressed in terms of ransoming.

Precisely how this author conceived this ransoming is made plain by a phrase which he employs three verses further on: 'a death having taken place for the ransoming of the transgressions.' He is still contrasting the effective work of Christ with the merely representative work of the Old Covenant. A promise had been given of an eternal inheritance. But men had not received the heritage which had thus been promised. Their sins stood in the way, and there was no sacrifice which took away sin. Christ had now brought such a sacrifice. In His case a death had taken place 'for the ransoming of the transgressions' which they had committed. 'Ransoming' here conveys a meaning which might have been conveyed by 'expiation.' The term used is not the simple form λύτρωσις, but the strengthened form ἀπολύτρωσις; and the construction is inexact—it is not the transgressions but the transgressors that are ransomed. But the meaning is plain. 'The genitive expresses in a wide sense the object on which the redemption is exercised ("redemption in the matter of the transgressions," "transgression—redemption")' (B. F. Westcott, Hebrews, p. 264). It was because men had sinned that they required to be ransomed; sin had brought them into a condition from which they could be delivered only by a ransom. And the ransom required was a death. The matter is put quite generally: 'a death having taken place for ransom-ing the transgressions.' This death was, in point of fact, Christ's death; and it was because it was Christ's death that it was adequate to its end (v.¹⁴). But the fundamental point in our present passage is that Christ could ransom men from their sins, that is to say, from the consequences of their sins, including, of course, that consciousness of sin which bites into the conscience (v.¹⁴), only by dying. By sacrificing Himself He put away sin (v.²⁵); He was offered to bear the sins of many (v.²⁸). The images of sacrifice and of ransoming are inextricably interwoven, but it easily emerges that Christ is thought of, in giving Himself to death, as giving Himself as a ransom-price to deliver men from the guilt and penalties of sin.

This representation meets us again, very tersely put, in Eph 1⁷, of which Col 1¹⁴ is a slightly less completely expressed repetition. The ransoming (ἀπολύτρωσις) which is in Christ, described with more particularity in Ephesians again as having been procured 'through his blood,' is in both passages alike identified immediately with 'the remission of our trespasses' (Eph.), or 'of our sins' (Col.). 'The studied precision,' as J. B. Lightfoot phrases it in his note on Col 1¹⁴, with which the ransoming is thus defined to be just 'remission of sins,' is the more noteworthy because it is apparently directly contrasted as such with the wider 'deliverance' (ἐλευσάτο) from the power of darkness and removal into the Kingdom of the Son of God's love, for which it supplies the ground. It is because Christ has at the cost of His blood, that is, by dying for us, purchased for us remission of sins (which is our ransoming), that we have deliverance from the tyranny of darkness and are transferred under His own rule. We thus reach a very close determination of the exact point at which the ransoming act of Christ operates, and of the exact evil from which it immediately relieves us. It relieves us of the guilt and the penal consequences of our sins; and only through that relief does it secure to us other blessings. It is, at its very centre, just 'the remission of our sins' that we have in Christ when we have in Him our ransoming.

The great passage in which the nature of our ransoming is unfolded for us, however, is Ro 3²⁴. There, nearly all the scattered intimations of its essential nature found here and there in other passages are gathered together in one comprehensive statement. The fundamental declarations of this very pregnant passage are, that men, being sinners, can be justified only gratuitously, by an act of pure grace on God's part; that God, however, can so act towards them in His grace, only because there is a ransoming (ἀπολύτρωσις) available for them in Christ Jesus; and that this ransoming was procured by the death of Christ as an expiatory sacrifice, enabling God righteously to forgive sins. The ransoming found—perhaps we may even say stored—in Christ Jesus is here represented as the result of His sacrificial death; this sacrificial death is made the ground of God's forgiveness of sins; and this forgiveness of sins is identified with the justification which God gratuitously grants believing sinners. The blending of the ideas of ransoming and expiation is complete; the 'blood of Christ,' in working the one, works also the other. The ascription to God of the whole process of justification, including apparently the ransoming act itself, which is usually (but not always) ascribed to Christ, but which is thus traced back through Christ to God, whose will in this too Christ does, is apparently due to the emphasis with which, throughout the passage, the entirety of salvation, in all its elements, is attributed to God's free grace. This emphasis on the gratuitousness of the whole saving process is the most noticeable feature of the passage. It has been strangely contended (e.g. by T. Zahn) that it is inconsistent with the conception of a ransom, strictly taken. There is, however, not even an antinomy here: the gratuitousness of justification quoad homines cannot possibly exclude the grounding of that act in the blood of Christ, as a ransom paid for men from without. What the passage teaches is, that all men have sinned and have failed to attain the glory God has in mind for them; all are in this matter in like case; those whom God justifies—namely, all believers—are, then, justified freely, by God's grace alone. But it does not teach that God acts thus, in His free grace, justifying sinners gratuitously so far as they are concerned, arbitrarily and with no adequate ground for His action. On the contrary, it asserts a ground for His justifying act; and the ground which it asserts is the ransoming that is in Christ Jesus. It says, indeed, not 'on the ground of the ransoming that is in Christ Jesus' (διὰ τῆς ἀπολύτρωσιν), but 'through the instrumentality of the ransoming that is in Christ Jesus' (διὰ τῆς ἀπολύτρωσεως). But this is only a formal difference. What Paul says is, that the ransoming that is in Christ Jesus is the means by which men, being sinners, are brought by God into a justification which they cannot secure for themselves. If the ransoming that is in Christ Jesus is the means by which alone they can be justified, that is only another way of saying that God, who gratuitously justifies them in His grace, proceeds in this act in view of nothing in them, but solely in view of the ransoming that is in Christ Jesus. How this ransoming comes to be in Christ Jesus is, then, immediately explained: God has set Him forth as an expiatory sacrifice through faith in His blood, for the manifestation of His righteousness in the forgiveness of sins. Christ, then, has been offered as an expiatory sacrifice; this enables God to forgive sins righteously; those thus forgiven are justified gratuitously; and this justification has taken place in view of, and that is as much as to say by means of, the ransoming which has resulted from the shedding of the blood of Christ. The ransoming provided by Christ is, in a word, the means by which God is rendered gracious; and in this His grace, thus secured for us, He gratuitously justifies us, although we, as sinners, have no claim upon this justification.

The fundamental idea underlying the representation of salvation as a ransoming is its costliness. In some of the passages which have been adduced this idea is thrown very prominently forward. This is the case with Ro 3²⁴, and, indeed, with all the passages in which Christ is said to have given 'Himself,' or 'His blood,' as a ransom for His people; and it is elaborated in much detail in such passages as He 9¹² and 1 P 1^{18a}. But the emphasis often falls no less on the value of the acquisition obtained, and that both on its negative and on its positive sides. Naturally it is the eschatological aspects of this acquisition on which ordinarily most stress is laid. These eschatological aspects of our ransoming are brought very decidedly into the foreground, for example, in Tit 2¹⁴, 1 P 1¹⁸, and not less so in He 9¹², Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴. When the mind is thus occupied with the eschatological results of the ransoming, it is apt to be relatively less engaged with the nature of the ransoming act itself, and we may be tempted to read the term 'ransoming' as if its whole implication were absorbed in the simple idea of 'deliverance.' This is, of course, not really the case. The term 'ransoming' is employed instead of one by which nothing more than 'deliverance' would be expressed, precisely because the writer is conscious that the deliverance of which he is speaking has been secured only at a cost, and instinctively employs a term which intimates this fact. It was thus a true feeling which led James Morison (A Critical Exposition of the Third Chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, 1866, p. 254) to insist that by the terms in question is expressed not mere deliverance, but 'deliverance which is effected in a legitimate way, and in consistency with the rights and claims of all parties concerned.' We must, however, go a step further and recognize that the deliverance intimated by these terms is thought of distinctively as resting on a purchase, as, in a word, the issue of a ransoming. This is, at all events, the state of the case with the NT instances.

When we read, for example, in Ro 8²³, that we, in this life, are groaning within ourselves, waiting for our adoption, and then this adoption is defined as 'the ransoming (ἀπολύτρωσις) of our body,' the word 'ransoming' cannot be taken out of hand as merely 'deliverance,' and much less can it be supposed to intimate that a special ransom shall be paid at the last day for the deliverance of the body. What is meant is that the deliverance of our bodies—by which is intended just our resurrection, connected in this context with the repristination of the physical universe, an object as yet of hope only—shall be experienced in due season, not as something disconnected with the salvation we are enjoying here and now in its first-fruits, but as its consummation; that is to say, as one of the results of the ransom paid by Christ in His blood on the Cross, from which flow all the blessings which, as believers, we receive. It is because Paul's mind is fixed upon this fundamental ransom-paying that he uses here a term which imports a ransoming and not one of mere deliverance.

Similarly, when we read in the closing words (Eph 1¹⁴) of that splendid hymn of praise which opens the Epistle to the Ephesians, that believers, having received the promised Spirit, defined specifically as 'the earnest of the inheritance,' have been 'sealed unto the ransoming of the acquired possession, to the praise of God's glory,' every element in the wording of the statement itself, and of the context as well, cries out against seeing in the term 'ransoming' anything else but a reminder that this deliverance is an issue of the ransom-paying of Christ in His blood. This ransom-paying had just (Eph 1⁷) been defined as made by Christ in His blood, and as consisting in the remission of our trespasses. As it is impossible to suppose that the term is used in two radically different senses in the same sentence, so it is impossible to imagine that those who are delivered are described expressly as God's 'acquired possession,' and their deliverance is made dependent upon their reception of the Spirit, described specifically as 'the earnest of their inheritance,' without a very precise intention of connecting this deliverance with the ransom-paying out of which it flows as its consummation. And, this being true, it is quite clear that 'the day of ransoming' of Eph 4³⁰ does not mean the day on which the ransom shall be paid, nor merely the day of a deliverance wrought somehow or other not intimated, but distinctly the day on which there shall be actually experienced the ultimate results of the ransom-paying which Christ has made 'through his blood' (1⁷), that is, at His death on the Cross, assured to believers, because they are sealed thereto by the Holy Spirit of God, received now as the earnest of their inheritance.

There seems no reason to doubt that the same conception underlies the language of our Lord (Lk 21²⁸) when He encourages His followers to see in the signs of the coming of the Son of Man, fearful to others, the indications of their approaching 'ransoming' (ἀπολύτρωσις): 'But when these things begin to come to pass, look up, and lift up your heads; because your ransoming draweth nigh.' He does not point them to the time when the ransom which He came into the world to pay (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸) is at length to be paid for them; neither does He promise them some other deliverance, different from that and disconnected with it, which they might expect some time in the undefined but distant future. He says 'your ransoming,' intimating that it was already theirs in sure expectation; He speaks of it as 'drawing nigh,' recognizing that it was eagerly looked for. He is, of course, pointing to the complete realization of the ransoming of which He speaks in the actual deliverance which shall be experienced. But when He speaks of this deliverance as a 'ransoming' He is equally, of course, referring to it as its result to a ransom-paying which secures it; and can we doubt that what was in His mind was His own promise that He would give His life a ransom in the place of many?

This declaration of our Lord's (Lk 21²⁸) may lead us to the two or three passages (all, like it, occurring in Luke's Gospel, 1⁶⁸ 2³⁸ 24⁻¹) which differ from the other instances in which the terms denoting 'ransoming' are employed in the NT, in that they do not have the great basal assertion of our Lord (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸) behind them, but give expression to hopes nourished on the promises of the Old Covenant. We read of Zacharias, on the birth of his prophetic son, praising the God of Israel, because 'he hath visited and wrought ransoming (λύτρωσις) for his people' (Lk 1⁶⁸); and of Anna, the prophetess, on seeing the infant Jesus in the Temple, giving 'thanks unto God, and speaking of him to all them that were looking for the ransoming (λύτρωσις) of Jerusalem' (2³⁸); and of the two disciples, sorrowing over Jesus' death, sadly telling their unknown Companion, as they journeyed together to Emmaus: 'We hoped that it was he that should ransom (λυτρουσθαι) Israel' (24⁻¹). Obviously these passages stand somewhat apart from those which embody the apostolic conception of the nature of the saving work of Christ. They represent rather the anticipations of the faithful in Israel with respect to the salvation promised to God's people. Their interest to us is due to the use in them of the same terminology to express Israel's hope which afterwards was employed by the apostles when they described Christ's work as at its root a ransom-paying. As we can hardly ascribe to these aspirations of saints taught by the OT revelation so clearly cut and definitely conceived a conviction that the Divine deliverance for which they were waiting was to be specifically a ransoming, as we have ascribed to the apostolic writers with respect to the deliverance wrought by Christ, the question easily arises whether we have not overpressed the apostles' language, and whether it would not be better to interpret their declarations from the vaguer, if we should not rather say the looser or at least the broader, use of the same terms in these earlier passages which represent a usage going back into the OT.

Such has been the method of many expositors (the typical instance is commonly taken from H. Oltramare on Ro 3²⁴; cf. the corrective in Sanday-Headlam on the same passage). Following it, they have felt entitled or bound to empty the language of the apostles, which literally expresses the idea of ransoming, when speaking of the work of Christ, more or less completely of all such implication, and to read it as conveying merely the broad idea of delivering. This method of dealing with the apostolic usage is, however, quite misleading. The language of the apostles is altogether too definite to permit such a process of evacuation to be carried successfully through with respect to it. Their teaching as to the nature of our Lord's work as an act of ransoming is not conveyed exclusively by the implication of the ransoming terms which they prevailingly employ in speaking of it; they use other terms also, of similar meaning, side by side with them (cf. Ac 20²⁸, 1 Co 6²⁰ 7²², Gal 3¹³, 2 P 2¹, Rev 5⁹ 14⁴⁻¹); and they often expound their meaning in the sense of ransoming in great detail. It must not be permitted to drop out of sight that something happened between the prophetic promises of the Old Covenant reflected in the anticipations of the early days of the gospel, and the dogmatic expositions of the nature of the work of Christ by the apostles, which was revolutionary precisely with respect to the conceptions held by God's people of the nature of His great intervention for their deliverance. We cannot interpret the apostles' exposition of the meaning of the death of Christ and the manner in which it produces its effect—which was to them the most tremendous of experienced facts—wholly within the limits of the anticipations of even the most devout of Israelites who, at the best, only dimly perceived the necessity of a suffering Messiah (Lk 20²¹). We must expect a precision in defining the mode of God's deliverance of His people to enter in after the experience of it as a fact, which could not exist before; and that the more, because a model which necessarily dominated all their teaching had been given His followers by our Lord Himself (Mk 10⁴⁵, Mt 20²⁸) for interpreting the nature of His work and the meaning of His death. F. J. A. Hort is certainly right in saying, when speaking of 1 P 1¹⁹: 'The starting point of this and all similar language in the Epistles is our Lord's saying in Mt 20²⁸ || Mk 10⁴⁵' (cf. also B. F. Westcott, Ephesians, 1906, p. 140, and even, though more cautiously, A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, p. 331). Moreover, the primary assumption of this method of determining the apostolic usage of these terms is not unquestionable—to wit, that, in their earlier use, running back into the OT, the implication of purchase has dropped wholly out of sight, and only the broad sense of delivering has been retained. It is at least noticeable that the OT persistently employs terms with the implication of purchase, when speaking whether of the great typical deliverances from Egypt and the Captivity or of the greater deliverance typified by them which Jahweh was yet to bring to His people. This is no more a phenomenon of the LXX than of the underlying Hebrew; and it does not appear that it is due to a complete decay of feeling for the implication of purchase intrinsic in these terms. No doubt they are sometimes used when we see nothing further necessary for the sense than simple deliverance, and sometimes in parallelisms together with terms of simple deliverance. They are also used, however, when the implication of purchase is express. And we are not encouraged to think that they had ceased to bear their intrinsic meaning to the writers of the OT, even when applied to the greater matters of destiny, whether of the individual or of the nation, by such a passage, say, as Ps 49⁻³: 'None of them can by any means redeem (יִגְדֹּל, λυτρουσθαι) his brother, nor give to God a ransom (כֶּנֶס, ἐξίλασμα) for him: (for the redemption [ῥῆμα, τὴν τιμὴν τῆς λυτρώσεως] of their life is costly . . .)' or by such a passage as, say, Is 43¹²: 'Fear not, for I have redeemed thee (יִגְדֹּלְךָ, ἐλυτρώσάμην); . . . I have given Egypt as thy ransom (כֶּנֶסְךָ, ἀλλάγμα), Ethiopia and Seba for thee. . . . I have loved thee; therefore will I give men for thee, and peoples for thy life.' The truth seems to be that the language of ransoming and redemption is employed in the OT to describe the deliverances which Israel had experienced or was yet to experience at the Divine hands, not because this language had lost to the writers of the OT its precise import, but in order to intimate that these deliverances were not, and were not to be, without cost. Even the later Jews were not without some sense of this, and looked about for the purchase-price. 'With two bloods,' says the Midrash on Ex 12², 'were the Israelites delivered from Egypt, with the blood of the paschal lamb and with the blood of circumcision' (A. Wünsche, Bibliotheca Rabbinica, ii. [1890] 135, as cited by F. J. A. Hort on 1 P 1¹⁹, p. 79^b). There is no compelling reason, then, why we should not recognize an implication of purchase, however undefined, even in Lk 1⁶⁸ 2³⁸ 24²¹.

If there be any instance in the NT of the use of a derivative of λυτρον, from which this implication is wholly absent, it will most probably be found in He 11³⁵, where, in the bead-roll of the heroes of faith, we are told of some who were beaten to death, 'not accepting the ransoming (ἀπολύτρωσις), that they might obtain a better resurrection.' There is nothing in the context to intimate that the deliverance from their martyrdom which they refused was to be purchased by a ransom. But is anything further needed to carry this intimation than the employment of this particular word, in which the idea of a ransom is included? Is it not possible that the writer has selected this particular word (it is not employed in the account from which he is drawing) precisely in order to intimate that Eleazar and 'the seven brethren with their mother'—if he is really alluding to their cases (2 Mac 6, 7)—felt apostasy too great a price to pay for their deliverance? They did not refuse a bare deliverance; they refused a deliverance on a condition, a deliverance which had to be paid for at a price which they rated as too high. The term employed is, at all events, perfectly adapted to express this fact; and the words of this stem, when used elsewhere in this Epistle, retain the implication of purchase (9¹¹⁻¹⁵).

There is another passage in which we are practically dependent on the implications of the form itself, without the aid of contextual indications, to determine its meaning. This is 1 Co 1³⁰, where the Apostle, in enumerating the contents of that wisdom which Christ has brought to His followers, orders the several elements, which he mentions, thus: 'that is to say, righteousness and sanctification, and also ransoming.' It is a little surprising to find the 'ransoming' (ἀπολύτρωσις) placed after the righteousness and sanctification, or which it is the condition. We may, therefore, be tempted to give it some looser sense in which it may appear to be conceived as following upon them, if not chronologically, at least logically. There seems to be no justification, however, for departing from the proper meaning of a word which is not only clear in its natural meaning, but is closely defined in other passages in Paul's writings in accordance with this natural meaning. We may think, with Lightfoot and T. C. Edwards, of the eschatological usage of the word, and understand it 'of redemption consummated in' our deliverance from all sin and misery'; and suppose it to be mentioned last because referring to the final deliverance, and, therefore, 'almost equivalent to ζωὴ αἰώνιος' (Lightfoot, ad loc.; cf. also Edwards, ad loc.). Or we may think with H. A. W. Meyer and C. F. G. Heinrici of its ordinary use as the proper term to designate the act by which Christ purchased His people to Himself by the outpouring of His blood, and suppose it to be mentioned last in the enumeration of the blessings received from Christ, with the emphasis of climax, because it supplies the basis of those further acts of salvation (justification and the gift of the Spirit), by means of which righteousness and holiness are conveyed to believers. The one thing which we cannot easily suppose is that Paul has departed in this one instance from his uniform usage of a word which holds the rank of a technical term in his writings. A. Deissmann cries out: 'This rare word occurs seven times in St. Paul' (op. cit. p. 331, n. 2). The reason obviously is that Paul had something to say which he needed this word to say. Are we to suppose that he might just as well have used the common words, current in everyday speech, for what he had to say?

How little strange the idea of salvation as a thing purchased is to this particular Epistle may be observed from the declaration twice repeated: 'Ye were bought with a price' (6²⁰ 7²³), which Paul uses as an incitement to Christian effort. The addition to the assertion of the verb that we have been 'bought,' of the words, 'with a price,' serves to give great emphasis to the exclusion of all notion that salvation was acquired for us without the payment of an equivalent, and thus to make very prominent the essential idea of exchange which underlies the conception of ransoming. What the price was which was paid for our purchasing is not mentioned in these passages: it was too well understood to require explicit statement. It is similarly taken for granted in the like allusion in 2 P 2¹, where the false teachers who were vexing the Church are condemned as even 'denying the Master (δεσπότης) that bought them.' There is no question that they were bought: this pungent fact is rather treated as the fundamental thing in the consciousness of all Christians, and is therefore employed as a whip to their consciences to scourge them to right conduct towards their Master. In all these instances the stress falls on the ownership over us acquired by Christ by His purchase of us. They therefore naturally suggest the remarkable words of Paul, when, in bidding farewell to the Ephesian elders, he exhorts them 'to feed the church of God, which he acquired by means of his own blood' (Ac 20²⁸). Although, however, not the specific 'purchased' but the broader 'acquired' is employed here, the emphasis is shifted from the mere fact of acquisition and consequent ownership to the costliness of the acquisition, and therefore the price paid for it is not only explicitly mentioned but strongly stressed. God has acquired His Church by means of His own blood, a paradoxical statement which presented no difficulties to Paul and his readers, but rather was freighted with the liveliest gratitude. Whence 'the church of God' was thus acquired 'by means of his own blood,' we learn from the new songs of the Apocalypse. It was 'purchased out of the earth,' 'from among men' (14³⁻⁴), or, more explicitly, 'of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation' (5⁹). And here we are reminded again of the great price which was paid for it, and of the great deliverance which was obtained for it at this great cost. The purchase-price was nothing less than 'the blood of the Lamb,' and they that are purchased are 'loosed' (λύειν, the primitive of λυτρουσθαι) from their sins in his blood (1⁵), and made unto God 'a kingdom and priests' (1⁵ 5¹⁰) who shall 'reign upon the earth' (5¹⁰). All the virtues gather to them—'they are without blemish' (14⁵). That nothing should be lacking to the presentation of the whole idea of ransoming outside the term itself, we find Paul employing the exact synonym, 'to buy out' (ἐξαγοράζειν), to express the common idea. 'God sent forth his Son,' he tells us, 'born of a woman, born under the law, that he might buy out them under law, that we might receive the adoption of sons' (Gal 4⁴); 'Christ bought us out from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us' (Gal 3¹³). Paul's whole doctrine of the ransoming Christ has been compressed into these two sentences. We were under the dominion of law, and have been bought out from it, that we may become rather sons of God and receive the Spirit. We were under the curse of the broken law and had incurred its penalty—the wrath of God and all that the wrath of God means: Christ has bought us out from under this curse. He has done this by becoming Himself a curse for us; that is, by taking the wrath of God upon Himself and enduring the penalty of the broken law in our stead. As a consequence, the blessing of Abraham has come to us, and we have received the promised Spirit.

We have called this Paul's doctrine of the ransoming Christ, and that designation of it is just. The derivatives of λυτρον occur nowhere except in Paul's own letters and other writings closely affiliated with them (Luke, 1 Peter, Hebrews). The technical term by way of eminence for the expression of this doctrine, ἀπολυτρωσις, occurs seven times in Paul and but three times elsewhere (Hebrews, twice; Luke, once). From another point of view, however, it deserves to be called a generally apostolic doctrine. It is rooted in distinct teachings of our Lord Himself. It is found clearly enunciated in the whole series of Paul's letters, from Galatians to Titus. It has a place also in the Epistle to the Hebrews, both Epistles of Peter, and the Book of Revelation. Its outlines are so sharply etched in by a touch here and a touch there, as allusion to it is added to allusion, that they cannot be obscured. It is not a doctrine merely of 'moral reform' or even of 'moral revolution,' although it includes in it an effective provision for moral regeneration. It is not a doctrine of 'deliverance from the world,' although again it counts deliverance from the world among its most valued effects. It is not merely a doctrine of deliverance from sin, conceived as a power, although it provides for deliverance from the power of sin. It is most particularly not a doctrine of deliverance from the powers of evil under whose dreadful dominion 'this world' labours, although it is a doctrine of deliverance from bondage to Satan. It is specifically a doctrine of deliverance from the guilt and penalties of sin, with all that flows from this deliverance to the uttermost consequences. The function of Christ in it cannot be reduced to that of a teacher or of an example. It is presented rather as that of a substitute. He gives Himself, His life, His blood, and He gives it as a ransom-price to buy man out from the penalties he has incurred by sin, and thus to purchase for him newness of life. Parallel and intertwined with the doctrine of Christ our Sacrifice, this doctrine of Christ our Ransom is made thus a vehicle of that 'blood theology' which is the very heart of the entire teaching of the apostles, and which has given to Christianity its whole vitality in the world.

Julius Kaftan has made a particularly sustained effort to interpret the Christian doctrine of 'ransoming from sin' in terms of the general religious idea of 'deliverance from the world': Dogmatik, 1897, § 43; Die christliche Welt, xvi. [1902] 411 ff.; ZTK xiv. [1904] 273-355, reprinted in Zur Dogmatik, 1904, pp. 255-337; Jesús und Paulus, 1906, p. 30 ff.; ZTK xviii. [1905] 237-292. In connexion with Kaftan there should be consulted: W. Wrede, Paulus, 1904 (Eng. tr., 1907), to which Kaftan's Jesús und Paulus is an answer: Wrede, under the same terminology of 'deliverance from the world,' interprets Paul as teaching not, as Kaftan, a purely subjective, ethical 'redemption,' equivalent to regeneration, but an objective one, explained as deliverance from the evil spirits and demons which dominate the world, a notion repeated in H. B. Carré, Paul's Doctrine of Redemption, 1914. See also Max Reischle, Die christliche Welt, xvii. [1903] 10 ff., 28 ff., 51 ff., 76 ff., and 93 ff., the last of which is a criticism of Kaftan. Reischle's articles discuss, under the title of 'Erlösung,' the general religious doctrine of 'deliverance,' and in connexion with them should be read E. Nagel, Das Problem der Erlösung: eine religionsphilosophische, philosophiegeschichtliche und kritische Untersuchung, 1901. There seems to be nothing in English which covers the ground of Nagel's book; but cf. H. O. Taylor, Deliverance, 1915. Josef Wirtz, Die Lehre von der Apolytrosis. Untersucht nach den heiligen Schriften und den griechischen Schriftstellern bis auf Origenes einschliesslich, 1906, deals very slightly with the biblical material, and, for the rest, investigates the history of the Patristic doctrine of ransoming from Satan.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

RED SEA.—The passage of the Red Sea with the destruction of Pharaoh's army was one of the great miracles of Jewish history which the people loved to recall. There are three distinct references to this event in the NT. In Ac 7³⁶ St. Stephen mentions it as manifesting the glory of Moses. In He 11²⁹ it is referred to as a striking instance of what faith can do. But the chief reference is in 1 Co 10¹⁻², where St. Paul, in warning the Corinthians of the danger of neglecting their Christian benefits, quotes Israel's escaping from Egypt as an illustration. Of several great benefits bestowed by God on His people Israel one was that they all passed through the Sea; while a second was that they were all baptized in the Sea as followers of Moses. But all their great benefits did not save them when they afterwards became disobedient. St. Paul here conceives the passage through the Red Sea to have been an initiatory rite like baptism (see G. G. Findlay, EGT, '1 Corinthians,' 1900, p. 857).

REED (κάλαμος, Heb. קנה=Eng. 'cane').—The 'reed like a staff' (κάλαμος ὅμοιος ῥάβδῳ) which St. John used for measuring the temple of God (Rev 11¹) was probably the arundo donax, which flourishes especially in the Jordan Valley, growing in marshy brakes to a height of 15 to 20 ft. and strong enough to be used as a walking-stick (Ezk 29⁶, Is 36⁶). Being straight and light, this reed served also as the most convenient measuring-rod (Ezk 40⁵), and as a definite measure it was 6½ cubits long=about 9 ft. (Liddell and Scott, s.v.). The New Jerusalem was measured by an angel who had for a measure a golden reed (Rev 21^{15, 16}).

REFORMATION (διορθωσις).—This word—fraught with so much significance in the history of Christendom—occurs only once in the English Bible. The passage is He 9¹⁰, in which the writer, speaking of the ordinances of the First Covenant, says that they are 'carnal ordinances, imposed until a time of reformation' (RV). The time of reformation referred to is the period of the New Covenant, described in He 8¹³ by a quotation from Jer 31^{31, 34}. The inauguration of it by the offering of Christ is set forth in He 9¹¹, where His perfect sacrifice of Himself is contrasted with the annual sacrifices of the older dispensation.

It is from an Old Testament point of view that this title is bestowed on the Christian era. Other aspects of that era, from the same point of view, are indicated by the words 'regeneration' (παλιγγενεσία, Mt 19²⁸) and 'restoration' (ἀποκατάστασις, Ac 3²¹).

The aspect of 'reformation' is complementary to these, and involves a necessary element. It was when Christ, the 'High Priest of the good things to come,' appeared that all defects inherent in the ancient system were remedied. The numerous ineffectual sacrifices were replaced by the one perfect Sacrifice; the veil was taken away. Religion became less a matter of mechanical routine, and more a matter of rational spiritual service.

The corresponding Greek word διόρθωσις is equally unique in biblical usage. Except in He 9¹⁰ it does not occur in the Greek Bible. It is fairly common in later Greek in the general sense of 'amendment' or 'correction.' Aristotle so uses it with reference to laws and constitutions (Pol. III. i. 5, VII. i. 9). Polybius employs it of the rectification of things that have mischanced or gone amiss (v. lxxxviii. 2, vi. xxxviii. 4). The corresponding verb διορθοῦν is used in the LXX of amending one's ways (cf. Jer 7³⁻⁵, Wis 9¹⁸).

DAWSON WALKER.

REGENERATION.—Introductory.—A study of the NT idea of regeneration does not mean, of course, simply an examination of the passages in which that particular metaphor occurs, but a consideration of the theory which the NT writers held as to the nature of the experiences which they found in themselves and in their converts. These experiences did not take place in a vacuum, but in a world in which supernatural religion was an intensely significant interest. No movement can ever be so original that it is entirely independent of the ideas and conditions of its day. However new it may be in its spirit, it will inevitably clothe itself in the familiar forms of human speech and conduct, even though it give to them a wholly new significance. In the time of Jesus, people believed already in a Divine power which would make them fit for an immortality of bliss. They thought of the necessary transformation as a death and resurrection, as a new birth, as a purification. If the totality of the utterances of later Judaism and of the non-Christian religions be considered, it is probable that we should regard the conditions of the new life which they present as, for the most part, unethical, external, magical. But when the finest of these utterances are read with due appreciation, it must be recognized that they have a large ethical meaning.* The gospel of regeneration was not a striking novelty either to the Jewish or to the pagan world, and if the condition of regeneration were simply stated as a belief that Jesus was the Messiah, the Son of God, it might seem quite consonant with the common faith of the time. And this was probably so much the case that one of the great problems before the creative personalities of Christianity, who were passionately inculcating a spiritual faith, was to put ethical content into those supernatural conceptions of the new religion with which the people were all too easily satisfied. It is probable, therefore, that we shall have to look for the highest meaning of regeneration as conceived by the apostles, not so much in those miraculous aspects which have generally attracted attention, important as these are in NT thought, but rather in what was added of real ethical quality to the conceptions that otherwise might have been largely external and magical.

So far as Judaism is concerned, it has always been recognized that early Christianity formed itself against the background of the great faith that had come from the OT, and it has latterly been quite generally recognized that the background of NT theology is also that apocalyptic Messianism that had come to such elaborate development at the time. The continuity of revelation which has been thought of between the OT and the NT has made it easy for us to think of Christianity as accepting the language, the metaphors, and many of the externals of Judaism, giving to them a larger significance. But it is necessary also to realize that Christianity was able to take over the whole schema of apocalypticism by simply putting Jesus as the expected Messiah. The conditions for a doctrine of regeneration were then complete. Current Judaism made sharp distinction between the present age under the dominion of Satan and the coming age when the Messiah would be in power. Among the most glorious expectancies regarding the Messiah were the supernatural endowments that He would bestow upon His people. And there was not wanting the ethical expectation that sin would be pardoned, and a great era of righteousness would ensue. If, then, Jesus were the Messiah already manifested, crucified for sin, raised from the dead, coming again in glory, empowered to bestow an earnest of the gifts of the coming age, a supernatural new life would, of course, be possible. The believer in those redemptive facts would be translated from the Kingdom of Satan to that of Messiah. He would receive salvation, he would become a child of God, he would be miraculously re-born (a phrase already probably used of proselytes), and he would obtain the gift of the Spirit with its miraculous effects. It is evident that there is here a possibility either of the highest ethical motive or of confidence in a mere magical salvation. The whole spiritual quality of the new faith depended upon the degree in which the acceptance of Jesus became a moral power in human lives. If regeneration gave men a sure status, guaranteeing that they would be pardoned in the coming Judgment, so that they might live secure in having made comfortable provision for the future, then the whole supernaturalism would be in vain. If, on the other hand, it inspired them to be worthy to reign with Christ, it would have the highest moral quality. The great NT passages are concerned not with a definition of regeneration, but with entreaties and exhortations to live the new life which had been so Divinely bestowed.

But not only in Judaism was there a background for the doctrine of regeneration. The researches of recent years compel us to recognize that there were widespread hopes and expectancies of new life among the people who had felt the influence of the great mystery-religions.* And these were not national and racial, as were those of the Jews, but personal. The individual could be saved through a purification, this sometimes seeming to be ethical, perhaps more often ceremonial. There was intense interest in personal immortality, and a belief that the way to this salvation and immortality was that of initiation into the mysteries, involving mystic communion with the god. The very metaphor of the new birth was in all probability employed, indicating the attainment of a new status and the possibility of miraculous charismata. Indeed, it is not without significance that the word 'regeneration' is not used in the great NT passages. Its only occurrence as applied to the individual is Tit 3⁵, a passage of very doubtful Pauline authenticity, where the most obvious interpretation is that salvation is effected by baptism. Is it possible that the word had so sacramental a significance that it was better avoided by those who were insisting upon an actual ethical renewal? With the triumph of sacramentalism in the Church the word attained its technical value.* Of course the documents that present these ideas so fully belong for the most part to a period not earlier than the end of the 2nd cent. A.D., and it is possible to maintain that they have been coloured by Christianity. But the essential doctrines of the mystery-religions could not have been so soon completely metamorphosed. Clemen (Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, p. 231), in a very careful examination of the material, recognizes the priority in the mystery-religions of many of the redemptive doctrines, and these not without ethical character. So far as regeneration is concerned, he believes that even the γεννηθῆναι ἀνωθεν (Jn 3³) might be so derived. He thinks also that the mention in the Naassenic sermon of a πνευματική, ἐπουράνιος, ἀνω γένεσις, in which the reference is to the Eleusinian mysteries, may well indicate a general influence, at least upon the Christian phraseology. This is not to say that Christianity borrowed its ideas from paganism at the same time that it felt the most intense revulsion against the idolatries, but only that certain common religious thought-forms concerning miraculous purifications and transformations were current, and Christianity inevitably expressed its own new-born faith in the language of the day. If, then, in the non-Jewish world Jesus was proclaimed as the Son of God, who had become incarnate, had died the sacrificial death, had risen from the dead and ascended into heaven, was coming again to give immortality to His followers, it would be quite in accord with the religious ideas of the time to believe that an acceptance of these redemptive facts would constitute one a child of God, and would avail to secure the gifts of the Spirit, which would be the attestation of having passed from death unto life. And, again, as among the Jews, it would be possible to accept such a doctrine in a wholly external way, making the salvation process merely miraculous. There was, of course, the other glorious possibility that those who believed themselves saved from sin and translated into eternal life by the loving acceptance of the grace of God in Jesus Christ would be actually impelled by new ethical motive, and would manifest the moral, as well as the miraculous, fruits of the Spirit. This was the experience of the NT writers themselves, and it is to this new life of love and moral endeavour that they exhort their readers.

* Reitzenstein's comparison of the NT with these is, however, significant: 'the tremendous seriousness with which guilt and atonement are preached is, so far as I can discover, lacking in Hellenism' (Poimandres, p. 180, n. 1).

* See art. MYSTERY, MYSTERIES.

The basis for a doctrine of regeneration is therefore to be found in the sacramentalism of both Judaism and the mystery-cults. And the NT writers believe in a miraculous change of status brought about at the moment of faith. But they always insist that this has no meaning unless a new moral life, governed by new motives, has actually resulted. And this is a practical nullification of the sacramental conception. It is further a nullification of the artificial distinction which later theology elaborated between regeneration and sanctification. In the effort to make a self-consistent theology all the passages which referred to the miraculous change of status were used for a doctrine of regeneration, and those which referred to the ethical agency of the Spirit for one of sanctification. There was thus developed the idea that regeneration produced a complete change of nature, an idea which neither common human experience nor scientific psychology supports. The NT writers, far more concerned with the facts of experience than with the formulation of a self-consistent theology, developed no such theory. To them regeneration was always a moral fact. Hence the idea of the regeneration of infants, very easily held by those who believe in the possibility of a supernatural change of nature, does not appear in the NT. The reason for this will be noted in the discussion of 1 John.

The examination of the NT documents may well begin with Jesus' teaching in the Synoptics, then proceed to the Book of Acts as presenting the external manifestations of the early Christian experience with the interpretations that were current in the Church, and then to the writings that more clearly express the personal contributions of the great spiritual leaders.

1. The Synoptics.—The idea of regeneration, strictly so called, does not appear in the words of Jesus in the Synoptic tradition. This is significant at once of the faithfulness of the tradition and of Jesus' own extraordinary originality. The παλιγγενεσία of Mt 19²⁸ is, of course, the Messianic consummation. But neither here, nor in any other passage that refers to the Kingdom of God in apocalyptic fashion, is there any statement of a miraculous change of status of the individual. The saying of John the Baptist that the Coming One shall baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mt 3¹¹, Lk 3¹⁶) implies the supernaturalism of the charismata, but Jesus' own words have to do with the simplicity of a religious experience within the reach of all who fulfil the ethical conditions of thorough-going repentance (Mt 18³) and heroic, sacrificial choice of the higher values (10³⁹ 11²⁸, 16²⁴, 18³⁴). Of course God Himself reveals truth to the obedient soul (16¹⁷), but there is no natural incapacity for righteousness. Men can become sons of their Father if they will (5⁴⁵). The striking figure used of the Prodigal, who was alive after being morally dead, is only a strong expression of the happy result when the foolish sinner 'came to himself.'

2. The Book of Acts.—That the specific metaphor of regeneration had not been theologized in the primitive Church is evident from the entire absence of the figure from this book. The only reference to men as the children of God is the quotation from the Greek poet (17²⁸). However, there is here the essentially similar idea, as throughout the NT, that the saved man is one who has received the gift of the Holy Spirit. He is Divinely possessed. He may be so carried out of himself by the supernatural enthusiasm that he appears to on-lookers as drunk (2¹³); more generally he has the miraculous power of uttering ecstatic sounds (speaking with tongues, 2⁴ 10⁴⁶ 19⁶), and declaring his faith in exuberant public speech (prophesying, 11²⁸ 19⁶ 21⁹, 10); while those especially endowed may work miracles (2⁴³ 4³⁰ 5¹² 8¹³ 14³). This gift of the Holy Spirit, with its wonderful manifestations, is the distinguishing mark of the Christian (2³⁸, 3⁵ 5³² 8¹⁷ 10⁴⁴ 13³ 19⁶). The schema of the new religion is clearly set forth; Jesus is the Messiah (2³⁶ 5⁴²), predicted in the Scriptures (7³² 8³⁵ 13⁴⁷), attested by the Resurrection (2³² 10⁴¹ 13³⁸ 26²³); acceptance of Him as such is the basis of salvation (4¹² 10⁴³ 13³⁹); but there must be also a very definite repentance, not merely for having crucified the Messiah (2³⁸), but a turning from iniquities (3²⁶), and from darkness to light (26¹⁸), and this is to be followed by works worthy of repentance (26²⁰); baptism follows on repentance and seems to have a sacramental efficacy (βαπτισθῆτω . . . εἰς ἄφεσιν τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ὑμῶν, 2³⁸; βάπτισαι καὶ ἀπολῶσαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας σου, 22¹⁶). As regards baptism, it is noteworthy that Cornelius and his company are accepted of God and receive the gift of the Holy Spirit before they are baptized (10⁴⁴, 47), though in every other case the gift of the Spirit is subsequent to baptism.

* For a careful study of the word παλιγγενεσία see art. 'Regeneration' in HDB, by J. Vernon Bartlett, and for its use in the mystery-religions see Reitzenstein, Poimandres, and Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, s.v. παλιγγενεσία in Index.

Finally, those who are thus saved and endowed are ordained unto eternal life (13^{46, 48}), the blessed inheritance of the future (26¹⁸). While it is evident that much of this programme would be entirely familiar to the world of the mystery-religions, the peculiar power of primitive Christianity was manifest in its fine moral glow and its gracious charities, as well as in its religious enthusiasm. And this story of the early Church reveals, on the one hand, an utter absence of those coarser elements, from which the mystery-cults, whatever may have been their philosophical refinements, never freed themselves, and, on the other hand, a positive moral power resulting from glad allegiance to the Historical Founder of Christianity, such as was never accorded to the mythical founders of the other religions of the time.

3. The Pauline writings.—The central passage for St. Paul's thought on the experience of regeneration is Ro 6-8. It is evidently autobiographical in fact as well as in rhetorical form, and is a wonderful piece of self-revelation. It is a classic of religious experience, and yields in a most interesting way to clear psychological interpretation. The passage exhibits what the experience of regeneration really is in the case of such persons as are conscious of what has been called 'the divided self.' It is the case, familiar enough in some form to most of us, where all one's ethical ideals reinforced by education lead in one direction, while the strength of many habits and even of primitive instinct (if ἐπιθυμία in 7⁵ is to be understood as 'lust') impel one in another direction. When attention is concentrated upon duty, a man acts according to his sense of higher values; when impulse determines his conduct, he is false to his better knowledge. And so, in spite of longings and endeavours after moral victory, defeat is the constant result. To the earnest Pharisee the terrible impasse is reached, that he wants to be righteous but he cannot (7²¹⁻²⁴): he must actually do what he hates (7¹⁵). Some new idea with very high emotional quality is essential to secure the concentration of attention on the nobler course of conduct. This comes to St. Paul in his conversion experience. He feels himself thereupon released from the thrall of the lower self and empowered to live in the higher self. The new idea has the emotive power necessary to make his ethical ideals actually attainable, and so he comes into the experience of the peace of the unified self (7^{24, 25}; cf. 5¹). An element of this new idea that has strong emotional value is the belief that there awaits the victor in the conflict an eternity of splendid peace in the full enjoyment of all those experiences for which now he must contend so hardly (8¹³⁻¹⁷). This creates a condition distinctly favourable for pursuing lines of conduct conducive to the desired end. The transformation has thus taken place, that ethical ideals are no longer merely intellectually conceived, but have gained an emotional quality that renders the inhibition of contrary tendencies easy and natural (8⁻). Of course under strong provocation the old impulses to wrong conduct would revive, and sometimes so strongly as to overcome the new inhibitions and pass over into action. But the experience of victory and unity would be so vivid that this re-emergence of the divided self would be painful, the new desirable lines of conduct would renew their hold upon the attention, the inhibitions would regain their sway, and peace would again ensue. (This involves an interpretation of 7⁷⁻²⁵ as a continuous experience, and not merely a post-conversion memory.)

St. Paul's own interpretation of this regeneration experience is based on the antagonism between the σάρξ and the πνεῦμα. Whether his psychology involves an actual anthropological dualism it is perhaps not necessary to decide. He was probably not conscious of attempting a philosophical explanation, but was using the currently conceived antagonism between flesh and spirit to express the fact of his own experience and observation. The resolution of the antagonism is to St. Paul a Divine miracle of grace (7²⁵). The flesh is gaining the victory, but the Divine Spirit comes to the reinforcement of the human spirit and overcomes the flesh. St. Paul conceives the πνεῦμα θεοῦ as an actual external power coming to the aid of the believer, as a donation to be received (8¹⁵; cf. 2 Co 12³, Eph 1¹³ 4³⁰). It is difficult here to follow him exactly because we are not sure of his psychology, but it is not at all difficult to arrive at his practical purpose. He is not so much concerned to explain the religious experience of the Christian, except to ascribe it to the power of God, as he is to insist that it must be a moral experience, involving necessarily the active moral endeavour of the believer. The passage is primarily hortatory, only incidentally doctrinal. St. Paul knows that eternal vigilance has been the condition of his own moral victory, God-given though he believes it to be, and he is anxious for his readers not to fail of victory by any easy acceptance of an external salvation.

The four rich metaphors of this passage, of which regeneration is not one, are all employed with this hortatory aim. (1) Death and resurrection.—Under the symbol of baptism, the believer is pictured as dead and risen again, in order to enforce the obligation of living in newness of life (6³⁻¹¹). (2) Change of masters.—The figure of the bondservant is used to press the alternative that we belong either to sin or to righteousness. Our conduct determines which is master (6¹⁶ 23). (3) Remarriage of a widow.—Just as a widow assumes a new loyalty when she marries a new husband, so are we free from the old sense of moral obligations and under the highest necessity of being true to the new (7¹⁻⁶). (4) Legal adoption of children.—The most significant figure of adoption is employed to indicate a new relationship to God attested by the presence of the Divine Spirit, enabling the believer to call God his Father. But this is all dependent upon actual life in the Spirit (or in the spirit, conceived as the higher human nature) (8¹²⁻¹⁷). The Apostle is peculiarly careful that these metaphors shall not be pushed to an unethical conclusion. He sees the danger in his own day, which was fully realized in the history of the doctrine of regeneration. If any reader assumes that, having been baptized, he is therefore dead to the old life, St. Paul is not afraid to present to him the paradox, that the man who has died to the flesh and is thus released from its bondage (6^{6, 7} 8¹⁰) is still to go on putting to death the doings of the body (8¹³). In close juxtaposition he speaks of a definite bestowal of the Spirit (αορίστ ἐλάβετε, 8¹⁸), with a constitution of the status of adoption, and of a relationship to God contingent on an ever-present obedience (δοῦναι ἁγνοῦν, 8¹⁴). So the new life of the Christian is at the same time an ethical achievement and a supernatural gift. St. Paul does not carefully distinguish between these. They are merged in any vital religious experience, so that the regenerate man is the one who is in the actual experience of living the new life of moral victory (8⁹).

Entirely in keeping with Ro 6-8 are all St. Paul's references to the new spiritual life. He assumes that it has had a miraculous beginning (note his use of the past tense: δικαιωθέντες, ἐλευθερωθέντες, κληθέντες, ἡγιασμένοι), but he lays the emphasis upon the ethical endeavour, which alone can make the potential actual. Thus in Ro 12³, using the word ἀνακάλυψις, very near akin to the idea of regeneration, he calls upon his readers to make a complete change for the better. Sanday-Headlam (ICC, 'Romans' 5, 1902) paraphrase, 'do not adopt the external and fleeting fashion of this world, but be ye transformed in your inmost nature.' Denney (EGT, 'Romans,' 1900) says that the process would in modern language be rather sanctification than regeneration, but that the latter is assumed. Would it not be nearer to the Apostle's thought, as to his experience, to say that he regards the process of spiritual renewal as one bestowed by God through faith, but rendered significant and vital only by continued faithfulness? To the Colossians he affirms in repeated metaphors a definite change that has been effected by Divine agency: a translation from the kingdom of evil to the Kingdom of Christ (1¹³), a reconciliation from alien enmity (1²¹⁻²²), a death and resurrection with Christ (2²⁰ 3¹⁻³), an unclothing and reclothing (3⁹⁻¹⁰). But the reconciliation is dependent on continuance in the faith (1²³); the members of the dead man are to be put to death (3⁵); and the new man is to be renewed (3¹⁰). In the last passage the equivalent word for regeneration (ανακαινισμενον) is clearly used in the sense of process as in 2 Co 4¹⁶, where the contrast is between the loosening hold upon physical life and the growing sense of spiritual reality. To the Ephesians St. Paul writes in the most absolute terms of a fore-ordained adoption as sons (1⁵) and of salvation as a free gift (2⁸), and the metaphor of the new life is a resurrection (2¹⁻⁵⁻⁶), not as in Romans a dying and rising with Christ, which is merely a bold use of the symbol of baptism, but a resurrection to new life of a nature so corrupt as to be regarded as morally dead. And yet the splendid description of Divinely given salvation is only an argument for a realization of an actual moral renewal, progressively to take place: putting away the old man, putting on the new, being renewed (ανακαινισθαι) in the spirit of their minds (4¹⁻²³). The same paradox, though with a change of metaphor, appears in 5⁸.

4. The Epistle to the Hebrews.—The figure of regeneration is not used in this document. Christians are called sons of God and brethren of Christ, but are not said to have been made so. When they are called the sons whom Jesus brings unto glory (2¹⁰) the antithesis is not between sons of God and the unregenerate, but between the mortal humanity of the sons whose likeness Jesus took and the immortal glory of His own proper estate which they shall share. And in the consciousness of sonship that is gained through suffering (12⁸) the antithesis is between uncared-for children who receive no correction and those beloved who are the objects of paternal discipline. However, the initial Christian experience as a definite change of attitude and relationship is very clearly expressed. It is an enlightenment (10⁵), a tasting of the heavenly gift (of forgiveness), a reception of the Holy Spirit, a tasting of the good word of God, and of the powers of the age to come (i.e. a foretaste of the blessed experiences that the expected Messianic Age would bring) (6⁴⁻⁵). This experience is elaborated in many passages of the Epistle and is represented as produced by Divine power. The blood of Christ cleanses the conscience from sin, and makes it possible for the man of faith to serve the living God (9¹⁴ 10²²). The blood of the covenant is that which sanctifies (sanctification being here equivalent to regeneration) (10²²). Baptism symbolizes (or perhaps effects) the cleansing (10²²). The Holy Spirit is bestowed as a gift (2⁴). Indeed, salvation would seem to be altogether miraculous when it is said that by one offering God hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified (10¹⁴). And yet the purpose of the Epistle is to warn against apostasy, and to insist that all the blessedness of the new life is only a potentiality to be realized by faithfulness. The great passage (6⁴⁻⁶) which enumerates all that has been done for the believer is written for the sake of the conclusion that if apostasy follows such blessedness there is no further hope. If we hold fast, we belong to Christ (3⁹), and are partakers of Christ (3¹⁴). We shall not escape if we turn away (12²³), and if we sin wilfully after being enlightened there is no further means of salvation (10²⁶). Thus, although the new religious experience is Divinely bestowed and sustained (12²) and perfected (13²⁰⁻²¹), it is not magical and sacramental, but dependent upon ethical striving and continued faithfulness.

5. The Catholic Epistles.—In the Epistle of James the idea of regeneration is connected with the coming Messianic Age: believers are Divinely brought forth (απεκνησεν) as firstfruits of the new order (1¹⁸). In another figure the dualism between this world and the Divine order is indicated, when God's people are represented as joined to Him by a marriage vow so that 'the friendship of the world is an adultery' (4⁴). Yet, while this Epistle recognizes miraculous salvation, it distinctly affirms that religion can be defined only in ethical terms (1²⁶⁻²⁷), and lays careful emphasis on justification by works (2¹⁴⁻²⁶).

1 Peter is full of the exultant expression of a rich religious experience. The metaphor of regeneration appears several times. It is used to express the utterly new life which belongs to the person who has attained a hope of resurrection and heavenly glory (αναγεννησας, 1³). Again, Christians are said to be begotten again (αναγεννημένοι) to a new life of brotherly love, the moral quality of the regeneration being very marked (1³⁻²³). And, with expansion of the figure, the new-born babe is urged to desire the fitting nourishment for producing the maturity of salvation (2⁻). St. Paul's great figure of death and resurrection is employed to indicate that union with Christ means a death to sins and a life unto righteousness (2²⁴).

In 2 Peter the new life is separated from the old by a καθαρισμός (1⁹). It is described as an escape from the corruptions of the world (1⁴ 2²⁰). Christians thus become 'partakers of the divine nature' (1⁴). This is effected through knowledge (επιγνωσις) of God (1²⁻³) and of Christ (1²⁻⁸ 2²⁰ 3¹⁸). But if, in spite of this redemptive knowledge, there should be a return to the defilements of the world, salvation is lost and 'the last state is become worse with them than the first' (2²⁰). The Epistle is throughout strongly ethical.

6. The Johannine literature.—The purpose of the Gospel of John is definitely stated in the conclusion (20³¹) to be a demonstration that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, in order that men might believe and have life in His name. Life is the key-word of the Gospel. This is more than a hope of immortality, which of course it includes (6³⁰ 14⁹). It seems to imply a certain rich and exuberant experience as a result of the indwelling of the Spirit. One becomes, as it were, a perennial spring of spiritual vitality (4¹⁴ 7³⁸). It is an experience of spiritual apprehension (8⁴), of walking in light and not in darkness (8¹). The object of salvation is that one shall live to the full, abundantly (10¹⁰). It may be doubted whether our modern social interpretations of the abundant life were in the mind of the writer, but he evidently referred to an exultant sense of the glorious worthfulness of being a child of God, superior to worldly circumstance, possessed of the Spirit, with miraculous powers, and certain of a glorious future. This new life is so different from ordinary mundane life that very naturally the metaphor of regeneration is used to explain it. As our human begetting by the will of man bestows upon us common life, so the Divine begetting gives us life eternal (1¹⁸). The antithesis is clear: one is either regenerate or not (3⁹). The conversation with Nicodemus affords the opportunity for presenting the doctrine. The Kingdom of God comes not by natural heritage even to a Jewish Rabbi, but by supernatural bestowment. It is mysterious as the incalculable winds, but is inevitable and essential (3⁸). The condition of this regeneration is a belief that Jesus is the Messiah, Son of God; for what is definitely stated in the prologue (1¹¹⁻¹³) is implied in the believing unto eternal life (3¹⁵). Regeneration as thus presented might seem to be the mere change of status with miraculous charismata in consequence of an external act of homage, which the pagan heart would so well understand. But faith is not an external act in this Gospel. He that doeth the truth cometh to the light (3²¹); he that is willing to do the will of God gains experiential evidence of the truth of the gospel (7¹⁷). And the great central teaching of the last discourse of Jesus is fundamentally ethical. The figure changes from regeneration to that of the branch in the vine. The question is not whether the branch is in the vine, but whether it bears fruit, failing which it is cast forth and burned (15²). And the fruit is love (15¹²). So the test of regeneration is the actual experience of love of the brethren, the actual fulfilment of the commandment of Christ. Belief, then, through which comes regeneration, is not an intellectual assent, but a passionate loyalty, rich in ethical impulse, and a continuous experience.

1 John has the same theme as the Gospel, but the treatment is more homiletic. The conditions are peculiarly favourable to the definition of a doctrine of regeneration, for the letter is evidently written to a Christian community or communities, in which many must belong to the second or third generation of believers, and therefore would not have experienced the decided change involved in a conversion from heathenism. The silence of the NT upon the matter of the regeneration of children is interesting in view of the large place which it has held in subsequent theological discussion. In the NT, however, regeneration is always dependent upon faith. The children would, of course, receive such instruction as would enable them to believe. Both the Jewish and the Greek world were thoroughly familiar with the idea of a coming of age at puberty, and the children probably received the baptism which was the seal of their faith at that time. The figure of regeneration had not been so thoroughly theologized that the question whether or not children were regenerate would arise. The silence of the NT is an assumption that the children of believers were candidates for salvation. But a religion dependent on instruction might easily become merely formal. And it is such a situation that this Epistle presupposes. It is addressed to the Christian community (5¹³), to fathers who have long known the truth, to young men who are conquering evil (2¹³⁻¹⁴), all of whom have received the gift of the Spirit, which is an abiding enlightenment (2²⁷). The writer identifies them with himself in the absoluteness of salvation — 'we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one' (5¹⁹). And yet the distinctive emphasis of the Epistle is upon regeneration as a moral experience rather than as a religious status. When the author says, 'whosoever believeth is begotten of God' (5¹), he is stating the fact which any primitive Christian would have understood. But with equal emphasis he insists that 'everyone that doeth righteousness is begotten of him' (2²⁹), and again that 'everyone that loveth is begotten of God' (4⁷). He does not say that we know that we have passed from death unto life because we have been baptized, but because we have the Spirit (4¹³), and the evidence of this is love of the brethren (4¹²⁻¹³). The ethical quality of regeneration is still more emphatically stated — 'whatsoever is begotten of God doeth no sin' (3⁹⁻¹⁰). Thus mankind is divided into children of God and children of the devil, each living according to the paternal nature that is in them (3⁸⁻¹⁰). Of course this is stated in absolute terms, and the correction is at hand: 'if we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves,' etc. (1⁸⁻¹⁰). It is St Paul's fine paradox again: we are children of God by supernatural creation; the Divine seed is in us; what is Divine cannot sin; therefore the believer does not sin in his own proper nature, and if he does sin he seeks and finds forgiveness. And the paradox is true to the real religious experience. But sacramentalism is avoided, and the whole conception of regeneration is ethicized by the warning against confidence in a formal regeneration which does not manifest itself in new life. The regenerate life is an exultant and abiding love to God and the brethren (4^{12-13, 16}), and if this is absent there is no regeneration at all (1⁸⁻⁹).

REJECTION.—Rejection is an idea expressed by more than one word in the NT. (1) ἀποδοκιμάζειν, which means 'to reject after trial,' is used of our Lord in His own Person (Mk 8³¹, Lk 9-17²³), and of our Lord as 'the stone which the builders rejected' (Mt 21⁴², Mk 12¹⁰, Lk 20¹⁷, 1 P 2⁴⁻⁷, in all these places quoted from Ps 117 (118)—, although St. Luke, in reporting St. Peter's words in Ac 4¹¹, uses of the rejected stone ἐξουθενήεις), and of Esau (He 12¹⁷); (2) ἀποβάλλειν (in the forms ἀποβλην, 1 Ti 4⁴, and ἀποβολή, Ac 27²², Ro 11¹⁵) and (3) ἀπωθεῖσθαι (Ac 7³⁹⁻⁴⁰, 13⁴⁸, Ro 11¹⁻², 1 Ti 1¹⁹) are used in a general sense in most of the references.

In the references to Romans, (2) and (3) are employed in the special sense of the rejection of Israel to make way for the Gentiles as recipients of the gospel. It was a cause of deep distress (Ro 9²⁻³) to St. Paul that God's chosen people whom He foreknew seemed to be rejected, and it was taken by opponents as a reflexion upon his apostleship that Israel as a nation rejected his gospel. But St. Paul did not admit the final rejection of Israel. 'Did God cast off his people (μη ἀπωσατο ὁ θεὸς τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ, 11)? God forbid. . . . God did not cast off his people which he foreknew.' He then proceeds to show that Israel's rejection is not final, and does not exclude individual members of the chosen race from the acceptance of gospel blessing. But Israel itself as a nation rejects the gospel (Ac 13⁴⁶) in order that the offer of it may be made to the Gentiles, who had no hereditary claim to it and were not even seeking it (Ro 10²⁰).

The unbelief or disobedience of Israel is noted by St. Peter (1 P 2³), who points out also, in language as strong as St. Paul's, that Israel's stumbling and rejection had a place in God's great purpose in the salvation of men 'whereunto they were appointed.' This is a great mystery which St. Paul sets forth (Ro 11²⁵), but in Gentile communities and under the conditions of Gentile life, the gospel had scope for world-wide extension and universal acceptance which were not possible among the Jewish people. Such, however, is the inherent genius of the Jewish people for religion that when they mark the blessedness and joy of Christian believers and the manifestations of grace in those who bear the name of Christ, they will be stirred up to seek as their own the righteousness and holiness manifested in the lives of Christians. 'And so all Israel shall be saved' and their election at the first upheld, seeing that the gifts and calling of God are incapable of being revoked (vv. 25-29). 'Did they stumble that they might fall?' asks the Apostle. 'God forbid: but by their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles. . . . For if the casting away of them (ἡ ἀποβολὴ αὐτῶν) is the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?' (vv. 11-15).

THOMAS NICOL.

RELIGION.—The uses of the word 'religion' in the apostolic writings may be classified under three heads.

1. In Gal 1¹³, Ἰουδαϊσμός is twice translated 'the Jews' religion.' St. Paul reminds the Galatians that they had heard of his manner of life aforetime when he followed Judaism, and that they knew his proficiency in Judaism. In this context the literal rendering 'Judaism' is to be preferred, for the factious rather than the religious aspect of Judaism is prominent. The EV 'Jews' religion' is an 'unfortunate' translation, because 'it implies a definite separation between the two religions which did not then exist, . . . and it puts this view into the mouth of Paul, who steadfastly persisted in identifying the faith of Christ with the national religion. . . . Here Ἰουδαϊσμός denotes Jewish partisanship, and accurately describes the bitter party spirit which prompted Saul to take the lead in the martyrdom of Stephen and the persecution of the Church. . . . He advanced beyond his fellows in sectarian prejudice and persecuting zeal' (F. Rendall, in EGT, 'Galatians,' London, 1903, p. 153 f.).

2. The Greek adjective δεδωδαίων is rendered in Ac 17²² 'superstitious' (RV) and 'religious' (RVm). The derivative noun δεδωδαϊσμός is rendered in Ac 25¹⁹ 'religion' (RV) and 'superstition' (RVm). The dominant meaning of the words in classical Greek is 'due reverence of the gods,' but in the 1st cent. A.D. they had a depreciatory sense and signified 'excessive fear of the gods' (cf. E. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, Oxford, 1889, p. 45). It does not, however, follow that 'religion' is an impossible rendering in the address of Festus to the Jewish king, Agrippa, who paid outward deference to the Jewish religion. But although Felix is not likely to 'have used the term offensively . . . he may well have chosen the word because it was a neutral word (verbum μέσον, Bengel) and did not commit him to anything definite' (R. J. Knowling, in EGT, 'Acts,' London, 1901, p. 497). 'Superstitious' is more probably, though not certainly, the correct translation in Ac 17²². St. Paul was addressing Athenians, and they 'would instinctively recall the literary associations of the word. . . . In point of fact, the words ὡς δεδωδαίωνεστέροις give, in a form as little offensive as possible, St. Paul's view of Athenian idolatry already noticed by the historian (v. 16). The ὡς brings out the fact that the word δεδωδαίωνεστέροις expresses the speaker's own impression' (F. H. Chase, The Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, London, 1902, p. 213).

3. In Ac 26⁵ and Ja 1²⁶, 'religion' is the rendering of θρησκεία which in Col 2¹⁵ is translated 'worshipping.' The contemporary meaning of the word is religion in its external aspect—'cultus religiosus, potissimum externus' (Wilke-Grimm, Clavis Novi Test., 1868). It is appropriately used by St. Paul in his address to Agrippa (Ac 26⁵). Calling to remembrance his life as a Pharisee, the Apostle claims to have been 'a zealous and diligent performer . . . of the outward service of God' (R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, London, 1890, p. 175). In Ja 1²⁶, when the word is rightly understood, there is no support for those who disparage inward and spiritual religion, nor for those who so exalt its outward aspects as practically to identify it with morality and works of benevolence. What St. James asserts of such works is that they are 'the body, the θρησκεία, of which godliness, or the love of God, is the informing soul. . . . The apostle claims for the new dispensation a superiority over the old, in that its very θρησκεία consists in acts of mercy, of love, of holiness, in that it has light for its garment, its very robe being righteousness; herein how much nobler than that old, whose θρησκεία was at best merely ceremonial and formal, whatever inner truth it might embody' (R. C. Trench, op. cit. p. 176, who says, 'these observations are made by Coleridge, Aids to Reflection, 1825, p. 15').

REMISSION.—See FORGIVENESS.

REMNANT.—This word occurs only twice as a substantive in the English NT, both instances being in the Epistle to the Romans.

1. Ro 9²⁷, υπολειμμα (WH, ὑπολίμμα) with N*AB Ens. The TR reads κατάλειμμα with later authorities. The latter variant probably originated in the desire to make St. Paul's word correspond exactly with that of the passage in Is 10²², which he is here quoting from the LXX: 'And Isaiah crieth concerning Israel, If the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, it is the remnant that shall be saved' (LXX, τὸ κατάλειμμα αὐτῶν σωθήσεται).

The Apostle is expressing, in language adapted from the OT, his conviction that only a remnant of the Jews will be saved, a conviction forced upon him by the repeated experiences of his missionary journeys. This sad outlook on the immediate present is afterwards modified by his prophetic forecast of the ultimate return of the whole people, when 'all Israel shall be saved' (11²⁶).

The passage in Isaiah is one of central significance. The prophet is convinced that the Assyrians, the instruments of God's punishment, will overthrow not only Samaria but Jerusalem. As a State, Judah will be destroyed. The only survivors will be the 'remnant,' the group of true-hearted believers who submit to God's word spoken by the prophet. We have here for the first time the dissociation of the religious from the national life, the conception of a Church as free from political associations. Of this 'remnant' the prophet says that it 'shall return' (2:2). The LXX rendering, σωθήσεται, lends itself more directly to St. Paul's reference to the Messianic salvation. To show, as he does here, that not only the calling of the Gentiles, but also the partial rejection of the Jews, was foretold in the prophetic writings, was both a ground of assurance to himself and an effective answer to Jewish criticism.

2. Ro 11⁵, λείμμα (WH, λίμμα): 'Even so then at this present time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace.' The comparison here is with the 'seven thousand men' who during the religious persecution of Ahab's reign had not 'bowed the knee to Baal' (1 K 19¹⁸). The reference, as in 9²⁷, is to the small body of faithful believers who constituted the true Israel, in contrast with the recreant and disobedient majority.

The 'remnant' in the time of Elijah and that in the time of Isaiah are prototypes of the believing minority of Jews who accepted Jesus as the Messiah.

DAWSON WALKER.

REPENTANCE.—Repentance (μετάνοια) is one of two words used in the NT, both of which originally denoted a change of mind of any sort. It is so used, though only occasionally, in Thucydides, Plato, Polybius, etc., and the phrase locus penitentiae ('opportunity for a change of mind'; cf. τόπον μεταβολας, Wis 12¹⁰ and He 12¹⁷, both with a deeper religious meaning—for the latter passage see B. F. Westcott, Hebrews, 1889, in loc. cit.) is found in the Roman jurists. μετανοεῖν is common in the LXX; there, with παράκληθῆναι (cf. the use of ἄλως), it denotes change of mind or attitude, both in man and in God, as the translation of נִפְחַ (Niph), whose causative mood is used for bringing about the special change from sorrow to ease (e.g. Gn 6⁷, Ex 32¹⁻¹⁴, 1 Ch 21¹⁵, Jl 2¹⁵, 1 S 15²³ [cf. v. 11]). The noun is very rare in the LXX, occurring only in Pr 14¹⁵, Wis 11²³ 12^{10 19}, and Sir 44¹⁶ (ἐνώχ . . . ὑπόδειγμα μεταβολας). In the NT, a differentiation takes place: μεταμέλῃναι (which is also found in a few passages in the classics) is used for a general change of attitude or purpose (Mt 21^{30 27} and He 7²¹, a quotation from Ps 110⁴, the only reference to a change of mind in God in the NT, though cf. 2 Co 7⁹); μετάνοια and μετανοεῖν are used of a religious change of attitude to God and to sin, often occurring in the phrase μετάνοια ἀπὸ ἡμῶν. No such idea is found in classical Greek literature. It is commoner in Acts than in any other book of the NT. The earliest Christian preaching, as there described, involved the announcement of Jesus as the Messiah and the simple call for repentance in view of His near return (Ac 2³⁸ 3¹⁹ 8^{22 21}). This is equally true of the sermons of the original apostles and of St. Paul; in Ac 17³⁰, St. Paul tells the Athenians that God is summoning all to repentance, using the same phrase—ἀπαγγέλλειν μετανοεῖν—as he uses of his own action in 26²⁰. In essence, this is identical with the preaching of the Baptist (Ac 13^{24 19}; cf. Mt 3² and ¶s), except that the Baptist spoke of Jesus as coming, and of the Kingdom, or the Messiah, as at hand, while the apostles referred to Jesus as already come. How repentance is to be brought about is not stated. The imperative mood implies an act of human will, possible for all to whom the call comes. On the other hand, the apostles speak of Jesus as having been exalted by God as Captain and Saviour, to give repentance unto Israel, and remission of sins (Ac 5³¹); and the Christians in Jerusalem, hearing of the conversion of Cornelius, exclaim, 'Why, God has given repentance to the Gentiles' (Ac 11¹⁸; cf. Wis 12¹⁹). There is probably here no contradiction, though, if such existed, it might easily have been overlooked by the early preachers. Man could not be thought of as forced into repentance independently of his own will; but repentance is none the less made possible only through a dispensation of God's grace (cf. art. ATONEMENT, and 2 P 3⁹, where the Lord is said to will that all men should come to repentance). As in the preaching of the Baptist (Mt 3² and ¶s), repentance is expected to manifest itself in conduct (Ac 26²⁰).

The above passages show that repentance was an integral part of St. Paul's preaching; but references to repentance in the Pauline Epistles are very rare, though of great interest. The kindness of God leads to repentance (Ro 2⁴; a strikingly similar thought is also found in Ezk 36²⁶⁻²⁷, though in Ezk 6⁹ the impulse to repentance is attributed to a different cause; cf. the interesting passage Wis 12²⁷). The forbearance and mildness characteristic of the servant of God may lead to God's giving repentance to those who experience such treatment (2 Ti 2²⁵). In each case, the simple conception of Ac 5³¹ 11¹⁸, that repentance is an attitude induced or made possible by God, is at once elaborated and modified. There is no explicit reference here to the work of Christ; but, as in Ezekiel, the experience of blessings felt to be unmerited, or the shock of unmerited forbearance from Christian people, brings about a change of mind towards sin and God. With the foregoing, we may compare the simple statement in Clem. Rom. (Ep. ad Cor. i. 7) that from generation to generation the Master has given opportunity for repentance to those who wish to turn to Him.

How is this wish caused? Hitherto, we have met no reference in the NT to the 'godly sorrow' for sin emphasized by Ezekiel. In converts from heathenism there might be fear at a threatened catastrophe (cf. the Philippian jailer) but not sorrow. In one passage, however, St. Paul is led to develop very clearly the influence of sorrow for sin on believers. He is referring to the effect of his previous sharp rebuke on the Corinthian Church, which hitherto had refused to mourn for the presence of sin within its borders (1 Co 5²; cf. 12²⁰). He does not now regret (μεταμέλῃναι, not μετανοεῖν in this case) the pain he had caused them, since this pain was experienced in the way of God (κατὰ θεόν) rather than in the way of the world, and this worked not death (cf. the young man's sorrow in Mt 19²) but repentance, arousing in them indignation, fear, longing, and a passionate desire to set themselves right. The result of such sorrow in the community is seen in the punishment inflicted on the guilty member; and once this has brought repentance to him also, he must be comforted by his fellow-believers, lest he be overwhelmed by his pain. If, on the other hand, this punishment is ineffectual, more drastic treatment from the Apostle will be needed (2 Co 13²). At the same time, he knows that the sin of his converts and friends will cause a deep sorrow, a 'vicarious repentance,' in him (12¹, cf. Jer 8^{18ff.}).

One passage, denying the possibility of repentance to those who fall away after illumination (He 6⁶; cf. 12¹⁷) has occasioned great difficulty to interpreters. With the theological questions raised by the verse we have no concern here; repentance, however, is evidently used in its largest sense of an entire change of attitude, and the writer's meaning is that when a man has definitely relinquished the fullest spiritual privileges, it is impossible (for human agency) to enter on a process of making him anew (the expressions and the tenses used are noteworthy). Apart from this passage, however, the possibility that repentance may be for some men unattainable is never hinted at. Repentance in believers has a prominent place in the messages to the Seven Churches. There, it is expected that repentance will follow from the accusation and conviction of sin. If not, a sudden punishment in each case is to fall on both the guilty church and the sinners harboured in it (Rev 3. 16. 21 3³, etc.). In the Apostolic Fathers, explicit references to this repentance are lacking. Even the letters of Ignatius, though addressed to churches with whom their writer had considerable fault to find, say nothing definite on the subject. Hermas is aware that this sorrow may be a blessing; but he is more concerned to point out that, in general, sorrow may distress the Spirit which dwells in the Christian (Mand. x. iii. 1, 2). In the Apostolic Age, indeed, it would seem that Christians were so eager to enter into the new joy, that they would not stay to contemplate sorrow (Ac 2⁴⁶, Eph 1³; if they groaned, it was for a fuller illumination, Ro 8²³). This frame of mind finds constant expression in the Odes of Solomon; in almost the only place where repentance and sorrow might have occurred to the writer (xxxiii., Christ's preaching in Hades), they are unmentioned. As for the heathen, their sins had been overlooked (Ac 17³⁰). Divine punishments for sin might well bring sorrow to the evildoer (Ja 5¹, Rev 9²⁰, 16²¹), where the most drastic treatment meted out to the sinners in the world before the Parousia fails to produce repentance); but such sufferings as come to the Christian are lifted up into the rapture of communion with Christ (Col 1⁻⁴, 1 P 4¹³).

These considerations may be thought hardly sufficient to explain the comparative silence of St. Paul. It may be added that he was writing for believers, in whom repentance was an accomplished fact, his chief concern being to lead them on to religious conceptions and levels of conduct of whose significance they could not have been aware when they first turned from dead works. Further, he does not lay great emphasis on the original and simple change of attitude in his converts. He rather analyzes what would seem to have been his own experience of it: the crushing weight of law; the emergence of desire: the resultant sense of helplessness; and the deliverance wrought by the grace of God (Ro 7²⁴; cf. I. A. Dorner, System of Christian Ethics, Eng. tr., 1887, p. 364; the wretchedness to which St. Paul here refers is not sorrow for sin, but the resulting sense of being torn in two); or else he describes its immediate consequences, in relation to Christ, under the figures of death and resurrection (Col 2²⁰). Similarly, no reference is made to repentance in the Johannine Epistles or the Fourth Gospel. Its place is taken by the figures of the new birth (Jn 3³; cf. also 1 P 1²³) or the passage from darkness to light (Jn 8¹², 1 Jn 2⁹), which are equally applicable to repentance and conversion.

For this comparative neglect in the NT a psychological reason may perhaps be suggested. Repentance and conversion, unless either is imperfect, must go together. They are two sides of the same process. In repentance, however, the emotional side of the process is more prominent; but it is questionable whether a past emotion is ever recalled. The memory of its occurrence can of course be retained, and an appropriate stimulus may arouse a similar emotion. But it may be that such a stimulus never occurs. This would be the case with the normal Christian. Sorrow for sin becomes as much a thing of the past as sin itself. The emotions associated with repentance are only memories, and the forward look (Ph 3¹³, He 12¹) and the preoccupation of the mind with the things of the Kingdom (Ph 4⁸) will prevent any morbid dwelling on an experience which can only be temporary and ought to be short-lived, just as, by these means, any desire for a formal analysis of a past psychosis will be removed. St. Peter never refers, save by way of allusion, to his own repentance; and the long description of the stages previous to repentance and conversion in Augustine's Confessions and Bunyan's Grace Abounding would seem to be foreign to the spirit of the NT writers. They prefer to dilate on the consequences of the process (1 Co 6¹¹, Tit 3⁵).

The same absence of interest in abstract analysis explains the silence of the NT on the question of the relative parts played by man and God in repentance. The attitude of the NT writers is rather that of the normal believer, who knows that his attitude of mind changed (see above), and that he once willed a very different set of actions, while he is equally sure that this change could never have happened apart from the grace of God (Ro 11²³). The argument in Ro 9¹⁴⁻¹⁸ is not intended to prove that God arbitrarily grants repentance to some and withholds it from others (cf. the catalogue of warnings given to Israel, Ro 10); but only that if God's favours are withheld, God cannot rightly be blamed (see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans', 1902, p. 248 ff.). On the other hand, with regard to the ethical consequences of repentance, there is no ambiguity whatever: a fact which is the more remarkable since the belief in the near approach of the Parousia might have been expected to lead to an 'Interimsethik,' or, as some of the Thessalonian converts believed, to no ethics at all (1 Th 5⁷, 2 Th 3¹¹). The same thing may be seen clearly in the Epistle of Barnabas, in which the apocalyptic section is followed immediately by the transcription of the 'Two Ways.' (See Schweitzer, Geschichte der paulinischen Forschung, 1911, who points out that the same stress on the importance of ethics in the descriptions of the coming world after the Parousia effectually distinguishes Jewish and Christian from pagan eschatology.)

But in truth, no multiplied references to repentance were necessary. No Christian could forget the new light in which he had come to look upon his past life (the paganism around him would make this impossible), nor the act of loving self-surrender to a new personal influence which accompanied it (Ac 20²¹; cf. Mk 1⁵, He 6¹); and, though he might fail to display at the first all the graces of a mature Christian character (Eph 4²³), he knew that repentance and faith together had wrought a real deliverance for him (1 P 4³); and if he had felt less sorrow at the time than we might have expected for sins which hitherto he had not thought of as sins, he now regarded them with the more loathing and contempt.

REPHAN (Ac 7², so RV; AV 'Remphan,' WH 'Rompha,' Tisch. 'Romphan').—St. Stephen in his speech is quoting from LXX of Am 5²³. None of the above forms is known at all as the name of a god elsewhere, the suggestion of Lipsius that it is connected with the name repa-n-neteru, 'youngest of the gods,' a title of the god Seb (= Saturn), being too far-fetched. The Hebrew has Chiun, which may have been read as Kewan, and changed into Rephan, a similar change of כ to ר in LXX occurring in Nah 1⁶. The Hebrew Kewan might represent the Babylonian Kaivanu, 'Saturn' (Schrader, *KAT*², 1883, p. 409 f., Eng. tr., 1885-88, ii. 141 f.), but more probably it is not a proper name at all (W. R. Smith).* The mention of the 'star' is all that is requisite for St. Stephen's purpose, namely, to show that the foreign idolatrous planet-worship had crept in and meant apostasy from the true worship of Jahweh. See, further, Commentaries on Acts and Amos. F. W. WORSLEY.

REPROACH.—So far as the RV rendering of the apostolic writings is concerned, this word represents

* 'The words כְּכֹהֵן אֱלֹהֵינוּ ['star of our God'] are a gloss, as is indicated by the fact that the Septuagint read them before פאִפֶּאָר=כִּי. The gloss arose from the idea that Chinn is equivalent to the Syriac Kēwan, a Persian name of the planet Saturn. But the date of Amos forbids this interpretation. Both כְּכֹהֵן and כִּי must be common nouns in the construct state, probably 'the shrine of your (idol) king and the stand of your images,' i.e. the portable shrine and platform on which the idols were exhibited and borne in processions' (OTJC, London, 1892, p. 294 n.; cf. also Prophets of Israel, do., 1882, p. 401).

the Greek ὀνειδισμός. It occurs twice in the Pauline Epistles and three times in Hebrews, and affords interesting instances of references to OT thought and employment of OT language. The word ὀνειδισμός belongs to the sphere of Hellenistic as distinct from classical Greek. It is of frequent occurrence in the LXX throughout the later prophetic writings and, for the most part, represents the Hebrew הקטל.

St. Paul (Ro 15³), in appealing to the 'strong' to bear the infirmities of the 'weak,' adduces the example of Christ, who 'also pleased not himself, but'—and here the Apostle breaks the grammatical construction in order to introduce intact an OT quotation—'the reproaches of them that reproached thee fell upon me.' This is an exact employment of the words of Ps 68¹⁰ in the LXX (EV 69⁹), οἱ ὀνειδισμοὶ τῶν ὀνειδίζοντων σε ἐπέπεσον ἐπ' ἐμέ. The general purport of this psalm is to describe the sufferings of the typically righteous man at the hands of the ungodly. Many passages from it are referred to our Lord in various parts of the NT. In v. 10 the righteous sufferer is represented as speaking to God and as saying that he has to bear the reproaches uttered against God. St. Paul here puts the words into our Lord's lips, who is conceived as speaking, not to God, but to a man, and as saying that in enduring reproaches He was bearing, not His own sufferings, but those of others.

The passage so used is an interesting example of the way in which St. Paul takes OT phraseology out of its original context and employs it for his own purpose. In the hands of one who viewed Ps 68 as Messianic in its reference, this procedure was both legitimate and appropriate.

In 1 Ti 3³ the Apostle, enumerating the characteristics requisite for a bishop, says that 'he must have good testimony from them that are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil.' There is considerable uncertainty as to the exact meaning of this passage. One question is, whether 'reproach' is to be taken alone, or whether 'reproach and snare of the devil' is to be treated as all one phrase. Some, perhaps feeling that 'reproach of the devil' is an impossible expression, take διαβόλον here in the general sense of 'slanderer,' and translate, 'lest he fall into the reproaches and snares prepared by slanderers.' On the whole, the RV as given above seems to afford the most natural meaning. A bishop's life must be such as not to forfeit the approval in general of surrounding non-Christian society. Should he fail to secure this general approval, there is the probability that his life is open to adverse criticism and that he may thus fall a prey to the wiles of the tempter.

He 10³³ recalls how the readers of the Epistle had been 'made a gazing-stock both by reproaches and afflictions'; but the passages of greater interest in this book are 11²⁶ and 13¹³. The reference in each is to the 'reproach' of Christ. In 11²⁶ it is said that Moses accounted 'the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.' The 'reproach' which Moses endured is called 'the reproach of the Christ' because it was on account of his belief in God's saving purpose that he suffered it. 'The reproach which Moses suffered in the fellowship of the People of God—the hardship, contempt, and the like, inflicted at the hands of the Egyptian world then—was the same as that inflicted on Christ in the days of His flesh, and the same as was borne by the Hebrew believers in their day, or as is borne by believers at all times. Though the reproach and the sufferings are the same, however, Christ is worthy to give name to them; to others they derive their meaning from having been endured by Him, and in Him they reached their climax' (A. B. Davidson, The Epistle to the Hebrews, Edinburgh, n.d., p. 223). The statement does not necessarily imply belief on the part of Moses that a personal Christ was to come. What he did believe in was the fulfilment of God's promise, which, in point of fact, was fulfilled in the coming of Christ.

In He 13¹³ the readers are exhorted to 'go forth unto him [Jesus] without the camp, bearing his reproach.' They must make their choice between Christianity and Judaism, for the two cannot be amalgamated. Christ's death 'without the gate' was the symbol of His being cast out of the community and religious life of the OT Israel. To realize the full power of His redeeming work, His followers must abandon 'the camp'—the sphere within which the religious life and ordinances of Israel prevail—and must go forth to Him. To be branded as a traitor and to be deprived of Jewish privilege was 'the reproach of the Christ.' This His followers must share.

It is not improbable that the language of Ps 89⁵⁰⁻⁵¹ underlies both of these passages in Hebrews (LXX 1's 88^{51, 52}), μνησθήτι Κύριε, τοῦ ὀνειδισμοῦ τῶν δοῦλων σου . . . οὐ ὠνειδίσαν τὸ ἀντάλλαγμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ σου.

In the AV the word 'reproach' occurs in two passages in 2 Corinthians. In 11²¹ it is used to translate the Greek ἀτιμία (RV 'disparagement'). In 12¹⁰ it is used to translate θβρις (RV 'injury').

DAWSON WALKER.

REPROBATE.—'Reprobate' is the rendering of the Greek word ἀδόκιμος, which is used in the NT only by St. Paul and only of persons, except in He 6⁸, where it is used of the land. It is the negative form of δόκιμος (from δέχομαι), 'acceptable,' 'tested,' 'worthy,' and means 'unacceptable,' 'unworthy,' 'rejected after trial.' 'Reprobate silver shall men call them,' says Jeremiah of God's degenerate people, 'because the Lord hath rejected them' (6³⁰ LXX). In Ro 1²⁸ St. Paul uses the word when speaking of the natural condition of the heathen world, alienated from God, abandoned to their lusts and passions and to a reprobate mind (εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν), as if, having failed to avail themselves of the light of nature, they were now left without it altogether and without hope of amendment at all. A 'reprobate mind' in the judgment of St. Paul is proof of the deep depravity of the heathen and at the same time its awful punishment. In 1 Co 9²⁷ St. Paul uses the word in a passage where he is comparing the Christian life in its strenuousness to the contests in the Grecian games. In them the racer or the boxer must contend strictly according to the rules, for if he is found fouling a rival or transgressing the rules of the contest, he is liable to be cast out of the lists and scourged, and at any rate will be declared disqualified for a prize. It was in this spirit that Ignatius, on the way to martyrdom at Rome, entreated the prayers of his fellow-Christians so as to be found worthy of the lot he had set before him, that in the end he might not be found 'rejected' (ἀδόκιμος) (Ignatius, ad Trall. xii. 3). See CASTAWAY. Elsewhere St. Paul urges the necessity of earnest self-examination and the close following of Christ if his readers would escape this reproach (2 Co 13⁵⁻⁷); and utters words of solemn warning against men who after having made a Christian profession become depraved in mind and heart, or content themselves with an outward profession, whilst, as regards the faith and every good work, they are discredited, 'reprobate' (2 Ti 3⁸, Tit 1¹⁶).

The passage in He 6⁸ where ἀδόκιμος is used not of persons but of the land is, taken in connexion with its preceding context, very suggestive. The land which drinks in the rain and brings forth the looked-for crop receives blessing of God, but that which receives the same benign influence and produces only thorns and thistles is 'rejected' (ἀδοκίμος), gets no share of that blessing, but is fit only, like Sodom and Gomorrah, for the fire. It is in these solemn words that the writer sums up his urgent message to the Hebrew Christians to press on unto perfection and to be on their guard against spiritual sloth, which may issue in falling away. He speaks as if a fall from grace were possible even on the part of those who have experienced spiritual enlightenment and renewal, as if there were a point even in the spiritual life where backsliding becomes apostasy, and the man who crucifies the Son of God afresh and puts Him to an open shame is beyond repentance, rejected, reprobate. St. Paul and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in these passages are not presenting a reasoned system of predestination and election, but rather dealing with what may happen under the stress and strain of temptation and trial in the ordinary tenor of the Christian life, and emphasizing the need of diligence and watchfulness, if they and their readers would make their calling and election sure.

Of 'reprobation' as the issue of a Divine decree there is no direct statement in the NT, St. Paul, indeed, seeming deliberately to avoid any such statement. When asserting the Divine sovereignty under the figure of the potter who makes of the same lump one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour, he asks, 'What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction: and that he might make known the riches of his glory upon vessels of mercy, which he afore prepared unto glory?' (Ro 9²¹⁻²³). The distinction drawn by the Apostle when speaking of 'the vessels of wrath' and 'the vessels of mercy' in the above passage is significant. Of the former he uses the passive and impersonal form, 'fitted to destruction'; of the latter he speaks in the active voice, 'the preparation' being directly attributed to God. Our Lord similarly distinguishes between the sentence which He will pass in the Judgment on those on His right hand and that on those on His left. To the former, the address is, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father'; to the latter, 'Depart, ye cursed,' the blessing being all of God, the curse entirely of themselves. In the same connexion 'the everlasting fire' is 'prepared for the devil and his angels,' but the Kingdom to which the righteous are summoned is prepared for them 'before the foundation of the world.'

It is interesting as a matter of NT interpretation to notice that three of the most notable of the Reformed Confessions—the Heidelberg Catechism, the Revised Thirty-nine Articles, and the Scots Confession of 1560—pass the subject of reprobation over in silence.

REPROOF.—The subject of reproof, i.e. the refutation of error, the discovery of sin, the convincing and convicting of the wrongdoer (ελεγχμός, ελεγχος, ελεγχω: LXX for הַעֲרִיבָה, הַעֲרִיבָה, הַעֲרִיבָה), is mentioned frequently in the Bible. Reproof is used generally in the sense of rebuke. Rules are laid down for its administration, and advice given as to its reception. It is necessary, beneficial, and not to be despised. The great and constant dangers to be avoided are these—reproving unskilfully, withholding reproof unfaithfully, and resenting reproof administered in love. Christians in general are exhorted to reprove 'the unfruitful works of darkness' (Eph 5^{11, 13}; cf. Mt 18¹⁵⁻¹⁸), and Christian ministers in particular must regard reproof as an important duty of their office (1 Ti 5²⁰, 2 Ti 4², Tit 1^{13, 15, 21}).

Reproof may be administered (a) by word, in which case there is the underlying idea of severe rebuke and admonition. The offender must be called upon to give an explanation of his conduct and his fault must be made plain to him (1 Ti 5²⁰, 2 Ti 4², Jude 15; cf. Mt 18¹⁵ Lk 3¹⁹); (b) by deed, in a two-fold sense: (i.) by deeds of light being manifested in a way that will be a virtual reproof of deeds of darkness (Eph 5¹³; cf. Jn 3¹⁹⁻²¹); (ii.) by chastening or punishment (He 12⁵; cf. Ps 37 (38)² 94¹² 119^{7, 75}, Pr 3¹¹, Jer 31^{18, 19}, Rev 3¹⁹, Wis 12², To 11¹⁵ 13^{5, 9}, Jth 8²⁷); (c) by the Scriptures (2 Ti 3¹⁶). Behind the censure lies the fundamental idea of the conviction of sin. The verb ελεγχω signifies 'prove, refute, expose, convict.' It is used with these meanings in classical writers from the time of Euripides. Many scholars hold the opinion that it means rather more than 'reprove' and rather less than 'convince.' For 'reprove' in the sense of 'bring to the proof' see 2 Ti 4² RVm; cf. Ps 38¹⁴ RVm. For reproof in relation to sin, see 1 Co 14²⁴, Ja 2⁹, Jude 15; cf. Jn 8^{2, 46} 16³; Aristoph. Plut. 574. For reproof of false teachers, see Tit 1^{13, 15, 21}.

REPUTATION.—This word occurs in four passages of the AV. In each case it is employed as a rendering of a different Greek adjective or verb, and in each case the RV uses some other expression which translates the Greek somewhat more literally and exactly.

1. Ac 5³⁴ speaks of Gamaliel as a νομοδιδάσκαλος τίμιος παντὶ τῷ λαῷ. AV renders this: 'had in reputation among all the people,' RV more literally, 'had in honour of all the people.'

2. Gal 2² tells of St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem, when he communicated the gospel which he preached to the Gentiles κατ' ἰδίαν τοῖς δοκοῦσι. AV renders this: 'privately to them which were of reputation'; RV—in almost identical terms, but again with a degree of greater exactness—'who were of repute.' οἱ δοκούντες is in itself a term of honour, and is used as such here. The meaning, however, may vary with the context, and in Gal 2² it is depreciatory, not of the worth of the apostles, but of the extravagant claims advanced by some on their behalf.

3. Ph 2⁷ says of Christ that He εαυτὸν ἐκένωσε. AV renders this: 'made himself of no reputation'; the RV 'emptied himself' is obviously more exact. The import of this mysterious predicate is discussed in art. PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, above, p. 226 f.

4. Ph 2²⁹ is the passage in which St. Paul, commending Epaphroditus to his Philippian friends, bids them τοῖς τοιοῦτοις ἐντίμιος ἔχετε. AV renders this: 'hold such in reputation.' The RV 'hold such in honour' is equally clear and maintains closer correspondence with the Greek adjective.

RESPECT OF PERSONS.—The abstract noun προσωπολήψια occurs in the NT four times. In three of these instances (Ro 2¹¹, Eph 6⁹, Col 3²⁵) it is used with reference to God, in the fourth (Ja 2¹) with reference to man. The cognate verb προσωπολημπτέω occurs once only in the NT in Ja 2⁹. The masculine form προσωπολήμπτης occurs only once in Ac 10³⁴ and the negative adverb ἀπροσωπολήμπτως only once in 1 P 1¹⁷. The compound is a late Hellenistic formation, appearing only in the NT and in ecclesiastical literature.

Before the formation of the compound, and along with it, the constituent elements were used together as separate words. The expression λαμβάνει πρόσωπον is used in the LXX to translate קָבַץ פָּנָי, 'to accept the face,' i.e. to receive kindly or look favourably upon any one (cf. Lv 19¹⁵). Originally the expression was a neutral one, involving no idea of improper partiality. When, however, it becomes a distinctive expression, as, e.g., in Gal 2⁶ (πρόσωπον θεὸς ἀνθρώπου οὐ λαμβάνει), it takes a worse sense. Lightfoot (in loc.) suggests that this is owing to the secondary meaning of πρόσωπον, 'mask,' so that πρόσωπον λαμβάνειν signifies 'to regard the external circumstances of a man'—his rank, wealth, etc.—as opposed to his real intrinsic character. The phrase λαμβάνειν πρόσωπον occurs again in the NT in Lk 20²¹. It also occurs in the Didache iv. 3: κρινεῖς δικαίως, οὐ λήψῃ πρόσωπον ἐλέγξει ἐπὶ παραπτώμασιν. Alternative expressions with a similar meaning are βλέπειν εἰς πρόσωπον (Mt 22¹⁶, Mk 12¹⁴) and θαυμάζειν πρόσωπον (Jude 16).

The NT instances of the compound word fall into three main groups. Ac 10³⁴, 1 P 1¹⁷, and Ro 2¹¹ constitute the first of these. In Ac 10³⁴ St. Peter, addressing the assembled household of Cornelius, says, καταλαμβάνομαι ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν προσωπολήπτης ὁ Θεός. On this assertion of God's character, as free from partiality to one nation above other nations, the Apostle bases his repudiation of the exclusive covenant of Israel. In Ro 2¹¹ St. Paul asserts the same view with the similar phrase οὐ γὰρ ἔστιν προσωπολήπτης παρὰ τῷ Θεῷ. The expression in 1 P 1¹⁷ describing God as τὸν ἀπροσωπολήπτην κρίνοντα κατὰ τὸ ἐκάστου ἔργον involves the same assertion, but it also involves a warning (with a possible reference to Dt 10¹⁷) that, under the New Covenant as under the Old, God would show no favour to those whose deeds made them unworthy of it.

The two passages Eph 6⁹ and Col 3²⁵ form the second group. Both are concerned with the mutual relations of masters and slaves. In Eph 6⁹ masters are counselled as to the right treatment of their slaves, 'knowing that both their Master and yours is in heaven, and there is no respect of persons (προσωπολήπτης) with him.' In Col 3²⁵ the word occurs in the counsels addressed to the slaves. The passage is interesting as showing that προσωπολήπτης, though usually exercised in favour of rank and power, might occasionally be employed on the opposite side (cf. Lv 19¹⁵). The slave might assume that because man's προσωπολήπτης would usually be on the master's side, there would be a corresponding προσωπολήπτης of God on the slave's side. St. Paul's warning in this passage corrects any such mistaken impression.

The third group of passages consists of the two in St. James, the noun in 2¹ and the corresponding verb in v. 9. In the general context it is partiality in favour of the wealthy, well-dressed member of the Christian assembly that is condemned. In 2¹ the noun is used in the plural, ἐν προσωπολημψίαις, with probable reference to the many ways in which partiality may display itself.

In the sub-apostolic writings προσωπολήπτης occurs only in Polycarp, ad Phil. vi. 1. Elders are warned that they should be compassionate and merciful, ἀπεχόμενοι πᾶσης ὀργῆς, προσωπολήπτας, κρίσεως ἀδίκου. The negative adverb occurs in 1 Clem. i. 3 (ἀπροσωπολήπτως γὰρ πάντα ποιεῖτε) and in Ep. Barn. iv. 12 (ὁ κυριος ἀπροσωπολήπτως κρινεῖ τὸν κόσμον).

DAWSON WALKER.

REST.—So far as the apostolic writings are concerned, the teaching on rest in its relation to the believer's life is confined to two great passages—He 4¹⁻¹¹ and Rev 14¹³. The basis of the idea is the Divine rest, the rest on which God entered at the completion of His work of creation. Participation in this rest is a Divine gift to man. The natural tendency is to conceive rest as mere cessation of work. So far as the Jews shared this misapprehension, it is corrected by our Lord in the discourse of Jn 5^{17a}, beginning with the words, ὁ πατήρ μου ἔως ἀρτι ἐργάζεται, καὶ γὰρ ἐργάζομαι. This idea of rest as freedom for further work finds expression in

Rev 14¹³: 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours (κόπων); for their works (ἔργα) follow with them.' The 'labours' of the Christian's life are ended at death; its 'works'—i.e. habits, methods, and results—abide and remain in the new life.

It is in He 4¹⁻¹¹ that we find the most exhaustive treatment of this theme. The whole passage may almost be called a homily or discourse having for its text the words of Ps 95¹¹, ὡς ὤμοσα ἐν τῇ ὀργῇ μου, εἰ εἰσελεύσονται εἰς τὴν κατάπαυσίν μου. The rest to which God, as quoted by the Psalmist, refers is the Divine rest, after creation, of which Gn 2² speaks: καὶ κατέπαυσε τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ἑβδόμῃ ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν ἔργων αὐτοῦ ὧν ἐποίησε, a passage which links the idea of Divine rest indissolubly with the Sabbath. The writer's argument is briefly this. The inspired oracle in Ps 95 speaks of a 'rest' of God. The Psalmist tells how in the days of Moses this rest lay open to God's people, but they did not enter in through disobedience. Neither then nor at the entry into Canaan under Joshua was the Divine idea of rest realized. The Psalmist, in fact, implies that the Divine idea still remains unrealized, it still awaits fulfilment; and the author of Hebrews, taking the Psalmist's word as the last utterance of the OT on the subject of rest, applies it with confidence to his hearers of the NT epoch. He draws the inference ἀρα ἀπολείπεται σαββατισμὸς τῷ λαῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

The word σαββατισμός (RV 'Sabbath rest') occurs here only in the Greek Bible. It is not a coinage of the author's, because it is found in Plutarch, de Superstit. 3. Its occurrence therefore in Justin Martyr, Dial. 23 B, is not necessarily dependent on Hebrews. The substitution of this word for κατάπαυσις, the word employed throughout the remainder of the passage, is not accidental. It not only denotes the Divine rest as a Sabbath rest; it links together, in a most suggestive way, the end with the beginning, the consummation with the creation. It implies too that the rest which God gives is one which He also enjoys, and it strikes the note of universalism, for the Divine rest is prior to the very existence of a chosen people. Just as in the case of salvation, the Christian rest may be viewed both as a present possession and as a future blessing. On the one hand, 'we which have believed do enter into that rest.' On the other hand, the very conception of the rest as God's rest involves fuller realization yet to come.

The word ἀνάπαυσις occurs now and then in the sub-apostolic writings with reference to the heavenly rest. 2 Clem. v. 5 speaks of the ἀνάπαυσις τῆς μελλούσης βασιλείας καὶ ζωῆς αἰωνίου, and in vi. 7 we read, ποιούντες γὰρ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Χριστοῦ εὐρήσομεν ἀνάπαυσιν. The verb καταπαύω occurs throughout an interesting passage (Ep. Barn. 15) in which the hallowing of the Sabbath is discussed as something which will find its fulfilment in Christianity (as opposed to Judaism) in the impending Messianic Age. It is quite possible that the treatment here may be influenced by the thought and language of He 4¹⁻¹¹.

In 2 Th 1⁷ the RV agrees with AV in using 'rest' to translate ἀνεσις. This word is used in the NT only by St. Paul, always with a contrast to θλίψις expressed (as here) or implied. That the idea of rest here has an eschatological reference is seen from the following words: ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ μετ' ἀγγέλων δυνάμει αὐτοῦ.

DAWSON WALKER.

RESTITUTION.—1. The term.—The word 'restitution' is the AV rendering (RV 'restoration') of the Gr. ἀποκατάστασις, which is found in the NT only in Ac 3²¹, though the verb ἀποκαθίστημι, 'restore,' occurs several times (see especially Mt 17¹¹, Ac 1⁶). In the exegesis of Ac 3²¹ two views have been taken of the relation of the phrase ἀπὸ χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων ('until the times of restitution of all things') to the relative clause which follows, and these two views are reflected in the renderings of the AV and RV respectively. According to the AV rendering the relative pronoun ὅν has πάντων for its antecedent, so that the restitution is a restitution only of those things of which the prophets had spoken. According to the RV and the great majority of modern commentators the antecedent is χρόνων, so that it was the times of restoration of which the prophets spoke, and the restoration is a restoration or all things in some sense not defined in the context. The sense, however, is suggested by the passages to which the present one evidently refers. The prophet Malachi had foretold that Elijah should be sent as the Messiah's forerunner (Mal 4⁵) and that he should effect a work of moral restoration (v.⁸); and in the LXX this restoring work (Heb. בִּנְיָה, EV 'turn') of Elijah is expressed by the word ἀποκαταστήσει. On the ground of this saying the expectation of Elijah's reappearance to herald the advent of the Messiah had become general among the Jews (Sir 48^{10, 11}; cf. Schurer, HJP II. ii. [1885] 156), and when Jesus, after His transfiguration, forbade His disciples to tell any one of their vision of Moses and Elijah on the mount, they asked Him, 'Why then say the scribes that Elijah must first come?' (Mt 17¹⁰; cf. Mk 9¹¹). 'Elijah indeed cometh,' was His reply, 'and shall restore all things' (ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα, Mt 17¹¹; cf. Mk 9¹²); but He immediately made them understand that Elijah had come already in the person of John the Baptist (Mt 17¹²).

The 'restoration of all things' of which St. Peter spoke was thus not a restoration in the large sense of a Universalist doctrine, but a moral and spiritual recovery of Israel such as Malachi had foretold and St. John proclaimed in preaching the baptism of repentance. That St. Peter at this stage of his career could not have entertained any idea of a universal restoration is proved by his later experiences at Caesarea (Ac 10). And if it is suggested that the phraseology of the verse is due to St. Luke, the writer of Acts, with his much wider outlook, it has to be considered that a close fidelity of the historian to his sources is suggested by St. Peter's whole speech, embodying as it does a purely Jewish form of Christian expectation quite different from the later perspective of the Church after the door had been opened to the Gentiles and the national life of Judaism had been destroyed.

2. The idea.—A discussion of the NT doctrine of restitution or restoration, however, cannot be limited to an examination of the particular term. The idea of a 'restoration of all things' is raised not only by this speech of Peter's but by one or two of our Lord's utterances, and above all by certain striking statements and declarations in the Pauline Epistles.

(1) The saying of Jesus in Mt 17¹⁰ (Mk 9¹¹) has been already referred to. But in 19²⁸ we find Him speaking of the 'regeneration' (παλιγγενεσία), when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory. The word παλιγγενεσία in this passage is practically synonymous with the ἀποκατάστασις of Ac 3²¹ (cf. Jos. Ant. XI. iii. 8, 9, where the words are used interchangeably of the national restoration under Zerubbabel). Jesus is referring to that hope of a renovation of heaven and earth which formed part of the Jewish Messianic expectation (Enoch xlv. 4, 5; cf. 2 P 3¹², Rev 21¹) and was based on Is 65¹⁷

66²². No more here than in Rev 21, where we have the Apocalypticist's conception of the ἀποκατάστασις or παλιγγενεσία, is there any suggestion of a universal restoration of sinful beings (see Rev 21^{3, 22}). The same thing must be said of Jn 12³², which is sometimes adduced in the interests of a Universalist doctrine. The context (v.^{20a}) shows the point of the verse to be that the uplifting of Jesus on the Cross (cf. 3^{14c}) would draw to Him Gentiles as well as Jews.

(2) It is in St. Paul's writings, however, and especially in such passages as Ro 11²², 1 Co 15^{22a}, Ph 2^{10, 11}, Eph 1¹⁰, Col 1²⁰, that support is chiefly sought for the idea of a universal restoration. But the argument of Ro 11 shows that in v.², as in Jn 12³², 'all' means Jew and Gentile alike. In 1 Co 15²², again, nothing more is asserted than a universal resurrection of the dead, and in vv.⁴⁻²³ what is in view is a subjugation of all forces that are hostile to the Divine Kingdom so that God may be all in all. And if we find that in Ph 2^{10, 11} the adoration of the Exalted Jesus is represented as an act in which the whole creation participates, while in Eph 1¹⁰, Col 1²⁰ Christ appears as summing up all things in Himself and reconciling all things unto Himself, these soaring utterances cannot be interpreted apart from St. Paul's emphatic teaching that the wages of sin is death (Ro 6²³), and that destruction awaits the enemies of the Cross of Christ (Ph 3¹⁹). In the light of such texts it seems safe to conclude that the Apostle's 'universalism' implies not a universal redemption of individuals, but a restoration of the disordered world to unity and harmony by an elimination of all discordant elements or a subdual of all hostile powers.

(3) Support for a restorationist doctrine is sometimes sought in those passages of the Pastoral Epistles where it is said that God 'willeth that all men should be saved' (1 Ti 2⁴), that He is 'the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe' (4¹⁰), that His grace 'hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men' (Tit 2¹¹). Yet it seems hardly possible to affirm more here than that the Divine saving purpose brings salvation within the reach of all, while the realization of that purpose depends upon the attitude of the individual to the Divine grace. Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners (1 Ti 1¹⁵); but to obtain mercy men must 'believe on him unto eternal life' (v.¹⁶). In the same Epistle we read that destruction (δωλερός; cf. 2 Th 1⁹) and perdition (ἀπωλεία; cf. Ph 3¹⁹) await those who walk in the way of their own lusts (1 Ti 6⁹).

Attractive as it is, the idea of universal restoration finds little support in a careful exegesis. Those who advocate it usually fall back upon conjectures suggested by the hidden possibilities of the future life or general considerations with regard to the grace of Christ and the Fatherly love of God. Even when a case has been made out for Universalism from the direct utterances of the NT, it has to be admitted that the materials for a case against it are abundantly present. To Martensen it seemed that on this subject the Scriptures set before us an unresolved antinomy corresponding to the antinomy between the sovereignty of God and the free will of man. The Divine saving purpose is universal in its scope, but it is conditioned by human freedom. The one entitles us to cherish 'the larger hope'; the other suggests that in the very nature of man there lies the possibility of final condemnation (Christian Dogmatics, Eng. tr., 1866, pp. 474-484).

RESTORATION OF OFFENDERS.—In the discipline of the Apostolic Church the restoration of the offender was the main idea and that of punishment subordinate. Even excommunication was not final, if the expelled member, conscious of guilt, was led to repentance and reformation. The Christian Church has the right and the authority to admit, to exclude, to readmit suitable persons to its privileges. This is seen clearly in the case of the Corinthian offender (2 Co 2¹¹).

A general rule is laid down in Gal 6¹—‘Brethren, even if a man be overtaken in any trespass (‘flagrante delicto’), ye which are spiritual, restore (καταρτίζετε) such a one in a spirit of meekness; looking to thyself, lest thou also be tempted.’ Bengel, in his comment upon the word ‘brethren,’ says, ‘a whole argument lies hidden under this one word’ (cf. Gal 3¹⁵ 4¹² 6¹⁸). Some (e.g. Lightfoot) think that the Corinthian case was before the mind of St. Paul. Others (e.g. Ramsay) reject this idea.

καταρτίζω (to make aptos, ‘fit,’ ‘sound,’ ‘complete’) is a surgical term used of setting a broken bone or a dislocated joint. It may be used to refer to the repair of material or spiritual damage; e.g., mending nets (Mt 4¹, Mk 1⁹); setting up walls (Ezr 4¹²); removing State factions (Herod. v. 28); righting spiritual calamity (Gal 6¹). Spiritual restoration is gradual, but it may become complete. All the powers of the sinner may be combined harmoniously, all defects supplied, all faults amended, so that the restored one is fitted perfectly for service (1 Co 1¹⁰ Gr. 1 Th 3¹⁰, He 10⁵ 11³ 13²¹, 1 P 5¹⁰; cf. Lk 6⁴⁰, Herod. v. 106. See Eph 4¹², καταρτισμός; 2 Co 13⁹, καταρτισίς, Vulg. consummatio; cf. Ign. Eph. 2, Phil. 8, Smyrn. 1, Mart. Ign. 4). As the many members of the body in each believer must be fitly framed together, so believers themselves must be brought into harmonious relationship in Christ’s body the Church, and this mainly through the duly appointed ministers of the Church (Eph 4¹¹⁻¹²). ‘The enumeration is not of classes of persons or formal offices, but of classes of functions,’ is Hort’s comment on Eph 4¹¹ (The Christian Ecclesia, 1897, p. 166).

This work must be carried out by the spiritual (οἱ πνευματικοί; cf. 1 Co 2¹³⁻¹⁵ 3¹), believers in general as well as the ministry. It must be done ‘in the spirit of meekness,’ which will counteract any tendency to vainglory or feeling of superiority. Here πνεῦμα seems immediately to refer to the state of the inward spirit as wrought upon by the Holy Spirit, and ultimately to the Holy Spirit as the inworking power; cf. Ro 1⁴ 8¹⁵, 2 Co 4¹³, Eph 1¹⁷, in all which cases πνεῦμα seems to indicate the Holy Spirit, and the abstract gen. the specific χάρισμα (C. J. Ellicott, on Gal 6¹).

The doctrine of the final restoration of all offenders cannot be based upon texts of Scripture. Upon this point there is an almost general agreement. Those who advocate this theory base it upon other foundations than biblical texts which deal with the subject of restoration in general or the restoration of offenders in particular.

RESURRECTION.—I. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.—The resurrection of Christ does not fall to be discussed in this article, the next article being devoted to it. Nevertheless it will be impossible to treat of the Pauline view of resurrection without some discussion of his attitude towards the nature of Christ’s resurrection. St. Paul is practically the only NT writer who has really worked out the problem of the resurrection on the basis of the resurrection of Christ. It will be necessary to show how much he has in common with the Jewish apocalyptic writers of the 1st cent. A.D. in his attitude towards the problems of the resurrection, and also how far he has introduced new elements and developed along fresh lines. In dealing with the Fourth Gospel we have to examine the relation between that Gospel and St. Paul, how far the author is developing along the lines laid down by St. Paul and how far he is travelling on independent lines.

The principal questions that must be answered by any inquiry into the subject of the resurrection from the historical point of view are: (1) What was the place of the resurrection in the eschatology of the time? (2) Are there more than one resurrection in any of the eschatological schemes of the 1st century? (3) How is the resurrection of Christ related to the general Christian resurrection-doctrine of the period? (4) How is the question of the relation between body and spirit, flesh and spirit, worked out? (5) How far does an ethical element enter into the various views of the resurrection developed by NT writers? These questions involve ethical, metaphysical, and eschatological considerations which were not clearly distinguished in the thought of the time, and cannot be separated in our treatment of the subject; yet they must be borne in mind in examining the various systems of the period.

The roots of eschatology have been found to be far more widely spread in early civilizations than was formerly believed, and of all the conceptions of eschatology none has a more varied and complicated history than the conception of the resurrection. It is not our task to trace out its roots in the ancient past. But we have to consider and take stock of the stage of development which the conception of resurrection had reached at the beginning of our period. It was the moment when the focus of national and political consciousness was shifting from the present to the future—a movement which expressed itself in every phase of human activity, especially in religion. Hence the significance of the mystery-religions, whose emphasis was wholly on the future life. The word ‘syncretism’ has been much abused, but it expresses well the characteristic tendency of this period. An immense number of currents of religious and philosophic thought were meeting and influencing one another, and it is easier to distinguish the main currents than to estimate the extent to which they intermingled and modified one another. The history of the interpretation of St. Paul bears witness to the difficulty of this attempt. The main currents may be broadly distinguished as follows:

(a) Neo-Platonism, in its earliest form, representing a fusion of Platonic philosophy with Oriental mysticism, and emphasizing the superiority of the intellectual principle in man, the voûs, over the body. Hence, for our inquiry, it is an influence against the conception of a bodily resurrection. Possibly it would be more accurate to call this current, in which Philo has a place, Neo-Pythagoreanism.

(b) Orientalism, to use a broad term for the various forms in which the dualism and mysticism of the East expressed themselves in religious sects and mystery-cults, and so influenced religious thought in the Græco-Roman world of our period. The eternal antithesis between matter and spirit, the necessity of redemption from the bondage of matter, and the consequent stress on asceticism, are factors working against the conception of a bodily resurrection.

(c) Judaism, although logically coming under the head of Orientalism, yet practically stands apart. At the time under consideration Judaism presents two forms of resurrection-doctrine: (1) the doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous only, developed from ethical and spiritual interests, and probably quite independent of external influences; (2) the doctrine of a general resurrection of both righteous and wicked, possibly, but not necessarily, due to the influence of Mazdeism (cf. R. H. Charles, *Eschatology*², London, 1913, pp. 139-141). In addition to this divergence, Judaism also represents two other lines of divergent thought on this subject, lines which were not so sharply separated at this period as they became later: (i.) the Palestinian doctrine of bodily resurrection, both of the individual and of the nation, for the Messianic kingdom; (ii.) the Alexandrian doctrine, influenced by Neo-Platonic ideas, teaching only a spiritual resurrection, and tending to abandon the idea of the Messianic kingdom. These various forms of thought will be dealt with in fuller detail in the historical examination of the Jewish literature.

(d) Christianity, receiving its doctrine of resurrection from both forms of Judaistic thought, but profoundly modifying the doctrine it thus received by the conception of the nature of Christ's resurrection as interpreted by St. Paul, to be reacted on later by contact with the Hellenic and Oriental streams of thought, especially in the conflict with Gnosticism.

The fuller discussion of these various currents of conflicting and intermingling views concerning the nature of the resurrection, its time and conditions, will arise out of our examination of the various passages relating to it in the literature of the Apostolic Age.

II. THE RESURRECTION IN THE LITERATURE OF THE APOSTOLIC AGE.—1. Jewish literature.—The references to the subject of resurrection and the related question of body and spirit may be considered under the separate heads of Alexandrian and Palestinian, although, as already pointed out, at this time there was not a sharp line of demarcation. Palestinian Judaism was influenced by Alexandrian, and the literature of the former will show the influence of the latter in its conceptions.

(a) Alexandrian Judaism.—The principal literary sources for Alexandrian Judaism are Philo, the Book of Wisdom, 2 Enoch, and 4 Maccabees. The general attitude of this phase of Judaism towards the resurrection can only be touched on briefly, as our main inquiry lies in the Christian literature of the period. The Alexandrian and Palestinian Judaism must be touched on sufficiently to show its influence on the formation of Christian thought.

Philo holds the Neo-Pythagorean view of the evil nature of matter. The soul was once free from matter, has become united to and debased by matter, and can attain to the full knowledge of God, the supreme good, only by deliverance from matter. Hence the resurrection of the body is obviously impossible, and any doctrine of a corporate resurrection of a blessed community can have no place. Philo's mysticism is purely individualistic, like that of Plotinus, and looks to the perfection of the disembodied soul, after death, with God. The national Messianic hope is replaced by the expectation of the universal triumph of the Law. In the words of a French scholar, E. Brehier, 'Of the whole Jewish eschatology, this idea alone retains its vitality in Philo's system, the future of the Law which is destined to attain universal sway' (Les idées philosophiques et religieuses de Philon d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1903, p. 10).

The author of the Book of Wisdom also held the eternity and evil of matter, and, in spite of some objections, it is most probable that he held the pre-existence of the soul (8¹⁹⁻²⁰). The body, even if 'undefiled,' is nevertheless 'corruptible' (9¹⁵), and clogs and imprisons the soul. Hence 'immortality' (8¹⁷), 'incorruption' (2²³ 6¹⁹), are terms which belong only to the state of the soul, and do not imply any resurrection of the body. The judgment is immediately after death, for both righteous and wicked (3¹⁸ 4¹⁴ 14).

In 2 Enoch we have the conception of the millennial Messianic kingdom, at the end of which occurs the Final Judgment. There are intermediate abodes for souls (7¹⁻³ 32¹). The writer holds the doctrine of the pre-existence of souls. It is not clear whether he holds a resurrection of the body, since his description of the change from the earthly to the heavenly body is curiously akin to St. Paul's doctrine of the spiritual body (cf. 22⁸⁻¹⁰). His account, too, of the torments of the wicked suggests a bodily state in hell, unless the language used be taken symbolically (10⁴ -).

In 4 Maccabees there is no resurrection of the body. The souls of the righteous are received by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, after death, and enjoy eternal communion with God (13¹⁶ 17³).

(b) Palestinian Judaism.—The chief sources are the Assumption of Moses, 2 Baruch, and 4 Ezra for the apocalyptic literature, and such portions of the Talmud as may reflect the Rabbinical tradition of this period. The division Sanhedrin contains the most important of the traditional utterances on this subject.

The Assumption of Moses presents a temporary Messianic kingdom, without a Messiah (cf. 2 Bar.). At its close Israel, probably identified by the writer with the righteous in Israel, is exalted to heaven, and sees its enemies in Gehenna. As in Alexandrian Judaism, so here there is no resurrection of the body.

2 Baruch is a composite work, containing, according to Charles's analysis, three apocalypses written prior to A.D. 70 and three fragments belonging to a later date. In the parts of the book composed before A.D. 70 we have the following important passages: 30¹⁻², 'And it will come to pass after these things, when the time of the advent of the Messiah is fulfilled, and He shall return in glory. Then all those who have fallen asleep in hope of Him shall rise again.' Here the resurrection of the righteous is placed after the period of tribulation preceding the advent of Messiah. The form of the passage strongly suggests Christian influence or interpolation, especially the phrase 'fallen asleep in hope of Him' (cf. 1 Th 4¹³⁻¹⁴). This doctrine of the bodily resurrection of the righteous seems to be characteristic of only the portions of the book composed prior to A.D. 70. In 30², which belongs to the sections written after A.D. 70, we have the doctrine of a general resurrection, also in chs. 50. 51. These chapters also discuss the nature of the resurrection very fully.* The personal identity of the dead is to be preserved in the resurrection in order to give force to the judgment by the recognition of identity, 'when they have severally recognized those whom they now know, then judgement will grow strong' (50⁴). The bodies of the righteous will be changed into bodies of glory that they may be able to take part in the world to come; they will be made like to the angels.

The close resemblance of this teaching to that of the Pauline Epistles and of Luke 20²¹⁻³⁶ is very striking.

4 Ezra is also a composite book, written partly before A.D. 70 and finally edited after that date. The doctrine of resurrection occupies a large place in it. It contains the doctrine of a Messianic kingdom of 400 years' duration, at the close of which the Messiah and His companions are to die,

* It should be remarked here that the precise place of the resurrection in the general eschatological scheme depends entirely on Charles's analysis of the book in question into sources. There are signs of a reaction against this tendency to carry analysis to an extreme (cf. Burkill, Jewish and Christian Apocalypses, Lecture III.).

before the Final Judgment and end of all things. In the earlier sources, i.e. the Ezra-Apocalypse and the Son of Man Vision, we have the doctrine of the revelation of Messiah from heaven with the saints who had been caught up alive, prior to the establishment of the 400 years' kingdom. Then follows the death of the Messiah and all men, then the Final Judgment for which all will be raised (cf. 4 Ezr. vi. f.). In the Salathiel-Apocalypse, the most important of the later constituents of the book, the souls of both the righteous and the wicked await the Final Judgment in a kind of intermediate state of blessing and misery respectively. The terms in which their condition is described suggest some kind of bodily state (cf. 7⁷⁵⁻¹⁰¹). In 7³² there is a clear reference to the resurrection of the body, but G. H. Box would assign this verse to the redactor, who, according to him, is seeking to supplement the resurrection-doctrine of the author of the Salathiel-Apocalypse. The souls of righteous and wicked are assembled for the Final Judgment which determines the full blessing and torment of each respectively. Hence the resurrection-doctrine of the Salathiel-Apocalypse lies midway between the Alexandrian doctrine of a spiritual resurrection immediately after death, and the Palestinian doctrine of an intermediate disembodied state and a resurrection of the body for the Final Judgment.

The most important point, however, in these two apocalyptic works is the suggestion of the doctrine of a first resurrection which appears explicitly in the NT. This germ of the idea of a first resurrection appears especially in 4 Ezr. vii. 28, xiii. 52 (see Charles, Eschatology, p. 133 ff.).

For the Rabbinical views on the resurrection at this period we have the second article in the Shemoneh Esreh, which speaks of the power of God in raising the dead. Lagrange finds no trace of a connexion between the resurrection and the Messianic kingdom earlier than R. Meir; but it must be remembered that the apocalyptic writings already quoted may well represent Rabbinical eschatology of this period, and it is not necessary to suppose that the Talmud is the only source of information as to contemporary Rabbinical belief.

The general tradition, however, is clear for a belief in the bodily resurrection of both righteous and wicked for the Final Judgment. (For an excellent account of the Rabbinical doctrine of the resurrection see Lagrange, Le Messianisme chez les juifs, Paris, 1909, p. 176 ff.)

2. St. Paul.—If the passages relating to the resurrection in St. Paul's correspondence be collected and compared they appear to show three distinct elements at work.

(a) There is his own view of the resurrection, which, as the evidence of Acts plainly indicates, he held in common with the Pharisaic party of his time. It is not very easy to determine precisely what shade of resurrection-doctrine he held, and possibly St. Luke was not clear himself on the matter, but the point must be discussed as the passages are examined. This form or shade of resurrection-doctrine may be assumed to have constituted a part of St. Paul's general eschatological belief at the time of his conversion to Christianity. (b) There is the distinctively Christian belief in the resurrection of Christ as a historical fact. Possibly it was afterwards interpreted in different ways according to the particular view held concerning the resurrection, but it is absolutely clear that the belief in the fact of the resurrection of Christ operated more powerfully than any other cause in transforming current beliefs in the resurrection. (c) There is the particular line of modification in St. Paul's view of the resurrection which can be traced out in process of development and which is due to his interpretation of what he accepted as the historical fact of the resurrection of Christ.

If the speeches in Acts may be accepted as in any degree authentic, they depict the Apostle as holding the general belief in a resurrection of just and unjust for a Final Judgment (cf. Ac 23⁶ 24¹⁵). The passage in 17³¹ does not necessarily refer to the resurrection of the dead in general, though v. 32 may imply that the Athenians understood it in that sense.

In 1 Thessalonians, where St. Paul's exposition of the resurrection clearly implies a resurrection before the Messianic kingdom in order that the dead may share in its blessings, it is possible that the idea may have been already present in his original scheme of eschatology, although he had not imparted it to his converts. But it is also clear that, whatever be the source of the idea, it receives a new setting, and is brought into organic connexion with the resurrection of Christ (see art. PAROUSIA).

In 1 Co 15 the whole argument presupposes a belief in the resurrection, not necessarily depending upon the resurrection of Christ, although the resurrection of Christ is used to support the belief in the resurrection of the dead and to modify the general outline of the eschatology.

The question of St. Paul's indebtedness to the mystery-religions for any ideas as to the resurrection belongs rather to the discussion of the development of his doctrine than to the evidence for his original stock of ideas on the subject.

(b) Turning to the second point, St. Paul's interpretation of Christ's resurrection, we have first of all several passages which do not call for special discussion proving the Apostle's belief in the resurrection of Christ as a historical occurrence. Indeed, the whole of his correspondence rests upon this as the most fundamental thing in his religious experience. It is well expressed in Ac 25¹⁹: 'a certain Jesus, who had died, whom Paul pretended to be alive.' The discussion of this point belongs to the following article. We are here concerned only with St. Paul's interpretation of the fact in so far as it bears on his view of the resurrection of believers or of a general resurrection.

The passages in 1 Thessalonians only yield the general inference that the resurrection of Christ is related to His Parousia; through His resurrection He is able to enter upon the Kingdom in power; God will bring Him again with the dead saints; it is as raised from the dead that He becomes the deliverer from the coming wrath.

In Galatians the subject of resurrection is not touched on, but it is possible that the famous passage in 2²⁰ may throw light on St. Paul's view of the resurrection of Christ. Taken along with other passages to be quoted later it appears certain that St. Paul, probably in common with the leaders of the primitive Church, had considered the resurrection of Christ not merely as an eschatological event, or as an article of belief, but as an event in the human experience of Christ intimately related to the experience of the believer. It is possible that we may see in such passages as Ro 1³⁻⁴ 6⁴⁻¹⁰, 2 Co 4¹¹⁻¹⁴ 13⁴, and others, the evidence of such an attitude towards the Resurrection. Ro 1³⁻⁴ is commonly interpreted to mean that St. Paul regarded the Resurrection as an evidence of the Messiahship of Jesus. But, while this may be implied, there appears to be much more implied as well. 'Son of God' is not used by St. Paul as a Messianic title but rather as a personal name, possibly implying moral likeness to God. Also 'according to the spirit of holiness' would seem to refer to the personal holiness of the human life of Jesus, so that the Resurrection marks out or distinguishes Jesus in virtue of His absolute holiness as Son of God, possessing that character. There was something in His life which made this special act of power possible in His case. In addition to this, another element in the experience is introduced, viz. faith. Not St. Paul only, as in 2 Co 4¹¹⁻¹⁴, but the early Church in general, seems to have regarded the Resurrection as a result of Christ's faith, and also as an act of necessary justice on God's part, 'by the glory of the Father.'

These factors in the interpretation of the Resurrection need to be considered in order to understand the extension of the principle to believers. Now, the passage in Galatians already cited suggests that St. Paul, in considering the death and resurrection of Christ from this point of view, had come to the conclusion that faith was the governing principle in Christ's life, and that he himself as a believer lived by virtue of the faith which Christ had exercised and which had brought Him through resurrection into a spiritual state in which He could realize and make good the purpose of God in His death by dwelling in those who believed on Him.

This is the central idea in St. Paul's view of the Resurrection—his belief in the present spiritual existence of the same Christ whose faith during His earthly life had brought about the whole possibility of resurrection, a spiritual life, and the communication of it to believers. It is a mistake to think that St. Paul separated the earthly from the heavenly Christ; the heavenly Christ was the earthly Christ in a new state of existence, but the same in experience and personal identity. Hence, by His indwelling, the principles that had been proved in His own experience could be reproduced in those who believed on Him.

(c) This brings us to the third set of passages, viz. those in which St. Paul develops the consequences of the indwelling of Christ for the future state of believers. The most important are Ro 8¹⁻³⁰ especially vv. 11, 30, 1 Co 15, 2 Co 3-5, Ph 3^{10, 20-1}. The clearest exposition of this view-point is found in 2 Co 3-5, where St. Paul develops the ministry of the Spirit in its various consequences, identifying Christ with the Spirit, and reaching the climax in the passage 4¹³⁻⁵¹⁰. The dying of Jesus is at work in him, and by the same spirit of faith he is certain that God will raise him with Jesus and present him along with the other believers, clothed in a new and glorious habitation prepared by God and already existing in heaven.

In the same way, in Ro 8 the consequences of the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ, again identified with Christ, extend to the quickening of the mortal bodies of those who are thus dwelt in. In Ph 3 the Apostle desires to be completely identified with the experiences of Christ, His death and His sufferings, in order to reach the goal of resurrection and attain to the resurrection from among the dead.

In 1 Co 15 the general line of argument is: (1) the proof of the possibility of a resurrection from the resurrection of Christ accepted as a historical event; (2) the argument from analogy, based on the Rabbinical conception of 'body,' to prove the possibility of the existence of such a thing as a spiritual body; (3) the contrast between Christ and Adam as the respective sources of the incorruptible and the corruptible, the heavenly and the earthly. The Second Man, the Last Adam, is a quickening spirit; by this title St. Paul implies all that is developed at length in Ro 8 and 2 Co 3-5. Lastly, he describes the manner in which the change from the earthly to the heavenly body is effected. Hence the general line of St. Paul's development of the doctrine is clear. As a Pharisee he held the continued existence of the soul after death; as part of his Palestinian eschatology he held the necessity of a resurrection to judgment of both righteous and wicked, and probably a first resurrection of righteous to participation in the Messianic kingdom.

Into this original stock of eschatological belief there broke the new conception of a Messiah who had died and risen. It is so clear from the Pauline correspondence that this new conception was based upon what St. Paul believed to be a trustworthy historical event, supported by contemporary evidence and confirmed for himself by his Damascus experience, that it is unnecessary to discuss the question of whether he owed this conception to one of the mystery-religions.

The effect of this new element was two-fold. On the one hand, it shifted the eschatological centre of interest, almost unconsciously, to the resurrection of Christ, as 1 Co 15 shows. The resurrection of Christ assumes a catastrophic colouring, so to speak: it becomes the first act of Divine intervention in the introduction of the Kingdom, the first step of a process whose culmination also has a catastrophic character derived from the original scheme of eschatology. On the other hand, it introduced into the eschatological scheme the doctrine of the Spirit of Christ with its new ethical implications and a special theory of the way in which the presence of the Spirit operated to transform the whole personality of the believer into the likeness of the Glorified Christ.

The tendency of this double working of the interpretation of the death and resurrection of Christ was to disturb the outline of the old eschatology. We can see in 1 Thess. the stress laid on the first resurrection, that of believers to the likeness of Christ; then in 1 Cor. the outline of the eschatological scheme is adjusted to this new emphasis: first Christ's resurrection, then the resurrection of those that are Christ's at His Parousia—clearly the first resurrection—then the end, when the Kingdom is delivered to the Father. No mention is made of what happens in this third stage, whether another resurrection takes place or not.

Thus St. Paul's doctrine of the resurrection, as far as it can be reconstructed from the Epistles, becomes limited to a resurrection of believers only, in the likeness of Christ; and further, this likeness is conceived of more and more as ethical and spiritual, and the whole ensuing state of blessing as a spiritual state rather than as a concrete kingdom on earth. But the latter never wholly disappeared from St. Paul's thinking; it only fell into the background. It is difficult to believe that St. Paul ever reached the point of abandoning entirely the resurrection of the body, although his conception of the doctrine was extremely spiritual. But the difference between a mere life of the spirit after death, even in full communion with God, and St. Paul's doctrine of a spiritual body is much more than a difference of words. It involves two fundamentally different views of redemption. The Oriental view, which influenced Alexandrian eschatology, regarded redemption as the separation of matter from spirit, the dissolution of an evil and unnatural union. The Pauline view, which was based on the Palestinian, and which ultimately passed into the distinctively Christian point of view, was the deliverance of the body from corruption, the corruptible and mortal element in it due to sin, and its true union with the spirit in an incorruptible form. No doubt metaphysical speculation may find practically no difference between a spirit preserving personal identity and a spiritual body, but it is more than doubtful whether St. Paul ever reached such a point of view.

Before leaving the subject of the Pauline doctrine of resurrection it may be of interest to add a note on the special doctrine of the spiritual body. The Kabbala reflects a theory which goes back to very early Jewish times, possibly earlier than R. Meir, that unfallen man in the garden of Eden was clothed in a garment of light, which after the Fall changed into a covering of skin (Zohar, II, 220b). In the Bardesanean Hymn of the Soul, contained in the Syriac Acts of Judas Thomas, we have also a full and striking account of the Light-Form, or spiritual counterpart of man, which remains in heaven during man's stay on earth, and is reunited to him when he casts off his earthly body and returns to his home in heaven. Likewise, in the recently discovered Odes of Solomon occur several references to the same belief, closely connected with the sacrament of baptism. Burkitt (Early Eastern Christianity, London, 1904, Lecture IV, p. 124 f.) has shown that in early Syriac Christianity the sacrament of baptism was believed to have a special efficacy in relation to complete physical resurrection, and was limited to celibates. Hence the Pauline doctrine of a spiritual body seems to have its roots in early Jewish metaphysical and cosmological speculation, although considerably modified by his views of the ethical and spiritual element in the resurrection of Christ.

There is also a remarkable resemblance between the theory of resurrection put forward in 2 Bar 40-51 and St. Paul's doctrine of the spiritual body. According to Baruch, all who have died are first raised in precisely the same physical form in which they were buried (50²); they are then transformed, the righteous into the likeness of angels, and the wicked into some worse or baser aspect (51¹⁻⁸). In St. Paul's doctrine transformation holds good only of the living who remain until the Parousia; the dead are raised in their new and glorious form. Charles would also add that the believing dead receive their glorious form or state immediately after death, according to his view of 2 Co 5. In St. Paul's teaching there is no place for the resurrection of the wicked, or for any such change as is taught in 2 Bar 50¹. The only exception is Ac 23⁶.

2 Timothy is the only one of the Pastorals that contributes anything of importance to our subject. ἀφθαρσία, 'incorruptibility,' is one of the elements of the Pauline gospel (1¹⁰⁻¹¹). The elect are to obtain salvation with eternal glory (2¹⁰). Those who share the death will also share the life, those who suffer will reign (2¹¹). There were some who taught that the resurrection had already happened (2¹⁸), but no answer to this heresy is deemed necessary by the author of the Epistle, showing that the belief in a future resurrection already formed a part of the orthodox faith. Christ is to judge both living and dead (4¹). But there is little or nothing of the distinctively Pauline teaching on the resurrection.

3. The Catholic Epistles.—(a) Hebrews is important for our inquiry. The resurrection of Christ is held firmly as a historical event. God brought Christ again from the dead (13²⁰). Yet the resurrection-state of Christ seems to be conceived of as purely spiritual, and the same term 'perfected,' τετελειωμένος, is used of Christ's present condition (7²⁸) as is used for the present state of the righteous, 'the spirits of just men made perfect' (12²³). 'A better resurrection' is spoken of in 11³⁵ as the object of the hope of the martyrs.

The general tendency of the Epistle seems to point to what Charles calls a spiritual resurrection, the belief which, as we have already seen, was characteristic of Alexandrian Judaism. But it is impossible to draw any conclusions from this Epistle as to the place of the resurrection in the general scheme of eschatology.

(b) The First Epistle of Peter supports the contention already put forward that the early Church regarded the faith of Christ as an important element in the historical fact of His resurrection. The Epistle draws a parallel between the ark as the means of salvation for Noah and his company from the judgment of his time and Christian baptism, which by the resurrection of Christ saves the believer from the eschatological judgment which is regarded as imminent. But the manner of the salvation is left quite vague. Believers are to share the 'glory' which is to be revealed at the Parousia, but in what state is left undefined. There is also a vague reference to the future state of the wicked (4⁶), but it is impossible to draw the implication of the resurrection of the wicked from it.

4. The Synoptic Gospels.—One or two passages in the Synoptic Gospels fall to be considered here, although, owing to the difficulty of ascertaining the original form of Christ's sayings, we can gather from them only the general nature of His attitude towards the resurrection-doctrine of His time.

In the passage containing the question raised by the Sadducees as to the resurrection (Mk 12¹⁸⁻²⁷ = Mt 22²³⁻³²), the Marcan form of the Saying of Christ, closely followed by Matthew, appears to show two elements: (1) the acceptance of the current Pharisaic belief in a future resurrection, although the position of that resurrection in the eschatological scheme is not defined, and a too materialistic view of the resurrection-state is corrected; (2) an argument, more rabbinico, in which it is proved from Ex 3⁸ that the resurrection follows from the nature of the relation between God and the patriarchs. The line of argument appears to imply that the relation 'God of the living' is not fully satisfied by the present state of the patriarchs in Sheol or Paradise, but requires the resurrection of the persons concerned to give its full meaning and truth. The older doctrine of Sheol, as represented in many of the Psalms, teaching that in Sheol there was no relation between God and the soul, would give more point to the argument; but that doctrine can hardly have been current in the time of Christ, nor would it have been denied by the Sadducees. The Lucan form of the Saying (Lk 20³⁴⁻³⁶) either has been considerably modified by Luke, or has its source in a different tradition. The phrase τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῆς ἐκ νεκρῶν (v. 35) is Pauline, as is also the thought of attaining to the resurrection (cf. Ph 3¹⁰).

The Pharisaic view of the resurrection is given in much fuller detail. The resurrection is definitely connected with the Messianic Age, τοῦ αἰῶνος ἐκείνου, but those who rise cannot die again; they enter on their eternal state, possibly as against the doctrine of the death of Messiah and His companions at the close of the Messianic Age, taught in 4 Ezra (see above). The implication that the resurrection is only for the righteous is made clearer: 'sons of God' is the equivalent of 'sons of the resurrection.' But in the second part of the argument an addition is made which implies a general resurrection—'all live unto Him.' This is not consistent with the older form of the Saying and its implication, and may possibly arise from the same point of view which led St. Luke to represent St. Paul as holding the doctrine of a general resurrection in Ac 23⁶.

Although the Synoptic Gospels are outside our field of inquiry, yet they illustrate the primitive background of the Christian resurrection-doctrine, the spiritualizing tendency at work having a partial source of support in our Lord's teaching, and the possibilities of later modifications of an earlier tradition.

5. The Johannine literature.—(a) The Apocalypse.—In the Apocalypse we have the only absolutely explicit teaching of more than one resurrection. Here also the question is complicated by source-theories. The principal passage with which we are concerned is 20⁴⁻⁶, 11¹⁻¹⁵. This passage, after the account of the binding of Satan in the Abyss during the 1000 years (vv. 1³), goes on to describe the resurrection of those who had been slain during the tribulation. They live and reign with Christ 1000 years (vv. 4⁶). Then at the close come the final assault of Gog and Magog, their defeat, the general judgment and resurrection of all the dead, or, strictly speaking, of the rest of the dead (v. 5), for judgment.

In considering this passage we have to take several points into account: (1) The possibility of different sources. E. de Faye (Les Apocalypses juives, Paris, 1892, p. 171 f.), following F. Spitta's analysis (Die Offenbarung des Johannes untersucht, Strassburg, 1889), assigns 20¹⁻³ to a Caligula-Apocalypse of Jewish authorship, while 20⁴⁻⁶ is assigned to a Christian redactor of Trajan's time. Hence the original Apocalypse would not have contained a pre-millennial resurrection. Modern critical opinion, however, has expressed itself strongly in favour of unity of authorship, and that authorship Christian. Thus we are sufficiently justified in regarding as held in the time of Domitian, in certain Christian circles, the view that there was a pre-millennial resurrection, possibly of martyrs only, followed by a post-millennial general resurrection for judgment.

(2) There is also the possibility that the author, who seems to distinguish the Church from the remnant of Israel and the slain martyrs of the tribulation, may have regarded the rapture and resurrection which St. Paul contemplates in 1 Th 4 as having already taken place. The difficulty of interpreting the symbolic representations comes in here, but it is possible that the elders already in heaven in ch. 5 represent the Church. In this case we have a scheme of three resurrections implied: (i.) the resurrection and rapture of the Church before the pre-Messianic woes commence; (ii.) the pre-millennial resurrection at the close of the tribulations, confined by Charles to the martyrs; and (iii.) the resurrection of the rest of the dead at the end of the millennium for the general Judgment. In support of this view there is the evidence of a somewhat ambiguously expressed belief that the Church would be saved from the final tribulation, possibly due to St. Paul's teaching. Even if this be not accepted—and there are serious objections to it—it is impossible to think that the author could have confined the enjoyment of the millennial kingdom to the martyrs and survivors, shutting out all the righteous of early times, and those believers who had died, but not as martyrs, before the establishment of the kingdom. Those who have part in what the writer calls 'the first resurrection' are 'blessed and holy.' It hardly seems likely that he contemplated the omission of any who possessed this character from the first resurrection. The phrase 'the first resurrection' certainly militates against the view of three resurrections. But, as we have seen from St. Paul's earlier scheme, possibly abandoned afterwards by him, the resurrection of Christ could be considered as the commencement of a resurrection which culminates with that of the dead believers—'Christ the firstfruits; then they that are Christ's, at his coming' (1 Co 15²³). Possibly the author of the Apocalypse may have understood the first resurrection in such a sense, namely, as a process commencing with the resurrection of Christ, continuing with the rapture and resurrection of the Church before the tribulation, and closing with the resurrection of martyrs at the beginning of the Messianic kingdom on earth. But this is certainly a highly disputable point.*

(3) Lastly, we must note that the author's scheme is clearly a combination of non-congruent elements. It combines at least two views of the resurrection, and possibly three, if we accept the influence of the Pauline teaching as suggested above. He has combined the early Judaic and Pharisaic view of an earthly temporal Messianic kingdom, to which the righteous are raised, with the later view, partly due to Alexandrian influence and also to the failure of Messianic hopes after the destruction of Jerusalem, of a general resurrection of righteous and wicked for judgment before the establishment of an eternal kingdom in a new heaven and earth.

* Charles has offered a reconstruction of this passage in ExpT xxvi. [1914-15] 54, 119.

It is obvious that the resurrection of all the righteous and holy before the Messianic kingdom, if we accept this as the writer's intention, renders nugatory a discriminating judgment at the close of the kingdom, for none but the wicked are left to be raised. Yet the account of the final resurrection and judgment clearly implies a discriminating judgment.

Of the nature of the resurrection-condition we can gather nothing from the writer of the Apocalypse.

(b) The Fourth Gospel.—The Gospels lie outside the plan of this work. Yet the Fourth Gospel by its date belongs to our period, and a few words as to its teaching on resurrection are necessary to complete our account of the whole view of the resurrection during the Apostolic Age. See also artt. PAROUSIA and IMMORTALITY.

The principal point to be observed concerning the resurrection-doctrine of this Gospel is that it presents the completion of that process which we observed at work in the Pauline eschatology. The conception of Christ's resurrection has completely transformed the traditional doctrine of resurrection. The resurrection of Christ is the demonstration of the nature of His spiritual life, the eternal life, pre-existent, and incapable of being touched by death. Hence Christ not only rises, but is in His own Person the Resurrection and the Life. The two ideas coalesce in Him. Hence the believer in Christ, possessing eternal life, possesses the resurrection-life already, and after death merely enters into its fuller enjoyment. Hence, in consistency, an eschatological scheme of resurrection has no place in this writer's view. But such a scheme certainly had a place in Christ's teaching, and the writer could not wholly remove it from his presentation and interpretation of that teaching; and even if we allow with Charles and other scholars that 5²³⁻²⁹ is an interpolation, we still have the repetition of the phrase 'I will raise him up at the last day.'

Like all the NT writers, the author of the Fourth Gospel presents elements which are not entirely congruent, save by a forced and artificial process of exegesis. We have the furthest and highest spiritual development of the doctrine of life, transcending the current views of eschatological events, and we have also the survival, perhaps unconscious, perhaps a conscious accommodation to the readers' point of view, of the older doctrine.

6. The Apostolic Fathers.—(a) 1 Clement.—The author of 1 Clement in a curious passage (chs. 24-26) proves the doctrine of the future resurrection along the lines of St. Paul's proof in 1 Co 15. He uses the analogy of day and night, of the seed sown, and finally the myth of the phoenix, to illustrate his view. But, while a resurrection of the flesh is clearly implied, its time and nature are left undefined. The only other passage that bears on the subject is in ch. 50, where the resurrection and public manifestation of the righteous are placed at the ἐπισκοπή τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ Θεοῦ, apparently the coming of the Kingdom; but whether an earthly millennial kingdom is intended or an eternal heavenly one is not clear.

(b) 2 Clement.—In this little treatise we have a good deal more definite teaching on the resurrection. In ch. 8 the future state of the believer is contingent on purity of the flesh and on baptism. In ch. 9 the resurrection of the flesh is explicitly stated, 'Let none of you say that this flesh is not judged nor rises again,' 'we shall receive the reward in this flesh.' In ch. 14 we have an apparent similarity to the mystical teaching of Ignatius. The relation between flesh and spirit is conceived of as corresponding to the relation between the Church and Christ; the abuse of the one involves the loss of the other. Life and immortality are connected with the possession of the Spirit, which is identified with Christ. In chs. 16 and 17 a physical resurrection of both righteous and wicked at the Day of Judgment is implied. In ch. 19 those who do righteousness 'gather the immortal fruit of the resurrection.'

(c) Ignatius.—The general trend of Ignatius' attitude towards the resurrection closely resembles, and has possibly been formed by, that of the Fourth Gospel. Christ is his true life. He expects to rise again to God as the immediate consequence of his martyrdom. He lays stress, however, in the Pauline way, on the salvation of both flesh and spirit by the Passion of Christ, who Himself rose both in flesh and in spirit. The possession of life and immortality is also connected with the Eucharist, 'the medicine of immortality' (Eph. xx. 2). In Magn. 9 we have a reference to the raising of the righteous dead of the OT, by the descent of Christ into Hades, possibly reflected in Mt 29^{52, 53}; cf. also Hermas, Sim. ix. 16, and Gospel of Peter, 9. In Smyrn. 3 we have the assertion of the physical resurrection of Christ, in 7 those who have love are those who will rise again. In the Letter to Polycarp, 7, is the only clear reference to the resurrection as an eschatological event, 'that I may be found your disciple at the resurrection.'

From the nature of the correspondence a clear statement of eschatological views is hardly to be expected, but it is fairly clear that the older scheme of eschatological expectation has no living place in the experience of Ignatius. 'Christ our life' has for him replaced the earlier form of Jewish Christian hope.

(d) Epistle of Polycarp.—This letter contains two references (chs. 2 and 5) to the resurrection as the subject of future hope, but nothing definite as to its time and nature.

(e) The Didache.—In the last chapter of the Didache we have a brief summary of the kind of eschatology which was characteristic of primitive Judæo-Christian community represented by this treatise. There is the great tribulation preceded by a general apostasy, as in the little Apocalypse of Mk 13. Then come the signs of the Parousia, the third sign being the resurrection of the dead. Then the writer adds, 'but not of all the dead,' quoting Zec 14⁵ in order to limit the resurrection to the righteous only.

This apparently will be the pre-millennial resurrection of Rev 20⁴⁻⁶. But no mention is made of a final judgment and resurrection.

(f) Barnabas teaches (v. 7) the general resurrection and judgment of both wicked and righteous, and also (xi. 8) lays stress on the importance of baptism in this respect (cf. also xxi. 1. 6).

(g) The Shepherd of Hermas.—In this strange medley we have what may represent the point of view of the poorer and uneducated class of Christians in Rome about the middle of the 2nd century. Much stress is laid on baptism for the salvation of flesh and spirit to the Kingdom of Christ (Vis. iii. 5). In Vis. iv. iii. 5 the world is to be destroyed by blood and fire, but the righteous pass through the final tribulation in safety. The elect will dwell in the world to come, without spot and pure. In Sim. iv. 'the world to come is summer for the righteous, but winter for the wicked.' All are to be manifested in that world and to receive the reward of their deeds. In Sim. v. vii. 4 both flesh and spirit, kept pure, are to be preserved for the future life. In Sim. ix. 16 we have the fullest passage for the raising of the OT saints, but with considerable differences from the view that apparently became stereotyped in the Roman Creed. The apostles after their death preached to the OT saints and gave them the seal of baptism. It is remarkable that Hermas, speaking of the apostles, says, 'they went down alive and came up alive,' in contrast with the OT saints who 'went down dead and came up alive.'

It is difficult to extract much coherency from the rambling visions and parables of Hermas, but apparently he conceives of the completion of the tower, the Church, as the moment when the world to come will be ushered in. There will be judgment of wicked and righteous, a great tribulation, a resurrection of flesh and spirit for the righteous, and apparently eternal death or annihilation for the wicked.

Hence, the survey of the Apostolic Fathers shows us in the main the same lines of cleavage, represented by Ignatius and the Didache respectively. We have too little remaining to us of the literature of the Church of this period to form a comprehensive judgment. C. H. Turner (Studies in Early Church History, Oxford, 1912, p. 1 ff.) has already entered a weighty protest against regarding the Didache as in any way representative of the general thought and practice of the Church at the beginning of the 2nd century. Nor can we infer that the type of eschatology which it represents largely outweighed the more spiritual form of hope characteristic of the Christian experience of Ignatius.

III. CONCLUSION.—In closing this examination of the doctrine of the resurrection as held in various circles of the early Church during the 1st cent. of Christianity the same general conclusions meet us as appeared at the close of the survey of the Parousia. There are, however, some important differences in the development of the two conceptions.

The Parousia—that is, the coming of Messiah with glory to inaugurate a time of bliss—had always formed a somewhat uncertain element in Jewish eschatology. It was not bound up with the future hope of Israel by any moral necessity; hence we find it absent from various forms of Jewish eschatology, and at various periods.

The resurrection of the righteous, on the other hand, was increasingly regarded by the best Jewish thought as morally bound up with the character and faithfulness of God, and hence appears in nearly every form of eschatological construction, whether strictly Messianic or not.

Thus, when we pass into NT eschatology, we find that the two factors of the belief in the historical resurrection of Christ as the Messiah, and the connexion of this resurrection with His own moral character and God's response to it, operate much more cogently in the development of the resurrection-doctrine of the NT than in that of the Parousia, especially in St. Paul's teaching. Hence we find two lines of thought of unequal strength at work in St. Paul's treatment of the subject.

(1) On the one hand, he seeks to find a place for the resurrection of the believers in the general scheme of eschatology as he had inherited it, and to relate the resurrection of Christ and those who were vitally connected with Him to the whole scheme. The result was a disturbance of the main lines of the Palestinian eschatology and a gradual blurring of its determined sequence of events.

(2) On the other hand, St. Paul is far more interested in working out the nature of the resurrection of believers as a moral implication of the resurrection of Christ. The essential form of his resurrection-doctrine is principally determined by this factor, although his Judæo-Hellenistic psychology, his Rabbinical metaphysics, and his Pharisaic eschatology have a subordinate influence on his modes of thinking. These three last factors contribute far less to the essence of St. Paul's resurrection-doctrine than has been generally supposed.

The outstanding results of the development in those circles where the historical resurrection of Christ remained the fundamental fact in the Church's belief were the gradual liberation of the belief in the resurrection of believers from any particular scheme of eschatology and an increasing spiritualization of the resurrection. The strength of the belief in the physical resurrection of Christ, however, caused the resurrection of the body or the flesh to become a fixed element in the belief of the Church as a whole, as witnessed by the early forms of creed.

The subsidiary results of development were a divergence of opinion between those circles in the Church which held to the Jewish expectation of an earthly kingdom and those which inclined to the Alexandrian view. In the former the millennial scheme prevailed, with a resurrection of the righteous preceding the Messianic kingdom, and a general resurrection and final judgment following it. This is represented in the Apocalypse and the Didache, and was perhaps most prevalent in the Palestinian churches and in the country districts of Asia Minor. In the latter circles the tendency was to regard the righteous as entering upon their glorified state after death, although even here the conception of a final resurrection as necessary for the full consummation was retained, and the belief in a final resurrection of both righteous and wicked for judgment kept its place.

It is not too much to say that the real inwardness, the essence, of both the Pauline and the Johannine doctrine of the resurrection failed to be apprehended by the Church as a whole, although individuals such as Ignatius show clear traces of its influence.

I. THE PLACE OF THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST IN THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH.—The fundamental fact on which the Apostolic Church rests is the resurrection of Jesus Christ. What lies at the basis of everything else determining the whole round of apostolic thought and life is the conviction that the Jesus who was crucified was raised from the grave by the power of God and is now the Exalted and Sovereign Lord. Apart from this the very existence of Apostolic Christianity as exhibited in the NT is unintelligible and inexplicable. Three aspects of this fundamental significance of the Resurrection may here be indicated.

(a) It is the fountal source or spring of the apostolic faith, that which brought the Church into existence and set it moving with that wonderful vitality and power which lie before us in the NT. Much of modern historical criticism attempts to find the impulse which constitutes Christianity in the impression of the life and teaching of Jesus on His disciples. But so far as that went, and if that were all, there would have been no such thing as the Christianity of the apostles. There might have been memoirs of Him, there might have been a school of thought founded on His teaching, but there would have been no living faith, no Christian gospel, no Apostolic Church. He had spoken as no man had ever spoken; He had done many mighty works, 'works which none other man did' (Jn 15²⁴). And more than what He said and did was what He was—the unique impression of His life and personality, whereby He made men feel that in Him they were face to face with one who was none other than the great Promised One of God, 'the Christ' (Mk 8²⁹, Mt 16¹⁶, Lk 9²⁰), 'the Holy One of God' (Jn 6⁶⁹; cf. Ac 3¹⁴, 'the Holy and Righteous One').

Yet the faith called forth by the life of Christ was a faith which broke into fragments under the crash of the Cross. The creative force or dynamic of Christianity has, as a matter of history, to be found in an event that carries us beyond the limits of the earthly life. It was the Resurrection, viewed as a great declaratory act of God, the fact that God 'raised him from the dead, and made him to sit at his right hand' (Eph 1²⁰), that re-interpreted and re-established the faith evoked by the Life, and for the first time gave Him His true place as Lord and Christ in their lives. This is best seen by reference to the reports of St. Peter's speeches in the Acts, in which, by general consent, we have a true representation of the earliest Christian preaching. In these speeches St. Peter starts indeed from the historical Person of Jesus and from facts well known to his hearers regarding His life on earth: 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man accredited to you by God through miracles and wonders and signs which God performed by him among you, as you yourselves know' (Ac 2²²); 'anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power: who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him' (10³⁸).

This Divine approval of Jesus on earth, as certified by His works, was, however, apparently contradicted and denied by His death on the Cross, which to the Jew was the symbol of Divine rejection (5³⁰ 10³⁹; cf. Dt 21²³). But the difficulty thus presented to faith by His death was removed or annulled by the Resurrection on 'the third day' (10⁴⁰), which is represented as a great historical act on the part of God, who thereby reversed Israel's act of rejection and vindicated the claim of Jesus to be the Christ, 'whom ye crucified, whom God raised' (4¹⁰; cf. 2²⁴ 3² 3¹⁵).

Thus through the Resurrection Jesus is proclaimed not only as 'Messiah' (3¹⁸⁻²⁰ 4²⁵⁻²⁸), but as 'Lord' (1²¹ 2³¹ 3² 3¹⁵ 2³¹ 5³¹ 10³⁶), 'Saviour' (5³¹ 4¹²), 'In none other is there salvation', 'Prince of life' (3¹⁵ 5³¹), and 'Judge of quick and dead' (10⁴², represented as in accordance with the teaching of Jesus Himself). So men are called to repentance and to be baptized in the name of Christ for the remission of sins and receiving of the gift of the Holy Spirit (2³ 10⁴⁵).

(b) Not only is the resurrection of Christ the fountal source or spring of Apostolic Christianity, so that from it the apostolic gospel dates; it is itself the very centre and substance of His gospel. So far from being a mere accessory or appendage to the apostolic message, a detached event added on to the life and teaching of Jesus to assure the disciples of His survival of death and of the truth of His claim, in it lay germinally and as in a kernel the whole gospel they had to preach; so that the preaching of Christ is for the apostles the preaching of His resurrection, and their primary function is to be witnesses of the fact (Ac 1⁸ 2², etc.). St. Paul but represented the common apostolic mind when, writing to the Corinthians, he said: 'If Christ hath not been raised, then is our preaching vain' (κενόν), there is nothing in it, it has no real content); and 'your faith is vain (ματαιά, it is futile, to no purpose, fruitless of effect); ye are yet in your sins' (1 Co 15¹⁴ 17). If Christ died and in that 'loam Syrian town' lies in His grave like other men, then the whole gospel of the apostles falls to the ground, for the good news they have to declare is that God hath raised up Jesus from the dead and made Him the Exalted Lord to whom all power is given in heaven and on earth. 'This Jesus whom ye crucified God hath made both Lord and Christ' (Ac 2³⁶)—this is the concentrated essence of the gospel they proclaim. There is nothing else in it except what comes out of this, and belongs to this, and is illumined by this.

The resurrection of Christ, viewed not as a mere revivification of His earthly body but as His entrance on a state of exalted power and Lordship, is the key which unlocks the inner meaning and significance of His earthly life and ministry. The earthly life of Jesus, with its amazing memories, is seen to be a very incarnation of God, a 'sending forth' of His Son by the Father, the event to which all else in the world's history had been moving (Gal 4⁴). The Death on the Cross, the very symbol of shame, which had seemed to wipe out for them the meaning of the Life, becomes in the light of the Resurrection full of Divine meaning and significance, the central disclosure of redeeming self-sacrificing Love.

But more than this; the revelation of the life and death of Christ attained its end and became an effective reality only through the Resurrection. For only through His being raised from the dead and His exaltation to supreme power and sovereignty with the redeeming virtue of His life and death in Him, did Christ enter fully on His career as Prince and Saviour (Ac 5³¹), and become the life-giving principle of a new humanity (1 Co 15⁻), the second Adam (Ro 5¹², 1 Co 15⁴⁵), inaugurating a new era in the process of Divine creative evolution. The religion of the apostles is communion with a Risen Lord. Only 'in Him,' 'in Christ,' in union with a living Saviour, have we redemption and renewal of life (Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴ 2¹³, Ro 3²⁴).

(c) As the entrance of the crucified and buried Jesus on a state of exalted power and glory in which He is Lord both in grace and in nature, the Resurrection is, further, the fundamental determinative principle of the whole apostolic view of the world and life. It pervaded and revolutionized their whole universe of thought, controlling and governing their interpretation of existence and creating a new intellectual perspective so that all things—God, the world, man—came to be viewed sub specie Resurrectionis. The characteristic apostolic title for God becomes 'God the Father who raised Jesus Christ from the dead' (e.g. Ro 4²⁴ 6⁸, Col 2¹, 1 P 1²¹). The God in whom they believe is One whose character is once for all made manifest in that He raised up Jesus Christ. The Cross and the Burial had seemed to be the triumph of evil in the world, the final defeat of holy love. But by the Resurrection and Exaltation God had vindicated the holiness of Jesus, and by thus vindicating Jesus had vindicated and authenticated Himself. At the great crucial moment in the world's moral history, in the case of a perfectly holy life, the omnipotence of God—in apostolic language the 'working of the strength of his might' (Eph 1¹⁹)—was shown to be on the side of goodness and righteousness. Through the resurrection of Christ, too, as no merely spiritual resurrection—'the survival of personality beyond death'—but a rising from the grave and from the power of death, God has convincingly manifested the supremacy of spirit over the strongest material forces.

The long struggle between nature and spirit was concentrated climactically in the body of Jesus, and by His bodily resurrection from death and the grave—and what other kind of resurrection from the grave could there be?—victory is shown to remain with spirit. Death itself, the crowning manifestation of the seeming victory of material forces over spirit, has been vanquished and overcome; and this supreme and crucial revelation of the power and character of God sheds its transfiguring light over all other revelation in nature and history, illuminating the mysteries of life here and of destiny hereafter. By the Resurrection assurance of personal immortality is given to men, and the present life in the fullness of its embodied existence is lifted above the vicissitudes of time and invested with infinite meaning and eternal value. 'Wherefore'—such is the conclusion of St. Paul's great argument in the Resurrection chapter in 1 Cor.—'be ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord' (15⁵⁸). In a word, the resurrection of Christ was for the apostolic mind the one fact in which the world and history arrived at unity, consistency, coherence; the pledge and the guarantee of 'the gathering together in one of all things in Christ' (Eph 1¹⁰). It was the breaking in upon human life of a new world of triumph and hope, in which were contained at once the pledge and the ground of the consummation of God's purpose for the world. Hence the vitalizing and energizing optimism of the apostolic outlook on life—'born anew to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead' (1 P 1³).

That the Resurrection holds this place of centrally determinative importance in the Apostolic Church is a fact which, if not always sufficiently realized by the friends of Christianity in subsequent centuries, is at all events acknowledged by her opponents. D. F. Strauss, e.g., the most trenchant and remorseless of her critics in dealing with the Resurrection, acknowledges that it is the 'touchstone not of lives of Jesus only, but of Christianity itself,' that it 'touches all Christianity to the quick,' and is 'decisive for the whole view of Christianity' (New Life of Jesus, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1865, i. 41, 397). If this goes, all that is vital and essential in Christianity goes; if this remains, all else remains. And so through the centuries, from Celsus onwards, the Resurrection has been the storm centre of the attack upon the Christian faith. The character of this attack has varied from age to age. To-day it differs in important respects from what it was even fifteen or twenty years ago. The application of new and more stringent methods of criticism to the evidence, the rich store of new material provided through recent researches in comparative religion and mythology, the re-discovery of Judaistic apocalyptic literature, and the new interest in the psychology of religion—all this has given 'a new face' to the critical attack.

It is not, indeed, that the apostolic belief in the resurrection of Christ, or the centrality of this belief to Apostolic Christianity, is denied. These are admitted on all sides as incontestable. What is called in question is the validity of the belief, the historical reality of the fact or facts on which the belief was based. It is held that in the light of the new critical methods applied to the evidence, and the new knowledge made accessible to us to-day in the light of what is generally, though ambiguously, called 'modern thought,' it is no longer possible for us to believe in the Resurrection as the apostles believed in it. In particular, in much present-day discussion it is maintained that, in view of modern scientific-historical criticism of the evidence, it is impossible to believe in the resurrection of Christ in any other sense than that of a spiritual resurrection. The result is that to-day we are faced with this somewhat new situation, that not by the opponents of Christianity only, but by some of its most honoured supporters and advocates in their effort to recommend Christianity to the 'modern mind,' the bodily resurrection of Christ is denied, or minimized as forming no vital or essential part of the Christian faith.

We shall first of all examine the nature and extent of the historical evidence which is presented in the apostolic writings for the fact of the Resurrection, and thence deduce the nature or character of the apostolic belief in the fact. Thereafter we shall consider the meaning or significance of the Resurrection for Apostolic Christianity—this in itself is part of the apostolic evidence for the fact, as the true nature of a cause becomes apparent only in its effects—and finally examine the main critical attempts to explain the belief without acknowledging the fact. In the course of the inquiry the conviction will be expressed and supported that the recorded evidence for the resurrection of Christ, though in many ways disappointingly meagre and when critically examined not devoid of 'contradictions,' or 'discrepancies,' is yet adequate and sufficient for the purpose in view, and that those critics who come to negative conclusions do so less because of difficulties connected with the evidence than because of pre-suppositions or præjudicia of a dogmatic or philosophical character with which they come to the examination of the subject. The evidence available for the resurrection of Christ, it is recognized, can appeal aright only to those to whom the fact has a significance altogether different from that which an ordinary fact of human history can ever possess. Mere historical evidence is of itself incompetent to generate true Christian faith in the Resurrection. This depends on anterior and prior considerations determining our religious attitude to the fact—upon our philosophy of life and, in the last resort, upon our estimate of Jesus Christ Himself.

II. THE APOSTOLIC EVIDENCE FOR THE FACT.

—I. THE PRIMARY EVIDENCE.—In proceeding to examine the evidence for the fact it should be remarked, to begin with, that this is much wider than is often represented. The historical evidence presented in the NT narratives—upon the examination of which the truth of the Resurrection is often decided—is after all but a small part of the witness by which the fact is established. The primary evidence lies further back, in the transformation effected in the lives of the apostles, giving rise to the Christian Church; in the fullness of that energizing life and power of which the NT writings are themselves but the product. To realize the greatness of this transformation we have but to take the picture of the apostles after the event as given in the Acts, and compare it with that before as given in the Gospels. Sadness has given place to joy, weakness to strength, cowardice to courage, despair to confidence. The men who, timorous and un-understanding, had forsaken their Master in His hour of utmost need, who counted all their hopes in Him lost when He was put to death, who, disillusioned and hopeless, had for fear of the Jews shut themselves up within closed doors, now face the rulers of the land proclaiming that He whom they had condemned and crucified was indeed the Christ, the Messiah, in whom alone there was salvation (Ac 4¹), and summoning them to repentance and to baptism in His name for the remission of their sins and the receiving of the gift of the Holy Ghost (28³).

Such a change, such a moral and spiritual transformation, with the results following, demands a sufficient cause. What the apostles' own explanation was we know—the Resurrection 'whereof we are witnesses' (Ac 2³² 3¹⁵ 5³² 10⁴¹, etc.). They believed that the Crucified Jesus was now the Risen and Exalted Lord, raised from the dead on the third day by the power of the Father—a belief which early found institutional expression in the observance of the first day of the week as 'the Lord's Day.' Whether they were deceived or not, is not now the question. It is sufficient at present to note that this is the primary evidence in relation to which all other evidence must be seen. 'It is not this or that in the New Testament—it is not the story of the empty tomb, or of the appearing of Jesus in Jerusalem or in Galilee—which is the primary evidence for the resurrection; it is . . . the existence of the Church in that extraordinary spiritual vitality which confronts us in the New Testament' (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, p. 111 f.). This is where the apostles themselves placed the emphasis. 'He hath poured forth this which ye both see and hear' (Ac 2³²), says St. Peter in his first sermon, referring to the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost as proof of the resurrection and exaltation of Christ; and in his second sermon or address the healing of the cripple is adduced as further proof (3¹⁶). In his view the evidence of the Resurrection was not merely a past event 'on the third day,' but present religious experience. 'The Resurrection was not an isolated event. . . . It was the beginning of a new and living relation between the Lord and His people. . . . The idea may be expressed by saying that the apostolic conception of the Resurrection is rather "the Lord lives" than "the Lord was raised" . . . Christ lives, for He works still' (Westcott, The Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 294 f.). Thus it is that the continued existence of the Church, and of the moral miracle in which the Church consists, is a vital part of the evidence for the Resurrection. If the Resurrection were not a fact continued into the present, the historical incidents recorded would soon have faded, like all merely historical facts, into a past significance.

The remembrance of this primary evidence for the Resurrection has important consequences. (1) The Apostolic Church, the Christian society, existed before any of the NT narratives were written, and essentially is independent of them. Therefore even if the narratives were, as alleged, 'conflicting and confused'—nay, even if it could be shown that there are features in them whose historical value is doubtful, this would not of itself disprove the fact of the Resurrection. We should in that case know less than we thought we did about the mode of the Resurrection life of Christ, but our faith in the Resurrection itself, of which the existence of the Church is the primary evidence, would not be disturbed. (2) It is only in relation to this primary evidence that the 'historical evidence' presented in the narratives can be estimated aright. The narratives were written from within the Church, they were the product of the faith created by the Resurrection. Further, they relate to a fact which is no mere event of the past, but continues as a living power in the present, and so must be viewed in the context of living history and experience. Historical criticism, therefore, which isolates the narratives from this living context, and analyzes them out of relation on the one hand to the experience of which they are the outcome, and on the other to the experience in which they result, is in its nature abstract, and can give only a limited or partial view of the facts.

ii. THE DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.—With this fundamental and primary evidence for the Resurrection before us, we pass to consider what is commonly called 'the historical evidence,' that presented in the NT documents or narratives.

1. The witness of St. Paul.—The earliest documentary evidence to the fact of the resurrection of Christ is that presented in the writings of St. Paul.

(a) The empty grave.—St. Paul is sometimes appealed to in support of a purely spiritual Resurrection, as teaching that it was the spirit of Christ which rose into new life, and his view is contrasted with the 'more materialized' representation of the Gospels. The empty tomb and the resurrection of the Body were, it is alleged, no part of St. Paul's teaching, but a later development. Schmiedel, e.g., supports his contention of the unhistorical character of the evidence for the empty tomb by reference to 'the silence of Paul . . .—a silence which would be wholly inexplicable were the story true' (Ebi iv. 4066). Weizsäcker urges that St. Paul says nothing of what happened at the grave because he knew nothing of it (*Apost. Age*², London, 1897-99, i. 5). And Harnack, while thinking it 'probable' that the Apostle knew of the message about the empty grave, holds that 'we cannot be quite certain about it.' In any case, 'certain it is that what he and the disciples regarded as all-important was not the state in which the grave was found, but Christ's appearances' (What is Christianity?, Eng. tr.³, London, 1904, p. 164 f.). What are the facts? In the first Epistle of his which has come down to us, which is also the first extant NT writing—I Thess.—written from Corinth about A.D. 51, St. Paul simply asserts the fact of the Resurrection without defining its nature. He recalls how the Thessalonians 'turned unto God from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus' (1st); 'if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so,' etc. (4th). The fact is referred to incidentally as if it were a matter unquestioned in the Church. This is St. Paul's general attitude in his Epistles, and it is an attitude even more significant as an attestation of the Resurrection than any more direct evidence.

But St. Paul's conception of the nature of the fact is plainly indicated by the more explicit reference in 1 Co 15, written about the year A.D. 55 (see Sanday, in Ebi i. 904), i.e., about twenty-five years after the Resurrection. Here St. Paul reminds the Corinthians of the fundamental facts of his preaching and of their faith—'the gospel which I preached unto you . . . by which also ye are saved' (v. 1st). In this earliest extant narrative of the facts, which is therefore the primary document in regard to the Resurrection, St. Paul's words are: 'For I delivered unto you first of all (ἐν πρώτοις, 'first and foremost' [Moffatt]) that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried; and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures; and that he appeared to Cephas,' etc. (v. 3rd). In this outline statement of the substance of his preaching in Corinth the following points of importance are to be noted:

(1) St. Paul explicitly refers to a rising 'on the third day,' which was distinct from and preparatory to the appearances. This event on the third day, as concrete an event as the death of Jesus, is set over against the burial, and is presented as the reversal of it, thus making clear what is meant by the fact. If St. Paul meant simply a spiritual resurrection, a manifestation of the spirit of Jesus from heaven, he need have said no more than that Jesus died and on the third day appeared to the disciples. The clause 'and that he was buried' not merely emphasizes the full reality of His death, but points to the grave as the state from which the Resurrection took place. 'Why mention His burial unless it was His bodily resurrection he [Paul] had in view?' (Dods, in Supernatural Christianity, p. 103). Who ever heard of a spirit being buried? Even Schmiedel somewhat inconsistently admits this: 'That Jesus was buried and that "he has been raised" (1 Co 15⁴) cannot be affirmed by any one who has not the reanimation of the body in mind' (Ebi iv. 4059). So in the other two passages in St. Paul's writings where reference is made to the burial of our Lord (Ro 6⁴, Col 2¹²). In both, the Resurrection is presented as relative to the burial and as the reversal of it, showing that even if St. Paul does not explicitly mention the empty grave it was the bodily resurrection he had in view. This is borne out by the whole line of the Apostle's argument in 1 Co 15. St. Paul is replying to those in Corinth who denied, not the continued spiritual existence of the Christian after death, but the possibility of his bodily resurrection, on the ground that they could not conceive how the body could rise; and he does so by setting the resurrection of Christian believers, the quickening of their mortal bodies (v. 4th), in closest and organic connexion with the resurrection of Christ as 'the firstfruits of them that are asleep' (v. 20). Here, obviously, only a reference to the bodily resurrection of our Lord would have been relevant. This is the conception of the Resurrection which permeates his Epistles (e.g., Ro 6^{4th}, 8¹¹, 2 Co 5¹⁻⁵, Ph 3²¹), and it is reflected in the speeches of St. Paul reported in the Acts (13²⁹, 17³¹, 26²³). Such a conception of the Resurrection, indeed, was required by the whole context of Pauline thought on the matter. For St. Paul, as for the entire Jewish Christian community, sin and physical death stood in organic connexion with each other. Hence Christ's triumph over sin involved for them His final and complete victory over the death not only of the soul but of the body as well.

(2) The significance of the term used in reference to the resurrection of Christ has to be noted as setting forth St. Paul's conception of the nature of the event. He does not say simply, 'He rose on the third day,' but, 'He hath been raised (ἐγέρθηται) on the third day.' The use of the perfect tense signifies that the event was of such a character as had an abiding effect on the condition of the Lord. His resurrection was not like other raisings from the dead recorded in the Scriptures, where the raising meant simply restoration to the old life and the old conditions, with the prospect of meeting death again in the future. Christ rose, St. Paul says, and remains in the risen state; He has triumphed over death: 'Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death no more hath dominion over him' (Ro 6⁹). As risen He belongs to a new and higher mode of being. St. Paul's conception of the nature of Christ's risen body is more fully elucidated by his teaching as regards the 'spiritual' body (see more fully below, III. ii. and IV. ii. 2 (c)).

(3) This gospel which he had preached in Corinth, including as one of its great affirmations the fact that Christ was raised on the third day, was not, he says, peculiar or original to him. He had but 'delivered' (παρέδωκα, 'passed on' [Moffatt]) what he had himself 'received' (παρέλαβον)—received not by direct revelation from Christ, but through tradition from those who were in Christ before him (see Lake, The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 33 ff.). The channel through which he received the tradition he does not here indicate. In the Epistle to the Galatians, however, an Epistle accepted with practical unanimity by NT scholars though it is difficult to date it definitely, he tells us that three years after his conversion he went up to Jerusalem expressly 'to visit Cephas' (1⁸, ἰστροῖσαι Κηφᾶν), that he stayed there for a fortnight, and that he saw St. James also. The term ἰστροῖσαι 'implies a careful and searching inquiry on his [Paul's] part' (A. Edersheim, *LT*⁴, London, 1887, ii. 625; cf. Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, p. 222, and A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., London, 1891, p. 81). That his knowledge of the details of the common Christian tradition may be traced to this visit and prolonged interview with two of the primary witnesses of the Resurrection is, therefore, altogether probable. As Schmiedel acknowledges, 'during his fifteen days' visit to Peter and James (Gal 1⁸), he had the best opportunity to perfect his knowledge on the subject in the most authentic manner' (EBi iv. 4057).

Through this visit, therefore, if not indeed already at his conversion, he came into possession of the facts which he had handed on to the Corinthians as the common Christian tradition. Some hold (e.g., W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, Gottingen, 1913, p. 90 ff.) that the tradition which St. Paul here repeats, though indirectly derived from the older apostles, was mediated for him by the Hellenistic Christianity of Damascus and Antioch, and suffered modification accordingly. But St. Paul distinctly asserts (v.¹¹) that the substance of his preaching in Corinth was identical with that of the other apostles. This is a fact of the first importance. St. Paul's conversion took place not long after the death of Christ. Lightfoot dated it six or seven years after the Crucifixion, but the trend of more recent criticism is to place it much earlier, within a year or two of this event. Harnack places it in the year following the Death, as do also McGiffert and Moffatt, while Ramsay makes it three or four and Weizsacker five years after (see art. 'Chronology of the NT' in HDB i. 424). St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem, therefore, and his interview with St. Peter and St. James fall possibly within five years, but certainly well within ten years, of the Resurrection. We have, accordingly, in documents which all reasonable critics admit, the clearest evidence as to what the fundamental facts of Christianity were, as taught in the primitive community, within the first decade of the event, by those who were primary witnesses of the Resurrection. These were that 'Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures,' that 'he was buried,' that 'on the third day he was raised from the dead according to the scriptures,' and that 'he appeared' to His disciples. If St. Paul's testimony, therefore, proves anything, it proves that the earliest apostolic witness included not only the fact of appearances of the Risen Christ, but the empty grave and the Resurrection on the third day.

(4) One other point in St. Paul's summary statement is to be noted. The atoning death of Christ ('for our sins'), and His resurrection on the third day are represented as being 'according to the scriptures' (κατὰ τὰς γραφάς, v.³¹). St. Paul's belief in the Resurrection on the third day has been represented as a deduction or inference from OT prophetic Scripture, based 'on theological rather than historical grounds' (Lake, Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 264), or as due to a 'Messianic dogmatic,' a pre-Christian sketch of the Christ-portrait derived from widespread non-Jewish myths (chiefly Babylonian in origin) and embodied in Jewish writings (see, e.g., T. K. Cheyne, Bible Problems, London, 1904, p. 113). In answer to this it is sufficient here to note that St. Paul claims to stand in this matter precisely on the same ground as the earlier apostles. The gospel he had preached to the Corinthians in its two great affirmations—the atoning significance of the Death and the reality of the Resurrection on the third day—was not, he claims, original to him; he had but 'handed on' the tradition which he had himself 'received.' The attempt to explain the primitive apostolic belief in the Resurrection on the third day as an inference from Scripture will be considered later (below, II. ii. 3).

(b) The appearances of the Risen Christ.—St. Paul's witness to the Resurrection includes, however, not only the rising on the third day but the fact of subsequent appearances of the Risen Lord. In his outline statement in 1 Co 15 the following list of appearances is given: 'He appeared to Cephas; then to the twelve; after that he appeared to over five hundred brethren at once, the majority of whom survive to this day though some have died; after that he appeared to James, then to all the apostles, and last of all he appeared to me also—this so-called "abortion" of an apostle' (vv.⁵⁻⁸).

(1) The purpose for which St. Paul adduced this list has to be noted, for the consideration of this at once removes certain objections which have been urged against it. There were some members of the Corinthian Church (τινές, v.¹) who denied the fact of the resurrection of the dead—not the resurrection of Jesus in particular, but the resurrection of the dead generally. They said, 'There is no such thing as a resurrection of dead persons' (ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν οὐκ ἔστιν, v.¹²; cf. v.²⁹, 'dead men are not raised at all' [ὅλως]), asserting a universal negative. Who these τινές were St. Paul does not say, but we know that in his missionary labours among the Greeks the subject of teaching which proved the chief stumbling-block was the resurrection of the dead. In Athens, e.g., we are told that, when he began to speak of the resurrection of dead men (ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν), they derided the very idea, and their manifest impatience and ridicule forced him to terminate his speech abruptly (Ac 17²; cf. 26⁵). These τινές in Corinth shared the prejudice of Greek culture against the idea of a bodily resurrection. They denied the possibility of the fact. They repeated the dogma 'Dead men do not rise' as the last word of philosophy, much as in modern times the similar dogma 'Miracles do not happen' has been repeated as the last word of science.

To deny the resurrection of the dead is by implication to deny Christ's resurrection, and to do this is to contravene the Gospel witness, and, further, as St. Paul shows by the reductio ad absurdum argument, to render the whole saving worth of the gospel ineffective (vv.¹⁴⁻¹⁸), and to show that they believed the gospel heedlessly or at haphazard (εἰκν, v.²) without seriously realizing the facts involved. So, before advancing to the doctrinal discussion which was the real purpose of his argument in this great chapter, St. Paul felt called to rehearse the historical evidence for Christ's bodily resurrection which he had 'received,' and which he had already 'delivered' to them by word of mouth when he was among them. In this rehearsal he recalled not only the Burial and the fact of the Resurrection on the third day, but a summary of the chief appearances of the Lord after His resurrection. Whether St. Paul is here giving his own summarized statement of the principal witnesses to the Resurrection or, as some maintain, a stereotyped or formulated summary list which he had himself received and had handed on to the Corinthians ('a selection made for purposes of preaching' [Sanday, HDB ii. 640^{*}]) does not affect the argument. In either case the list given is a summary statement of evidence already received.

The remembrance of this supplies a complete answer to the objections drawn from St. Paul's omitting to refer to certain appearances recorded in the Gospels. Weizsäcker, e.g., argues from St. Paul's silence as to the appearance to the women at the grave, recorded in the Gospels, and from his placing the appearance to St. Peter first in his list of Christophanies, to his ignorance of the fact. 'The only possible explanation is that the Apostle was ignorant of its existence' (*Apost. Age*², i. 5). And from this he proceeds to draw the inference that, since 'Paul's knowledge of these things must have come from the heads of the primitive Church, therefore it is the primitive Church itself that was ignorant of any such tradition,' which is, therefore, a 'later product' (p. 6). Such is the conclusion to which Weizsäcker comes on the supposition on which he proceeds that St. Paul is here relating the appearances 'in order to prove the fact' of the Resurrection, 'proof which he undertakes so earnestly and carries out with such precision' (p. 5). To like effect Schmiedel: 'By his careful enumeration with "then . . . next . . . next . . . then . . . lastly" (εἶτα . . . ἔπειτα . . . ἔπειτα . . . εἶτα . . . ἔταρον, 15⁸) he guarantees not only chronological order but also completeness' (EBi iv. 4038). On this ground he argues, like Weizsäcker, from St. Paul's omission of reference to the appearance to the women to his ignorance of the fact, and hence to the supposition that the Jerusalem Church, from which St. Paul derived his facts, included in its testimony to the Resurrection no such stories of the appearing of Jesus to the women as are now found in the Gospels. It is doubtless a fair inference from St. Paul's manner of expressing himself that he gives the appearances which he mentions in what he considers their chronological order. So much 'then . . . after that . . .', etc., denotes or implies.

But there is nothing to show that he considers his enumeration exhaustive. Indeed, there is everything against it. The statement here given is almost as condensed as it could possibly be, and it is difficult to see how it could ever be mistaken for an exhaustive evidential account of the proofs of Christ's resurrection. In this list nothing more than the names or numbers of the witnesses are given. No mention is made of locality or other detail of the appearances, not from lack of knowledge but because the Corinthians themselves would be able to fill in the details from memory. The passage is but a recapitulation of oral teaching, giving in a summary fashion what he had enlarged upon in all its circumstances and significance when he was among them. For this summary purpose St. Paul selects the appearances to the leaders of the Church whose names were well known to the Corinthians and would carry weight with them, and who were, like himself, specially chosen and commissioned to be witnesses of the Resurrection (1 Co 15¹⁶; cf. Ac 1²² 43³)—Cephas, the Twelve, St. James, all the apostles—mentioning, besides these, only the great crowning manifestation of the Risen Lord to 'more than five hundred brethren at once.' This in itself would explain the omission of the appearance to the women which had a more private significance and would not be of special interest to the Corinthians. It may have been on this ground too, as Sanday suggests (HDB ii. 639^b)—'because the two disciples involved were not otherwise conspicuous as active preachers or prominent leaders'—that the appearing on the way to Emmaus is not mentioned. In any case, the mere omission to mention this appearing or that to the women cannot be held to argue St. Paul's ignorance of the fact (though this was possible), much less warrant the conclusion that the manifestation of Jesus to the women had no place in the primitive Church tradition.

(2) Whether St. Paul means that the entire list of appearances here given (with the exception, of course, of that to himself) formed part of the original tradition which he had received has been disputed. The grammatical construction continues unbroken to the end of v. 5 ('that he hath been raised on the third day . . . and that he appeared to Cephas, then the twelve') and then changes ('then he appeared,' etc.): and some hold that these later appearances were added to the list by St. Paul himself. But it is precarious to make the mere grammatical structure of the sentence the basis of reasoning. Such a break is not unusual with St. Paul. Certainly the implied idea would seem to be that St. Paul is here summarizing the common tradition which he had received, and it is natural to suppose that the recapitulation extends to the end of the series. Chase interprets the break in construction, if intentional, as denoting that 'the Apostle regards the appearances which he mentions as falling into two groups,' and infers that 'he places the appearance to Cephas and that to the Twelve among the events "of the third day"' (Gospels in the Light of Hist. Criticism, p. 41).

A detailed examination of St. Paul's summary list will show how far it is in line with the Gospel accounts and confirms the narratives there given.

(i.) 'He appeared to Cephas.' The source of St. Paul's knowledge of this appearance is scarcely open to dispute. When he went up to Jerusalem to 'visit Cephas,' who can doubt that while St. Paul had much to say of his experiences on the Damascus road St. Peter told how the Master had appeared to himself on the very day of the Resurrection. Of the Evangelists, Luke alone mentions this appearance and assigns to Peter the privilege of being the first apostle to whom the Risen Lord appeared (24³⁴). The source of Luke's knowledge is not difficult to trace.

(ii.) 'Then to the twelve.' 'The twelve' is here used as the official title of the apostolic body—a technical phrase (cf. Godet, in loc.; Lake, Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 37)—without exact regard to number. It is probable that the incident to which St. Paul here refers was the appearance to the Ten in the Upper Chamber on the evening of the Resurrection (Lk 24³⁶, Jn 20¹⁹), or the appearance to the Eleven (Thomas being present) a week later (Jn 20²⁶); or it may be that St. Paul's reference would cover both these incidents. It is the fact of the manifestation of the Lord to the assembled company of His selected companions that is referred to, and the absence of Thomas on the day of the Resurrection is an accident. Accordingly, even if others were present on the first of these occasions, as Luke's language seems to imply ('the eleven and those that were with them,' v. 33), the significance of the appearance would rest in the recognition of the Lord by His chosen friends.

(iii.) 'Then he appeared to above five hundred brethren once for all' (εφ' ὅλης)—rather than 'at once' or 'simultaneously' (cf. Ro 6¹⁰, Ac 7⁷⁷ 9¹² 10¹⁰)—the implication of εφ' ὅλης being that not only did they see the Lord together but 'the occasion in question was the only one on which this large company of disciples had so wonderful an experience' (CQR lxi. [1906] 328). The identity of this appearance with that on a mountain in Galilee recorded in Mt 28²⁶—the appearance foretold in the promise of vv. 7, 10 and anticipated in Mk 16⁷—has been maintained by many. And certainly this appearance would seem to require location in Galilee, not in Jerusalem. 'An appearance to so large a body of disciples at one time could only have taken place on the Galilean hills' (Swete, Appearances of our Lord after the Passion, p. 82). Matthew, indeed, speaks only of 'the eleven disciples' in connexion with this meeting in Galilee, but in the expression 'some doubted' (οἱ δὲ ἑδίστασαν, Mt 28¹⁷) there has been found an indirect indication of the presence of a larger body. 'In the small body of the eleven there is hardly room for a "some"' (Orr, Resurrection of Jesus, p. 190). Further, as H. Latham (Risen Master, Cambridge, 1901, p. 290) urges, a meeting with the Eleven only would not have necessitated an appointment in the hill country. It could have been held with perfect safety in a room at Capernaum. Matthew's speaking only of 'the eleven disciples' in connexion with the meeting may be explained by the fact that his interest lay wholly in the commission of the Risen Lord to the apostles which was given at this meeting (cf. Chase, Gospels in the Light of Hist. Criticism, p. 42). The identification can never indeed be more than a probability. Weiss (in loc.) rejects it, and E. von Dobschütz (Ostern und Pfingsten, Leipzig, 1903, p. 34), followed by Harnack and Lake, attempts to identify the appearance with the coming down of the Holy Spirit upon the assembled company on the Day of Pentecost. But in any case it is to be noted that St. Paul, writing twenty-five years after the Resurrection, says that the majority of those 'more than five hundred' were still living and could be interrogated by his readers for themselves as he had doubtless interrogated them. Of this appearance the Apostle makes much, including it even in a summary list; as well indeed he might, for, even if the Eleven could be deceived or deceivers, was it credible that their error or their fraud would be shared by so large a company? 'Some there must have been among them who, as the days went on, would have exposed the imposture or betrayed their doubts. But if any doubts of this kind had arisen, it would have been dangerous for the Apostle to appeal to the survivors of the five hundred in a letter written to Corinth, where he had enemies who were in frequent communication with Jerusalem' (Swete, Appearances, p. 83f.).

(iv.) 'Then he appeared to James.' Of this appearance we have no notice in the Gospels. An extra-canonical account of it is found in the fragment of the Gospel according to the Hebrews preserved by Jerome (de Vir. Ill. 2), a Palestinian work of the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd century. 'The Lord . . . went to James and appeared to him; for James had sworn that he would not eat bread from the hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord until he saw Him raised from the dead. . . . Bring, the Lord said, a table and bread. . . . He brought bread, and (Jesus) blessed and brake it and gave it to James the Just and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man has risen from the dead.' This cannot, however, 'with any confidence be connected with the appearance to James the Lord's brother of which St. Paul speaks' (Swete, p. 89f.; cf. J. B. Mayor, Epistle of St. James, London, 1910, p. xxvii). Though not thus referred to elsewhere in the NT, corroboration of the fact may be derived from the light thrown by it on what we are told of the Lord's brethren after the Resurrection. That they did not believe in Him during the days of His public ministry is recorded in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7⁵; cf. Mk 3²¹). After the Ascension, however, we find them included among the little company of believers (Ac 14); and within a short time we find St. James in particular president of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 15¹³). The natural explanation of the change is contained in St. Paul's assertion 'He appeared to James.' It seems impossible to doubt that St. Paul derived his information direct from St. James himself during his fortnight's visit to Jerusalem (Gal 1¹⁸); and this appearance is included in the summary because of the special value attached to the testimony of St. James from the fact that he was the eldest brother of the Lord and head of the Jerusalem Mother Church, as well as from the fact of his previous unbelief.

(v.) 'Then to all the apostles.' The appearances in this list being set down in chronological order, the incident to which St. Paul here refers may with a reasonable degree of probability be identified with the appearance of Christ to the Eleven before the Ascension, more circumstantially narrated by Luke (24³⁶, Ac 1⁶; cf. Mk 16⁷). Ac 1²², which speaks of those who had accompanied with the Eleven from the beginning until 'the day that he was received up,' would support the contention of those who hold that on the occasion of this appearance others were present besides the Eleven, and that St. Paul means to convey this by distinguishing an appearance of 'all the apostles' from an appearance to 'the twelve.' St. Paul's wider usage of the term αποστολος makes such an interpretation possible.

The appearances recorded by St. Paul may thus be held to correspond to appearances recorded in the Gospels, with the one exception of that to St. James, which we have seen reason to assume he obtained at first hand during his visit to Jerusalem. The further appearances of the Risen Christ recorded in the Gospels of which there is no mention in St. Paul's summary—the appearance to the women, to Mary Magdalene, to the travellers to Emmaus, to the seven at the Sea of Tiberias—may have been omitted for the reason already indicated, viz. that they were of less interest for the purpose in view, having little more than a private significance. St. Paul's list, therefore, helps us to verify, and at one or two points to supplement, the narrative of the Gospels. The significance of this has to be noted. It has often been asserted that the Gospel story of the Resurrection was not committed to writing till thirty or forty years after the events recorded, and that this period allows time for the incorporation of details which may be nothing more than tradition. But here we have written down within twenty-two or twenty-three years of the event (taking the date of 1 Cor. as A.D. 55) a list of witnesses expressly affirmed to be part of the tradition which St. Paul had received either at his conversion (A.D. 31 or 33) or, at latest, during his visit to Jerusalem three years later, from first-hand sources, thus taking us back to within a few years of the event. And how remarkable a list it is—'Cephas,' 'James,' 'the twelve,' 'more than five hundred brethren,' and 'all the apostles.' To realize the weight of this testimony it must be taken as a whole and not in its isolated parts. The number and variety of the persons to whom the manifestations were made, as well as the character and status of the witnesses and the simultaneous perception by many, make this a statement of evidence for the Resurrection which cannot be made light of by the impartial historian.

(3) The most important appearing of all, as giving St. Paul's direct evidence to the Resurrection—an addition to the traditional list 'received'—has yet to be considered. Behind St. Paul's preaching of the Resurrection there stood not only the testimony of others, but the great historical fact of the Risen Lord's appearing to himself on the way to Damascus. 'Last of all (ἔσχατον πάντων) he appeared also to me—to this so-called "abortion" of an apostle' (ὡς περὶ τῷ ἐκτρώματι, v. 8).

The AV translation 'as to one born out of due time' finds the suggestion in ὡς περὶ τῷ ἐκτρώματι to be that he was born too late to witness one of the normal appearances of Christ after the Resurrection and before the Ascension. But J. Weiss points out (H. A. W. Meyer, Kommentar über das NT, Göttingen, 1868-73, Eng. tr., London, 1873-95, in loc.) that ἐκτρώμα means born not too late but too early, too quickly, the suggestion being that of the suddenness and violence of St. Paul's birth into Christ. His was an unripe and violent birth (cf. G. G. Findlay, EGT, 1 Cor., London, 1900, in loc., 'the unripe birth of one who was changed at a stroke from the persecutor into the Apostle, instead of maturing normally for his work'). In either case the point is the abnormality of St. Paul's birth into faith and apostleship, and probably the significance of the article is, as Weiss points out, that τὸ ἐκτρώμα was an insulting epithet flung at St. Paul by those who belittled his apostleship. In their eyes he was a real Misgeburt. St. Paul adopts the title and gives it a deeper meaning, arguing that, notwithstanding his abnormality and unworthiness, his apostleship was as valid as that of the older apostles.

A considerable body of negative criticism has maintained that the appearance to St. Paul was of an inward visionary character, and that, since he includes it in his list with the others without any discrimination between them except as regards time, using the same word (ὥσθι) to describe all the appearances, he must have regarded these as like his own, visionary. Weizsäcker, e.g., says: 'There is absolutely no proof that Paul presupposed a physical Christophany in the case of the older Apostles. Had he done so he could not have put his own experience on a level with theirs. But since he does this, we must conclude that he looked upon the visions of his predecessors in the same light as his own' (Apost. Age, i. 9; cf. O. Pfleiderer, Christian Origins, London, Eng. tr., London, 1906, pp. 136f., 160f.). The 'more materialistic' accounts of the appearances given in the Gospels are the outcome of later 'unhistorical embellishments.' The truth, however, is, as Westcott points out (Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 111), that the exact converse is the proper line of argument. St. Paul, we have seen, conceived of the Resurrection as a bodily resurrection, in this believing himself to be at one with the older apostles, and his use of the same term to describe all the appearances shows that he regarded the appearance of the Risen Lord to himself on the road to Damascus as of the same kind as those granted to the others. He believed, and always acted on the belief, that he had seen the Risen Lord in the same sense as did those who saw Him during the forty days, that he was a witness of Christ's resurrection in the same sense as the others were, and the last of such witnesses; and this 'seeing' he regarded as containing the basis and justification of his apostolic mission. He claimed to be as directly commissioned by our Lord in person as any other of the apostles (Gal 1¹¹⁻¹⁷). 'Am I not an apostle, have I not seen Jesus our Lord?' (οὐχὶ Ἰησοῦν τὸν Κύριον ἡμῶν ἑώρακα, 1 Co 9¹) (cf. Jn 20¹³, ἑώρακε τὸν Κύριον; v. 2, ἑώρακαμεν τὸν Κύριον; v. 2, ἑώρακάς με).

'The phrase seems to have been current in the Apostolic Church in speaking of a personal experience of the appearances of the risen Christ' (Swete, Appearances, p. 41 n.). That the reference here is to a risen appearance and not to a seeing of Jesus during His earthly life is obvious. For even if, as some maintain, St. Paul had so seen the Lord, what he is concerned with in this passage is his claim to be an apostle and a witness equally with the 'Twelve of the Lord's resurrection; and to justify this claim a 'seeing' of the Risen Lord was necessary.

The visionary character of this experience has sometimes been argued from the mere use of the term ὥφθη, but this is illegitimate. The term is, indeed, sometimes used of 'visionary' seeing (e.g. Ac 16⁹); but it is used equally of seeing which is not visionary (e.g. Ac 7²⁶). 'What it suggests in almost every case is the idea of something sudden or unexpected; that which is seen is conceived to be so, not because one is looking at it or for it, but because it has unexpectedly thrust itself upon the sight' (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, p. 116). Support for the visionary interpretation of the appearance has, however, been sought by reference to St. Paul's words elsewhere.

Two passages in particular have been adduced: 2 Co 12¹⁻⁹, Gal 1¹⁶. To take the latter first: 'When it was the good pleasure of God, who separated me even from my mother's womb, and called me through his grace, to reveal his Son in me (ἐν ἐμοί), that I might preach him among the Gentiles.' That this revelation refers to his experience near Damascus is indicated in v. 17; and it is urged that in these words St. Paul unequivocally asserts the inward character of the revelation granted to him, and that this meaning must in consequence be applied to all other passages in his writings where the point is spoken of.

But St. Paul's assertion here of the inward character of the revelation does not require us to resolve the whole manifestation into an inward experience and exclude an accompanying or preceding appearance vouchsafed to the senses. Lightfoot (in loc.) maintains that the words, 'when it pleased God to reveal his Son in me,' should be taken in close connexion with the words immediately following, 'that I might preach him among the Gentiles' (this giving the content of the inner and spiritual revelation); while the words, 'called me by his grace,' should be understood as a reference to the actual event on the Damascus road on which the inner revelation supervened. However this may be, the admission of an inner revelation does not exclude an external manifestation as well. Even such a negative critic as Meyer admits this: 'It is not therefore (because of the inward revelation) to be denied that Paul conceived the appearance of Christ to him to be objective and external' (Die Auferstehung Christi, p. 186). The revelation of God to him was two-fold, the inward supplementing the outward. Such an inward revelation indeed, as Knowing points out, was necessary to complete and interpret the outward. Without this 'the outward appearance could never have been recognised for what it was in its full meaning, nor could the Apostle have been assured against all suspicion of an illusion of the senses' (Testimony of St. Paul, p. 184). The outer revelation separated from the inner would have been valueless, and would have left St. Paul in the same bewildered state as the companions of his journey. But the outward revelation, though valueless without the inward, was a necessary condition and presupposition of it.

In the other passage referred to, 2 Co 12¹², St. Paul writes, 'I must needs glory, though it is not expedient; but I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord,' etc. May not the Apostle, it is urged, have 'seen' the Lord in one of these ecstatic visions, visions with regard to which he could not even affirm whether he was in the body or out of it? But this very passage, as Sabatier truly observes, 'shows that Paul, so far from comparing the manifestation of Christ to him at his conversion with the visions he afterwards enjoyed, laid down an essential difference between them' (The Apostle Paul, p. 65). Of the latter he speaks with the utmost reserve and reticence—'of which it is not expedient that he should glory.' But the former he places in the forefront of his preaching, as containing not only the grounds of his conversion, but, as we have seen, the basis of his claim to apostleship. Moreover, St. Paul describes the appearance of Christ here referred to as the last or a series—'last of all' (ἔσχατον πάντων). The force of the words is often overlooked. They do not mean merely that St. Paul was the last of the particular series of persons named in the previous verses; 'he does not say . . . that Christ appeared to him the last; but that He appeared to him for the last time, i.e. as in a series which was now closed' (Knowing, p. 182). St. Paul, we know, had many visions and revelations of the Lord after this, and he could not therefore tell us more definitely than he does by this expression 'last of all' how fully and clearly he distinguished between the Damascus vision and every other vision of the Risen Saviour (cf. Weiss, on 1 Co 15⁸: 'All later visions of Christ belong for Paul to a different category, they cannot be viewed in the same way as proofs of the Resurrection').

This external objective character of the appearance of the Risen Christ to St. Paul is corroborated by an examination of the three accounts of it given in Acts (9:1-22, 22:1-18, 26:1-18). The first occurs in the course of Luke's own narrative of the circumstances of St. Paul's conversion. The second occurs in the report of St. Paul's defence before Lysias, when Luke was probably present (a 'we' section). The third is in the report of St. Paul's defence before Agrippa, when Luke again was probably present. Of these different accounts Schmiedel says that 'they contradict one another so violently . . . that it is difficult to imagine how it could ever have been possible for an author to take them up into his book in their present forms' (EBi iv. 4063). The divergences, however, relate to details, not to the essential facts. 'In the essential point there is the same impression throughout' (H. Weinel, St. Paul, Eng. tr., London, 1906, p. 77).

The chief variations concern (i.) the effect of the appearance upon St. Paul's companions: in the first account they are described as 'hearing the voice but beholding no man' (9⁷, ἀκούοντες μὲν τῆς φωνῆς, μὴδὲν δὲ θεωροῦντες); in the second it is said, 'They beheld indeed the light, but heard not the voice of him that spake to me' (22⁹, τὴν δὲ φωνὴν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντος μοι); (ii.) the place of Ananias: in the first account Saul is bidden to arise and go into the city, where it shall be told him what he must do. So also in the second account. The instruction is then left to be given by Ananias. But in the third account the instruction is given by the Lord Himself and no mention is made of Ananias. These variations, however, are relatively unimportant. As regards (i.), in the very variation a significance has been discerned. 'They may have heard a vague sound (φωνῆς, genitive), and yet not the articulate, intelligible voice (φωνήν, accusative), which fell upon St. Paul's ear with a definite meaning' (H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, London, 1904, p. 86; cf. Grimm-Thayer, s.v.). As regards (ii.), St. Paul's omission in Ac 26 of the part of Ananias may be sufficiently explained by the difference of circumstances. He naturally dwelt on it in his defence before a Jewish mob (Ac 22), because the mention of Ananias and his part would be reassuring to his hearers, while in speaking before Festus and Agrippa at Caesarea such a reference would be uncalled for. In Ac 9 we have the historian's own circumstantial narrative of the course of events where we would expect Ananias to be mentioned.

In regard to St. Paul's own experience of the appearance the different accounts agree in the following details. (i.) A light from heavens suddenly shone round about him as he journeyed to Damascus (9^s, περιεστράψεν φῶς; 22^s, περιεστράψαι φῶς; 26¹³, περιλάμπαν . . . φῶς). Of this light Saul's fellow-travellers also were cognizant. (ii.) From the shock of this dazzling light Saul falls prostrate on the ground. (iii.) He hears a voice (the others heard only a sound), which he discovers to be that of the Glorified Jesus speaking to him in words which he can understand. Whether, besides seeing a splendour of light and hearing a voice, St. Paul saw also the Risen Lord in bodily form the accounts in Acts do not explicitly assert—though this seems implied in what is said by contrast of the experience of his companions, who are described as hearing the voice but 'beholding no man' (μηδενα θεωρουντες, Ac 9⁷), and in Barnabas' subsequent announcement to the Church at Jerusalem that 'Saul had seen the Lord in the way' (Ac 9²⁷; cf. his announcement to St. Paul himself, 'the Lord, even Jesus, who appeared unto thee', v. 17; cf. 22¹⁴).

That St. Paul believed he had seen the Lord in His risen body is involved in the references to the event in his letter to Corinth which we have already considered (1 Co 9¹ 15^s). In the former passage, in defending his apostleship he claims to have 'seen Jesus Christ our Lord.' The primary apostolic function was to witness to the resurrection of Christ, and in order to discharge this function it was requisite that the Apostle should with his own eyes have seen the Risen Lord. In the latter passage, in which he classes his own experience with the earlier appearances of the Risen Christ, his purpose is to prove not the continued spiritual existence of the Christian, but his bodily resurrection; and only a reference to the bodily resurrection of our Lord and a bodily appearance would have been relevant. But according to the account in Acts the aspect of the appearance which chiefly impressed him was the Divine glory of it, 'the glory of that light' (Ac 22¹¹). And this is reflected in many passages in his letters—2 Th 1⁹⁻¹¹ 2^s, 1 Co 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁹, Ro 8¹⁸⁻²⁵, 1 Ti 6¹⁵⁻¹⁶, 2 Ti 1¹⁰⁻¹², and especially Ph 3²⁰. ('the body of his glory'). The vision he saw was of Christ glorified; but this Glorified Christ was identical with the Crucified Jesus of Nazareth (Ac 22^s, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest'; 26¹⁵, 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest'). And, however the phenomena perceived by his senses were to be described, what is important to note is the immediate effect that the appearance had upon him, for St. Paul himself in his accounts of it is concerned with the significance of the fact rather than with any precise descriptive details. He became, through it, absolutely convinced that the Jesus who was crucified and whose followers he was persecuting was indeed the Risen and Exalted Lord (Κυριος); and this conviction revolutionized his whole thought and life, energizing in him unto a new life of absolute devotion and surrender whereby he became henceforth the property (δοῦλος) of a crucified but living and glorified Christ (Ro 1¹, Gal 1¹⁰, Ph 1¹). His own explanation of the transformation is contained in these words, 'He appeared to me also'—words in which he claimed for himself the same kind of revelation as that made to Peter, James, and the other apostles after the Resurrection.

Various attempts have been made to explain the appearance on purely natural grounds. Any explanation, to be satisfactory, must be able to give a sufficient reason for the greatness of the revolutionary change referred to in the persecutor's experience, with its lasting moral and spiritual effects. (i.) Taken to this test, the attempt to account for the experience as a species of epileptic seizure in scorching heat, the product of excitable nerves and atmospheric effects—a view identified with the name of Renan (cf., more recently, Weinle, St. Paul, p. 821.)—is at once condemned as inadequate. (ii.) W. James speaks of a form of 'sensory automatism' which he calls a 'photism,' a 'hallucinatory or pseudo-hallucinatory' phenomenon, and represents St. Paul's 'blinding heavenly vision' as a phenomenon of this sort (Varieties of Religious Experience, London, 1902, p. 251 f.). The parallelism between St. Paul's experience and the modern instances quoted is hard to find, but inasmuch as James himself claims that his hypothesis does not necessarily involve a denial of the heavenly or Divine origin of the appearance to St. Paul, his hypothesis need not be considered as a purely naturalistic one. (iii.) Chief of such naturalistic attempts is that which would represent the appearance as the result of St. Paul's psychological condition (Strauss, Baur, Holsten). Doubts or misgivings, so it is represented, had been working in his mind for some time previously, scruples of conscience as to his persecuting proceedings. Such scruples were induced largely by his experience of the calm confidence and triumphant joy of the Christians in persecution, as compared with his own inner consciousness of turmoil, born of the conflict between self and the holy law of God.

Strauss's classical representation of the case may be quoted: 'They [the believers in Jesus] showed a state of mind, a quiet peace, a tranquil cheerfulness, even under suffering, which put to shame the restless and joyless zeal of their persecutor. Could he have been a false teacher who had adherents such as these? could that have been a mendacious pretence which gave such rest and security? On the one hand, he saw the new sect in spite of all persecutions, nay, in consequence of them, extending their influence wider and wider around them: on the other, as their persecutor he felt that inward tranquillity growing less and less which he could observe in so many ways in the persecuted. We cannot therefore be surprised if in hours of despondency and inward unhappiness he put to himself the question: "Who after all is right, thou or the crucified Galilean about whom these men are so enthusiastic?" And when he had once got as far as this the result, with his bodily and mental characteristics, naturally followed in an ecstasy in which the very same Christ whom to this time he had so passionately persecuted appeared to him in all the glory of which His adherents spoke so much, showed him the perversity and folly of his conduct, and called him to come over to His service' (New Life of Jesus, i. 420). Time and again—so C. Holsten represents the case in his searching analysis of St. Paul's state of mind at his conversion (Zum Evangelium des Paulus und des Petrus, Rostock, 1868)—the reproachful image of Jesus, as described by Stephen and other Christians, stood before his soul and made appeal so that he was half persuaded to join himself to His followers. In such a state of mind he journeyed to Damascus, when he experienced his vision. This view is supported, it is held, by the words reported in the narrative of his conversion as spoken to St. Paul by Christ Himself, 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad' (Ac 26¹⁴). 'In what else can it have consisted,' asks Pfeiderer, 'than in the painful doubt as to the lawfulness of his persecution of the Christians—in the doubt, therefore, whether the truth was really on his side, and not rather, after all, on that of the persecuted disciples of Christ?' (Influence of the Apostle Paul on the Development of Christianity [HL], Eng. tr., London, 1885, p. 35).

Now it is not necessary to deny all inward psychological preparation on St. Paul's side for the experience issuing in his conversion. Otherwise, as Pfeiderer truly enough observes, his conversion would have to be recorded as a 'magical act of God, in which the soul of Paul would have succumbed to an alien force' (ib. p. 34). 'Such visions do not happen in a vacuum' (Moffatt, Paul and Paulinism, London, 1910, p. 10; cf. P. Feine, Theologie des NT, Leipzig, 1910, p. 202). It was the difference in this inward or psychological preparation between Saul and his journey companions that partly explains why the occurrence meant one thing to him and another to them.

As elements in Saul's psychological preparation contributing or disposing towards the result, the two factors referred to by supporters of this theory may be admitted. (1) The wonderful demeanour of the followers of the crucified Nazarene, their triumphant joy and calm, unswerving loyalty even in persecution, could not but leave a powerful impression on such an ardent and sensitive nature as St. Paul's. In particular, the calm confidence and heroism of Stephen in face of death and his dying vision of the Lord probably sank deep into his soul. And then (2) the impression made by these would be emphasized by contrast with his own experience of inward turmoil and dispeace. The words reported in the narrative of his conversion, 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad' (σκληρόν σοι προσκέντρα λατίζειν), are no doubt full of significance in this connexion. Even if proverbial, and as such not to be pressed too closely with regard to St. Paul's state of mind before his conversion (so Knowling, in EGT, London, 1900, on Ac 26¹⁴), taken in connexion with references in his letters they reveal a profound internal conflict going on within Saul's soul, a deep misgiving concerning his own religious position and standing before God. A Pharisee of the Pharisees, he had striven to attain peace with God through fulfilment of the Law, but already upon him the painful sense of failure and moral despair was pressing (cf. Ro 7). 'His soul had been pierced and lacerated by his sense of moral impotence in face of the Law. Like a stupid beast, Saul knew not whether this incessant goad was driving him, nor whose was the hand that plied it' (Findlay, HDB iii. 702b). He could not but contrast his own state of mind with that of the followers of Jesus. But with all this there is in the narratives no hint of doubt on Saul's part of the rectitude of his persecuting zeal, nothing to show that he ever suspected the real truth to lie in the direction of the new sect of the Nazarenes.

St. Paul's own uniform representation of his mental condition on his way to Damascus is not that of doubtful misgiving, but of conscious rectitude undisturbed by the least shadow of doubt that in persecuting the Christians even to death, he was doing God's will. 'I verily thought within myself that it was my duty to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth' (Ac 26⁹). To Saul the position of the Jesus-sect was a blasphemy against God. It was not only that their so-called Messiah had been put to death. That in itself to the mind of Saul, the orthodox Jew, shattered the claim that Jesus was the Christ. The conception of a Suffering Messiah was, to quote Holsten's own words, 'so far removed from the orthodoxy of Jewish belief that a suffering Messiah, during the lifetime of Jesus, was still to His disciples an inconceivable and enigmatical representation' (op. cit. v. 88). But it was above all the peculiar form of the Death which disproved the claim of Jesus to be the Messiah. To a Jew, the Cross was the very emblem of Divine rejection. 'Cursed,' not merely by man but by God, 'is every one that hangeth on a tree' (Gal 3¹³; cf. Dt 21²³). Hence ἀνάθεμα ἵπστους, 1 Co 12³). To the mind of Saul of Tarsus the death on the Cross appeared a Divine retribution on a blasphemous claim. God Himself had endorsed the verdict of Caiaphas and Pilate, and in proclaiming a crucified Messiah the followers of Jesus were fighting against God.

Thus to Saul the suppression of the Jesus-sect was a sacred duty and a meritorious service for the glory of God. The followers of Jesus spoke, indeed, of a resurrection of their crucified Master, but no one had seen Him save some of their own company, and to Saul's mind it was the uttermost heresy, and he simply refused to believe it. The young Pharisee was, indeed, far from being at peace within himself. Yet this very inward dispeace only fanned his anti-Christian zeal to new flame and urged him forward more fiercely than ever in loyal adherence to the traditions of his fathers, if thereby he might the better fulfil the righteousness of the Law. As he says himself, he was 'exceedingly mad against them' (Ac 26¹¹). With all the intensity of his nature he set himself to stamp out the heresy. Not content with harrying the Christians in Jerusalem, he 'persecuted them even unto strange cities.' Such was the spirit in which he started on his way to Damascus, when all at once his persecuting zeal was brought to a halt. An incident occurred which cleft his life in twain and 'drove him, in spite of himself, into a new channel' (Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, p. 60). The mental conditions, therefore, out of which a self-generated vision of the Glorified Jesus might conceivably have been formed were wanting in him at the time.

The whole impression conveyed to the reader of the narrative in Acts is that of the suddenness, unexpectedness, surprisingness of the change in the persecutor's psychological condition (Ac 9³ 22⁶). And this is corroborated by the references in St. Paul's own letters. He always referred to the event which formed the turning-point of his life as a sudden, surprising, overwhelming experience. The very language he uses in reference to it emphasizes this. 'I was apprehended (κατελήβην) by Christ Jesus' (Ph 3¹²)—a remarkable word which denotes that the persecutor was seized upon suddenly, taken hold of by Christ, and subdued as if by main force. He looks upon himself in 2 Co 2¹⁴ as a suddenly subdued rebel, whom God leads in triumph about the world. The same suggestion of suddenness and violence we have seen already to be implied in the term ἐκτροπή. That this, and not a gradual change, is the view required by St. Paul's language is admitted by so unprejudiced a critic as H. J. Holtzmann in his edition of the Acts: 'It is at all events certain that the Apostle knows nothing of a gradual process which has drawn him closer to Christianity, but only of a sudden halt which he was compelled to make in the midst of an active career' (Handkommentar zum NT 3 Tübingen, 1901, ii. 70 f., quoted by Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul, p. 189).

2. The witness of the Gospels.—The apostles, in their preaching of Jesus and the Resurrection, would from the first be called upon to substantiate their statements by detailed historical evidence. One of the first requirements in missionary teaching of the Resurrection would be a summary of the principal witnesses. Thus arose, we may well believe, for missionary and catechetical purposes such a list of the chief appearances as that given in 1 Co 15³⁻⁸. But, especially as time went on, more would be required than this. 'How can you believe in a crucified Messiah?' 'How can you preach the gospel of forgiveness and justification in His name?' To such challenging questions the full answer would be not merely an adducing of the evidence for the Resurrection, but an account of the life and ministry of Jesus on earth—essentially a Passions-Geschichte—showing that the suffering of the Death was the climax of a life of service and suffering on the part of One who claimed to be the Messiah, and who supported His claim by His works. So the main facts of Christ's life and teaching on earth would be recalled, and an oral tradition would grow up based on first-hand evidence derived from the apostles and other eye-witnesses; until, as time went on and the possibility of distorting the facts grew ever greater, it would become necessary for apologetic and practical purposes to put on record the tradition hitherto preserved in the Church only by oral means. Thus arose written narratives of our Lord's life and ministry as culminating in the Death and Resurrection, the primary aim of which was not historical or biographical, but that expressed by the word 'gospel.' 'These signs are recorded that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing you may have life through his name' (Jn 20³¹; cf. Mark's heading of his work, 'The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God,' 1¹).

The generally accepted results of recent criticism with regard to the relations of the Gospels may be represented shortly as follows. Two main sources are to be recognized: (1) a collection made at a fairly early date of the sayings and discourses of Jesus, the chief object of which was, according to Sanday, 'to set before its readers (the new converts in the different Churches) some account of the Christian ideal, the character and mode of life expected of them as Christians' (ERE ii. 575-); this original document is identified with the Logia mentioned by Papias (Eus. HE iii. 39) and usually christened 'Q' (Quelle, the original source); (2) a later document supplementing Q, a narrative or sketch of the Lord's public ministry which was practically, if not quite, identical with our present Second Gospel written by John Mark, the companion of Peter, and embodying the substance of that apostle's reminiscences of his Master's words and works. (The original ending of the narrative is lost, and the present ending [16⁹⁻²⁰] is a later appendix; but the fact that it appears in nearly all extant MSS and versions points to an early date, and perhaps to a close relation with Mark himself.) Then a little later came two fuller narratives, going behind the Ministry to the Birth. The writers, Matthew and Luke, writing for different classes of readers, with the two main sources referred to before them as basis of their narratives, arranged and edited independently the material thus supplied, sometimes interpreting it, sometimes giving it new point and fullness, and each adding information derived from his own minute investigations. This dependence of Matthew and Luke in their narrative portions on Mark is reckoned 'the one solid contribution' of literary criticism (F. C. Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission, Edinburgh, 1906, p. 37; cf. W. C. Allen, ICC, 'S. Matthew' 3, do., 1912, p. vii).

It cannot, however, be argued that, while Mark is a primary authority, Matthew and Luke are secondary authorities. Much critical argument proceeds on this assumption, as if the narratives of the First and Third Gospels were a simple 'writing up' and embellishing of Mark's stories, and any details not found in the latter were to be rejected as unhistorical and legendary. Luke, e.g., in the most important portion of his whole narrative—the Passion and the Resurrection sections—wholly deserts Mark and prefers to rely on independent information. As to the source of this information, Chase (Gospels in the Light of Historical Criticism, pp. 12, 62 f.) makes out a strong case for James and the elders of the Church with whom Luke was brought into personal contact in Jerusalem some twenty-five years after the Passion (see Ac 21¹⁵). Now James was a primary witness of the Resurrection, one of those who saw the Lord, so that Luke in his narrative would be in touch with first-hand information as much as Mark (cf. Lk 1³). Then later still, the writer of the Fourth Gospel, having a knowledge of the Synoptic Gospels, wrote his narrative, wishing to supplement and perhaps in some details to correct them. In connexion with the narrative of the Resurrection in particular, the writer, with his more precise and consecutive account, affords valuable information. There is a growing tendency among critics to hold that, in substance at least, this Gospel represents a genuine work of the apostle John written in his old age, containing authentic reminiscences of the Lord's words and works. These reminiscences indeed have been moulded by the writer's meditation through many years on their significance, so that reminiscence and interpretation are often so interwoven that it is difficult to say where one ends and the other begins, but this does not detract from the trustworthy character of the Gospel. 'It is a blending of fact and interpretation; but the interpretation comes from one who had an unique position and unique advantages for getting at the heart and truth of that which he sought to interpret. It is the mind of Christ seen through the medium of one of the first and closest of His companions' (Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, Oxford, 1905, p. 169). Indeed, John's account may be trusted to reality. 'The history of a great movement will be told long years afterwards with the nearest approach to truth, not by the prosaic observer who noticed only what lay on the surface, but rather by one who at the time discerned something of its grandeur, and who as he recalled it instinctively idealized it. Idealization is perhaps a necessary condition for the preservation of the memory of a momentous spiritual crisis' (Chase, p. 17). (Ch. 21 is an appendix to the Gospel which closed at the end of ch. 20. Yet it must have become an integral part of the Gospel at an early period, for no trace exists of a Gospel without it. The style also is similar to the rest of the Gospel, so that on both internal and external evidence an increasing number of critics support Godet's contention: 'Either John himself composed this piece some time after having finished the Gospel, or we have here the work of that circle of friends and disciples who surrounded the Apostle at Ephesus, who had often heard him relate the facts contained in it, and who have reproduced them in his own language.)

It is often urged against the narratives of the Gospels that none of the writers were first-hand witnesses, but if the Fourth Gospel, as a growing weight of criticism encourages us to believe, is a genuine work of the apostle John, we have at least one such witness of first-rank importance. But further, Mark was the companion and interpreter of Peter, another primary witness. Besides, Luke was the companion of St. Paul, and St. Paul had direct communication with Peter, James, and other members of the original apostolic company; and Luke lays stress on the fact that the things which he relates rested on the testimony of those who were eye-witnesses. The Gospel of Matthew, if not directly the work of that Apostle—another first-hand witness—must have been written by one so closely associated with him that it ever afterwards passed as Matthew's own. We are thus, throughout, in contact with first-hand information, and all claim to be but recording a tradition well established in the Church, and derived originally from the apostles.

Approximate probable dates for the Gospels may be given as follows: Mk. A.D. 60-70, Mt. Lk. (Gospel and Acts) A.D. 70-80; Jn. A.D. 85-100—all falling probably within the 1st century. The extra-canonical Gospels, the Gospel according to the Hebrews and the Gospel of Peter, parts of which have been preserved, and both of which belong probably to the beginning of the 2nd cent., add little or nothing of a trustworthy character to the canonical accounts of the Resurrection.

The witness to the Resurrection in the Gospels may be thus exhibited: (a) Empty grave on the third day (Mk 15⁴²⁻¹⁶, Mt 27⁵¹⁻²⁸, Lk 23^{50-24¹²} (23-24), Jn 19^{38-20¹³}); and (b) post-Resurrection appearances (Mk [App.] 16⁹⁻²⁰, Mt 28⁹⁻²⁰, Lk 24¹²⁻³⁸, Jn 20¹⁴⁻²⁹ 21 [App.], Gospel acc. to Hebrews, xii. 50-57, Gospel of Peter, xiv. 58-60).

The historical value of the Gospel witness to the Resurrection has been called in question on various grounds, chief of which are: (1) Alleged discrepancies between the different accounts. This was already one of the chief objections to the Gospels in the earliest reasoned criticism of Christianity that has come down to us—The True Word of Celsus, written about the end of the 2nd cent. (see Origen, c. Celsus, ii. 56-63, v. 56, 58). H. S. Reimarus, writing nearly a century and a half ago, enumerated ten irreconcilable contradictions or discrepancies in the narratives (G. E. Lessing, Wolfenbütteler Fragmente, 1774-78). 'In reality,' says a more recent critic, 'the number is much greater' (Schmiedel, EB iv. 4041). And Harnack, on the basis of examination of the various narratives, feels himself driven to an Agnostic despair of history, which regards the problem of what happened on the first Easter morning as absolutely insoluble. (2) The presence of mythical and legendary elements in the accounts. 'Even the empty grave on the third day can by no means be regarded as a certain historical fact, because it appears united in the accounts with manifest legendary features' (Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr., 7 vols., London, 1894-99, i. 85 n.). (3) The insufficiency of the evidence, even if allowed, to satisfy the demands of scientific historical inquiry. 'Secure evidence of the resurrection of Jesus would be the attestation of it in a decided and accordant manner by impartial witnesses. But . . . Jesus showed himself to his adherents only: why not also to his enemies, that they too might be convinced, and that by their testimony posterity might be precluded from every conjecture of a designed fraud on the part of his disciples?' (Strauss, Life of Jesus, Eng. tr., London, 1892, pt. iii. ch. iv. sect. 140, p. 738). To like purpose Renan demands that the evidence for the Resurrection be such as would convince 'a commission, composed of physiologists, physicists, chemists, persons accustomed to historical criticism,' and on this basis criticizes the NT narratives as not satisfying 'scientific conditions' or 'rational principles' (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr., London, 1873, Introd., p. 29 f.). We shall consider the two parts of the witness separately, keeping these objections in view.

(a) The empty grave.—The narratives agree as to the following facts. (1) On the morning of the first day of the week, 'the third day' after the Crucifixion, very early, certain women went to the grave (Mt 28¹, Mk 16¹⁴, Lk 24¹⁻¹⁰, Jn 20¹); (2) they found the stone rolled away and the grave empty (Mt 28-7, Mk 16³⁻⁶, Lk 24²⁻⁶, Jn 20²⁻¹¹); (3) they were informed by angelic means that Jesus had risen, and that they were bidden to convey the news to the disciples (Mt 28⁵⁻⁸, Mk 16⁶⁻⁸, Lk 24⁴⁻¹¹, Jn 20¹¹⁻¹²). Divergences in detail have to be acknowledged, though they are slight in comparison with the general agreement, and do not impugn the trustworthiness of the central facts in the common tradition.

Chief of these divergences are the following. (1) In regard to the number of the women, John represents the visit to the sepulchre as made by Mary Magdalene alone (20¹), while the others (Mt., Mk., Lk.) represent her as in company with other women, variously named. (2) As regards the purpose attributed to the women in coming to the tomb, two of the Evangelists, Mark (16¹) and Luke (23⁵⁶ 24¹), represent this purpose as the anointing of the body of Jesus, while John records the fact that the anointing had already been done by Joseph and Nicodemus at the time of the entombment. (3) In regard to the angelic message, Matthew and Mark speak of one angel at the tomb; Mark representing him as 'a young man' arrayed in a white robe, appearing to the women on their 'entering into the tomb' (16⁴), while Matthew has an independent story of a great earthquake, and represents the angel as rolling away the stone and sitting upon it (i.e. outside the tomb, 28²⁻⁵). Luke and John, on the other hand, speak of two angels as appearing to the women (or woman), Luke representing the interview as occurring inside the tomb (24³⁻⁵), while John represents Mary Magdalene as still remaining outside (20¹²).

In regard to such divergences or alleged 'discrepancies' we have to remember two things. (1) The aim of the narratives is not to supply evidence or proof for a court of law, but rather to supply information regarding facts already believed, as Luke says, 'fully established' (κατὰ προφητείαν), in the Church, concerning which they had already been 'catechetically instructed' (v. 4, κατηχήθης). This explains the often naive and informal character of the narratives. None of the Evangelists aims at giving a complete account of everything that happened on that wonderful Easter morning and day. Each selects and combines with his own special object in view. From this incompleteness arises much of the seeming contradictoriness of the different narratives. E.g., John speaks only of Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre probably because he has a special story to tell of her—though the 'we' of Jn 20² seems to imply the presence of others. (There is no need to suppose that the women came all together to the sepulchre. It is more probable that they came in different groups or companies.) (2) We have to remember further that the Resurrection day was necessarily one of intense excitement and agitation. This is vividly reflected in the narratives—the shock of amazement of the witnesses, their incredulity, their mingled fear and joy. So it is possible that the events of the day were told by different witnesses in a different order, and with differences in detail. The excitement of the moment may have left the memory dazed and unable to form any distinct impression of what was seen and heard, so that from the first there would be a certain confusion in the stories. But to discredit the narratives because they betray imperfections such as these is altogether unreasonable. So far from being incompatible with, they rather confirm, their historical veracity. 'The usual character of human testimony is substantial truth under circumstantial variety' (W. Paley, Evidences of Christianity, in J. S. Memes' Christian Evidences, London, 1859, pt. iii. ch. i. p. 203).

It need not be denied that some details of the narratives may possibly be unhistorical or legendary. In Matthew's story, e.g., about the resurrection of many bodies of the saints, and their appearance to many after the Resurrection (27⁵¹⁻⁵²), we seem to have something akin to what we find in the Apocryphal Gospels (cf. Chase, Gospels in the Light of Hist. Criticism, p. 31). But the earthquake account (given only by Matthew, which is the only account of how the stone was rolled away) and that of the angelic visitation when ruled out (e.g. Lake, Resurrection, p. 251 f.) as legendary and unhistorical, are so not so much because of any insufficiency of evidence, as through prejudice against the supernatural, which, however, is of the very essence of the narratives throughout.

Luke records (24¹²) that, on receipt of the message of the women, Peter went to the sepulchre and found it empty, with only the grave-clothes left. This verse is of doubtful authority—being absent from important Western documents—and is omitted by Westcott and Hort and by Tischendorf as a later insertion, though, as F. Blass points out (Philology of the Gospels, London, 1898, p. 189), Luke's account contains another reference to a visit to the grave on the part of some of the apostles (v.²⁴), the genuineness of which there is no good ground for calling in question.

John in his account—that of an eye-witness of the facts—tells us (20³⁻¹⁰) that, on receipt of the message of the women, Peter and himself went to the grave and found the condition as the women had said. He gives a circumstantial description of the way in which the grave-clothes were found lying; in particular, that the napkin which had been round His head was found 'folded up' (v.⁷, εντετυλιγμένον) by itself, apart from the other bandages, doubtless at the raised end of the chamber where the head rested (see Latham, Risen Master, plate 2, for an imaginary sketch of the interior of the tomb). Latham's theory is that the word implies that the head-cloth still partially retained its annular form (p. 43), and that the other grave-clothes still retained the general outline of the human form (p. 50). If this interpretation be correct, the suggestion of the careful observer (θεωρεῖ, Jn 20⁶) would be that the Body had somehow passed out of the grave-clothes, rather than that it had been removed by human hands for burial elsewhere. In any case, the position of the clothes is noted by the Evangelist as significant.

In this connexion the significance of the incident recorded in Mt 28¹¹⁻¹³ is to be noted—the attempt of the Jewish authorities to bribe the guard to misrepresent the facts and say that the disciples removed the body—a saying which is 'commonly reported among the Jews until this day.' This fraudulent transaction proceeds upon the admission by the enemies of Christianity that the grave was empty—an admission which is enough to show that the evidence for the empty grave was 'too notorious to be denied' (Cambridge Theological Essays, ed. H. B. Swete, London, 1905, p. 336).

The whole story of the guard at the tomb, which is narrated only by Matthew (27⁶²⁻⁶⁶) has been called in question. But the action of the authorities in setting a watch at the tomb is altogether credible. Had not Jesus spoken repeatedly of His being put to death and rising again the third day (Mt 16⁻¹⁷, 20^{16, 19} and 19)? And may not such words have come to the ears of His enemies? Had not indeed His mysterious words about the building of the Temple in three days been quoted against Him before the chief priests and Pharisees (Mk 14²⁸; cf. Jn 2¹⁸⁻²²)? And with such in their minds, was not the fact that the body of Jesus had been committed to His friends for burial enough to create the fear that His disciples might remove it and afterwards pretend that He had risen? To meet this apprehension, a watch was obtained, and to make security doubly sure, the tomb was sealed with the official seal.

Nothing, indeed, in the Resurrection-story of the narratives is more strongly attested than the fact of the empty tomb on the third day after the Crucifixion. It is not only attested by the women, and subsequently by Peter and John—'interested parties'—but also acknowledged by foes. This is the fundamental fact at the basis of the apostolic belief in the Resurrection on the third day. It is not uncommon among negative critics to represent the case as if the belief were a deduction or inference from certain prophetic references, a belief resting 'on theological rather than historical grounds' (Lake, Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 264). Strauss set the way in his endeavour to show how the belief might have originated from OT hints (New Life of Jesus, i. 438 f.). O. Holtzmann (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr., London, 1904, p. 336) lays much stress on Hos 6¹: 'After two days will he revive us: on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live before him.' Schmiedel (EBi iv. 4067) appeals to 2 K 20⁵ as a text that has 'special relevance' in this connexion. Others combine with these OT hints the predictions of Jesus Himself (e.g. Meyer, Die Auferstehung Christi, p. 181 f.), while more recently others trace the belief primarily to a 'Messianic dogmatic,' a pre-Christian sketch of a dying and rising Messiah which found its way into Jewish writings from Oriental sources, chiefly Babylonian (see, e.g., Lake, pp. 197 f., 261 ;

Cheyne, Bible Problems, p. 110 ff.). The OT hints and pre-Christian Messianic belief alone or combined with the predictions of Jesus, it is represented, naturally took shape in the belief in the Resurrection on the third day, or were the predisposing cause for this belief. The belief created the Resurrection rather than the Resurrection the belief. But what are the facts? The Gospels tell us unmistakably that the disciples had no anticipation whatever of the resurrection of their crucified Master. For all that, Jesus did predict His resurrection on the third day and represent this as foreshadowed in the Scriptures (Mt 16²¹ 17⁻¹⁸ 20^{16, 19}, Mk 8³¹ 9³¹ 10³³, Lk 9⁻¹² 18³¹ 24^{6, 7}; cf. Lk 24⁴⁶). The astonishment of the disciples at the empty tomb is explained by the reflexion that 'as yet they knew not the scripture, that he must rise again from the dead' (Jn 20⁹). So far from the victory of the Messiah over death through a resurrection being part of the current Jewish Messianic belief, the very idea of a suffering and dying Messiah was 'to His disciples an inconceivable and enigmatical representation' (Holsten, op. cit. p. 98; cf. Mt 16²¹ 17²³). 'Suffering and death for the actual possessor of the Messianic dignity are in fact unimaginable, according to the testimony of the prophets' (Dalman, Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1902, p. 265). Ps 16¹⁰ is the only passage which the NT writers quote as prophetic of the Resurrection, but it is clear that its Christian interpretation was by no means obvious before the event. The proof from Scripture prophecy of the Resurrection on the third day was thus an interpretation or confirmation after the event, and, under the influence of Jesus' post-Resurrection teaching, an 'after-thought,' as Lake himself admits (p. 30). It is not the prophecies which suggest the fact, but the fact which extracts and explains the prophecies. The attempt to trace the belief in the event 'on the third day' ultimately to Oriental sources will be more fully considered below (V. ii. 2). But meantime the fact is to be emphasized that no detail is better attested in connexion with the Resurrection than the discovery of the empty tomb on the third day, and any criticism which ignores this cannot justly lay claim to be 'scientific.'

It has often been pointed out that in the Gospels none of the witnesses claims to have seen our Lord leave the tomb. Of the Resurrection itself there was no eye-witness. This is sometimes adduced in disparagement of the Gospel evidence. But this very silence of the narratives is a significant corroboration of their historical trustworthiness. If the accounts of the events at the empty grave were as legendary as some recent criticism would represent, the silence is almost inexplicable. 'A faith that was capable of creating, with absolutely no basis in fact, so circumstantial an account of the emptiness of the Tomb, would assuredly not have left without a witness the one moment on which the significance of its whole creation seems to depend' (Cambridge Theol. Essays, p. 332). A comparison with the account given in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter brings into clear relief the self-restraint of the canonical Gospels (cf. Orr, Resurrection of Jesus, p. 260 f.).

(b) The post-Resurrection appearances.—Though the empty grave on the third day is thus adequately attested, this, according to the evidence, was not in and by itself the cause of the disciples' belief in the Resurrection. According to the Evangelists, it was not simply the fact of the empty tomb, not even this supplemented by the angelic proclamation that the Lord had risen, which produced in the disciples the conviction that their crucified Master was indeed risen from the dead. The women returned, as they were bidden, to tell the disciples what they had seen and heard at the empty grave, but 'this story of the women seemed in their opinion to be nonsense (ἄηρος); they would not believe them' (Lk 24¹¹ [Moffatt]; cf. Mk 16^{11-13, 14}, Jn 20⁻⁵, οὐ μὴ πιστεύσω. For a whole week Thomas refused to believe). Peter and John go to the grave and find the condition of things as the women had said. They stoop down and enter in and find the grave-clothes lying where the body had rested, with the head-cloth folded up by itself, instead of lying beside the other bandages, and they return home 'wondering what had happened' (Lk 24¹² [Moffatt]), perplexed and unable to explain what they saw. John indeed, writing many years after, says of himself that he 'saw and believed' (Jn 20⁸, εἶδε καὶ ἐπίστευεν). The meaning of these words is doubtful. It has been suggested that, from the manner in which the grave-clothes lay folded, John was led not merely to believe in the emptiness of the grave, but to the idea of resurrection. So, e.g., Cyril of Alexandria: 'Ex involutis linteaminibus resurrectionem colligunt,' as the Latin version renders it (Migne, PG lxxiv. 683, quoted by W. J. S. Simpson in DCG ii. 507^a); cf. Latham, Risen Master, and Dods, EGT, in loc. But if such was the case, it does not appear that he said anything to the others on the subject. On the other hand, to say that he 'believed' here means simply 'became convinced' that the grave was empty and the body removed may be saying too little. Probably it is nearest the truth to say with Swete: 'There arose in his [John's] mind at that moment a nascent confidence that in some way as yet unknown their darkness would be turned to light, and the victory of the Christ be secured. For the present, however, the mystery remained unsolved; they seemed to have exhausted their means of getting at the truth, and both men went home again' (Appearances, p. 6). Even as regards the women themselves, the chief impression we receive of their mental condition from the narratives is that of terrorized amazement. The dazzling vision and the voice from the grave filled them with dismay. They fled from the sepulchre, and on their way back to the city they spoke not a word, so great was their terror. 'They were seized with terror and beside themselves' (Mk 16⁸ [Moffatt]). Not the empty grave, therefore, and not the angelic report merely, but these followed by and in essential connexion with the subsequent self-revelation of the risen living Lord in the shape of manifestations or appearances of Himself to them (or what were taken to be such), were what, according to the narratives, gave rise to the apostles' belief in the Resurrection.

The list of the appearances given in the various narratives is as follows:

(1) Mark's account (in the genuine portion) records none. But the abrupt way in which the narrative breaks off in the middle of a sentence at 16⁸ ('for they were afraid of . . .') [Moffatt] points to the fact that the writer meant to add some account of the meeting of the Risen Lord with the disciples in Galilee referred to in v. 7. The probability is that such was added and that it is lost. There is good reason for believing that Matthew has worked up into his last chapter much of the matter contained in the lost ending of Mark, adding certain incidents for which he relied upon his own resources (see Chase's art. 'The Lord's Command to Baptize' in JThSt vi. [1904-05] 481 ff.). The Mk. App. (16⁹⁻²⁰) records appearances to Mary Magdalene (v. 9), to two disciples on the way to Emmaus (v. 11), and to the Eleven at meat (v. 14).

(2) Matthew records two appearances—the first to the women in or near Jerusalem on the morning of the Resurrection (28⁹), and then to the Eleven in Galilee on a mountain 'where Jesus had appointed them' (vv. 16-20), the meeting referred to in forecast in Mark.

(3) Luke records three: to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus (24¹³⁻³²), to the 'eleven . . . and them that were with them' in Jerusalem (v. 36c), and to Peter, this preceding the last and being indirectly stated (v. 34; cf. 1 Co 15⁵). Luke also refers (v. 30c) to a meeting on the day of Ascension at Bethany (more fully reported in Ac 1⁴⁻¹²).

(4) John, writing with knowledge of the other Gospels and filling up from his reminiscences what the others had left untold, records four: the appearance to Mary Magdalene in the garden (20¹⁴⁻¹⁷); an appearance to the disciples (without Thomas) the same evening in Jerusalem (vv. 19-23); another appearance a week later to the disciples (with Thomas) in Jerusalem (vv. 26-28) and lastly, an appearance to seven disciples some time later at the Sea of Tiberias (21¹⁻¹⁴).

(5) Extra-canonical Gospels.—The Gospel acc. to the Hebrews tells of an appearance to James, and the Gospel of Peter seems on the point of narrating an incident not unlike the appearance to the seven at the Sea of Tiberias when the fragment ends abruptly. Both narratives, however, are distinctly secondary in character and add nothing of a trustworthy nature to the canonical accounts.

It is against the accounts of the appearances in the Gospels that the argument from discrepancies has most force. It has to be frankly admitted that the records present many difficulties in the way of constructing a coherent harmonized account. 'Whichever way we turn, difficulties meet us, which the documents to which we have access do not enable us to remove' (Sanday, Outlines of Life of Christ, p. 180). These difficulties concern in the main two points: (i.) the sequence or time order of the appearances, and (ii.) their place or locality.

(i.) The sequence or time order of the appearances.—None of the Gospels presents us with an ordered statement of the whole facts. St. Paul's list in 1 Co 15 is no doubt given in chronological order, but it does not profess to be complete, and leaves room for other appearances to be added. By the time the Gospel accounts were written, however, it may have been too late to find out with any precision how this or that additional appearing preserved in tradition was related in time to the others. In particular the relation of the appearance to Mary Magdalene (recorded by Jn. and Mk. App.) to the appearance to the women recorded in Mt 28⁹⁻¹⁰ is left by the narratives in uncertainty—an uncertainty connected with the seeming confusion in the First and Third Gospels, between Mary's return to Jerusalem and the return of the other women. Again, Luke gives the impression that all the appearances took place on the day of the Resurrection, and that the Ascension itself took place on the evening of that day. But this is contrary to what we find in the other Gospel accounts, where the appearances are represented as extending over a considerable time. And it is contrary to Luke's own account in Ac 1, where he interposes 'forty days' between the Resurrection and the Ascension, and assumes the appearances of Christ to be spread over the whole period (cf. Ac 13³¹, 'many days'). The latter 'contradiction' is made much of by Strauss and Keim, and, more recently, by Weizsäcker and Meyer. The explanation is to be found, however, in Luke's highly compressed or condensed style of narrative in the closing chapter of his Gospel (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 17, 'compressed to the highest degree'). Chase maintains that there are good grounds for thinking that the opening section of the Acts was already composed before the closing section of the Gospel (Gospels, p. 46), and Denney says that in all probability it was produced continuously with it (Jesus and the Gospel, p. 142). Having in view from the beginning to write a sequel to his Gospel, giving a more detailed account of the events leading up to the Ascension, the Evangelist 'fore-shortens' and compresses the narrative in the Gospel, treating two or three distinct occasions as if they were continuous, knowing that facts well known in the Church would render impossible the supposition that all the events recorded took place in a single day.

(ii.) The scene or locality of the appearances.—More serious is the difficulty which confronts us here. St. Paul in 1 Co 15 makes no mention of locality, but the Gospel accounts are divided between Galilee and Jerusalem. Matthew and probably Mark (original conclusion) lay the stress upon Galilee. In Mark indeed (in the genuine portion) no record is given of any appearances, but the women are bidden by the angel at the tomb to say that the Risen Lord would meet the disciples in Galilee (16⁷). The same message of the angel is given even more emphatically in Mt 28⁷—‘Go quickly and tell’—and (unless vv. 9-10 represent, as F. Rohrbach maintains [see A. B. Bruce, EGT, in loc.], the same fact in another form) repeated by Jesus Himself when He appears to these women on their way to execute the charge of the angel (28¹⁰). A promise to the same effect had already been given by Jesus to His disciples before they left the upper room for the Garden of Gethsemane, and is recorded by both Matthew and Mark (Mt 26³², Mk 14²⁸).

In accordance with this message and promise is the programme of appearances given in the First Gospel. The eleven disciples departed into Galilee (28¹⁶), and there saw Jesus, and there also received the great commission, Go and make disciples of all nations. No record is given of any appearance of Jesus to the apostles in or near Jerusalem. And it is probable that the original conclusion of Mark carried out the same programme. Luke and John, however, confine their account to appearances in Jerusalem and neighbourhood. Luke, who records (in ch. 24) the appearances to the two on the way to Emmaus, to Peter, and to the Eleven, all in or near Jerusalem, ends his account with a command of Jesus to the disciples to remain in Jerusalem until they were ‘clothed with power from on high’ (v. 49). But this appears definitely to exclude any departure into Galilee, and the possibility of an appearance there. In line with this is the different representation of the angelic message given in Luke from that in Matthew and Mark. The Marcan version, ‘He goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto you’ (16⁷), becomes in Luke, ‘Remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee, saying,’ etc. (24⁴⁶). That is to say, the message as given by Luke becomes not a direction to go into Galilee, but a reminder that Christ spoke to them about His resurrection when He was yet with them in Galilee. In like manner, all the appearances mentioned in the Fourth Gospel except that in the Appendix (ch. 21) are placed in Jerusalem, and the author indicates that the disciples remained at least a week in Jerusalem after the Resurrection (20²⁶).

What are we to make of this discrepancy? Are these two versions or traditions to be regarded as contradictory and ‘irreconcilable’ alternatives, only one of which can be received, the other being ruled out as unhistorical? This is how, e.g., Strauss and Weizsäcker represent the case (New Life of Jesus, i. 435, and *Apost. Age*², i. 2f.). If so, the question is, Which is the more trustworthy? The usual course among critics has been to prefer the tradition in Matthew and Mark as the more primary, and to confine the appearances to Galilee. The appearances to the apostles at Jerusalem were, it is represented, unknown to Matthew and Mark, and form a later addition to the earliest version of the Resurrection-story which spoke only of Galilee.

This Galilean theory, which we shall go on to discuss, is generally maintained in connexion with a naturalistic visionary theory of the Resurrection. The advantage of it for this purpose is obvious. By separating the appearances from the events of the third day and transferring them to Galilee, it gives more time for visions to develop amid scenes coloured by memory and imagination. As Strauss puts it, ‘If the transference of the appearances to Galilee dis-engages us from the third day as the period of the commencement of them, the longer time thus gained makes the reaction in the minds of the disciples more conceivable’ (New Life, i. 437). Support for this Galilean theory has been sought in the extra-canonical Gospel of Peter, where in xiv. 58-60 the disciples are represented as returning to Galilee in sorrow and therefore without knowledge of the Resurrection. The difficulties of this theory have been forcibly pointed out by F. Loofs (Die Auferstehungsberichte und ihr Wert, Leipzig, 1898, pp. 18-25), who shows that it requires an impossible misrepresentation of the facts. To place the first appearance of our Lord in Galilee, it is of course necessary to transfer the apostles from Jerusalem. But this has no historical basis whatever. The words, ‘they [the disciples] all forsook him and fled’ (Mk 14⁵⁰), the upholders of this theory interpret as referring to a flight not from the Garden of Gethsemane, but direct home to Galilee.

This interpretation, however, is refuted by the facts recorded. It is, as J. Weiss calls it, ‘a scientific legend.’ The oldest tradition expressly mentions that on the very night of the flight Peter was found in the high priest’s palace (Mk 14³⁴; cf. Mt 26⁵⁻⁸) and there thrice denied his Lord. The message sent to the disciples through the women on Easter Day, according to the earliest Evangelist, was this, ‘He goeth before you into Galilee,’ implying, as Loofs points out (p. 19), that the disciples were still waiting in Jerusalem. And so John, who predicts the ‘scattering’ (16-), yet gives detailed accounts of the meetings in Jerusalem. If Mt 28⁹⁻¹⁰ is accepted as genuine, the fact that the Evangelist records the appearance to the women in Jerusalem, in which the previous direction of the angels to the disciples to go into Galilee is received from Jesus’ own lips, shows that the appointed meeting in Galilee was not held to exclude earlier appearances.

Further (see Chase, Gospels, p. 45), to argue that the silence of Matthew (probably following his source Mark) as to any appearance to the apostles in Jerusalem, means ignorance of the fact, and that, therefore, the appearances in or near Jerusalem are to be looked upon as a later addition to the earliest form of the Resurrection-story, which spoke only of Galilee, proves too much. Even as regards Galilee, Matthew mentions only one appearance to the apostles. Are we, therefore, to conclude that he and his ‘source’ were unaware of any other appearance? We know from St. Paul that a list of appearances was handed down in the Apostolic Church from the earliest times, and that this formed part of the catechetical instruction given in the churches. The facts about the appearances, therefore, would be familiar to his readers, and just here may be found the sufficient explanation of their silence. The Evangelists felt at liberty to make a selection of the facts, each from his own point of view.

If the theory which would confine all the appearances to Galilee is thus unsuccessful in accounting for the facts, is Loofs any more successful in transferring all the appearances to Jerusalem, as he does in arguing in favour of the tradition represented by Luke and John? To carry out his theory, Loofs is obliged to separate Jn 21 from the rest of the Gospel, treating it as having little or no connexion with it, and finding in it a combination of two incidents, one of which (the fishing scene of vv. 1-14) has been misplaced (Lk 5¹⁻¹¹), while the other (the dialogue of vv. 15-23) was originally unconnected with Galilee. On this Sanday says: 'These are strong measures, which, however high our estimate of the tradition, Lk-Jn, are obviously not open to one who thinks that the identity of style between Jn 21 and the rest of the Gospel is too great to permit of their separation' (HDB ii. 640^b).

The attempt to treat the narratives as alternatives and to confine the appearances either to Galilee or to Jerusalem being thus unsatisfactory, we seem compelled to combine the traditions much as they are combined in the Fourth Gospel (with App.) and in the App. to Mark, and to recognize appearances both in Jerusalem and in Galilee. If Mt 28⁹⁻¹⁰ is to be treated as a later addition, the purpose of the insertion apparently, as Rohrbach suggests, was to cancel the impression otherwise produced that Jesus was seen only in Galilee. This is supported by St. Paul's list of appearances in 1 Co 15, which, though it makes no mention of place, 'suggests Galilee for the scene of the appearance to the 500 hardly less clearly than it suggests Jerusalem for the appearance to Peter and the Eleven.'

We cannot, indeed, fit the narratives into each other so as to leave no difficulties or contradictions unsolved. As regards the details of the different traditions it would seem that from the first there was a certain amount of confusion which was never wholly cleared up. But these difficulties with regard to details are discounted as serious objections when we remember—a fundamental consideration in this connexion—the aim of the Evangelists in the Gospels. 'The narratives constitute not primarily a history, but a Gospel of the Resurrection' (Westcott). They were written not to create belief in the resurrection of Jesus in the minds of men to whom the fact was unfamiliar, but to inform more fully those who had already received the general tradition of the Church, and to show the significance of the fact, both for Him and for them. 'Believing in the resurrection themselves, and writing for those who believed in it, they [the writers] aimed at giving such an account of it as should bring out its permanent significance for the Church' (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, p. 153). With this in view each writer selects the facts which he considers most appropriate to his object. He is so far indifferent to their connexion with other facts which he is not concerned to relate. He may pass over a great part of the evidence, or he may mass it together in a generalized statement; and, while he will not consciously depart from historical truthfulness, he will yet so handle his materials that, in order to estimate them aright, we must keep distinctly before us his special aim.

The different interests or points of view of the Evangelists will determine the perspective in which the facts are viewed, and the different aspects of the facts emphasized. Matthew, e.g., is occupied throughout his Gospel with the Galilean ministry of Jesus as that in which he beheld the fulfilment of Jewish prophecy. So in his account of the appearances he concentrates on the meeting in Galilee with its great commission, 'Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations.' To this as his objective he hastens on without pausing on intermediate events. While Matthew concentrates on the meeting in Galilee, Luke is chiefly interested in the appearances in Jerusalem on the Resurrection day as leading up to the promise of the Spirit and the Ascension at Bethany, and ignores the appearances in Galilee. 'We do the Evangelists injustice,' therefore, 'when we regard them as witnesses in a court of law, who have been appointed to prove a fact, and who have deliberately taken it in hand to do so' (W. Milligan, The Resurrection of our Lord, p. 57). Not that the narratives are not evidence, but they are not put forward as presenting the complete evidence. There is not the least ground for supposing that the Evangelists told us all they knew, nor yet the least necessity that they should have done so. They recorded what was sufficient for their purpose. To bring out the meaning or significance of the appearances to the disciples, they may have condensed into a single representative or typical scene what they knew to be different appearances.

Thus we find that even so conservative a critic as Denney counts it 'not in the least improbable . . . that in the great appearing of Jesus to the eleven recorded in all the gospels (Mt 28¹⁶⁻²⁰, Mk 16¹⁴⁻¹⁸, Lk 24³⁶⁻⁴⁹, Jn 20¹⁹⁻²³) we have not the literal record of what took place on a single occasion, but the condensation into a representative scene of all that the appearances of Jesus to His disciples meant. . . . And if Jesus nevertheless had in point of fact appeared in different places, we can understand how one evangelist should put this typical scene in Galilee and another in Jerusalem. When we see what is being done we should rather say that both are right than that either is wrong' (Jesus and the Gospel, p. 155 f.). The main thing in all the narratives is not the details of time or place or circumstances—in regard to these a certain confusion may remain through unassimilated and unharmonized traditions—but the fact of the appearing of the Risen Christ to His disciples, together with the significance of the fact. And to establish this, to justify and sustain the faith that Jesus is risen from the dead, the narratives, though fragmentary and in no case presenting an orderly statement of the whole facts, supply sufficient evidence. So that Sanday, while recognizing to the full the difficulties in the narratives, yet maintains that 'no difficulty of weaving the separate incidents into an orderly well-compacted narrative can impugn the unanimous belief of the Church which lies behind them, that the Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead on the third day and appeared to the disciples' (art. 'Jesus Christ' in HDB ii. 641^a).

This enables us also to answer the other objection brought against the apostolic narratives—that the appearances recorded were only to the circle of His disciples, to 'interested parties,' and, therefore, that the evidence presented is not of a kind to satisfy the demands of scientific historical inquiry. This objection, urged, as we have seen above, by Strauss and Renan, is one which occurs already in Celsus' criticism of Christianity written about the end of the 2nd century. 'After these points,' says Origen, taking up Celsus' objections one by one, 'Celsus proceeds to bring against the Gospel narratives a charge which is not to be lightly passed over, viz. that if Jesus desired to convince men that He was really divine He ought to have appeared to those who had ill-treated Him, and to him who had condemned Him, and to men generally (οἱ πάντες τῶν ἀνθρώπων)' (c. Cels. ii. 63). The fact to which this criticism refers is, it should be noted, explicitly acknowledged by the apostles. 'Him,' says Peter, 'God raised on the third day, and allowed him to be seen not by all the People but by witnesses whom God had previously selected, by us who ate and drank with him after his resurrection from the dead' (Ac 10⁴². [Moffatt]).

The evidence was designed not to satisfy 'scientific experts,' but to evoke and support belief in the Resurrection on the part of those 'whom God had previously selected' that they might be 'witnesses' to others. If the fact to be testified to were the manner of the Resurrection and the exact sequence of the physical changes that accompanied it, supposing this capable of description in scientific terms, then, no doubt, the disciples were not qualified witnesses. They were born 1900 years too soon for this. But 'if the essential truth to be conveyed was the personal identity of Him who died and was buried with Him who was raised and appeared, what evidence is to be compared with that of intimate personal friends?' (Cambridge Theol. Essays, p. 323). To impugn their witness as not impartial is to forget what the narratives uniformly testify, that so far from being predisposed to believe in the fact, their predisposition was all the other way.

There are two other considerations which may be brought forward in support of the restriction of the appearances of the Risen Christ to His disciples. (i.) This limitation or restriction is in keeping with Christ's manifestations during His earthly life. To appear to outsiders, to His opponents or enemies or men generally, in order to convince them of His resurrection and thus turn them to belief in Him, would have been contrary to the principle whereby He consistently refused to present miraculous proofs in order to force unwilling belief. When on one occasion the Pharisees asked Him to give them a sign which should remove their unbelief, we read that 'He sighed deeply in his spirit, and said, Why doth this generation seek a sign? verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation' (Mk 8¹²). Faith induced by such signs was not of the proper quality (cf. Lk 16²¹). This is not the kind of evidence that convinces. True faith is morally and spiritually conditioned. The principle which governed the action of Jesus on earth in His manifestation of Himself still determined the action of the Risen Christ. 'Why is it that you are to appear to us and not to the world? . . . If any one loves me . . . we will come to him' (Jn 14^{22f.}). (ii.) Especially is this the case when we remember that the purpose of the appearances was not merely to convince of identity but to reveal a new order of life. If the Resurrection were simply a return to life under normal conditions, the mere survival of death, the objection urged might have more weight. Outsiders, 'men generally,' can tell whether a man who is dead at one moment has returned the next to a normal human life. But the resurrection of Jesus was a rising to life under new and more spiritual conditions, the revelation of a new kind of life, and because of this it could appeal only to those who were capable of receiving such truth. Such a revelation could be received, its significance could be appreciated, only by those of spiritual receptiveness, who had the faculties to discern the possibilities of a new life in Him. Only they were competent witnesses.

Here we are in a realm where the scientific expert is not the expert in the case. There are those who go the length of maintaining that the Resurrection-Body of Jesus was in its very nature such as required a spiritual susceptibility to discern, making it impossible for the outward senses alone to recognize its existence. Westcott, e.g., says, 'If it [the Resurrection] was a foreshadowing of new powers of human action, of a new mode of human being, then without a corresponding power of spiritual discernment there could be no testimony to its truth. The world could not see Christ, and Christ could not—there is a Divine impossibility—shew Himself to the world' (Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 11; cf. The Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 162 f., 'Human sense alone was not capable of discerning Who He was'). But even if such a manifestation could have been made it would have been valueless for the purpose in view in the manifestations. 'Even if the world could have visibly recognised the identity of the risen with the earthly Jesus, yet it could have had no perception of what His risen life meant, seeing that the transformation in Him, which was quite as real and essential as the identity, required spiritual receptivity for the discernment of its significance' (Forrest, *The Christ of History and of Experience*⁷, p. 156 n.).

III. THE APOSTOLIC WITNESS TO THE NATURE OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION-BODY.—That the grave was found empty on the third day, that on the same day He appeared to His disciples, and that these appearances, succeeding upon the empty grave, had already given rise on the third day to a belief in the Resurrection, are facts historically well attested by the Gospel narratives and corroborated by St. Paul's account. But there is more than this. The appearances of the Risen Christ were, according to the apostolic witness, not mere appearances and nothing more; they were in the nature of interviews, sometimes for a considerable length of time, between Him and His disciples. 'There is no such thing in the New Testament as an appearance of the Risen Saviour in which He merely appears. He is always represented as entering into relation to those who see Him in other ways than by a flash upon the inner or the outer eye: He establishes other communications between Himself and His own than that which can be characterised in this way' (Denney, Death of Christ, London, 1902, p. 67). And the apostolic narratives bear witness to a certain view of the nature or mode of existence of the Risen Christ.

i. THE WITNESS OF THE EVANGELISTS.—In the picture given in the Gospel narratives we have a noteworthy combination of seemingly opposite qualities in the Risen Christ's mode of existence.

(a) On the one hand, Christ seemed to have resumed the form of bodily existence maintained while on earth. His mode of existence was not phantasmal or apparitional like a ghost, but embodied. He appeared in a body possessing attributes and functions which attested its physical reality and identity (or continuity) with the former earthly body.

(1) He could be seen, touched, handled, as a purely spiritual existence could not (Lk 24^{36f.}, Jn 20²⁷). Indeed we are told that He offered Himself to their touch and handling to convince the disciples of His bodily existence: 'Feel me and see; a ghost has not flesh and bones as you see I have' (Lk 24³⁹ [Moffatt]; cf. Jn 20²⁰). Or, as another report has it, coming either from the Gospel according to the Hebrews or from the Doctrine of Peter: 'Take handle me and see that I am not a bodiless spirit' (Ignatius, Smyrn. 3, ἀάθετε, ὑψηλάρατε με, καὶ ἰδετέ ἐτι οὐκ εἰμι δαιμόνιον ἀσώματος). On 'flesh and bones' Westcott says: 'The significant variation from the common formula "flesh and blood" must have been at once intelligible to Jews, accustomed to the provisions of the Mosaic ritual, and nothing would have impressed upon them more forcibly the transfiguration of Christ's Body than the verbal omission of the element of blood which was for them the symbol and seat of corruptible life' (Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 162 n.). We are not told that the disciples availed themselves of the test at Jesus' invitation. But in Mt 28⁹ we read, 'They [the women] took hold of his feet and worshipped him.' If the disciples did not actually touch Him it was, it would seem, because 'they were so convinced, by sight, of His reality, that they abstained out of reverence from subjecting Him to the further test' (Forrest, *The Christ of Hist. and of Exper.*⁷, p. 148 n.).

The body was apparently capable also of partaking of food, for we are told that as they were still incredulous and 'wondered,' He took a piece of a broiled fish which remained from the evening meal and ate before them (Lk 24⁴²⁻⁵; the words 'and of a honeycomb' are omitted by the best MSS). This touch in the incident, which is mentioned only by Luke, has been called in question by Loofs and others as 'secondary' and 'representing the more realistic shape which the legend of the Resurrection ultimately took.' Even Denney shares this doubt: 'There does seem something which is not only incongruous but repellent in the idea of the Risen Lord eating,' and he finds in it one illustration of Luke's 'tendency to materialise the spiritual' (Jesus and the Gospel, p. 146). In support of this it has been noted that in the case of the meal with the two disciples at Emmaus (Lk 24³⁰), and in the later scene of the seven beside the Lake recorded in Jn 21¹⁻¹³, it is not said in either case that Jesus Himself partook of the bread which He distributed to others with His own hand. If we retain this touch, we must say with Clement of Alexandria, 'He did not eat for the sake of His body, but for their sakes with whom He conversed,' to convince them that they were not seeing a ghost. 'If there be resurrection of the body, there is no reason why such a body should not have the power of taking food without depending on it' (E. R. Bernard, HDB iv. 234¹). But even if we eliminate this detail in the picture, which admittedly is the least certain element in it, the picture in its essentials is not appreciably altered. The Risen Christ's mode of existence was such that human eyes could see and human hands could touch and feel Him.

(2) Further, the body in which He appeared was a body identical (or continuous) with the body which He had on earth, and which had suffered on the Cross and been laid in the tomb. Apart from the fact that the grave in which the body of Jesus had been laid on the Friday evening was found empty on the morning of the third day, identity (or continuity) was evidenced by the fact that the Risen Body bore the marks of the Passion, the print of the nails in the hands, and the spear-mark in the side (Lk 24³⁹, Jn 20²⁷).

Lk 24⁴⁰, καὶ τοῦτο εἰπὼν ἔδειξεν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας καὶ τοὺς πόδας, is called in question as omitted in some authorities, but Jn 20²⁰, where probably the same appearance is described though there is a seeming discrepancy in the number of disciples present, is undoubted. See Plummer, ICC, 'St. Luke' 2, Edinburgh, 1898, in loc.

The identity, it would seem, extended still further. Mary recognized Him by the familiar tone of the voice (Jn 20¹⁶) and the two disciples by the familiar gesture in the breaking of bread (Lk 24³¹).

(b) On the other hand, the body if the same was yet somehow not the same. It had undergone some marvellous change. If there was identity, there was yet contrast. The Risen Body had mysterious peculiarities which distinguished it from the natural earthly body. Indeed, so prominent were these distinguishing peculiarities that the Risen Lord is uniformly represented in the narratives as with difficulty persuading the disciples of the identity of the two. Chief of these peculiarities are—

(1) The transcendence of the ordinary laws of material or physical existence.—Matter was no longer an obstacle. The Risen Christ could pass through a closed sepulchre (apparently implied by Mt 28-) and through shut doors (Lk 24³⁶, Jn 20¹⁹⁻²⁶). Distance could not delay His movements; He could be present in different and distant places at short intervals (Lk 24¹⁵⁻³⁴). Suddenly He appears without apparent physical locomotion (Lk 24³⁶, Jn 20¹⁹⁻²⁶, 'Jesus stood [ἔστη] in the midst'). As suddenly He disappears (Lk 24³¹, 'He vanished from their sight,' ἀφαντος ἐγενετο ἀπ' αὐτῶν—a disappearance, not a local withdrawal). Here apparently is an emerging from and a withdrawal into complete invisibility at will. And then, finally, as illustrating this transcendence of the ordinary laws of material existence, we are told He ascended from earth to heaven in visible form (Lk 24⁵¹, Ac 1⁹; cf. Mk 16¹⁹).

The words καὶ ἀνέβητο εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν in Lk 24⁵¹ and all v. 19 in Mk 16 are regarded as doubtful by textual criticism, and, even if they be accepted, it has been contended that they do not of themselves imply a visible ascent (see E. P. Gould in ICC, 'St. Mark,' Edinburgh, 1896, p. 309). But such a visible ascent is directly stated in Luke's second treatise, Ac 1⁹, and the subsequent joy of the disciples (Lk 24³²⁻⁵) distinctly points to some such visible representation of His final triumph over death (cf. Forrest, *The Christ of Hist. and of Exper.*⁷, p. 413).

(2) Difficulty of recognition from mere outward appearances.—So great was the change that, it would seem, the mere external form and features failed to disclose who He was, even to those with whom He had had familiar intercourse on earth. Mary Magdalene mistook Him for the gardener, until He called her by her name (Jn 20¹⁴⁻¹⁶). The two men on the way to Emmaus not only walked but conversed with Him for a considerable length of time, yet did not know who He was till He was made known to them in the breaking of bread (Lk 24³⁰⁻³²). When He stood in the midst of the assembled disciples He seemed so strange to them that they 'imagined it was a ghost they saw' and they were 'scared and terrified' till 'he showed them his hands and feet' (Lk 24³⁷⁻⁴⁰ [Moffatt]; cf. Jn 20²⁰, 'his hands and his side'). And again, at the Sea of Tiberias, when Jesus stood on the beach, the disciples (among whom were four apostles) failed to recognize Him (Jn 21⁴).

This is the more striking when we consider (i.) that the appearances were not momentary glimpses, but, at least in several of the cases, prolonged interviews; and (ii.) that even when He appeared to the same people a second or third time they were still at first perplexed and had their doubts as to His identity. What was the cause of this non-recognition? It may be that the failure of Mary Magdalene to recognize Jesus at the beginning was due, as some maintain, to her eyes being dimmed with tears, and her mind bewildered and perplexed—this, combined with the dimness of the early morning light. It may be that the two disciples on the way to Emmaus failed to recognize Him because of mental preoccupation with their grief, and absorption in their puzzled discussion of the story told by the women. 'Their eyes were holden (ἐκρατούντο, overpowered, spell-bound) that they should not know him (τοῦ μὴ ἐπιγινώσκειν αὐτόν),' says Luke in explanation (24¹⁶).

These words need not be taken to imply any special supernatural action on their senses on the part of the Risen Christ, "who would not be seen by them till the time when He saw fit" (see Plummer, ICC, in loc.). They may mean simply that they did not know Him; that, through some conditions on their side, they failed to recognize Him (cf. Moffatt's translation, 'they were prevented from recognizing him'). It has to be remembered that in this case neither of the two, so far as we know, belonged to the company of the apostles, and so they may never before have come into close quarters with the Master, so that their failure to recognize Him was not surprising (cf. Swete, Appearances, p. 23). Once more, in the incident at the Lake of Tiberias the words of the Evangelist, 'when early morn was now arrived, or arriving' (πρωτας δὲ ἡδὴ γενομένης, other MSS γενομένης), suggest that the disciples may have been hindered from recognizing Jesus on the shore by the dimness of the dawning morning light. These and such like conditions may have contributed to the effect. Their mental condition in particular has to be taken into account as an operating factor in the case. It is altogether probable that their surprise and bewilderment, combined with their hopeless grief, made them less capable of exact observation than in ordinary circumstances. Yet the narratives convey the impression that there was something more in the case than this; that some mysterious change had occurred in Jesus' outward appearance which at least assisted non-recognition and excited awe in the beholders (Lk 24³⁷); that some change in bodily appearance had taken place corresponding to the mysterious change already referred to in Christ's relation to ordinary physical laws.

'He appeared to them in another form' (ἐν ἑτέρῃ μορφῇ), says the Mk. App. of the manifestation to the two on the way to Emmaus. That the words mean only that to the two on the way to Emmaus He presented a different appearance from that to Mary Magdalene (possibly, as Alford suggests, through His dress being changed, giving the impression not now of a gardener or labourer at work, but rather of a traveller with his loins girt, shoes on feet, and staff in hand) is altogether improbable. The natural interpretation of the words is that He appeared in a different form from that He had on earth, that some change had come over Him so that He did not look the same as when He was with them before the Passion ('μορφή always signifies a form which truly and fully expresses the being which underlies it' [H. A. A. Kennedy, in EGT, London, 1903, on Ph 2¹³]).

This is supported by the cumulative evidence of the narratives, the uniform testimony of which is that, while the same, some mysterious change had come over His whole mode of existence. It is a change which attaches to all that we read in the Gospels of the appearances of Jesus. It was not only, as we have seen, that His risen body was no longer subject to ordinary physical laws, but the manner of His intercourse with His disciples after His resurrection was altogether changed. His appearances were occasional. He appeared only when He willed to appear. There is a strange aloofness and reserve about His attitude to them. He is no longer their companion as He used to be; He speaks of the time 'when I was yet with you' (Lk 24⁴⁴). Though He invites them to feel Him and see that they may be thus convinced that He was no phantasm or apparition, but indeed the Risen Jesus, He forbids Mary Magdalene to 'keep clinging to him' (Jn 20¹⁷, μὴ μου ἄρτου) so as to hold Him in possession. The prohibition of Jesus meant that the old earthly intercourse and relations with His disciples which Mary wished to resume could not be restored, that they were for ever past, and that their place was to be taken by a new and higher kind of fellowship, to be realized only when He had completed His earthly self-manifestation, and had 'ascended unto the Father' (Jn 20¹⁷, οὐπω γὰρ ἀναβέβηκα). For the present He is, in His intercourse with them, hovering between the old and the new in a transitional condition, combining the seemingly opposite qualities of the material and spiritual, embodied in another form.

This combination of two opposite sets of characteristics in the appearances of the Risen Christ Weizsacker (*Apost. Age*², i. 9-11) makes the basis of criticism of the credibility of the Gospel accounts. They represent, he says, two different layers of tradition. The appearances were in their earliest form purely spiritual or visional; but, as time went on, the craving for external and palpable signs, combined with popular realistic ideas of a carnal Resurrection, led to a gradual materializing of the visions, and an endowing of the visional with physical attributes, thus overlaying history with legend. So Harnack and others hold that the idea of a bodily Resurrection was a form subsequently imposed on a more primary spiritual belief in the Lord's continued life. This overlaying of the Gospel representations by popular realistic conceptions was a process which history shows speedily manifested itself in the early Church. But the combination of contrasted traits—the 'dual quality' or double aspect of His appearances—is of the very essence of the Gospel accounts throughout, present in what Weizsacker terms the earlier layers of the tradition as really as in the later. And if the Resurrection be what it is uniformly represented in the narratives as being—not the simple reanimation of His mortal body which Harnack speaks of (Hist. of Dogma, i. 85 n.), a resuscitation and restoration to the former conditions of existence, but the entrance on a new order of life, then the combination in the Gospel accounts of the appearances of apparently inconsistent aspects, so far from casting doubt on these accounts, is a strong evidence of their historical trustworthiness.

For such a conception of the mode of existence of the Risen Christ the disciples had absolutely no precedent. On the contrary, it was to them, as the records show, a most novel and strange idea for which they were unprepared, and which with difficulty they were persuaded to receive. It was opposed to both Jewish and Greek ideas on the subject. The Resurrection as it actually took place 'would be quite foreign to Jewish ideas, which embraced the continuance of the soul after death and the final resurrection of the body, but not a state of spiritual corporeity, far less, under conditions such as those described in the Gospels' (Edersheim, *LT*⁴ ii. 624). About the current Jewish conception of the Resurrection-Body there was little that was spiritual. 'The future body, as to material and organisation, was conceived as essentially of the same quality as the present' (F. W. Weber, Lehren des Talmud, Leipzig, 1880, p. 353, quoted by Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 227). In Apoc. Bar. (e.g. l. 2) it is stated that the bodies of the dead shall be raised exactly as they were when committed to the ground. After this has been done for purposes of recognition by friends, a glorious change will take place: 'they shall be made like unto the angels, and be made equal to the stars, and they shall be changed into every form they desire from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory' (li. 10; cf. the more spiritual ideas prominent in Enoch, e.g. l. 4, civ. 4, 6, cviii. 11, etc.). The changed body is still, however, described largely in sensuous physical terms, while here, in the case of the Risen Christ, was a body so spiritualized that they thought it was a spirit. On the other hand, the Alexandrian Greek conception was that of emancipation from the body and continued existence as pure spirit. But, besides the fact that the tomb was empty, here was a body which could be not only seen but touched and felt, and presented evident marks of identity with the body of earth. 'Feel me and see, a spirit hath not flesh and bones.' The marvel of the records is the perfect simplicity, the perfect naturalness with which the two sets of characteristics are combined in the same narratives, 'as if those who put the facts together were conscious of no difficulty in the apparent contradiction' (Westcott, Gospel of the Resurrection, p. ix). If we take one series of events, the Resurrection might appear to have been a mere coming back to life; if we take another, it might appear to be purely spiritual or spiritualistic. But the records combine both, and thus differentiate the apostolic representation of the resurrection of Jesus from the two current conceptions—from the sensuous conception of it held by the Pharisees, and from the spiritualistic conception of the Alexandrian or Greek philosophers.

Such a representation had no precedent, and can be explained only by the new revelation conveyed to the disciples through the appearances and intercourse of the Risen Christ, as recorded for us in the narratives. Through these appearances and self-manifestations Christ sought to impress on His disciples, on the one hand, the identity of the Risen with the Crucified Jesus, and on the other, that His resurrection was not a mere restoration to life but a triumph of His whole personality over death and His entrance on a new and higher mode of existence. So Jesus offered Himself to the senses of the disciples, even to their touch and handling, if this were needed to convince them of His identity—even, it may be, to the eating of bread, if only so the feeling that He was a phantasm or apparition could be removed. But when this was attained, when doubt of His identity was removed and the disciples thought to resume the old familiar intercourse, He manifested the characteristics of a more spiritual form of existence, and they learned the truth, that the Resurrection was the entrance on a new order of life and a higher kind of fellowship. So the Ascension is represented in the Gospel narratives as the natural and necessary sequel of the Resurrection. The visible lifting from the earth marked the close of the visible intercourse and the beginning of the more spiritual for which the disciples were gradually prepared by the teaching of the forty days (Jn 20^r; cf. Lk 24⁴³, Ac 1⁸, Jn 14–16) (see Denney, art. 'Ascension,' HDB i. 161). The contention (e.g. Newman Smyth, Old Faiths in New Light, London, n.d., p. 156 f.) that the body of Jesus during the forty days underwent a gradual process of spiritualization or glorification, a 'process of resurrection,' which was consummated in the Ascension does not seem to be supported by the narratives. On the very day of His resurrection the spirituality of His risen body was as manifest as in the case of the appearance by the Sea of Tiberias (cf. Lk 24³¹⁻³⁸, Jn 21⁴²; see Forrest, Christ of Hist. and of Exper., p. 411 f.).

With the essential nature of the Resurrection-Body the Evangelists were not concerned. But from the temporary manifestations of the Risen Body during the forty days there were two things, either of which they might have thought it to be, which they came to know it was not. It was not simply the old earthly body resumed, and it was not a mere phantasmal existence. And one thing they knew it was—it was a body no longer subject to physical limitations and restrictions, but completely under the control of the spiritual nature or will, so under control that it could manifest itself in such material form or forms, if this were necessary, for evidential purposes. Already during the earthly ministry there were, according to the Gospels, pre-glimpses of this control of body by spirit. Two of the best attested incidents in the narratives—His walking on the sea and the Transfiguration—are instances in point. The chief significance of the Transfiguration has been found by some to consist just in this, that it was meant to prepare the disciples for the Resurrection and for the appearance of the Risen Jesus in glorified form (see, e.g., H. A. A. Kennedy in JThSt iv. [1903] 270 ff.).

ii. THE WITNESS OF ST. PAUL. — St. Paul's teaching on the nature of the Resurrection-Body as 'spiritual' is but the further carrying out of the teaching of the forty days, and is intelligible only against the background of the appearances of Christ's risen body, reports of which he would receive from first-hand witnesses. In regard to the Risen Body he holds firmly the two points borne witness to by the Gospel accounts: (1) the identity between the body which was buried and the body which rose. Some critics maintain that there is no substantial identity between the two in St. Paul's teaching; but apart from the analogy of the seed, the words 'that Christ died . . . and that he was buried and that he hath been raised on the third day' are, as Feine points out (Theol. des NT, p. 362), susceptible of no other interpretation than that of identity. But (2) equally with identity the difference between the two is insisted on, represented by the distinction between the seed and the perfected plant: 'Thou sowest not that body that shall be' (1 Co 15³⁷). St. Paul speaks of the risen body as a body not of flesh and blood ('flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,' v.⁵⁰) but one transfigured and transformed. A distinction is drawn between the 'psychical' or 'natural' body and the 'pneumatical' or 'spiritual' body, the former the vehicle of self-manifestation under earthly conditions, the latter the organ of self-manifestation under supra-terrestrial conditions. The difference consists not in the body ceasing to be material or being changed into spirit, but in the material being entirely subjected to the dominion of the spirit. The risen body of Christ was spiritual 'not because it was less than before material, but because in it matter was wholly and finally subjugated to spirit, and not to the exigencies of physical life. Matter no longer restricted Him or hindered. It had become the pure and transparent vehicle of spiritual purpose' (Gore, Body of Christ, p. 127). (For the striking corroboration of St. Paul's conception of the 'spiritual body' supplied by recent science, see below, IV. ii. 2 (c).)

St. Paul's view has been contrasted with that of the Evangelists, as less materialistic, and the difference has been traced to the more spiritual character of the appearance of the Risen Christ to St. Paul as compared with those to the older apostles. But we have to remember the difference of relationship to the Risen Lord between St. Paul and the older disciples. That St. Paul had ever seen Jesus during His earthly life and ministry is doubtful. Ramsay, C. Clemen (Paulus, Giessen, 1904), and J. Weiss (Paulus und Jesus, Berlin, 1909), among recent critics, maintain that he had. The weight of probability, however, is against the supposition (see Feine, Jesus Christus und Paulus, Leipzig, 1902, pp. 93, 350) (2 Co 5¹⁶ cannot be cited for or against, for what St. Paul is contrasting here is the knowledge of Christ 'after the flesh' [not 'in the flesh'] with the knowledge of Him after the spirit—the difference between the estimate of Christ formed by St. Paul before his conversion and after). Recognition of identity under changed conditions was not, therefore, the primary requirement in St. Paul's case, as it was in the case of the older apostles. The aim of the appearance to him was to convince him that the Jesus who was crucified and whose followers he persecuted was indeed the Risen and Exalted Christ. To him, therefore, Christ was manifested in the majesty of His Divine glory, a Figure invested in dazzling splendour, with none of those more tangible characteristics which He manifested to the earlier apostles and which seemed necessary for evidential purposes. Though thus less tangible, however, the appearance to St. Paul was not less objective than those to the earlier apostles. In St. Paul's own judgment it was the same kind of appearance as that to Peter, James, and the others—'He appeared to me also.'

The question has been raised whether St. Paul derived his view of the resurrection-body entirely from what he had seen and heard of the Risen Lord, or was partly influenced by contemporary Jewish or Hellenistic ideas. Lake, e.g. (Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 23 ff.), maintains that 'the Pauline doctrine of a transubstantiation of the body at the resurrection is one which was in the main familiar to the Jews,' yet he recognizes the influence on St. Paul's doctrine of 'his knowledge of appearances of the Risen Lord in the light of which knowledge he re-formed his ideas on the Resurrection generally.' The question of the influence on St. Paul's doctrine of Christ's own teaching on the resurrection has also to be considered. Feine (Jesus Christus und Paulus, p. 181 f.) points out certain remarkable similarities between St. Paul's teaching in 1 Cor. and the narratives of our Lord's discussion with the Sadducees in Mk 12¹⁸, Lk 20²⁷. The condition of the risen is described by Jesus as being 'as the angels of God in heaven' (Mk 12²⁵, ὡς ἄγγελοι ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς), or 'like the angels' (ὡς ἄγγελοι), and as being 'sons of God, being sons of the resurrection' (Lk 20³⁶). That is to say, they possess a heavenly or spiritual organism, and are conformed to the likeness of God (see Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, pp. 100, 234). This Christian tradition of Jesus' eschatological teaching, if received by St. Paul, was, however, illumined and defined by the manifestations of Jesus to himself and to the other apostles. Others maintain (e.g. Reitzenstein; see J. Weiss, on 1 Co 15⁴⁴) that St. Paul's contrast between the 'natural body' (σῶμα ψυχικόν) and the 'spiritual body' (σῶμα πνευματικόν) was derived from the Greek mystery-religions. But the Greek antithesis is based on a dualistic conception of human nature, and St. Paul's contrast is in quite a different category.

IV. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST FOR APOSTOLIC CHRISTIANITY.

—The significance of the Resurrection for the Apostolic Church may be represented under a two-fold aspect, (i.) as evidential, (ii.) as essential or constitutive.

i. EVIDENTIAL SIGNIFICANCE. — In the older mode of treatment of the Resurrection, in English theology especially, main stress was laid upon its evidential value as the confirmation or proof of the truth of Christ's claims as to His person and work. To place the chief emphasis on this aspect of its significance is to give the Resurrection too abstract and external a character, and is the correlative of that view of the miracle of Jesus natural to 18th cent. theology, which lays stress on their value as credential appendages rather than as an essential part of Jesus' redemptive revelation. According to the invariable apostolic representation, however, the resurrection of Christ is not merely something consequent upon the redemptive revelation of His life and work on earth, something added on to it as the reward and guarantee of its efficacy; it is itself an essential and constitutive part of the revelation necessary to its culmination or completion. While this is so, the importance of the evidential aspect of the Resurrection is not to be minimized. This is, indeed, where we must begin in our study of the apostolic representation. For the apostles the first and primary significance of the Resurrection lay undoubtedly in the fact that it was the Divine confirmation of Jesus' entire claim as to His person and work. Thus it is—and the importance of the fact has to be noted, as it is often overlooked—that it is always God to whom the apostles impute the raising of Christ. His resurrection was the immediate act of God the Father, who by this gave His verdict concerning Jesus, thus once for all reversing Israel's act of rejection, and refuting the Jews' charge of blasphemy. 'Whom they slew, hanging him on a tree, him God raised up' (Ac 10³⁹). This is the uniform apostolic representation common to St. Paul and the earlier apostles (cf. Ac 2²⁴ 32 36 31⁵ 41⁵ 53¹ 13³⁰⁻³⁹ 17³¹, 1 Th 1¹⁰, Ro 1⁴ 6⁴, 1 Co 15¹⁵, Gal 1¹, Eph 1²⁰, Ph 2⁹, 1 P 1²¹, He 13²⁰). So that St. Paul says, 'If Christ did not rise . . . we are detected bearing false witness to God (κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ) by affirming of him that he raised Christ' (1 Co 15¹⁴⁻¹⁵ [Moffatt]). And if this affirmation or witness is false, then their whole view of the worth of Christ's person and work is without validity. Their preaching of Christ is 'empty' (v. 14) and faith in Him is 'vain' (v. 17). To develop this evidential significance of the Resurrection into its details:

1. Evidential with regard to His Person.—(a) Through the Resurrection conclusive proof was afforded of the Messiahship of Jesus. This aspect of its significance was that which was primarily emphasized in the earliest apostolic teaching as represented by the sermons of St. Peter recorded in the early chapters of Acts. That Jesus claimed to be the Messiah, the Divinely sent One in whom all the hopes of Israel were to be realized, cannot be seriously doubted. In calling Himself 'the Son of man' He adopted a title which, it is now generally recognized, involved Messianic pretensions (see Sanday, The Life of Christ in Recent Research, Oxford, 1907, p. 123 ff.). This claim He had already supported by His life and work. His miracles—works of God wrought through Him (cf. Jn 14¹⁰)—were proofs of His mission as God's accredited messenger to Israel (Ac 2²², 'a man accredited to you by God through miracles, wonders, and signs which God performed by him among you'; cf. Ac 10³⁸, 'anointed of the Holy Ghost and with power he went about doing good, for God was with him'). This claim, however, was apparently contradicted and denied by His death on the Cross, which to the Jew was the symbol of Divine rejection (5³⁰ 10³⁹). Through the Death on the Cross, therefore, the Jews' verdict on Jesus seemed Divinely supported. But through the Resurrection as not merely His being raised on the third day (Ac 10⁴⁰) but His being exalted to the right hand of God in power and glory, Israel's act of rejection was Divinely reversed, and the claim of Jesus to be the Christ was for ever vindicated. 'This Jesus has God raised up' (Ac 2²⁴). 'The God of our fathers has glorified Jesus his servant' (3¹³; cf. 2³³ 5³¹ 7³²).

'God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified' (Ac 2³⁶; cf. 9²²). 'Uplifted then by God's right hand, and receiving from the Father the long-promised holy Spirit, he has poured on us what you now see and hear' (2³⁸ [Moffatt]). There could be but one conclusion—earth's rejected was God's accepted.

(b) Through the Resurrection the Divinity of Jesus was established. He was shown to be not only Messiah but the Son of God. A unique relation to God He had Himself claimed. The title 'Son of God,' indeed, is very rarely found applied by Jesus to Himself. More often it is used to describe the impression made by Him upon others (e.g. on the possessed, Mk 3¹¹ 5⁷ and [s]; on the centurion, Mk 15³⁹ and [s]). The crowning instance is the confession of Peter, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16¹⁶). That on this matter of His Divine Sonship our Lord maintained a great measure of reserve and reticence was quite in keeping with His whole method of self-revelation. The truth of His Divine Sonship was not one that could be taught the disciples as a dogma; it must be allowed to break naturally upon them as they increasingly divined the uniqueness of His character. But we see in the records of the Evangelists how Jesus consistently sought to guide the thoughts of His disciples concerning Himself into true and worthy lines. He uniformly claimed to stand in a unique relation to God. He habitually speaks of God as 'my Father' (Mt. 23 times), never embracing Himself with His disciples as being in the same sense sons of God. He attributes to Himself powers and prerogatives which imply essential coequality with God. He claims perfect mutuality of knowledge as well as of will with the Father, whereby He possesses an exclusive power of manifesting Him (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 10²²). He claims to do for men what only God can do—to grant forgiveness (Mt 9¹, Mk 2¹⁰, Lk 5²⁴) and to bestow the Holy Spirit (Mt 10¹⁹, Lk 12¹). And, further, He demands from men that complete surrender and utter devotion of life which can be granted only to God (Mt 10²⁷, Lk 14²⁶). So it is altogether in keeping with the Synoptic representation when the Fourth Gospel records such sayings as these: 'I and the Father are one' (thing or essence, ἐν) (10³⁰), 'He who has seen me has seen the Father' (14⁹), 'I am in the Father, and the Father is in me' (14¹¹), 'the Jews sought the more to kill him because he said, God was his peculiar (ιδίον) Father, making himself equal to God' (5¹⁸).

The claim of Jesus to be the Son of God is thus implied in His attitude throughout, and for refusing to disown it He was counted a blasphemer and condemned to death (Mt 26⁶³⁻⁶⁶, 27⁴³; cf. Jn 10³⁶). Such a death—a 'hanging on a gibbet'—seemed to be a confirmation of the judgment of His enemies, but the Resurrection was God's great declaration in action substantiating the truth of Jesus' claim: 'declared Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead' (Ro 1⁴). No blasphemer was He. The Resurrection 'declared,' defined, or marked Him out to be (ἀποδείκνυμι) what He always truly was—Son of God. For the Sonship thus declared 'in power' (ἐν δυνάμει)—no longer in humiliation but in power, the power of exalted Lordship) by the Resurrection was 'according to' or answered to the spirit of holiness (κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης), the spirit of exceptional and transcendent holiness which was the inmost reality in the person and life of Jesus, and testified to His peculiar relation to God. Divine Sonship, that is to say, was not an honour to which for the first time Christ was exalted after His death. The Resurrection only displayed Him as being what He was inalienably from the first, and installed Him in the dignity which corresponded to His nature. 'In virtue of His resurrection . . . Christ is established in that dignity which is His and which answers to His nature' (Denney, EGT, on Ro 1⁴).

For St. Paul the conviction of the Divine Sonship of Jesus dated from the appearance to him on the way to Damascus of the Glorified Christ. What was revealed to him then was that the Crucified One was the Son of God in power. So that the gospel he immediately began to preach was 'that Jesus is the Son of God' (Ac 9²⁰). It is sometimes maintained that the 'Son of God' was a recognized title of the Messiah (cf. En. cv. 2; 4 Ezr. vii. 23 f., xiii. 32, 37, 52, xiv. 9), and that we cannot argue from the mere use of the phrase to His Divinity. But it is not a case of thus arguing. We have but to take the first writing of his which has come down to us—1 Thess.—to see there writ large what the assertion of the Divine Sonship of Jesus meant for St. Paul. In this first extant NT writing (written, according to Sanday, probably about A.D. 51, i.e. about twenty years after the Resurrection) three remarkable predictions are made of Jesus.

(1) In the first verse, the Glorified Jesus is bracketed in dignity with God the Father. St. Paul and his companions give solemn greeting to 'the Church of the Thessalonians (which is) in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (v. 1). The wonder of such a juxtaposition is realized only when we remember that St. Paul was a strict Jew, in whose blood therefore monotheism ran like a passion. Yet this Jewish apostle does not scruple to place Jesus side by side with God, and assume a like estimate of Him on the part of those to whom he writes.

(2) In this brief letter Jesus is more than twenty times referred to as 'Lord' (Κυριος). The disciples had been in the habit of addressing their Master as 'Lord' during His lifetime, using the term as a title of authority in a sense not very different from that in which any Rabbi might be addressed by his pupils (Jn 13³⁶) (see Sanday in HDB ii. 645^b). But that sense is no longer adequate to the apostolic usage; the word has become filled with a deeper meaning, being used as the LXX equivalent of the OT 'Jahweh' and as signifying Divine power and sovereignty. What Jahweh was to Israel, that Jesus was to the religious consciousness of St. Paul—the One who has earned the place of Sovereign in his heart, and whom he feels constrained to worship and serve.

(3) Prayer is addressed to Jesus directly, and not merely offered in His name—'Now may our God and Father himself, and our Lord Jesus, direct our way unto you' (3¹¹). And all this, it is significant to note, is referred to by the Apostle only in the passing, without the slightest indication that it was a novel or unfamiliar attitude to his readers. In his subsequent Epistles St. Paul gives fuller and more developed doctrinal expression to his conviction of the truth of the Divine Sonship of Jesus. Personal pre-existence in the Godhead is unambiguously affirmed of Him in 2 Co 8⁹ ('ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ,' etc.) and in Ph 2⁶ ('though he was divine by nature, he did not snatch at equality with God but emptied himself by taking the nature of a servant,' etc. [Moffatt]). In Col 1¹⁵⁻²⁰ His cosmic significance is dwelt upon. As 'the image (εἰκὼν) of the invisible God,' He occupies a position of unique pre-eminence and sovereignty, and is agent or mediator and end in creation as well as in redemptive history ('in him were all things created . . . all things have been created through him, and with a view to [εἰς] him'; cf. 1 Co 8⁶ 10⁴). But already in his earliest as truly as in his latest writings full, eternal, essential Divinity is ascribed to Jesus as Son of God, whereby He is placed alongside the Father in honour and worship.

St. Paul's usage of the term 'Son of God' in this transcendent sense has been traced to Hellenistic influence. While the title had been employed by the earliest Christian community 'in a very harmless sense,' St. Paul gave it the altogether new and mythical sense of a God who had descended from heaven, a sense which was intelligible enough to Greeks and heathen but not to Jews with their strict monotheism; and in so doing he 'became the creator of the new Christology, which drew its inspiration, not from history, but from something above it—from a mythical being, and which won over the heathen for this very reason' (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1903-04, i. 250). 'Son of God,' as employed by St. Paul, is thus held to be primarily a Gentile title, one which was sometimes applied to the Emperors, like the title 'Lord' (e.g. it is so found in a letter of the Emperor Augustus dated A.D. 5; see Exp. 6th ser., vii. [1903] 114, and Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul, p. 44). This Imperial usage, Deissmann conjectures, may have first suggested to St. Paul the application of the title to Jesus (Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895, i. 167, Eng. tr., Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, p. 166 f.). But 'Son of God,' if a Gentile, was also a Jewish title, and, as Knowling points out, it is most significant that the first and earliest intimation which we have in Acts of St. Paul's Christian teaching is this, that 'in the synagogues'—not to Greeks or Romans, but to Jews and proselytes—'he proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God' (9²⁰).

If St. Paul had interpreted 'Son of God' differently from the other apostles, and if the deification of Christ had been due to him, the surprising thing is that we do not hear of any opposition on this point between him and the other apostles. The older apostles and St. Paul differed no doubt in many things, but there is no trace that they differed in the estimate which they formed of the Person of Christ, and of His relationship to the Father. St. Paul's representation of Christ is only a more developed expression of what is present already in solution in the primitive apostolic teaching. Of this St. Peter's sermons in Acts and his First Epistle may be taken as representative.

In St. Peter's sermons in Acts, while no attempt is made at a fully developed doctrine of the Person of Christ, He is quite definitely placed on the side of God as over against man, the theme of the gospel and the object of faith. Through His resurrection and exaltation Jesus is proclaimed not only 'Messiah' (3¹⁸⁻²⁰ 4²⁵⁻²⁸), but 'giver of the Holy Spirit' (2³³), 'Prince of life' (3¹⁵ 5³¹), 'Saviour' (4¹² 5²¹), and 'Judge of living and dead' (10⁴², a prerogative which in the OT belongs to God and to God alone). Prayer is offered to Him directly (1²⁴ 7⁵⁹), so that one mode of describing Christians in these early days was to speak of them as those that called upon the name of Jesus (9²¹). And already in his first sermon we find St. Peter applying to Christ the term 'Lord' (Κύριος, Ac 2¹⁻³³ 3⁶; cf. 3¹³ 2¹ 5²¹ 10³⁶), the same term as is used of Jahweh in the LXX, thus assigning to Him Divine sovereignty and authority. The mere use of the word Κύριος may not in itself necessarily involve Divinity. The Jews applied it to their Messiah (Mk 12³⁶ and J⁹) without thereby, it is said, pronouncing him to be God. But, as Knowling points out, 'it is not merely that the early Christians addressed their Ascended Lord so many times by the same name which is used of Jehovah in the LXX . . . but that they did not hesitate to refer to Him the attributes and the prophecies which the great prophets of the Jewish nation had associated with the name of Jehovah' (EGT, on Ac 2²¹).

In his First Epistle St. Peter represents the same point of view in slightly fuller and more developed form. The Spirit of God is definitely spoken of as 'the Spirit of Christ' (1¹¹); and although the title 'Son of God' is not employed, we find the expression 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1³), with an undeniable implication of Christ's special Sonship. Christians are called to 'sanctify in their hearts Christ as Lord' (3¹⁵) in words which in the OT are applied to Jahweh and His sanctification by Israel (Is 8¹³). He is proclaimed to be Lord not only of the spiritual world but of the material as related to and subserving the spiritual, 'angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him' (1 P 3²²). It is a disputed question whether 1¹¹ and 1²⁰ do or do not imply the real pre-existence of Christ. While the language of the former seems satisfied if we take it to mean simply that the Divine Spirit, now so bound up with Christ that it can be called His Spirit, moved also in the prophets of old, the latter passage is more significant. 'While the word "foreknown" (προεγνωσμένου) in no way involves the pre-existence of Christ, since it is used even of Christians in 1², yet the unusual combination of "foreknown" with "manifested" may justly be considered as placing the matter beyond doubt. Only that can be manifested which was in being before manifestation' (H. R. Mackintosh, The Person of Jesus Christ, Edinburgh, 1912, p. 45 f.). With the sermons of St. Peter in Acts and his First Epistle as representing the general conception of Christ current in the earliest Apostolic Age may be coupled the Epistle of St. James, where Jesus is extolled as 'the Lord of glory' (2¹) and ranked with God in honour and dignity (1¹); and the brief Epistle of Jude, who describes Jesus as 'our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ' (v. 4), whose 'slave' (δοῦλος) he is (v. 1).

As representing the more developed apostolic doctrine, we have not only the Epistles of St. Paul but the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Johannine writings. In Hebrews the central thought is that of the Divine Sonship of Christ, in virtue of which He is the Mediator of the new and better covenant (12²⁴ 9¹⁵ 8⁶). He is announced as a 'Son' (1²), transcendently related to God, the effulgence of the Father's glory and the very image of His substance (1³), creator, upholder, and heir of all things (1² 10), who, though thus eternal and Divine, because the children were partakers of flesh and blood, Himself likewise partook of the same and is now through His suffering and sacrifice exalted at the right hand of the majesty on high (1³ 8¹ 10⁵). In the Fourth Gospel the emphasis on the Divine Sonship, marked throughout, so that even such a critic as J. Weiss admits that in this Gospel Christ is God in the fullest sense, possessing 'those qualities which constitute the nature of the Deity' (Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma, Eng. tr., London, 1911, p. 148 ff.). The view of the writer is summed up in the Prologue in terms of the rebaptized Logos conception of which he predicates His eternity ('existed in the very beginning,' v. 1 [Moffatt]), His eternal personal relation to God ('was with [πρὸς] God,' v. 1; 'was with God in the very beginning,' v. 2), His agency in creation ('through him all existence came into being, no existence came into being apart from him, v. 3), giver of life and light to the whole race of mankind, the medium alike of creation and of revelation ('in him life lay, and this life was the Light for men,' v. 4; 'the real Light which lightens every man,' v. 9). In 1 Jn. such a unity between God and the Son is recognized that he who confesses the Son hath the Father also (5²⁰). In the Apocalypse Christ is represented as He whom all creation unites to worship as it worships God Almighty (1⁶; cf. 7¹²). God and the Lamb receive united adoration (5¹³ 7¹⁰). He is the 'First and the Last,' the 'Beginning and the End' (1⁸ 21⁶ 22¹³), the Lord of the churches, who holds their stars or guardian angels in His hand (1^{18, 20}), who is Ruler of the nations and King of kings, the all-wise and almighty Judge of the nations (7⁹ 15⁴).

2. Evidential with regard to His work, especially His death.—The Resurrection was not only the confirmation of Christ's claim to Sonship and Messiahship; it was through this the Divine justification of Jesus' claim as to the redemptive character of His life and work as culminating in His death, and the public declaration of its acceptance. The Messiah was looked for as coming in outward glory, but Jesus came in a way that was the very opposite of this. His life on earth had been one of humiliation and suffering, of self-denying service and sacrifice for others, until at last the culminating point of His sacrifice was reached in His death. All were 'offended' in Him. He needed to be justified, and the Resurrection was His Divine justification or vindication. In the Epistle to the Philippians His resurrection (and exaltation) is connected with His 'making himself of no reputation' and taking upon Him the form of a servant (2⁶⁻¹¹). In Romans (1⁴) it is in contrast with His having been made of the seed of David according to the flesh that He is said to have been declared Son of God with power. Above all, His death needed justification. Jesus had Himself while on earth proclaimed the necessity of His suffering and death. But this was so contrary to Jewish conceptions of the Messiah that the first disciples had difficulty in attaining to it. 'The idea of the Messianic sufferings and death is one that wakes no echo in the heart of any Jewish contemporary of our Lord, not excepting even His disciples' (L. A. Muirhead, Eschatology of Jesus, London, 1904, p. 206), and the Death on the Cross when it came was fatal, in Jewish eyes, to Messianic claims. This was the great σκατάβαλον. It was His resurrection, and the fact that by it He had been 'declared' the Son of God with power, that showed the peculiarity and importance of His death. So St. Paul represents the case. If Jesus was indeed both Lord and Christ, as through his experience on the Damascus road he had come to know, the death which He died could not be what it seemed to be, a curse, the death of a malefactor and blasphemer, but a Divine appointment for the salvation of men. There must be in it a Divine virtue. 'God was in Christ,' even Christ the crucified, reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5¹⁹; cf. 1 Co 15¹⁷, Ro 4²⁵ 6⁴). It was a vicarious death; He was delivered up for our transgressions (Ro 4²⁵), and the Resurrection was the assurance that God had accepted Christ's atoning work, and that the foundation of perfect reconciliation between God and man had been laid. In the light of the revelation of the Resurrection, the Death on the Cross lost its shame and became a spring of blessing, the central 'commendation' or proof of Divine love (Ro 5⁸).

Already in the primitive Christian community, following hints of the Lord Himself in His earthly and then in His post-Resurrection teaching, we have the atoning significance of the Death represented. That Jesus 'died for our sins according to the scriptures'—not only the fact of the Death but its atoning significance—was part of the tradition which St. Paul had received and which, he claimed, was common to himself and the older apostles (1 Co 15³⁻¹¹). 'The inference,' Weizsacker acknowledges, 'is indisputable; the primitive Church already taught, and proved from Scripture, that the death of Jesus exerted a saving influence in the forgiveness of sin' (*Apost. Age*², i. 130 f.).

This is borne out by the reports of St. Peter's speeches in the Acts, where the death of Jesus is represented as a Divine necessity, taking place 'by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God' (2²³; cf. 4²⁸), and as in accordance with prophecy (3¹⁸; cf. Christ's post-Resurrection teaching, Lk 24²⁷. Is 53 seems to have been the special passage in the Apostle's mind—the Suffering Messiah being frequently identified in these early speeches with the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah, e.g. 3¹³ 4²⁷; cf. 8³³). So, although represented as a crime on the part of the Jews (2³ 3¹³⁻¹⁵ 5³⁰), the death of Jesus is viewed as a fact Divinely foreordained and Divinely necessary. This Divine necessity of the Death has reference to its saving or redemptive significance in virtue of which the great blessing of the gospel, offered in the name of Jesus, is the forgiveness of sins (2³⁸ 3¹⁹ 5³¹ 10⁴³). In these early sermons or discourses the redemptive significance of the Death is not developed. We have to remember that 'the Petrine speeches in the Acts were called forth by special circumstances and (except the speeches recorded in Ac 10³⁰⁻³³ 15¹⁻¹¹) were all addressed to non-Christian Jews at Jerusalem. We have no right, therefore, to look to them for the full cycle of Christian doctrine which even in the beginning of the Gospel Peter had apprehended' (Chase, HDB iii. 793^b). In the First Epistle of Peter we have a somewhat more developed doctrine; the atoning efficacy of the suffering and death of Christ being described in varied language—covenant blood (1-), ransom (1^{18a}), sin-bearing (2^{24b}), substitution, the sacrifice of the righteous for the unrighteous (3¹⁻⁷).

In St. Paul the redemptive significance of the Death is further developed. He died 'for our sins' (1 Co 15³, 2 Co 5²¹); a 'ransom' (λύτρον, 1 Ti 2⁶); through His death there is inaugurated a New Covenant (1 Co 11²⁵), in which the Divine purpose of 'salvation' is realized: deliverance from wrath (Ro 5⁹), from the curse of the Law (Gal 3¹³), and the imparting of eternal life (1 Th 5¹⁰). The shedding of His blood was a sacrifice which had propitiatory value (Ro 3²⁴ 5⁹, 1 Co 5⁹), in virtue of which men are brought into a new relation to God, treated as righteous (Ro 3⁴), 'accepted in the Beloved' (Eph 1⁶). This sacrificial significance of the Death is specially emphasized by the writer to the Hebrews, who finds in the sacrifices of the Old Covenant types and shadows of the sacrifice of Christ. Through its propitiatory efficacy the Death is viewed as a crown of glory (2⁹; cf. 5¹⁰). In the Johannine writings 'Jesus Christ the righteous' is represented as 'the propitiation for our sins' (1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰; cf. Rev 1⁵ 5^{6, 9, 12}), in the Gospel the suffering and death being viewed, as in Heb., as a glorification (13³⁴). 'He [St. John] . . . does not ever, like St. Paul (e.g. Ph 2^{8, 9}), separate it [the Passion] as a crisis of humiliation from the glory which followed' (Westcott, on Jn 12³²; cf. Milligan, Resurrection, p. 314).

3. Evidential with regard to man's eternal destiny.—Another aspect of the evidential significance of the resurrection of Christ for the Apostolic Church is that which concerns the eternal destiny of those 'who through him do believe in God.' Already in the OT we have foreshadowings of the belief in a continued personal life with God after death. The religious relation of the soul to God was felt to carry with it the pledge of such a continued life. Fellowship with God constitutes a bond which death cannot sever. 'Immortality is the corollary of Religion. If there be religion, that is, if God be, there is immortality' (Davidson, Job, Cambridge, 1884, p. 296). As Jesus Himself put it, interpreting and supporting this fundamental OT source of the faith in immortality, God is 'not a God of dead people but of living' (Mt 22³², Mk 12²⁷, Lk 20²⁸). And this immortality was for the Hebrew an immortality of the whole personal being of man, body as well as soul. The conception of a disembodied future life was entirely foreign to the OT—belonging to ethnic not to Hebrew thought. Such a destiny, indeed, could be for the OT believer but a hope, a faith, a faith venture, though involved in the very nature of religion as fellowship with God. If certainly, if assured confidence of such a full personal immortality, was to be attained, some more 'sure word' of God must be spoken; and such a sure word the Apostolic Church found in the resurrection of Jesus. As the crowning example of a life lived in fellowship with God, and trusting God for the future, Jesus supplied the test case, the crucial instance, of God's love.

Since therefore Jesus—the man Jesus—was raised from the grave, the faith in the Resurrection grounded in the life of fellowship with God has received its final seal and assurance. The resurrection of those who are His is guaranteed—'For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that are fallen asleep in Jesus will God bring with him' (1 Th 4th). The empty grave therefore, as Harnack admits with some inconsequence, is 'the birthplace of the indestructible belief that death is vanquished, that there is a life eternal' (What is Christianity?, p. 165).

St. Paul puts this evidential significance of the Resurrection first negatively: 'If Christ be not risen, then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished (ἀπώλοντο)' (1 Co 15th). They have 'perished' not in the sense of suffering annihilation or extinction of conscious existence, but of undergoing deprivation of continued existence, in any sense in which it is worth having—deprivation of 'life' through separation from God, the Sheol state of existence. (For St. Paul's use of ἀπόλλυσθαι and ἀπώλεια as the antithesis of σώζεσθαι and σωτηρία see Kennedy, St. Paul's Conception of the Last Things, p. 119 ff.) 'But now hath Christ been raised and become the first fruits (ἀπαρχή) of them that are asleep' (v. 20). This is the more positive statement of it. As the first ripe shear is the earnest and guarantee of the coming harvest, so the resurrection of Christ is the pledge and guarantee of the resurrection of those who are His (cf. Col 1st, Rev 1st, πρωτότοκος ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, 'the first born from the dead'). So St. Peter speaks of Christians being 'born anew to a life of hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, born to an unscathed, inviolate, unfading inheritance' (1 P 1st [Moffatt]).

The resurrection of Christ is not only the assurance or pledge of the full personal immortality of believers; it is also the revelation of the nature of this immortal life. It 'has brought life and immortality to light' (2 Ti 1st); it has displayed it to our view. He has risen in possession of a body like ours, only glorified and made free from the law of sin and death, a body 'spiritual' in the sense of being the perfect instrument of the purposes of spirit. In this glorified embodied state of the Risen Christ we have a look at the nature of the future state of believers. At present we are pent up in a body which is but an imperfect medium of our will or spirit. It is 'a body of death' (Ro 7th), full of weakness and corruption, limiting our powers of service. But 'this body that belongs to our low estate' shall be transformed 'till it resembles the body of his Glory' (Ph 3rd [Moffatt]). For 'if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you, he that raised up Christ Jesus from the dead shall quicken also your mortal bodies through his Spirit that dwelleth in you' (Ro 8th). (On the connexion between the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of believers, whereby the former is not only the pledge or guarantee but the ground of the latter, and the moral significance of the doctrine, see, further, below, IV. ii.)

ii. ESSENTIAL OR CONSTITUTIVE SIGNIFICANCE. —The heart of the apostolic representation is not reached until it is perceived that the Resurrection is not simply an external seal or evidential appendage added to guarantee certain truths about Christ and His work, but an essential or constitutive element in the work itself, an integral part of His redemptive revelation. Such a view as that of Herrmann already referred to, which lays the chief stress on the impression produced by Christ's life, making the Resurrection at most a deduction of faith without vital relation to redemption, fails to do justice to the inner meaning of the fact. This more inner vital significance of the Resurrection for apostolic thought and life as the necessary sequel of the Incarnation and Crucifixion, and essential to the completion of the work of redemption, may be presented under the following heads:

1. What it meant for Christ Himself. —The Resurrection was essential to Christian faith, because of what it meant for Christ Himself. As the transition from a state of humiliation to a state of exaltation, the entrance in His risen manhood on a new life of exalted power and sovereignty, whereby He became Lord over all, the Resurrection formed a new beginning in the life of Christ Himself. This is the central significance of the Resurrection insisted on by St. Peter in his sermons recorded in Acts: 'God hath made him both Lord (Κύριον) and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified' (136); 'Him hath God exalted at his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour' (5th); 'therefore being by the right hand of God exalted . . . he hath poured forth this' (2nd), and the healing of the lame man is pointed to as further evidence of His exalted sovereignty (4th). Κυριος, the LXX name for Jahweh and the characteristic apostolic title for the Exalted Jesus, defines Him as One who is sovereign in the spheres both of grace and of nature, Lord not only over the Church but over all creation. This too is the connotation or significance of the phrase 'at the right hand of God'—a phrase borrowed from Ps 110th and oftener used in the NT than any other words of the OT. It defines Christ's exaltation as a sharing in the universal sovereignty and almighty power of God. So in 1 P 3rd the statement that 'angels and authorities and powers' are 'made subject unto him' is the affirmation of His personal participation in the universal sovereignty of God, whose servants the angels and authorities and powers are.

This is most strikingly expressed by St. Paul, for whom the greatness of the Resurrection, as the supreme manifestation of Divine power ('the surpassing greatness of his power,' Eph 1st [Moffatt]), consisted in the fact that it was not merely the raising of Jesus from the dead, but His exaltation and enthronement 'in the heavenly sphere (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις) . . . the sphere of spiritual activities . . . which lies behind the world of sense, . . . the sphere of all the ruling forces of the universe' (J. Armitage Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, London, 1903, pp. 21, 20), 'above all the angelic Rulers, Authorities, Powers, and Lords'—above all powers whether of the natural sphere or of the spiritual—and all this for redemptive ends, that He might be 'head over everything for the church, the church which is his Body' (Eph 1st—[Moffatt]). As he puts it in the Epistle to the Philippians, 'God raised him high and conferred on him a Name above all names [Κυριος], so that before the Name of Jesus every knee should bend in heaven, on earth, and underneath the earth, and every tongue confess that "Jesus Christ is Lord," to the glory of God the Father' (2nd—[Moffatt]). The Resurrection thus constituted a 'crisis' in the experience of Christ Himself. Through it His activity was raised to a new level, whereby He became clothed with absolute might to carry out the issues of His saving work on earth.

The frequency with which St. Paul speaks of Jesus as 'Lord' (Κύριος) is remarkable. The word occurs some 131 times in his writings (see Feine, Theol. des NT, p. 344). In his first Epistle, 1 Thess., the title is applied to the Risen Christ more than 20 times. The peculiar significance of St. Paul's use of the term is sometimes minimized on the ground that it was used in ancient times to express the relation of a king to his subjects—cf. Ac 2³⁶, where it is applied to the Roman Emperor—and in Oriental religions to express the relation between a god and his worshippers. So Deissmann maintains that the Pauline title 'the Lord' is 'a genuinely Oriental predicate,' and that St. Paul uses it as a silent protest against the acknowledgment of any other Lord, even the Roman Emperor, as a rival to the Lordship of Christ (see Feine, Jesus Christus und Paulus, p. 38). So Heitmüller and Bousset claim that St. Paul's view of Jesus as Κύριος was determined by the Hellenistic Christianity which he found in Damascus and Antioch. But if it was a Gentile title was also a Jewish title, being the LXX name for Jahweh, and this for St. Paul as a Jew was its nearer context. And St. Paul's application of the term to the Exalted Jesus was in line with the usage of the early Christian community (see above, IV. i. x). To say, as Pfleiderer does, that the common faith of St. Paul and the early disciples in Jesus as Lord was due to a pre-Christian conception of Messiah which came ultimately from Oriental sources, is to cut it off from its origin in apostolic experience and to leave unexplained what is the central and essential fact to be explained—how Lordship came to be predicated of One who died on a Cross of shame.

When we ask in what ways the Risen Lord exercises His sovereignty and power, we find the apostolic writers dwelling especially upon two manifestations of it: (a) the giving of the Holy Spirit, and (b) the intercession of Christ at the Father's right hand.

(a) The giving of the Spirit is represented by the apostles as the gift of the Exalted Lord by which He carries on His work on earth, and secures the ends for which He lived and died. 'Being therefore by the right hand of God exalted,' says St. Peter, connecting the fact with the exaltation of Christ, 'and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he has poured forth on us what you now see and hear' (Ac 2³³). So intimately was the giving of the Spirit connected with the exaltation and glorification of Christ that St. John can say that there was no gift of the Spirit before the Ascension. 'Spirit was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified' (Jn 7³⁹). He was anointed with the Holy Spirit Himself, and by the power of the Spirit accomplished the work given Him to do; but not till His work on earth was done and His glory entered did He possess the Spirit in such wise as to be able to bestow it on men. It was the promise of the Father—part of Christ's reward for His work on earth—and, as such, a sure proof of God's acceptance of that work.

Thus it is that the characteristic apostolic name for the Spirit is 'the Spirit of Christ' or 'the Spirit of the Lord [Jesus]' (Ac 16⁷ RV, Ro 8⁹, 2 Co 3⁴, Gal 4⁶, Ph 1¹⁹, 1 P 1¹¹), not only as having dwelt in Christ Himself, but as being the gift of Christ as Christ was the gift of the Father (cf. Jn 14²⁶ 15²⁶). Further, the Spirit is called the Spirit of Christ as having Christ for His theme, His office being to witness to, interpret, and glorify Christ, and thus carry on His work on earth (cf. Jn 15²⁶ 16¹⁴). As such the Spirit is characterized chiefly in three ways: (1) as the Spirit of truth, to lead men into the truth as it is in Jesus, to take of the things of Christ and show us their meaning (Jn 14²⁶ 15²⁶ 16¹³, Ac 2⁴ 6¹⁰ et passim, 1 Co 2¹⁰ 12³, etc.); (2) as the Spirit of holiness, to convince of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment (Jn 16⁸), to help our infirmities (Ro 8²⁶), to set free from the power of sin and death (Ro 8⁻¹⁰ 13, Gal 5²², etc.), to produce the virtues of the Christian character which are the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5⁻, Eph 5⁹), and to conform us in body and in spirit into the likeness of the Risen Christ (Ro 8²⁹ 10¹³, 1 Co 3¹⁶ 6¹⁹ 15⁴²⁻⁴⁴, 2 Co 3¹⁸, Gal 2²⁰, etc.); (3) as the Spirit of power, to enable men to be effective witnesses in word and life to the Risen Christ (Ac 1⁸ 3¹² 4⁷, etc.).

The function of the Spirit was thus to realize a new kind of fellowship between Christ and His followers

—a spiritual fellowship with a living, everywhere present Lord—in and through which they were led into new truth and holiness and power. The coming of the Spirit, therefore, is not to be looked upon as a compensation or substitute for an absent Christ; it is the higher mode of Christ's own presence, to which He pointed forward when He said, 'I will be with you all the time, to the very end of the world' (Mt 28²⁰). On Christ's own life, the promise 'the Comforter will come' is interchangeable with 'I will come to you' (Jn 14¹⁸ 15²⁶).

St. Paul in more than one passage expressly identifies the Risen Christ with the Holy Spirit (e.g. 2 Co 3¹⁷, 'the Lord is the Spirit,' and v. 18, 'we are changed into the same image by the Lord the Spirit'). And on this ground it is sometimes argued that for St. Paul the Risen Exalted Christ and the Holy Spirit are really one and the same (e.g. von Dobschütz, Ostern und Pfingsten, p. 34). To identify the Risen Lord and the Spirit, however, without qualification in the face of the three-fold benediction in the same Epistle (13¹⁴) is unwarranted. What St. Paul meant was that between the Spirit and the power of the Risen Christ no experimental distinction could be made. 'The truth of the passage is the same as that of Ro 8^{9a}: "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of His. And if Christ is in you," etc. Here, so far as the practical experience of Christians goes, no distinction is made between the Spirit of Christ and Christ Himself; Christ dwells in Christians through His Spirit' (Denney, Expositor's Bible, 'The Second Epistle to the Corinthians,' London, 1894, p. 134). 'What the Apostle means by his form of verbal identification ["the Lord is the Spirit"] is rather the religious certainty that Jesus Christ, in whom God redeems men, and the Spirit, in whom He communicates Himself to men, are so indissolubly bound up in one, act so absolutely for the same end and through the same means, that from the standpoint of the practical issue they are seen as merged in each other. They are one as the fountain and the stream are one. "Christ in you, or the Spirit of Christ in you; these are not different realities; but the one is the method of the other" (Moberly)' (H. R. Mackintosh in SDB, p. 708^b; cf. the same writer's The Person of Jesus Christ, p. 374).

(b) While thus through the Spirit the Exalted Christ carries on His work on earth, by His intercession at the Father's right hand He Himself carries on His work in heaven. This aspect of the Risen Christ's activity is specially emphasized in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is represented as the culmination of His high-priestly functions, the entering 'through his own blood,' i.e. with the virtue of His atoning sacrifice in Him, into the holiest of all 'to appear in the presence of God for us' (He 9²⁴), and the guarantee of the full effectiveness of His redemptive work, 'wherefore also he is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession (ἐντυγχάνειν) for them' (7²⁵). But in the other apostolic writings, both Pauline and Johannine, His intercession at God's right hand is equally represented as the culminating aspect of Christ's work, and 'with a kind of adoring awe which is quite peculiar even in the New Testament' (Denney, Studies in Theology, London, 1894, p. 162). 'It is Christ Jesus that died, yea rather, that was raised from the dead, who is at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession (ἐντυγχάνειν) for us' (Ro 8³⁴, 'who actually pleads for us' [Moffatt]). 'These things write I unto you that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous' (1 Jn 2¹).

It would no doubt be misleading to represent

His heavenly intercession as oral or vocal, as taking place in words or spoken entreaty. 'Words imply distance and duality of a kind incongruous with the identity of life subsisting between Christ and the Father. Theirs is a unity that needs no language' (Mackintosh, The Person of Jesus Christ, p. 377). When the apostles speak of His 'making intercession for us,' they are not speaking of 'specific acts done or words spoken by Christ in His glory. His glorified presence is an eternal presentation; He pleads by what He is' (R. C. Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, London, 1897, p. 246). On the other hand, it would seem to be doing less than justice to the apostolic thought to represent His intercession as nothing more than His appearance and constant presence before God for us, with the virtue of His atoning life and death in Him, God being thus continually reminded, as it were, at once of the efficacy of Christ's atoning work and of the needs of humanity.

Apparently we should interpret the apostolic language (e.g. He 4¹⁶, 'that we may find grace to help in time of need,' grace for timely succour) as implying that the intercession of Christ is not a continuous unvarying representation to God on behalf of men on the part of the Exalted Christ, but an intercession which relates itself sympathetically to the varying needs and exigencies of the believer's life. This direct personal representation to God on our behalf is not to be conceived as limited to prayer. The verb ἐντυγχάνειν translated 'intercede' means to deal or transact with one person for another, and, when it stands alone without any limiting expressions, ought to be understood in a much wider sense than petition or prayer, viz. as 'including the whole series of transactions in which one person may engage with another on behalf of a third' (Milligan, The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord, p. 151). Christ's intercession is the whole action or transaction in the presence of God of the Exalted Christ, whereby, on the ground of His atoning work, the full blessings of salvation are made over to those 'who come to God through him' (He 7²⁵; cf. Ro 8³⁴).

2. What it meant for humanity.—In virtue of its being thus the entrance on a new life of exalted power and Lordship in which He exercises His full redemptive activity, the resurrection of Jesus constitutes a new beginning in the life of humanity, ushering in a new creative epoch. The Risen Jesus becomes a new life-principle in men, a 'life-creating Spirit' (1 Co 15⁴⁵, πνεῦμα ζωοποιούν) introducing men into a new world of spiritual experience. This epochal significance of the Resurrection St. Paul represents by saying that in and by His resurrection Christ became the 'second Adam,' the Founder and Head of a new humanity, so that the resurrection of Christ represents as real a crisis in the history of man as his creation (Ro 5¹², 1 Co 15⁴⁵). 'The first Adam became a living soul' (1 Co 15⁴⁵, ψυχὴ ζῶσα, a person possessing a principle of life)—this marks the crisis of man's creation. 'The second Adam became a life-creating spirit' (ib.)—this marks the crisis of man's redemption whereby he becomes a 'new creation' (καὶνὴ κτίσις) and henceforth walks 'in newness of life' (Ro 6⁴, ἐν καινότητι ζωῆς).

This new life into which believers are introduced through union by faith with the living Lord St. Paul can describe only by saying that he possesses the Spirit (πνεῦμα) of Jesus Christ (Ro 9⁹), that the Spirit of Christ or the Spirit of God mediated through the Exalted Christ dwells in him (9¹¹) or that Christ lives in him, so that he can say, 'I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2²⁰; cf. Ro 8⁹⁻¹¹). The life He now lives as a human being has, as its central determining principle, not himself but Christ. Christ is 'our life' (Col 3⁴, ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν). The ζωή of the believer is the very ζωή of the Exalted Christ (cf. Ro 8¹⁰, 2 Co 4¹⁰). Christianity for St. Paul is the condition of being 'in Christ' (ἐν Χριστῷ). A man 'in Christ'—that is his definition of a Christian. The new dispensation or epoch inaugurated by the Resurrection is the dispensation of the Spirit predicted by Christ Himself (Jn 14¹⁶, 26 15²⁶ 16⁷).

By those who, like Pfleiderer and Beyschlag, trace St. Paul's view of Christ as 'the second Adam,' the man 'from heaven' (1 Co 15⁴⁷), to the influence of Philo's Jewish-Hellenic conception of a pre-existent heavenly Man, the Urmensch or archetypal model of man's creation, St. Paul is represented as conceiving of Christ in His pre-incarnate state merely as Man in heaven, the prototype of humanity (see J. Weiss, on 1 Co 15⁴⁷, and Feine, Theol. des NT, p. 303). Even if we assume, however, that St. Paul borrowed the contrast in the first place from current Hellenic thought, using the schema lying to his hand, he filled it with a content determined not by the speculations of Alexandrian philosophy but by his own experience of the Risen Christ. He seems, indeed, expressly to contrast his own point of view with that of Philo, by designating the man 'from heaven' not the 'First Man' as in Philo, but the 'Second Man.' 'That is not first which is spiritual but that which is natural' (1 Co 15⁴⁶). It is only at His resurrection that Christ is represented by St. Paul as becoming the 'second Adam,' the life-giving head of a new humanity.

For the apostles, accordingly, Christian life and experience in all its forms depends upon the Resurrection.

(a) Our justification depends upon it. The great passage here is Ro 4²⁵: 'He was delivered up for our trespasses (διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα ἡμῶν) and was raised for our justification (διὰ τὴν δικαιοσύνην ἡμῶν).' The latter clause is sometimes taken to mean that the Resurrection is necessary to our justification in the sense of being the great proof that the sacrifice of the Death was Divinely accepted, thus evoking faith in us. 'He was delivered up [to death] because of our trespasses [to make atonement for us]: and He was raised because we were justified by His death.' On this interpretation the significance of the Resurrection for our justification becomes reduced to a 'divine declaration that we are accepted with God' (G. B. Stevens, Pauline Theology, London, 1892, p. 254; cf. B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1882, i. 437). Its purpose is evidential; it is little more than a certificate or testimonial to the validity of the Death. That the Resurrection has this evidential significance we have seen. But this is only a partial statement of the apostolic view. If this were all, no inner or essential connexion is to be traced between the Resurrection and our justification, but one which is purely external and temporary; and the Resurrection would be a matter which can be dispensed with as soon as faith is gained, or is unnecessary if faith is gained in some other way (see, e.g., Pfleiderer, Paulinism, Eng. tr., London, 1877, i. 119).

But this is not adequate to the Pauline thought. The Resurrection is necessary to our justification, not merely because of the difference it makes to us as certifying the atoning efficacy of the Death and thus evoking faith in us, but also because of the difference it makes to Christ Himself. It marks the point at which His sovereign power as Lord is made effective. Our justification, the basis for which has been laid in the Death, becomes an accomplished fact and effective reality only through Christ's rising again, with the virtue of His atoning life and death in Him, to apply His atonement in those who are united with Him by faith. That which redeems is not Christ's atoning death apart from His living Person into union with whom we are brought by faith. Nearly every error in theories of the Atonement may be traced ultimately to separating the propitiatory work of Christ from Christ Himself. The very ABC of Apostolic Christianity is that we are saved not by believing the fact that Christ died for our sins but by union with the Crucified and now Risen Exalted Saviour. Only through union with a living Saviour who has in Him the virtue of His atoning death do justification, forgiveness, and all the blessings of redemption become ours—'In whom we have redemption through his blood' (Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴). We are accepted 'in the beloved' (Eph 1⁶); 'there is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus' (Ro 8¹). Justification is ours as we are 'in Christ' in such living union with Him that His life becomes identified with ours and ours with His. Because of this identification or incorporation Christ's acts are repeated in us so that in His death we die to sin, 'crucified with Christ' (Gal 2²⁰), and in His life we live to righteousness. But it is only by His risen life that Christ can come into such living union with men as thus to effect their redemption.

The apostolic thought accordingly is this: 'He was delivered up [to death] on account of our trespasses [to make atonement for them]; and He was raised on account of our justification [that it might become an accomplished fact].' 'His rising again was the necessary antecedent of His applying to His elect the virtue of that Atonement which His dying wrought for all men. . . . He died to purchase what He rose again to apply' (J. H. Newman, Lectures on the Doctrine of Justification, London, 1874, p. 206). So it is that the resurrection rather than the death of Christ is spoken of as the cause of justification. It is doubtless true, as Denney urges, that 'Paul did not make an abstract separation between Christ's Death and His Resurrection, as if the Death and the Resurrection either had different motives, or served ends separable from each other' (EGT, on Ro 11²⁻⁵). Christ's work is one and its end one. He both died and was raised for our justification. But this end was made effective only through the Resurrection; cf. Ro 8³⁴: 'Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that was raised from the dead'; 5¹⁰: 'saved by his life'; and 1 Co 15¹⁷: 'If Christ be not risen your faith is futile; you are still in your sins.'

In the Epistle to the Hebrews the same truth is presented from the point of view of the Priesthood of Christ. Just as in OT ritual only when the high priest took the blood within the veil and sprinkled it upon the Mercy Seat was the offering for sin completed and the covenant-fellowship with God established, so Christ's offering for sin is not completed until in the heavenly sanctuary He presents Himself 'through his own blood' (9¹²), i.e. with the virtue of His atoning death in Him. Only then is the new covenant-fellowship between God and sinners established. It is in Him as the living prevailing High Priest, and not merely through something He did in the past, that we have peace with God.

(b) Our sanctification, our moral and spiritual renewal or quickening, depends upon it. This is but a further explication of (a). 'In Christ, and through union with Him, we have pardon; 'in Christ,' and through union with Him, we have sanctification of life. Through His resurrection, therefore, Christ becomes 'a life-creating Spirit' (1 Co 15⁴⁵), the source of spiritual quickening to believers. Here and now they share in the power of Christ's risen life, whereby they become the subjects of a moral and spiritual resurrection. Through union with Christ by faith, and symbolically in baptism, they are 'crucified with Christ' (Gal 2²⁰) unto sin, 'engrafted (συνέφυτον, united vitally) into the likeness of his death' (Ro 6⁵), the old nature being 'annulled' by the introduction through faith into the 'in Christ' environment, the environment of the power of the exalted victorious Lord. They rise with Him and live with Him, 'engrafted into the likeness of his resurrection,' that 'like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life' (Ro 6⁴; cf. Ro 8²⁻¹¹, Eph 2⁴, Col 2¹⁻³¹⁻³, Ph 3¹⁰).

This spiritual resurrection through union with the Risen Christ St. Paul describes as being 'quickened together with him' and 'raised up with him and made to sit with him in the heavenly places, in Christ Jesus' (Eph 2⁴⁻⁶). This renewal in which the Christian life consists is a manifestation in us of 'the power of his resurrection' (Ph 3¹⁰), or, as St. Paul more often puts it, of the same mighty power of God which had effected Christ's resurrection and enthronement in the heavenly places, 'that working of the strength of his might which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead . . . and (raised) you when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins' (Eph 1¹⁹⁻²¹; cf. 2 Co 4¹⁴). The resurrecting energy of God in raising Christ and in raising us when we were dead in trespasses and sins is one and the same. The one act is the prolongation of the other, the manifestation in two steps or stages of the same Divine miraculous energy. 'Every conversion, every advance in the new life, is part of that great new creation which began at the open grave, which advanced at Pentecost, and which will only reach its consummation when every knee shall bow to Christ and every tongue confess that He is Lord' (Cairns, Christ and Human Need, p. 186). St. Paul, indeed, speaks of the Christian's resurrection and enthronement as a Divine act 'contemporaneous with the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ' (J. Armitage Robinson, on Eph 2⁶), as if it were already achieved. It is involved in the latter ideally in posse, but it has to be worked out really in esse. But one is as much the creative work of His Spirit as the other. And the outcome of this working of the Spirit St. Paul describes as being 'transformed into the same image (εἰκόνα), passing from one glory to another, inasmuch as (this influence proceeds) from the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3¹⁸, καθὰρ ἐπὶ ἀπὸ κυρίου πνεύματος). 'Not mere semblance is implied in St. Paul's use of εἰκών, but semblance resting on identity of nature, community of being' (Kennedy, Last Things, p. 294). So that the end is nothing less than perfect assimilation to the very nature of God Himself.

(c) The bodily resurrection of believers depends upon it. Already in the Apostolic Age there were those who, under the influence of non-Christian dualistic pre-suppositions, declared that there was nothing more to hope for than a moral and spiritual rising from the dead, that 'the resurrection has taken place already' (2 Ti 2¹³). And similar attempts are made to-day, under the influence of the dualistic pre-suppositions of modern thought, to confine the resurrection to the moral and spiritual side of our natures, and thus to exclude the physical. And sometimes the authority of St. Paul is claimed for such a position. Matthew Arnold, e.g., claims that in St. Paul's teaching the expression 'resurrection from the dead' 'has no essential connexion with physical death. . . . Resurrection, in its essential sense, is . . . for Paul the rising, within the sphere of our visible earthly existence, from death in this sense [obedience to sin] to life in this sense [obedience to righteousness]. . . . Christ's physical resurrection after he was crucified is neither in point of time nor in point of character the resurrection on which Paul, following his essential line of thought, wanted to fix the believer's mind. The resurrection Paul was striving after for himself and others was a resurrection now, and a resurrection to righteousness' (St. Paul and Protestantism, ed. London, 1887, p. 55 ff.).

How little this represents St. Paul's point of view may be seen, not only from the argument in 1 Co 15, which we shall presently consider, but from such a passage as Ro 8^{10a}, where St. Paul impressively reasons from the indwelling of the Spirit (or the Risen Christ) in believers, not only to their moral but to their bodily resurrection. 'If Christ is in you, the body is dead [consigned to physical dissolution] because of sin [of Adam]; but the spirit [the human spirit of the believer] is living as the result of righteousness [of Christ]. And, he goes on—for the spiritual resurrection which has already taken place through the indwelling of the Spirit in the believer is not all—if the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead dwells in you, then he who raised Christ Jesus from the dead will also make your mortal bodies live by his indwelling Spirit in your lives.' For St. Paul, as for Jewish thought generally, personal life was an indissoluble unity of soul and body. (On the Hebrew 'synthetic view' of life, see Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, pp. 113, 153, 157.) There is no trace in his thinking of the Hellenic dualistic antagonism between body and spirit. And the quickening or 'making alive' which is the result of the indwelling πνεῦμα extends to the whole personality, physical as well as moral and spiritual.

It may be, as Matthew Arnold complains, that popular theology has confined the idea of the resurrection both of Christ and of the Christian too much to the bodily resurrection, thus losing sight of the profoundly spiritual conception of the Resurrection for apostolic thought. Jesus had already taught, according to the Johannine account (Jn 11^{25a}; cf. 6^{40, 44} 5²¹ 3³⁶), that the root of the resurrection-life lay in living organic connexion with Him who is the Resurrection and the Life, and apostolic teaching is in line with this. The ground, the operating principle of the resurrection, both spiritual and physical, of the believer is the indwelling in him of the life-giving Spirit, the Spirit of the Risen Christ, or 'the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead.' The link which makes the Christian participate in Christ's resurrection is the possession of His Spirit—'Christ in you the hope of glory' (Col 1²⁷).

Not only is Christ in His resurrection a 'firstfruit' (1 Co 15²⁰, ἀπαρχή) of them that have fallen asleep, the promise and earnest of the resurrection of His followers; He is further the ἀρχή (Col 1¹⁸), the 'first principle' and potency of this resurrection. As death was grounded in Adam, so life is grounded in Christ. 'As in Adam all die [all who belong to Adam's family], so also in Christ shall all be made alive [all who belong to Christ]' (1 Co 15²²). The new life derived from Christ, i.e., includes the body as well as the soul in the sphere of its quickening. The indwelling Spirit is a regenerative principle or power for the whole personality, physical as well as moral, leading not only to a moral resurrection now but to a physical resurrection hereafter. Nay more, this physical quickening whose final fruit and issue is in the resurrection after death, is already begun here on earth, leading to a gradual inward transformation of the body (2 Co 4¹⁶, 'renewed from day to day'). Through the indwelling of the Spirit, there is already going on in the believer that subjugation of matter to spirit which in its highest manifestation and outcome was exhibited in the resurrection of Christ's body, transfigured and transformed into a more glorified mode of being, and which, in its final issue in the believer, 'shall transform (μετασχηματισεῖ) the body of our humiliation into conformity with the body of his glory (συμμορφον τῷ σώματι τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ), according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things to himself' (Ph 3⁻¹; cf. 1 Jn 3²).

How different a conception of the future life is this from the current Greek conception familiar to the Corinthians, and prevalent in Jewish-Alexandrian literature. The prospect before St. Paul (and the apostles) is not that of a bodiless state, the deliverance of the soul from its earthly 'prison house' (σώμα σῆμα), but the rising to new life of the entire personality. 'We that are in the tabernacle do groan, being burdened';—St. Paul has just been emphasizing the contrast between the weariness and burden of the present earthly life and the glory which awaits the Christian in the eternal future—for this reason (ἐνι τούτῳ), not for that we would be unclothed (or stripped, ἐκδυσασθαι), but that we would be clothed upon (ἐνεδύσασθαι), that what is mortal may be swallowed up of life' (2 Co 5⁴). These words are sometimes taken as giving expression to an intense desire on St. Paul's part that Christ should come (the Parousia take place) before his death, so that he might be spared the terrifying experience of bodily dissolution, and have the corruptible put on incorruption and the mortal put on immortality without that trial. 'If Christ comes first, the Apostle will receive the new body by the transformation, instead of the putting off, of the old; he will, so to speak, put it on above the old (ἐνεδύσασθαι); he will be spared the shuddering fear of dying; he will not know what it is to have the old tent taken down, and to be left houseless and naked' (Deuney, Expositor's Bible, '2 Cor.', p. 175 f.; cf. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 286). But it is equally true to the Apostle's thought to interpret the words simply as affirming the Christian conception of the future life as opposed to the Greek conception prevalent in Corinth—this in any case is implied—'We groan, not that we long for a disembodied existence, a condition of spiritual nakedness; rather our longing is for the new embodied condition, the possession of the spiritual body.'

Some verses in 2 Co 5 (esp. v. 8, 'We choose rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord') have been held to evidence an advance on St. Paul's part, in the interval between 1 Cor. and 2 Cor., to a more spiritual view of the Resurrection, a disembodied immortality (e.g. H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der NT Theologie, 2 vols., Tübingen, 1911, ii. 193; Charles, Eschatology, pp. 397-403). But the words do not justify such a position. St. Paul is simply asserting his confidence that the condition of the believer which is in prospect (the possession of the σώμα πνευματικόν), which is guaranteed by the pledge of the πνεῦμα, is infinitely preferable to his present condition of being 'at home in the body' (the σώμα ψυχικόν). And the supposition of a change of conception on St. Paul's part in his later Epistles—in itself very unlikely when we consider the short interval between the two Corinthian Epistles—is decisively negated by Ph 3²¹.

The moral significance of such a doctrine cannot be overrated. It gives a new sanction to bodily consecration and temperance. Each sin against the body is no longer, as it was on the Greek conception, a stain on that which is itself doomed to perish, but a defilement of that which is consecrated to an eternal life—'Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost?' (1 Co 6¹⁹); 'the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body . . . your bodies are members of Christ. . . . Glorify God therefore in your body' (vv. 18-20); 'let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body' (Ro 6¹²). The nature of the resurrection-body of believers St. Paul sets forth in 1 Co 15³⁵⁻⁴², where he endeavours to answer in detail the question, 'With what kind of a body (τῷ σώματι) do they come?' This was the difficulty which perplexed the Corinthian Christians, and led some of them (τινές, v. 12) under the influences of Greek thought to deny altogether the possibility of a bodily resurrection. Like most similar present-day objections, the difficulty was based, as St. Paul shows, upon the supposition that it was the identical body laid in the grave that was raised again, that the resurrection meant a revivifying of the present material body, which, as we have seen, was the current popular Jewish idea.

The difficulty or problem of the resurrection of the body St. Paul seeks to elucidate by means of the analogy or metaphor of the sowing of seed. It was an analogy already used by Jesus Himself (Jn 12²⁴), though, as writers of the 'religious-historical' school especially maintain, the use of this analogy or metaphor from the world of vegetation may have been suggested to St. Paul by the prevalence of such nature-myth ideas in popular religious thought, in which case the analogy would appeal with peculiar force to his readers (see J. Weiss, on 1 Co 15³⁶; cf. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 241). St. Paul's argument on the basis of this analogy is directed to remove the objection to the resurrection of the body derived from its alleged incredibility, and must not be pressed beyond its purpose.

His argument is as follows: 'What you sow (ὃ σπείρεις) is not made alive (ζωοποιεῖται) unless it dies' (v. 36). The seed deposited in the earth has to die before it can develop into a fuller, larger life. The apparent extinction is the condition of a higher vitality. It is not impossible therefore, nor even improbable, that our present body may through death develop into a new and more perfectly equipped body. The fact that we cannot beforehand conceive the nature of this body is no valid objection to the possibility. The same life principle can clothe itself in altered bodily semblance. Who could foretell without previous observation what would spring, e.g., from a grain of wheat? The grain of wheat itself gives to the eye no token or foreshadowing of the stalk with ears and grain that is to develop out of it by God's working in the economy of nature. 'What you sow is not the body that is to be, it is a mere naked undeveloped grain (γυμνὸν κόκκον) of wheat, e.g., or some other seed. But God (ὁ δὲ θεός in contrast to σὺ σπείρεις in v. 36) gives it a body according as He will' (καθὼς ᾔθελε), not 'as He wills'—the aor. ᾔθελε denotes the first act of God's will determining the constitution of nature' (T. C. Edwards, *1 Corinthians*², London, 1885, p. 434; cf. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 243). 'And to each kind of seed (he gives) a body peculiar to itself (ἴδιον), the body best fitted to give effective expression to the life which possesses it. So the presumption is that God will find a fit body for man's redeemed nature as He does for each of the seeds vivified in the soil.

'For you must not suppose,' St. Paul argues—coming now (v. 39) to closer quarters with the assumption on which the objection to the resurrection was based, viz. that it is the same identical body that is laid in the grave that is raised up from it—you must not suppose that there is no other kind of σῶμα than that consisting of σάρξ which you now possess. Even as regards earthly fleshly bodies, there are great varieties in the Divine economy of nature, bodies of men, of beasts, of birds, of fishes, each fitted to life in its own element. And there are not only earthly bodies (σώματα ἐπίγεια) but heavenly bodies (σώματα ἐπουράνια), bodies for heavenly beings just as there are for earthly, and great varieties here also, each fitted to their several distinctive ends or constitution. 'So,' he says, summing up his discussion on this point, 'with the resurrection of the dead, the quickening of the present body through death into another body unimaginably different from it is in the inexhaustible variety of God's resources—for the secret of all is the power of God—as possible and likely as the springing up of the seed in a wholly different fuller and larger form of life. God, we may well expect, will equip the redeemed life with a body or organism as fitted to the conditions of the future life as the present body is to the conditions of earth.'

This future body or organism he describes by contrast with the present body in the following four particulars: 'The sowing is in corruption (ἐν φθορᾷ), the rising in incorruption (ἐν ἀφθαρσίᾳ), sown inglorious (ἐν αἰσχύᾳ) it rises in glory (ἐν δόξῃ), sown in weakness (ἐν ἀσθενείᾳ) it rises in power (ἐν ἐνδυνάμει), sown a natural body (σῶμα ψυχικόν) it rises a spiritual body' (σῶμα πνευματικόν) (v. 42). In the last contrast the root cause or reason of the other contrasts is given. 'Corruption,' 'dishonour,' and 'weakness' are the characteristics of a 'natural' body; 'incorruption,' 'glory,' and 'power' are the characteristics of a 'spiritual' body. The ψυχή, the natural principle of being, the life-force in the individual, has by God's appointment an organism corresponding to itself, the σῶμα ψυχικόν, the body whose substance is σάρξ, with all which that, in the actual condition of human nature, implies; whose end is necessarily φθορά, decay. . . . The πνεῦμα, on the other hand, the Divine gift, the power which enters human nature in response to faith, and changes it so that henceforward it is governed by a Divine principle, will be equipped with an organism corresponding to itself, the σῶμα πνευματικόν, the 'body' which has no fleshly element inherent in it, which therefore enters upon ἀφθαρσία, incorruption, immortality, as its necessary sphere of existence' (Kennedy, p. 252f.).

Now there is here a difference of interpretation. The first impulse is to refer the 'sowing' here spoken of to the burial and dissolution in the grave after death, and the 'rising' to the coming forth from the grave after death. (So Bengel, e.g. Of σπείρειν he says, 'verbum amenissimum pro sepultura.') But many scholars hold that this is unwarrantably to limit the Apostle's point of view and to confuse his analogy. Our present life, it is held, is for St. Paul the seed time (Gal 6th), and our mortal bodies (Ro 8^{10c}) are in the germinal state, concluding with death, out of which a wholly different organism will spring. The attributes of φθορά (cf. Ro 8²¹), αἰσχύια (cf. Ph 3²¹), ἀσθενεία (cf. 2 Co 13⁴) are, it is said, those that St. Paul is wont to ascribe to man's condition in his present state of existence in contrast with the ἀφθαρσία, δόξα, δυναμίς of the post-resurrection state (cf. 2 Co 4⁷, 10, 16, 51, 4; Ro 14⁸⁻²³; see Findlay, EGT, in loc.; Milligan, Resurrection, p. 163; Charles, Eschatology, p. 392). The difference of interpretation is important for its bearing on the question as to when the process of transformation from the one kind of body to the other takes place, and the latter interpretation is in line with what we have seen to be St. Paul's view, that through relation to Christ the resurrection-life, not only moral but physical, begins here, to be consummated after death.

What, however, St. Paul is concerned with in this passage is primarily the contrast between the two bodies, the 'natural' and the 'spiritual,' and their genetic relations. The σῶμα ψυχικόν we have in relation to Adam, the natural head of the human race, who through the Divine creative inbreathing became 'a living soul' (ψυχὴ ζῶσα). The σῶμα πνευματικόν we have in relation to Christ, the second Adam, who through the Resurrection has become a life-creating Spirit (πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν), the founder and head of a new humanity (v. 45). 'Man the first is from the earth earthy' (χοϊκός, 'material' [Moffatt]). 'Man the second is from heaven' (ἐξ οὐρανό, v. 47). (On this contrast between the 'heavenly' man and the 'earthly' and its relation to current Hellenistic ideas, see Weiss, in loc., and Feine, Theol. des NT, p. 353.) And as we have borne the likeness of the earthly man, so we are to bear (reading ὁμοιωσόμεν) the likeness of the heavenly man (v. 49). Not the body of flesh therefore, the self-expression of the ψυχή, the natural principle of life which we have in relation to Adam the first member of the race, is that which will be raised up as the organism of our future glorious existence, for it is subject to weakness and corruption. 'This I admit, flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption' (v. 50). This σῶμα ψυχικόν, the body of our humiliation, shall be exchanged for a body made like unto (ὁμοιωμόθυον) the body of Christ's glory, the body of the Exalted Lord, the second Adam, who in His risen 'heavenly' life possesses a σῶμα πνευματικόν, a body which is the perfect organ and instrument of the Spirit's self-expression. What the substance of this spiritual body is, is not described (is it δῶκα?), only its formative principle. To call it spiritual is not to assert its immateriality or to identify it with spirit, but to affirm its complete subordination to the purposes of spirit. Just as the natural or psychical body does not consist of soul, neither does the spiritual or pneumatical body consist of spirit (cf. Simpson, Resurrection and Modern Thought, p. 331).

The support afforded by modern science to the apostolic view of the Resurrection-Body, in particular to St. Paul's doctrine of the 'spiritual body' and its connexion with the 'natural,' is striking and noteworthy. The whole trend of modern psychology is to draw the two sides of man's nature, the bodily and the spiritual, more closely together by emphasizing the dominance of spirit over matter, recognizing that '... of the soule the bodie forme doth take;

For soule is forme, and doth the bodie make'

(Spenser, An Hymne in Honour of Beautie, l. 132f.).

The identity even of our present bodies is now conceived by science in a less materialistic fashion, as consisting not in identity of the particles of matter of which the body is composed, for this is continually changing, but in that which organizes them and makes them the instrument or medium of its expression, the vital organic constructive principle which in its own nature is spiritual. As Origen expressed it, drawing out the Pauline teaching, 'the "body" is the same not by any material continuity, but by the permanence of that which gives the law, the "ratio" (λόγος) . . . of its constitution, the ratio insita a Deo (see Westcott, art. 'Origenes,' DCB iv. 138 n.). Further, the essential meaning of body, science itself is more and more insisting, is the vehicle of manifestation or expression of spirit, and this will take different forms in different conditions of existence. 'The real meaning of the bodily life is its spiritual meaning. . . . The bodily being is but vehicle, is but utterance of the spiritual, and the ultimate reality even of the bodily being is only what it is spiritually' (Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 40). 'A human body is the necessary—is the only—method and condition, on earth, of spiritual personality. It is capable, indeed, of expressing spirit very badly . . . it is, in fact, almost always falling short of at least the ideal expression of it. And yet body is the only method of spiritual life; even as things are, spirit is the true meaning of bodily life; and bodies are really vehicles and expressions of spirit; . . . the perfect ideal would certainly be, not spirit without body, but body which was the ideally perfect utterance of spirit' (Moberly, Problems and Principles, p. 308). Admitting the scientific truth of this view of the relation of body and spirit, O. Lodge recognizes the probability of a future embodied state. 'Since our identity and personality in no way depend upon identity of material particles, and since our present body has been "composed" by our characteristic element or soul, it is legitimate to suppose that some other "body" can equally well be hereafter composed by the same agency; in other words, that the spirit will retain the power of constructing for itself a suitable vehicle of manifestation, which is the essential meaning of the term "body"' (Man and the Universe, London, 1908, p. 281f.). In particular, he recognizes the reasonableness of the Christian doctrine of a bodily resurrection. 'Christianity both by its doctrines and its ceremonies rightly emphasises the material aspect of existence. For it is founded upon the idea of Incarnation; and its belief in some sort of bodily resurrection is based on the idea that every real personal existence must have a double aspect—not spiritual alone, nor physical alone, but in some way both. Such an opinion . . . is by no means out of harmony with science. Christianity, therefore, reasonably supplements the mere survival of a disembodied spirit, a homeless wanderer or melancholy ghost, with the warm and comfortable clothing of something that may legitimately be spoken of as a "body"; that is to say, it postulates a supersensually appreciable vehicle or mode of manifestation, fitted to subserve the needs of future existence as our bodies subserve the needs of terrestrial life' (HJ vi. [1907-08] 294f.; cf. 'The Material Element in Christianity,' ib. iv. [1905-06] 314ff., and Substance of Faith, London, 1907, p. 106).

To a great many questions raised by the inquiring mind in this connexion no answer is supplied by the Apostle. As to the nature of the process or method by which the 'natural' body will be changed at the Resurrection into the 'spiritual' body, St. Paul never speculates. His interest was practical, not theoretical. He was writing as a missionary, not as a dogmatic theologian, and he confines himself to positive conceptions. It is sufficient for him that he is sure of two things: (1) that the cause or operating principle (δύναμις) is the power of the new Divine life in the believer's nature, the same power that raised Jesus; and (2) that the end or consummation of the process is the transformation into the likeness of the body of Christ's glory. We are apt to dwell more on the difference between the resurrection of Christ and that of Christians. In one respect, in particular, Christ's resurrection was different from the resurrection of believers. The body of Christ saw no corruption. If Christ's natural body had remained in the grave, no demonstration had been given in His resurrection of that continuity between the earthly body and the risen body which is implied in St. Paul's representation. So St. Paul recognizes two 'orders' (1 Co 15²³, τάγματα, groups or divisions) of the risen: the one contains none but Christ the 'firstfruit' (ἀπαρχή), who rose on the third day; the other is composed of those who belong to Christ who shall rise 'afterwards' (ἔπειτα), defined as 'at the Parousia.' But as to how they shall rise St. Paul does not speculate.

Again, no information is given as to the Apostle's conception of the state after death of those who had died or shall die before the Parousia. St. Paul betrays little interest in the Intermediate State. 'The influence upon his heart and mind of the crucified and risen Messiah fixed for ever the point of emphasis in his outlook upon the future. He was able to ignore many aspects of the Last Things on which Jewish and Christian Apocalyptic had set great importance. To go to Christ, to be with Christ, overshadowed all the accompaniments of the End. He knew that nothing could separate His followers from the love of Christ in time or in eternity' (Kennedy, Last Things, p. 312). As Wernle succinctly expresses it, the 'longing [to be with Christ] spans the chasm that lies between death and the resurrection, and proceeds straight to the desired goal, to the meeting with Jesus' (Beginnings of Christianity, i. 287).

So it is that even on a question apparently so central as that of a general resurrection little light is given in St. Paul's writings. His absorbing interest was in the resurrection of believers, the resurrection whose operating principle or δύναμις is the power of the indwelling Spirit. And his description of the resurrection-body as 'spiritual,' i.e., a fit organ for the spirit, is one which cannot refer to any but Christians. A resurrection of unbelievers as well as believers is involved in his recognition of a universal judgment at the Parousia of Christ (Ac 24¹⁵, Ro 2^{5a}, 14^{10, 12}, 1 Co 6-11³², 2 Co 5¹⁰), but such a resurrection occupies a subordinate place in Pauline eschatology and must proceed on different lines. What St. Paul is interested in is the resurrection of Christians, and the other though recognized is not dwelt upon or in any way elaborated—possibly he had not come to definite conclusions on the matter. A resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous was recognized in Jewish apocalyptic literature (cf. Dn 12², Apoc. Bar. xxx. 2-5 and 2 Es 7³²⁻³⁷), though the more general view in apocalyptic Judaism limited the scope of the resurrection to the righteous. In the teaching of Jesus a general resurrection is presupposed. In Jn 5²⁸. He speaks of a resurrection of 'all that are in the graves,' and distinguishes a 'resurrection of life' (ἀνάστασιν ζωῆς) from a 'resurrection of condemnation or judgment' (ἀνάστασιν κρίσεως). The rejection of these verses as an interpolation on the ground that their teaching is not found in the Synoptics or elsewhere in John itself is not justified. Charles (Eschatology, p. 371 n.) holds that the doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked in Jn. is an intrusion due to Judaistic influence. But a general resurrection of just and unjust forms at least the background of the thought in Mt 5²⁹, 10²⁸, 12⁴¹, 25³¹⁻⁴⁶, Lk 11³², Jn 12⁴⁸.

In the Fourth Gospel, it is true, a profounder view of the resurrection-life is revealed than that contained in the Synoptics. The resurrection is represented as intimately connected with the spiritual renewal or quickening which comes of organic relationship between Christ and believers (11²⁵; cf. 6⁴⁰, 44 52¹ 3³⁶). So that, while the resurrection in some sense of unbelievers is affirmed (5²⁸, 12⁴⁸), it must have a widely different basis and meaning from that of believers. It is referred to the omnipotence of the Father: 'the Father raiseth the dead and quickeneth them' (5⁻¹). But faith's primary interest is in 'the resurrection of life,' the resurrection of those who are 'in Christ,' and the apostolic writers often use language as if there were no other. So it is that scanty reference is made to a general resurrection in St. Paul's writings. Lightfoot (on Ph 3¹) distinguishes firmly between ἡ ἀνάστασις (or ἐξανάστασις) ἡ ἐκ νεκρῶν and ἡ ἀνάστασις τῶν νεκρῶν, the former being equivalent to ἀνάστασις ζωῆς, the latter to ἀνάστασις κρίσεως (Jn 5²⁹).

There are indeed those who hold that in 1 Co 15²⁴ there is an explicit reference to the resurrection of unbelievers, interpreting τὸ τέλος as 'the last act (of the resurrection)' (Meyer) or 'the remainder,' the rest of men, those not 'in Christ,' as forming a third τάγμα. According to this view, a resurrection of believers takes place at the Parousia, then, after an interval of indefinite duration—between the point marked by ἔπειτα and the following εἰτα in which Christ gradually subdues all His enemies—a resurrection of the wicked (see Lietzmann and J. Weiss, in loc.). Such a millenarian view finds support in Rev 20^{4c}, where, although there is no specific reference to the resurrection of the wicked, this is implied in the expression 'the first resurrection,' as well as in the connexion established between the Resurrection and the Judgment. But the introduction of such a thought is quite irrelevant to St. Paul's argument here where he is answering the difficulties raised as to the resurrection of those who have died in Christ. St. Paul's interest throughout is in the resurrection of Christians, and for the rest he is content to urge men to the attaining of this resurrection (Ph 3¹¹), and to warn them of the fate attendant on the rejection of Christ (Ro 2⁵, 2 Th 1⁹; cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰, Ph 3¹⁰, etc.).

3. What it means for the Kingdom of God.—The resurrection of Christ, as thus the ground not only of the moral but of the physical resurrection of believers, is further the pledge and ground of the ultimate dominance of spiritual interests, the consummation of the Kingdom of God. This is its wider cosmic significance.

(a) The redemption of the body from the power of death and the grave, St. Paul shows, is an essential part of the Divine world-plan, necessary to the fulfilment of God's Kingdom through Christ (1 Co 15²⁰⁻²⁸). Without this Christ is not Lord of all; 'all things' are not subdued unto Him (v. 27). 'Then comes the end (τὸ τέλος, not merely the termination, but the consummation, expressing and manifesting the goal of the whole process) when he shall have abolished every rule (ἀρχήν) and every authority (ἐξουσίαν) and power (δυναμὴν)—every force or power antagonistic to the Divine dominion. 'The last enemy to be abolished is death (ὁ θάνατος).' For St. Paul, death, not the mere physical experience, but, as for Hebrew thought generally, this experience in co-relation with sin, was the supreme enemy (see Kennedy, Last Things, p. 113). When 'he' (ὁ θάνατος—St. Paul almost personifies it) has been vanquished, Christ's dominion is complete (cf. He 2¹⁴, 'Him that had the power of death, that is, the devil,' and Rev 20¹⁴). In the resurrection of Christ we have the assurance that sin and death are not the final realities in the universe, but are destined to be swallowed up in victory.

(b) In the redemption of the body through Christ, we have the pledge of the ultimate subjugation of the entire material order to the purposes of spirit, the revelation of the destiny of the whole material universe to be included in the transformation wrought by Christ. The material order has shared with the moral and spiritual in the consequences of sin. It has been subjected to futility (ματαιότης, Ro 8²⁰), to vain striving; the full purpose of its existence has been defeated through man's sin. Like human life, it is 'in thralldom to decay' (v. ²¹, φθορά) and 'waits with eager longing' (v. ¹⁹) for 'the freedom of the glory (τῆς δόξης) of the children of God' (v. ²¹). The redemption of the body (ἡ ἀπολειτουργία τοῦ σώματος) which is the climax of material evolution, the rescue of it from the bondage of φθορά, and the transfiguring and transforming of it so as to make it the complete instrument of the spirit—this contains the promise of the transfiguration and transformation of the entire creation, 'new heavens and a new earth' (2 P 3¹³, Rev 21¹), 'all things new' (Rev 21⁵). In the resurrection of Christ as the pledge and ground of the moral and physical resurrection of believers we have, accordingly, the assurance that the redemption of Christ involves the rectification of the material as well as of the spiritual universe. This new condition of things Jesus once names the 'regeneration' or 'new birth' (παλιγγενεσία, Mt 19²⁸) of all things. (St. Peter's phrase in Ac 3⁻¹ [ἀρχὴ χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων] rendered in AV 'until the times of restitution of all things' is hardly a parallel.)

(c) So, finally, in the resurrection of Christ we have the pledge of the consummation of God's redeeming purpose—the 'summing up' (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι) all things in Christ, the things in heaven, and the things on earth' (Eph 1¹⁰), and thus the bringing in of final world-unity, when 'Christ is all and in all' (πάντα καὶ ἐν πᾶσιν, Col 3¹¹). For 'it pleased (the Father)'—this was His aim—'through (διὰ) him to reconcile all things unto (ἐς) himself . . . whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens' (Col 1²⁰; cf. Ph 2⁻¹¹). The Resurrection, that is to say, was for the apostles not only the completion of the incarnation and atonement of Jesus; it was the fulfilment of the original purpose of God in creation, the consummation of the whole evolutionary process. This is expressed most definitely by St. Paul in Col 1^{15a}, where Christ, 'the firstborn of all creation' (πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως), its norm and type, that which sets for it its true end—'for in him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth . . . all things have been created through him, and unto [with a view to] him' (ἐς αὐτόν, v. ^{15b})—is described as the beginning (ἀρχή, the first principle), the first begotten from the dead in order that He might become (ὡς γέννηται) prominent over all (ἐν πᾶσιν, 'no doubt purposely left indefinite, including every province of creation' [Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 293]). Through the Resurrection, as the culmination of the Incarnation and Atonement, by means of which Christ becomes the ἀρχή or life-giving principle of a new humanity, God's aim in the whole process of creation attains its end.

V. ATTEMPTED EXPLANATIONS OF THE BELIEF.—The character and significance of the apostolic belief in the resurrection of Christ have been considered, and the historical evidence on which the belief was based. It remains to review the attempts which have been made to account for the apostolic belief and its consequences without acknowledging the full fact of the Resurrection, as this is represented in the apostolic writings.

i. OLDER FORMS OF EXPLANATION.—Some of the older naturalistic hypotheses may now be regarded as obsolete and abandoned. They have practically only a historical or antiquarian interest, and do not need to be re-argued at length. Yet they are not on that account to be overlooked. As monuments not only recording past history, but serving as warnings to all time of the futility of certain methods of explanation, they demand passing notice.

1. The swoon theory.—According to this theory, Jesus' supposed death on the Cross was in reality only a swoon, a case of 'suspended animation.' In the cool air of the cavern tomb He revived and again appeared among His disciples. This explanation—a favourite one in the school of 18th cent. rationalism, and associated especially with the name of Paulus—is now hopelessly discredited. To escape with His life after having been nailed to the Cross meant that the Resurrection, if resurrection it could be called, was a return to life under the same conditions as before, and this, as we have seen, is not the kind of fact with which the records deal. The practical difficulties of the theory are insuperable. If Jesus had presented Himself merely as one who had stolen half-dead out of the sepulchre, His appearance would have produced the impression of weakness and helplessness, not that of a conqueror over death and the grave. (For a trenchant statement of these practical difficulties see Strauss, New Life of Jesus, i. 412.)

2. The theft or fraud theory.—A second hypothesis, which may also be taken as now practically discredited, is the theory that the disciples, in order that they might still have a message, stole the body and pretended that Jesus had risen. The theory is an old one—the oldest of all indeed, if we may believe the story of Mt 28¹¹⁻¹³, which was still current in the days of Justin Martyr (Dial. with Trypho, 17). The theory thus anticipated by the Jewish authorities was urged, though with some difference of detail, by Celsus (see Origen, c. Cels. ii. 56). It is identified in modern times chiefly with the name of Reimarus. The theory thus stated would found Christianity on imposture or fraud. But no sober critic now challenges the good faith of the first disciples in their witness. They 'really had the impression of having seen him' (Schmiedel, EBi iv. 4061). A more recent form of the theory is that adopted by O. Holtzmann (Life of Jesus, p. 499), that the body was quietly removed by the owner of the grave without the knowledge of the disciples. Joseph of Arimathea, feeling, on reflexion, that it would not do to have in his respectable family vault the body of a man who had been crucified, had the body of Jesus secretly removed and buried elsewhere. Another form of the theory is that suggested by A. Réville (see Jésus de Nazareth. Études critiques sur les antécédents de l'histoire évangélique, Paris, 1897, ii. 420 ff.), that the leaders of the Sanhedrin bribed the soldiers to remove the body lest the tomb might become an object of pilgrimage to Jesus' followers in Galilee, and fanatical outbreaks might occur in Jerusalem. Lake gives what he holds to be a more possible hypothesis. His suggestion is that the women in the dusk of the morning came to a tomb which they thought was the one in which they had seen the Lord buried. 'They expected to find a closed tomb, but they found an open one; and a young man, who was in the entrance, guessing their errand, tried to tell them that they had made a mistake in the place. "He is not here," said he; "see the place where they laid him," and probably pointed to the next tomb. But the women were frightened at the detection of their errand and fled, only imperfectly or not at all understanding what they heard' (The Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 251 f.). B. H. Streeter (in Foundations, London, 1912, p. 134) claims that 'with a little ingenuity it is not difficult to imagine more than one set of circumstances which might account on purely natural grounds for the tomb being found empty.'

But, apart altogether from the consideration that the theory in these different forms contradicts the historical evidence in vital points, and that to ascribe to fraud or mistake the rise of a belief with such revolutionary effects in the thought and life of the disciples is altogether improbable as an adequate explanation, there is one fact on which all such theories come to grief. Within a few weeks of the Death and the Burial the disciples were boldly proclaiming in the streets of the very city where Jesus had been crucified, and even before the authorities who were responsible for the Crucifixion, that God raised Him up on the third day, and through this public proclamation were making multitudes of converts. If their testimony was false, why did not the Jewish and Roman authorities for ever silence the disciples by pointing to where the body of Jesus still lay, or by showing how it had come to be removed from the tomb in which it had been laid after the Crucifixion? What could have been at once easier and more effective? Even after an interval of fifty days, as medical science acknowledges, the body must have been recognizable. 'The silence of the Jews is as significant as the speech of the Christians' (Fairbairn, Studies in the Life of Christ, p. 357). 'Did not in this case spells could not, and the empty tomb remains an unimpeachable witness to the truth of the message that the Lord had risen' (Orr, Resurrection of Jesus, p. 213 f.).

3. The subjective vision or mental hallucination theory.—This is the most weighty of the older theories put forward to explain the apostolic belief in the Resurrection, without acknowledging the actual fact. According to this theory the so-called 'appearances' of the Risen Christ were due to the excited state of mind in which the disciples were after the death of their Master. Overwrought and mentally distraught by the shock of His death, and yearning for His presence, they saw apparitions or visions of Him. But these were purely subjective—phantasms or mental hallucinations. They longed to see Him; they expected to see Him; and they thought they did see Him. Their thought was perfectly honest, but it was nevertheless a hallucination. For persons in a state of unusual mental excitement and expectancy, especially when they are also of a highly strung nervous temperament, such visions are, it is represented, common phenomena of religious history, and are often contagious. So it was in the case of the appearances of Jesus. They began with the women, probably with Mary Magdalene, an excitable and nervous person. Her story that she had seen the Lord was eagerly embraced; it spread with lightning rapidity, and with the force of an epidemic. What she believed she had seen others believed they too must see, and they saw. The visions were the product of their dwelling in fond and affectionate memory on the personality of their Master, which, after the first shock of despair was over, they came to feel was such that He must have survived death. So it is that Renan represents the case. As he puts it, 'Ce qui a ressuscité Jésus, c'est l'amour' (Les Apôtres, Paris, 1866, ch. i., Eng. tr., London, 1869). With this Strauss combines reflexion upon certain passages of the OT expressing faith in the Resurrection, together with recollection of the Master's own predictions of the fact. The inadequacy of such a theory to account for a belief with such incalculably momentous results as the belief in the Resurrection has often been exposed, but because of its continued prevalence in one form or other in the present day—such recent critics as Schmiedel, Weizsäcker, Harnack, A. Meyer, and Loisy support it—the chief objections to it, in addition to the fundamental consideration referred to at the end of last section, which applies equally against all forms of the vision theory, may be briefly indicated.

(1) Such a psychological condition as is necessary to the vision theory is absent on the disciples' part. With hearts sad and hopes broken, so far from expecting a Resurrection, they could hardly be persuaded of the fact even after it occurred (Lk 24¹¹, Jn 20²⁵, Mk 16¹¹⁻¹³). The women themselves who went on the third morning to the tomb went to anoint a dead body, not to behold a Risen Lord. (2) With reference to Strauss's attempt to base the expectation on certain passages of the OT, there is no evidence of any Jewish belief in Jesus' time of a resurrection from the dead before the last day, much less of such a resurrection as took place in the case of Jesus (see Edersheim, LT⁴ ii. 624). Even Jesus' own intimations that He would rise again, frequently as they were given (e.g. Mt 16-17 20¹⁹ 26³², etc., and [Is], seem to have made no impression upon the disciples. The thought was so strange to them that they were unable to receive it. Only after the event were these predictions understood (cf. Jn 2-2). (3) The tradition of 'the third day' and of the appearances already on this day of the Risen Christ in Jerusalem is set aside as affording too little time for the rise of visions. So the upholders of the vision theory feel the necessity of transferring the appearances of Jesus from Jerusalem to Galilee, thus not only giving more time for visions to develop, but transferring them to scenes where memory and imagination could more easily work. This involves the separating them from the empty tomb and the events of the Easter morn, which we have seen to be facts firmly rooted in the apostolic tradition. The inadequacy of Strauss's endeavour to show how the belief in 'the third day' may have originated from OT hints (New Life, i. 438 f.) has already been referred to. (4) The fact that the manifestations were made not merely to this or that individual but to companies of persons at the same time, 'the twelve,' 'all the apostles,' 'more than five hundred,' increases many-fold the difficulty of explaining as the product of subjective vision the fact to which they bear witness. There are no doubt genuine instances of 'collective' delusion, an impression received or idea conceived by one ardent soul being transmitted by a kind of electric sympathy to others ready to bear witness that they have had a like experience. Schmiedel gives some instances (EBi iv. 4083); but there is this fundamental difference between these and the appearances of the Risen Christ, that in the latter case, as the narratives bear distinctly on their face, the whole company was instantaneously affected in the same way. (5) The theory is inconsistent with the fact that the visions came so suddenly to an end. After the forty days no appearance of the Risen Lord is recorded, except that to St. Paul, the circumstances and object of which were altogether exceptional. It is not thus that imagination works. As Keim says, 'the spirits that men call up are not so quickly laid' (Jesus of Nazara, vi. 357).

4. The objective vision or telegram hypothesis.—Keim, realizing the difficulties of the last theory, advanced the hypothesis that the appearances, while essentially of the nature of visions, were not purely subjective—the result of the enthusiasm and mental excitement of the disciples—but real, objectively caused manifestations of the Risen Christ. His theory is that, while the body of the Crucified Jesus remained in the tomb, His living spirit sent telegrams to the disciples to assure them that He still lived, telegrams or supernatural manifestations which the disciples took for bona fide bodily appearances of their Risen Master (Jesus of Nazara, vi. 364). Keim thinks that in this way he saves the truth of the Resurrection. 'Though much has fallen away, the secure faith-fortress of the resurrection of Jesus remains' (p. 365). The aim of the theory is, while acknowledging a kind of resurrection, to relieve the mind from the difficulty of believing in an actual resurrection of the body from the grave. The root of the theory is thus aversion to the recognition of the supernatural in the physical realm. In such a theory, Keim himself acknowledges, the supernatural is not altogether eliminated. 'Christian faith . . . oversteps these boundaries [of the natural order], not merely in the certain assurance that Jesus . . . took his course to the higher world of God and of spirits . . . but also in the conviction that it was he and no other who, as dead yet risen again, as celestially glorified even if not risen, vouchsafed visions to his disciples' (p. 360). The intervention of the supernatural in the normal, mental, or psychological order of the disciples' experience is thus presumed. Once we admit such an intervention, however, there is no reason why we should not proceed further to the full apostolic affirmation—for which this is a poor substitute—that Jesus burst the bands of death and came forth bodily from the tomb on the morning of the third day.

Of this theory Bruce remarks with truth that it is 'a bastard supernaturalism as objectionable to unbelievers as the true supernaturalism of the Catholic creed, and having the additional drawback that it offers to faith asking for bread a stone' (Apologetics, p. 393). Besides, there is the further difficulty urged by Bruce that Keim's hypothesis requires us to believe that the faith of the Christian Church is based upon a revelation from heaven which was in fact misleading. 'Christ sends a series of telegrams from heaven to let His disciples know that all is well. But what does the telegram say in every case? Not merely, My Spirit lives with God and cares for you; but, my body is risen from the grave. . . . If the resurrection be an unreality, if the body that was nailed to the tree never came forth from the tomb, why send messages that were certain to produce an opposite impression?' (ib.). The hypothesis really means that Christ deceives His disciples by inducing them, and through them the whole Christian Church, to believe a lie. The new turn given to the theory by psychical research will be considered below (ii. 1).

Milligan, Resurrection of our Lord, London, 1881, lect. iii.; J. Orr, Resurrection of Jesus, do., 1908, ch. viii.; A. M. Fairbairn, Studies in the Life of Christ, do., 1881, ch. xviii.

ii. MORE RECENT EXPLANATIONS.—The character of the attack on the Resurrection in recent times has changed in some important respects. New knowledge and new critical methods have given rise to new ways of attempting to explain the belief in the Resurrection without accepting the full facts presented in the apostolic narratives. A close relation exists between these different theories—they are but different aspects of the same attempt to remove or minimize the supernatural in Christianity—but different forms can be distinguished according to the difference of emphasis.

1. The psychological or psychical research theory.—A new turn, and with it a new vogue, has been given to the objective vision theory in recent times by bringing the appearances of the Risen Christ recorded in the narratives into line with the phenomena of psychical research. The late F. W. H. Myers, the leader in this movement, held that psychical research had definitely established the reality of telepathic intercommunication between this world and another. 'Observation, experiment, inference, have led many inquirers, of whom I am one, to a belief in direct or telepathic intercommunication, not only between the minds of men still on earth, but between minds or spirits still on earth and spirits departed' (Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death, p. 350). And so highly did Myers estimate the worth of the evidence supplied by these psychical investigations that he predicted that 'in consequence of the new evidence, all reasonable men, a century hence, will believe the Resurrection of Christ, whereas, in default of the new evidence, no reasonable men, a century hence, would have believed it' (ib. p. 351). The ground of this prediction he proceeds to state: 'Our ever-growing recognition of the continuity, the uniformity of cosmic law has gradually made of the alleged uniqueness of any incident its almost inevitable refutation . . . and especially as to that central claim, of the soul's life manifested after the body's death, it is plain that this can less and less be supported by remote tradition alone; that it must more and more be tested by modern experience and inquiry' (ib.).

The position thus stated has found considerable support, among both theologians and scientists. It is to 'the type of phenomena collected by the Society of Psychical Research, and especially by the late Mr. F. W. H. Myers,' that Lake, e.g., turns for help in understanding the nature of the appearances of the Risen Christ (The Resurrection of Jesus Christ, p. 272). As to the results already obtained in this sphere he expresses himself more cautiously than Myers. He thinks it possible that at least 'some evidence' already exists pointing to the fact of such communications having taken place. But 'we must wait until the experts have sufficiently sifted the arguments for alternative explanations of the phenomena, before they can actually be used as reliable evidence for the survival of personality after death' (p. 245). As to the value of the evidence, however, when thus sifted and substantiated, Lake has no doubt. The belief in the Resurrection even in the sense of the personal survival of Jesus after death depends on the success of the experiments and investigations of psychical research. It must remain 'merely an hypothesis until it can be shown' through these experiments and investigations 'that personal life does endure beyond death, is neither extinguished nor suspended, and is capable of manifesting its existence to us' (ib.). Some of the leading representatives of present-day science, too, have found in the phenomena of psychical research new support in favour of belief in the recorded appearances of Christ after His death. Lodge, e.g., maintains that the narratives of the appearances are substantially accurate records of genuine psychical experiences on the part of the apostles. The appearances during the forty days are mysterious enough, but they can be accepted very much as they stand, for they agree with our experience of genuine psychical phenomena the world over (cf. Man and the Universe, p. 290). This relating of the appearances of the Risen Christ to psychical phenomena is held to explain some of the difficulties belonging to the narratives, in particular the apparent discrepancy in regard to the locality of the appearances (see Resurrectio Christi, London, 1909; Interpreter, vi. [1909-10] 306).

Now this branch of psychical science is still in its infancy, and it is difficult to speak yet of any definiteness of results. But already it is evident that a new chapter in the discussion of the Resurrection has opened here. The whole question of relation of body and spirit has taken on a new aspect through these investigations. The mystery of human personality and the possession of hitherto unrecognized powers, not only of mind over mind, but of mind over body, is being revealed as never before. The evidences of hypernormal mental control, especially in the hypnotic state, over bodily processes (e.g. the production of blisters and ecchymoses of the skin, the so-called 'stigmata' by verbal suggestion) show that mind has the power of exerting a far greater influence over body than had been generally recognized by physiologists (see, e.g., MacDougall, Body and Mind, ch. xxv.). And the evidence produced by such investigations of the control of matter by spirit in extraordinary if not preternatural ways may aid not a little in removing prejudice to the facts recorded in the narratives as to the resurrection and ascension of Christ. 'When scientists of world-wide reputation, trained in the strictest school of scientific inquiry, such as Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Sir Alfred Wallace, declare, as they have done, that they have verified the fact by repeated experiment that ponderable bodies can be moved without physical contact by some hitherto unrecognized force which was brought into play by the action of human will, it is no longer possible to treat with scientific contempt the assertions contained in the Gospels that Christ's material body disappeared from the tomb as the result of a hitherto unrecognized force which was exerted upon it without physical contact' (Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection, p. 97). It is doubtful, however, how far help can be obtained from this quarter in understanding the bodily manifestations of Jesus to His disciples recorded in the narratives. The verdict of most critics will, we fancy, be at present one of non-committal.

Against the attempt to bring the resurrection of Christ into line with the phenomena dealt with by psychical research and to make belief in the Resurrection dependent on the scientific verification of these phenomena in the way that Myers and Lake suggest, various objections may be urged.

(1) It does less than justice to the apostolic claim. According to Myers, the 'essential claim' of the tradition of Christ's resurrection is taken to be 'the soul's life manifested after the body's death.' Its claim extends, that is to say, only to a spiritual Resurrection, a Resurrection in the sense of a personal survival of Jesus, an assurance that though His body was laid in the tomb and remained there He lived in spirit. 'What we mean by resurrection is not resuscitation of the material body, but the unbroken survival of personal life' (Lake, p. 265). So it is held that 'the existence of verified apparitions would substantiate all that is useful in the study of the resurrection, and make human experience in all ages akin' (J. H. Hyslop, Psychical Research and the Resurrection, Boston, 1908, p. 333). As for a physical resurrection, 'this must remain incredible so long as such phenomena are not now frequent, and as long as human experience does not reproduce it as a law of nature' (ib.). But it was not upon such spiritual apparitions or 'manifestations of a surviving personality' that the faith of the Church in the resurrection of Christ was built; it was, as we have seen, upon His victory over death and the grave, as witnessed by the empty tomb on the third day and His subsequent appearances.

(2) To place the appearances of the Risen Christ on the same level as spiritualistic apparitions of the dead—no more miraculous or significant than they—given to assure the sorrowing disciples that their Master was still living in the world of spirits, thus 'making human experience in all ages akin,' is to eliminate just that which is of distinctive worth and value in His appearances, and to fail to realize the true significance of the Resurrection for apostolic thought. The Resurrection claims to be a new beginning, a new departure in experience, a revelation sub generis. For the apostles the Resurrection had a significance far beyond the incidental revelation of the truth that Christ lives on after death. It was a fact of the largest moral and spiritual significance, for it meant His exaltation at the right hand of God, supreme in the material as well as in the spiritual world, and as such led to a revolution in apostolic thought and life. To compare the appearances and manifestations of the Risen Christ with their unique and far-reaching results to the spiritualistic apparitions of psychical research and alleged communications from the other world is to compare the incomparable. When any of the 'resurrections' investigated by the Society for Psychical Research has consequences of a moral and spiritual character to be compared with the NT or the Apostolic Church—then, but not till then, will we believe it is the same kind of thing as the resurrection of Jesus. So-called 'messages' or 'communications' from the other side of death we have in abundance, but they are mere inanities and platitudes which we are as well without. 'If communication is established at all with the spirit-world, it is merely with "the dregs and lees of the unseen universe"—with spirits who either have not the power or else the will to communicate anything of importance to man' (W. P. Paterson, SDB, p. 458*).

(3) A scientific proof or verification of the Resurrection by experimental methods on evidence open to all alike, such as Myers and Lake desiderate, would have no religious value. The belief in the resurrection of Jesus depends on an initial appreciation of the uniqueness of His personality—it is belief in Jesus as risen—and this is spiritually discerned. (4) The object of the theory is to bring the resurrection of Christ into line with natural phenomena and 'our ever-growing recognition of the continuity, the uniformity of cosmic law' (Myers, Human Personality, p. 351), and thus to get rid of the supernatural especially in the physical realm. The empty tomb and the event on the third day become, on this theory, mistakes for which some explanation has to be found. What Lake's suggested explanation is has already been considered (V. i. 2).

LITERATURE.—On this theory see F. W. H. Myers, Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death, ed. London, 1907; K. Lake, Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, do., 1907; O. Lodge, Survival of Man, do., 1909, art. 'The Immortality of the Soul,' pt. II, in HJ vi. [1908] 574 ff.; F. 2. The mythological theory.—The theory adduced from the side of the study of comparative religion and mythology is perhaps the most characteristic modern form of explanation. It is connected, in its most recent phase, with the rise of the school of thought usually called 'Neo-Babylonian' or 'Pan-Babylonian' from its attempt to account for much in Bible story through the influence of conceptions imported into Judaism from the Orient, and derived chiefly from Babylonia. The fundamental principle of this school or movement in relation to Christianity is the demand that the religion of Jesus Christ, including its OT preparation, be studied by the scientific-historical method, not as if it were something unique and apart, 'a holy island in the sea of history,' but in its place in the stream, and in essential connexion with religions chronologically and geographically adjacent to it. As applied to the NT, the attitude of the school may be represented by the thesis of H. Gunkel that 'in its origin and shaping (Ausbildung) in important and even in some essential points the religion of the NT stood under the influence of foreign religions, and that this influence was transmitted to the men of the NT through Judaism' (Zum religionsgeschichtl. Verständnis des NT, Göttingen, 1903, p. 1); or by that of Cheyne: 'There are parts of the New Testament—in the Gospels, in the Epistles, and in the Apocalypse—which can only be accounted for by the newly-discovered fact of an Oriental syncretism, which began early and continued late' (Bible Problems, p. 19). Among the beliefs thus accounted for is the belief in the resurrection of Jesus in the form in which this appears in the NT. Myths of the death and resurrection of gods, 'resurrection legends,' derived ultimately from Babylonia, were spread, it is represented, through the whole East, and these, entering through many channels, chiefly through the mystery-religions, became attached first to the figure of the expected Messiah in Jewish literature, and then through Judaism to Jesus of Nazareth, and had a powerful influence in moulding the NT representation of His resurrection.

It is nothing new to draw comparisons or analogies between the NT story of the resurrection of Jesus and the myths of the death and resurrection of gods in pagan religions. Celsus had already made a beginning in this direction. He compared the NT narratives of the Resurrection with similar myths in Greek story (see Origen, c. Cels. ii. 55 f.). What is characteristic of this new scientific school of thought is that it is no longer comparisons or analogies merely which are sought between the Gospel narratives and pagan myths, but an actual derivation the one from the other. Gunkel, e.g., thus derives from Oriental, and ultimately from Babylonian, conceptions, the NT story of the Resurrection from the dead on the third day (op. cit. pp. 76-83; cf. pp. 31-35), the Ascension (ib. p. 71 f.), and the origin of Sunday as a Christian festival (ib. pp. 73-76). And Cheyne holds that 'the apostle Paul, when he says (1 Co 15²¹) that Christ died and that He rose again "according to the Scriptures," in reality points to a pre-Christian sketch of the life of Christ, partly . . . derived from widely-spread non-Jewish myths, and embodied in Jewish writings' (Bible Problems, p. 113). This is the theory of Strauss over again, with the substitution of Babylonian mythology for OT prophecy.

In criticism of such an attempted derivation of the apostolic belief in the Resurrection it has to be said: (1) that the fundamental assumption or allegation on which the application of the theory to the NT story depends, viz. the influence of Oriental conceptions on Jewish thought in the way of giving rise to a pre-Christian sketch of a dying and rising Messiah, is unjustified. That Jewish thought in the time of Christ was familiar with the idea of a resurrection of the dead—a resurrection of the body at the last day—is certain (though Gunkel's attempt to trace its origin to extra-Jewish Oriental sources must be contested; see Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 64). But that the idea of a dying and rising Messiah formed part of this thought, that the idea of a resurrection from the dead was connected with the Messiah in current Jewish beliefs, is contrary to evidence. The notion of a resurrection of the Messiah had nothing corresponding to it in the beliefs of Judaism. Even when Jesus had given repeated intimations of His death and resurrection, and had represented this as in accordance with OT prophecy, so contrary was the idea to contemporary Judaism that the disciples themselves were 'slow of heart' to believe the things that Jesus had spoken to them (Lk 24³⁵ 44-46).

(2) Not only is the fundamental assumption of the theory without support, but the analogies quoted between the NT and extra-Jewish mythological thought are altogether inadequate for the purpose in view. If God is in all history we may expect to find a preparation for the higher in the lower in the way of foreshadowings or prefigurations of Christian truths in ethnic religions. But the analogies cited to explain the Christian ideas are no real parallels. Take, e.g., the mythological explanations of the Resurrection on the third day. Why was the third day fixed upon for the occurrence? Strauss maintained that it was because of OT hints. The insufficiency of such an answer Gunkel and Cheyne acknowledge, and they claim that the matter can be satisfactorily explained only from the historical-religious point of view, as due to the influence of pagan myths of solar deities on Jewish thought. 'The three days' of Jonah and 'the three and one half' of Dn. (7²⁵ 12) and the Apocalypse (11¹³ 14) are all forms of Oriental sun-god myths (Gunkel, p. 82 ff.; Cheyne, p. 110 ff.). To this influence also is due the observance of Sunday as the day of the commemoration of the Resurrection. The Lord's Day was the day of the sun-god. Easter Sunday was the day of the sun's emergence from the night of winter (Gunkel, pp. 74, 79). It is not strange that this was the day on which Jesus was said by the primitive Christian community to have risen. It is really an ancient Oriental festival which has here been taken over by the early Church. But a borrowed story ought at least to have some real likeness to its source, and there is no true analogy between the story of Christ's death and resurrection on the third day and the pagan myths of slain and risen gods, beyond the general ideas of death and survival. These myths were polytheistic in origin, and were a poetic rendering of the phenomena of the yearly death and revival of vegetation represented in ritual and personified. The death and resurrection of Christ, on the other hand, were historical facts which bore no relation whatever to these myths. The resurrection of Attis, Adonis, and Osiris was an annual affair symbolizing the sun's victory over winter in spring. The resurrection of Christ, however, was commemorated not only once a year at Easter, but also every Sunday. Had it been suggested by pagan myths and rituals, its commemoration would have shown some trace at least of the rites which suggested the belief, but nothing such is found. That Christ's death and resurrection took place at the time of such a pagan commemoration may be regarded as a coincidence and nothing more, although it may have had some influence in furthering the acceptance of the story itself among pagans. The pagan beliefs in slain and risen gods, therefore, bear no real likeness to the account of Christ's death and resurrection in the NT. Attis, Adonis, and Osiris are in no sense historical characters. They are ideal embodiments of the decay and reanimation of natural life year by year. Even if the apostles knew of such myths there is no evidence that they suggested to them the idea of a resurrection of their Master. All the evidence shows that the last thing the disciples expected was such a resurrection. The change in their attitude came about suddenly. It was not a slow growth, and it claimed to be based on an alleged occurrence which it was within the power and in the interest of many to disprove had it been but a myth—the empty grave on the third day together with His subsequent appearances. This was their own explanation of the ethical and spiritual power which differentiates their belief from that of alleged pagan counterparts, and this is the only explanation that is adequate to the facts.

3. The spiritual significance theory.—Another tendency which is dominant at the present time is that which lays emphasis on the spiritual worth or significance or the resurrection of Christ while surrendering or sitting loose to the belief in a bodily rising from the grave. A bodily Resurrection, so far from being of the essence of the Christian faith, is represented as a temporary excrescence which can be dropped without affecting it in any vital way. This is a tendency associated especially with a certain section of the Ritschlian school of theologians and 'connects itself naturally with the disposition in this school to seek the ground of faith in an immediate religious impression—in something verifiable on its own account—and to dissociate faith from doubtful questions of criticism and uncertainties of historical inquiry' (Orr, Resurrection of Jesus, p. 23 f.). 'The basis of faith must be something fixed; the results of historical study are continually changing' (W. Herrmann, Communion of the Christian with God, Eng. tr.², London, 1906, p. 76). The certainty to which Christian faith holds fast is that 'Christ lives,' but this is a 'judgment of value,' or, as Herrmann prefers to call it, a 'thought of faith' (Glaubensgedanke), a conviction based on the impression of religious worth produced by the earthly life of Jesus, and not affected by any view that may be held as to the historical Resurrection. The belief in the Resurrection is thus not a belief based on historical evidence in regard to an event in the past, but a faith inference from a prior judgment of His person. Foremost among representatives of this position stands Harnack, who has probably done more than any other to popularize the theory.

In his Hist. of Dogma (I. 55-57) Harnack contends (1) that there is no satisfactory historical evidence of the actual bodily Resurrection. 'None of Christ's opponents saw him after his death. . . . The succession and number of the appearances can no longer be ascertained with certainty. . . . The disciples, and Paul, were conscious of having seen Christ not in the crucified earthly body, but in heavenly glory. . . . Even the empty grave on the third day can by no means be regarded as a certain historical fact, because it appears united in the accounts with manifest legendary features, and further because it is directly excluded by the way in which Paul has portrayed the resurrection in 1 Co 15.' But (2) Harnack goes further, and pours ridicule on the attempt to find such evidence. He scents the idea of faith being dependent on historical evidence at all. Faith must be independent of evidence coming to us through the testimony of others. 'To believe in appearances which others have had is a frivolity which is always rebuffed by rising doubts.' But the faith which is thus independent of historical evidence is, it speedily appears, a faith which is indifferent to the question of the physical Resurrection. 'Faith has by no means to do with the knowledge of the form in which Jesus lives, but only with the conviction that he is the living Lord.' The faith in the Resurrection and the belief in the empty tomb are two different things. The historical question and the question of faith must clearly be distinguished here. In his later lectures on 'What is Christianity?' Harnack gives expression to the same view in his famous distinction between what he calls the 'Easter message' and the 'Easter faith.' 'The Easter message tells us of that wonderful event in Joseph of Arimathea's garden, which, however, no eye saw; it tells us of the empty grave into which a few women and disciples looked; of the appearance of the Lord in a transfigured form—so glorified that his own could not immediately recognise him; it soon begins to tell us, too, of what the risen one said and did.' But 'the Easter faith is the conviction that the crucified one gained a victory over death; that God is just and powerful; that he who is the first-born among many brethren still lives' (What is Christianity? 13, p. 163 f.). To found the Easter faith on the Easter message is to rest it on an 'unstable foundation.' 'What he [Paul] and the disciples regarded as all-important was not the state in which the grave was found, but Christ's appearances. But who of us can maintain that a clear account of these appearances can be constructed out of the stories told by Paul and the evangelists; and if that be impossible, and there is no tradition of single events which is quite trustworthy, how is the Easter faith to be based on them? Either we must decide to rest our belief on a foundation unstable and always exposed to fresh doubts, or else we must abandon this foundation altogether, and with it the miraculous appeal to our senses' (p. 164 f.). It must have been, he thinks, even to the disciples themselves not so much the Easter message as the impression of His personality which was the ultimate foundation of the Easter faith that He was still alive. This impression of the personality of Jesus at least is a simple matter of fact which no historical criticism can in any way alter (ib.).

This position is open to objection on the following grounds. (1) It is based on a view of the relation of faith and history—an attempt to make faith independent of historical evidence—which cannot be accepted. Mere historical evidence, indeed, is incompetent of itself to generate true Christian faith in the Resurrection. For this there is needed also an estimate of the moral and religious uniqueness of Jesus derived from the impression of His personality, which prepares the mind for the proper appreciation of the evidence. Only to those who have received this impression is the Resurrection truly credible. In this sense it is true to say that the belief in the Resurrection is a 'value judgment' or 'thought of faith'; and that 'no appearances of the Lord could permanently have convinced them [the disciples] of his life, if they had not possessed in their hearts the impression of his Person' (Hist. of Dogma, i. 86 n.). But this is not to make faith independent of historical evidence. It may be and is involved in a proper estimate of His worth that 'He could not be nolden of death,' which means not merely that 'Jesus lives,' as the Ritschlians put it, but that 'He is risen from the dead.' But, if all historical evidence for the fact were either wanting or discredited at the bar of criticism, faith would be involved in insoluble contradiction. The Easter faith cannot dispense with the Easter message which is its historical attestation, an attestation which has to be judged by the principles of historical criticism. (2) When we take the position to the test of the narratives its inadequacy is further established. Harnack holds that the distinction between the Easter faith and the Easter message is one already drawn in the NT. 'The story of Thomas is told for the exclusive purpose of impressing upon us that we must hold the Easter faith even without the Easter message: "Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed." The disciples on the road to Emmaus were blamed for not believing in the resurrection even though the Easter message had not yet reached them. The Lord is a Spirit, says Paul; and this carries with it the certainty of his resurrection' (What is Christianity??, p. 163 f.). But the support thus found involves a misrepresentation of the facts. The words to Thomas (Jn 20²⁹) are a rebuke to him for distrusting the testimony of his fellow-disciples and refusing to believe the Easter message without the personal verification of it by his own senses. The reproach to the two on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24³⁶) is directed against their hesitation to believe the story of the women, confirmed as this was by prophetic prediction, and the previous intimations of Jesus Himself.

St. Paul's conviction that the Lord is the Spirit is the direct outcome of the appearance to him of the Risen Christ outside Damascus, which he reckons in the same category as the earlier appearances to the other apostles. The stress St. Paul lays on the appearances as evidence of the resurrection of Christ (1 Co 15⁸⁻⁹), combined with his reference to the burial, altogether forbids the attempt to detach his Easter faith, or that of the early Christian community, with which in these matters he knew himself to be at one, from the Easter message. 'It would have conveyed no meaning to Paul or to any member of the original Christian circle to say that it was the spirit of Christ which rose into new life, or that He rose again in the faith of His devoted followers, who could not bear the thought that for Him death should end all' (Denney, Jesus and the Gospel, p. 113). The rising of which they speak is relative to the grave and the burial. They did not need to be assured that His spirit survived death. Not one of them doubted that. What they did need to be assured of, if their faith in Jesus was to be re-established, was His victory over death and the grave, and nothing but a bodily resurrection would have convinced them of that. It may be, as A. E. Garvie suggests (Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus, London, 1907, p. 439), 'that Jesus Himself would have esteemed the Easter-faith, the conviction that His life and work were of such infinite value to God that He must prove the conqueror of death, without the Easter message—the sensible evidences of the reality of His Resurrection—as much more precious than this belief which rested on the signs of sense.' As during His earthly ministry He rated low the faith that rested on His miracles (Jn 4⁴⁸), so the belief in His resurrection which needed sensible evidence might be less satisfactory to Him, because showing less spiritual discernment of His worth, than a humble and confident trust in His word. And for us to-day brought up within the Christian Church, the heirs of the past with the evidence of Christ's working through the centuries before us, belief in the Risen Lord may not depend so immediately or directly on the historical testimony of the empty grave and the appearances. But if one thing is made more plain and certain by the narratives than another it is that the disciples were quite incapable of the belief without the Easter message. Deeply as He had stamped Himself upon them in His earthly intercourse, the disaster of His death paralyzed their faith in Him, and this was regained and reconstituted only through the Easter message of the empty grave and the subsequent appearances.

But, it may be said, the Easter message, though thus needful, from the point of view of the early Christian community, to re-establish their faith and thus set the Church agoing—all the more so that for them as Jews a resurrection without an empty grave was unthinkable—is no longer necessary to the Christian faith, and may be dropped without affecting it in any vital way. Essential to the first disciples, so essential that as a matter of history the Apostolic Church sprang from the conviction that the body of Jesus was not left in the grave, it is no longer essential to us to-day. The Christian faith, it is urged, is not bound up with holding a particular view of the relation of the Glorified Christ to the body that was laid in Joseph's tomb. Faith, it is said, is to be exercised in the Exalted Lord, and of this faith belief in a resuscitation of the Body is no vital part. This is the position taken up in the latest outstanding illustration of the attempt to conserve a spiritual Resurrection while denying or minimizing the fact of a bodily resuscitation—that of Sanday in his pamphlet Bishop Gore's Challenge to Criticism (1914). Sanday is of opinion that we ought to be satisfied with a heart-felt expression of the conviction that the Risen Lord as Spirit still governs and inspires His Church, while sitting loose to the question of what became of His body. In regard to the resuscitation of the body of the Lord from the tomb, 'the accounts that have come down to us seem to be too conflicting and confused to prove this. But they do seem to prove that in any case the detail is of less importance than is supposed. Because, whatever it was, the body which the disciples saw was not the natural human body that was laid in the grave. . . . The central meaning of the Resurrection is just that expressed in the vision of the Apocalypse: "I am the first and the last, and the Living one; and I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore" (Rev 1st) (p. 20). All else in the apostolic representation is unessential for us to-day, and can be spared. The bodily Resurrection is but a 'symbolical' representation of the essential fact, the result of the world of ideas in which the first disciples moved. Their world of ideas was one in which the Resurrection was conceived as a bodily resuscitation. Their 'minds were steeped in the Old Testament' and their 'thoughts naturally ran into the moulds which the Old Testament supplied' (pp. 24, 25), with its belief in 'nature-miracles' gathering round great personalities in a pre-scientific age—a belief which 'perpetuated itself in the New Testament' (p. 27). For the first disciples, therefore, the 'nature-miracle' of the bodily Resurrection 'seemed necessary to the completeness of the idea, but it is so no longer.' It 'has done its work and can be spared.' It is like a lame man laying aside his crutches' (p. 28).

Sanday's position may be further elucidated by reference to a sermon of his published some years previously in Miracles (London, 1911). 'It was in Jewish circles that the belief in the Resurrection first sprang up. . . . But among the Jews the characteristic form of the belief in a life after death, or (as they expressed it) "life from the dead," was the Pharisaic doctrine of a bodily resurrection. This was the form of the belief which the first disciples had in their minds, and which naturally and inevitably shaped and coloured all their experiences. This was pre-eminently so with St. Paul, who before his conversion had been a zealous Pharisee. . . . So it was in the last resort this Pharisaic doctrine that was taken over by the Christian Church, and that from the first dictated the form of the Christian conception. It could not be otherwise. It was the one alternative open to those who believed in life from the dead at all. In that mould the belief of the first disciples was cast, and it has remained dominant in the Church down to our own time' (p. 16 f.). But it is characteristic of our time to attempt 'to go behind this form of the belief,' to show how it arose naturally in certain circumstances, and to distinguish between the question of its origin and that of its permanent validity. 'And I for one do not feel that I can condemn those attempts. I do not think that we are called upon to regard the precise form of the Pharisaic doctrine as the last word on the subject. It is . . . only the relative expression or outward clothing of a Divine revelation. . . . It was through the medium of minds possessed and dominated by these ideas, and, indeed, practically not conscious of the existence of any other, that the first announcement that Christ was alive and not dead was given to the world' (p. 17 f.). But we have to distinguish between 'what the ancients themselves really thought' and 'what we moderns should think.' Indeed this is 'the main problem before us at the present day' (p. 23).

The view of 'nature-miracle' at the root of Sanday's position will be examined in the following section, but meanwhile two considerations may be urged in criticism of this depreciation of the bodily resurrection. (1) It is no doubt true that faith to-day is to be exercised directly in the Exalted and Glorified Lord, but our faith must ultimately rest on historical fact, and it is difficult to understand how Christian faith can ever be really indifferent or 'agnostic' with regard to the facts about the empty tomb and the Risen Body, which form so essential a part of the apostolic evidence. To make the belief in the physical resurrection of merely temporary significance—to set the Apostolic Church agoing—while now it may be cast aside as 'no longer necessary,' is to spurn the ladder by which we have risen to our Christian faith and to leave this faith 'in the air.' It is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive how faith in an Exalted Lord could ever have been attained if the fact of the bodily resurrection of Jesus had not first been recognized. It is founded basally on the belief that the resurrection of Jesus was the actual raising in glory and power of that which was sown in dishonour and weakness; and faith can never be indifferent to this its historical foundation. (2) To sit loose to the bodily resurrection of Jesus is to do less than justice to the fullness of the apostolic representation of the essential constitutive significance of the Resurrection for the Christian faith (see above, IV. ii.). The rising of Jesus from the grave was for the Apostle at once the guarantee and the ground of the Christian's full redemption and immortality, body as well as spirit having its place in the renewed Kingdom of God, 'who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory' (Ph 3rd). If the body of Jesus rotted away in the grave, then what guarantee have we that material forces are not after all supreme, and that Christ is indeed Lord over all, in nature as well as in grace, Lord of life and of death? The Resurrection-Body is indeed not the same natural human body that was laid in the grave. It is this body so changed as to be described as a 'spiritual' body, but this is very different from representing it as simply dropped and lost, left behind in the grave to see corruption. The plain question to be answered is, Was the body of Jesus left lying in the tomb on the hillside of Jerusalem, or in some other tomb, or was it not? If it was, what then? Let us suppose it to be firmly established that, instead of being raised, the body of Jesus was for some reason removed from the tomb in which it was first laid, and buried elsewhere, and that this or something like this is all the ground there is, beyond the pious imaginations of the disciples, for the belief that the body of Jesus was raised from the grave. On this supposition the apostolic doctrine of redemption becomes seriously attenuated, and our Christian faith turns out to be a very different thing from what it was for the early Church.

The view under criticism is really based not so much on a scientific examination of the historical evidence as on a dogmatic or philosophical attitude which, while seeking to preserve what is essential to Christian faith, could sacrifice the supernatural in the physical realm as being what Herrmann explicitly calls it, 'a great hindrance to men to-day' (*Communion*², p. 80) in the way of accepted Christianity. That this is so is recognized with characteristic frankness by Sanday in this pamphlet. It is professedly because he finds the evidence on behalf of the bodily Resurrection unsatisfactory that he ranges himself with the 'modernists' in doubting the fact. But this denial or minimizing of the bodily Resurrection is made, he recognizes, in an apologetic interest, viz. of commending Christianity to the 'modern mind' by removing what he calls 'the greatest of all stumbling-blocks,' in the way of its acceptance, the admission of miracle in the physical realm. 'I know,' he says, 'that the suggestions I have made will come with a shock to the great mass of Christians; but in the end I believe that they will be thankfully welcomed. What they would mean is that the greatest of all stumbling-blocks to the modern mind is removed, and that the beautiful regularity that we see around us now has been, and will be, the law of the Divine action from the beginning to the end of time' (Bishop Gore's Challenge to Criticism, p. 30). The ground of this repugnance to the recognition of the physical supernatural or 'nature-miracle' will be considered in the following section.

LITERATURE.—On the Spiritual-Significance Theory see J. H. Skrine, Miracle and History, London, 1912; J. Orr, The Christian View of God and the World, Edinburgh, 1893, lect. vi. note C (p. 512 ff.); D. W. Forrest, Christ of History and of Experience, do., 1914, p. 153 ff.; B. Lucas, Fifth Gospel, London, 1907, p. 160.

4. The 'supernatural-without-miracle' theory.—The real motif of all theories which attempt to explain the apostolic belief in the Resurrection without accepting the full apostolic representation of the fact is the repugnance to the admission of the supernatural in any specific or unique sense in the physical realm. This is the presupposition or præjudicium lying behind and determining the attitude of modern thought to the evidence; so that the fundamental apologetic problem to-day in connexion with the Resurrection is, as it has been in all ages, the problem of the supernatural. The latest evidence of this is the attitude of Sanday to the bodily Resurrection as definitely elicited by his controversy with Gore. His 'entire and strong belief in the central reality of the . . . Supernatural Resurrection' Sanday affirms (Bishop Gore's Challenge, p. 28); but he claims that this need not involve the admission of the 'nature-miracle' of the resuscitation of the Body from the tomb. Sanday adopts the old distinction between contra naturam and supra naturam miracles. The latter, the 'healing-miracles' of the Gospels, 'were abundantly accounted for by the presence in the world of a unique Personality, and by that wave of new spiritual force which flowed from it in ever-increasing volume. They involved no real breach in the order of nature' (p. 24). The 'nature-miracles' of the Gospels, however, with the bodily resurrection of Jesus as the supreme instance, are represented as not merely thus supra naturam but as contra naturam, involving a 'definite reversal of the natural physical order' (p. 23). The conception of 'nature-miracles' 'took its rise in the region of the Old Testament' through the influence of myths or legends gathering round great personalities in a pre-scientific age and 'perpetuated itself in the New Testament' (p. 27). But the admission of such miracles is contrary to the postulate of modern science, the uniformity of nature, 'the beautiful regularity that we see around us . . . the law of the Divine action from the beginning to the end of time' (p. 30), and must be dropped. So the watchword of much current Christian apologetic in its attempt to recommend Christianity to the 'undetermined' is 'the supernatural without miracle.' This is the point of view represented in an extreme form by J. M. Thompson's Miracles in the New Testament (London, 1911).

At the root of this modern repugnance to the supernatural in the physical region lies the conception of miracle as a 'violation of natural law,' or 'a breach in the order of nature.' This is the view of miracle which, e.g., controls Schmiedel's negative criticism. 'By miracle we here throughout understand an occurrence that unquestionably is against natural law' (EBi iv. 4040). This is the view which already underlay Hume's famous argument in his essay 'On Miracles' (Essays, Moral, Political and Literary, 2 vols., ed. London, 1907) as to the insufficiency of evidence for the alleged Gospel miracles in face of our experience of the regularity of nature, and of the notorious fallibility of human testimony to extraordinary events. 'A miracle is a violation of the laws of nature; and as a firm and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined' (ii. 93). He takes the Resurrection as his typical example. 'It is no miracle that a man . . . should die on a sudden: because such a kind of death . . . has yet been frequently observed to happen. But it is a miracle, that a dead man should come to life; because that has never been observed, in any age or country' (ib.). Briefly, it is contrary to experience that a miracle should be true, but not contrary to experience that human testimony should be false (cf. ii. 105).

While the 'healing' miracles of the Gospels, or most of them, may be scientifically explicable in accordance with laws recognized by modern science (what M. Arnold called 'moral therapeutics'), the 'nature-miracles,' with the bodily Resurrection as the supreme instance, are ruled out as violations of natural law. This objection to nature-miracles, however, goes back to a view of nature and natural law which, as the offspring of a mechanical view of the world, is now obsolete, yet which continues to influence thought in subtle ways. If nature be regarded as a closed mechanical system owing its origin, it may be, to the creative power and wisdom of the Divine, but now a self-sufficient, self-running order bound together by iron bonds of natural law, then what we call 'miracle' can be conceived only as an intervention from without, an inroad or intrusion into an ordered and complete mechanical whole. But if nature, as a more adequate philosophy is now teaching us, and as science itself is increasingly recognizing, is no such closed mechanical system shut in upon itself, but alive, moving, a growing organism, a process of creative evolution; if its laws are not ultimate realities or entities which bind the universe into a changeless mechanism of material forces, but simply modes of the Divine activity, forms of God's self-expression—then a very different conception of miracle presents itself. The distinction between 'natural' and 'supernatural' becomes a distinction between lower and higher forms of Divine activity. What is called the 'natural order' is God's basal method of working in the world, the indispensable condition of all stable rational experience. What are called the 'laws of nature' are the general laws of sequence based on past observation and experience of the Divine working on this basal level—'a convenient shorthand method of summing up our existing knowledge'—whereby we can say that if the same conditions are fulfilled the same results will follow. In this sense nature is 'uniform' or 'regular.' If the conditions are changed, however, and new forces are introduced whereby a new level of Divine working is brought about, the ordinary laws of nature are not violated or contradicted but transcended, their action is controlled or modified for higher ends. Standing at the lower level and without experience of the higher, the new experiences may seem to contradict what is natural at that level, to be in that sense contra naturam, while really, as St. Augustine long ago pointed out, being only 'contrary to nature so far as yet known' ('non contra naturam, sed contra quam est nota natura' [de Civ. Dei, xxi. 8]). From the point of view of the physical order the phenomena of organic nature and still more of self-conscious personality will appear as if they contradicted the laws of that order. They would be contradictory only if these laws were assumed to be final and ultimate instead of being means to ends beyond themselves.

Apply this to the nature-miracles of Jesus, and in particular to His bodily resurrection. If we regard Jesus of Nazareth as one whose life moved wholly on the plane of our ordinary human experience, the contra naturam argument might be urged with plausibility. But in Jesus, as the narratives present Him, we have a new phenomenon in human history, unique in His character, person, and work. He stood in the midst of a sinful world, the alone sinless One, living in perfect communion with God, and claiming a unique relation to God and man—a claim which He substantiated in the experience of those who submitted themselves to Him, making them veritably 'new creations.' This is a miracle in the moral and spiritual sphere as wonderful as any alleged miracle in the physical. It is a new departure in human history—in this sense 'contrary to experience'—so that we cannot criticize Him by the light of any canons drawn from our past experience of ordinary humanity. In the case of such a new phenomenon we should antecedently expect that He would manifest Himself in new and unfamiliar ways. 'As with the appearance of man there were introduced new powers and properties unimaginable from the animal point of view and therefore from that point of view seemingly supernatural—so with the appearance of the Christ we ought to expect new powers and properties unimaginable from the human point of view and therefore to us seemingly supernatural, i.e. above our nature' (J. le Conte, Evolution in Relation to Religious Thought, London, 1888, p. 362).

Human personality is a unity in which spiritual and material are organically connected and mutually dependent, the spirit moulding the body and the body in turn influencing the spirit. Sin, accordingly, is a fact which though primarily moral and spiritual—a matter of the will—yet extends to and includes the physical as well, moral and physical mingling with and reacting on each other till the entire resultant may be spoken of as 'the body of this death'—a complex whole in which it is impossible to disentangle the spiritual element from the diseased conditions and perverted functions of organ and tissue, which personal and ancestral sins have brought about' (Illingworth, Divine Immanence, p. 92). In like manner sinlessness is a fact which, though primarily moral and spiritual, concerns the physical as well, a sinless soul carrying with it as its correlative an unstained body. It may be 'contrary to experience,' as Hume says, that a human body should rise from the dead; it is contrary to our experience, that is to say, of ordinary human bodies, the bodies of sinful men. But in the case of a sinless personality like that of Jesus we have a fact so transcending ordinary experience that no amount of evidence drawn from such experience can warrant us in laying down beforehand how nature will react on such an one. It may be as normal for a sinless man to rise from the dead as it is for the bodies of sinful men to remain in the grave. At all events our modern scientific knowledge of the mutual interdependence of spirit and body makes it a priori probable that one who like Jesus was not holden of sin should also not be holden of death. Without this the manifestation of His triumph over sin would be incomplete. But more than this. Jesus claimed not only to be sinless Himself but to have come into the world to destroy the dominion of sin in others. He stood over against men the alone sinless One claiming to have power to forgive and to redeem, and, in manifestation of His power to rectify the whole disorder caused by sin and restore the entire personality of man, body as well as soul, to God's plan for it, He performed works of healing on the body. His healing of the one He connected with His forgiving of the other as parts of the same redemptive work. Of this redemptive Lordship, His own bodily resurrection was at once the consummating manifestation and the final guarantee; so that being such an One as He was and proved Himself to be per ejus beneficia 'it was not possible that he should be holden of death' (Ac 2³⁴).

It is in the light of these considerations that the physical Resurrection becomes credible, and even antecedently probable. It is not an isolated abnormal incident in an otherwise normal career. 'If the Resurrection were alleged to have occurred abruptly in the middle of a series of events which passed on slowly to their consummation unaffected by its interruption . . . then we might have paused in doubt before so stupendous a miracle, and pleaded the uniformity of nature against the claims of such an event upon our belief' (Westcott, Gospel of the Resurrection, p. 105). But the Resurrection is the resurrection of Jesus, and, as such, an event at once with unique antecedents and unique consequents. Its context on either side is miraculous. It is the culmination of a unique human life, a life which was a moral miracle constituting a break in human experience, and making such a physical miracle as the Resurrection altogether natural and congruous; a life too which was represented as the consummation of God's purposes in all previous human history—for this is the essential meaning of the appeal to prophecy made by the apostles. Then there are the unique consequents of the fact—and the nature of a cause becomes apparent only in the effect—the rise of the Christian Church as a new and ever-increasing power in history constituted in the continuous miracle of Christian history and experience. It is when we consider the Resurrection thus in its context that we see the naturalness and congruousness of the fact. As the consummation of the Incarnation and the means of realizing its purposes, the Resurrection is at once an end and a new beginning. 'To this fact all former history converges as to a certain goal; from this fact all subsequent history flows as from its life-giving spring' (ib. p. 104). And so, taking all the evidence together—evidence converging and cumulative—it is not too much to say with Westcott that 'there is no single historic incident better or more variously supported than the resurrection of Christ' (p. 137).

REVELLING.—'Revelling' is the tr. of κῶμος (perhaps from κείμαι) in Ro 13¹³ (RV), Gal 5²¹, 1 P 4³. The Greek word denoted also a band of revellers. The κῶμος was a characteristic feature of Greek life. There was (1) the more regular and orderly κῶμος, the festal procession in honour of the victors at the games, partaking of the nature of a chorus. Most of Pindar's odes were written to be sung at κῶμοι of this sort. And there was (2) the riotous κῶμος, the nocturnal procession of revellers, who ended their carousal on a festival-day by parading the streets with torches in their hands and garlands on their heads, singing and shouting in honour of Bacchus or some other god, and offering wanton insult to every person they met. In later Greek mythology, as we learn from the Elkbores of Philostratus (3rd cent. A.D.), Comus was the god of festive mirth. Milton calls him the son of Bacchus and Circe, and puts into his mouth the words :

'Meanwhile, welcome joy and feast,
Midnight shout and revelry,
Tipsy dance and jollity.

'What hath night to do with sleep ?'
(Comus, 102 ff.).

With such pagan ideas in mind, St. Paul urges the Romans to 'walk becomingly (εὐσχημόνως), as in the day; not in revelling and drunkenness' (Ro 13¹³). See R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, London, 1876, § lxi., and art. DRUNKENNESS.

REWARD.—It will be convenient, in the course of this article, (1) to define the usage of the term; (2) to indicate its occurrence in the apostolic writings; (3) briefly to set forth the place of this conception in the apostolic teaching.

1. The verb 'to reward' is capable of neutral usage; it may mean to give in return evil as well as good (cf. Ps 74 35¹² [AV]). But the usual meaning of 'reward' as a noun is an equivalent return for good. A 'reward' is a thing that carries with it the idea of gain, profit, or remuneration. The present discussion will confine itself to this view of the word and will endeavour to indicate the place which 'reward,' in the sense of payment or wages, holds as a factor in the Christian life.

2. The usual word in the NT for 'reward,' in the sense of hire or wages for work, is μισθός. It is so used by St. Paul (Ro 4¹, 1 Co 3⁸⁻¹⁴ 9^{17, 18}). In 1 Ti 5¹⁸ (quoting Lk 10⁷) RV translates 'hire.' In Ja 5⁴, 2 P 2^{13, 15}, and Jude 11 RV also translates by 'hire.' But in 2 Jn 8, Rev 11¹⁸ 22¹² the rendering is again 'reward.' St. Paul also twice uses the late, non-classical compound αντιμισθία, which in each case RV translates 'recompense.' This expression is neutral in meaning, for in Ro 12⁷ the allusion is to due recompense of error; in 2 Co 6¹³, on the other hand, it is to corresponding enlargement of heart in response to the Apostle's affection.

The normal verb to express reward, in the sense of equivalent payment, of either good or evil is αποδίδωμι. This occurs in NT passim, and is the basis of the substantive which occurs only once in the NT as used by St. Paul in Col 3²⁴, when, in urging slaves to single-hearted service, he says that they shall receive from the Lord την ανταπόδοσιν της κληρονομίας (RV 'the recompense of the inheritance'). This word is frequent both in LXX and in classical Greek. It occurs also in inscriptions and papyri (cf. Moulton and Milligan, Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, pt. i., London, 1914, s.v.).

From a combination of μισθός and αποδίδωμι we get the late and non-classical compound μισθαποδοσία, which word (with its corresponding μισθαποδότης, He 11⁶) occurs in Hebrews only (2² 10³⁵ 11²⁶) and nowhere else in the Greek Bible. RV translates μισθαποδότης by 'rewarder,' but μισθαποδοσία in each instance by 'recompense of reward.' The word is employed in a neutral sense, for 2² refers to the consequences of transgression and disobedience, while 10³⁵ refers to the consequences of Christian παρησία, and 11^{6, 26} refer to the reward of faith and faithful endurance. In fact, the word emphasizes the exact requital of either good or evil by a sovereign judge.

The word μισθαποδοσία does not occur in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. The Pauline αντιμισθία appears now and then in 2 Clement (i. 3, 5, ix. 7). In xi. 6 it is coupled with a quotation from He 10²³, πιστὸς γὰρ ἐστὶν ὁ ἐπαγγελλόμενος τὰς ἀντιμισθίας ἀποδίδονα ἐκάστῳ τῶν ἔργων αὐτοῦ. xv. 2, speaking of faith and love, says, ταυτην γὰρ ἔχομεν τὴν ἀντιμισθίαν ἀποδοῦναι τῷ Θεῷ τῷ κτίσαντι ἡμᾶς.

ἀνταποδότης occurs in Ep. Barn. xix. 11 and Didache iv. 7, in the same phrase in both places: οὐ διατάσεις δοῦναι οὐδὲ διδοὺς γογγύσεις 'γνώση γὰρ τίς ἐστὶν ὁ τοῦ μισθοῦ καλὸς ἀνταποδότης'.

μισθός is of fairly frequent occurrence in contexts suggesting reward or requital. Perhaps the most interesting for the present purpose are 1 Clem. xxxiv. 3 and Ep. Barn. xxi. 3, in both of which the allusion is to Is 40¹⁰: Κυριος μετὰ ἰσχυος ἐρχεται . . . ἰδοὺ ὁ μισθὸς αὐτοῦ μετ' αὐτοῦ. The same idea is expressed in Ep. Barn. iv. 12: ἐκαστος καθὼς ἐποίησεν κομείσται.

3. The foregoing investigation has been concerned with the words usually employed by the apostolic writers to express the idea of requital in general and of reward in particular. The general idea of requital does not come up here for discussion. It may suffice to say that the idea of judgment, with the view that a man's works, the general moral tenor of his life, is the standard by which he will be judged, is the consistent doctrine of Scripture throughout. The more immediate question is the place which the idea of reward holds in the apostolic teaching—the conception of the Christian life as a service rendered for which payment will be received.

It may be said that the conception of reward may be traced throughout the apostolic writings, the later as well as the earlier, and that, presumably, it reproduces the teaching of our Lord. That it formed part of His teaching is undeniable (cf. Mt 6⁴ 16²⁷). It is sometimes suggested that the holding forth of reward is not the highest ground of appeal for virtuous action, and that our Lord's words here were conditioned by the exigencies of addresses to a popular audience. Without raising the question whether 'virtue for virtue's own sake,' in total abstraction from all thoughts of consequences of any kind, is a thing really conceivable by any human intelligence, it may be asserted that the idea of reward as employed by Christ requires neither extenuation nor apology.

He came to proclaim the Kingdom of God. The relation of the members of that Kingdom to God is one of service, a service involving the corresponding idea of reward. This idea of service is in no way incompatible with that of sonship; a son as well as a subject must serve. It should also be remembered that reward, so far as it appears in Christ's teaching, is conceived not quantitatively but qualitatively. The reward for which the disciple looks is simply the completion of his salvation. In all his service and all his sacrifice for the Kingdom he is moved by the desire for participation in the completed Kingdom. His reward lies in the attainment of that for which he has striven, and any other motive destroys the value of his service.

In fact, the idea of reward is entirely legitimate and appropriate when we remember in what the reward consists. It might be thought, for example, that the Johannine conception of salvation as eternal life, a life developing by its own inner necessity, would exclude the idea of reward. But in the Johannine writings, along with the idea of life, we have that of keeping Christ's commandments. From this point of view the idea of service appears, and with it the presence of an impulse, which is provided by the promised reward. What is the reward? Simply closer union with Christ. 'He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself unto him' (Jn 14²¹): 'if ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love' (15¹⁰); 'ye are my friends, if ye do the things which I command you' (15¹⁴). A reward for service, which consists in abiding in Christ's love, needs no apology, but may well stand as the highest conceivable motive to action. The reward may be otherwise expressed as honour bestowed by the Father (cf. Jn 12:44²⁶, a passage which comes into close contact with the Synoptic presentment of the matter in Mt 10:32, Lk 14:11). It is the teaching of the Fourth Gospel, as quoted above, that forms the background to the passage in 2 Jn 8, 'Look to yourselves . . . that ye receive a full reward.'

None of the various Greek words for 'reward' occurs in 1 Peter, but the general idea of the consummation of all things as a 'reward' to faith holds here, as it does in the teaching of Jesus; cf. 1³, 'receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.' This is the object of the 'hope' to which repeated allusion is made. Here, too, the reward is homogeneous with the service; it simply consists in this, that faith is recognized, and receives glory, praise, and honour at the return of Christ (1⁷). This is expressed in more figurative fashion in 5⁴ as 'the crown of glory that fadeth not away.' It is quite true that life is viewed in this Epistle as a matter of Divine grace and Divine calling (cf. 5¹⁰); but there is no inherent contradiction. The promised gift of grace is also viewed as a reward when the conditions for its attainment are admitted to have been fulfilled.

The fact is that the Christian salvation may be viewed under various aspects, which are not contradictory but mutually complementary. It is a life, it is sonship, it is membership in a kingdom, it is service; and with the last there goes, indissolubly, the idea of reward—a reward consisting in fuller life and opportunity for more faithful and loving service, with the Divine approbation and benediction. It is interesting to note that 2 Clem. iii. 3, speaking of Christ's confession of His faithful followers before the Father, says, οὗτος οὐκ ἐστὶν ο μισθὸς ἡμῶν. When these considerations are borne in mind, any seeming difficulty in St. Paul's language tends to disappear. He undoubtedly speaks of reward, and at first sight he may appear to conflict with his own doctrine of justification by faith. But justification is a past act resulting in a present state. It pertains to the beginning of the Christian life. That life is one of action and of service, and the service is inspired by the hope of the reward. In Ro 2:6¹ (quoting Pr 24:12) St. Paul says that God 'will render to every man according to his works: to them that by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honour and incorruption, eternal life.' The conception of μισθός appears in 1 Co 3:12-15. The man whose work stands the test of the fire will receive his reward; the man whose work is destroyed will, apparently, though saved himself, lose his reward. The μισθός here does not appear to be identified with salvation, but more particularly with the opportunities of higher service as distinct from the man's own personal salvation. In 1 Co 9:17, 18 the Apostle comes more closely to the general NT idea of the μισθός. The 'pay' that he prefers is the continued opportunity to preach the gospel without pay. The opportunity for fuller service is the reward. It is in no way inconsistent with this that he regards those who have believed through him as his 'crown' (1 Th 2:19, Ph 4¹), and that, sharing the idea of St. James (1:1-), St. Peter (5:4), and the Seer of the Apocalypse, he looks on to 'the crown of righteousness' that awaits him (2 Ti 4:8). So in Col 3:24 the faithful and single-hearted slave will receive a 'reward' consisting in the Divinely promised inheritance.

It is quite mistaken to regard St. Paul's language about rewards as a piece of earlier Judaism persisting in his Christian teaching, in which it forms an intractable and contradictory element. It presents no fundamental opposition whatever to his cardinal doctrine of justification by faith.

It remains to say a word about the language of Hebrews at this point. One great aspect of Christianity, as depicted in this Epistle, is that it is the fulfilment of the Divine promises. But here again, in so far as the receiving of the promises is connected with the performance of the duties of the New Covenant, it may be regarded as wages or reward; hence the use of μισθοδοσία in 10:35. So in 11:6 God is conceived as the μισθοδοτής of those who seek for Him. It was the μισθοδοσία for which he looked that nerved Moses to be 'evil entreated with the people of God' (11:25). And even in the case of Jesus Himself, the idea of reward is not alien: 'Who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross' (12:2).

The idea of reward accompanies, almost of necessity, belief in a personal God. Viewed as the apostolic writers were taught by our Lord to view it, it is the loftiest and most potent incentive to holiness of life.

RHEGIUM (Ῥήγιον, now Reggio).—Rhegium was an ancient Greek colony, mainly of Chalcidians, in the south of Italy. Commanding the southern entrance to the Sicilian Straits, it had great strategic importance, and willingly or unwillingly played a part in many wars. For a time it held its own among the leading cities of Magna Græcia, but in revenge for a slighted offer of friendship it was totally destroyed by Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse (337 B.C.). From this calamity it never quite recovered, but it profited by fidelity to Rome in the Punic Wars and to Augustus in the Civil Wars. Re-peopled by the Emperor, it assumed the name of 'Rhegium Julium.' Strabo, in the beginning of our era, speaks of it as 'tolerably well peopled,' and as one of three cities founded by the Greeks in Italy—the others were Neapolis and Tarentum—that had not become barbarian, i.e. lost the language and manners of their mother-country (VI. i. 6). Since 134 B.C. it had a further importance as the terminus of the Via Appia, which branched from the Via Appia at Capua and traversed southern Italy. The actual place of crossing to Messina (now Messina) was, and still is, about 8 miles north of the city, at Columna Rhegina (ἡ Ῥηγίαν στυλῆς), now Villa San Giovanni, where the channel is only 5 miles wide.

In view of the destruction of Reggio by earthquake in 1908, when 35,000 out of 40,000 inhabitants perished, Strabo's words, with their curious mingling of fact and fancy, are striking. 'It was called Rhegium, as Eschylus says, because of the convulsion which had taken place in this region; for Sicily was broken from the continent by earthquakes. . . . But now these mouths [of Ætna, the Lipari, and the neighbouring islands] being opened, through which the fire is drawn up, and the ardent masses and water poured out, they say that the land in the neighbourhood of the Sicilian Strait rarely suffers from the effect of earthquakes; but formerly all the passages to the surface being blocked up, the fire which was smouldering beneath the earth, together with the vapour, occasioned terrible earthquakes' (VI. i. 6).

To indicate the course of St. Paul's ship from Syracuse to Rhegium, St. Luke, who was evidently impressed by the good seamanship of the crew, uses a nautical term (περιελθόντες) which has perplexed exegetes (Ac 28:13). Probably it means 'by tacking.' This explanation was suggested by J. Smith, who writes, 'I am inclined to suppose that the wind was north-west, and that they worked to windward' (The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1880, p. 156). This tr. is now generally adopted in place of 'we fetched a compass' (AV) or 'we made a circuit' (RV). The alternative reading in N⁸B—περιελόντες, 'casting loose'—was probably due to copyists who were not at home in the language of men of the sea. Arriving at Rhegium, the crew had to wait a day for a favourable wind. If the north-west breeze was still blowing, they could not go through the Straits, where there is scarcely enough sea-room for successful tacking; but when the wind veered to south they ran before it to Puteoli, a distance of 180 miles, in little more than a day (28¹³).

RHODA (Ῥόδη, 'rose').—After St. Peter's miraculous deliverance from Herod's prison he went to the house of Mary the mother of Mark. When he had knocked, a young girl called Rhoda came to listen. In her joy at the sound of St. Peter's voice, she forgot to open the door, and, returning to report his presence, she was accused of being mad, but persisted in her declaration (Ac 12¹³⁻¹⁵). Nothing further is known of her. The name was a common slave name, and she may have been a Christian slave in the home where we find her.

W. F. BOYD.

RHODES (Ῥόδος).—When St. Paul, in his voyage from Troas to Caesarea, touched at the island of Rhodes (Ac 21¹), 12 miles from the S.W. corner of Asia Minor, he was in sight, if only for an evening and morning, of a beautiful city which was for centuries the capital of one of the noblest free States of ancient Greece. 'With regard to harbours, roads, walls, and other buildings, it so far surpasses other cities, that we know of none equal, much less superior to it' (Strabo, xiv. ii. 5). Highly favoured by Nature—'the sun shines every day in Rhodes,' said an ancient proverb (Pliny, HN ii. 62)—it owed still more to the naval enterprise, political wisdom, commercial integrity, and artistic genius of its people. On an amphitheatre of hills it was as carefully planned in 404 B.C.—by Hippodamus of Miletus, who also laid out the Piræus—as a modern garden-city. Occupying so central a position in the world that geographers reckoned from it their parallels of latitude and longitude, it succeeded in making itself a focus of the traffic of three continents. After the time of Alexander the Great, it was the first naval power in the Aegean, and its code of mercantile law was regarded as an ideal for all other States. Its opulence was merited by its humanity. 'The Rhodians, although their form of government is not democratic, are attentive to the welfare of the people, and endeavour to maintain the multitude of the poor. . . . There are public officers in the State, the function of whom is to procure and distribute provisions, so that the poor may obtain subsistence, and the city not suffer for want of persons to serve her, especially in manning her fleets' (Strabo, loc. cit.).

Such a commercial centre naturally attracted a colony of Jews, and about 139 B.C. Rhodes was one of the many free States to which Rome is said to have addressed a letter in favour of that race (1 Mac 15²³). Rhodes alternately benefited by the deserved favour and suffered from the unworthy jealousy of the Romans. For assisting them in their war against Antiochus the Great, she received (189 B.C.) a large part of Lycia and Caria, but when she began to be dreaded as a possible rival of Rome itself, she was not only shorn of these possessions, but nearly ruined in her commerce by the raising of her rival Delos into a free port. In the Mithridatic war her services to Rome were again so signal, and she won so much glory by successfully resisting a great siege (88 B.C.), that she recovered some of her lost territory and all her former prestige. Finally, however, for taking Caesar's part in the Civil War, she was so severely punished by Cassius, who robbed her of her whole fleet (43 B.C.), that she never again attained her old prosperity. Vespasian made the island a part of the province of Lycia.

Rhodes was the city of the famous Colossus. Two specimens of her art are the Laocoon and the Toro Farnese. Her coins, with the Sun-god on the one side and the Rose on the other, are among the most beautiful in existence. Rhodes acquired a new fame in the Middle Ages as the home, for two centuries, of the Knights of St. John.

RICHERS.—See WEALTH.

RIGHT.—Three terms translated 'right' in the EVV call for notice.

1. εὐθύς ('straight') expresses pictorially the simplest notion, which also underlies the Eng. term 'right,' being especially used in connexion with 'way' or 'path' (Ac 13¹⁰, 2 P 2¹⁵). A transitional use, carrying an ethical sense, occurs in Ac 8²¹: 'thy heart is not right' (εὐθεία).

2. δίκαιος comes into use when the notion of 'right' emerges on the ethical plane. Whatever accords with established custom (δίκη), with a recognized norm, is δίκαιον. That norm is found in the common ethical judgment of men; but the NT accentuates the norm as fixed by God (Ac 4¹⁹). And ultimately the only true δίκαιον 'in the sight of men,' is τὸ δίκαιον, 'in the sight of God.' That is the element of truth in 'vox populi vox Dei.' In every conceivable position and relation in which a man finds himself there is a course of action or a state of being for him which is as it should be: the one straight line of conduct amongst many more or less crooked. This is τὸ δίκαιον, what it is right for a man to do or be.

3. ἐξουσία ('a right').—The idea of 'a right' easily grows out of the foregoing. It is the power or liberty to be, do, or possess what it is δίκαιον for a man in such and such circumstances to be, do, or possess (cf. 1 Co 9¹², He 13¹⁰, Rev 22¹⁴). (Regarding ἐξουσία as = 'authority to rule,' note that all such authority, to be worth anything, must rest on τὸ δίκαιον as its basis.)

Discussions as to the 'rights' of Christians as such soon emerged in the primitive Church. In the NT see especially St. Paul's illuminating treatment in 1 Co 8-10. The widest, boldest claim is made as regards these rights (πάντα ἔχειν), only to be qualified immediately by a severe reference to the bearing of their exercise on others. Higher ethical judgments, too, may under certain circumstances demand the waiving of undoubted rights. See, e.g., how St. Paul deals with the question of marriage, and especially with that of ministerial stipends (1 Co 9).

J. S. CLEMENS.

RIGHTEOUSNESS.—The term 'righteousness' does not convey a very definite or even a very attractive meaning to the reader of modern English, and the meaning which it does convey is only part of the full significance which the Greek term (δικαιοσύνη) would carry for a Christian reader in the Apostolic Age. In ordinary speech, a man is not usually called 'righteous'; the term has a certain formality and archaic flavour about it. But when he is, it means that he is just, that he will observe the moral code strictly, or that he will be punctilious in the discharge of such obligations as are incumbent on a man in his position. A 'righteous' man will be high-principled, but the adjective suggests limitations. It does not necessarily follow that he will be kind or affectionate. As a matter of fact, we speak of a man as 'just but not generous,' and 'righteous' has come upon the whole to be associated with 'just' in this connexion. A person who is 'righteous' is estimable rather than attractive. It is curious that once at least in the NT we come across a similar use of the Greek equivalent, in St. Paul's remark: 'Why, a man will hardly die for the just (ὁ ἄριστος)—though one might bring oneself to die, if need be, for a good man' (ὁ ἀγαθός, Ro 5⁷). Here there certainly seems to be an implied distinction between the 'righteous' or 'just' man and the 'good' man; the former lacks those qualities of human kindness and affection which enable the latter to inspire enthusiasm and devotion in others. It is one thing to be scrupulous in respecting the rights of others, or even, as perhaps St. Paul meant, in fulfilling one's religious duties; it is another thing to have an instinctive sense of helpfulness and beneficence. The godly man may not be particularly human or humane. Even when he is, his beneficence sometimes lacks the warmth and heart which the 'good' man puts into his relations with others.

'He that works me good with unmoved face,
Does it but half: he chills me while he aids,
My benefactor, not my brother man!'

What Coleridge describes in these words resembles the character of the righteous or just man as distinguished from the good man. If we take Cicero's definition of the good man as 'he who assists those whom he can, and hurts nobody' ('vir bonus est is qui prodest quibus potest, nocet nemini' [de Officiis, iii. 15. 64]), we get a similar stress upon the positive and active interest of the good man in his fellows, as opposed to the more negative attitude associated with 'righteous.'*

But this is merely one of the meanings of 'righteousness' in the literature of the Apostolic Age. The Greek term δικαιοσύνη is employed by St. Paul in a technical sense, and by him and other writers in a variety of non-technical senses. One of the latter has just been noted, and, before passing on to the technical Pauline sense, it will be well to survey the other passages in which it is employed by him and later writers of the Apostolic Age without any specific theological reference.

1. Non-technical use of the term in apostolic literature (including St. Paul).—The usage of the term in 2 Cor. is particularly instructive. The verb 'justify' does not occur in this Epistle, but, as we shall see, one of the profoundest passages on righteousness in its technical application to the doctrine of justification falls within the scope of this letter. Yet side by side with this lie two non-technical meanings of the term.

(a) One of these is δικαιοσύνη in the sense of almsgiving, which it had already begun to acquire. In urging the Corinthians to be prompt and generous with their contributions to his fund for the relief of poverty among the Palestinian Jewish Christians, he quotes the LXX version of Ps 112⁹ and applies it to the situation of his readers (9⁹): 'as it is written, He scatters his gifts broadcast to the poor, his charity (δικαιοσύνη) lasts for ever. He who furnishes the sower with seed and with bread to eat will supply seed for you and multiply it; he will increase the crop of your charities (τὰ γενήματα τῆς δικαιοσύνης ὑμῶν). In this use of the term we can overhear the meaning which it had begun to gather in the religious ethic of Judaism (as early as the period of Sirach), where almsgiving or charity was regarded as so characteristic an expression of the truly pious life that δικαιοσύνη could be used as an equivalent for it upon occasion. Rabbinic piety now and then made this a feature of the imitatio Dei, as in the well-known saying* of Rabbi Chama ben Chaninah (Sota, 14a): 'As He clothes the naked (Gn 3-1), so do thou clothe the naked; as He nurses the sick (Gn 18¹), so do thou nurse the sick; as He comforts the mourners (Gn 25¹¹), so do thou comfort the mourners; as He buries the dead (Dt 34⁵), so do thou bury the dead.' In other directions, it fitted in with the stress on charity as one of the surest means of acquiring merit before God. 'Almsgiving is a strong mediator between the Israelites and their Father in heaven; it brings the time of redemption nigh' (Baba Bathra, 10a). This still prevails in popular Islam. C. M. Doughty, speaking of his hospitable host Maatuk, observes that 'if the camels came home he milked a great bowlful for the stranger, saying, it was his sadaka, or meritorious human kindness, for God's sake.'† As the context indicates (see v. 6: 'he who sows generously will reap a generous harvest'), St. Paul thinks of δικαιοσύνη here in the sense of an action (or rather, a character in action)* which is pleasing to God, because it harmonizes with the Divine nature; bountiful, generous actions done to others will enrich a man with God's bounty as nothing else will. St. Paul would have been the last to teach any doctrine of charity as a merit, on which one could base some claim to God's approval. But he is free to recognize that such spontaneous expressions of kindness and mercy between man and man are inspired and rewarded by God.

(b) The other general sense is reflected in 6⁷⁻¹⁴. In the former passage St. Paul, speaking of his methods in the Christian propaganda, claims that he employs 'the weapons of integrity for attack or for defence,' where δικαιοσύνη, as the preceding words indicate ('the holy Spirit, unaffected love, true words, the power of God'), is opposed to foul play, misrepresentation, and rancour; in evangelizing and in controversy, even when controversy is personal, he professes to be clean and honest. The second reference opposes δικαιοσύνη to iniquity or unregulated conduct, almost as goodness to wickedness: 'What have righteousness and iniquity in common, or how can light associate with darkness?' 'Morality' would be inadequate here, for what St. Paul has in mind is the religious life, but it is the religious life as expressed in conduct; he is certainly not using δικαιοσύνη in the technical sense in which he employs it elsewhere. 'Conduct is the word of common life,' says Matthew Arnold, 'morality is the word of philosophical disquisition, righteousness is the word of religion' (Literature and Dogma, ed. London, 1883, p. 16). It is in this sense, or in the allied sense of integrity, that it occurs in the Pastoral Epistles§ (e.g. 1 Ti 6¹¹, 2 Ti 2²² 3¹⁶ 4⁸), as well as in Eph 4²⁴ 5⁹ 6¹⁴. Similarly, the technical usage in Philippians is accompanied by the non-technical expression in 1¹¹, where the Apostle prays that the life of these Christians may be 'covered with that harvest of righteousness which Jesus Christ produces to the glory and praise of God.' This is equivalent to 'the harvest of the Spirit' (Gal 5²²), the good character produced by the influence of Christ or of the Spirit.

We have, indeed, no exact equivalent in English

* Quoted in S. Schechter's Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, London, 1909, p. 202 f.

† Arabia Deserta, 2 vols., London, 1888, ii. 273.

‡ Cf. the splendid description of δικαιοσύνη in Job 29^{14c}, as social justice and goodness. The mere fact that πρᾶξ often came to be rendered by ἐλεημοσύνη in later Judaism shows that δικαιοσύνη as a social virtue was far removed from our modern associations of 'righteousness.'

§ In Tit 3⁸—God saves us in sheer pity, 'not for anything we had done ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ,' and justifies us (the only reference to justification in the Pastorals) by His grace.

* There is an excellent note on this in Lightfoot's Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1895, p. 236 f. In Ro 7¹²—the command is holy, just (δικαία), and for our good (ἀγαθή)—ἀγαθός has the same sense of 'beneficent.'

for what δικαιοσύνη meant to a Greek or to a primitive Christian, especially if he had been born in Judaism. 'Righteousness' is too formal and abstract in its associations for a modern mind; 'justice,' again, is too narrow and, like 'integrity' and 'morality,' it is insufficiently charged with religious feeling. The technical Pauline content of the term especially spills over when it is emptied into any of these modern words. They occasionally reproduce the sense of the Greek word in non-technical passages, but even in its restricted sense of political virtue, as applied to the man who obeys the law or who is a good citizen of the State, the term had impressed Aristotle, four centuries earlier, with its variety of meaning (Nic. Eth. v. i. 7),* and when it passed into the vocabulary of Judaism and of early Christianity its range became still wider, stretching from 'justice' across a broad field of meaning to 'piety' or 'goodness.' It may sound like a confession of defeat to say that we cannot reproduce the word precisely in English. But it is something gained, at any rate, to realize that the conception, even in St. Paul, is not stereotyped, and that the Apostle uses it in more senses than one. Much of the investigation into the Pauline usage has been vitiated by the assumption that the term invariably represented a single, well-defined idea in the writer's mind. St. Paul was not the slave of words, even of a great religious word like δικαιοσύνη. If his arguments on righteousness are sometimes puzzling, it is rather because he overtaxed this term and its family; he forced them to serve a variety of purposes, some of which were not obviously relevant to their original object and contemporary employment.

Like Jesus, though more often, he uses 'righteousness' for the religious ideal, the relation to God in which all devout persons seek to stand. Thus, in Ro 9³⁰⁻³¹ he writes: 'Gentiles who never aimed at righteousness have attained it—that is, righteousness by faith; whereas Israel who did aim at the law of righteousness [i.e. at some code or rule which would lead to righteousness] has failed to reach that law. And why? Simply because Israel has relied not on faith but on what they could do.' Similarly in the next section (10³⁻¹¹): 'They would not surrender to the righteousness of God [i.e. to the righteousness which alone God will have and give], because they were ignorant of his righteousness [their zeal was not according to knowledge, v. 2] and therefore essayed to set up a righteousness of their own. Now Christ is an end to law, so as to let every believer (emphatic, as opposed to the man who relies on what he can do in the matter of obedience to law) have righteousness. Moses writes of law-righteousness: anyone who can perform it shall live by it.† But here is what faith-righteousness says: Confess with your mouth that Jesus is Lord, believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead;‡ and you will be saved; for with his heart man believes and is justified, with his mouth he confesses and is saved. No one who believes in him, the Scripture says, will ever be disappointed.'

These passages bring out two features of St. Paul's conception: (1) the contrast between God's righteousness and the religion which men make sincerely and passionately for themselves, and present as their own to God ('a righteousness of their own' here is equivalent to 'a legal righteousness of my own' in Ph 3⁹); and (2) the remarkable substitution of Christ for the Torah as the means of establishing a right relation to God, involving so supreme and novel a conception of faith that St. Paul speaks of devotion to the Torah as though it really did not make faith count at all.* But, over and above these characteristics, it is noticeable that, probably owing to the particular argument he has in hand, he retains the classical term 'righteousness' for the great end which men sought by right and wrong ways of religious discipline.

Even in more general passages, 'righteousness' is the direct opposite to 'sin' (cf. Ac 13¹⁰, 2 Co 11¹⁵). Thus in Ro 6¹², 'you must not let sin have your members for the service of vice; you must dedicate yourselves to God as men who have been brought from death to life, dedicating your members to God for the service of righteousness' (and similarly in vv. 18-20). The expression in Ro 8¹⁰ is less obvious. When St. Paul says that 'the human spirit is alive διὰ δικαιοσύνην,' does he mean, as in ch. 6, 'for the sake of righteousness' (i.e. to practise righteousness), or 'as the result of righteousness' (i.e. of the new, vital relation to God which the Divine righteousness has created through Christ—the thought of 5¹⁷⁻¹⁸)? Probably the latter is uppermost in his mind. In Ro 14¹⁷, however, we have the term used in what is apparently a more restricted sense: 'the reign of God is not a matter of eating and drinking; it means righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit.' As peace is defined immediately to mean harmony and good feeling between members of the Church (v. 19), the likelihood is that righteousness denotes primarily either integrity or just dealing as an expression of the Christian spirit (so Clem. Rom. lxii. 2), the very opposite of 'injuring your brother' (v. 13). The larger interpretation of the three terms is not, of course, to be ruled out, especially as all three have been already conjoined in 5¹, and as the distinctively religious basis would never be far from St. Paul's mind. But the context (v. 18, 'he who serves Christ on these lines') suggests that the stress falls upon what may be called, for the sake of convenience, though inaccurately, the 'ethical' bearings of righteousness and peace at any rate. (It is quite unlikely, however, that St. Paul had in mind the saying of Mt 6³³, 'Seek God's reign and his righteousness.') Matthew Arnold has somewhere described this verse as one of the texts in shadow, which ought to be brought into prominence to correct materialistic, popular views about the Kingdom of God. But this was not St. Paul's point, even on the 'ethical' interpretation of his words; he was not opposing conduct to supernaturalism in thus defining the nature of the reign.

In the cognate sense of justice, i.e. of the moral goodness which makes an authority act fairly and impartially, δικαιοσύνη for the Greeks was not only a human but a divine virtue. There is a remarkable passage in Plutarch's Life of Aristides (6) which brings out this usage of the term. Plutarch observes that the justice of Aristides was what impressed his contemporaries most, and won for him 'that most royal and divine title of "the Just".' He then proceeds to moralize upon the disinclination of men to imitate and reproduce this quality of the divine nature. The quality of incorruption (ἀφθαρσία) and eternity (τὸ αἰδίον) they envy and felicitate God on possessing; the quality of power (τὸ κυρίον καὶ το δυνάτον) they dread and fear; they love and honour and revere the deity for his δικαιοσύνη, and yet, Plutarch sadly reflects, the first of these three emotions, the passion for immortality ('of which our nature is not capable'), is the strongest, while the divine αἰετις, i.e. justice, which alone of the divine excellences is within our reach, commands least interest.

* He regards δικαιοσύνη as (α) complete virtue, in the general sense of obedience to law, and (β) as a special part of virtue, viz. fairness or equity.

† The original implies that this is quite possible (Lv 18⁵; cf. Bar 4¹⁶: 'this is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever; all they that hold it fast are to live, but such as leave it shall die'), but the present writer translates as above in order to suggest St. Paul's meaning, viz. that it had been proved impossible.

‡ This cardinal note of saving faith, viz. belief in Jesus as the risen Lord, was what St. Paul found already adumbrated in the faith of Abraham (Ro 4¹⁷⁻²⁴). In the OT, as in the NT, faith is elicited by, and directed towards, 'a God who makes the dead live.'

* E.g. Gal 3²³⁻²⁵, where the coming of faith, faith in Jesus Christ, marks an epoch after the regime of the Law.

... is a striking speciality of men in authority, and his use of the term in the Epistle to the Jews (1st), where the writer quotes Ps 45 as a description of the Messianic King, "Thou hast loved justice and hated lawlessness," and later on (7th) recalls the meaning of Melchizedek's

After St. Paul, the idea of righteousness ceases to occupy any special position in the apostolic literature; the term either echoes his technical usage, though this is rare, or is employed in one or other of its general meanings. The sole occurrence in the Fourth Gospel (16th) is remarkable, because it gives a turn to the word which is unfamiliar even to St. Paul. One of the three converging lines along which the Spirit, acting through the Church, confounds and condemns the unbelieving world is the witness to the Resurrection, which proves that Christ was not a blasphemous Messianic pretender, as the Jews held, but innocent, just, acting according to the Divine will. 'He will convince men of righteousness, because I go to the Father and you see me no more.' The overcoming of death by Jesus, which is testified by the presence of His alter ego, the Spirit, in the Church, is a convincing proof that He was 'right' in His claims, and that Christians who believed in Him, not the Jews who murdered Him, were 'righteous,' i.e. fulfilling the Divine will. The obscure line from the primitive hymn quoted in 1 Ti 3⁶, 'he was vindicated by the Spirit' (δικαιώθη ἐν πνεύματι), probably is an allusion to this point of view.[†] It is singular that this is the only NT application of the OT sense of the phrase, which meant the open vindication of Israel, by some signal act of Divine favour, before the nations who had been scoffers and persecutors.

The justification of Jesus came up, however, not long afterwards in a different form. Trypho told Justin (Dial. 67) that if Christians could prove from Scripture that Jesus really was the Messiah, it would be better to argue that He deserved this honour on account of His dutiful obedience to the rites and regulations of the Law than that He owed it to a legendary virgin-birth. Justin's reply is that Jesus was circumcised and obedient to the other ordinances of the Mosaic code, but 'not as if He were justified thereby.'

Justin's position is practically that of Mt 23; Jesus fulfils every religious requirement (ἵνα δικαιώσῃ) of the Law, but only as that is part of His obedience to the Father. It is noticeable, in this connexion, that St. Paul never speaks of Jesus Christ as 'righteous,' nor of His righteousness, although this was a familiar predicate of Messiah not only in the OT but in the later Judaism, especially in the Enochic Parables, where righteousness is one of the leading characteristics of Messiah as well as of the saints. Messiah as Son of Man is 'born to righteousness' (ἔτι 14) and possesses it as an essential quality of His nature; it is primarily the virtue of a conqueror, who establishes the right and vindicates the faithful by demonstrating the strong anti-Divine powers of earth; but it is ἡλικία to be more than the equipment of the Divine champion or law-giver, and (cf. Test. Judaei, xxiv. 1) it is associated with sinlessness as well as with wisdom or knowledge. Even when St. Paul speaks in terms of this militant Messianism (e.g. 2 Th 1-2), he refrains from calling Jesus 'The Righteous One.'[‡] Otherwise, he describes Him as 'born under the law' and as serving the Jews on earth in fulfilment of God's promises; in Ph 2nd he does not suggest that the obedience of Jesus under the Law amounted in any sense to 'justification,' or even to the maturing of character outlined in He 5th. His large use of 'righteousness' did not include any reference to the sinlessness which he presupposed in the Son of God.

The crisis of the Pauline struggle with the Law is so far behind that the author of 1 John feels at

* Similarly, in the only reference to a Divine δικαιοσύνη in Revelation (18th), the Messiah discharges the two-fold function of a Semitic king—he 'rules and makes war justly' (ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ βασιλεύει καὶ πολεμεῖ) in the Apocalypse (e.g. 13th 16th 19th), in the OT sense of vindicating the saints and punishing the wicked persecutors.

† This does not corroborate the hypothesis that St. Paul regarded Jesus as Himself justified by His resurrection, i.e. that the latter proved Him to be vindicated as sinless by God, so that Christians who identify themselves with Him by faith show and appropriate the same justification. Had St. Paul conceived the matter thus, he would have spoken of Christians being 'justified with Christ.' But he never uses this phrase.

‡ Unless we group with it 1 P 2nd.

§ St. Luke makes him use the term in Ac 22nd; otherwise, it is confined to Stephen (Ac 7th), Peter (1 P 2nd), and John (1 Jn 2nd).

liberty (cf. Rev 22nd) to use a legal phrase like 'doing righteousness' (cf. Ps.-Sol. ix. 9: 'he who does righteousness is treasuring up life for himself with the Lord'). Its associations were as old as the Greek Bible, and evidently it could no longer be misunderstood (cf. Clem. Rom. xxxi. 2, etc.). Thus in 2nd and 3rd the 'doing of righteousness' is a synonym for the 'doing of God's will';* it is at once the expression and the evidence of regeneration, and consequently the antithesis to 'committing sin.' It is possible that the stringent tone of these sayings about the ethical bearing of 'righteousness' was called out by some antinomian movement which disparaged mere morality in the interests of a Gnostic superiority, or by a local abuse of the Pauline teaching. Certainly the latter is the case in the Epistle of James, e.g. 2nd. The idea that belief justified by itself would not have been suggested, so far as we know, by any Jewish type of piety. The formalism† against which the writer feels it necessary to warn his readers arose from an exaggeration and misapprehension of the Pauline antithesis‡ between faith and works—an antithesis which was coined by St. Paul. Hence 'faith' in St. James is closer to a confession of monotheism (cf. 2nd) than to the Pauline conception. This is not affected by the reference in 2nd. St. James can conceive the existence of a faith which is devoid of any practical element, requiring the breath of 'works' to vitalize it: 'As the body without the breath of life is dead, so faith is dead without works' (2nd). From the Pauline standpoint, the reverse would be more true: it is faith that vitalizes works. But 'works' are moral actions for St. James, not legal observances. The entire omission of any reference to the Law in this section of his Epistle is significant. It corroborates the impression that justification means for him God's recognition of moral conduct, not the free forgiveness of sins, which according to St. Paul made any Christian character and conduct possible. The only allusion to δικαιοσύνη is in the OT quotation (2nd), from which he draws the inference that Abraham's righteousness rested not on his faith alone but on his act of practical obedience in being prepared to sacrifice Isaac. When he says elsewhere that 'human anger does not promote divine righteousness' (1st), i.e. the religion of which God approves, and that 'peacemakers reap righteousness' (3rd) as the harvest of their quiet efforts in the Church, he is illustrating the wrong and the right ways of promoting the religious life; δικαιοσύνη is employed in its familiar and normal sense to denote the devout life of goodness as that is lived under the standard and scrutiny of God (cf. Ac 16th: 'he who reverences God and lives a good life—εὐσεβέως δικαιοσύνη in any nation is welcomed by him'), and the writer urges that wrangling and angry controversy are not a soil which can be expected to foster the growth of spiritual religion (δικαιοσύνη = 'cet état normal auquel Dieu prend plaisir et auquel le chrétien doit tendre' [E. Reuss, Les Epîtres catholiques, Paris, 1873, p. 139]). The second of these phrases is paralleled by the expression in He 12th, where those who are trained by the discipline of God 'reap the fruit of it afterwards in the peace of an upright life' (καρπὸν εὐπρεδίας . . . δικαιοσύνης); here δικαιοσύνη includes participation in the holiness of God's nature (v. 10) as the characteristic of personal religion, and the peace is primarily harmony with His purpose, an absence of friction and fretting, although the further thought of harmony within the community is soon developed (v. 14). Neither here nor elsewhere in Hebrews do we find δικαιοσύνη used outside the non-technical range of meaning. In 11³³ 'wrought righteousness' means 'administered justice,' and in 5¹³ the term is not far from what a modern would call moral truth,* as the context proves (v. 14). Similarly in Ac 24²⁵: when St. Paul made Felix uneasy by preaching 'about δικαιοσύνη and self-mastery and the future judgment,' it was not the δικαιοσύνη of Ro 1¹⁷ but the morality demanded by God (cf. Ro 2²⁸). The only exception is the isolated echo or adaptation of the Pauline phraseology in He 11⁷, where Noah is said to have inherited 'the righteousness that follows faith' (τῆς κατὰ πίστιν δικαιοσύνης). Noah is passed over by St. Paul, but Philo had already noted that he was the first man to be called δίκαιος in the OT, and although the writer of Hebrews carries back this title of honour to Abel (v. 4), he signalizes the faith of Noah as the reason why he obtained the position of δίκαιος before God. The non-technical use of Pauline language here tallies with the fact that the writer does not work elsewhere with the Pauline categories of faith and justification. Noah had faith, acted on it, and thus was entitled to the position of δίκαιος. The idea is closer to St. James than to St. Paul.

* When Mt 7th is quoted in 2 Clem. iv. 2, 'ἡ ἐκείνου ἐστὶν ἡ θέλησις' is similarly substituted for 'the will of my Father.'

† Thus Clem. Rom. xxx. 3 can even say, 'we are justified by deeds (ἔργων) not words.'

‡ For a different view, cf. B. Eartmann's paper on 'St. Paulus und St. Jacobus über die Rechtfertigung' in Evangelische Studien, H. J. (Freiburg i. B., 1907) 301, 148 L., and S. Harbmann's discussion in J. M. A. Vacant and E. Mangenot's Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, H. J. [1913] 70 L.

In Rev 19⁸ the white linen in which the Bride of Messiah is allowed to array herself for the marriage is defined as 'the righteous conduct (δικαιωματα) of the saints,' i.e. of the faithful who are personified as the Bride. The plural is curious; it recalls the plural use of δικαιοσύναι, e.g. in (the Greek of) Sir 44¹⁰ and Pss.-Sol. ix. 6 (cf. 2 Es 7³³), as acts of righteousness (charity). But St. Paul uses the singular in Ro 5¹⁸ of a righteous act, and the plural actually occurs in Bar 2¹⁹, the famous protest against the doctrine of the zechuth of the Fathers (see below). The absence of the doctrine of justification by faith from the Apocalypse made it less difficult for the writer to adopt such language without fear of being misunderstood. He emphasizes as usual that moral purity and activity are the conditions of future bliss, but no one who read his pages could suspect him of reducing the religious life to moralism. The figure of speech is as old as Job 29¹⁴, Is 61¹⁰, Pss.-Sol. xi. 8, and Sir 27⁸, but the words of Bar 5⁴ ('O Jerusalem . . . cast round thee the tunic of the righteousness that is from God') are a specially apt parallel. The last-named passage, which predicts that in the Messianic Age Jerusalem's name is to be 'the peace of righteousness,' illustrates the original background of allusions like He 12¹¹; vindicated Israel, triumphantly justified by God over her persecutors, will enjoy peace. It was a short step to the moralization of this, and to its application to the religious experience of δικαιοσύνη in the present.

In 1 Peter, the just judgment of God brings out the thought of the moral order as a warning against careless conduct on the part of Christians (1¹⁷) and as a consolation for the innocent who may have to suffer unjustly, like Jesus (2⁻³); but the term 'righteousness' † is employed only in its general, non-technical sense (2²⁴ 3¹⁴), as repeatedly in the Apostolic Fathers (e.g. Barn. iv. 12, etc.). The same is the case* in 2 P 2⁵ and 3¹³ (apocalyptic sense), but in 1¹ it denotes the 'equity' of God in granting the same privilege and quality of faith to Gentiles as to Jewish believers, or to ordinary Christians as to apostles. Justin Martyr (Dial. 93 f.) quotes Gn 15⁶ for the same purpose as St. Paul does in Ro 4⁹.—to prove that Abraham's faith was prior to his circumcision—and concludes that God cannot be shown to have acted capriciously or unfairly in history, since the condition for righteousness has been the same (as Clem. Rom. xxxii. 3 f.) from the first. But, when he comes to define righteousness, he echoes the definition of Jesus rather than that of St. Paul, quotes Mt 22³⁷, and adds: 'since all righteousness is divided into the two branches of love to God and love to one's neighbour, whoever loves God with all his heart, and with all his strength, and his neighbour as himself, is truly a righteous man.' This is precisely the definition of the commandment of δικαιοσύνη given by Polycarp (ad Phil. iii. 2).

The language of the Odes of Solomon recalls partly the OT and partly the NT, though it never quotes from the latter. The Divine righteousness succours the elect (viii. 22) and their righteous cause triumphs over spiritual evil (viii. 6 f.); in this OT sense, righteousness can be spoken of as man's as well as God's. It is even personified, like Victory, and represented as conferring the everlasting crown of truth upon the pious (ix. 7-10). The allusion in xxix. 5 is obscure; if verse 6 ('For I believed in the Lord's messiah . . .') is a (Christian) interpolation, then the words 'He brought me up out of the depths of Sheol; and from the mouth of death He drew me; and thou didst lay my enemies low, and He justified me by His grace' might denote, as in viii. 6, the vindication of the Christian or of Messiah (cf. above, p. 373), but probably the Ode is a unity and refers to the experience of spiritual victory (see Rendel Harris's ed., Cambridge, 1911, p. 61, and E. A. Abbott's Light on the Gospel from an Ancient Poet, do., 1912, p. 247 f.), like the still more obscure reference to justification in xxxi. 5. The singer, in xvii. 2, is 'justified in my Lord,' i.e. freed from the bondage of vanity and error; the expression is Pauline but not the content, and in xxv. 10 the more congenial OT significance recurs ('I became holy by thy righteousness; and all my adversaries were afraid of me . . . and I was justified by His gentleness'), righteousness being the saving strength of God exerted on behalf of His own. One of the repeated sources of ambiguity in the interpretation of the Odes is the uncertainty as to who is the speaker—the soul of man, Truth, or the Christ. In xli. 13 Christ is distinctly described, however, as 'exalted by His own righteousness,' and the Divine title of 'The Righteous One' occurs in connexion with the Crucifixion in xlii. 3 (though not in Frankenberg's reconstruction of the text), but it is not so clear whose Heart pours out 'as it were a gushing stream of righteousness' (xxxvi. 7). In the only ethical allusion (xx. 3), the OT colouring leaves it uncertain whether the hymn-writer, in saying that 'the sacrifice of the Lord is righteousness, and purity of heart and lips,' meant by 'righteousness' works of mercy and charity (see above, p. 371), or, in the more general sense, goodness inspired by the Golden Rule.

Ignatius quotes Mt 3¹⁰ in Smyrn. i. 1, but the term and the idea have no place in his theology.† Polycarp uses the word more frequently; he quotes Mt 5¹⁰ in ad Phil. 2 and 2 Co 6⁷ in iv. 1, he employs

* The present writer prefers this interpretation of λόγος δικαιοσύνης to the interpretation of von Soden ('richtiger Rede') and Reuss ('l'enseignement complet'), though the latter can also support itself on Greek usage.

† In Ac 17³¹, the only place where it occurs in St. Paul's speeches, it is in a quotation from the Psalter (Ps 98)—'he has fixed a day on which he will judge the world justly (ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ)' by a man whom he has destined for this' (i.e. Jesus).

* Noah is 'the herald of righteousness' (2⁹), as in the Jewish tradition of Jubilees (vii. 20 f.) and Sibylline Oracles (cf. p. 433) e.g. he preaches to his wicked contemporaries.

† The phrase in ad Phil. viii. 2 ('that I may be justified by your prayers') seems to refer to martyrdom.

δικαιοσύνη to bring out the general idea of Christian goodness (iii. 1, 3, ix. 1 f.), he echoes St. Paul in speaking of Christ as 'our righteousness' (viii. 1: 'let us hold fast by our hope and the pledge of our righteousness, that is, of Christ Jesus who bore our sins in his own body on the tree, who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth, who endured all things for our sakes, that we might live in him'), and once speaks of God's righteousness, though not in the Pauline sense (v. 2: 'likewise the deacons must be blameless before his righteousness,* as servants of God and Christ, not of men'). God's righteousness here probably means His searching presence, before which Christians must eschew sin, just as in En. ci. 1-9 it denotes the Presence which ought to inspire fear and reverence in men ('Observe the heaven, ye children of heaven, and every work of the Most High, and fear ye him and work no evil in his presence. If he sends his anger upon you because of your deeds, ye cannot petition him; for ye spake proud and insolent words against his righteousness: therefore ye shall have no peace. And see ye not the sailors of the ships, how their ships are tossed to and fro by the waves, and are shaken by the winds, and are in sore trouble? . . . Do not the sailors of the ships fear the sea? Yet sinners fear not the Most High!'). On the other hand, St. Paul's very language is echoed, and his ideas reproduced, in the Epistle to Diognetus, 9—one of the passages in the so-called Apostolic Fathers which send the surge of genuine religious feeling straight into the mind of a modern reader. 'So, having himself planned everything together with his Son, he permitted us during the time before to be swept along by disorderly impulses just as we chose, carried away by pleasures and passions—not at all because he delighted in our sins, but because he was forbearing [ἀνεχόμενος; cf. ἀνοχῇ in Ro 3²⁵: below, p. 388], not because he approved of that period of iniquity, but because he was fashioning [δημιουργῶν] this present period of righteousness in order that we, whose very actions then proved us unworthy of life, may now be [made? counted?] worthy of it by God's goodness, and may be enabled by God's power to enter the Kingdom of God after we had made it plain that by ourselves we could not. When our iniquity was full, and when it had become perfectly plain that the recompense of punishment and death was awaiting it [this corresponds to the Pauline philosophy of history in Gal 4¹, Ro 5⁶; see below, p. 389], and when the time came which in God's purpose was to manifest his goodness and power (O the surpassing kindness and love of God!), instead of hating us, rejecting us, or bearing malice against us, he was long-suffering, he bore with us, he took our sins upon himself in pity, and gave his own Son to be a ransom for us, the holy for the wicked, the innocent for the evil, the just for the unjust, the incorruptible for the corruptible, the immortal for the mortal. What else but his righteousness could cover our sins? By whom, save only by the Son of God, could we be justified [δικαιωθῆναι: either 'made just' or 'acquitted'], wicked and impious as we were? Oh sweet exchange! O inscrutable creation [δημιουργία]! O benefits unlooked for! That the wickedness of many should be hidden by [ἐν] a single righteous One, that the righteousness of One should make many wicked righteous [δικαιῶσις as above]! The use of δικαιοσύνη in this fine outburst of faith recalls both senses of the term. On the one hand, it denotes generally the Christian religion, and this is repeated at the close of the next chapter, where the writer tells Diognetus that, when he sees what the real fire of hell is like, he will count

* Cf. En. liii. 7, 'before his righteousness' (i.e. his holy presence).

Christian martyrs blessed who 'endure the temporary fire for the sake of righteousness.' On the other hand, we find the term used specifically in a Christological sense. The latter usage reaches back to St. Paul, and to it we may now turn, i.e. to δικαιοσύνη, as something more than a particular virtue or grace of the Christian life, or even than a generic term for Christian goodness.

2. Technical Pauline use of the term.—

The small group of words connected with righteousness in the specific sense of the term is as follows: δικαιοσύνη or 'righteousness' is the state of those who are δίκαιοι ('just')* because they have been 'justified' (the verb is δικαιοῦν, -οῦσθαι) by God, and their acquittal or justification is δικαιοσις. The declaration of this verdict is sometimes taken to be the meaning of δικαίωμα, but in Ro 5¹⁶ it is probably equivalent to δικαιοσις, and in Ro 3¹³ it means the 'act of redress' which makes acquittal possible. The latter sense develops the Greek usage, which, according to Aristotle (Nic. Eth. v. vii. 7), employed δικαιοπραγία as the opposite of ἀδικημα and reserved δικαίωμα for the rectification of an unjust action (το ἐναντιόωμα του ἀδικήματος).

The phrase 'righteousness of God' occurs in 2 Co 5²¹, Ro 11⁷ 35.21 22 (twice) 33²⁶ (twice) 10³ and Ph 3⁹ (δικαιοσύνη ἐκ θεοῦ). The phrase 'righteousness of faith' occurs in Ro 4¹¹ 13 93⁹ (δικαιοσύνη ἐκ πίστεως) 10⁸ (δικαιοσύνη ἐκ πίστεως) and Ph 3⁹ (δικαιοσύνη ἐν τῇ πίστει). The former is an OT expression, although some of the LXX translators seem to have avoided it as far as possible. St. Paul stamps it afresh, and he coins the cognate expression, 'righteousness of faith.' In neither case is there any subtle difference of meaning suggested by the addition of ἐκ; it merely emphasizes the fact implied in the simple genitive, that the δικαιοσύνη originates with God. The life He possesses, He imparts to men, and therefore δικαιοσύνη may be said to be 'His' in either sense. Whether we start from the idea of δικαιοσύνη in itself or from that of faith, it is plain that St. Paul could have neither thought nor spoken of any such standing or relationship except as one of experience, a position of life resting on the attitude of God to sinful men in Jesus Christ.

Instead of discussing seriatim the succession of conflicting views of righteousness in St. Paul's theology, we shall prefix some characteristic definitions and descriptions, in order to indicate the main outlines of debate, and the various attempts which have been made to extricate a meaning from the labyrinth of this problem.

(i.) 'This δικαιοσύνη Θεοῦ . . . is . . . the adequate relation founded in God's own nature, in which, as the idea of legal requirement, man has to stand towards God' (F. C. Baur, Paulus, Eng. tr., vol. ii. p. 136). It is 'the way opened up by God for this purpose' (ib. footnote).

(ii.) 'The true relation between God and man, which, being ordained by God, presents itself to the consciousness of man as a new religious principle, as a new regulator of his religious behaviour, and to which man has to submit himself, by allowing his attitude towards God to be determined by this divinely ordained principle' (O. Pfleiderer, Paulinism, Eng. tr., London, 1877, vol. i. p. 175).

(iii.) 'The highest religious-ethical ideal, the realization of which every religion must ultimately strive after, because it is only in consequence of its realization that man knows himself to be standing in that right relation to God which guarantees his salvation' (B. Weiss, Lehrbuch der biblischen Theologie des NT, Eng. tr., vol. i. p. 317 n.).

(iv.) 'Righteousness is nothing else than moral goodness regarded in its intrinsic worth or acceptableness . . . viewed relatively to God's judgment or approval of it' (J. H. Newman, Lectures on the Doctrine of Justification, London, 1874, p. 107).

(v.) 'This righteousness which comes from God by faith is not a more or less relative perfection which God realizes in man, but consists in this, that God, as the consequence of faith, replaces man in normal touch (rapport normal) with himself' (Goguel, L'Apôtre Paul et Jésus-Christ, p. 29).

(vi.) 'This righteousness obtained by man through Christ is designated the righteousness of God, not merely to denote that it is valid in His sight, or that He recognizes it as equivalent to the fulfilment of the law . . . but to show that this righteousness is produced and constituted by God as a state which He Himself can alone impart' (C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i. 2 [London, 1897] 167).

(vii.) 'This righteousness exists already in God as an attribute and active force; it is transferred to man, and realized in him by the action of Divine grace.' It 'is more than a simple acquittal of the guilty; it is an actual power (δύναμις Θεοῦ), which enters into the world and is organically developed there,—like the power of sin, but in opposition to it' (A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., pp. 288, 299).

(viii.) 'Paul's starting-point, it cannot be too often repeated, is the idea of righteousness'; 'the righteousness of God'; a sense of conformity with the divine moral order, the will of God, a sense of harmony with this order, of acceptance with God' (Matthew Arnold, St. Paul and Protestantism, London, 1857, pp. 44, 41 f.).

(ix.) 'The righteousness of faith is the divine righteousness

* But St. Paul prefers to call them δικαιοθῆντες rather than δίκαιοι. He does not even call Abraham δίκαιος.

which a man receives when he receives Christ. It is not a mere declaration by God that the sinner is justified or forgiven for his past sins and accounted righteous without regard to his actual character; it is not a mere status into which he is introduced by such declaration, but it is at bottom the real righteousness or the righteous nature which is bestowed upon the believer by God' (A. C. McGiffert, History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 142 f.).

(x.) 'Righteousness is an objective condition of mankind transferred into this condition by an act of God . . . an objective righteousness which by the grace of God is imputed to the man who believes in God's grace in the cross of Christ, although he is actually still sinful' (C. Holsten, Das Evangelium aes Paulus, vol. ii, p. 65).

(xi.) 'God's righteousness is not only judicial righteousness but also the righteous attitude of God, corresponding to his nature, which in virtue of his faithfulness to his promise is made accessible to men in the gospel, so that they too share in his righteousness' (P. Feine, Theologie des NT, p. 343 f.).

(xii.) 'There are two great facts which correspond to the doctrine of righteousness by faith, which is also the doctrine of the universality of the Gospel: first, the vision which the Apostle saw on the way to Damascus; secondly, the actual conversion of the Gentiles by the preaching of the Apostle. Righteousness by faith, admission of Gentiles, even the rejection and restoration of the Jews, are—himself under so many different points of view' (B. Jowett, The Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans, London, 1894, ii. 255).

(xiii.) 'It is unbiblical, then, to assume that between God's grace or love and His righteousness there is an opposition, which in its bearing upon the sinful race of men would lead to a contradiction, only to be solved through the interference of Christ. The righteousness of inexorable retribution, which would be expressed in the sentence Fiat justitia, pereat mundus, is not in itself a religious conception, nor is it the meaning of the righteousness which in the sources of the Old and New Testaments is ascribed to God' (A. Ritschl, Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, Bonn, 1832-83, Eng. tr., ii. [1900] p. 473).

(xiv.) 'The Pauline conception of righteousness is not juristic but ethical, and he does not recognise as proceeding from God's nature of holy love any contradiction of righteousness and grace which must be removed by a satisfaction of the former' (W. Beyschlag, NT Theologie, Eng. tr., vol. ii, p. 137).

(xv.) 'The righteousness of God . . . its intrinsic meaning is God's own eternal righteousness, revealed in Christ for reconciling the world to himself, rather than (as commonly interpreted) the forensic righteousness (so-called) imputed to man' (J. Barnaby, on Ro 1¹, in Pulpit Commentary, London, 1890).

(xvi.) 'I know that by the righteousness of God is sometimes meant that of which God is the author, and which he bestows upon us; but here the only thing meant is, that being supported by the expiation of Christ we are able to stand at the tribunal of God' (Calvin, on 2 Co 5-1).

This catena is representative so far, that it illustrates the two-fold tendency, since Baur, to re-state the older Reformed idea of an objective righteousness, and on the other hand to moralize the conception. But the more recent movements of criticism (see Literature) have been specially swayed by an emphasis on the eschatological element and an attempt to establish some organic connexion between the Pauline and the OT conceptions. Cremer's monograph is of special value, in both directions, for its independent re-statement on the lines of Ritschl.

3. Technical Pauline use of the term 'God's righteousness.'—(a) Origin and meaning.—The phrase 'God's righteousness' or 'a righteousness of God' is one which St. Paul has charged with a special meaning. The Greek words δικαιοσύνη θεού are sometimes employed in another sense—e.g., as we shall see, in Ro 3²⁵, where they denote His justice or moral equity, and in 3⁴, where they similarly express the thought of His justice or faithfulness to His word.* But in a central group of passages they bear a technical meaning. One set of passages within this group connects the Divine righteousness closely with the Person of Christ (1 Co 1³⁰, 2 Co 5²¹, Ro 3²²⁻²⁶); another set presents the thought in a less definite connexion (Ro 1¹⁷ 10³). What is common to all, however, is the presupposition that this righteousness, this state of acceptance with God, this right relationship between the righteous God and sinful men, is brought about by God. It is not the goal of a laborious quest of man for God. The initiative is with Him. That is what the genitive signifies. He wills, He creates, He bestows, this bliss. 'It is all the doing of God' (2 Co 5¹⁸). When St. Paul speaks of righteousness as 'God's,' in opposition to a righteousness which is man's ('their own,' 'my own,' see below), he has the same religious interest as the Johannine theology in speaking of the new birth. The origin of the Christian life lies in the will of God as a will of life for man. 'The righteousness which consists not in what we do but in what we are, is the righteousness of faith,' and what we are, we are by the grace of God. It is He who sets us in this new, vital relationship, by pardoning us for Christ's sake.

* In relation to the special problem (resumed afterwards in 9-11) of God's attitude towards Israel. The rejection of Christ by individual Israelites means their rejection by God, but not any refusal of God to fulfil His word and obligations to Israel as a whole. Again, no one (Jew) has the right to plead that because his wrong-doing serves to bring out the Divine consistency and faithfulness, it is unfair of God to punish him (cf. A. Robertson in The Thinker, iii. [1893] 429 f.). Here the Divine πίστις, δικαιοσύνη, and ἀλήθεια are all practically synonymous. The quotation in 3⁴ is the nearest approach, in St. Paul's Epistles, to the idea of God being justified, which is so characteristic of the Psalms of Solomon (e.g. ix. 8), where the saints humbly acknowledge that He is just even as He chastises them.

P. Wernle, who laments St. Paul's doctrine of justification by faith as 'one of his most disastrous creations' (Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr., London and New York, 1903-04, i. 309), admits that its misleading husk contains the great and profound thought that 'God is our Father, who freely gives to us whether we deserve it or not, and that we men, just as we are, are His children, living by His love.' Jowett's essay on 'Righteousness by Faith' (The Epistles of St. Paul to the Thess., Gal. and Rom., ii. 247-272) is not one of his strongest pieces, but it equally penetrates to this thought as one of the ethical contributions of the doctrine to the religious life. In Exp. 8th ser., iv. [1912] 252-262, J. Oman emphasizes the same aspect. It is one of the points at which St. Paul's subordination of the Βασιλεία or malcuth doctrine to that of the zecuṭh turns out to be a real parallel to the teaching of Jesus, who subordinated the zecuṭh idea to that of the malcuth. St. Paul's category is closer to the Rabbinic standpoint, but the conception of God as the gracious Giver breaks through until it answers to that of the Father, in the teaching of Jesus, who takes the initiative by sending the Son and setting up the Kingdom for men on earth. For some other aspects of this parallel, see W. Sanday's article on 'St. Paul's Equivalent for the Kingdom of Heaven,' in JThSt i. [1899-1900] 481-491.

It is this interest that made the legal phraseology about faith being 'reckoned as righteousness' by God so attractive to St. Paul. The status of being right with God was something which men owed to Him, not to themselves; it depended on His verdict, on His gracious assurance that He was prepared to treat them as 'righteous.' But in several ways the Apostle shows that the status was more than a legal fiction. In itself, 'the idea of righteousness as dependent on a divine judgment (δική) could only have arisen on the basis of legalism, while at the same time it points beyond it' (Skinner, ICC, 'Genesis,' Edinburgh, 1910, on Gn 15⁶).^{} It points beyond legalism in St. Paul from various aspects. The God who thus reckons men righteous is a Giver, not a Judge, not even a Law-giver. The basis for His reckoning is a Divine self-sacrifice, due to Divine love for men, the death of Christ, God's Son, who breaks the power of sin and death in the flesh for the doomed race of men. And the reckoning is interpreted as equivalent to forgiveness, a blissful experience (Ro 4⁸). To be treated as 'righteous' is to be pardoned and reconciled. The status is a relationship to God which means life, as opposed to the condemnation and death which are the fate of sin, i.e. of those who refuse this reconciliation and therefore have their trespasses still counted against them (2 Co 5¹⁹: 'In Christ God reconciled the world to himself, instead of counting men's trespasses against them'). Just as sin means to fall short of the Divine glory (Ro 3²³), so to receive God's righteousness is to participate in that glory—and glory, in this connexion,† is associated (cf. 2 Co 3⁶⁻¹⁴) with life. The terminology of 'righteousness' and 'justify' was not quite so well suited to bring out this positive, personal relation to God as some other phrases and conceptions which St. Paul employs, but even here he reveals now and then the deeper religious interests to which the juridical conception pointed. Thus, while the old debate whether righteousness, in the phrase 'righteousness of God,' meant an attribute of God or some quality which He imparted, whether 'God' was subjective or objective—while this was largely a philological rather than a real issue, and while δικαιοσύνη or 'justify' certainly denotes (as its opposite, κατακρίνειν, indicates) 'to consider or pronounce righteous,' not 'to make righteous,'† nevertheless when St. Paul could write to the Christians of Corinth, 'Some of you were once like that' (immoral, vicious, criminal), 'but you washed yourselves clean at baptism, you were consecrated, you were justified (ἐδικαιώθη) in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; and in the Spirit of our God' (1 Co 6¹¹), when he could speak of Christ being made 'our righteousness' by God, or of our becoming 'God's righteousness in him,'‡ it is plain that the juridical sense of a change in the position of men towards God is shading off into that of a change in the character of men.§ and that the 'righteousness' in question is not simply formal and forensic but real. It is a status, but a status 'in Christ'—which makes all the difference in the world. Justification is not followed by sanctification, in the technical sense, but accompanied by 'consecration'; it is a transformation in the attitude of God to sinners, which not only frees them from the power and penalties of sin but makes them God's very own people—not righteous as He is righteous, for (as Haring admits) that is an un-Pauline and (cf. 1 Jn 3⁷) almost an unbiblical turn of thought, but in possession of His eternal life through Jesus Christ. The objective righteousness which He has realized and revealed through the sacrificial death of His Son implies a subjective righteousness, in men, and the decisiveness with which St. Paul states the former as fundamental to the gospel must not be allowed to obliterate the fact that he recognized the latter, even in his use of juridical formulæ which lent themselves specifically to the prior truth.

* Barnabas (xiii. 7) quotes this verse as μόνος πιστεύσας ἐν τῷ θεῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην.

† The conception of 'glory' as the immortal, sinless life enjoyed by Adam and Eve in Paradise, and to be enjoyed by the faithful, underlies the Pauline usage of the term; cf. II. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, London, 1904, pp. 92 f., 301 f.

What does obscure this occasionally is the undue emphasis laid on the retributive or penal element in God's 'righteousness' as the Apostle employs that form of expression. But this is merely one element. The acquittal, for example, which is the result of Christ's death for men (Ro 5¹⁶), is opposed to doom or the condemnation of death, i.e. exclusion from the presence of God, and it therefore looks to 'life,' 'glory,' or 'salvation.' It is not enough to say that these are further stages in the process initiated by the justifying verdict; they are implicit in it. St. Paul often speaks of the latter by itself, no doubt, concentrating attention upon the Divine act of grace which inaugurates the new standing of men, but we are drawing distinctions which he never drew when we confine this initial stage to the forgiveness of sins, as if that were merely or mainly a negative boon, or to a verdict which does not carry with it the instant admission of the believing man to the life of God through Jesus Christ. Take his own explanation, e.g., of what is meant by having 'faith counted as righteousness.' To us that is apt to sound formal and forensic. There is a ring of unreality about it, in modern English. But just as to have one's trespasses 'counted against' one (2 Co 5¹⁹) means the definite exclusion of the sinner from God and his relegation to doom and death, so he who has his faith 'counted as righteousness' (Ro 4⁴) is thereby admitted to the inward experience of forgiveness, i.e. to a positive and real relationship with God. It is not simply God opening the door of the prison, though it is that; it is God bringing us out into the sunlight beside Himself. That is what 'righteousness' means, as His free gift through Jesus Christ. Similarly—to look at the same truth from another angle—the faith which justifies at the outset cannot be regarded as apart from some experience of the Spirit. Faith and revelation correspond to each other, and both are conditioned by the Spirit. The Galatian Christians, who had the Crucified Christ placarded before the eyes of their mind when St. Paul preached the gospel, began with the Spirit (Gal 3¹⁴). Their belief in the gospel message of the death of Christ started with an experience of the Spirit. Justification by faith cannot, therefore, be regarded as a preliminary stage which has a more or less negative character. The faith which mediates it for the sinner is God's action upon him, and initiates him into the new standing of grace; it is his reception into that ideal relation between God and His people which St. Paul describes from one point of view as 'righteousness.' It is called 'righteousness' because that denotes the saving, gracious relation between the two parties, and it is called 'God's righteousness' not only because He, and He alone, has the right to create it, upon the ground of Christ's death, in view of human sin, but because it is His will of love to establish it. This being so, it means life with God, life in Jesus Christ His Son. The antithesis to δικαιοσύνη is θάνατος (Ro 5¹⁻⁶), and it is impossible to overvalue the significance of this. It would be un-Pauline to say that nothing remains to be done; the justified man has a great deal to do for God, and God has a great deal still to do for him and with him. But it would be still more un-Pauline to say that anything remained to be done, even by God, in order to fill this relationship with intimate fellowship and an experience of the Spirit. 'As we are justified by faith, let us enjoy the peace we have with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have got our access into this grace where we have our standing. . . . God's love floods our hearts through the Holy Spirit given to us' (Ro 5¹²). These are the words of a man to whom justification was not a pale, formal preliminary, but a real experience which transformed the relations between himself and God, and in so doing transformed his own life into a shining light which was to shine more and more unto the perfect Day.

It is imperative, at the outset, to realize this vital character of the Divine righteousness in Paulinism.

of producing life, righteousness would have been really due to law.' But it is written over all his letters. δικαιοσύνη means σωτηρία, and this comes out (e.g. in Col 2¹²) even where the δικαιοσύνη idea is replaced by another.

* E.g. 'consecration' or ἀγιασμός, which also meant primarily a religious relation to God in which men stood as ἄγιοι, but readily suggested (e.g. 1 Th 4²) the moral implication of such a position (p. 357).

† The latter view is still held by some, on exegetical grounds (cf. McGiffert's History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, p. 1431; E. P. Gould in AJTh I. [1897] 149-155) or for more theological reasons (cf., e.g., R. C. Moberly's Atonement and Personality, London, 1901, p. 335 f., and J. Drummond in HJ I. [1902] 831, 272 ff.). But, while the protest against an extravagant interpretation of St. Paul's language is justified, the 'forensic' element is too fundamental to be ignored (cf., e.g., W. A. Stevens in AJTh I. 443-450) in favour of a 'fictitious' sense for δικαιοσύνη (F. W. Mozley in Exp, 7th ser., x. [1910] 451-503). Much of the strife and confusion arises from the tendency either to exaggerate or to ignore the distinction between a religious relation to God and a moral state, which Orientals did not find it difficult to understand.

‡ There is a verbal parallel, at any rate, in the Pharisaic En. xlviii. 7, where the righteous are said to have 'hated and despised this world of unrighteousness, and have hated all its works and ways in the name of the Lord of Spirits: for in his name they are saved.'

§ Cf. J. Weiss's notes on these passages in 1 Corinthians 9 (Meyer's Kommentar, Göttingen, 1910, pp. 41 f., 155).

¶ How naturally St. Paul assumed this may be seen in his remark (Gal 3²¹), 'had there been any law which had the power

But it is easy to misinterpret it. 'Righteousness' and 'righteous' are already OT terms for the action and character of God, and the suggestion has been made* that St. Paul employs them as the psalmists and prophets did, that by 'righteousness' in God, e.g., he means not inexorable retribution but the self-consistent and undeviating action of God on behalf of the salvation of His community, and that he posits no opposition between grace and righteousness,† the two being for him as for the OT essentially identical. As 'righteous,' God champions the interests and vindicates the character of His own people against threats and accusations. Probably this is the sense in which the Johannine theology occasionally applies the term 'righteous' to God, e.g. in Jn 17²² and 1 Jn 1⁹, where it denotes, not any rigorism, but, on the contrary, the gracious loyalty of God to His people.‡ But it is less easy to agree that such a meaning covers the entire range of the special usage in St. Paul. Its reality for OT religion is veiled from the reader by the misleading associations of 'righteousness' in English. In Deutero-Isaiah, particularly, the Divine 'righteousness' and salvation are closely associated: 'There is no God beside me—a God who is righteous and saving' (45²¹); 'I bring near my righteousness, it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry' (46¹³); 'My righteousness is near, my salvation is gone forth . . . my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished' (51⁵⁻⁶). 'Righteousness' here means active aid; if there is any punishing to be done, it is not Israel but her enemies that are punished. But what of St. Paul's position? 'These passages,' it is said, 'seem to have made a deep impression upon St. Paul.'§ Perhaps they did. But we have no evidence for it. He never quotes any of them, never even alludes to them—a fresh proof, according to Holtzmann, of the slighter emphasis laid by St. Paul the ex-Pharisee, as compared with Jesus, on this great prophetic section of the OT. The truth is, that the sharp factor of human sin reset for St. Paul the older idea of righteousness as a Divine characteristic. In the OT, it denotes God's 'consistent adherence to his revealed line of action, which involves deliverance to faithful or at least repentant Israel, and destruction to those who thwart his all-wise purposes' (T. K. Cheyne, *The Prophecies of Isaiah*⁶, London, 1889, ii. 29, note on Is 51⁵). He vindicates His own people openly; if He did not, He would be unjust. But in the central passages of St. Paul, the two parties are God and sinners. St. Paul's problem starts from the time 'when we are still enemies.'|| It is no longer a people who are faulty but still in touch with Him and requiring vindication before the hostile world; it is humanity, people who even as Jews have no claim on God. Those who need God's righteousness are not wronged but wrong.¶ When St. Paul is at the heart of his argument on sin, it is not to God's righteousness as loyalty and faithfulness that he appeals; his gospel is addressed to men who need to be delivered not from their enemies but from themselves, to men who are enemies of God, alienated from Him, by their disobedience; and it is a gospel, not because it reveals the Divine righteousness as a spontaneous force diffusing itself among men, or as a vindication such as is contemplated even in Ps 73, but because it reveals that righteousness as God in Christ reconciling unfaithful men to Himself and enabling them, when they have nothing to say for themselves (Ro 3¹⁹), to be right with Him. Ritschl's interpretation is correct in protesting against any exclusively punitive view of the Divine righteousness, which would oppose it to grace, and in bringing out the positive, life-giving element in the Pauline conception. But it fails by transferring language from the OT situation to a situation which differed materially and formally.

For several reasons, it is difficult to trace the precise lines of this difference, but the broad fact emerges from the apocalyptic literature and even from the sources of contemporary Rabbinic theology, that an alteration had taken place during the 1st cent. B.C.

There are signs that during the period of the later Judaism the old confidence in God's righteousness as His loyalty to Israel's interests and His gracious intervention on their behalf had begun to wane in certain circles, and that the rise of individualism and the deepening sense of personal sin as more or less connected with racial guilt tended to suggest condemnation and punishment when 'righteousness' was spoken of as an attribute of God (cf. W. Bousset's *Die Religion des Judentums im neutest. Zeitalter*², Berlin, 1906, pp. 358 ff., 435 ff.).* The Divine righteousness became more forensic and distributive. The pious no longer appealed to it with the same naive confidence. They dreaded it, as their conscience was troubled by transgression. Touching appeals to God's mercy and compassion fill the religious literature of the period; the pious plead their weakness, acknowledge that He is just in punishing them for their offences, and beseech His gracious favour on various grounds, but not usually on the score that He is a 'righteous' God in the sense of primitive Israel.† It is possible to over-estimate the extent of this change of mood, but not to deny its reality. And unless we are prepared to take the short and easy method of excluding the apocalyptic literature from a historical appreciation of Jewish popular piety during the NT period, we must take this factor into account in estimating the contemporary significance of a term like 'righteousness' for St. Paul and his age. As he found it and used it for his special dialectic on justification, it bore traces of the later as well as of the earlier connotation; neither exactly corresponded to the significance which he attached to it, but the change of meaning through which the term had passed helped to mould it for his purpose. He did not regard God's righteousness as a dread attribute which had to be supplemented by His grace, but he was still further from the older view that the Divine righteousness could be counted upon to succour and deliver the faithful people. The contemporary expression of this reliance assumed a certain right on the part of the pious, which was more or less modestly urged, to receive the benefits of God's justitia distributiva, on the score either of what they were able to do in the way of keeping the Law,

* By Ritschl in *Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung*², Eng. tr., ii. 473 f., and after him, on independent lines, by Cremer, Sabatier, and C. Bruston (Revue de Théologie, ix. [1900] 290 f.; ZNTW vii. [1906] 77 f.) especially.

† In Gn 19¹⁹ ('thou hast magnified thy mercy, which thou hast shewed unto me in saving my life'), Ex 34⁷ ('keeping mercy for thousands'), and other passages, the usage of δικαιοσύνη by some LXX translators is significant.

‡ With 1 Jn 1⁹ compare Wordsworth's apostrophe:

Just God, forgive!'

|| I.e. exposed to the Divine wrath. In Ro 5¹⁰ ('when we were enemies') it is God's hostility to us, not ours to Him, that is meant by ἐχθροί (as in Ro 1²⁸).

¶ It is a different matter when St. Paul appeals to God's moral equity (2 Th 1¹⁶) in punishing the persecutors of the loyal Church. This is a further stage, not the initial stage of making it possible for such a church to exist at all.

* Also H. Cremer's Die paulin. Rechtfertigungslehre, p. 95 f., though he fails to differentiate the prophetic current from the 'legal,' which made faith, i.e. adherence to the true cultus and doctrine of the Torah, the basis for Israel's assurance of favour.

† The devout confidence in the Divine δικαιοσύνη as protecting favour and guidance is voiced, however, in the combination of 'mercy and righteousness' (Jub. xxxi. 24-25 and Bar 5⁹) most expressively.

or of their reverence for the Lawgiver. Even in the apocalyptic eschatology, a certain moral rectitude, as compared with the Gentiles, is assumed. Only thus did the justitia distributiva become justitia salutifera.^{*} This is what was anathema to St. Paul; it is the position that he attacks in his criticism of righteousness by works. As against the tendency to make repentance and amendment deserve forgiving grace,[†] he revived the phrase about 'justifying', which had ceased to be used commonly of men, and he turned it into the utterly un-Jewish[‡] expression, 'justify the ungodly', pleading that God was 'righteous' in treating men so, because the death of Christ enabled Him at once to punish sin justly and to 'justify' sinners, i.e. freely to forgive them as a gracious God. In the Cross of Christ, God shows that He has the right as well as the will to pardon the ungodly. The Atonement is, therefore, not a compromise between righteousness and love in God, unless 'righteousness' is taken in its narrower sense. St. Paul recognized its broader sense, and usually expressed the punitive element otherwise, e.g. by the conception of the Divine anger, just as he sometimes expresses the action of the Divine righteousness by the more positive term 'grace', and its effect by the warmer term 'reconciliation.'

Two features in the current Rabbinic view of righteousness are conspicuous by their absence from St. Paul's re-statement. (1) One is the combination of God's gracious favour with His judicial verdict on a man's record, the beautiful idea that when a man's good and bad actions left his status doubtful before the justitia distributiva of the Lord, He threw His mercy into the scales. Contemporary Judaism must not be dismissed off-hand as a merely legal, bargaining religion. The religious consciousness was far too large for any theory of personal righteousness simply on the score of works, and demanded this recognition of a God who was at liberty to favour and forgive, in doubtful cases, a God whose mercy did not require any prompting[§] to season His justice. But St. Paul did not conceive of God's righteousness in such a way that it required His grace to temper it for sinful man. Neither could his view of justification as a synthetic verdict, on what man is, not on what he does, admit the allied notion that a man's faith might be taken generously as the guarantee, supplement, or equivalent of righteousness. The remark in the Mechilta on Ex 12th is characteristic: 'Have they fulfilled the Passover command already? No, but from the instant that they undertook to perform it, God reckons it to them as if they had fulfilled it.' It is erroneous to understand St. Paul as valuing faith thus in justification, although ethical interests have led some interpreters to this conclusion. What faith means in this connexion for the Apostle is not any intention which God, who takes the will for the deed, may be pleased in His mercy to accept. The Pauline view of righteousness, no less than the cognate view of faith, rendered it impossible for such a conception to enter into his theology. (2) The other element ignored by St. Paul is akin to this. It was occasionally felt that the Divine mercy at the Judgment might be set in motion by the intercession of the righteous—an extension of the principle of solidarity, by which the righteousness of the living saints was considered to have merits availing for the erring members of the nation. But the idea that the righteous could intercede on behalf of the ungodly at the Last Judgment is entirely ignored by St. Paul,[¶] and expressly repudiated not long afterwards by the author of 4 Ezr. (vii. 102-106): 'And I answered and said: If I have found favour in thy sight, show this also to thy servant—whether at the day of Judgment the righteous shall be able to intercede for the ungodly or to entreat the Most High on their behalf, fathers for sons, sons for parents, brothers for brothers, kinsfolk for their nearest, friends for their dearest. And He answered and said: . . . None shall pray for another on that day, neither shall one lay a burden on another; for then everyone shall bear his own righteousness or unrighteousness' (cf. G. H. Box's note in his edition of The Ezra-Apocalypse, London, 1912, pp. 153-156). In the contemporary Apocalypse of Baruch, which Charles describes as 'a good representative of the Judaism against which the Pauline dialectic was directed' (Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, Oxford, 1913, vol. ii. p. 470), a similar view is urged (xxxv. 12): 'When the Most High will bring to pass all these things, there shall be there no . . . place of supplication for offences, no intercession of the fathers, no prayer of the prophets, no help of the righteous' (see, further, Charles's note on Slavonic Enoch, liii. 1 [ib. p. 462]). The 2nd cent. Testament of Abraham (cf. M. R. James, in TS ii. 2 [1892]) contains a ψυχοστασία, or weighing of souls by angels, which is singular in Jewish apocalyptic; but even more singular is the fact that one poor soul whose fate literally hangs in the balance, since his sins and good deeds (δικαιοσύνη) happen to be exactly equal, is saved by the intercession of Abraham and Michael. It has to obtain one more δικαιοσύνη in order to be saved. Abraham proposes to Michael to try what prayer to God will do, and 'when they rose from prayer, they did not see the soul standing there. Then said Abraham to the angel, "Where is the soul thou wast holding in the midst?" and the angel said, "It has been saved by thy righteous prayer." The absence of any allusion to this, in St. Paul, is the more striking as he was familiar with the ideas of imputed righteousness and imputed sin in current Judaism.

(b) The eschatological background.—The primary conception of righteousness in the earlier prophetic literature naturally pointed to the end, when God would make the issues clear by establishing the triumph of His cause and people over the ungodly. The final world-judgment would be the vindicating of Israel by her righteous, loyal Lord, who then would do justice to His own in the sight of pagans. This prevails through the later Judaism as well. The idea of a present justification, especially for individuals, is not absent, as we can see from 1 K 8th ('Hear thou in heaven and judge thy servants, condemning the wicked and justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness'), or from the background of an allusion like that in Lk 18th (cf. Jub. xxx. 17 f.). But the specific interest of the righteousness-craving was focussed on the Last Day, the impending crisis when the Lord would intervene in favour of His folk and exhibit openly their right position, which for the time being had been obscured. This predominates not only in the OT, where righteousness is a Messianic boon (e.g. Is 11th, Jer 23rd 33rd, Bar 5) promised by God, but in the apocalyptic piety.^{*} Even where the Law is prominent, the reward of loyalty to the Commandments is steadily regarded as life, to be conferred at the close of this world-age, when the lawless pagan powers will be annihilated or reduced to abject submission. To get a footing in the Messianic order, to ensure 'life' or righteousness in the world to come, the essential condition was to keep the Commandments, for the reign which God was to set up would be over the dutiful and law-abiding.

When we pass into the Pauline view of righteousness, this eschatological background is still behind both the terminology and the cardinal ideas, however radically the latter are modified by the faith that Jesus had inaugurated the first stage of the Messianic order on earth. The imminent return of the Christ will complete this saving work. And, meantime, what are the factors in the situation which make this return so decisive? Primarily, we may say, the traditional conception holds true. It is still sin which furnishes the need for righteousness and the occasion for justification, and sin, as καρπὰς or ἀμαρτία or καρπῶν or ἀμαρτί or ἀδικία, is conditioned by the Law; it disqualifies for the status of blessing and reward, to be assigned at the end for obedience. The terminology retains its OT associations. Righteousness implies a standard of character and conduct which is ap-

^{*} It reappears in the liturgy of the Shemoneh Esreh (10-11): 'Sound the great horn for our freedom; lift up the ensign to gather our exiles, and gather us from the four corners of the earth . . . reign thou over us, O Lord, thou alone, in loving-kindness and tender mercy, and justify us in judgment' (see, on this point, J. Koberle's Sünde und Gnade im relig. Leben des Volkes Israel, Munich, 1906, p. 639 f.).

^{*} Cf. Sokolowski's Die Begriffe von Geist und Leben bei Paulus, p. 173 f.

[†] See, e.g., Jub. v. 17: 'If they [i.e. the children of Israel] turn to Him in righteousness, He will forgive all their transgressions and pardon all their sins. It is written and ordained that He will show mercy to all who turn from all their guilt once each year [i.e. at the Day of Atonement].

[‡] A Jew would have quite agreed that God δικαιοῖ τὸν ἀσεβῆ if δικαιοῖ meant, as it seems occasionally to have meant in Attic prose, 'punishes.' What St. Paul means by 'the ungodly' is, of course, the man who, in spite of his sins, has a desire for God and the godly life.

[§] Sometimes it is the prayers of the righteous which are able to make His mercy overpower His anger (e.g. T. B. Succah, 14a, Berachoth, 7a).

[¶] The nearest approach to it is the passing allusion (in Ro 11th) to Israel as 'beloved (by God) for the sake of the fathers.'

pointed by God. 'The ideas of right and wrong among the Hebrews are forensic ideas; that is, the Hebrew always thinks of the right and the wrong as if they were to be settled before a judge. Righteousness is to the Hebrew not so much a moral quality as a legal status. . . . In primitive society the functions of judge and lawgiver are not separated, and reverence for law has its basis in personal respect for the judge. So the just consistent will of Jehovah is the law of Israel, and it is a law which as King of Israel He Himself is continually administering' (W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, London, 1895, p. 71 f.). The repeated violations of the Law, which the weakness of the flesh produces, result, according to St. Paul, in a state of guilt which calls out righteousness as the punitive duty of the Lawgiver. He speaks of this less often than of sin, but the outcome is the punishment of death as the supreme expression of the Divine wrath for wilful transgressions of the Divine Law. The Law works out in wrath (Ro 4¹⁵); the thunderclouds of doom are ready to break over those who take that path. In one place, he attributes moral perversity (Ro 12⁴) to the working of the Divine wrath. But this is merely one expression of it, and (23³⁶) the stress falls on the eschatological visitation of God's wrath. The δίκη of God, like its opposite, σωτηρία, is for St. Paul * originally and especially eschatological (cf. 1 Th 1¹⁰, Ro 5⁹); it is an accompaniment of the Day of Judgment, the punishment of those who wilfully disobey God.† To St. Paul the history of the world is a drama of disobedience, and the fifth act of the tragedy is being played out; the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ prove that the final scenes are imminent. Accordingly, the primitive Christian eschatology viewed justification as the anticipation of salvation at the end, the guarantee that he who is justified will be right with God at the Final Judgment. The decision of God will be in his favour. He will be inside, not outside, the Messianic realm of bliss and life. 'By faith we wait in the Spirit for the righteousness we hope for' (Gal 5⁵),‡ i.e. the final acceptance and freedom (1 Co 1⁵, Ro 8³³) from condemnation. But God's wrath is not exclusively eschatological for St. Paul, neither is His righteousness. As in Judaism§ already, so, and much more so, in St. Paul, justification ceases to be a mere hope. It is not simply the assurance of being acquitted at the end, but becomes a present, definite attitude of the soul towards God. Here and now there is a valid status before God. St. Paul's word is, 'We are justified,' not 'We shall be justified.' God's righteousness is a revelation in the present order, a reality of experience here and now. In Ro 1⁷, e.g., it is not wholly eschatological any more than wrath is; the term 'salvation' tends to retain its predominantly eschatological meaning, but 'righteousness' increasingly bears upon the immediate position of the soul towards God, largely because it was so definitely associated with forgiveness. The eschatological hope usually came to be expressed by St. Paul in other terms; 'righteousness' was so bound up with the sacrifice of Christ and the present fellowship into which faith ushered the Christian, that it gradually became concentrated upon the experience and standing of the believing man. It is needless to multiply proofs of this obvious Pauline position. A sentence like that in Ro 5⁹ clinches the matter: 'Much more, then, now that we are justified by his blood, shall we be saved by him from wrath.' The present experience of God's righteousness (1⁷) becomes the ground of assurance that we are freed from condemnation and that we shall not be exposed to the final doom of His wrath (1¹⁸, 1 Th 5⁹) which is imminent and eschatological. The eschatological background to St. Paul's theory of righteousness* and justification is real (cf., e.g., Ro 2¹³⁻¹⁶), but it may be exaggerated, as it is by those who fail to see that justification, like νόθεσις, the alternative conception, deepens into a present moral and spiritual experience, involving a career as well as a hope, or rather a hope which implies a career of goodness. Because the Christian is sure of final acquittal, he is to live up to it. Or, to put it in an antithesis: he is not to be saved because he is good, he is to be good because he is justified. It is a short interval till the final crisis arrives, but the Christian can await the Judgment with confidence, on the strength of his justification by faith and (Ro 13¹¹) readiness for salvation.

(i.) This is exaggerated by Wernle's thesis† that St. Paul never thought about the problem of sin in the Christian, or at least, very seldom, since the hope of the immediate End was so vivid that it left no place for any ethical transformation of the believer; the Christian who is justified is thereby guaranteed all the bliss that belongs to the Messianic community of the αἰών μελλών, but St. Paul does not leave either time or need for dealing with defects of character in the brief interval before the End. Sin belongs to this present world, whereas the Christian life is the beginning of the new age, and therefore is sinless. Such an unqualified estimate of the eschatology implies that faith does not possess any distinctive ethical force or regenerating energy. It is true that St. Paul did say something about 'faith working by love,' and Wernle (op. cit. p. 85) is troubled by this remark (Gal 5⁶). However, he reflects that it must be an obiter dictum! After all, we must remember that it does not occur in Romans! The content of faith, in Paulinism, is not to be evaporated into adherence to the Messianic community, however; Paulinism was not a religion of sheer eschatological enthusiasm, which refused to see facts that contradicted its theory; and it is a mistake to regard the doctrine of righteousness as little more than a piece of mission-propaganda, which had no significance for the life of Christians in the Church.

(ii.) Nor is it possible to regard righteousness in St. Paul's theology as the state which qualifies for the final salvation, the condition God appoints and will accept (E. J. W. Williams, St. Paul's

* Like John the Baptist (Mt 3⁷=Lk 3⁷), but unlike Jesus; in the Synoptic record of His teaching, it is introduced by St. Luke only once (21²⁰), while Mt 24¹ and Mk 13¹⁰ simply speak of δικαιοσύνη.

† This is reiterated in Ro 2⁵, and St. Paul puts the reverse side in 2¹³⁻¹⁶. 'To be just before God,' or acquitted, or delivered from His wrath, is the supreme boon of the Messianic order. Christ has already inaugurated this order by His death and resurrection, and He is sure to complete it at His return, when the Day of Judgment will decide the fate of men. The conditions of that decision are stated by St. Paul, but he denies that believing men need have any fear of the result; their present relation to God through Christ, in the new order, enables them to anticipate the future with confidence (Ro 5¹⁷, 8³¹ f.). We can feel the alteration of emphasis from the contemporary Jewish faith, which drew its passion for law-righteousness largely from its interest in the future final hope of glory and recompense.

‡ Contrast the contemporary Apoc. Bar. xiv. 12 ('the righteous justly hope for the end . . . because they have with thee a store of works treasured').

§ Particularly, though by no means exclusively, in apocalyptic circles, where the heavenly powers and realities were believed to be already moving in human life, instead of remaining hidden in heaven until the epoch of consummation. The fact of Christ's death and resurrection having recently taken place increased the Christian tendency to realize that the new age had already begun in the existence of the Church whose experiences of justification and fellowship rested on Christ's sufferings and risen glory.

* Sketched, e.g., by Koibing, K. Müller, Titius, and Shailer Mathews (see Literature).

† In Der Christ und die Sünde bei Paulus, Freiburg i. B., 1897, pp. 22 f., 92 f., 100 f. He is right in emphasizing the fact that 'justification is the first boon of the Messianic age, and signifies reception into the community of the true worship and the true hope' (p. 93).

Doctrine of Justification, London, 1912); this theory is open to the same objection, that it ignores the ethical substratum of the soteriology and eschatology. God might no doubt be considered free, as we shall see in a moment, to lay down a fresh qualification for acceptance, viz. faith. He might replace the νόμος έργων by the νόμος πίστεως, although that would not explain St. Paul's full attitude to the Law. Also, the primary idea of justification was the status of a man before God, not his ethical character. Granted. But in Paulinism we cannot distinguish rigidly between a man's standing and his heart; and faith, the faith which justifies, is more than a special method of enabling men to get out of their inherited status of original guilt and become qualified for the final salvation. Such a theory fails to fit St. Paul's deep sayings about the present position of the believing man. We cannot, e.g., translate the opening words of Ro 5 as if they meant, 'Being therefore made eligible from faith, we are to have peace before God.' It is not untrue to say that, when St. Paul regards God as pronouncing a man righteous on the score of faith, he assumes that He is not pronouncing the verdict of a judge but laying down a legal principle, as He is entitled to do; yet this is not all the truth. The faith in question cannot be left as a mere attitude of mind, unrelated to the moral self; and the experience of the justified man is more than an assurance of being qualified for some future position of bliss. St. Paul's conception of Christ's victory over sin, death, and the Law, in the flesh, gave a fresh content to the idea of 'righteousness' alike in God and in human nature, and at the same time it reset the idea of faith.

We must now attempt to define this content more closely.

(c) Apologetic and controversial setting.—'Righteousness' was a term common to Jew and Christian. What differentiated the two, according to St. Paul, was the method of attaining this religious position of acceptance with God which ensured acquittal and bliss at the end. St. Paul's motto was, 'righteousness by faith,' and he defined his meaning controversially by way of contrast; 'by faith' meant 'not by the Law,' 'not by works.'

The controversy was not simply with Jews, but with Jewish Christians as well. Many in the primitive Church had not thought out their relation to the Jewish Law; they were not alive to the full consequences involved by their faith in Jesus Christ. They were content to rest in a Messianic conception of the Lord, as if His forgiveness availed for such sins as their obedience to the Law failed to cover. His pardon was a welcome and necessary supplement; still, it was a supplement. The Law and Christ were two saving principles. In a word, their position might be summed up thus: justification by the Law plus Jesus Christ. This seemed to offer an indispensable guarantee for morality and to preserve continuity. It was only under the logic of facts, like the conversion of Gentiles, and the stress of St. Paul's arguments, that they admitted that obedience to the Law was not essential to salvation. The admission was hard to make, but it had to be made for the sake of the Gentiles as well as for themselves. We have this put strongly in Galatians, the fighting line of Paulinism against the Jewish Christian propaganda of the early Church. Thus, in 2¹², the Apostle starts for the sake of argument from the same premisses as St. Peter and the Jewish Christians ('since we know a man is justified by faith in Jesus Christ, and not by doing what the Law commands, we ourselves have believed in Jesus Christ'), but he draws a conclusion from these premisses which they did not draw, when he adds, 'so as to get justified by faith in Christ and not by doing what the Law commands, for by doing what the Law commands no person shall be justified.' This is St. Paul's inference. It was he, not they, who made an antithesis between Christ and the Law. Instead of holding to righteousness by the Law plus Christ, the Apostle laid down the thesis: either Christ or the Law. Justification from, not by, the Law. As he put it to them bluntly, 'You are for justification by the Law? Then you are done with Christ, you have deserted grace' (Gal 5⁴).

The further development of this thought belongs to the discussion of the Law. All that we require to note at this point, for our immediate purpose, is that St. Paul treats the Law as a whole, instead of distinguishing, as we might expect him to do for the sake of lucidity and logic, between the ethical and the ceremonial sections. In Romans it is possible to feel that the ethical is uppermost in his mind, in Galatians the ceremonial. Yet even in the disparaging references of the latter Epistle, he has room for the great saying, that the entire Law is summed up in the single command to 'love your neighbour as yourself' (5¹⁴). The fact is, he invariably regards the Law as the supposed way to life, from the Jewish standpoint, and argues that life comes by another way, by faith in Christ. Justification means life, and justification is based on the death and resurrection of Christ, which superseded the Law as a revelation of God's mind and will for sinful men. Besides, he actually adds, in pre-Christian Judaism the Law did not lead to life; it stirred up evil in a man, and reduced the earnest to despair. Above all, it never elicited faith. Doing, not trust, was its watchword.

This criticism of the works of the Law has been itself subjected to criticism. Was the antithesis fair to Jewish piety? it has been asked. Did not St. Paul, in the stress of controversy, exaggerate the position of his opponents? When he criticized them for the place they assigned to 'works of the Law,' what place did he leave for works, or, as we should say, for ethics, in his own system? Does not his own appeal, in non-controversial moments and for practical needs, to the Divine judgment on works indicate that he was not really so far from the Jewish Christian position as his controversial passages would seem to claim? If it is true that the Pharisees almost deified the Law, is it not the case that Paul as nearly caricatured it?

So far as these criticisms are relevant to the special topic of righteousness in the Pauline system, they must be considered from the historical point of view, that what St. Paul encountered was not the OT type of devotion to the Law and righteousness such as is presented in the 119th Psalm, but a Pharisaic type of piety in which he had himself been trained. We can see now that he was really reviving the prophetic spirit of protest against an undue emphasis on the external, which had the unhealthy effect of fostering self-righteousness, and reviving it on a higher level. He insists, with uncompromising rigour, e.g., on the paramount significance of faith, not as one means of pleasing God but as the means, the source and centre of true righteousness. In this, he opposes Jewish legalism, as Jesus did. 'With Paul as with Jesus, faith is

* In Ac 13³⁹ St. Luke appears to attribute this idea to St. Paul. 'Remission of sins is proclaimed to you through him, and by him everyone who believes is absolved from all that the Law of Moses never could absolve you from (δικαιωθήναι).' But the language does not make it quite clear that St. Luke thought justification by faith came in to remedy the defective pardon of the Law. At any rate it is not so clear as the narrower identification of justification with ἀφεσις ἁμαρτιῶν. St. Paul, on occasion, could speak of a man being 'absolved from sin' (Ro 6⁷, δικαιωθεὶς ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας), but he is speaking of a dead man in a contemporary mode of thinking, and using this rather as an illustration.

the decisive thing. St. Paul has found the same God as Jesus: he has learnt that God is far greater and His demands far more searching and lofty than the Jew believed.* The controversy between Jesus and the legalism of the Pharisees is practically reproduced in the criticisms passed by St. Paul, the quondam Pharisee, upon the doctrine of righteousness by works. The religious interest is the same. Faith is conditioned by the character of the God who is revealed to the soul; and our God, says St. Paul after Jesus, though he says it in his own way, is One who gives Himself freely to man in his utter need. The primary thought of righteousness is for him not task but gift. St. Paul's technical phraseology must not be allowed to obscure the relation of his teaching at this point to the teaching of Jesus upon the Father who freely gives to His children, and gives them life with Himself. The Apostle's phrase, 'righteousness by faith,' aims at the same idea of life imparted freely by God, for justification is not a formal verdict or declaration—that would not alter a man's nature or create a new personality. Justification is to treat as right or just, no doubt. But this is for St. Paul the action not of a judge but of a Father, and everything depends on the character and purpose of Him who determines to treat thus the erring penitent. How is it right? When is it wise? To Jesus, the character of the Father is a sufficient answer by itself. So it is to St. Paul; only, he looks through the Cross to God's character, and also interprets the Cross through God's character, since the Cross is the supreme revealing action of God. The Cross proves that God is a God of love, a God who will have mercy even on the ungodly; it also proves that He does not condone sin. The sinner can trust the love of it, and yet be sure this mercy is not dealing lightly with his sin. Hence faith arises, the faith that justifies. The words differ, but the spirit is akin to the interest which underlay the teaching of Jesus about the conditions which evoked trust in God.

We may wonder (i.) why he did not, like the author of Hebrews, employ the sacrificial sections of the Law to illustrate the death of Christ as the means of establishing this righteousness with God; (ii.) why he did not conceive the Law as a preparatory stage for Christianity or the new law of righteousness, as a later age did; (iii.) why he never reckoned with the Jewish † doctrine of the merits of the Fathers availing to supplement the demerits of living Israel; and (iv.) why he was not driven, as Marcion after him, to deny outright the validity of the Law as a Divine institution. Probably he was too much of a Pharisee, with too strong a sense of the purpose of God in history and in Israel, to break so radically with the past. His attitude towards the Law as a means of righteousness is thoroughly characteristic of his Pharisaic antecedents and his individual experience. To him, the Law is everything or nothing. He sees it as a rival to Christ and strikes at it in unqualified antitheses. From what he saw of Judaism and of Jewish Christianity, he considered it was essential to prove that the Law not only could not justify, but was never intended to justify, by faith.

† E.g. in the contemporary Apocalypse of Baruch, where the works of the righteous avail for other generations (xiv. 7, lxxiv. 10: 'Pray diligently with your whole heart that the Mighty One may be reconciled to you, and that He may not reckon the multitude of your sins, but remember the rectitude of your fathers'). This quantitative doctrine of the zechut of the fathers, i.e. their righteousness as availing for their descendants, implied that by the grace of God their meritorious goodness was allowed to count in favour of those who were defective in piety, instead of the latter being judged strictly on their own merits (cf. E. G. Hirsch in JE x. 423, and Schechter, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, ch. xii.).

According to his analysis of the tendencies of the contemporary legalism—and there is no historical reason to doubt that his analysis was substantially accurate—the practical outcome of devotion to the Law, as glorified by Pharisaic piety, really resulted in an endeavour to attain righteousness by one's own moral record. This had broken down in his own case, and he argued from that to a general proposition. It was important to do this, for 'when he looked at the Jews who retained their unbelief in face of the gospel, he was convinced . . . [that] it was not imperfection, but the effort to reach righteousness that kept them away from the gospel.'* His criticism of the Law was not a clever, one-sided jeu d'esprit of dialectic; it was evangelistic as well as apologetic, an attempt to save others from the impasse into which he had himself once strayed in sheer sincerity of purpose. The repudiation of the Law as a method of attaining righteousness sprang from the fact that in his own experience he had felt what he regarded as the fundamental error of Pharisaism. Hence it is possible for J. Weiss to say (Paul and Jesus, Eng. tr., London, 1909, pp. 82-84) that St. Paul 'saw more deeply into the nature of Pharisaism and rejected it more absolutely than even Jesus Himself. Jesus constantly referred to the inconsistency between outward behaviour and inward motive; the formalism and unreality of this pietism aroused His anger. Paul, on the basis of his personal experience and by means of his entirely religious nature, realised that Judaism was distorted as a system and that its attitude towards religion was from the outset perverted; he regarded as chimerical the theory that by means of works men could force God to deal out reward and salvation in fulfilment of a contractual obligation; moreover, this attitude towards God, which seemed to regard Him as a contracting party with rights and claims not superior to those of man, was recognised by Paul as impious and as a blasphemous misrepresentation of the position of man, in view of his entire dependence upon God. The irreligious aberrations of Pharisaism consisted in this "boasting before God," as Paul calls it, or as we may paraphrase it, "in self-glorification upon the ground of past achievement, in making demands of God"; this mad "going up to heaven" to bring salvation down from thence, and this unseemly "reckoning" with God which is entirely characteristic of all Jewish thought,† are the by-products of a pietism which, like heathenism, pressed to exert compulsion upon God; heathen magic, sacrifice and prayer, was here replaced by the practice of righteousness to which God was unable to refuse reward. Paul himself had shared this passionate zeal for the law, this painful ἐργάζεσθαι, . . . ; it was this experience which enabled Paul not merely to conquer certain outposts of Judaism, but to show that the system must be rejected as absolutely incompatible with the gospel.'

The negative propositions about righteousness not being by the works of the Law are therefore the reverse side of St. Paul's positive conviction that justification did originate by faith. They represent him coming to terms with Judaism, stating his new faith as against its old rival. His repudiation of legalism finds its strength in his personal conviction of God's grace in Christ. He does not set up, it has to be noted, any antithesis between faith and works, i.e. moral actions. Only, the latter are regarded as the outcome of faith, and denied any place in winning a state of acceptance with God. The opposite of his doctrine of righteousness by faith is the popular Rabbinic conception of zecuṯh or satisfaction,* according to which anyone who kept the commands of the Law was in a state of zecuṯh or 'grace,' and being thus 'righteous' might claim the Divine reward of justification. Such a man is right with God, because he has made himself right, satisfying God's demands, especially by the study of the Torah, by almsgiving, charity, and the like. He can even swell his credit, and do so of his own initiative. It is this sort of self-made morality, with its tendency to self-righteousness, that St. Paul antagonizes in his polemic against the works of the Law as a basis for righteousness.

Without entering into details on St. Paul's conception of faith, or of justification as compared with contemporary Jewish views (e.g. in the Apocalypse of Baruch), we may notice two items of importance. (i.) One is the triple repudiation of 'works' in the earliest allusion to justification (Gal 2¹⁶). There is a curious misinterpretation of this verse, which takes καὶ μὴ with ἐξ ἔργων, as if St. Paul wrote, 'a man is not justified by the works of the law unless he believes in Jesus Christ.' Newman, e.g., adopted this view for dogmatic reasons in his Lectures on Justification (3rd ed., p. 279). He pleads ingeniously that 'it does not follow that works done in faith do not justify, because works done without faith do not justify.' But it does follow, according to St. Paul. Newman's position is the very position of the Jewish Christians, which St. Paul regarded as ambiguous and compromising to the gospel, viz. that if a man does believe, his moral obedience and actions co-operate in his justification. 'We know,' says the Apostle, 'that a man is justified simply by faith in Jesus Christ and not by doing what the law commands.' He explicitly seeks to lift and free Christianity from the Jewish Christian combination of faith and works which re-appears in Newman's theory.

(ii.) In the second place, we notice that as soon as he speaks of righteousness, he brings in faith (Ro 1⁷); from first to last—this seems to be the meaning† of ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν—the saving revelation of God is conditioned by faith. Faith is for man its source and sphere. It is not a faith which is itself a 'work,' on which a man might plume himself. It is not ποιεῖσα but ἀκουoυσα (Ro 10¹⁴), elicited by the revelation of God's grace in the gospel of Jesus Christ (cf. Gal 3²⁻⁵, Ro 10¹⁷, 1 Co 2⁴). The faith which justifies is called out by this overpowering disclosure of God in the Person and sacrifice of Christ. The Cross, with the love of God in it, exhibits God's righteousness and elicits faith in man, the faith of which St. Paul says, 'a man who instead of "working" believes in him who justifies the ungodly, has his faith counted as righteousness' (Ro 4⁵). Obviously it is not a meritorious action, any more than it is a legal condition for a legal acquittal. At the same time, it is not an empty state, this faith stirred in the soul. The contrast of 'not by works' and 'by faith,' in the dialectic of 'righteousness,' does not imply that a man believes in Christ by putting out of life henceforth all moral energy. 'Works of the law' mean for St. Paul that a man is constantly thinking of himself, urging himself on, putting moral pressure on himself, striving to please God on his own resources, and inevitably taking some credit to himself; 'by faith' means that a man turns from his moral or immoral self to God, meeting Him who comes triumphing over weakness and sin in Jesus Christ, daring to trust himself to Him who has successfully invaded sin and death in their headquarters in the flesh, ready to live by this faith, because it identifies him with the power and inspiration of the Lord. This is, according to St. Paul, the way to be right with God; and it means a right life, for the end of such a Divine righteousness is to create spiritual personalities, and the faith which appropriates it is not so much an act as a reception of Christ or an abandonment of oneself to Him. Hence, e.g., the explanation that even Abraham's faith implied a reverence for the power of God and a willingness to act upon His word (Ro 4¹⁷). Hence also the association of faith with obedience (Ro 1⁵ 6¹⁷ 10²¹), i.e. submission to the gracious will of God which meets us in the gospel, a willingness, at any cost of pride and prejudice, to take His road to life; you must 'give in' to God's terms, he declares (Ro 10²). How hard that was, especially for a man of moral character, he himself knew well—how hard, and yet how glad and fruitful, once the surrender was made.

There are two considerations which have to be weighed in estimating the justice of St. Paul's verdict on contemporary Judaism. One is, that he was diagnosing Pharisaism on the spot—and not across nineteen centuries, from a restricted survey of the earlier OT and the later Rabbinism. The other is, that he was diagnosing the symptoms of a disease from which he had himself suffered. Scattered statements can be disinterred from Rabbinic literature to prove that faith was not ignored by all the leaders of contemporary Israel, that many were conscious of the need of Divine grace in order to obey the Torah, that they found a true religious joy in practising this obedience, that they were not invariably pluming themselves upon their merits, and that the Torah meant for them more than a code of legal enactments. No historical critic has any interest in minimizing such data. Nor has he any hesitation in allowing for the deflecting influence of controversy upon St. Paul's mind; St. Paul was apt to be unconciliatory at times, and this idiosyncrasy would be fostered by the inevitable tendency of dialectic to state a case without qualification, in order to be impressive and telling. But that he knew what he was talking about when he analyzed the practical effects and the underlying spirit of the Pharisaic conception of righteousness, that his religious genius enabled him to detect and expose the cardinal issues which were bound up with the problem of the Jewish Law in relation to Christian faith, there is no sound reason to doubt. History and religious experience have justified the sense of exultation, the thrill, the delight of breaking out into the open air, which throbs through his words on the liberty of the believing man—and this liberty is only another aspect of his 'righteousness by faith' conception.

The conception of righteousness, in this specific sense, is bound up with the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith; in fact, it enters into the Apostle's thought upon the Person of Christ, sin, the Law, election, and eschatology. What it conveys, however, is largely a generalization of his own experience. 'Righteousness' is one of the classical terms of OT and contemporary Jewish piety, but St. Paul has stamped it with an original meaning, due to his sense of the inadequacy of moral obedience to the Law, his profound consciousness of sin, and his experience of the forgiveness and fellowship which faith in Christ opened up to him. Further, his use of the term is not only personal but polemical. He turns against legalism with weapons drawn from its own armoury, and the paradoxical element in some of his phrases and arguments is best explained by the fact that these are employed by him to defend a religious position very different from their original object and setting. It is probably for this reason also that the discussion of righteousness by faith is absent from the Thessalonian Epistles. When he wrote these letters, he had already been through the crisis depicted in Galatians. But the theme was primarily of apologetic interest to him, and at Thessalonica the controversy with Jewish Christians and Jews was not raised on this issue. The argument about righteousness was a particular expression of his views on the absolute grace and goodness of God in Christ, but these views could be otherwise expressed. Consequently we find that in the earliest Epistles, as in the later, the 'righteousness' argument falls into the background, and even in the main Epistles it hardly ever appears except in controversial passages—the principal exceptions being 1 Co 6¹¹ and Ro 8^{31f.} When St. Paul was not developing his doctrine in opposition to Jewish tendencies, within or without the Church, he generally chose other terms and methods. This does not imply that the fundamental thought in his conception of righteousness is secondary. On the contrary, it is from that central conception that his views on other matters ray out. His doctrine of sin, e.g., is really elicited by his deeper interest in righteousness, and the former is developed in connexion with the latter. At the same time, it must be realized that the doctrine of righteousness or justification by faith, in what we may call its fighting aspect, does not cover the entire range of St. Paul's theology, and that the terms belonging to this particular aspect could be translated into other equivalents for the underlying religious experience. Thus, the conception of righteousness is closely allied to that of life. Only, whereas in the latter idea St. Paul seems to be developing tendencies characteristic of Hellenistic Judaism, whereas his conceptions of 'the bliss to be' are tinged and shaped by Greek thoughts which had filtered into the Jewish mind, in 'righteousness' and 'justification,' despite Reitzenstein's plea, we must hold that the Apostle is on a Palestinian basis, even when he is constructing there a fresh, Christian synthesis. His argument on righteousness is neither that of the OT nor that of the mysticism reproduced in the later Poimandres literature. Its specific elements are due to a new religious experience, and its specific terminology is best illustrated from the Messianic categories of Palestinian Judaism.

In Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (Leipzig, 1910, pp. 100-104), R. Reitzenstein argues that the use of δικαιοσύνη in the Hermetic religious literature on the re-birth of the initiated points to a Hellenistic usage which ought to determine the sense of the term in Ro 6³⁰ as 'made sinless (in nature).' The verb denotes the deliverance of a person from the δύναμις of ἀδικία by the Divine powers which 'deify' him (ἐδικαιώθημεν, ὡς τέκνον, ἀδικίας ἀπούσης). It is by no means certain, however, that these ideas represent a pre-Christian type of mystical piety on Egyptian lines. Furthermore, as Reitzenstein admits, δικαιοσύνη is not prominent as a Divine δύναμις, and it seems hazardous to infer that originally it must have played a more important rôle, since the parent Egyptian religion expected a verdict of acquittal for the pious dead. It is interesting to find δικαιοσύνη losing its forensic sense and denoting freedom from ἀδικία, but the origin of this type of mystical religion is as yet too unexamined to permit the conclusion that we have here the clue to St. Paul's use of the term, e.g. in 1 Co 6¹¹, or to his conception of the Divine δικαιοσύνη entering a human personality as a power to expel unrighteousness. This may be due to the influence of Christian language on a later Gnostic religious mysticism. Even if it is not, the juristic associations of δικαιοσύνη, as of νόσθεσία, define the central thought of St. Paul, without any need of conjecturing the influence of the Hermetic mysticism. 'Righteousness,' like νόσθεσία, was capable of suggesting a state or relation to God as well as the initial act which created that state, and St. Paul's faith-mysticism would do the rest.

What is St. Paul's religious interest in this sharp distinction between faith and works as the rival bases for righteousness? Why does he distinguish the one from the other as true and false? The answer depends on an analysis of what he meant by faith in this connexion.

(i.) At the close of his argument about justification in Ro 3⁷ he asks, 'Then what becomes of our boasting (ἡ καυχῆσις)?' It is ruled out absolutely. On what principle? On the principle of doing deeds (τῶν ἔργων)? No, on the principle of faith. 'Boasting' means relying on one's personal merits, the Pharisaic self-consciousness which feels that it is able to bring God something which deserves favourable consideration. We may call it 'Pharisaic,' not because it was characteristic of all Pharisees in St. Paul's day, nor because it was confined to them, but because the Pharisaic type of theology, as St. Paul knew it from personal experience and observation, tended to develop a religious self-consciousness, a self-satisfaction which was inclined, on the score of moral qualities and achievements, to treat with God and even claim His favour as more or less a due. Such a mood, no doubt, involved faith of a kind, faith in a Divine recompense which was just in its awards. But this was not the faith of St. Paul. Nor was his 'faith' the faith which itself amounted to a meritorious 'work,' on which a man might secretly or openly plume himself as if it entitled him to some credit with God, for his confidence, his insight, his dutifulness, his loyal venture of the soul.* It was to avoid any such misconception that St. Paul defined faith as the opposite of works, and not as a work or action of which man was the author and on which he could pride himself. There was a place for καυχῆσις in the Christian order, but it was not on faith as an achievement; hence the paradoxical use of the term in Ro 5¹¹: 'As we are justified by faith, . . . we triumph (καυχώμεθα) in the hope of God's glory;† not only so, but we triumph in our troubles . . . not only so, but we triumph in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we now enjoy our reconciliation.' Or again, in the proud humility of Ph 3³: 'We are the true circumcision, we who worship God in the spirit, we who pride ourselves (καυχώμενοι) on Christ Jesus.' There is a legitimate sense, St. Paul would say, in which we Christians can speak of 'boasting' or 'pride,' but what evokes it is the sheer grace and generosity of God in Jesus Christ—the very revelation of Himself which elicits faith. The Pharisaic boasting went back to the conception of faith as a meritorious work, as, e.g., in the Midrash on Gn 15⁶, which interpreted the words thus: 'Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as a righteousness,' a meritorious work. St. Paul took faith as the vital spring of life, set in motion by God Himself. When he substituted faith for works as the basis of righteousness, it might seem as though he only meant to make faith the supreme 'work.' On the strict Pharisaic doctrine of the Divine sovereignty, which St. Paul shared (Ro 9-11), God could do as He pleased. He was not bound to obedience to the Law as the condition of righteousness; conceivably (see above, p. 379), He might make faith that condition. But St. Paul did not understand God as exempt from moral consistency (cf. Ro 3^{4f.}). He did not adduce faith as selected arbitrarily by God to be the essential qualification for righteousness. On his view, it was organic to the entire order of the Christian religion from the first, and drawn out fully by the gracious revelation in Jesus Christ. Faith is always the correlative to revelation, and saving faith is the response of the entire personality to God's reconciling love in Jesus Christ. The initiative is with God. Faith, therefore, is not belief or even fidelity, in the primary sense of the term; it is not an act or

* Cf. the point of Jn 15¹⁶: 'You did not choose me, it was I who chose you.'

† A characteristically Jewish expression. But St. Paul's basis is not that of contemporary Judaism. 'Full recompense does not come until the future world. . . . Then Israel, both as a nation and as individuals, will be rewarded for its loyal fulfilment of the Law by a life of untroubled bliss. Good works, like reverence for father and mother, beneficence, peace-making among one's neighbours, and above all study of the Law, are comparable therefore to a capital sum, whose interest is already enjoyed in the present life, while the principal itself remains for the future life. This hope of a future recompense was the main impetus to zeal for the Law. In fact, the entire religious life of the Jewish people during our period moved round the two poles: fulfilment of the Law and hope of future glory' (Schürer's GJV II.4 [Leipzig, 1907], p. 547 f.; cf. Eng. tr., II. [Edinburgh, 1885] II. 92 f.).

quality of the soul, but the yielding of the whole nature to God's appeal and offer in the gospel. There must be no thought of credit in this initial surrender, St. Paul insists. Genuine trust clears every trace of such a mood out of the soul. 'In the work of man's salvation an unconditioned initiative belongs to God, and all that is required of man is the unreserved abandonment of himself to what God has done. That is faith in the sense of St. Paul.* But there is a tendency in human nature, not simply in Pharisaism, to evade or modify this unqualified demand; it is a tendency which may be due, in part, to conscientious feeling and ethical principle, but none the less it is out of place. St. Paul felt this strongly, and it is from his sense of the religious principle involved, not simply owing to the exigencies of theological controversy, that he sharply reiterates the antithesis between faith and works. For him there was only one way to be right with God, and the only assurance of being on that way was the sense of having risen above the mists of religious self-satisfaction.

(ii.) One special temptation of the Pharisaic καυχῆσθαι was particularism, and therefore faith also swept away the system of ideas which gave the Jew or Jewish proselyte an exclusive or pre-eminent claim on God's favour. In this aspect, too, faith was not arbitrary. It was bound up for St. Paul with the universal scope of the gospel. Thus, in Romans for example, immediately after the words on καυχῆσθαι which have just been quoted, he adds: 'We hold a man is justified by faith apart from deeds of the Law altogether. Or, is God only the God of Jews? Is he not the God of Gentiles as well? Surely he is. Well then, there is one God, a God who will justify the uncircumcised as they believe and the uncircumcised on the score of faith' (3²²⁻³⁰). The argument is that God as One is the same for all, and faith is the one, common method of being right with Him. To have faith, you do not need to have the Law or to be a Jew (circumcised). 'I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel,' said Jesus once of a pagan. St. Paul generalizes the same conviction. He had the palpable fact before him, that Gentiles could be and were being saved apart from the Law. If a man can be right with God apart from the Law, then faith is universal; or, vice versa, as faith is a universal instinct, it implies a universal range for the faith of the gospel. In Romans and Galatians, through the abstruse, winding arguments upon righteousness, two thoughts are constantly before St. Paul's mind: one is that Christianity is a religion of grace which evokes faith, the other is that it is a religion for mankind. These are cognate thoughts, and Gal 3, e.g.,† is a series of curious illustrations and exegetical arguments on both. Thus, after contrasting the Law and faith, he suddenly goes off in 3²⁸: 'faith has come, and we are wards no longer; you are all sons of God by your faith in Christ Jesus. . . . There is no room for Jew or Greek, there is no room for slave or freeman, there is no room for male or female: you are all one in Christ Jesus.' Faith at once suggests to him the catholicity and humanity of the new religious order. It supersedes exclusiveness. Christianity as the redemptive religion, basing righteousness on faith, transcends the divisions of race and class and sex which contemporary religions, especially Judaism, recognized. This is what Jowett‡ meant when he declared that 'the whole doctrine of righteousness by faith may be said to be based in a certain sense on fact, on two great facts especially—the conversion of the Apostle himself, and the conversion of the Gentiles.' Again we see the specifically religious interest which underlay the Apostle's antithesis between faith and works. It is not a piece of scholasticism, but the interpretation of God's acts in history and experience, an interpretation which was meant to be as uncompromising as the facts on which it rested were decisive.

Observe, St. Paul's argument is not 'Have faith like Abraham.' That would leave out Christ. He argues 'You are all sons of God by your faith in Christ Jesus.*' It is not by imitating Abraham's intuition of trust, but by faith in God as revealed in Christ His Son, that you are members of His household. With Christ, faith receives for the first time its proper and full object—the adequate, absolute revelation of the Divine purpose for men. St. Paul does not even call on Christians to have faith like Christ, to believe in God as Jesus believed. 'Faith such as Jesus had' is not a Pauline conception. It is surely impossible to interpret the phrase πίστις Ἰησοῦ as if it meant 'the faith of Jesus'; what it does mean is faith in the gracious will of God manifested in Christ, a faith which transforms the personality into His Spirit. 'The life I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God who loved me and gave up himself for me' (Gal 2²⁰). This is almost the nearest approach (yet cf. Ro 3²², Gal 2¹⁶) which St. Paul makes to speaking of πιστεύειν Χριστῷ, as he speaks of πιστεύειν θεῷ. For him, Christ 'is the object of faith so far, that in him, especially in his death and resurrection, the favourable will of God, which is the real object of religious trust, has been revealed.'† This revelation was not made by a legal act; it was shown in devotion to the point of death, and consequently it can elicit devotion from the heart which seeks and finds in it union with the object of its trust and love.

(d) God's righteousness and human sin.—As the righteousness of God means a status of man before Him, or rather a relationship between Him and man, which He brings into being through the sacrificial death of Christ, and which becomes a reality of experience for man as he believes, St. Paul can speak of it as he could not if it were merely an attribute* of God's nature. He can say that it is due to 'faith in Jesus Christ' (Ro 3-), or that it originates with God and rests on faith (Ph 3⁹). The believing man possesses it as the gift of life to him. These two sides of the truth are always present to the mind of St. Paul, but one is sometimes more prominent than the other, and he freely passes from the one to the other. It is necessary to recollect this, as we go on to analyze the Apostle's main statements upon the relationship in question.

Righteousness, on the Pharisaic lines of piety, meant an ἐννομος βίωσις, fidelity to the Divine Torah as embodying the standard set by God for His people; in other words, all that God requires from man in relation to Himself and to other men. It is a matter of life and death. To be saved, a man must be righteous; and he alone is righteous who conforms to this Law. And God? His righteousness consists in fidelity to His own Law, as the highest norm of life. He is righteous as He rewards and praises those who keep that Law, which as Judge or Ruler He is bound to uphold. Now this was an aspect which, in the strict sense of the term, St. Paul naturally left out of account, since he held that no one, however much care and passion he devoted to legal obedience, could possibly attain a position which entitled him to such praise and reward.* Sin intervened so powerfully and disastrously that St. Paul was forced to fix his mind upon the other side of the Divine righteousness, viz. the punishment of disobedience. It was axiomatic for him as for the Judaism of his age, though in different degrees, that the just God could not leave sin unpunished; He must maintain the rights of the Law when it was violated. The Divine Law, like human law, involved the praise of those who kept it and also the punishment of transgressors. The old maxim held good: 'iudex damnatur ubi nocens absolvitur.' It was essential that God should prove Himself 'just' in this restricted sense of 'righteous,' by taking account of evil and transgression. But this punitive attitude, which St. Paul describes as the anger of God, did not exhaust His mind towards a humanity which deserved nothing else. There is the way of expiation or atonement, which enables God to acquit the sinner without condoning the sin. No sacrifice that men can offer has this atoning power; St. Paul never troubles to argue that the ceremonial sacrifices, or even the sacrifice on the Day of Atonement, on which probably pious Jews relied for the completion of pardon, did not avail for this purpose. The sacrifice is offered by God Himself; in modern terminology, it is a Divine self-sacrifice for the sake of sinful men; the Cross of Christ reveals the heart of God in its righteousness (or grace) and also reveals his condemnation of sin. Through the blood of the Cross God's righteousness is revealed fully as the saving power of His love for men. It represents His grace—and grace for St. Paul means the power as well as the disposition of God's love to sinners—but, as δικαιοσύνη connoted justice in the narrower sense, St. Paul could use the term upon occasion to bring out that punishment of sin which was essential to His nature and relations to men, or, as a modern might say, to the moral order.

* In this particular passage (Gal 3²⁶) it is possible to take διὰ τῆς πίστεως by itself, and render, 'you are all sons of God in Christ Jesus, by your faith'; but this is less probable, and even if it were taken thus, there are many other passages where the above-noted principle is implied (e.g. Ro 4^{23f}).

‡ The Philonic habit of regarding certain attributes of God's nature as semi-personified, and therefore capable of being appropriated by man, might form a precedent for the view that St. Paul considered God's righteousness as emanating from Himself and yet entering into human experience upon certain conditions. But this is not supported by his language. He does objectify or personify sin and death and wrath, but Ro 1¹⁷ is too slender a basis for the idea that righteousness is similarly conceived as a Divine power operating in history. The personification in 2 Co 5²¹ is irrelevant to such a notion (see below).

The revelation of Divine goodness or righteousness in the gospel is therefore thrown into relief against the revelation of Divine anger which is the only alternative for those who will not have faith to see God's meaning and purpose in the gospel of Christ. This is the point of Ro 1¹⁶: ('the gospel is God's saving power [δυναμὶς θεοῦ εἰς σωτηρίαν] for everyone who has faith . . . God's δικαιοσύνη is revealed in it by faith and for faith'). It is apt to be distorted for modern readers, who inevitably associate righteousness with an austere, retributive exercise of judicial power. But St. Paul here distinctly connotes it with saving power and opposes it to the Divine wrath, in a way that reminds us of the Psalmist's phrase (Ps 98): 'The Lord hath made known his salvation (τὴν σωτηρίαν αὐτοῦ): his righteousness (τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ) hath he openly shewed in the sight of the nations.' The Apostle, as often, objectifies his thoughts. By the words 'a righteousness of God is revealed' he means that God is revealed as a God who justifies, as a God who, Himself righteous, seeks to have men righteous before Him (cf. 3²⁶).

* Light is light which radiates,
Blood is blood which circulates,
Life is life which generates'
(Emerson, Threnody, 242 ff.).

God as righteous is the living God, not one who stands aloof from sinful men, leaving the race to itself, except to brood over its heightening impiety with the anger of outraged justice that ends in

* Unlike his contemporary, the author of the Apocalypse of Baruch, who (ll. 3 f.) describes in glowing language the glory of 'those who have now been justified in My law . . . those who have been saved by their works, and to whom the law has been now a hope.' Some lines of the description ('they shall be changed into every form they desire, from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory') recall 2 Co 4¹⁸.

punishment and death. The supreme obstacle to His life generating life in men is sin, the sin which has assumed such tyrannical power over humanity. But in the gospel He removes this obstacle, or rather, breaks this hostile power, by the sacrificial death of Christ, His Son, so that His righteousness or vital energy can now come into play.

When the Apostle eventually describes this in more detail (in Ro 3²¹⁻²⁶), he still speaks of the Divine righteousness being manifested, but, by a natural turn of thought and expression, he also uses δικαιοσύνη in v. 25¹ in the narrower sense of 'justice' as opposed to laxity. The atoning death of Christ is put forward as a proof that He did recognize the doom with which sin had to be punished, and therefore that His righteousness bestowed on believing men is consonant with moral justice. If St. Paul could use δικαιοσύνη already in a restricted sense in v. 8 of this chapter, the present writer sees no reason why he should not employ it in this particular sense in v. 25¹, especially as it was a sense which was innate in the term. Whenever 'righteousness' was associated with the thought of sin, its aspect of justice naturally tended to become prominent; the sombre punitive element came to the front, as in the case of the verb δικαίουν (see above).

The use of a word in different senses in the same context may be illustrated from the very next paragraph (Ro 3²⁷), where St. Paul employs νόμος in the special sense of principle (v. 27) and then (v. 28) as 'Law' (see above, p. 334). The Psalter of Solomon furnishes another case of δικαιοσύνη being used in two or three different senses close together:

* The works of mercy (δικαιοσύνας) of thy saints are before thee . . .

O God, our actions are in our own choice and power, to do right (ποιῆσαι δικαιοσύνην) or wrong in the works of our hands.

In thy righteousness (ἐν τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ σου) thou visitest the sons of men' (ix. 6-8).

Before going further into this passage, however, we must turn to the prior allusion in 2 Co 5¹, one of the most startling personifications in the Pauline literature. 'For our sakes he made him to be sin who himself knew nothing of sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God.' When did God 'make Christ sin'? * At the Incarnation, when the pre-existent Son of God was made to wear the flesh of sinful man? This is Holsten's view. He regards St. Paul as holding that the flesh was essentially sinful, and consequently that Christ's human birth might be said to imply that He took sin upon Him by entering our sinful state. This view of the flesh, however, is untenable, and the fact which St. Paul has in mind is the Death pre-eminently. Whether 'sin' means 'sin-offering' is not quite so clear. It is no argument against such an interpretation that it involves a double sense of 'sin' in the same verse, for the compressed, rapid style of the Apostle here might admit of that. But the parallelism of 'sin' and 'righteousness' tells against it strongly. It is a daring expression, though not unexampled. God, St. Paul seems to mean, treated Christ as a sinner, let Him suffer death (the normal consequence of human sin) in the interests of men, that we might become righteous† by our union with Him. 'Righteous' here obviously means more than acquitted; to become righteous in Christ, righteous before God, is to enjoy not simply freedom from guilt but a positive relation to God. How this takes place, St. Paul does not state in the verse before us; his words must be read in the light of his other references to the virtue of Christ's sacrifice as the death of One who, as sinless, did not deserve to die, and whose death therefore availed for the guilty. God thus reconciles men to Himself, and it is an act of love. This death of the One for all (v. 14^c) means that 'all have died, and that he died for all in order to have the living live no longer for themselves but for him who died and rose again for them.' It is in the light of such words that we can interpret what St. Paul intended by this antithesis of v. 21. The identification of Himself with sinful men is the clue to the meaning of Christ's death; it is an expression of His love, just as from another side it shows God's treatment of Him as bound up with sinners, so as to die for them. The result is that sinners are freed from the death which is their due, and raised to a position which is defined as devotion to Christ or as 'righteousness,' that is, life shared with God, the life to which Christ Himself rose and into which He raises His people. Instead of being condemned to death, they are now freed from condemnation and made 'right' with God; i.e. they are reconciled (v. 18^c), they are made a new creation (v. 17), which has a moral purpose in it. This purpose is elsewhere described as 'consecration' (ἀγιασμός), e.g. in 1 Co 6¹, where justification is associated with consecration, as a real and true relation to the living God. In reconciliation or justification there is an implicit purpose of 'holiness' or consecration, in this sense of belonging to God, and of caring to belong to Him, as members of His own community.* But the sharp point of the paradox in 2 Co 5²¹ lies in the phrase about the act of God which makes the Christian standing a reality. At first sight, the parallel indeed seems unreal. Christ was not really a sinner, in His death for sin. Is our 'righteousness' of the same kind? Is it only an estimate? We may reply, with Sabatier (The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., p. 330), 'Redemption consists precisely in this, that God sees in Christ that which is in us,—namely, sin; and in us that which is in Christ,—namely, righteousness. No doubt this is a logical contradiction; but it is the Divine contradiction of love. The logic of the heart triumphs over that of the intellect.' We may also perhaps add this moralizing consideration. When Christ by the will of God identified Himself with sinful men, His sympathy with them only intensified His holiness and goodness; the more He came into contact with sin, the stronger did His holy love become. So, as we identify ourselves with Him, we come to share His mind towards our sin; we learn to condemn it and to side with God against ourselves. When we are brought to cry, 'Who shall deliver me from this body of death?' we become God's. It is through the death of Christ that we truly learn our hopeless position as sinners, and the hope enshrined in His sacrifice. What St. Paul elsewhere describes as 'by faith,' he expresses here by the phrase 'in him.' The vicarious death of Christ implies that God subjected Him to real suffering for our sakes, to the last extremity of desertion and death, and when we identify ourselves with Him, when we trust Him with ourselves, God subjects us to as real an experience of reconciliation. Christ's experience of agony and desolation at the end was real in its bitterness; He was not going through a painful official formality when He suffered. So our experience of union with God is a real bliss, a direct, personal relation to Himself. What is common to both is the intense and growing reaction against sin which Christ's sacrifice produces in us. What differentiates Christ and men is that our characters are transformed by the creative act of One whose character required no change.

* The expression is even stronger than the similar phrase in Gal 3¹³: 'Christ ransomed us from the curse of the law by becoming accursed (κατάρα) for us: for it is written, Cursed (εὐκαταπαρέος) is everyone who hangs on a gibbet.' St. Paul leaves out the LXX ὡς θεοῦ after εὐκαταπαρέος.

The importance of taking 2 Co 5²¹ at this stage in an analysis is two-fold: it is a fresh corroboration of the truth that 'God's righteousness' is a positive, personal relation to Himself; and also of the vital connexion between this righteousness and the Person of Jesus Christ. We are hardly surprised to discover that the close association of righteousness with a personal experience of Christ* emerges in the last autobiographical reference, in Ph 3⁸⁻¹¹. St. Paul summarizes his Pharisaic prerogatives, a passionate and positive orthodoxy, 'immaculate according to the standard of legal righteousness,'† zeal, high character, and all the rest, all the κερδῆ which he and others thought contributed materially to salvation. 'I parted with them gladly,' he confesses, 'for the sake of intimacy with Christ Jesus my Lord.' And I gained far more. It was for the sake of 'gaining Christ and being found (when I die) in him, possessing no legal righteousness of my own (i.e. no religious standing which a man thinks he can secure by scrupulous obedience to the moral code of the Law) but the righteousness of faith in Christ, the Divine righteousness that rests on faith.' There is only a verbal difference between this last description and the more personally tinged expression 'knowing Christ Jesus my Lord'—where 'knowing' means practical reverence and intimacy.‡ Whether St. Paul speaks of 'righteousness by faith,' or of Christ being made righteousness for us, or of our being made righteousness in Him, the same inspiring conviction breaks through the somewhat legal and technical phraseology, viz. that while the reconciliation is a reality apart from our experience of it, it becomes a reality for us only through our personal surrender to the personal will of love which reaches us in the Cross and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

From these earlier and later allusions, we may now turn back to the references in Romans. The conception of righteousness is commonly studied first of all in Ro 1-8, where it is discussed for its own sake,§ rather than in Galatians, where the leading thought is the freedom of Christians, and justification comes in to illustrate the main theme. So far, the method is legitimate. But this concentration of interest on Romans has had its drawbacks and dangers. One thing, e.g., which has thrown investigators off the track repeatedly has been the circumstance that the earliest allusion to righteousness in the Epistle appears to introduce it in rather an abstract sense. 'I am proud of the gospel; it is God's saving power (i.e. it is a thoroughly effective plan of ensuring the Messianic σωτηρία, which no one need be ashamed of trusting and serving) for everyone who has faith, for the Jew first and for the Greek as well. God's righteousness is revealed in it by faith and for faith—as it is written, Now by faith shall the righteous live' (Ro 1¹⁶). Even here, the impression of abstractness is superficial. St. Paul is

* The lack of any reference to the Messianic promise in Jer 23⁶ (Israel's name is to be 'The Lord our righteousness') is surprising. Zahn explains it (Der Brief des Apostels Paulus an die Römer, Leipzig, 1910, p. 84) by the fact of the LXX mistranslation ἰσχύει, but thinks that a writer like St. Paul, who knew the Hebrew original, cannot fail to have been influenced by the striking expression.

† St. Paul belonged to the Luther and Bunyan class—not to those who, like Augustine, broke through to Christ out of a vicious life.

‡ Cf. Wis 15³: 'to know Thee is complete righteousness, and to know Thy power is the root of immortality.'

§ W. G. Rutherford, in his translation of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, London, 1900, arranges the entire Epistle, apart from its preface (1¹⁻¹⁷) and epilogue (15¹⁴⁻¹⁶), under the category of 'righteousness': righteousness created by faith (1¹⁸⁻⁵), righteousness realized in faith (6¹⁻⁸), righteousness triumphant (8¹⁸⁻³⁹), faith the only source of righteousness (9¹⁻¹¹), righteousness as affecting conduct (12¹⁻¹⁵).

* The term (ἀγιασμός) quite naturally included the further idea of the life which answered to this position (cf. 1 Th 5⁸), just as δικαιοσύνη did (p. 377).

speaking of the gospel, and that is God's personal, direct message and gift to the faith of men, inseparable from Jesus Christ. Still, the very absence of any direct reference to Christ has led some critics at the start to isolate righteousness and consequently to misunderstand it either by treating it as a Divine quality which operates more or less independently of the Person of Christ, or by regarding the entire topic as a religious piece of forensic controversy. But even the context itself implies that justification, i.e. the process by means of which one becomes right with God, is not a cold ante-chamber through which the Christian is ushered into the warm atmosphere of personal intimacy beyond. It is not a chamber or hall of justice; it is the household of the living God. The righteousness which is revealed and conveyed is not simply acquittal, but life in the fullest sense of the term. 'By faith shall the righteous live.' The righteousness which comes by faith is not a preliminary stage, at which a man is pardoned for his sins and let off; it is a living, personal experience of God revealed in Christ. The righteousness revealed in the gospel is not the issuing of a pardon or the proclamation of an amnesty, but a relation of acceptance with God, in fellowship with Jesus Christ, which depends on faith as the personal surrender of a man's entire nature to the Divine will of reconciliation.

This is fundamental to Paulinism, and one of the simplest ways to grasp the truth of it is to note how the Apostle twice over uses 'righteousness' in a personal sense, as applied to Christ. 'This,' he argues in 1 Co 1³⁰, 'is the God to whom you owe your being in Christ Jesus, whom God has made our "Wisdom" (σοφία), that is, our righteousness and consecration and redemption.'* Christ as the Divine Wisdom is further defined as righteousness and consecration and redemption for us. The Christian 'Sophia' is not a vague, shadowy, speculative idea or æon; it is embodied in Christ's personal relation to the sin and need of men, whom He has brought into intimate relation with God. Again, in the more difficult passage in 2 Co 5²¹, God is said to have treated Christ as a sinner for our sakes, to have allowed Him to suffer what sinful men suffer, dying the accursed death of the Cross (Gal 3¹³). 'For our sakes he made him to be sin who knew nothing of sin (i.e. because he knew nothing of sin as a personal experience), so that in him we might become the righteousness of God' (i.e. Divinely righteous). St. Paul may personify righteousness in Ro 1⁷ and elsewhere, but it is more important to observe how readily he identifies it with the personal relations of Christ to men and of men to God. Nothing proves more clearly how far he was from regarding it as an abstract, official relationship between the sinner and the Saviour, which led to some further and closer fellowship.

In the light of all this, we can at last read the central passage in Ro 3-6: 'On the score of obedience to law, no person will be acquitted in his sight. What the Law imparts is not acquittal but only the consciousness of sin [ἐπιγνώσις, St. Paul's favourite word for a full recognition, a sight of the real meaning, of anything or any person]. But now [harking back to 1⁷] we have a righteousness of God disclosed apart from law altogether (i.e. entirely apart from any human achievement of obedience to law, as above); it is attested by the Law and the prophets (i.e. 'apart from law' does not mean that the revelation has no continuity with the OT), but it is a righteousness of God which comes by believing in Jesus Christ, and it is meant for all who have faith. No distinctions are drawn [the religious interest of catholicism, already noted; cf. p. 385]. All have sinned, all come short of the glory of God, but they are justified for nothing by his grace through the ransom provided in Christ Jesus [all this was in his mind when he spoke of God's righteousness being revealed in the gospel, 1¹⁶], whom God put forward as the means of propitiation (ἱλαστήριον) by his blood, to be received by faith.' Later on, he will explain how God condemned sin through His Son (8³), but here he goes on to note that, while this 'righteousness of God' is made available for believing men apart from the Law altogether, the fact that it rests on the Divine self-sacrifice in the death of Christ is enough to prove that God is not taking sin lightly or failing to visit transgressions with their moral due. He has in mind a criticism of his doctrine of righteousness. It had been objected—or he anticipated the objection—that the Law, with its sacrificial rites and stress on repentance, at least took moral evil seriously; St. Paul might deride it and criticize it, but surely it was not open to the charge of laxity like his own theory, which asserted that a sinner could be restored to God by faith and nothing more. The Apostle replies by claiming actually that the very reverse is true. God's new means of providing righteousness shows that He is dealing with sin more rigorously than He ever did under the old system of the Law; the sacrifice of Christ, His Son, exhibits His uncompromising attitude towards sin, which hitherto had not been displayed to the full. When the gospel bids men seek righteousness outside the code and ritual of the Jewish Law, it is not suggesting that God is now pleased to be satisfied with an inferior type of righteousness, or that He is prepared to annul sin without more ado. To drive this point home, St. Paul now uses δικαιοσύνη in its narrower sense. In v. 1⁶ it denotes the general redeeming purpose of God, as in 1¹⁷, but in v. 2⁶ the meaning is closer to that of v. 5, i.e. the moral integrity of God, which in presence of deliberate sin implies the reaction of His inviolable justice. In order to realize His righteousness for sinful men, God had to vindicate His character of 'justice.' Hence the two-fold purpose of Christ's sacrificial death. It was 'to demonstrate the justice of God in view of the fact that sins previously committed during the time of God's forbearance' had been passed over; it was to demonstrate his justice at the present epoch (in contrast to the past, when it had not been so exhibited), showing that God is just himself and that he justifies man on the score of faith in Jesus.

Whether ἱλαστήριον means propitiatory gift or sacrifice, it is offered by God Himself, not by men; and this sacrifice of Christ was necessary for the realization of God's righteousness or redeeming purpose. It is fairly clear from the context, and this interpretation is supported by other data, that the words 'by his blood' refer to the historical Crucifixion. It is the sacrificial death of Christ, not blood-fellowship with the Risen Christ, which the Apostle has primarily in mind.† What enables

* Not in the previous life of people who are now saved, but in the sense of Ac 17³⁰, although the eschatological horizon is more distinct there than here.

† It is true that justification implies the Resurrection (Ro 3²⁵), but the relation of the justified to God depends on one who 'was dead and is alive again' as their Lord. In view of a passage like 5⁶, it is beside the point to lay stress, as Lipsius does, on the absence of any reference to the Cross here. The recent popularity of this blood-fellowship interpretation (cf., e.g., G. A. Deissmann in EBi iii, 3034-3035; A. Schettler, Die paulinische Formel 'Durch Christus', Tübingen, 1907, p. 5; and Otto Schmitz, Die Opferanschauung des späteren Judentums, do., 1910, p. 223 f.) is probably due to a right reaction against the idea of righteousness as a purely forensic status, depending on the death of Christ, but it is not necessary from an exegetical point of view, and it tends to miss the truth that the relationship of righteousness implies a communion with God through Christ in which the sacrificial power of His death is the effective thing (cf. A. Juncker, Die Ethik des Apostels Paulus, Halle, 1904, p. 121 f.).

God to justify sinners, what justifies Him in justifying them, is the δικαστήριον of Christ. It is through this sacrificial death that God's moral character as δικαίος becomes, in relation to human sin, the attitude and action of a δικαίων. 'Till Christ and outside of Christ there is no righteousness for men.

This is the vital point at which the conception of righteousness crosses the conception of atonement in St. Paul's theology. Without trespassing on the province of the articles JUSTIFICATION and ATONEMENT, we may point out that in the present passage St. Paul distinctly regards the sacrificial death of Christ as the explicit sentence of God on human sin. This is why he speaks of the past, and in so doing uses δικαιοσύνη in v. 5st. in the specific sense of 'justice.' In the death of Christ as the one adequate offering for sin, God now shows His real mind towards sin and sinners as punitive and judicial; He condemns sin, and thus cannot be suspected of any indifference to it. Men, arguing from the long past when He forbore to exhibit any such weighty reprobation as the death of Christ now conveyed, might impugn His justice, as if He were indifferent to moral interests. But the terrible expression of His real attitude in the death of Christ removed any such suspicion; it revealed for the first time and finally His true verdict on sin. If He had forbore to show this until now, that was because He sent Christ, as St. Paul elsewhere argues,* at the proper moment in the world's history, not because of any failure to conserve the interests of justice. St. Paul would have admitted that sins had been visited by God's anger in the past; this is the thought of Ro 1st. ('God's anger is revealed from heaven against all the impiety and wickedness of men'). The mere fact of death (Ro 5¹⁻⁴) showed that sin had consequences for sinners. But until the death of Christ on the Cross the full exhibition of God's condemnation of sin could not be made; and it had to be made, not only in view of the previous forbearance or abeyance of judgment, by which God had spared the Jews, instead of punishing them by extinction, but in order to realize the new righteousness. That new righteousness or state of acceptance with God involved a recognition of the just connexion between sin and death ('God himself is just'), and at the same time of a gracious power triumphing over both ('all are justified for nothing by his grace through the ransom provided in Christ Jesus,' 'he justifies man on the score of faith in Jesus'). This demonstration was furnished in the death of Christ, the Divine Being who died on the Cross neither as a sinner nor as a sinless individual but as God's Son, the innocent for the guilty, reversing the fatal consequences of Adam's transgression and inaugurating a new relationship between God and His people, on the basis of faith in Himself. When St. Paul describes this death as a ransom, he is thinking pre-eminently of its positive results in the creation of fellowship rather than of its negative side. The uppermost idea is the restoration to God of those who belong to Him, not of what they are ransomed from, nor of the particular price paid. It is God who provides this sacrifice, as it is God who desires the restoration. Obviously, the new content of the religion is larger than the old sacrificial metaphors employed to state it, but δικαστήριον does carry sacrificial meaning. Here as elsewhere the fundamental thing in righteousness is the positive relation of life to which those who believe in Christ are admitted, their new standing before God ('We are justified by faith . . . through our Lord Jesus Christ we have got access to this grace where we have our standing'). It is not exhausted in the assurance that they are now considered far from blame and no longer liable to punishment. Whether 'the righteousness of God' means God bringing men to Himself or the relation in which they stand to Him when they are thus brought home—and both meanings naturally emerge, and emerge together, in St. Paul's language—the cardinal idea is the same; it would be scholastic to imagine that he thought of this righteousness either as a preliminary action of God, clearing away the obstacles in order to let the Spirit have full play, or as a state which required to be vivified by a second act of grace. Here the contrast between the Law and the ransom is enough to explode any such misinterpretation. The δικαστήριον enables God to do what the Law could never do, and if the Law meant anything it meant the maintenance of living communion between God and men.

Such were the presuppositions underneath the first allusion to the Divine righteousness in Romans (1⁷), for the gospel in which it is disclosed has been already described in vv. 6 as a gospel of redemption through Jesus Christ, God's Son. God's anger is revealed from heaven against human sin, and the counterpart is the revelation of His righteousness, for the moral situation is such that man cannot put himself right with God. This revelation of His righteousness is inaugurated by the sacrificial death and resurrection of Christ; it is not a revelation which has been in existence from the beginning, the revelation of a Divine attribute which constantly unfolds itself in human history and has acquired a heightened expression through Christ. On the other hand, it is not punitive, for the attitude of God to sin is described as 'anger.' What is denoted by 'righteousness' is saving power, as defined more fully elsewhere.* The main difference between the use of the phrase δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ here and in most of the other passages is that the emphasis falls upon δικαιοσύνη in this passage, not on θεοῦ. The contrast is between 'righteousness' and 'anger.' Human sin leaves no alternative but for God to show His moral displeasure in punishment, but He freely and graciously reveals through Christ how sinners can be right with Him. His righteousness is the new hope for men who have brought upon themselves His anger.

We may ask, Why is not love the antithesis to anger? It really is, in St. Paul's view. The entire justification of men is due to God's love. 'Therefore, as we are justified by faith, let us enjoy our peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ . . . since God's love floods our hearts. . . . God proves his love for us by this, that Christ died for us when we were still sinners' (Ro 5¹⁻⁶). St. Paul never distinguishes, as moderns have often done, between love and righteousness in God. Incidentally, as we have already seen, he recognizes a sense in which 'righteous' is less than 'loving' as applied to men, but God is never 'righteous' to him in this sense of the term. Probably the reason why he prefers to speak of God's righteousness rather than of His love, in this connexion, is either because he cherishes the old classical term, or because he was dealing with a controversial topic in its own vocabulary, or because he desired to emphasize the moral quality and aim of God's nature and dealings with men. This may be why he uses 'righteousness' here, just as elsewhere he chooses to speak of grace, which is only the Divine love in action upon the sin of men. 'Righteousness' is God's nature revealed in its special purpose of dealing with the desperate situation of man's sin and guilt; the Johannine theology uses 'love' outright in this connexion, but St. Paul generally prefers the term 'grace' as an equivalent for this purpose in its personal action upon sinners who yield, and 'anger' for the relation of God to wilful disobedience and rebellion. It is characteristic of his Jewish training that he employs a term like 'righteousness' to express not only what was fundamentally a religious relation between God and man, but also the moral issues of that relation. The persistence with which he rules out any human element which might compromise the absolute grace of God in justifying sinners becomes all the more significant when we find that he did not hesitate still to use this very term 'righteousness' as one of the words for the ethical outcome or aspect of justification. To this we may now pass.

* 'In due time' (Ro 5⁶), 'when το πᾶν χρόνον came' (Gal 4⁴).

* E.g. in 3²⁶ (God 'just himself and the justifier of men').

(c) God's righteousness and the new life.—The problem of the nexus between this faith-righteousness and the moral life of the Christian, between the free forgiveness which cuts away 'works' as establishing any claim on God and the strong ethical interests of the Pauline gospel, is unusually difficult, but it has sometimes been made needlessly difficult by dogmatic handling. For example, some of the Reformed theologians, in a laudable effort to oppose the Roman theory of merits, occasionally tended to reduce faith to a barren assent, which emptied it of ethical content, making it either (a) a mere organ for receiving the initial blessing of forgiveness, i.e. assent to a doctrine of salvation, or (b) too much a matter of subjective feeling. Luther himself, in his sheer anxiety to safeguard the interests of saving faith, now and then allowed himself to say paradoxical things which suggested that there could be justifying faith apart from love. Luther is certainly a better exegete of St. Paul at this point, in the main, than the tradition derived from Augustine. Augustine tended to regard human faith as worthless until it was infused and vitalized by Divine grace, and he seems now and then to read St. Paul as if God's grace revived faith and made it ethically valid by means of the sacraments. The spirit of Luther's fundamental interpretation is at any rate more true to the Apostle's teaching. At the same time, the problem of the relation between righteousness by faith and the conduct of the Christian really does belong to the problem of justification (q.v.), for St. Paul, as we have seen (above, p. 372), does not scruple to speak of the Christian life as 'righteousness' in the non-technical as well as in the technical sense of the term. The vexed problem of the relation between righteousness by faith and the judgment on works (which includes Christians) might be supposed to lie, strictly speaking, outside our subject; for while St. Paul regards justifying faith as in no essential respect different from the faith which underlies the entire course of the Christian experience, he generally employs other methods of statement (the 'fruit of the Spirit,' etc.) to elucidate the general conduct of the Christian. The terminology of righteousness by faith did not rule his whole theology. Yet, whatever explanation may be adopted of the nexus between the so-called forensic and ethical sides of his theology, the term 'righteousness' is not always dropped when he proceeds to state the latter. This is clear, e.g., in Ro 6¹³⁻¹⁴, where he reiterates the thought that Christians must dedicate themselves to 'the service of righteousness.' Life is a service, however you take it, he implies.* In fact, apologizing for the oxymoron, he calls the new life a 'slavery to righteousness'! 'Set free from sin, you have passed into the service of righteousness'

* As Jesus did in Mt 6²⁴: 'you cannot serve two masters, but you must serve one, either God or mammon.' In the next chapter (Ro 7⁴), St. Paul puts the same thought from another point of view: 'you must belong to Someone, either to the Law or to Christ.'

(ἐδουλώθητε, v.¹⁸). Sin is a slavery, so is δικαιοσύνη. You once knew the former; now take the latter. Here the position of δικαιοσύνη, which is absolutely due to God's grace, as he has just been arguing in the previous chapter, becomes not only a memory and a hope but an obligation upon those who are justified, the nexus being the Person of Christ with which our faith identifies us, since Christ has broken the hold of sin over us and opened up to us the sphere and the capacity of the Divine life.*

This nexus is not a mere play on the different senses of δικαιοσύνη. The forensic metaphors used by St. Paul in connexion with righteousness in the technical sense render it all the more imperative to grasp the larger thought for which he is seeking a somewhat controversial expression. When a sinner is pronounced righteous or justified, as we have seen, this does not correspond to the cool verdict of acquittal passed by some outside authority; it is the gracious dealing of a loving God, whose end is life for the sinner. The clearest statement of this truth is in the long passage of Ro 5⁶⁻¹¹: 'While the sentence ensuing on a single sin resulted in doom, the free gift ensuing on many trespasses issues in acquittal' (but acquittal is not the last word). 'For if the trespass of one man allowed death to reign through that one man, much more shall those who receive the overflowing grace and free gift of righteousness reign in life through One, through Jesus Christ.' The δικαίωμα or acquittal carries life with it. Hence the Apostle sums up: 'Well then, as one man's trespass issued in doom for all, so one man's act of redress issues in acquittal and life (ἐκ τῆς δικαιοσύνης) for all; just as one man's disobedience made all the rest sinners, so one man's obedience will make all the rest righteous . . . sin increased, but grace surpassed it far, so that while sin had reigned the reign of death, grace might also reign with a righteousness that ends in life eternal through Jesus Christ our Lord.' It is passages like this which suggest that the Pauline doctrine of righteousness by faith finds its equivalent in the Johannine doctrine of fellowship with the Father and the Son, life in both cases being the central thought. The door into this fellowship opens from within, and similarly the righteousness which issues in life is steadily regarded as a free gift of God; you cannot pay for it, or work for it, you have only to accept the reconciliation. The life comes through a Divine self-sacrifice. When St. Paul is using his most juridical language, he never forgets to bring this out, and the very fact that his line of argument in this section does not lead him to develop the human faith which receives the gift enables him to lay all the more stress upon the Divine generosity which provided it for needy man.† 'The gift,' 'the free gift,' 'for nothing'—it is as if he could not say enough to convince his readers of

* It is the ὑπακοή of Christ (5¹⁹) which realizes the new order of reconciliation and δικαιοσύνη for men, who in turn have to give in (see above), by an act of obedience, to these gracious terms of God for their redemption. But the human ὑπακοή is not exhausted by this surrender to God in Christ; it has to be worked out in His service and spirit (Ro 6¹²⁻¹⁷). Cf. W. Schlatter's Glaube und Gehorsam, Gütersloh, 1901.

† Cf. what R. W. Dale once said about Maurice (Life of R. W. Dale, London, 1898, p. 541): 'What he wanted was to be conscious that he deserved all the love and trust that came to him. I am more and more clear about this, that we must be content to know that the best things come to us both from man and God without our deserving them. We are under grace, not under law. Not until we have beaten down our pride and self-assertion so as to be able to take everything from earth and heaven just as a child takes everything, without raising the question, Do I deserve this or not? or rather with the habitual conviction that we deserve nothing and are content that it should be so, do we get into right relations either with our Father in heaven or with the brothers and sisters about us. That principle is capable of a most fatal misconception, but in its truth it is one of the secrets of righteousness and joy.'

God's character and motives in the work of reconciliation.

Yet even when he considers human faith in this connexion, it only serves to emphasize the truth that the new relation of righteousness cannot rest on any pact between a man and his God. Faith is not the contribution which the sinner makes. There were religious conceptions of righteousness which gave a place to faith alongside works, but St. Paul would not hear of such an admixture as we meet, e.g., in the apocalypse of 4 Ezra. 'A worker has his wage counted to him as a due, not as a favour; but a man who instead of working believes in him who justifies the ungodly has his faith counted as righteousness' (Ro 4¹). Everything turns upon faith, he adds (4¹⁶), for the new righteousness is a gift or, historically regarded, a promise; these are the terms on which it is offered.

In the light of this, it is not difficult to understand why, after urging Christians to 'serve righteousness' (in 6¹²), he instinctively varies the phrase: 'now that you are set free from sin, now that you have passed into the service of God' (this is another way of stating what he means by justification or the possession of 'God's righteousness'), 'your gain is consecration (αγιασμός), and the end of that is life eternal. Sin's wage is death, but God's gift is life eternal in Christ Jesus our Lord.' The life which the practice of δικαιοσύνη produces is ultimately a Divine gift. Even in this sphere, where the human will is active, where a man is bidden co-operate with all his powers, the notion of merit is carefully excluded. A man gets something out of the service of sin, and he has himself to thank for it! He also gets something out of the service of righteousness (i.e. out of his devotion to the character which God approves), but he has God to thank for this. The fact that St. Paul uses δικαιοσύνη in this definite sense of character, so soon after he has just used it to denote a religious standing or relationship to God, is noticeable; it confirms our interpretation of the latter as implying a positive experience of life, and it illustrates at the same time the common basis of both in the grace of God, mediated through Jesus Christ. Not only justification but the service of δικαιοσύνη depends upon man's relation to Him, since the latter means a life lived for Him (2 Co 5²¹) or in Him (Ro 6¹¹). In both senses of the term, δικαιοσύνη means life (Ro 5²¹ 6²³), and whether this life is viewed as a standing before God or a calling it is equally dependent upon Him. St. Paul could have conceived acquittal apart from moral renewal as little as he could have conceived moral renewal apart from acquittal (Sokolowski, Die Begriffe von Geist und Leben bei Paulus, p. 14); the one involved the other, and, as both implied the mediation of life through Jesus Christ, the intrusion of merit or self-righteousness was definitely eliminated. In Ph 3⁹ we have both aspects and senses of δικαιοσύνη held together; the gift is a task, and the very task is itself a gift, depending for its inspiration as well as for its reward upon the Lord. In Ro 6¹⁵, the conception of faith, which elsewhere reveals the nexus between the so-called forensic and ethical sides of righteousness, is conspicuous by its absence, but the second half of the chapter rests on the thought of the first half, viz. the identification of the Christian with Christ in His new life of power over the flesh and sin, and therefore the Apostle's language about the duty of devotion to δικαιοσύνη as the religious ideal could not be misunderstood, as if it implied that in this career of goodness a man was somehow less dependent upon God than in the initial crisis of justification. The juridical associations of 'righteousness' and 'justify' made it more easy for the Apostle to bring out the absolute indebtedness of man to God for forgiveness and fellowship at the outset of the Christian experience. They did not suggest so naturally the same exclusion of merit in the statement of the new career of δικαιοσύνη; in fact, their terminology did not lend itself so readily* to the expression of this positive and living content in justification at all, for we cannot assume that he ever used the verb 'justify' (apart from the quotation in 3⁴) of God in any sense except that of pronouncing a verdict. But when believers were 'counted righteous,' because they believed in Christ who had died for their sins, this involved their possession by God; they were now His, for His own purposes, and His purpose was life. Through their organic union with Christ, this life is reproduced in their experience, and consummated. 'He glorifies those whom he has justified' (Ro 8³⁰). Probably it was to avoid any possible misapprehension that St. Paul never spoke of God 'making' men righteous; he reserved δικαιοῦν strictly for the verdict of acquittal, which altered once and for all the standing of the sinner before his God. Instead of using the same term for the process of making the justified man 'righteous' in the moral sense of the term, he employed other words (e.g. Ro 7⁴) and metaphors. Nevertheless the acquittal was a creative act, and even 'righteousness' is used in connexion, e.g., with life, which shows what was in the writer's mind. Allusions like those in 2 Co 5¹⁵ and Ro 8¹⁰ (whatever view is taken of this clause; cf. above, p. 372) indicate what he regarded as implicit in the initial verdict of 'justified,' and what prompted him for once to employ δικαιοῦν as he does in Ro 6¹⁵.

Finally, a word upon the idea of rewards and punishments being meted out to Christians at the end. Bunyan pointed out that the village of Morality lay off the straight, safe road to the Celestial City; he also recalled how Mr. Honest in his lifetime had appointed 'one Good-conscience' to help him over the River of Death, and how 'the last words of Mr. Honest were, Grace reigns.' So with St. Paul. He warns the Christian off 'works of the law' (Mr. Legality is the leading inhabitant of the village of Morality!), and also warns him not to meet the end without a 'good conscience, without a moral record which will bear the most searching scrutiny. For such a scrutiny awaits even the justified, even those 'for whom there is now no condemnation'; they will be taken to account before the Divine tribunal for what they have made of their life. The emphasis set by St. Paul on the moral transformation of the believing man is shown by this striking fact that he retains the conception of judgment being passed on the works even of Christians at the end, although logically it seems incompatible with the truth that Christians were already free from doom and assured of salvation. Various explanations of this have been offered. The Apostle's stress upon recompense is excused as a remnant of his traditional Pharisaic theology, which he did not reconcile with his evangelical principle of justification by faith; the two are left side by side as parallel lines, religious and ethical; or, the doctrine of judgment on works is taken to refer to the degrees of glory in which Christians are to stand, all being saved as believers in Christ, but with varying records. The latter view† is ingenious, but it has to be read into St.

* St. Paul did not quote Ps 118¹⁹ as Clement of Rome did (xviii. 2-4), to show that 'of the numerous gates which are opened, this in righteousness is the gate in Christ, whereby blessed are all they that enter and make straight their paths in holiness and righteousness.' In view of Gal 6⁵ it is literally, but no more than literally, correct to say (with Lightfoot on Ro 6²¹) that St. Paul 'never uses καρπός of the results of evil-doing, but always substitutes εργα.' Still he does tend to confine this organic metaphor to the new life in the spirit; he avoids speaking of καρπός δικαιοσύνης (cf. Ph 1¹³, LXX) except in Ph 1¹⁴.

Paul's language in order to explain all the facts. Others point out that the equivalence of reward and service is not mechanical or juridical, and that the deeds which come up for scrutiny at the end are the 'fruit of the Spirit.' In any case, St. Paul never regarded justifying faith as either morally indifferent or guaranteeing mechanically a good life. He retains judgment on the works of the Christian* as a justified man, on account of his strong sense of ethical responsibility. There may be a formal contradiction, but the significant thing is that both in 2 Co 5th. ('I am eager to satisfy him, whether in the body or away from it; for we have all to appear before the tribunal of Christ, each to be requited for what he has done with his body, well or ill') and in Ph 3rd, where the possession of the Divine righteousness at the end does not exclude personal effort in the present,† the Apostle's religious experience is larger than the logical inferences of the strict righteousness-doctrine. To be justified by faith was God's gift. But it was more than a gift; it was a vocation, a career—Aufgabe as well as Gabe. Because it was the gift of a new relationship, the recipient had to work from it or with it scrupulously: 'Work strenuously at your salvation, for it is God who in his goodwill enables you to will this and to achieve it' (Ph 2nd). My aim, he adds, is 'to see if I too can attain the resurrection from the dead' (Ph 3rd), that being part and parcel of the Divine righteousness which depended on faith. Baur takes this last clause and writes opposite it, 'If there be anything that our apostle could not possibly have written it is that dubious ἐπὶ τῷ καταντήσω ἐς τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν, where his whole fellowship with Christ is put in question.' St. Paul could not have written it, unless he had been more than a Paulinist—a Paulinist of Baur's type. But he was a great Christian. He could conceive it possible that even he might be a reprobate, and he wished his churches to feel the same wholesome fear of themselves. He knew there was such a thing as receiving the grace of God in vain. Nothing would have been more out of keeping with his doctrine of assurance than a Christianized Pharisaism which counted lightly on final acceptance.‡ It is not a proof of the unauthenticity of Philippians that he introduces this remarkable allusion to the subjective aspect of righteousness. On paper the collocation of this with the assurance of acquittal on the score of faith may seem heterogeneous, just as the cognate association of justification by faith with judgment to be passed on the conduct of Christians may appear an antinomy. But, while we learn to know St. Paul first on paper, the clue to the real St. Paul lies in the spiritual and ethical attitude towards the realities of God and human life, which can and must hold together in the Christian consciousness things which logically amount to a paradox.

The judgment on works, i.e. on the behaviour of Christians as justified men as well as on outsiders, implies the recompense of good conduct and service as well as the retribution upon evil. The good life is crowned, at the end (2 Ti 4th). This was sometimes expressed by St. Paul as receiving God's 'praise,' e.g. in 1 Co 4th (almost in the sense of approval), where each faithful servant gets his proportionate meed of praise from God, when the final scrutiny upon the records of service takes place (cf. Ro 2nd). This shows that the equivalence of reward and service is not a mechanical equivalence or even a purely juridical verdict, but, as in the teaching of Jesus, a gracious act of God. This is confirmed by the fact that the deeds for which men are rewarded are done under the inspiring Spirit; they are the outcome of a process (Gal 5th 6th), and the very process is more than a human achievement. The Pauline doctrine thus differs from the Jewish conception of the judgment,* which tended to fix a man's fate by the tally of meritorious actions which he could produce at the end, one of these being faith or fidelity. To St. Paul, faith is the principle which inspires the whole process of conduct.†

* It is impossible (in face of Ro 2nd and 2 Co 5th) to hold that he kept it for outsiders.

† Titius (Der Paulinismus, pp. 203-205) traces in Ph 3rd a weakening of the definitive character of justification, although he interprets Gal 217 of the constant task which falls to the Christian—the task of maintaining his position as a justified man. Gal 217 is a difficult link in a difficult chain of argument, but it probably means that even Jews who sought righteousness on Christ's terms had to confess they were sinners; they could not bring forward any racial privilege which would exempt them from the verdict that 'all have sinned' (Ro 3rd).

‡ Cf. Pascal's saying: 'au lieu de dire, "s'il n'y avait point en Dieu de miséricorde, il faudrait faire toutes sortes d'efforts pour la vertu," il faut dire, au contraire, que c'est parce qu'il y a en Dieu de la miséricorde, qu'il faut faire toutes sortes d'efforts' (Pensées, ed. E. Havet, Paris, 1866, vol. ii. p. 103).

The religious interest in this reward of service and conduct is expressed in the original form of the prayer in the Te Deum: 'We believe that thou shalt come to be our judge. We therefore pray thee, help thy servants, whom thou hast redeemed with thy precious blood; make them to be rewarded (not 'numbered'—the true reading is 'munerari,' not 'numerari') with thy saints in glory everlasting.' The tone of this petition recalls the spirit of St. Paul's emphasis on judgment or praise for the Christian at the end. He employs terms which literally are incompatible with his original view of justification, but he employs them in such a way as to urge ethical responsibility without compromising the grace of God or affording any ground for the unhealthy καυχῆσθαι which it was his relentless aim to eradicate from righteousness at any stage and in any form of the religious experience.

RING.—Rings on the fingers were among the ornaments worn by Jews, both by men (Gn 38^{13, 23} 41⁴, Lk 15²²) and by women (Is 3¹). A warning against the wearing of rings by Christians is given in Apost. Const. i. 3. That it was needed we can see from the fact that in Ja 2² the Christian congregations are warned against paying undue respect to the man who comes into their assembly 'with a gold ring' (lit. 'golden-ringed'; his hands might be adorned with a number of rings). Clement of Alexandria, while forbidding to Christians such ornaments as are mere luxuries, makes an exception of the ring because of its use for the purpose of sealing.

RIVER (ποταμός, Ac 16¹³, 2 Co 11²⁶, Rev 8¹⁰ 9¹⁴ 12¹⁵ 16^{4, 12} 22^{1, 2}; the references to rivers in the Gospels are even fewer [cf. Mt 7²³, Mk 1⁵, Lk 6⁴⁸, Jn 7³⁸]).—The Jordan is the only river in Palestine proper, worthy of the name. It is rightly called the Jordan, which probably means 'the Descender,' as it falls some 2,000 ft. in a distance of 100 miles. Among the other streams and mountain torrents in Palestine there are the Kishon, which drains Galilee westward; the Yarmuk and the Jabbok, which carry the waters of Bashan and Gilead into the Jordan; the Leontes and Orontes, which rise in Coele-Syria and drain the great basin between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon; and the Euphrates, greatest of all, forming the boundary of Palestine on the N.E.

The rivers mentioned in apostolic history carry us beyond Palestine. Certain references to rivers, indeed, are but figures of speech. That alluded to in Ac 16¹³ is best identified with the Gangitis, a tributary of the Strymon near Philippi. On its banks St. Paul and his companions found a place of prayer, with a small building possibly in connexion with it. According to Josephus (Ant. xiv. x. 23), the decree of Halicarnassus allowed the Jews 'to make their places of prayer by the seashore, according to the custom of their fathers.' Tertullian (ad Nat. i. 13) also, about A.D. 200, mentions 'prayers on the shore' as characteristic of the Jews (cf. Ac 21¹⁵). The Jews in Philippi at that time were probably too few in number to possess a synagogue. This 'place of prayer,' being situated by a river, was convenient for ceremonial washings. In another passage (2 Co 11²⁶), St. Paul, in illustration of his unflinching Christian endurance, recounts the perils he had suffered in his missionary journeys from swollen and turbulent 'rivers,' which had been treacherous to ford or swim. Doubtless he had had many hazardous experiences of this character. When the rivers of Asia Minor and Palestine are in flood, to ford them is little less than a tragedy. The rains and melting snows keep most of them bridgeless.

Two references in the Book of Revelation are of similar import and may be considered together. In the first (8¹⁰), when the third angel sounds, there falls from heaven a great star, burning as a torch, upon the third part of the 'rivers' and upon the fountains of waters. The star is called 'wormwood,' a bitter drug, typical of Divine punishment, and regarded as a mortal poison. In the second passage (16⁴), the third angel pours out his bowl into the 'rivers' and fountains of waters, and they become blood. In consequence, there is no more drinking water. All nature is in convulsion, the special object of the Apostle being to announce the doom of Rome and of the worshippers of the Emperor.

There are three other passages in the Apocalypse which may very appropriately be discussed by themselves. In the first (Rev 9¹⁴), the sixth angel with the trumpet is bidden to loose the four angels that are bound at 'the great river Euphrates,' that they may lead forth a mighty army to the sad disaster of Rome. The Euphrates, which in the olden time had been the ideal eastern boundary of Israel's territory, is here conceived of as the frontier between Rome and her enemies the Parthians. In a parallel passage (16¹²) the sixth angel pours out his bowl on the Euphrates, and its waters are dried up that the way may be ready for the kings (of Parthia) to cross over (cf. 17¹⁻¹⁶). Both predictions have to do with the Roman Empire and its fate. In the remaining passage (12¹⁵) the dragon casts water out of his mouth 'as a river' that the Imperial mistress (Rome) may be carried away as by a deluge. In all these passages the Seer is attempting to picture the marvellous deliverance of God's people from their Roman enemies. For the Roman armies under Nero threatened to sweep away Christianity in the wreck of the Jewish nation.

The most beautiful reference to 'rivers' in the whole Bible is yet to be discussed. It is found in Rev 22^{1, 2}, 'And he shewed me a river of water of life, bright as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, in the midst of the street thereof. And on this side of the river and on that was the tree of life, bearing twelve manner of fruits, yielding its fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.' To the Seer of Patmos, the New Jerusalem would not be complete without the river of water of life. The original Paradise (Gn 2¹⁰) possessed a river, and Paradise Regained must possess one too. Rivers, in the East especially, have the power to turn a wilderness into a garden of beauty and fertility; hence the river is here an apt symbol of life. Its waters are 'living waters' (Jer 2¹³) and healing (Ezk 47¹⁻¹²), making 'glad the city of God' (Ps 46⁴). In Ezekiel the life-giving stream, issued from the Temple; now, inasmuch as the city is all temple, the river's ultimate source is from the presence of the king. The river and the street run side by side through the city, as the Barada and the street upon its left bank do to-day in the city of Damascus. Trees of life are placed in rows on either side of the intervening space. Both river and trees are within reach of every one. The river is no longer a mere boundary (Nu 34⁵) or a highway for navigation (Is 18²), nor are its banks even a place of prayer (Ac 16¹³); it is rather a source of spiritual irrigation to immortals. Thus John uses the realistic though archaic language of Jewish piety to delineate the bliss of the Redeemed in a future state. In his picture the river becomes the symbol of the spiritual happiness of the followers of the Lamb; thus heaven is to possess all that Judaism had ever claimed or craved.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

ROADS AND TRAVEL.—The beginnings of travel as of so many other human institutions are hidden in obscurity. No doubt the search for food or better accommodation was a primary motive in early times. Soon would supervene that love of gain which was eventually to send the merchant princes of Rome on long sea-journeys to the bounds of the Empire and beyond.

So Horace, Carm. i. xxxi. 11 ff.:

'Mercator . . .
Ois carus ipsis; quippe ter et quater
Anno reuisens æquor Atlanticum
Impune.'

A later motive still would be curiosity, the desire to obtain knowledge. We learn, for instance, that Germanicus, the adopted son of the Emperor Tiberius, turned aside from his official journey to visit Egypt cognoscendæ antiquitatis (Tac. Ann. ii. 59, etc.). Indeed, Egypt was as much a show place in ancient times as it is now. Pliny the Younger tells us that in his day (about A.D. 100) people would take the longest journeys to see wonderful sights, while blind to the equally wonderful at their own doors. Journeys were also undertaken in those days for purposes of health. The inhabitants of low-lying coast towns resorted to the villages on the uplands in the hot season. There are multitudes of references in the Latin authors to the holiday-resorts near Rome, such as Praeneste, Tibur, Tusculum, to which in the height of summer the jaded Roman resorted. Many journeys were made in pursuit of military or other official duty. There were, however, nearer analogies to the tours of apostles than those mentioned: for long, teachers of philosophy and rhetoric had been wanderers from place to place, and the ancients were also familiar with the wandering priests of various religious cults. Between these two classes stand the apostles like Paul.

1. Conveyances.—In ancient times we hear very little of walking, except for short distances. Dispatch runners, however, are sometimes mentioned as covering distances in an incredibly short space of time. Nor do we hear much of riding, except in the cavalry divisions of the army and in the formal reviews of the equestrian order, etc. Driving was the favourite method of locomotion on land. It was not permitted within the city of Rome itself. The streets were narrow, and any one who wished to be carried in the city had to be conveyed in a sedan-chair (lectica). On reaching a gate of the city the traveller entered the carriage which would be found waiting. It is a curious fact about Roman conveyances that nearly all the Latin words for them are borrowed from the Celtic language of the Gauls. It would seem, therefore, that most types of conveyance were obtained by the Romans from the Gauls. The favourite was the two-horsed carriage. Such it was, doubtless, that St. Paul took when wearied by his final long journey towards Jerusalem (ἐπισκευασμένοι, Ac 21¹⁵, means, 'having equipped [saddled] horses'; cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 302). From the mention of this detail here and here only, it may be inferred that his usual method was the healthiest, safest, and surest, namely, walking.

2. Roads.—(1) Construction.—The Roman system of roads has never been surpassed. Some account, therefore, of the method of their construction is of interest. Perhaps the most detailed description that has survived is that of Statius, in his Silvæ (iv. 3), describing the Via Domitiana, a road which the Emperor Domitian caused to be made between Sinuessa and Puteoli on the west coast of Italy. The problem there was of some difficulty, as the engineers had to deal with rivers, marshes, hills, and forests. The poet describes how on the old track the traveller was jolted, how the wheels stuck in the ground while the pole was high in air, how the populace had all the terrors of a sea-voyage on land, added to the discomfort of the painfully slow progress. The journey that once took a whole day now takes 'scarcely two hours'! First the track was marked out, then balks were cut through, and the earth was removed to a considerable depth all the way along. The bed thus obtained was then filled up with fresh material. This consisted of layers of sand and stones of various sizes. The stones were kept in position partly by means of dowels connecting one with another, partly by the use of wedge-shaped stones driven into interstices at the sides of the road. The building of the road involved extensive labour of various kinds. Hills had to be stripped of their trees, stones and beams had to be planed, pools had to be drained, the courses of streams to be diverted, bridges to be constructed, etc. Our own country provides many examples of Roman roads, some in excellent preservation. Sometimes one may have the chance of seeing a Roman road in section, for instance that between Alcester and Dorchester (Oxon.) in a quarry on Shotover Hill. The upper surface of the best roads consisted commonly of square blocks of basalt (saxum silex) placed angularly, with the corners pointing towards the sides and the direction of the road. Such blocks may be seen in position on the Appian Way near Terracina, at Tusculum as one ascends the hill, and also at Ostia, where the recent excavations have produced marvellous results.

(2) Upkeep.—The upkeep of the roads was naturally a matter of the greatest importance. The thoroughness of the initial construction was such that the ordinary upkeep was not so serious a matter as it would otherwise have been. Landslides and other accidents must have been comparatively rare, but everyone knows that even a good road, like a good house, requires careful watching, if it is to be kept in perfect condition. During the Empire such duties were entrusted to definite officials. Augustus in 27 B.C. took in hand the repair of the roads of Italy. In 20 B.C. he appointed curatores viarum, who appear to have had a general oversight of the roads of Italy. In Claudius' time we hear of curatores of particular roads, men who had already held the prætorship. Curatores of equestrian rank are seldom found, and had charge only of the second-class roads. The prætorian curatores had under them subcuratores. The Italian roads seem for the most part to have been supported out of the public treasury, though the local authorities and the Imperial treasury had a share in the cost of the upkeep. We hear of tabularii, Imperial officials concerned with disbursements for this purpose (cf. Hirschfeld in the Literature). The streets of Rome itself were under the charge of another department.

(3) Purpose.—The original purpose with which the Roman roads were made was military, not commercial. It was not so much the army that followed in the wake of trade, as trade that followed the army. As soon as a particular district had been garrisoned by the Romans, it was a necessary part of the scheme of defence and subjection that the garrison should be connected with Rome by a road or series of roads, along which, in the event of a rising (tumultus) of the enemy, an army could be brought as rapidly as possible. But though military in their origin, such was the effectiveness of the pax Romana that for the most part these roads were used for political and commercial purposes, or for those of general travel.

Perhaps the most important use to which the roads were put in Imperial times was the service of the Imperial post. This was established by Augustus, perhaps on some Eastern model, for the effective dispatch of business. By the arrangement entered into between Augustus and the Senate, half the provinces were under the control of the Emperor, and he had his financial agents (procuratores) in the other half. Centralization of government was a feature of the Roman Empire from the first, and in the exaggerated form which it attained in the 4th cent. A.D. was one of the causes, probably the chief cause, of its disintegration. The Roman Emperors were as a class hard-working men who took administration seriously. Pliny the Younger tells that his uncle, the Elder Pliny, used to help the Emperor Vespasian with his correspondence before dawn (Ep. iii. 5), it being the Roman practice to gain time by getting up early rather than by sitting up late. It is obvious, therefore, that the land and sea routes were both in constant use by Imperial dispatch-carriers. For this purpose the roads were all provided with mansiones or stopping-places, where the Imperial dispatch-carriers could obtain relays of horses and thus reach their destination as early as possible. The Imperial post was strictly reserved for Imperial purposes. Even governors of provinces were unable to use the service for their own ends unless they had received a diploma or passport from the Emperor himself entitling them to do so (Pliny, Ep. ad Traianum, 45, with Hardy's note [London, 1889]).

(4) Milestones.—The roads were provided with a system of milestones. The Roman mile was one thousand passus, and by a passus was meant a double-step, after which the feet were in the same relative position as at the first. As this measure was estimated at about 4·85 English ft., a Roman mile was 430 English ft. shorter than an English mile. All milestones in Italy were measured from the miliarium aureum, set up in the Forum at Rome by Augustus. Placed at every thousand passus, they measured about 6 ft. high on an average, and were cylindrical in shape, often with a square base belonging to the same block (as sometimes also in modern England). The stone was inscribed with the name, titles, and year (of office) of the reigning Emperor. Thousands of these stones have been discovered, and every year adds to the number. In the provinces systems of milestones counted from various important centres have been found.

(5) Inns.—Inns provided accommodation for travellers. From all accounts these seem to have been not only very humble in character, but also brothels at the same time. This is no doubt partly the reason why Cicero and other travellers in Republican times spent the nights of a journey either in their own country-houses or in those of their friends, as far as possible. Certainly it explains the apostolic insistence on hospitality (Ro 12¹³, He 13¹, 1 Ti 3², Tit 1⁸, 1 P 4⁹). By 'hospitality' (φιλοξενία, lit. 'love of strangers [foreigners]') in such passages is intended the entertainment, not of fellow-citizens, but of strangers from a distance. The inns were no fit places for persons whose lives were dedicated to chastity and all holy living. From the scanty references to them in literature one can see that they were avoided by all respectable persons, as were the cook-shops of the cities ('dignitosa homini popinam ingredi notabile est,' pseudo-Augustine, Quæstiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti CXXVII. no. 102, § 5, ed. Souter, Vienna and Leipzig, 1908).

(6) Perils of the road.—From what has been said it will be gathered that the roads were on the whole safe, and this was indeed the case. The pax Romana told against brigandage as it told against revolt. But there were certain districts where brigandage was a real menace; one was the Isaurian mountains in the neighbourhood of Pisidian Antioch and Lystra. Nothing is said in the Book of Acts about this, but the general reference in 2 Co 11³ serves to fill out the Acts narrative (cf. Pelag. on 2 Co 11²³⁻²⁴: 'hæc in Actibus non omnia repperiuntur, quia nec in Epistulis omnia quæ ibi scripta sunt continentur'). Ramsay has suggested (*Church in the Roman Empire*², London, 1894, p. 24) that 'perils of robbers' refers to the journey from Perga in Pamphylia across Mt. Taurus to Pisidian Antioch and back again. That brigands played a considerable part in the life of the time is shown not only by the story of the Good Samaritan, but also by the frequent references to brigands as well as pirates in the Greek romances of the Early Empire.

(7) Chief road-systems.—We may now proceed to enumerate the chief road-systems of the Roman Empire, or rather those of which the apostles seem to have had some experience. The reader who desires a full, or approximately full, list will have to consult the works enumerated in the Literature. For our purpose, Britain, Germany, Spain, North Africa, Moesia, and Thrace may be left out of account. The remaining countries we shall take in order.

(a) In Italy the Via Appia, 'longarum regina viarum' (Stat. Silvæ, ii. 2, 12), deserves mention as the oldest of the great Roman roads, built by the censor Appius Claudius Cæcus in 312 B.C. It left Rome by the Porta Capena in the south, and passed by Aricia, Tres Tabernæ (Ac 28¹⁵), and Forum Appi (28¹⁵) to Tarracina (Anxur) (modern Terracina), the white cliffs of which are often referred to by ancient authors. Up to this point the road is perfectly straight, having been built over the marshland of the Campagna. Much of this land is now drained, but with as yet poor results to agriculture. The building of the road over this country was a great engineering feat for those days. After Tarracina its course is inland by Fundi to Formiæ, the fabled home of the Læstrygonian cannibals in the Odyssey, then to Minturnæ (Menturnæ), where the great Gaius Marius hid among the reeds in his days of adversity, then by Suessa Aurunca to Sinuessa, where it again reaches the sea. Turning inland again, it makes its way to Casilinum and then to Capua. It was here that St. Paul reached it by a road which ran between Capua and Puteoli (Ac 28¹³). A generation after his time Domitian built the road called after him Via Domitiana, direct from Puteoli to Sinuessa, which saved the detour necessary before that time. After Capua the Via Appia takes its final inland course, which eventually ends in Brundisium (Brindisi) on the other side of the peninsula. The intervening chief stations are Calatia, Candium, Beneventum, Æclanum, Venusia, near which Horace was born, and Tarentum, where the sea is at last reached. The terminus Brundisium is attained by a straight road across the 'heel of the boot.' The classic description of a journey on this road by the poet Horace and his friends (Sat. i. 5) will be referred to below. The importance of this Via Appia cannot be over-rated. By it almost every person who travelled between Rome and the East by sea had to go for part of his journey, whether he took ship at Puteoli on the west coast, or at Brundisium on the east. Such a traveller could avoid it only by travelling northwards and taking the overland route (the Via Egnatia) to Macedonia and Thrace, or else by following the Via Ostiensis, and taking ship at Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber.

Other Italian routes had their importance also. Perhaps the greatest of them was the North Road, called the Via Flaminia, which enters modern Rome by the Porta del Popolo, below the Pincian gardens in the N., and corresponds in its Roman part to the modern Corso Umberto Primo, the Bond Street of Rome. The Via Flaminia went by Falerii, Ocriculum (modern Otricoli, where the famous bust of Jupiter was found), Narnia, Interamna (where the Emperor Tacitus was born), Nuceria, to Fanum Fortunæ, where it reaches the Adriatic, then along the coast through Pisaurum to Ariminum (modern Rimini), its terminus. From Ariminum the Via Emilia started, and went by Bononia (modern Bologna), Mutina (modern Modena), Parma, Placentia (modern Piacenza), to Mediolanum (modern Milano). A fourth road in Italy was a branch of Via Appia from Capua by Forum Populi and Thurii to Ad Columnam, whence the crossing to Messina (modern Messina) in Sicily was easy. A fifth, the Via Aurclia, ran along the west coast to Centum Cellæ (modern Civit  Vecchia), Pisa, Luna (famous for Carrara marble) to Genova.

(b) Routes in Gaul may be briefly referred to. After reaching Milan the traveller had a choice of various Alpine roads, built by Augustus and his successors. For Gaul he would probably take that by Susa and the Mont G n vre. By this route the journey to Arclate (modern Arles) was only 395 Roman miles. Another road led by Augusta Pr toria (Aosta) and the Little St. Bernard to Vienna (modern Vienne, much less important than its ancient counterpart), and Lugudunum (modern Lyons) and through Genava (modern Geneva) and Vesontio (modern Besan on) to Argentoratum (Strasbourg, Strassburg). There were also important roads linking up the chief cities in Western Gaul. Gesoriacum (Boulogne-sur-Mer) was the point from which crossings were made to Rutupia  (Richborough) on the British coast.

(c) For Pannonia and Dalmatia (2 Ti 4¹⁰) on the east side of the Adriatic the traveller went from Bononia (Bologna) to Patanium (Padova) and thence to Aquileia, if he desired a land route. The journey presupposed in 2 Ti 4¹⁰ would be undertaken across the Adriatic from Brundisium to Dyrrhachium (Durazzo), as also the journey to Nicopolis (Tit 3¹²).

(d) The student of the Apostolic Age is more nearly concerned with the routes in the eastern provinces. In the province of Syria and neighbouring districts there were several well-marked routes. Taking Jerusalem as a centre, we may indicate several roads. There was the road 'going down from Jerusalem to Gaza' (Ac 8²⁶) in a south-westerly direction. It passed over ground which in apostolic times was very sparsely populated (Ac 8²⁶). It was doubtless by a branch road going off to the right that Philip found his way to Azotus (Ashdod) (Ac 8⁴⁰). The eunuch of the Candace would continue his way to Gaza, and then by the coast-road into Egypt, thence southwards to Abyssinia. Philip proceeded from Azotus through Joppa and Antipatris to C sarea (Ac 8⁴⁰) on the coast. The part between C sarea and Antipatris was the same as that gone over by St. Paul on several occasions (Ac 9³⁰ 18-²¹ 21⁸ 23³³; cf. 1 ³ 30), passing through Lydda, where St. Peter had been in the early days also (Ac 9). The shortest route from Jerusalem to Damascus was to cross the Jordan and go via Gerasa. From Damascus there was a road passing through C sarea P neas to Tyre, and another to Sidon.

(e) The land-journeys of St. Paul in the peninsula of Asia Minor have been finally fixed by the researches of W. M. Ramsay. We are not informed as to the way in which Barnabas and Saul journeyed from Antioch to Jerusalem (Ac 11³⁰), but there is little doubt that Saul was fetched from Tarsus to Antioch (Ac 11²⁵) by the coast-road passing within the bend between Asia Minor and the province of Syria. It was probably along the southern coast of the island of Cyprus that Barnabas and Saul journeyed between Salamis and Paphos. Reaching land at Attaleia in the province of Pamphylia they sailed up the river C strus as far as Perga. From there they took the road northwards by Adada to 'Pisidian' Antioch (described best in Ramsay, *Church in Roman Empire*³, p. 16 ff.; cf. also The Cities of St. Paul, London, 1907, p. 247 ff., Athen um for 12th Aug. 1911, p. 192 f., 'Iconium and Antioch' in Exp., 8th ser., ii. [1911] 149 ff.). Then for part of the route they retraced their steps and journeyed eastwards to Iconium, then S.S.W. to Lystra, then S.E. to Derbe. The 'Imperial Road,' however, mentioned in the Acta Pauli in connexion with the Thecla legend, passed direct from Pisidian Antioch to Lystra, and did not touch Iconium (Ramsay's discovery, told in Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire [Aberdeen Univ. Studies, no. 20 (1906)], pp. 241-243). This road 'passed about seven or eight miles south-west of Iconium' (Ramsay). The return route taken by St. Paul and Barnabas from Derbe to Attaleia (Ac 14²¹⁻²²) was the same as the outgoing.

The second journey (15⁴¹) was, as far as Tarsus, by the same route as St. Paul had taken when he was first brought to Antioch (Ac 11³). We may conjecture that one of the 'churches' referred to in Ac 15⁵¹, and nowhere else, was at Issos; for Issos was on this route. On leaving Tarsus St. Paul and Silas no doubt struck straight to the north by the historic road, which becomes the pass through the Taurus mountains known as the Cilician Gates (this route has been graphically described with illustrations by Lady Ramsay in Travel, vol. ii. no. 23 [1898] 494-498). On reaching the northern side of this great mountain range the travellers went by Podandos, Loulon, Halala (the later Colonia Faustina, Faustopolis), Kybistra, and Laranda to Derbe. From Derbe they travelled by their old route to Lystra, Iconium, and 'Pisidian' Antioch. Between Iconium and Antioch they would pass through Vasada and M sthia. After Antioch they followed a direction new to them. It is probable that the direction taken was west to Lysias, then northward through Nakoleia to Dorylaion on the Tembrogios. There they were kar  M stlar (opposite Mysia), and from there a road went N.N.W. to Nicaea in Bithynia, which was the province that they desired to visit. Dorylaion was a parting of the ways. 'The spirit of Jesus suffered them not' to go to Bithynia. They therefore took the other turning, went westwards along the left bank of the river Rhyndakos, through Artemeia, across the river Granikos, and then S.W. to Troas (Ac 16⁸).

On arriving at Neapolis, the port of Philippi in Macedonia, they made their way by the Via Egnatia to Philippi itself (Ac 16¹). From there they travelled along the Via Egnatia to Amphipolis, Apollonia, and Thessalonica. This important road went from Apollonia and Dyrrhachium on the Adriatic Sea to the river Hebrus beside Kypsela. If the name be derived from the town of Gnathia or Egnatia in Apulia (Italy), as is generally believed, then it is clear that from early times it must have been regarded as the overland route from South Italy to the East. Even before the days of Roman pre-eminence it was evidently an important trade-route between the Adriatic and the  gean and Black seas. In Cicero's time it was regarded primarily as a military road (for its direction see below). From Thessalonica St. Paul and Silas were spirited away to Bero a. From there St. Paul was hurried to the sea-coast, probably to the nearest harbour, as matters were urgent (1¹⁴). From Athens (17¹⁵-18¹) he went, by sea no doubt, to Corinth, and from there by the short land journey to the southern port of Corinth, Cenchr e (18¹⁸). Luke sketches the sea-journeys that followed, Cenchr e to Ephesus, Ephesus to C sarea, with great rapidity (18¹⁹⁻²²). In 18²³ the same journey is implied as is described in 15⁴¹ 16¹⁻⁶. 19¹ takes St. Paul through a district where he had never journeyed before. 18²³ has brought him as far as Pisidian Antioch, and then he is said to have crossed rd   νωτερικ    ρη and thus reached Ephesus (19¹). W. M. Ramsay has clearly explained what is meant by this phrase 'the higher-lying parts.' There was a well-recognized, important, and ancient route to Ephesus by Apollonia, Apamea-Cel ne, the Lycus valley, Colosse, Laodicea, the M ander valley, Antioch, and Tralles. St. Paul purposely avoided this route, probably because of fatigue, and thus never visited either Colossæ or Laodicea (cf. Col., passim). He chose the higher-lying, quieter, and healthier route over the hills, where the traffic was light. The unimportant places he passed through—Ly-ias, Metropolis, Seiblia, Dionysopolis, Teira, etc.—are never mentioned in sacred story. What route was taken by him from Ephesus to Macedonia (20th) must remain uncertain, but it is probable that he coasted northwards to Troas and then repeated the journey of 16th. Whether he took the sea-journey to Athens on this occasion also from the unknown port near Berea is uncertain; but to Athens and Corinth he went. He then returned through Macedonia, no doubt by his former route, and once more back to Troas (Ac 20³⁻⁶). A coasting voyage followed to Tyre (21st) and Ptolemais (v. 4) and Cæsarea (v. 8). From Cæsarea he went by the old land-route to Jerusalem. It is specially mentioned that horses were hired for this stage (v. 13): St. Paul was weary in body and spirit, and knew the importance of arriving in Jerusalem as fresh as possible.

(f) We have thus followed all the land-routes along which St. Paul is known to have travelled. Before going on to refer to sea-routes, it will not be without interest to give some account of one or two land journeys by others recorded in ancient literature.

From Cicero's letters we are able to reconstruct some of his itineraries in the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. In 58 B.C. he was exiled from Rome. He journeyed south by the Appian Way, as far as Capua, and then took the road to the right referred to above, as far as Vibo Valentia in the country of the Bruttii. From there he found his way to Brundisium, from which he crossed the Adriatic to Dyrrhachium (Att. iii. 8). From there he reached Thessalonica on 22nd May, having gone east by the Egnatian Way referred to above. The complete course of the Via Egnatia was as follows: Dyrrhachium, Clodiana (where the branch from Apollonia met it), Scampa, Lychnidus, Scirtiana, Nicæa, Heraclea, Cellæ, Edessa, Pella (where Alexander the Great was born), Thessalonica, Apollonia, Amphipolis, Philippi, Neapolis, Porsulæ, Brendice, Tempyra, Doriscus, Dyme, Cypsela, Syracellæ, Apri, Bisanthe, Heræum, Perinthus, Selymbria, Melantia, Byzantium (later Constantinople). Cicero returned by the same way by which he had come.

The journey he took to his province Cilicia in 51 B.C. may also be followed with interest. He left Rome in the beginning of May and arrived at his villa at Arpinum (his birthplace), among the hills, about the 3rd May. From there he went by the Arcanum of his brother to Aquinum (afterwards the birthplace of Juvenal), and reached Minturnæ on the 5th. He then went by the Appian Way to his villa at Cumæ, and from there by Puteoli to his villa at Pompeii, reached at latest on the 9th. The 10th and 11th May were spent at the villa of a friend at Trebula, from which he went to Beneventum (11th May, evening), Venusia (night of 14th spent there), Tarentum (arrived 18th May, departed 21st May), Brundisium (arrived 22nd May, departed 10th or 11th June). The whole journey from Beneventum to Brundisium was of course on the Appian Way. From Brundisium he crossed the sea, and we hear of him at Corcyra (12th June), the Sybota Islands (13th June), and Actium (14th June). We next hear of him at Athens (arrived 25th June, left 6th July). On 6th July he sailed from the Piræus, the harbour of Athens, to Zoster, from there on 8th July to Ceos, on 9th July to Gyarus, on the 10th to Syros, on the 11th to Delos. He then went by Samos to Ephesus (arrived 22nd July, departed 26th July). On the 26th July he began his inland journey. His province, named

Cilicia, comprised a very large territory, indeed the whole of what was afterwards Southern Galatia, as well as Lycia, Pamphylia, Cilicia (proper), etc. He proceeded along the great road already mentioned, and reached Tralles (27th July), Laodicea (arrived 31st July, departed 3rd August, early). Laodicea was the first city of the province on the west. Henceforth it was an official progress that he made. Neither the rate of his progress from place to place nor the actual time he stayed in each place can be fixed with certainty. The dates given by O. E. Schmidt (Der Briefwechsel des M. Tullius Cicero, Leipzig, 1893, p. 78) are not reliable (Ramsay in Exp., 8th ser., ii. [1911] 149 ff., repeated in The First Christian Century, London, 1911, p. 145 ff.). The best account is by L. W. Hunter (aided by W. M. Ramsay) in JRS iii. [1914] 74 ff. It is probable that he travelled at the rate of about 21 or 22 English miles a day, and certain that he stayed at Apameia (for which he must have diverged from the main road) and Philomelion, about three to five days in each. At Laodicea Combusta he left the great road and took the branch to the right for Iconium (reached 23rd August). There he spent a considerable time getting his army together. From Iconium he marched towards Cybistra, but, on learning that his predecessor Appius Claudius was at Iconium, he returned there, only to find that he had gone. He resumed his journey (3rd Sept.) to Cybistra (reached 19th or 20th Sept.) and pitched his camp there. Leaving Cybistra on 22nd Sept., he crossed the Taurus range on 24th Sept. by the Cilician Gates, and on 5th Oct. reached Tarsus. Two days later he began his march to the Amanus range, and on 8th Oct. encamped at Mopsuestia. A later camp was at Epiphanea, whence Cicero on the evening of 12th Oct. made the ascent of the Amanus mountains, and next day defeated the enemy and was hailed as Imperator by his troops. He descended to Issus, and was encamped till 18th Oct. near Alexander's Altars. He then marched to Pindenissus, began its siege on 21st Oct., and captured it on 17th December. About the end of December he reached Tarsus again. He left Tarsus on 5th Jan. 50 and returned to Laodicea, no doubt by the same route as before (with the exception perhaps of the detour to Synada), reaching it on 11th February. There he remained almost three months. On 7th May he returned to Tarsus by the old route (Apameia, etc.), and he arrived there on 5th June. From there he marched eastwards, making a demonstration in force, and returned to Tarsus not later than 17th July. On 30th July he left Tarsus, and, as it was the hot season, very probably by sea. We next hear of him at Side in Pamphylia, which suggests that he had got there by coasting. He left Side on 4th Aug. and arrived at Rhodes about 10th August. He wished to cross the Ægean before the season of the trade-winds (27th Aug.), but was compelled, on account of the unseaworthiness of his ship, to cast anchor at Ephesus. There he remained the whole of September. He left Ephesus on 1st Oct. and landed on the 14th at the Piræus. From Athens he took a land-journey across the Isthmus and then along the north of the Peloponnese to Patræ (modern Patras). He embarked there on 3rd Nov. and on the next day reached Alyzia in Acarnania. Early on 6th Nov. he sailed from there and travelled to Leucas (6th Nov.), Actium (7th and 8th Nov.), Corcyra (9th to 16th Nov.), Cassiope in Corcyra (16th to 22nd Nov.), across the Adriatic to Hydruntum (23rd Nov.) and to Brundisium (24th Nov.), having been absent from Italy seventeen and a half months. Leaving Brundisium on the 27th, he proceeded to Eculanum, Trebula (9th Dec.), Suessula, Naples, Pompeii (10th Dec. to 12th or 13th Dec.), Cumæ, Formiæ (16th Dec.), Lavernium (25th Dec.), back to Formiæ (25th Dec. to 1st Jan. 49). The outbreak of the civil war and Cicero's desire for a triumph alike kept him outside Rome (a general gave up his claim to a triumph if he entered the city walls). Cicero's further movements at this time were Tarracina (1st Jan.), Pomptinum (2nd Jan.), Alba (3rd Jan.), outside Rome (4th Jan.). Between 8th and 11th Jan. Cicero was given charge of the district of Capua in the interest of the Senate. On the 18th before dawn he left Rome in the direction of Antium, the route being by the Appian Way for the first stage. He was at Formiæ from about 20th to 22nd January. His later movements were to Minturnæ (22nd to 24th Jan.), Cales (24th Jan.), Capua (25th to 28th Jan.), back to Cales and Formiæ (29th Jan. to 3rd Feb.), then again to Capua (4th to 7th Feb.), Cales (7th Feb.), and again to Formiæ (8th to 17th Feb.). On 17th Feb. he journeyed to Cales, and on the 19th back to Formiæ, where he remained till 27th March, on which day he went to his villa at Arpinum among the hills. On 3rd April he arrived at his brother's Laterium (Arcanum). After 7th April he journeyed to the coast: on 13th April at latest he was at Cumæ. On 12th May he went to Pompeii, but on the morning of the next day returned to Cumæ, where he remained till, soon after 19th May, he moved to Formiæ. On 7th June he left Italy by sea for the East, probably for the villa of Atticus in Epirus, where he in all likelihood spent the summer. Before the end of the year 49 he joined Pompey's camp at Dyrrhachium. It is not necessary to follow him further, but it has been instructive to trace Cicero's movements through his letters during these three important years. It is safe to say that of no other man's movements before the 19th cent. do we know as much in detail as of Cicero's.

Early in the year 37 B.C. a journey was taken from Rome to Brundisium for political purposes. The poet Horace and others were in the retinue of the diplomatists. In Sat. i. 5 Horace gives an account of the journey. It is true that he modelled the satire on an earlier one of the old satirist Lucilius on a similar topic, but this fact in no way interferes with the interest of the account. The journey need not have occupied more than nine days (Ovid, Ep. ex Ponto, iv. v. 5-8), but this party, moving leisurely, took thirteen days. The itinerary, according to the latest reconstruction (in Paul Lejay's edition of the Satires, Paris, 1911, p. 146), was as follows:

First day . . .	Rome to Aricia :	over 16 Roman miles.
Second day . .	Aricia to Forum Appi :	" 27 " "
Night of second to third day .	On the canal :	" 16 " "
Third day . . .	To Tarracina :	" 3 " "
Fourth day . .	(1) Tarracina to Fundi :	" 13 " "
" . . .	(2) Fundi to Formiæ :	" 13 " "
Fifth day . . .	Formiæ to Bridge of Campania :	" 27 " "
Sixth day . . .	(1) Bridge of Campania to Capua :	" 17 " "
" . . .	(2) Capua to Caudium :	" 21 " "
Seventh day . .	(1) Caudium to Beneventum :	" 11 " "
" . . .	(2) Beneventum to Trivium :	" 25 " "
Eighth day . .	Trivium to Asculum Apulum :	" 24 " "
Ninth day . . .	Asculum Apulum to Canusium :	" 35 " "
Tenth day . . .	Canusium to Rubi :	" 23 " "
Eleventh day .	Rubi to Barium :	" 23 " "
Twelfth day . .	Barium to Gnatia :	" 37 " "
Thirteenth day.	Gnatia to Brundisium :	" 30 " "

3. Sea-Routes.—We have seen from the experiences of Cicero and other travellers that land-journeys could be performed with a safety and a certainty that are truly astonishing. There was a similar security about journeys over the Mediterranean. The Mediterranean was practically closed to traffic in the five winter months, November to March. Also coasting voyages were, where possible, preferred to voyages right across the sea. These facts, taken in conjunction with the small size of the vessels, account for the safety of ancient navigation. Greek sailors steered by the Great Bear, and Phœnicians by the Lesser Bear (Lucan, Bell. Civ. iii. 219), but it was a common custom to put in to harbour at night and sleep on shore. Examples of both kinds of voyages are to be found in the Acts of the Apostles.

The best plan to follow in describing the principal sea-routes of the Mediterranean will be to select several examples, all from the 1st cent. A.D., of sea-journeys that were actually taken. Philo the Jew, in his in Flaccum, v. (ed. Mangey, ii. p. 521), describes most graphically the journey of Herod Agrippa from Rome to Syria, when he went to take over the kingdom conferred upon him by Gaius in A.D. 40. 'As he was about to set out, Gaius counselled him to avoid the direct voyage from Brundisium to Syria, as it was long and wearisome, and to wait for the periodic winds and take the short route via Alexandria. He said that the merchant vessels from that port were quick sailers, and that the steersmen were most skilled, being like charioteers driving horses trained to contests, and taking an unswerving course straight to the goal. And he obeyed, as he was at once his overlord and the advice he gave him seemed to be to his advantage. So, travelling down to Puteoli, and seeing Alexandrian ships at anchor, all in trim for setting sail, he went on board with his family, had a good voyage, and a few days later arrived in sight of port, unexpected and undetected' (cf. ch. xiii. [Mangey, ii. p. 533] for another voyage from Puteoli to Alexandria, which also took only a few days [ὀλίγαι ἡμέραι]). The same voyage was taken by M. Mæcius Celer, sent by the Emperor Domitian as a legatus legionis to command a legion in the province of Syria about A.D. 92 (Stat. Silvæ, iii. 2). A straight course between Puteoli and Alexandria was from May to September the regular course for the corn-ships which brought corn from Egypt to Italy. The ships kept to the south of Crete. Pliny speaks of a record passage of nine days, and it is mentioned that the accession of the Emperor Galba was known at Alexandria within 27 days (Companion to Latin Studies, p. 427). Only favoured persons were allowed to travel by these ships. The corn-fleet flew a special topsail. When the appearance of this sail in the offing warned the people of Puteoli that the great corn-fleet was approaching, a general holiday was immediately proclaimed (Seneca, Ep. 77, § 1).

In the winter the open sea was avoided. The ships sailed across from Alexandria to Myra, and thence, keeping to the northerly side of the Mediterranean as much as possible, made their way to Italy. According to the Bezan text (Ac 21¹), St. Paul found at Myra a ship to which he transferred on his last journey to Syria. Myra was a harbour of the greatest importance for the Levant traffic, and from there vessels sailed straight across to Syrian ports as well as to Alexandria. St. Paul's ship, being a large one, probably cut straight across the Levant from Myra to Tyre, past the west promontory of Cyprus. From Tyre it coasted to Ptolemais and to Cæsarea (vv. 7, 8). The last voyage, to Rome, began at Cæsarea. There St. Paul and his company embarked on a ship going to Adramyttium in N.W. Asia Minor and calling at several ports on the way. They went by Sidon (27²), past the east coast of Cyprus (because of contrary winds), and along the coast of Cilicia and Pamphylia to Myra in Lycia (v. 6). There they left the Adramyttian ship and transhipped to an Alexandrian vessel (with figure-head 'Castor and Pollux') bound for Italy. By slow coasting, in the teeth of a west wind, they passed Patara and Rhodes and came opposite Knidos, and from there made for the east end of Crete and the promontory Salmone. Thence they coasted along the southern side of the island, arriving at Fair Havens, near the city Iasea, about the middle of the south coast. They had already suffered the penalty of those who dared to voyage in winter, and there was a movement in favour of passing the winter in the harbour of Phoenix farther on. A strong east wind, however, got hold of the ship, which was driven relentlessly before it, and they passed south of the little island of Cauda (Cauda). As the wind's force was unabated, they undergirded, furled sail, and threw overboard some of the cargo, and then the tackle. On the fourteenth day after leaving Fair Havens they landed at Malta (Ac 27²⁷ 28¹). From Malta they sailed to Syracuse, tacked between Sicily and Italy, and eventually reached Puteoli. See, further, art. SHIP.

St. Paul had of course taken many voyages before this eventful one. Not all, or at least not all their details, are recorded in Acts. For he mentions (2 Co 11²³) that he had been thrice wrecked and had passed a night and a day on a raft. This happened earlier in his life than the last voyage. Some of his shorter voyages have been referred to earlier in this article. One of the most constant voyages taken in ancient times was that across the Ægean between Corinth and Ephesus. This was one stage on a great Oriental trade-route: from Brundisium to Patrae and then to Lechæum, the northern port of Corinth, then over the Isthmus of Corinth on the ὁλκός, which carried those vessels bodily to the other (southern) harbour Cenchreæ (Ac 18¹⁸). The journey straight across the Ægean brought one to Ephesus. Thence there was a great land trade-route to the Far East. The ease and regularity of this crossing of the Ægean must be remembered in arguments about the number of the Apostle's visits to Corinth. Cicero's slow voyage in the Ægean from the Piræus to Ephesus, referred to above, is a contrast to the direct route Corinth-Ephesus.

We are indebted to Philo for a reference to another Ægean trip (in Flacc. xviii., xix. [ed. Mangey, ii. pp. 533-541]). L. Avilius Flaccus, prefect of Egypt from A.D. 32 to 37, was, during the latter part of his period of government, guilty of such injustice, especially against the Jews, that he was removed to Italy, and tried in Rome. His property was confiscated, and he was banished to the Ægean island of Andros. Soon after (in 38 probably), he was there, by the Emperor's order, put to death. Philo describes his journey. He was taken from Rome by the Appian Way to Brundisium, whence he sailed across the Adriatic and up the Gulf of Corinth to Lechæum, the northern port of Corinth, crossed to Cenchreæ the other port, and sailed from there to the Piræus. The boat was small, and the wind blew strong, and he suffered greatly on this part of his journey. He then coasted along Attica as far as the promontory of Sunium. Rounding Sunium, he passed the small islands of Helene, Kianos (?), and Kythnos, 'and the others that lie in a row,' eventually reaching the larger island Andros. He had been destined for the bleak island of Gyarus, much used as a place of deportation (cf. Juvenal, Sat. i. i. 73, with Mayor's note [London, 1886]), but a friend had interceded for him, and he was sent to Andros instead.

The large use of the Gulf of Corinth in ancient times ought to be mentioned. The project of a canal through the Isthmus of Corinth was often mooted, but never completed. The voyage round the south of Greece was greatly dreaded, on account of the danger of being wrecked on Cape Malea.

So much was this the case that Malea became a proverb for extreme danger, and anyone who had rounded it was a sort of hero in his own eyes and those of everyone else. Pliny the Younger describes to the Emperor Trajan (Ep. 15 [26]) how he had gone to Ephesus to take up the government of his province (about A.D. 111-113) ὡπὲρ Μαλέαν, and Flavius Zenxis, a merchant of Hierapolis in Phrygia, records on his tombstone that he had sailed seventy-two times past Malea from Asia to Italy. Pliny's ultimate destination was Bithynia-Pontus, and his plan was to reach his province from Ephesus, partly by the help of coasting vessels, and partly by the use of carriages (loc. cit.)—the reasons he gives are the periodic winds and the heat respectively. He could under ordinary circumstances have done the whole of the rest of his journey either by land or by sea.

The chief lesson to be derived from a study of ancient navigation is that, small as the vessels were, and primitive as were the methods of navigation, the ancients made a marvellously skilful use of such facilities as they had. The Mediterranean was crowded with craft of all kinds. There were recognized routes for particular journeys, as in modern times. Sailings were as regular, relatively, as in our own day. The sea was for the most part free from piracy in the Apostolic Age. In the matter of sea-voyaging as in the conditions of land-travelling, in the universality of the Greek speech, and in the pacific attitude of the Government, the 1st cent. was fitted, as no succeeding century has been, for the propagation of the gospel in Mediterranean lands, which were at that time pre-eminent in the world.

ROBBERS OF CHURCHES.—This is the AV rendering of the word λεπιδουλοῦ used by the town-clerk of Ephesus on the occasion of the riot described in Ac 19. 'For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess' (Ac 19³⁷). The term 'churches' according to the Elizabethan usage could be applied to pagan temples. The RV substitutes the word 'temples' for 'churches,' but this is also a mis-translation, and there is strong evidence in favour of Ramsay's view that the passage should be translated thus—'guilty neither in act nor in language of disrespect to the established religion of the city.' The term λεπιδουλος could now apply to any person guilty of any form of action disrespectful to the established worship.

Instances of the narrower, more literal meaning of the term occur in Ro 2— and in 2 Mac 4². In the former passage St. Paul asks: 'Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou rob temples?' 'Dost thou rob temples, and so, for the sake of gain, come in contact with abominations without misgiving?'

(Cf. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' London, 1900, p. 600.) In the latter passage, the term 'church-robber' is applied to Lysimachus, brother of Menelaus the high priest, who was killed in a riot (170 B.C.). He and his brother had committed sacrilege by stealing the sacred vessels, and this conduct provoked the disturbance. 'Thus many of them they wounded, and some they struck to the ground, and all of them they forced to flee: but as for the church-robber himself him they killed beside the treasury.'

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, London, 1895, The Church in the Roman Empire, do., 1893; J. T. Wood, Discoveries at Ephesus, do., 1876. R. STRONG.

ROBBERY.—When St. Paul enumerates in his Second Letter to the Corinthian Church the dangers through which he has passed in the prosecution of his missionary labours he includes κινδύνους ληστῶν, 'perils of robbers' (11²⁸). There can be little doubt that, while this peril may have existed on many of the routes in Asia Minor, it existed in a special degree on that through the Taurus mountains by which St. Paul reached Antioch. However valuable for health reasons the journey to the higher land may have been, it involved positive dangers, 'perils of rivers' not less than 'perils of robbers.' While the Roman authorities had set themselves the task of suppressing brigandage, and visited upon brigands the stern punishment of crucifixion, it was obviously impossible to make that suppression complete, especially in mountainous or relatively obscure districts. Augustus discovered how hopeless was the task of rooting out the brigands of the Pisidian mountains. Travellers who could afford it usually adopted the wise precaution of having an escort.

Epigraphic study, associated chiefly with the names of Sterrett and Ramsay, has served to give interesting evidence of the insecurity which prevailed amid the Taurus heights. Patrokles and Douda, for example, set up an epitaph in memory of their son Sousou, a policeman who was slain by robbers, while there is evidence also for the existence of an official—the stationarius—who had to lend assistance in the capture of runaway slaves, a class from which the ranks of the mountain robbers might be most easily recruited.

Emphatic statements respecting the prevalence of robbers during the stormy period preceding the fall of Jerusalem, and an account of the measures adopted by Felix in consequence, may be found in Josephus—'as to the number of the robbers he caused to be crucified, and of those who were caught among them, and whom he brought to punishment, they were a multitude not to be enumerated' (B. J. II. xiii. 2).

ROBE.—See CLOTHES.

ROCK (πέτρα, Ro 9³⁸, 1 P 2⁸, 1 Co 10⁴, Rev 6¹⁵, 16; cf. Ac 27²⁹, Jude 12).—Of the physical features of Palestine, rocks form a conspicuous part. Rock walls and escarpments, deep gorges and desolate crags, caves, fastnesses, and mighty boulders, are common in many portions of the country. Allusions to them on the part of the biblical writers were, therefore, inevitable. Symbolically they stood for solid foundations (Mt 7²⁴), for confession of the Deity of Christ (16¹⁸), and for Christ Himself (1 Co 10⁴). Among the rocks mentioned in Scripture are Sela (Jg 1³⁶, RV), Oreb (7²⁵), Etam (15⁴), and Rimmon (20⁴). Precipitation from a rock was one form of execution (2 Ch 25¹²; cf. Lk 4²⁹).

Of the four principal references to rocks in apostolic history, those in Ro 9³⁸ and in 1 P 2⁸ may appropriately be considered together. Both St. Paul and St. Peter quote and combine the same two prophetic passages (Is 8¹⁴ 23¹⁶), adapting the LXX version of them so as to show that Israel had failed to attain unto God's true law of righteousness, because they sought it not by faith but by works. Because they had not apprehended the wisdom of God's salvation in Jesus Christ, St. Paul declares that he had become unto them 'a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence.' St. Peter probably had St. Paul's statement (Ro 9³⁸) before him when he wrote, for his use of the two passages from Isaiah is practically the same. He tells his readers that they are stumbling through disobedience, and failing to obey what they must recognize is true. Instead of availing themselves of the blessing of the gospel offered them, they are refusing to submit to its influence, and so come into collision with the power and authority of Christ. Both apostles boldly apply to Christ what is spoken by the prophet of Jahweh, and they point to the prophet's words as a prediction of their own people's spiritual blindness and consequent failure. As Jahweh is a firm foundation to those who trust in Him, so is Jesus; but to those who disbelieve, both He and His Son may be a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence.

A more difficult passage is that contained in 1 Co 10⁴, 'And did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of a spiritual rock that followed them: and the rock was Christ' (ἐπὶνεν γὰρ ἐκ πνευματικῆς ἀκολουθοῦσης πέτρας, ἥ δὲ πέτρα ἦν ὁ Χριστός). There is a Rabbinical legend, which can be traced back as far as the 1st cent. A.D., to the effect that the rock of Rephidim (Ex 17⁶; cf. Nu 20¹¹), 'globular, like a bee-hive,' rolled after the camp in Israel's wanderings, and supplied them with water. But in the face of Nu 21⁵, which must have been known to the Apostle, it is scarcely likely that St. Paul believed this. Rather he adapted it, stating explicitly that the rock which followed them was a 'spiritual,' i.e. a supernatural, rock, and that Christ was a rock. The manna was literally 'food from heaven' to him (1 Co 10³; cf. Ps 78²⁴), and so were the water and the rock (Ps 78^{15ff.}); and both the water and the manna were a foreshadowing of the Christian sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper (1 Co 10², 16). St. Paul's argument is briefly this: 'all' ate of the same spiritual food (v. 3), and 'all' drank of the same spiritual drink (v. 4)—the manna and the water being intended to sustain the spirit as well as the body—but only two (Caleb and Joshua) recognized the spiritual presence of Christ, who in His pre-existent state was ever with Israel in their gathering of the manna and beside every cliff which Moses struck. Philo had already identified the rock of Dt 8¹⁵ with the Wisdom of God, and the rock of Dt 32¹³ with His Wisdom and Word; hence it was easy for St. Paul to take another step and identify the smitten rock with Christ, the Rock spiritual. A parallel to this mode of interpretation may be found in He 11²⁶, where the Apostle represents Moses as 'accounting the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.' See also art. METAPHOR.

In a passage in Acts (27²⁹), St. Paul and his ship companions are described as fearful of being driven ashore on 'rocky ground' (τραχεῖς τόποι, literally 'rough places'). While a different expression is used here in the Greek, the reference is evidently to rocks, upon which it would be hazardous to let their vessel strike. In Jude 12, also, a kindred expression (σπαλάδες) is used, in a similar but metaphorical way. 'These are they who are hidden rocks in your love-feasts,' etc. The RV translates σπίλδες by 'spots,' and this has the support not only of the Vulg. maculae, but also of the parallel passage in 2 P 2¹². Hidden, or sunken, rocks is an eminently appropriate metaphor by which to describe the ungodly character of those who, like Balaam and Korah, were inclined to mar the fellowship of Christian believers.

The only other passage remaining to be discussed is that contained in Rev 6¹⁵⁻¹⁶, in which the Seer pictures the struggle of the Church, and of God's judgment upon her enemies. At the opening of the sixth seal, the wicked are depicted as terrorized by an earthquake, and as hiding in the caves and rocks of the mountains, to escape the wrath of the Lamb. It is the dreadful Day of the Lord which is about to come. Panic seizes troubled consciences. The end is near. The wicked, even the rich and the mighty, princes and captains, bondmen and freemen, hide themselves, calling to the mountains and rocks to fall on them and hide them from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb (cf. Is 2¹⁹, Hos 10⁸, Lk 23³⁰).

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

ROD.—1. An instrument of punishment or correction.—The term denotes an instrument of punishment or correction.

(a) In his enumeration of the hardships and sufferings endured by him in the course of his apostolic labours, St. Paul employs the verb παθόντων, 'to beat with rods,' to describe the punishment to which he was subjected on three occasions by Roman magistrates (2 Co 11²⁵). 'The rods' was the customary expression for Roman scourging. In the one instance recorded in the Acts, the scourging was inflicted by the lictors (παθόντων, tr. 'sergeants' in AV and RV, lit. 'rod-holders') by order of the duumviri (16²⁷⁻²⁸). It was the duty of the lictors to carry the fasces, consisting of rods bound in the form of a bundle, with an axe in the middle which projected from them. These, usually made of birch, were the instruments with which St. Paul and Silas were cruelly maltreated at Philippi.

(b) The term is used figuratively in 1 Co 4²¹ to denote the stern treatment called for in the event of continued recalcitrancy on the part of Church members, chastisement with the rod being a familiar method of enforcing obedience and submission to parental authority (cf. v. 14¹).

2. The symbol of sovereignty.—The 'rod' or sceptre is also used as the symbol of sovereignty (He 1⁸; cf. Ps 45⁶ 110²). Quotations in the Apocalypse (12⁵ 19¹⁵) from Ps 2⁹, which represents the theocratic king as ruling (ποιμανεῖς, LXX) the nations with a rod of iron, are applied to the mediatorial reign of Christ, in which His servants also share (2³⁶). The rod of empire, regarded as a shepherd's staff, is transformed into an instrument of penal authority which subdues or crushes all opposition (cf. 1 Co 15²⁴).

ROMAN EMPIRE.—The purpose of this article is to sketch the growth of the Roman Empire from its small beginnings down to about the middle of the 1st cent. A.D. The Empire did not stop growing at that date, but its later history hardly belongs to a Dictionary of the Apostolic Church.

1. Origins.—Rome, according to the opinion now commonly held, began with a settlement on the Palatine Hill on the left bank of the Tiber, some twenty miles from its mouth. This settlement occupied what was afterwards spoken of as Roma Quadrata, 'Square Rome,' from the shape of the outline of the walls. It was a community of shepherds, who, along with their wives, families, and property, were protected from an enemy by the strong walls surrounding the town. Hill towns are still a feature of Italy. Other hills in the neighbourhood seem to have been occupied by similar communities, and there can be no doubt that these communities found it advisable to make an alliance with one another against their common enemies. Such an alliance had a religious sanction, and we find in early times a festival of the Septimontium in existence, the seven mountains being the Capitolinus, Palatinus, Aventinus, Caelius, Oppius, Cispius, Fagutal (the three last spurs of the afterwards named Mons Esquilinus). (The later list of the [proverbial] 'seven hills' is not precisely the same, but consists of the first four followed by the Mons Esquilinus, the Collis Viminalis, and the Collis Quirinalis; this list is purely geographical, and has no religious significance.) The result of an attack on these combined communities by the hardier Sabines from the hills to the north and east appears to have been the defeat of the Romans, and the absorption within the population of a strong Sabine element. This fresh element led to the strengthening of the power of the united peoples. A further absorption seems to have taken place as the result of struggles with their northern neighbours on the banks of the Tiber, the mysterious Etruscans, who were believed to have come from Lydia in Asia Minor through Thrace to Italy. The presence of certain Etrurian customs as well as the ancient 'Etrurian street' (Vicus Tuscus) in Rome proves their influence on the young city.

2. Rome under the kings.—During this early period Rome was undoubtedly governed by kings, who were heads of the army and of religion as well as of civil affairs. We cannot, however, trust all the details given by ancient historians of the events which occurred during the regal period. The broad outline may be trusted. The later kings were of Etrurian stock, and are a sign that this element in the population had become dominant. The meeting-place of the various hill communities which combined to make Rome was naturally the hollow between the hills, in the immediate vicinity of the Palatine and the Capitoline. As this place was liable to be inundated by the Tiber, a splendid scheme of drainage was carried out in the Cloaca Maxima, which survives in part to the present day. Towards the end of the regal period Rome joined the other cities of Latium in a league, in which she was destined to become the predominant partner. The meetings of the league were held on the Alban Mount. But for this league Rome could never have conquered Italy. The existence of the league made it possible gradually to do so. First the tribes nearer at hand like the Volscians were conquered.

3. Rome under the prætors.—After the expulsion of the last king, Rome was governed by two rulers, with the name 'generals' (prætores, changed in 367 B.C. to consules, 'men who consult [the Senate]'). Much of the history of this early period consists of dissensions between the patricians (the ruling class) and the plebeians (the dependent class). Some modern historians think that these two classes represented different tribes. In any case, the dissensions almost destroyed the community. Had it not been for Rome's lucky star, the growing community would have been strangled. The constitution of the Republic was in fact being slowly hammered out by these quarrels.

The invasion and burning of Rome by a northern Celtic race, the Gauls, in 390 B.C. mark the beginning of authentic Roman history. The Romans bought temporary peace from them, but were tormented for a number of years by their incursions.

The lower classes suffered deep distress at this time, with which legislation endeavoured, not unsuccessfully, to cope. In the year 287 B.C. the struggle between the orders finally ceased. They were now practically on terms of equality. From this hour dates the beginning of Rome's power to deal with foreign affairs.

4. Samnite Wars.—But we are anticipating. The period 367 to 290 B.C. was one of great struggle. The Romans were now united at Rome and had secured the predominance in the Latin league, when they were called upon to fight the most dangerous enemy they had yet had to deal with. The long contest was for supremacy in Italy. The Samnites inhabited the central area of Italy, the Apennines, but frequently over-ran the rich plains at their feet. The war began by their attack on the Sidicini, a neutral people between Campania and Samnium. Campania supported the Sidicini and Rome supported Campania. The Romans were victorious in this first war (343–341) at Mt. Gaurus, but concluded peace with the Samnites because of internal dissensions and difficulties near home. This war was followed by war with the Latins (340–338), in which the Samnites fought on the Roman side. The contest was to decide whether the Latins should be subjects of Rome or not. It was fought in Campania, and by 338 B.C. the Romans had proved complete victors. In that year the league was dissolved, and special arrangements were made with individual parties to the old league. Assistance lent by the Samnites to Greek cities in Campania was the occasion of the second Samnite war (326–304). During the first five years the Romans were for the most part successful. This period was followed by a one year's truce, which was broken before its end. In 321 the two Roman consuls sustained a disgraceful defeat at the Caudine Forks, a pass in Campania, and the army had to pass under the yoke. For several years afterwards fortune favoured the Samnites, but in 314 the consuls scored a decisive victory. This was followed by others, interrupted only by an Etruscan war in 311. In 304 the Samnites asked for peace, which was granted, and they were admitted to alliance with Rome. About 300 the Roman power seemed established in central Italy. In the third and last Samnite war (298–290), however, Rome had to face a coalition of Etruscans, Senonian Gauls, Umbrians, and Samnites. In 295 the desperate battle of Sentinum was fought, which resulted in a victory for Rome. The Samnites, however, continued to struggle on, until in 290 they finally gave up the contest. Rome's mastery in Italy was now assured, though it took about a quarter of a century more to subdue the whole peninsula.

5. Conquest of Greek cities of South Italy.—The next stage in Rome's career of battle was carried out in connexion with the Greek cities in the south of Italy. The people of Tarentum called in the assistance of a Greek filibuster, Pyrrhus of Epirus, who gave the Romans trouble from 281 to 275 B.C., in which year he returned to Greece finally defeated. In 272 Tarentum fell. Soon after, every nation in Italy south of the 44th parallel of latitude owned Rome's supremacy. She was now the first power of the Western world, and one of the first powers of the ancient world. But empire was not her intention. She gave the cities of Italy self-government, and as far as possible incorporated them with the Roman State. The free inhabitants of Italy consisted now of (a) Roman citizens, residents in Roman territory and in coloniae, and individuals in municipia on whom citizenship had been conferred; (b) inhabitants of municipia (certain country towns) who had the citizenship of Rome (i.e. the right of trading and intermarriage) but not the right of voting or of holding office; (c) socii (allies), divided into two classes—(i.) Latini, who stood in a relation to Rome like that of the parties to the old Latin league, and had the capacity for acquiring Roman citizenship, by going to Rome or (later) by holding a magistracy in their own towns; (ii.) the free and allied cities, comprising all the rest of Italy, which had a military alliance with Rome, regulated either by fœdus (formal treaty) or by lex data (a charter).

6. First and Second Punic Wars.—The signal career of Rome in extra-Italian conquest begins with the First Punic War (264–241 B.C.). At this period Carthage, in the Tunis district, was mistress of the western Mediterranean. Rome was not as yet a naval power, but amongst her new Greek subjects (or allies) in southern Italy there were many traders by sea, and these had to be protected. Carthage had by means of mercenary troops conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and now aimed at the possession of Sicily. The western part, having been already planted with colonies from her parent city of Tyre, fell an easy prey to her, but the rest of the island was studded with Greek cities, which were not prepared to give up their free constitutions for the oligarchical tyranny of Semitic barbarians. The city of Messana (modern Messina) in the N.E. part of Sicily was the immediate cause of the outbreak of war between the Romans and the Carthaginians. Messana was at the time in the possession of Italian mercenaries, called Mamertini, who had conquered and taken possession of the city some time before. They grew great enough to menace the power of Hiero, the Greek king of Syracuse. He shut them up in their city, and they appealed for help to Rome. If Rome had refused, they would have appealed to Carthage. This fact determined the Roman people—for the Senate hesitated greatly, knowing the responsibility this fresh step would entail—to give the support the Mamertini sought. The Carthaginians must not be allowed to occupy a place so close to Italy. But the delay had allowed the admission of a Carthaginian garrison, by whose means peace had been concluded with Hiero. The Romans could thus have retired altogether from the situation, had not a Roman legate persuaded the Mamertini to expel the Carthaginian garrison. Hiero and the Carthaginians next proceeded to lay siege to Messana, and the Romans declared war against them (264). The contest, with breaks, was fated to last for about one hundred and twenty years. Rome had to build a fleet. She was for the most part victorious throughout the first war, but Regulus, who had invaded Africa, the territory of the Carthaginians, was defeated and taken captive. The battles in this war were for the most part naval, and a final naval victory in 242 made it possible to reduce the Carthaginian strongholds in Sicily (241). By the terms of the peace Carthage had to evacuate Sicily and the neighbouring islands. Thus was the first Roman 'province' formed (see under PROVINCE).

The Second Punic War did not begin till 218. It differed from the first chiefly in two respects. In the interval Carthage had conquered Spain and thus had a new base of operations, and the second war was fought on land. In 238 the Carthaginians had had to fight their own rebellious mercenary troops, and Rome took advantage of this state of affairs to demand Sardinia and Corsica, which were made into a second province. This is probably the only instance of unjustifiable acquisition of territory in Rome's long history. Illyrian and Gallic wars occupied the rest of the interval. North Italy had been thus opened up (the Via Flaminia had been built from Rome to Ariminum in 220 B.C.). Hannibal in 218 left New Carthage and crossed the Rhone and the Alps. He defeated the Romans successively at the Ticinus and Trebia (Dec. 218) in North Italy, at the Trasimene lake in Etruria (217), and at Cannæ in Apulia (216). The fidelity of Rome's most important allies in Italy, the inability of Hannibal's army to conduct successful siege operations, and other factors preserved Rome at this crisis. The further stages of the war may be compared with the later phases of the South African War. The Roman army was broken up into many small portions, leading strategic points were well garrisoned, and flying columns were dispatched over Italy. Capua, Tarentum, and Syracuse (in Sicily) were in turn lost and recovered. A Roman attempt to divert Hannibal's attention by attacking Spain was attended with disaster, but Hasdrubal, who came from Spain to join his brother Hannibal, was signally defeated by the Romans at the Metaurus (207). Hannibal then retired to the very south of Italy. Meantime the youthful P. Scipio had conquered a great part of Spain. On obtaining the province of Sicily (205 B.C.) he crossed over into Africa. Hannibal, who had been recalled in consequence, was defeated by Scipio at the battle of Zama (202). By the treaty of next year the war was brought to an end, and Carthage lost all her foreign possessions.

7. Macedonian Wars.—The possession of Sicily, Sardinia and Corsica, and Spain (or rather the Spains, for the Romans always distinguished between Hither and Further Spain), the last of which was made into two provinces in 197, made the Romans the greatest power in the ancient world. Philip, king of Macedonia, had been an ally of Hannibal. His attack on the two towns Oricum and Apollonia on the Illyrian side of the Adriatic, which had recently come into the possession of the Romans, drew Rome into the vortex of Eastern politics. The Romans at the close of the First Macedonian War (214–205) made peace with Philip, so that they might be left free to deal with Africa. The Second Macedonian War was declared in 200, and was brought to a successful end by the battle of Cynoscephalæ (197). In the following year Greece was declared free from the yoke of Macedon. Discontent among Rome's Greek allies led to war with the Seleucid king Antiochus, ally of Hannibal and Philip, who crossed to Greece by invitation. Having been defeated by the Romans at Thermopylæ (191), he returned to Asia and was there defeated again, at Magnesia (190). He was compelled to give up all his Asia Minor dominions north of Mt. Taurus. Soon after, the Galatians (Celts) of Central Asia Minor were defeated, and Asia was organized (188). The Romans did not take over Asia at this time, but strengthened the power of the king of Pergamum and that of the State of Rhodes, to keep Antiochus out. About the same period the Gauls in the north of Italy had to be subdued, and from this time (191) Cisalpine Gaul was a Roman province. After the Ligurian War Roman influence reached as far as the Alps instead of the Apennines.

Rome's protectorate over the East did not yet pass unquestioned. Perseus, son of Philip and his successor as king of Macedon, had been making preparations against Rome. The Third Macedonian War ended with victory for the Romans at Pydna (168). The Macedonian monarchy was finally overthrown, but Rome, following her usual policy in the East, did not annex the country but divided it into four districts, each under an oligarchical council. Stirrings and dissensions in Greece and Macedonia led in 146 to the destruction of Corinth by Mummius, and the constitution of the first eastern province, Achæa, which comprised both countries.

8. Third Punic War.—In the same year the Third and last Punic War resulted in the siege and destruction of Carthage and the formation of the province of Africa, consisting of her former territory. The province of Asia was constituted on the death of Attalus, king of Pergamum, in 133 B.C., having been left by his will to the Roman people (129). About 121 B.C. Gallia Narbonensis was made a province, on the conquest of the southern portion of Transalpine Gaul, between the Alps and the Pyrenees. It must not be supposed that there was complete peace in all these territories from the moment they were formally annexed. Many of Rome's wars, which have to be passed over without mention in this article, were connected with the consolidation of a power already defined.

9. The Social War.—A most important event was the Social War (90–89 B.C.), the result of which was that the territory of the city-State Rome now stretched from a point a little to the north of Florence as far as the extreme south of Italy. All freeborn persons within that area were now cives Romani, with all that that implied.

10. Mithradatic Wars.—Soon after, the Romans had to meet one of the direst enemies in all their long history, Mithradates (120–63), king of Pontus, south of the Black Sea. His father by favour of the Romans had been given Phrygia also, but this the Romans took from the son in his minority. The war between Mithradates and the Romans was due to the former's aggressions and his interference with the kingdoms protected by the Romans. He kept the whole of the Near East in a ferment. The first stage (88–84) was concluded by a peace, according to the terms of which Mithradates agreed to give up his conquests. The Second Mithradatic War was entirely due to the aggression of a Roman general Murena (83), and was with some difficulty concluded by a peace in the next year. Mithradates now seriously trained his army to meet the Roman style of warfare. The Third and last War was begun in 75 B.C., when King Nicomedes of Bithynia left his country by will to the Roman people, and Bithynia was in consequence declared a Roman province. Mithradates supported a claimant to the throne, and the war began. Roman armies sustained defeats. Tigranes, king of Armenia, joined Mithradates, and the combined forces needed the best generalship the Romans had to cope with them. Lucullus distinguished himself greatly, but the result was fruitless, and in 66 Lucullus had to make way for Pompey, who had just defeated the Cilician pirates. Pompey succeeded in defeating Mithradates and in conquering Armenia. He reduced Pontus and thereafter Syria (64) to the state of Roman provinces. There was now a chain of Roman provinces from the Black Sea to the Euphrates, but client States were retained along the frontier.

11. Acquisition of Gaul.—The next stage in the growth of the Roman Empire is the acquisition of Gaul, which corresponds roughly to modern France, by the generalship of Gaius Julius Cæsar (58–49 B.C.). Cæsar was one of the three most powerful men in the State, but was without means, and was anxious to obtain a command which would enable him to emulate Pompey's achievements in the East and eventually obtain supreme power. By the arrangement of the coalition in 60 he obtained the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum for five years (58–54). Transalpine Gaul was shortly afterwards added. The details of Cæsar's stubborn campaigns need not be here entered into. In addition to conquering the whole of Transalpine Gaul (except Gallia Narbonensis, already a Roman province), he twice crossed the Rhine and twice entered Britain. His period of command was extended for a further five years. His conquests secured Rome a northern frontier and saved the Empire for centuries.

12. Civil War.—In 49 B.C. civil war broke out, and for a number of years there could be no thought of extending the Empire. During the civil war, the eastern provinces, roughly speaking, were on Pompey's side and the western on Caesar's; later, Antony held most of the east against Octavian.

13. Rome under the Emperors.—In 31 B.C. Egypt was acquired by Octavian, and henceforward the Roman Emperors reigned there as kings. About the same time Octavian re-organized the eastern provinces. On 16th Jan. 27 B.C. the provinces were apportioned between the Senate and Augustus (see PROVINCE). Though the greater part of Spain had long been part of the provincial system, the hardy tribes of the north-west, the Cantabri and Astures, had never been subdued. Between 26 and 20 B.C. Augustus and Agrippa succeeded in quelling them, and a new province, Lusitania, was formed. On the death of the client-king Amyntas in 25 B.C. all the northern and western part of his kingdom was taken over and made into the province Galatia. The boundaries of this province changed with the changing sphere of duty which covered all the central part of Asia Minor. It retained its importance down to A.D. 72, when Cappadocia became a consular province with an army, whereas in A.D. 17 it had been created merely a procuratorial province. Augustus spent 21-19 B.C. regulating the East, and in 16-13 visited Gaul. There he aimed at fixing the north-west frontier of the Empire. His first intention was to fix the limit at the Elbe and the Danube. The tribes of the Tyrol, the Rhaeti, Vindelici, and Norici were conquered in 15, and the Alpine tribes in 14-13. After a number of campaigns the dream of an Elbe frontier had to be given up, and the Rhine was reluctantly substituted. The Rhine-Danube frontier is much longer than the other, and was therefore much more difficult and expensive to defend. The reign of Tiberius (A.D. 14-37) saw the annexation of Cappadocia, as has been said. Gaius (Caligula) (37-41) pursued a somewhat retrograde policy. He restored to Antiochus of Commagene the realm which Tiberius had taken from his father. A similar policy was pursued in Palestine. In Thrace the former kingdom of Cotys was given to his son Rhæmetales, and further territory in Thrace was added to it. To Polemo was gifted Pontus Polemoniacus, and to Cotys, younger brother of Rhæmetales, lesser Armenia. Mauretania was taken over and afterwards (under Claudius) divided into two provinces, named Cæsariensis and Tingitana. In Africa the legion was taken from the senatorial proconsul and put under the command of a special legatus. Under Claudius (41-54) many important administrative changes were made in the provinces. In Germany and Pannonia the extensive operations resulted in no addition to the Empire, but Thrace was at last made a province under a procurator in 46. Lycia was united to Pamphylia as a province under one governor in 43. Macedonia and Achaia, which under Tiberius had been governed by an Imperial legatus, were restored to the Senate as two separate provinces. In 44 Judæa, which had been for a time under the rule of Herod Agrippa, was put under a procurator.

The most interesting event of Claudius' reign is, however, the annexation of Britain. Britain had been invaded twice by Julius Cæsar, but had never been conquered, still less annexed. It was reserved for Claudius to make the southern half of England into the province Britannia, which he visited in person. The Roman forces numbered between 40,000 and 70,000 and were under the command of A. Plautius Silvanus. The first objective seems to have been Essex and Hertford; Camalodunum (Colchester), the capital of the Trinovantes, was taken and made the capital of the new province. Plautius, the conqueror of the province, remained till 47 as legatus Augusti pro prætor. During this period the Romans penetrated at least as far as Somersetshire. At the end of Plautius' command the country comprised within a line drawn from Bath through Silchester, as far as London, with a loop enclosing Colchester, was Roman. Plautius' successor, P. Ostorius Scapula (47-52) conquered the Iceni and drew a line of forts across the country from Gloucester to Colchester. His greatest achievements were along the Welsh border. A fresh advance was made under Nero (54-68), when Suetonius Paulinus was appointed governor (59). His first two years were probably spent in subduing North Wales. An insurrection meantime broke out among the Iceni in the East. On the death of their king their territory had been added to the province. A rising of the Iceni and Trinovantes, who massacred 70,000 Romans and their allies, recalled Suetonius to the East. He took a terrible vengeance. The after history of the province is full of interest, but cannot be pursued here. For the Armenian wars of Nero see under NERO. His reign saw the addition of two provinces to the Roman Empire, Pontus Polemoniacus and Alpes Cottiae.

ROMAN LAW IN THE NT.—The student of Christian origins cannot neglect the influence which the law of the Roman Empire had on the infant Church. The marvellous talent of the Roman authorities for organization, and especially their wise adaptability, which saved them from enforcing a rigid uniformity in legal details in all the countries which they conquered, were to a large degree instrumental, under Divine providence, in furthering Christianity throughout the Empire. Though the Emperors and their officials became, at a comparatively late date (see below, 4) persecutors, yet there can be no doubt that the Roman system of law and organization was a most powerful help to the apostles in preaching the gospel. In this article we may trace the various direct and indirect allusions to that system in the Christian literature of the apostolic period.

1. Administrators of the law.—The greater part of the Roman world was divided into provinces, which were either senatorial, i.e. under the rule of the Roman Senate, or imperial, i.e. under the direct rule of the Emperor. The older and settled provinces usually came under the former head, and those in which there was danger from external enemies usually under the latter; but there were not infrequent exchanges between Emperor and Senate, and a province might be at one date senatorial and at another imperialorial. It is therefore a good test of accuracy in a historical writer to examine whether he names the Roman governor rightly in any given incident (see below).

(a) Senatorial provinces.—Such a province was governed by a proconsul (ἀρχὴνταρος, Ac 13¹⁴ 19²³; cf. 18¹², ἀρχιτελεοντος). St. Luke rightly calls Sergius Paulus in Cyprus a proconsul (13⁷), for shortly before St. Paul visited the island it became a senatorial province, though it ceased soon afterwards to be such. An inscription found in N. Cyprus by Cesnola has 'in the proconsulship of Paulus' (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 74, who quotes D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, London, 1889, p. 114). St. Luke also rightly speaks of Gallio as proconsul of Achaia (18¹²). This province had gone through many changes: having been at one time a separate province, at other times joined to Macedonia, it had from A.D. 15 been a joint imperialorial province, but in A.D. 44, before St. Paul came to Corinth, had again been disjoined from Macedonia and had become senatorial (Ramsay, HDB i. 23). The senatorial provinces mentioned in the NT are: Macedonia (senatorial after the time of Claudius); Achaia; Asia (the western part of Asia Minor); Bithynia-Pontus, a united province in NT times (part of ancient Pontus was joined to Galatia, part given to the Polemonian kingdom; see below, c); Cyprus (see above); Crete-Cyrene, a joint province. In Ac 19²³ the plural ἀρχιτελεοντες is used; the meaning is not that there were more than one proconsul at Ephesus at a time, or that the proconsul's counsellors were called by this name (a conjecture for which there is no evidence), but that 'there are such things as proconsuls.'

(b) Imperialorial provinces.—Such a province was ordinarily governed by a propraetor (in full, legatus Augusti pro praetore; in Greek, ἀντιστράτηγος or πρεσβευτής). Neither of these Greek names is found in the NT, but several imperialorial provinces are there named: Syria-Cilicia-Phenice, a joint province; * Galatia; Illyricum (Ἰλλυρικόν),† N.W. of Macedonia and W. of the provinces of Moesia Superior and Thracia, which are not referred to in the NT, and do not contain any of the places there mentioned; Pamphylia; Lycia. (The last two were joined together in A.D. 74: Lycia is mentioned in Ac 27⁵ as a separate province [cf. 1 Mac 15²²]; Patara [Ac 21⁷] was within it.)

Some imperialorial provinces were governed by procurators, such as Judaea (when it was not a dependent kingdom) and Cappadocia, though Judaea was not perhaps strictly a 'province'; the governor of Egypt was called a prefect. Both these names are used in other senses. A procurator (ἐπίτροπος or διοικητής, in the NT more loosely πρεμύν, Mt 27¹, Ac 23²⁴ 26²⁰, etc., and so Josephus, Ant. XVIII. iii. 1, though this word is used generally of Roman governors * as contrasted with semi-independent 'kings' in Mk 13⁹ and Mt 10¹⁸, Lk 21¹²; cf. 1 P 2¹⁴) was of a rank inferior to that of a propraetor. He was in most respects vested with full power, but was in some degree in a subordinate relation to a neighbouring governor; thus, Judaea was more or less under Syria, Cappadocia under Galatia.

(c) Subject kingdoms, etc.—In addition to the Roman provinces, there were in apostolic times a considerable number of semi-independent kingdoms, and also of petty princedoms or 'tetrarchies'—this word having lost its original meaning of 'rule over a fourth part.' Of the former class we notice the dominions of Herod the Great and of his grandson Herod Agrippa I. (who died A.D. 44, Ac 12²³); these were kings of all Palestine. Another such kingdom was that of Polemo (Πολέμων) to the east of Pontus; this kingdom existed up to A.D. 63; one of the Polemos married Berenice or Bernice (Ac 25¹³). A third such kingdom was Lycaonia Antiochi (between Galatia and Cilicia), which is indirectly alluded to in Ac 18²³, where St. Paul is said to have gone through τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν, i.e. he visited first that part of Lycaonia which was not part of the subject kingdom but was incorporated in the province Galatia, and then he went through Phrygia or 'the Phrygian' [region] (cf. 16⁵, τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, which by the grammatical construction must mean 'the region which was both Phrygian and Galatic,' i.e. that part of Phrygia which was incorporated in the province Galatia; cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 210). Herod Agrippa II. was king (or tetrarch) of Chalcis in Coele-Syria (the Lebanon), and afterwards of Northern Palestine; in Ac 25¹³ he is called 'Agrippa the king,' and the word 'king' is emphasized in these chapters; he died A.D. 100. Herod Antipas was also popularly called 'king' (Mk 6²⁵, Mt 14⁹), but he was really tetrarch (Mt 14¹) of Galilee (Lk 3¹, τετραρχοῦντος) and Peræa (Jos. Ant. XVII. viii. 1). Archelans succeeded his father Herod the Great in Judaea and Samaria as 'ethnarch,' without the title of king, though St. Matthew uses the verb βασιλεύειν of him (2²²). Herod Philip was tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis, and Lysanias of Abilene (Lk 3¹). The existence of these kings and tetrarchs was due to the wise tolerance of the Romans, and it paved the way for direct Roman rule, and indirectly for the spread of Christianity.

Against the decisions of both governors and kings there lay an appeal to the Emperor. That of St. Paul is recorded in Ac 25¹¹ (cf. 28¹⁹), but it is disputed whether it was from the Sanhedrin to the Roman tribunal or from Festus to Caesar. The latter view seems best to suit the circumstances of the case. The appeal need not necessarily have been granted; but as we see from Agrippa's remark in 26²², once it was allowed, the prisoner could not be released.

(d) In 19²¹ the Asiarchs, officials in the province of Asia, are mentioned. But the Asiarch was not, strictly speaking, an administrator of the law. In the provinces there were organized associations of cities, having to a great extent a religious character, though having also some relation to the law. Such an association was called 'commune' (τὸ κοινόν). Each 'commune' was presided over by an officer named after the province; thus he was called Asiarch in Asia, Galatiarch in Galatia, etc. He was president of the games, and had an undefined influence in civil affairs. The plural 'Asiarchs' in 19²¹ perhaps implies that past holders of the office retained the title. For these offices see the Martyrdom of Polycarp, xii., and Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii., 'Ignatius' 2, London, 1889, iii. 404 ff.

2. Administration of the law. The Romans did

* Syria and Cilicia are joined in Gal 1²¹: τὰ κλίματα τῆς Συρίας καὶ τῆς Κιλικίας, tr. in AV and RV 'the regions of Syria and Cilicia.' St. Paul's habit of using the Roman names for provinces is here illustrated, for Ac 9³⁰ says that he was sent from Jerusalem 'to Tarsus,' i.e. to Cilicia. Ramsay (Gal., p. 277 ff.) would with * omit the second τῆς in Gal 1²¹; as Lightfoot says (Gal., London, 1876, in loc.), 'the words τὰ κλίματα seem to show that "Syria and Cilicia" are here mentioned under one general expression, and not as two distinct districts,' though he seems to be in error in saying that they were at the time under a separate administration. For the meaning of κλίματα see Ramsay, loc. cit.

† The usual Greek name of this province is Ἰαλυρίς or Ἰαλυρία, but St. Paul as a Roman citizen uses a Latin form in Ro 15¹⁹, as does the historian Dio Cassius twice (Ramsay, Gal., p. 276 f.). This province is also called Dalmatia in 2 Ti 4¹⁰, this name (which had previously been given to South Illyricum only) taking the place of the other during St. Paul's lifetime (Ramsay, ib.).

‡ In Lk 22 the verb ἡγεμονεύω is used of Quirinius' office in Syria, in 31 of Pilate's procuratorship; in 31 ἡγεμονία is used of the 'reign' of Tiberius.

not enforce a rigid uniformity of law throughout the Empire. When they conquered a country and incorporated it as a Roman province, they found in many cases an excellent system of law in force, and they retained much of it. This was especially the case in Greek cities, and above all in Asia Minor, where the people were particularly tenacious of old customs. Just as the Romans did not force the Latin language on Greek countries, but recognized the Greek language and made use of it, reserving Latin for State occasions, so they used much of pre-existing Greek law and custom. Thus at Ephesus, a 'free' city, we find, in addition to the Roman proconsulship, a Greek constitution. There was a senate (βουλή), and also the popular assembly (δῆμος, 19³⁰; also called ἐκκλησία, vv. 32, 41) which met regularly three times a month and (when required) in extraordinary session; and this popular assembly had its clerk (γραμματεὺς), a very important official, whose influence over it was great, as this chapter shows (vv. 33-41). Inscriptions of Roman date in Greek cities show the continuance of Greek institutions (for these statements see Rackham, Acts, p. 362 ff., and Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 131 ff., Gal., pp. 132 ff., 181 f.). At Athens, also a 'free' city, we find a Greek institution, the court of the Areopagus (17^{19, 22}), the members of which were called 'Areopagites' (v. 34). This, however, was not a court of law, and St. Paul was not on his trial before it on a criminal charge. It was rather a University court, 'in the midst of' which (v. 22) the Apostle made his defence as a teacher. The scene has been taken by F. C. Conybeare (HDB i. 144) and others, with the AV text in v. 22 (but not AVm), to have been on Mars' Hill outside the city, whence the court derived its name, but Ramsay with more probability (St. Paul, p. 244 f.) places it in the city itself, in or near the Agora or market-place. 'In the midst of Mars' Hill' as a topographical expression would hardly be possible.

In non-Greek countries which passed under Roman rule, Roman law and organization were more speedily adopted, as there was less of previous civilization to withstand them. But in Palestine, as in the Hellenized districts, local law survived to a considerable extent, even when Roman procurators had displaced native kings. Power was left to the Sanhedrin in Judæa, and, though that body had no jurisdiction in Galilee and Samaria, local synagogues outside Judæa were allowed by the civil authorities to exercise a good deal of authority over their members (C. Bigg, ICC, 'St. Peter and St. Jude', Edinburgh, 1901, p. 25). The Sanhedrin could not inflict capital punishment without leave of the procurator (Jn 18³¹), but the latter often applied Jewish law, and this seems to be the meaning of Festus' proposal to send St. Paul to Jerusalem, to be tried in his presence indeed, but by Jewish law (Ac 25⁹). The sentence would be the procurator's, and the appeal would be from him to the Emperor (see above, 1 (c)). The stoning of Stephen was no doubt an illegal murder (Ac 7⁵⁸), and other deaths of Christians would fall under the same head (5³⁸ 22⁴ 26¹⁰); but the Sanhedrin could arrest persons, and inflict imprisonment and flogging (5^{18, 40} 22⁴ 26¹⁰; cf. 2 Co 11²⁴, Mt 5²²). In 9² 26¹ the synagogue at Damascus is requested by the Sanhedrin to exercise its powers (cf. 22¹⁹, Mk 13⁹). In the semi-independent kingdoms Roman law found its way less speedily, and only as the local kings deemed it practicable to spread Western ideas. The position of Herod the Great in this respect is well drawn by Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, London, 1898, ch. ix.), who suggests that the king was allowed to carry out the enrolment which took place at the time of our Lord's birth in such a way as to conciliate Jewish prejudices, by giving it a tribal character which it did not possess in the other parts of the Empire.

On the other hand, the Romans founded colonies in various parts of the Empire, chiefly for military reasons; their inhabitants were Roman citizens, and Roman law was observed in them more strictly; the city officials were named in Roman fashion duoviri, quæstores, ædiles, prætores (the magistrates in Greek cities were called στρατηγοί or ἀρχοντες, and in Ac 16^{20, 22, 25} St. Luke gives the former as the translation of 'prætores' at Philippi, a Roman colony). In colonies there was no Senate (βουλή), but there were decuriones (Ramsay, Gal., pp. 117, 182); the language used in the municipal deeds is shown by inscriptions to have been Latin (ib.). The colonies mentioned in the NT are: Antioch of Pisidia (Ac 13¹⁴), Lystra (14⁶), Philippi (16¹², where alone of NT passages κολωνία is found), Corinth (18¹), Ptolemais (21⁷). Iconium (13⁵¹) did not become a colony till Hadrian's time (Ramsay, Gal., pp. 123, 218). Here it may be remembered that Roman law gave special privileges to 'citizens.' Citizenship (πολιτεία, 22²⁸) was not conferred on all the inhabitants of the Empire till A.D. 212. Even the inhabitants of 'free' cities were not Roman citizens, or 'Romans,' as citizens proudly and tersely called themselves (16²¹ 22²⁸); but citizenship might be acquired by purchase, in the corrupt times of the Emperor Claudius, though at a high price (22²⁸), or by birth, as in St. Paul's case (ib.). The law protected citizens from flogging, and St. Paul asserts this right in 16³⁷ 22²⁵; it exempted Jews who were also Roman citizens from the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrin and of the synagogues, though St. Paul did not always assert his exemption (2 Co 11²⁴), and it gave them an appeal from a death sentence by a provincial governor (HDB iv. 292). In Ac 16³⁷ 22²⁸ the word κατάκριτος ('uncondemned') does not imply that the Apostle could have been flogged after trial, which is not the case; the want of trial merely suggests the possible excuse of ignorance which the officials might have urged: St. Paul says that they ought to have investigated. Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 225) suggests that the Apostle spoke in Latin and used the phrase re incognita ('without investigating our case'), and that St. Luke rendered it loosely by κατάκριτος.

3. Illustrations in the NT drawn from Roman or Roman-Greek law.—The following illustrations have been gathered from Galatians by Ramsay, though his conclusions have not in all cases been universally accepted. In particular, his deductions from a Roman-Syrian law-book of the 5th cent. of our era have been objected to, because of its date. But the deductions agree well with the NT, and it is highly probable that the law-book, which is of the nature of a compilation, re-echoes in a large degree the old Seleucid law.

(a) Roman and Greek wills.—The Greek will once properly executed and recorded—the recording took place in the testator's lifetime—was irrevocable, and so it is in Gal 3¹⁵, where St. Paul applies the custom to the Jewish covenant or testament, while at that time a Roman will was revocable by the testator, for it was a secret document and was not recorded (Lightfoot denies that a will is intended in Gal 3¹⁵, and translates 'covenant'). In He 9¹⁶ the will is of the Roman kind; it can take effect only after the death of the testator. The inference is that among those to whom Galatians is addressed the Romans left the older local (Greek) law on the subject untouched, and that the persons addressed therefore lived in a district that was highly Hellenized; while the persons addressed in Hebrews (Jewish Christians in Palestine, or possibly in Rome?) had received Roman law in this respect (Ramsay, Gal., pp.

350 ff., 364 ff.). See also ADOPTION, § 2; HEIR, § 2.

(b) Law as to coming of age.—Here, again, Greek and Roman law differed. In Gal 4¹ the father names the date at which the heir comes of age. In Roman law a child was under a 'tutor' till he was 14 years old, when he could make a will and dispose of his own property; then under a 'curator,' who managed the property, till he was 25. The distinction was not known at Athens, but it is found in provincial Greek cities. In 4² the 'tutor' (ἐπίτροπος) and the 'curator' (οἰκονόμος) are both mentioned. But though in this respect Galatia followed Rome, it did not do so in the other respect, for the father is said to appoint (i.e. by will) the term during which these officers should have authority over his son (Ramsay, Gal., p. 391 ff.). See HEIR, § 2.

(c) Law as to the position of children.—In this matter the Greek and the Roman law agreed, but they differed from the Hebrew law. A son of the master of the house by a slave mother was, by Greek and Roman law alike, a slave; but, according to Hebrew law, the status of the father ennobled the child, who was free. Thus Dan and Asher were not slaves, though their mothers were. Hence the illustration of Gal 4¹⁻³¹ about the two sons of Abraham, the son of Hagar being born 'unto bondage,' would appeal to the Galatians, who lived under Roman-Greek law, while it would not appeal in the same way to one who was brought up without reference to that law (Ramsay, Gal., p. 434).

4. Attitude of the law to the Christian Church.—The Roman law recognized Judaism, though it was not the State religion, as a religio licita; it was tolerated, and no one could be punished for being a Jew. But no religion which was not recognized by the State was lawful, and as Christianity had never been so recognized it was from that fact a religio illicita. It has, however, been disputed when the Roman law in this respect was first actively put into force. Many writers, especially in Germany, treat Trajan as the first real persecutor, maintaining that before his time Christianity was confused with Judaism, and that Nero and Domitian were merely capricious persecutors of individuals. A damaging indictment of this view is made by Lightfoot (op. cit. i. 1-17). There is no doubt that at the very first Christians were looked upon merely as Jews (e.g. Ac 16³⁰). At Corinth Gallio treats the question before him as one of Jewish law (18¹⁵). St. Paul could hardly have held his favourable view of the State organization and of its power for furthering the gospel had it been otherwise. But it seems highly probable, if not certain, that at least from the time of Nero Christianity was looked upon as a distinct sect, and therefore as illegal. Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) clearly treats it as having been a distinct religion in the time of Nero; he mentions its followers as 'those whom the common people used to call Christians'—the use of the imperfect 'appelabat' shows that he is not, as has been alleged, projecting the ideas of his own time into that of the middle of the 1st cent. (he himself was born c. A.D. 55). Suetonius, who was a few years younger than Tacitus, calls Christianity 'a novel and malignant superstition' (Nero, 16). Even had there been confusion between the two religions in Nero's time, by the time of Domitian, when Emperor-worship was enthusiastically pressed, and the Imperial policy thus became directly antagonistic to Christianity, there could be no possibility of confusing the two. The Jews themselves were active in making the distinction manifest to the authorities. In Ac 19³³ the Jews put forward Alexander for this very purpose. And it is inconceivable that they would allow a confusion so injurious to themselves to continue. It was not necessary that a distinct edict against Christianity should have been put out, and it is quite possible that no such edict was issued until Trajan's time; the very fact that Christianity had never been recognized by the State made it unlawful. Nor is this argument weakened by the fact that there was not a continuous persecution of the Christians on the part of the Roman authorities in the 1st century. The law was there, though it was not always enforced. The same thing happened in the 2nd and 3rd centuries, and there is no dispute that Christianity was then regarded as an unlawful religion. The Church benefited by more than one interregnum of peace.

Light is thrown on the attitude of the law to Christianity by I P 2¹²⁻²⁰ 4¹⁴. Here St. Peter alludes to Christians being accused of crimes (2¹), a verse which recalls the infamous offences imputed to them in later days, the 'Thyestean banquets' and 'Œdipodean intercourse'—i.e. cannibalism and incest; cf. the letter of the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons given in Eus. HE v. 1, and Justin, Apol. i. 26, etc.), and also to their suffering when they do well (2²⁰), and 'for the name (ἐν ὀνόματι) of Christ' (4¹⁴). Bigg (Com. on 2¹³), who upholds an early date for the Epistle, maintains that this does not show that the State had as yet systematically declared against the Church; Ramsay (The Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 245 ff., 290 ff.) thinks that these passages show that the Epistle belongs to the latter part of the 1st century. In either case Christianity is represented as an unlawful religion, and Christians suffer 'for the name' (i.e. for being Christians, without any moral crime being attributed to them). Thus at least before the time of Domitian all confusion with Judaism must have ceased. The same thing may be gathered from the Apocalypse, which (at any rate in its present form) is probably of the time of that Emperor.

It is agreed by all that the law in the time of Trajan regarded Christianity per se as unlawful. In his letter to Pliny the Emperor says that Christians are not to be sought out, but that if they are accused and convicted they are to be punished, though not if they apostatize (see the text in Lightfoot, 'Ignatius', i. 53 f.). But there is no trace whatever of a new policy having been instituted by Trajan.

The law condemned secret societies, and this was perhaps the chief cause of Trajan's attitude to Christianity. He was energetic in suppressing clubs and gilds; whether religious or not, and whether in themselves innocent or not, he considered them dangerous as being liable to be used for political purposes (see the examples collected by Lightfoot, op. cit., p. 18 ff.). The meetings of the Christians for Eucharist and Agape would at once rouse his antagonism. Pliny, in his letter to Trajan (Ep. 96), therefore reports the assemblies of the Christians 'on a fixed day before light,' but emphasizes their innocent character: at the first meeting (i.e. the Eucharist) they bound themselves by an oath (sacramento) not to do wrong; at the second (i.e. the Agape, held later in the day) they met to take food, 'promiscuum tamen et innoxium'; but the latter assembly was discontinued after Pliny's edict, because he had forbidden gild meetings (hetærias) according to Trajan's command. Pliny apparently considered that the Christians were no longer a gild, because they gave up their common meal; he probably did not understand the nature of the Eucharist (there seems to be some confusion about his use of the word sacramentum), or at any rate he did not consider that it came under this head.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Date and destination.—The Epistle is usually supposed to have been written to Rome (1⁷⁻¹⁵) from Corinth during the visit of Ac 20²², i.e. towards the close of the third missionary journey. The year will depend upon the general scheme of chronology adopted for St. Paul's life; c. A.D. 58 is the usual date. The grounds on which this view is based are:

(1) The reference to the collection for the saints (15^{23ff.}). This is prominent in 1 and 2 Cor. (1 Co 16¹, 2 Co 8³), which belong to the same period of St. Paul's life, and is mentioned incidentally in Ac 24¹⁷ as forming part of the purpose of the final visit to Jerusalem. According to Ro 15 the collection is nearing completion, and St. Paul is about to start for Jerusalem; this points precisely to the circumstances of Ac 20.

(2) Ac 19²¹ shows that the Apostle had in mind at this time a visit to Rome, which again corresponds exactly to the indications afforded by Ro 15^{23ff.}; cf. 1¹⁰.

(3) Timothy and Sosipater (16²¹) were with St. Paul at this period (Ac 20⁴). The fact that the other travelling companions of Ac 20 do not happen to be mentioned creates no difficulty; they may have had no connexion with Rome, or they may not yet have joined St. Paul.

(4) Phœbe, a 'deaconess' of Cenchrere, the port of Corinth, is prominently mentioned (16¹); possibly she is the bearer of the Epistle.

(5) Gaius is the Apostle's host (16²³), and we hear also of a Gaius at Corinth, evidently in close personal relation to St. Paul, since he was one of the few baptized by him (1 Co 1¹⁴).

(6) We hear of Erastus, chamberlain of the city (16²³); in 2 Ti 4²⁰ we read that an Erastus was left at Corinth, which may thus have been his home.

Some of these indications are slight; (3) cannot be pressed, and the force of the references to Gaius and Erastus is weakened by the frequency of the names. But the first two cross-correspondences are very strong, and the data fit in so exactly with what we know of St. Paul's movements at this period that the commonly accepted placing of the Epistle might be regarded as indisputable, if it were not that it rests upon an assumption which may be questioned, as taking for granted its integrity. The indications come from the last two chapters; did these form part of the original Epistle? In particular, even if ch. 15 is accepted, can we safely use ch. 16?

2. Integrity.—There are here two distinct, though possibly related, problems to be considered: (a) the original destination of ch. 16, (b) the existence of a short recension of the Epistle.

(a) Was ch. 16 originally addressed to Rome?—We are at once struck by the fact that though St. Paul has never visited Rome, and in the body of the Epistle betrays no detailed acquaintance with local conditions, yet according to 16²³⁻¹⁸ he seems to have a large number of friends there. Indeed the list of persons greeted is longer than in any other Epistle, and personal details are mentioned freely in a way which suggests a considerable knowledge of the work of the church. It is therefore widely held that vv. 1-23 (the concluding doxology offers a separate problem which will be considered under

(b)) would be more in place if addressed to some church where St. Paul had made a long stay. Ephesus best satisfies the conditions at this period, and indeed two features point to it directly.

(1) In v. 5^b we find a greeting to Epænetus, who is called 'the firstfruits of Asia.'* Of course he may have moved to Rome, and St. Paul may be commending him to his new home, but the words are more naturally explained as addressed to the church of which Epænetus is the oldest member; and in 'Asia' St. Paul first preached at Ephesus.

(2) Of greater significance is the reference to Prisca and Aquila ('Salute Prisca and Aquila . . . and the church in their house,' 16^{3ff.}). We learn from Acts that they had come from Rome to Corinth, where they had met St. Paul; thence they accompanied him to Ephesus (Ac 18) and remained there. In 1 Co 16¹⁹, written from that city shortly before the date usually assigned to Romans, they are there still, and St. Paul sends a greeting from them and from the church in their house; similarly in 2 Ti 4¹⁹ he sends greetings to them, again at Ephesus. Hence Ephesus evidently became their home. It is of course possible that at the time when Romans was written they might have returned temporarily to Rome to settle their business affairs; their expulsion perhaps left them but little time to put them in order; but the strange thing is that when they were in Rome only for a short visit their house should there, as well as at Ephesus, be the meeting-place of the local church.

These facts, then, suggest that the verses are really a fragment of a letter addressed to Ephesus. It may be added that the sudden outburst in v. 17^{ff.} is certainly surprising if meant for Rome; it is severe and emphatic in tone, and suggests that St. Paul is speaking of an existing danger, not of something which may happen, and yet the body of the Epistle gives no hint of the presence there of false teachers of this type (see § 4).

On the other side the attempt is made to rebut these arguments by considerations derived from inscriptions and from archaeological evidence.† It is pointed out that most of the names in this chapter can be paralleled from inscriptions found in Rome; it is not suggested that these refer to the actual people mentioned by St. Paul, but that 'such a combination of names—Greek, Jewish, and Latin—could as a matter of fact be found only in the mixed population which formed the lower and middle classes of Rome' (Sanday-Headlam, p. xciv). We have, however, to allow for the fact that the corpus of Roman inscriptions has been greater than those of other places. As inscriptions, e.g. from Asia Minor, are studied and catalogued, more and more of the names of this chapter are found in them too, so that the argument is somewhat precarious.‡ Again, much stress cannot be laid on the attempts to trace on antiquarian grounds evidence of an early connexion of Prisca and Aquila with Rome. It is possible that the households of Aristobulus and Narcissus (vv. 10-11) may refer to the slaves of the Imperial household inherited from Aristobulus, the grandson of Herod the Great, and to those of the Narcissus who was executed by Agrippina, but again the names are common, and, as Lake points out, we should expect of Ναρκισσιστοί instead of οι Ναρκισσοί, words ending in -ani being usually transliterated. The most that can be said is that while these expressions suit Rome, they do not positively demand it.

* AV 'firstfruits of Achaia' rests on poor MSS evidence, and is contradicted by 1 Co 16¹⁵, where Stephanas is so described.

† See the discussions in Lightfoot, *Philippians*⁴, London, 1878 (detached note on 'Caesar's Household,' p. 171 ff.), Sanday-Headlam, 1CC, 'Romans'⁵, pp. xciv ff., 418 ff., with criticism in K. Lake, Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911, p. 330 ff.

‡ To describe the personal names in Rom. xvi. as specifically Roman on the strength of inscriptions found in the city of Rome is about as safe as to describe Wilhelm, Friedrich, Luise as specifically Berlin names because they are found on Berlin tombstones. The names referred to are found swarming in inscriptions, papyri, and ostraca all over the Mediterranean world' (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr., London, 1911, p. 278, n. 1). Similarly G. Milligan, The New Testament Documents, do., 1913, p. 183, n. 1.

Our conclusion may be that, though it is not impossible that this section may be an integral part of the Epistle, it is more probable that it was addressed to a church St. Paul had visited, and that the indications point to Ephesus. No doubt this conclusion would be more readily accepted if it were possible to give a reasonable explanation of the way in which the chapter came to be attached to this particular Epistle; a suggestion will be made when we come to deal with the next problem. Meanwhile it need only be added that those who regard the verses as misplaced often see in them a letter,* or part of a letter, commending Phoebe (see v.1) to Ephesus (Renan, etc.). Gifford† and others suggest that it may have been written to Rome after St. Paul's first imprisonment there; this would explain the large circle of acquaintances (but not the references to Aquila and Prisca, or Epenetus), and it might easily become attached to the earlier letter. It should be clearly understood that very few critics question the Pauline authorship of the chapter; the doubt is whether it is in its right place.

(b) The short recension.—This problem is not a little complicated, and its study requires some knowledge of the principles of NT criticism. It will be best to state the facts before proceeding to discuss the solutions which have been offered.

(1) Evidence that a recension of the Epistle existed which omitted chs. 15, 16.—It should be understood that no extant MS omits these chs.; the evidence is indirect. (a) In the breves or chapter-headings‡ of the Codex Amiatinus of the Vulgate (a system found in many other MSS) the 50th 'chapter' clearly describes Ro 14¹⁵⁻²³, and the 51st, and last, the doxology (16²⁵⁻²⁷), the remainder of 15 and 16 being omitted. In the same way the breves of Codex Fuldensis point to a similar text, without the doxology, while the concordance, or harmony, of the Pauline Epistles found in the Codex Morbacensis unmistakably implies the use of the Amiatine breves based on the short recension.

(2) Neither Cyprian, Tertullian, nor Irenæus quotes from the last two chs.; § 'the argument from silence,' often so dangerous, is here significant. (i.) We should expect Cyprian in his Testimonia to use Ro 16¹⁷ under the headings which refer to the duty of avoiding heretics; (ii.) Tertullian (adv. Marc. v. 14) quotes 14¹⁰ as occurring in clausula, i.e. in the closing section, of the Epistle, while he does not use against Marcion any of the obvious passages from 15-16, or accuse him of having cut them out of the Epistle.

(3) Origen does in fact say that Marcion 'removed' (abstulit) the final doxology and 'cut away' (dissecuit) the last two chapters. This agrees with the evidence from Tertullian just quoted, though, as we have said, he does not accuse Marcion of tampering with the text; their copies apparently agreed.

(4) In the group of MSS DEFG, which seem to come from a common ancestor, it is argued that the text of the last two chs. is so different from that of the rest of the Epistle that somewhere in the line of transmission there must have come a MS containing only 1-14, which was supplemented from some other source for chs. 15-16. It is probable that this archetype also omitted the doxology.*

(2) The position of the final doxology.—It should be carefully noted that there is no break in thought between chs. 14 and 15 (our present chapter divisions are late and do not always correspond to breaks in the sense), and the chs. as they stand offer a reasonably connected sequence of thought, except for the fact that there seem to be several distinct endings—15²³, 16^{20, 25-27}. But when we come to examine the textual phenomena the case is even more complicated. In some MSS and Fathers (Chrysostom, Theodoret, etc.), representing the Antiochene text, the last three verses, which it will be convenient to refer to as 'the doxology,' are found at the close of ch. 14; Origen also knew of codices in which this was the case. A few authorities, including A, have it both there and at the end. FGg and a few other authorities omit the doxology altogether, as we know was the case with Marcion. The variation in the position of 'the Grace' (16²⁰), which is inserted in some MSS after 16²³ and in TR by a natural conflation in both places, is additional evidence of the existence of copies which did not end with the doxology.

It will be understood that the evidence for the doxology after 14²³ is also evidence for the existence of a short recension, since the doxology cannot have stood originally between 14²³ and 15¹, making a complete break in the sense. Its position there can only imply that the Epistle ended, or was supposed to end, at that point.

(3) Omission of the address to Rome.—There is evidence that the text used by Origen and Ambrosiaster omitted ἐν Ῥώμῃ ('in Rome') in 17¹⁵, and read ἐν ἀγάπῃ ('in love'), which is actually the reading of G.† It should be remarked that these authorities coincide with part of the evidence for the short recension, a point which may or may not be significant.

We have, then, these three textual phenomena—the existence of a short recension of the Epistle; the displacement, or omission, of the doxology; and the omission of the words 'in Rome'—together with the doubt attaching to the original destination of 16²³, though it is not yet clear how far they are all connected. The primary problem is to explain the short recension and the displacement of the doxology, which do undoubtedly stand in close relation to one another. Any solution must account for the fact, to which attention has already been called, of the close connexion of thought between 14²³ and 15¹. How then did the Epistle come to be truncated at this point, and the doxology to be inserted there? This consideration seems fatal to views such as those which regard chs. 15-16 as altogether unauthentic (Baur), or as belonging to a different recension of the Epistle made by St. Paul himself (Renan, Lightfoot, Lake). It is very difficult to believe that it ever ended with 14²³, with or without the doxology.

The most popular explanation, therefore, is that adopted tentatively by Sanday-Headlam, following

* Lake, Earlier Epistles, p. 341; Sanday-Headlam, p. xcviil.

† For details see Lake, op. cit., p. 346, who supplements Sanday-Headlam, ad loc., by calling attention to the fact, discovered only in 1897, that the scholiast of cod. 47 was really using Origen. Lightfoot (Biblical Essays, p. 257) points out that Rufinus' Latin text of Origen also implies the omission.

* According to Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, p. 226), 'there is no lack of analogies for a letter of recommendation plunging at once in medias res and beginning with "I commend." He suggests that the short letter to Ephesus followed that to Romans in the letter-book (a book containing copies of letters sent or received) of Tertius, St. Paul's amanuensis.

† For this and other theories see Moffatt, LNT, p. 138.

‡ It must be remembered that the 'chapters' or sections referred to are not our present chapters.

§ According to Moffatt (p. 140), Clement of Alexandria and Origen are the only Ante-Nicene Fathers who do so.

¶ On the whole, it is not probable that this means merely 'separated off' or 'cut about.' Hort tries to explain away Origen's evidence, but he has not been generally followed; see Sanday-Headlam, p. xc; Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, London, 1893, p. 287 ff. (including a paper by Hort).

Gifford. They suppose the short recension, with the consequent confusion of text, to be due to Marcion. They point out truly enough that the opening verses of ch. 15 contradict his teaching entirely, and that he could not possibly have admitted them. He therefore cut them out, as Origen apparently says, and it is supposed that this influenced later orthodox practice. 'When in adapting the text for the purposes of church use it was thought advisable to omit the last portions as too personal and not sufficiently edifying, it was natural to make the division at a place where in a current edition the break had already been made.* The doxology was afterwards replaced at the end of ch. 14, while Marcion is also supposed to be responsible for the omission of the words 'in Rome,' which he struck out as an unimportant local allusion.

The theory has, however, been criticized by Lake.† It implies that Marcion had a greater influence than is altogether probable on the formation of the canon of the Pauline Epistles and on the text of the NT; von Soden's estimate of the extent of this influence has not been generally accepted. Further, Tertullian seems to have used the short recension, and his corpus was independent of Marcion's; this fact and the widespread nature of the evidence for the omission of the last two chs. suggest that catholic collections of the Epistles, containing only the short recension, existed before Marcion. The charge that he cut the chs. out may only mean that they did not in fact stand in the copies he used.

As to his supposed responsibility for the omission of the reference to Rome, Lake points out that it is clear from the recently discovered Marcionite prologues that he did in fact describe the Epistle as 'to the Romans' in the usual way.

To these criticisms we may add others which are no less damaging. What evidence is there of any serious manipulation of the Epistles in order to fit them for ecclesiastical use? There is, e.g., no trace of the omission of 1 Co 16, which is equally local and personal. And if this was done in the case of Romans, how came the doxology to be re-inserted? It can have come only from a MS which had the complete ending, and in that case surely 15¹⁻¹³, which is in every way suited for public reading, would have been restored at the same time.

Lake himself has a fresh theory. He suggests that the original Epistle consisted of chs. 1-14, with or without the doxology, and without the mention of Rome; this was sent as a circular letter, dealing with the Judaistic propaganda, to churches St. Paul had never visited, and belongs to the same period as Galatians. The latter Lake regards as the earliest of the Pauline Epistles, written before the Council of Ac 15. Later on St. Paul sent a copy of the letter to Rome, adding ch. 15, and ch. 16, if it really belongs to the Epistle. It is obvious to compare the relation of Ephesians, also regarded as a circular letter, to Colossians, written at the same time and closely resembling it. The theory has the advantage of accounting for the partial identity of the witnesses for the omission of the last two chs. and of the reference to Rome, and it is also attractive to those who, like the present writer, agree that Galatians is the earliest Pauline Epistle, since it accounts for the similarity of style and language between it and Romans, but it still seems to fail at the crucial point. It does not explain the break after 14^a, since it is very difficult to believe that the Epistle ever ended there, whether with or without the doxology, which Lake indeed is inclined to regard as unauthentic. The close is too abrupt, and 15¹⁻¹³ does not read as an afterthought. Further, ch. 1, even without the reference to Rome, gives the impression of being addressed to a particular church; it is more definite in tone than Ephesians.

The present writer is inclined to suggest a fresh theory, based on a hint given by Lake himself. He calls attention to the fact that in the Muratorian Canon Romans stood last of the Epistles to the Churches, and that it was also last in Tertullian's, Cyprian's, and Origen's collections. We may remark that, being the longest and most important of the Epistles, it might equally well stand first, as in our own canon, or last, as in these, there being no attempt at chronological order in either. There is also good ground for regarding the doxology as not genuine. Its length and its position at the close of the Epistle are without parallel in the letters of St. Paul, and the language is to some extent un-Pauline (see Mollatt, p. 135). No doubt this would not be sufficient to justify our rejecting it if there were no other grounds for suspicion. But the fact of a passage being found in different places in our MSS always suggests the possibility that it is a later addition (cf. the 'Pericope' in Jn 7^{53ff.}), so the internal and the external lines of evidence here confirm one another. As Lake points out, it is a habit of scribes to add doxologies at the close of books or collections of books (cf. the doxology at the end of each book of the Pss.); this doxology may therefore have been inserted to mark the close of the Pauline corpus. We may, however, go further, and find here the key to the whole problem. (1) The Epistle may have originally ended with 15³³; the short prayer is quite in keeping with St. Paul's practice. (2) The last page of the MS or roll was lost, leaving only chs. 1-14 (cf. the lost ending of Mk.). (3) To this, standing at the end of a collection of Pauline letters, the doxology was added. (4) The lost conclusion was then copied in from some other source, and ch. 16, a genuine fragment of the Pauline correspondence, was also added as a sort of postscript to the corpus. (5) It was realized that the doxology was out of place, and it was transferred to the end, whether regarded by now as an integral part of the Epistle or not. If the process seems complicated, it will be seen that each step, with the exception of (1) and the first part of (4), is in fact represented by some part of our evidence; the variations are themselves so many that any theory which is to account for them must be somewhat complex. It may be added that the theory can in fact be presented in a simpler form if we regard ch. 16 as an integral part of the Epistle. We need only suppose, then, that the last two chs. were lost, the doxology added after ch. 14, and then transferred to the end of ch. 16 when the missing chs. had been replaced.

It is true that this hypothesis offers no explanation of the omission of the words 'in Rome.' But, as we have seen, the attempts of Sanday-Headlam and Lake to bring them into connexion with the short recension are not very successful; it only remains, therefore, to regard this as a primitive textual error, or perhaps as a deliberate omission made in order to 'catholicize' the Epistle.

Since the discussion of these textual phenomena has been of necessity somewhat long, it may be well to point out their bearing on the general view of the date and destination of the Epistle. Roughly speaking, they leave it unchanged on any theory which regards ch. 15 as genuine, whether belonging to a first or to a second edition. Rome remains as the destination, and the closing period of the third missionary journey as the date. The rejection of ch. 16 only removes the reference to Corinth as the place of writing. It must, however, be remembered that if Lake's view that the Epistle was not originally intended for Rome be accepted, the reference of the details of the Epistle to the circumstances of the Roman Church will fall to the ground.

* Sanday-Headlam, p. xcvi.

3. Authenticity.—The Pauline authorship of the Epistle is practically undisputed, except by the Dutch School. But since their views have found no foothold even among the most advanced critics, it does not seem necessary to discuss them here. The curious English reader may find them stated by W. C. von Manen in EBi, s.v. 'Romans (Epistle)', with a refutation in the same Encyclopædia by P. W. Schmiedel, s.v. 'Galatians'; see also R. J. Knowling, Witness of the Epistles, London, 1892, p. 133 ff., Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, do., 1905, p. 34 ff., and Lake, Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, p. 421 ff. The external evidence for Romans is in fact peculiarly strong. It begins with 1 Peter, and perhaps with Hebrews and James (see § 9), and clear traces, though without definite quotation, are found in Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Justin Martyr (see full quotations and references in Sanday-Headlam, p. lxxix ff.; Moffatt, p. 148). Marcion (c. A.D. 140) is the first to mention the Epistle by name; from the time of Irenæus onwards we have numerous direct quotations. In the Muratorian Canon it stands the last of the seven Epistles to the Churches.

4. Purpose of the Epistle.—It seems obvious at first sight to look for the object of the Epistle in circumstances connected with the Roman Church. Most of St. Paul's letters are in fact pièces d'occasion, called forth by special difficulties or dangers arising in churches in which he is interested; the Epistles to Galatia and Corinth are the outstanding examples. Accordingly, attempts have been made (Baur, etc.) to reconstruct from hints afforded by the Epistle the conditions of the Christian community in Rome, and the relations existing between its Jewish and Gentile elements; the 'strong' and the 'weak' of chs. 14, 15 are identified with parties supposed to have arisen there; and from these features so discovered the main purpose of the Epistle is deduced. It will not be denied that this method is justifiable in certain cases, but it is questionable whether it gives us the right point of view from which to approach this particular Epistle. For Romans is distinguished from the other Epistles just named by two important features. (a) It is addressed to a church which St. Paul has not founded, or even visited. He must therefore have been dependent upon reports received from others for any knowledge of its difficulties or of the various influences at work. No doubt such reports were available (?Prisca), but (b) the Epistle itself does not suggest that it was written in view of them. There is no hint in it* that St. Paul's purpose is to counteract errors or divisions which he has reason to believe have actually arisen. Indeed, he seems to safeguard himself from being supposed to do so (15¹⁴), and suggests that his object is the imparting of a spiritual gift (1¹¹ 15¹³). He does not insist on his authority as an apostle except in the opening section. What he does insist on is his desire and frustrated attempts to visit Rome (1¹³ 15²²). It would appear, therefore, that the letter is intended partly to take the place of this visit, and partly to prepare the way for it, if it should be possible in the future. Remembering the circumstances under which it was written, we can hardly doubt that the writer was acutely conscious that the visit might in fact never take place. Already we have hints of the premonitions as to the result of the journey to Jerusalem (15³¹), which soon became still more defined (Ac 20²² 21¹⁰). St. Paul realized the outstanding importance of Rome and a church there both at the moment and still more for the future. He may well have felt that in case he should never be able to go there himself he would wish that church to have some permanent record of his teaching. The Epistle is not a formal compendium of Paulinism, but it is the longest and most carefully thought-out statement of his views on certain points, and we may conjecture that, though addressed to Rome, St. Paul had in mind the possibility of its penetrating to other churches.* In other words, the letter does not arise primarily from a desire to meet a particular situation in the Roman Church; it arises from the wish to put it and others in possession of his views in some more or less permanent form. Apart from the few personal references, it might have been equally well written to any church, and we can draw few conclusions from it as to the circumstances of the Roman Church in particular. The Epistle, however, remains of the greatest value as affording material for the reconstruction of the thought and conditions of Apostolic Christianity. It tells us the kind of questions St. Paul found men asking generally, the difficulties they felt, and the forms of error to which they were exposed. For the particular examples he had in mind we should probably look to the churches he knew, or even to the church in which he happened to be writing, rather than to Rome.

In the light of these considerations we may examine two questions which have bulked large in discussions of the Epistle.

(a) Was St. Paul writing to Jews or to Gentiles?—Certain passages imply clearly that he has Gentiles in mind; e.g. 1⁵, 'Among all the nations [i.e. Gentiles, ἔθνη] . . . among whom are ye also'; v. 13, 'That I might have some fruit in you also, even as in the rest of the Gentiles'; 11¹³, 'I speak to you that are Gentiles.' But the curious thing is that there are other sections in which the writer seems to associate his readers no less decisively with himself as fellow-Jews—4¹, 'Abraham, our forefather according to the flesh'; 7⁶, 'We have been discharged from the law'; 9⁹, 'Our father Isaac.' Further, the general argument of the Epistle presupposes acquaintance with Jewish Scriptures and ways of thought, and is addressed to Jewish as much as to Gentile Christians. In Galatians, on the contrary, St. Paul addresses his readers as those who have not been under the Law, though in 1 Co 10¹, written to a Gentile church, he speaks of 'our fathers.' The obvious conclusion is that in Romans he has both Jews and Gentiles in mind, and the combination is made easier when we remember that many of the latter approached Christianity by way of the Synagogue, while some would even have been proselytes. A. Robertson, (HDB iv. 298^b) suggests that these predominated and 'gave the tone to the community,' &c. of the Christian Church in Rome. If, however, what has been said above holds good, we shall be cautious about drawing from the Epistle conclusions as to the composition of the Roman Church. Baur, followed by Mangold and others, argues that it was predominantly Jewish and a stronghold of Judaistic Christianity. In this, however, he has not been generally followed, and a priori considerations confirm what we gather from our sources as to the origin of the Roman Church, leading us to suppose that it contained both elements. The Epistle implies that the relation between Jew and Gentile Christians would be likely to arise in that church, but it does not suggest that it was a burning question, as in Galatia, or that Judaistic teaching had already obtained a strong footing there.

(b) What teaching is St. Paul combating in chs. 14, 15?—In other words, who are 'the weak' and 'the strong'? In these chs. St. Paul discusses questions as to food and the observance of days. 'One man hath faith to eat all things: but he that is weak eateth herbs' (14); 'One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike' (v.⁶); 'It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth' (v.¹); 'We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak' (15¹). Here again it has been assumed that the reference is to definite parties or sects existing in Rome, and the attempt has been made to identify them on this basis. It is suggested that the ascetics were Judaizers (Origen, etc.), but the obvious difficulty arises that the reference is not to scruples about eating things offered to idols as at Corinth,* but to abstinence from meat and wine altogether, which was in no way characteristic of the party of the circumcision. More probable is the view that Essene† practices are referred to (Liddon, Lightfoot, Gifford), or vegetarian ascetics of the type mentioned by Seneca; Baur suggests Ebionites, who seem, however, to belong to a later period. Any of these ideas may have been in St. Paul's mind, but the point is that it is by no means certain that he was referring to any particular sect in Rome; he mentions abstinence from meat as 'a typical instance of excessive scrupulousness' (Sanday-Headlam, p. 402). We conclude that the whole passage is probably due not to anything which St. Paul has heard of as going on in Rome, but to tendencies which he has found at work in the churches he knows, and particularly in Corinth, where he is perhaps writing.‡ The passage is not an answer to a question or a report, but he knows that errors which have arisen in the Church at large are sure to be represented sooner or later in Rome.

In the light of these considerations we may also answer the question as to

(c) How far Romans is a true letter.—Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, p. 225), arguing on the basis of the recently discovered papyri and the light thrown by them on the language and methods of NT writers, has gone very far in the denial of any literary character to the Epistles; § 'The letters of Paul are not literary; they are real letters, not epistles; they were written by Paul not for the public and posterity, but for the persons to whom they are addressed. Almost all the mistakes that have ever been made in the study of St. Paul's life and work have arisen from neglect of the fact that his writings are non-literary and letter-like in character.' He admits that Romans is at first sight least like a letter, but he still persists in including it in his category: 'Here also, therefore, if we would understand its true significance, we must banish all thought of things literary' (p. 231). No doubt the warning is valuable against exaggerations; no one of the Epistles, not even Romans, is a theological treatise in which the epistolary form is adopted as a mere literary device; in their interpretation we must always allow for the personal factor and also for the special circumstances in which they were produced.

* It is in fact doubtful whether these Corinthian 'Puritans' were Judaizers at all, at any rate of the ordinary type; see Lake, Earlier Epistles, p. 219 ff.

† It is not, however, quite certain that these practised vegetarianism; see Lietzmann, Com. ad loc., for the various traces of this type of asceticism in different quarters.

‡ For scrupulousness as to days see Gal 4¹⁰ and Col 2¹⁶, where meat and drink are also mentioned; for these cf. 1 Ti 4³.

§ Cf. also the same writer's Paulus, Tübingen, 1911, p. 4 ff., Eng. tr., London, 1912, p. 9 ff.

At the same time Deissmann has carried his thesis too far. We may quote on the other side one who is equally qualified to speak from the point of view of the new discoveries: 'The letters of St. Paul may not be epistles, if by that we are to understand literary compositions written without any thought of a particular body of readers. At the same time, in view of the tone of authority adopted by their author, and the general principles with which they deal, they are equally far removed from the unstudied expression of personal feeling, which we associate with the idea of a true letter. And if we are to describe them as letters at all, it is well to define the term still further by the addition of some such distinguishing epithet as "missionary" or "pastoral." It is not merely St. Paul the man, but St. Paul the spiritual teacher and guide who speaks in them throughout' (Milligan, The New Testament Documents, London, 1913, p. 95).

If this applies generally, it applies with special force to Romans, which has in it something both of the manifesto and of the homily.

5. The primitive Roman Church.—The bearing of the Epistle on the composition of the Roman Church and its supposed parties has already been discussed (§ 4). It remains to put together what we can gather as to the character of the community addressed by St. Paul. Since the time of Pompey (63 B.C.) there had been considerable settlements of Jews in Rome, and Latin literature is full of references to them, mostly of an unfavourable character (see quotations in Sanday-Headlam, p. xix ff.). We may therefore safely assume that there would also be in Rome large numbers of those proselytes and 'God-fearers,' attracted by the monotheism and ethical teaching of the Synagogue, from whom St. Paul and early Christian missionaries in general drew many of their converts. The importance of the Jewish community also implies frequent direct contact between Rome and Jerusalem (cf. the connexion of the Herods with the Imperial Court). There was a synagogue of Roman libertini at Jerusalem (Ac 6⁹), and strangers from Rome, 'Jews and proselytes,' are mentioned among the first hearers of the gospel on the day of Pentecost (2¹⁰). It is not unreasonable to trace the first beginnings of Christianity in Rome to this fact. But possibly more important was the constant intercourse between such cities as Ephesus and Corinth and the capital. A Christian church would be founded there almost imperceptibly, owing to the visits and migrations of converts, each of whom, after the manner of the first generations of Christianity, became a centre of missionary effort. There is at any rate no evidence of any definite propaganda in Rome on the part of Peter or any other of the apostles before the period of our Epistle. The stories of an early preaching of Peter (7.v.) in the capital are comparatively late and unsupported. Our oldest authorities speak only of his martyrdom there at a later date. The evidence of Romans itself is certainly against any idea that he had visited Rome before the writing of the Epistle. It is true that the interpretation of 15²⁰ is not undisputed, Lake and others seeing in the 'hindrance' the fact that the church had actually been founded by another—presumably St. Peter. But a careful reading of the passage shows that v. 15, 'wherefore I was hindered these many times from coming to you,' refers to the urgent necessity under which St. Paul had lain of preaching in other districts first, not to the objection of intruding on another's foundation. He clearly implies that the 'hindrance' has now been removed; he has, in fact, 'no more any further place in these regions'; i.e. he has done his work. On the other hand, the objection that Rome was another man's foundation would be valid permanently, and it is most improbable that in these circumstances St. Paul would even have written to the Roman Church, at any rate without making the least reference to St. Peter's work and position there. There would not, however, be the same objection to writing to or visiting a community in which Christianity had simply sprung up, as it were, of itself.

The remark of Suetonius (Claud. 25) that Claudius 'Judæos, impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes, Roma expulit' (confirmed by Ac 18-) may well be an indication of the existence of Christianity in Rome c. A.D. 52.* It is true that 'Chrestus' may be the name of an actual individual (it was a common slave name), but more probably it represents 'Christus,' in which case we have a hint either of some Messianic disturbance of a general character or else, more specifically, of troubles arising between Jews and Christians owing to the preaching of Jesus as Christ. The Roman historian might easily suppose from hearing the name that Christus, or Chrestus, was the actual ringleader. It may be that the reminder in Ro 13^{1st} of the duty of proper submission to the civil power has a special reference to this event; Christians are to hold aloof from every type of lawless action, and from anything which might lead, however unintentionally, to collision with those responsible for law and order. Lake, however (Earlier Epistles, p. 392 ff.), suggests that the passage is more general and refers to the danger of being mixed up in the agitations and abortive rebellions of the Zealots. It is at any rate important as reflecting the Pauline and Lucan attitude to the Imperial power, in strong contrast to the hostility of the Apocalypse. And, written to Rome, it might have a considerable apologetic value if a copy of the Epistle chanced to come into the hands of anyone connected with the Court.

We may now consider what light is thrown by the Epistle on the circumstances of the Roman Church. It has already been pointed out that it is precarious to argue too definitely from it to the conditions supposed to exist at Rome, and we must bear in mind that the destination of ch. 16, with its personal references, is doubtful. But, whether this ch. refers to Rome or to Ephesus, it is equally valuable as giving some indication of the wide spread of Christianity at this period among different classes and races. Slaves and freedmen are largely, but not exclusively, represented. If Narcissus is the freedman of Claudius, and Aristobulus (v.¹⁰) the grandson of Herod the Great (see § 2 (a)), it is interesting to find that Christianity had reached their households, i.e. their slaves and entourage. But if these identifications be rejected, we then probably have the names of prominent and presumably more or less wealthy members of the church. The ch. also suggests that the community is organized in groups and household churches, and this harmonizes with other indications afforded by the Epistle which, in common with others of the same period, has no reference to a developed ministry. We hear only generally of men who prophesy, teach, exhort, and rule (12^{6th}), mentioned in a way which leaves it doubtful whether permanent officials are intended. Such a stage of development would be very natural in Rome, if the church had not been founded by any leading missionary but had grown up more or less haphazard. In ch. 16 the importance of the work of women is noticeable; Mary, Tryphæna and Tryphosa, and Persis are mentioned; Prisca is prominent, and Phœbe is the servant or deaconess (διδασκός) of the church at Cenchreæ; it is, however, questionable whether a definite official is meant.

Of the sacraments, baptism is taken for granted, but there is no reference to the Eucharist. Though prophecy and, in St. Paul's own case, miracles are mentioned, we do not hear of the startling gifts so prominent at Corinth. Disputes as to the relative value of charismata seem to lie in the background of 12^{3rd}, but this may only be a reflexion of St. Paul's general experience, and need not imply the actual existence of such quarrels in Rome in particular. The whole picture of church life in chs. 12, 13 is markedly sober and practical; the Christian has his trials (8, 12^{1st}), but definite persecution is excluded by 13^{1st}. The importance of hospitality in the primitive Church is well known; the duty would be specially urgent in Rome, whither so many travellers came (12¹³).

6. The bearing of the Epistle on the personal history of St. Paul.—Romans is primarily important as marking a definite stage in the development of Christian doctrine, and it has comparatively little to offer with regard to the external history of St. Paul's life. There are, however, a few scattered indications which it may be well to group together. Its chief interest is with regard to the form his teaching had come to take; we find but few of those intimate personal touches in which 1 and 2 Cor. are so rich. Ch. 7 is no doubt autobiographical in the sense that it is based on personal experience, probably of struggles before conversion. At the same time the 'I' seems to be typical of the divided soul in general and not to refer to St. Paul specifically. The passionate outbursts in 9^{1st} 10¹ throw a strong light on St. Paul's burning patriotism. It has been remarked that if he had not spent himself in the service of Jesus he would have shed his blood with other natives of Tarsus on the walls of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. As has been pointed out (§ 1), the Epistle touches the narrative of Acts at two points.

(1) It emphasizes St. Paul's strong desire to visit Rome (cf. Ac 19²¹). Without any unworthy flattery it helps us to realize the importance he attached to that city and to its church, an importance natural to a Roman citizen who worked along the great roads and concentrated on the great towns of the Empire, and who understood to the full the opportunity afforded by the Pax Romana for the spread of Christianity. The Epistle underlines this particular feature in the Apostle's missionary policy. Whether the journey to Spain of which he speaks (Ro 15²⁸) ever took place must remain doubtful, though it may be covered by the expression of Clement of Rome (Ep. ad Cor. i. 5) that he reached 'the western limit of the world.' The Muratorian Fragment also speaks of a visit to Spain, but on that we can lay little stress.

The phrase 'even unto Illyricum' (15¹⁹) is difficult. It seems that it does not imply an extension of St. Paul's missionary activity to the east coasts of the Adriatic, of which there is no hint in Acts, but merely that when he was in Macedonia he found himself on the border of Illyricum; this, when he wrote, formed the western limit of his preaching.

(2) The other important point of contact is the reference to the collection for the saints (15^{25th}), which appears as the main motive for the visit to Jerusalem. We see from the Epistle St. Paul's anxiety as to his reception and his keen desire that the gift should be favourably received. Romans itself is in a sense an eirenicon between Jew and Gentile, both within and without the Church (see esp. chs. 11-13), and the purpose of the Epistle is therefore in harmony with that of the visit to Jerusalem, showing that at this period St. Paul was taking particular pains both to secure unity within the Church and, if it were possible, to win over the nation as a whole.*

We should not pass over the incidental reference in 15¹⁹ to St. Paul's power of working miracles. It is not known what event is referred to in 16⁴; it can hardly be the riot of Ac 19²³.

7. Analysis.—(a) Introduction (11-17).

11-17. Extended greeting.

18-17. Congratulations and personal notes, leading up to statement of the writer's Gentile apostleship and the theme of the Epistle—'the righteous shall live by faith.'

(b) Righteousness (18-5).

18-33. Even the Gentiles might have known God, but they have not; sin has followed ignorance, and God's anger is just.

21-11. God's judgment is universal and is only delayed in mercy (n.b. vv. 9-11, taking up the thought of 1⁸ and emphasizing the similarity between Jew and Gentile).

212-16. Not the possession of the Law but the doing of it is the crucial question from the point of view of God's judgment.

217-29. Do the Jews keep the Law? Certainly not. This suggests that we must look deeper to discover the true Jew and the true circumcision, which turn out to be spiritual.

31-8. Preliminary objections. What is the advantage of the Jew (the answer is not given till chs. 9-11)? Man's disobedience does not invalidate God's promises, nor may this fact be made an excuse for sin.

39-20. Universal sinfulness proved by an appeal to Scripture, as it has already been proved by the appeal to experience.

321-31. God's real method of salvation is by faith in Jesus Christ. It is connected with His death. This faith brings full forgiveness of sin and justification; it excludes all idea of personal merit and is essentially universal.

41-25. The principle considered in relation to Abraham. He was justified by his faith, not by his actions, and that before the institution of circumcision. Nor did the promise come through the Law. His faith was shown by his acceptance of the promise of a son. These facts make him the father of all believers, of whatever race (vv. 11, 12, 16, 23ff.).

51-21. The results of this new righteousness by faith. It carries with it the assurance of present free access to God and the hope of final salvation, guaranteed by the love of God displayed in the death of Christ. The work of Christ stands in strong contrast with the effects of Adam's fall (vv. 12-21).

(c) Sanctification (chs. 6-8).

61-14. Our baptism is a death unto sin; it therefore implies a constant conflict against evil (some interpret this passage as implying that theoretically at least the Christian cannot sin; see § 8).

615-76. This truth illustrated by the double metaphors of emancipation from slavery and of marriage.

77-24. What, then, is the position of the Law? It brings the occasion and the possibility of sin, though not itself sinful. To it is due the inward struggle in the self between good and evil ('flesh'), from which we are delivered by Christ (this section apparently refers not to the experience of the Christian but to that of the unregenerate man).

81-17. The work of the Spirit, bringing deliverance from the 'flesh' (vv. 1-9), the guarantee of bodily resurrection (vv. 11-13), of sonship and final glory.

818-39. The sorrows and yearnings of creation point forward to a future deliverance (vv. 18-29). In our present weakness we are sustained by the Spirit, and the certainty of God's final purpose for us, a purpose which nothing can hinder.

(d) The problem of the rejection of Israel (chs. 9-11).

91-8. The problem stated in its personal and general bearings.

96-13. From the first there was a progressive selection and rejection; the promise was not to all the actual descendants of Abraham.

914-29. The principles of this selection rest on the will of God as Creator (Pharaoh, and the metaphor of the potter); against these the creature has no right of complaint. The OT shows that God's choice was to embrace Gentiles as well as Jews (vv. 24-29).

930-10-1. Israel chose the wrong way of attaining righteousness (930-103), yet its attainment was near and easy. The universal preaching of the gospel has brought to Israel both opportunity and warning.

111-10. But after all the true Israel has always been a remnant, or small fraction, of the whole.

1111-36. Their very fall has the purpose of opening the way to the admission of the Gentiles. Yet they too must beware of presuming on their position (the olive tree); the rejection of the Jew is only temporary, till the final purpose is worked out. This is one of mercy to all, based on the methods of God's working, which are unfathomable by man.

(e) Practical exhortations (chs. 12-15¹³).

12-13. Miscellaneous exhortations, centring round the idea of peace and unity, including sections on the right use of spiritual gifts and the attitude to the civil power.

14-15⁷. The practical problem of the relation of the weak brother to the strong within the Church.

158-13. Both Jew and Gentile have their place in the purpose of God (the return to this topic is apparently dictated by the need of insisting on unity).

(f) Conclusion (15¹⁴-end).

1514-33. Personal explanations; motive of the Epistle; visits to Rome and Jerusalem, and the collection for the saints.

161-16. * Greetings to various friends.

1617-20. A warning against false teachers.

1621-23. Greetings sent by St. Paul's companions.

1625-27. Doxology.

8. The argument of the Epistle.—The problem to be solved is the method by which man may attain righteousness. The underlying idea in this is not merely salvation, regarded as something external—the winning of certain privileges and the escape from punishment. It is an inner state of the man, bringing him into a right relation to God. No doubt in virtue of this he will escape the wrath of God's righteous judgment (25 5⁹), but this is not the primary thought. St. Paul's answer may be best understood if we approach it from the point of view of his own spiritual experience.† In this we can trace three main elements.

(a) There is the consciousness of his own sin and impotence; the Law had not helped him in the past to attain the righteousness he desired; it had only brought the sense of failure and of guilt, and

* On the question whether this ch. in fact forms part of the Epistle see § 2 (α).

* On this point, which has an important bearing on the reliability of the view of St. Paul's character and policy presented in Acts, see A. Harnack, Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels, Eng. tr., London, 1911, pp. 64, 72 ff.

† Attempts have been made, e.g. by Schweitzer (Geschichte der paulinischen Forschung, Tübingen, 1911, p. 192), to deny the influence of St. Paul's experience, and in particular of his conversion, on his thought. It is true he does not make many direct references to this, but it is impossible to read such an Epistle as Romans sympathetically without realizing that the experience of himself and his converts is always in the background.

this experience was general both with Jew and with Gentile (2. 7th. 8th).

(b) On his surrender to Christ at his conversion he became conscious of an entire breach with the past and of a completely new point of view. The death and resurrection of Christ have introduced a new factor into the relation between God and man (3rd. 4th 5th. 8th). The starting-point is now what He has done, not what man can succeed in doing for himself. But this work of Christ does not remain something external to the believer; transactional theories of the Atonement and unethical views of salvation have always been based on the isolation of the work, generally the death, of Christ, regarded as a past event which the believer has only to accept. To St. Paul the Christian is identified with Christ and shares in His death, burial, and resurrection (6. 8th); this truth is absolutely central in his teaching. The term which he applies to this identification of the self with Christ is 'faith.' It is well known that to him faith is not the intellectual acceptance of a creed, but a personal surrender to a new power; the believer is a new creature; he is in Christ and Christ in him (see Sanday-Headlam, pp. 102, 162); faith is inseparable from the mystical union. The external method by which the union is effected is baptism. With regard to this it must be remembered that to St. Paul and to the first Christians in general baptism was always the accompaniment of a definite conversion and change of life, by which the convert died in a very real sense to the old past, turning his back not only on its sins, but on its religious beliefs and practices, its habits of life, and very often on its friendships and social ties. The primary result of this new experience is a sense of forgiveness or justification (3rd, etc.); the believer, having died to the sinful past, can now be 'treated as righteous' before God; he starts afresh* (see, further, JUSTIFICATION).

(c) The third element is the sense of new power which comes from the union with Christ. This may be described as sanctification through the Spirit, or as a present sharing of the resurrection of Christ (6th. 11th. 7th. 8th); it is very difficult to trace any real or final distinction between the Spirit and Christ (cf. the interchange of terms in Ro 8). That the sense of the possession of the Spirit is primarily based on experience comes out most clearly in the question of Gal 3, which is the starting-point of St. Paul's argument, 'Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?' It is common ground that a new force has come into the convert's life; the only question is whether it is to be ascribed to the gospel or to the Law. This new power, then, is inseparably connected with the conversion experiences and with faith, though it does mark a development which for certain purposes may be distinguished from them; i.e. sanctification is not the same as justification; it is the fruit which grows from this root. But the closeness of the connexion avoids all danger of the unethical conclusions which some were ready to draw from St. Paul's teaching (Ro 6th). The life of righteousness must follow; in a certain sense it is unthinkable that the Christian can continue in sin,† and practical moral injunctions fill the latter part of the Epistle. But the stress is not on works as the starting-point; St. Paul always goes deeper down to the power and motive from which they will inevitably spring.

It is in the light of these doctrines that we may best understand St. Paul's attitude to what is superficially the central problem of the Epistle, viz. the relation between Jew and Gentile. It is obvious that considerations such as a man's physical descent and his obedience to external requirements such as circumcision and a ceremonial Law, or indeed any law, considered as such, become irrelevant. Experience was in fact proving daily that the new life was open to the Gentile at least as freely as to the Jew. But at once there arose a difficulty. It requires some effort of sympathetic imagination to enter into the feelings of a Jew brought up to regard his people as the favourites of God, and the Law as the Divine means by which life was to be won. No doubt he might hope for the Gentiles to be converted to Judaism, but if they could obtain all the privileges of the Messianic kingdom without this, what became of his Scriptures with their promises to the children of Abraham? Why had God chosen them or given the Law at all? St. Paul, as a Jew, was bound to meet the objectors on their own ground; he appeals to the Scriptures themselves, to the story of Abraham justified by faith before the giving of circumcision or the Law (ch. 4), and to the purpose of the Law as revealing sin. He argues on the analogies of slavery and marriage that its sway is abolished by the death to the old self (7th), and, more effectively, he shows its practical failure (v. 7th). It is well to admit frankly that St. Paul's arguments do not always appeal to us so directly on these points; he is arguing as a Rabbi brought up to use a certain method of interpretation, which is not our own to-day. The real proof of the truth of his position lies in the appeal to spiritual experience and history, and that is even stronger than when he wrote. The supreme value of the Epistle is to be found in the imperishable passages, such as chs. 6-8, in which the facts of the spiritual life are described in language which must remain classical for all time.

There still, however, remained the problem of God's choice of the Jews and their apparent abandonment. Under this new method of salvation, which has been proved from the Scriptures themselves to be the right one, what is the meaning of the past history of Israel and what is to be its fate in the future? Chs. 9-11 deal specifically with these difficulties,* resuming the question of 3rd. In them St. Paul shows that there had always been a principle of selection and rejection in God's dealings with His people, a principle resting on His inscrutable will (ch. 9). And in fact the Jews were themselves to blame; they had adopted a wrong method of seeking righteousness, in spite of the teaching of their own Moses, and when the Messiah came they rejected Him, though they had full opportunity of hearing the message (ch. 10).

expected the Christian to be actually sinless, an idea of which we have traces in 1 Jn. and in Hermas. Observation of life in the early Christian communities must have at once made it difficult to hold any such theory, and it is contradicted by the whole tone of the exhortations of the Epistles. The expressions which suggest it belong to the sharp dichotomy between the regenerate and unregenerate already noticed; they are part of the theory of the Christian life, unhappily at once negated by experience. St. Paul found, in fact, that it took more to kill the 'old Adam' than he had expected; the crucifixion of the flesh and the old self was a gradual process, not something completed at a definite moment. This truth has an important bearing on the difficulty which arises from the slow working of the heaven of Christianity.

* Baur regarded these as the central portion of the Epistle, for the sake of which all the rest was written; this, however, is to go too far, though it is probable that they are not an afterthought or an appendix, as the modern reader is sometimes inclined to think.

* It may be noted that under the pressure of this vivid experience St. Paul sometimes goes very far in the sharpness with which he draws the line between the regenerate and the unregenerate man; he hardly regards the new life as the quickening of a spark which already burns, however feebly, in all men; it is an entirely new thing ab extra. It is true that in Ro 7 he represents the flesh and the spirit as already in conflict before conversion, but at other times the natural man would seem to be abandoned to 'the flesh' (5th). From such a point of view it must be either one or the other; they cease to be two tendencies at work in every one. See FLRSH.

† It has sometimes been argued, on the basis of expressions in Ro 6 and 8, as well as in other Epistles, that St. Paul

Finally, so far as the future is concerned, God's casting off of His people is only temporary; it is a stage in the conversion of the Gentile world, and in the end both Jew and Gentile will be united in Christ. This again rests on the unfathomable purpose of God. The chs. are among the most difficult of the Pauline Epistles (2 P 3⁴⁰). In 9¹⁰⁰. St. Paul states the Divine sovereignty in a way that seems to leave little room for free-will. The difficulty is eased, but not removed, by the reminder that he is dealing with nations and not with individuals. The only real answer is that in ch. 10, as elsewhere in his Epistles, especially in his ethical teaching, he insists no less strongly on human responsibility and the power of choice. He is dealing with one of the ultimate problems of thought, and for the moment, after his manner, isolates a single element. It is a mistake to look in his teaching for any detailed theory on the problems of metaphysics; nor does he ever answer the question as to the final fate of the heathen or of 'vessels prepared for destruction.' It must be admitted, however, that the principle of the appeal to the absolute rights and unchallengeable will of God as Creator has its dangers. It cannot hold good as against those questionings which come from man's moral sense or justice, since, if all that is best in our human instincts of truth and goodness does not rest in the end on corresponding elements in the Divine nature, we have no means of knowing God at all and no criterion of right and wrong.

It may be added that considerable light is thrown on St. Paul's argument here and throughout the Epistle by a study of contemporary Jewish literature and especially of 4 Ezra. There is no question of any direct connexion, but we see in such a book how the problems with which St. Paul deals were the problems which occupied the minds of other thoughtful Jews, particularly after the fall of Jerusalem. We find the same questions as to the choice and apparent rejection of Israel, the power of sin and its relation to the Law (4 Ezra. iii., iv., v. 23 ff.). There is the same emphasis on Adam's sin and its effects on his descendants (iii. 7, vii. 11), and the same contrast between the choice of Jacob and the rejection of Esau (iii. 16). Stress is laid on man's universal sinfulness (vii. 46) and the general absence of 'good works' (viii. 31), while in ix. 7 works and faith are coupled as alternative means of salvation. The solution of the problem is based both on the inscrutability of God's ways and on trust in 'the goal of the love that I have declared unto my people' (v. 40, viii. 47 ff.), a two-fold doctrine found in similar contexts in St. Paul; cf. Ro 9¹⁴. 11³⁵. 33⁵⁵. The greatest contrast with St. Paul's teaching—assuming, of course, the absence of the Christian solution—is to be found in the narrow nationalism of the writer. The world has been created for Israel's sake; the nations are but spittle and a drop on a bucket (vi. 55 ff.); the writer can even rejoice over the fewness of the saved (vii. 60 ff.), and the supremacy of the Law remains unchallenged (iii. 19 ff., ix. 31 ff.); it 'perishes not but abides in its glory,' in spite of the fact that it is unable to save the sinner who transgresses it; his fate can only be acquiesced in as deserved.

A further question, which can only be raised here, is how far, side by side with such Jewish influences, we may trace the influence, possibly unconscious, of Greek and Oriental pagan thought. Christianity, when it passed from Jerusalem to Antioch, and then into the Græco-Roman world, found itself in an atmosphere seething with a variety of religious ideas; particularly important are those connected with Astral Stoicism and the mystery-religions. Many of its converts must have come from such systems. They found in the new religion the redemption, the new birth, the union with the Godhead, and the hope of immortality they had sought elsewhere in vain. We should expect a priori that the language and mode of thought to which they had been accustomed would leave some mark on Christianity.* With regard to Romans, the question arises specially in relation to ch. 6 (see, e.g., Lietzmann, ad loc.; Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Leipzig, 1910, p. 100 ff.), but it can be answered only when considered in its bearings on the whole development of Pauline theology and early Christian thought. It is still sub judice, and hasty answers are to be deprecated, but the student should bear it in mind as one of the factors which may have to be taken very seriously into account.

9. Literary relationships.—(a) Other Pauline Epistles.—Romans stands in the same group as Gal. and 1 and 2 Cor., the four being known as the Hauptbriefe, or central letters of the Pauline corpus.† It is connected with them in style, language, and thought, and with 1 and 2 Cor. in date also, being written shortly after them. Many would add that it is also related in date to Gal., though the present writer believes that the latter is in fact the earliest extant Pauline Epistle, having been written before the Council of Ac 15. A discussion of the question would be out of place here; the only point with which we are concerned is that Romans is certainly later than Galatians.‡ The two deal with the same subject—the relation of the gospel to the Law, and the position of the Gentile Christian in the Church. The parallel is worked out in detail by Lightfoot (*Galatians*⁴, London, 1876, p. 45 ff.); cf. especially Gal 3⁶ 10 and Ro 4³⁻¹⁵; in fact, most of Gal 3 may be paralleled in Romans. Lightfoot on the strength of this puts the writing of Gal. a few months before that of Romans. This conclusion, however, is not necessary, since it is quite possible for a writer to repeat himself very closely on the same subject after the lapse of several years, if his views were fairly formed at the earlier date. The important point is the difference between the two Epistles, which Lightfoot himself fully admits: 'The Epistle to the Galatians stands in relation to the Roman letter as the rough model to the finished statue; or rather, if I may press the metaphor without misapprehension, it is the first study of a single figure, which is worked into a group in the latter writing' (ib. p. 49). And this difference is generally admitted. Gal. is definitely controversial, written red-hot to convince waverers and recover backsliders in the midst of a pressing crisis. Romans is not indeed an academic treatise, but it is the calm and studied statement of a position reached during years of debate. It is worth noting that some of the arguments of Gal. which are most after the Rabbinical manner and are least convincing are in fact dropped in Romans, e.g. the allegory of Hagar, and the argument derived from the singular of 'seed' (Gal 3¹⁶). In Ro 4¹³.

* A good example of the influence of terms (though in this case the idea behind them is rejected, not accepted) may be found in the difficult 'height' and 'depth' of Ro 8³⁸. Lietzmann points out that ύψωμα and βάθος are technical astrological expressions for the ascension and declination of a star. Remembering how fate and the stars were connected in the religious ideas of the day, we may develop this hint and suggest that St. Paul implies that among the forces conquered by Christ is that tyranny of fate, astrologically conceived, which must so often have made life a burden. Similarly, the 'powers' (δυνάμεις) which immediately precede (separated, be it noted, from the angels) may be the supposed influences of the stars.

† See Sanday-Headlam, p. lviii, for list of words peculiar to the four.

the 'seed' is interpreted in the natural way of Abraham's descendants in general. A comparison of the two Epistles by no means excludes the possibility of some considerable interval between them.

(b) Other books of the NT.—(1) The Epistle of St. James.—Here again we have certain resemblances in language (Sanday-Headlam, p. lxxvii), accompanied, however, by an apparent contradiction in teaching. Both quote Gn 15⁶ ('Abraham believed God,' etc.; Ja 2³, Ro 4³, etc.), but draw from it opposite conclusions, St. James arguing that Abraham was justified by works and not by faith. There are really two distinct questions. (i.) Is there any direct literary relation between the two? The date of James is most uncertain; it may be one of the earliest or one of the latest of the books of the NT, and, therefore, if there is indebtedness, it would be very difficult to say which of the two was the borrower. But in fact the general parallels in language are not sufficient to prove that either had the other's work before him. They are mostly commonplaces of Jewish and Christian teaching, and, if any further explanation were required, it might—on the supposition of the apostolic authorship of James—be found in personal intercourse between the two writers. The common quotation seems at first sight more significant, but it ceases to be so when we remember that this text was frequently used in Jewish discussions (Lightfoot, *Galatians*², p. 158 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, p. 104). Of course if St. James be placed late the case is then somewhat altered, and it becomes possible that the writer knew Romans and was attempting to answer either it or exaggerated deductions drawn from St. Paul's teaching.

Apart, however, from the question whether either writer is intending to controvert the other or not, it is important to ask (ii.) how far the two points of view are really exclusive. It at once becomes obvious when we look below the surface that the two mean different things by faith.* St. Paul with his conception of faith could never have said that the devils believe and tremble. St. James is on the level of the plain matter-of-fact man, insisting on conduct, not on profession. St. Paul goes deeper down to the springs of conduct. The two do represent different points of view, but they are not necessarily contradictory. St. Paul would probably have accepted all that St. James said, granting his use of the terms, but would have argued that it did not go to the root of the matter. St. James would probably have been quite ready to agree with St. Paul, when he had explained what he meant, with the mental reservation that he was not quite sure that he understood him. There is certainly room for both within the Church's canon.

(2) 1 Peter.—Here the literary relationship is far stronger and indeed almost indisputable. The parallel passages may be seen in Sanday-Headlam, p. lxxiv ff. Their conclusion is as follows: 'Although equal stress cannot be laid on all these passages the resemblance is too great and too constant to be merely accidental. In 1 P 2⁶ we have a quotation from the O.T. with the same variations from the LXX that we find in Ro 9³. Not only do we find the same thoughts, such as the metaphorical use of the idea of sacrifice (Ro 12¹, 1 P 2⁹), and the same rare words, such as συνχηματισθεαι, ἀνυποκριτος,† but in one passage (Ro 13¹⁻², 1 P 2¹³⁻¹⁷) we have what must be accepted as conclusive evidence, the same ideas occurring in the same order. And their verdict that 1 Peter is the borrower must be accepted on every ground. We are not here concerned with the possible bearing of this fact on the question of the authorship of that Epistle; we need only point out that it makes it probably the earliest external witness to the existence of Romans.

(3) It may be added that there are fairly close resemblances between Ro 4¹⁷⁻¹ and He 11^{11, 12, 19}, and between Ro 12¹⁹ and He 10³⁰, where Dt 32³⁵ is quoted with the same variations from the LXX. Jude²⁴ is also of the same type as the doxology of Ro 16²⁵; on this see § 2 (b).

(c) Writings outside the NT.—(1) Wisdom.—Here we pass to a book which undoubtedly influenced St. Paul. The main parallels are found in Ro 1²⁰⁻²³ (the attack on idolatry), which is closely similar to various passages in Wis 13 and 14, and in Ro 9¹⁹⁻²³, for which cf. Wis 11²¹ 12^{10, 12, 20} 15⁷. In each case the passages will be found in full in parallel columns in Sanday-Headlam (pp. 51, 267). On the other hand, the contrast between Ro 2 and Wis 15^{1ff.} is most instructive. In the latter passage the writer boasts of the freedom of the Jew from idolatry; St. Paul's words gain in force if read as a retort to this. Further, while Wisdom distinguishes between the principles and motives of God's chastisement of Jews and heathen, very much to the favour of the former, St. Paul teaches that both are ultimately on the same level.

(2) Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.—Here again a long list of parallel passages will be found in Sanday-Headlam, p. lxxxiii f., and also in R. H. Charles's ed. of the Testaments, London, 1903, p. lxxv ff. To take a single example, we may compare with Ro 12¹ Test. Benj. iv. 3, 'By doing good ne overcometh evil' (οἱ τὸς τὸ ἀγαθὸν τοῦ κακοῦ). Sanday-Headlam suppose the Testaments to be the borrower, but they are now very generally assigned to an earlier date (Charles, c. 100 B.C.), and we may accept Charles's verdict, 'It will be clear that St. Paul was thoroughly familiar with the Greek Translation of the Testaments,' with the conclusion that his Epistles are sometimes dependent on that version. It need only be remarked that the parallels in Romans do not stand alone.

LITERATURE.—For literature dealing with the Pauline Epistles and theology in general, see under PAUL. The literature on Romans itself is very large; reference may be made to art. 'Romans,' HDB iv. 306; to the list of Commentaries in Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'², Edinburgh, 1902, p. xcviiff.; and to J. Moffatt, LNT, London, 1911, p. 130. Among the best for general purposes may be mentioned E. H. Gifford, Speaker's Commentary, iii., London, 1881; C. J. Vaughan, *St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans*³, do., 1870; B. Jowett, *Epistles of St. Paul to the Thess., Gal., and Rom.*³, do., 1894; J. B. Lightfoot, Notes on Epistles of St. Paul (covering Ro 1-7), do., 1895; F. Godet, Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1881-82; J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' London, 1900; and, above all, Sanday-Headlam, ICC.

Of German Commentaries the best are perhaps Meyer-Weiss, *Der Brief an die Römer*², Göttingen, 1899; A. Jülicher, in Schriften des NT, do., 1907; H. Lietzmann, in Handbuch zum NT, Tübingen, 1910 (valuable for quotations from contemporary literature).

Of studies we may mention H. P. Liddon, Explanatory Analysis of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, London, 1893; F. J. A. Hort, Prolegomena to St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians, do., 1895; H. C. G. Moule, Expositor's Bible, 'Romans,' do., 1894; C. ROME.—Any attempt to describe Rome in the middle of the 1st cent. could be made only by one alike endowed with sympathetic imagination and equipped with minute erudition. Such an attempt has been made, not altogether unsuccessfully, by F. W. Farrar in his Darkness and Dawn (London, 1891), as well as by other writers. In this article it has seemed best to mention one or two points in which Rome of that period differed from a modern great city, and to follow this up by giving some account of certain important buildings of the early

* See Sanday-Headlam, p. 102 ff.

Empire, whether they actually date from the later Republic or not. The writer has not rigidly excluded those that belong to a period somewhat later than Nero, but he has as far as possible confined his attention throughout to buildings of which actual remains exist. He has been indebted to standard works mentioned in the Literature, but has himself seen everything which he describes.

The population of Rome at the time St. Paul reached it, about A.D. 60, may be estimated roughly at from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000, of which a very large proportion were slaves. The streets of the city were for the most part narrow, and no vehicles were allowed inside the city walls except the wagons necessary for building purposes. The traveller who did not walk was conveyed in a sedan chair or on horseback to one of the city gates, where his carriage was awaiting him. The public buildings were magnificent, but many of the dwelling-houses, three or more stories high, were in a state of dangerous disrepair. Crassus, the great financier of the 1st cent. B.C., owned much of this property, and derived a large fortune from it. Martial and Juvenal, towards the end of the 1st and the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D., describe the perils to the pedestrian from falling tiles, etc. The dangers to the health of slum dwellers were to some extent obviated by the open-air life commonly led, by the porticoes which gave protection from sun and rain, by the theatre, amphitheatre, circus, etc. There was no proper lighting of the streets at night. Active life was supposed to end at sunset, and those who were abroad after dark were accompanied by torch-bearers, as the Londoners of the 18th cent. by link-boys. Not till the time of Augustus was there any police in Rome, but the riots of the 1st cent. B.C. had shown the necessity, and Augustus divided the city into wards (regiones), and established an excellent police system, of which archæological remains have been found.

Palatine Hill.—There is a general consensus of opinion that the original Rome, Roma Quadrata ('Square Rome'), was on the Palatine Hill only—the hill of Pales, the shepherds' god. It is with the S.W. angle that the earliest legends of Rome are mostly associated. It was there that the basket was found containing the twins Romulus and Remus, after it had been washed ashore by the Tiber. There also was the lair of the she-wolf that suckled the twins, etc. The Palatine Hill is kept for the most part sacred from modern buildings, and is almost entirely covered by ruins of buildings belonging to various epochs. Excavation is still going on, but seemingly no attempt is made to check the growth of vegetation. In the Republican period the Palatine became a fashionable residential quarter. Here was the house of Cicero. On his exile in 58 B.C. the house was destroyed and the site confiscated, but in the next year it was restored to him. The Emperor Augustus was born near the N.E. corner, and various rooms of a house belonging to his wife Livia are still shown on the hill, with the frescoes on the inside walls. Under the Empire practically the whole of the hill was converted into a huge Imperial residence. The process was begun by Augustus, who acquired a valuable property which had once belonged to the orator Hortensius, and added to it by the purchase of adjoining properties. There the Imperial palace was built. Fire and destruction worked upon this and other buildings, and we cannot with certainty identify remains on the hill as belonging to buildings of a particular date. What one sees is great masses of brick-work, with arched roofs. The bricks are square, and very thin as compared with those of to-day. The surviving edifices impress one greatly by their size and strength, but by nothing else. The whole looks excessively shabby. The explanation is that what we are now looking on is only the inner core of the building proper. In the heyday of their existence all these shabby brick buildings were encased in marble. The marble, in the course of ages, has been stripped off, partly in the interests of the decoration of Christian churches, and partly to be pounded down and made into lime. There is a well-known saying of Augustus that he found Rome built of brick and left it made of marble. On seeing these ruins it occurred to the present writer that what was meant by this saying was simply that he had covered brick buildings with marble. The Imperial palace on the Palatine was successively altered or enlarged, as the tastes or requirements of successive Emperors demanded. One most important building must be mentioned before we leave this hill, or mountain, as the Romans called it (see ROMAN EMPIRE), namely, the temple and precinct of Apollo on the N.E. part of the hill. The decoration of the temple was magnificent. In a double colonnade connected with it were statues of each of the fifty fabled daughters of Danaus, and there also were the Imperial libraries of Greek and Roman literature, one of the earliest public libraries in Italy, splendidly equipped by Augustus not only with manuscript books but also with busts of the great authors.

Capitol.—In modern times the Capitoline Hill is disfigured on the southern side by a hideous barrack-like erection with a campanile, called the Campidoglio, and on the other peak, the Arx, there is being erected an enormous monument to commemorate united Italy. The great ornament of the Capitoline in ancient times was the temple of Jupiter, Best and Greatest (the god whom the Latin allies worshipped on the Alban Mount), together with Juno and Minerva. It was to this great temple that all the triumphal processions of Rome made their way. It was approached immediately by the Cliuſus Capitolinus, 'Capitoline slope,' from the Forum. The temple measured about 204 ft. by 188 ft. At the angle of the hill nearest the Tiber was the Tarpeian Rock, from which criminals were hurled. The sheer cliff may be seen from various points. One of the most prominent ancient features on the Capitoline Hill to-day is the equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius, placed there in 1538, probably under the direction of Michael Angelo, who was commissioned to lay out this site in as worthy a manner as possible. The statue owes its preservation to the belief that it was supposed to represent the earliest Christian Emperor, whereas, as a matter of fact, Marcus was one of the greatest persecutors of the Church. It is the only equestrian statue of an Emperor that has survived. The Arx was in ancient times for the most part not built on: it was from the ground there that heralds got the sacred plants which played a part in the conclusion of treaties with foreign powers. The plant (verbenā sagmina) symbolized the soil of Rome. The temple of Iuno Moneta was on this height; it was the seat of the Mint.

Forum.—Both these hills flank the Forum, to which most of our space must be devoted. Standing near the Cliuſus Capitolinus, one looks straight down the Forum, and there must have been a lovely view of the Alban mountains in the distance, before the enormous Flavian amphitheatre, commonly called the Colosseum, shut it off. We must try to touch briefly on each of the more important buildings of which there are traces in the Forum. Like the Palatine, it is shut off from modern intrusions. The Forum was the centre of the throbbing life of the ancient city—the life social, commercial, legal, and political. Occupying a central position in the hollow surrounded by the various heights, it was the natural meeting-place of the communities on the hills above, and this it continued to be as long as ancient Rome lasted. It was flanked by all sorts of shops, those of the money-changers or bankers included. Military processions passed through it. The people were addressed there. Funeral processions stopped there for the funeral oration to be pronounced. In the adjoining buildings law-cases were tried. An enumeration of the buildings, proceeding from N. to S., will serve to give some notion of the comprehensiveness of the life of the Forum.

The Tabularium or Record Office was situated at the foot of the Capitol, and was built in 78 B.C. Its lower courses, on which mediæval work is now superimposed, are the most splendid specimens of Republican masonry surviving.

In front of this was the Temple of Vespasian and Titus, erected in A.D. 80. Three columns are still standing. There is also a richly decorated frieze and cornice. An inscription records that the temple was restored by Septimius Severus and Caracalla.

To the left of this was the Temple of Concord. This temple with concrete foundations, built by M. Furius Camillus in 366 B.C., was restored by Opimius in 121 B.C., and again rebuilt by Tiberius in A.D. 7-10. Only the threshold is preserved, but some parts of the columns are to be found in museums.

Beyond this are the remains of the Mamertine Prison, where the Catilinarian conspirators Lentulus and Cethegus were strangled by order of the consul Cicero. The tradition that St. Paul was confined there is valueless.

To return to the other side, we come to the Temple of Saturn. Of this great temple the lofty sub-structures are preserved. The eight columns of red and grey granite belong to a later restoration. This restoration was irregular and carelessly carried out. The temple was originally built about 500 B.C. In its vaults was stored the public treasure of Rome. Julius Cæsar, after crossing the Rubicon and thus declaring civil war, forced his way in and seized £300,000 of coined money, as well as 15,000 gold and 30,000 silver ingots.

Right over on the other side is the Arch of Severus. This was built in A.D. 203 as a memorial of the victorious campaigns of the Emperor Septimius Severus in the East. In ancient times it was reached by steps, being above the level of the Forum, and now that the ground has been cleared away, that is again true. The middle archway is 40 ft. 4 ins. in height and 22 ft. 11 ins. wide; the side archways are exactly as high as the large one is wide, but they are only 9 ft. 10 ins. wide. There are four columns on each facade standing on high bases. The bas-reliefs are the most interesting part. Some represent legionary soldiers leading prisoners from the East in chains. Another figures Rome receiving the homage of conquered Oriental peoples. The great majority depict detailed scenes of the various stages of war.

In front of this arch lie some of the most antique remains yet discovered in Rome—the Lapis Niger, etc. At this place there was probably a grave or an ill-omened place of some sort. The most interesting part is a rectangular column covered with inscriptions on all four faces. The writing goes from the top down and from the bottom up. The letters show a great resemblance to those of the Greek alphabet, from which the Latin alphabet is admittedly derived. The date is not later than the 5th cent. B.C. The sense cannot be made out. All we can say is that there is mention of a rex, of ioumenta, 'beasts of burden,' and of a kalator, 'public servant'; the words sakros esed (= sacer sit, 'let so-and-so be sacred') occur also. It is probably a portion of a religious law that we have here.

Beyond the Black Stone lies all that remains of the Comitium, the voting-place of the Republic.

Beyond this again lies the Church of S. Adriano, which corresponds to the main room of the Senate House of the Empire. It was constructed by Julius Cæsar. The situation of the smaller committee room is also known. The level of the ground round about has been gradually raised in the period intervening between the original date of the building and the present day.

If we turn back again to get to the other side we come to the remains of three large oblong erections parallel with one another, all much larger than any with which we have yet had to do. The first is the Basilica Æmilia. It is only recently that this has been thoroughly excavated. The original building on this site goes back to the year 179 B.C., when its construction was completed by two censors. Lucius Æmilius Paullus, the conqueror of Perseus of Macedon, seems to have decorated it, as an inscription in his honour has lately been found among the ruins. The building was restored by another Æmilius, consul in 73 B.C. A coin of 61 B.C. shows the building as a two-storied portico. In 54 B.C. it was again restored by yet another Æmilius—it was a sort of monument of this family—with Julius Cæsar's approval and at his expense. The building was restored again after a fire in 14 B.C. at the expense of the Emperor Augustus. The next restoration took place in A.D. 22 in the reign of Tiberius. Of the Republican building only foundations remain. The entrance opens into six rooms which served for banking business, etc. A staircase led to the upper story, which was similarly arranged. The main room was 95 ft. wide and about 228 ft. long. The galleries above the side aisles were supported by columns. A considerable number of these have been found lying among the other ruins, in all cases broken, but in some cases more so than in others. These are like Peterhead granite, and form part of the 5th cent. reconstruction, which was very thorough.

Next comes the Forum Romanum proper—an open space. At the end nearest to the site of the later Arch of Severus stood the Rostra of the Republic. This was a raised platform decorated with the prows of ships captured in the First Carthaginian War in 260 B.C., under Duillius: hence the name. From this platform many a historic speech, many a funeral oration, including that of Mark Antony on Julius Cæsar, was delivered. Another interesting feature of the Forum, of which only the basis now survives, was a bronze equestrian statue of the Emperor Domitian, raised towards the end of the 1st cent. A.D. and described in detail by Statius in the first of his miscellaneous poems called Silvæ.

Leaving the Forum proper, we cross the Sacra Via (the poet Horace [Sat. i. ix. 1] by the requirements of his metre said uia sacra, but to the ordinary Roman it would have been as absurd to say Via Sacra as to say 'Street Oxford' or 'Street Princes' to-day). This Sacred Way was one of the oldest streets in Rome. Its exact course through the Forum is uncertain, but it would appear that it passed between the Forum proper and the Basilica Julia, that it then went N.E. and ran along the east side of the Forum, turning southwards eventually and passing under what is now the Arch of Titus. It was the thoroughfare through the Forum, and was connected with almost every movement of importance, sacred and secular, throughout the whole of Roman history.

Crossing it, we come to what was by far the largest edifice in the Forum, the Basilica Julia.

Nothing but the pavement and the basis of some of the columns now remains. It was begun in the year 54 B.C. and was dedicated, though not yet finished, by the dictator Julius Cæsar on the day of the celebration of the victory over his Pompeian enemies at Thapsus in 46 B.C. Augustus completed it. On its destruction by fire, he built a much larger building, which retained the original name. It consisted of three parts—a vestibule on the Sacra Via side, the main hall with the galleries surrounding it, and the separated rooms situated behind it. The main hall, used as a law-court, etc., was 328 ft. long and 118 ft. wide (central nave 271 ft. by 59 ft.). Thirty-six pillars of brick covered with marble surrounded the central nave, and into this nave the galleries in the upper story opened. The roof above the central nave was constructed with a clerestory. Much timber was used in making the roof. Four tribunals could try cases at once in this large hall, so that there must have been partitions between them. It is on record that an orator with a specially powerful voice who was pleading before one tribunal received applause from the crowds attending in all four courts. Such buildings have a special interest for us, as it was on them that one at least of the earliest types of Christian church was modelled, and from them that it received the name Basilica, which is still current.

Crossing the Vicus Tuscus or Etrurian Street, which went at right angles to the Sacra Via, we come to the great Temple of Castor or the Castors. The three columns which still stand are at once one of the most conspicuous and one of the most beautiful monuments remaining in the Forum. The temple itself was one of the most ancient of Roman foundations, going back to about 500 B.C. The legend of the help given by the twin-brother gods to the Romans when in straits at the battle of Regillus is familiar to all. The temple was the repayment of a vow. Frequently reconstructed as it was, the remains we now know date from the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D. under Trajan and Hadrian. It is quite a steep climb to get to the floor of the temple. This is of black and white mosaic laid in Tiberius' time, and covered a century later with slabs of variegated marble. The testing of weights and measures was carried on in this temple.

We come next to the Lacus Iuturnæ. At the foot of the Palatine the goddess who presided over the springs which bubble forth there was worshipped as Iuturna, she who appears in Virgil's Aeneid as the sister of Turnus, the king of the Rutulians. The pool is about 6½ ft. deep and about 16 ft. 9 ins. square. It is fed by two springs. Various ornaments and other interesting objects have been dug out there.

In this neighbourhood are three (or rather two) connected buildings, all belonging to the same cult, that of Vesta. They are respectively the circular Ædes Vestæ and the Atrium Vestæ, with the Domus Virginum Vestalium. The worship of Vesta was the worship of fire and the hearth. Fire is to the house a continual necessity, whether for the cooking of food or for the external warmth of the body, and it has for the city's house the same importance as for the private house. Just as there were a fire and a hearth in every private house, so there were a fire and a hearth in the central part of every Latin town, belonging to the people itself. In the primitive community it was important that there should be a central fire belonging equally to all the citizens, where fire could be obtained for their houses, if their own fire had gone out. It must never be allowed to go out. Six noble ladies in Rome, vowed to single life, were appointed to guard this fire. Their connexion with the town religion, as well as their high birth, made them a power in Rome, and they were universally respected. The importance of this cult is reflected in the ruins surviving in the Forum. The Temple of Vesta was round, a less common shape than the square or rectangular, and the foundations alone survive. It stood upon a circular substructure 46 ft. in diameter and was ornamented by pilasters. The entrance faced exactly east. The altar was not quite in the middle. The other two buildings ought strictly to be regarded as one, the central Atrium Vestæ, which was very large, being flanked on both sides by the living-rooms of the Vestals' house. This house was roomy and splendid, but shut in like a cloister. The central part of the Atrium seems to have been laid out as a garden. There is much of interest about this place that must be passed over.

Right at the other side is the Temple of the god Antoninus and the goddess Faustina. On the death of the Empress Faustina in A.D. 141, the Senate, at the instance of her husband, who had been passionately devoted to her, elevated her among the gods, and vowed her a temple, the construction of which was begun almost at once. The name of Antoninus himself was added to that of his wife at his own death. The vestibule of the temple has six unfluted columns of Eubæan marble, 55 ft. 9 ins. high and 4 ft. 9 ins. in diameter. The shafts of the columns have numerous inscriptions on them. A church was built into this temple before the 12th century.

At the southern end of the Forum, on higher ground at the top of the Sacra Via, stands the Arch of Titus. This noble structure was decreed by the Senate and people to the Emperor Titus after the triumphant end of the war with Judæa and the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, but was not completed till after the end of his reign (A.D. 81). Piers at the sides, having been seriously injured in the course of repeated misuse of the building in the Middle Ages, were skilfully renewed in 1821. The chief features of the arch are the numerous reliefs with which it is adorned. One shows the Emperor in a chariot crowned by the goddess of Victory. Here also are the lictors carrying the bundles of rods. The most notable relief represents a section of the triumphal procession, where the treasures of the Temple at Jerusalem are being carried on litters; on the first the table of the shewbread and the trumpets of the year of Jubilee, on the second the seven-branched candlestick.

Such is a cursory review of the most notable surviving ruins in the Forum, belonging to the period of the Republic and the early Empire. The area is about 430 by 110 yards. If the grandeur of the ruins impresses one, the impression of decay, perhaps even shabbiness, is also vivid. But the setting in which the remains appear adds glory to them. Vegetation is not seriously interfered with, and in early April one may see growing wild there clover, vetch, cranesbill, geranium, violet, pink, cyclamen, periwinkle, borage, blue anemone, wallflower, birdsfoot trefoil, etc. On some of the ruined walls you will find, five weeks before English time, the wistaria, surely the most exquisitely delicate of all creepers. In the warm period of the day the lizards scurry hither and thither. Above, on the Palatine, wild mignonette abounds.

Beyond the Forum to the south is the Flavian Amphitheatre (commonly called the Colosseum). It is one of the most wonderful ruined structures in the world. In this vast edifice, where many a victim bestial and human was 'butchered to make a Roman holiday,' there was room for very many thousands of spectators. The building is a beautiful oval in shape. It is upwards of 180 ft. in height and one-third of a mile in circumference. The exterior is ornamented by three styles of columns—the Doric on the lowest range, the Ionic in the middle, and the Corinthian above. The inside sloping part, where stone seats rose in tiers, was built by the most skilful use of the arch. Beneath the arena there is a vast number of rooms, and certain of these may have been used to house the victims till they were required for exhibition. The nearest modern analogy to the Roman amphitheatre is the Spanish bull-ring (plaza de toros) built on the same model. In both, the system of entrances and exits to the various parts of the house is admirably efficient. In both the sunlight has to be reckoned with, and on occasion in Rome a silk awning was drawn over the top. Towards the end of the 1st cent. of the Empire, tickets (nomismata) were often showered upon the populace from above (Stat. Silvæ, i. 6; Martial, vassim). Each ticket bore on it the indication of a prize which the lucky catcher obtained on presenting it at an office in the city.

Law-courts.—Leaving this quarter of the city, we can now return to the northern end of the Forum. As the volume of legal business increased with the settled state of the Empire, now free from the curse of civil war, additional law-courts became necessary, and Emperors vied with one another in building them. North of the northern end of the Forum proper was built the Julian Forum, north of that the Augustan, and west of that the huge square forum of Trajan with double apses, bounded on its west side by the Basilica Ulpia. Yet this does not exhaust the number of these buildings. Behind the place where the temple of Antoninus and Faustina afterwards stood, was Vespasian's Forum with the Temple of Peace. To connect this with the Augustan Forum just mentioned, Nerva built one which was called after him, but also called 'Transitorium' (the connecting Forum). Of all this wonderful group of glorious buildings very little remains.

On the north side of the Augustan Forum was the Temple of Mars Ultor. The three columns and architrave of this building, vowed by Augustus on the battle-field of Philippi and dedicated in 2 B.C., are all that remain to show how splendid a structure it was. The only portion of the Forum Transitorium that remains visible is a fragment of the eastern enclosing wall of the forum with two columns belonging to the colonnade half buried in the ground. The cornice and attic of the wall project above and behind these columns. On the attic is a figure of Minerva in relief. Trajan, in order to build his forum, had to cut away the S.W. spur which connects the Quirinal Hill with the Capitoline Mount. The earth was carted away and used to cover up an old cemetery.

Of all Trajan's magnificent buildings nothing remains uncovered but the central portion—about half the area—of the Basilica Ulpia, with the Column of Trajan in a rectangular court at the further side of the Basilica. The column, which had a statue of Trajan on the top, is over 100 ft. high, and is said to be exactly the height of the spur of the hill which was cut away. It is notable as having a series of reliefs arranged spirally from the basis to the capital—namely, twenty-three blocks of Parian marble. The Senate and people of Rome erected the column in the year 113. The reliefs are of immense interest as depicting many scenes in the wars carried on by Trajan against the Dacians. This people lived in modern Transylvania and also south of the Carpathians in Wallachia and part of Roumania. In the time of the Flavian Emperors they became a serious menace to the Empire. By Trajan's time their king had established a great military power. The second of Trajan's wars with them resulted in the conquest of Dacia (105–106) and the reduction of it to the status of a Roman province. The reliefs are a contemporary historical document of value unsurpassed in the whole of Roman history. Apart from its historical value, the monument has been described as 'the most important example of an attempt to create a purely Roman art filled with the Roman spirit.'

Of further ancient monuments one must simply select one or two for mention. Near the Tiber the vaulted channel of the Cloaca Maxima (Great Drain) can be observed. This construction first made habitable the marshy ground of the Forum and the land between the Capitoline and the Palatine. Near this is a circular building, once perhaps the Temple of Mater Matuta, now the Church of S. Maria del Sole. The superstructure is solid marble, and had a peristyle of twenty Corinthian columns, of which one is now lost. Some considerable distance N. of this, in what was once the Campus Martius, is the Pantheon, the most complete and the most impressive surviving monument of the earliest Imperial period. The original building, erected in 27 B.C., was burned in A.D. 80, restored by Domitian, struck by lightning and again burned in 110, and finally restored by Hadrian (120–124). It is his building we now see. It is a huge rotunda of the simplest proportions. The height of the cupola is the same as that of the drum upon which it rests, and the total height of the building is therefore the same as the diameter of the pavement. The dome is not solid concrete throughout. There are the beginnings of an articulated system of supports between which the weight is distributed. On either side of the vestibule are niches in which colossal statues of Agrippa (the builder) and Augustus once stood. The one opening in the roof admits sufficient light. The building, originally erected to all the divine protectors of the Julian house, has since A.D. 609 been used mostly as a church. What the Church, the great destroyer of Roman pagan buildings, did not ruin, it modified and used for its own purposes.

LITERATURE.—The most minute works on the topography of ancient Rome are H. Jordan and C. Huelsen, Topographie der Stadt Rom, 2 vols., Berlin, 1871–1907; O. Richter, *Topographie der Stadt Rom*² (in Ivan von Müller's Handbuch), Munich, 1901. The best work on the Forum is C. Huelsen, The Roman Forum, Eng. tr., Rome, 1906, 1909 (cf. his I più recenti scavi nel Foro Romano, Rome, 1910). Other works of value and interest are T. Ashby, in A Companion to Latin Studies, ed. Sandys, Cambridge, 1910, pp. 35–47, and W. Ramsay and R. A. Lanciani, *A Manual of Roman Antiquities*³, London, 1894 (especially as introductions); H. S. RUDDER.—See SHIP.

RUDIMENTS.—See ELEMENTS.

RUFUS (Ρούφος, a common Latin name).—1. In Mk 15²¹ Rufus is named as the son of Simon the Cyrenian, who was compelled to carry the Cross of Jesus to the place of crucifixion (cf. Mt 27³², Lk 23²⁶). Another son, Alexander, is mentioned, and, as the name of Rufus comes second, he was probably the younger of the two. St. Mark gives no further information with regard to them, and it would seem that they must have been known to the readers for whom he intended his Gospel. If, as is generally held, he wrote in Rome for Roman Christians, Alexander and Rufus may have been at the time resident in the city and prominent members of the Church. Simon was evidently a Hellenistic Jew (cf. Ac 2¹⁰ 6⁹ 13¹), who gave his sons Gentile names.

2. In Ro 16¹³ a certain Rufus is saluted by St. Paul. If we admit the Roman destination of these salutations it is natural to wish to identify 1 and 2, but the name is so common that there are no real grounds for doing so. Rufus is described as 'the chosen in the Lord' (τὸν ἐκλεκτὸν ἐν κυρίῳ), a phrase applicable to every Christian (Col 3¹², etc.), but perhaps peculiarly appropriate in his case on account of 'special circumstances, in which a striking intervention of the Divine grace had been recognised, by which his conversion was effected' (C. von Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr.², i. [1897] 395). Possibly, however, the meaning is rather 'eminent as a Christian' (Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'⁸, 1900, p. 427), i.e. distinguished among his fellow-Christians in character and usefulness. The only other Christians so described in the NT are 'the elect lady' and her sister in 2 Jn 1¹³. Coupled with Rufus in the salutation is 'his mother and mine' (τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐμὴν). The allusion has generally been supposed to mean that 'this nameless woman had done a mother's part, somehow and somewhere, to the motherless Missionary' (H. C. G. Moule, Expositor's Bible, 'Romans,' 1894, p. 429) and that he felt towards her ever afterwards as a son. The Apostle had not visited Rome before writing his Epistle to the Roman Christians. If, therefore, we regard Ro 16 as an integral part of 'Romans,' we shall place this mother and her son elsewhere at the time when she showed kindness to St. Paul, and imagine that later they became residents in Rome. It is perhaps easier to believe that Ephesus was the scene of the woman's hospitality and care, and that the greeting is directed to Rufus and his mother in that city.

RULER.—The ruler of the temple' occurs in Ac 4¹ AVm, but is more correctly represented by 'the captain of the temple' (AV and RV). He was a priest, second in command to the high priest himself, and had under him the officers who commanded the Temple police. His duty was to superintend the priests and Levites who guarded the Temple and its precincts. The word 'ruler,' however, generally represents ἀρχων or some derived word, and the general idea behind ἀρχων is that of a magistrate of a city, whereas ἡγεμὼν suggests rather a governor of a country (see GOVERNMENT). In 3¹⁷ 4^{5,8} 13⁷ ἀρχοντες is used of the Jews in authority who had Jesus put to death, and therefore includes the high priests (cf. R. J. Knowling in EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, on 4⁵). In 4²⁸ 7^{27,35} (referred to Moses in Egypt) 23³ the word occurs in quotations from the LXX. In Ro 13³ magistrates (and possibly also governors and the Emperor) are referred to. In Ac 13¹⁵ rulers of the synagogue are mentioned at Pisidian Antioch. In Asia Minor there is evidence that the title was one of honour, and therefore could be held by more than one person simultaneously; there is a case known of even a woman bearing this title at Smyrna. In Corinth, however (18¹⁷), the normal practice of having one ruler of the synagogue with real power appears to have been maintained. In 14² the leading men among the Jews at Iconium are intended, probably including the honorary rulers of the synagogue. In 16¹⁹ Luke first uses the general term ἀρχοντες, and then the specific στρατηγοί for the two leading Roman magistrates of the colonia Philippi (see under PRÆTOR). In 17⁸, again, it is the leading magistrates of Thessalonica, the πολιταρχαί, to whom reference is made (see under MAGISTRATE). In Eph 6¹ 'the rulers of the darkness of this world' (AV) might be more exactly rendered 'the world-rulers of this darkness' (RV). The reference here is to spiritual powers of evil to which this world is really in bondage, while all the time it falsely asserts its independence of the only true God. This world is the realm of darkness of these powers. References to such powers under various names are frequent in the NT where they are part of the heritage from later Judaism.

SABAOTH.—'Lord of Sabaoth' (i.e. 'Lord of Hosts,' יהוה צבאות) is a common title for Jahweh in the prophets, with the exception of Hosea and Ezekiel. The appellation may not have originated with them, but they invested it with a deeper significance. What was the original meaning of the title is still a subject of dispute. Some take the 'Hosts' in question as the armies of Israel which Jahweh leads on to victory (Jg 4¹⁴), while others find an allusion to the stars, the host of heaven, or to the armies of angels (but it is contended that in the plural צבאות is used only of earthly warriors). Whatever the original meaning of the phrase, it came afterwards to denote the all-controlling power of God, as represented by the rendering of the LXX κύριος παντοκράτωρ; cf. 2 Co 6¹⁸, (also κύριος τῶν δυνάμεων). Sometimes, however, the LXX renders κύριος Σαβαώθ as in Is 1⁹, which is reproduced verbatim from the LXX in Ro 9²⁹. The only other instance of the use of the phrase in the NT is Ja 5⁴, where God is so named to suggest the awful majesty of the great Judge who will avenge the oppression of the poor. There are several instances in Rev. of the title made familiar by the LXX, κύριος ὁ θεὸς ὁ παντοκράτωρ, 'Lord God Almighty.'

G. WAUCHOPE STEWART.

SABBATH.—1. The Jewish Sabbath in apostolic days.—For the whole subject in its most general aspect readers are referred to the various Encyclopædias and Dictionaries wherein the Sabbath is discussed. It is enough if here we briefly set forth what were its chief features as a Jewish festival in the days of the early Church.

In common with other ancient institutions of a similar kind, the Sabbath had undergone great modifications with the passing centuries, although preserving the essential character of one day in seven, observed mainly by a cessation of daily business and work. Shabbath (whatever may be said of an Assyrian sabbatum in support of a theory which gives a Babylonian origin to the institution) is undoubtedly connected with the verb shabath, 'to cease,' 'to desist from'; and cessation from labour was its most conspicuous and primitive characteristic (Ex 20⁹. = Dt 5¹², Ex 23¹² 34²¹).

The Sabbath with which the NT makes us familiar is specially the product of post-Exilic times. There is a paucity of reference to the Sabbath in pre-Exilic days which is most striking. Yet the two or three references that occur (2 K 4²³, Am 8³) mention it as a well-established and familiar institution, and Amos in particular makes it clear that cessation from business was a special feature of the day. But after the Exile greater prominence is given to it (Is 56-66 58¹²). Neh 13¹⁵⁻²² gives us a picture of vigorous Sabbath-reform. Its observance is not by any means introduced as a new thing. Rather it is the re-establishment, with new rigour, of an institution which had been allowed to lapse into a variety of abuses or even actual neglect (see La 2⁶). We must also include in these post-Exilic references such passages as Jer 17¹⁹⁻²⁷ and Ezk 20, with their glowing promises attached to Sabbath observance and solemn warnings against its profanation. These utterances indicate that rehabilitation of the Sabbath which increasingly characterized Judaism as it emerged purified and refined from the fires of the Exile.

It is clear that in the time of our Lord the observance of the Sabbath was one direct occasion of an open breach between Him and the religious authorities of His day. The well-known and remarkable logion found in cod. D (Lk 6¹⁰), if it is to be relied upon, particularly illustrates the difference in standpoint so far as work was concerned. As for special religious services associated with the Sabbath, the synagogue was the particular scene of these devotions. The importance of the synagogue as a centre of Jewish life became greater and greater as the central sanctuary of the Temple declined and ultimately perished. In the Diaspora it was inevitable that this should be the course of development. So in the Acts of the Apostles the synagogue is the main scene of the first appeal of Christian preachers to the Jews, and the Sabbath was the special day on which they carried on their propaganda. How rich the day was, e.g., in opportunity for St. Paul from the first we see from Ac 13¹⁴, 14¹ 16¹³ 17-18¹, etc.

Moreover, the observance of the Sabbath by cessation from labour was one outstanding peculiarity of the Jews which most forcibly struck the heathen observer. It is one special mark of the Jew as we meet him in the generally unfriendly pages of Roman authors. Seneca, e.g., is represented by St. Augustine as ignorantly condemning the Sabbath-keeping of the Jews: 'quod per illos singulos septem interpositos dies septimam fere partem ætatis suæ perdant vacando et multa in tempore urgentia non agendo lædantur' (de Civ. Dei, vi. 11). For other references see Tac. Hist. v. 4; Hor. Sat. I. ix. 69; Juv. Sat. xiv. 96-106.

This shows indubitably how well Sabbath was kept by the Jews. Not only so; they suffered considerable hardship in adhering to a custom that was wholly disregarded by the world in general. At an earlier period, indeed, we read of certain Jews who perished rather than violate the Sabbath by fighting on that day (1 Mac 2³⁴⁻³⁸). This led in those troublous times to a relaxation of the law, so that fighting on the defensive was permissible. Ultimately the Romans were obliged to release the Jews from military service, and that, among other things, on account of the great inconveniences attendant on Sabbath observance (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10).

Beside this we have the enormous importance attached to the Sabbath by tradition and instruction amongst the Jews themselves. The reference to the 'Sabbath day's journey' (ὁδὸς σαββάτου, Ac 1²) reminds us of the glosses and refinements (and, we may also say, absurdities) to which, as time went on, the Sabbatic law was subjected at the hands of the Rabbis. Even this limit of lawful travel was open to various interpretations according as the 2000 ells (the distance allowed) were to be reckoned in a straight line in one direction or as the radius of a circle. In at least one tractate of the Talmud (Shabbath) minute directions were treasured up as to what might and what might not be done on the Sabbath day. It may seem as if the day were thus made burdensome to the community, but, if we are to believe the testimony of Jewish writers who are worthy of all esteem, it was not so in reality. The Sabbath was a joyous day of rest from toil and business, of happy social intercourse, of assembly in the synagogue for worship. Josephus clearly though indirectly makes reference to this in c. Apion. i. 22 (cf. also Ant. xvi. ii. 3). But we need not go beyond the very definite allusion to the synagogue observance as an established practice in Ac 15²¹. Abstention from the thirty-nine kinds of work specified by the Talmudists as forbidden (the number is evidently artificial, and probably not unconnected with 'forty stripes save one,' 2 Co 11²⁴) was by no means the whole of Sabbath observance.

A passing notice may be taken of the emphasis which Philo, in his characteristic way, puts upon the Sabbath as a positive season to be devoted to 'philosophizing,' to contemplation of the works of God, to moral and spiritual examination and renewal (de Decalogo, 20). It is also a day specially appropriate for instruction. Again, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in a vein not unlike Philo's, handles the Sabbath with an extension of the idea to the hereafter. How popular and deep-rooted this use has become the whole devotional language of the Church bears witness. 'There remaineth therefore a Sabbath rest (a Sabbath-keeping, σαββατισμός) to the people of God' (He 4⁹). But in the Talmud, too, Sabbath is a foretaste of the world to come. See also Ep. Barn. 15 for further mystical treatment.

2. The observance of Sabbath in the early Church.—As far as we can see, there was no thought on the part of the first 'disciples' of ever discontinuing an observance to which as Jews they had been accustomed all their lives. Whilst Jesus was in direct conflict with the religious authorities as regards their interpretation of the Sabbath and its laws, we hear no word of any complaint of His primitive followers on that score. What mainly marked them off from their fellow-Jews was their testimony and declaration that 'Jesus was the Christ' (Ac 5⁴² 17³ 18³). This was divisive and revolutionary enough, it is true; but they seem to have thought that the old faith could live with the new, or at least that old habits and customs which did not appear to clash with their loyalty to Jesus could still be maintained.

The inclusion of the Gentiles within the scope of the gospel brought with it inevitable complications—this among the rest: How far were the religious customs of the Jews to be considered as binding upon them? St. Paul, who was certainly revolutionary and advanced in his teaching in comparison with the Church at Jerusalem, was even openly taxed with advising Jews who lived amongst Gentiles to abandon Moses and 'the customs' (see Ac 21¹²). Was that of Sabbath observance one of them? Probably such teaching as we find in Ro 14 might give rise to this charge, though there he does not prohibit or even dissuade, but simply pleads for liberty of judgment. At the same time he certainly disapproved of all attempts to make the observance of the Sabbath and other peculiarly Jewish customs binding on Gentile converts to the faith (Col 2¹⁶).

Where Jews continued to form the main personnel of Christian communities, Sabbath observance still lived on. Yet, just as surely the setting apart of 'the first day of the week' as the Lord's Day grew up alongside as something distinctively Christian. Traces of this are clear even in apostolic times (see art. LORD'S DAY). The two existed side by side, alike yet different. In the Apostolic Constitutions, which reflect in this as in some other respects the usages of earlier times, we find more than one reference to the Sabbath and the Lord's Day together as days equally to be observed (ii. 59, vii. 23, viii. 33). A stray papyrus-leaf discovered in middle Egypt in 1911, which appears to be a portion of a prayer-book that must have been familiar in Eastern Christian circles, probably in the 2nd cent., bears unexpected witness to this early custom. It contains what is called a σαββατική εὐχή, whose liturgical phraseology is easily and closely paralleled in NT and early Christian literature, and follows immediately upon what appear to be the closing words of a prayer for Friday (see Neutestamentliche Studien für G. Heinrici, Leipzig, 1914, no. 6: 'Zwei altchristliche Gebete').

As time went on, however, a considerable difference showed itself between the Eastern and Western Churches in their attitude towards the Sabbath. Both continued to keep it; but among the former it was accounted a festival, with the sole exception of the 'great Sabbath,' i.e. that which immediately preceded Easter Day (see Apost. Const. vii. 23), whilst among the latter it was very generally observed as a fast. This is unimportant; the main point is that the ancient Jewish institution was carried over into the Christian Church, and lived on in some form or other. Even to this day in the liturgical names for the days of the week, in both the Roman and the Greek Church, Saturday is known by its Jewish name, sabbatum, σάββατον. But it is now at most merely a prelude and preparation for the dies dominica; and a faint hint at such relation is found in the fact that, where liturgical uses are followed, the collect for the following day is said on Saturday evening.

How at length the Sabbath as an institution ceased to be maintained and gave place to the Lord's Day as its Christian substitute may be briefly conjectured. As Christian became more and more distinct from Jew, this and other things would naturally follow. The early propagation of the faith among Gentiles, as Christianity realized its world-wide mission, would necessarily tend in the same direction. In Ep. ad Magn., attributed to Ignatius, we meet with an early admonition, emphasizing the distinction: 'Let us, therefore, no longer keep Sabbath after the Jewish manner (Ἰουδαϊκῶς) and rejoice in days of idleness. . . . But let every one of you keep Sabbath after a spiritual manner, rejoicing in meditation on the law' (ch. 9). In the nature of things, the two days could not continue to be equally observed in the Christian Church. The Sabbath must needs give place to the Lord's Day: the seventh day of the week to the first. The legislation of Constantine (A.D. 321), which recognized Sunday as a feast day, must have been no small factor in the case; though, again, that would not have been enacted if the custom of keeping the Lord's Day had not already been predominant among Christians. As a concession to paganism, it may be noticed that the studied name given to the day (dies solis) 'afforded the possibility of its universal encouragement, without thus appearing to enforce directly an ecclesiastical celebration' (W. Moeller, History of the Christian Church, Eng. tr., i., London, 1892, p. 298).

Nevertheless, great confusion has continued to exist in the Christian Church as to the keeping of the weekly festival. This inevitably resulted from transferring the sanctions and some of the features of the Jewish Sabbath to the Lord's Day, and from the incorporation of the unaltered Decalogue as a norm in Christian ethics. The Fourth Commandment was still held to be binding; only Sunday was tacitly substituted for 'the seventh day.' The confusion probably still exists, very much helped by the long-established custom of speaking of the Lord's Day as 'the Christian Sabbath' or even simply 'the Sabbath' or 'the Sabbath Day.' But there is a clear distinction between the two; and for Christians the Lord's Day is paramount. Great as the authority of the Sabbath is, the authority of the Lord's Day for all who accept the resurrection of our Lord is equally great or even greater.

As a matter of fact, the practice of Sabbath-keeping among Christians has been made to rest on different grounds and has been differently interpreted, though the views may ultimately be classified as two, the Sabbatical and the Dominical. Some supporters of the former have argued even that the seventh day is the true Sabbath and ought still to be observed by Christians (see a curious work by Francis Bampfield written to show that the seventh-day Sabbath is the desirable day and according to 'an unchangeable Law of well-established Order both in the Revealed Word and in Created Nature' [Judgment for the Observation of the Jewish or Seventh-Day Sabbath, London, 1672]). And representatives of this view still exist: e.g. the Seventh Day Adventists, an American sect—not, be it noticed, with a desire to return to primitive practice and observe both Sabbath and Lord's Day, but to observe the seventh day alone.

The Jews have long suffered special disabilities in Christian countries in this respect, but this has not availed to cause them to abandon Sabbath-keeping. And we have Sunday. We must discriminate between the day as a day of rest from labour (one day in seven) and as a day of joyful worship and of religious activities. The sanctions for the former are deep-seated in human nature itself. It is simple wisdom to guard such a space of liberty from the encroachments of labour, and to make it, in George Herbert's words, 'The couch of time, care's balm and bay' (Sunday, line 5). And all enlightened Christians will continue to make the worthiest use of the day so set apart.

SACKCLOTH (σάκκος; from σῶ, which was introduced, probably through the Phœnicians, into all the languages of Europe; the root is perhaps Egyptian—Coptic sok).—Sackcloth meant properly a coarse black fabric woven from goats or camels' hair, and then an article of clothing made of that material and worn (1) by prophets; (2) by mourners, penitents, and suplicants; and (3) by slaves and captives. This garment, which was originally, and remained pre-eminently, a sacred covering, was a mere loin-cloth, probably resembling the ihram of the Muslim pilgrims to Mecca, of whom C. M. Doughty says: 'they enter the town like bathing men—none is excused' (Wanderings in Arabia, 1908, ii. 263). The prophet Elijah is described as 'a man with a garment of hair' (2 K 1⁹ RVm). Isaiah too wore, at least for a time, sackcloth upon his loins (Is 20³); and 'a hairy garment' became the characteristic dress of the prophets (Zec 13¹⁴). The raiment (ἐνδυμα) of the Baptist was made of camel's hair (Mt 3⁴), i.e. of sackcloth. The dark colour and tragic associations of sackcloth suggested to the prophet of the Revelation, as it had already done to Deutero-Isaiah, a figure for a solar eclipse which seemed to portend a Divine judgment—'the sun became black as sackcloth of hair' (Rev 6¹²; cf. Is 50³). Before the Final Judgment two witnesses—apparently Enoch and Elijah are meant—are to come and prophesy, περιβεβλημένοι σάκκους, 'clothed in sackcloth' (Rev 11³), a symbol of the need of humiliation and repentance. SACRAMENTS.—Neither in the NT nor in the other Christian writings of the 1st cent. is there any trace of the use of a common name to designate those observances which were afterwards classified more or less comprehensively as sacraments. The word sacramentum (see W. Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, London, 1911, p. 464 f., and notes 28–33), as applied to denominate such rites, occurs first in the famous letter (x. 97) of the Younger Pliny to the Emperor Trajan (c. A.D. 112); but its employment in that letter may be merely accidental. In Christian usage the term makes its earliest appearance in the Old Latin version and in Tertullian, and there stands as a rendering of μυστήριον, and as synonymous with mysterium. The word μυστήριον did not acquire its special reference to the Christian sacraments until later than this period. In the NT it is never applied to institutions or observances, the nearest approach to such a significance being in Eph 5³², where St. Paul asserts regarding marriage, τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο μέγα ἐστίν. An approximation to subsequent usage may perhaps be detected in Ignatius; but even of the phrase 'deacons of the mysteries of Jesus Christ' (Trall. ii. 3) Lightfoot says that a restriction of its reference to the Eucharist 'would be an anachronism.'

The absence of any common name for the sacraments indicates the absence in this period of any defined sacramental concept. It is true that ideas as well as things must be already in existence before they receive a name; but it is also true that prior to their designation ideas remain uncrystallized. The kindred nature of the ecclesiastical rites known as mysteries and sacraments—their kindred nature as belonging to the externals of Christian practice—must obviously have been perceived from the first. Harnack, indeed, places the grouping together of Baptism and the Eucharist as among 'a series of the most important Christian customs and ideas' whose origin is involved in obscurity and 'in all probability will never be cleared up' (History of Dogma, Eng. tr., 7 vols., London, 1894–99, i. 132 f.). Nevertheless, the affinity of these two principal sacraments appears to have been recognized from the earliest times. They are mentioned in conjunction as of the same order by the Didache (vii. 1, ix. 1, 5), and by Ignatius (Smyrn. viii. 1, 2, 'where the ἀγάπη must include the eucharist' [Lightfoot]). Both are referred to by implication in a manner exactly analogous in the parallel discourses of the Fourth Gospel on the New Birth and the Bread of Life (Jn 3 and 6). An allusion to both may possibly underlie Jn 19³⁴, 1 Co 12¹³, He 10²², 1 Jn 5^{6–8}. Their connexion in the mind of St. Paul, when he conjoins the type of Baptism 'in the cloud and in the sea' with the type of the Eucharist in the 'spiritual meat' and 'spiritual drink' of the wilderness (1 Co 10^{1–4}), scarcely admits of question. And the primal picture of the life of the Christian community given in the Acts of the Apostles (2⁴¹, 42–46) exhibits these sacraments as united together in primitive observance. In one of the passages cited above (1 Co 10^{1–4}) there is evidence, moreover, not only of the association of Baptism and the Eucharist in the mind of the Apostle himself, but also of the existence of a general sacramental idea in the minds of those to whom he writes; for the argument developed in the succeeding verses (vv. 5–12) seems to lose point unless it be directed against an improper and unethical application of certain views then prevailing as to the character and virtue possessed by these two sacraments in common.

The absence of any defined sacramental concept is naturally accompanied by the absence of any formulated doctrine of the sacraments in general. This does not mean, of course, that instruction as to the institution, purpose, and significance of individual sacraments was at any time neglected in the Apostolic Church. It is inconceivable that such instruction did not invariably find a place in the elementary teaching (Ac 2⁴² 18²⁵ 19⁴) imparted to every believer concerning the first principles of the doctrine of Christ (He 6^{1–3}). The sacramental references in the Didache, Hermas, Barnabas, Ignatius, Clement of Rome, all assume that their readers are familiar with the doctrine of Baptism and the Eucharist. The allusive nature of the references to Baptism in St. Paul's Epistles plainly infers that those addressed had been carefully grounded in the relative doctrine. The same may be said regarding the reference to the Eucharist in 1 Co 10^{16–17}; while the one example afforded of direct instruction upon the subject of the Lord's Supper (1 Co 11^{23–24}) expressly adverts to instruction previously given (v. 24) as well as to supplementary instruction to be administered on a future occasion (v. 34). But, in accordance with the educative order which rules in the history of the Church—truth and life first, explanations afterwards—the elaboration of sacramental doctrine belongs to a later period than that of the 1st century. 'Cyril [Catechetical Lectures] is the first church-teacher who treats of baptism, the oil, and the Eucharist, in their logical sequence, and in accordance with general principles' (Harnack, iv. 293).

In these circumstances any discussion of the abstract subject of sacraments in connexion with the Apostolic Church has little primary material to deal with. It must presuppose the whole special study of particular sacramental observances; and it must confine itself almost exclusively to the general inferences to be drawn from that study. At the outset some definition of the more exact significance in which the term 'sacrament' is used requires to be taken for granted; and for this purpose the definition provided by the Shorter Catechism (Q. 92) of the Westminster Assembly will be found to offer certain advantages. It is distinguished by extreme precision of statement. It postulates, as essential to the nature of a Christian sacrament, not only (1) the outward and sensible sign, and (2) the inward and spiritual grace thereby 'represented, sealed, and applied to believers,' but also another constituent, one of great importance in differentiating the sacramental from the magical, namely, (3) the institution and command of Christ, which conjoins the inward and spiritual grace with the outward and sensible sign, and imposes upon participators the attitude of religious obedience. And it concentrates attention upon the two particular observances, which, in virtue of their special history, sanction, and rank, have always occupied a position apart from all others. If not the only Christian sacraments, Baptism and the Eucharist are at any rate by universal consent the Christian sacraments par excellence; and with the witness which may be adduced regarding them the apostolic authority of the whole system of sacramental practice and doctrine stands or falls. At the same time it must be borne in mind that there are other and cognate rites rooted in the soil of this period—christ, laying on of hands, benediction, offices of common worship—which partake of a sacramental character, and cannot be left altogether out of account. (See separate articles, BAPTISM, EUCHARIST, ANOINTING, ORDINATION, etc.)

Whatever inferences may be drawn from a study of the sacraments in this period will be found to have an important bearing upon other and larger fields. One lesson taught by the science of comparative theology is that the ceremonial associated with any form of religion furnishes an illuminating index to the origins and contents of that religion. Our whole view of the nature of Christianity and of the history of the Church must be affected by the conclusions to which we come regarding sacramental practice and theory in the Apostolic Age; and these conclusions, in consequence, are themselves peculiarly liable to be biased by theological and ecclesiastical prepossessions. The subject, therefore, is one which requires the exercise of candid and dispassionate judgment. It may be dealt with under two heads: (1) inferences as to sacramental observance, and (2) inferences as to sacramental doctrine.

1. Inferences as to sacramental observance.—(a) The observance of sacramental rites was primitive and universal in the Apostolic Church. All the evidence available goes to establish this conclusion. There is no trace of a period anterior to the practice of sacramental rites; no record of the subsequent introduction of such a practice; no vestige of any controversy, like that concerning circumcision, upon the question of obligation or propriety. Direct references to sacramental rites may not be very numerous in the NT; in the case of the Eucharist they are admittedly scanty. But the references which do occur are of a sort which may be said to offer their actual infrequency as additional constructive proof, and to leave no manner of doubt that sacramental rites were from the first an integral part of the Christian 'way,' that baptism was invariably enjoined upon converts to the faith, and that the 'breaking of bread,' which at least comprised the Eucharist in its germinal form, was one (Ac 20^{6,7}, 1 Co 11²⁰) if not absolutely the chief purpose of Christian gatherings for worship. The only questions concerning the origin of Christian baptism, as an observance, relate to its connexion with and differentiation from antecedent kindred Jewish rites. Certainty as to the original form of the Eucharist is to some extent obscured by speculations with regard to the supposed primitive custom of the Christian Agape. But the prevalence of that custom in the Apostolic Church, a circumstance too generally taken for granted, is itself both hypothetical and supported only by somewhat meagre and equivocal evidence (P. Batiffol, *Etudes d'histoire et de théologie positive*³, Paris, 1904, pp. 283-325). The term 'breaking of bread' in Ac 2⁴²⁻⁴⁵ 20⁷ may refer to the Agape as well as to the Lord's Supper; its reference to the latter, however, is not less obvious, but, on the contrary, more obvious, than its reference to the former. The attempt to maintain that St. Paul or any other teacher engrafted a commemorative or sacramental significance upon a custom which before was predominantly social and but vaguely religious credits innovation with a facility, speed, and completeness of accomplishment which are to the highest degree improbable.

Recent research has thrown interesting light upon the environment of pagan ideas and practice amid which the Gentile Churches were planted; but its results do not substantiate the hypothesis that Christian sacraments owe either inception or character to this source. The lineage of these sacraments is manifestly Jewish. Apostolic history exhibits no trace of any real nexus between them and the Hellenic mysteries; and their subsequent conflict with the mysteries of Isis and Mithra belongs to a phase of development posterior to the age of origins. Such general resemblances as their comparison with the mystery rites has discovered may be sufficient to furnish what Farnell has called 'adjacent anthropology' with illustrations of certain laws in the evolution of religion from the human side. But these parallels, while remote and indecisive in themselves, are also accompanied by contrasts much too pronounced and significant to afford solid ground for any theories of definite borrowing or suggestion. It is true, indeed, that, at a later date, recognized analogies led to a deliberate adaptation of the mystery terminology; and the very name sacramentum, which seems to have been used of initiation into the third grade—the grade of miles—in the Mithraic cult, may itself have found entrance into the Church by this avenue (F. Cumont, Textes et monuments figurés relatifs aux mystères de Mithra, 2 vols., Brussels, 1895-99, ii. 318, n. 11). It is true also that, still later, there set in a marked tendency to imitate or compete with the accessories of mystery ceremonial. But the utmost influence upon the sacraments with which these pagan rites can be credited in the Apostolic Age is that of having provided the sacramental vocabulary with perhaps one or two convenient words then in current use and of having prepared the way, through familiarity with symbolic worship and its circle of ideas, for the reception of sacramental observances and teaching among Gentile Christians. To attribute to the mysteries any influence more germinal than this is to mistake the soil for the seed. Although the conclusion that the observance of sacramental rites was primitive and universal may appear to be elementary, important consequences follow from it. If such rites obtained from the first, the conception of primitive Christianity as a formless spiritual impulse, a mere community of religious experience which afterwards developed its own constitutional order and embodied its worship in appropriate ceremonies, is not tenable. Primitive Christianity was undoubtedly charismatic. It bore witness to the presence and power of the Holy Spirit dividing to every man severally as He willed. But the sacraments attest that primitive Christianity was ceremonial as well as charismatic. And such ceremonies carry with them the implication of some measure of corporate form, of common regulations, and of recognized administrative rule. The co-existence, moreover, of ceremonial side by side with charismatic life, especially with a charismatic life so universal and powerful as was manifested at the first, affords a proof of the vigour and stability of the ceremonies themselves. Such a combination could not have been maintained unless these ceremonies had been regarded either as of indispensable value, or as ordained by incontestable authority, or, which was in fact the case, as possessing both of these sanctions in the fullest measure.

(b) The observance of sacramental rites was regarded as of indispensable value in the Apostolic Church. For the earlier half of the 2nd cent. and for the closing years of the 1st this assertion will hardly be challenged. Evidence as to the high place assigned to Baptism and the Eucharist in the Didache, to Baptism in Hermas and Barnabas, to the Eucharist in Ignatius, and to the eucharistic service in Clement of Rome, is decisive and leaves no room for doubt. For NT times the conclusiveness of the evidence has been disputed. The mere prevalence, however, of these sacramental observances from the first itself affords strong presumption as to the exceptional reverence in which they were held. In the case of a religion old enough to possess traditional customs one can imagine rites of universal currency which, having become thus consuetudinary, are regarded as of but ceremonial significance. It is impossible to imagine such formalism in the case of a religion still in its infancy, of a religion so spiritual, moreover, and so intolerant of unreality as that of Christ. These rites must have been esteemed as primary, or they would not have been universally observed. That Baptism, for instance, was treated as indispensable is plain. Even one converted by a heavenly vision (Ac 9¹⁸⁻²²), even those upon whom the Holy Ghost had already fallen (10⁴⁵), were required to receive it, while of those whose understanding and experience of the faith were discovered to be essentially defective (19¹⁻⁴) the crucial question at once asked by the Apostle was—'Into what then were ye baptized?' To Baptism St. Paul habitually appeals as to a fact of cardinal religious importance (Ro 6¹⁻¹⁴, 1 Co 6¹¹⁻¹³, Gal 3²⁶⁻²⁷, Col 2¹¹⁻¹², Tit 3⁵); and he includes it among a series of solemn witnesses to the unity which the Christian calling demands in a concatenation of ideas the most exalted conceivable (Eph 4⁴⁻⁶). Regarding the Eucharist, again, it may be affirmed with confidence that St. Paul could never have expressed himself as he did in 1 Co 11¹⁷⁻³⁴ had he reckoned its value to be secondary, or its sacredness to be negligible, or its obligation to be anything less than imperative upon all members of the Church. Support has been claimed upon various grounds for the contention that sacramental observance is 'not central' in the NT. It has been pointed out that in the Acts and writings of the apostles the space devoted to sacramental subjects is extremely exiguous, that in many whole books neither one sacrament nor the other is mentioned, that such references as do occur are for the most part incidental. But it may be replied that the books of the NT do not purport to be comprehensive; that they are occasional or specific in their character; that not one of them is, or professes to contain, a systematic manual of first principles; that all of them assume the concurrent operation of evangelistic preaching and oral instruction; that, when read as addressed to churches in which sacramental observance was invariable and presupposed, they are at once perceived to be really interwoven with manifold allusions to the sacramental life unobserved before. The argument ex silentio is proverbially a perilous argument. It becomes convincing only when accompanied, as in this case it is not, by independent proof that silence must infer either ignorance or disregard. It may often with equal, if not greater, propriety be used to establish the very contrary of that which it has been cited to make good. Lake's remark applies most pertinently in this connexion: 'It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of realizing that, if we want to discover the central points of Christian doctrine, we must look not at those to which St. Paul devotes pages of argument, but at those which he treats as the premises accepted equally by all Christians' (The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911, p. 233 n.). It is not really paradoxical to maintain that the NT writers say little about sacramental observance just because sacramental observance was in their eyes a first principle. The emphasis laid in the NT upon the saving grace of faith is another reason adduced to depreciate the primitive importance of the sacraments. But saving graces and the means of grace are never placed in contrast in apostolic doctrine. The antithesis is gratuitous and imaginary. The relation between faith and sacrament remains exactly analogous to that which the Gospels represent as existing between faith and the instrumentality used by our Lord in the performance of His miracles. The faith involved in sacramental obedience is faith, not in outward rites, but in Him by whom these rites were appointed, whose instruments they also are. One particular passage (1 Co 1¹²⁻¹⁷) is frequently quoted as an indication that St. Paul disparaged Baptism as compared with preaching. Careful examination of the purpose of that passage leads to a conclusion entirely different. Had St. Paul not recognized the primary importance of Baptism as the sacrament of initiation into the Church, had he not supposed that his administration of it was more liable than his preaching to encourage the party watchword—'I am of Paul,' he would not have adverted to his apostolic practice in this connexion. He thanks God that he baptized few of the Corinthians himself, just because he knows the supreme incorporating significance of that ordinance, and perceives the misinterpretation which party-spirit might have put upon any special diligence shown by him as a minister of the actual rite of Baptism—'lest any man should say that ye were baptized into my name' (1 Co 1¹³).

(c) The observance of sacramental rites based itself in the Apostolic Church upon the authority of Christ's institution. The question which concerns us here is not that as to the origin of these rites. The sacraments meet us upon the very threshold of the Apostolic Church; and the discussion of their institution and of their relation to contemporary Jewish customs belongs to the province of Gospel study. What we are here concerned with is the authority which secured or sanctioned their observance in the Church. Only one such authority—that of the apostles—can in the first instance be imagined. Whether that authority was official or not, it must still have been effective. The apostles were believed to know the mind of Christ. They were the companions of His ministry. They were the witnesses of His resurrection. Without their injunction or approval sacramental observance could not have been introduced. But their authority was not original. It was derivative. They were ἀπόστολοι of Christ (Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. i. 42). The things which they taught the Church to observe were the things which Christ commanded (Mt 23²⁹). Hence the sacraments must have been supposed to possess the authority of our Lord Himself; and this is the belief upon which sacramental observance was established. Apart altogether from historical criticism of their contents, the Gospels bear testimony to the convictions which held sway in the Apostolic Church. St. Matthew's record (23¹⁶⁻²⁹), whatever view be taken as to the textually unassailable Trinitarian formula, proves that the Christian observance of Baptism was referred directly to the appointment of our Lord; and this conclusion is confirmed both by the description of baptism as 'in (ἐν, ἐν, ἐν) the name of Jesus Christ' (Ac 2³⁸ 16 10⁴⁵, etc.), and by the distinction insisted upon between Christian baptism and the baptism of John (Ac 18²⁵ 19³⁻⁵, He 6²). The combined witness of the Synoptists leaves no doubt that our Lord's own institution was believed to be the origin of the Eucharist. Lk 22^{19b-20} may be indebted in some way to 1 Co 11²⁴⁻²⁵; but there is no ground for the conjecture that St. Paul's account diverges at this point from the tradition of the Church at Jerusalem; while his own emphatic declaration—'I received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you' (v. 23)—whether referring to a special revelation or not, indicates clearly the supreme authority consistently presupposed as the foundation of sacramental observance. More than the bare command of Christ was contemplated as investing the sacraments with their authority. It was His command, surrounded in either case with circumstances of incomparable solemnity. If St. Matthew represents the belief of the primitive Church, Baptism was conceived of as an ordinance of the Risen Lord, delivered by Him on an occasion of transcending importance, decreed in the same breath with a claim to universal authority in heaven and on earth, associated with an imperial charge to make disciples of all the nations, and accompanied by a promise of His unfailing presence all the numbered days until the completion of the age. If the Synoptists and 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁶ 10^{16, 17} represent the belief of the primitive Church, the Eucharist was conceived of as an ordinance appointed by the Lord upon the eve of His sacrifice and in anticipation or it, upon an occasion of unique and consummating intimacy of self-revelation to His disciples, an occasion overshadowed, indeed, by the approaching betrayal and crucifixion, and therefore filled to overflowing with recollections inexpressibly moving and poignant, but consecrated also as the inauguration of the present communion of His body and blood, and radiant with the assurance which it contained of the impending triumph of His Kingdom. The sacraments, thus regarded as 'holy ordinances instituted by Christ,' afford an indication that the idea of positive ordinance, side by side with and counterbalancing the idea of individual charismatic freedom, was part of the essence of Christianity from the first. For the new 'way,' Christ had appointed beforehand certain definite rites which all life quickened by the Holy Spirit should observe. And the extraordinary solemnity of circumstance with which their appointment had been emphasized secured for these observances, even apart from discernment of their meaning or experience of their virtue, and without the original aid of any formulated sacramental theory, the homage of unquestioning practice. The sacraments of Christ may be said to resemble the words of Christ in this, that, while filled by Him with manifold grace and truth, the wealth of their contents would not be appropriated otherwise than gradually, and at the first, in consequence, their reception rested for its assurance chiefly upon the strength of that sovereign authority to which they owed their promulgation. In the apostolic belief that they were holy ordinances instituted by the Founder and King and Head of the Church we find the one sufficient explanation of their earliest prevalence. The faith of apostolic times saw the authority of our Lord's Person standing as fountain-head at the beginnings of sacramental observance; and, were it not for the demand made upon faith by the miracles of Pentecost and the Resurrection, the credibility of this historic witness to the actual institution of the sacraments by Christ would never in all probability have been seriously challenged.

2. Inferences as to sacramental doctrine.—(a) As ritual acts of faith and obedience towards God, the sacraments possessed the character of worship from the first. True sacraments are always capable of consideration under two aspects: a Godward aspect and a manward aspect. In the former they appear as acts of worship; in the latter they appear as means of grace. There is, indeed, a third aspect in which they are sometimes considered—that in which they become cognizable as forms of public or mutual self-expression. The last, however, is really an incidental accompaniment of the first, and quite subordinate to it. Only when the devotional life of the Church grows cold are the sacraments much thought of in this light. In the Apostolic Church they were not contemplated as formal means by which either the corporate religious consciousness or the decisions and experiences of personal religion received expression. That they did express such consciousness—the consciousness of blessings enjoyed, of the reality of 'the re-birth which is typified by the Church's sacrament of initiation' and of 'the participation in the Divine Life which is dramatised in its sacrament of communion' (E. Underhill, The Mystic Way, London, 1913, p. 33 f.)—may be in a sense true; but this was not regarded as their purpose. The decisions and experiences of personal religion, indeed, could not fail to be shown forth or implied in the sacraments. Inasmuch as these observances were distinctive and elementary acts of Christian faith and love they became at once prominent tokens of the Christian profession; and to this circumstance, no doubt, they owe in some measure their investment with the designation sacramenta. In the case of the initiatory rite, the rupture with the past (Ro 6², Eph 4²⁰⁻²² Col 3⁹, etc.) and 'the good confession in the sight of many witnesses' (1 Ti 6¹²) and the new habit of life (Ro 6⁴⁻⁶, Eph 4²³⁻²⁴, Col 3⁹, etc.) were circumstances so arresting that Baptism must always in those days have worn the complexion of an open avowal. In the case of the Eucharist, that rite which postulated devotion to Him whose memorial it was, in which also declared fellowship with the one Body was time after time renewed, participation became not only a badge of continued fidelity and an example in perseverance calculated to encourage others (He 10²⁴⁻²⁵, where it is surely natural to understand as included a reference to the eucharistic service), but, at a later date, a criterion as well by which adherence to sound doctrine (Ignatius, Smyrn. vi.) might be tested. Nevertheless, as an observance of personal faith, neither Baptism nor the Eucharist was an act of self-expression otherwise than incidentally. Both, primarily, were solemn acts of worship performed towards God. But both did not fulfil this character in the same way. The germ of a future classification of rites into sacraments singular and sacraments capable of repetition is already latent in their divergent types. Baptism is worship in the form of definitive self-surrender to God in Christ, accompanied with repentance and acknowledgment of faith. It is the dedication of a living sacrifice, the acceptance of office in a holy priesthood, the response to a calling of God to become the 'lively stones' of 'a spiritual house,' and, indeed, to be a temple bodily through the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit. The Eucharist, on the other hand, as the distinctive Christian form of stated common worship, was to be taken part in continually. By it the worship of the Church was differentiated from the worship of the synagogue; and it became at an early date the central act of the whole Christian cultus. This aspect of the observance connected itself from the first with the offering of the thanksgiving in accordance with our Lord's example; and the rapid specialization of the name eucharistia, applied therefore to the sacrament regarded as worship, may be traced from St. Paul (1 Co 14¹⁶) through St. Clement of Rome (Ep. ad Cor. i. 41 [see Lightfoot]) to its precise and settled use in Ignatius (Eph. xiii. 1, Philad. iv. 1, Smyrn. vi., viii. 1) and in the Didache (ix. 1, 5). The Eucharist was the culminating point of Christian worship. Elements of service—'lections, chants, homilies, and prayers'—might be and were borrowed from the Jewish liturgy (L. Duchesne, Christian Worship, Eng. tr.⁴, London, 1912, p. 47 f.). But 'the eucharistic celebration . . . was the new and vivifying principle, the centre round which these adopted elements ranged themselves' (J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. i., 'St. Clement of Rome,' London, 1890, i. 393).

(b) In their aspect as means of grace the sacra- ments were regarded as symbolical but not merely symbolical, as effectual but not magical, as both sealing and applying the spiritual benefits which they outwardly represented but in a way not yet strictly defined nor yet explained in terms of relative doctrine. The sacraments were looked upon not only as human acts but also as Divine instruments. The grace of God wrought through them, and wrought by means of symbols. The method of instruction by parable habitually employed by our Lord on earth had already taught His disciples to view external nature as a shadow of the Kingdom of Heaven, and had encouraged the conviction that 'everything, in being what it is, is symbolic of something more' (R. L. Nettleship, quoted by W. R. Inge, Christian Mysticism, London, 1899, p. 250). 'God omnipresent was so much in all their [the early Fathers'] thoughts, that what to others would have been mere symbols, were to them designed expressions of His truth, providential intimations of His will. In this sense, the whole world, to them, was full of sacraments' (R. Hooker, Works, ed. J. Keble, Oxford, 1841, vol. i. p. xcii). In harmony with our Lord's didactic method, and as a continuation of it, the sacraments instituted by Him took their place in the Church as permanent and embodied parables of the Kingdom. Symbolism was inherent in the use made by them of 'sensible signs.' Their elements and their actions were filled with ideas both obvious and more recondite. The water, the bread, and the wine, and the whole ritual associated with them spoke eloquently of invisible things and spiritual processes. Illustrations of a tendency to pass even beyond the similitudes primarily suggested, and to elaborate particular details of the imagery for purposes of doctrine, may be found not only in the age succeeding the apostles (the Didache, Hermas, Barnabas, Ignatius), but already in the apostles' writings themselves (1 P 3²⁻⁴, Ro 6⁴, Col 2¹¹, 1 Co 10¹⁷, etc.). Care, however, must be taken not to read the modern acceptance of the term 'symbolical' into the primitive view of the sacraments. According to modern habits of thought, symbols which speak outwardly to the senses operate upon the soul exclusively through the association of ideas. They make their address to the intellect, and only through the intellect influence the affections and the will. They are nothing more, in fact, than a language of signs. That this was not how the Apostolic Age regarded them, that they were always looked upon as having more than mere intellectual potency, research into the contemporary forms of popular religion claims to have established. Harnack, who both in History of Dogma and in Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1904) repeatedly emphasizes the assertion that the symbol was uniformly contemplated as possessing a vital and not only a figurative significance, thus represents the primitive view, at least in the field of Gentile Christianity: 'Although Christian worship is to be a worship in spirit and in truth, these sacraments [Baptism and the Lord's Supper] are sacred transactions which operate on life. . . . No doubt, the elements of water, bread, and wine, are symbols, and the scene of operations is not laid in externals; still, the symbols do actually convey to the soul all that they signify. Each symbol has a mysterious but real connection with the fact which it signifies' (Expansion of Christianity, i. 286). Lake goes so far as to express the opinion that 'this position [the purely symbolical view of the sacraments] has received its death-blow from the modern study of the history of religions' (The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, p. 389). Gentile Christians in contact with the pagan mysteries, and habituated to the conception that symbols carry with them vital effects, would not, unless expressly taught to do so, divest the sacraments of that deeper than emblematic significance which they naturally assumed them to contain; while for Jewish Christians a merely emblematic interpretation of the sacramental symbols would have appeared to attribute to these symbols the very character which stamped the legal worship, now abrogated because fulfilled in Christ, with imperfection—the character, namely, of 'a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things' (He 10¹ 8³, Col 2¹⁷). When we find the Didache prescribing careful ceremonial in relation to Baptism (vii.) and applying to the Eucharist the Dominical word 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs' (ix. 5), and Ignatius speaking of our Lord purifying the water by His suffering (Eph. xviii. 2) and exhorting 'Let your baptism remain as your arms,' i.e. as your shield (Polyc. vi. 2), and describing the Eucharist as 'the medicine of immortality, the antidote that we should not die' (Eph. xx. 2), we feel that we are in a region of sacramental ideas lying quite beyond the superficial theory of symbols. But we are really in the same region before we leave the canonical books. Those who contend that the purely symbolical is the only view of the sacraments entertained by NT writers cannot make good their contention except by denying a plain sacramental reference to Jn 3 and 6, and by employing ingenious exposition to empty one after another the entire series of express NT references to Baptism and the Lord's Supper of any other than a figurative implication. But there can be little doubt that the first readers of the Fourth Gospel would perceive in Jn 3 a direct allusion to Christian Baptism and in Jn 6 a direct allusion to the Eucharist; and, while all the express NT references to Baptism and the Lord's Supper are quite compatible with higher than figurative conceptions of the sacraments, in the case of a number of them (e.g. Ro 6¹⁻¹⁴, 1 Co 10¹⁻¹³, 12¹³, 11¹⁷⁻³⁴, 12¹³, Gal 3²⁶⁻²⁷, Eph 4⁵ 5²⁶, Col 2¹¹, 12, Tit 3⁵, 1 P 3²¹, He 6⁴—) the straightforward interpretation is one clearly involving that higher sacramental conception, to which also the consensus of the whole series points and testifies.

The sacraments, while regarded as more than empty symbols, while looked upon as really effectual, and tending to combine with the nature of dramatic παράβολαι the nature also of σημεία (in the sense of the Fourth Gospel) permanent in the Church, were not, however, thought of as having any kind of magical affinity. The precise meaning of the word 'magic' is difficult to define; and in this connexion its elasticity has led to a controversial use much to be deprecated. The characterization of sacramental theory as magical too often takes the place of serious argument. But the spiritually effectual and the magical are not synonymous terms. The really salient feature of magic, which 'has been ingeniously defined as the strategy of animism' (P. Cumont, Les Religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Paris, 1906, p. 224), may be recognized in its claim to possess the secret of commanding unseen powers. From the sacraments this feature is excluded by the institutional authority which they assert. The sacraments obey; they do not command. They operate not of necessity, but through the unconstrained agency of the Holy Spirit, who chooses them as His instruments. Their virtue resides not in material elements or ritual actions, but in the covenant of promise attached to their faithful observance. To magic, unless the name be stretched beyond its legitimate connotation, the sacraments of the Apostolic Church have no more substantial resemblance than prayer has to incantation. It is beyond doubt that in the world which Christianity entered the practice of magic and the circle of ideas associated with it were familiar. But the stories of Simon Magnus (Ac 8⁹⁻²⁴), of Elymas the sorcerer (13⁶⁻¹²), of the damsel possessed of a spirit of divination (16¹⁶⁻¹⁸), of the magicians of Ephesus (19¹³⁻¹⁹), as well as the condemnations of idolatry and sorcery contained in the Epistles (Gal 5²⁰, 1 P 4³, 1 Co 10¹⁴, Col 3⁵; cf. Rev 9^{20, 21} 18²³), illustrate the attitude of antagonism which the Church assumed towards magic from the first. Nor was this antagonism that of rivalry. Christianity was in no true sense a mystery-religion. Its sacramental system differed fundamentally from that of the mystery rites (but see J. E. Harrison's derivation of μυστήρ, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion, Cambridge, 1903, p. 153 f.). Except when forced into seclusion as a religio illicita, it worked openly. It knew of no magical secrets to be kept from all but the initiated. It knew only of life-giving secrets to be declared. In the Apostolic Church no trace exists of the disciplina arcani; and even when, at a later date, that disciplina was introduced, it was introduced in connexion with the institution of the catechumenate, and was employed as a method of education, as a device of rhetoric, as an expedient for the promotion of reverence, and not as implying any esoteric cult (see Batiffol, Études d'histoire et de théologie positive, pp. 1-41). It is perhaps only fair to add that, in the opinion of some competent scholars, the mysteries themselves, in their ultimate forms, and as understood by cultivated votaries, seem to have outgrown their original magic, and to have approximated, at least, to a sacramental character. The Christian polemic directed against them in the early centuries implies alleged resemblances. 'In the sacraments of Mithra, Tertullian and other Apologists perceived a diabolic parody of the usages of the Church' (S. Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, London, 1904, p. 613). Modern apology will incline rather to interpret such resemblances as disclosing in the sacramental system of the faith a Divine adaptation to the experienced requirements of human nature, a Divine response to the longing of the human heart for assured cleansing, for help in the pursuit of holiness, and for the promise of eternal life. That which the more refined mystery conceptions sought after, the sacraments actually supplied. It may well be that, not only in the syncretistic philosophies of the Roman Empire, but also in its 'conflict of religions,' the Spirit of Truth was secretly at work, opening many doors of prepared receptiveness for the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven. From any alliance with magic the Christian sacraments, at any rate, were safeguarded from the first by the personal relation which they involved as between members of the Church and the Person of her living and exalted Head, by the predominant emphasis laid upon the grace of Christian faith as an indispensable condition of every spiritual blessing, and by the intensely ethical requirements which were invariably associated with their observance.

The effect ascribed to the sacraments was partly of the nature of Divine assurance and promise. They operated so as to establish or confirm a new relationship of privilege which contained in posse a dower of future blessings—grace to be realized in this age and the hope of the world to come. The specific use of the word σφραγίς to designate the initiatory rites—a use common in post-apostolic times—does not yet appear as conventional. But the idea—more probably connected with Jewish revelation than with mystery conceptions—is already found in St. Paul's Epistles (2 Co 1²¹⁻²², Eph 1¹³ 4³⁰). Baptism is the outward sign of the Divine calling and election. By it those sealed are marked by God as His. They are enrolled in 'a nation from the midst of nations.' They are made members of the Body of Christ. And the gift of the Holy Spirit accompanying their initiation is a gift of 'the Holy Spirit of promise,' the 'earnest' (ἀρραβών) of an 'inheritance.' The Lord's Supper, again, is a seal of the New Covenant in Christ's blood, an assurance of eternal life now, an anticipation of the Parousia, a promise of resurrection, a pledge of the Messianic triumph, a foretaste of the great Supper of the Kingdom of Heaven (Mt 26^{26, 29}, Mk 14^{24, 25}, Lk 22^{20, 16-18}, Jn 6⁵⁴, 1 Co 11²⁶; also Mt 22¹⁻¹³, Lk 14¹⁵⁻²⁴). But the actual bestowal of the blessings represented by the sacraments was also regarded as an effect of their observance. They operated respectively as veritable means of their own distinctive grace. And they accomplished this not through any natural psychological process—an explanation which really reverts to the theory of empty symbols—but by the power of the Holy Ghost. They acted not upon intellect only, but upon the person, upon life. Baptism was the actual occasion of those effects which it represented—of the forgiveness of sin (Ac 2³⁸ 22¹⁶, Eph 5²⁶, Tit 3⁵), of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ac 2³⁸, 1 Co 12¹³), of the dying and burial with Christ (Ro 6³⁻⁴, Col 2¹²), and of regeneration (Jn 3⁵, Tit 3⁵). The Eucharist was the actual occasion of the communication and communion of the body of Christ and of the blood of Christ (1 Co 10¹⁶) and of all that was represented by the ministration and reception of the bread and wine in the sacrament (see also Jn 6⁵³⁻⁵⁸, and Ignatius, Rom. vii. 3, Philad. iv. 1, Smyrn. vi.). How the sacraments become thus effectual; what relation exists between the elements and that which is bestowed through them; in particular, what the body and blood of Christ precisely signify, and how such sacred realities ought to be conceived of as related to the consecrated bread and wine—these are questions which do not expressly emerge in this period. But, although no theory of sacramental grace is formulated as yet, the materials for its future construction are already provided. Among the prolegomena of sacramental theory, the doctrine of the Incarnation must always hold the place of supreme importance. That doctrine, not so much in its bearing upon the earthly life of our Lord as in its bearing upon His heavenly state and ministry, and in the conclusions to be drawn from it as to the perpetuity of the human nature assumed, as to the permanent relation of that human nature to His Divinity, as to its glorification, as to its endowment with the power of the Holy Spirit in full measure, and as to its potential omnipresence, constitutes the very basis of the whole sacramental fabric. And not only was that doctrine, uncoded as yet in creeds, and waiting still to be followed into its consequences, fundamental in the faith and teaching of the Apostolic Church, but certain aspects of it, which, as challenged by Docetic tendencies, receive marked prominence in the Johannine writings (Jn 1¹⁴, 1 Jn 4², 2 Jn 7) and prominence at least not less marked in the Epistles of Ignatius, are the very aspects which look in the direction of sacramental theology, and in the light of which sacramental theology was afterwards developed (e.g. see Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 66, and J. H. Srawley's comment, The Early History of the Liturgy, Cambridge, 1913, p. 35). In one place, indeed, in which Ignatius refers to Docetic separatists in such terms as to suggest that the Eucharist implies the reality of Christ's flesh (Smyrn. vi.), the doctrine of the Incarnation and the doctrine of the Eucharist are brought into a closeness of contact which illustrates the derivation of the sacramental principle from the contents of the truth that 'the Word became Flesh and dwelt among us.' In the two natures united in our Lord's Person, the two parts of the sacrament, its outward sign and its invisible grace, found their analogy. Our Lord's bodily presence was in fact the compendium of all sacraments; and all sacraments were the virtual extension of our Lord's bodily presence and activity. Of doctrine such as this the foundation had been laid already in the Apostolic Age, and the material provided. But it was left to subsequent centuries of constructive faith and devout reflexion to rear upon that foundation and with that material the doctrinal edifice of the sacramental system.

(c) Although either sacrament was regarded as the specific means of its own appropriate grace, both had a common reference to the whole way of salvation in Christ; and, while the complexity of this reference permitted certain aspects of it to receive peculiar prominence from time to time, there is no sufficient ground for the assumption that all were not equally implied in the nature of the institutions from the first. Baptism and the Lord's Supper had each its own distinctive purpose in the economy of grace. But they possessed in common similar general relations to the entire scheme of redemption. Both were means towards the fulfilment of the mystical union with Christ. Both had respect to the sacrifice offered by Him on the Cross. Both were inseparably connected with the cardinal fact of the Resurrection. Both looked up to a Prince and a Saviour by the right hand of God exalted. Both were dependent for their vitality upon the operation of the Holy Ghost sent forth from Him. Both had in view the constitution and service of the body corporate and the communion of saints. Both belonged to a new and spiritual order which bore witness to the one hope of the coming and kingdom of the Christ of God. Their common outlook was thus not in one direction only but in many—an outlook so comprehensive that it is strictly accurate to describe the blessings represented, sealed, and applied by them as being nothing less than 'Christ and the benefits of the New Covenant' (Shorter Catechism, Q. 92). This manifoldness of the sacramental outlook is, indeed, made evident in the facility with which each succeeding modern hypothesis as to what was 'central' in primitive Christianity can claim the witness of the sacraments for its support. If, e.g., the gospel of the Kingdom was mainly eschatological in its contents, there is no difficulty in showing that the sacraments looked forward to a Kingdom yet to come, of which they were the seals. If, on the other hand, the gospel of the Kingdom was mainly spiritual in its contents, it is equally easy to demonstrate that the sacraments as means of grace find their purpose in a Kingdom of God realizing itself gradually here and now. It may quite well be that at different periods, in different Churches, and by different teachers, particular aspects of the sacraments—whether the personal aspect or the corporate, the commemorative, the mystical, the ethical, or the prophetic—may have been given superior prominence. The Pauline theology may have laid more stress upon their relation to Christ's death, and the Johannine upon their relation to Christ's life; but it is not necessary to assume that only one aspect can be primitive, that all others were superinduced and represent deflexions from the original ordinance. It seems to be more reasonable to attribute the real variety of meaning and purpose which may be assigned to the sacraments to the intrinsic wealth of the sacraments themselves. If they were, as the Apostolic Church believed, the very institution of Christ Himself, it is not surprising to find that they exhibit the same many-sidedness of significance which characterized all the words which Christ spoke and the same many-sidedness of effect which characterized all the works which He performed. As 'holy ordinances instituted by Christ' they combine simplicity with mysterious depth; and from many sparkling facets, with iridescent doctrine, they reflect the light.

SACRIFICE.—1. Sources.—The sacrificial ideas found in the teaching of the Apostolic Church cast their roots so deeply in the soil of OT ideas and practice that careful reference to the sacrificial system inherited by apostolic writers from Jewish sources is essential. Even more closely than in other subjects, the apostolic literature assumes the genetic connexion of Christianity with Judaism in its doctrine of sacrifice. The OT thought-world is everywhere regarded as the basis for expounding the ultimate and more spiritual exhibitions of the sacrificial principle characteristic of apostolic interpretation. To make accurately and sympathetically the fine adjustments necessary between these transformed and spiritualized sacrificial values and their pre-Christian forms is of first importance. This task is the more difficult because the Jewish sources are themselves in turn inherited from primitive Semitic usages of which the meaning and origin are at present under investigation and the subject of keen discussion. Possibly reminiscences of each of the main theories advocated respecting the origin of sacrifice may be traced in the terms that illustrate apostolic teaching—e.g. the Gift theory (Ph 4¹³), the Homage theory (Ro 12¹), the Common Meal theory (1 Co 10¹⁴⁻²²). The Expiatory theory is too obvious to need references. The one constant element in primitive sacrifice persisting to apostolic times that modern research, both anthropological and psychological, seems to warrant is that sacrifice appears to have pleased the object of worship and secured the favour of the deity—i.e., it was 'propitiatory' in the broadest sense. The most reliable expert opinion of different schools of anthropologists regards sacrifice as devised by man as an institution by which he might indicate and satisfy the instincts of his religious nature, and therefore only indirectly Divine in its origin. Sacrifice thus originated in primitive childlike ideas of God, and developed, through the primary religious instinct of pleasing Him by giving or sharing a meal with Him, into later rites regarded as of expiatory value as the moral consciousness of the race deepened. Some such long course of development lies behind the appearance of sacrifice in the OT.

(a) Early Israel.—Here sacrifice is regarded as a familiar custom at the beginning of human history; it originated in the first family; it was patriarchal. It meets us early in the OT as the comparatively complete and elaborated cultus mirrored in the J document, but no light is thrown upon its origin. Its chief occasions were times of meeting with God; it marked the intimate relationship between the god and his worshippers; the prevailing conception of its significance was that it was a present to God in sign of homage, thanksgiving, desire for communion or Divine gifts. The indications here of the stricter motive of expiation are very slight, although awe of the Divine Presence finds early and constant expression; and there is little doubt that Israel in all ages believed in the effectiveness of sacrifice to preserve or restore the favour of Jahweh. In view of apostolic teaching the early significance of the Covenant Sacrifice should be noted. Its specific object was to make a covenant sure and binding by the interchange of blood between the parties to it; half the animal victim's blood was poured upon the altar for God and half sprinkled upon the people (cf. Ex 24⁸⁻⁹, He 8⁶, 9¹⁵⁻²²). The religious efficacy of sacrifice was interpreted according to the degree of ethical and spiritual enlightenment of the offerers. The popular idea of a union cemented by blood in its physical and literal character was beginning to be challenged in the early monarchy; the higher theology of the age was already excluding the idea of God as a fellow-guest, and offerings were regarded as worthless without obedience (cf. 1 S 15⁻⁷). God was disposed favourably by sacrifices, but we are not able to say in what manner they were supposed to influence Him. Neither these nor the older Semitic sacrifices were strictly expiatory, as has often been assumed; even where the animal may have been regarded as the offerer's substitute, it may not necessarily have been as expiation for sin. Human sacrifices were unquestionably offered in the earlier stages of the Hebrew transition from the prehistoric to the historic development of the doctrine. They were common in Palestinian religion.

(b) Prophetic teaching.—Before touching upon the priestly or Levitical sacrificial system, from which it is evident apostolic teaching chiefly drew its thought-forms and its sacrificial terminology, reference must be made to the attitude taken towards sacrifice by the OT prophets, especially by those of the 8th century. From these the primitive Christian Church drew much of the substance of its teaching on sacrifice as it came to be interpreted in ethical and spiritual values. These two types—prophetic and priestly—dominate the structure of our OT sources; they existed side by side and acted and reacted upon each other. If not distinctly rival systems in the religious thought and practice of Israel, they represent different ideals concerning that which is an acceptable offering to the Lord. To recognize that both of them deeply influenced apostolic views of sacrifice is important. It is not probable that the prophets actually proposed the abolition of sacrifice, as some scholars have maintained. They assumed its legitimacy; they denied its necessity. Their protest was against the exaggerated importance of sacrifice (cf. Am 5²³, Jer 7²¹); it was not essential to forgiveness. The Levitical cultus provided sacrifice as the chief vehicle of God's grace; forgiveness is mediated through it. The insistent iterance of the prophetic word is that sacrifice is not essential; God requires obedience, not sacrifice. Because He is a righteous God, He can accept nothing in place of righteousness. Righteousness is fundamental religion (Mic 6⁶⁻⁸); without it sacrifice was an insult to God; He was weary of it; it provoked Him. Whilst they did not demand a religion without a cultus, i.e. a purely spiritual worship, the prophets denied that sacrifice in itself has efficacy with God, and that He has appointed it as essential to the ministry of His grace. In thus setting character before cultus the Psalmists join the prophets, emphasizing at the same time the abiding value in the sight of God of penitential feeling (cf. Ps 40⁶⁻⁹ 51^{16f.}). With the great prophet of the Exile there rises also the commanding figure of the Suffering Servant of the Lord. Out of His personal afflictions for His people grows the vision of a voluntary and personal sacrificial offering of Himself. This transcends in its perfect ethical and spiritual value all lower ideas associated with the offering of animal victims (Is 53). The extent to which this presentation of the Suffering Servant and the prophetic attitude of bare tolerance towards the sacrificial system influenced the apostolic teaching on sacrifice has not been fully appreciated.

(c) Levitical.—Historically this followed the prophetic period referred to. It did not precede it, as was formerly thought. The elaboration of the Levitical Code and the bewildering details of the priestly legislation respecting sacrifice led to the depreciation of the prophetic criticism of it. Levitical conceptions became characteristic of the Judaism with which early Christianity had such intimate and vital connexion. The transition from the ethical ideals of the prophets to the ceremonial ritual of the Levitical system carries us into a different world of sacrificial ideas; in many respects the change marks reaction; ethically it is on a lower plane, though it may possibly as a hard shell have preserved for future generations the kernel of the prophetic teaching regarding sacrifice. Its marvellous completeness provided a basis for typological analogy. It was almost inevitable, in the circumstances in which Christianity arose, that the primitive Church should extensively use this as a vehicle for teaching its doctrine of redemption. We need not refuse to see in the rich detail of Jewish sacrifices an unconscious illustrative preparation for apostolic forms of teaching. Yet it is difficult to hold that this whole ceremonial system was instituted with a conscious reference to, or binding authority for, the spiritual teaching of the sacrificial principle in Christianity, in which the Jewish sacrificial system was at once fulfilled and abrogated. The chief feature of the Levitical system, as distinguished from the sacrifices of the earlier cultus in Israel, was the greater importance attached to peculiar or expiatory sacrifices—the guilt-, sin-, and trespass-offerings. This resulted from the deepened sense of sin which had developed during the Exile. Originally not more important than other offerings, the sin-offering now becomes the sacrifice par excellence. Eventually this type of sacrifice appears to have overshadowed the other great type represented by the peace-offerings, which assumed that the covenant relations with Jahweh were undisturbed. It was the expiatory type that constituted the daily sacrifice—the continual burnt-offering—up to apostolic times; it was regarded as most perfectly embodying, through its vicarious character, the sacrificial idea; it was not connected with any particular transgression, but was maintained as the appropriate means of a sinful people's approach to a Holy God. Essential features in it were the shedding and sprinkling of blood and the conveyance of the sacrifice entire to God and His ministers; it was also accompanied by the imposition of hands. The utmost importance was attached in this type of sacrifice to the disposition of the victim's blood: the blood was God's; it belonged to Him of right; a mysterious potency inhered in it; the life was in it (cf. Lv 17¹¹); safety for the individual and the nation lay in such sacrifices of blood. It is of great importance, however, in view of apostolic conceptions to note that such sacrifices—the highest in value the Levitical system provided—availed only for sins of ignorance, for unwitting transgression of holy things and for the removal of physical uncleanness, which was regarded as implying moral as well as ceremonial disability in drawing near to God (Nu 15³⁰). For wilful sins—‘sins with a high hand’—no reconciling sacrifice was provided in Israel; the penalty of such sins was death—‘that soul was cut off from Israel.’ But even such sins were not beyond the reach of forgiveness. That such sinners might through confession and true penitence approach God, and through His grace, apart from sacrifice, meet with His mercy was the evangelical proclamation of the prophets. It was held, however, by later Jewish interpreters that the ‘scapegoat’ on the great Day of Atonement expiated the sins of all Israelites who had not deliberately put themselves outside its effects by forsaking the religion of their people; and this expiation was applied so as to include sins the penalty of which was ‘to be cut off from his people,’ or death (cf. EBi iv. 4219, 4224).

(a) Later Jewish.—The whole question of the expiatory value of Jewish sacrifices generally is keenly debated amongst modern scholars. The theory of the penal substitution of the life of the animal victim in place of the life of the offerer, which was formerly regarded as almost an axiomatic principle of interpretation, now meets with cogent criticism. Whilst this theory is still held on the ground of evidence direct and indirect in biblical and post-biblical ideas or usage, it must be said that probably the majority of modern scholars regard it as no longer tenable. Much in the discussion of these opposing positions turns upon the confidence which should be placed upon the theories of sacrifice prevalent in later Judaism. If the date and adequacy of the valuable materials collected from later Jewish sources, belonging to the time when the institution of the Synagogue was growing up side by side with the sacrificial worship of the Temple, could be depended upon, they would afford data of the highest importance in seeking to interpret the ideas of the apostolic literature, whose writers had been taught in the synagogue or in the Rabbinical schools. The present difficulty, however, of gathering the old Jewish theory of sacrifice from these sources may be illustrated by the contrary judgments of two scholars who have had access to them. Holtzmann sums up the result thus: ‘Everything pressed towards the assumption that the offering of a life, substituted for sinners according to God’s appointment, cancelled the death penalty which they had incurred, and that consequently the offered blood of the sacrificial victims expiated sin as a surrogate for the life of the guilty’ (Neutest. Theol. i. 68, quoted by W. P. Paterson, art. ‘Sacrifice’ in HDB iv. 342^b; cf. Stevens, Theol. of the NT, p. 409). G. F. Moore holds an opposite opinion: ‘The theory that the victim’s life is put in place of the owner’s is nowhere hinted at, perhaps because the Jewish doctors understood better than our theologians what sin offerings and trespass offerings were, and what they were for’ (EBi iv. 4226). Such a measure of disagreement need not, however, lead to the position assumed by other scholars that no theory underlay the practice of sacrifice in Israel: ‘A precise answer to the question how the sacrificial worship influenced God men were unable to give. When in the blood of the Sin-offering the tie between God and His people was renewed, what was felt was the weird influence of the incomprehensible’ (Smend, Alttest. Religionsgesch., p. 324). Apostolic writers held that there is a simple answer given in Lv 17¹¹ to the question how sacrifice expiates—‘it is the blood that maketh atonement.’ ‘According to the law, I may almost say, all things are cleansed with blood, and apart from shedding of blood there is no remission’ (He 9²²). Two other important tendencies of the later Jewish period also passed as influential principles for sacrificial interpretation into the apostolic teaching: (a) the strong tendency to recognize the sufferings, and especially the death, of righteous men as atoning for the sins of other men. For instance, the merits of Abraham served to cover the sins of his posterity; such expiatory value of suffering is also applied to the sufferings of Moses, Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and to the passion of the martyrs; it was also pre-eminently illustrated in the career of the Suffering Servant of Is 53. These sufferings constituted a ground of forgiveness of sin in Israel; they are expressly compared, in point of efficacy, to the Day of Atonement (Pesiqta, 174b). These tendencies probably influenced profoundly the sacrificial theory of the age; for it was a transition easily made from the vicarious death of the righteous to the belief in substitution of animal victims, or possibly by a fortiori reasoning from the value of the substitutionary death of the animal victim to that of the righteous saint (cf. 2 Mac 7³⁷, 4 Mac 6²⁹). (b) Whilst the sacrificial ceremonies were most scrupulously observed and with great pomp and solemnity, a process was going on which was loosening the hold of sacrifice upon the Jewish religion. A reluctant admission was beginning to be made—which ultimately found its logical and historical completion in apostolic Christianity—that it was not a full expression of the relation of His people to God, and was not wholly essential for their communion with Him. Sacrificial worship was being gradually co-ordinated with that of the synagogue. Owing to the renewed authority of the teaching of the prophets, and the widening distance from the Temple services of the multiplied congregations of the Dispersion, knowledge of the Law and the ethical value of good deeds became recognized forms of religious activity which were regarded as directly well-pleasing to God; the Rabbi and the scribe became at least complementary authorities, often indeed competitors with the priest and the Levite. The destruction of the Second Temple within the Apostolic Age so quickened the rapidity with which traditional authority became superior to sacrificial that it was officially taught that the study of the Law was more valuable in the sight of God than the continual burnt-offering (Megilla, 3b, 16b, Pesiqta, 60b). The fact that within the Apostolic Age the abolition of sacrifice as a national mode of worship in Jewish religion had become, through the destruction of Jerusalem, a necessity may well be helpful in defining the attitude of apostolic writers towards sacrifice.

For careful information on the origin and theory of sacrifice the reader should consult the very full article ‘Sacrifice’ by W. P. Paterson in HDB, which favours the substitutionary theory, and that in EBi by G. F. Moore, which opposes it; also Smend’s discussion of the development of the sacrificial system in Israel in his Alttest. Religionsgeschichte; G. B. Stevens outlines the sacrificial system in Christian Doctrine of Salvation, pt. i. ch. i.

2. Modifications of the inherited sacrificial system presented in apostolic teaching and in the practice of the Apostolic Church.—The best method of expounding the apostolic views of sacrifice is to notice in what directions and to what extent the writers in the primitive Church modified the sacrificial ideas they carried with them in their passage from Judaism to Christianity. These were the ideas from which controversies and party divisions in the Apostolic Church largely sprang. Jewish and Gentile Christians possessed a different heritage of sacrificial practices; the apostolic literature has reference to both, but the references to the Jewish immeasurably preponderate. The starting-point for the apostolic modifications is found in the Synoptic account of the attitude of Jesus towards the current sacrificial system. (a) He recognized the authority of the sacrificial law as practised in His time by observing it, keeping the Passover and other feasts, worshipping in the Temple, where sacrifice was the central act; by commending its observance to others, e.g. the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing (Mt 8⁴; cf. Mk 14⁴). (b) He constantly favoured the prophetic rather than the priestly view of sacrifice. He quoted Hos 6⁶ 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9¹³ 12⁷), and commended the judgment that love is more than all burnt-offering (Mk 12³¹); He declared that sacrifice is worthless with unrepented sin (Mt 5²³). (c) He referred to His own death as sacrificial, comparing it especially with the Covenant sacrifice with which the Mosaic system was instituted, 'My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26²⁸, Lk 22²⁰; cf. 1 Co 11²⁵). If we may take the 'new' of the Lucan and Pauline versions as our Lord's, we may draw the inference that in the establishing of the 'new' the 'old' Covenant was abrogated, and with it the sacrifices that had initiated it and given it historical continuity in Israel. How long it was after the institution of the New Covenant before the Apostolic Church appreciated all its implications it is not easy to determine. The Petrine attitude, which favoured a policy of continuity or at least compromise towards important parts of the Jewish sacrificial cultus, is exhibited in early, strenuous conflicts of judgment recorded in the Apostolic Church. St. Paul quickly seized the central principle in the changed situation which was to mark the development of Christian thought and usage in reference to the Jewish sacrificial system, but he succeeded only gradually in applying it. The full inferences of the abrogation or the ancient sacrifices are first drawn by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The use made by the apostolic witnesses of the elaborate and technical terminology of the Jewish sacrificial system must be briefly reviewed. The 'proof-text' method of working over this material in fragmentary textual correspondences and coincidences between the old and new is not satisfactory, and has yielded place to the co-ordinated testimonies of typical apostolic teachers. The differences and signs of developing doctrine in this group of writers must be separately considered as constituting together—

3. The apostolic teaching.—The records of the apostolic preaching in the Acts reveal the primary fact that 'Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15³) was an article of common tradition in the Apostolic Church. The death of Christ appears to have been regarded at a very early period as expiatory; the idea of expiation was closely associated with that of sacrifice; it was natural, therefore, that the death of Christ should be looked upon as a sacrifice and spoken of under sacrificial figures. This sacrificial interpretation of His death is embedded in subsequent types of apostolic teaching (A. Ritschl, Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, Bonn, 1870-74, ii. 161; A. Cave, Scriptural Doctrine of Sacrifice, p. 280 ff.). No direct mention of the sacrifice of Christ is made by James or Jude; but their silence may be accounted for by the fact that the subject was foreign to the purpose for which they wrote.

(a) Petrine.—In the Epistles of Peter the sacrificial references are clear and interesting; 'sprinkling of the blood of Jesus' (1 P 1²; cf. Ex 24⁸); 'ye were redeemed . . . with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ' (1¹⁸); cf. also Is 53⁷. with its clear echo in 1 P 2²¹⁻²⁵, where the sacrificial idea of vicarious suffering is too obvious to need comment. The characteristic feature of the Petrine references is their close sympathy with OT ideas and usage.

(b) Pauline.—In the Pauline references the contrast between the Jewish and Christian aspects of sacrifice is more pronounced. St. Paul's direct references to Levitical sacrifice are not numerous. Their scarcity, however, does not warrant Bruce's suggestion that his ideas were coloured more by the analogy of human sacrifice, with which Greek and Roman story makes us familiar, than by that of the Levitical system (cf. St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, Edinburgh, 1894, p. 169). Whilst St. Paul does allude to pagan ideas of communion through sacrifice (1 Co 10^{18, 20}), he was intimately acquainted with the minutiae of the Levitical system and even definitely associated himself with its observance (Ac 21²⁶ 24^{11, 17}), though some find it difficult to believe that his action in the Temple could have been so contrary to his clearly expressed precept (cf. Gal 4⁹). It should also be noted that St. Paul, unlike the writer to the Hebrews, does not explicitly declare that the sacrifices of the Law came to an end with the death of Christ. Whilst it cannot be denied that St. Paul clearly regards the death of Christ as substitutionary, he expounds this conception so much less in terms of the sacrificial system than might have been expected from him that it has been possible for some expositors to maintain with some plausibility that he did not regard Christ's death as a sacrifice (cf. Pfeiderer, Der Paulinismus, Leipzig, 1890, p. 144). This is an exaggerated position; for in addition to many traces of sacrificial ideas which he used as suggestive illustrations of the meaning of Christ's death, he speaks definitely of the Death as a sacrifice, 'He gave himself up for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for an odour of a sweet smell' (Eph 5²); 'Our passover also hath been sacrificed, even Christ' (1 Co 5⁷). References to the blood of Christ as the ground of the benefits conferred by His death (Ro 3²⁵ 5⁹, 1 Co 10¹⁶, Eph 2¹³) are not satisfied by regarding the 'blood' as merely an allusion to His violent death; it seems clear from the tenor of St. Paul's teaching that he means 'sacrificial blood' (cf. Ro 8³², Gal 2²⁰, Col 1²⁰, Eph 1⁷). It may be maintained, however, that if he 'has not especially brought out this idea [the interpretation of Christ's death] in connection with his allusions to sacrifice, he has done so in other ways, and the inference that this was his conception of Christ's death, viewed as a sacrifice, is quite inevitable' (Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 63).

(c) Epistle to the Hebrews.—Unlike St. Paul the writer to the Hebrews presents his doctrine of salvation wholly in terms of sacrifice, and thus provides the classical treatment of the significance of sacrifice for apostolic thought. His argument is developed in a running comparison between the sacrifices of the Levitical ritual and the perfect offering presented by Christ in the sacrifice of Himself. The sacrificial institutions associated with the Old Covenant are set forth as types and shadows of the heavenly and eternal reality in which the New Covenant is established in the blood of Christ. The key-word of the Epistle and of the comparison it elaborates is 'better.' The Son whose humanity is perfect, the Mediator of the new and better covenant, is the true High Priest (see art. PRIEST) (cf. 8⁵⁻¹² 9¹⁵ ff.). His constitutive function is to offer sacrifice (8³). Christ offers Himself; the nature and effect of this perfect sacrifice are contrasted with the sacrifices of the Law (8-10¹⁸); the contrast culminates in the parallel between the action of the high priest in the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Ex 24⁴⁻⁶) and Christ entering the heavenly places 'through his own blood' (9^{11a}). The superiority of Christ's sacrifice is everywhere impressively developed. It was also an offering in close dependence upon the love of God: by the grace of God Christ tasted death for every man (2⁹); it was never spoken of as 'reconciling God.'

Three main truths emerge from the comparison. (i.) The Levitical sacrifices cannot take away sin; they serve rather to bring to mind the sin they cannot expiate (10⁹). At its best the Levitical system contemplated the removal of ceremonial faults only, sins of ignorance and infirmity (10⁴⁻¹¹); it effected a purification of the body only. The pathetic failure of the whole sacrificial system touches all the writer's thought; it was morally ineffective because it belonged to the lower, sensible world (9¹¹ 11³), 'the visible order' of Philo and the Alexandrian thinkers. The absoluteness and finality of Christ's sacrifice is demonstrated by relating it to the heavenly and eternal realm of reality (8¹¹ 9¹⁻³ 10⁴)—the realm which Philo, in the spirit of Plato's doctrine of archetypal ideas, calls 'the intelligible world.' Christ has entered with His sacrifice into heaven itself (9²⁴) and obtained eternal salvation for us (7²⁷ 9¹⁻¹⁵ 10¹⁰), having 'through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God' (9¹⁴). It was an offering, on our behalf and as our representative, of a pure and spotless life. The solidarity of Christ with mankind is confidently stated: 'Both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren' (2¹¹). The Levitical sacrifices were perpetually repeated, just because they had no real efficacy either objective or subjective (9⁶ 10^{2L}); Christ's sacrifice is made once for all, 'perfecting for ever them that are sanctified' (7²⁷ 9¹²⁻²³ 10¹²⁻¹⁴). Christ's sacrifice purged the conscience to serve the living God (9¹⁴ 10²²), thus dealing with sin ethically and in its deepest seat instead of with its accidental expressions which marked the limits of efficacy in ceremonial sacrifices (9⁹ 10³). The sacrifices of the Law opened no way of spiritual access to the holy presence of God (9⁸); by the blood of Jesus a new and living way was dedicated by which men could draw near to Him with spiritual confidence (10^{19c}). Everywhere the writer insists upon the truth that only by better sacrifices than those of the Levitical system could the heavenly places and the spiritual realities be cleansed and consecrated (7²⁵ 9¹³⁻¹⁴); insufficiency marks all material elements and outward aspects of sacrifice; indeed, the whole point of the exposition turns upon contrast, not upon congruity. The interpretation of the Epistle which is frequently met with, that because its author expounds the Christian salvation in the terminology of sacrifice its meaning is therefore to be determined throughout by reading it in the light of the Levitical system, misses entirely the main motive of the writer, which is to mark the radical difference between the Christian and the Levitical conception of sacrifice. The most important fact to be observed is that the author, constrained by the estimate of the Christian values of sacrifice, ethicizes the whole meaning of sacrifice, and ascribes to Christ's offering of Himself a wholly different nature from that which belongs to the Levitical oblations.

This is specially seen in the way in which the writer deals with (ii.) the value of the material of Christ's sacrifice—His blood. In the Levitical system the manipulation of the blood was of supreme importance. Nothing was cleansed without its use (9^{21L}). The vital moment in the culmination of the sacrifices of the Day of Atonement was the entering of the Holy of Holies by the high priest, bearing with him sacrificial blood (9⁷). Christ's sacrificial act was accomplished also when He entered into the heavenly place, 'through his own blood' (9^{11a}), 'to make propitiation for the sins of the people' (2⁷); 'he offered a sacrifice for sins once for all, when he offered up himself' (7²⁷; cf. 9²⁸⁻²⁹). It is clear that the writer makes distinct use of the conception of substitution. But it is important to notice the evidence that something deeper than the literal substitution and the idea of legal transfer of sin which had gained currency in the later Jewish period was in the writer's mind. The value of Christ's offering is ethical; it resides in His will; His blood is presented not simply as the evidence of His death, but as the offering of His life. It is life, not death, which is the essence of all true sacrifice. Even in the Levitical system the blood constitutes the sacrifice, because 'the blood is the life' (Lv 17¹¹). Christ's offering of Himself includes more than His dying; it is the willing offering of His life in the perfection of ceaseless filial obedience to the will of God. The writer of this Epistle emphasizes this: 'Sacrifices and offerings and whole burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein (the which are offered according to the law), then hath he said, Lo, I am come to do thy will. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. By which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all' (10^{10c}). This offering with which God was well pleased brought humanity into a new relation to God. It was a positive ethical and religious valuation of Christ's sacrifice that went beyond its value as merely legal substitution.

(iii.) The doctrine of the New Covenant. The first Covenant was not dedicated without blood (9¹⁵; cf. Ex 24⁶⁻⁸); sacrificial blood was for Israel essentially 'the blood of the covenant' (9²⁰; cf. Mt 26²⁸). The sacrifices of the Mosaic Covenant were the sign of the establishment of the Law; the New Covenant in Christ's blood was the sign of its fulfilment, and therefore 'unto remission of sins' (Mt 26²⁸; cf. Jn 6⁵³⁻⁷¹, 1 Jn 1⁷). The blood divided by sprinkling between the parties to the covenant was the seal of the friendship it established or restored. It was under the shelter of this covenant relation that the whole system of Levitical sacrifices was instituted; they availed only for those within its bonds. This conditioned its permanence; it could not abide. It was the prophetic attitude towards sacrifice that initiated the conception of the necessity of a New Covenant which should be ethical and spiritual and therefore permanent and universal. Jeremiah's prophecy of the New Covenant (Jer 31³¹) is the principal link between the sacrifices of the Law and Christ's fulfilment and consequent abolition of them. This is a covenant under which God lays His laws upon the hearts of men and inscribes them upon their minds, and undertakes no longer to remember their sins and iniquities (10^{16c} 8^{8d}). 'Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin' (10¹⁵). A real remission makes all other sacrifices useless. The sacrifice of Christ, 'the mediator of a new covenant' (9¹⁵) by which such a new covenant is established, is the 'one offering by which he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (10¹⁴). The prophetic idea of the value of the sacrificial sufferings of the Righteous Servant is thus restored in close association with the use of sacrificial ideas which were the current coin of Jewish thought. Henceforth there was no longer room for the sacrifices of the Law (10¹⁵). The only sacrifice that retained its permanence for the future was 'a sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of lips which make confession to his name' (13¹⁸).

(d) Johannine.—These writings probably represent apostolic views on sacrifice towards the close of the Apostolic Age and therefore later than the sources hitherto considered. It is a question for discussion, however, whether the ideas they suggest represent a development of the apostolic thought upon this subject or whether they simply reproduce the common positions to which the Church had become accustomed as traditional interpretations. That so little is said of sacrifice itself and so much of the abiding ethical and spiritual results that Christian thought had learned to connect with the sacrificial death of Christ seems to favour the opinion that the apostolic conception had by this time become more completely separated from the Jewish and more perfectly expressed in purely ethical applications; the mystical rather than the legal aspect of sacrifices prevails. But direct sacrificial terms appear at times in the Gospels, Epistles, and Apocalypse, and probably quite as frequently, proportionately, as in the Pauline writings. (i.) The references to 'the Lamb of God' (Jn 1²⁹) predominate. The great saying of John the Baptist, whether critically valid or not, is a good illustration of the Johannine type of reference. This sacrificial symbol is definitely applied to Jesus. Whether the reference is to the Paschal Lamb or to the prophetic sacrificial ideal of the Suffering Servant (Is 53¹¹) is not certain. But there is no doubt of the expiatory value attached to the symbol; for the Lamb 'taketh away the sin of the world' (1²⁹; cf. 1 P 1¹⁹). Jesus takes away sin by the sacrificial method. Symbol and expiatory idea occur again several times in the Apocalypse, where 'the Lamb' is combined with references to the sacrificial blood; 'a Lamb standing, as though it had been slain' (Rev 5^{6, 12}); those who have 'washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb' (7¹⁴); 'they overcame because of the blood of the Lamb' (12¹¹). Salvation is ascribed unto 'our God which sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb' (7¹⁰). These references indicate how easily and naturally sacrificial ideas were associated with the work of Christ and especially with its results. Although textual difficulties attach to 'the Lamb that hath been slain from the foundation of the world' (13⁸), it may illustrate how influentially the sacrificial idea applied to Christ persisted in apostolic thought. (ii.) The references of Jesus to 'eating my flesh, and drinking my blood,' in Jn 6 are sacrificial; they are interesting as references in apostolic times to sacrifice as the sharing in a common meal with a view to enriching human life by communion. Here such ideas, though presented in sacrificial symbolism, are intensely ethical and spiritual in value. (iii.) Illustrations of the elevation of the sacrificial idea to the sublime acts of ethical self-sacrifice by which Christ accomplished His redemptive mission may be traced in the references to the laying down of His life in vicarious surrender; 'the lifting up' (Jn 3¹⁴ 12³²), 'the good shepherd' (Jn 10¹¹), 'the prophecy of Caiaphas' (11⁵⁰), 'the corn of wheat' (12³⁴). (iv.) And in Jn 17¹⁹ the work of Christ is paralleled, as in Hebrews, by that of the high priest on the Day of Atonement by the use of a word of sacrificial associations. (v.) In the First Epistle of John words and ideas with direct sacrificial implications are frequently observed; 'the blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1⁷); 'he is the propitiation for our sins' (2² 3¹⁶ 4¹⁰); 'he was manifested to take away sins' (3⁵); with these may be read the distinctive saying of the Apocalypse, 'Unto him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins by his blood' (Rev 1⁵). The contribution these sayings make to the interpretation of the apostolic thought respecting sacrifice is that they everywhere appear as familiar Christian phrases, which suggest how surely the transition had been accomplished in the early Church from the legal and preparatory conception of sacrifice to the permanent Christian view which was ethical and spiritual.

(e) Sub-apostolic.—In this period the sacrificial ideas met with in the Apostolic Age continued with but little change; the tendency, judging from post-apostolic development, was, if anything, towards more ceremonial and material views of sacrifice as applied to illustrate or interpret the death of Christ. The Epistle ascribed to Barnabas deals with the subject in its relation to the sacrifices of the Jewish Temple, which are considered to have been abolished in order that 'the new law of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is without the yoke of necessity, might have a human oblation' (ii.).

4. Conclusions.—Sacrifice was taken over by the Apostolic Church as a living institution in Judaism; the value of it as a fundamental principle of religious worship was recognized; the retrospect of its history given by the apostolic writers is reverent and appreciative; it was educative. For a time there appears to have been hesitation as to how far its practice should continue in the Christian environment; the primitive Jewish Christians made use of it by worshipping in the Temple at Jerusalem, and in the observance of ritual associated with the sacrificial system elsewhere within the Christian communities. Others with a quicker spiritual instinct reached the conviction that as Christ was the only perfect sacrifice, the material and historical sacrifices were of relative value only, and transient. Vehement controversy arose when the Judaizing party in the Church sought to lay upon Gentile believers the burden of the ceremonial law of Israel. The sharp contentions of the Petrine and Pauline schools (Ac 15³⁹), the Council at Jerusalem (Ac 15), the teaching of the Pauline Epistles, particularly Galatians, and ultimately the masterly argument of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews are witnesses to hesitations and tendencies of thought in apostolic times. Sympathy with the ancient ritual of sacrifice and sanction for its practice appear to have accompanied the emergence of Christianity as a separate institution from the Judaism in which it had its rise. Whilst the great principle that in Christ all preparatory sacrificial institutions were fulfilled found early acceptance, it was only slowly that its many-sided implications were fully acknowledged.

(a) Retention of the Jewish sacrificial system as symbolic.—Even when the sacrificial system as a living institution had passed into a condition of obsolescence in the Apostolic Church, it remained permanently influential as an organized system of illustrations for interpreting the spiritual realities of the work of Christ; it became a system of types and symbols which were of service for the teacher and preacher. Whilst the apostles deliberately set aside the belief in the efficacy of Jewish sacrifices, it is evident not only that they could express the work of Christ in no better terms than those associated with sacrificial ritual, but that they found in these terms some real meaning when applied to the shedding of His blood for the remission of sins. Consequently sacrificial terminology came into easy and common usage, and became in fact the most comprehensible and almost necessary medium for the thought-forms which set forth the inward and abiding realities of the Christian redemption. The evidence for this abounds, as we have seen, in the apostolic literature. How close the symbol moved towards the reality in the apostolic teaching respecting the significance of the death of Christ, how far, that is, His death was truly a sacrifice, involves questions that run up into the problems of the grounds on which the efficacy of His death was ultimately based (see ATONEMENT). So far, however, as its efficacy is based on the meaning of sacrifice in the OT, the divergent positions held as satisfying the terms of apostolic teaching may be broadly represented on the one hand by writers who hold that sacrifice in the OT was substitutionary in the sense of providing satisfaction for sin, and, on the other hand, by writers who maintain that such a view 'rests upon profound misunderstandings of the nature of the OT sacrifices, and entirely ignores Jewish conceptions of the effect and operation of sacrifice' (EBi iv. 4232). The kindred question arising from the apostolic use of sacrificial symbols, as to how far Christ's death was truly a sacrifice, or merely illustrated by sacrificial language, also leads to opposing replies. On the one hand, it is held that 'Old Testament conceptions will always be suggestive and historically instructive for the study of Christian teaching, but a direct source of such teaching they cannot be. Christianity rises high above that national and ritualistic religion on whose soil it took its rise' (Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 2; cf. W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, Edinburgh, 1882, p. 6). On the other hand, W. P. Paterson writes: 'Nor for the apostolic age was the description of Christ's death as a sacrifice of the nature of a mere illustration. The apostles held it to be a sacrifice in the most literal sense of the word' (HDB iv. 343 f.). One fact stands clearly out. The thought-forms of the Apostolic Church have survived, and are living and apparently necessary thought-forms for modern Christian thinkers. The whole problem of symbolism or typology in Christian teaching will probably receive greater attention in the near future. This will be necessary in order to show how far the detailed correspondences between the precise elements of Jewish ritual and Christian ideas of sacrifice so freely set forth in the apostolic writings afford justification or otherwise for the exegetical methods subsequently adopted by Christian expositors. It is in effect the question whether the minutiae of sacrificial ritual in the ancient economy should be elaborated by them with increasing ingenuity as providentially supplied for literal application as a means of legitimately interpreting the sacrificial work of Christ, or whether the whole Levitical system should be broadly expounded as preparatory because illustrating the sacrificial principle, itself eternal in all true religion, as generally predictive of its final and highest expression in Christ. The latter alternative would have the advantage of co-ordinating the predictive element in sacrificial typology with the same element in prophecy, and applying to it the methods of interpretation which modern critical scholarship has used with success in exhibiting the preparatio evangelica in Messianic prophecies as Christ fulfils them. (These positions are discussed in Cave, Scriptural Doctrine of Sacrifice, pp. 131-173; HDB iv. 348; Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 2 ff.; A. S. Peake, The Bible, London, 1913, pp. 347-361.) Another feature of the retention by the apostolic writers of the sacrificial symbols is their effective application to the beautiful ethical ritual that was to become characteristic of the worship and service of the Christian life. Everything in Christianity, in both its Godward and its manward activities, is regarded as essentially sacrificial in spirit. Christ's sacrifice of Himself was not only the fulfilment of all preceding types; it was itself a type; it was typical of the presentation to God as an offering well pleasing to Him, 'an odour of a sweet smell,' of the whole body, soul, and spirit of Christian manhood (Ro 15¹⁶, Jude 24). The heart of apostolic teaching was that every Christian was crucified with Christ; he died with Him (Ro 6⁴⁻⁵). But he had also his own cross upon which, as upon an altar, the oblation of his own life was offered; he also was a 'priest unto God,' and it was essential that he should have somewhat to offer. Hence the offering of his body (Ro 12¹), his prayers and his thanksgivings (He 13¹⁵), his good deeds (13¹⁶), his gifts of charity (Ph 4¹⁸), his entire service for others (Ph 2¹⁷), were spoken of as sacrifices after the manner of Christ's offering of Himself. Such sacrifices were acceptable to God and were a means of blessing for men. St. Paul is bold enough to say that his sufferings on behalf of others were means whereby he could 'fill up what is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh on behalf of his body, which is the church' (Col 1⁻⁴). This saying probably reflects in the Christian atmosphere the later Jewish idea of the value of 'the sufferings of the saints.' Its applications in subsequent Christian thought are too subtle and historically too far-reaching for reference here. These and the association of the Eucharist with sacrificial values lie far beyond the limits of apostolic thought both exegetically and historically (cf. T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, London, 1902, p. 307; J. B. Lightfoot, 'The Christian Ministry,' in *Philippian*⁶, London, 1881, pp. 261, 264 f.).

(b) Fulfilment in the death of Christ.—The dominant and, with the slight exception of the secondary applications referred to, the sole concern of the apostolic mind was to relate the sacrificial ideas of the past to the supreme fulfilment of their meaning in the death of Christ. There can be no doubt that the death of Christ was very early regarded in this light; it corresponded to these ideas as antitype to type. Not only was the whole sacrificial worship thought of as in a general sense typical of Christ's perfect offering of Himself, but the correspondence between His death and the different elements of the Levitical system is indicated; e.g. covenant sacrifice (He 9¹⁵); Passover sacrifice (1 Co 5⁷); peace offering (Eph 5⁷); sin offering (Ro 8³, He 13¹¹, 1 P 3¹⁸); sacrifices of the Day of Atonement (He 9¹²⁻²²). The ritual acts of the Jewish system are also regarded as having been repeated in the history of Christ's dying; e.g. the slaying of the spotless lamb (Rev 5⁶ 13³), the sprinkling of blood in the sin offering (He 9¹³⁻²²), and in the covenant sacrifice (1 P 1⁷); the destruction of the victim without the gate (He 13¹³). Moreover, spiritual results are attributed so definitely to the fulfilment in Christ's death of all the suggestions conveyed historically and typically by the ineffective offering continually of animal sacrifices that this event must inevitably issue in—

(c) The abrogation of sacrifice.—In their pre-Christian days the apostolic writers had believed in the efficiency of the Jewish sacrificial system; now they regarded its oblations as of value chiefly because of the witness of these to their own inadequacy. The reality of the inward experience that they had 'redemption in his blood,' access in worship into 'the holiest of all' through the blood of Jesus, reduced their need of the older sacrifices to a vanishing point. Whilst it may be an open question whether the sacrificial systems of either the Jewish or the Græco-Roman religion could have maintained their place as permanent institutions in presence of the growing refinement of taste and the more elevated ideas of God, made familiar in the Platonic or Stoic systems of thought current in the Apostolic Age, yet the sure joys of forgiveness of sin, the newness of life and the privileges of direct communion with God in Christ ultimately made it axiomatic for apostolic teaching that all other sacrifices, Jewish or pagan, were abolished in Christ. His sacrifice was effective because it belonged to a different world—the world of heavenly and eternal realities—from that of the temporary, carnal, and ineffectual offering of material gifts. This transition to ethical and final values in sacrifice was accompanied in apostolic thought by a—

(d) Return to prophetic ideas of sacrifice.—These made the real value of sacrifice to depend upon personal relations between God and man, and upon its voluntary quality. This return was, as we have seen, mediated chiefly by means of the influence of the great prophetic figure of the Suffering Servant of Is 53 (cf. Ac 8³² 31⁸. 26 4⁷¹. 30, He 9²³, 1 P 2²¹⁻²³). It cannot be without significance for the modern mind that sacrificial categories derived from the Levitical order were unable to express fully for the apostolic mind the significance of the sacrificial death of Christ. These were obsolescent and needed the complement and interpretation of the prophetic ideas whose value was permanent. In the recognition of sacrifice as essentially ethical and spiritual the apostolic writers so far anticipated the findings of modern criticism that prophecy, not ceremonial legalism, represented the high-water mark of the religious ideas of Israel. Without implying its priority in time they assumed its priority in value; it was the decline of prophetism and the ascendancy of ritualism which had brought on that night of legalism in later Jewish religion in which the formalism of priest, Pharisee, and scribe, to which apostolic teaching was antithetical, had developed. The exposition of the apostolic meaning of sacrifice has suffered many things, even at the hands of Christian teachers, because the animal victims and not the human servant, law and not prophecy, have given it significance; the OT system of ritual sacrifice has been so fully discussed that the figures of Jeremiah, the suffering Remnant, and the Servant of the Lord, the human forerunners of Christ in sacrificial obedience, have failed in emphasis (cf. G. A. Smith, Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the OT, London, 1901, p. 170 ff.).

SADDUCEES.—The Sadducees were a Jewish sect or party best known by their opposition to the Pharisees.

1. Sources.—Our knowledge of the Sadducees, such as it is, is derived from the following sources: (a) Gospels and Acts; (b) Josephus; (c) Rabbinical writings, mainly Mishna, Tosefta, Sifre, Sifra, and Mechilta (these are all of comparatively late date, but their value is unquestionable as embodying earlier traditions. They record various disputes that took place between Pharisees and Sadducees); (d) Zadokite fragments (these are two fragments discovered quite recently in the Cairo Genizah. They deal with the beliefs and practices of a sect that lived in Damascus probably two centuries B.C., and was clearly Sadducean). Some references to Sadducees are found in various Church Fathers, but they have no independent value. It has to be remarked of the evidence of Josephus that it almost seems that part of what he had to say regarding Pharisees and Sadducees has been lost. In Ant. XIII. v. 9, XVIII. i. 2, he refers to BJ ii., but there we find only a scanty reference to Pharisees and Sadducees, while his notice of the Essenes is full. Further, the tendency of Josephus to bring Jewish parties into line with Greek schools of philosophy detracts somewhat from the value of his account.

2. The name.—The explanation of the name 'Sadducee' has long been a puzzle. Only two views need to be mentioned. (a) It has long been held that the name is derived from a certain priest Zadok. The difficulty has been to identify the Zadok in question. A linguistic difficulty has also been urged, to account for the form Zaddukim from Zadok. This, however, disappears when we find that in the LXX and in Josephus the name is spelt Zaddok. (b) The view in EBi supported by *EB*¹¹ (see art. 'Sadducees') is that the word represents the Persian zandik. In modern Persian zandik means a Zoroastrian, hence an infidel. It is argued that, just as the Greek ἐπικύριος was used by Jews as 'infidel,' the Persian zandik was probably applied to this sect, who, from the standpoint of the Pharisees were little better than infidels, and who further supported the introduction of foreign customs. Further, in the Arabic NT 'Sadducee' is translated zandakiya. It must be admitted that this view is ingenious. Its difficulties are obvious, a chief one being that we cannot argue safely from modern Persian to an ante-Christian usage. Besides, if we are to admit that the Zadokite fragments are Sadducean in character and origin—and this cannot easily be denied—it is beyond doubt that in this case the old and widely held opinion is correct. (For full discussion see W. O. E. Oesterley, The Books of the Apocrypha, their Origin, Teaching, and Contents, London, 1914, p. 132 f.)

3. Opposition to the Pharisees.—That the two parties were hostile is known to all. How precisely and concisely the difference is to be defined is a problem of great difficulty. Our knowledge of the Sadducees in particular is not extensive, and a large portion of it comes from sources that certainly were not sympathetic. Geiger's view that the Sadducees were aristocratic while the Pharisees were democratic is true so far, but does not bring out the fact that their differences were notably theological or give any explanation of those divergences. J. R. Hanne's view that Pharisees and Sadducees carried on the old conflict of prophetism and priestism is attractive, but according to the NT it is the Pharisees who are blinded and enslaved by that ceremonialism and externalism against which prophetism protested. Wellhausen's view that the Pharisees were essentially those devoted to the Law on religious grounds while the Sadducees were essentially a political party has really little evidence in its favour, and all our authorities agree in representing the differences between the two parties as to a great extent doctrinal. (For reference to those views see A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig, 1884, p. 86 f.) Instead of attempting the ambitious task of expressing the differences in any one phrase, we shall do better simply to set down what is known of them as they existed.

(a) Standard of faith and practice.—The fundamental difference between Pharisees and Sadducees was that relating to the supreme arbiter of all disputes. What is the standard? What the final court of appeal? The Sadducees held that it was contained only in the written Law. The Pharisees held that the oral traditions were as authoritative at least as the written Law.

'The Pharisees have delivered to the people from the tradition of the fathers all manner of ordinances not contained in the laws of Moses; for which reason the sect of the Sadducees reject these ordinances; for they affirm that only such laws ought to be observed as are written, while those which are orally delivered from the tradition of the fathers are not binding. And concerning these things great questionings have arisen among them' (Jos. Ant. xiii. x. 6).

All other sources fully bear out the accuracy of this statement, which in a sense is the most important that we have. In its light everything else must be read and where necessary corrected. It explains the negations or Agnosticism of the Sadducean creed: no doctrine that was not clearly taught in the written Law possessed for them validity or certainty. It explains why they were more rigid than the Pharisees in enforcing the penal law (Ant. xiv. iv. 2 f.). It would be misleading to call the Sadducees the Protestants of Judaism, but there is some similarity between their divergence from the Pharisees and the divergence of Protestants from Roman Catholics on the question of authority. In both cases we have an appeal to the written Word alone, as against an appeal to the Word plus traditions, precedents, and ecclesiastical judgments. For the latter the Pharisees claimed the same sort of infallibility as the Roman Church attaches to ex cathedra pronouncements by the pope.

How did this conflict eventuate? In reality there was a clear victory for neither. Pharisaism and Sadduceism in their long discussions affected each other. On the one hand, the complexities of life convinced the Sadducees that cases had to be met for which there was no definite guidance in the written Word, and popular feeling compelled them to fall in with the procedure of the Pharisees (Ant. xviii. i. 4). Still, we may take it, they strove to make all new regulations in harmony with the Word. On the other hand, their insistence on the supreme authority of the Word led to an intensive study of the Word by the Pharisees, who were concerned to show, just as a Roman Catholic is, that the oral tradition was really based upon the Word. Hence the Pharisees won, but only by doing full justice to the Sadducean position.

'The Pharisees won the day ultimately, for they were able to show by subtle exegesis that the oral tradition was based upon the written Law. But, and this is the great point, the Sadducean principle was thus victorious; as a party they went under; but the Pharisees, by adopting the Sadducean principle that nothing is binding that cannot be shown to be in accordance with the written Law, implicitly acknowledged that the Sadducees had been right all along' (Oesterley, op. cit., p. 143).

(b) Providence.—According to Josephus, the Sadducees did not believe in Providence.

While the Pharisees, he tells us, hold that some things in the world happen by the will of Providence, and that other things lie in the power of men, 'the Sadducees take away Providence, and say there is no such thing, and that the events of human affairs are not at its disposal; but they suppose that all our actions are in our own power' (Ant. xiii. v. 9). 'The Sadducees take away Providence entirely, and suppose that God is not concerned in our doing or not doing what is evil; and they say that to act what is good, or what is evil, is at men's own choice, and that the one or the other belongs so to every one, that they may act as they please' (BJ ii. viii. 14).

We cannot admit that this is an accurate account of Sadducean belief. Josephus is here straining the position of the Sadducees into correspondence with the Epicureans and sceptical individualists of Greece. If the Sadducees were the stalwart supporters of the written Word, they could not have held such a view of God and the world. Further, if Josephus is accurate here, passages such as Mt 3⁷ 16¹, Ac 5³⁰ become unintelligible. There it is implied that Sadducees believe in wrath to come, in signs from heaven, in the danger of fighting against God. Again, while Rabbinical writings contain no evidence of any dispute with the Pharisees on this topic—a silence which is very significant—the Zadokite fragments show the Sadducean doctrine of God to be in harmony with OT teaching (see Oesterley, op. cit., p. 145 f.). We conclude that on this topic there was no essential difference between Pharisees and Sadducees. It follows that the popular idea of Sadducees as irreligious and rationalist is as baseless as the idea that all Pharisees were whited sepulchres.

(c) The future life.—It is clear that the Sadducees did not believe in the resurrection of the body (Ac 23⁸). Did they believe in the immortality of the soul? According to Josephus, they did not.

'They take away the belief of the immortal duration of the soul and the punishments and rewards in Hades' (BJ ii. viii. 14).

Oesterley tries to show that in this point also Josephus is untrustworthy. Josephus, he holds rightly enough, does not separate the questions of resurrection and immortality, and represents for his Greek readers, to whom resurrection was an unfamiliar idea, the denial of the one as a denial of the other. This is not improbable in itself, but it is difficult to explain away the agreement on this point between Josephus and Ac 23⁸. 'The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit.' Oesterley very properly connects this usage of 'angel' with Ac 12¹⁵, 'It is his angel.' And he argues that what is meant is that Sadducees did not believe that the departed become angels or spirits (op. cit., p. 147 f.). It is not obvious how he can conclude that probably the Sadducees believed in the immortality of the soul, after admitting that they did not believe in resurrection or in the departed becoming spirits. Probably on this point the Sadducees took Agnostic ground. Their supreme standard being the written Law, it is difficult to see what else they could have done.

(d) Attitude to foreign influences.—In strong contrast to the Pharisees (see art. PHARISEES), the Sadducees were sympathetic to foreign, especially Hellenistic, culture. This contrast between the two parties is surprising. The Sadducees stood for the old truth against the innovations of the Pharisees. The latter were the party of progress. Yet it was the conservative Sadducee who embraced foreign culture with enthusiasm, and the progressive Pharisee who bitterly opposed it. In the history of the conflicts of political and ecclesiastical parties it is no unusual thing to find the opponents apparently exchanging rôles. Often no better explanation can be given than that suggested by Oesterley in this case, 'the innate illogic of human nature' (op. cit., p. 155).

(e) The Messiah.—The Sadducees held that Aaron and his family were the chosen of God from whom Messiah should proceed.

(f) The calendar.—Into this complicated subject we have no occasion to enter. It is sufficient to say that endless disputes were carried on between the two parties as to the correct dates of the feasts, arising from the fact that while the Pharisees reckoned by a lunar year, the Sadducees computed a solar year (see Oesterley, op. cit., p. 150 f.).

4. Position and influence.—In our period the Sadducees were in the position of an aristocracy. 'This doctrine is received but by a few, yet by those still of the greatest dignity' (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 4). Practically they may be identified with the Temple high-priestly caste, though there were priests who were not Sadducees, and no doubt Sadducees who were not priests. The majority of the Temple officials and their relatives constituted the main portion of the sect of the Sadducees (cf. W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter, Berlin, 1903, p. 164 f.). The high priest and the whole Temple cultus still possessed considerable influence. But their power was waning. Various movements tended to diminish it. Essenes rejected the Temple rites almost entirely. Several late Jewish works speak deprecatingly of the present Temple compared with the former. The real religious leader was no longer the priest but the scribe. The facts that the Sadducees were harsh in punishing, and that the upkeep of the Temple was so expensive, tended to make the people favour the party who opposed the Sadducees (cf. Bousset, op. cit., p. 87 i.). With the destruction of the Temple Sadduceism disappeared.

As to the character of the sect our knowledge is too limited to enable any just estimate to be made. According to Josephus, they did not agree too well among themselves.

'The behaviour of the Sadducees one towards another is in some degree wild, and their conversation with those that are of their own party is as barbarous as if they were strangers to them' (BJ II. viii. 14).

Their unpatriotic conduct in Maccabæan times cannot be palliated, and there is reason to fear that worldliness and an eye to the main chance dulled the purity of their devotion to the Law. On the other hand, it is important to remember that the common notion that they were mere politicians and irreligious has absolutely no foundation in the authentic evidence we possess.

5. Attitude to Christianity.—Jesus Himself referred very seldom to the Sadducees; His polemic was directed against the Pharisees. In His protest against their making void the Law by their traditions He was at one with the Sadducees. Yet it was from the Sadducees that the most bitter persecution of Judæan Christianity arose. We know the part played by the Sadducean Sanhedrin in the trial of Jesus. They continued to persecute His disciples (Ac 4¹⁵, 5¹⁷, 23¹⁵). Josephus informs us that they were responsible for the death of James, the brother of the Lord (Ant. XX. ix. 1). There can be little doubt as to the reason for this persecution. It began when Jesus interfered with the prerogatives of the Sanhedrin by expelling the money-changers from the Temple-court. Significant also is the stress laid upon His alleged threat to destroy the Temple. In the rise of a party adhering to Jesus they feared political consequences (Jn 11⁴⁷). They were in power, and they meant to keep it, and anything that threatened to be a danger to their power or to the Temple cultus with which their power was bound up they strove to destroy. That any Sadducees became Christian we are not told. Many of the priests believed (Ac 6⁷), but that is indecisive, as many priests were not Sadducees. But one of the disciples was 'known unto the high priest' (Jn 18¹⁵); a considerable degree of intimacy is implied in this statement, and it is very improbable that a friend of the high priest would be anything but a Sadducee. There is a possibility, then, that the author of the Fourth Gospel was once a Sadducee. One would like to think that the two greatest of NT writers were of Pharisee and Sadducee origin respectively. Both sects had their good points, and both their grave errors. Christianity conserved what was good in both, and offered a higher unity in which their differences were transcended.

SAIL, SAILOR.—See SHIP.

SAINT.—'Saint' in the NT is the English equivalent of ἅγιος, 'holy,' as applied to the individual. It is important to recall the fundamental idea of 'holy,' which is primarily a religious and not an ethical idea (see art. HOLINESS). The man, thing, or place that is holy belongs to God, and is therefore 'separate' from what is profane or common property. What belongs to God partakes of the Divine character; therefore the ethical content of 'saint' is determined by the character attributed to the Divinity to whom the 'saint' belongs, and by the nature of the existing bond. Everywhere in the NT God is One whose heart, purpose, and power towards men are revealed as redeeming love in Jesus Christ. The 'saint' is a 'believer (πιστός) in Christ Jesus' (Eph 1¹, Col 1²), i.e. one who has accepted the gospel of love which constitutes the essential significance of His life, death, and resurrection, along with its corresponding ethical obligations. In other words, 'saint' is the NT equivalent of 'Christian.'

1. The saint is one on whose whole life God has an irresistible claim, which is humbly acknowledged by the individual concerned. This claim receives its most striking admission in such utterances as 'the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me' (Gal 2²⁰); 'ye are not your own; for ye were bought with a price' (1 Co 6²⁰); 'beloved of God, called to be saints' (Ro 1⁷). Under various metaphors, this new and compelling relationship of the 'saint' to God is expressed. Regarded as a criminal on trial, he is 'justified' or 'acquitted' (yet as an act of grace, and not with a verdict of 'not guilty,' Ro 5⁸); as an enemy he is 'reconciled'; as a debtor he is 'forgiven'; as a slave he is either 'redeemed' or admitted to the status of 'son' in the household of God (cf. A. Deissmann, St. Paul, Eng. tr., London, 1913, p. 145). In other words, the saint is 'called' by God, in the sense of receiving not an invitation, but rather a royal summons, expressed in the free gift of an overwhelming love. The NT does not look on 'sainthood' as an adventure which may be presumption, a kind of life for which volunteers are asked, a warfare at our own charges, for which some are constitutionally or temperamentally or by virtue of circumstances unfitted. It is not what we are, or feel ourselves to be, or what we have been, that determines our right to call ourselves 'saints.' Our 'calling' rests on the truth of the character and purpose of God revealed in Jesus Christ. The ethical bearings of this claim upon men properly belong to the art. SANCTIFICATION. It is sufficient to say here that the 'saint' is one who is immediately and obediently responsive to the Spirit of God, the spirit of sonship (Ro 8¹⁵). He is one who is, from the ideal point of view, no longer subject to any external rule or 'law'; from whom no tracts of the world's life are fenced off by any arbitrary or conventional requirement; whose only 'constraint' is the 'love of Christ,' especially as revealed in His Cross (2 Co 5¹⁴); in other words, one who 'possesses the kingdom' (Dn 7²²), accepts the rule of God, and suffers it to bring forth its own fruits in character and moral attitude. The Holy Spirit is the immanent principle of the new life (Ro 8⁴⁴).

2. It should be noted that in the Bible the term 'saint' is never applied to individuals as such. The word is always 'saints.' Only twice is it used in the singular, as applied to persons (Ph 4², Rev 22¹¹), where, however, the 'saint' is regarded as a member of a community. Jesus alone in the NT is called ὁ ἄγιος τοῦ θεοῦ (e.g. Mk 1²⁴). This is important as establishing a link between the OT and the NT conceptions. In the OT 'saints' are members of the true Israel, at first of the nation, and latterly of the pious remnant. In the NT 'church' and 'saints' are used interchangeably in the greetings of letters: the former in Thessalonians, Corinthians, Galatians, Philemon; the latter in Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians. Just as in the OT the covenant is made with the nation, or with Abraham as representing the nation yet to be, so with the NT the Church or community of believers is the recipient of the 'new covenant in my blood.' This is not equivalent to putting the Church first, and the individual experiences of its members last. It simply means that the present experience and future realization of 'salvation' by the individual was to the first Christians or 'saints' inconceivable, except in so far as it involved a mutual relationship with others in the sight of God. Saintliness is an impossibility unless it contains as its essence an experience of God's love common to all which finds expression in common worship, and certain corresponding mutual obligations of loving thought and ministry towards others. The members of the Church have been individually justified, reconciled, forgiven, and have entered upon a new relationship of trust and freedom with God; but the spirit that has accomplished this can have no free course in the development of individual life and character, except in so far as it expresses itself in a community where Christ is head of every man (1 Co 11³). 'We, who are many, are one body in Christ, and severally members one of another' (Ro 12⁵). The saints in the NT as in the OT receive a 'kingdom' (Dn 7²⁷), a social gift too great for one pair of hands to hold, or for one single mind to conceive. We must comprehend 'with all saints' (Eph 3¹⁵) the dimensions of the love of God. No Christian apart from others can perfectly fulfil the moral and spiritual ideal, or attain to 'eternal life.' A more common description in the NT of the kingdom which is the possession of the saints is 'inheritance' (see art. HEIR). Christians are 'heirs' of eternal life (Tit 3⁷), and also of the 'kingdom' (1 Co 6⁹⁻¹⁰ 15⁵⁰). The mutual relationship that exists as binding the members of the Church together is increasingly based in the NT on the response to certain moral obligations, which are directly involved in the experience of salvation (Eph 5⁵, Col 1²).

It will thus become readily apparent that with the new conception of God revealed in the Cross of Christ these two aspects of NT sainthood issue in the result that moral obligation in the Christian life is not merely reinforced, but deepened and enriched. The enervating sense of impossibility, and the facile acceptance of a two-fold standard of living, so interwoven with the popular use of the word 'saint,' are really the still persistent product of the monastic ideal, and are seen to be, what they really are, a fundamental denial of the Christian faith, which is essentially the acceptance of a filial relationship to God. The moral activities of the saint are rooted in a 'patience' which obeys the voice of illumined conscience, and humbly believes in Jesus at all costs (Rev 14¹²; cf. Col 1¹⁰).

SALAMIS (Σαλαμίς).—Salamis, the most important city of ancient Cyprus, was the first place visited by St. Paul and Barnabas in their first missionary journey (Ac 13⁵). Situated at the eastern extremity of the island, about equidistant from Cilicia in the north and Syria in the east, it was the emporium of the wide and fertile plain of Salaminia, which stretched inward between two mountain ranges as far as Nicosia, the present capital of Cyprus. Once a centre of Mycenaean civilization, and afterwards colonized by the Greeks, Salamis became the arena of a long conflict between an Eastern and a Western culture, Phœnicia and Hellas here contending with and profoundly influencing one another.

The city possessed a fine harbour, near which the Athenians defeated the Phœnicians, the allies of Persia, in 449 B.C. The same waters witnessed the greatest sea-fight of ancient times, in which Demetrius the son of Antigonus achieved in 306 B.C. a brilliant victory over Ptolemy Soter and thus wrested the island from him. But after a few years Cyprus was again in the possession of the Egyptian king, and it was probably during his reign that Jews began to settle in the island, to which a letter is said to have been sent by the Roman Senate on behalf of this people about 139 B.C. (1 Mac 15²³). Their numbers were doubtless greatly increased in the time of Herod the Great, when 'Cæsar made him a present of half the copper mines in Cyprus, and committed the care of the other half to him' (Jos. Ant. XVI. iv. 5). Many Jews must have made their home in Salamis, where Barnabas (himself a Cypriote, Ac 4³⁶) and St. Paul found synagogues, in which they 'proclaimed the word of God' (Ac 13⁵). The historian has recorded no incidents or results of this visit. After the 'sharp contention' of St. Paul and Barnabas at the beginning of the second missionary tour, the latter went back to labour in his native island, taking his cousin Mark with him (15³⁹). During a widespread insurrection in the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 117), the Jews of Salamis, grown numerous and wealthy, rose and massacred their fellow-citizens, and the once populous city became almost a desert. 'Hadrian, afterwards Emperor, landed on the island, and marched to the assistance of the few inhabitants who had been able to act on the defensive. He defeated the Jews, expelled them from the island, to whose beautiful coasts no Jew was ever after permitted to approach. If one were accidentally wrecked on the inhospitable shore, he was instantly put to death' (H. H. Milman, Hist. of the Jews, London, 1866, ii. 421). Devastated by earthquakes in the time of Constantius and Constantine, Salamis was restored by Constantius II. and named Constantia. Epiphanius, the writer on the heretical sects, was its archbishop A.D. 367-402. The story that Barnabas suffered martyrdom there is a late legend. His relics, with a copy of the First Gospel, were 'discovered' in A.D. 477, and the Emperor Zeno consequently made the Cyprian Church independent of the patriarchate of Antioch. The site of the ancient city is now covered by sandhills, its place being taken by Famagusta, 2½ miles S., where there is a good natural harbour.

SALMONE (Σαλμώνη; Strabo usually writes Σαμώνιον, sometimes Σαλμώνιον; Pliny, Sammonium).—Salmone is a promontory in the east of Crete (Ac 27⁷). It is uncertain whether the modern Cape Sidero, in the extreme N.E., or Cape Plaka, about 7 miles farther S., was so named. The map of Crete in *EBR*¹ gives the latter. It has been surmised that the ancient usage itself varied. On passing Cnidos, the S.E. corner of Asia Minor, St. Paul's Alexandrian ship was beaten out of her course, which would have taken her straight to Cythera, north of Crete, and obliged to bear S.W. by S. till she came over against (κατά) Salmone, from which point she could work slowly westward under the lee of the island. The season was autumn, during which the Etesian (north-west) winds blow in the Aegean for forty days, beginning at the rise of the dog-star (Herodotus, vi. 140, vii. 168); 'perflant his diebus, quos Etesias vocant' (Pliny, HN ii. 47). Aristotle describes them as μῆζιν ἔχοντες τῶν τε ἀπὸ τῆς ἄρκτου φερομένων καὶ ζεφύρων (de Mundo, iv. 15).

SALT (ἅλας; also ἄλας, a form which is rare except in LXX and NT; adj. αλυκός).—This condiment of food was in general use among the civilized nations of antiquity. From the religious significance which it had for the primitive mind, and especially its association with sacrificial meals, it became—and still is throughout the East—a symbol of guest-friendship and fidelity; from its purifying and antiseptic properties, an image of the power of good men to preserve the moral soundness of society (Mt 5¹³); and from its piquancy, a suggestion of the relish which wit and wisdom give to talk which would otherwise be insipid. St. Paul exhorts the Colossians to let their speech be 'seasoned with salt' (ἅλατι ᾠρημένους, Col 4⁶), and the salt which he had in mind possessed finer properties than the ἅλας and sal of Greek and Latin writers.

Attic 'salt' was Attic wit. Pliny (HN xxxi. 7) says: 'The higher enjoyments of life could not exist without the use of salt; indeed, so highly necessary is this condiment to mankind, that the pleasures of the mind can be expressed by no better term than the word salt (sales), such being the name given to all effusions of wit.' The meaning of the word is usually indicated by the context in which it occurs: 'Sale vero et facetiis Cæsar . . . vicit omnes' (Cic. de Offic. i. xxxvii. 133); 'facetiarum quidam lepos quo, tanquam sale, perspergatur omnis oratio' (Cic. de Orat. i. 34); 'sal niger,' i.e. biting wit, sarcasm (Hor. Ep. ii. 60).

St. Paul was of course familiar with this classical 'salt,' which at its best was intellectual acuteness and sparkling wit, but which easily degenerated into ευτραπεία (Eph 5⁴). There was no lack of it in his university town of Tarsus. But as a Christian he takes the word—like χαρις, ἀγάπη and many another term—and gives it a new and better connotation. He eliminates from it the bitterness of sarcasm and adds to it the essential grace of Christianity. Without making it less intellectual, he makes it more spiritual. As a lover of good talk, he is far from deprecating what is stimulating and pungent. He desiderates all the old readiness 'to answer each one' (Col 4^{6b}), but the answer will no longer be the repartee which seeks a brilliant personal victory; it will be the response of the heart that loves still more than of the mind that glitters. If the new meaning of the metaphor is to be determined by the context in which it is employed—'walk in wisdom,' 'let your speech be always with grace'—salt becomes the symbol of a rare combination of virtues. A spiritual wisdom and Christian grace, at once quickening the gifts of Nature and hallowing the charms of culture, are to replace pagan wit as the savour of that human intercourse which is the feast of reason and the flow of souls.

SALUTATIONS.—Salutations are friendly greetings, literary and otherwise, which Christianity took over from the social life of antiquity, but filled with a new content of Divine love and made a symbol of a common brotherhood in Christ. Of literary greetings those in Ro 16³⁻¹⁵ are the most striking and the most puzzling. Here are twenty-five persons and four house-societies, each apparently well known to St. Paul, and characterized by him with a particularity as brief as it is discriminating. This by one who had never been in Rome is quite impossible, it is said. Jülicher says: 'One must presuppose a kind of popular emigration from the Pauline congregations in the East to Rome, in order to find so many friends of the apostle in Rome.'* But there was a constant movement to Rome from all over the Empire, as well as a returning tide, and the Apostle with his rare knowledge of societies in Asia and Europe could easily have a score of personal friends in the capital, as well as an intimate knowledge of the Church there. David Schulz sought the solution in Ephesus, to which Church these words were directed.† Spitta claims that the Epistle to Rome is really two Epistles, the second being written from Spain later, after St. Paul knew the Romans from residence.‡ But this presupposes a second imprisonment—a point in dispute—and it is not wise to assume it unless necessary. The Acta Pauli (ed. C. Schmidt, Heidelberg, 1905) connects the death of St. Paul with the imprisonment of which we know. But in every city in which St. Paul worked there were Jews and Christians personally known to him who were now in Rome; cf. Juv. Sat. iii. 62 ff., and Strabo, xiv. p. 675 (ed. Amsterdam, 1707, p. 993), where he speaks of the city 'full of Tarseans and Alexandrians.'

K. Erbes, in a suggestive article, thinks that, as St. Paul's journey to Rome was well known in the city, many disciples met him at Forum Appii or Tres Tabernæ, and gave him full particulars concerning the Roman congregation. Even before, brethren in Rome in deep sympathy had written to him, so that he was familiar with disciples there. In the Peter-Paul Acts (ed. R. A. Lipsius, Leipzig, 1891, p. 180f.), it is said that St. Paul received in Malta a friendly letter from Rome by two messengers, and this occurs in the oldest part of these Acts. The greetings in Ro 16 may be a historical reminder of this letter. Christians also may have gone ahead to Rome from St. Paul's various Churches to help and plead for him. How much Christians did in this way for lesser men we know from Lucian, de Morte Peregrini, 13, and Ignatius, ad Smyrn. 10, and Erbes gives interesting parallels between the Epistles of Ignatius and St. Paul. The Greek names in these greetings—there are also Latin—confirm what we know from other sources, that most of the members in Rome were Greek. In the Bulletino dell' Istituto di Corrispondenza archeologica, Rome, 1881, p. 131 ff., H. Dessau gives eighty-one names in families in Ostia in which NT ones often recur. It can easily be proved by inscriptions in the time of Claudius and Nero that all the names in Ro 16 were Roman names. Erbes thinks that these were actual salutations sent to Rome by the Apostle, occasioned perhaps by these embassies and letters; and that this beautiful message covering with renown these humble and faithful workers might not be lost, they inserted it in the most appropriate place in the Epistle to the Romans.§

The religious interest, however, so predominant in the NT that salutations like those in Ro 16 are rare. They are swallowed up in the ever-recurring prayer (in which, perhaps, greeting also is not wanting) that the grace of God or of Christ may be with the Christians. And the community or brotherhood seems to supersede the personal element. 'The churches of Asia salute you'

(1 Co 16¹⁹); 'All the brethren salute you' (v.²⁰). If Aquila and Prisca salute, 'the church that is in their house,' the society usually meeting in their triclinium or dining-room is immediately brought in (v.¹⁹). Again, 'All the saints salute you' (2 Co 13¹²), where the word 'saints' is to be interpreted as equivalent—without losing its religious significance—to our word 'members.' This universality of Christian interest, or inclusiveness of brotherhood, appears often: 'Salute every saint in Christ Jesus' (Ph 4²¹); 'The brethren which are with me salute you' (v.²¹), where all the Christians who were wont to assemble in prison or in his hired rooms (Ac 28³⁰) to console St. Paul, or were actually present when he dictated this letter, join in his salutation; 'All the saints salute you, especially they that are of Caesar's household' (Ph 4-), where we are reminded of what recent research in inscriptions has shown, not to speak of the literary evidence—that converts, and some of them of high rank, were in the Imperial Court, besides many in the city of the highest circles.* Sometimes St. Paul is so anxious to bring home to the societies his loving greetings that he takes the pen from the amanuensis and adds these in his own hand (1 Co 16²¹, Col 4¹⁸). In the form 'All that are with me salute thee' (Tit 3¹⁵) there is nothing unusual, as the same appears in the papyri.† The Christian note, of course, is peculiar: 'Salute them that love us in faith' (ib.). In the midst of other associations, in and for Christian society alone St. Paul lived and worked. On account of a danger of a false Judaizing, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews brings in the Christian leaders in a unique way. The democracy of Christianity is seen both in the inscriptions or opening words of the Epistles and in the greetings at the close, where mention of ministers or officers is generally absent, in a way impossible after A.D. 80 or later. But in Hebrews we have: 'Salute all them that have the rule over you [better, 'all your leaders,' ἡγουμένους], and all the saints' (13²⁴). The author is determined, as in desperation over theological and other (v.⁴) dangers (cf. the Epistles of Ignatius), to refer the believers again (see v.⁷) to their guides and other helpers, of whose correctness he is convinced. Even their salutations must first be given to them. The personal touch is in 2 Jn¹ and more remotely in 3 Jn¹⁴. James, 2 Peter, 1 John, and Jude omit greetings at the end.

Of greetings in practice, the kiss, well known in Oriental lands, is urged five times, besides being mentioned in Ac 20³⁷—'Salute one another with a holy kiss' (1 Co 16²⁰, 2 Co 13¹², Ro 16¹⁶, 1 Th 5²⁸ ['all the brethren'], and 1 P 5¹⁴ ['Salute one another with a kiss of love']). The thought at the back of it in ancient folklore was the communion of soul with soul, or the forming of a covenant, for the soul flows out of the nose or mouth. This significance held long in magic. When the sorcerer attempts to awaken the dead by a kiss, he will pour his own soul into him (cf. 2 K 4³⁴), as Jahweh makes man a living soul by breathing (Gn 2⁷).‡ In ancient Rome the kiss was a sign of family relationship, so that there developed a formal law of the kiss (ius osculi) between relatives, going as far as those between whom marriage was forbidden. It was also a sign of peace or agreement. The salutation by the kiss was taken over under Christianity as a matter of course, but, like everything else, purified and sanctified. References in the NT presuppose an assembly for worship, where the Epistles are read, the kiss being not yet perhaps a formal part of the service, but a general practice on the ground of brotherly love in religious communion. Whether in NT times the kiss was promiscuous between the sexes cannot be answered certainly, though it is risky to argue from later custom that it was.* The separation of the sexes in the assemblies, the strict subordination of women amounting to a depreciation on the part of St. Paul (1 Ti 2⁹⁻¹⁵), and general customs among both Jews and Greeks, make it exceedingly unlikely that the kiss was given promiscuously. If so, it was, as Cabrol says, a sign of the purity of morals among Christians. But later, in the 2nd and 3rd centuries, with the growth of larger freedom and self-confidence, the kiss became more general. It has been argued, though on slight grounds, that it was a custom in the Jewish synagogues.†

R. Seeberg thinks, from the ancient custom of the kiss in the Lord's Supper service, and from the passages on the kiss in the Epistles, that the Epistles especially (not so much the Gospels) were read in the evening service, to which in the early Church the Supper was limited, and that the kiss as a part of the worship took place after that reading. 'So the writer of the Epistles reckons that his Epistle will be read in that evening service, in which worship and sociability flow together, so that he tries to prepare hearts for the reception of the Lord, whom they await in the Supper.' Besides, in 1 Co 16²², after the kiss of v.²⁰ comes the Marana tha ('The Lord is coming' [not, Maran atha, 'The Lord has come']) and the benediction, and we know from the Didache that the Marana tha was an element of the oldest liturgy of the Supper; consequently St. Paul in this passage connects an exhortation to the kiss with the Supper liturgy. He therefore expects that his Epistle will be read immediately before the Supper. The Lord's Supper kiss at the end of different NT Epistles proves that these Epistles are intended to be read in the evening public worship.‡ This is an ingenious and suggestive interpretation. Unfortunately, we have not sufficient light to estimate it.

As we go into the post-Apostolic Age, we find the kiss a secure part of public worship. 'When we have ceased from prayer, we salute one another with a kiss. There is then brought to the presiding brother bread and a cup of wine' (Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 65). Athenagoras quotes an extra-canonical Scripture warning against an abuse of the kiss, saying that 'the kiss, or rather the salutation, should be given with the greatest care; since, if there be mixed with it the least defilement of thought, it excludes us from eternal life' (Legat. 32). Clement of Alexandria also recognizes abuses which crept in, and refers to the resounding kisses in church which made suspicions and evil reports among the heathen, and claims that the kiss must be 'mystic' (Pæd. iii. 11). Tertullian presupposes omission of the kiss when fasting, but declaims against the omission (except on Good Friday), believing that the kiss of brotherhood is a part of every true prayer (de Orat. 18). On the other hand, he refers to the embarrassment the custom causes in the case of an unbelieving husband who is unwilling for his wife 'to meet any one of the brethren to exchange a kiss' (ad Uxor. ii. 4). Origen refers the custom of the kiss after prayer to Ro 16¹⁶ and other Scripture, and says that the kiss must be holy, chaste, and sincere, an expression of peace and simplicity (ad Rom. x. 33 [Migne, PG xiv. 1283]). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 11) insisted on order in this part of the service; the clergy to kiss the bishop, the laity the men, the women the women, going back in this last particular to the probable use of the Apostolic Church.

SALVATION, SAVE, SAVIOUR.—1. Words referring to salvation in the NT outside the Gospels (for Gospels see DCG ii. 552-557, 571-573).—σωζεν ('to save') is generally used for spiritual deliverance. The exceptions in the Acts are 4⁹ 14⁹, where it is used for healing from bodily infirmity, and 27²⁰. 31, where it is used for deliverance from shipwreck. In the other passages in the Acts (2⁴⁰. 47 4¹² 11¹⁴ 15¹. 11 16³⁰. 31) it is used to denote spiritual deliverance. The link between the two meanings may be seen in the quotation from JI 3⁵ (Heb.; 2²² Eng.) cited in Ac 2²¹; cf. Ro 10¹³. σωζεν refers to the deliverance from Egypt in Jude⁵; to deliverance from death in He 5⁷; to spiritual deliverance in Ro 5⁹. 10 8²⁴ 9²⁷ 10⁹. 13 11¹⁴. 28 1 Co 1¹⁸. 21 3¹⁵ 5⁷ 7¹⁶ 9²² 10³³ 15², 2 Co 2¹⁵, Eph 2⁵. 8, 1 Th 2¹⁶, 2 Th 2¹⁰, 1 Ti 1¹⁵ 2⁴. 15 4⁸, 2 Ti 1⁹ 1¹⁴, Tit 3⁵, He 7²⁵, Ja 1²¹ 2¹⁴ 4¹² 5²⁰, 1 P 3²¹ 4¹⁸, Jude²³. In Ja 5¹⁵ ('the prayer of faith shall save him that is sick') σωζεν is interpreted of bodily healing by many commentators; but the general context of a chapter which as a whole relates to what is spiritual, the immediate context associating forgiveness of sins with the particular command ('and, if he have committed sins, it shall be forgiven him'), and the use of the word 'healed' in the next verse to denote healing from sin, concur to indicate that here also the word, as usually in the Epistles, means spiritual deliverance. Any difficulty in understanding ἐγείρω in 'the Lord shall raise him up' of spiritual succour is less than that of explaining 'the prayer of faith shall save' of bodily healing in this context.

σωτήρ ('saviour'), used in the Gospels for God (Lk 1⁴) and Christ (Lk 2¹¹, Jn 4⁴²), similarly in the Acts and the Epistles refers to God in 1 Ti 1²³ 4¹⁰, Tit 1³ 2¹⁰ 3⁴, Jude²⁵; and to Christ in Ac 3²¹ 13²³, Eph 5²³ ('the saviour of the body'), Ph 3²⁰, 2 Ti 1¹⁰, Tit 1⁴ 2¹³ 3⁵, 2 P 1¹. 11 2²⁰ 3¹⁸, 1 Jn 4¹⁴.

σωτηρία ('salvation'), used in the Gospels for spiritual deliverance in general, but connected with the idea of salvation through the Messiah (Lk 1⁶⁹. 71. 77 10⁹, Jn 4²²), occurs for the deliverance from Egypt in Ac 7²⁵, for deliverance from death in shipwreck in Ac 27³⁴, for the deliverance of Noah in He 11⁷. It is used for spiritual deliverance in Ac 4¹² 13²⁶. 47 16¹⁷, Ro 1¹⁶ 10¹. 10 11¹¹ 13¹¹, 2 Co 1⁶. 7¹⁰, Eph 1¹³, Ph 1¹⁹. 28 2¹², 1 Th 5⁸. 9, 2 Th 2¹³, 2 Ti 2¹⁰ 3¹⁵ He 1¹⁴ 2³. 10 5⁹ 6⁹ 9²⁸, 1 P 1⁵. 9. 10 2². 2 P 3¹⁵, Jude³. Eleven (Ro 10¹ 13¹¹, Ph 1¹⁸ 2¹², 1 Th 5⁸. 9, 2 Ti 2¹⁰, He 1¹⁴ 5⁹ 9²⁸, 1 P 1⁵ 2²) of these instances refer to the future and ultimate salvation; the other instances refer, at any rate partly, to the salvation in this life. In Rev 7¹⁰ ('Salvation unto our God which sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb') 12¹⁰ ('Now is come the salvation, and the power, and the kingdom of our God, and the authority of his Christ') 19¹ ('Salvation, and glory, and power, belong to our God'), there is a special way of using the word.

σωτήριον ('salvation'), used in the Gospels for spiritual deliverance through the Incarnation (Lk 2³⁰ 3⁶), occurs in St. Paul's speech in Ac 28²⁸ for spiritual deliverance through the Incarnation, and in Eph 6¹⁷ for spiritual deliverance, the future being largely in view. In Lk 2³⁰ 3⁶, Ac 28²⁸ it is from Is 40⁵ 52¹⁰ (LXX); in Eph 6¹⁷ it is from Is 59¹⁷ (LXX).

σωτήριος ('bringing salvation') occurs in Tit 2¹¹ for spiritual deliverance through the Incarnation.

2. Connexion of NT words with OT words.—

The analogous words in the OT are used for external deliverance, for a combination of external and spiritual deliverance, and very rarely for spiritual deliverance simply. The new feature in the NT is the frequent application to spiritual deliverance simply and to the supreme spiritual deliverance through the Incarnation. In the OT the verb יָשָׁא (yasha'), meaning etymologically 'width,' 'spaciousness,' 'freedom from constraint,' usually denotes external deliverance; see, e.g., Dt 20⁴, Jg 3³¹, 1 S 10²⁷, Ps 28⁹, Hos 1⁷; it denotes spiritual deliverance in Ezk 36²³ 37²³. The noun יִשְׁוּאָה (y'shu'ah) is used for external deliverance in, e.g., Ex 14¹³, 1 S 14⁴⁵, Ps 3⁸, Jon 2⁹, for the cognate sense of welfare or prosperity in Job 30¹⁵, and for a combination of external and spiritual deliverance in, e.g., Is 12². 3 45¹⁷ 49⁶ 51⁶. 8 52⁷. 10 56¹ Ps 67² 93², though possibly some of these are instances of spiritual deliverance simply. The noun יִשְׁוּאָה (t'shu'ah) is used for external deliverance in, e.g., Jg 15¹⁸, 1 S 11⁸. 13, Ps 37³⁹, and for a combination of external and spiritual deliverance in Is 45¹⁷ 46¹³, Ps 40¹⁰. 16 51¹⁴, though possibly in some of these instances for spiritual deliverance simply. The noun יָשָׁא (yesh'a) is used for external deliverance in, e.g., Hab 3¹⁸, Ps 12⁵ 18³⁵. 48, for the cognate sense of preserved security in Job 5⁴. 11, and for a combination of external and spiritual deliverance in, e.g., Mic 7⁷, Hab 3¹⁸, Ps 24⁵ 25⁵ 51¹², though possibly Ps 51¹² may refer to spiritual deliverance simply. The noun מֹשָׁאָה (mosha'ah) occurs in Ps 68²⁰ only: it there denotes, at any rate chiefly, external deliverance. (For the use of the Hebrew words see S. R. Driver, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel, 1890, pp. 90, 91 [21913, pp. 118, 119]; *The Parallel Psalter*², 1904, pp. 455, 456.)

3. Idea of salvation.—A characteristic thought of the NT is that salvation is past, present, and future. This may be seen with regard both to the actual words relating to salvation and to different expressions of the idea. Christians are spoken of as those who have been saved, and who are in possession of a salvation which they can use or neglect: 'By grace have ye been saved,' 'By grace have ye been saved through faith' (Eph 2⁵. 8); 'According to his mercy he saved us' (Tit 3⁵); 'How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?' (He 2⁹). Yet salvation is also future. As a helmet 'the hope of salvation' is to be 'put on' (1 Th 5⁸). 'Now is salvation nearer to us than when we first believed' (Ro 13¹¹). Those who now have been justified by Christ's blood have yet to be saved through Him from the wrath (5⁹); and those who have been reconciled to God through Christ's death have yet to be saved by His life (5¹⁰). Christians are bidden to work out their salvation with fear and trembling (Ph 2¹²); salvation is said to be ready to be revealed in the last time (1 P 1⁵), although it is now received by a foretaste (1⁹). Christians are at some future time to inherit salvation (He 1¹⁴). While Christ has been once for all offered to bear the sins of many, He has yet to appear for salvation to those who wait for Him (9²⁸). The same three aspects—a past gift, a present possession, a future inheritance—are to be traced also in regard to eternal life, redemption, the gift of the Holy Ghost, and the Kingdom of Heaven, phrases which afford different expressions of the idea of salvation. In the Fourth Gospel eternal life is the present possession of the believer (3³⁶ 5⁴ 6⁴ 6⁵⁴ 12⁵⁰ 17²). This is indicated not only by the use of the present tense, but also by that which is asserted about eternal life. 'To believe, to hear the word, to eat the flesh of the Son of Man, to drink His blood, to be growing in the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, are all acts and conditions possible and realized in the present life. But the present possession is also a step towards future attainment. This is hinted at in 6^{40, 44}, and more distinctly shown in 4^{14, 36} 6⁷ 12²⁵. Similarly in 1 Jn. the present character of eternal life is indicated in 3¹⁵ 5^{11, 12, 13, 20}; the futurity of it is suggested in 2²⁵, and a link between the two is hinted at in 1². In the rest of the NT the idea of what is future preponderates. Ac 13^{46, 48}, Ro 6^{22, 23}, 1 Ti 1¹⁶ 6¹² are ambiguous; in Mt 19¹⁶ (Mk 10¹⁷, Lk 18¹³), Mt 19²⁹ 25⁴⁶, Mk 10³⁰, Lk 10²⁵ 18³⁰ Ro 2⁷, Tit 1² 3⁷, Jude²¹ the phrase refers to the future. 'Redemption' is used in Lk 1⁶⁸ 2³⁸ and 'redeem' in Lk 24¹ for the redemption to be accomplished by the Messiah, and 'redemption' is used in Lk 21²³ for that which is to accompany the coming of the Son of Man after our Lord's earthly ministry 'with power and great glory.' In the Epistles redemption denotes a past work in Ro 3²⁴, He 9¹⁻¹⁵, 1 P 1¹⁸; a present possession in 1 Co 1³⁰, Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴; a future gift in Ro 8²³, Eph 1¹⁴ 4³⁰. In Tit 2¹⁴ the word is ambiguous. He 11²⁵ is irrelevant. The gift of the Holy Ghost is spoken of as past, present, and to come. It has already been received in 1 Co 12¹³, Gal 4⁶, Ja 4⁵, 1 Jn 3⁴. It is a present possession in 1 Co 3¹⁶ 6¹³, Eph 2¹⁸. It is a future inheritance in Ro 8²³, 2 Co 1²² 5⁵, Eph 1¹⁴. Similarly, the Kingdom of Heaven or of God, which is the sphere in which salvation and redemption and the gift of the Holy Ghost are received, is spoken of sometimes as now existing, sometimes as to be established in the future. In Ro 14^{16, 17}, 1 Co 4^{19, 20}, Col 1¹³ 4¹¹ it is viewed as present; in 1 Co 6^{9, 10} 15⁵⁰, Gal 5²¹, Eph 5⁵, 2 Th 1⁵, 2 P 1¹¹, Rev 11⁵ 12¹⁰ it is regarded as future. In the Gospels the present character is indicated in Mt 3-4¹⁻¹⁰ 11^{11, 12} 12²⁸ 13, Mk 1¹⁵, Lk 9^{27, 60, 62} 10¹¹. signs of its future character are in Mt 7²¹ 13⁴¹⁻⁴³ 18^{3, 9} 19²⁸ 25³⁴ 26²⁹ Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁷ 14²⁵, Lk 13^{28, 29} 19¹¹ 21³¹ 22^{18, 29, 30}. There is thus a consistent view throughout the NT in accordance with which salvation is regarded sometimes as already accomplished, sometimes as a present state, sometimes as an inheritance to be received in the future. In regard to the salvation thus represented in the NT as an abiding and growing possession the following points may be noticed.

(a) The deliverance which gives admission to the state of salvation is everywhere regarded as accomplished by Christ. In Ac 2²¹⁻²⁸ 'the Lord' of whom Joel (3⁵ Heb.; 2²⁸ Eng.) declared that through calling on His name there should be salvation is identified with Christ. In St. Peter's speech in Ac 4¹² it is said that 'in none other' than 'Jesus Christ of Nazareth' 'is there salvation; for neither is there any other name under heaven that is given among men whereby we must be saved.' In the speech of St. Peter and the apostles in 5³¹ it is said that Jesus 'did God exalt with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins.' In St. Peter's speech at the Council of Jerusalem in 15¹¹ belief is expressed 'that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we [Jews] shall be saved, even as they [Gentiles].' 'Our Lord Jesus Christ gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us out of this present evil world' (Gal 1⁴). 'In Christ Jesus' the Gentiles 'that once were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ'; and His work of peace was such as to 'reconcile them both [Jews and Gentiles] in one body unto God through the cross' (Eph 2¹³⁻¹⁸). 'The Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory' is 'a saviour' (Ph 3²¹). 'Our Saviour Christ Jesus . . . abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel' (2 Ti 1¹⁰). He is described as 'our Saviour' (Tit 1⁴ 2¹³ 3⁶), as 'the author of' 'salvation' (He 2¹⁰), and 'Saviour'

(2 P 1^{1, 11} 2²⁰ 3²⁻¹³), and as 'the Saviour of the world' (1 Jn 4¹⁴).

(b) The means of the deliverance was notably Christ's passion and death. According to St. Peter's speech in Ac 2²³ it was 'by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God' that Christ was 'delivered up,' a fact implying the purpose accomplished by His death. According to St. Paul's speech at Ephesus (Ac 20²⁸) Christ 'purchased with his own blood' 'the church of God.' 'The word of the cross is' 'the power of God' 'unto us which are being saved' (1 Co 1¹⁸). 'Christ crucified' is 'unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks,' 'the power of God, and the wisdom of God' (1^{23, 24}). It was part of His work that 'by the grace of God he should taste death for every man' (He 2⁹). That 'he became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation' is mentioned in close connexion with His sufferings (5⁹). 'With precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ,' were men 'redeemed' (1 P 1^{18, 19}). He 'loosed us from our sins by his blood' (Rev 1⁵). To Him described as the Lamb it is said, 'Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation' (5⁹). 'They which come out of the great tribulation . . . washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb' (7¹⁴).

(c) The deliverance thus accomplished was from sin. In the speeches of St. Peter and St. Paul in the Acts, and in the words addressed to St. Paul at his conversion by Christ, the work of Christ is constantly associated with remission of sins (Ac 2³⁸ 3¹⁹ 5³¹ 10⁴³ 13³⁸ 26¹⁸; cf. Rev 1⁵).

(d) The deliverance was also from the penalties of sin. 'Being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from the wrath of God through him' (Ro 5⁹). He 'abolished death' (2 Ti 1¹⁰). It was a purpose of His incarnation that 'through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage' (He 2^{14, 15}).

(e) The reception of the deliverance is made possible by faith. 'A man is justified by faith apart from the works of the law' (Ro 3²⁸; cf. 5¹). 'A man is not justified by the works of the law save through faith in Jesus Christ' (Gal 2¹⁶). 'By grace have ye been saved through faith' (Eph 2⁸).

(f) The faith which enables the Christian to lay hold on the deliverance includes life and action. In the teaching of St. Paul that which 'availeth' is 'faith working through love' (Gal 5⁶), and 'faith' in St. Paul's writings habitually means more than mere intellectual belief and includes the moral attitude of surrender to God. St. James differentiates the faith which has not works, and doth not profit, and is dead, and is like the belief of the demons, and is barren (2¹⁴⁻²⁰), from the faith which is needed in prayer that is to be effectual and which makes those who have it rich (1⁶ 2⁵ 5¹⁵).

(g) The salvation is far more than deliverance. It affords not only escape from the penalties of sin and from sin itself, but also admission to union with Christ, so that the saved are enabled to participate in His risen and ascended life. 'All we who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death. We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life'; 'If we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him'; 'Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus' (Ro 6^{4, 8, 11}). 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?' (1 Co 10¹⁶); 'In one Spirit were we all baptized into one body'; 'Ye are the body of Christ, and severally members thereof' (12¹³ -). 'Ye are all sons of God, through faith, in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ did put on Christ. . . . Ye all are one man in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁷, 28). 'That Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith' (Eph 3¹⁷). 'Having been buried with him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with him through faith in the working of God' (Col 2¹²). 'If then ye were raised together with Christ'; 'ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God' (3¹⁻³). Thus the life of salvation which the Christian lives is a life in which he has been brought into Christ, is alive in Christ, partakes of Christ's body and blood, is united in Christ to other Christians, and has Christ dwelling in his heart.

(h) So far as the possibility of receiving is concerned the life of salvation is open to all men, since 'the living God . . . is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe' (1 Ti 4¹⁰), though this must not be pushed to a denial of the correlative NT truth that there are possibilities of rejection and that there is eternal punishment as well as eternal life.

(i) The power of the salvation in some sense extends beyond man so as to affect the universe. 'All things' are eventually to be 'subjected unto' 'the Son' (1 Co 15²⁸); it is the purpose of the Father 'to sum up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things upon the earth' (Eph 1¹⁰), and that 'in him should all the fulness dwell'; and through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his cross; through him . . . whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens' (Col 1¹⁹, 20).

4. First-century writers outside the NT.—The documents to be considered are the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Epistle to the Corinthians of St. Clement of Rome. The general features of teaching about salvation expressed in these books are the same as those found in the NT.

(a) The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles contains remarkably little on the subject. The NT doctrine that good works are a necessary part of the life of salvation receives the particular expression, reminiscent of the deuterocanonical books of the OT (Sir 17²²⁻²³, 29¹²⁻¹³, 40²⁴, To 4⁷⁻¹¹, 12⁸⁻⁹, 14¹⁰⁻¹¹), that almsgiving affords a ransom for sin: 'Be not thou found holding out thy hands to receive, but drawing them in as to giving [cf. Sir 4³¹]. If thou hast ought passing through thy hands, thou shalt give a ransom for thy sins. Thou shalt not hesitate to give, neither shalt thou murmur when giving; for thou shalt know who is the good paymaster of thy reward' (iv. 5-7). The description of the Eucharist as a 'sacrifice' (xiv. 1, 3) may imply that it was regarded by the writer of the Teaching as a means of appropriating the redemption accomplished by Christ.

(b) The Epistle of Barnabas supplies more. Salvation is possessed by Christians in the present time as being a mark of that life which has been bestowed and can be lost (ii. 10). It is also future, since it is hoped for (i. 3) and desired (xvi. 10) and the complete hallowing has yet to come (xv. 7). It is the work of God as being 'He who redeemed' (xix. 2). It includes deliverance 'from death' (ib. 2). It could not have been if the Son of God 'had not come in the flesh' (v. 10). The remission of sins and sanctification needed for it are through the blood of Christ (v. 1); His sufferings were 'for our sake,' and 'He suffered in order that His wound might give us life' (vii. 2); 'He offered the vessel of his spirit as a sacrifice on behalf of our sins' (vii. 3), 'His flesh on behalf of the sins of' His 'new people' (vii. 5); 'the cross' has 'grace' (ix. 8). Remission is applied by means of baptism (xi. 1, 8, 11). Salvation is gained through hope on Christ (xii. 3, 7). Souls may be saved by words spoken by Christians (xix. 10). For the possession of salvation there is need of righteousness and endurance (iv. 9-14, vii. 11, viii. 6, xix. 10); and in a phrase resembling that in the Teaching quoted above it is said, 'thou shalt work with thy hands for a ransom for thy sins' (xix. 10). Through the remission of sins are gained renewal and regeneration, re-creation and Divine indwelling: 'Since then He renewed us in the remission of sins, He made us another type so as to have the soul of children, as if He were re-creating us' (vi. 11); 'Receiving the remission of sins and hoping on the Name we became new, being created afresh from the beginning. Wherefore God really dwells in our habitation within us. How? The word of His faith, the calling of His promise, the wisdom of the ordinances, the commandments of the teaching, He Himself prophesying in us, He Himself dwelling in us, opening to those who had been in bondage to death the door of the shrine, which is the mouth, giving us repentance leads to the incorruptible shrine. For he who desires to be saved looks not to the man but to Him who dwells and speaks in him' (xvi. 8-10).

(c) The Epistle of St. Clement of Rome emphasizes strongly the work of our Lord as the Saviour. Christians are described as having been 'called and sanctified by the will of God through our Lord Jesus Christ' (præf.); and blessedness is said to be 'upon those who have been chosen by God through Jesus Christ our Lord' (l. 7). Christians have 'taken refuge in' God's 'mercies through our Lord Jesus Christ' (xx. 11). Those who are saved are 'saved through Jesus Christ' (lviii. 2). Jesus Christ is 'the High-priest of our offerings, the Guardian and Helper of our weakness,' 'the Way in which we found our salvation' (xxxvi. 1, 2), the 'Gate of the Lord,' through which 'the righteous shall enter' (xlviii. 3; cf. Ps 118¹⁹⁻²⁰). 'The blood of Christ' 'is precious to his Father because it was poured out for the sake of our salvation and won for the whole world the grace of repentance' (vii. 4). 'Through the blood of the Lord' is 'redemption for all those who believe and hope in God' (xii. 7). His 'blood was given on our behalf' (xxi. 6). 'Jesus Christ our Lord gave His blood on our behalf by the will of God, and His flesh on behalf of our flesh, and His soul on behalf of our souls' (xlix. 6). Christians are said to be 'justified by works and not by words' (xxx. 3). Preserving the other side of the NT antithesis, the writer says also: 'We, having been called in Christ Jesus through His will, are justified not through ourselves nor through our wisdom or understanding or piety or works which we wrought in holiness of heart, but through faith, through which the Almighty God justified all men who have been from the beginning' (xxxii. 4). The work of salvation includes the body (xxxvii. 5, xxxviii. 1). God is the Saviour of those who are in despair (lix. 3; cf. Jth 9¹¹), and of those who are in tribulation (lix. 4). Faithful Christians have 'conflict day and night for all the brotherhood, that the number of the elect may be saved' (ii. 4).

5. Relation of Christian teaching to the pagan mysteries.—The theories underlying the pagan mysteries bear some resemblance to Christian teaching, since they contain the idea of deliverance through a process of regeneration, and through participation in a Divine life which is operative for the future as well as for the present. They differ greatly because Christian teaching represents our Lord as a historical Person who accomplishes and gives salvation, while the great figures in the pagan mysteries, e.g. Osiris and Attis, are mythological personifications, and also because the ethical element, always prominent in Christianity, has no real counterpart in the religion of the mysteries.

DARWELL STONE.

SAMARIA (Σαμάρεια [T WH -la], from שַׁמְרִי).—1. The kingdom or district.—Samaria originally denoted the capital of the kingdom of Israel, but the term was early applied to the kingdom itself, and in this sense 'the king of Samaria,' 'the cities of Samaria,' 'the mountains of Samaria' are familiar expressions in the OT writings. After the overthrow of the monarchy, the name was still attached to the old territory, whether under the government of Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, Hasmonæans, or Romans. The boundary of Samaria on the N. was the southern edge of the Plain of Esdraelon, on the W. the eastern fringe of Sharon, and on the E. the Jordan. On the S. the frontier was very mutable: Josephus names 'the Acrabene toparchy' and 'the village Anuath, which is also named Borceos,' as the boundaries in his time, and these terms have been identified with Akrabbeh and Burkil, about 6 miles S. of Shechem. The Wady Farah on the E. of the watershed, and the Wady Ishar, called lower down Wady Deir Ballut and Wady Auja, on the western side, may be regarded as the dividing lines, which in our Lord's time were religious rather than political. Ginea (the modern Jenin) is given as the most northerly town (BJ III. iii. 4), and Antipatris was just beyond the S.W. border (Talm. Bab. Gittin, 76a).

Josephus' statement (loc. cit.) that Samaria 'is entirely of the same nature with Judæa' is inaccurate; for, while Judæa was a single massive table-land, with natural barriers which rendered it austere solitary and inaccessible, Samaria consisted of groups of mountains separated by fertile valleys, meadows, and plains, while it was so exposed on its frontiers that neither could artificial fortresses protect it from hostile invasions nor spiritual barriers defend it from the subtler influences of environment. The physical difference between the two countries, however, does not explain that most bitter quarrel in history which came to a head some time before the Christian era began. It was after all a quarrel between brethren, the old tribal and national feud of Judah and Ephraim being accentuated and perpetuated as a religious controversy. The Jewish contention that the Samaritans were at once foreigners and heretics was on both counts an exaggeration. The Assyrian conqueror Shalmaneser (2 K 17²⁴), or, according to the inscriptions, his successor Sargon, deported from Samaria only the most influential families, which would have been those most likely to give trouble—27,000 persons in all—leaving the humbler classes in the cities, as well as whole minor towns and villages, undisturbed. The number of Assyrian colonists then and afterwards (Ezr 4²) introduced into the country was no doubt small in proportion to the entire population. Only the most rigid Jewish exclusiveness could refuse to the Samaritans as a whole the right to the sacred name and traditions of Israel, and so to an equal share in the worship of Jahweh. Josephus, whose Jewish bias is obvious, presents the case against the Samaritans, or, as he frequently calls them, from the Assyrian origin of a fraction of them, the Cuthæans (2 K 17²⁴). He alleges that the rival worship on Mt. Gerizim was begun by a renegade Jewish priest—Manasseh the high priest's brother—who had married a Cuthæan satrap's daughter (Ant. XI. vii. 2, viii. 2); and that when Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated the Temple in Jerusalem, the Samaritans denied 'that the temple on Mt. Gerizim belonged to Almighty God,' and petitioned 'Antiochus, the god Epiphanes,' to permit them to name it 'the temple of Jupiter Hellenius' (ib. XII. v. 5). Josephus therefore glories in the Maccabæan zeal which 'subdued the nation of the Cuthæans, who dwelt round about that temple which was built in imitation of the Temple at Jerusalem,' 'demolished the city [of Samaria] and made slaves of its inhabitants' (BJ I. ii. 6, 7). He asserts that in his own time the Samaritans still continued to distress the Jews, 'cutting off parts of their land and carrying off slaves' (Ant. XII. iv. 1); that on one occasion they 'came privately into Jerusalem and threw about dead bodies in the cloisters' (ib. XVIII. ii. 2); that they harassed the Galileæans on their way to Jerusalem and 'killed a great many of them' (ib. XX. vi. 1); that in the days of Jewish prosperity they called themselves 'kindred,' but at other times declared that they were 'no way related to them, and that the Jews had 'no right to expect any kindness or marks of kindred from them,' who were 'sojourners that came from other countries' (ib. IX. xiv. 3). That there is some measure of truth in these allegations is quite probable, but there has unfortunately been no advocate for the defence, no historian who has eloquently presented the facts from the Samaritan point of view. The despised heretics have, however, found one Defender who has adjusted the balance. Jesus not only rebuked the fiery zeal of His disciples—in this respect thorough Jews—against the hated race (Lk 9⁵¹⁻⁵⁵), but made one Samaritan a pattern to all the world of neighbourly love (10³⁰⁻³⁵) and another—'this alien' (ἀλλογενής)—of gratitude to God (17¹¹⁻¹⁹).

The Pentecostal Church, thrilled by the Spirit of the Risen Christ, is said to have awakened early to her duty to Samaria. The dispersion which followed the death of Stephen brought many preachers 'to the regions of . . . Samaria' (Ac 8¹⁻⁴). While Philip, and afterwards Peter and John, probably laboured in the city of Samaria—now called Sebaste—itsself (8⁵), others evangelized in 'many villages of the Samaritans' (8²⁶), and their efforts were not without success. The church in Samaria, enjoying, like those in Judæa and Galilee, a time of peace, was built up and multiplied (9³¹). St. Paul and Barnabas, going up to Jerusalem at the end of their first missionary tour, gave a complete account (ἐκδηροῦμενοι) of the conversion of the Gentiles as they went through Samaria (15²). But from this moment Samaria passes out of view. After Christ's own work there—if Jn 4³⁹⁻⁴² is a reflexion of facts—and the primitive mission of His apostles, history has nothing more to say of the evangelization of Samaria. In the Roman wars the Samaritans made common cause with the Jews and endured great sufferings. Gathered on the top of Gerizim, a company of them preferred death to surrender, and 11,600 are said to have been cut to pieces by Vespasian's fifth legion (BJ III. vii. 32). In later times they seem to have become as fanatical as the Jews, and under the Byzantine Emperors Zeno and Justinian they were punished for their cruelty to the Christian Church. In the Middle Ages there were colonies of them in Nāblus, Cæsarea, Damascus, and Cairo. They are now reduced to a little community—'forty families,' it is always said—who still sacrifice on Mt. Gerizim, 'the oldest and the smallest sect in the world' (A. P. Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 240).

2. The city.—The city of Samaria, rather than the territory, appears to be meant in Ac 8^{5.9.14}, the best MSS having the article before πόλιν τῆς Σαμαρίας in 8⁵, and the genitive being probably that of apposition. This is the view of Weiss, Wendt, Blass, Knowling, and others, and, if they are right, the character of the city chosen by Philip for a Christian mission is a matter of interest. The royal city of Omri occupied a strong position on a round and isolated hill in a broad and fertile vale, about 6 miles N.W. of Shechem, commanding a splendid view (as its name Shomron, i.e. 'Wartburg' or 'Watch Tower,' would indicate) across the Plain of Sharon to the Western Sea, 23 miles distant. Already partly paganized (2 K 17²⁴) after its capture by the Assyrians (722 B.C.), it began to be Hellenized by Alexander the Great (331). He avenged the cruel death of Andromachus, his governor in Cœle-Syria, by killing many of the inhabitants of Samaria, deporting others to Shechem, and substituting Macedonian colonists, who continued to occupy the city till the time of John Hyrcanus. It was 'a very strong city' (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 2) in the time of this victorious Maccabæan prince and high priest, whose sons destroyed it after a year's siege, and took possession of the whole district for the Jews (BJ I. ii. 7). Being afterwards separated from Judæa by Pompey, and made a free city (Ant. XIV. iv. 4, BJ I. vii. 7), it was rebuilt by Gabinius (Ant. XIV. v. 3, BJ I. viii. 4). Its second period of royal splendour began when Augustus presented it to Herod the Great, who made it an impregnable fortress with a wall $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in circumference, built in it a magnificent temple to Divus Cæsar, adorned it with public buildings, colonnades and gateways, settled in it thousands of his veterans along with people from the neighbourhood, and renamed it 'Sebaste' (= Augusta) in honour of his Imperial patron (Ant. xv. vii. 3, viii. 5, BJ I. xx. 3, xxi. 2; Strabo, XVI. ii. 34). That the populace was now non-Jewish—'chiefly heathen' (Schürer, HJP II. i. 126), 'half Greek, half Samaritan' (G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 348)—is proved by their taking the side of the Romans, first in the conflicts that followed the death of Herod, and again in the great war which sealed the fate of the Jewish nation.

If this was the city which Philip went to evangelize, and in which he was joined by Peter and John (Ac 8¹⁴), it is probable that their gospel was heard chiefly, if not solely, by members of the Samaritan race, whose faith did not essentially differ from that of the Jews by whom they were counted heretical. The time was not yet come for 'turning unto the Gentiles'; that was first done in the purely Gentile city of Antioch. But the apostles obeyed their marching orders: beginning at Jerusalem, they went to Judæa, Samaria, and the ends of the earth (Ac 1⁸).

Herod's Hellenistic city, which he stained with the blood of his own family (Jos. BJ I. xxvii. 6), was re-created as a Roman colony under Sentimius Severus; but when the need for a fortified 'Watch-tower' was past, the tide of prosperity returned to the ancient town of Shechem (re-named Neapolis, now Nāblus), and Samaria fell into decay.

Eusebius, in the 4th cent., describes it as Σεβαστήν, τὴν νῦν πολίτην τῆς Παλαιστίνης (Onom. 292). A bishop of Samaria attended the Council of Nicæa (A.D. 325), and another that of Jerusalem (A.D. 536). A baseless tradition made it the scene of the death of John the Baptist, and a church of the 12th cent. stands over his supposed tomb. A small village retains the Imperial name—Σεβαστιῆ—and some of Herod's pillars are still standing. Excavations carried on by Harvard University since 1903 have resulted in many remarkable discoveries.

SAMOS (Σάμος).—Samos is one of the fairest and most fertile islands of the Ægean, 27 miles long from E. to W. and 14 miles at its greatest breadth, separated from the mainland by the strait of Mycale (the Little Bosphorus), seven stadia in width, in which the Greek fleet gained a great victory over the Persians in 479 B.C. The island attained its highest prosperity in the days of Polycrates, and held for a time the naval supremacy of the Ægean. It was the birthplace of Pythagoras, and a Samian mariner, 'not without divine direction' (Herod. iv. 152), was the first to sail beyond the Pillars of Hercules. Its chief city, also called Samos, was a libera civitas in St. Paul's time. Situated in the S.E. of the island, it had the largest temple Herodotus ever saw (iii. 60), and disputed with Smyrna and Ephesus the title 'first city of Ionia.' There were many Jews in the island (1 Mac 15²³), which was visited by Herod in A.D. 14 (Jos. Ant. XVI. ii. 2).

In a voyage down the Ægean the ship in which St. Paul was sailing left Chios on a Wednesday morning, 'struck across to Samos'—here probably the island is meant—and rounded either the west or the east extremity. The RV rendering, 'touched at Samos,' conveys the idea of a stoppage, which is not implied in the Greek (παραβέβηκεν εἰς Σάμον, Ac 20¹⁵). Probably the attempt was made to get as far as Miletus the same day, but when Trogyllium, a promontory 5 miles E. of the city of Samos, was reached, the Ægean N. wind apparently died away, as it generally does in the late afternoon throughout the summer months, and the passage had to be completed next day with the aid of the fresh breeze that springs up in the early morning. The clause in the Bezan text regarding Trogyllium, which is found in the AV but relegated to the margin of the RV, was in all probability omitted by the scribes of the great uncials under the mistaken notion that a night had been spent at the city of Samos, and that a second anchorage only 5 miles farther east was out of the question.

SAMOTHRACE (Σαμοθράκη, the 'Thracian Samos,' in Homer Σάμος Θρηική; still called Samothraki).—Samothrace is an island about 30 miles S. of the coast of Thrace, 8 miles in length and 6 miles in breadth, rising to a height of 5240 ft. above the sea. Next to Pharos, it is the most conspicuous natural feature in the northern Ægean. According to Homer, Poseidon took his stand on its summit to survey 'all Ida, the city of Priam, and the ships of the Greeks' (Il. xiii. 12 f.). Samos is probably a Semitic (Phœnician) word, from the root shamakh, 'to be high' (see W. Leaf, Iliad, 1902, II. 4). The island, which always enjoyed autonomy on account of its sacred traditions, was celebrated for the mysterious worship of the Cabeiri (Herod. ii. 51), which was still in full vogue when St. Paul passed and repassed the island.

The Apostle and his companions, sailing from Troas, 'made a straight course,' running before the wind (εὐθυδρομήσαμεν, Ac 16¹¹), to Samothrace, where they cast anchor, and next day reached Neapolis. In less favourable conditions, when tacking was required, the passage in the opposite direction took five days (Ac 20⁹). Samothrace was quite harbourless—Pliny, in enumerating the Aegean islands, calls it importuosissima omnium (HN iv. 23)—but it had several good anchorages.

SAMSON (Σαμψών).—Samson was the popular hero of the tribe of Dan who began to deliver Israel from the Philistines, the Nazirite whose secret of strength lay in his hair, the blinded giant who prayed for power to avenge himself and his country in the hour of his death (Jg 13–16). He finds a place in the great Roll of Faith contained in He 11. Much has been written in recent years regarding the legendary elements of the story of Samson and the possibility of its being a solar myth, but such ideas were naturally far from the mind of the anonymous writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

LITERATURE.—For solar myth theory see Commentaries on Judges by G. F. Moore (ICC, 1895) and K. Budde (Das Buch der Richter, 1897); J. G. Frazer, *The Golden Bough*², 1900, iii. 390 ff.; A. Jeremias, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, Eng. tr., 2 vols., 1911, ii. 169 ff. JAMES STRAHAN.

SAMUEL (Σαμουήλ).—Samuel is named in the roll of the OT heroes who lived and died in faith (He 11³²). His unique position in the history of Israel is indicated by two phrases in Acts—‘all the prophets from Samuel’ (3²⁴), and God ‘gave them judges until Samuel the prophet’ (13²⁰). He is regarded as the last of the Judges and the first of the Prophets. In one stratum—the earliest—of the two books which bear his name he is the ‘seer’ of a small town; in another he is the ‘judge’ who rules over the whole people; in a third he is the ‘prophet’ who speaks like an Amos or a Hosea. But the difficult critical problems raised by the composite story of his life and achievements (see artt. ‘Samuel’ in HDB and EBi) have no bearing upon the NT passages in which he is mentioned. That he played a highly important role, religious and political, as representative of Jahweh and as king-maker, at a turning-point in Hebrew history is a fact which criticism leaves unshaken.

SANCTIFICATION.—The meaning of ἁγιασμός in the NT is in conflict with its etymological form. The word (as also the verb ἁγιάζω) etymologically suggests a process, a gradual advance in moral attainment, an ethical emphasis. In the NT generally, however, the word expresses a state, a position of religious attainment, a religious emphasis. To ‘sanctify’ is to ‘make holy,’ and the word ‘holy’ essentially implies a certain relationship to God (see artt. SAINT, HOLINESS). Perfection of moral character is a derivative but necessary result of holiness, and not, strictly speaking, holiness itself. The ‘saint’ develops a certain type of character in accordance with certain inward moral demands that are essential to the preservation of the ‘holy’ relation to God. In the NT this God is the God and Father of Jesus Christ. ἅγιος being ‘that which belongs to God,’ ‘sanctify’ means ‘to make to belong to God,’ ‘to dedicate’ to God. The precise kind of relationship between God and the object ‘sanctified’ is determined by the nature and situation of the object. Thus in Hebrews, where the religious problem is focused in the question of providing a valid worship for those debarred from the Temple services, the ‘people’ are ‘sanctified’ through the blood of Christ, and thereby enabled to become a ‘worshipping’ people, standing in the relation of ‘worshippers’ to God, inasmuch as the sacrifice of Jesus was offered ‘outside the gate,’ i.e. outside the sacred enclosure of the Holy City (He 13¹²). On the other hand, the barrier to the holy relationship may be a moral one, as in 1 Co 6^{9–11}. It is the removal of this barrier of guilt, or alienation from God, through the death of Jesus, that is emphasized in the striking words, καὶ ταῦτά τινες ἦτε· ἀλλὰ ἀπελούσασθε, ἀλλὰ ἡγιάσθητε, ἀλλὰ ἐδικαιώθητε ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ ἐν τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν. ἀπελούσασθε refers to Christian baptism, as implying penitence and faith on the part of the worshipper. The conjunction of ἡγιάσθητε and ἐδικαιώθητε, and above all the order in which they are mentioned, show that in Christian experience no real distinction in time can be drawn between justification and sanctification (cf. He 10¹⁰, where ἡγιασμένοι clearly has affinity with Pauline justification). When the NT—St. Paul in particular—speaks of justification and sanctification, it really speaks of justified and sanctified men and women, and has little concern with the theological abstraction. Justification and sanctification are both ‘works of God’s free grace’ (Shorter Catechism, 1648). In both, God is the determining agent. The man who is ‘justified’ knows that God is not an enemy, but a friend. The ‘sanctified’ man knows also that he is now in a new relationship to God as son or child, and that in answer to the pardoning grace in justification a certain subjective attitude on his part must bring forth fruit in moral life. He must walk worthily of his vocation or standing before God. A good analogy with sanctification is patriotism, which is a social and political condition of individual life, in whose creation the individual has, strictly speaking, no part; which also carries with it certain practical duties that can be refused only at the cost of disloyalty to the State. Thus we are called on to ‘render unto God the things that are God’s,’ as to ‘Caesar the things that are Caesar’s.’ In other words, just as we are born members of a certain family, and citizens of a particular State, so as Christians we are ‘born again’ in Christian baptism into an obedience to the rule or Kingdom of God, and a responsibility for all the corresponding social duties that ought to be maintained as between man and man. The Christian is ‘a new creation in Christ’ (2 Co 5¹⁷). He lives in a new world, where there stands out sharply a distinction between things permanent and things transient, things seen and things unseen; where a new moral valuation is at work: where the humblest and most despised individual claims a new, loving interest as one for whom Christ died. In the experience of ‘conversion’ or ‘regeneration,’ symbolized in Christian baptism, lies the root-idea of sanctification. The ‘saint’ belongs to God, and therefore thinks of things and men as God thinks of them. The determining agent in sanctification everywhere, both in experience and in the conduct that follows from it, is God, as revealed in the Cross and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is quite true that, as we shall see later, sanctification is not incompatible with moral effort and daily renewal; indeed it implies them (2 Co 4¹⁰, Col 3², Eph 4²²). Yet in the act of sanctification, God has already exerted all His power, and the development of the Christian character is but the development of power already present in the individual ‘saint.’ God gives man a part in His own holiness, taking him out of the sphere of ungodliness, ‘the authority of darkness,’ and translating him into the sphere of His own purity, ‘the kingdom of the son of his love’ (Col 1¹³).

For the sake of convenience, the NT doctrine of sanctification may be treated under two aspects: (1) sanctification as a correlate of justification; (2) sanctification and the Christian ethic. It is to be noted that these are but two aspects of the doctrine. Essentially, and especially in the minds of the NT writers, they are the same. Neither the question of a non-ethical religion nor that of a non-religious ethic would have entered into the minds of NT writers, save to be set aside. Reconciliation to God and love to men, which constitute the perfected experience of sanctification, in the two directions of religion and practical conduct, are both regarded as issuing from the same source, viz. the redemptive work of Jesus Christ, and the human response to it of faith which worketh by love (δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, Gal 5⁶). Sanctification on the human side is faith at work.

1. Sanctification as a correlate of justification. — Faith is a judgment of the whole personality that God means what He said and did in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This is justification in the Pauline sense. Faith is also unswerving daily fidelity to such a judgment, to believe that God equally means us to become what we are when He raised Jesus from the dead. This 'is the will of God, even your sanctification' (1 Th 4⁹). Justified by faith, we have peace with God. Our life is to be lived in the sphere of this gracious act of God; we are reconciled to God through the death of His Son, and, being reconciled, are saved by the life of Christ (Ro 5¹¹). Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that in the NT doctrines both of justification and of sanctification the relationship is between living persons, and not between moral forces that germinate in a dead past. The Christian message is a gospel from a living Christ to living men. It requires to be daily uttered, and daily received.

The experience of guilt enters into the conception both of sanctification and of justification. Justification includes the idea of the willingness of God to remove it, and of its actual removal in an objective sense. It is the faith that God has, at infinite cost to Himself, taken back His erring child to His heart. There is always, however, a certain barrier to a complete response to this gracious act of God. Justification must be experienced not only as a sense of sonship, but as an actual force at work in our lives. As such, it is sanctification. The sense of guilt is the result not only of a judgment of God, but of an answering judgment of man. Guilt may be a barrier not only to the faith that God can justify us, but also to the faith that He can effect any change in us. In the OT all sin was ultimately regarded as an offence against God (Ps 51⁴), even when it meant only failure to comply with national custom, which was practically religion, associated as it was with Divine sanction. With the enrichment of the moral sense, the increasing moralization of the idea of God, and the growth of individual responsibility which culminated in the teaching of Jesus, guilt became in the NT that condition of heart and life produced by offences, conscious or unconscious, against the love of God. It is a burden which must be removed, a barrier to be broken down, if sanctification is to be realized in the individual experience, and man is to be at peace with God. All the NT writers are agreed in this, that they attribute the removal of guilt to the atoning death of Jesus, who is our 'sanctification' (1 Co 1³⁰). They are agreed that the agent in sanctification is the Holy Spirit, but present certain differences in their application and statement of the doctrine.

(1) The Epistle to the Hebrews. — We may take the writer of this Epistle first, as his forms of thought have a closer connexion with the OT than either the Pauline or the Johannine. In Hebrews the ideas of purification, sanctification, and perfection (τελειωσις) are in close affinity to one another. Through the death of Christ the wor-shipper has the individual experiences of forgiveness, freedom from guilt, purification of conscience. Thus the 'new and living way' to God is open, and the believer's will is bound to serve the living God (He 10²²). While St. Paul develops his doctrine of sanctification in opposition on the one hand to antinomian teaching, and on the other to Jewish legalism, the doctrine of Hebrews is rather developed in opposition to a ritualistic spirit of dependence on the ancient rites of cleansing from sin. His readers have difficulty in emancipating themselves, in their condition of excommunication, from the local and ceremonial associations of the ancient worship which mingled with their former religious habits. It is the business of this writer to exhibit the ineffectiveness of the ancient sacrifices to take away sin. His God is 'a consuming fire' (12²⁹); the word of God is 'sharper than any two-edged sword,' penetrating to the inmost recesses of the human conscience (4¹²). Such a far-reaching and comprehensive burden of guilt can be removed only through a perfect sacrifice, the sacrifice of Him who is both priest and victim. His death is the new and living way. He is the great High Priest who alone has passed 'through the heavens,' the tractless regions that intervene between man and God. He and His worshippers are united, through their faith, in the bond of perfect human sympathy. He sanctifies them, and presents them to God. The sanctifier and the sanctified are sons of the one Father (2¹¹). The sacrifice of Jesus, therefore, in virtue of this essential unity, realized in the Incarnation, is effective for the purification of the human conscience, and in making men fit to stand in the presence of the Holy God. How the sacrifice of Jesus is thus effective does not enter into the mind of the writer. He simply applies the principle, accepted and experienced in the case of the OT sacrifices, to the death of Christ. For him, as for St. Paul, Jesus is alive in this particular relationship, in the midst of His Church, leader of their praise, prototype of their faith, united to them by ties of flesh and blood. According to the demands of the Old Covenant, the relationship with God implied in 'holiness' was restored by the blood of bulls and goats, but the demands of the New Covenant are infinitely more exacting. The sphere in which the new relationship of sanctity is realized is no longer the earthly tabernacle or temple, but a sphere in which the worship is spiritual, and the relationship real. The OT worship took place amid the 'patterns' of heavenly things. The NT worshipper is introduced to the 'heavenly things themselves' (9^{23ff.}). The Incarnate Son, by His eternal sacrifice, has lifted humanity into the very presence of God Himself; and in the white light of that environment, with all its moral demands, the Christian life must be lived. The thought is nearly akin to Jn 4²⁴. We must pursue this holiness or sanctification (ἀγιασμός), without which no man shall see the Lord (He 12¹⁴). These words indicate the direct passage of the writer's thought from the religious to the ethical, which will be dealt with later.

(2) The Pauline writings. — The doctrine of sanctification in St. Paul represents a somewhat earlier stage in apostolic thought. Both in St. Paul and in Hebrews the death of Jesus is that which establishes the new relationship between God and man (Eph 2¹³⁻¹⁴). The unsanctified man is in a state of enmity towards God, and sanctification means peace with God. The mind of St. Paul always tends to isolate the Cross as an act of redemption. Both Hebrews and St. Paul teach that God sent His pre-existent Son in the flesh (Ro 8³, He 10⁵), but in St. Paul the Incarnation took place in order that on the Cross a curse might be pronounced upon sin. In both, Jesus is our representative, but in St. Paul He is regarded as dying the death that we deserved to die. Sin exhausted its power in His crucifixion, and was set aside as a beaten enemy in the supreme demonstration of the power of God in the resurrection of Jesus. God 'highly exalted' Him, and raised Him to His right hand. The epithet 'Lord' (κύριος) is Paul's most characteristic description of the Risen Jesus. It carries with it the notion of authority rather than of sympathy, although the latter is by no means absent. The barrier of guilt is constituted for Paul by inability to keep the law of God, understood as a moral demand quite as penetrating and comprehensive as in Hebrews. This moral inability presupposes a certain 'law' warring in his members against the 'law' of God. If we substitute 'authority' for 'law' in St. Paul, much of the difficulty constituted by his apparently ambiguous use of the term νόμος disappears. Through the death of Jesus Paul is delivered from the 'authority' of sin, which is broken, and is made subject to the 'constraint' or 'authority' of the love of God manifested in Jesus Christ, the Κύριος. The acceptance by faith of this 'authority' of Jesus Christ, in response to His grace and love, is the condition of being 'in Christ,' which is the characteristic Pauline phrase for the state of sanctification. It is a relationship to God of 'sonship,' of perfect freedom. 'The authority of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the authority of sin and of death' (Ro 8²). The Spirit that sanctifies is shed abroad in our hearts, and we cry, 'Abba, Father.' This authority that so speaks in Jesus Christ is the authority and the power of the Creator. Even Nature shall yet be on our side. Ro 8¹⁹⁻²² is not mere poetry. It is the utterance of a heart that looks out on a world both of men and of things that is in its misery far from God, and can yet see in it all the birth-pangs of a new creation (vv. 20-21). Amid the worst that men or things can accomplish, it is impossible to annul God's loving choice of the believer in Christ Jesus (vv. 35-39).

(3) The Johannine writings.—Much of the relevant matter in this connexion falls more properly to be treated under the art. HOLY SPIRIT. Here, however, it may be pointed out that the Johannine conception of sanctification has a strong affinity with the thought of Hebrews. In Jn 10³⁸ Jesus in His earthly life is said to be sanctified by the Father, i.e. set apart for the holy purpose of the redemption of men, and in 17¹⁹ Jesus sanctifies Himself in death for the sake of His disciples, who are also 'sanctified in the truth' by virtue of their abiding 'in Him.' As in Hebrews, the unity of Jesus and His disciples (not His immediate followers only) is a corollary of the Incarnation, but the bond is not conceived of in terms of human sympathy so much as in a certain semi-physical sense, due no doubt to the atmosphere of Hellenistic thought that surrounds the Johannine writings. The self-sanctification or consecration of Jesus, however, in Jn 17¹⁹ is the same as in He 10¹⁰. He is both Priest and Victim. In the OT when God 'sanctifies' Himself or His 'great name' (Ezk 36-3) it is equivalent to a display of His saving power on behalf of Israel as against their enemies. In Johannine thought the Cross is the supreme manifestation not only of Divine love, but of Divine power (Jn 12³¹⁻³²). The Risen and Crucified Jesus 'draws all men unto himself.' This is really the same as to 'sanctify' them. In accordance also with Johannine thought, sometimes the Spirit, the alter ego of Jesus, sometimes the Glorified Jesus, is the sanctifying agent. In experience both are the same; Jesus is our Life. Believers abide in Him. They carry within them a χρῖσμα (1 Jn 2-6) or σπέρμα (3⁹). What in St. Paul is called 'adoption' corresponds in St. John to 'sanctification' (1 Jn 3¹). The work of the Spirit is to beget 'sons' (τέκνα) of God.'

2. Sanctification and the Christian ethic.—It is extremely important that the NT teaching on the previous aspect of sanctification should be emphasized, in order that the inalienable connexion between the Christian religion and Christian morality should be preserved. In other words, the NT teaches everywhere that what a man believes has an all-determining effect on what he is and what he does. Every act of faith is in the NT an ethical force. The passages which contain ethical precepts (including the Sermon on the Mount) cannot be understood apart from the doctrinal teaching. All is ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν. 'This is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith' (1 Jn 5⁴).

Is there, then, such a thing as progressive sanctification? Strictly speaking, the word αγιασμός, as we have seen, contains no such idea. It expresses a state of holiness, not a process of becoming holy. Any other interpretation would negative the NT idea of holiness itself. The primitive idea of holiness, indeed, still persists. The NT has deepened and moralized it, but has rejected decisively one aspect of it, viz. that there can be degrees or grades of holiness from the Divine point of view. The savage may take liberties with a certain tree or other natural object, and finds to his cost that he has unwittingly violated a holy place. He has interfered with the property of the god, and is taught by the consequences that a certain attitude and conduct are necessary if he is to continue to live in safety and security. The god has decreed, 'Certain things are mine,' and there are degrees by which one thing, place, or person is holier than another, with corresponding grades of penalties. In the NT things and places are seldom called holy except in a traditional sense. Only persons are holy, and no man has the right to say to another, 'Stand thou on one side, for I am holier than thou.' An equal degree of guilt belongs to every violation of what is God's. 'If any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy . . . which temple ye are' (1 Co 3¹⁷). On the one hand, through the influence of the prophets, first the nation and then the individual (as in Jeremiah) are regarded as 'holy' in the eyes of Jahweh, who, unlike other gods, has more than a mere proprietary interest in 'His own.' On the other hand, through the influence of the priestly caste, Jahweh's service became more and more a matter of correct ritual and observance of certain rules, and the result is a Holy God afar off whose name dare not be mentioned, and who lives in a state of moral neutrality. The incarnation of Jesus Christ realized in perfection the prophetic teaching, and for ever made men aware that God is the Father, whose holiness is also love, and who reasserts His claim on each individual soul by an act of redemption. 'We are bought with a price.' NT 'holiness' is therefore a state of belonging to God, which depends not on a mere Divine fiat, but upon an act of salvation at the greatest possible cost to the Father. What God has once hallowed is always holy. We are holy by Divine choice, and there can be no degrees either in the Divine offer or in the human acceptance of salvation.

This condition, therefore, of absolute holiness demands on our part both faith and conduct. A certain 'walk' is demanded of us, if we are to maintain and affirm the new friendship with God. 'Our citizenship is in heaven' (Ph 3²⁰), or, as Moffatt translates it, 'we are a colony of heaven' (*The NT: a New Translation*³, London, 1914), with all the obligations of loyalty and sacrifice that the mother-country lays upon us. In the NT the mother-country is just the Father's heart and the Father's presence. Our moral progress is not a growth into holiness out of a state of comparative unholiness. That would be to negative the Christian gospel. Rather it is a growth in holiness. The act that makes us holy is done once and for all.

On the ethical side, sanctification reveals itself chiefly as the basis of moral freedom. Freedom, creativeness, originality are the marks of the moral teaching of Jesus, and they are the marks of all true imitatio Christi. The Japanese artist, Yoshio Markino, has the following sentences: 'Don't imitate my art. Don't watch my hand or brush. Only feel what I am feeling. Communicate your spirits to the nature and find out everything yourselves. Judge your art with your own eyes, and judge your music with your ears' (When I was a Child, London, 1912, p. 253). The expression is at times quaint, but the words are not only true in art, but supremely true of Christian ethics. Growth in holiness in the NT sense is to be free from all merely legal compulsion and to know only one constraint, the love of Christ (2 Co 5¹⁴). We live no longer unto ourselves, or under the Law, but unto Him who for our sakes died and rose again. We have not even yet fully realized the extraordinary daring of the conception of Christian freedom developed by St. Paul, largely as the result of his own experience of a legalistic morality. There is not a word in the recorded teaching of Jesus that can be construed into the position that the Mosaic Law was temporary. Yet this may be said to be the pivot of St. Paul's whole position. The liberty wherewith Christ has made us free is not only a religious but an ethical liberty, not merely the removal of guilt but the setting free of the will. Only one who knew what sanctification is could have been bold enough to preach it. It is neither more nor less than the doctrine that all legal statutes are out of place in the Christian life. Our norm is neither the teaching nor the example of Jesus by themselves, but the experience of His work, and of His risen life. We have as much right to examine the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount under the illumination of the Holy Spirit the Sanctifier as any of the ethical passages in St. Paul or St. John. The extent of our obedience to them is determined not by the statutory form of the precepts themselves, but by communion with the living mind of Him who uttered them. Nor is this illumination a mere isolated inner light. It springs from the communion of 'saints,' a word always used in the plural in the NT (see art. SAINT). Christ in us, and dwelling in His Church by His Holy Spirit, has a right to be His own commentator and interpreter. To the sanctified man, who understands that the God who will not let him go is Love and Holiness and Justice, either precepts or principles by themselves, no matter from what source, are as flowers broken off at the root. 'Precepts wither if they are alone,' says even Seneca (Ep. xciv. 59).

This is dangerous doctrine, but all great doctrines are dangerous. Freewill, by the teaching of Scripture itself, was a very dangerous experiment. It is not surprising that St. Paul's principle of freedom should not only have occasioned abuse, but also excited grave doubts in the minds of those who were morally in earnest. The existence of abuse is suggested in the question, 'Shall we sin that grace may abound?'; but, in the fact that the question is a quotation, it is equally suggested that he had to develop his doctrine of sanctification, as he does in Ro 6, also in opposition to those who were seriously concerned about the interests of morality. It is impossible to escape the feeling that the return of the Galatians to the observance of days, months, seasons, years, and to the moral precepts involved in it, was really for safety, and as a result of moral earnestness. They might have said, equally with Festus, 'Paul, thou art mad.'

If, then, the Pauline doctrine of sanctification is developed in opposition both to the morally lax and to the morally earnest, it is of deep interest to note the lines of his answer. It is typical of the NT ethic generally. He deals with the subject more than once—Ro 6 is perhaps the fullest answer he gives.

(1) He refuses to think in terms of abstractions or mere forces. His opponents were talking of 'sin' and 'grace' as though they were impersonal principles. To him, 'sin' is a personal power, the arch-demon; 'grace' is the grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. He reminds them that they are baptized 'into Christ Jesus' (Ro 6³); with Him they died, and with Him they rise again. 'If we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him' (v.⁸). 'Even so reckon ye also yourselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus' (v.¹¹). In short, the ethical motive is an enriched and reinforced form of noblesse oblige. The noblesse is not only a state of ennoblement that carries with it duties, but One to whom we stand in deepest indebtedness for pardon and life, in whose fellowship we are raised to high rank and high responsibility. We sit in heavenly places with Christ Jesus. Sin against grace is now the sin of those who have been adopted into the family of God. Our motive is a sense not only of honour, but above all of gratitude. The old bad habit of obedience to sin persists, but not in that direction urges our loyalty. Sanctification means the growth of grateful loyalty to Christ. We die to sin, and live to Christ. Forgiveness is needed and sought for unwilling obedience to an evil power that has now no dominion or authority over us. And at this point we may glance at the attitude of St. Paul to the Law. At one moment he seems utterly to depreciate it, at another he says that the Law is good, and holy, and righteous. It is an illustration of his idea of progress in sanctification. Obedience to law is good for those to whom God says only 'Thou shalt' or 'Thou shalt not'; for 'law' to St. Paul is not what we would understand by 'natural' or 'spiritual order' of things. He can speak of the law of sin and the law of death, as well as of the law of God. 'Law' is God speaking in an authoritative voice, and while his use of it is not confined to the Mosaic Law, yet he regards the Mosaic Law as the most definite embodiment of the Divine authority. For the Christian, for those that are 'sanctified,' the 'law' of sin and death is done away altogether, and obedience to the law of God is merged in a higher and nobler loyalty to the God and Father of Jesus Christ, and above all in a sense of supreme indebtedness. We are 'servants' of God, but our reward cannot be called 'wages.' It is a 'free gift' (Ro 6²³). The progress is in the idea of God.

(2) St. Paul everywhere recognizes the need of strenuous moral effort on our part. In this regard, he is not alone among the NT writers. We find it equally in the Epistle to the Hebrews: 'Follow (pursue) peace with all men, and holiness (ἀγλασμός), without which no man shall see the Lord' (12¹⁴). 'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling' (Ph 2¹²). In what does the effort primarily consist? It is in what might be called a persistent daily reaffirmation of the act of consecration: 'Present your members as servants to righteousness unto sanctification' (Ro 6¹⁹). Here again we shall misunderstand the meaning of εἰς ἁγιασμόν unless we remember that St. Paul is not really expressing his thought in abstract nouns like 'righteousness,' 'sanctification.' These are really personifications, like 'sin' or 'lawlessness.' 'Sanctification' here is really the timeless act of God, which is gradually realized in time. There is a moment, as we shall see later, when we are 'wholly' sanctified, when God has been able to work His complete will in us, and to this end (εἰς ἁγιασμόν) we must co-operate by renewed acts of consecration. The ritualistic idea is still in the background. In the OT, as the idea of sacrifice became spiritualized, 'the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit,' and in the NT God is satisfied with no less than a constant and persistent offering of the whole personality—the σῶμα including the life-principle. 'Present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service' (λογικὴ λατρεία, Ro 12¹; cf. R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Berlin, 1910, pp. 24, 91, 155).

Human co-operation, then, in the work of sanctification is strongly emphasized, if 'the fruits of the Spirit' are to be brought forth in human character. It is no doubt to St. Paul that we first owe the idea that the Holy Spirit is the factor not only in the Christian as a member of the community (a saint among saints), but in the individual Christian in his daily thought and life. We are exhorted to 'walk by the Spirit' (Gal 5¹⁶). It has often been shown that St. Paul rescued the conception of 'spiritual gifts' as confined to extraordinary manifestations such as took place at Pentecost, or are associated with ordinary meetings for worship in the Apostolic Church, and enabled these gifts to include the ethical requirements of daily life (1 Co 12-14). 1 Co 13 is not merely a song in praise of love; it is a landmark in the history of the Christian ethic. The Spirit is a gift not only of emotion, but of motion, and furnishes the driving power for the ministry which includes all other ministries, the ministry of love. It is, in Bengel's phrase, 'via maxime vitalis,' a way that all may tread, in which even men incapable by temperament of great emotional disturbance may walk secure (cf. Denney, The Way Everlasting, London, 1911, p. 152 ff.). 'It shall be called The way of holiness; . . . the way-faring men, yea fools, shall not err therein' (Is 35⁸).

This ethical reference of the work of the Spirit is emphasized equally in nearly all the NT writers. We need mention only passages like He 12¹⁰, where suffering is regarded as a Divine discipline, and intended to issue in participation in the Divine holiness: 1 P 1¹⁵, 'Ye shall be holy; for I am holy'; 2 P 1⁴, and especially v. 9, where ethical failure is said to be due to 'short-sightedness, imperfect vision of the 'cleansing from old sins.' In Rev 22¹¹, ὁ ἅγιος ἁγιασθήτω ἐντί should probably be translated 'Let the saint still act as a saint' on the analogy of the preceding clauses.

(3) In the NT sanctification is not equivalent to moral perfection. 'Holy and blameless' (ἄμωμος) is an expression St. Paul uses elsewhere (Eph 1⁴ 5⁷, Col 1²²). He also speaks in 1 Th 5²³ of his readers being 'sanctified wholly.' It is evident that 'blamelessness' is not regarded as equivalent to holiness, and it is also noticeable that in the Thessalonians passage this condition of complete sanctification ensues at the Parousia (cf. 1 Th 3²). No doubt the controversy as to 'progressive sanctification' would have seemed to St. Paul unreal. We fall into the habit, of necessity, of drawing distinctions which never occurred to the NT writers. It is easily seen that there was no real place for the idea of moral progress in our sense of the word, so long as the Parousia was regarded as imminent. There can be little doubt, however, that the end became for him less near as time went on, and the idea of sanctification became more and more associated with moral progress, as a fruit of the Spirit's continuous working. The Risen Christ, whom one day he hopes to see face to face, manifests Himself more and more as a present spiritual power in the man himself. The mind removes Him to a farther distance, but the heart draws Him nearer. 'Christ in you, the hope of glory' (Col 1⁷) breathes the sense of moral imperfection, and at the same time the sense that 'Christ . . . carries the man who clings to Him in faith through all the great crises which came to Him, on the path of His perfecting' (H. A. A. Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians,' London, 1903, p. 455). See also the exposition of Ph 3¹² by R. Rainy, Expositor's Bible, 'Philippians,' 1893, pp. 199-256). More and more, as St. Paul's experience deepens, the work of the Spirit in sanctification is identified with the work of the Risen Christ. The sense of present fellowship with Him becomes more real, and has its corresponding ethical effect. 'Now the Lord is the Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. But we all, with unveiled face beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3¹⁻¹⁸). There are certain exegetical difficulties connected with this passage which cannot be dealt with here. The AV rendering 'beholding as in a mirror' has been adopted, as best suiting the thought. 'Glory' is just that type of character and life which is fully manifested in Jesus, risen and reigning, and St. Paul's present communion with the Saviour is the source of a daily moral progress. The thought is much the same as in 1 Jn 3¹⁻³. This cannot fairly, either in St. John or in St. Paul, be called mysticism. The 'beholding' is not immediate, but 'as in a mirror,' which, however obscure as an image, at least indicates a medium of communion, probably the Christian Church; and St. John speaks of a 'hope' which purifies, and of a moment yet to be realized when 'we shall see him as he is.' The Hellenic idea of metamorphosis is clearly present, but to what extent it colours St. Paul's thought is disputable. The idea that the risen body of Jesus is a kind of semi-physical light substance which mingles with ours in this communion is certainly not present in Paul's thought, notwithstanding that he may have robbed Hellenic mysticism of a word (μεταμορφώμεθα; cf. P. Kölbinger, Die geistige Einwirkung der Person Jesu auf Paulus, Göttingen, 1906, p. 104 f.). The conception is, in any case, that progress is from within outwards (Ro 12³, Eph 4²³), and the forces that prevent the influx of the new life are broken and overcome one by one (Ro 8¹³, 1 Th 3¹⁰ 4¹, 2 Co 9¹⁰ 10¹³ 16¹³, Ph 1⁹⁻²³, Col 1¹⁰ 11).

LITERATURE.—Besides the works mentioned in the art. see Literature under SAINT; J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' London, 1900 (esp. chs. 6-8); Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans' 5, Edinburgh, 1902; J. A. Beet, Holiness, London, 1880; see also J. Vernon Bartlett, art. 'Sanctification,' in HDB, and the Literature there appended. R. H. STRACHAN.

SANCTUARY.—This term is used by AV and RV (1) in He 9¹ for τὸ ἅγιον, which denotes the sacred tent in both its parts, as is implied by the synonymous σκηνή, 'tabernacle,' in the following verse; and (2) in He 8² for τὰ ἅγια, the heavenly sanctuary or holy of holies (RVm 'holy things'). The word represents ἅγια in He 9² (RV 'the Holy place'), where the omission of the article, in contrast to the invariable LXX usage (Lv 10⁴, Nu 3²², etc.), serves to emphasize the holiness (M. Dods in EGT, 'Hebrews,' 1910, in loco). In this passage ἅγια stands in express contrast to ἅγια ἄλτων (9³), 'the Holiest of all' (AV), 'the Holy of holies' (RV). But the simple ṛd ḏya frequently denotes 'the Holiest,' and is so translated by the AV in He 9⁸ 10¹⁹, though elsewhere (9²⁸ 13¹¹) 'the holy place,' which is the RV rendering in all these passages. This usage is justified by Lv 16², etc., where קֹדֶשׁ, LXX ṛd ḏyon, denotes the holy place within the veil; Vulg. sanctuarium quod est intra velum. It is now recognized by all scholars that the central sanctuary and elaborate ritual of the desert wanderings are not historical realities but products of religious idealism, based in all essential features upon the architectural plan and sacerdotal rubric of the Second Temple. But the argument of the writer of Hebrews is scarcely affected by the change from the traditional to the critical view. Whether the earthly sanctuary, which he at once magnifies and depreciates, was the creation of Moses or of Ezekiel and Ezra, it has now had its day and must cease to be, since the true high priest has passed into the heavenly sanctuary, and become the minister of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, not man (He 9¹ 2).

SANHEDRIN.—1. The name.—Sanhedrin (סנהדרין, pl. סנהדריות; Targumic also סנהדרין, pl. סנהדרות, Heb.-Aram. form of συνέδριον, 'council,' specifically 'court of justice' [so LXX Pr 22¹⁰ 26³⁶ 31²³, Ps.-Sol. iv. 1; Josephus, Ant. XIV. v. 4]) is the name of the high court of justice and supreme council, specifically at Jerusalem (Sanh. i. 3; Sotā, ix. 18), called also 'Sanhedrin of Seventy-one' (Sheb. ii. 2), 'the Great Sanhedrin' (Sanh. i. 6; Midd. v. 4) in contradistinction to 'the Little Sanhedrin of Twenty-three,' the Beth Din shel shib'at w' ehad, 'the court of justice of seventy-one' (Sanh. i. 5; Tōs. Sanh. iii. 4) and most frequently Beth Din hag-gadol shebyerushalaim, 'the high court of justice of Jerusalem' (Sotā, i. 4; Gitt. vi. 7; Sanh. xi. 4), also Beth Din hag-gadol shebhlshkath hag-gazit, 'the great court of justice which has its sessions in the hall of hewn stones' (Sifre Dt. 154; Sanh. xi. 2). The older name is γενοῦσα, 'senate' (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 3; 2 Mac 1¹⁰ 44¹¹⁻⁷, 1 Mac 12⁶, Jth 4⁸, and elsewhere; also simply 'the elders' or 'the elders of the people' (1 Mac 7³³ 11²³ 12³⁵ 14³⁰). cf. Zikne'amkā betn yisrael in the ancient eighteen benedictions for the Sanhedrin, zākēn, 'elder,' being the name of the single member of the Sanhedrin = συνεδρος (Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 4). Another name for the Sanhedrin (possibly the Jerusalemic and not national Council of Justice) is βουλῆ (Jos. BJ II. xv. 6, xvi. 2, xvii. 1, v. xiii. 1), whence Jos. ib. II. xvii. 1; Mk 15⁴³ βουλευτής = בֹּיָהָבִים (J. Levy, Neuhebr. u. chald. Wörterbuch über die Talmudim u. Midraschim, 1876-89, i. 199 f.). On Maccabean coins the Sanhedrin is called heber hā-y'hūdīm, 'representative assembly of the Jews' (F. W. Madden, History of Jewish Coinage, 1864, p. 58; A. Geiger, Urschriften und Übersetzungen der Bibel, 1857, p. 121; J. Wellhausen, Die Pharisäer und die Sadducäer, 1874, pp. 29, 34).

2. Origin and history.—The institution is based on Dt 17⁸⁻¹¹ (Sifre and Sanh. 2a) and the seventy elders on Nu 11¹⁶ (Sifre). The Talmudic sources ascribe it to Moses; also that of 'the Little Sanhedrin of Twenty-three' for each tribe after Dt 16¹⁸ (Sanh. 16b, Jer. Sanh. i. 19c; cf. Sotā, 44b; Targ. Jer. Nu 25⁴ 7⁷⁵ 9⁸, Ex 21³⁰ 32²⁶, Lv 24¹²); and speak of its existence under Joshua, Jabez, Jerubbaal, Boaz, Jephthah, Samuel, David, and Solomon, and until the time of the captivity by Nebuchadnezzar (Babu bathrā, 121b; Yomā, 80a; Mak. 23b; Koh. R. 18; Targ. Ru 3¹¹ 4¹, 1 Ch 4¹² 5¹² 18¹⁷, Ps 69¹ 80¹; M.K. 26a; Babā Kammā, 61a; Yeb. 77a; Ber. 3b-4a; Sanh. 16b, 107a; Targ. Est. 1²; Jer. Sanh. i. 18b). Again, during the Second Temple, after the men of the Great Synagogue from Ezra to Simon the Just II. had occupied the place of the Sanhedrin, Talmudic tradition holds that it was re-organized under the zugōth (duumviri [Abōth, i. 4-11; Hag. ii. 2; Peah, ii. 6; Yad, ii. 16; Jer. Sotā, ix. 24a]) and continued in power under such form until the destruction of the Temple, when it was transferred to Jabneh, to Usha, to Sepphoris, and, finally, to Tiberias (Rōsh hash. 31b). This whole view, however, bears the imprint of the schoolhouse, and forms part of the Pharisaic system which in support of the Oral Law postulated an unbroken chain of tradition without any interference by any priestly—that is, Sadducean—authority. In this sense Jose ben Halaphtha, the great 2nd cent. authority for Talmudic historiography, says (Tōs. Sanh. vii. 1; Hag. ii. 9): 'In former times there were no dissensions in Israel. Every legal question that could not be decided in any city was submitted to the Sanhedrin of 23 on the Temple hill, and if not decided there, to the Little Sanhedrin of 23 in the Temple rampart, and if not decided there either, brought for final decision before the Great Sanhedrin in the hall of hewn stones which was in session from morning to evening, never allowing fewer than 23 of its members to be present for the discussion of the subject in the Temple schoolhouse. Thus the Halākah was fixed and developed in Israel. Dissensions arose when the disciples of Hillel and Shammai increased in number and failed to acquire through personal contact with their master the necessary knowledge and thus the doctrine was divided into many doctrines.' As a matter of fact, pre-Exilic history presents nowhere a trace of an institution like the Sanhedrin. The seventy elders invested with spiritual powers (Nu 11¹⁶ 24¹, Ex 24¹ 9; cf. אֲנִי וְאַחֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל [Ex 24¹¹] with נָאָם [Nu 11²⁵]) point to the existence of some sort of representative body of the nation (cf. Ezr 8¹¹ with Ex 3¹⁶ 18¹, Dt 21⁹, 1 K 8¹ 12⁸ 20⁷, 2 K 23¹), but they form no judiciary like the Sanhedrin. The story in 2 Ch 19² of a high court of justice established by king Jehoshaphat, after Dt 17⁸, consisting of Levites, priests, and heads of the families, with two chief members—the high priest to decide the religious, the governor of Judah to decide the monarchical, matters—cannot be adduced as proof of the Mosaic origin of the Sanhedrin, as does D. Hoffmann (Der oberste Gerichtshof, pp. 6, 20), but is, like all the Chronicler's stories, a reflexion of the views of the post-Exilic writer. In fact, it indicates, as pointed out by Wellhausen (*Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels*³, 1886, p. 199), the existence of the Sanhedrin in his time, i.e. in the 4th century. As to the duumviri see below.

The first positive record of the Sanhedrin, under the name of Gerousia, appears in the decree of Antiochus the Great about 200 (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 33). This was an aristocratic body of elders of the nation with the high priest at its head, which had charge of the government of the Jewish people under Persian and then under Ptolemaic and Seleucidæan rule; nor was it different under Roman rule (ib. iv. viii. 17, xi. iv. 8, xx. x.; 1 Mac 12⁶ 13³⁶ 14²⁰, 2 Mac 1¹⁰ 44¹¹⁻⁷). The name Synhedrin (Aramaized Sanhedrin), which denotes chiefly a court of justice, came into popular use under Ptolemaic rule; and, as its Hebrew equivalent, the name Heber hā-Yehūdīm appears on Hasmonæan coins, which read: 'Johanan the high priest, the head, and the Council (representative) of the Jews' (Madden, op. cit., p. 58; Wellhausen, Phar. und Sadd., pp. 29, 34, *Israelit. und jud. Geschichte*⁴, p. 231). A Sanhedrin of the Hasmonæans is mentioned in Sanh. 82a, Abôda Zārā, 36b, which is probably identical with the Pharisaic Sanhedrin (called kenishṭa, 'assembly,' Meg. Ta'ânith, x.), whose triumph over the Sadducean Sanhedrin in the reign of queen Alexandra Salome and under the leadership of Simon b. Shetah was celebrated as a festival. The Sanhedrin seems to have played a political role in the quarrel between Alexandra's two sons, when Gabinius, the Roman governor of Syria in 57 B.C., diminished its power by dividing the country into five districts and placing a Sanhedrin in Sepphoris and Jericho alongside of that at Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XIV. v. 4). Soon afterwards, however, the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem was in full power again when sitting in judgment upon young Herod (ib. XIV. ix. 4), but forty-five of its members fell victims to the terrible revenge of the tyrant. Thus he rose to power, and a new Sanhedrin was chosen by him of servile men who passed sentences of death at his command (ib. XV. i. 2, vi. 2).

Under the Roman procurators when Judæa was shorn of all her sovereignty and independence, the Sanhedrin still continued to represent the supreme power and authority of the Jewish people (Mt 26⁵⁹ and Ac 4¹⁵ 5²¹ 6¹² 22³⁰ 23¹ 24¹⁰). In the war against Rome it directed and organized the struggle, and when towards the last the Zealots took hold of the city of Jerusalem, they appointed their own Sanhedrin in place of the old to have a semblance of authority for their atrocious acts (Jos. BJ II. xv. 6, xvi. 1 ff., iv. v. 4). It must be noticed, however, that Josephus uses the term βουλή in BJ and κοινόν in Vita, 12, 13, 38, etc., instead of Sanhedrin, probably because the latter had become more what he calls (Vita, 12) 'the Sanhedrin of the Jerusalemites,' i.e. a city Senate. With the downfall of the State, the Sanhedrin as a national or political institution ceased to exist (Sôṭā, ix. 11; Eḳah R. v. 16), but under the leadership of Johanan b. Zakkai, Hillel's great disciple, the new Sanhedrin was soon afterwards organized at Jabneh (Jamnia), of an entirely scholastic character, consisting only of teachers of the Law; and the form the new Sanhedrin assumed under his successor Gamaliel II., who took the title of Nasī as the lineal descendant of Hillel, offered to the Talmudic tradition many of the features ascribed to the ancient Sanhedrin.

3. The presidency of the Sanhedrin.—The chief difficulty for the historian lies in the irreconcilable conflict between the Talmudic traditions and the above quoted historical records in Josephus and the NT concerning the presidency of the Sanhedrin. According to the latter, the authenticity of which cannot be questioned, the high priest, as the political head of the nation, was the president. The former assign to the high priest no place in the Sanhedrin (Sanh. ii. 1, 'The high priest can neither bring a case before the Sanhedrin nor be judged by them'; cf. Yômā, 1³, according to which he receives his mandates from the Sanhedrin), and instead have masters of the Pharisean schools placed regularly at its head. Two such masters known under the name of zuggôth (= dummviri), one with the title of Nasī (prince), the other with that of Ab Bēth Dīn ('father of the court of justice'), are recorded to have presided over the Sanhedrin from about the middle of the 2nd to the middle of the 1st cent. B.C. (Hag. ii. 2; cf. Abôth, i. 4-12; Peah, ii. 6; Yad, ii. 16; Jer. Sôṭā, ix. 24a): Jose b. Joezer of Zereda (a relative of Alkimos the high priest) (Ber. R. 65, 18), and most probably identical with the Hasidean leader Razis (?) (2 Mac 14³⁷ 'an elder and father of the Jews') and Jose b. Johanan—the first dummvirate; Joshua b. Perahya and Nittai of Arbela—the second; Simon b. Shetah (contemporary of Alexander Jannæus and relative of queen Alexandra) (H. Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, iii.⁴ [1888] 137; E. Schürer, GJV ii.⁴ 421), and Judah b.

Tabbai—the third; Shemaiah (= Sameas, Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 4) and Abtalion (= Ptolion, ib. xv. i. 1)—the fifth. According to Sheb. 15a, Hillel's successor as Nasī was his son Simon, and he was followed by his son Gamaliel I., and he again by his own son Simon, the last president of the Sanhedrin before the destruction of the Temple. The untrustworthiness of these traditions, however, is shown first of all by the confusion in the sources, some of which place Judah b. Tabbai above Simon b. Shetah, and Shammai above Hillel (Hag. ii. 2, 16b; cf. Sheb. 17a), and then by the significant fact that nowhere else are these men spoken of as Nasī, Hillel being simply called 'the elder' = senator (Suk. 53a and elsewhere), but above all by the direct mention of Sameas and Ptolion (Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 4, xv. i. 1), of Gamaliel I. (Ac 5³⁴) and Simon b. Gamaliel (Jos. Vita, 38), as 'certain members of the Sanhedrin belonging to the Pharisean party,' while in each case the high priest appears as chief of the Sanhedrin. It is, therefore, impossible to escape the conclusion that the conditions existing under Gamaliel II. at the close of the 1st cent. were transferred to former times, and so the title of Nasī (ethnarch) held by the Hillelites down to the 4th cent. (Orig. Epp. ad Africanum, quoted in Schürer, GJV ii.⁴ 248, n. 28) was claimed for Hillel, the ancestor believed to be of Davidic descent (Jos. Vita, 38; Ber. R. xlix. 10; Sanh. 5a); and, finally, the whole system of the dummvirate was carried back to the beginning of Pharisaism.

4. The title Ab Bēth Dīn and the dummvirate.—It is nevertheless unwarranted to dismiss as fictitious, as Schürer, Wellhausen, and Kuenen do, the whole tradition concerning the leadership of the so-called N'siim and the dummvirate. As a matter of fact, the important innovations (tekkā-nôth) ascribed to such masters as Jose b. Joezer, Simon b. Shetah, Hillel, and Gamaliel I. (cf. Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, iii. and iv. [see Index], and Jelski, Die innere Einrichtung des grossen Synedrions zu Jerusalem, pp. 43-81) could have been brought about only under a Pharisean leadership of greater authority on the Law than was the high priest, who as a rule lacked both learning and piety. Apart from this, however, the tradition of a dummvirate is corroborated by Josephus in a remarkable passage which failed to receive the attention its importance deserves. In giving an exposition of the Mosaic constitution, in all probability taken from an older Pharisaic source, he writes (Ant. iv. viii. 14): 'Each city shall have for its magistrates seven men known for their practice of virtue and zeal for righteousness, and to each magistracy two men of the tribe of Levi shall be assigned as assistants [secretaries]. These elected as judges shall be held in the utmost esteem. . . . For the power to judge cometh from God. . . . But if these judges do not know how to decide on matters submitted to them . . . they shall send the undecided case to the holy city, and there shall the high priest and the prophet and the Senate come together and give the final decision.'

It is plain that these rules must have been taken from the practice of the time and regarded as ancient traditional law. Now there is a trace of seven judges instead of the Talmudic three in each city court (Sanh. i. 1), found in the seven city aldermen (tôbē hā'ir [Meg. 26a; cf. Jer. Meg. iii. 1, 74a; Tos. Meg. iii. 1], probably heber hā'ir [Bik. iii. 12; Tôṣ. Peah, iv. 16; Sheb. vii. 9]). And the seven judges recur in Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 38 with reference to Ex 22⁻³, Elohim being taken as judges (cf. Targ. and Mek. to the passage). As governor of Galilee, Josephus appointed seven judges for each town and a Sanhedrin of seventy for the whole province (Jos. BJ II. xx. 5). For the high court at Jerusalem, however, a duumvirate, consisting of the high priest and the prophet, is ordained, and neither Kuenen (Gesamm. Abhandlungen, p. 66) nor Wellhausen (Phar. und Sadd., p. 26) nor Hoffmann (Der oberste Gerichtshof, p. 25) nor Büchler (Das Synedrion in Jerus., p. 62) explains the mention of the prophet here satisfactorily. The fact is that the Law (Dt 17^{9, 12}) mentions alongside of the priest also 'the judge,' implying thereby a man of judicial competence and authority, and thus suggests a sort of duumvirate such as the Chronicler (2 Ch 19¹¹) has. It is easy to see how, in view of the decline of the Sadducean priesthood, the necessity arose of having as the spiritual head of the Sanhedrin a Pharisean scribe who was to be consulted in all difficult questions. Such a scribe could well be called prophet, as the one filled with the Divine spirit of wisdom (Dt 34⁹; cf. Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 46, BJ II. viii. 12; Wis 7²⁷; Didache, x. 7; see also Hor. i. 4, mufia), while as the patriarch he received the title 'Ab Beth Din' (cf. Jg 17¹⁰ 18¹⁹, 2 K 2¹²), and the title 'Aboth' for the ancient sages). It is especially noteworthy that Jose b. Joezer, the first of the duumviri, was called 'the father of the Jews' (2 Mac 14³⁷). The duumvirate was, no doubt, the result of a compromise between Sadducean priesthood and the Pharisean scribes, the Ab Beth Din being for the Pharisees the actual president, whereas the Sadducean high priest was consigned to oblivion, wherefore a later tradition referred the duumvirate to the leaders of the two Pharisean schools of each generation, giving to the foremost one the title of Nasi (cf. J.E., art. 'Nasi'). It is not as president, but as the patriarch, that Gamaliel I. speaks with authority (Ac 5³⁴).

5. Composition and meeting-place of the Sanhedrin.—The Great Sanhedrin consisted of seventy-one members, the seventy elders and the Nasi or president (Sanh. i. 5; cf. BJ II. xx. 5 and iv. v. 4). When Gamaliel II. and Eleazar b. Azariah alternated as presidents, they counted seventy-two (Yad. ii. 5; Zeb. i. 3).

The Little Sanhedrin in the provinces (Sanh. i. 16b) and in Jerusalem, one at the entrance to the Temple hill, the other at the entrance to the Temple Court or the Rampart (Sanh. xi. 1; Tōs. Sanh. ix. 1; Sifre Dt. 152) consisted, according to the Talmudic tradition, of twenty-three. Of the former, one is mentioned as the βουλὴ of Tiberias (Josephus, Vita, 12), whereas the Great Sanhedrin is referred to as the Sanhedrin of Jerusalem. Possibly the Great Sanhedrin of seventy-one was composed of the two Little Sanhedrins, the one on the Temple hill, which may be identified with the Senate of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xx. i. 2, BJ II. xv. 6, xvi. 2), and the other before the Temple court, probably the one concerned with the Temple practice and the priestly legitimacy (Ant. xx. ix. 6), and the main body or the high court, also consisting of twenty-three (Tōs. Sanh. ix. 1), that is, 3 × 23 = 69, besides the patriarch of the court and the president or Nasi. This would also account for the forty-five slain by king Herod, if it may be assumed that the Senate of Jerusalem sided with him (Ant. xv. i. 2).

As to the elements constituting the Sanhedrin, the ruling priests representing the Sadducean party were, according to Josephus (BJ II. xiv. 8, xv. 2 f., xvii. 2 ff., v. i. 5) and the NT (Mt 26³⁰ 27⁴¹ and elsewhere), dominant in influence, and the patriarchs, called 'the men of power' (δυνατοί) in Josephus (loc. cit.), formed the bulk of the Sanhedrin, until king Herod replaced them by homines novi, whereas the Pharisees, who rose to power under Alexandra Salome, were but few in number (Jos. Ant. XIII. xv. 5; Mk 10³³; only the later Gospels mention the Pharisees). Only those were admitted into the Sanhedrin who were of pure blood, so as to be able to intermarry with the priestly families (Sanh. iv. 2). Little historic value can be attached to Jose b. Halaphta's statement (Tōs. Sanh. ix. 1) that the Sanhedrin selected for each city court the one found to be wise, humble, sin-fearing, of blameless character, and popular as judge, and then had him promoted to membership, first of the two Little Sanhedrins in Jerusalem, and finally to the Great Sanhedrin in the hall of hewn stones. The same holds good of the description in Sanh. iv. 3–4, Tōs. Sanh. viii. 1–2, according to which 'the Sanhedrin sat in a semi-circle, the Nasi in the centre and the two secretaries standing at both sides, while the disciples sat before them in three rows according to their rank; and when a vacancy arose, the new member was chosen from the first row, and his place again filled by one in the second row and so forth.' This seems to be a picture taken from the Sanhedrin of Jabneh. Likewise academic are the prerequisites of the Sanhedrin given in Sifre Nu. 92: 'They must be wise, courageous, high-principled (not 'strong' as Bacher has) and humble.' R. Johanan of the 3rd cent. (Sanh. 17b) says: 'They must also be of high stature, of pleasing appearance and of advanced age, conversant with the art of magic and the seventy spoken languages,' to which Judah han-Nasi is said to have added 'the dialectic power by which Levitically unclean things can be proven to be clean.'

There is, however, no cause for questioning the correctness of the tradition that the meeting-place of the Great Sanhedrin was in the hall of hewn stones, the lishkath hag-gāzith on the south side of the great court in which the priests held their daily morning service and where other priestly functions were performed (Midd. v. 4; Tāmīd, ii. iv.). Schürer's identification of lishkath hag-gāzith with the Senate assembly house (βουλὴ) near the Xystos (Jos. BJ v. iv. 2, vi. vi. 3) cannot be accepted in the face of these traditions, which prove that the lishkah (always the name of a Temple cell) must have been within the Temple area.

The Senate house near the Xystos in Josephus may refer, as Bacher thinks, to the time of the removal of the Sanhedrin to the city during the siege (Rōsh hash. 31). Besides this there was a special hall assigned to the high priest and the foremost men of the Sanhedrin called lishkath Parhedrin (παρεδροί), 'the men of the front rank,' also called lishkath buleutin, i.e. 'senators' hall' (Yōmā, i. i. 8b).

6. Functions of the Sanhedrin.—According to the Mishna (Sanh. i. 4), capital punishment was pronounced and executed by the Little Sanhedrin of twenty-three in the various provinces or tribes, but the tribunal of seventy-one in the Temple of Jerusalem was the only body vested with power and authority (1) to pronounce a verdict in a process affecting a tribe, a false prophet, or the high priest; (2) to declare war against a nation not belonging to ancient Canaan or Amalek; (3) to extend the character of holiness to additional parts of the Temple, or of Jerusalem; (4) to appoint Sanhedrin over the tribes; (5) to execute judgment against a city that had lapsed into idolatry. All these points, derived directly or indirectly from Scripture (Jg 21, Dt 13^{7, 15a}; Sanh. 16a f.), refer to a time when the twelve tribes still had their existence, and are consequently theoretical rather than real life issues. Nor can it be taken as an actual practice of the Sanhedrin when it is charged with the burning of the red heifer (Nu 19), or the breaking of the neck of the heifer to atone for a murder the perpetrator of which cannot be found (Dt 21¹⁴), the final judgment of a rebellious elder (Dt 17¹²), the bringing of a guilt offering in the case of an unintentional sin committed by the whole congregation of Israel (Lv 4¹³), the installation of a king or of a high priest (Tōs. Sanh. iii. 4), the ordeal of a woman suspected of adultery (Sotā, i. 4; cf. Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 308), or the fixing of the calendar each new moon (Rōsh hash. ii. 5, 9). It may be taken for certain, however, that the three branches of the government, the political, the religious, and the judicial administration, were centralized in the Sanhedrin; yet at the same time these three different functions were assigned to three separate bodies. Hence mention is made of a Sanhedrin of the judges (Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1), a Beth Din of the priests (Ket. i. 5; Tōs. Sanh. iv. 4), which had in charge also the investigation of the legitimacy of the priesthood (Tōs. Sanh. vii. 1), and the Sanhedrin of the Jerusalemites (Jos. Vita, 12), i.e. the Senate of Jerusalem, to which the political administration of the country was entrusted. Possibly the name τὸ κοινόν, 'the common administration,' used almost exclusively in Vita (12, 13, 38, etc.), refers to this centralization. Hoffmann (op. cit., p. 46) refers the name to the democratic government established by the Zealots (Vita, 39), and compares the Talmudic 'edāh ('congregation') with the Sanhedrin (Sanh. 16a). In all matters of great importance, or in cases when the lower courts could come to no decision, the Great Sanhedrin, composed of three departments (3×23=69), together with the president and the patriarch (Nasi and Ab Beth Din), and forming the supreme tribunal 'from which the law went forth to all Israel' (Sanh. xi. 2; Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 14; Philo, ed. Mangey, ii. 367), gave its decision, which was final and inviolable, and wilful opposition to which on the part of an elder or judge was punished with death. It held its sessions in day-time only, and only on week-days, not on Sabbath and holidays (Tōs. Sanh. vii. 1; Beza, v. 2; Philo, ed. Mangey, i. 450). Cases of capital punishment were not taken up on the eve of Sabbath or of holy days, because the sentence was always to be given on the following day (Sanh. iv. 1). The attendance of at least twenty-three members was required for cases of capital punishment, and unless the full number of seventy-one were present, a majority of one could not decide the condemnation. Talmudic tradition, however, states that forty years (which is a round number) before the destruction of the Temple the right of jurisdiction in cases of capital punishment was taken from Israel (Jer. Sanh. i. 18a; Bab. Shab. 15b). This agrees with Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1, Jn 18³¹, and the whole procedure of the Crucifixion. Otherwise the conflicting Gospel stories concerning the condemnation and crucifixion of Jesus show, to say the least, irregularities for which only the high priests (cf. Jos. Ant. xviii. iii. 3, 'the foremost men') were responsible.

As regards the death penalty on sacrilegious intruders on the Temple ground, this was, as the inscription indicates (see T. Mommsen, Römische Geschichte, v.² [1885] 513), a law against the Zealots sanctioned by the people and the Roman government (see art. 'Zealots' in JE xii. 641^b), and has nothing to do with the Sanhedrin, as Schurer thinks (GJV ii.⁴ 260 f.).

Characteristic of later times is the academic view of the 2nd cent. masters of the Mishna (Mak. i. 10): 'A Sanhedrin that passes a sentence of death once within 7 years, others say, every 70 years, and still others, only once, deserves the epithet murderous.' The Mishnaic rules of procedure in cases of capital punishment (Sanh. iv. 2, 5) may accordingly be regarded as of academic rather than historical value. The Sanhedrin had its jurisdiction over the Jews throughout the world as far as their religious life was concerned (Rōsh hash. i. 3 f.; cf. W. Bousset, Religion des Judæums, 1903, p. 83). As a religious tribunal it outlasted the Temple and State of Judæa, existing in the shape of a body of academicians down to the 5th cent. when its name was transferred to the seventy members of the academy of Babylonia called Kallah ('the circle').

SAPPHIRA.—See ANANIAS.

SAPPHIRE (σάφειρος, from τετ).—Sapphire is the second foundation stone of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21¹⁹), an idea probably suggested by Is 54¹¹. Doubtless the lapis lazuli is meant (so Rev 21¹⁹ RVm). According to Theophrastus (Lap. 23) the sapphire is 'as it were spotted with gold dust' (ὡς περ χρυσόπαστος), and Pliny (HN xxxvii. 38) alludes to its 'aureus pulvis,' and again (39), 'in iis [sapphiris] enim aurum punctis conlucet cæruleis.' This description does not suit the stone now called sapphire, but is fully applicable to the lapis lazuli, which 'frequently contains disseminated particles of iron-pyrites of gold-like appearance' (EB⁹ xvi. 199). In Ex 24¹⁰ the LXX says that under God's feet is ὡσεὶ ἔργον πλίνθου σαπφείρου—a fine simile for the star-gemmed azure sky (cf. Ezk 1²⁶). The modern sapphire is probably the ancient βάκινθος, or 'jacinth' (q.v.).

SARAH (Σάρρα).—(1) Sarah has a place in the Roll of Faith (He 11¹¹). By faith even she herself (καὶ αὐτῇ) won the title to this great honour. The meaning of αὐτῇ is doubtful: it may be expanded into 'though she was the weaker vessel' (vas infirmius, Bengel); or, 'though she was barren' (D adds the gloss στεῖρα); or, 'though she had been so incredulous.' She received strength for conception (εἰς καταβολὴν σπέρματος), believing, even when she was beyond the proper time of life (παρὰ καιρὸν ἡλικίας), that God could by a miracle give her a child. Motherhood after long childlessness is a recurrent theme in Bible narratives: Rebekah, Rachel, the mother of Samson, of Samuel, of John Baptist had each a happiness like Sarah's. (2) St. Peter (1 P 3⁶) praises the holy women of the olden time, who trusted in God and were in subjection to their husbands, 'as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord.' Her reverential use of this term in reference to her husband occurs but once (Gn 18¹²), and would in itself be an insufficient ground for making her a pattern of wifely obedience, especially as words of quite another import stand recorded against her (16⁵). But the Apostle evidently felt that the dutiful word was weighted with the love and loyalty of a lifetime.

SARDIS (Σάρδεις, Lat. Sardes or Sardis; the sing. form Σάρδης is found in Ptolemy).—Sardis, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia, was one of the most ancient and renowned cities of Asia Minor. Built on a strong hill projecting, with smooth and steep flanks, from the northern side of Mt. Tmolus, it commanded the wide and fertile plain through which the Hermus, about 3 miles N., flowed westward to the Ægean Sea. On three sides it was deemed inaccessible, the only approach being the neck of land which joined the hill to the Tmolus range. It was thus an ideal capital in days of primitive warfare between Lydia and Phrygia. In later times a second city was built around the foot of the hill, 1500 ft. lower than the acropolis.

In Sardis the kings of Lydia, whom the Greeks counted 'barbarians' (Herod. i. 6), reigned in Oriental splendour and luxury. But centuries of material prosperity made the Lydian character soft and voluptuous, and the fall of Cræsus, whom Solon warned in vain of the fickleness of fortune, became to the Greeks the supreme illustration of the danger of careless security.

When Cyrus, king of Persia, besieged the city (549 B.C.), and offered a reward to the soldier who should first mount the wall, 'a Mardian named Hyroæades endeavoured to climb up on that part of the citadel where no guard was stationed, because there did not appear to be any danger that it would be taken on that part, for on that side the citadel was precipitous and impracticable. . . . Having seen a Lydian come down this precipice the day before, for a helmet that had rolled down, and carry it up again, he noticed it carefully, and reflected on it in his mind; he thereupon ascended the same way, followed by divers Persians; and when great numbers had gone up, Sardis was thus taken and the town plundered' (Herod. i. 84). The same daring exploit was performed by the Cretan Lagoras, who scaled the heights and captured the citadel for Antiochus the Great (218 B.C.). After the defeat of Antiochus at Magnesia (190 B.C.), Sardis was gifted by the Romans to the kings of Pergamos. From the time of Alexander the Great it had enjoyed the constitution of a self-governing city of the Greek type, and under the Romans it became the head of a conventus juridicus in the Hermus valley. It still amassed wealth, but its ancient power and prestige were gone. The once brave, warlike, victorious Sardians had long been despised as 'tender-footed Lydians,' who could only 'play on the cithara, strike the guitar, and sell by retail' (Herod. i. 55, 155). Living on the traditions of a splendid past, Sardis sank into a second-rate provincial town. It seemed to have no power of material or moral self-recovery. In A.D. 17 it was destroyed by an earthquake, and rebuilt with the aid of Imperial funds.

The delineation which the Apocalypse gives of the Church of Sardis is singularly like that which history gives of the city. It is scarcely possible to imagine that the writer was unconscious of the resemblance when he added touch after touch to his picture, and the parallel could not but strike every intelligent reader. In the time of Domitian the Christian community needed to be told humiliating truths regarding itself. Years of evangelism had not delivered it from the spirit of the city which boasted her great name and fame, while she lapped herself in soft Lydian airs and closed her eyes to the dangers of overweening self-confidence. Within a single generation the Church is repeating the city's history of a thousand years. (1) It has a name to live and is dead (Rev 3¹). It is now only apparently what it once was really—a living Church. The youthful vitality is spent, its spiritual renown has become a nominis umbra. Religiously as well as politically decadent, Sardis seemed incapable of reanimation. Ramsay characterizes it as 'the city of death.' (2) The Church, like the city, has 'fulfilled' none of its works. Beginning with great ambitions, high hopes, and noble endeavours, it has lacked the grace of perseverance, and so has realized nothing. After a springtime rich in promise, how meagre the harvest! (3) The Church is warned that it must watch, if it is not to be surprised as by a thief in the night (3³). To any public-spirited Sardinian that was 'the most unkindest cut of all,' for in the critical times of history Sardis had always been caught napping. (4) It is implied, though not directly asserted, that the Church of Sardis had defiled its garments with the immorality of the soft and dissolute city which had been the age-long worshipper of Cybele, when it ought by this time to be like an urbs candida, wearing the white robes of purity and victory. No one of the Seven Churches of the province of Asia, not even Laodicea, is so severely rebuked as Sardis. All the more warm and tender are the words of praise addressed to the few who have kept themselves unspotted 'even in Sardis.' Their virtue has a peculiar grace because it blooms in such an atmosphere, and the reward of their purity will be fellowship with the perfectly pure—God and His holy angels.

SARDIUS (σάρδιον, a much better attested form in Rev 4³ than the TR σάρδιος = Vulg. 'sardinus').—The writer of the Apocalypse compares Him that sits upon the throne of heaven to a sardius (Rev 4³, AV 'sardine stone'). The sixth foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem is a sardius (21²⁰). This stone is doubtless the modern orange-red or golden 'sard,' which is a translucent quartz coloured with iron, nearly allied with the clearer and lighter-tinted carnelian. The Greeks commonly connected the word with Sardis, where the stone was said to have been first found; but it may be related to the Persian zard, 'yellow.' Pliny says that the sardius of Babylonia was more highly prized than that of Sardis (HN xxxvii. 7). This stone was more frequently engraved than any other. It was used for Assyrian cylinder seals, Egyptian scarabs, and early Greek and Etruscan gems.

SARDONYX (σαρδόνυξ).—The sardonyx is the fifth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21²⁰). This stone is a beautiful variety of onyx, consisting, as the name implies, of a layer or sard (or of carnelian) with one of white chalcidony, or presenting several alternating layers of these minerals. The finest kind known to ancient writers—now called the 'Oriental sardonyx'—had at least three strata—a black base, an intermediate band of white chalcidony, and a superficial layer of red or brown. The black was regarded as typifying humility, the white chastity, and the red modesty or martyrdom. The sardonyx was frequently used for seals and cameos. The best kind was obtained from India or Arabia. Imitations are made by cementing together stones of the required colours, or by placing a sard or carnelian, coated with sodium carbonate, on a red-hot iron and so producing a white layer.

SATAN.—See DEVIL.

SAUL (Σαούλ).—Saul the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, is mentioned in St. Paul's address at Pisidian Antioch as the first king whom God gave to Israel. After he had reigned 40 years, God removed him, and raised up David to be king over Israel, a man after His heart (Ac 13²¹⁻²²). Saul of Tarsus could not fail to be profoundly interested in the career of the great king whose name he bore and to whose tribe he belonged. The story of the hero who was called against his will to the throne, and who lived and died fighting for the liberty of his country, has all the elements of high tragedy. By separating the later from the earlier and more authentic narrative contained in 1 Sam., historical criticism enables the reader to understand more fully and to appraise more highly the real services of this protagonist who turned the tide of Philistine conquest into defeat and paved the way for the still greater king who consolidated the Hebrew monarchy. SCEVA.—See EXORCISM.

SCHISM.—This word occurs only once in the NT, viz. in 1 Co 12²⁵. St. Paul, in writing to the Corinthians on spiritual gifts, teaches them that one member of the Church should not look down upon another because he has not the same spiritual gift. All members are necessary to the perfection of the Body of Christ. He illustrates this from the analogy of the human body, showing that even the smallest member is necessary to its perfection and that 'there should be no schism in the body.' In this passage σχίσμα has its simple meaning of 'rent' or 'division.' The Gr. word occurs in other passages, where it is tr. 'divisions.' The later ecclesiastical use of 'schism' does not occur in the NT. See HERESY, DIVISIONS.

SCHOOL.—See EDUCATION, TYRANNUS.

SCHOOLMASTER.—This is the AV rendering of παιδαγωγός in Gal 3⁴⁶ (1 Co 4¹⁵, 'instructor'), but in the RV it has given place to 'tutor' (q.v.) in both passages. The latter rendering is scarcely less inadequate than the former. The παιδαγωγός is to be distinguished from the παιδονόμος, who is one of the official guardians of public instruction in a Greek city, and from the παιδευτής, the educator who trains the youth and corrects his foolishness (Ro 2²⁰), and from the διδάσκαλος, the teacher who actually imparts instruction (Ac 13¹, 1 Co 12²⁸, and elsewhere). His office in the old Greek system of education was to accompany the children of the family to and from their schools, the school of the music-master and the school of the physical trainer. He carried the books and instruments, the lyre and writing materials of his pupils. He was responsible for their guardianship and protection out of school hours, and was expected to protect them, not only from danger to life and limb, but also from the perils of evil companionship. His pupils remained under his charge till they reached the age of puberty, when they were supposed to be able to care for themselves. His status was that of a slave for the most part, but the most respected and trustworthy of the household; and care was taken that he should be correct in his language and should not tell stories to his charges likely to corrupt or deprave their morals. He appears frequently on the Greek stage both in tragedy and in comedy. Only on rare occasions was he admitted to the presence of his master's daughters. Among the Romans the pædagogus attended on girls as well as boys, but Roman girls were allowed to appear out of doors as Greek girls were not. He also gave home instruction to the child, and as he was a Greek-speaking slave, he taught him Greek, which in the days of the Empire was thought a good foundation for learning. The Roman pædagogi, however, under the degeneration of pagan manners in the Empire, soon got a bad name.

In the Galatian reference St. Paul represents the Law as exercising a severe but salutary moral influence calculated to make those who were under it feel the need of something better, and to bring them to Christ. As Lightfoot says (Galatians, ad loc.), 'as well in his inferior rank, as in his recognised duty of enforcing discipline, the pædagogus was a fit emblem of the Mosaic law. But the context of the passage, dwelling upon the close tutelage and supervision of an exacting Law, points not only to the satisfaction, but also to the liberty and devotion as of sons, to be found in Christ.

The Fathers liked to think of Christ Himself, the Incarnate Word, as the παιδαγωγός. One of the works of Clement of Alexandria is so designated. The παιδαγωγός is 'God in the form of man undefiled, minister to the Father's will, the unsullied image of God' (i. 2). He is ὁ πάντα φιλανθρωπος, the True Friend of Man (i. 1), and He trains His children both by chastisement and by love to beauty of character.

SCIENCE.—The word 'science' (γνῶσις) occurs only once in the NT, in 1 Ti 6²⁰, and then only in the AV. The Revisers use the word 'knowledge,' and this gives its real meaning. The knowledge which the Apostle has in view and here condemns was a mystical interpretation of the OT, and particularly its legal parts. But the age of science, as this word is now understood, had not then arrived; and the word in its modern significance is nowhere found in NT writings. J. W. LIGHTLEY.

SCORPION (σκορπίος).—The only books in the NT in which reference is made to the scorpion are the Gospel according to St. Luke and the Apocalypse. Scorpions are mentioned three times in the apocalyptic vision of the Fifth Trumpet or the First Woe (Rev 9^{2, 4, 10}), and on each occasion they form part of the description of the locusts themselves or of their mission. These locusts have the power of scorpions while their tails also resemble that of a scorpion and are similarly armed with stings. The sting of the scorpion was proverbial (cf. 1 K 12^{14, 14}, 2 Ch 10^{14, 14}, Ezk 2⁶, Lk 10¹⁹), but is seldom fatal. The mission of the locusts is thus not to slay, but to inflict pain worse than death itself.

Scorpions belong to the Arachnidæ or spider family. They are common in all warm climates, and are especially ubiquitous in the wilderness of Sinai (cf. Dt 8¹⁵). During the cold weather they lie dormant, but when it becomes hot they emerge from their hiding-places and make their way even into houses. More than eight species have been noted in Palestine. They vary in size and colour; the largest and most dangerous species is black, and measures about 6 ins. in length. Others are yellow, white, black, or reddish, while others again are striped. The females carry their young on their backs until they are old enough to provide for themselves. They swarm in every part of the country and have a particular partiality for ruins (cf. Ezk 2⁶), where they secrete themselves in the chinks of the walls, as well as under the loose stones. The scorpion resembles a lobster in shape, only it has a jointed tail, which, when running, it holds over its back in a threatening attitude. The tail has a venomous sting, and the reptile always attacks with its tail in this position, with the result that it sometimes strikes its own head and commits suicide thereby. It is carnivorous and feeds chiefly on beetles and locusts, and this fact adds to the hideousness and the formidability of the apocalyptic locusts, whose very tails are compared to the scorpions which normally feed on them. SCOURGING.—Among both Jews and Romans the common mode of corporal punishment to which offenders were subjected was that of scourging.

1. Jewish scourging.—The supreme Sanhedrin at Jerusalem and the local Sanhedrins connected with all the synagogues were in the habit of punishing by scourging secondary misdemeanours, civil and ecclesiastical. Their authority for the infliction was derived from the statute of the Mosaic Law (Dt 25¹⁻³) which ordained that the misdemeanant should receive a number of stripes not exceeding forty. To ensure that the legal limit was not exceeded, the number was restricted in practice to thirty-nine for one offence. These were administered with a scourge composed of leather strands, the usual executioner being the Chazzan, or attendant, of the synagogue (Lk 4²⁰).

Among the sufferings which he heroically endured, St. Paul records his subjection to this form of severe maltreatment on five different occasions, not one of which is mentioned in the Acts (2 Co 11²⁴). Jesus warned His disciples to expect the same sort of persecution at the hands of the Jewish authorities (Mt 10¹⁷), a forewarning which was soon verified. The beating (δέπειν) which the apostles received on the occasion of their second collision with the Sanhedrin was that with stripes (Ac 5⁴⁰). During the period of his career as persecutor, St. Paul searched out the members of every synagogue suspected of being believers, and endeavoured to secure their retraction by the use of the same drastic method (22¹⁹; cf. 26¹¹).

2. Roman scourging.—(a) Roman scourging is distinguished from Jewish in 2 Co 11²⁴, by the fact that the former was inflicted with rods (ραβδισθῆναι). St. Paul suffered this mode of punishment on three occasions. Only one of these inflictions, that shared by Silas, is recorded in the Acts (16-). In carrying out the orders of the Roman magistrates, the lictors would seem to have executed their task with merciless rigour (v. 23). According to the Porcian Law (300 B.C.), scourging was forbidden in the case of Roman citizens, this particular penalty being reserved for slaves and foreigners; and to make matters worse, the magistrates acted also ultra vires by failing to investigate the case fully (v. 37). (b) In the absence of lictors, the flagellation was inflicted with a different instrument, consisting of a 'knout' or 'cat' with 'lashes of knotted cord, or even wire, which might be loaded with knuckle bones or other cruel aggravations.' This dreadful weapon was sometimes employed for extorting confession from persons accused of crime. The chiliarch who had St. Paul under arrest ordered the whip (μαστιξ) to be used for this purpose. Arrangements for subjecting the Apostle to the terrible ordeal had been completed by the centurion, but he escaped it by a successful assertion of his rights as a Roman citizen (22²⁴⁻²⁹).

3. Among the heroes of faith mentioned in He 11 some had trial of scourgings (v. 36), the reference being to tortures inflicted by Jewish or heathen persecutors (2 Mac 7¹).

SCRIBE.—Judaism was a religious system which regulated the lives of its adherents in the minutest particulars. The necessary regulations were contained partly in a written Law, partly in a mass of oral tradition and authoritative precedents. Hence a class was needful who should make it their business to preserve and expound these. This class was the scribes.

1. Functions.—(a) Their primary function has just been indicated. It involved the making of accurate copies of the Scriptures, and the laborious memorizing of tradition. (b) In the synagogue a scribe acted as the expounder of Scripture to the people. (c) The scribe was a lawyer who had to decide all legal disputes. (d) To meet new cases for which there was no regulation written or oral, and no precedent to guide, he had to determine what the law should be. Hence the mass of traditions and precedents assumed overwhelming proportions. (e) The education of the young in schools was the charge of the scribe. As the Law was regulative of all human activities, the knowledge of the scribe was encyclopædic. In his person were combined the offices now distributed among clergymen, doctors, lawyers, and teachers.

2. Training.—The period of training for such a profession was naturally long. When it was finished and he had been called to a particular post, the scribe was ordained, and received the title Rabbi (see DOCTOR).

3. Schools.—Scribes were divided into various schools. While doubtless the majority were Pharisees, the Sadducees had their scribes also (implied in Ac 23⁸). Further, the Pharisee scribes were divided into two great schools, the followers of Hillel and of Shammai. It was only on points of detail, and on no fundamental principle, that they divided. On the whole, the school of Shammai was the more rigid.

4. Influence.—The influence of the scribes was naturally very great, and they were highly esteemed. After the fall of Jerusalem, they became more important than ever. Temple and priesthood disappeared. The synagogue became the sole centre of Jewish religious and national life, and the scribe the most important official (see under PHARISEES).

5. Relation to the early Church.—In the early history of Christianity we have only three references to the scribes. (1) Gamaliel, a scribe and the teacher of St. Paul (Ac 22³), on the occasion of the trial of St. Peter and his associates counselled toleration, and his advice was accepted (5^{34ff.}). (2) When St. Paul was on his trial, the Pharisaic scribes repeated Gamaliel's advice (23⁹). (3) On the other hand, 6¹ mentions scribes among those who proceeded against Stephen. Probably we should regard them as Sadducees. But in nearly all cases of Jews rising against Christians, especially outside Jerusalem, we may be sure that the scribes, the recognized leaders of the people, were the instigators.

SCRIPTURE.—1. Terms.—The general designation for 'Scripture' is γραφή or plur. γραφαί, the former occurring some 30 times in the NT (Gospels 14, Acts 3, Paul 9, Catholic Epistles 5), the latter about 20 times (Gospels 10, Acts 4, Paul 5, Catholic Epistles 2). The terms are almost invariably preceded by the definite article, the only exceptions being in Jn 19³⁷, 2 Ti 3¹⁶, where the article before γραφῆ is replaced by ἐτέρα and πᾶσα respectively, 1 P 2⁶, 2 P 1²⁰, where γραφῆ has become a real proper name, and Ro 1² 16²⁶, where the Scriptures are more explicitly characterized as γραφαὶ ἁγίαι and γραφαὶ προφητικαί, 'holy Scriptures' and 'prophetic Scriptures.' In one text, 2 Ti 3¹⁵, another designation is used, viz. λεπὰ γράμματα, 'sacred writings' (a direct translation of the Hebrew phrase ספרים קדשים), which we find also in Philo and Josephus.

2. Connotation of terms. — Both γραφῆ and γράμμα are derived from the verb γράφω, 'draw,' 'inscribe,' or 'write,' and thus suggest writing in the most general sense. Classical Greek shows the transition in each case from the rudimentary conception of written characters, or the art of alphabetic writing, to the higher thought of real literature. In the NT γράμμα alone shows any such variety of meaning. Here the word is applied, not merely to the 'letter' of the Law as contrasted with the living, life-giving spirit (Ro 2²⁹, 2 Co 3⁶), but in its plural form γράμματα to the elements of penmanship (Gal 6¹), literature as a subject of study (Jn 7¹⁵, Ac 26²⁴), and documents of various kinds, such as the debtors' bills reduced by the unjust steward (Lk 16⁶), letters of commendation or the reverse (Ac 28¹), the writings of Moses (Jn 5⁴⁷), as well as the Sacred Scriptures (in the phrase cited from 2 Ti 3¹⁶). The parallel term γραφῆ is used only in the last sense. The question has been widely canvassed whether the singular γραφῆ applies to the Scriptures as a unified whole, or to some single section or 'passage' of Scripture. In his famous note on Gal 3²² Lightfoot lays down the principle that 'the singular γραφῆ in the NT always means a particular passage of Scripture,' though in a subsequent comment on Ro 4³, while insisting that St. Paul's practice 'is absolute and uniform,' he admits a doubt as to St. John's usage. On the other hand, Warfield maintains that the prevailing classical application of γραφῆ to entire documents, carrying with it 'a general implication of completeness,' extends also to the NT,—that 'in its more common reference' the term 'designates the OT, to which it is applied in its completeness as a unitary whole' (DCC ii. 586). In the present writer's judgment the former contention vindicates itself, even in the Fourth Gospel and in the crucial text Gal 3—(the Apostle having in mind the passages of Scripture adduced either in 2¹⁶ 3¹⁰ or in the longer argument of Ro 3²¹). The only clear instances of γραφῆ applied to the Scriptures as a whole appear to be found in 1 P 2⁶ and 2 P 1²⁰, where the word is already a proper name, the full development of the personifying tendency observable in Gal 3². As regards the significance of the plural γραφαί there is general agreement. Where the term is qualified by the adjectives ἁγίαι and προφητικαί (cf. above), the reference is to the character, not the scope, of the Scriptures. In 2 P 3¹⁶ αἱ καταὰ γραφαί are most probably to be understood of apostolic writings. But the technical phrase αἱ γραφαί undoubtedly denotes the body of Scriptural writings as an organic unity, with a spirit and character of its own.

3. Authority of Scripture. — The peculiar quality of the Scriptures is indicated by the three defining adjectives, ἁγίαι, λεπὰ, and προφητικαί, the notions of 'holiness' and 'sacredness' bringing the Books into direct relationship with God, and that of 'prophecy' leading forward to the revelation of the mystery of God in Christ. The high Jewish theory of the inspiration of Scripture is fully accepted in the NT. The term θεόπνευστος, 'God-inspired' (cf. Heb. מְּנִיחַ הָאֵלֹהִים), applied to Scripture in all its parts (πᾶσα γραφή), is found indeed only in 2 Ti 3¹⁶; but the theory underlies the whole attitude of the NT writers to the older revelation. 'No prophecy ever came by the will of man: but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit' (2 P 1²¹). Thus the words of Moses, David, Isaiah, and the other prophets may be attributed directly to God (Ro 9⁵, He 1^{5a} 5^{5a}), or the Holy Spirit (Ac 1¹⁶, He 3^{7a} 10^{15a}), or God speaking through the Holy Spirit (Ac 4^{25a}, He 4^{5a} 8^{5a}), or even the Messiah (He 2^{12a} 10^{5a}). As the 'living oracles' of God, then, the Scriptures are the final norm alike of faith and of conduct. The true servant of God believes 'all things which are according to the law, and which are written in the prophets' (Ac 24¹⁴), and sets an example to others not, even in their estimate of the apostles, to go 'beyond the things which are written' (1 Co 4⁶). The appeal to 'what is written' (καθὼς γέγραπται or γεγραμμένον ἔστιν, the Christian rendering of the Rabbinic formula מִכְּתוּבִים or מִתּוֹרָה) is decisive, not merely in clinching a theological argument (esp. in Romans and Galatians), but in interpreting the mission and person of Christ, and the significance of His death, resurrection, and ascension (Ac 2^{25a}, 1 Co 15⁴, He 2^{5a}), with the subsequent outpouring of the Spirit, the persecution of the Church, the rejection of the Jews and mission to the Gentiles, the resurrection of the body, and the final salvation (Ac 1^{6a}, Ro 2²⁴ 8³⁶ 9^{25a}, 1 Co 1^{18a} 15^{45a}, etc.), and equally as the authoritative guide to Christian conduct (cf. Ac 23⁵, Ro 12¹⁹, 1 Co 9⁹, 2 Co 4¹³ 6¹⁷ 8¹⁵, Eph 6^{2a}, 1 P 1¹⁶ 3^{10a}); for 'whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that through patience and through comfort of the scriptures we might have hope' (Ro 15⁴), while the very quality of their 'inspiration' is tested by their helpfulness 'for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for discipline which is in righteousness' (2 Ti 3¹⁶). It must be admitted, however, that the new spirit of Christianity can move freely within the limits of the older Scriptures only by a frequent straining, and even 'wresting,' of their natural sense (see art. OLD TESTAMENT).

4. Extent of Scripture. — The canon of the NT writers was that inherited from the Jewish Church, and thus corresponded to our OT. There is frequent reference to the canonical groups of the 'Law' and the 'Prophets.' Of the Hagiographa, the Books of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job (in 1 Co 3¹⁹) are explicitly cited as Scripture, while a phrase from Ec 7²⁰ is introduced in the remarkable conflate of OT texts in Ro 3^{10a}, with the formula καθὼς γέγραπται. Though the remaining books are passed over in silence, there is no real reason to doubt that the writers knew and recognized the full Jewish canon. In the NT, too, there is no such sense of the inferiority of the Hagiographa as haunted the Jewish Rabbis. The whole book is of God, and bears witness to Him and His salvation. In addition to OT texts there are numerous allusions to apocryphal literature, such as the Wisdom of Ben Sira, the Wisdom of Solomon, 1 and 2 Maccabees, the Book of Enoch, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Assumption of Moses (see art. QUOTATIONS). It is remarkable, however, that the usual formula of Scriptural quotation is nowhere attached to apocryphal texts, the only approach to such canonical recognition being found in the 'prophesying' of Enoch in Jude 14. Though the NT writers follow the LXX, they apparently regard the Palestinian canon as alone authoritative in the full sense of the term. Naturally their own writings have not yet attained to the dignity of Scripture; but a true feeling for the spiritual value of apostolic letters is already evident in 2 P 3¹⁵, and the application to these writings of the technical term γραφαί shows how easy and inevitable was the extension of the Canon to cover both the OT and the NT.

SCROLL (ROLL) [βύλλον, ῥυλ].—So long as writing material was manufactured from the papyrus plant, the usual form of a book was that of the volumen or roll, wound round a stick or sticks. The modern form of book, called in Latin codex, did not come into use till the 3rd cent. of our era, when parchment (περγαμηνή, from Pergamos, where it originated) began to supersede papyrus. According to Pliny (HN xiii. 11 f.), the standard roll (scapus) consisted of 20 sheets (shedæ or plagulae) joined together with paste. Rolls, however, were often much longer; the longest Egyptian one known measures 144 ft. To this day the Scriptures are always read in the synagogue from rolls, never from a codex. One of the most impressive eschatological metaphors was suggested by the idea of the once familiar βύλλον—'and the heaven was removed as a scroll when it is rolled up' (ὡς βύλλον ἐλισσόμενον, Rev 6¹⁴ || Is 34⁴, 'et cælum recessit sicut liber involutus' [Vulg.]); 'a unique simile, reminding us of the later Stoic conception of the sky as a βύλος θεου, of which heavenly bodies are the στοιχεῖα or characters' (T. K. Cheyne, *The Prophecies of Isaiah*⁴, 1886, i. 195).

SCYTHIAN (Σκυθῆς).—The Scythians were a barbarous nomadic tribe of Indo-Germanic origin living in the region between the Caucasus Mountains and the Caspian Sea. The Greek colonists who settled on the northern shores of the Black Sea in the 7th cent. B.C. found the South Russian steppe in their possession. Their name 'Scythians' is first found in Hesiod (Strabo, vii. iii. 7, 8), while Herodotus (iv. 1-82, 97-142) gives a great deal of information regarding the people, although the fact that the Greeks soon came to extend the name 'Scythian' to all the nations to the north and north-east of the Black Sea makes some of the statements of Greek writers regarding them questionable.

The Scythians proper were a purely nomadic race living on the South Russian steppe the usual life of nomads, moving from place to place as the needs of their flocks demanded. Herodotus (iv. 46, 114, 121) tells us that the men rode on horseback while the women were conveyed in wagons drawn by oxen. They lived on boiled flesh, mares' milk, and cheese. Like most barbarians, they existed in a condition of filth, never washing themselves, and the women daubed themselves with paste containing the dust of fragrant woods and removing it the second day (iv. 75). Hippocrates (ed. Littré, ii. 72) informs us that they were not a very hardy race, suffering greatly from dysentery and rheumatism, and being soft and flabby in body.

The cruelty of the whole race and the despotism of their kings were notorious in the ancient world. When the king put a man to death all the male relations of the unfortunate victim were slain as well, for fear of blood revenge. When engaged in battle, the Scythian warrior drank the blood of the first of the foe he slew, using the skull as a drinking cup. No one was allowed to share in the booty who did not bring the head of a foeman to the king. The scalps of those slain in battle were tanned and hung on the bridle of the warrior (Herod. iv. 64 f.). The eyes of those taken captive and held as slaves were put out. The kings were invested with absolute despotic powers. On their death a vast multitude of slaves and even free-born servants were slain and buried in great funeral mounds along with horses and vessels of gold and silver.

The Scythians first come into history in connexion with their invasion of Asia and particularly of Media in the 7th cent. B.C. At this time there took place one of those great movements among the uncivilized peoples of the north which the Germans call a Völkerwanderung. Pressed on by Asiatic tribes, the Scythians seem to have driven the Cimmerians into Asia Minor and invaded Media. Herodotus speaks (i. 103-105) of a great victory of the Scythians over Cyaxares and the Medes which compelled the latter to raise the siege of Nineveh. Thereafter the victorious hordes overran all Asia, plundering at will for thirty years, from 634-604 B.C., till the Medes again under Cyaxares destroyed most of them after making them drunk at a banquet (i. 106). He also tells (i. 105) of king Psammetichus, who died 611 B.C., buying off these northern invaders who had come as far south as Philistia. The panic of these invading hordes reached Palestine, and several times the land seems to have been threatened and actually overrun with marauding bands. The reports of warriors fighting on horseback with bow and arrows, and drinking the blood of the slain, were fitted to appeal to the imagination of the Hebrew prophets, who thought of the messengers of God's wrath on a sinful nation. Jeremiah's description of 'the evil coming from the north' (1³ 4⁶ 5^{15a}. 6¹) and of the mighty nation of riders and bowmen, as well as Zephaniah's picture of the Day of the Lord, was probably suggested by the Scythian invasion and the terror it inspired. The memory of this invasion was perpetuated in the name Scythopolis, which was given to the old town Beth-shean (Σκυθων πόλις, Jth 3¹⁰; cf. Σκυθωπολείται, 2 Mac 12³⁰), which was probably taken, and, as Pliny (HN v. 16) and G. Syncellus (Chronographia, ed. P. J. Goar, Venice, 1729, p. 171) state, rebuilt by the remnant of the Scythians who remained after the main body was bought off by the king of Egypt.

To the Jews the name 'Scythian' became synonymous with 'barbarian.' Just as terrors which are only partially known assume gigantic proportions, so these Scythians, by their rapid descent on Palestine, their unwonted appearance, their savage cruelty, and their short sojourn, impressed the imagination. They became the symbol of savagery, inhumanity, barbarity, treachery, cruelty, and perhaps under the names Gog and Magog (q.v.) became types of the evil world-powers opposed to the Kingdom of God. Thus Josephus (Ant. i. vi. 1) identifies Gog and Magog of Ezk 38. 39 with the Scythians. When the apostle Paul is speaking of the absolute way in which the gospel of Christ abolishes all racial distinctions, he mentions in the list 'Greek and Jew . . . barbarian, Scythian' (Col 3¹¹), where undoubtedly 'Scythian' is referred to as being universally regarded as the lowest in the scale of humanity, the most savage of barbarians—'Scythæ barbaris barbariores' (Bengel) (cf. J. B. Lightfoot, *Colossians*², 1879, p. 216). Even Scythians, the Apostle maintains, can be renewed unto the knowledge of Jesus Christ and become one in Him along with members of other races. Justin Martyr, the apologist (Dial. 28), in extolling Christianity, refers to its having room for Scythians and Persians, the ferocity of the former and the licentiousness of the latter being notorious, while the pseudo-Lucian (Philoputris, 17) satirizes Christianity for suggesting that Scythians should have any place in heaven. The opponents of Christianity, such as Celsus and the pseudo-Lucian, could not understand a religion which had a place for those so low in the scale of humanity as the Scythians. The Apostle, on the other hand, gloried in a religion which could redeem and elevate the most degraded.

SEA (θαλασσα).—The term is employed in apostolic history to designate (1) a large body of water or collection of waters; (2) the Red Sea; (3) the Mediterranean Sea; (4) with γῆ and οὐρανός, the whole created universe; and (5) the 'sea of glass' before the throne of God.

1. A large body of water or collection of waters (Ac 27^{30, 38, 40, 41}, 28⁴, Ro 9⁷, 2 Co 11²⁶, He 11¹², Ja 1⁶, *Jude*¹², Rev 7¹⁻³ 8^{3, 9} 10^{2, 5, 8} 12¹ 13¹ 16³ 18^{17, 19, 21} 20^{8, 13} 21¹· cf. Ac 27⁵, πῆλαγος; Ja 3¹, εὐδαίος).—In the first of these passages, the sailors with Paul on his memorable voyage to Rome, pretending that additional anchors from the prow of the vessel would help to steady the ship, and that they must go off in a boat to carry them out to cables' length rather than drop them over the prow, 'lowered the boat into the sea' (Ac 27³⁰). But he saw through their scheme and warned the centurion. Later they cast the cargo of wheat into the sea (*v.*³⁸); and again they loosened the cables of the anchors and let them fall off into the sea (*v.*⁴⁰). Then, chancing on a sand bank between two seas, in the narrow channel leading into St. Paul's Bay, between the little island of Salmonetta and the mainland of Melita, they ran the vessel aground (*v.*⁴¹). Going on shore, the barbarians, seeing a viper clinging to Paul's hand, regarded him as a murderer, whom, though he had escaped from the sea, the goddess Justice would not suffer to live (28⁴).

Paul was thrice shipwrecked. He also suffered other 'perils in the sea' (2 Co 11²⁶); but he does not pause to specify them. In writing to the Romans he again alludes to the 'sea.' Quoting Is 10², he says that though Israel be as numerous 'as the sand of the sea,' yet it is not the unbelieving many but the faithful few who are the object of God's care. Only the remnant shall be saved (Ro 9⁷). A similar reference is found in He 11¹², in which the writer emphasized how faith on Abraham's part brought life out of death, giving him posterity 'as the sand which is upon the sea shore innumerable.' On the other hand, another writer describes the doubter as 'like the surge of the sea' (ἐοικεν κλυθώνι θαλάσσης, Ja 1⁶), driven by the wind and tossed. The instability of a billow changing rapidly from moment to moment furnishes a wonderfully apt symbol of the mind that cannot steady itself in belief. Jude uses a similar figure when he describes the ungodly and libertines as 'wild waves of the sea' (κύματα ἄγρια θαλάσσης, *v.*¹³), foaming out their own lawlessness and shame (cf. Is 57²⁰).

John likewise, in the Apocalypse, often uses the term in its natural sense. Thus, no hurt is to befall the earth or the sea until the servants of God are sealed in their foreheads; no physical convulsions are to take place until the saints of God are secured (Rev 7¹⁻³). On the other hand, judgment is imminent. Pausing in the process of unrolling judgment and consolation, the Seer beholds a strong angel standing like a colossus astride the earth and sea, holding in his hand an open book (10^{2, 5, 8}). He hears woes pronounced upon the earth and sea (12¹). A monster dragon comes up out of the sea, as the father of cruelty and blasphemy (13¹; cf. Dn 7²⁴). When the second angel sounds, one third of the creatures which are in the sea die (8^{3, 9}); when the same angel pours out his bowl into the sea, it becomes blood and every living thing dies (16³). At the fall of Babylon (i.e. Rome) mariners on every hand take up a lamentation because of her commercial loss to the world of trade (18^{17, 19, 21}); while in the final issue of events, after the millennium and after Satan has been loosed to deceive the nations, 'the number of whom is as the sand of the sea,' and after he is cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and the dead are summoned to judgment, then, we read, 'the sea gave up the dead which were in it'—in its great maw—to be judged every man according to his works (20^{8, 13}). But when heaven is described and the abode of the blessed is portrayed, and a new heaven and a new earth are created, the Seer is careful to say, 'and the sea is no more' (21¹). This passage is a most instructive witness to the estimate of the sea among the ancient Hebrews. They had a universal horror of it. To them it was a synonym of turbulence, estrangement, hostility, fickleness, isolation, and separation. It was the home of storms and tempests and vague terrors. As a great monster enemy it devoured men; yea, the sea was the prolific mother of monsters. Naturally the sea, therefore, could have no place in an ideal universe. According to Plutarch, the ancient Egyptians regarded the sea as no part of nature, but an alien element full of destruction and disease. The priests of Isis are said to have shunned it as impure and unsocial for swallowing up the sacred Nile. One favourite tradition made the sea disappear in the final conflagration of the world. But John ignores this view, and regards the sea rather as no longer existent. God's dread opponent, the dragon, he practically says, shall disappear from the abode of the redeemed; and the powers hostile to God, whether men or demons, shall be brought to naught.

2. The Red Sea (Ac 7³⁶, 1 Co 10^{1, 2}, He 11²⁹).—In some respects this is the most remarkable body of water on the globe. It is subject to extreme evaporation; and, though no rivers empty into it, it is never exhausted. It is 1350 miles long, and 205 miles broad at its widest part. There are three references to it in apostolic history: (a) Stephen in his memorable apology speaks of Moses thus: 'This man led them forth, having wrought wonders and signs in Egypt, and in the Red sea, and in the wilderness forty years' (Ac 7³⁶). His argument is that, as Moses' Divine appointment was attested by signs and wonders, so signs and wonders formed part of the credentials of Christ. (b) Paul also, in writing to the Corinthians, says, 'For I would not, brethren, have you ignorant, how that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea' (1 Co 10^{1, 2}). The Apostle's point is that ancient Israel started well; all were protected and guided by the cloud; all were safely brought through the sea; all were sealed as by a baptism into trustful allegiance to Moses as their deliverer; yet in the end all except two failed to enter Canaan. Those who sang victory at the crossing of the Red Sea never reached the promised land. (c) A different use is made of the same fact in He 11²⁹. The author here emphasizes how faith finds a path in life. 'By faith they passed through the Red sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were swallowed up.' What the writer means to teach is, that Israel's passage through the Red Sea was due to the discovery of faith. It was not a path which anyone could find. Indeed, to the Egyptians who had no faith, it became a sea. Hence it is an example of the wonder-working power of faith.

3. The Mediterranean Sea (Ac 10⁶ 32 17¹⁴).—The Mediterranean was to the Hebrews 'the great sea' (Nu 34⁶). It was probably the largest expanse of water with which they were familiar; it was like a mighty mirror flashing the glories of the sun. Two passages are in point here, though one refers more particularly to the Aegean. (a) The first recounts how Cornelius sent to Joppa to fetch Peter, who lodged with one Simon, a tanner, 'whose house is by the sea side' (Ac 10⁶ 32). The sea here alluded to is obviously the Mediterranean. Simon's house, which doubtless was a very humble abode, was by the sea because there he would have easy access to water; and it was outside the city, at least 50 cubits, because tanning was held to be an 'unclean' employment, bringing one constantly into contact with dead animals. (b) The other passage tells how the brethren of Berea sent forth Paul, whose safety was in jeopardy, 'to go as far as to the sea' (Ac 17¹⁴). The main road from Macedonia to Thessaly bent about the base of Mt. Olympus close along the sea. Whether St. Paul, on arriving at the coast, changed his plan, and, instead of taking ship for Athens at Methone or Pydna, went on foot, it is impossible to say.

4. With γῆ and οὐρανός, the whole created universe (Ac 4²⁴ 14¹⁵, Rev 5¹³ 10⁶ 14⁷).—For example, in Ac 4²⁴, after the healing of the lame man, Peter and John, who had been accused and brought before the elders, and charged and even threatened by them not to speak any more in the name of Jesus, prayed, 'O Lord, thou that didst make the heaven and the earth and the sea and all that in them is . . . grant unto thy servants to speak thy word with all boldness' (v. 24. 29). The opening words were probably not altogether unfamiliar to them, as they seem to have belonged to the earliest known psalm of thanksgiving in the Christian Church (cf. Is 37¹⁶ 20). In similar language, Barnabas and Paul remonstrated with the men of Lystra, saying, 'We also are men of like passions with you, and bring you good tidings, that ye should turn from these vain things unto the living God, who made the heaven and the earth and the sea, and all that in them is' (Ac 14¹⁵). The Lystrans are thus introduced by the apostles to the true and living God. In Rev 14⁷ there is a striking parallel to their summons, the implication being that the God who creates has a right also to judge His creatures. In 5¹³, also, by a sweep of prophetic imagination, even sea-monsters join with departed spirits in a doxology of praise to the Lamb; while in 10⁶ the thought of God's creatorship, of earth and heaven and sea, prepares the way for the announcement that the God of creation and providence is also a God of judgment.

5. The apocalyptic sea of glass before the throne of God (Rev 4⁶ 15²).—The first passage (4⁶) reminds one of the 'molten sea' in Solomon's Temple (1 K 7²³ 29). In fancy the Rabbis compared the shining floor of the Temple to crystal. To John heaven is a sort of glorified Temple, and the crystal pavement is a kind of sea. The figure greatly enhances the splendour of the picture. The Apostle was probably attempting to portray the ether with all its clearness and calm, shimmering yet motionless. In the other and only remaining passage (15²) he beholds 'a glassy sea mingled with fire.' On its shores the redeemed stand, as the children of Israel did on the shores of the Red Sea, victorious, singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb. See, further, next article.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

SEA OF GLASS.—In the literature of the Apostolic Age the conception of the Sea of Glass occurs only in Rev 4⁶ 15². In the former passage, the Sea of Glass like crystal (θάλασσα νάλινη ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ) forms a part of the surroundings of the throne in heaven. In the latter passage the position of the Sea is not mentioned, but is no doubt understood to be the same, and the Sea itself is further described as 'mingled with fire' (μεμιγμένην πυρὶ). The martyrs are seen standing upon it, singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb.

It is easier to trace back into the OT the origin of the symbolism of the Apocalypse, and to collect parallels from the religious literature of other nations, than to interpret the precise meaning of this particular symbol in the mind of the author of the Apocalypse. We shall in this article endeavour to collect the various parallels and possible sources of this conception, afterwards attempting to classify them, in order to show the various streams of thought that have combined to yield this climax of apocalyptic symbolism. Finally, an attempt will be made to interpret its meaning in the Apocalypse.

1. Sources of the symbol.—It may be remarked that all the parallels collected below are not of necessity to be regarded as sources of this particular conception, but they all offer possible links of connexion with it.

(a) We have, first, the conception, at once mythological and cosmological, of the upper sea, the waters in the heavens, separated by the firmament (στερέωμα) from the waters below (Gn 1⁶⁻⁷). This is directly connected with the Babylonian chaos-myth of the conquest of the chaos-dragon Tiamat by Marduk. Moreover, in the Babylonian cosmogony the heavenly universe is divided into three parts corresponding to those of the earthly universe, the third and lowest division being the heavenly ocean (cf. A. Jeremias, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, Eng. tr., 2 vols., London, 1911, i. 6 ff.). See 2 En. xxvii. 1-3.

(b) In the theophany in Ex 24¹⁰ a pavement of sapphire is described as being under the feet of God.

(c) In the apocalyptic vision of Ezekiel, upon which the symbolism of Rev 4 is most directly based, a firmament like the colour of the terrible crystal is stretched over the heads of the four living creatures, and upon it is placed the throne like sapphire stone (Ezk 1²² 26).

(d) In the vision of the Ancient of Days in Dn 7⁹⁻¹⁰ a fiery stream issues from the throne.

(e) In 1 En. xiv. 10-17, in the similar vision of the house and of the throne of God, the floor of the first house is of crystal and that of the second house is of fire, also from underneath the throne come streams of flaming fire (cf. also lxxi. 6).

(f) In Test. Lev. ii. 7 a hanging sea divides the first heaven from the second in the later recension; in the earliest form of the document the hanging sea is in the first heaven.

(g) Finally, an interesting passage from the Bundahish may be quoted (SBE v. 125 f.): 'Afterwards, the fire and halo melt the metal of Shatvafrō, in the hills and mountains, and it remains on this earth like a river. Then all men will pass into that melted metal and become pure' (cf. Sib. Orac. iii. 84 f., ii. 235 f.). The list might be enlarged, but these passages are representative both of the distribution of the conception and of the different forms which it assumed.

2. Classification of motives underlying the symbol.—(a) We find the cosmological significance of the heavenly sea. The celestial universe is the counterpart of the earthly. The Zodiac, the abode of the gods, rises above and upon the heavenly sea. Later the sea itself and the solid firmament conceived of as supporting it seem to unite in the symbol, and we have the throne resting upon a crystalline sapphire foundation or pavement. There may also enter into the symbol some element of the myth of the conquest of Tiamat. The sea stretched out calm and glassy before the throne may in part symbolize the victory of the divinity over the element of chaos.

(b) There is the eschatological element. In the period view of history based on astronomical observations and characteristic of Babylonian religion, the world was to be destroyed by a fire-flood at the close of the age which was ushered in by the water-flood. This idea is present also in the Avesta and in most early religions. Hence the sea of glass mingled with fire may contain a trace of this conception. From the throne proceeded not only the heavenly river of water of life, clear as crystal, but also the fire-stream of judgment. The martyrs also standing upon the fiery sea suggest the symbolism of purification and triumph (cf. the idea in the passage quoted above from the Bundahish, where the righteous walking through the fire-flood are unharmed by it).

(c) It is possible to find links with the Jewish ritual system. Before the approach to the holy place stood the brazen sea, whose form and decoration suggest remoter links with Babylonian cosmology. In the priestly system, whatever the past significance of the laver, it certainly stood for the necessity of purification for entry into the presence of God.

(d) There may enter into the form of the imagery details taken from the local surroundings of the vision. It has been suggested that much of the form of early eschatological schemes is due to the local characteristics (cf. Gressmann, Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie, p. 31 ff.). H. B. Swete (*The Apocalypse of St. John*², London, 1907, p. 70) suggests that the Aegean Sea, fired by the rays of the setting sun, has yielded the form of the splendid imagery of this vision. While this may be so, yet all the elements of the vision and their ensemble are an inheritance from the past.

3. Interpretation.—The central motive in the Seer's vision is certainly the relation between heaven and earth. The apparently confused and disorderly sequence of events on earth is really being ordered and determined by what takes place in heaven. Hence the Seer's first vision, as he gazes through the open door, is the throne, the centre and source of all the subsequent action of the book. The history of the world for him is dominated by that throne. The description of scenery surrounding the throne gathers up all the symbolism of the past, the cosmological, eschatological, and ritual elements, coloured, it may be, by the local scenery of Patmos. Before the throne the Sea, the emblem of chaos and destruction, lies calm and motionless, petrified and clear, the symbol of the throne's victory over the opposing forces of darkness and disorder. As the approach to the throne it symbolizes the holiness required of those who draw near. As the final tribulation draws to a close, that sea mingled with fire symbolizes the source of the throne's judgment on the earth below. The martyrs, having passed through those judgments, stand triumphant on it and sing the song of the new Exodus. Finally it becomes the source of the healing and purifying streams for the redeemed earth.

SEAL (σφραγίς, vb. σφραγίζω).—A seal is (1) the graven implement with which an impression is made on wax, clay, or other soft substance; and (2) the impression itself. The use of seals can be traced back almost to the dawn of civilization. The scarab seal was peculiar to Egypt and the cylinder to Babylonia. Having a distinctive character, requiring to be always at hand for use, and being a highly-prized and carefully-guarded possession, the seal naturally became a means of personal adornment. Seal and staff were the insignia of a man of rank among the Israelites as among the Babylonians (Herodotus, i. 195). A cord was passed through the seal, which was worn either as a necklace or as a bracelet (Gn 38¹⁸, Ca 8⁶, Jer 22²⁴). In later times the signet-ring came into use among the Jews. The ring displayed by the rich worshipper (χρυσόδακτυλιος) in the early Christian assembly (Ja 2²) was probably of this description. Signet-rings were largely in use among the Greeks and Romans, and many of these have been preserved.

The seal was used at all times for the purpose of safeguarding valuable possessions: wine jars were stopped and sealed, letters written and sealed, rolls folded and sealed, doors closed and sealed. Horace associates locks and seals—claves et sigilla (Ep. I. xx. 3). Property, security, secrecy, finality are the ideas suggested by the act of solemnly attaching one's seal to anything.

The figurative uses of the term are numerous. (a) Circumcision is regarded by St. Paul as the seal of a righteousness which existed before the rite was instituted (Ro 4¹¹). The same figure of speech was frequently used, though somewhat differently interpreted, by the Rabbis. 'Ye shall not eat of the passover unless the seal of Abraham be in your flesh' (Shemoth Rabba, 19). Many parallels are given by J. J. Wetstein, Novum Testamentum Graecum, 1752, ad loc. (b) Vindicating his apostleship, St. Paul points to his converts as the seal which Christ Himself has affixed to his work (1 Co 9²). Can his opponents dispute a claim so clearly and authoritatively attested? (c) Believers are sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise (Eph 1¹³). They gave themselves to Christ at their conversion, and the Spirit marked them as Christ's peculium, consecrated to His service and destined for His eternal Kingdom. Sealed unto the day of redemption (4³⁰), they receive in time an earnest of what they are to be in eternity (2 Co 1²²). On all such believers, who are God's firm foundation, there is impressed the seal, 'The Lord knoweth them that are his' (2 Ti 2¹⁹). It is often said that the Scriptural seal with which Christians are sealed is baptism, a natural enough interpretation, seeing that baptism early took the place of circumcision, which was expressly called a seal. J. H. Bernard (EGT, '2 Corinthians,' 1903) argues that the aorists in 2 Co 1²² (σφραγισμένοι, δοῦς) 'point to acts completed at a definite moment in the past; and this can only mean the moment of baptism.' But why not the hour of conscious regeneration or personal consecration? Lightfoot, Hatch, and Harnack question whether any apostle ever transferred the metaphor of the seal to baptism (see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans,' 1902, p. 107) (d) When St. Paul speaks of sealing the contribution (κοινωνία) of the Gentiles (Ro 15^{28, 29}) to the poor saints at Jerusalem, he means, not that he needs, as a good steward, literally to seal and secure the collection which has been made for them, but that he figuratively sets his seal (cf. Jn 3³³) to the offering of material things which is the 'fruit' of their spiritual gifts to the Gentile world. He uses language of great dignity and solemnity, for he knows that money, which is sometimes mere filthy lucre (Tit 1¹¹), comes to have almost a sacramental value when it is the outward and visible sign or seal of an inward and spiritual love. (e) The apocalyptic roll of destiny, containing the Divine counsel regarding the order of events which is to usher in the end, is sealed with seven seals. No angel is able to open them, but they are opened one after the other by Christ (Rev 5. 6). Roman wills required to be attested with seven seals, and T. Zahn (Introduction to the NT, 3 vols., 1909, iii. 394, following E. Huschke, Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln, 1860; cf. E. Hicks, Traces of Greek Philosophy and Roman Law in the NT, 1896, pp. 157, 158) holds that the roll (βιβλίον) is here a testamentum. As he confesses, omne simile claudicat; but this one would halt too badly, since God the Testator cannot die, and the βιβλίον is a book of doom rather than a will bequeathing a heritage. And the Roman parallel is unnecessary, for the use of seals was as familiar to the Jews as to the Romans, and seven was the Jewish sacred number. (f) According to the writer of the Revelation, the servants of God are sealed on their foreheads with the seal of the living God; 12,000 of every tribe of Israel are sealed. Those who have not the seal are exposed to great danger (Rev 7³. 4. 5-8 9⁴). (g) Satan is to be cast into the abyss, which will be shut and sealed upon him (20³). (h) The roll of the apocalypse is not to be sealed (22¹⁰), because its contents—unlike those of Daniel (12⁴. 9)—are not intended for a distant age, but are for use at the present juncture and in the immediate future.

SECUNDUS (Σεκουνδος TR], Σέκουνδος [WH, Blass]).—Secundus was a Macedonian Christian belonging to the church of Thessalonica, by which he and Aristarchus were deputed to convey to Jerusalem the contributions of the Thessalonians on behalf of the poor brethren of the mother church. He accompanied St. Paul on his last journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20⁴). The Apostle on this occasion intended to sail from Corinth, but the discovery of a plot at the last moment caused him to sail for Macedonia, where he may have met the deputies of the churches of Thessalonica and Berea. It is more probable, however, that they had been previously instructed to join the Apostle at Troas, where we find them along with deputies from Asia (Ac 20⁵). It is uncertain whether Secundus remained in Syria after St. Paul's arrest or returned to Thessalonica. He is never again mentioned in the NT, but the name occurs in the well-known inscription of Thessalonica (CIG ii. 1967), which gives a list of politarchs.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1897, p. 287; R. J. Knowling in EGT ii. [1900] 422; also artt. in HDB and EBI. W. F. BOYD.

SECURITY.—It is only in Ac 17⁹ that the word concerns us at present: 'And when they had taken security from Jason and the rest, they let them go.' The idiom is λαβόντες τὸ ἱκανόν and is a translation of the Latin satis accipere. Cf. τὸ ἱκανόν ποιῆσαι in Mk 15¹⁵, which occurs 'as early as Polybius' (J. H. Moulton, A Grammar of NT Greek, vol. i., 'Prolegomena,' 1908, p. 20 f.). It is natural to meet a Latin legal term in this Roman court; the politarchs of Thessalonica may even have used the Latin instead of the κοινὴ. The security demanded might be in the form either of money or of sponsors for good behaviour. It is not clear what is meant by saying that the politarchs 'let them go.' It is uncertain also whether the security was for the 'good behaviour' of Jason and the rest, for the production of St. Paul and Silas before the politarchs, or for the 'good behaviour' of St. Paul and Silas (cf. R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, in loco). F. Blass (Acta Apostolorum, 1895, in loco) considers the phrase a commercial, not a legal, term. In any case, 'the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea' (Ac 17¹⁰). The haste and the cover of darkness indicate the urgency of the predicament, which concerned, apparently, the welfare not merely of St. Paul and Silas, but also of Jason and the rest, because of 'the security' given to the politarchs. It is not open to make a charge of cowardice here against either Jason or St. Paul. It was a practical question of how to meet an emergency due to jealousy and prejudice. A. T. ROBERTSON.

SEED.—The early Christians used 'seed' in its natural sense, of that which contains the germ-cell (1) of plants (σπέρμα, Mt 13²⁴. 27. 32. 37¹, Mk 4³¹, 1 Co 15³⁸, 2 Co 9¹⁰; σπόρος, Mk 4²⁶, Lk 8⁸. 11), and (2) of man (σπέρμα, He 11¹¹; σπορά, 1 P 1²³). Metaphorically, 'seed' (σπέρμα) was used (1) of the nucleus of the Jewish race left from the Captivity (Ro 9³); (2) of offspring in general, either (a) taken literally (Mt 22²⁴, Mk 12¹⁹⁻²³, Lk 15²⁰⁻²⁸, Jn 7⁴² 8³³. 37, Ac 3²⁵ 7⁵¹. 13³³, Ro 1³ 4¹³ 9⁷ 11¹, 2 Co 11²², 2 Ti 2⁹, He 2¹⁶ 11¹⁸, Rev 12¹¹), or (b) figuratively, as when believers were called Abraham's seed because they emulated his faith (Ro 4¹⁶. 18 9⁸, Gal 3¹⁶. 19. 29); and, finally, (3) of the generating power of God acting through His Word (cf. 1 P 1²³) and His Spirit (1 Jn 3⁹). St. Paul argued in Rabbinical fashion from the distinction between 'seed' and 'seeds' (Gal 3¹⁶). Since the singular stood in Gn 13¹⁵ and 17¹⁷, he concluded that the promise made to Abraham pointed to Christ as an individual and not collectively to Jews. For this and similar examples of artificial exegesis in the NT, see INTERPRETATION. S. J. CASE.

SELEUCIA (Σελεύκεια).—Seleucia was the seaport of Antioch and the maritime stronghold of the Macedonian monarchy in Syria. It lay 5 miles to the north of the mouth of the Orontes, on the southern skirts of Mt. Pieria, whence it was called Σελεύκεια ἢ ἐν Πιερίᾳ, in distinction from the many other foundations of the same name. It was one of the cities which formed the Syrian Tetrapolis, the others being Antioch, Apameia, and Laodicea. 'They were called sisters from the concord which existed between them. They were founded by Selencus Nicator. The largest bore the name of his father, and the strongest his own. Of the others, Apameia had its name from his wife Apamea, and Laodicea from his mother' (Strabo, xvi. ii. 4).

Seleucia overlooked a bay 'not unlike the Bay of Naples and scarcely less beautiful' (G. L. Bell, Syria, the Desert and the Sown, 1908, p. 329). It was built partly at the foot and partly on the top of precipitous cliffs, the lower and the upper city being connected by a cutting through the solid rock 1100 yards long. Strongly protected by nature and by fortifications, Seleucia was regarded as the key of Syria (Polybius, v. 58). Ptolemy Euergetes seized it in 246 B.C., and Antiochus III. (the Great) achieved renown by recapturing it in 220. Ptolemy Philometor took it in 146 B.C. and 'put on himself the diadem of Asia' (1 Mac 11⁸⁻¹³), but after his death the city had to be restored to the Seleucids (ib. 18¹⁹). When Syria came under the sway of the Romans, they made Seleucia a free city—'Seleucia libera, Pieria appellata' (Pliny, HN v. xviii. 21).

Seleucia had great importance as an emporium of Levantine commerce. The Orontes was navigable as far as Antioch (Strabo, XVI. ii. 7), but only for smaller craft, while the harbour of Seleucia received the largest transport ships of Egypt, Phoenicia, Cyprus, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy. From this seaport St. Paul and Barnabas sailed on their first missionary journey (Ac 13⁴), and at the end of the adventure they 'sailed to Antioch' (14²⁶), landing probably at Seleucia.

The remains of Seleucia—citadel, amphitheatre, temples, etc.—are numerous and impressive. 'Some day there will be much to disclose here, but excavation will be exceedingly costly owing to the deep silt' (G. L. Bell, op. cit., p. 334).

JAMES STRAHAN.

SELF-DENIAL.—Jesus emphasized the necessity of self-denial (εαυτὸν ἀπαρνεῖσθαι, Mk 8^{34c}) and the taking up of the cross if outward following was to become real discipleship. Self-denial looks primarily to the initial struggle by which the disciple cuts himself adrift from his former way of living, renouncing parents, wife, possessions, hating life itself when these stand in the way (Mt 10³⁷, Lk 14²⁶). Taking up the cross looks rather to the acceptance of the stern conditions and dread possibilities of the new life itself. By the former the individual tears himself out of the old conditions, by the latter he shoulders the burdens of the new and as yet untried service. The difference between the two may be illustrated from the experience of the man who volunteers to serve his country in war. He has first to wrench himself from the glad associations of home, and then to take his post of hardship, danger, and perhaps death in the ranks and on the field of battle. Both are acts of will characterized by immediacy and decisiveness (aor. Mk 8³⁴, Lk 9²³, Mt 16²⁴); but Luke's addition of 'daily' is psychologically true. The original choice has to be constantly re-affirmed if the acolyte is not to become an apostate.

The best commentary on these two ideas is found in Ph 3⁴⁻¹⁴, where St. Paul describes both his own self-denial and his taking up of the cross. What things were gain to him these he counted loss for Christ, i.e. he gave up friends, privileges, earthly prospects—in reality his old self—and he accepted to the full the conditions of the new service (cf. Ac 9¹⁶), the fellowship of Christ's sufferings and conformity to His death. Similar is the thought in Gal 2¹⁹. The Apostle speaks of what he calls his own death, his own crucifixion, and Christ now living in him.

Thus, although the evangelic phrase εαυτὸν ἀπαρνεῖσθαι is not found in the apostolic literature, the idea underlies the whole apostolic view of the Christian life.

(a) The idea was primarily used in the martyr sense of willingness to suffer death or persecution for Jesus' sake. Death and persecution in themselves have no spiritual value (1 Co 13³, 1 P 4¹⁵), but to deny the 'name' or the 'faith' (Rev 2¹³ 3⁶) in order to escape them is to renounce Christ. 'Whoever denies himself to be a Christian and makes that plain by his actions, i.e. by worshipping our gods, . . . shall gain forgiveness' (Trajan's letter to Pliny, Ep. xvii. [xviii.], in E. G. Hardy's ed. of Pliny, Epp. ad Traianum, London, 1889, p. 217). To do that is the very opposite of Christian self-denial in this martyr sense. The Apocalypse is a warning against 'cowardice' (Rev 2¹³), and an encouragement to be faithful unto death (2¹⁰). The Christian was in constant danger of a violent death for Christ's sake (Ro 8³⁶, 2 Co 4¹⁰, Ph 3¹⁰, Col 1²⁴, 1 Co 15³¹, 2 Ti 2¹¹⁻¹³). This νέκρωσις, or dying to the world, was, however, the sure foretaste of eternal life. 'God cannot deny himself,' and this Divine moral consistency ensures future glory to those who deny Him not, as it ensures shame to those who do (2 Ti 2¹¹⁻¹³). Some explain 2 Ti 2¹¹ of the Christian's death with Christ in conversion (J. Moffatt, in EGT, London, 1910), and 1 Co 15³¹ of 'the utter self-denial with which he [St. Paul] devoted himself to the work of preaching Christ' (T. C. Edwards, 1 *Corinthians*², London, 1885, p. 425); but both passages can be as well explained as referring to the danger of violent death and persecution for Christ's sake. Christian self-denial in this sense is the assertion of Christ's unconditional Lordship and the repudiation of all other claims (like the Κυριος καὶσαρ claim) to determine Christian conduct.

(b) Self-denial describes also the initial stage of the Christian life when by faith the individual wholly yields himself to Christ. When St. Paul said: 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' (Ac 9⁶), that is self-denial. Man apart from God is selfish, controlled from below. 'Homo extra Deum querit pabulum in creatura materiali vel per voluptatem vel per avaritiam' (Bengel, on Ro 1²⁹). While the ὁ ἑστὼ ἀνθρώπος (Ro 7⁻; cf. 1 P 3⁴) or the vous acknowledges the higher law of God, in actual experience the self is enslaved. To obtain freedom total self-denial is required. This is done by an act of faith in Christ. The old sinful self dies with Christ (Gal 2²⁰, Ro 6⁶, Col 2²⁰). This self-denial is typified by baptism. It is 'the crucifixion of personal desire and pretension in order to the reception of communicated life' (T. H. Green, *Works*⁵, London, 1906, iii. 194). The death of Christ is the objective condition of this initial act of self-denial. The identification of the personality with Christ is possible because Christ first identified Himself with us. This is the Divine moment in Christian self-denial, and this is what distinguishes it from the Platonic or Hegelian. Plato speaks of the 'inner man' (Rep. ix. 589 A.; cf. Plotinus, Enn. i. 1. 10), or the 'god within.' This was also a favourite Stoic conception. To the Stoics self-denial was due to the inherent native energy of this Divine element, just as to the Hegelian it is a process immanent in humanity as such. Such a view takes no account of guilt as an infringement of the Divine law, and as something which man per se cannot remove. It is superficial also in its analysis of the actual moral weakness of man. By faith the Christian is united with Christ in His death and so guilt is removed. Death cancels all claims (Ro 6¹⁻¹⁴), and the result is a new man (νέος, καὶνὸς ἄνθρωπος, Col 3¹⁰, Eph 4²⁴, Gal 6¹⁵). Christian self-denial is not thus simply a bare moral act—it is redemptively conditioned—nor is it an end in itself, nor self-destruction as it seems to be in Buddhism. Its object is self-renewal, self-re-creation in Christ.

(c) This leads to another self-denial, which is the gradual life-long process of sanctification negatively viewed, just as the former self-denial 'which is its root' is 'the one decisive ideal act' taking place at conversion (Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans'⁵, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 158). We must not separate the two and make the one forensic and the other ethical. 'Paul never presents Christ's death as a substitution for ours in the sense that we need not die as well' (Green, iii. 194). It is equally true—and this is what Green does not sufficiently emphasize—that he never thinks of our dying as possible apart from the prior substitutionary death of Christ for us. The modern tendency is to over-emphasize in St. Paul's teaching what Green neglects. J. Weiss (Paul and Jesus, Eng. tr., London, 1909), e.g., makes it a radical distinction between St. Paul and Jesus that for St. Paul the ethical content of the new life is an effect of Divine acts, while for Jesus it is an effect of man's own ethical endeavour. But to St. Paul it is an act both of will and of Divine working at one and the same time (Ph 2^{12, 13}).

The self to be denied is the sinful self and its works. The phrases used for this self-denial are to 'put off' (ἀπορθεσθαι), 'to cleanse' (καθαρίσειν), 'to slay' (θανατοῦν) the flesh and its works. The new life of the Christian in virtue of his faith and of the presence of the Holy Spirit is hid with Christ in God, it is a walk in the Spirit, it is Christ in us and we in Him. Hence it is inconsistent that the fruits of this new life should spring from the flesh. The Christian life is not a life of moral indifference, τὸ ἀδιαφόρως ἔχειν (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 5. 40), as some of the early sects held. It is because this moral indifference was associated with intellectual error concerning Christ that John, Jude, Peter, and Paul (Col. and Pastorals) oppose Christian self-denial to intellectual error and to moral delinquency. Self-denial in this sense is the personal regaining, through conflict, of all the personality and of society for God. It is the gradual realization of all that is involved in our dying with Christ in conversion and our rising with Him to newness of life.

(d) But Christian self-denial rises to even higher heights. The Christian life is one of self-denial in the sense that the life of Jesus was also one of supreme self-denial. His life was one of complete obedience to His Father's will (He 5⁸; cf. Mk 14⁴⁶). It was a life of self-emptying for the sake of redemption (Ph 2⁷), and the Christian is under law to Christ (ἐννομος Χριστοῦ, 1 Co 9²¹). The law of Christ is that each one must bear the burdens of others (Gal 6²). The Christian law of self-denial is thus that we serve one another through love (Gal 5¹³). The example of Christ constrains us to renounce privileges, liberties, ease, even life itself, for the sake of bringing blessing to others—'we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren' (1 Jn 3¹⁶). How far this may go we can judge from Ro 9¹, a 'spark from the fire of Christ's substitutionary love' (Dorner, quoted in EGT, London, 1900, in loc.). It is in this light that we must view the giving up of property by Barnabas and others. This self-denial is not consciously directed against sin as described above (c), but is rather the out-flowings of Christ's love in the heart. St. Paul connects the example of Jesus often with this self-denial, and this example is not simply a human example but that of One who, though He was rich, for our sakes became poor; of One who, though He was Divine, yet became obedient unto death, the death of the Cross. The Christian life of self-denial is motivated by love. This is the immanent principle which is present all along and which unifies in one Christian experience all these forms of self-denial. Without this all is worthless (1 Co 13³). It was in Christ that this love dawned on men. It is the love of Christ shed abroad in our hearts.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

SELF-EXAMINATION.—In two passages of the NT (1 Co 11²⁸ and 2 Co 13⁵) the duty of self-examination is expressly inculcated. In the former the verb used is δοκιμάζω; in the latter πειράζω is combined with δοκιμάζω. Both these words are more appropriate to the act of introspection than the more general terms signifying investigation, like ἀντάζω or ἀνακρίνω; for the object of self-knowledge in the Christian is to discover his relationship with the Good. 'Self-examination is often a direct result of a new awakening to a sense of the moral imperative such as we have already described as conversion; but it may be carried on by men periodically, without any such reawakening' (J. S. Mackenzie, Manual of Ethics, London, 1900, p. 378).

For the purpose of self-examination δοκιμάζω carries with it the suggestion that the scrutiny will end in acceptance or approval, while πειράζω more commonly indicates a test which will issue in the disclosure of what is defective and evil. But this distinction is not always obvious, nor can it always be pressed, for in 2 Co 13⁵ St. Paul uses both words together: 'Try yourselves (πειράζετε) if you are in the faith; prove yourselves (δοκιμάζετε)'; and he proceeds, 'or do you not see when you look at yourselves (ἐπιγινώσκετε, 'know ye not as to your own selves,' RV) that Jesus Christ is in you? unless it should be that you fail in the test' (ἀδόκιμοι). The passage is so rendered by A. Menzies (Second Epistle to the Corinthians, London, 1912, p. 103), who explains that 'the examination enjoined must lead to one of two results: either the convert must conclude that what is required of him is too much; then he does not stand the test, he is not fit for the kingdom; Jesus Christ is not so much a part of his life that he must give up everything in order to be with Him; or he will conclude, on putting the necessary questions to himself, that Jesus Christ is in him and must dominate his whole life and action.' Thus, the Apostle throws his converts back upon the test of their own heart-experience so as to produce a complete severance from pagan vices, and further so that he himself, who has to condemn these vices, will be approved as having done his duty and will be found to be undeserving of the censure that has been poured on him.

In 1 Co 11^{28, 29} the exhortation is concerned with the Lord's Supper: by self-scrutiny the believer may be saved from eating and drinking judgment (κρίμα) to himself. The Communion had been allowed to degenerate into an ordinary feast instead of being a means of sanctifying grace. The Apostle urges upon the Christians the duty of self-examination on the ground that a right estimate of themselves is necessary for a right estimate of the Lord's 'body,' i.e. the spiritual significance of His glorified humanity.

Generally speaking, St. Paul appears to commend self-examination not so much with a view to the disclosure of personal weakness as in order to provide a stimulus to the spiritual life, an intelligent realization of what the faith claims from the Christian, ethical obedience and a clear apprehension of duty. The fact of unworthiness in motive and life is already detected even if not generally admitted by the believer: self-examination will bring it home to the conscience and show the necessity for aiming at the higher spiritual ideal in thought and action.

The duty of self-examination is not so familiar a feature in the early literature of Christian experience as it was afterwards to become under monasticism and in the writings of mystics in all ages. Among the mediæval mystics the purification of self as the result of the painful descent into the 'cell of self-knowledge' is a well-marked stage in the ascent to the uncreated good (E. Underhill, *Mysticism*², London, 1911, p. 240 ff.). The apostolic Christian is urged to follow his Lord's example (1 Ti 2⁶, 1 P 2²¹), and to look away to Jesus (He 12³) rather than to engage in the exercises of self-scrutiny. One seeks in vain among the mystic Johannine writings for any such incentives to self-examination as were afterwards to be adduced by St. Catherine of Siena: 'If thou wilt arrive at a perfect knowledge of Me, the Eternal Truth, thou shouldst never go outside the knowledge of thyself' (cf. E. Underhill, op. cit., p. 241); or by Thomas a Kempis, humilis tui cognitio certior via est ad Deum, quam profunda scientiæ inquisitio (de Imit. Christi, i. 3. 4). Self-examination is a conspicuous element in all forms of pietism: it passed into evangelical Christianity; and chiefly in the mystical autobiographies of Quakerism, like the diaries of T. Ellwood and J. Woolman, and in the hymnology of early Methodism we discover it to be a recognized exercise of the soul.

The NT gives no encouragement to a morbid or excessive self-scrutiny, as an end in itself. Introspection is implied in 1 Jn 3²⁰, but only to issue in the encouraging declaration that 'God is greater than our heart': and in Gal 6¹ (σκοπῶν σεαυτὸν) we are reminded that the inspection of our own hearts tends to stimulate charitableness towards the erring. On the other hand, Apostolic Christianity lends no weight to the modern tendency to rule introspection altogether out of the religious life.

SENATE.—See SANHEDRIN.

SENTENCE.—In the NT this word is used only three times: (1) as indicating a judicial sentence (ἐπίκρισις, Lk 23²⁴; see TRIAL-AT-LAW); (2) as giving a decision or judgment on a matter submitted for settlement (κρίνω): 'My sentence (RV 'judgement') is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gentiles are turned to God' (Ac 15⁹); (3) as a conclusion come to, or an answer given to a question put in certain circumstances (ἀποκρίμα): 'But we had the sentence of death in ourselves' (2 Co 1⁹ AV; RV, 'Yea, we ourselves have had the answer [RV in 'sentence'] of death within our-elves'). The word is of very frequent use in Acts and the Epistles in the sense of expressing a personal judgment or decision, or of holding an opinion (Ac 26³, 1 Co 2², etc.). JOHN REID.

SEPULCHRE.—Three Greek words are employed in the NT to express the idea of tomb or burial-place: (1) μνημα, Ac 2²⁹ 7¹⁶, Rev 11⁹; cf. Lk 8⁵⁷ 23⁵³ 24¹, Mk 5³⁵ 5; (2) μνημεῖον, Ac 13²⁹; cf. Mt 23²⁹ 27⁵⁻⁶⁰; (3) ταφος, Rev 3¹³; cf. Mt 23²⁷⁻²⁹ 27⁶¹. 64 66 28¹, the Hebrew equivalent of all three being קבר. The word 'grave,' though found eight times in the AV, is not regarded by the Revisers as an adequate English equivalent.

1. Ancient burial customs.—The Hebrews universally disposed of their dead by burial; otherwise they felt the soul of the deceased in Sheol would not find rest. The aboriginal cave-dwellers in Canaan, however, seem to have disposed of their dead by cremation (cf. R. A. S. Macalister, Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer, 1906, p. 48 ff.). Burning was resorted to by the Hebrews only in the case of those who had committed crime (Gn 38²⁴, Lv 20¹⁴). They used spices in preparing the body for burial, but they did not embalm. There was not the same incentive for it as prevailed in Egypt, where other-worldliness was so emphatically illustrated by temple and pyramid. Still, to the later Jews as well as to the Egyptians the tomb was 'the house of the living.' Swift burial was necessary because of the climate, and as a rule took place on the same day as the person died. Stones were placed over a grave, not only to mark the site, but to prevent jackals and other beasts from disturbing the body (cf. 2 S 18¹⁷). In the case of a criminal the heap of stones over his grave kept on growing, as every passer-by felt compelled to express his contempt for him by adding new stones to the heap. Ancient tombs are still very numerous in Petra, which is indeed 'the city of tombs.' Of the 750 (more or less) sepulchres extant there, some date back as far as the 6th cent. B.C., or even earlier, probably belonging to the ancient Edomites who once inhabited those parts. Others, perhaps the great majority, are those of the Nabatæans, or early Arabs, who flourished in Petra from 350 B.C. till A.D. 100. These tombs, which are of varied styles and types, are all cut in the sides of the massive sandstone mountains. One is filled with columbaria for receiving the ashes of the dead. As a necropolis Petra is worthy of special study.

2. Ancient types of sepulchre.—Like their neighbours, the Hebrews through their sepulchres gave expression to their belief in immortality. The limestone rocks of Canaan yielded to their desire for a permanent place of abode. And yet, though they must have been perfectly familiar with the Babylonian and Egyptian custom of building costly mausolea, the Hebrews insisted on simplicity. No elaborate or extravagant sepulchres were ever erected by them. They regarded such monuments as tending towards ancestor-worship, and they studiously avoided all kinds of idolatry. In preparing sepulchres for the dead they aimed at safety and endurance rather than elaborateness and ornamentation. Men of position sometimes prepared their sepulchres while yet alive; but, though the Phœnicians were their models, they seldom used a sarcophagus. The practice of raising monuments over their tombs was first inaugurated by Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 13²⁷⁻²⁸). Through the influence of the Greeks, the Hebrews began to build separate tomb-chambers. These varied in style as follows:

(1) The simplest type of Jewish sepulchre was a sunken receptacle for a single body, hewn in the rock. Oftentimes caves were appropriated and used by them to save labour and expense. Abraham, for example, buried Sarah in the cave of Machpelah (Gn 23⁹ 17). A slab of stone was prepared to cover tightly the rectangular depression. This was whitewashed annually, to guard against ceremonial defilement (Mt 23²⁷; cf. Lk 11⁴⁴). Ancient tombs of this kind are very common in Palestine still. Some have been found with shafts, as at Tell el-Judeideh (cf. Bliss and Macalister, PEF Excavations, 1898-1900, p. 199 ff.).

(2) Chambers with rectangular recesses called kokim, or loculi, for receiving the body. These were usually secured by means of slabs which were plastered and ceiled. Some were cut in the face of the rock lengthwise. They are known as shelf-tombs; others were cut at right angles to the surface of the wall, to a depth of 5 or 6 ft., the body being laid in with the feet towards the opening. The recesses were usually low, almost on a level with the floor of the chamber. It was probably in a shelf-tomb that our Lord was buried (Mt 27⁶⁰, Mk 15⁴⁶, Lk 23⁵³, Jn 20¹²). Over the shelf, ledge, or trough, as the case might be, arches were usually cut. This kokim kind of sepulchre was the family type. Sometimes double chambers were made, with a rock-cut passage-way leading from one into the other. The so-called 'Tombs of the Kings' and 'Tombs of the Prophets' at Jerusalem are of this type. The Greeks built such sepulchres from 200 B.C. onwards. A heavy stone door swinging in a socket, or a large rolling stone-disk, protected the entrance against robbers and other wilful violators (Mt 27⁶⁰, Jn 11³⁸). Curses were often invoked on those who would disturb the dead (cf. the inscription on Shakespeare's tomb at Stratford-on-Avon, 'And curs'd be he who moves my bones'). No outsider was allowed to bury in a private family sepulchre, because such tombs were holy ground. If unused and empty, they might be, indeed often were, occupied by outcasts and homeless ones who took refuge in them (Mk 5³). Chamber-tombs frequently had porches, vestibules, or antechambers. Even the single tomb might have its antechamber as well as its chamber proper. C. M. Doughty describes sepulchres of this type as existing in Arabia (Travels in Arabia Deserta, 1888, i. 108).

(3) Tombs built of stones. Masonry tombs are all of later date. Some of them, however, carry us as far back as the Greek Age. Certain very interesting antique examples still exist at Kadesh-Naphtali, Tell Hum, Malal, Teiasir, and 'Ain el-Banieh. The one probably best known to the student of the Bible is the so-called Tomb of Rachel at the fork of the road leading to Bethlehem. At Palmyra the most remarkable masonry tombs are to be seen. They are known as 'sepulchral towers.' One stands 59 ft. high and contains a tomb-chamber 27 by 20 ft. in size. Other tombs built of masonry are to be found at Rabbath Ammon, and formerly at Modin, the home of the Maccabees. In certain cases limestone sarcophagi, ornamented and highly polished, received the dead. Not infrequently such tombs are revered by the Arabs as sacred, being regarded as the sepulchres of saints and heroes. The Arabs make pilgrimages to them, call them makāms, and carefully guard them against all possible profanation. Religious services are frequently held at them, and votive offerings are repeatedly brought and placed on the walls under the saint's protection. Clothing, implements of agriculture, and other such peasant belongings are considered perfectly safe when deposited by a saint's tomb; for, if they are injured or stolen, the act incurs the saint's wrath. Even the Jews perpetuate the memory of certain celebrated Rabbis by honouring their tombs through the building of synagogues over them, which in turn have become centres of pilgrimage; that of the celebrated Talmudist Rabbi Meir, near Tiberias, is an illustrious example.

3. NT passages.—There are but five passages in apostolic history which speak of tombs or sepulchres: (1) Ac 2³, in which Peter says, 'Brethren, I may say unto you freely of the patriarch David, that he both died and was buried, and his tomb (τὸ μνημα αὐτοῦ) is with us unto this day.' The Apostle's argument is that, in spite of the fact that David was a patriarch and the founder of a royal family or clan, and wrote Ps 16¹⁰ ('For thou wilt not leave my soul in Sheol,' etc.), he nevertheless himself came to the grave and was buried; therefore, he must have had in mind One greater than himself. According to 1 K 2¹⁰, David was buried 'in the city of David.' Nehemiah (3¹⁶) mentions 'the sepulchres of David.' To buy off Antiochus Epiphanes, Hyrcanus opened one of the chambers of David's sepulchre and took out 3000 talents; Herod the Great rifled another in the time of Hadrian (cf. Josephus, Ant. vii. xv. 3, xiii. viii. 4). David's tomb is said to have fallen into ruins. Its site was probably within the city walls. F. de Sauley erroneously identifies it with the 'Tombs of the Kings,' which are of Roman origin (Journey round the Dead Sea, new ed., 1854, ii. 111 ff.). Jerome, writing in the 4th cent. A.D. to Marcella, expresses a hope that they might pray together in the mausoleum of David (Ep. xlv.).

(2) Ac 7¹⁶, 'And they [the fathers] were carried over unto Shechem, and laid in the tomb (ἐν τῷ μνηματι) that Abraham bought for a price in silver of the sons of Hamor in Shechem.' Stephen here seems to have confused OT statements with ancient Jewish tradition. According to Gn 50¹², Jacob was buried in Hebron; and, according to Jos 24³², Joseph was buried in Shechem. Jewish tradition adds much to these facts: e.g. Josephus (Ant. ii. viii. 2) regards all the patriarchs as buried in Hebron. The Book of Jubilees (ch. 46) speculates about the bones of Joseph's brethren, declaring that they were buried in Shechem. This is possible. There is nothing to prevent our supposing that the bodies of all twelve of the sons of Jacob were removed to the Promised Land. Shechem was more central than Hebron. It was there that Abram first settled when he came into Canaan; there he built an altar to Jahweh (Gn 12^{6, 7}); and it is only reasonable to suppose that he also purchased the ground on which it stood; otherwise it would have been exposed to desecration and destruction. 'The purchase of the ground on which an altar stood would therefore seem to follow as a kind of corollary from the erection of an altar on that ground' (cf. R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, in loc.). This does not preclude the possibility of Jacob's purchase of the field of Shechem from the sons of Hamor (Gn 33¹⁹, Jos 24³²). Stephen, accordingly, only enlarges upon the statements of the OT in keeping with both tradition and possibility. To-day the tomb of Joseph is shown a few hundred yards to the N. of Jacob's well, and the same distance almost due E. from Shechem. Tradition fixed upon this location, as early as the 4th cent. A.D., as the place where Joseph was buried. The present tomb, which was restored in 1868, has the usual appearance of a Muslim weli. On the other hand, the Harām, or sacred area, which encloses the Cave of Machpelah in Hebron marks the place where Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah were buried. Few Europeans can boast of having been permitted to enter it; the present writer had this privilege in April 1914.

(3) Ac 13²⁹, 'And when they had fulfilled all things that were written of him, they took him down from the tree and laid him in a tomb' (ἐν μνηματι). St. Paul here treats of Christ's burial with a freedom analogous to that of St. Peter when speaking of David's (Ac 2²⁹). The motive of both was the same, namely, to prove the reality of the death, and, therefore, of the resurrection from the dead. Unlike Enoch and Elijah, Christ had died and been actually buried; hence His death was a reality, and because He had risen from the tomb His resurrection was an indisputable fact. But did the Jews bury Jesus? The Gospel of Peter says that they did (21-24). And surely Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus were both Jews and members of the Sanhedrin. Where is His tomb to be located? Certain authorities are unwilling to commit themselves; but the present writer is free to acknowledge that the traditional place, marked as it is by the Cathedral of the Holy Sepulchre, despite all that is repulsive and idolatrous about it, best satisfies him as the approximate site. Eusebius (Onom., ed. P. de Lagarde, 1870, pp. 229, 248) favours this opinion (cf. H. Guthe, art. 'Holy Sepulcher,' in Schaff-Herzog, v. [1909] 328-331).

(4) Ro 3¹³, 'Their throat is an open sepulchre' (τὰ φάρυγγα). These words are quoted from the LXX version of Ps 5¹⁰. The Psalmist is describing enemies whose false and treacherous language threatened ruin to Israel. Just as a grave stands yawning to receive the corpse, and gives forth foul and pestilent vapours, so the throat of the wicked is open to besmirch by slander and malice some one's fair name. The modern custom of secreting tomb cavities and re-opening them to make fresh interments affords a partial illustration of what the Apostle means.

(5) Rev 11⁹, 'And from among the peoples and tribes and tongues and nations do men look upon their dead bodies three days and a half, and suffer not their dead bodies to be laid in a tomb' (ἐν μνήμα). The picture drawn here by John is that of a degenerate Church refusing to allow the bodies of its true witnesses the rite of burial. To the apostles, such a spirit was paralleled only by pagan malice. For the enemies of the Church to be willing not only to see the bodies of the faithful lie exposed in the open way, but to invite the world to the spectacle, and to celebrate the event with holiday joy and the exchange of gifts (v. 10), was the climax of insolence and contumely.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

SERGIUS PAULUS.—Sergius Paulus is mentioned in Ac 13¹⁻¹¹, where he is described as the proconsul in Cyprus, 'a man of understanding' who 'called unto him Barnabas and Saul, and sought to hear the word of God.' With Sergius Paulus was Elymas the sorcerer who sought 'to turn aside the proconsul from the faith.' St. Paul's power brought blindness upon Elymas. 'Then the proconsul, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the teaching of the Lord.'

The Sergii were a Roman patrician gens who furnished more than one consul. Two possible references to Sergius Paulus occur outside the NT. A Sergius Paulus is mentioned in the Index of Authors to Pliny's Natural History, as an authority on bks. ii. and xviii., which give special information about Cyprus. A Greek inscription from the N. coast of Cyprus is dated 'in the proconsulship of Paulus,' who is probably the same governor.

NT references, though incidental (for the interest of the story centres in the duel between St. Paul and Elymas), describe a triumph for the Christian preachers. It was customary for a high Roman official to have in his train of comites not only personal friends and attaches, but also 'provincials, men of letters or of scientific knowledge or of tastes and habits that rendered them agreeable or useful to the great man' (W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, p. 77). Sergius Paulus is described as σμερὸς—a man of understanding, or of keen intelligence. This description does not favour the idea that he was weakly under the influence of a mountebank. Elymas was evidently a powerful exponent of a subtle theosophical system; and as a man of unusual intelligence, with a religious bent, the governor encouraged the presence and enjoyed the company of such scientists and philosophers. For the same reason he sent for Barnabas and St. Paul, when news reached him of their work in Cyprus. These travelling teachers were summoned to Court. The governor listened to their message with such evident pleasure and approval that the jealousy of Elymas was roused, and he tried to dissuade his patron from hearing them. But St. Paul's challenge reduced Elymas to impotent blindness. Sergius Paulus had been impressed already by the missionaries' exposition of Christianity. He was 'astonished at the teaching of the Lord.' His astonishment is said to have been due not to the miracle but to the teaching (C. v. Weizsacker is wrong, therefore, in ascribing the conversion of Sergius Paulus to 'the Apostle striking his favourite, the Magian Barjesus, blind' [Apostolic Age, i. 111; and cf. 274]). The Christian message made a deep impression on this 'man of understanding'; and, when he saw the issue of the conflict between the two champions, 'he believed.' The governor of Cyprus was a notable convert. Renan and others have regarded the conversion of a Roman proconsul as incredible. It has to be said that we know nothing more of his Christian life—whether he professed Christianity openly by baptism, and used his influence to further the religion, or whether he relapsed. Possibly the word ἐπιστεύσας is used here to describe something less than full Christian faith; cf. 8¹³, 'Simon believed' (though Simon became a pervert), and Jn 12⁴², 'the rulers believed . . . but did not confess,' and especially Jn 20⁸. Anyhow, the unembellished statement is entirely in favour of its historical integrity: Sergius Paulus did make some profession of faith which sent the apostles on their way rejoicing in the Christian victory. We are not told whether this man's heart was the good soil in which the seed bears fruit, or the shallow soil in which the shoot is scorched, or the preoccupied soil in which the growing corn is choked. We are told only that the seed took root and sprang up.

Probably this proconsul's favourable reception of St. Paul's preaching was one of the earliest suggestions to the Apostle that the dominant power of Rome might be an asset for Christianity rather than a hostile influence. It is possible, also, that it encouraged St. Paul and Barnabas to develop a more extended missionary campaign on the mainland than was originally intended; and this may have been one reason for John Mark's withdrawal from the party.

J. E. ROBERTS.

SERJEANTS, LICTORS.—These officials are mentioned only in Ac 16³⁵⁻³⁸, as taking a message from the prætors of Philippi (see under art. PRÆTOR) to St. Paul and Silas, and conveying back to the magistrates their reply. The name in Greek means 'rod-carriers,' and is the official equivalent of the Latin lictores ('beadles'). These men were taken from the lowest class of the people or from the class of freedmen to act as attendants upon the leading magistrates in Rome. A dictator was allowed 24, a consul 12, and a prætor 6. Each carried a bundle of rods with an axe included, as symbols of the power of punishment and of life and death possessed by the higher magistrates. They marched in single file in front of the magistrate and cleared a space for him through the crowd. They had to see that proper respect was paid to the magistrate, and had also to carry out the punishment ordered by him. A minor offender (not a citizen) was bound hand and foot and beaten with the rods; a more serious offender was beheaded by the axe. This power during the Republic was held by generals commanding-in-chief in the field, but the insignia had to be dropped before they passed within the city gates, unless they had been awarded the dignity of a triumph. Within the city a citizen had always the right of appeal against a death sentence of a magistrate (see J. S. Reid in JRS i. [1911] 68-99). The constitution of Rome was copied in coloniae, which were in theory parts of Rome itself. Just as Rome had pratores and lictiores, so had the coloniae, even where the chief magistrates did not bear that name. Philippi was a colonia, and the two chief magistrates there had their lictiores. But in all probability they had no such powers as their originals in Rome had. Their bundles of rods were mostly ornamental, and so was the axe, if indeed there was an axe at all. These magistrates were proud of the forms of the parent city, even if the power possessed by them was merely a shadow. The Acts narrative shows that it was in their power to scourge recalcitrant subjects of the Empire, but not Roman citizens, when known to be such. St. Paul and Silas could indeed have successfully appealed against the treatment which they received.

A. SOUTER.

SERPENT (ὄφης).—Apart from the Gospels, the only occurrences of the word 'serpent' in the NT are in the Epistles to the Corinthians (1 Co 10⁹, 2 Co 11³) and in the Apocalypse (Rev 9¹⁰ 12⁹ 14¹² 20²). In 1 Co 10⁹ the writer exhorts his readers not to tempt Christ sorely as the Israelites did, with the result that they were allowed to perish from time to time (ἀπολλύοντο) by the inflammatory bites of serpents. In the second passage (2 Co 11³) he expressed the fear lest, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety, so the minds of the Corinthian converts should be corrupted from the simplicity and single-mindedness of Christ. In both cases the tempter is Satan, and in both cases his nefarious work is accomplished by subtlety and deception, but in Genesis his agent is the serpent, while here the 'ministers' of Satan (v. 15) are the Judaizers (v. 13). In Rev 12⁹ the Devil appears in his time-honoured rôle as a serpent, and he is identified both with the great Dragon and with the person called 'Satan' in the later books of the OT and in Jewish literature. The name 'Satan' was familiar to the later Jews, and occurs fourteen times (ὁ σατανᾶς) in the Gospels, twice in the Acts of the Apostles, ten times in the Pauline Epistles, and eight times in the Apocalypse. The earth was no new sphere for the exercise of his devilish activities, but henceforth his scope was to be confined thereto, and this limitation of his powers seems only to have intensified his animosity and desire for revenge. A torrent of water issued from his mouth (v. 15) which was designed to sweep away the Woman, but this malicious attempt recoiled on the Devil's own head, and the destructive flood was swallowed up by the earth which was his own domain. The purpose to which the Roman Emperors set themselves was to eradicate and stamp out the very name of Christianity as well as the memory of the Founder of that religion. The futility and complete failure of the attempt are too obvious to admit of comment. In Rev 20² the Devil is again identified with the great Dragon and Satan. The Dragon has from the outset (13²⁻⁴) been the real instigator and author of the revolt led by the Beast and the False Prophet, but hitherto he has escaped justice. Now, however, he is seized and bound for a period of a thousand years. The period of his imprisonment is indeed limited, but its length forms a striking contrast to the short duration of heathenism—a thousand two hundred and threescore days (Rev 11^{3a}).

In Rev 9¹⁰ the tails of the horses in the vision are likened to serpents, just as the tails of the locusts in 9³ are compared to scorpions. The power of these horses resides in their mouth and in their tails. The tails are incongruously said to have heads, but the incongruity is perhaps atoned for by the additional horror thereby imparted to these superhuman animals.

Serpents are very common in Palestine and in the wilderness of Sinai; over thirty species are known, the majority of which are, however, harmless. Most of the innocuous serpents belong to the genera Ablabes and Zamanis of the Colubrine family. Many of these are brilliantly coloured; they are well proportioned and slender, with a gradually tapering tail, and they live exclusively on land. The majority are of rather small size, but some are very large. A species very frequently found in the marshes and lakes is the Tropidonotus hydrus. A few species of harmless sand-snakes have also been found, of which the Eryx jaculus is the most common.

The poisonous snakes of the country are the following: the cobra (Naja haje), and four viperine snakes, two true vipers, the Vipera euphratica and the Vipera ammodytes, the Daboia xanthina, and the Echis arvenicola, a dangerous reptile which is very frequently encountered in the hotter and drier parts of the country. With the exception of the Daboia xanthina, they all belong to the Mediterranean and North African fauna, or are closely allied thereto. The Daboia xanthina is a beautifully marked yellow serpent and the largest of the vipers in Palestine, as well as one of the most dangerous. The Naja haje, or Egyptian cobra, is of rare occurrence. It is the species especially popular with snake-charmers. Another very deadly serpent is the Cerastes hasselquistii, or 'horned serpent.' It lies in ambush in depressions in the way (cf. Gn 49¹⁷) and attacks the wayfarer. It is 12 or 18 ins. long, and of a sandy colour with brown or blackish spots. See, further, ASP, VIPER.

SHADOW (σκιά). — 1. Healing property of shadow.—The shadow of St. Peter had the property of healing the sick (Ac 5¹⁵). Similarly, articles of clothing touched by St. Paul caused disease and evil spirits to depart from the afflicted (Ac 19¹²), just as those who touched the border of Christ's garment were healed (Mk 6⁵⁶, Lk 8⁴⁴). Even the name of Jesus was effectual in some cases (Ac 3⁶ 4¹⁰). The therapeutic power of suggestion in all such instances is recognized by modern psychology.

2. The metaphysical use of the term 'shadow'.—This use occurs in Hebrews (8⁵ 10¹), affording an interesting link with the Epistle to the Colossians, where St. Paul declares that the Jewish ceremonial observances were but 'a shadow of the things to come (σκια τῶν μελλόντων); but the body is Christ's' (Col 2¹⁷). Here 'shadow' is contrasted with 'body,' or substantial reality. The 'things to come' are the Christian dispensation, which from the Jewish standpoint, was yet in the future. Christianity embodies the Divine reality, whereas Mosaism was only a 'shadow' cast temporarily into human history by the 'body,' the eternal fact of the heavenly Christ yet to be revealed. The interpretation of Calvin, that 'shadow' means the sketch of which Christianity is the finished picture, is unlikely when the occurrence and significance of the term in Hebrews are taken into consideration. The fundamental conception of this Epistle is the Alexandrian one that there are two worlds or orders of things, a higher and a lower—the one heavenly, eternal, and real; the other earthly, temporal, and merely phenomenal. The material, sensible world is not the real, but only the shadowy copy of the heavenly pattern. This conception the writer of Hebrews takes up and fills with a religious content. The Mosaic Law, so revered by the Jews, has only 'a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things' (10¹). Here 'shadow' (σκιά) is contrasted with 'image' (εἰκών). Judaism is the 'shadow,' Christianity is the 'very image' of the good things. The Christian religion gives us possession of the reality only dimly foreshadowed in the Jewish system. The Law is a shadow, inseparable indeed from the eternal image; but in comparison with that reality, it is only a dim flickering and transient outline, lacking the abiding substantiality and content of that which cast it. Furthermore, the priests of the Levitical system only 'serve a copy' (ὑποδείγμα) and shadow (σκιά) of the heavenly things' (8³). The tabernacle itself was made by Moses only according to the 'pattern' (τύπον) of the heavenly original, the 'true tabernacle' pitched by God (v.-). Like every other part of the Levitical system, the tabernacle was only a 'copy,' the 'pattern' (τύπον) of which exists eternally in heaven. This use of the term 'shadow' in contrast with 'image' is more than an illustration taken from art. It may well be that, but it seems rather an explanation of Christian truth by means of the categories of Platonic and Philonic philosophy. Plato's famous allegory of the Cave (Rep. vii. 514), wherein men are described as seeing on the wall of the den but the shadows of real objects passing outside, illustrates his theory of Ideas. The relation of eternal realities (archetypal Ideas) to visible things is like the relation between substantial bodies and their transient shadows. This theory was taken up by the Alexandrian philosophy, and the OT is explained by Philo in terms of this Hellenistic speculation. The writer of Hebrews, who shows many signs of Alexandrian influence, uses throughout his Epistle this Philonic form of thought to show the superiority of Christianity over Judaism. Judaism is but a 'shadow,' Christianity is the very 'image' embodying and expressing God's eternal purpose concerning mankind.

SHAMBLES.—See ARTS.

SHAME ((1) αἰσχύνη, vbs. αἰσχύνεσθαι, ἐπαισχύνεσθαι, κατααἰσχύνεσθαι; (2) ἐντροπή, ἐντρέπειν; (3) αἰδώς).—(1) The dread of outward shame, αἰσχύνη, as opposed to δόξα, 'glory,' not only restrains men from base actions, but sometimes deters them from the noblest and best deeds. In the Apostolic Age it was scarcely possible to be a Christian without facing ignominy. As Christ could not save the world without despising the shame of the Cross (He 12⁻), so every Christian had to bear a cross of shame. He needed fortitude not to be ashamed of the gospel (Ro 1⁶), of his hope (5³), of his faith (9³ 10¹¹), of his trials (Ph 1²⁰), of his suffering as a Christian (1 P 4¹⁶). Timothy was exhorted not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, or of St. Paul his prisoner (2 Ti 1⁸), and Onesiphorus was praised for not being ashamed of St. Paul's chain (11⁶). Those who were not ashamed of Christ had their reward in the assurance that He was not ashamed to call them His brethren (He 2¹¹), that God was not ashamed to be called their God (11¹⁶), and that they would not be ashamed before Christ at His second coming (1 Jn 2²⁸). True Christians renounced the hidden things of shame (τὰ κρυπτά τῆς αἰσχύνης, 2 Co 4²), and inconsistent Christians were warned that the shame of their nakedness would be exposed (Rev 3¹⁸), while hypocrites continued to foam out their own shameful deeds (αἱ αἰσχύναι, Jude 12).

(2) ἐντρέπειν τινα is lit. 'to turn a man upon himself,' and so to shame him. In 1 Cor., which reflects the writer's quickly changing feelings and attitudes, St. Paul tells his readers that he does not write to shame them (οὐκ ἐντρέπω ὑμᾶς, 4¹⁴), and again that he does write to move them to shame (πρὸς ἐντροπήν, 6³ 15³⁴). The Pastoral Letters teach that the disobedient Christian is to be avoided, that he may be ashamed (2 Th 3¹⁴), and that the servant of Christ is to behave irreproachably, that his opponent may be ashamed (ἐντραπή, Tit 2⁸).

(3) Αἰδώς (tr. 'shamefastness' in 1 Ti 2⁹, 'reverence' in the inferior text of He 12²⁸) is a nobler word than αἰσχύνη, denoting a higher motive—a sensitive shrinking from what is either unworthy of oneself or dishonouring to God. It occurs twice in the Iliad—αἰδω θέσθ' ἐνὶ θυμῷ (xv. 561), and τοῦτε γὰρ αἰδώς (ib. 657): in the first case Pope renders it by 'honest shame,' and in the second by 'manly shame.' As to 'shamefastness,' which is read in the RV instead of 'shamefacedness' in the AV, see R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, 1876, p. 67, and art. 'Shamefacedness' in HDB.

SHARON (ὁ Σάρον, שָׂרֹן, 'the level').—Sharon was the ancient name of the undulating Maritime Plain which extended from Mt. Carmel to some distance beyond Jaffa—perhaps to the Nahr Rubin and the low hills to the S. of Ramleh—where it merged in the Philistian Plain. It was admired by prophets and poets for the richness of its vegetation and the beauty of its wild flowers—'the excellency of Sharon' (Is 35²), 'the rose of Sharon' (Ca 2¹). From the groves of oak which at one time covered a great part of its surface, especially in the north, it was also called ὁ ὄρνυς (LXX, Is 33⁹ 35² 65¹⁰; Jos. BJ I. xiii. 2) or οἱ ὄρτυες (Ant. XIV. xiii. 3). Strabo (xvi. ii. 27) says that in his time there was next to Carmel 'a large forest' (ὄρνυς μέγας τις). The only part of Sharon which is alluded to in the NT is the southern end, lying around Lydda (now Lydd), where the fields and orchards were exceedingly well-watered and fertile and the population was dense. Here the presence of St. Peter in the early Apostolic Age—though his visit was only brief, as he was urgently summoned away to Joppa—is said to have given rise to a widespread spiritual movement: 'all that dwelt at Lydda and in Sharon turned to the Lord' (Ac 9³⁵). The AV renders 'at Lydda and Sharon,' apparently mistaking 'Sharon' for a town or village in the neighbourhood of Lydda. The use of the article with the Greek and the Hebrew noun proves that a whole district—'the level country' (from שָׂרֹן)—is meant. The only known village of Saronia is in the N.E. of Mt. Tabor, probably represented by the Saronas which Eusebius (Onom. 296. 6) says was the name given to the district between Tabor and Tiberias.

SHAVING.—See HAIR, NAZIRITES.

SHECHEM.—In St. Stephen's address we read that Jacob and the fathers were carried over unto Shechem and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought of the sons of Hamor in Shechem (Ac 7¹⁶). There is here a combining of two separate traditions. Jacob was buried at Machpelah (Gn 50¹³), which Abraham bought from the sons of Heth (23). Jacob himself bought ground from the children of Hamor, and in it Joseph was buried (Jos 24³). This ground was in Shechem. Here Jacob established his residence for some time, and his people entered into the closest relations with the natives. A well, said to have been dug by his orders, was in existence in Christ's day, and here at Jacob's well our Lord had His famous interview with the Samaritan woman (Jn 4). Shechem became famous as a Levite city, and a city of refuge, and still later as the capital of the ten tribes under Jeroboam. It became a city of the Samaritans. Its situation was between Mount Gerizim and Mount Ebal, and it lay on the Roman road from Jerusalem to Galilee.

SHEPHERD.—The name 'shepherd' is taken from the occupation of the Hebrews as a pastoral tribe (Gn 13⁷ 30³⁶ 37² 47³, Ex 3¹, 1 S 17³⁴) and applied to God as the one who feeds and provides for His people (Gn 48¹⁵ 49²⁴, Is 40¹¹, Ps 23¹ 95⁷ 100³; cf. Ezk 34¹¹⁻³¹) and to the rulers of the nation (Nu 27¹⁷, 2 S 7⁷, 1 K 22¹⁷, Jer 28³ 31⁵ 23¹⁻⁴, Ezk 34²⁻¹⁰, Zec 10³ 11³⁵ 13⁵). The idea expressed in most of these passages is that the care of Israel, as 'the flock of His pasture,' is given by the Lord in charge of the rulers who are held to account for the welfare of every member of the same. Especially Ezk 34 rebukes these 'shepherds' for their neglect of their charge, and ends up (v. 23^b) with the prophecy that in the end one shepherd, like unto David the servant of the Lord, will tend them as prince. To this Messianic passage reference is made in Jn 10¹¹⁻¹⁶, where Jesus is represented as saying: 'I am the good shepherd; . . . and I lay down my life for the sheep. And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: . . . and they shall become one flock, one shepherd'; cf. He 13²⁰, 1 P 2²⁵ 5⁴. To His office as Shepherd Jesus refers in Mt 15²⁴; cf. Jer 50⁶. Moses also is represented in Ex. R. 22³ as the good shepherd to whom the Lord said: 'Since thou takest such care of the lambs of thy flock, be thou the shepherd of My flocks.' The same is said there also of David when chosen by the Lord to be king. Concerning the identification of Christ as the Good Shepherd with Orpheus on ancient Christian paintings see F. Piper, Mythologie und Symbolik der christl. Kunst, Weimar, 1847-51, i. 126; J. P. Lundy, Monumental Christianity, New York, 1876, pp. 187-196; also R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Leipzig, 1904, 11-13, 32f., 113. But the title 'shepherd' or 'pastor' is given in the NT to all the heads of the Church, to the apostle Peter (Jn 21¹⁷; cf. Mt 10^{6, 16}) and to the elders of the Church (Ac 20²⁸, 1 P 5²) as having charge of the 'sheep of Christ,' 'the flock of God.' The name Ποιμην ('pastor' or 'shepherd') is used in the sense of 'overseer,' episcopos (Eph 4¹), wherefore Jesus is also called the 'arch-shepherd,' ἀρχιποιμην (1 P 5⁴). This conception (cf. Philo, ed. Mangey, i. 196) of spiritual rulers as shepherds rests on the original Jewish Didascalia (preserved in the so-called Apostolic Constitutions, ii. 6, 10, 15, 4, 18, 7-18, 19, 1-3, 20, 3-5, 9, 11), where the above-quoted passages from Jeremiah and Ezekiel are interpreted in a spiritual sense as referring to the duties and responsibilities of the overseer of the Church, viz. that he has to look after the spiritual health of each member of the flock, keep them in a sound state of perfect faith, strengthen those weakened by doubt, bind up those bruised by the remorse of sin, and bring back those that have gone astray, while expelling those that may affect the moral or spiritual well-being of the flock by evil conduct or evil doctrine (see art. 'Didascalia' in JE). The name 'shepherd' or 'pastor' became henceforth the title of the bishop (Ignat. ad Phil. ii. 1, ad Rom. ix. 1; Iren. iv. 33; Cyprian, Ep. viii. [ii.], 'Cleri Romani ad clerum Carthaginiensem'; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 26), and later on in Protestant Christianity of the minister of the Church in general. In Enoch lxxxix. 59, xc. 25, the name 'shepherd' is given to the 70 angels ruling the 70 nations of the earth (see R. H. Charles, ad loc., and F. Spitta, Zur Geschichte und Literatur des Urchristentums, Göttingen, 1901, ii. 367 ff.), also to the angel in Hermas, Mund. iv. 22, Sim. vi. 3. 2. In ancient Babylonia the chief stars bore the name of 'Shepherds of Heaven.'

K. KOHLER.

SHEWBREAD.—In the holy place of the temple or tabernacle was the shewbread (He 9²), lit. 'the setting forth of the loaves' (ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων; Vulg. propositio panum). In the LXX rendering of Ex 40²³ the loaves are called ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως; other names were 'the continual bread,' 'the presence-bread,' 'holy bread.' Every Sabbath day the shewbread, unleavened (Josephus, Ant. III. vi. 6), and fresh from the oven, was placed, in two piles of six loaves each, on a table of cedar-wood, in front of the entrance to 'the most holy place,' and the stale bread was eaten within the sacred precincts. Instructions as to the composition, setting forth, and consumption of the bread are given in Lv 24⁵⁻⁹. The ritual is attested from an early date (1 S 21⁶), and was no doubt a survival from a primitive cultus in which the shewbread was regarded as the food of the deity, like the lectisternia of the Romans; but this idea was 'too crude to subsist without modification beyond the savage state of society' (W. R. Smith, RS, 1894, p. 229), and, when more spiritual thoughts of the Divine nature prevailed, the shewbread was retained merely εἰς ἀνάμνησιν (Lv 24⁷)—i.e. as a reminder of man's dependence upon God for the gift of daily bread. Among the spoils displayed at the triumph of Vespasian and Titus, 'those that were taken in the temple of Jerusalem made the greatest figure of them all: that is, the golden table, of the weight of many talents; the golden candlestick also' (Josephus, BJ vii. v. 5), both of which are represented on the well-known Arch of Titus.

SHIELD.—See ARMOUR.

SHIP (ναῦς, occurring in Ac 27⁴¹ only, 'a vessel of considerable size'; cf. πλοῖον, 'ship, boat, sailing vessel,' Ac 20¹⁸ 33 21² 3. 6 27⁴⁴. 28¹¹, Ja 3¹, Rev 8⁹ 18¹⁷⁻¹⁹, and frequently in the Gospels; cf. also πλοῖάριον, 'a little boat,' Mk 3⁹ 4³⁸, Jn 21⁶, and ἡ σκάφη, 'a skiff,' used of the small life-boat which was towed astern the larger vessel on which St. Paul sailed from Palestine to Italy, Ac 27¹⁶ 30. 32).—The ancient Hebrews were not given to seafaring, Solomon (1 K 5⁹ 9²⁶ 10²²) and Jehoshaphat (1 K 22⁴⁸ 49) being the only important exceptions. They preferred agricultural and pastoral life. Besides, Canaan had no good harbours, and almost the entire coast remained permanently in the possession of others, the Phoenicians holding all north of Mt. Carmel, and the Philistines most of that to the south. Simon the Hasmonæan (c. 145 B.C.) was the first to make a harbour. 'He took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea' (1 Mac 14³). According to Josephus (BJ I. xxi. 5, Ant. xv. ix. 6), Herod the Great added a second harbour at Cæsarea. As early as 400 B.C. the Greeks demonstrated their ability to construct large ships. Dionysius I. of Syracuse built ships with four ranks of oarsmen (Pliny, HN vii. 57; Diod. Sic. xiv. 41, 42). In the days of St. Paul the Romans controlled the commerce of the Mediterranean.

It is to St. Luke that we owe the most vivid as well as the most accurate account of sea-voyaging which has come down to us from antiquity. Experts in naval science agree that it is without a parallel (cf. J. Smith, *The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul*⁴). Luke must have possessed a genuine Greek love for things nautical. The wealth of detail contained in Ac 27 and 28 regarding St. Paul's experiences from Cæsarea to Puteoli, which covered a period of six months (Sept. A.D. 58 to March 59), is invaluable. But long prior to this most eventful voyage, St. Paul had become experienced in nautical affairs. Writing to the Corinthians, he says, 'Thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day have I been in the deep' (2 Co 11²⁵), clinging perhaps to some floating plank or other timber of a wrecked vessel (cf. Ac 27⁴⁴).

In the voyage to Italy St. Paul and his fellow-prisoners were carried in three different vessels: (1) In a ship of Adramyttium (a town near Troas in Mysia), probably a coasting vessel which was returning home for the winter (27-). The centurion's plan probably was, originally, to take the prisoners all the way to Mysia, and from there cross over and join the Egnatian Way, which ran overland from Byzantium through Philippi to Dyrrachium, thence crossing to Italy. As a matter of fact, they sailed by this vessel only from Cæsarea to Myra in Lycia. (2) In a corn-ship of Alexandria bound for Italy, from Myra to Melita, one of the great fleet of merchant ships which assisted in feeding Rome (27⁶). This was the vessel which was wrecked. (3) In a second corn-ship of Alexandria, which brought them from Melita to Puteoli (28¹¹).

The following points in connexion with these ships are especially noteworthy:

1. Size of ships.—While we are not informed as to their exact dimensions, we do know that they were capable of carrying not only a considerable cargo of wheat but also 276 souls all told (though the Vatican MS reads but 76), and that when one was wrecked another took all these persons on board (27^{37, 38} 28¹¹). It has been estimated that the capacity of such vessels must have ranged from 500 to 1000 tons. This is corroborated by what we know in general about Roman merchant vessels. That, for example, on which Josephus was wrecked, he tells us, carried 'about six hundred' (Vita, 3). Lucian (Πλοιορ ἢ Ευχαί) also describes a vessel which was driven by a storm into the port of Athens, which measured the equivalent of 180 ft. in length by 45 ft. in breadth, having an approximate tonnage of 1200. And, according to Athenæus (v. 37), the war galley of Ptolemy Philopator measured 420 by 57 ft. (cf. J. Smith, *Voyage and Shipwreck*⁴, pp. 187 ff., 234 ff.).

2. The officers.—(a) The sailing-master, steersman, pilot (κυβερνήτης, 27¹¹; cf. Rev 18⁷; in the AV of Ja 3⁴ called 'the governor,' ὁ ἐνθύνων); and (b) the ship-owner, ship-master, captain (ναύκληρος); he it was who hired out his vessel, wholly or in part, for purposes of transportation, probably also receiving the fares.

3. The sailors, called ναῦται, seamen, shipmen, crew.—It was their keen ears that detected the sounds of the breakers when they were nearing land (Ac 27^{27, 30}).

4. The sails (σκεῦος, translated 'gear,' 27¹⁷; the same word is used in 10¹¹ of the great sheet which Peter saw in a vision; cf. ἀπτεμῶνα, translated 'foresail,' 27⁴⁰).—Roman ships usually bore but one large square sail, on which for the most part they depended to propel the vessel. Pliny says there was also a sail at the stern, but this J. Smith regards as exceptional (Pliny, Proem. xix.; Smith, *Voyage and Shipwreck*⁴, p. 192). This large mainsail was fastened to a long yard. It was furled by being drawn up to the yard. It was reefed in time of storm (cf. 27¹⁵). From a drawing, preserved at Pompeii, of a vessel dating from the time of the apostles, it is evident that Roman sails were sewn across both vertically and horizontally by bands of rope to check any rent from extending beyond the square in which it occurred. They were made of costly material—byssus, or shesh—and sometimes bore designs, which were woven into them. The ships of Antony and Cleopatra carried purple sails. Tyrian sails were richly embroidered. As St. Paul was a tent-maker, he probably understood sail-making also, and may have more than once crossed the Mediterranean, earning his passage by plying his trade. In times of storm a vessel could not safely carry the large mainsail, or even the yard-arm; hence these were lowered on the deck, and a small storm-sail or 'foresail' (ἀπτεμῶν) was hoisted to take their place. This was what was actually done on St. Paul's ship just before running aground (27⁴⁰). Some, however, following Breusing, interpret the 'gear' which was 'lowered' (27¹⁷) to mean that cables with weights attached were lowered into the sea to retard the vessel in its progress to inevitable destruction (so Blass, Goerne, Knabenbauer, and, to a modified extent, also Wendt).

5. The masts.—Nothing is said of masts in the account except by implication. There must have been a large mainmast, and probably a foremast also at the bow. They were made of strong wood, possibly of cedar (cf. Ezk 27²). There is no proof that these Roman corn-ships bore a mizzenmast or aftermost mast, though doubtless the Romans at this time possessed three-masted vessels.

6. The anchor (ἀγκυρα, 27^{30, 32, 40}).—Four are specially mentioned in 27³², but others were doubtless carried, for use at both bow and stern. Originally, the ancients used large stones, but in Roman times they made anchors of iron. They consisted of a main stock with two teeth-like extremities, not always 'without flukes' (cf. Roschach in Daremberg-Saglio's Dictionnaire des Antiquités, 1873-75, p. 267). Anchors were needed to prevent a vessel from being cast on the rocks. Those on the ill-fated vessel with St. Paul were finally cast off into the sea and abandoned (27⁴⁰). A singularly beautiful figurative use is made of the expression in He 6¹⁹, in which the Apostle speaks of hope as 'an anchor of the soul' (see ANCHOR).

7. The rudder (πηδάλιον, 27³⁰; cf. Ja 3⁴).—The Greek word comes from a root meaning 'the blade of an oar'; hence a rudder was primarily a broad float oar or paddle. It was probably hung by straps or ropes from the after part of the ship, and was managed by the steersman or master of the vessel (κυβερνήτης). When not in use, as for example in harbour, it was made fast either to the side of the ship or on deck. When a vessel was on the verge of running aground, the rudder was loosed to carry the ship up the beach (27⁴⁰). Of the rudder, also, a striking figurative use is made by the apostle James in speaking of the tongue; he says that, as a little rudder can turn about a great ship, so the tongue can control the whole nature of man (3^{4, 5}).

8. Helps (27¹⁷, 'They used helps, undergirding the ship,' βοηθείας ἐχρῶντο, υπογωννύσας τὸ πλοῖον).—

These were cables for undergirding and strengthening the hull especially in bad weather, in order to prevent the ship's timbers from yielding under strain. The vessels of the Romans were so loosely built that they had to be frapped. This was done either lengthwise round the ship from stem to stern above the water-line (as Breusing and Torr are disposed to think) or transversely, amidship under the keel, encircling the vessel (as Balmer, J. Smith, and others). The verb 'undergirding' favours the latter view, though both processes may have been in vogue.

9. Tackling (σκευή, 27¹⁹).—A comprehensive term including all the ship's necessary furniture, its fittings and equipment, everything movable lying on deck or anywhere about, not in actual use—these were cast overboard the third day.

10. The little boat (ἡ σκάφη, 27¹⁸. 30. 32).—Every large merchant ship probably had one or more such skills to serve as life-boats. They were usually towed behind. That attached to St. Paul's ship was dragging water-logged astern, until, under the lee of Canda, it was taken up for greater security (27¹⁸). When the sailors felt that danger was imminent, they began to lower it in order to escape to land (27³⁰), but St. Paul promptly detected their scheme and reported them to the centurion, whereupon it was cut loose and dropped overboard (27³²).

11. Ropes (σχολία, 27³).—These held the little life-boat, but, being cut, the boat was allowed to fall off into the sea. No incident in the voyage shows so well the faith which the soldiers had in St. Paul.

12. Sign (παράσημον, 28¹¹).—Roman ships bore individual ensigns. That on which St. Paul left Melita bore the sign 'Dioscouri,' the Twin Brothers, referring to the heroes Castor and Pollux, the twin sons of Zeus, who were generally regarded as protectors of voyagers. In Greek mythology they were the heroes of many adventures, and were worshipped as divinities, particularly by Dorians and at Rome. To them, as the patron deities of the seamen, this third ship was dedicated. Why the ensign of this particular vessel should be given is not clear, but perhaps it was because of the captain's courage in starting in winter (February ?) on so perilous a voyage—Melita to Puteoli. Sometimes eyes also were painted or sculptured on the prows of vessels (cf. 27¹⁵, ἀντοφθαλμεῖν, lit. 'to look at the wind eye to eye'). The hull, too, was often painted and decorated, the ornament on the stern-post being commonly a swan or a goose-head. From the hull (πρυμνα, 27²⁹) rose the flagstaff which carried the pennant.

13. Speed, winds, currents, direction, etc.—A vessel's rate of sailing depended much upon the wind. The voyage from Troas to Philippi St. Paul made on one occasion apparently in two days (16¹¹. 12), whereas on another it required five (20⁶). With a fair wind, Roman ships ordinarily averaged, it is reckoned, seven knots an hour. Being rigged like modern Chinese junks, they were peculiarly well fitted to make good speed before the wind. When the winds were unfavourable, ships could be made to sail 'within seven points of the wind'; for example, St. Paul's vessel maintained a N.W.W. course from Canda to Melita in spite of an E.N.E. Euraquilo, or north-easter (27¹⁴). Roman sailors knew also how to make use of the currents of the Mediterranean. Thus, the ship of Adramyttium sailed northward from Sidon under the lee of Cyprus against winds that were contrary (27⁴), probably helped somewhat by a coast current which flows in that direction. In a very severe storm, sailors made their ships 'lie to,' the object being, not to make progress, but to ride out the gale, as under the lee of Canda (27¹⁴⁻¹⁷). But with vessels of only moderate size, rigged with sails unequally distributed over the deck, and having at best very imperfect charts, and with no compass, shipwrecks were of common occurrence. Sailing was avoided as much as possible in the winter season because the heavens were then frequently clouded and it was impossible to take observations (27²⁰ 28¹¹). Plumb-lines were carried for purposes of sounding (27²⁸), and possibly other instruments, such as windlasses; but the science of navigation in apostolic times was still in its infancy.

Most remarkable is the fact that before setting out to sea it was customary even among the Greeks and Romans to supplicate the protecting deities for a prosperous voyage (cf. Wis 14¹, Jon 1⁵).

SHOE, SANDAL.—With one exception the references to shoes or sandals are all found in the Book of Acts. Two of these are quotations, one from Ex 3⁵ (Ac 7³), and the other from the Gospels, Mt 3¹¹, Mk 1⁷, Lk 3¹⁶, and Jn 1⁷ (Ac 13²⁵). The latter gives scope for comparison, and raises a certain problem, which is discussed in EBI, s.v. 'Shoes.' Verbal differences are not sufficient to throw any light upon the kind of foot-covering worn. The two words found, υποδήματα and συνδάλια, do not appear to be distinctive, the one of 'shoes' and the other of 'sandals.' The former is found in all the passages cited above, while the latter appears only in Ac 12⁵, conjoined with the verb from which υποδήματα is derived.

Although linguistic aids fail us, we may safely infer that both sandals and shoes were in common use during apostolic times. For the most part they were made by craftsmen, working with leather chiefly, although wood, cork, etc., were also employed. Simple and ornate forms were forthcoming. Sandals of the plain kind were mere coverings for the soles of the feet to save them from injury, especially during a journey. They were attached by thongs arranged in a variety of ways. In the more ornate forms sandals had an attachment at the toes, at the heels, and along the sides, not necessarily all found together. So long as the toes were in any measure visible the foot-covering might be said to be a pair of sandals. When the various attachments to the sole were closed in above, the transition to shoes was complete. The thong or latchet would appear to have been as necessary to shoes as to sandals. An exception to this would be the 'slipper,' best suited for indoor wear, being easy to put on and off. Another distinctive feature of shoes, as opposed to slippers, was the heel-covering. Boots in various forms were also known, but the descriptions are not very definite.

On the ground of Eph 6¹⁵ we are perhaps justified in referring to the Roman caliga, the foot-equipment of the common soldier at this time. It is usually taken to be a sandal of the strong order, with nails to prevent slipping, but, according to another view, it was really a shoe fitting closely to the foot above. Such foot-gear is supposed to be referred to in Josephus, BJ vi. i. 8, in which instance the nails failed in their purpose.

The practice of walking barefoot seems to have been restricted to slaves and the poorer classes; with others it was the custom only on certain occasions (e.g. mourning). Indoors it was usual to lay aside the shoes or sandals that had been worn abroad, and to go barefoot, and so when reclining at meals (cf. Jn 13⁴⁻⁵). In the Temple ceremonial also shoes were discarded. As appears from Ac 12³, sandals were laid aside during sleep.

From 13⁵¹ we may infer that St. Paul and Barnabas had foot-wear of some sort, the symbolical action pointing to the dust which had collected underfoot. By detachment of the shoes this could be shaken out, and, assuming that the action is to be literally taken, it accords with the wearing of shoes rather than of sandals.

SIBYLLINE ORACLES.—At the close of the 5th (6th?) cent. Gospel (cf. vol. i. p. 439) which is entitled The History of Joseph the Carpenter, the Saviour predicts that Antichrist will murder four persons and shed their blood like water, in revenge for their exposure of his evil policy. The apostles ask who these four persons are, and the Lord replies, 'They are Enoch, Elijah, Schila, and Tabitha.' 'Schila' has puzzled editors of this Arabic document. It is commonly taken as a man's name, and he has been identified with the NT 'Silas,' although there is no obvious reason either in the NT or in later tradition why Silas should be in such exalted company. E. Nestle (ZNTW xi. [1910] 240) suggests that he was the son of the widow of Nain; but this is pure conjecture, and Nestle's companion idea that 'Tabitha' represents the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5⁴¹, ταλεια κόρη) is a precarious support. Tabitha is certainly the woman of Joppa (Ac 9³⁶⁻⁴¹) whom St. Peter raised from the dead. In the Coptic Apocalypse of Elijah she encounters Antichrist, and in a fragment of some Sahidic apocalypse, quoted by Crum (ZNTW xii. [1911] 352), she is ranked with Enoch and Elijah as having entered heaven in the body. Crum further solves the problem of 'Schila' by noting that when the Arabic noun is pointed differently it becomes equivalent to 'Sibylla,' who is elsewhere associated with Enoch. This yields an excellent sense for the passage, two men being followed by two women.

But what is the Sibyl, a pagan figure, doing in this Christian connexion? How did she come to fill so strange a role? The answer to these questions is the subject of the present article.

The etymology of the word 'Sibyl' is a disputed point. (a) The oldest derivation is the attractive one given by Varro (quoted in Lact. Div. Inst. i. 6), that the term is a generic title for prophetesses, which comes from the Doric or Æolic σιβος = θεος, and Βουλλά (βουλλα) = βουλη, i.e. 'the counsel of God.' (b) J. P. Postgate (JPh iii. [1882] 333-334), unable to accept (a), since σιβος is Laconian, not Æolic, and since the loss of an accented syllable is unlikely, prefers the roots σιβ-υλο-γα (the feminine suffix) = 'the wise (little) woman,' the suffix -υλο being used in a diminutive sense, and σιβ- being connected with sap, 'to be wise.' (c) The idea of wisdom is brought in by those philologists, like Max Müller (Lectures on the Science of Language, new ed., London, 1882, vol. i. p. 109), who connect σιβ with a primitive Italian sabius or sabius, 'wise'; but there is no trace of this Italian term as the origin of the diminutive, and 'Sibylla' does not seem to occur in any Italian dialect. (d) E. Hofmann (see below) accepts the first part of (a), but makes the word a composite from σιβος and ἄλαος = ἄλαος (ἄλαος), meaning 'God-appeasing,' or 'God-reconciling,' with reference to the aim of the primitive Sibylline oracles. Others find the thought of age dominant, and (e), like S. Krauss, derive it from sub-il, 'the ancient of God,' sub or sub- = 'old,' and -il as in Βαβυλων, for which the inscriptions furnish the form 'Bab-il' (Byzantinische Zeitschrift, xi. [1902] 122), or (f), like H. Lewy in Philologus, lviii. [1898] 350 f., connect σιβυλλα with the Semitic (Aramaic) root of sub-il'd, 'grandmother,' although this leaves the reduplication of the β unexplained. None of these, or of the other ancient and modern etymologies which have been proposed, is satisfactory. Σιβυλλα occurs as a woman's name in an Attic inscription from the 4th cent. B.C., but, while this suggests that Sibyl may have been a proper name to begin with, it is insufficient to prove that Sibyl was a Greek term, not an Oriental. Eventually the name was applied to any woman of prophetic gifts, according to Servius (on Æn. iii.

445: 'Sibylla . . . dicitur omnis puella cuius pectus numen recipit') and Suidas (ἐνὶ ὀνόματι αἱ θηλείαι μάντιδες ὠνομάσθησαν Σιβυλλαί). But originally it was restricted to a small class of prophetesses, whom we may call:

1. The classical Sibyl(s).—Towards the end of the 6th, or about the beginning of the 5th, cent. B.C., the foundation of the Capitoline temple in Rome was associated with the influence of Sibylline utterances and the infusion of Greek rites (Græcus ritus) into Roman religion. The origin of these was Eastern. During the 6th cent. 'Greece was not only full of Orphism and Pythagoreanism, but of floating oracular dicta believed to emanate from a mystic female figure, a weird figure of whom it is hard to say how far she was human or divine; and of whose origin we know nothing, except that her original home was, as we might expect, Asia Minor' (W. Warde Fowler, The Religious Experience of the Roman People, London, 1911, p. 257). This was the Sibyl. Like the Pythia, she was a woman, considered to be inspired by Apollo. Subsequently, she was supposed to be extremely old, on the principle, probably, that long experience added to her prophetic capacities. As time went on, her personality multiplied; in the 4th cent. B.C. Heraclides Ponticus, the historian, knew of three, and Varro reckoned as many as ten * Sibyls. Primitive tradition located the original Sibyl at Erythræ, but the most famous Sibyl resided at Cumæ, the old Greek settlement in Campania, though it is probable that the Sibylline oracles which came to Rome from Cumæ had reached the latter city from Erythræ.† The Roman collection, which legend linked to the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, perished in the Capitol fire of 83 B.C. But they had become too important for the purposes of religion to be lost, and a commission of three State officials replaced them by a fresh collection of a thousand verses, gathered from Erythræ, Samos, Ilium, Africa, Sicily, and elsewhere. Instructions were given that only genuine productions were to be admitted to this new edition of the libri Sibyllini or libri fatales.‡ But such precautions as were taken do not seem to have been more than partially successful. Oracles of this kind absorbed forgeries of a more or less political aim, and the authorized collection had to be purged from time to time. In 13 B.C. Augustus included this among his religious reforms, and Tiberius had to prevent an anonymous Sibylline book from being added to the list; the Emperor showed himself more sceptical than the quindecimviri sacris faciundis,§ who were officially responsible for the interpretation of the oracles and for the application of their mysterious commands to the national life. In times of disaster and misfortune, or when prodigies occurred, the Romans turned to this sacred collection. Whatever measures it dictated—fasts, feasts, expiations, or the like—were carried out with trembling, anxious care, as during the panic roused by Hannibal's campaign in Northern Italy. The Sibylline collection met, or was skilfully manipulated to meet,

* The variant tradition of nine reached Shakespeare. The Bastard in King Henry VI. (pt. i. act i. scene ii. lines 55-57), describing Joan of Arc, says:

'The spirit of deep prophecy she hath,
Exceeding the nine sibyls of old Rome:

What's past and what's to come she can descry.'

† Cf. Emmanuel Hofmann's paper on 'Die tarquinischen Sibyllen-bücher' in Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, new ser., i. [1895] 90-113.

‡ According to some recent critics, e.g. F. Kampers (in Hist. Zeitschrift, 1908, p. 252 f.), the new harvest of Sibyllina included some Jewish Alexandrian productions, which influenced Vergil. See, further, J. B. Mayor's paper in the Exp. 7th ser. iii. [1907] 289 ff.

§ When his patron's son was elected to this board of officials, Tibullus (ii. 5) wrote a poem for the occasion, in which he invokes Phœbus Apollo, under whose guidance 'the Sibyl has never played the Romans false, singing Fate's secrets in hexameters' (15 f.).

the popular appetite for appeasing the supernatural, which prodigies and defeats created from time to time. These Roman oracles originally were not so much predictions of woes to come, like apocalyptic tracts, as explanations of what was required to avert the anger of the gods and ward off evil to the State on earth. They were not 'vaticinia' but 'remedia Sibyllina,' as Pliny puts it (HN xi. 35). They were also esoteric literature; the consent of the Senate was required before a line of their contents could be divulged to the general public. This put considerable power into the hands of the officials who had charge of them, especially as the obscurity of their contents made the sense of certain passages conveniently ambiguous, and it is not surprising to find that, as time went on, their reputation suffered in the same way as the Greek oracles; the Roman, like the Greek, Sibyllina might 'philippize'; genuine lines might be interpreted for private ends, if a political leader could influence the expositors, and forced lines could be surreptitiously introduced. Still, for two centuries at least, these oracles had a singular power over the religious hopes and fears of the people. An odd story like that preserved by Petronius* in the 1st cent. A.D. must not be allowed to count unduly against the esteem which was still felt for the oracles. But their influence was upon the wane. Thus, in A.D. 270, when the Alemanni invaded Italy, the Senate hesitated to consult the Sibyllina, and Aurelian had to incite them (Vopiscus, Vita Aureliani, 20); the Emperor taunted them with behaving as if they were in a Christian church—a significant indication of the changed attitude towards these oracles! Their use lingered down to the age of Julian. Then the Christian reaction proved fatal to them, and Stilicho is said to have burned the entire official collection at the beginning of the 5th century. His action was bitterly resented, as we can see from the indignant verses of Rutilius Numantianus, but the protest did not affect the fact; Stilicho's action had made it impossible for the authorities to appeal in future to this ancient relic of pagan divination.†

Besides the official collection, however, Sibylline oracles passed current in large numbers among the people. Lactantius, who has preserved several important data on the subject, declares that only the Cumæan Sibyl's oracles, amounting to three books, were kept secret,‡ while the writings of the other Sibyls for the most part circulated freely. It is true, as we have seen, that the very diffusion of such verses led to the partial discrediting of the entire literature as a religious authority of impartial value, but long before this shadow fell upon the Sibyllina at Rome the Hellenistic Jews of Alexandria had taken advantage of the current Sibylline verse as a literary genre and started a new, ingenious development of the method.

2. The Jewish Sibylline oracles.—We come upon Jewish Sibylline oracles before we hear of a Jewish Sibyl. The latter is first mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor, the Greek author of Xalδaîkâ, in the 1st cent. B.C., who quotes what is apparently an oracle still extant in Sib. Orac. iii. 97 ff. It is necessary to say 'apparently,' for serious doubts have been thrown recently upon Alexander's indebtedness to a Jewish source; both Geffcken* and Bousset† prefer to find traces of a Babylonian (Greek) Sibylline oracle, and Schürer's criticism of this theory does not succeed in ruling it out of court. The exact relations between the Jewish Sibyl and the Chaldean have not yet been cleared up. Pausanias vouches for four Sibyls, the Erythrean Herophile, the Cumæan Demo, a Libyan prophetess, and 'subsequent to Demo, an oracular woman among the Hebrews, named Sabbe; Berosus is said to have been the father, Erymanthes the mother, of Sabbe. Some call her the Babylonian, others the Egyptian Sibyl' (x. 12). A later variant for 'Sabbe' is 'Sambethe,' which is variously explained. But among these uncertainties the fact shines clear, that by the 2nd cent. B.C. the literary method of the Sibylline oracles had been exploited by one or more Jewish authors at Alexandria, in the interests of religious apologetic and propaganda. Like the older Philo, Theodotus, and possibly the author of the pseudo-Phocylidean verses, the Jews who composed these Sibylline oracles of their own could write Greek hexameters.‡ They chose this pagan form in order not only to convey threats or doom against persecuting powers like Assyria and Rome, but also to win a hearing among outside circles for their own monotheism and moralism. Why should not the Sibyl, this recognized exponent of Divine things, voice the true inspiration of Israel as well as the secondary revelation of the nations? Why should not this authoritative channel convey the living water of Jewish truth, or rather of truth as only the Jews knew it? And so this form of pseudonymous literature came into vogue.§

But the vogue did not last very long. The same fate befell the Sibylline oracles of Judaism that befell the apocalypses; their popularity with the early Christian Church appears to have thrown them out of favour with the officials of Rabbinic Judaism.|| The Church appropriated them, appealed to them, edited them in her own interests, composed fresh ones, and, in general, treated the Jewish Sibylline oracles much as the Alexandrian Jews had treated the pagan ones. It is true that the composition of Jewish Sibyllines continued sporadically till the reign of Marcus Aurelius at any rate, and even later. But the extant collection is due to Christians, and one of the intricate problems of this literature is to determine how far Christians have edited sources which were originally Jewish. As in the case of the apocalypses, the criteria are far from being satisfactory. The Sibylline oracles are a conglomerate of documents, ranging from the 2nd cent. B.C. to the middle of the 7th cent. A.D. Some sections (e.g. the earliest, in bk. iii.) are evidently Jewish, others as evidently Christian; but large passages seem to show no distinct soil in one or the other religion. Some of them are not definitely pre-Christian, and even those that are to be dated in the Christian era may be Jewish compositions worked over by a Christian hand.

‡ The language of prophecy naturally assumes a metrical or rhythmical form, partly as an aid to the memory, partly, perhaps, as a means of giving to the words uttered the effect of a more solemn intonation' (W. Y. Sellar, Roman Poets of the Republic, Oxford, 1905, p. 34); cf. ERE iv. 798^a.

Lieger's Die jüdische Sibylle, griechisch und deutsch mit erklärenden Anmerkungen, Vienna, 1908; in addition to the prefaces of critical editors like Alexandre and Friedlieb. The bulk of bk. iii. goes back to the 2nd cent. B.C.; nuclei seem to gather round 170 a.c. and 140 b.c.

* His drunken hero, Trimalchio (Satyricon, 48), alleges, 'I once saw with my own eyes the Sibyl hanging in a cage at Cumæ, and when the boys called to her, "Sibyl, what do you want?" she replied, "I want to die."'

† On the whole subject, see G. Wissowa, Religion und Kultus der Römer, Munich, 1902, pp. 462-475, and W. Buchholz's article in Roscher, pp. 790-813, with the penetrating discussion in A. Bouché-Leclercq's Histoire de la divination dans l'antiquité, 4 vols., Paris, 1879-81, ii. 190 f.

‡ Justin (Apol. i. 44) denounces this as a device of evil demons, to prevent men from reading evidence for the truth of God!

An instance of the difficulty of deciding whether a passage of the Sibyllina was written by a Jew or by a Christian is afforded by the first of the fragments which Theophilus of Antioch has preserved (ad Autol. ii. 36):

'O mortal men of flesh, mere things of nought,
How quick your pride, regardless of life's end!
Have ye no fear of God, who knows each thought,
Who sees all, rules all,* who doth all transcend,
Nourishing all he made, and in all men
Sets the sweet † Spirit to direct their ways?
One God there is, Lord above mortal ken,
Unborn, alone in power, from mortal gaze
Hidden himself, who yet beholdeth all.
The immortal God no eye of flesh can view,
Who dwells above, the heavenly God, the true;
For mortal nerves will weakly flinch and fall
Even before the sun's refulgent ball.
'Ah, worship him who o'er the world holds sway,
Unborn, eternal, self-created Being,
Sustaining Lord, who in our common day §
Assigns to mortals each the power of seeing. ||
Bitterly for ill error shall ye pay,
For all forsaking of his altars true,
For hecatombs and offerings ye lay
On altars of dead idols as their due.
Besotted, proud, ye left the straight highway
To wander blindly among thorns: ah, cease,
Cease, oh ye foolish men, to roam astray,
From darkness and black night seek ye release,
Lay hold upon the Light,* unerring, clear,
For all to mark his presence now and here.
Turn not for ever to the murky night:
When lo the sun's sweet rays are shining bright!
Be wise of heart, be wise and understand:
There is one God, who sends upon the land
The rain, the wind, the lightning and the might
Of earthquake, famine, pestilence, and woe,
Sad woe that weighs the heart, the hail, the snow,—
All, all are his, who reigns over his own,
Sovereign of heaven and earth himself alone.'

A passage like this breathes so much of the monotheistic moralism which was common to Orphism, Judaism, and Christianity that we have no definite criteria for assigning it to either a Jewish or a Christian Sibyllinist; either might have written it, subordinating his dogmatic idiosyncrasies to the need of preserving the dramatic probabilities of the situation. The spirit of the piece is deliberately neutral. On the other hand, there can be no doubt with regard to a passage like this from bk. iii. 263 ff., which describes the fortunes of the twelve tribes:

'To them alone a hundred fold the field
Bears harvest, and God's measures ample yield.
Yet even they shall fare amiss, even they Shall suffer pestilence. Thou,†† far away
From thy fair shrine shalt flee, for 'tis thy fate
To leave thy sacred soil all desolate;
Borne to Assyria, thou shalt there behold
Thy wives and children into slavery sold,
And greedy hands despoiling all thy gold.
Thou shalt fill every country, every sea,
And at thy customs all shall angry be.‡
But thy land shall be empty, down shall fall
The great God's shrine and altar, the long wall,

* τὸν ἐπιστατον ὕμῶν, almost in the sense of Wis 16 (=scrutator) or 1 P 25 ('overseer').

† As below (p. 435) in bk. vi. Blass prefers to render, 'who set the sweet breath of life in everything, and made man director of all things.'

* This ancient argument is applied in the Epistle of Barnabas (v. 9f.) to the Incarnation specifically: 'He manifested Himself as God's Son. For, had He not come in the flesh, how could men ever have been saved by beholding Him, since they are unable to gaze directly at the rays of the sun, which is destined to perish and is the work of His hands?'

§ ἐν φαί κοινῶ, a frequent phrase in the Sibyllina.

|| i.e., apparently, of recognizing Himself. But κριτικὸν is difficult in this sense. To take it as meaning that God constantly judges men in the present, not simply in the future, is a possible, though less probable, alternative.

†† If this alludes to Christ, the authorship is plain. To take it as a reference to the sun is possible, but less likely. The same difficulty emerges in the interpretation of iii. 95 f.

 Literally, 'why detail each one by one?'—a common phrase of the Sibyl, in breaking off a list.

|| Suddenly apostrophizing the Jewish people.

‡ The well-known anti-Semitic prejudice which echoes through Latin literature. See H. Strong's paragraphs in HJ xiii. [1915] 306 f.; he points out how, e.g., the Jewish objection to pork must have irritated Romans, as pork was their favourite animal food.

Since God immortal thou would'st not obey,
But from his holy law didst swerve and stray,
Since wretched idols were thy heart's desire,
Careless in reverence for the immortal Sire
Of gods and men, who worship doth require.
Wherefore thy wondrous shrine, thy fruitful land
For seventy years* untouched by thee shall stand.
Yet at the end shall bliss and glory greet
Be thine, as God has ordered: only wait . . .'

We have thus three strata in the medley of the extant Sibyllina: (1) the pagan (Greek or Babylonian) oracles, which came into the hands of Jews and eventually of Christians. It is one of the many services rendered to the criticism of the oracles by Geffcken, their latest editor, that he has distinguished more fully than any of his predecessors the presence of such outside sources throughout the collection; even although the evidence is occasionally unsatisfactory, there can be little doubt that the later Jewish and Christian Sibyllinists made more use of these surviving fragments than scholars formerly were disposed to admit; † (2) the Jewish Sibyllines, rising in Alexandria not long after the invasion of Egypt by Antiochus Epiphanes in 171–169 B.C. The literary method was to imitate,‡ the pagan oracles, for the purpose of persuading or threatening the Gentiles, but occasionally fragments of them were incorporated as the nucleus of a fresh composition, and more or less edited for their new setting; (3) the Christian Sibyllines, which followed the same path in dealing with their predecessors. Fresh oracles were composed, old ones were recast and Christianized. It was the Jewish composers who gave the lead to Christian in this literary method, as in the apocalyptic department of pseudepigrapha, and the production of occasional Jewish oracles went on side by side with the Christian activity, even after the Pharisaic reaction and reorganization of Judaism had eschewed the Sibyllines. But we must now turn to the third of the strata. It is the most important for our present purpose, not simply because it is Christian, but because the final editing of the oracles, as we have them, was the work of Christians.§

3. The Christian Sibyl.—In the early Christian literature we hear of the Sibyl before we hear of Sibylline oracles. The so-called allusions in Clement of Rome are dubious, but Hermas (Vis. II. iv.) mentions her. Justin (Apol. i. 20) quotes her, along with Hystaspes, to prove that the world would be destroyed by fire, and the author of pseudo-Justin's Cohortatio ad Græcos (16), not earlier than the end of the 2nd or the beginning of the 3rd cent., not only quotes her as a primeval witness to monotheism, but (37) describes her shrine at Cumæ: 'You will also be able easily to learn the right religion, to some extent, from the ancient Sibyl, who, under a powerful inspiration, teaches you by her oracles what seems closely akin to the doctrine of the prophets. She is said to have come from Babylon, her father being Berosus, who wrote the history of Chaldaea; after crossing over, somehow, to Campania, she uttered her oracles in a town called Cumæ, six miles from Baiæ, the site of the hot springs of Campania.'

* From Jer 25:12.

† See below, p. 456. In viii. 361, 373, two lines are quoted from a Delphic oracle which happens to be preserved by Herodotus (I. 47). Hermas (see below) hears terrible news from his Sibyl, followed by gentle, gracious promises, and Rendel Harris (The Homeric Centones, London, 1898, p. 15 f.) conjectures that the former were 'an intimation of the impending ruin of Rome, something like what we find in the eighth book of the Sibylline Oracles.' But this would be Jewish. The couplet in iv. 97–98 is indubitably pagan; Strabo quotes it as such.

‡ 'The pseudo-oracular,' as F. W. H. Myers puts it, 'is a style which has in all ages been cultivated with success' (*Hellenica*², London, 1898, p. 411).

§ A good statement of the problem is to be found in Harnack's Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur, i. I. [Leipzig, 1893] 861 ff., n. i. [do., 1897] 581 f., ii. [do., 1904] 184 f.

When I was in that town, I saw a spot where I was shown a huge basilica cut out of a single block—an extraordinary and most marvellous object. According to those who had the local tradition from their fathers, it was there that she used to put forth her oracles. In the middle of the basilica I was shown three openings cut out of the same block, in which, when filled with water, she was said to have bathed; after which she would resume her robe, retire to the inner shrine of the basilica (still cut out of the same block), and in the middle of the chamber, seated on a high platform and throne, put forth her oracles.' He then argues that Plato must have had this Sibyl in his mind when he described in the Phædrus (244B) and the Meno (99C) the phenomena of prophetic frenzy or rapture, since the Sibyl did not recollect afterwards what she had said during her unconscious ecstasies.* This Christian author also shares the view of Pausanias (see above) about the parentage of the Sibyl; but for our immediate purpose it is more relevant to note his appeal to her teaching on morality and monotheism. The appeal is by no means characteristic of him alone. It represents a widespread attitude, and from it there developed a Christian Sibylline literature. Christians, especially Christian apologists of the 2nd cent. like Theophilus of Antioch and Clement of Alexandria, were content to upbraid the degenerate and immoral paganism of the age by holding up the purer conceptions of the ancient Sibyl, but others were attracted to the predictions and threats of the Sibylline prophecies, which seemed so analogous to the apocalyptic tracts of the Church. It was the latter interest that first started the independent composition of Sibylline verses by Christians, probably on quite a small scale. Celsus, e.g., taunts Christians on two grounds, in this connexion; they were 'Sibyllists,' he urged, with their belief in the existence of a prophetic Sibyl and their appeal to her oracular authority (Orig. c. Cels. v. 61), and they dared to interpolate these ancient sources with impious lines of their own (vii. 53: οὐν δὲ παρεγγράφειν μὲν εἰς τὰ ἐκείνης πολλὰ καὶ βλάσφημα εἰκὴ δύνασθε). It was not difficult to slip in a Christian line or alter a phrase, any more than in the case of the apocalypses of Judaism. Then came the full-blown production of such oracles by writers of the Church, partly to justify the ways of Providence, partly to enforce Christian predictions and threats, partly even to disseminate Christian doctrines. Once the fabrication of Sibyllina started, it went on from modest interpretations of a line or two to fresh pieces. The sustaining force in the composition of such oracles was drawn from the popular passion, in several Christian circles, for their pagan and Jewish prototypes. The ingenuity of Sibylline composers and the credulity of many simple Christians combined to produce our present collection.

One remarkable proof of the prestige gained by the Sibylline oracles of paganism in certain corners of the Church during the 2nd cent. is afforded by an incidental allusion in Clement of Alexandria, which proves that some Pauline apocryphon claimed the authority of the Apostle for the Divine testimony of these primeval predictions. In the sixth book of the Stromata (ch. 5), arguing that the Greeks had some knowledge of the true God, Clement declares:

* From the Hellenic discipline and also from the legal [i.e. the Jewish] discipline, those who accept faith are gathered into the one race of the saved People—not that the three peoples are separated chronologically, but that they are disciplined in different covenants of the one Lord [and instructed?] by the word of the one Lord. As it was God's will to save the Jews by giving them prophets, so be raised up the most notable of the Greeks themselves to be prophets in their own tongue, as they were able to receive the divine bounty, and thus separated them from the vulgar crowd. This will be clear from The Preaching of Peter and also from the words of the Apostle Paul: "Take the Greek books, read the Sibyl, see how the unity of God and the course of the future are shown there. Take and read Hystaspes, and you will find the Son of God far more luminously and plainly described, and how many kings will array themselves against the Christ, hating him and those who bear his name, his faithful ones, his patience and his coming."

Unfortunately Clement does not name this Pauline document, and nothing corresponding to his quotation has turned up yet in any surviving fragments of the Acta Pauli. But the Alexandrian apologist's attitude brings out one distinctive feature in the Christian Sibyllina. For all their common appeal to the pagan Sibyl or Sibyls, there was one difference between the procedure of the Jewish Sibyllinists and the Christian. The former often took pains to construct a Sibyl of their own; she spoke Greek, and spoke to Greeks, but she was of Hebrew birth. She repudiates her sisters of Erythræ and Cumæ. 'Mortals throughout Hellas will call me foreign, sprung from Erythra, and shameless; some will say I am the Sibyl whose mother was Circe and whose father was Gnostos, a raving maniac. But when all these things come to pass, then you will remember me, and none will then call me mad, but the prophetess of mighty God' (iii. 813-818; cf. iv. 1-23). The Sibyl, like Cassandra, has to prophesy to an incredulous generation. But she is of Hebrew origin, or at any rate of Babylonian. Traditions vary on her birth; in some quarters she appears to have been connected with Noah (iii. 827, 'I was his daughter-in-law'), but it was at any rate essential to safeguard the origin of one who not only denounced idolatry but glorified the Jewish people, and there was a tendency to identify her, in one or other of her Oriental forms, with Hebrew story. The Christian Sibyllinists, on the other hand, took over the pagan Sibyl or Sibyls. Their theory of Divine inspiration working in the past outside Israel—an outcome of the finer conception of the Logos, as held by the apologists—enabled them to dispense with the construction of a new figure. It would have been much more difficult for them, in any case, to produce a Sibyl for themselves than it had been for the Hellenistic Jews of an earlier age.* The Christian Sibyl is therefore a voice rather than a figure; she is rarely so dramatic and definite as the Jewish Sibyl, except when she is made to repent of her pagan vices (see below).

The only exception to this may be found in the pages of that second-rate Bunyan of the 2nd cent., Hermas. He makes his hero receive a book of revelations from an old woman, whom he takes to be the Sibyl. But he is told in a vision that it is the Church; the Church is old, because she was created first of all things (Vis. i.-ii.). This would be all the more dramatic if the setting of the vision were Cumæ.† Whether Hermas added this graphic touch or not, he certainly took over the figure of the aged Sibyl and re-shaped it as the Church, in order to suggest a medium for moral precepts and eschatological predictions. It is one of the daring touches in this religious romance, but later writers of the Church went on another line when they appropriated the Sibyl. They

* The traits remained the same: (a) the Sibyl was a woman; (b) her inspiration was ecstatic and frenzied; (c) she spoke in hexameters, the ordinary metrical mould for religious oracles (Plutarch, De Pyth. Orac. 9, says she was nourished by the Muses on Helicon); and (d) she was very old. The last point was sharpened for Jews and Christians. If the Sibyl was already in the far past, when Hecataetus heard of her towards the end of the 6th cent. B.C., how much more remote she would be to Hellenistic Judaism and early Christianity!

† 'I was on my way,' says Hermas, εἰς Κωμὰς (MSS); most editors alter this to εἰς Κούμας.

* In the Sibylline oracles, the Sibyl is passive or reluctant under the influence of inspiration. This tallied with some Jewish and Christian conceptions of prophetic inspiration.

preferred to leave her in the far mists of Greek antiquity as an incontrovertible witness to God's presence and purpose among the nations of pre-Christian paganism. From that coign of vantage she pours out reproof and threatening. She has little or no dramatic rôle of an independent kind, till we turn aside to some corners of Egyptian Christianity,* where, as we saw at the beginning of this article, apocalyptic fantasy set her among the final opponents of Antichrist, among the four witnesses to Christ who herald His overthrow of death and evil. A conception of this kind could arise only in a popular Christianity which was face to face with sterner exigencies than those of the age of Hermas; but it represented the normal Christian attitude to the Sibyl as little as did Hermas. What the Church valued primarily in the Sibyl was her rhapsodies, not any actions or sufferings. She was a voice in the wilderness, and it was to the oracles which she was supposed to have voiced that Christians turned for confirmation of their hopes and beliefs.

A number of prominent early Christian Fathers ignore the Sibyl, but none of those who mention or quote her feel any need of defending this procedure. The ordinary assumption is that she is a reliable prophetess of the truth, and that her predictions of Christ and Christianity are as authentic in their own way as the prophecies of the OT. Tertullian† voices the general opinion when he calls her 'veri uera uates.' The first indication of any real‡ scepticism on the part of Christians occurs in the 4th cent. oration of Constantine, ad Sanct. coetum (18f.). Though the speaker quotes the Sibylline oracles as a telling proof, from paganism, of the Divine origin and nature of Christ, he feels obliged to give reasons for the faith that is in him: the reasons are weaker than the faith, but the significant thing is that evidently he could not count upon an unquestioning acceptance of the oracles as inspired by God in pre-Christian Greece. He argues in this way:

'The Erythraean Sibyl, who declares that she lived in the sixth generation after the flood,§ was a priestess of Apollo; she wore the sacred fillet in imitation of him whom she served, and guarded the tripod round which the serpent coiled; she answered those who consulted her, as her parents in their folly had devoted her to this service—a service which produced not solemn results but unseemly passions, such as are told of Daphne. However, she once swept into the shrine of that obnoxious superstition and, really filled this time with the Divine inspiration, foretold in words the Divine plan for the future, plainly disclosing the story of the descent of Jesus by the initial letters of the lines—which form an acrostic.' He proceeds to quote the acrostic (see below), adding: 'Obviously a divine impulse inspired the maiden to foretell this. For my part, I consider her blessed who was thus chosen by the Saviour to be a prophetess of his gracious thought for us. But many people are sceptical; they allow that the Erythraean Sibyl was a seer, but they suspect that it was someone belonging to our religion, not unacquainted with the art of poetry, who composed these lines; they think they are a forgery and that they are alleged to be oracles of the Sibyl because they contain salutary moral precepts which curb sensuous indulgence and promote a sober, orderly life. It is impossible, however, to mistake the real facts of the case, for our own members have been at pains to calculate the time with care, so that no one need suspect this poem was written after the arrival and the condemnation (καθόδοι καὶ κρίσις) of Christ or that the current view of their previous composition by the Sibyl is inaccurate.'

* Vergil, of course, had already begun to set the Cumæan Sibyl in motion. She is more to him than a seer who is consulted. She conducts Æneas to the world of the dead, just as she does in Ovid.

† Ad Nationes, ii. 12: 'Ante enim Sibylla quam omnis litteratura exstitit. Illa scilicet Sibylla, veri uera uates, et cuius uocabula demoniorum uatibus induistis. Ea senario uersu in hunc sensum de Saturni prosepia et rebis eius exponit.' The description recurs in the passage inserted by Codex Fuldensis in Apol. 19, but the authenticity of the addition is doubtful (cf. R. Heinze's Tertullian's Apologeticum, Leipzig, 1910, p. 330 f.).

‡ Origen's answer to Celsus is weak, and he never uses the Sibyl in his proofs of revelation. But he never does pronounce against the Sibyllina. Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 15. 26) takes much the same line of defence as Constantine.

§ In bk. i. 283 f. the Sibyl distinctly says she belonged to the sixth generation after Adam!

He then appeals to the evidence of Cicero in the de Divin. ii. 54—a singularly maladroit appeal, for Cicero did not translate this acrostic* into Latin, and in fact used the acrostic form of the Sibylline verses to disprove the assertion that the Sibyl spoke in ecstatic frenzy; acrostics, as he observed, are not the product of a frenzied intellect, pouring out impromptu inspiration. Eusebius, or whoever wrote this speech for the Emperor, felt, however, that the Sibyllina afforded too telling a proof of Christianity to be surrendered. The uncritical spirit prevailed over the doubts of more intelligent Christians and the ridicule poured by pagans on this manufactured product. The Sibyllina were read, and they continued to be written.

From what has been said, it will be gathered that no Sibylline oracles of Christian origin are contemporary with the Apostolic Age. We do not possess any definite evidence as to the period when such compositions began to appear in Christian circles, apart from the insertion of lines here and there in extant Jewish oracles, which preceded independent Sibylline composition. But it can hardly have been much, if at all, earlier than the end of the 2nd cent. that the Church's interest in the Sibyl became creative. All the sections which are specifically Christian, in the present collection, are quite post-apostolic; some may be earlier than the 3rd cent., but none has a sure claim to be reckoned as belonging to the 2nd century. The result is that we are left with the paradox that those Sibylline oracles which, strictly speaking, are relevant to this Dictionary are all of Jewish origin, i.e. the familiar oracles embedded in books iii.–v. especially, illustrating the apocalyptic and eschatological traditions† which operated in some circles of contemporary piety. These Jewish oracles the present writer does not propose to discuss. They are accessible, and for the most part intelligible, thanks to the research which for over a century has been devoted to this branch of our subject.‡ It is the rest of the Sibyllines which are unfamiliar to the ordinary student, even of Church history; they are not easily accessible, and they are by no means clear, but they represent so curious and baffling a phase of early Christian literature and popular feeling, on its romantic side, that it will be of some service even to call attention to the problems which they still contain, and to the phenomena of their origin. In surveying these Sibyllina we enter a by-way of early Christian literature, but it is a by-way which, like that of the uncanonical gospels, though never to the same extent, was once thronged and popular.

In Geffcken's standard edition of the text (see Literature), apart from a prose prologue and some brief, scattered fragments, the extant collection contains fourteen books. Nothing from the ninth and tenth has been preserved, but the other twelve amount to 4146 lines (400, 347, 829, 192, 531, 23, 162, 500, 324, 299, 173, 361), and there are some obvious lacunæ in the text. The present form of the collection probably goes back in the main to the anonymous Byzantine Greek who wrote the

* The Sibylline oracle he mentions advised the Romans 'eum quem re vera regem habebamus, appellandum quoque esse regem, si salui esse vellemus.' The Parthians could be conquered only by a 'king.' Therefore, as this adroit partisan of Cæsar put it in his oracle, let that title be given to Cæsar.

† E.g. the belief in Nero rediturus or at any rate reduz, which echoes through bks. iv., v., and viii., and which sounds behind the Apocalypse of John.

‡ Besides the translations mentioned in the Literature (below), the English reader will find critical discussions in S. Krauss's article (JE xi. 319–323), W. J. Deane's Pseudepigrapha, London, 1891, pp. 276–344. Bousset's article in the Eng. tr. of Herzog (vol. x. pp. 396–400), J. H. Lupton's art. in Smith's DCB iv. 644–649, a paper by S. A. Hirsch in the JQR ii. [1890] 406–429, and—for the religious ideas—James Drummond's Philo Judæus, 2 vols., London, 1858, i. 187 ff., and R. H. Charles, in EBB i. 245–250.

prologue some time in the course of the 6th century. This prologue is a rough piece of work. It repeats some current legends about the Sibyl and Sibylline oracles, but its structure is loose. This may be due to later interpolations, or the text may have suffered at the hands of scribes. Even so, however, it shows more goodwill than critical ability in the writer. He is a simple, credulous Christian, who undertakes the literary task of collecting and arranging the Sibyllina because he desires to aid Christian piety. The contents of the prologue are as follows:

'If toil spent on reading Greek books yields rich profit to those who labour at it, inasmuch as it has the power of making scholars of those who toil thus, it is far more fitting for the right-minded to devote themselves at all times to the divine scriptures, inasmuch as they treat of God and of what issues in spiritual profit; this yields a twofold gain, for people can thereby profit themselves and also those whom they come across. Hence it was that I myself resolved to take the oracles which are called Sibylline, and which are to be found here and there, read in confusion and indistinctly understood, and to publish them in connected and orderly form, so that they may be readily grasped by the reader and yield him their profit (for they contain no small amount of what is essential and useful), thus rendering the study of them at once more rich and varied. For they impart clear information about the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the divine and life-imparting trinity, as well as about the incarnation of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ, about his birth from a pure virgin, about the cures performed by him, likewise about his life-giving Passion and his resurrection from the dead on the third day, about the judgment to come and the recompense for what we all have done in this life. Besides, they treat clearly of what is disclosed in the writings of Moses and the books of the prophets about the creation of the world, the formation of man, the expulsion from paradise, and the re-forming;* they foretell what has taken place, and perhaps what is to take place, in various ways. In a word, they can be of no small service to those who come across them.

"Sibyl" is a Roman term, meaning prophetess or seer; hence female seers were called by this single name. There were Sibyls, as many writers tell us, in different ages and localities, to the number of ten; first, the Chaldaean or Persian, whose proper name was Sambeche, belonging to the race of the most blessed Noah, and said to have foretold the events connected with Alexander the Macedonian; she is mentioned by Nicanor the biographer of Alexander. Second, the Libyan sibyl, mentioned by Euripides in the prologue to the Lamia. Third, the Delphic, born at Delphi, of whom Chrysippus speaks in his book upon the deity (divination?). Fourth, the Italian sibyl of Cummeria in Italy, the mother of Evander, who founded the shrine of Pan in Rome called the Lupercal. Fifth, the Erythraean sibyl, who predicted the Trojan war; Apollodorus the Erythraean vouches for her. Sixth, the Samian sibyl, whose proper name was Phyo; Eratosthenes has written of her. Seventh, the Cumæan sibyl called Amalthea and also Herophile, by some Taraxandra; Vergil (Æn. vi. 36) calls the Cumæan sibyl Deiphobe, the daughter of Glaucus. Eighth, the Hellespontine sibyl, born at the village of Marpesus near the town of Gergition, in the district of the Troad, during the days of Solon and Cyrus, as Heraclides Ponticus writes. Ninth, the Phrygian, and tenth, the Tiburtine sibyl, called Albunea.†

The story goes that the Cumæan sibyl brought nine books of her own oracles to Tarquinius Priscus, who was then king of the Roman State, asking three hundred pounds for them. As she was treated with contempt and not even asked what their contents were, she committed three of them to the flames. On her next visit to the king, she brought the six books and demanded the same price for them, but was treated with disdain, and burned other three. Following this up with a third visit, she brought the remaining three and asked the same price for them, declaring that if she did not get it she would burn them also. Then the king—so the story goes—read them, and in astonishment gave her a hundred pounds for them and demanded the rest of the books; she reported that she had none equivalent to what had been burnt and that no such oracles were attainable apart from ecstasy, but that certain persons in various towns and localities had received oracles which they judged essential and profitable, and that a collection of these should be made. This was done speedily. What God had given in secret did not escape notice. The books of all the sibyls were deposited in the Capitol in ancient Rome, those of the sibyl of Cumæ being kept secret and not communicated to the people, as they announced rather specifically and distinctly what was to happen in Italy; the other books were made known to all. The predictions of the Erythraean sibyl have the local name prefixed to them, whereas the others have no indication of their origin, but lie mixed up together.

Now Firmianus;‡ a philosopher of no small repute and a

* ἀναπλάσεις, the 'new' creation in contrast to πλάσεις, which has just been used.

† This paragraph is practically a reproduction of Varro's account, which Lactantius (Div. Inst. i. 6) had preserved.

‡ He means, of course, the great Christian apologist, L. Cælius Firmianus Lactantius. Some idea of our author's priest of the aforesaid Capitol, opened his eyes to Christ, our eternal light, and in his writings set forth what had been said by the sibyls about the unspeakable Glory, and thereby refuted with effect the folly of the Greek error. This powerful explanation was in the Ausonian tongue, whereas the Sibylline verses were in the Greek language. Lest this should be deemed incredible, I shall bring forward the following evidence from the man who has just been mentioned.* (Since the Sibyllines current among us are despised as common by those who understand Greek topics—what is uncommon being only counted of any value—and since people are the slower to believe in them as the lines do not all observe the accurate laws of metre, this latter is not the fault of the prophetess but of those who took them down, either because they could not keep up with the rush of what was said, or because they were uneducated;† as for the prophetess, her memory of what she had said ceased with the period of ecstasy. This was what Plato‡ had in mind when he wrote that many important things were accomplished by those who did not know what they were saying.) "So I shall quote as much as possible from the oracles brought to Rome by the envoys. The following was written of the supreme God:

One God, who rules alone, almighty, uncreated . . .
One God there is alone, high over all, who made the heaven, the sun and stars and moon, the fruitful earth, the swellings of the sea;
he only is Creator God, all-strong, he fixed our mould of being, and 'twas he blended the nature of each human life."

Which means either that when human beings come together, they become one flesh with the Father, or that he fashioned man and the world under heaven out of the four elements which are opposed to one another.†

There is a close affinity between this prologue and a 'theosophy' of the 5th cent. (474-491), which originally contained seven books 'on the orthodox faith,' employing the Sibylline oracles amongst other pagan sources to illustrate Christian doctrine. In a fragment recently discovered by Karl Mras ('Eine neuentdeckte Sibyllen-Theosophie,' Wiener Studien, xxviii. [1906] 43-83), the author appears to have drawn his quotation from Lactantius in part, but he had not our extant Sibylline collection before him, and Mras conjectures that the author of our prologue borrowed from this 'theosophy.' There is nothing in the prologue to contradict this view; it is a dishevelled piece of writing, and neither original nor reliable. However the compiler made up his collection, its condition does not increase our respect for his literary capacities. What his ideas of connexion and order may have been, we have no means of telling. The arrangement of the following oracles is not chronological—possibly we have no right to expect that—but it is not even topical. The least unsatisfactory method of dealing with the materials will be to survey rapidly each book in the sequence of the collection.

Bks. i. and ii. form a unity, but they are not by any means the earliest part of the collection, and it is almost certain that they represent a Jewish basis overlaid by Christian additions at several points. They appear to have been unknown to early Christian writers; the first echo occurs in the Oratio ad sanct. coetum (18 = Sib. i. 283 f.), which is attributed to Constantine. This does not militate against H. Dechent's view§ that the Jewish piece historical knowledge may be inferred from his remark that Lactantius had been a pagan priest of the Capitoline temple!

* The loose quotation from Lactantius (Div. Inst. i. 6) does not begin till after the passage in brackets, which our author seems to have reproduced freely by an error of memory from the Cohortatio ad Græcos.

† This is the Christian's attempt to answer the educated Roman's objection to the obscurity and irregularity of the Christian Sibyllina. So far from being a mark of weakness, this really proves their authenticity and inspired origin!

‡ See above, p. 480. Both passages expound the validity of rapture as a means of divination and insight, but the Sibyl is only mentioned in the Phædrus, where Socrates contends that 'the greatest blessings come to us by way of madness (μᾶνεια) if only it is bestowed by heaven. Why, the prophetess at Delphi and the priestesses at Dodona have done many a noble service to Hellas, both to individuals and to the public, by their madness, whereas they have done little or nothing in their sober senses. And further, we should only be elaborating what is known to every body, if we were to speak of the Sibyl and all the rest, who by the exercise of inspired divination have set many people right for what lay before them, by disclosing to them much of the future.'

which he disentangles from i. 1-323, ii. 6-33, 154-178, 185-189, 193-241, 253-311, 314-325 (327) was composed before the fall of Jerusalem, but it does tell against any early date* for the Christian editing. In bk. i. the Sibyl describes the Creation and the Flood, and then, in genuinely prophetic style, carries the story down to the rebellion of the Titans (1-323), when suddenly the birth, ministry, death, and resurrection of Christ, and the punishment of the disobedient Hebrews, are described; the book ends with a prediction of the capture of the Temple at Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews under the wrath of God for having maltreated His Son. Several passages in this Christian section are almost verbally identical with lines of the eighth book, and it is still a vexed question which book borrowed from the other.

In the Jewish oracle, which, like nearly all the Sibyllina, is a mine of odd lore about contemporary traditions and legends, the most interesting feature is the detailed description of Noah as a 'preacher of righteousness' (2 P 29) to his scornful generation (147 ff.). He preaches a short, good sermon. God reveals to him the impending fate of mankind, if they persist in their evil ways, and bids him appeal to them for the last time. Noah does so, but is scoffed at. He renews his warning, and, instead of being couched in any threatening tones,† it is charged with a singular pathos. He tells them, e.g., how he will lament and weep in the ark, if things come to the worst and God has to destroy them and the world. As is usual in the Sibyllina, the biblical thread is strung with variegated chips of legend and romantic mythology, but it is not so thickly strung as to become invisible. There is a simplicity and directness in this popular poetry on the biblical narrative which is superior to the prosaic paraphrase of Josephus. The Christian section is of less merit, either from a religious or from a literary point of view. It is a florid cento from the NT, with a vehement animus against the Jews. A fair specimen of the author's outlook may be found in the description of Christ, 'the son of the immortal God,' in 332 f.:

'He shall fulfil, he shall not destroy, God's law, bringing the original pattern, and shall teach all things.
To him shall the priests! bring offerings of gold, myrrh and incense.
But when a voice sounds through the desert, bidding all mortals loudly to make straight paths and cast evils from their heart and be enlightened by baptism in the waters,‡ every one, that being born from above they no more may swerve from the right in the least— . . .
then mortals shall have a sign suddenly,
when the Fair Stone comes guarded from Egypt's land, § whereat the people of the Hebrews will stumble, but the nations will muster under his guidance.'

The second book is predominantly eschatological, as might be expected, since the Sibyl now comes to the closing generations of mankind. One of the characteristics of this literature is its stress upon a purpose in history; sin is to be punished by God, amid sore suffering, and the punishment implies not only the overthrow of impious States on earth, but a final judgment of God, to which all leads up. The second book starts with a brief, gloomy description of the woes that vex earth in the tenth generation, when Rome is shattered by a visitation from heaven. Then earth is peaceful and fruitful for the pious, free from the curse of private property and Imperial tyranny. At this point, the Sibyllinist dramatically describes the contest for the virtuous rewards of immortality, over which Christ presides (34 f.)—a section which is further marked by the incorporation of a long moralistic* passage (56-148) from pseudo-Phocylides. The oracle then returns to the woeful last days, the misfortunes of the Jews, and the Last Judgment. The Christian accretions are probably from various hands, but none of them necessarily implies an early date. Lines 163 f. may be a quotation from the Gospel of the Egyptians (cf. vol. i. p. 495), but what Clement (Strom. iii. 6. 45) cites from the latter is only a parallel to the Sibylline allusion. The reference to the intercession of the Virgin Mary (312) is not so primitive as the remarks of Irenæus (v. 19), and the earliest parallel to the divine lists of struggle for the prizes of bliss occurs in Tertullian's treatise Ad Mart. 3. Whatever may have been the period of the fragments that constitute the nucleus of the book, the Christian touches need not be assigned to a date much, if at all, earlier than the end of the 2nd cent., and they may well be later. No early Father quotes from them. They are marked by a weird, grim power, if we can speak of 'power' in connexion with the Christian Sibyllina at all, either in edification or in literary quality. The apocalyptic element is strong, coloured by tinges familiar (e.g. 165 f. = Mt 24⁴¹) to us from current apocalyptic treatises, but often with an individuality of its own.

It is in this book (10 f.) that we first meet the famous Sibylline doctrine of the ten ages of the world (cf. ÈRE i. 200, and A. Rzach's paper in Wiener Studien, xxxiv. [1912] 114-122), which had been current in the pagan Sibyllina already (cf. Servius on Verg. Eclog. iv. 4). It recurs in iii. 108 f., in a separate form, the tenth generation being the generation of the Titans which is reckoned as the tenth from the Flood (the passage quoted by Tertullian, see above, p. 481). But here and in viii. 199 f. it is eschatological, the tenth generation being the last. In iv. 47-87 the tenth generation seems to mark the downfall of the Persian Empire at the hands of Alexander, and the generations are reckoned from the Flood, whereas in i. 1-198, which appears to be the prelude to ii. 15 f., the generations are reckoned from Adam, the fifth generation being that of the Giants.

'When Sabaoth, Adonai, thundering on high raises the dead, setting a term to their fates, and seats himself on the heavenly throne and places the great pillars, † then Christ the immortal shall come in a cloud to the Immortal, with mighty angelic retinue, seating himself at the right hand of the Great, and judging from the throne
the life of the pious and the ways of the impious.'

* According to Bousset, the Christian editor of bk. viii., the author of iii. 63-92, and the editor of i.-ii. all wrote in the 3rd cent., under Odenathus. This would follow necessarily, if the widow of iii. 77 f. were Zenobia, not Cleopatra, and if the Assyrian whom the twelve tribes return from the East to punish (ii. 167 f.) were Odenathus. Bleek relegated i.-ii. to the 5th cent. (middle), Ewald to the 4th, Alexandre to the 3rd, and Friedlieb to the 2nd.

† Such as, e.g., we hear in the oracle of iii. 55 f., where the bitter irony of denunciation overpowers the speaker. 'Woe is me, alas! when shall that Day arrive, the judgment of the immortal God, the great King? Meantime, o ye cities, get founded, get all adorned with temples, race-courses, market-places, statues of gold and silver, and stone, so that ye may come to the bitter Day! For come it will, whenever the smell of brimstone pervades all men.'

† Cf. Mt 215, 1 p 277.

* Note, e.g., the denunciation (111-118) of the love of money, as elsewhere in iii. 235 f., viii. 18 f. Rapacity is one of the cardinal sins with which these Eastern provincials charge the Roman Empire (iii. 350 f., viii. 18 f., 96 f.); the Sibyl reflects the resentment felt by the popular mind at the taxes levied by Rome, as well as the ordinary ethical protest against avarice and luxury. The general ethics are discussed with reference to the Didache by Rendel Harris in The Teaching of the Apostles, London, 1887, p. 40 f., and by A. Dieterich in his Nekyia, Leipzig, 1893, p. 193 f.

† Taking κίονα as generic. But this feature is unexampled and unintelligible. Did the Sibyllinist mean 'the whipping-post' of a Roman place of trial?

Moses, the great friend of the Most High, shall also come, clothed in flesh, and Abraham the great, Isaac and Jacob, Joshua, Daniel and Elijah, Habakkuk, Jonah, and those whom the Hebrews slew. All the Hebrews after Jeremiah who come for judgment before the throne shall he slay, that they may receive due recompense and punishment for what each did in this mortal life. Then shall all pass through the fiery stream, through the unquenchable fire: the just shall all be saved, but the impious shall perish to all eternity, as many as have formerly wrought evil, committed murder or been accomplices therein, all liars, thieves, deceivers, foul adulterers, parasites, intriguers, sowers of slander, wicked, violent, lawless, and idolatrous persons, all who have forsaken the great immortal God, who have turned blasphemers, persecutors of the pious, destroyers of the faithful, scornors of just men, all who with crafty and shameless double-face as presbyters and honoured deacons 'look on . . .'

There is a lacuna in the text at this point, after which the grim list of crimes is continued, with their fitting punishment. In 313f., the bliss of heaven is portrayed as follows:

'But as for those others who cared for justice and good deeds, for piety and righteous thoughts, angels shall bear them up through the fiery stream to light and life without a care, where is the immortal path of the great God, where are the three fountains of wine, honey and milk. There shall earth be alike for all, undivided by walls and barriers, then of its own accord it will bear richer fruits, possessions shall be in common and wealth no monopoly.† No poor shall be there, no rich man, no tyrant, no slave, neither great nor small any more, no kings, no rulers, all shall be alike in fellowship. None shall ever say again, "Night has come" or "Morning," or "Yesterday," none worries over length of days, over spring, over summer, over winter, over autumn, over marriage, over death, over buying, over selling, over sunset, over sunrise: it shall be one long day.

The last words literally run, 'and He shall make one long day.' But, in order to avoid the appearance of describing a selfish bliss, the Sibyllinist proceeds to the following remarkable doctrine:

'And another thing will the almighty, immortal God bestow on them:‡ when the pious ask immortal God, he will grant them to save men from the fierce fire and eternal torment: this also he will do (for them).

He will take the men again from the tireless fire and for the sake of his own people will transport them to another life, immortal, undying, in the Elysian plain, where he has the great waters of the deep-bosomed lake, perennial Acherusia.'

At the thought of this the Sibyl breaks into a pathetic prayer for herself:

'Alas, woe is me for that day, when I am punished for all my ill deeds, I who cared nought for marriage or sound reason, but in the house of my wealthy man shut out the needy, and deliberately

* Even Christian officials are among the condemned, as in the Dantesque vision of the 4th cent. Apocalypse of Paul (ed. Tischendorf, Leipzig, 1866, p. 34f.), where the Apostle sees a presbyter, a bishop, and a deacon successively tormented for their ecclesiastical misdeeds.

‡ The denial that the punishment of hell is eternal tallies with Origen's doctrine, and an indignant scribe or editor has appended a protest, which has been preserved in some MSS. 'Obviously a lie,' he remarks, 'for the fire of punishment will never leave the condemned, though personally I could wish it were so, scarred as I am with such sore wounds of sin, that need all the greater Mercy. Origen ought to be ashamed of chattering as though there were any limit to punishment.'

§ The traditional Sibyl is unmarried, though there is one strange exception in the Sibyl whom Pausanias mentions (x. 12); she was called Hierophile or Artemis, she sang at Delphi about the rape of Helen and the Trojan war, and 'she was the wedded wife of Apollo, and his daughter, and his sister.' Perhaps here as in vii. 163 (see below, p. 480) she confesses to having sinned sexually instead of marrying. Only, she seems to be married here, unless 'in the house of my wealthy man' means residence in the shrine of Apollo. The two versions of her past life differ slightly.

wrought unlawful deeds aforetime! Saviour, do thou save me from my tormentors, a shameless woman, who has done immodestly. Lo, I beseech thee, let me cease a little from my song, O holy giver of manna, king of a great kingdom.'

The long third book, on the other hand, is almost entirely a Jewish compilation, with oracles dating from the 2nd and the 1st centuries B.C. Originally it had 1034 verses instead of the extant 829. No book of our collection is so important for the study of this Jewish propaganda in its eschatological aspects, and none presents such difficulties to the literary analyst. It is plain that a Christian has threaded in lines here and there, e.g. 776 (if νὴν is read for ναὸν or οἶκον—νὴν γὰρ καλέουσι βροτοὶ μέγαλοιο θεοῖο); it is by no means so plain that longer sections like 46–62 and 63–92 are of Christian origin, although the latter, with its striking description of Beliar (Simon Magus?) who comes from Sebaste (Samaria?) and of the catastrophes at the end of the world, does not have a Jewish ring about it. Apart from the possible exception of these passages, the motley oracles of the book are all pre-Christian; this is almost the sole result which stands out clearly amid the various literary analyses. The fourth book is distinctly Jewish, and is commonly dated c. A.D. 80, since the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79 (130–136) is regarded as a punishment for the Roman treatment of Judaea, and is to be followed by an Eastern attack on Rome, headed by Nero, from beyond the Euphrates. It is a short, heterogeneous book, and is quoted by Justin and Clement of Alexandria, as well as by Lactantius. Its antipathy (27 ff.) to any visible temple and to material sacrifices has been taken by some critics to mark a type of Judaism different from that of bks. iii. and v.—either Essenism or some 'allied though independent' phase (cf. Lightfoot's Colossians and Philemon, new ed., London, 1879, p. 96 f.); but these allusions may be to pagan cults, and even the stress laid on grace before food (24 f.) does not stamp the oracle as Essenic. The fifth book is larger and stretches further down, though the contents are still predominantly Jewish, and even Egyptian, to judge from the curious reference of approval to the temple of Onias (501–511). It is a medley of denunciations, woes, and predictions, the latest of which are not earlier than Hadrian's reign (46 ff.) and possibly* as late as that of Marcus Aurelius. But these Jewish oracles of the first two Christian centuries owe their present form to some Christian editor of the latter century. The first Christian to quote from them is Clement of Alexandria. Here and there, but not often, we can detect a Christian patch, as at 256–259:

'But then shall a unique Man come from heaven, who spreads out his hands on the Wood† of rich fruit, the best of the Hebrews, who one day shall stay‡ the sun, with fair words issuing from pure lips.'

Another touch, which possibly is late, is the abrupt (293 ff.) prediction of ruin for the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which is to be overwhelmed by an earthquake and to sink into the sea, to the bitter grief of the Ephesians.

Substantially, however, these three books are Jewish in texture. At their best, they voice the

* If line 51, which speaks of Hadrian's three successors, belongs to the previous oracle (1–50), and is not an interpolation. † I.e. the Cross (see below, on bk. vi.); Ignatius (ad Smyrn. i. 2) had already called Christians 'the fruit' of the Cross.

‡ The meaning is obscure, partly because the reading varies. K. Buresch and Geffcken read σπέραι for the σπέραι(ν) of the MSS; either the miracle of Joshua is to be repeated in the last days (cf. Lact. Div. Inst. vii. 26. 2: 'et statuet deus solem') or Jesus is in some way identified with Joshua (owing to the Greek equivalent Ἰησοῦς; cf. He 48). Hirsch, however, recalls the Midrash Tanhuma on Ex 17¹⁸, according to which Moses stopped the sun and moon when he stretched out his hands at the battle with the Amalekites. This would tally with the Sibylline point of view in viii. 251 (see below).

highest propaganda of Hellenistic Judaism between the 2nd cent. B.C. and the 2nd cent. A.D., when many, in Egypt especially, were conscious of their vocation (cf., e.g., iii. 195, α παντεςσι βροτοις βίου καθοδηγοί εσονται—Ro 2⁹, οδηγόν τυφλων) to be a source of light and leading to the Gentiles. These primitive Sibyllina of Judaism are neither cosmopolitan nor proselytizing; this is one of their distinctive features. They are 'national and nomistic,' as Krauss observes, 'in so far as they are Jewish. Even the Messianic time is inconceivable without the Temple, sacrificial worship, and the Law. Despite this, the pagan Greeks are nowhere urged to observe the Law; they are asked merely to lead moral lives and to recognize the one God. Although the Sibyl addresses all peoples, the Syrians, Britons, Gauls, and the nations of the Isles, she especially exhorts the people of Hellas, knowing that it will be well with all the human race if this people with its grand culture will combine its own virtues with the pure religion of Judaism' (JE xi. 320^b). The latter conviction underlay the Hellenistic propaganda. It was Greece which had been primarily responsible for the development of idolatry in the great Roman world, and Greece must regain her lost monotheism if the mass of men were to abandon polytheism and return to the original worship of the one God. The conversion of Greece (cf. iii. 545 ff.) was the hope of these Sibyllinists. Hence the aptness of their appeal through the stammering, inspired lips of a Sibyl who spoke from the far mists of pre-Homeric antiquity. The appeal, it must be remembered, was not to the 'intellectuals.' The Sibyllina were popular literature, not esoteric essays. They were couched in the language of impressive, popular address, midway between the hymn and the apocalypse,* and like the latter aimed their shafts at the common heart of men. Naturally, the shafts were winged with threats as well as with promises and argument. And denunciations of idolatry and polytheism as naturally led to eschatological predictions. If the average apocalypse could be called a tract for bad times, the Sibylline oracle was usually a tract for bad people, for nations who had deliberately devoted themselves to idolatry and vice, or outraged the Jewish people. The last words of bk. v. are: 'the heaven remained starless.' And that is characteristic of the oracles. These Sibyllinists wrote on the sound principle that some people really need not argument but suffering, if they are ever to be brought to their senses. A starless sky hangs over them. In the Jewish Sibyllina (cf. P. Volz, Judische Eschatologie, Tübingen, 1903, pp. 46-50, etc.) particularly, though by no means exclusively, impatient threats of doom abound; sometimes it is final, though sometimes it is intended to act as a salutary historical reminder of the pains and penalties which are incurred by all who defy the laws of Israel's God.† The Sibyl will reason with Hellas, e.g., but she will also shower threats of calamity on her. Her oracles are charged with lightning as well as with light. It is this preoccupation with a moralistic view of history which repeatedly tends to make the interest of the Sibyllina eschatological even when they are more hopeful about the heathen; for in contrast to the misery of pagans the Messianic bliss of Israel is depicted, partly to encourage the disconsolate Jews of the period, but partly also to act as a tempting promise to outsiders (e.g. v. 492 f.). It is to the God who can bestow such happiness, not to vain idols, that worship ought to be paid. Thus, in iii. 624 f., after depicting the prosperity of Israel on the new earth—i.e. the new order of things under the later Maccabees—the oracle proceeds to bid the deceitful man turn and make intercession to God, offering him sacrifices and honouring him with good behaviour: 'it may be that the immortal God will have mercy on thee.' But in most cases the oracles are oppressed by the sense that things have gone too far. Their environment was dark. What the Sibyl generally has in mind, it must be repeated, is not so much the philosophers of Hellas as the practical propaganda which followed in the wake of the Seleucid kings (e.g. iii. 732 f.), with its contemptuous indifference to all that a Jew valued in monotheism and even in morals. This is one of the main threads running through the woof of these three Jewish books of Sibyllina, the desire to warn at any rate and win if possible contemporary Hellenism. As the latter hope waned, the Sibyl's testimony hardened into denunciation and doom.

In the sixth book we are back on Christian ground, more thoroughly Christian than any we have yet crossed. At the same time, there is not a single allusion to the Sibyl. The book is simply a short hymn, which has been taken to represent a theology akin to some of the uncanonical gospels and to have originated in more or less heretical circles of the 2nd cent. Church. 'Heretical,' in this connexion, is a question-begging epithet, however, as Harnack points out; 'eccentric' would suit the contents better. The piece need not be earlier than the 3rd cent., though 2nd cent. parallels are not wanting. The only help in determining its relative date is furnished by the fact that it is quoted by Lactantius, but there are no historical references to enable us to say how much earlier than the beginning of the 4th cent. its composition is to be placed. It is the briefest of the extant Sibylline books, and may therefore be translated in full. The present writer appends a fairly literal version, in order to bring out the peculiar theology of the piece:

'I hail from the heart the Immortal's great Son, renowned in who was granted the throne to possess, by the Father most High, ere yet he was born; whereupon in the flesh granted him he appeared and bathed in the streams of the river of Jordan that moves with grey tread on as it rolls its waters.

Avoiding the fire,* he first shall behold the sweet Spirit of God, borne on the white shining wings of the Dove. A Blossom pure shall bloom, and springs shall gush; to men shall he show the Ways, shall show the paths of heaven, and give to all instruction in tales of wisdom.

He shall come for judgment and smite the disobedient People, extolling the praiseworthy race of the Father in heaven.

He shall tread on the waves, shall free mankind from diseases, shall cause the dead to arise, shall banish many a sorrow: from a single wallet † shall bread in abundance issue for men, when David's house puts forth its Plant; and in his hand the whole world lies, the earth, the sky, the sea.

He shall flash upon the earth, as when at his first appearance they two saw him; who had been born each from the side of the other.

And this shall be when earth rejoices in hope of the Child. But for thee alone, O land of Sodom, evil woes are in store; for thou, thou didst not know thy God, insensate one, when he came to be seen of men; nay, with thorns for a crown thou crownest him, and for his drink despitefully didst mix the dreadful gall—hence come thine evil woes.

* The tradition which appears in some of the uncanonical gospels (see vol. i. p. 494).

‡ Adam and Eve.

§ Cf. Rev 11⁸.

* M. Friedlander exaggerates the significance of the Sibyllina for apocalyptic prophecy, but there was a distinct affinity between both forms of Jewish propaganda (Die religiösen Bewegungen innerhalb des Judentums im Zeitalter Jesu, Berlin, 1905 p. 289 f.).

† E.g. in v. 276 f., and especially in iv. 152 f., when impiety, bloodshed, and vice are rampant, men know 'that God is no longer gentle and gracious, but gnashing his teeth in anger and destroying the whole race of men together with a huge conflagration. O wretched mortals, do not drive God to all sorts of wrath, but give up swords, shrieks, murder, and violence, wash your whole body in ever-running streams, stretch your hands to heaven, ask pardon for your past deeds; God will grant repentance.'

O cross,* most blessed wood, on which God was stretched out, earth shall no longer hold thee, thou shalt see heaven thy home, when God's bright Light flashes forth afresh.'

The text of bk. vii. is broken at several places, and the contents are miscellaneous, but the bulk seems to be of Jewish Christian origin; there are Gnostic touches (e.g. in 139 ff.), which indicate a soil in the 2nd or 3rd cent. similar to that of bk. vi. The book, however, is such a conglomerate of fragments that it defies any general estimate. A brief woe on Rhodes, Delos, Cyprus, and Sicily is abruptly followed by a reference to Noah, and a prediction of the final deluge, as follows (9-23): †

'The earth shall float, the hills shall float, the very air (heaven) shall float, all things shall be water, and by water shall all things be destroyed; the winds shall be stayed, and a second age shall begin. O Phrygia, thou shalt first emerge from the top of the water, thou first shalt impiously deny thy God, delighting thyself in idols dumb, in idols that shall be thy ruin, O wretched one, when many years have run their course. The luckless Ethiopians, who suffer piteous pangs, shall be struck down by the sword, as they stoop and bend. Fair Egypt, ever blessed with corn, watered by the seven flowing streams of the Nile, shall be ruined by strife and faction; whereupon, in despair, men shall drive out Apis—no god for men! Woe to thee, Laodicea, who never hast God beheld, thou shalt be beguiled, thou proud one; the Lycus will flood thee over.'

The following fragments are Messianic (24 f.), historical denunciations § (40 f.), and woes on Troy, Colophon, Corinth, and Tyre, as well as on Coele-Syria (64 f.) for its indifference to the Logos-Messiah (line 84 echoing the thought of the fire at Christ's baptism, in vi. 6). Then comes a group of oracles, apparently taken from some older collection, against Sardinia, Celtiberia, Mygdonia, Rome, Syria, and Thebes (96-117). The terrors which precede the Messianic Age are described (118-149), with a brief picture of the new order of things on lines familiar to us from apocalyptic traditions preserved in Papias, and Irenæus, and elsewhere. Lactantius quotes (Div. Inst. vii. 16. 13) from this fragment (123). It may be conjectured with some certainty that here as elsewhere the short, pithy oracles of doom and warning addressed to places in which neither a Jewish nor a Christian Sibyllinist would feel any direct interest originally belonged to some collection of pagan prophecies. Often they stand in an extremely loose connexion with each other, or with their general context. We may suppose that they were retained, partly to lend vrasmblance to the new composition, partly for the sake of some local importance which is lost to us. ||

The close of the book is singular (150 f.), for,

* One of the first allusions to the cult of the Cross, in its legendary development (cf. ERE iv. 328). Sozomen remembers to quote this line in his 5th cent. history (ii. 1), when telling the romantic story of how Queen Helena found the genuine Cross of Jesus at Jerusalem. He protests against any sceptical surprise, on the ground that 'even among the Greeks this Sibylline view was admitted: "O most blessed wood, on which God was stretched out." Our most ardent opponents would not deny this, so that the wood of the Cross and the reverence paid to it are clearly proved to have been foreshadowed.'

§ The habit of threatening and denouncing grew as the Sibyllina went on. The severe tone had been characteristic of the pagan Sibyl, and, as Bouché-Leclercq observes (op. cit., p. 202), it sounded still more loudly in the Jewish oracles. 'La Sibylle . . . ne sait guère menacer sans maudire.'

|| Zosimus, the Greek historian of the 5th cent., preserves a fragment of 37 lines (ii. 5) which give directions for the proper celebration of the 'Indi seculares.' This was a pagan oracle which Christians would naturally ignore, and it is therefore absent from our collection. It is possibly the sort of 'Sibyllini versus' mentioned by Horace in his Carmen Seculare (pt. iv. line 5).

after describing the bliss of men upon the new earth, the Sibyl utters an apologia and plea for herself as a pagan, which goes beyond the similar cry in bk. ii. (see above, p. 484). She confesses that she has sinned both wilfully and carelessly, and has despised marriage (i.e. as the context here seems to imply, 'indulged in sexual vice'). For all this, she is to die, and burn in hell-fire, when men on earth have stoned and buried her. But apparently—for the text is mangled and dim—she hopes for deliverance, when God instructs her and raises her to life in heaven. We have here the Christian Sibyllinist conscious of the drawbacks attaching to his pagan mouthpiece, and endeavouring to adjust her character to the new setting. It is not enough to put predictions and statements of Christian doctrine in the mouth of a pagan Sibyl of the far past; she must be made to repent of her errors and be Christianized at the end.

The miscellaneous contents of bk. viii., from which Lactantius has quoted largely, are distinguished by an unusual antipathy to the tyranny and avarice* of the Roman Empire. The ordinary view is that 1-216 are in the main Jewish, the rest Christian. A general blend of woes, Messianic prophecies, incongruous separate oracles, and historical allusions characterizes the former. The denunciation of Rome in 1-138 and the prediction of her downfall must be dated not earlier than the burial of Hadrian (52-64) in A.D. 139. The bitterness of the allusions to Hadrian, which contrasts so remarkably with the tone of bks. v. and xii. to that Emperor, points to a Jew rather than to a Christian as the author of the piece; and if the piece is homogeneous, in spite of some lacunæ in the extant text, it must have originally been the work of a provincial† Jew, exasperated by Hadrian's suppression of the Palestinian rebellion, and by the 'Judaicus fiscus,' as that unpopular tax was levied and collected. Lines 139-216 are heterogeneous, partly taken from earlier books (e.g. 169 f. from iii. 49 f.), but never betraying any decisive trace of Christian authorship. ‡

The case is altered when we pass from line 216 to 217; then and thenceforth we are on Christian soil of the 3rd century. Indeed four MSS print 217-500 as part of a 'ninth' book; they have no relation to the fragments of the preceding oracle, and it is owing to a blunder of the first editor, in all likelihood, or of some scribe, that these two disparate sections have been yoked together. § The outstanding feature of this part of the book is the famous opening acrostic on the name of IHCOYC XPEICTOC ΘEOY YIOC CΩTHP, which, in a Latin translation, is actually cited by Augustine (in the Civ. Dei, xviii. 23) as a genuine prophecy of Christ which had fallen from the lips of the Erythraean Sibyl. In Constantine's Orat. ad sanctorum coetum (18) the acrostic is quoted with the addition || of CTAYPOC, and this is the form in the Sibylline oracles. It is next to impossible to reproduce, without extreme awkwardness, in a translation the artificial structure of the lines,

* As in iv. 145 f. ('to Asia there shall come the great wealth which Rome once stole and placed in her rich treasury; twice as much, aye and more, shall she restore to Asia') and even in iii. 301 f. ('For all the money received by Rome from tributary Asia, Asia shall receive three times as much from Rome, and pay back to her the horrid insolence'). We may overhear the same note in Commodian's Carmen Apologeticum, 889 f. ('tollatur imperium, quod fuit inique repletum, quod per tributa mala diu macerabat omnes').

† Yet the (Cumean?) Sibyl seems to be prophesying in Rome (κατα πτόλιν, 3).

‡ The end of Rome is predicted (189 f.) for A.D. 195, in connexion with the return of Nero from the East.

§ Alexandre assigned viii. 217 f. and the introductory Theophilus fragments to a Christian who wrote in the first quarter of the 2nd century.

|| The addition is superfluous when a double acrostic is made out of the initial letters of each word, i.e. IXΘYC, 'Fish,' the favourite early Christian symbol.

but the following version is an attempt to preserve the acrostic feature which is the outstanding characteristic of the Greek original. The present writer has rhymed the translation, in order to make it less prosaic:

'Judgment is come, the earth shall sweat in fear;
Eternal, the King leaves the heavenly sphere,
Sentence to pass on all the world of men.
On God the just and unjust shall look then,
Uplifted 'mid his saints, when time is done;
Souls, mortal souls, he judges from his throne,
Changing to dry land and to thorns the wide
Round earth, till men their idols* fling aside.
Earth, sky and sea the flame shall burn, and dash
Into the gates of Hell with shattering crash;
Saints in the flesh shall shine in liberty,
The lawless fire devours eternally.
Of secret deeds the tale shall then be told,
Since God the heart's dim corners shall unfold.
Then shall all wail and gnash their teeth, at strange
Eclipse of sun, dropping of stars, and change
Of heaven, the moonlight lost, while here below
Up rise the valleys, down the mountains go;
Under the sky no lofty peak shall soar
Inhuman, hill and plain shall be no more,
Or sea to fare upon; the scorched land,
Springs, rippling rivers, perish by the brand.
Sounding from heaven, the trumpet peals a blast
Of wrath and woe upon the evil cast,
The earth is opened and hell's pit laid bare.
Each and all stand before God's royal chair.
Rivers of fiery sulphur† flood the air.
Sign of all this, a vivid seal, shall be
The cross among the faithful joyfully,
A hindrance to the world, but life and light
Unending; to elect souls washed aright;
Rod of the shepherd, shall it rule in iron might.
Our God is shown in the acrostic thus,
Saviour, immortal King, who died for us.

This acrostic was composed partly to lend an air of authenticity to the Christian Sibyllina. The pagan tradition‡ was that the Sybil had spoken her oracle in acrostic form. When sceptics doubted the genuineness of the Christian oracles, it was useful to be able to point to a specimen of the acrostic which told in favour of Christian doctrine. But its inherent popularity led to translations into Latin, even before Augustine's day.

The remainder of the oracle is a chaos of queer fragments. The acrostic is immediately followed by the remark that the Crucified Christ was typified by the outstretched arms of Moses at the victory over Amalek (251 f.), an idea which had been propounded by the author of Barnabas (xii. 2) and by Justin Martyr (Dial. 90). The advent of Christ (256 f.) shades off into a comparison between the creation and the end, but in 270 ff. the life and Passion of Christ are described afresh. One of the romantic touches in the picture of the Risen Lord is the symbolism of the four wounds in His hands and feet (318 f.), which He shows to the faithful (cf. Jn 20²⁰); these are explained to mean the four quarters of the earth—north, south, east, and west having to bear witness against the cruelty of man. The next fragment depicts the entry of Christ into Jerusalem (323 ff.). Then a break occurs, ushering in a dramatic sketch of the Last Day, the burning of the world, and the horrible woes of men (337–353). Through the lips of the Sibyl (359 ff.) God now teaches His true nature, the vanity of idols, and the superfluousness of sacrifice (390), the two ways set before men (399 f.), and the pains and rewards which they may expect. This long homiletic section is almost unique in the Christian Sibyllina. It ends abruptly, and the next paragraph (429 f.) treats of the Divine providence and man's relation to his Creator and Judge. The text is badly preserved, but we can trace a form of Logos theology behind the doctrine. In ‡ Literally, 'enlightening of the elect with water from twelve springs' (i.e. the twelve apostles?). Orthodox baptism (cf. above, p. 453).

* Literally 'their idols and all their wealth.'

§ Dion. Hal. iv. 62 quotes Varro to this effect.

456 f., the oracle becomes clearer; the Virgin-birth at Bethlehem is described. Suddenly, however, the scene changes, and the closing verses (480 ff.) are a moralistic homily to Christians upon humility, love to God and man, reverence, worship, and the like—wholesome doctrine, but quite out of keeping with any Sibylline setting. The preacher has overpowered the poet, and the passion for edifying has proved too strong for the writer's sense of dramatic fitness.

The passage on Christ's advent (256 f.) deserves to be quoted. It was a favourite of Lactantius:

'For he shall not enter the world* in glory, but as a mortal man, pitiable, without honour and comeliness, to give hope to the pitiable, to give comeliness to mortal flesh and heavenly faith to the unbelieving, to fashion man who in the beginning had been formed by God's holy hands, but whom the serpent had craftily seduced to the doom of death, to gain the knowledge of good and evil, till he deserted God and worshipped mortal beings. The Almighty at the beginning took him as his counsellor, saying, "Let us both, my son, mould mortal race after our likeness; I shall devote my hands, and thou the Word, to our form, that together we may make the product." Mindful, then, of this design he shall enter the world, bringing the original pattern into the holy virgin, baptizing with water by the hands of presbyters, doing all things by his Word, healing every disease. With his word he shall check the winds, smooth the raging sea, walking on it with the feet of peace and in faith.'

It is from this eighth book (337 f.), as Augustine† used it to show that the Sibyl was a pre-Christian witness to the truth of Christian prophecy, that the famous mediæval hymn drew its inspiration for the lines:

'Dies iræ, dies illa,
Solvet sæculum in favilla,
Teste David cum Sibylla.'

The final destruction of the world by fire is proved not only by the psalter but by the Sibylline oracles;‡ they were enlisted in the service of Christian eschatology. The God who had spoken of this crisis by David had spoken of it also by this pagan prophetess. Another echo of the oracle is to be heard in the 5th (6th?) cent. composition, Questiones et responsa ad orthodoxos (74 . . . 'if the end of the present order of things is the judgment of the impious by fire, as the scriptures of prophets and apostles declare, as well as those of the Sibyl'), which was erroneously attributed to Justin Martyr. We can understand, from this widespread feeling in a later age, how Michael Angelo neither felt nor excited any sense of incongruity in painting Sibyls along with OT prophets on the roof of the Sistine Chapel. Giotto had already done this in the Campanile at Florence. Here as elsewhere art naively expressed the popular theology of the age.

The following books are political rather than religious; this distinguishes them from most of the other Sibylline oracles, whether Jewish or Christian, but it is a return to the primitive function and temper of the classical Sibyl. The eleventh book is a rambling, fanciful series of oracles, in which the Sibyl, as in bk. v., is concerned mainly with the fortunes of Egypt down to the period of Cleopatra; § Egypt's subjugation by

* Mendelssohn happily conjectures κρίσις for the irrelevant κρίσις of the MSS, here and in 269.

† According to Augustine, the Sibyl and Job are the two pre-Christian personalities who can be reckoned as classical examples of membership in God's City (xviii. 23 and 47).

‡ The earlier Sibylline proofs (e.g. in iv. 193 f.) were in the mind of Justin when he wrote (Apol. i. 20) that 'the Sibyl and Hystaspes certify that corruptible things are to be dissolved by fire' (cf. Mayor's note on 2 P 3).

§ The 'monstrous regiment of women' is for the Sibyllines an invariable prelude of disaster; the idea is historically applied to the Romans is God's punishment for her treatment of Israel (307 ff.). She starts from the Flood and the Tower of Babel, surveys the ancient monarchies, and ends, as she begins, with Egypt. The standpoint is Jewish, but this does not necessarily imply that the author was a Jew, although it must be admitted that there are no distinctively Christian touches in the oracles. They are practically devoid of religious interest. The Sibyl takes occasion to repeat (163 f.; see bk. iii. 419-426) * her charge against Homer, after telling the fate of Troy:

* And again there shall be a wise old man of song, whom all dub wisest among men.
Plainly shall he set down things quite unspeakable, having gained possession of my words, my measures, and my verses;
he first shall unfold my books and then hide them, and show them to men no more.'

The pre-Homeric Sibyl thus claims to have furnished Homer with the materials for his epic, which he took over without acknowledgment and then suppressed. This is intended, of course, to account for two features in the Sibylline oracles, the fact of their late publication and the hexameter metre. The former fact was explained on the same lines as the late publication of apocalypses which professed to have been written by men of the far past; they remained unknown for long, because they had been hidden purposely either by the author or by others, for various reasons. The Sibyllinist does not hesitate to blacken Homer's character, in order to establish the good faith of the Sibyl herself. Otherwise, the only feature of interest in the book is the repeated use made of the third book. The very asseveration of her veracity as an interpreter of the Divine counsel, with which she closes as she opens the oracle, echoes the opening lines of the third book. Only, she feels † that her predictions are to be ridiculed and her warnings ignored (314 f.). So she will retire ‡ to the shrine of Apollo, where she is regarded as a true, ecstatic prophetess. The time will come when the hearers of this present oracle will have to admit that she was no deceiver.

The data for calculating the date of the piece are exceptionally few and vague. There is an apparent reference to the extent of the Roman Empire in lines 160-161; but the reading varies, and, while one critic deduces from the language § that the author wrote between A.D. 115 and 118, another is equally confident that the Sibyllinist must have survived the overthrow of the Parthian kingdom in A.D. 226. All that is certain is that the terminus a quo for the composition of the main part of the book is the overthrow of Cleopatra by the Romans.

Berenice III. in 81 B.C. (xi. 245 f.), and then to Cleopatra (cf. viii. 199 f., iii. 75 f.). Bousset (Antichrist Legend, London, 1896, p. 99 f.) sees behind this a conception of the marine anti-divine monster as feminine.

* In a private communication, Professor Walter Scott points out that these passages from bks. iii. and xi. probably imply that this author knew the pagan oracles of the Trojan War to which Pausanias alludes (see above, p. 478). The complaint of the Sibyl against Homer belonged to pagan tradition; it was not invented by Jews or Christians. Varro (as reported by Lactantius, Div. Inst. i. 6. 9) tells that the Erythraean Sibyl 'Graius Ilium petentibus vaticinatum et perituram esse Troiam et Homerum mendacia scripturum.'

† This Cassandra-like touch goes back to the pagan tradition.

‡ Sibyls were not always stationary. Some would wander abroad, like the Babylonian (iii. 809 f.) or the Erythraean. This reflects either a primitive tradition that the Sibyls roamed on their mission to the discerning on earth or an aetiological explanation of the widespread traces of Sibylline oracles.

§ The Sibyl's trick of punning continues, e.g., in 236 (καὶ τότε μεφέσσω Μέμφις). She had caught it from the pagan oracles of her tribe, e.g. the famous (iii. 363-364) ἔσται καὶ Σαῖος ἄμμος, ἔσται αἰὼν ἀθλος, καὶ Ῥώμῃ ῥῆμα.

But the OT instances paved the way for its usage among Hellenistic Judaists.

Since Lightfoot wrote (Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii.² [London, 1889]: 'Ignatius and Polycarp, vol. i. p. 542 f.), it has been customary to accept bks. xi.-xiv. as a continuous prophecy, which summarizes the history of the world from the Flood down to the end of the 3rd cent. A.D. at the earliest. But even so, it is not a unity. The contents have been increased and altered from time to time by successive hands, and data of style and language place bks. xii. and xiii. by themselves as superior to the other two. Unfortunately, even in the case of the latter, the text is extremely corrupt, and the historical allusions * are often ambiguous.

While the eleventh book kept the fortunes of the Egyptian Empire in the foreground, the twelfth book chronicles 'the woeful time of the sons of Latium' (like v. 1-11, from which xii. 1-11 is verbally taken). Our Sibyl sketches rapidly and incoherently the course of the Roman Empire, with repeated indifference to the facts of history. The date of the book is fixed by the death of Alexander Severus, with which the oracles end. It must have been written during the first half of the 3rd century. Otherwise there is little definite information about the author. Geffcken, who has devoted special attention to this book, finds Christian additions in 28-34 (the prophecy of Christ's birth) and 232, which have a Jewish source, written not so much by an ardent Jew † as by one who was above all things an Eastern provincial, with ill-concealed admiration for the Imperial system. ‡ But it is a dull book. The Sibyl at the close begs for relief from the strain of rhapsody, on the ground that 'her soul within is weary of the divine measures, prophesying of royal reigns.' The reader is also weary, long before the Sibyl. Short chronicles of long historical periods are apt to be dull, even in prose. When they are written in verse by a third-rate poet who covers three centuries in less than three hundred lines, they are even less relevant to poetry and religion than to history.

The thirteenth book covers an exceptionally short period, only a quarter of a century, from A.D. 241 to 265. It is the wail of a Christian who has a passionate abhorrence of the persecuting Emperor, Decius, § and a brooding sense of pity for the calamities of the Empire. The book illustrates what Gibbon (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, i.⁴ [London, 1906]) describes as a period which was 'one uninterrupted series of confusion and calamity,' and one of the few redeeming points, in the mind of the Sibyllinist, seems to be the appearance of Odenathus (147 f.), the powerful senator of Palmyra, whose services in the field compelled the thanks and recognition of the Romans. Otherwise, the survey of the Sibyl embraces little except disgrace and defeat for the Empire. For once, the woes are not open to the suspicion of professional colouring. The historian is obliged to write that 'during that calamitous period, every instant of time was marked, every

* It is almost refreshing to come across (in xii. 196 f.) a reference to the legend of the thundering legion, in the survey of the campaigns of Marcus Aurelius. The divine miracle is attributed to the pious deserts of the Emperor.

† The favourable opinion of Hadrian (163-178) tells against this. How could any Jew, writing after Bar Cochba's revolt, describe the Emperor thus? (The similar praise in v. 46 f. was written originally before that, since line 51, which implies a later period, must be an interpolated addition to the oracle.) Yet, even so, it is difficult to understand how either a Jew or a Christian of any definite belief could commend the Emperor's interest in the pagan mysteries (169-170). A similar difficulty is raised by the curiously negative description of the dead in viii. 107 f.; but the mood of Ecclesiastes cannot be supposed to have died out among thinkers of Jewish birth.

‡ Even in the Christian passage (33-34), it is pointed out that 'the strength of Rome is to increase with him' (i.e. Christ). The author will not hear of the charge that his religion was either a foe or a source of weakness to the Empire.

province of the Roman world was afflicted, by barbarous invaders and military tyrants, and the ruined empire seemed to approach the last and fatal moment of its dissolution' (p. 237). The Sibyllinist reflects this period. If the lights are low in his oracle, it is because they were burning low when it was written.*

The book is short and heterogeneous. The Sibyl is moved (1-6) to narrate the tumultuous wars of the East, in which Rome was involved (Sf.). Suddenly she interpolates (64-73) a stern word to Bostra, which echoes the oracle in iii. 57f.; the Arabian capital is denounced especially on the score of its passion for astrological pursuits. Other prophecies follow, against Alexandria and Cappadocia particularly, but the Sibyl presently comes back to the disastrous fortunes of Rome (103f.) and her downfall at the hands of the Easterns; it will be a time when the living will envy the dead, when they say 'death is good, yet death will fly from them' (118-119; cf. Rev 9⁵). Then we hear of the dismal plight of Syria (119f.), and a series of woes on various Eastern cities and provinces follows. Persia and Rome are the protagonists. So much is plain amid the symbolic expressions and the grandiloquent language of the oracle, but the habit of describing kings and rulers as wild beasts or of referring to them by a numerical equivalent for the first letter of their names† does not promote lucidity, and even when we know the period which is under review it is far from easy to make sense of several details in the Sibyl's predictions. Obscurity may be impressive in pseudo-oracular literature, but the impression made is slight. The leading interest of the book's oracles is for students of Roman history at this dark period in the Empire's course; the book has no religious significance, and there is nothing in its paragraphs which is worth quoting.

It is a question, says Gefick, whether bk. xi. or bk. xiv. is the worst of the Sibylline oracles. The latter is at any rate later, written by a Jew who probably lived in Egypt. It opens with a lament and warning on the passion for power and tyranny (1-11), and then passes into an enigmatic, confused series of Eastern chronicles, under the disguise of prophecy, of Roman generals and Emperors who are hardly to be identified, closing (280-283) with a prediction that the race of Latin Emperors is to be replaced by a permanent (ἀνάλευρος; cf. He 12⁷) generation whose reign is the reign of God. The rest of the book is an oracle on Egypt (284-361), which is almost unintelligible. It is not possible here to do more than call attention to two attempts to bring order out of chaos in this conglomerate of oracles. The first is by A. Wirth (Wiener Studien, xiv. 35f.), who ingeniously traces the Roman Emperors from Cæsar to the close of the 3rd century. One of the chief difficulties in identifying them is that the Sibyllinist as usual never names them; he gives each a number, which is intended to mark the initial letter of his name, each letter of the Greek alphabet being valued numerically as on the well-known principles of the cryptic Gematria which apocalyptic had found so useful.* Thus, according to Wirth, the man of 'eighty' (in 227) is Probus. Wirth rightly sees that the book cannot be earlier than the 3rd cent. A.D., but this hypothesis requires several data to be forced, and it involves some fanciful reconstruction alike of the text and of the history. Ewald, long ago, had felt that the oracle reflected a much later period, in the 7th cent., and this position has been worked out afresh by W. Scott in an elaborate, ingenious series of papers in The Classical Quarterly, ix. [1915] 144-166, 207-228. He attempts skilfully to illustrate the details of the oracle from the struggle between Rome and Persia for Egypt during the first half of the 7th century. According to this interpretation, the Sibyl sympathizes strongly with the opponents of Rome; the two campaigns of the Persians in A.D. 614-617 and of the Arabs in 639-641, especially the latter, lie behind the Egyptian oracle of this book, which regards the Roman re-occupation between the two conquests from the East as an unwelcome and oppressive epoch. Every defeat of the Romans, in the struggle that swayed over the possession of Alexandria, is hailed as Divine vengeance on the Empire for what the Jews of Egypt had suffered. This interpretation† resets Ewald's general view in the light of recent research upon the Arab conquest of Egypt, and, so far as sense can be made out of an oracle which is often little better than gibberish, it clears up more obscurities than the rival theories, which do not go further down than the 3rd or 4th century. On this hypothesis, of course, the fourteenth book must have been added to the collection after the prologue was written. This is not improbable, in the nature of the case, and it is not even out of keeping with the extant condition of the text, for the fourteenth book ends abruptly, whereas the thirteenth closes with the refrain of the eleventh, the Sibyl pleading exhaustion and begging for a cessation of her poetic and prophetic rhapsody.

Our gratitude to the unknown Byzantine Christian who put the Sibyllina together in this collection is tempered by the impression of carelessness, ignorance, and caprice which mark his editorial efforts. It is true that he did his work for the purpose of edifying pious Christians, and not for the benefit of critical students. It is also true that the roughnesses and obscurities of the text may be partly set down to later scribes. But it was the editor who must have cut up oracles ruthlessly in order to make them fit; he must have omitted sections and thus broken the continuity of many passages, and evidently he knew little or nothing about the origin and sense of several of the oracles which he collected. The result is chaos frequently. The materials are often obscure in themselves, and their setting rarely makes them more intelligible. Oracles lie side by side which differ utterly in aim and date. Fragments from various centuries are scattered over the entire collection, and even the so-called 'books' are hardly ever homogeneous. At the same time, under this incongruity and confusion of the Sibyllina there is a certain unity not only of form but of spirit. (a) The formal unity is more than the adherence to the hexameter. As Rzach's appendix to his edition of the Sibyllina (pp. 240-314) shows, every Sibyllinist made a more

* This goes back to the Sibyllinist of bk. v., where (12f.) Augustus is the man 'who has the first of letters' (A), Nero the man whose initial letter is fifty (N=50), and so forth.

† The difficulty raised by the abrupt allusion in 812 to an army of Sicilians is solved, according to Scott, by reading δ' ἐκ Κιλικίων for ἐκ Συκελων, and assuming that Heraclius started his expedition against Egypt in 626-627 from Cilicia, where he had won a footing in 625. Wirth prefers to think of the slave wars in Sicily towards the end of the reign of Gallienus, and Alexandre conjectured Συκελων.

* In 46-49 the Sibyl predicts that Alexandria will supply Rome with corn for as many years as her name stands for (i.e. ΡΩΜΗ=943). Professor Scott (see Literature below) points out a remarkable coincidence in connexion with this. Chosroes the Persian leader conquered in Egypt in A.D. 617. Now 943 years reckoned back from this date brings us to 332 B.C., the year in which Alexandria was founded. If this was in the Sibyllinist's mind, he must have written this fragment after 617 (Scott thinks he was the man who also wrote xiv. 284f., which describes the conquest of Egypt by the Persians), and the fragment was inserted in bk. viii. at this point, because in the preceding lines (38-45) it is prophesied that, so long as Alexandria exported corn to Rome, the Persians never would conquer that city. The original Sibyllinist of the 7th cent., of course, expected, on the strength of this prophecy, that the Persians would succeed in conquering Rome.

† An even more exasperating trick is to hint at the first letter(s), by way of assurance. E.g. the Sibyllinist in xi. 23-24, wishing to describe Pharaoh, reminds the reader of 'Phasgana'!

or less serious attempt to echo Homer. The Homeric phrases and tags are not confined to the earliest books. They appear in oracles from the 3rd and 6th Christian centuries. To some extent, they are probably indirect, but the use of Homeric phraseology as well as metre was evidently a convention.* The history of literature shows that true poetry need not be stifled by the conventional forms of its age; but whenever the genuine breath of inspiration begins to ebb conventions are borne less lightly, and it is only in one or two books of the Sibyllina that the Homeric conventions are almost forgotten by the reader in the sheer interest of the oracles. It should be recollected, however, that their interest would be greater for their original public, just because they were circulated as separate pieces. A modern reader has the collected mass before him, and the juxtaposition of good, poor, and indifferent prevents him from appreciating the occasional flashes of genuine pathos and stern power which lighten up the surrounding mists.

(b) To a certain extent, also, there is a general point of view, which survives in spite of the different historical and religious situations. The cosmology is fairly uniform in outline if not in details, and even the theology, apart from the definitely Christian touches,† has a character of its own. This is particularly true of the eschatology, for, although one oracle will be more Messianic (in the personal sense of the term) than another, although the Jewish sections tend to view the consummation as a prolonged reign of the holy nation on earth, while the Christian Sibyllinists lay more stress on the catastrophe of the Last Judgment, yet these and other variations do not obliterate the large common features which the Sibyllina shared with apocalyptic—calculations about the near end, the conditions of the Judgment, the expectation of Nero's return, and so forth. Here, as in the theology, there must have been a tradition, partly akin to Orphism and Stoicism, to which every Sibyllinist felt bound to conform in the main, however well-marked his idiosyncrasies might be. It is the same in the political aspect. One oracle will favour Hadrian, for example, more than another, but it is impossible as a rule to mistake the unswerving antipathy to Rome in the later Sibyllina, where it succeeds to the rôle of Syria in the earlier. Jew and Christian were generally at one on this point, when they composed Sibyllina. Their reasons might vary, and there might be differences in the degree of their bitterness, but the Roman Empire stood out as the last enemy to be conquered by, or rather for, the just. The rivalry of East and West, which characterized ancient history, was to be decided in favour of the East. This again was a feature which the Sibyllina shared with their allied literary product, the apocalypses. Upon the whole, we may contend that, while those who endeavour to identify the historical situations of the various Sibylline oracles are right in feeling that the ars nesciendi forms an unusually important part of the investigator's equipment, nevertheless, standing back from the details, we are able to gain a fairly broad and accurate impression of their general spirit and characteristics.‡

The amazing developments of the Sibylline myth in Byzantine and mediæval literature do not concern us here, as they were practically independent of our Sibylline collection and subsequent to it. It was the 9th cent. Byzantine chronicler, Georgios Monachos (Hamartolos), for example, who apparently started the idea that the biblical queen of Sheba could be converted into a Sibyl (see the essay by S. Krauss in the Byzantinische Zeitschrift, xi. 120–131), a notion which proved the germ of some curious growths in mediæval legend. The companion tradition of the Tiburtine Sibyl (cf. ERE i. 580*) does appear to run back to the 4th century. Like the exploitation of Vergil's eclogue as a Messianic prophecy,* it was one of several streams which flowed from almost the same soil as our Sibylline oracles, but the latter went their own way, and, if we are able to follow that way, even dimly, it is thanks to the Byzantine Christian who, in the 6th cent., cut the rough channel along which they have flowed down to us through the ramifications of early and mediæval oracular literature.

LITERATURE.—An ample bibliography will be found in Schürer's GVV iii 4 (Leipzig, 1900) 555–592, though he does not mention some of the English contributions, like W. Whiston's A Vindication of Sibylline Oracles (London, 1715) and J. Floyer's similar volume, The Sibylline Oracles, translated from the best Greek Copies (London, 1713). The authenticity of the oracles formed a topic of discussion among the English Deists of the 18th cent., in connexion with prophecy, but the debate led to no critical advance, owing principally to the defective spirit of historical criticism and to the corrupt state of the text. The latter difficulty was eased by Angelo Mai's discoveries of fresh material and MSS at Milan and Rome (1817, 1823), on the basis of which the first modern edition was published by a French scholar, C. Alexandre, Oracula Sibyllina, Paris, 1841–1856; the second edition of this standard work (1889) is not quite so full as the first. Almost simultaneously J. H. Friedlieb issued a short edition (Die sibyllinischen Weissagungen, Leipzig, 1852), with a German metrical version. Alexandre's version had been in Latin. A. Rzach's edition of the text (Oracula Sibyllina, Vienna, 1891) is only one of a long series of contributions which he has made to the historical and textual criticism of this literature. Lastly, J. Geffcken edited the oracles critically for Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, Leipzig, 1902. Geffcken's edition is not final, but it forms an indispensable basis for study. The Jewish oracles in bks. iii–v., together with the fragments, are translated into German by F. Blass in E. Kautzsch's Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des AT, Tübingen, 1900, ii. 177–217, and translated into English by H. C. O. Lanchester in Charles's Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, Oxford, 1913, ii. 363–406. A German version of Christian oracles in bks. i–v. and vi–viii., etc., is published by Geffcken in E. Hennecke's Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, Tübingen, 1904, but there is no modern English version of them, even of selected passages. The blank verse translation by M. S. Terry, New York, 1890, the present writer has not been able to see. In addition to the authorities cited throughout the course of the article, he is specially indebted to the courtesy of Professor Walter Scott, formerly of Merton College, Oxford, and Toronto University, who has placed at his disposal unpublished materials relating to bks. iv. and viii.

SICKLE (δρέπανον).—In the NT the sickle is referred to only in St. Mark's Gospel (Mk 4²⁹) and in the Apocalypse (Rev 14^{14–19}). In the latter passage the victorious Christ comes with a sharp sickle in His hand to gather in the fruits of His triumph. For the simile cf. Jl 3¹³, Jer 51³³. In the earliest times sickles were made of flint. They had only one cutting edge, which was generally slightly concave and serrated. As a rule the back edge was quite thick. The bone or wooden handle in which they were set followed approximately the curve of the flint edges. The flints projected from the hafts about half an inch or less. Flint sickles continued to be used throughout the Bronze Age. The reason probably was that they were on the one hand comparatively inexpensive, and on the other hand quite as efficacious as sickles made of bronze. It was not until iron came into general use in the

† Which are moulded, as a rule, on a type of their own.

‡ The Swedish scholar, E. Fehr, has published an excellent monograph on these characteristics (Studia in Oracula Sibyllina, Upsala, 1893).

* This lies side by side with the proof from the Sibylline oracles, in Constantine's Orat. ad sanct. coetum (19). Rendel Harris (UDB v. 67 f.) thinks that the Vergilian element in bk. xi., to which Dechant had already called attention, the references to Aeneas and the claim of priority to Homer, must mark the period of Constantine as the date when the problem of the Christian Sibyl's relation to Homer became acute.

Fourth Semitic period that flint sickles were entirely superseded. Iron sickles are confined to the Fourth Semitic and the Hellenistic periods. The breadth of the blade varies from $\frac{3}{4}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$ ins., the commonest breadth being from about 1 to $1\frac{1}{2}$ in. The handle sometimes consisted of two hafting plates secured by thongs or metal pins; occasionally, however, the butt-end of the sickle was tanged, while socketed sickles also sometimes occur. SICKNESS.—Outside of the Gospels little attention is paid to sickness in the apostolic writings. This is very noticeable if one compares these writings with the OT or even the Gospels. Only five particular kinds of disease are specified: palsy (Ac 8⁹ 9³³); impotence (Ac 3³); a digestive trouble (πικρὰ ἀσθένεια, 1 Ti 5²³); dysentery (Ac 28³); abdominal disease associated with worms (Ac 12¹²). In addition we have those suffering from nervous disorders (Ac 5¹⁶; cf. also 16¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 19¹). Individuals are, in general terms, 'sick' (Dorcas [Ac 9⁴⁰], Epaphroditus [Ph 2²⁶ 27], and Trophimus [2 Ti 4²⁰]), yet no symptoms are mentioned by which the nature of the illness may be defined.

The terms in which other references to sickness appear are extremely indefinite: ἀσθενῶν (cf. Ac 4³), ἀσθένεια (Ac 28³), ἀσθενέω (Ja 5¹⁴), ἀδυνατός (Ac 14³), κάμνω (Ja 5¹⁵), ἀρρωστός (1 Co 11³⁰). The meaning here may be only lack of strength, or it may be an infirmity caused by sickness. In all these cases of specific diseases the trouble is described popularly by its leading symptoms, with the exception possibly of the ailment of Publius' father.

The only attempt to account for the cause of any sickness alluded to is by St. Paul in his advice to the Corinthians concerning the Lord's Supper. He there intimates that sickness and even death are a Divine judgment on their flagrant abuse of the Eucharist. One may compare this with the theory of the supernatural cause of disease in Hebrew and Greek circles. A connexion between sickness and disease is suggested by Jesus in Jn 5¹⁴. Two other implications as to the cause of abnormal conditions are contained in the Acts, both associated with nervous derangement, yet without any conscious diagnosis or effort to account for the fact. In accord with the notions of the time, evil spirits are reported as going out from those whom they had possessed (Ac 19¹), a particular instance of which is in 16¹⁶⁻¹⁸. Because the spirit Python possessed the damsel she became a ventriloquist-soothsayer. The demon was cast out by a word from St. Paul and the maid restored to mental equilibrium.

The treatment of sickness in the Apostolic Church, so far as suggested by the NT, is medicinal, therapeutic, psychotherapeutic, and miraculous. The practice of anointing with oil (Ja 5¹⁴; cf. Mk 6¹³) is not indeed without a magical association—'in the name of the Lord'—but its long history connects it with a healing virtue; wine also possesses medicinal properties (1 Ti 5²³). The medicines used on the island of Malta are not specified, nor are the results of their use stated. The therapeutic treatment of disease certainly underlies St. Paul's advice to the Corinthians. Psychotherapy is to be appealed to with reference to the healing of nervous disorders (cf. 1 Co 12²⁸⁻³⁰, 'gifts of healing'). The cases of cure which are not otherwise accounted for are regarded by the apostles as miraculous (cf. Ac 4¹⁶ 9⁴⁰).

SIDON (Σιδων, ethnic Σιδωνιοί).—Sidon, called 'Great Zidon' (Jos 11⁸), was one of the maritime cities of Phœnicia, about 25 miles N. of Tyre, its 'rival in magnitude, fame, and antiquity' (Strabo, XVI. ii. 22). After the coming of Alexander the Great, whom Sidon rapturously welcomed and Tyre frantically opposed, the two cities shared the same political fortunes, being for two centuries bones of contention between the Greek kings of Syria in the north and Egypt in the south. So long, however, as their civic autonomy was secure, their factories busy, their overseas traffic prosperous, the quarrels of their alternate overlords did not greatly trouble them. And, while their wealth was apparently almost as great as ever, they added a new interest to life by learning the language and assimilating the culture of Greece. They were not now a mere race of merchant princes or pedlars, wholly absorbed in getting and spending. Strabo says that in his time—the beginning of our era—the Sidonians not only 'cultivate science and study astronomy and arithmetic, to which they are led by the application of numbers and night sailing, each of which concerns the merchant and seaman,' but there are 'distinguished philosophers, natives of Sidon, as Boethus, with whom I studied the philosophy of Aristotle, and Diodotus his brother' (XVI. ii. 24).

The two sister cities now consistently advocated a policy of peace with all their neighbours. Not possessing a fraction of the army and navy with which they once defied empires, they could no longer assert themselves even when they were in the right. When Herod Agrippa was 'highly displeased with the Tyrians and Sidonians' (Ac 12²⁰), they indulged in no useless heroics. Raising no question as to whether the king's displeasure was just or not, and facing the plain fact that 'their country was fed from the king's country,' they looked about for a friend at Court and humbly asked for peace. If there was any thought of peace with honour, it was suppressed. Dependents could not afford to be angry, and the king could do no wrong. To this had great Sidon and proud Tyre now come.

No details are given of our Lord's visit to Sidon, though it is definitely stated that He came through it, or at least its surrounding territory (reading δὲ not καὶ in Mk 7³¹, with the best MSS), on His way to Decapolis, which He probably reached by the highway over the Lebanon to Damascus (see H. J. Holtzmann, Die Synoptiker, 1901 [Handkommentar zum NT], and A. B. Bruce, EGT, 'Mark,' 1897, in loc.). Nothing is known of the actual introduction of Christianity into Sidon. One of its bishops attended the Council of Nicæa in A.D. 325.

'Sidonian' was originally an ethnic name like 'Hittite,' Sidon and Heth being named together as sons of Canaan in Gn 10¹⁵. In Homer 'Sidonia' is equivalent to Phœnicia and 'Sidonian' to Phœnician. In the Latin poets, too, when the adjective qualifies such words as 'Dido' (Virg. Æn. xi. 74), 'nautæ,' 'rates,' 'murex,' 'vestis,' 'chlamys,' it means Phœnician. The modern town, called by the Arabs Saida, has about 15,000 inhabitants. Some very remarkable sarcophagi have been found in the necropolis to the S.E. of the town.

SIGN.—The word σημεῖον ('sign') is used (1) of the autographic part of a letter, the mark of authenticity—2 Th 3¹ (EV 'token'); (2) as meaning a 'symbol'—1to 4¹¹ (the 'sign of circumcision,' i.e. circumcision as a sign of the covenant); (3) as an 'indication'—Mt 26⁴⁸ (Judas' kiss), Lk 21² (to the Shepherds) 23⁴ (the child Jesus set for a sign); (4) hence for some wonderful indication—Mt 24³⁰, Mk 13⁴ (of Christ's Coming), Mt 16¹, Mk 8¹¹, 'Mk' 16^{17, 20}, Lk 11^{16, 29} (to show Christ's power), Mt 16³ (signs of the times) 16⁴ (sign of Jonah), 1 Co 14²² (tongues and prophesying as a sign of the power of Christianity); and therefore for a 'miracle' or wonderful deed which has instruction as its object. The 'signs in heaven' of Rev 12^{1, 3} 15¹ are a connecting link between these two shades of meaning. The usual sense of σημεῖον in the NT is a 'miracle,' especially in the plural (see art. MIRACLE).

In the EV the word 'sign' is used in two places where σημεῖον does not occur. In Lk 16² 'they made signs' renders ἐπέειπον, a verb used in Pr 6¹³ 10¹⁰ (LXX) of winking with the eye. In Ac 28¹¹ 'a ship whose sign was the Dioscuri' renders πλοῖον παρασημῶν Διοσκουρίων, where παρασημῶν is either an adjective (= 'marked') or else, less probably, a substantive with Διοσκουρίων in apposition (but in that case it means a ship's flag in classical Greek; see Liddell and Scott, s.v.). A. J. MACLEAN.

SILAS or SILVANUS.—The companion of Paul on his second missionary journey. The shorter (Greek) form of the name is peculiar to Acts, the longer (Latin) form appears four times in the Epistles. Its derivation is uncertain, but may be either of two Hebrew roots, שָׁלַח or שָׁאַל, which would give respectively the meanings of 'sent' and 'asked for.' The fact that Josephus mentions four Jews of the name of Silas points to its Semitic origin.

The first appearance of Silas in Acts is at the close of the Council of Jerusalem, when he and Judas surnamed Barsabbas, described as chief men among the brethren, are chosen to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, with a letter notifying the decision. Being prophets, they not only deliver the letter but remain for a time at Antioch, exhorting and confirming the brethren, and then return to Jerusalem. Shortly afterwards, the rupture between Paul and Barnabas takes place, and Silas is selected by Paul as his new associate, and starts with him on his second missionary journey (15²²⁻⁴¹). As this implies the presence of Silas again at Antioch, it may be supposed that Paul has sent for him to Jerusalem, or that he has returned of his own accord after reporting to the primitive Church the fulfilment of his original mission; 15³⁴ (AV, 'it pleased Silas to abide there still'), which appears with variations in some ancient MSS, is generally regarded as a gloss. On the subsequent journey Silas is not mentioned till Philippi is reached, when his name becomes associated with that of Paul in all the circumstances of the imprisonment, the conversion of the jailer, and the official release. Incidentally, like Paul, he is credited with the possession of the Roman citizenship (16³⁹⁻⁴⁰). Thereafter, he shares the work and troubles of the Apostle at Thessalonica, and proceeds thence with him to Berea, where he and Timothy are left, when Paul retires before his Jewish opponents (17¹⁻¹⁴). From Athens a message is sent by Paul, instructing them to come to him with all speed (17¹⁹), but he has left that city and arrived at Corinth before they rejoin him (18⁵). At this point the name of Silas disappears from the story.

The references to Silvanus in the Epistles accord with the account of Paul's companion in Acts and confirm the theory of their identification. In both Epistles to the Thessalonians, probably written at Corinth, he appears as joint-author with Paul and Timothy, and unites in their friendly greetings (1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1¹). In 2 Co 1¹⁹ he is again mentioned with them as a co-worker in the gospel at Corinth. The inference is that he was the same person as Silas, whom Acts represents as the companion of Paul and Timothy both at Thessalonica and at Corinth. The final reference—1 P 5¹² ('by Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you, as I suppose, I have written briefly')—only shows that in later years he was associated with the author of that Epistle, and assisted him in its production. One passage, when compared with Acts, may be supposed to present a difficulty, if it is presumed that Silas and Timothy were inseparable from the time when they parted with Paul at Berea till they rejoined him at Corinth. 1 Th 3¹⁻⁵ conveys the impression that Timothy had been with Paul in Athens, and had been sent thence to Thessalonica to comfort the Church there and bring news of its condition. It is possible that Timothy paid a visit to Athens which has not been recorded in Acts, but it is unnecessary to infer that Silas accompanied him, and that consequently there is a lacuna in Acts, so far as he is concerned.

Notwithstanding the corroboration of the notices in the Epistles, the identification of Silas with Silvanus has not passed without question. On the ground of an alleged tendency in Acts to connect Paul as closely as possible with the Church of Jerusalem, Weizsacker suggests that, in the account of the second missionary journey, Silas has been substituted for Silvanus, the actual companion of Paul. As a member of the primitive Church and its agent in conveying the decree regarding circumcision to Antioch, Silas would be a pledge of relationship between Paul and Jerusalem on the second journey, as Barnabas had been on the first; and so he would be regarded by the author of Acts as a more appropriate associate for the Apostle. For this theory, however, the reasons adduced have not been found convincing, even by those who admit the supposed tendency in Acts. Scarcely more success has attended the various critical attempts to identify Silas or Silvanus with other friends and fellow-labourers of Paul, such as Luke (Van Vloten) and Titus (Märeker and Seufert). Of the theories advanced in this connexion perhaps the least probable is that which finds two Silases in Acts—one the messenger of the Jerusalem Church to Antioch (15²²⁻³²), the other the companion of Paul on his second journey (15⁴⁰–18⁵)—and identifies the latter with both Silvanus and Titus (Zimmer).

To Silas has been attributed a share, more or less independent, in the writing of several Epistles. Thus it has been suggested that some passages of 1 Cor. (1¹⁶ 3¹⁶, 15²⁰⁻³⁴ 16¹³⁻¹⁸) are interpolations by him, and that he wrote the apocalyptic portions of the Epistles to the Thessalonians (I. Scott). Even the whole of 1 and 2 Thess. has been supposed to be the work of the Silvanus mentioned in 1 P 5¹². Silas (Silvanus) is also one of the authors to whom Hebrews has been ascribed; but there is no traditional support for this view, and too little is known of him to furnish a compelling argument. As in the case of Barnabas, his connexion with the Jerusalem Church tells rather against his authorship of such an Epistle as Hebrews. There is good reason, however, for associating the name of Silas with 1 Peter, and the part borne by him in the production of that Epistle is obtaining increasing recognition. According to 5¹², he was at least the amanuensis by whose hand it was written; but, if the Petrine origin be accepted, various considerations, such as the Pauline cast of the Epistle and its correct Greek, suggest that both matter and style were largely influenced by him. Some scholars, indeed, suppose that Peter entrusted its composition entirely to Silas, and contented himself with revising and approving it. Others go further, and think that Silas may have written it independently, after the death of the Apostle.

SILK.—Silk, the fibrous substance produced by the mulberry silk-moth of China, is mentioned (Rev 18¹) as part of the costly merchandise of 'Babylon' (Imperial Rome). The Chinese name of the silk-worm is si, Korean soi; to the Greeks it became known as σίη, the people supplying it being the Σῆες, and the fibre itself σηρικόν, whence Lat. sericum, Fr. soie, Ger. Seide, Eng. silk. The silk-worm is first mentioned in Western literature by Aristotle (de Anim. Hist. v. 19). The silken textures of the East began to be imported into Italy in the early days of the Empire. At first they fetched fabulous prices, and their use by men was deemed an unpardonable extravagance. At a meeting of the Senate, in the time of Tiberius, 'much was said against the luxury of the city by Quintus Haterius, a man of consular rank, and by Octavius Fronto, formerly prætor; and a law was passed "against using vessels of solid gold in serving up repasts, and against men disgracing themselves with silken garments"' (Tac. Ann. ii. 33). The trade, however, grew. Elagabalus was the first Emperor who wore robes of silk. Aurelian complained that a pound of it cost 12 ounces of gold. Under Justinian the Western world at last received from China a supply of silk-worms' eggs (E. Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, iv. [1902], ch. xl. § 3).

SILVER (ἀργυρος, ἀργύριον, Lat. argentum; from ἀργός, 'shining').—Silver is one of the precious or 'noble' metals, used from the earliest times as a means of exchange and adornment. With the exception of gold, it is the most malleable and ductile of all substances. Gold was 'estimated at thirteen times the value of silver' (Herod. iii. 95), but the proportion varied considerably at different periods.

1. Articles of silver are mentioned among the costly wares sold in the market of the apocalyptic Babylon—Imperial Rome (Rev 18¹²). As this metal has a perfect metallic lustre and takes a very high polish, it was often used for mirrors. The aquila, or standard of the Roman legion, was of silver (Cic. in Cat. i. ix. 24). 'Milites argentati' were soldiers whose shields were covered or plated with silver (Livy, ix. 40). In a great house there were many 'vasa argentea' (2 Ti 2²⁰, Vulg.; cf. Hor. Sat. ii. 7. 72 f.). Rome's principal supply of silver came from southern Spain. The Maccabees heard what the conquering race 'did in the land of Spain, that they might become masters of the mines of silver and gold which were there' (1 Mac 8³). Strabo (iii. ii. 10), quoting Polybius, says that 40,000 men were regularly employed in the silver mines of New Carthage (Carthagera), which yielded daily to the Roman people a revenue of 25,000 drachmæ.

2. As silver was the everyday medium of exchange in the ancient world, the Gr. ἀργύριον, like the Heb. ḥāṣēṣ, frequently denoted money (cf. Fr. argent). When Simon the Magian offered Peter money (χρήματα) for the power to work miracles by the Holy Spirit, the Apostle answered, in horror of this 'simony,' or trafficking in sacred things, 'Thy money (ἀργύριον, RV 'silver') perish with thee.' Xenophon (Cyrop. iii. i. 33) has the phrase εἰς ἀργύριον λογισθέντα, 'calculated in our money,' and ἀργύριον καθαρὸν (Theocritus, xv. 36) meant 'hard cash.'

3. The magical books which were publicly burned in Ephesus during St. Paul's great mission there were priced at 50,000 [pieces] of silver (ἀργυρίου μυριάδας πέντε, Ac 19¹⁹). The coin understood is the drachma or denarius. When Rome became mistress of the Hellenic world, she allowed the Attic coinage to be continued along with her own monetary system. Since the δραχμή and the denarius were practically equal in value, they became convertible terms. As the denarius-drachma (translated 'shilling' in the American RV) was about 9¹/₂d., the books destroyed were worth nearly £2000. Many silver shrines, or miniatures of the temple of Diana, were made and sold in the same city. A guild of silversmiths (ἀργυροκομοί, cf. LXX Jg 17⁴, Jer 6²⁹), of which Demetrius was probably the president during the last year of St. Paul's residence at Ephesus, made their living largely by this lucrative business.

4. In depicting the fate of rich men, James (5³) says that their gold and silver are 'rusted' (καίονται). This is not strictly accurate, as both of these metals have the property of resisting corrosion; but silver is readily blackened or tarnished in an atmosphere of sulphuretted hydrogen.

SIMEON.—See PETER, TRIBES.

SIMON (the tanner).—A dweller in the town of Joppa or Jaffa; in his house St. Peter lodged during his sojourn there after the raising of Dorcas (see art. DORCAS), and from it he was summoned to visit the Roman centurion Cornelius (Ac 9³ 10⁶ 17. 32). The fact that Simon's occupation was that of a tanner has given rise to several interesting suggestions with regard to the Apostle's state of mind at this period. The trade of Simon, owing to his constant contact with dead bodies, was regarded by the Jews as unclean (cf. Edersheim, Jewish Social Life, 1908, p. 158). The Apostle's scruples as to ceremonial uncleanness were not so pronounced as to prevent him from lodging with Simon, and perhaps his contact with the tanner, probably a Christian believer, may have helped to prepare his mind for receiving the message of Cornelius. We may admit that the reference to the tanner is meant to introduce the 'universalism' of the following chapter without in any way suggesting that the passage is unhistorical (cf. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, in loco).

W. F. BOYD.

SIMON MAGUS.—1. The NT account.—Ac 8⁹⁻²⁴ gives the story of 'a certain man, Simon by name,' who 'used sorcery, and amazed the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one (λεγων εἶναι τινα ἑαυτὸν μεγάλην): to whom they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is that power of God which is called Great (ἡ δὲ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη). . . . But when they believed Philip preaching good tidings concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women. And Simon also himself believed: and being baptized, he continued with Philip; and beholding signs and great miracles wrought, he was amazed.' The news of the movement in Samaria brought Peter and John from Jerusalem, and through their prayers and the laying on of their hands, the believers received the Holy Spirit. Seeing this, Simon offered the apostles money, saying, 'Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay my hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost. But Peter said unto him, Thy silver perish with thee, because thou hast thought to obtain the gift of God with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is not right before God. Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray the Lord if perhaps the thought of thy heart shall be forgiven thee. For I see that thou art in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. And Simon answered and said, Pray ye for me to the Lord, that none of the things which ye have spoken come upon me.'

These verses tell all that is known definitely about this particular Simon. But in subsequent Christian literature the name became very prominent. A Simon Magus was described as an arch-heretic who was the antagonist of Simon Peter. Accounts of his teaching are given in heresiological works. An elaborate legend became current about his conflict with the Apostle. In modern times fresh importance has attached to this legend because the Tübingen school have tried to show that the oldest accounts are those in which Simon Magus is represented as a caricature of the apostle Paul, and the opponent of the apostle Peter. This has been used as a basis for their reconstruction of early Church history from the point of view that Peter and Paul were in conflict, and that the Acts of the Apostles was a conciliatory compromise. The question of the identity of this legendary Simon Magus—the disguised Paul—with the Simon of Ac 8 can be discussed best after some inquiry into the legend and into the references to Simon in Patristic literature.

2. The Simonian legend.—There are two chief sources of this legend. (a) The Clementine Homilies and Recognitions. These are two forms of an early Christian romance, the Homilies in Greek, the Recognitions in Latin. They relate the story of Clement's search for truth until his reunion with the long-lost members of his family. According to the Homilies, in the course of his wanderings Clement met Peter at Cæsarea in Palestine. The Apostle was to dispute next day with Simon of Gitta. The story of Simon is then related by two of his pupils: that his father's name was Antonius, his mother's Rachel; that he was a Samaritan of the village of Gitta, six miles from Samaria; that he was educated at Alexandria, and was skilled in the wisdom of the Greeks and in magic. Peter disputed with him for three days, after which Simon fled by night to Tyre. Peter followed him to Tyre and to Sidon and to Tripolis, whence Simon escaped to Syria. They met again in Laodicea, where the disputes were renewed. Simon managed to escape by changing the face of Faustus, Clement's father, and making it like his own. This device, however, led to Faustus exposing Simon's impostures. Meanwhile Simon reached Judæa.

In the Recognitions only one dispute is described—in Cæsarea. But there is reference to a visit of Simon to Rome, where he is to be honoured with statues. It is probable that these versions are independent re-castings of a common original. The question in doubt is whether the original story told only of a conflict between Simon and Peter in Syria, or whether it related an earlier conflict in Syria and a later one in Rome.

(b) The legendary Acts of Peter and Paul. These tell the story of contests between Simon and Peter; but they place the scene in Rome. There are two forms of the story. (a) The Gnostic Acts (Actus Petri cum Simone) tell that after Paul left Rome, a stir arose in the city about a Simon who worked miracles and called himself the Great Power of God. He came to the city flying in smoke, and created a great sensation. Therefore Peter was bidden by Christ to go to Rome. The Apostle found Simon installed in the house of a Roman senator, and he attacked the Magian as a ravening wolf. When Simon refused him admittance, Peter sent a message by a dog, whose speech brought the traitor to the Apostle's feet. By the aid of further miracles Peter silenced Simon till a public controversy was arranged before all Rome. Peter raised the dead, and exposed Simon's attempts to work similar miracles. Simon then promised to fly to God. But in answer to Peter's prayers he fell, broke his thigh, and was taken to Terracina, where he died.

(b) The Acta Petri et Pauli gives another form of the story. Paul is the companion of Peter in Rome. The success of their preaching made the Jews stir up Simon against Peter. He convinced Nero of his claims, and Peter and Paul were summoned to appear before the Emperor. After long discussion, Simon undertook to fly from a high tower. Paul was distressed, and prayed. But Peter adjured the angels of Satan not to help Simon, who fell to the ground and died.

The Apostolic Constitutions contains the whole story of a conflict in Syria and a conflict in Rome. Probably this is a piecing together of two stories, originally independent. It does not settle the question whether the Clementines and the Petrine Acts depend upon independent documents, as G. Salmon thinks (DCB, art. 'Simon Magus'), or whether they severally elaborate two parts of one common history—an Ebionite Acts of Peter—which is Lipsius' theory.

The substance of the story as it concerns Simon is that he travelled in Syria and as far as Rome, deceiving people by his magic and winning widespread adherence for his claims to Divine power; that he was opposed by Simon Peter, who exposed his deceit and brought to naught his efforts to impose on the people.

3. The Simonian system.—In addition to these legendary accounts of the contest between Simon Magus and Simon Peter, there are references to Simon in Patristic literature which give more trustworthy accounts of his life and teaching. (a) The earliest reference is in Justin Martyr's Apology (i. 26, 56). He says: 'After Christ's ascension into heaven the devils put forward certain men who said that they themselves were gods; and they were not only not persecuted by you, but even deemed worthy of honours. There was a Samaritan, Simon, a native of the village called Gitta, who in the reign of Claudius Cæsar, and in your royal city of Rome, did mighty acts of magic, by virtue of the art of the devils operating in him. He was considered a god, and as a god was honoured by you with a statue, which statue was erected on the river Tiber, between the two bridges, and bore this inscription, in the language of Rome: "Simoni Deo Sancto," "To Simon the holy God." And almost all the Samaritans, and a few even of other nations, worship him, and acknowledge him as the first god; and a woman, Helena, who went about with him at that time, and had formerly been a prostitute, they say is the first idea generated by him. And a man, Menander, also a Samaritan, of the town Capparetea, a disciple of Simon, and inspired by devils, we know to have deceived many while he was in Antioch by his magical art' (26). In 56 is another reference: 'But the evil spirits were not satisfied with saying, before Christ's appearance, that those who were said to be sons of Jupiter were born of him; but after He had appeared and been born among men, and when they learned how He had been foretold by the prophets, and knew that He should be believed on and looked for by every nation, they again, as was said before, put forward other men, the Samaritans Simon and Menander, who did many mighty works by magic, and deceived many, and still keep them deceived. For even among yourselves, as we said before, Simon was in the royal city Rome in the reign of Claudius Cæsar, and so greatly astonished the sacred senate and people of the Romans, that he was considered a god, and honoured, like the others whom you honour as gods, with a statue.'

(b) Later Patristic literature seems to gather its accounts of Simon's teaching from some common ground—probably a lost treatise by Justin. Simon is said to have taught that he was the highest power—the Supreme God Himself, who descended to the lower world because its rulers ruled it all. He passed through its regions, appearing in every form necessary for the restoration of the lost harmony. Among Jews he manifested himself as the Son, in Samaria as the Father, and among other nations as the Holy Spirit. Helena (whom he had purchased in a brothel in Tyre) was his πρωτη ενορια, mother of all, by whom he had called the angels and archangels into being. She had been laid under bonds by her own children, but after many transmigrations had been rescued at last by the Supreme God—Simon—who came down to deliver her and to bring salvation to all men through the knowledge of himself. He liberated the world and those who were his from the rule of those who had made the world. Those who had hope in him and in Helena might freely do as they would, for men were saved according to his grace and not according to good works.

Such a system is obviously an amalgam of paganism and Christianity. It contains a good deal that is common to almost all the forms of Gnostic myths, and it borrows some of its ideas and not a little of its phraseology from Christianity.

4. The historical value of the story.—(a) One explanation of this tradition is that it is the legendary development of the story in Ac 8, under the influence of a continued conflict between Christianity and the Simonian Gnosis. The Tübingen school, however, explained it in a different way. According to Baur and his followers, the Ebionite Clementine literature contains a caricature of the apostle Paul. Instead of the Simon of the tradition being treated as a historical character, the name is to be interpreted as a term of reproach for Paul. Whenever Simon Magus is mentioned in ancient documents, Paul is meant. The contest between Simon Magus and Simon Peter really represents the conflict between Paul and Peter. So the Simon of Ac 8 was no real character but only a presentation of Paul. Thus, Peter's refusal to give Simon Magus the power of the Holy Spirit is a covert account of the refusal of the elder Apostle to admit Paul's claims to rank with them, backed though the claim was by a gift of money for the poor saints in Jerusalem. Starting from this standpoint, Baur's school reconstructed the story of early Christianity with the conflict between Paul and Peter as the key. The Acts of the Apostles was interpreted as a compromise, a book written in a conciliatory interest but resting upon Jewish Christian myths only partly understood. The journeys of Peter and his visit to Rome are merely an ecclesiastical tradition reflecting the journeys of Paul, and expressing the belief of the Church that the great Apostle, who had withstood the Simon-Paul everywhere else, must have followed up his victory in the capital. This theory, ingeniously applied to Patristic and Clementine literature, and worked out with much skill, won many adherents for a time, despite the fact that it proved the presence of biased and fabricated history within primitive Christianity. But a reaction soon set in. In *EBR*⁹ (xxii. 79) A. Harnack wrote, 'On no other point are the proofs of the Tübingen school weaker than in this.' In *EB*¹¹ (xxv. 126) St. George Stock's conclusion is, 'The idea that Simon Magus is merely a distortion of St. Paul is absurd.' It is not denied that the Clementine literature is marked by hostility to St. Paul. 'The Clementine writings were produced in Rome, early in the third century, by members of the Elkesaite sect. . . . One of the characteristics of these heretics was hostility to Paul, whom they refused to recognize as an apostle' (G. Salmon in Smith-Wace, DCB, London, 1877-87, iv. 687). But, though P. W. Schmiedel (in EB, art. 'Simon Magus') defends a modified position of the Tübingen school, most modern scholars would probably accept St. George Stock's summing up in *EBR*¹¹: 'In conclusion, there are of course some grounds for the Tübingen view, but they are wholly inadequate to bear the structure that has been raised upon them. St. Paul was a hard hitter, and Jewish Christians, who still clung to James and Peter as the only true pillars of the Church, are not likely to have cherished any love for his memory. This is enough to account for the hostility displayed against St. Paul in the Clementines. But to push the equation of St. Paul with Simon Magus further than we are forced to by the facts of the case is to lose sight of the real character of the Clementines as the counterblast of Jewish to Samaritan Gnosticism and to obscure the greatness of Simon of Gitta, who was really the father of all heresy.' As F. H. Chase puts it in discussing Lipsius' theory that the Simonian legend originated the story of Peter's visit to Rome: 'Lipsius' theory is really an offshoot of the Tübingen theory of the apostolic age. The main trunk is now seen to be lifeless. The branch cannot but share its decay' (HDB iii. 777b).*

(b) If the Tübingen theory be recognized as 'lifeless,' there are three questions of importance bearing on the historical value of the Simonian legend.

(1) Is the Simon of the legends a historical person? Salmon's answer may be accepted at once: 'It cannot reasonably be doubted that Simon of Gitta is a historical personage. The heretical sect which claimed him for its founder was regarded by Justin Martyr as most formidable. . . . He speaks of it as predominant in Samaria, and not unknown elsewhere; that is to say, probably, he had met members of the sect at Rome. The existence of the sect is testified by Hegesippus and Clement of Alexandria' (op. cit., p. 687 f.). There is nothing to throw doubt upon the definite statements of Justin Martyr about the Simon who is mentioned alongside of Menander and Marcion as the founder of a sect and the object of veneration.

There is less certainty about the details of his life. With regard to his birthplace—Gitta—Justin was a Samaritan and a good witness; and the statements of Hegesippus about his father and his mother, and his being trained at Alexandria, are quite possibly good tradition. Also the general ascription to him of magical powers probably reflects a claim he made. The persistent story of his journeys, coupled with the existence of Simonians outside Palestine, favours the view that he travelled, though considerable haziness hangs over the whole subject of his alleged visit to Rome.

(2) Is the Simon of Ac 8 a historical person? This question also may be answered unhesitatingly in the affirmative. 'The Simon of the Acts is also a real person' (Salmon, op. cit., p. 688). With the break-down of the Tübingen theory, and the re-habilitation of Luke as a historian, all reasons for doubting the essential accuracy of the narrative in Acts have disappeared. That narrative relates to times of which Luke had no firsthand knowledge; therefore it may be coloured by later feeling. But Luke related it because it occurred, and because he had reasons for relating it. What those reasons were, and whether we know very much about Simon, can be discussed best when another question has been answered:

(3) Is Simon of Gitta the same as the Simon of Ac 8? This identity was generally assumed until Salmon questioned it in the article referred to above. He believes that Justin Martyr confused Simon of Gitta with Simon of Acts, and that the confusion has dominated all subsequent references to them. His chief argument is that the Simonian doctrine, being a variant of 2nd cent. Gnosticism, could not have been propounded by a Simon who lived in Samaria c. A.D. 40. In support of his theory he adds: 'If Simon had been really the inventor of the Gnostic myths, it is not credible that they should pass into so many systems which did not care to retain any memory of his name. On the other hand, if this mythology had been in Simon's time already current, it is intelligible that he might make use of it in order to justify to his disciples his relations with a fallen woman.' Salmon thinks that 'the Simon described by Justin was not, as he supposed, the father of Gnosticism, but had found at the time of his teaching a Gnostic system already developed. It follows, then, that Justin's Simon could not be identical with the contemporary of the Apostles; and the name Simon is so common a one, that the supposition of two Simons presents no difficulty.' His conclusion is that 'the Simon described by Justin was his elder only by a generation; that he was a Gnostic teacher who had gained some followers at Samaria; and that Justin rashly identified him with the magician told of in the Acts of the Apostles' (ib., p. 683). This conclusion is supported generally by St. George Stock in *EBR*¹¹ (xxv. 126), who says that 'Dr. George Salmon brought light into darkness by distinguishing between Simon of Gitta and the original Simon Magus.' His conclusions are: '(1) That all we know of the original Simon Magus is contained in Acts; (2) that from very early times he has been confused with another Simon'; and he adds: 'Before such an amalgam of paganism and Christianity could be propounded, it is evident that Christianity must have been for some little time before the world, and that the system cannot possibly be traced back to Simon Magus. Is it not this early struggle between Jewish and Samaritan universalism, involving as it did a struggle of religion against magic, that is really symbolized under the wild traditions of the contest between Peter and Simon?' (ib., p. 127). 'Justin Martyr was decidedly weak in history, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that he may have confused the Simon of Acts with a heretical leader of the same name who lived much nearer to his own time, especially as this other Simon also had a great reputation for magic. A full century must have elapsed between the conversion of Simon Magus to Christianity and the earliest date possible . . . for the composition of Justin Martyr's First Apology' (c. A.D. 152) (ib., p. 126). F. H. Chase also accepts this theory, saying, in reference to the Simonian legend, 'the most probable account of its genesis is that it grew out of a mistaken identity' (HDB iii. 778).

(c) Before this modification of the view held so long as to the identification of the two Simons can be accepted, regard must be had to the following points.

(1) Are the references of Justin Martyr historically explicable on the theory that Simon of Gitta was a 2nd cent. Gnostic? Even if Justin was decidedly 'weak in history' (Stock), he must have acted 'rashly,' as Salmon allows (loc. cit.), if he identified two men who lived nearly a century apart, in a public Apology in defence of Christianity. His reference to a statue to Simon in Rome is generally regarded as a mistake, because in 1574 the base of a statue was dug up in the island in the Tiber to which he refers, with the inscription 'Semoni Sanco Deo Fidio.' It is supposed, therefore, that Justin mistook a statue dedicated to a Sabine deity for one erected to Simon. There is considerable force, however, in the plea of the editors of the 'Ante-Nicene Christian Library' that this is 'very slight evidence on which to reject so precise a statement as Justin here makes; a statement which he would scarcely have hazarded in an apology addressed to Rome, where every person had the means of ascertaining its accuracy. If, as is supposed, he made a mistake, it must have been at once exposed, and other writers would not have so frequently repeated the story as they have done' (Ante-Nicene Christian Library, ii. [1892] 29 n.).

It has also to be considered whether Justin could repeat (chs. 26 and 56) such a flagrant error as bringing Simon to Rome in the reign of Claudius and ascribing public honours to him, if the man Simon was not a generation older than himself, as Salmon's theory suggests. Would such a tradition have grown up in the Roman community about a man who was almost their contemporary? And, if there was no tradition, was Justin likely to have made such a statement, even adding the plea, 'As for the statue, if you please destroy it' (56)? At any rate, would the story have been left unrefuted so that it could be accepted and repeated by later writers? If Simon of Gitta was a 2nd cent. Gnostic teacher, either he had not been in Rome, in which case it is difficult to understand why Justin's fallacious reference was not exposed, or he had been in Rome so recently as to make it difficult to understand why Justin pushed back the event for nearly a century.

(2) Further, it has to be noted that there is a real parallelism between the Simonian system and the slight account in Acts of the teaching of Simon Magus. The magical element is prominent in both. Simon in Samaria 'used sorcery, and amazed the people,' a trait very characteristic of the legendary Simon. Acts (8¹⁰⁻¹¹) says Simon gave out 'that himself was some great one: to whom they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is that power of God which is called Great (ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη).' And Simon is said to have been specially struck with the 'signs and great miracles' wrought by Philip (v. 13). Now, in the Simonian system, Simon is said to have taught that he was the highest God, τὴν ὑπὲρ πάντα δύναμιν. He called himself ὁ ἐστὼς, ὁ σὺς, ὁ σιγῶμενος, implying his pre-existence and his immortality.

It would seem, therefore, that if the two Simons are different, the 3rd cent. Simon taught doctrines whose elements were taught by the earlier Simon; also that both were distinguished for sorcery and for magical powers.

The amalgam of paganism and Christianity which was characteristic of Gnosticism, and which was specially obvious in the Simonian system, is readily explicable in the teaching of Simon Magus, who, according to the story in Acts, was brought into intimate contact with Christian teaching without becoming a genuine believer.

(3) Is it not possible to find a mediating theory? First of all, we must think of the Simon of Acts as a convert whose conversion was sincere as far as it went, but was very superficial. He is not represented as resenting Peter's rebuke. It abashed him, and made him penitent to the extent of asking humbly for the Apostle's prayers. There is no contest between Simon and Peter in Acts. But is it not likely that, when Simon was brought face to face with the deeper meanings of Christianity, he failed to respond? Instead of advancing in Christian knowledge, he seceded from a community with which his connexion had been anomalous. This view is put forward also by W. M. Ramsay in Exp, 8th ser., v. 348. Discussing the term 'believe,' he writes, 'The example of Simon Magus seems conclusive. Simon believed (Acts viii. 13), and was baptized. Yet it is hard to suppose that he became in the final sense a Christian, although for the time he was a member of the Church. The language of Luke, on the whole, suggests the opposite. Simon, it is true, after baptism, "continued with Philip; and beholding signs and great wonders wrought, he was amazed" (ἐκίστατο). Yet no word is said to mitigate the final condemnation pronounced on him by Peter: "thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; for thy heart is not right." He is described, not as repenting, but only as asking in fear of the future that Peter should pray for him.'

It seems beyond question that Luke knew the reputation which Simon acquired, and that he regarded the subsequent history of Simon as the natural result of what occurred at the beginning of his connexion with the Christians.'

But it need not be supposed that when Simon broke with the Christians he renounced all he had learned. It is more probable that he carried some of the Christian ideas with him and that he wove these into a system of his own. This system did contain some of the germs of later Gnosticism. Thus he became the leader of a retrograde sect, perhaps nominally Christian and certainly using some of the Christian terminology, but in reality anti-Christian and exalting Simon himself to the central position which Christianity was giving to Jesus Christ. The separation between Simon and the Christians would probably be widened by the departure of Philip soon after the apostles left Samaria. Philip had been the agent of the Christian movement, and it is not unlikely that on his withdrawal many Samaritans might easily fall again under the spell of Simon, especially if he were offering himself as a Christian leader.

Now if Simon was a pervert who originated an apostate sect—an anti-Christian sect, though a sect claiming Christian connexion—is it not comprehensible that two results happened? (a) Simon became the arch-heretic in the eyes of the Christians, and tradition was sure to be busy with his name. (b) The sect he founded became absorbed in later Gnosticism, but also contributed something to it. Gnosticism did not enter the 2nd cent. fully grown. A. C. Headlam (art. 'Gnosticism' in HDB ii. 188) remarks that 'the developed Gnostic heresies of the 2nd cent. presuppose the NT,' and that 'the embryo Gnosticism of the NT takes its proper place in the history of religious development.'* May not Simon have been one of the forerunners of Gnosticism; not, perhaps, its father, as tradition has supposed, but one source of some of its ramifications? A. C. McGiffert refers to this: 'His effort to rival and surpass Jesus very likely began after his contact with the Christians which Luke records. His religious system was apparently a syncretism of Jewish and Oriental elements, and resembled very closely some forms of second century Gnosticism, if it did not indeed give rise to them' (A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, pp. 99-100). Without ascribing to Simon such prominence as is demanded by tradition, it is permissible to believe that he gave his name to a sect which became Gnostic but which retained a historical connexion with him, though its doctrines were modified largely in process of time.

In such circumstances we may find a historical basis for much of the Simonian tradition, whilst recognizing that tradition had been busy embellishing the story of Simon even long before the time of Justin Martyr. It may be assumed that he was born in the Samaritan village of Gitta; that he was a man of unusual attainments; that he received some training in Alexandrian philosophy; that he startled Samaria with his powers; that he was, for a time, nominally a Christian, but that he broke away from the Christian Church; that his knowledge of Christian truth was very shallow, and that he carried some Christian ideas over with him, but in confusion; and that his subsequent teaching was an amalgam of this crude Christian precipitate with Alexandrian speculation and with magic. It is probable that he travelled, preaching his new doctrines, practising his magical arts, and winning for himself and for his teaching something of the devotion with which he was regarded in Samaria. Whether he ever exhibited his skill in Rome, we have no means of determining; but at all events he was brought to Rome by popular legend and was represented as winning an extraordinary success in the Imperial city. His disciples became a sect which bore his name and which persisted long after the death of the original members. Simon's teaching contained some of the germs of 2nd cent. Gnosticism, which it may have done something to evolve and with which the Simonian sect became impregnated, though it still retained many of its early magico-Christian elements. Beyond this it seems impossible to go. What was actually taught by Simon cannot now be distinguished from what was taught by his followers. The story of Helena may be a Simonian doctrine rather than a fact. It cannot be said whether Simon Magus and Simon Peter ever met again after their encounter in Samaria; the record of their conflict is probably the romance which tradition has woven round the name of one who was known to have been a Christian once but was rebuked by Peter for his ignorance of Christian truth and who became subsequently an apostate.

(4) Coming back to the story in Ac 8, there seems no reason for doubting its essential accuracy (see 4 (b) (2)).

(i.) Luke's account looks like history. There is no embellishment from the point of view of the Christian romancer. The story does not dilate upon the remarkable conversion, and it leaves Simon directly the purpose of the reference to him is fulfilled. The plain record is not embroidered; moreover, there is an almost tantalizing brevity, as in several of Luke's stories, which belong to the history of the Christian Church and were not written to satisfy curiosity.

(ii.) This does not deny that the story may be coloured somewhat by being seen through the haze of a considerable interval. Luke was writing about events of which he knew nothing at first hand. Perhaps he had met the Simonian sect outside Palestine, and there may have been already some magnifying of Simon's success in Samaria or some depreciation of his motives in Christian circles. At the same time, this 'impressionist' account of the incident would not justify such a criticism, e.g., as that of McGiffert: 'Luke's account of Simon's dealings with the apostles can hardly be accurate in all the details, for it rests upon the assumption that the Holy Spirit was given by the laying on of the apostles' hands' (op. cit., p. 100 n.). All that the account suggests is that in this case the gift of the Holy Spirit was connected with the laying on of hands—a suggestion quite in harmony with the general tenor of Acts.

(iii.) Why did Luke insert the story? Salmon's laconic comment is, 'we need not ascribe to Luke any more recondite motive for relating the incident, than that he believed that it had occurred' (op. cit., p. 668). This answers the charge that the incident is unhistorical. But it fails to take into account the modern estimate of Luke's methods as a historian. Two motives may be suggested.

(a) Is not a sufficient reason Luke's well-known plan of describing the first meeting between Christianity and rival systems? In Ac 13⁸⁻¹² there is a careful account of the meeting between Paul the Christian and Elymas the sorcerer; 16¹⁸⁻¹⁹ tells of the maid having the spirit of divination whom St. Paul delivered; 17¹⁶⁻³¹ relates Paul's first argument with the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers in Athens; 19¹³⁻²⁰ describes Paul's success in conflict with the pagan dabblers in the black art. Does not Ac 8⁹⁻²⁴ tell the story of the earliest meeting between Christianity and a rival system? Simon Magus represented the magic of that time. When the gospel was brought to Samaria, thus making its first essay on non-Jewish soil, it was discovered to be mightier than the magic which exercised such a powerful influence over the contemporary world. It was a notable triumph for the young Christian faith that, on the first trial of strength with the world's magic, the gospel not only lured the multitudes from the magician but even won the admiration of the magician himself, and at least his temporary adherence.

(b) If we may accept the existence in Luke's time of a Simonian sect owing anything to this Simon Magus, would not another motive urge Luke to tell the story? Evidently the Simonian heresy always had a Christian tinge. This made it more dangerous to Christians than a gnosis which did not affect any Christian influence. Luke therefore would be anxious to disclose the true circumstances that accounted for the origin of the sect—circumstances highly discreditable to Simon. If the story in Acts tells exactly what happened, it was natural for the Church historian to relate it in order to guard Christians against Simonian errors, and to warn members of the sect against the mistake they were making in following such a leader as Simon instead of accepting the orthodox Christian faith.

It only remains to add that the influence of Simon Magus lingers in two directions. (1) The practice of presenting any person to an ecclesiastical benefice for money, gift, or reward is an offence against the law of the Church, known as 'simony.' An example of the offence occurs as early as the 3rd century. It was prohibited by many Councils, but it became well rooted in the mediæval Church. Dante refers to it (Inferno, xix. 1).

(2) 'Doctor Faustus' of popular literature preserves several traits of the ancient magician. The story is reminiscent of the Simonian legend in several points. In Simon Magus himself there may be a suggestion of Mephistopheles.

LITERATURE.—The three most complete articles on Simon Magus in English are in UDB (A. C. Headlam), in DCB (G. Salmon), in *EBR*¹¹ (St. George Stock). A. Harnack's art. in *EBR*⁹ should also be consulted. See also F. H. Chase, art. 'Peter (Simon)' in UDB, esp. pp. 773-775 for account of Gnostic Acts of the Clementine literature, and pp. 777-779 for discussion of Peter's visit to Rome and the Simonian legend. P. W. Schmiedel, art. 'Simon Magus' in EBi, gives the modern modified form of the Tübingen theory. There is a brief summing up of several of the questions involved in note on Ac 8⁹ by R. J. Knowling in EGT, 'Acts,' London, 1900. J. B. Lightfoot discusses the Ebionite and anti-Pauline spirit of the Clementine literature in his essay on 'St. Paul and the Three' appended to St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, London, 1887, pp. 324-330; see also p. 61; W. SIMON PETER.—See PETER.

SIMPLICITY (lit. 'one-foldedness').—(a) In Ro 16¹⁸ the term 'simple' is used in the AV to translate ἁκακος. False teachers by smooth and fair speech beguile the hearts of the 'simple.' These are inexperienced Christians, unfamiliar with the duplicity of guile. ἁκακος in He 7²⁸ is used in the purely good sense of 'guileless,' and is applied to Jesus, but here the word seems to be used in a slightly derogatory sense—so ignorant of evil as to be easily deceived by evil.

(b) In Ro 16¹⁹ the word 'simple,' translating ἀκραιος (lit. 'free from foreign admixture,' as, e.g., wine unmingled with water, unalloyed metal), has no such derogatory significance. St. Paul would have his readers innocent without being ignorant; discerning the wiles of Satan, yet without sin-craft: in wisdom many-sided—in aim and affection single-minded (cf. 1 Co 14²⁰, 'Be not children in mind: howbeit in malice, be ye babes').

(c) In 1 P 2² ἁδοκος is used in the sense of 'simple,' 'unadulterated': 'Desire the sincere milk of the word' (AV: the word 'sincere' being used in its early English sense of 'unmixed'). See R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT, London, 1876, p. lvi.

(d) 'Simplicity' is given as the AV translation of ἁπλότης in Ro 12⁸: 'He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity.' The Greek word indicates one-foldedness; in regard to giving, the term suggests that there is no two-sidedness in the act, that the impulse to help is not checked by a spirit of grudging selfishness. Thus the sense of 'liberality' became attached to the word, and so it is translated in the RV of this passage (cf. 2 Co 8- [AV and RV] 9^{11, 13}, Ja 1⁵).

In 2 Co 11³ St. Paul fears lest the church at Corinth, like tempted Eve, 'should be corrupted from the simplicity (both AV and RV) that is toward Christ.' The noun (ἁπλότης) would be better translated here 'singleness of heart,' as in AV and RV of Eph 6⁵ and Col 3²² ('Obey your masters in singleness of heart,' i.e. in contrast to the double-dealing of eye-service). In Ac 2⁴⁶ ('They'—i.e. the members of the primitive Church—'did take their food with gladness and singleness of heart') the same idea is expressed by another phrase—ἀφελότητι καρδίας—the figure suggested being that of a field clear of stony ground (ἀ + φελλεύς). The AV tr. 'simplicity' of 2 Co 1¹² rests on an inferior reading—ἁπλότητι for ἀγιότητι.

H. BULCOCK.

SIN.—'Sin' is a term which belongs to religion. Moral evil as an injury done by man to himself is vice, as an offence against human society crime, but as affecting his relation to God sin. But even here we may distinguish a more distinctively religious from the more general moral sense. It is distrust of the goodness and grace of God as well as disobedience to the law of God as the standard of moral obligation. To be forgetful of God in one's thoughts, to be neglectful of piety and worship towards God, is as much sin as to disregard and defy God's commandments. It is sometimes insisted in writings of to-day, such as Tennant's (see Literature), that sin must be conscious and voluntary distrust and disobedience; but it will appear that in the Scriptures the emphasis on the subjective consciousness is secondary. Sin includes departure from, or failure to reach, the standard of religious and moral obligation for man determined by the nature and purpose of God; the stress falls more on the objective reality—the difference between what man is and what he should be, God being what He is. While it might be convenient to restrict the term 'sin' to conscious, voluntary acts, yet the wider usage is too deeply rooted in religious thought to be easily displaced. It must be insisted, however, that moral accountability, personal blameworthiness, attaches to the conscious and voluntary acts alone, even although, as regards the consequences of evil, human solidarity is such that the innocent may suffer with the guilty.

The term 'guilt' is one that requires careful definition. It is not punishment; for punishment consists of all the evil consequences of sin, which the sinner in his sense of having sinned regards as resulting from a violated moral law, or more personally as the evidences of the Divine displeasure. This subjective consciousness is not, however, illusory, as it does correspond with and respond to a moral order and a personal will opposed to sin, which are an objective reality. Guilt is the liability to punishment, the sinner by his act placing himself in such a relation to the moral order and the personal will of God as to expose him to the evil consequences included in his punishment. Here again our modern thought with its refinements makes distinctions which the Scriptures for the most part ignore. Can we separate, or must we identify, guilt and sense of guilt? Is there an objective fact and a subjective feeling? If sin is confined strictly to conscious and voluntary acts, then guilt, it would seem, must be measured by the sense of guilt, the blameworthiness or evil desert that the conscience of the sinner assigns to him. If this were so, then the worse a man became, the less guilty he would be; for it is a sign of moral deterioration to lose the sense of shame in wrongdoing.

The Scripture approach—and surely this is the properly religious approach—to the question is from the side of God rather than of man. A man's guilt is measured, not by his shame or sorrow, but by God's judgment: his relation to God as affected by his sin is determined, not by his own opinion of himself, but by God's view of him. The Divine judgment will, we may confidently believe, take due account of all the facts; the departure from, or failure to reach, the Divine standard, the moral possibility of each man as determined by his heredity, environment, and individuality, and his own moral estimate of himself—all will be included in God's knowledge of him, and so his guilt will be determined, not by an unerring wisdom and an unfailing righteousness only, but also by an unexhausted love. Thus a man's sense of guilt is not the measure of his guilt: for the more callous he is morally, the worse must his moral condition appear in the sight of God; and the more sensitive he is, the better must he appear to God. In the measure in which a man judges himself in penitence will he not be judged guilty by God.

Further, in his subjective consciousness a man tends to separate himself, both in his merits and in his defects, from his fellow-men; but in objective reality men are so closely related to one another as to be involved in moral responsibility for one another. Saints as a whole must bear the blame for many of the conditions which make the criminal; and the saint will bear in his heart as a personal sorrow and shame the sins of his fellow-men. In God's view also the individual does not stand isolated; but the race is a unity, one in its guilt, yet also one for God's grace. While, when necessary, we must insist on individual liberty and personal responsibility, we must not ignore the complementary truth of racial solidarity. The Scripture point of view is predominantly, if not exclusively, universal objectivity and not individual subjectivity; and unless we recognize this we shall fail to understand the apostolic teaching.

1. St. Paul's teaching.—As the DCG deals with the teaching of Jesus, we are here strictly confined to the apostolic teaching; and we must obviously begin with St. Paul.

(a) The universality of sin.—St. Paul's view is the distinctively religious view. Men, dependent upon God, and capable of knowing God, 'glorified him not as God, neither gave thanks,' but dishonoured God in their conception of Him, and in their worship (Ro 1²¹); their moral deterioration followed religious perversion (vv. 24-25). Even in the Gentiles this involved guilt, for the sin was conscious and voluntary, as a disregard and defiance of a law written in their hearts (12²⁻²³ 214-16). Not less guilty was the Jew who failed to keep the Law of the possession of which he made his boast (2²³). By such a historical induction St. Paul establishes his thesis of the universality of sin and consequent guilt, and confirms it from the Scriptures, the aim of which is to bring to all men the sense of guilt, 'that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may be brought under the judgement of God' (3¹⁹); 'the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold down the truth in unrighteousness' (1¹⁸). This thesis is advanced, not for its own sake, however, but to show the need of as universal a salvation offered to mankind in Christ.

The validity of St. Paul's conclusion here is not affected by the correctness or otherwise of the explanation which he offers of the origin of idolatry and the immorality consequent on it. First, we must recognize the Hebraic mode of speech, which represents as direct Divine judgment what we should regard as inevitable moral consequence; and, secondly, we must to-day regard polytheism and the accompanying idolatry as seemingly inevitable stages in the development of the religious consciousness of the Divine. We may admit, however, that idolatry as St. Paul knew it in the Roman Empire was closely associated with immorality; and that Greek and Roman mythology was likely to have an adverse moral influence, as Plato in the Republic recognized.

In affirming that sin involves guilt, exposes man to the Divine judgment, St. Paul was echoing the teaching not only of the OT and of Jesus Himself (Mt 11²² 237-38) but of the universal human conscience, confirmed by the course of human history. There is a moral order in man and the world condemning and executing sentence on sin; and, if God be personally immanent in the world, we cannot distinguish that moral order from the mind and will of God. And, if God be personal, He feels as well as thinks and wills; and so we cannot altogether exclude an emotional reaction of God against sin. St. Paul's term 'the wrath of God' may be allowed its full significance so long as we exclude any passion inconsistent with holy love. Thus we are here dealing, not with an outgrown superstition, but with a permanent moral and spiritual reality—man's sin and God's judgment, man's need and God's offer of salvation.

(b) The development of sin.—From the universal fact we may turn to the individual feeling of sin. St. Paul was not merely generalizing his individual experience in his proof of the universality of sin, but it is certain that his individual experience gave emphasis to his statement. The classic passage is Ro 7²⁻²⁵, which the present writer must regard as an account of St. Paul's own individual experience, before the grace of Christ brought him deliverance; but there is no doubt that he desires us to regard his individual experience as in greater or lesser degree common to all men. Sin is a power dwelling in man, which may for a time be latent, but which is provoked into exercise by the Law. The knowledge of the prohibition stimulates, and does not restrain, the opposition of sin to law; as the common proverb says, 'Forbidden fruit is sweet.' While the mind knows, approves, and delights in the law of God as holy, righteous, and good, the flesh is the seat and vehicle of sin. The 'law in the members' is opposed to, resists and conquers, the 'law in the mind,' and so the man is brought into bondage, doing what he condemns, unable to do what he approves. This passage raises three questions which must briefly be answered.

(1) Sin as a power.—For St. Paul here as throughout chapters 5. 6. 7 sin is personified as distinct from the animal appetites, the physical impulses, and even the human will itself as dwelling in men and bringing men into bondage. It enters into the heart (7^{17, 20}), works on man, using the Law itself for its ends (vv. 8-11), and enslaves him (6^{6, 17, 20}). In Christ he is freed from sin (vv. 13, 22) and dies to it (vv. 9-11). As freed from and dead to sin, the Christian is not to put his members at the service of sin (v. 13), and must not allow it to reign over him in his body (v. 12). Is this only personification, or does St. Paul regard sin as a personal agent? As a Jew he believed in Satan and a host of evil spirits; and probably, if pressed to explain the power of sin, he would have appealed to this personal agency; but we must not assume that when he thus speaks of sin he is always thinking of Satan. Sin is for him an objective reality without being always identified with Satan (see Sanday-Headlam, ICC, 'Romans,' p. 145 f.). For us the personification is suggestive in so far as we must recognize that in customs, beliefs, rites, institutions, in human society generally, there is an influence for evil that hurtfully affects the individual—what Ritschl has called the Kingdom of sin as opposed to the Kingdom of God. 'The subject of sin, rather, is humanity as the sum of all individuals, in so far as the selfish action of each person, involving him as it does in illimitable interaction with all others, is directed in any degree whatsoever towards the opposite of the good, and leads to the association of individuals in common evil' (Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1900, p. 335).

(2) The flesh as the seat and vehicle of sin.—As there is in this Dictionary a separate article FLESH, the subject cannot here be fully discussed: a summary statement must suffice. The flesh is not identical with the body, animal appetite, or sensuous impulse; it is man's whole nature, in so far as he disowns his dependence on God, opposes his will to God, and resists the influence of the Spirit of God. It is man in the aspect, not merely or creatureliness, but of wilfulness and godlessness. It is as corrupted and perverted by sin that human nature lends itself as a channel to and an instrument of sin as a power dwelling in and ruling over man.

(3) The relation of the Law to sin.—The Law reveals sin, because it shows the opposition between the will of God and the wishes of man (Ro 3^{20, 77}). The Law provokes rather than restrains sin (7^{8, 9}; cf. 1 Co 15⁵⁶): the commandment is like a challenge, which sin at once accepts. This St. Paul represents not only as the human result, but as the Divine intention (Ro 5²⁰, Gal 3¹⁹), in order that a full exposure might be made of what sin in its very nature is (Ro 7¹³), so that men might be made fully aware of their need of deliverance from it (11³²). The Law fails to restrain, because of its inherent impotence (τὸ γὰρ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου, Ro 8³), as letter and not spirit (2 Co 3⁶), as written on tables of stone and not on tables that are hearts of flesh (v. 3; cf. Jer 31³³). Thus sin as a power, finding its seat and vehicle in the flesh, not restrained but provoked by the law in the individual, brings a bondage from which the gospel offers deliverance, even as it sets a universal grace of God over against the universal sin of mankind.

(c) The origin of sin.—What explanation can be offered of the fact of the universality of sin? How has man's nature become so corrupted and perverted as to be described by the term 'flesh'? How can sin be represented as a power dwelling in, ruling over, man, and bringing him into bondage? While St. Paul does not in Ro 5^{12, 21} formally offer this explanation, the passage being introduced into the argument for another purpose—to prove the greater efficacy of grace than of sin, by as much as Christ is greater than Adam—yet, as he is there dealing with his view of the introduction of sin into the world, we must regard that passage as his explanation both of sin as a power in humanity and of the flesh; for it is not likely that he would leave sin in the race and sin in the individual unconnected. In the art. FALL the subject has already been discussed; here only the considerations bearing immediately on the subject of sin need be mentioned. The relation of the race to Adam may be conceived as two-fold: (1) a participation in guilt; (2) an inheritance of a sinful disposition.

(1) Participation in guilt.—St. Paul teaches that all men are involved in the penalty of Adam's transgression, for 'death passed unto all men' (v. 12), but he does not teach that all men are held guilty of Adam's transgression; for (a) by a surprising change of construction and discontinuity of thought he affirms as the reason for the universality of death the actual transgression of all men 'for that all sinned,' and (b) he guards himself against the charge of imputing guilt when there is no conscious and voluntary transgression, by affirming that 'sin is not imputed when there is no law' (v. 13).

As regards (a), the clause ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἡμαρτον cannot mean that all sinned in Adam ('omnes peccarunt, Adamo peccante,' Bengel), either as the physical source or as the moral representative of the race; for ἐφ' ᾧ most probably means 'because.'

As regards (b), while St. Paul affirms that guilt is not ascribed unless there is transgression of law, as in the case of Adam, yet he asserts that nevertheless the same penalty falls on all. For him, therefore, penalty may be racial, while guilt must be personal. This statement, however, is qualified by his declaration in chs. 1 and 2 of the responsibility of the Gentiles as having an inward law. Did he really think of any period or nation as having had in this sense no law?

(2) Inheritance of a sinful disposition.—Unless the analogy with Christ is incomplete, there must be, however, some connexion between Adam's transgression and the actual sin of all mankind. How does St. Paul conceive that connexion? It has usually been taken for granted that he teaches that by Adam's transgression human nature was itself infected, and that from him there descends to all men a sinful disposition. But he might mean no more than that sin as an alien power found entrance into the race, and brought each individual under its dominion. He may regard social rather than physical heredity (to apply a modern distinction) as the channel of the transmission and diffusion of sin. In view, however, of his teaching about the 'flesh,' it is more probable that he did regard human nature as corrupted and perverted; and, in the absence of any other explanation, we seem warranted in assuming that he did connect this fact with the Fall. We must beware, however, of ascribing to him such definite doctrines as those of 'original sin' and 'total depravity'; for later thought has probably read into his words more than was clearly present to his own mind.

It cannot be shown that St. Paul regarded all men as involved in Adam's guilt, either because of their physical descent from him or of any federal relation to him, even although all men are subject to the penalty of death. He does not explain how there is liability to the penalty without culpability for the offence; but he does regard mankind as guilty in the first sense, and not guilty (except by personal transgression) in the second sense. Later theology blurred this distinction in teaching 'original sin' in both senses. Nor is there any ground for holding that he ascribed to Adam that moral endowment which this theology assigned to him. He does not, as is sometimes maintained, represent Adam himself as subject to the flesh in the same way as are his descendants; for 1 Co 15⁴ contrasts not the unfallen Adam with the pre-existent Christ, but the fallen Adam with the Risen Christ; but he does emphasize the voluntary character of Adam's act: it was disobedience (Ro 5¹⁹). Could he have assigned to it the moral significance he does, had he thought of Adam as in the hopeless and helpless bondage described in 2²³? This passage, however, represents that bondage not as directly inherited, but as resulting in the individual from a moral development, in which sin uses the flesh to bring it about. Thus he does not teach total depravity as an inheritance.

(d) The penalty of sin.—St. Paul undoubtedly teaches that death is the penalty of sin (Ro 5¹²). While he includes physical dissolution, death means more for him (6¹⁻²³); it has a moral and religious content; it is judgment and doom; it is invested with dread and darkness by man's sense of sin (1 Co 15⁵⁶). While we cannot in the light of our modern knowledge regard physical dissolution, as St. Paul regarded it, as the penalty of sin (for it appears to us a natural necessity), yet, viewing death in its totality, as he did, we may still maintain that it is sin that gives it the character of an evil to be dreaded. The connexion between death and sin, St. Paul affirms, is not that of effect and cause, but of penalty and transgression (Ro 5¹⁴), or wages and work (6²³); for he thinks not of a natural sequence, but of a deserved sentence (2⁵). He approaches our modes of thought more closely, however, in the analogy of sowing and reaping (Gal 6³; cf. Ja 1¹⁵).

(e) The deliverance from sin.—This is for St. Paul two-fold: it is an annulling of the guilt and removal of the penalty of sin, as well as a destruction of the power of sin. Sin is an act of disobedience (Ro 5¹⁹), committed against God (1¹) and His Law (3²⁰ 77), which involves personal responsibility (1²⁰), ill desert (13⁻), and the Divine condemnation (5¹⁶⁻¹⁸). This condemnation is expressed in the penalty of death, which is not, as we have just seen, a natural consequence, but a Divine appointment, an expression of God's wrath against sin (Ro 1¹⁸, Eph 5⁶, Col 3⁶). The work of Christ as an act of obedience (Ro 5¹⁹) reversed this condemnation (8¹), and reconciled men with God (5¹⁰, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²⁰). We shall miss what is central for St. Paul if we ignore this objective atonement of Christ for the race, and confine our regard, as we tend to-day to do, to the subjective influence of Christ in destroying sin's power in the individual.

That inward change St. Paul describes as dying to sin, being buried with Christ through baptism into death, a crucifixion or dying with Christ, a resurrection and living with Christ (Ro 6¹⁻¹¹, Eph 2¹⁻¹⁰). By this he does not mean insensibility to temptation, or cessation from struggle, but a deliverance from the impotence felt in bondage to sin, and a confidence of victory through Christ. Nor does he mean a process completed in man by Divine power apart from his effort; for believers are to reckon themselves to be not only dead unto sin, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus. But they are not to let sin reign in their mortal selves, nor are they to present their members unto sin (Ro 6¹¹⁻¹³); and they are to mortify by the spirit the deeds of the body (8¹³; cf. Col 3⁵). Thus St. Paul knows from his own personal experience a complete remedy for the universal fatal disease of sin; and all that in his letters he presents regarding this subject is presented that he may commend the gospel to men, as the sole, sufficient, Divine provision for the universal dominant human necessity.

2. St. John's teaching.—(a) In the Fourth Gospel sin is primarily represented as unbelief, the rejection of Christ (1¹¹ 16⁹), aggravated by the pretension of knowledge (9⁴¹). As Christ is one with God, this involves hatred of the Father (15²⁴). The choice reveals the real disposition (3¹⁹⁻²¹), and so justly incurs judgment. Sin is a slavery (8³⁴). One notable contribution to the doctrine of sin is the denial of the invariable connexion of sin and suffering (9²), although it is not denied (5¹⁴) that often there is a connexion.

In the First Epistle sin is described as lawlessness (3⁴, avoula) and unrighteousness (5¹⁷, adikia); and, as love is the supreme commandment, hatred is especially condemned (3¹²). Further, as righteousness is identified with truth, sin is equivalent to falsehood (2²² 4²⁰); but this is not an intellectualist view, as truth has a moral and spiritual content; it is the Divine reality revealed to men in Christ. On the one hand, Christ is Himself sinless, and was manifested to take away sins and to destroy the works of the Devil (3⁸⁻⁹); and, on the other hand, believers by abiding in Him are kept from sin (v. 9), because the Evil One cannot touch them (5¹⁸).

Hence arises what has been called the paradox of the Epistle. On the one hand, the reality of the sinfulness even of believers is insisted on; to deny sinfulness is self-deception, and even charging God with falsehood (1⁸⁻¹⁰), and confession is the condition of forgiveness and cleansing (v. 9). On the other hand, the impossibility of believers sinning is asserted; whoever abides in Christ cannot sin (3⁹), the begotten of God cannot sin (v. 9), because kept by Christ and untouched by the Evil One (5¹⁸). The explanation is that each of these declarations is directed against a different form of error. Of the first declaration Westcott says: 'St. John therefore considers the three false views which man is tempted to take of his position. He may deny the reality of sin (6, 7), or his responsibility for sin (8, 9), or the fact of sin in his own case (10). By doing this he makes fellowship with God, as He has been made known, impossible for himself. On the other hand, God has made provision for the realisation of fellowship between Himself and man in spite of sin' (The Epistles of St. John, 1883, p. 17). Regarding the second declaration, he offers this explanation: 'True fellowship with Christ, Who is absolutely sinless, is necessarily inconsistent with sin; and, yet further, the practice of sin excludes the reality of a professed knowledge of Christ' (ib., p. 101). What the Apostle is referring to is not single acts of sin, due to human weakness, but the deliberate continuance in sin on the assumption that the relation to God is not, and cannot be, affected thereby. The one class of errorists denied the actuality of sin, the other declared that even the habit of sin did not deprive the believer of the blessings of the Christian salvation.

(b) Another contribution to the doctrine may be found in the conception of a sin unto death (5¹⁶), for which intercession is not forbidden, and yet cannot be urged. The reference is not to any particular act, but rather to any act of such a character as to separate the soul from Christ and the salvation in Him. It may be compared to the sin against the Holy Ghost (Mk 3²⁹) and also to the sin of apostasy (He 6⁴⁻⁶ 10²⁶).

(c) It must be noticed that in this Epistle there is a very marked emphasis on Satan as the source of man's sin. The Devil has sinned from the beginning, and he that sinneth is of the Devil (3⁸), and the whole world lieth in the Evil One (5¹⁹; cf. Jn 8⁴⁴, where the Devil is described as a murderer and a liar).

3. St. James's teaching.—(a) St. James offers us, as does St. Paul, although much more briefly, a psychological account of the development of sin in the individual. Having asserted the blessedness of enduring temptation, he denies that God does or can tempt (1¹²⁻¹³). Temptation arises when a man is drawn away and enticed by his desire (ἐπιθυμία). This desire need not itself be evil, but it acquires a sinful character when indulged in opposition to the higher law of duty. This desire has sin as its offspring, and this sin full grown is in turn the parent of death (vv. 14, 15). This natural analogy, with which may be compared St. Paul's figure of sowing and reaping (Gal 6³), does not, in suggesting a necessary sequence of desire, sin, and death, exclude either man's free will in consenting to the desire or God's free will in decreeing death as the penalty of sin. Nor does the passage teach that every sin must issue in death. The sin must reach its full development before death is its result. We can also here compare 1 Jn 5¹⁸, 'a sin unto death.' As St. James teaches the possibility of conversion (5¹⁹⁻²⁰) and enjoins the confession of sin and mutual intercession for forgiveness (v. 16), this development from sin unto death may be arrested by Divine grace. The sequence is a possibility, not a necessity.

(b) What appears at first sight an echo of Rabbinic teaching in 2¹⁰, that stumbling in one point makes a man guilty of all the law, proves on closer scrutiny entirely Christian. The law is not the Mosaic Law, but 'the perfect law,' 'the law of liberty' (1²⁵), and the 'royal law' is, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (2⁸); and assuredly the respect of persons condemned is entirely inconsistent with that law. Stumbling in such a point is a violation of the principle of the law. As has often been pointed out, Jewish as St. James is, no other NT writer has so completely assimilated the teaching of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount; and it is from the inwardness of Jesus' standpoint, and not the externality of Rabbinism, that such a saying is to be judged.

(c) In one respect St. James does not, however, closely follow the teaching of Jesus. He assumes the probability of a connexion between sickness and sin (5¹⁵), and enjoins not only prayer and anointing with oil in the name of the Lord for the healing of the disease, but also personal confession and mutual intercession for the forgiveness of the sin (vv. 14-16). For sin involves Divine judgment (4¹² 5⁹⁻¹²). There is a friendship with the world which is enmity against God (4⁴). As for the other NT writers, there is in the background of St. James's thought about sin the belief in Satan and demons (3¹⁵).

4. Teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews.—

(a) The standpoint of Hebrews must be understood if the teaching on sin is to be understood. The Epistle is primarily concerned with man's access to God, and sin, as guilt involving God's judgment, bars man's approach.

In the New Covenant there is no more conscience of sins, for the worshippers have been once cleansed, as they could not be by the sacrifices of the Law (10¹⁻²). While the Law failed to take away sins (v. 11), and could not, as touching the conscience, make the worshippers perfect (9⁹), the blood of Jesus, the new and living Way, gives boldness to enter the holy place of fellowship with God (10²⁰), 'having obtained for us eternal redemption' (9¹²). On account of this sacrifice offered once for all, there is remission of sins (10¹⁸) and believers are sanctified (not in the sense of being made holy, but as set apart for God's service, 10¹⁰). This guilt, which Christ by His atonement removes as all the propitiatory rites of the Old Covenant had failed to do, involves man in the fear of death with consequent bondage (2¹⁵) and an evil conscience (10²²), by which is meant the sense of guilt. The writer is thus concerned not with the subjective aspect of sin as individual bondage to the power of sin, as is St. Paul in Ro 7⁷⁻²⁵, but with the objective aspect of God's judgment on sin, and the echo of that judgment in man's sense of guilt and fear of death.

(b) The sin which he especially warns against is the rejection of this Divine provision for the removal of sin in Christ. 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' (2³). There are two passages of very solemn warning, of even terrible severity (6⁴⁻⁶ 10²⁸⁻²⁹). Those who have been guilty of apostasy, having yielded to 'an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God' (3¹), cannot be renewed 'unto repentance,' as they have crucified 'to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame' (6⁶): for them 'there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgement,' because they have 'trodden under foot the Son of God, and have counted the blood of the covenant . . . an unholy thing, and have done despite unto the Spirit of grace' (10²⁸⁻²⁹). G. B. Stevens' interpretation of the two passages may be added: 'If a man deliberately and wilfully deserts Christ, he will find no other Saviour; there remains no sacrifice for sins (x. 26) except that which Christ has made. The Old Testament offerings are powerless to save; one who refuses to be saved by Christ refuses to be saved at all. For him who turns away from Christ and determines to seek salvation elsewhere, there can be only disappointment and failure. While such an attitude of refusal and contempt lasts, there is no possibility of recovery for those who assume it. But this impossibility is not an absolute but a relative one; it is an impossibility which lies within the limits of the supposition made in the context, namely, that of a renunciation of Christ. Nothing is said against the possibility of recovery to God's favor whenever one ceases from such a contempt of Christ and returns to him as the one only Saviour' (The Theology of the NT, Edinburgh, 1899, pp. 521-522).

(c) Unlike St. James, the author of this Epistle does not connect suffering with sin as its penalty, but urges his readers to regard their afflictions as fatherly chastisement (12⁵⁻¹³), for Christ Himself was perfected by suffering (vv. 1-3; cf. 2¹⁰ 4¹⁵).

5. St. Peter's teaching.—There is nothing distinctive about the teaching of St. Peter in the First Epistle. He warns his readers, 'as sojourners and pilgrims, to abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul' (2¹¹). He describes the Christian redemption as from the 'vain manner of life handed down from your fathers' (1¹⁸). Christ's atonement for sin by substitution is distinctly taught: 'he bare our sins in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness' (2⁴); and he 'suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (3¹⁸). In sin he sees a personal agency, 'Your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour' (5⁸).

In the Second Epistle (and also in Jude) the demonology is still more pronounced. The rebellion in heaven against God, and the expulsion of the rebels to hell (2 P 2⁴, Jude 6)—this is the ultimate cause of the sin in the world, on which the Divine judgment by fire will fall (2 P 3⁷⁻¹¹).

6. Apocalyptic teaching.—A vivid anticipation of this last judgment pervades the Revelation (6¹⁰ 15¹ 20¹²): God will at last triumph over sin. But into the detailed account of that victory it is not necessary here to enter, as it belongs to eschatology (q.v.).

Summary.—It will be useful, having thus passed the different apostolic writers in review, to attempt a more systematic statement of the apostolic teaching. In the background there is the Jewish demonology and eschatology, although it would be a mistake so to emphasize the personal agency of Satan as to give the impression that sin was always thought of in this connexion. St. Paul distinctly personifies sin as a power; and we must recognize this personification as a characteristic feature of his teaching. In accordance with Jewish belief also, the entrance of sin and its penalty death into the race is connected with the Fall of Adam. A morally defective nature is not ascribed to Adam; and such moral freedom and responsibility are assigned to him as make his transgression an act of disobedience deserving punishment. The whole race is subject to the penalty of death; but it is not taught that the guilt of his sin is imputed as personal culpability to his descendants, for the sin of all is affirmed, and imputation of sin, where there is no law, is denied. The assumption that, when there is no outward law, there is an inward, however, deprives the latter statement of its significance. While St. Paul does thus connect the death of all with the sin of all, it would be quite in accord with Jewish thought if he regarded all men as guilty in the sense of liable to the penalty of death, while not guilty as personally culpable for voluntary transgression of known law. It is very probable, if not altogether certain, that he did connect the perversion and corruption of human nature, which he indicates in the use of the term 'flesh,' with the sin of Adam by physical heredity; for it is not likely that he left this fact unexplained, or had another explanation of it than that which he gives of the introduction of sin. While the use of the term 'flesh' in this special sense is peculiar to St. Paul, St. James indicates that the desires of man often issue in sin. All the apostolic writings agree in recognizing the universality of human sinfulness, although St. Paul alone gives a proof of it. The possibility of the process of sin going so far that no recovery is possible is recognized by St. John in his reference to the sin unto death, and by the Epistle to the Hebrews in its warnings against apostasy. The Law fails to restrain, it even provokes, sin; and the gospel alone offers an effective deliverance from sin. The worst sin is the unbelief that rejects the sole means of salvation from sin. For all sin there is judgment; but the severest judgment falls on the neglect of the offered salvation. In Christ there is both the forgiveness of sin and the victory over the power of sin. While actually the conflict with sin still continues in the believer, ideally, according to St. Paul, he is dead to sin as crucified with Christ, or, according to St. John, he cannot sin, for he is kept by Christ. While the Epistle to the Hebrews specially emphasizes the objective aspect of sin as guilt rather than the subjective aspect as weakness, in the NT generally the need of atonement for the guilt is probably even more insisted on than the need of deliverance from weakness. The doctrine of sin is everywhere presented, not for its own sake, but as the dark background on which shines the more brightly the glory of the gospel of the grace of God.

While we cannot subject Christian faith to-day to Jewish eschatology, demonology, psychology, or anthropology, even on the authority of a Christian apostle, and while the apostolic doctrine must in these respects at least be modified for our thought, yet, as it rests on a real moral and religious experience, such truths as the universality of sinfulness in the race, the reality of the moral bondage of the individual, the certainty of future judgment on persistent transgression, the necessity of forgiveness and deliverance, the sufficiency of the grace of God for salvation, will find confirmation from the moral conscience and the religious consciousness wherever there has been the obedience of faith to the Divine revelation and human redemption in Christ Jesus. To most modern thought the apostolic emphasis on these truths seems disproportionate and exaggerated; but, whatever difference of terms and even of ideas there may have been between the disciples and the Master, they did not take sin more seriously than did He who gave His life a ransom for many, and who in His own blood instituted the New Covenant unto the remission of sins.

A. E. GARVIE.

SINAI.—The peninsula between the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Akabah; also one of the high peaks there. The peninsula is usually called in Scripture 'the desert (or wilderness) of Sinai.' St. Stephen (Ac 7³⁰) recalls how an angel of the Lord appeared to Moses 'in the wilderness of mount Sinai, in a flame of fire in a bush.' Mount Sinai was a sacred mountain from very early times, being possibly connected with the worship of the Babylonian moon-god Sin. In the Jewish tradition it was sacred to Jahweh, and was memorable as the place where God gave to Moses the 'lively oracles' (Ac 7³⁸). See, further, MOUNT, MOUNTAIN. For Gal 4²⁴ see HAGAR. J. W. DUNCAN.

SINGING.—See PRAISE.

SIRACH.—Sirach (Σειραχ or Σιραχ) is the Greek form of the name which in Syriac and post-biblical Hebrew is written סרַח, and resembles in structure סרַח and numerous other names which appear in late Hebrew lists (e.g. Ezr 2), though its etymology is obscure. The Greek transliteration has been compared to 'Ακελδαμάχ for סרַח in Ac 1¹⁹, and appears to be an attempt to render a sound sometimes called the glottal catch.

1. Author.—The person who bore this name was the father of a Jesus, author of a Hebrew work of which the original is lost, but which is preserved in a Greek translation called Σοφία Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σεραχ, a Syriac translation called The Words of Jesus son of Simon called son of Asira (i.e. the Captive), and a Latin translation called Ecclesiasticus Iesu filii Sirach. In the Jewish oral tradition it is cited as The Book of Ben-Sira, whereas according to Jerome it was called Proverbs. The Latin name is explained by the Latin Father Rufinus as a 'non-canonical book suited for churches'; but this is very probably a conjecture, and the suggestion in the mediæval chronicle called סדר גזל (A. Neubauer, Mediæval Jewish Chronicles, Oxford, 1887-95, i. 167) that the title was a Latin one derived from Ecclesiastes, i.e. 'Book in the style of Ecclesiastes,' is attractive. The Hebrew original doubtless perished when the rest of the non-canonical literature in that language was destroyed; and such specimens as are preserved in the collections of oral tradition are exceedingly inaccurate, inconsistent, and mixed up with biblical and other matter, while at times sayings of Ben-Sira are ascribed to other Rabbis. In some cases the gradual merging of a saying of his in some biblical text can be followed in different collections of tradition. From this source, then, nothing certain can be learned about him or his book.

In the colophon (50²⁷) some Greek MSS give the grandfather's name as Eleazar, and, as has been seen, the Syriac gives the father's as Simon, supposing Asira to be an Aramaic sobriquet. The last seems improbable, since we should have expected the Hebrew form to be ben-ha-Asir; but the word may have been a sobriquet, and the other statements may be correct.

To the Greek translation there is prefixed a preface of great interest, said to be the only known honest paragraph by any Israelite of this period, in which the translator states that the original was by his grandfather, a diligent student of the Law, the Prophets, and the other national books (a phrase which represents the Rabbinical TNK, i.e. Law, Prophets, Writings, as a name for the OT), and that he himself had come to Alexandria in the year 38 under King Euergetes, and studied there for a long time. He implies further that the whole OT already existed in Greek. Though the chronological expression is not perfectly clear, it seems probable that it should be interpreted as the year 38 of Euergetes II., which synchronizes with 132 B.C. The author in the Greek translation calls himself in the colophon (50²⁷) 'of Jerusalem,' according to some MSS 'a priest of Jerusalem'; and the list of eminent Israelites with which the book closes ends with an encomium on the high priest Simon son of Onias ('Nathania' of the Syriac is a corruption to be explained from the Syriac script). If this personage is to be identified with the Simon the Just of Josephus, his period of office appears to have been from 300 to 287 B.C., and the words of Ben-Sira imply, though they do not distinctly state, that he had seen this Simon officiate. Various ways have been devised of reconciling the dates of the original and the translation, which according to this would be separated by about 150 years, though the translator was the grandson of the author; probably the solution is to be found in the great uncertainty which attaches to the list of the high priests, as may be seen from the works of those who have endeavoured to restore it (e.g. L. Herzfeld, *Geschichte des Volkes Israel*², 2 vols., Leipzig, 1863, ii. Excursus 6). It is clear that Ben-Sira is pre-Maccabean; his floruit is probably to be placed near the end of the 3rd or the beginning of the 2nd pre-Christian century. The appendix to his work (ch. 51), which has the heading 'A Prayer of Jesus the son of Sirach,' contains some biographical details, but they are too vague and obscurely worded to convey much information. He claims to have travelled, and this may also be inferred from his praise of travel (31¹⁰⁻¹²), and in both passages he asserts that he had many times been in great danger; in the Prayer he specifies an occasion when he had been falsely accused before a king. Neither this nor the other perils which he enumerates are anywhere explained in detail. Since in 43²⁴ he quotes hearsay for the dangers of the sea, we should infer that he had not himself crossed it; it is noticeable that he gives the correct seasons for the overflow of the rivers Jordan, Tigris, and Nile (24²³⁻²⁵), and, though the first of these may have been got from Jos 3¹⁵, the others could scarcely have been learned from the Bible. If (as seems likely) the account of the scribe in ch. 39 is autobiographical, he must at some time have obtained employment at a Court.

The century in which he lived is one of the most obscure in Israelitic history; hence it is not possible to interpret any political allusions with certainty. Some have endeavoured to find a political programme in 45^{24, 25}, where the author insists that the high-priesthood belongs for ever to the house of Aaron, but the royal title to the house of David. The true explanation seems to be that he is projecting himself into the period of national independence for the restoration of which he prays, and indeed Jewish authors of a much later period do the same; in the Tanna d'Be Eliahu of about the 10th cent. A.D. (ed. Warsaw, 1893, p. 563), the 'crown of the house of Aaron and the crown of the house of David' are still said to be inalienable.

2. Sources.—The translator mentions the author's biblical studies, and in 24^{28, 29} the latter confesses that his book is a biblical anthology, though in 39¹⁻³ his enumeration of what the scribe should study seems to be rather too copious to be confined to the OT as we know it. Besides the Law, he is to study the wisdom of all the ancients, prophecies, the dicta of renowned men, strophes, mysteries, and enigmas. From his list of famous men we should gather that his Bible contained no book that, or at any rate no author who, has since been lost, and in the main the Torah (in the wider sense) which he possessed was identical with ours. Thus he utilizes the whole of Isaiah, all five books of Psalms, Job, Ecclesiastes, and every division of the Proverbs. He fails, indeed, to mention Daniel and Ezra in his list of famous men, and this silence is often used as a strong argument against the genuineness of both; nevertheless he appears to quote Daniel in 33²⁶, καὶ ἡλλοίωσε καιροὺς καὶ εορτάς, from Dn 2²¹, ἀλλοιοὶ καιροὺς καὶ χρόνους (perhaps εἰργασίαι), and the name for the Deity, ὁ ζῶν ἐς τὸν αἰῶνα (18¹), is found in the OT only in Dn 12⁷. The phrase ἐλθοντες ἐν κατοικίᾳ αὐτῶν (44^{6b}) is from Dn 4¹. 40^{29c}, ἀλίσγησει τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ ἐν ἐδέσμασι ἀλλοτρίοις, is probably an allusion to Dn 1⁸. Further, the passage 39^{13, 14}, in which the 'holy sons' are addressed and bidden 'bless the Lord for all his works,' is very like a reference to the hymn of the 'three holy children' inserted in the Greek Daniel 3⁵². For it is not clear who else the 'holy sons' can be, and the words addressed to them, 'thrive as a rose growing on a water-brook,' are easily interpreted from Dn 1¹⁵. It does not appear possible to demonstrate acquaintance on Ben-Sira's part with Chronicles or Esther; on the other hand, it cannot be shown that he was unacquainted with them.

Besides the OT, Ben-Sira displays very considerable acquaintance with Greek literature, though he nowhere confesses this, or even makes the study of Greek a necessary part of the equipment of the 'scribe.' Homer's comparison of the race of men to leaves (Il. vi. 146-149) is fairly closely paraphrased in 14¹⁸. There is a reference to an Æsopic fable in 13². Many thoughts are borrowed from the works of Aristotle: the sleeplessness of the stars (43¹⁰) from de Cælo, 284 A 32; the changeableness of the fool (27¹¹) from Eudemian Ethics, 1239 B 12; the comparison of a friend to wine (9¹⁰) from ib. 1238 A 23; abuse preceding battle (22²²) from Metaphys. 1013 A 9; the enmity between the hyena and the dog (13¹⁸) from Nat. Hist. 594 B 3; the decoy partridge (11²⁰) from ib. 614 A 13; the pleasing effect of green vegetation on the eye (40²²) from Problems, 959 A 25; the description of a friend as 'one whose soul is like thine' (37^{12a}) from Great Ethics, 1211 A 32; the affection between animals of the same species (13¹⁴) from Problems, 896 B 10. The use of Plato is far less considerable; still the author appears in 43⁸ to adopt from Cratylus 409 C Plato's derivation of the word 'month,' μῆς or μήν, from μεινσθαι, 'to diminish' or 'wane' of the moon—a derivation which naturally applies to the Greek, not to the Hebrew, name of the month; and the puzzle in 6²², 'wisdom is according to her name and is not manifest to many,' appears to be a misunderstanding of the passage in the Cratylus (412 B) where the etymology of σοφία is given, and is said to be σκοτωδέστρον, 'somewhat obscure,' with reference not to wisdom, but to the etymology which he suggests. (The coincidence of some precepts with those to be found in the Story of Ahikar is to be explained by borrowing on the part of the latter from Ben-Sira, the Aramaic papyrus of Ahikar published by Sachau being a glaring forgery.)

One or two additional cases of borrowing from Greek literature will be noticed below; there is of course some danger of discerning a loan where there is only a coincidence. Hence the saying (20³³), 'A slip off the ground rather than from the tongue,' need have no connexion with that ascribed to the Stoic Zeno (Diog. Laert. vii. 22), 'It is better to slip with the feet than with the tongue,' just as al-Muhallab may have been independent of both when he pointed out (A.H. 83=A.D. 702) that 'a man may slip with his foot and recover; but if he slips with his tongue, he will perish' (Ibn Khaldun, iii. 53). Where, however, an author acknowledges to composing an anthology and insists on the importance of learning by heart what wise men have said, the chances of borrowing on his part where there is close correspondence in thought and expression are very great. We shall probably be right, then, in supposing Ben-Sira to have got from the Greeks the maxim (11²³), 'Call no man happy before his end.' For this saying is definitely associated by the Hellenes with the name of Solon (Herod. i. 86; Aristotle, Nic. Ethics, 1100 A 11), though it is constantly quoted as a proverb.

The fact that Ben-Sira had before him no Hebrew or national literature which has not been preserved is of great interest; and, as has been seen, with his grandson the biblical books were classified as they are still. In the book itself certain other names appear. Thus a portion of the prophecies is called the Remonstrances (48¹⁰), of which we recognize the original in מִנְחָה similarly used in Jerus. Peah, ii. 4. Enigmas and Parables is the title taken by Ps 78, to which there is a reference in 39²⁶. The Bible as a whole is identified with Wisdom in 24²¹⁻²², and v. 23 implies that it had already undergone several generations of expounders. The attitude of Jewish writers to their Bible has so often been dictated by that of their neighbours to their own sacred books that we may be justified in finding here the traces of the Hellenic estimate of the Homeric poems, to which the Greek translator makes a veiled allusion in the phrase 'narrating epics in writing' (44²⁶).

3. Poetical form.—To any one who compares the lines of Ben-Sira with the corresponding passages of the OT it is apparent that the latter have been subjected to Procrustean treatment; thus Gn 17³, 'a father of many nations have I made thee,' becomes in Sir 44¹⁹, 'Abraham was a great father of many people'; but for Gn 22¹², 'in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed,' Sir 45^{21b} substitutes, 'that nations should be blessed in his seed.' Sometimes the order of the phrases is inverted; so Ec 3¹⁴, 'nothing can be added to it nor anything taken from it,' becomes in Sir 18⁶, 'there may be nothing taken from them, neither may anything be added to them.' Sometimes the verse reproduced undergoes so much inversion and padding that the sense is seriously injured, e.g. Job 8¹² in Sir 40¹⁶. Since in the first passages cited the author has altered a Divine etymology by the introduction of a monosyllable נ and seriously reduced a Divine promise by the omission of another monosyllable נ, it is evident that single syllables are of importance to him, i.e. that his Procrustean methods are due to his employment of a syllabic metre to which he accommodates the biblical material. That he should do this is very natural, since, as has been seen, he displays considerable acquaintance with Greek literature; and from the nearly contemporary Panulus of Plautus we find that the kindred Phœnician dialect was being accommodated to Greek syllabic metres. The metrical scheme is supplied by the correct re-translation of any two or three of the lines, and, where they are taken directly from the OT, this is easy; and this scheme is a trimeter of the rhythm called in Greek and Latin Bacchiac, in Arabic and Persian mutaqarib, of which the basis is a foot of the form $\cup \text{ } \text{I} \text{ } \cup$. In Persian this rhythm is very popular, the whole of the great classic Shah-namen being composed in it; the Hebrew variety (except in the substitution of three feet as the line-unit for four) resembles the Latin variety used by Plautus, e.g. 'multas res simitu in meo corde vorso.' Where the lines do not correspond with this scheme, there is some fault either in the tradition or in the re-translation. Thus 27¹¹, δειγῆσις εἰσεβοῖς δια παντος σοφία, when re-translated is one syllable short: but the Latin version which offers 'sicut sol' indicates that נחמ is corrupt for נחמ, which gives the ninth syllable required, and furnishes a correct antithesis to the changeableness which in clause b is compared to that of the moon. Where the lines contain lists, the fact that they are padded in order to obtain a metrical scheme is sometimes very obvious. So in the list 40⁹, θάνατος καὶ αἷμα καὶ ἔρις καὶ πομφαλά, ἐκαγὼγαί, λυβός, καὶ σύντριμμα καὶ μάστιξ, Fritzsche ejected ἐκαγὼγαί, 'utpote explicationis causa adsumtum.' It seems unnecessary for the sense, but the two syllables which it represents (נחמ) are very necessary for the metre.

The re-translation, if ever satisfactorily accomplished, will be of importance for the study of Hebrew grammar, which at present depends on a tradition codified some 1000 years later. For it will be found that, when the consonants are restored, the metre settles the vocalization (to a certain extent) as in 33³, ἐγκαίριστος σφεῖρα καὶ ἀλλοῦσσαν θαυμάσια, נחמ נחמ נחמ נחמ, where the metre and the sense both require that נחמ should be read ushneh, not u'shanneh ('and repeat,' not 'and alter').

4. Language.—The language employed by the author was from the nature of the case mainly that of the OT, of which his book is so largely a metrical cento; but here and there the traces of a later development of Hebrew, such as we find in the Mishna, can be discovered; and indeed the fragments preserved by the Oral Tradition exhibit a considerable amount of this. No confidence can indeed be placed in the accuracy of these; it is, however, of some interest that the transmitters of that tradition thought of his language as Rabbinic. One interesting technicality, הלכה, 'rules of conduct,' which clearly underlies τοπειαι in 14² occurs in an obelized passage; but comparison of Greek and Syriac seems to reveal נחמ for 'to beg' in 40^{25b}, and נחמ for 'shamefast' in 41¹⁴; while in 37^{1b} the sentence rendered 'there is a friend, which is only a friend in name' meant 'which is really a friend,' the usage which is here hidden being that of the later Hebrew, where 'to be named' means 'to be in reality' (e.g. Bab. Gittin, 47a). The use of late or Aramaic words seems at times to have been dictated by metrical reasons; so in 8¹⁰ נחמ can be restored with certainty for 'coals,' and it would seem that this word was employed because נחמ contained a syllable too many. The Greek word ἀγῶγος may have been employed in 48^{17b}, but this seems to be isolated.

5. Subject.—The subject of the work belongs to what is called in Arabic Adab, sometimes rendered

'Miscellanies'; it is didactic, devotionnal, and to a slight extent historical. The last portion is clearly marked off from the rest and occupies the final chapters 44-50, being a record of the great men mentioned in the OT, to whom the high priest Simon is added; it is preceded by a description of the wonders of Nature occupying ch. 42 from v.¹⁵ and ch. 43. The matter which precedes seems to fall into two books, each of which starts with a hymn to Wisdom (chis. 1-23 and 24-42¹⁴).

Since the aphorisms are very largely counsels of prudence, rules of conduct and behaviour, or observations on 'things in general,' even where they are not reproductions of OT verses, they contain little that is original or distinctive; man in all known societies has developed largely the same characteristics, which therefore have been noticed by observers in very different countries and periods. The interest of the work consists largely in the differences which it exhibits from the OT on the one hand and the later Jewish literature on the other. The former are largely due to the influence of Greek culture, which in the OT itself appears only in the Book of Ecclesiastes. It has been observed that in our time contact of Orientals with the West leads either to contempt on the part of the former for their own civilization or to exaggerated appreciation of it; Ben-Sira's case seems to resemble the latter. He places the home of Wisdom in Jerusalem (24¹¹), and ignores all celebrities save biblical heroes in his list of statesmen, authors, and musical composers (44¹⁻⁶). Nevertheless his debt to Greek authors is, as has been seen, considerable; and though in one place he ridicules sacrifices to idols (30¹⁹), which he compares with the practice of offering meats to the dead, his book is on the whole singularly free from that invective against foreign cults which reaches its climax in Isaiah and the Wisdom of Solomon, and made the Jews, in the words of Pliny, notorious for their contempt of the gods. Of the sacrifices enjoined by his own religion he can only say that they should be offered because the law enjoins them (32⁵). His theory of life (14¹¹⁻¹⁶) reproduces that of Heracles in the Alkestis of Euripides (770-802): since man has only one life, and death may come at any time, he had best enjoy himself while he has the chance. If this is slightly modified or explained away in what follows, in the demonstration that the pursuit of wisdom is the happiest form of existence, the Greek hedonistic schools were prepared to accept this gloss, or rather provided it themselves. Quite in Hellenic style he dilates on the delights of a symposium, where there is good wine and choice music (34²⁵⁻³⁵), and, parodying the words of Mimnermus, who declared that life would not be worth having without love (T. Bergk, Lyrici Graeci, Leipzig, 1882, ii. 25), asserts that it would not be worth having without wine (34²⁷). He is, however, by no means inclined to disparage female beauty, as appears from 26¹³⁻¹⁸. Comparison of this passage with Pr 31¹⁰⁻³¹, on which it is partly modelled, indicates very clearly the influence of the beauty-cult of the Hellenes on the Israelitish mind. The precepts on the use of wine display very close correspondence with those of Theognis (Lyrici Graeci, ii. 162-164), from whom they are likely to have been taken.

The influence of Greek thought appears very strongly in the account which he gives of the training necessary for the scribe (38²⁴⁻³⁹¹¹). For this purpose leisure is required; and, although in another context he had recommended industry (10²⁵⁻²⁶) and especially agriculture (7¹⁵⁻²²), he now asserts that these occupations and those of craftsmen and artists, e.g. potters and gem-engravers, are inconsistent with the two which Aristotle in the Politics declares alone suitable for gentlemen, viz. the service of the State and philosophy. The service of the State is expressed in terms of the Athenian Republic, where the governing bodies were the βουλή and the ἐκκλησία, while the δικαστήριον was the judicial authority; it is, however, clear that the δικαστής of whom he is thinking is not the Athenian juror but the judge, or qadi. Although there is not a little in this passage which reminds the reader of Greek treatises on preparation for a political career, e.g. Plato's Alcibiades I., probably it is nearer in many respects to the Islamic discipline called Adab al-Katib, or studies necessary for a Secretary of State. This is doubtless due to the changes introduced into Hellenic life by the fall of the free Republics. Part of the scribe's training is to be got by travelling abroad and entering the service of some ruler (39⁴); but it very largely consists in accumulating books and learning them by heart (vv. 1-3), as was the case in Islamic times.

Another profession to which some attention is devoted for the first time in the literature of the Israelites is the medical (38¹⁻¹⁵), the existence of which has, however, to be defended from passages in Genesis and Exodus. The author expresses himself with great caution, and implies that what the physician can do is to pray for the patient.

As compared with the later Jewish literature, i.e., the Talmudim and Midrashim (of which the general antiquity is certified by the Gospels, though the process of oral tradition through many centuries has introduced great modifications), Ben-Sira's book seems to exhibit few of the same interests. He looks forward to the coming of Elijah (48¹⁰⁻¹¹), on the faith of the prophecy of Malachi; but he knows nothing of a Messiah. He does not even mention the Sabbath or the food-legislation (unless 40²⁰ be a reference to it). His idea of religious obligations consists in offering the prescribed sacrifices and paying the priest his dues, which the Greek text assesses more highly than the Syriac (7²⁹⁻³¹). He thinks of the glyptic art as a normal industry (38²⁷), not as a violation of the Second Commandment. The profound darkness which covers Israelitish affairs in the 3rd cent. B.C. renders this phenomenon difficult to explain. The cases in which the formulæ of the later Halakah and Haggadah are suggested are exceedingly rare. In 37⁴ the πονηρὸν ἐνθυμημα evidently stands for the רע הרה, which was derived from Gn 6⁵, and this faculty may be what is meant by διαβουλίου in 17⁶, where a rather curious list of faculties is given. In v. 17 the theory is stated that every nation has 'a ruler,' i.e. guardian angel, which is worked out in the Midrashim (e.g. Exodus Rabba, 21, 32). In 39²⁸ the 'spirits' are identified with forces whereby God wreaks vengeance on evil-doers; this theme is also worked out in the Midrash (e.g. Genesis Rabba, 10). From his account of a banquet (31¹²⁻³⁷) we should guess that the 'hand-washing' of which we read in the Gospels had not yet been introduced as a religious observance; the only ceremonial washing mentioned is after contact with a corpse (34²⁵). The only trace that has been found of Alexandrian exegesis is in 44¹⁶, where Enoch is said to have been a pattern of repentance to the generations. This is inferred by Philo from the Greek word μετέθηκεν used in Gn 5²⁴ for the Hebrew קָבַץ, 'took' (de Abrahamo, 3), for 'metathesis' signifies change, in this case change of mind. If the verse were genuine, we should have to conclude that the author had studied the OT in the LXX version, and that the interpretation found in Philo was some 200 years earlier than Philo's time. It seems certain that this verse is an interpolation, not only because it is wanting in the Syriac, but chiefly because Enoch is mentioned in the supplementary list of celebrities (49¹⁴), where what happened tohim is interpreted according to the Hebrew. The interpolation, then, is later than the time of Philo, but it seems to have found its way into all the Greek MSS.

6. Place of the work in Jewish literature.—The mode wherein 'the Law' is eulogized in the work makes it clear that the canon in the author's time was so well fixed that the admission of any later work would be extremely difficult; although, then, verses of Ben-Sira are at times cited as from the Hagiographa, it is reasonable to explain this as due to defective memory on the part of the Rabbis who cite them, not to the work ever having been canonical. It is clear that Josephus was either unacquainted with its existence or did not regard it as sufficiently important to deserve notice. It is not actually cited in the NT, but the parable in Lk 12¹⁷⁻²⁰ appears to be an amplification of 11¹⁸⁻¹⁹, which is based on Ec 4⁷⁻⁸; and the doctrine involved in 'forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us' is so clearly stated in 26¹ that we are justified in regarding the latter as the source. Further, the precept against vain repetitions in prayer (Mt 6⁷), whatever the correct rendering of the phrase in the original, is nearer 7^{14b}, 'repeat not a word in thy prayer,' than Ec 5⁷, the source of the latter. It is probable, then, that Ben-Sira's book was at this time used in the education of the young.

The last person known to have possessed the original appears to be R. Eleazar b. Azariah, of the first half of the 2nd century. For 3²⁰⁻¹ are cited on his authority from Ben-Sira in Gen. Rabba 8, where the four hemistichs are increased to six, and Jerus. Hagigah, ii. 1, where they are reduced to four, but interpolated from Job 11⁸; in Bab. Hagigah, 13a they are again reduced to four, but by arbitrary omission of two synonymous clauses. The first of these collections comes nearest to the original as certified by the Greek and Syriac together. Naturally the connexion of R. Eleazar with the citation may be inaccurate, but the fact of its occurrence in two separate collections inspires some confidence. Numerous sayings which approximate more or less closely to verses of the book are to be found in various collections, often wrongly ascribed; thus in Aboth 4, Sir 7¹ is quoted according to the text of the Syriac version, and ascribed to R. Levites, a man of Yabneh. Sir 11²³ is to be found in the Tanna d'Be Eliahu, i. 61, without sign of quotation. An Aramaic form of 12¹ is quoted in Gen. Rabba 22 as a proverb. Some of these resemblances may be coincidences, but in other cases (e.g. 7¹⁷) there can be no doubt that verses of the book have been preserved in a mangled form, with erroneous ascriptions. Since the period wherein they were transmitted orally covered several centuries at the least, they furnish a good example of this mode of transmission, whereby accuracy seems always to be lost. The date when any of these collections ceased to be oral cannot now be determined, since Jewish writers invariably falsify the evidence on this subject; examples will be found in the variants of Yahuda's edition of R. Bachya's Hidayah, Leiden, 1912, pp. 145, 146.

From the discussion in Bab. Sanh. 100b we can infer that the original had been lost by the time of Rab Joseph (4th century). This personage couples it with 'foreign literature,' by the reading of which eternal life is forfeited; and the first passage cited and interpreted quite certainly does not belong to it. It thus appears that the book was already thought of as in the hands of Christians, though originally Jewish. Jerome indeed (about 400) professes to have seen a copy of the original; as he made no use of it for the correction of the Vetus Italica, his statement is liable to suspicion. Jewish writers either know nothing about Ben-Sira or get their information from Christians. Before the book became part of the inheritance left by the Hellenic and Syrian Jews to the Christians, it appears to have received some additions which are found in certain Greek MSS and are obelized in the Hexaplar Syriac. Some of these, e.g. those after 1⁴ and 1⁸, are evidently translated from Hebrew; and the long passage that follows 26¹⁶ in MS 248, which contains most of these additions, seems to be certified as a translation from the Hebrew by the fact of its occurrence in the Syriac. The MS cited and some others occasionally exhibit variants which go back to a Hebrew original, e.g. 37^{26b}, ἐστὶν for ἴσθαι; 25^{2c}, μωρόν for μοχλόν (i.e. יִשְׁרָאֵל); 10¹⁵, where ὑπερηφάνων is added to ἐθνῶν, doubtless an improved rendering of עַמִּי. Since it is certain, nevertheless, that all Greek MSS go back to one copy, if the Hebrew disappeared about A.D. 150 these improvements must all have been made before that date, though perpetuated in late MSS.

7. Place in the Christian Church.—The process whereby the literature of the Hellenic and Syrian Jews was appropriated and inherited by Christians is exceedingly obscure. With this question is connected that of the origin of the Peshitta OT, which is now known to lie behind certain passages in the Greek text of the Gospels, whence it appears to be pre-Christian; just as Christian books of interest were translated into Syriac shortly after their appearance in Christian times, we may suppose the same to have been done with Hebrew books in Jewish times. The work of Ben-Sira formed part of the inheritance taken over by the Christian communities from their predecessors; but, though associated with the canonical books, it failed to obtain admission into the canon; hence it is found in neither of the canons preserved in the HE of Eusebius, who notices the fact (vi. 13) that although ἀντιλεγόμενον it is cited by Clement of Alexandria. That various Christian writers should quote it as by Solomon is not surprising. The Latin version is certainly early, and in a curious language, said to be African Latinity; it appears to have been made from the Greek either directly or indirectly with the help of a copy of the original; for not only does it exhibit the chapters in their right order as does the Syriac, whereas in all copies of the Greek there is a serious transposition of chapters in the middle of the work, but in a considerable number of cases its renderings are explicable on this supposition. An example has been given above.

The other versions add little or nothing to the criticism of the text; of these the Armenian, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Syro-Hexaplar are from the Greek, the Arabic from the Syriac.

8. In Islāmic literature the name of Ben-Sira appears to be unknown, but in spite of this his work is perhaps more frequently cited than any other biblical book. Thus 30¹⁻³ are cited in the Kamil of Mubarrad (i. 45) as the words of 'a sage'; 26. 20 was cited by Malik b. Dinar († A.H. 123=A.D. 740) as 'written in the Wisdom' (Mikhlāt, 49, 16); 18²¹ is cited by Ghazali (Ihyā' ulūm al dīn, iii. 66) as from the Torah; 29²¹ is ascribed to the prophet Muhammad in the Musnad of Ibn Hanbal (i. 62) as is 25² in the Sahih of Muslim (i. 41); while 26²⁶ is cited as 'a tradition' by Yaqt (Dictionary of Learned Men, ed. D. S. Margoliouth, London, 1913, i. 15). Early authors, e.g. the poet Abu Nuwas and the polygraph Jahiz of Basrah, occasionally employ phrases which seem traceable to the book, though there is no suggestion of the source; thus in the Misers of the latter (ed H. van Vloten, Leiden, 1900, p. 99, 12) 'the people call miser one whose loaves are few in number' looks like a reproduction of 34^{24a}; it is, however, difficult to distinguish in such cases between reproduction and coincidence, whence it is likely that the verse of Ibn Hijjah (Cairo, 1304, p. 96), 'death is sweeter than a bitter life,' is his own, though the words are all but identical with those of Sir 30¹⁷.

9. Re-translations.—Re-translation, in the sense of restoring the lost original, is a difficult task, yet somewhat facilitated by the extreme faithfulness of the Greek; it is further aided by comparison with the independent Peshitta Syriac, which seems to have followed a mutilated and partly obliterated copy, which it often paraphrased rather than translated. In recent times the task has been attempted by J. L. Wolfsohn (Ben-Zeb), who followed the Syriac, which he supplemented from a German version of the Greek (³Vienna, 1814). A more scholarly re-translation is that of I. Z. Frankel (re-printed Warsaw, 1894, in a complete version of the Apocrypha made from the Greek). Both these works aim at providing a readable rendering for those who are accustomed to read Hebrew rather than at restoring for philological purposes the ipsissima verba of the original.

In the years 1897-99 considerable fragments were published in Oxford by A. E. Cowley and A. Neubauer, and in Cambridge by S. Schechter and C. Taylor, of a re-translation made in the 10th or 11th cent., which, doubtless owing to its extreme badness, had been consigned to oblivion in an Egyptian Genizah. This was, indeed, mistaken for the original by the editors and for a time by some others, but that it is a re-translation is demonstrated by all the tests that can be applied, and only a few arguments need be adduced here.

(1) It borrows from the Talmud, and not vice versa. In Bab. Erubin 54a the following is quoted: 'My son, if thou hast, do good to thyself, for there is not in Sheol luxury, neither is there to death delay.' This comes originally from Sir 14¹¹, 'Child, according as thou hast, do good to thyself, and offerings to the Lord worthily bring'; v. 12, 'Remember that death will not delay, and a covenant of Hades has not been shown thee'; v. 16, 'Give and take and deceive thy soul, for there is not in Hades to seek luxury.' It is clear that the reminiscence in the Talmud is of vv 11a, 16b, 12a. The Egyptian document for v. 12 gives the two clauses v. 16b and v. 12a in the order in which they appear in the Talmud: 'Remember that there is not in Sheol luxury, neither will death delay.' The clause which in the Greek is v. 16b is here transferred to the place before v. 12a. But when we come to v. 16 we find the same clause repeated: 'Give to a brother and give and indulge thyself; for there is not in Sheol to seek luxury.' The only explanation of this is that, when re-translating v. 1, the translator recollected the Talmudic citation and inserted it whole, without noticing that the clause about Sheol and luxury came later in the copy before him; and when he came to v. 16b he translated it afresh. Practically the same thing is done by Wolfsohn, who inserts the Talmudic quotation as v. 13, but does not repeat the clause about Sheol and luxury in v. 16 because the Syriac omits it.

(2) In numerous places where the Greek and Syriac versions differ slightly, yet quite clearly represent the same original, the Egyptian document has two texts, translating or mistranslating both the Greek and the Syriac. So in 30³⁰ where the Greek has 'eunuch' and the Syriac mhamna, i.e. 'faithful,' but used ordinarily for 'eunuch,' the Egyptian document has two verses, one with 'eunuch' and the other with 'faithful.' Similarly in 30¹⁷, where the Greek has 'Better is death than a bitter life, and eternal rest than constant sickness,' but the Syriac, 'Better is it to die than an evil life, and go down to Sheol than a sickness which is permanent,' the Egyptian document has two verses, one with 'eternal rest' and the other with 'to go down to Sheol.' Since the Greek and the Syriac clearly represent the same original, somewhat differently rendered, it is obvious and certain that the Egyptian document is compiled from the Greek and the Syriac, not vice versa.

(3) The Egyptian document has numerous readings which are easily explicable as mistranslations of Syriac or Greek words, e.g. that already cited of mhamna, 41^{12b}, 'wisdom' for κηγη, which really means 'of injustice,' but would be certainly misrendered thus by one acquainted only with the Jewish Aramaic; 35⁵, 'a judgment of song' for συγκριμα μουσικων (!). Others are explicable by the medium of another language; for it is not probable that the re-translator had access to the Greek directly. This language is identified with certainty as Persian written in the Arabic character by the mistranslation in 43- of διαγγελλον by 'pouring out heat.' This is obviously due to the Persian skhn, which means both 'speech' (its Persian sense) and 'heat' (its Arabic sense). Since the subject is the sun, one who did not remember Ps 19 might not unreasonably think that he poured forth heat rather than speech. Another certain mistranslation from Persian is in 43¹³, 'lightning' for 'snow,' since in this language the words are all but indistinguishable (barq and barf, distinguished by a dot). Besides containing mistranslations this document sometimes absolutely fails to understand the author, e.g. the 'decoy-partridge' of 11³⁰.

(4) Even if the document were not condemned hopelessly by internal evidence, the external evidence would condemn it. As has been seen, the nature of the references in the Oral Tradition makes it certain that the work had been lost before that tradition had been compiled. The only work in which the Egyptian document is quoted is a mediæval squib called Sefar ha Gaon, composed in mockery of the Gaon Saadyah († A.D. 941), though ascribed to him; but even this work is rather against it than in its favour, since it classifies it with a notorious forgery, the Hebrew Hasmonæan Roll, and makes the ludicrous statement that the authors of these works provided them with points and accents—inventions of the 8th cent. at the earliest. The real Saadyah knows Ben-Sira only from the citations in the Talmud. In the pseudo-Josephus, a Hebrew work of the 9th cent., the latter is called Ben-Shirach, a form which must come from the Greek; and in a chronicle of the 11th or 12th cent. (Neubauer, Mediæval Jewish Chronicles, i. 167) his work is called Maqhil, which is a rendering of the Latin Ecclesiasticus. Towards the end of the 10th cent. the author of the Arabic Fihrist mentions the work as in the hands of the Christians, but not of the Jews. When the Gaon Hai († 1038) was asked to account for certain words of Ben-Sira being said in the Talmud to be in the Writings, his reply is 'they were written,' implying that they were so no longer (Teshuboth ha-Gaonim, Lyck, 5624, p. 12).

(5) The appearance of the MS, in which the text is corrected with the greatest licence, resembles an author's brouillon more than a copy of an ancient work.

Against this evidence no argument can be adduced which deserves to be refuted or even cited. Even if it be true that it sometimes has a text which explains both the Greek and the Syriac where they differ, this is fully accounted for by the fact that the re-translator had the two texts before him, and tried to reconcile them; there is no reason why he should not occasionally succeed.

But that the original author should have written a series of verses twice with slight differences, and the Greek and Syriac translators in each case have selected one and selected differently, is a supposition which takes us into the region of sheer impossibility. Moreover, any one mistranslation, such as that of mhaimna above, condemns the whole work absolutely.

Since in Islamic States Jews were regularly associated with Christians in the public bureaux and the medical profession, they saw much of each other, and those Jews who wished to consult Ben-Sira's book could easily do so by borrowing it from their Christian friends; hence it may be suspected that it was translated into Hebrew from Christian copies many times. In the Seder Olam of the 11th or 12th cent., as we have seen, it is quoted from the Latin; and at least one passage of the Egyptian re-translation shows use of the Latin version. This is in 32^o, 'Before thunder there hurries lightning, and before a shamefast man there will precede grace.' The Latin renders this, 'ante grandinem praeibit coruscatio, et ante verecundiam praeibit gratia.' The Egyptian document gives two renderings which agree in substituting 'hail' for 'thunder,' while one repeats נֶגֶם as a rendering of praeivit, but a very erroneous one, since the Hebrew verb means (as Gesenius renders it) 'cantum praeivit.' Since lightning precedes not hail, but thunder, this Latin is a certain mis-rendering of the original. But why the re-translator should in this case have called in its assistance and in what medium is unknown.

SLAVE, SLAVERY.—1. Universal prevalence in the Apostolic Age.—Slavery was a conspicuous and unchallenged feature of the social order into the midst of which Christianity was born. Modern readers easily fail to realize its presence in the background of the NT Scriptures, so great are the social changes that have been brought about in the course of time, and so much is the harsh fact softened by the phrasing of our versions. The AV 'servant,' with its present connotation, is a very mild equivalent for δούλος; the RV 'bond-servant' is clearer, but is still a euphemistic substitute for 'slave'—the term which exactly represents what the δούλος of the NT really was. In the only instance in which the EVV use the term 'slaves' in the NT (Rev 13¹³) it represents a late but significant use of σώμα ('body'). Similarly, the EVV 'master' stands for terms (whether δέσποτης or the commoner κύριος) that imply ownership. The existence of slavery must have lent special vividness and point to the early use of redemption as a figure to describe the experience of salvation.

In the old civilization of the world slavery appears as a most natural and inevitable fact. The well-known Code of Hammurabi, fragmentary as it is, affords us considerable insight into the social conditions of Babylonia as existing more than twenty centuries before the Christian era. Therein we have a number of remarkable laws regulating relations between slaves and their owners, side by side with others dealing with the wages payable for the employment of different kinds of free labour. And, most probably with a real relation to this older legal system, we have at a later period the Mosaic legislation similarly embodying slave laws, slavery having been just as much a recognized part of the system of things among the Hebrews as among other ancient peoples. Only the Pentateuchal Code (or Codes) must be admitted to be marked by a conspicuous humanity in this as in some other respects, and especially in the Deuteronomic form (see, e.g., Dt 15¹²). The existence of slavery, indeed, was so old and general a phenomenon in human history that St. Augustine could explain it only as a result of sin, so sure was he that it was not the Divine intention that man should own and lord it over his fellow-man (de Civ. Dei, xix. 15). (St. Chrysostom takes a similar line in Hom. xl. ad 1 Cor. x. 5.) Incidentally he comments more suo on the fact that the term 'servus' first appears in Scripture in the strange Genesis story of the curse of Canaan (Gn 9²⁵)—a source whence, curiously enough, many a Christian owner of negro slaves in modern times has derived 'flattering unction' in defence of his position.

But never was slavery more conspicuous as a social institution than it was in the Roman Empire in the 1st cent. A.D. Numerous wars of conquest had swollen the numbers of the slave class to an enormous extent: for all prisoners of war were made slaves as a matter of course. Slave-dealers followed the armies on their campaigns and purchased on the spot those who were taken captive. Indeed, St. Augustine (loc. cit.) gives currency to a popular etymology of the term 'servus,' deriving it from the verb 'servare.' The serrus was a man who might justly have been slain, but was preserved alive by the conqueror, though inevitably doomed to lose his freedom. There was, moreover, a regular slave-trade carried on in the East, the markets being abundantly supplied from the barbarous tribes of Western Asia. Barbarians were regarded as being naturally designed to be the slaves of their superiors—a sentiment not wholly wanting even yet in many white people towards the 'inferior races.'

As in the Greek States at an earlier period the slaves numbered four or five times as many as the citizens proper, so the proportion in the Roman Empire must have been similarly great. Thus Pliny (HN xxxiii. 47) mentions a wealthy Roman, named Claudius Isidorus, of the time of Augustus, who left by will 4116 slaves as part of his possessions. When, too, it was proposed that slaves should wear a distinctive dress, the proposal was abandoned lest this should reveal their strength; and Roman history had already furnished evidence of grim possibilities in the serious slave wars of Sicily which occurred in the latter part of the 2nd cent. B.C. Similar considerations caused the enactment of severe laws that supplied drastic in terrorem methods for keeping slaves in subjection. Tacitus mentions the case of Pedanius Secundus, prefect of the city, who had been murdered by one of his slaves, and under a law requiring that, should a slave kill his master, all the slaves of the same household should forfeit their lives, some 400 of the culprit's fellow-slaves were put to death at Rome A.D. 61 (Ann. xiv. 42).

2. The 'libertini.'—As an outcome of the system of slavery, the class of libertini or freedmen, which formed so conspicuous a feature of Roman society, calls for passing notice. These were citizens who either had actually been slaves themselves aforetime or were the immediate descendants of freed slaves. They must have far outnumbered the free-born, and possessed overwhelming influence in the State. Manumission was of frequent occurrence. The enormous numbers of captives reduced to slavery after every war, and the frequent fluctuations in great Roman establishments, all tended to make manumission easy. Many slaves were permitted by their masters to accumulate savings and purchase their freedom with the money. Sometimes the enfranchisement was accomplished by the solemn rite of fictitious purchase on the part of some divinity. The slave first paid the purchase money which he had saved into the treasury of some temple: then owner and slave went together to the temple, and the latter was supposed to be sold to the god, the price being duly paid to the master. The slave became technically the property of the god (and was indeed regarded as his protégé), but was to all intents and purposes, and especially as regards his former master, a completely free man. In inscriptions and papyri frequent references are to be found to slaves who had been bought by this or that god for freedom. The practice sheds much light on the argument pursued by St. Paul in Gal 4. 5 (see A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East [Eng. tr., London, 1911, p. 326]). Manumission was often regarded as a normal result of faithful service. A man would emancipate slaves in individual cases during his own life-time, whilst very commonly a master would set a multitude at liberty on his death-bed or by will. But such wholesale emancipation was attended with evils of its own. One result was to flood the citizens' roll with crowds of 'undesirables.' On this account Augustus ordained (lex Furia Caninia, A.D. 8) that in no case should more than 100 slaves be emancipated by will.

When a slave was set free not by a legal but by an extra-legal process, i.e. by a simple exercise of authority on the part of his master, a kind of feudal tie still united the two. The freedman was his master's cliens, his master being now known as his patronus. A Roman noble depended very much on the multitude of his 'clients' for his political and social importance. Only in the third generation did these restrictions disappear and the family of the freedman come into the enjoyment of complete liberty. But the power possessed by this class in the early Christian period was very great: emancipated slaves or their descendants occupied all kinds of State offices. The libertini, too, prospered greatly in trade and commerce, being, indeed, as a class notorious for their ambition to amass wealth. The literature of the early Empire exhibits many of them as playing the part of the nouveaux riches and vulgarly emulating the luxury of aristocratic palaces.

3. Evils of slavery.—The evils of slavery were manifold, deep-seated, far-reaching. If, as Matthew Arnold puts it,

'On that hard Pagan world disgust
And secret loathing fell.
Deep weariness and sated lust
Made human life a hell'
(Übermann once More, lines 93-96), the evils of slavery contributed materially to that result.

(a) The slave population was necessarily a hot-bed of vice, contaminating all who came into contact with it. Moral excellence was not expected in a slave. He was only 'an animated chattel' (κίνημα ἐμψύχον): a tool could similarly be described as 'an inanimate slave' (ἄψυχος δούλος). (Cf. Varro's classification of implements, in de Re rust. i. xvii. 1: (1) those with voice and speech, e.g. slaves; (2) those with voice but not speech, e.g. oxen; (3) those without voice, e.g. wagons.) The term 'slaves' occurs only once in EVV of the NT, viz. in Rev 18¹³ as a crowning item in Babylon's merchandise: and there it represents σώματα ('bodies'). How significant that σώμα thus came to denote a slave! The somewhat similar use of the term 'hands' in modern industrialism—with subtle possibilities of suggestion lurking in the use—has often been remarked upon. Vast numbers of slaves hailed from Greece, from Western Asia, and from Egypt, whose great cities were the notorious seats of the wildest abominations; and their vices flourished with unimpeded growth.

(b) Luxury and extravagance increased in society as slaves increased in numbers and were more easily acquired. Friedlander points out that in great houses large numbers of slaves were kept merely for ostentatious display. Their service was often limited to ridiculously insignificant functions. Some had only to act as torch-bearers, or as street-attendants: there were instances in which slaves had merely 'to serve as clocks and announce the hours' (Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire, ii. 219). Masters and mistresses were thus spared every kind of personal exertion. Clement of Alexandria gives a scathing account of these evils in Pedagogus, iii. 4.

(c) A tyrannical and ferocious spirit found easy development in the masters. There was always the temptation to treat slaves worse than dogs. Moreover, an iron rule seemed the only means of keeping slaves in subjection and guarding against outbreaks of violence. Masters could not feel perfectly sure even of slaves born on their estates, how much less of those who could be described as a rabble of various nationalities! (Tacitus, Ann. xiv. 44). This state of things gave rise to the proverb: 'Quot servi, tot hostes.' The master might reckon every slave he had as a foe.

(d) The economic influence of slavery was disastrous. Trade and labour came more and more to be carried on by slaves. Poor citizens found themselves almost entirely excluded from ways of getting an honourable livelihood, and suffered degradation in consequence. Many even came to regard trade with repugnance. They betook themselves to corrupt and corrupting occupations, as actors, pantomimes, hired gladiators, political spies, and the like. Large numbers lived in idleness, having corn given them as a right and amusements gratuitously provided ('panem et circenses').

(e) Friedlander and others emphasize as the most revolting feature of slavery its 'contemptuous disregard of human dignity' (op. cit., p. 221). But this is to speak from a modern point of view. We may well agree with J. S. Mill that what most injures and dishonours a country is 'the personal slavery of human beings'; but it has taken the world many centuries to realize this. The average Roman citizen of the 1st cent. would be incapable of such a sentiment.

4. The better side of things.—There must, however, have been not a few lights to relieve the heavy shadows of such a system. Instances are not wanting of kindly affection in masters and of loyal devotion in slaves. Tacitus tells of the slave-girls of Octavia who braved torture and death in defence of her good name (Ann. xiv. 60). Slaves were to be found who preferred to remain slaves even when offered the chance of manumission (see the case of a slave belonging to the famous Mæcenas referred to by Suetonius, de Gramm. Illustr. 21). Dt 15^{1st}, it may be remembered, provides for such a case as a quite possible thing as regards slavery among the Hebrews. There must have been many houses like that of the younger Pliny, in which, as Seneca says, slaves were regarded as 'humble friends and real members of the family' (Ep. 47. See also de Benef. iii. 21). Inscriptions, again, often reveal a better side of slave life, testifying to mutual love between master and servant, and also to faithful love between slave-husband and wife, even though de iure slaves could not occupy the status of matrimony (Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, p. 117).

Many a slave found some amelioration of his lot in being (with his master's permission) a member of one of the numerous collegia or sodalities which formed such a feature of plebeian society in those days. These clubs or unions, as an institution, were of great antiquity, and were maintained 'for protection against oppression, for mutual sympathy and support, for relief from the deadly dullness of an obscure and sordid life' (Dill, op. cit., p. 256). In their gatherings fraternity found expression: slave could meet with freeman on equal terms and fully share in the same rights and privileges. Such guilds, indeed, most probably furnished to some extent the model on which the first societies of Christians were formed.

It must also be said that from the time of Augustus onwards a growingly humane sentiment made itself felt in legislation which decidedly improved the condition of the slave. The fact, also, that many people of superior ability, such as physicians, sculptors, and litterateurs, were of this class made legislative reforms urgent. The mass of laws dealing with slavery was immense (see Buckland, The Roman Law of Slavery). By the changes that were made from time to time the absolute power of masters over slaves for life or death was curtailed. Thus, the Lex Petronia (in the time of Augustus or Nero) prohibited masters from condemning slaves to fight with wild beasts unless with judicial sanction. Under Nero, a special judge was appointed to hear complaints of slaves, and now masters could be punished for ill-treating them. There is on record a case in which Hadrian exiled a Roman lady for five years for treating her slaves with atrocious cruelty.

5. Christianity and slavery.—One thing is clear, however surprising it may seem to some: it was no part of the Christian propaganda to attack slavery as a system and seek its overthrow. But, as B. F. Westcott incidentally remarks, 'the abolition of slavery would have seemed in the first age more impossible than universal peace' (Lessons from Work, London, 1901, p. 179). The existing social order was accepted as a fact. The Christian message addressed itself primarily to men in themselves. It had nothing to say as to their environment, their social status, the government and laws under which they lived—except so far as there were usages and characteristics of society to be denounced (e.g. idolatry, impurity, cruelty) as in deadly conflict with the cultivation of Christian character. So far from directly advocating efforts to effect social changes, Christianity rather counselled its adherents to acquiesce in their condition, though, as far as the servile class was concerned, their lot too commonly was degraded and hopeless.

Jesus Himself used the relation of master and slave to illustrate His teaching, without any word condemning slavery as an evil in itself (see, e.g., Mt 18²³). So, too, St. Paul in his Epistles has nothing to say against the institution. Indeed, in one important passage (1 Co 7²⁰⁻⁴) he definitely counsels slave converts to stay contentedly in their lot, even if they should have an opportunity to become free. The rendering of the EVV ('use it rather') is enigmatical; and certainly from early times some have understood the Apostle's phrase (μᾶλλον χρῆσαι) thus rendered to mean, 'take your freedom, if you can get it,' but there is more to be said for viewing it as counselling them to stay as they were. (RVm dimly indicates this.) Again, in his letter to Philemon (that little classic in the literature of slavery), St. Paul does not dream of suggesting that Onesimus should be set at liberty because he has become a Christian. Nor is this attitude to be explained merely by the fact that St. Paul was absorbed in the expectation of the Parousia and the break-up of all society in the near future (as A. E. Garvie suggests in Studies of Paul and his Gospel, London, 1911, pp. 73, 304). Rather, surely, slavery was so ancient and established a feature in the social framework as to be regarded as quite natural. Besides, in the Apostle's eyes, a slave could be as good a Christian as a freeman. The life of faith, the spiritual experience, was the one thing that mattered; and 'in Christ' the distinction between slave and freeman, like other distinctions, was of no moment (Col 3¹¹, etc.). And then, did not the Lord Himself assume the μορφή δούλου?—a consideration repeatedly used by the Fathers of the Early Church in consoling and encouraging believers who were slaves.

From the first both slaves and slave-owners were found in the ranks of the Christian society. No doubt the greater proportion of converts to the Faith came from the servile class—witness St. Paul's references in 1 Co 1 and elsewhere; but, as Friedlander says, the evangel 'certainly penetrated often enough from the cell of the slave to the house of the master' (op. cit., iii. 195). There was many another Philemon as well as many another Onesimus. Otherwise there would be little point in the reiterated NT counsels addressed to masters and slaves. Athenagoras, the 2nd cent. apologist, mentions as a simple matter of fact: 'We have slaves, some more and some fewer' (Apol. 35). In the persecution at Lyons, A.D. 177, pagan slaves gave evidence against their Christian masters (Eusebius, HE v. 1). And, again, from Constantine's time onwards we find numerous laws in operation dealing with the case of Christian slaves. Thus, Jews (against whom, especially as proselytizers, strict laws also existed in the Early Empire) were forbidden to possess such.

Yet the principles of Christianity were bound in time to act as powerful solvents on this institution. They contributed to its ultimate downfall. For one thing, Christianity set up a new order of relations that did not recognize class-distinctions. Master and slave sat together at the Agape, received the sacred elements together, and joined together in public worship. The Epistle to Philemon, though written to restore a runaway slave to his master, had within it the seeds of revolution in the words, 'No longer as a bond-servant, but . . . a brother beloved' (v. 16). In penitential discipline, wrongs done to a slave were not distinguished from wrongs done to a freeman. Church legislation carefully guarded the chastity of female slaves. Slave-birth was no bar to admission to the priesthood: e.g. Callistus, a 3rd cent. bishop of Rome, was originally a slave. Many names of slaves appear in the roll of the martyrs, and the memories of such as Blandina, Felicitas, and Vitalis, who suffered in the persecutions of the first two centuries, received highest honour.

Again, Christianity placed a high value on what might be called servile virtues—the qualities that any master would esteem as most desirable in his slaves. Humility, obedience, patience, gentleness, resignation are cardinal virtues in a Christian. Jesus said to His disciples, when speaking of the high-handed exercise of authority and power in the world, 'Not so shall it be among you' (Mt 20²⁶), and apostolic teaching followed the same line. It emphasized qualities that paganism neglected or under-rated, as was only natural since Roman society in general held slaves in utter contempt.

Primitive Christian teaching, however, in relation to the various duties of life, kept the balance even as between masters and slaves. That teaching in its essence still supplies the fundamental principle for regulating similar relations (masters and servants, employers and employees) under whatever changed conditions they may continue to exist. Masters were warned against a tyrannical spirit, a disdainful inhumanity; slaves were counselled to avoid 'eye-service' and do their work as for Christ

(Eph 6^{5a}), and even to be patiently submissive towards hard masters (1 P 2¹⁸). So also the Didache (4) exhorts Christian masters not to show harshness towards their slaves, 'whose hope is in the same God,' and slaves to submit to their lords as being a type, or copy, of God. The regulating consideration for both parties is summarily given in the so-called Apostolic Constitutions (iv. 12); it is their common humanity—'even as he is a man.' The warning addressed to slaves in 1 Ti 6¹⁴ is noticeable, and by no means superfluous, human nature being what it is. If their masters were fellow-believers, they were not to despise them, 'because they are brethren.' Similarly Ignatius (Ep. ad Polyc. 4): 'Do not despise slaves, yet neither let them be puffed up with conceit, but rather submit themselves the more (sc. as Christian slaves with Christian masters) for the glory of God.' He adds: 'Let them not long to be set free at the public expense, lest they be found slaves to their own desires.' With the continuance of slavery in the Christian era the need for such counsels continued. How imperfectly Christians sometimes followed them may be gathered from the simple fact that the Synod of Elvira (c. A.D. 300) could legislate for the possibility that a Christian mistress might whip her handmaid to death (Canon v.).

The Church also in the course of time sought to bring about practical ameliorations of the state of servitude. A surprising illustration of this is afforded by Apostolic Constitutions, viii. 33, where it is laid down that slaves are to be exempt from labour at all the great ecclesiastical seasons, on the days of apostles and martyrs, and on both the Jewish Sabbath and the Lord's Day. The reference to enfranchisement 'at the public expense' found in the quotation from Ignatius given above points also to the encouragement given by Christianity to the liberation of slaves as its influence increased. Christian slaves, as such, had no claim to help from the Church in order to purchase their freedom, yet cases occurred in which such help was given. After the time of Constantine still more is heard of the manumission of slaves by Christian masters. It came to be regarded as a meritorious, and even expiatory, act.

It must be fully admitted that in the ancient non-Christian world there were those who felt the manifold evils of slavery. Sentiments of enlarged philanthropy were not wanting. Among the Jews, the community of the Essenes, with their interesting experiment in social reconstruction, must not be forgotten. Philo says: 'There is not a slave amongst them, but all are free' (Quod omnis probus liber, 12). The Stoics held the fraternity of mankind. 'We are members of one great body,' says Seneca (Ep. 95), and the same spirit breathes in many of his writings. Cicero, too, emphatically proclaims universal brotherhood (see, e.g., de Officiis, iii. 6). Still, such voices were comparatively rare. Men for the most part acquiesced in the system: some argued for its necessity. It is idle to ask if humaner sentiments would have gained force in time and brought about the overthrow of slavery, had Christianity not emerged. All that we know is that Christianity, with all its imperfections, is the one power that has most effectively led to such a result.

6. In no instance has the incubus of slavery been easily or speedily removed. Serfdom, that modified form of slavery, lingered in Europe well into the last century. In Scotland colliers were legally serfs up to the end of the 18th cent.; and Archibald Geikie (Scottish Reminiscences, Glasgow, 1904, p. 341) speaks of having talked in his boyhood with men and women who had been born in servitude and had worked as serfs in the pits of Midlothian. And long after the system itself in any particular instance has disappeared, its baneful effects are clearly traceable, sometimes in conditions of national decadence, as Wallon says regarding Greece: 'degradation of the man, disorganization of the family, ruin of the States—these were the certain effects of slavery' (Histoire de l'esclavage dans l'antiquité, i. 452). Our very language, too, bears witness to long-lingering legacies in character and temper derived from this source, e.g. in 'servility' and a 'domineering' spirit—both hateful things.

Slavery still exists in various parts of the world, and anti-slavery campaigns are not unnecessary. The sons of freedom themselves sometimes succumb to the temptation to make slaves practically of their weaker fellow-men. If the cause of world-wide liberty for men is to prosper, the teaching of the NT must have full effect given to it. Christians have, indeed, sometimes defended slavery (as in America), and often failed to carry out the Christian doctrine of brotherhood: but the doctrine is there, and its corollary is liberty. Nor has Christianity wholly failed in exemplifying both brotherhood and the passion for freedom. It is surely bias that makes I. Benzinger hold up Islam and ancient Israel as perfect examples of 'the brotherhood in the faith,' and declare that this 'has come to be, in the Christian world, a mere empty phrase' (art. 'Slavery,' in EBi iv. 4658; also in his *Hebräische Archäologie*², Tübingen, 1907, art. 'Sklaven').

SLEEP.—The English word 'sleep,' derived from O.E. slepan, denotes that normal periodic condition of the organism in which the inactivity of certain nerve centres is accompanied by unconsciousness, more or less complete. In the OT the two most common words are the noun נִמְנוּם, 'sleep,' and the verbs, נָמַן, 'to rest in sleep,' and נָמַן, 'to lie down to rest,' the latter being the most frequent to describe the condition of those who were laid to rest with their fathers, and who thus sleep in death. In the NT the noun ὕπνος means sleep proper, whilst the verbs καθεύδω, 'to lie down to rest,' and κοιμάσθαι, 'to fall asleep,' are in most common use. Both these words refer to ordinary sleep, and in a symbolic manner they are employed with reference to death. Christ uses the former in describing the condition of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9²⁴, Mk 5³⁹, Lk 8⁵²), and the latter in respect of Lazarus (Jn 11¹¹). In both these cases natural death is spoken of by Christ as 'sleep,' on the ground doubtless that through the exercise of His miraculous power this 'sleep' would be followed by an awakening in the present world. As in the OT, sleep is used in the Apostolic Church as a euphemistic term for death. Stephen is said to have fallen asleep when he died as the effects of stoning (Ac 7⁶⁰). According to St. Paul, true believers live and die unto the Lord, under the symbolism of waking and sleeping respectively (1 Th 5¹⁰); hence the beautiful phrases occur, 'fallen asleep in Christ' (1 Co 15¹⁸) and 'those who sleep (or are fallen asleep) in Jesus' (1 Th 4¹⁴). Sleep is also used as a symbol of spiritual torpor and death, especially in several of our Lord's parables; hence the duty of watchfulness (Mt 25¹³, etc.). St. Paul is emphatic in warning men against that suspension of spiritual activity which is implied in sleep, inasmuch as Christians are the children of the day (1 Th 5⁶⁻⁷) and not of the night, and he calls upon them to awake out of sleep (Ro 13¹¹, Eph 5¹⁴).

Sleep has always been a profound mystery, and it is still the crux in physiology and psychology. The avenues of sense are closed and the mind is detached from the outside world. There is something awe-inspiring in the motionless face of the sleeper, temporarily deprived of sight and movement, the torpor of muscle and nerve and the unresponsiveness of the whole organism presenting a striking contrast to the same personality when completely awake. All the activities are lowered, the pulse falls about one-fifth, the circulation is slower, the process of nutrition is retarded and the excitation of the nerves diminished. Whilst the central activity is slowed, it is a moot point whether there is a greater or a less quantity of blood in the brain during sleep, and there is also some doubt with regard to the state of the blood itself. It is believed that the 'tensional forces' have a chance of recuperating themselves during the muscular inactivity induced by sleep and by the diminished production of heat. Whilst the nerves are in a less excitable condition during sleep, the organic processes, which are still continued in a less active degree, make themselves felt in dreams. The mental activity, liberated from the effort of attention to outward objects, may co-operate with the organic sensations to work up the materials of dream-fancies.

F. W. H. Myers, in harmony with his own theories, treats sleep as a positive and definite phase of personality co-ordinate with the waking phase. He contends that in special cases the power over the muscles is much greater than during the waking consciousness. The mind is set free from the activity of the organism to pursue its own quest, and it is refreshed and enriched thereby for the tasks of ordinary waking life. Like genius, it draws upon unknown and spiritual sources, and is exempt from the limitations of connexion with nerves and brain. It is not surprising, therefore, that sleep should appear to the onlooker as 'Death's twin-brother' and that the old Hebrews should have committed their dead to the tomb with the reflexion that they had fallen asleep and were laid to rest with their fathers. And all through the ages death has been spoken of as a sleep, but with far more appropriateness under Christian influence, as with the Christian's hope there will be a glorious awaking to life at its fullest and best. Since we discriminate amongst our experiences, as to whether we are dreaming or fully awake, by the higher degree of vividness and of the sense of activity as well as by the deeper conviction of reality in the latter states, so may we be led to expect that when we see things as they are, sub specie æternitatis, our experience will be analogous at least to awaking out of sleep, and our earthly life found to be the stuff of which dreams are made. SMOKE (καπνός).—Smoke is the visible vapour or volatile matter which escapes from a burning substance. It is one of the commonest categories of apocalyptic prophecy. In St. John's imagery the smoke of incense (q.v.), with (or rather 'for', i.e. 'in aid of') the prayers of saints, goes up before God (Rev 8⁴). The heavenly temple is filled with smoke from the glory of God (15⁸, Is 6⁴), a symbol of the dark and mysterious side of His self-manifestation, representing perhaps the reaction of His holiness against sin. The prophet Joel's omens of blood and fire and vapour of smoke (Ac 2¹⁹ || Jl 2³⁰) may refer either to carnage and destruction in war or to lurid appearances in Nature. The smoke which issues from the opened pit of the abyss, darkening sun and air like the smoke of a great furnace (καμνόν), and resolving itself into demons in the form of locusts (Rev 9²⁻³), was suggested either by the mephitic fumes emitted from chasms and caverns, or the clouds of vapour rising from hot springs, or the fire and smoke belched forth by volcanoes, all of which phenomena seemed to the pre-scientific mind to be connected with a subterranean Hades. Out of the mouths of the apocalyptic horses, which have the heads of lions, there come fire and smoke (9¹⁷), as from the mouth of Leviathan (Job 41²⁰; cf. Dionede's horses, Lucret. de Rerum nat. v. 29). The smoke of the torment of Caesar-worshippers goes up for ever in sight of the holy angels and the Lamb (Rev 14¹¹), a weird conception suggested by Enoch, xxvii. 2, 3, xlviii. 9, xc. 26, 27. The smoke of burning Babylon—Imperial Rome—resembling that of the cities of the Plain (Gn 19²⁸), is seen from afar by the kings of the earth (Rev 18⁹) and all shipmasters and mariners (18¹⁷), as it ascends for ever and ever (19³).

SMYRNA (Σμύρνα).—Smyrna has been an important city for at least 3000 years. Occupying one of the most beautiful and commanding positions in the eastern Ægean coastland, at the head of a deep and sheltered gulf, it has had a very chequered but honourable history, and it is to-day by far the most prosperous city in Asia Minor having a quarter of a million inhabitants. 'Old Smyrna'—ἡ παλαιὰ Σμύρνα (Strabo, XIV. i. 37)—was colonized by the Æolians, captured from them by the Ionians, and almost destroyed (in the 7th cent. B.C.) by the Lydians. It lay under Mt. Sipylus, 2 or 3 miles N. of 'New Smyrna,' which was founded by Lysimachus (c. 290 B.C.), and built along the southern shore of the Gulf and up the slopes of Mt. Pagos, the westernmost spur of the Tmolus range.

Smyrna was the emporium for the trade of the fertile Hermus valley, and the terminus of one of the great roads from the interior of Asia Minor. It was noted for its carefully-planned streets—one of them called 'Golden Street'—and splendid public buildings. Its citizens owed much to their sagacious friendship with Rome. As early as 195 B.C. they dedicated a shrine to Roma, and in all the struggles of the next two centuries Smyrna was invariably on the Roman—that is, the winning—side. She was rewarded for her fidelity by being constituted a civitas libera et immunitis, and under Tiberius she was chosen from among twelve keen rivals, of whom Sardis was the most powerful, to have the honour of building a temple to the Emperor (Tacitus, Ann. iv. 55f.).

The message to Smyrna in Rev. (2⁸⁻¹¹) is at once the briefest and the most eulogistic of all the Seven Letters. Like the others, it unquestionably contains a number of pointed local allusions. Words which may now seem pale and neutral were deeply significant to the first readers. St. John knew each of his churches almost as a living personality, and no touch is superfluous or irrelevant in his clearly-conceived and carefully-etched portraits. The title which he chooses for the Sender of the letters is in every instance apposite. The message to Smyrna comes from 'the First and the Last' (v. 8). Smyrna was the most ambitious of all the cities of Asia, and her municipal self-consciousness was inordinately developed. She could brook no rivals; she coveted all the honours and prizes; she appropriated the title πρώτη Ἀσίας. Her claim to be first in beauty was scarcely disputed, Strabo (XIV. i. 37) calling her καλλίστη πασῶν. She counted the greatest of poets one of her sons—though many other cities questioned the claim—and built a Homereion in his honour. She convinced the Roman Senate that she 'first reared a temple to the city of Rome' (Tacitus, Ann. iv. 56), and she wished to be first, as a νεωκοπος or temple-warden, to pay divine honours to the Emperor. She was like the Homeric hero whom nothing would satisfy but αἰὲν ἀριστεύειν, καὶ ὑπερποχὸν ἔμμεναι Ἀλλων (Il. vi. 208). To this 'First City' comes a letter from the First and the Last. Let her but once recognize His primacy, and she is likely to revise all her civic ideals, to renounce all her self-centred ambitions. Her first and most illustrious citizens will be her martyrs. Her standard of comparison will no longer be Ephesus or Sardis or Pergamos or even Rome, but the City of God, in which the last is first.
